PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL—METHOD OF CONSIDERATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I dislike starting the new school period with problems. However, in pursuit of my duty I must raise a question of privilege, notice of which I have given to Your Honour. I consider it to be an exceptionally serious issue, Mr. Speaker. It is one that would be very serious under any conditions, but at this stage of this Parliament, when opposition members have experienced through three sessions the rather arrogant attempts by this authoritarian government to cut the heart out of the parliamentary process, it is even more important that this question be raised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The matter I raise has some implications for the Chair as the guardian of our rights and privileges and the protector of minority parties in the House, and to some extent it also affects the officers and staff of the standing committees.

On December 16, after debate, the House gave second reading to Bill C-180 dealing with packaging and labelling, a measure that can be of great importance to many people. To facilitate passage of the bill, members of the opposition—certainly all members of this party—agreed to a restricted debate so that the bill could be given second reading and referred to the committee. At that time the minister quite properly stated there would be ample opportunities when the committee sat for members of the public who may be interested to appear before that committee, although the minister made it quite plain that he was only speaking as a member of the House and that it was up to the committee to decide its own procedure. I should add that the order was in the usual form with no restrictions on the right of the committee to hear evidence. Under Standing Order 65(8) there is ample opportunity for members of the public to appear before the committee, and there were no restrictions in that regard.

Two days after the bill received second reading the House recessed until today and as far as I can tell from examining the records and through discussions with committee members there has been no meeting of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to which the bill was referred. The bill has never been considered, nor has there been any decision as to the method of procedure. Yet on December 29 a letter was sent over the signature of the clerk of the committee to Mr. Ernie Steele of the Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada, who had previously been in touch with the committee clerk about making representations on the bill. Mr. Steele received this letter the next day, and I must put part of it on the record. It refers to a previous letter from Mr. Steele which had been brought to the attention of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), to whom I gave notice that I would be raising this question today. It stated:

> Your letter of November 16, 1970, has been brought to the attention of Mr. Steve Otto, Chairman of the Committee, who has requested me to advise you as follows:
> When the committee is considering a subjectmatter, outside witnesses will be invited to appear in order to present briefs and answer questions.
> During its consideration of bills, the committee will hear only the minister and departmental officials; furthermore, briefs can be submitted but not presented orally at sittings of the committee. Therefore, if you wish to submit a brief on Bill C-180, for distribution to the members of the committee (an up-to-date list is attached), please send me, at your earliest convenience, 25 copies in English and, if possible, 10 copies in French.
> The Chairman suggests that you might wish to contact individual Members of Parliament who could support your views, through members of committee who could be the spokesmen for your group; when the committee is considering the bill, Members of Parliament would be welcome to attend and be available to the members of the committee for the purpose of information, argument, etc., when the minister and departmental officials are being examined.
> The Chairman feels it would be just as effective to have your case presented as per the procedure outlined above as it would be if it were presented directly.

In passing, I must say I am amazed at the attitude of the hon. member for York East who two years ago circularized a statement to all his constituents in which he said that in his view the committee procedure of the House was not working successfully because the government was insisting that all committee members must do what they were told. He was not a chairman, then.

I suspect that this outrageous attempt to circumscribe the operations of a committee of the House involves more than just the opinion of the chairman. The wording used, the detail in the letter and the way in which proposed rules are laid down, together with previous statements I have heard, indicate that the government is laying its heavy hand on the committees and has issued instructions to chairmen, committee officials and possibly to its own members to act in this way. I suggest that more than just the internal operations of the committee are involved when a letter of this kind is sent over the signature of the clerk of the committee, apparently on the instructions of the chairman.

Incidentally, I hold no brief for the particular organization I have mentioned. I am sure that these people, together with representatives of consumer groups and others, wish to appear and speak for themselves. Instead, apparently they are to be allowed only to present briefs and to involve members of this House as lobbyists representing special interests. This is a grave situation and I maintain it cannot be permitted to pass without question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I could say a great deal more, but I submit a prima facie case of privilege has been made out. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this letter and the questions involved I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to examine the whole question of this letter dated December 29th and sent by the Clerk of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to Mr. C. G. E. Steele, and all of the surrounding and relevant circumstances, including any specific instructions the Clerk might have received and what general instructions have been issued to the Committees Branch.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that he cannot make such a motion unless the Chair has decided that there is a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is not prepared to receive the motion at this time. The Chair will allow the hon. member for York East to say a few words in reply since his conduct as chairman of the committee has been particularly impugned. Thereafter the Chair will take the matter under advisement.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, this is a nice way to start the second part of the session. May I point out to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) that this is not a question of privilege. The committee is master of its own proceedings; I believe Your Honour has held that to be so many times. It was the steering committee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs that decided some two years ago that when a bill is considered only departmental officials and the minister are to be heard and that when a subject matter is considered witnesses will be invited. A representative of the hon. gentleman sat on the steering committee and so did others. This decision was approved unanimously by the committee, and these are the rules that are being followed today.

Unlike the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, may I advise you that the minister did not have anything to do with this. Indeed, I had to reprimand the minister for presuming to tell the committee how its business should be conducted. The committee is conducting its business in accordance with the ruling made by the committee. The committee can still change its mind if it wants to; that will be up to the committee.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There can only be one question of privilege before the House at a time.

Mrs. MacInnis: This is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has indicated that no debate will be allowed at this time. I do not think there should be a debate. If the hon. member has another question of privilege I will hear it in a moment, but in any event I indicated that the first matter would be taken under advisement. If the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a different question of privilege, I will now hear her.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, it is equally well a point of order. My point is that an inaccurate statement has been made by the chairman of the committee and as a member of the steering committee I want to set it right. May I do so?

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mrs. MacInnis: The chairman made the point that the steering committee had decided that no witnesses would appear when legislation was referred to the committee. We did not make any such decision, Mr. Speaker. We made the decision that when the subject matter of a bill had already been discussed by the committee we would not consider it necessary to hear witnesses after second reading. The subject matter of the packaging and labelling bill has not been before the committee at any time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE LATE JOSEPH-ALFRED MONGRAIN

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I refer with the deepest sorrow to the death of Mr. Joseph-Alfred Mongrain, the member for Trois-Rivières, who passed away on December 23.

A member since 1965, Mr. Mongrain was devoted to the interests of the citizens of his riding and gave constant proof of his untiring dedication to his work. His active participation in municipal affairs well prepared him for the role he was to play in the House of Commons. Mr. Mongrain leaves behind him the memory of a generous man, a man of ideas, independent in spirit, for whom politics was a total commitment.

I know that all members join with me in paying tribute to his memory and in extending the sympathy of this House to his family and friends.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the tribute paid by the Acting Prime Minister to the late Mr. Mongrain. He was a man with whom we all had very pleasant relations, a man who displayed the ability to discuss matters in the House with vigour without in any way affecting personal relationships. We all feel that the House has suffered a very real loss. As the Acting Prime Minister has said, he was a man of real independence of spirit. He sat in the House as an independent member for some time.

I wish to join with the Acting Prime Minister in expressing our regrets, our sorrow and our sympathy to the members of his family.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members were both astonished and appalled to learn of the passing of Mr. Mongrain, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, during the Christmas-New Years recess.

Mr. Mongrain was a friendly man who I think had the respect of members in all parts of the House. He was one of those rare politicians who are comparatively free of bitter partisanship. Every year he brought a delegation from his constituency to visit Parliament Hill and invited members of other parties to come and meet them. He was popular not only in the House but in his own constituency as indicated by the fact that he was twice mayor of Trois-Rivières and for one term was president of the conference of Canadian mayors.

His death is a serious loss to this chamber and to the party with which he was associated. The members of the New Democratic Party wish, through you, Sir, to express to Madame Mongrain and her children and to the people of Trois-Rivières our deep regret at the great loss which they and we have suffered.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues of the Ralliement créditiste and myself were astounded to learn of the sudden demise of Mr. Mongrain, member for Trois-Rivières. We will certainly miss him, for he was remarkably clever and had a sense of humour. Even though we could not always agree with his opinions, it was nevertheless possible to exchange views with him. I would like to join all the other members to offer the stricken family our most sincere sympathy.

Question No. 203—Mr. MacRae:

Have any surveys been made within the past twelve months regarding the extension of the runways of the Fredericton Airport?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No, however, the Ministry of Transport conducts continuing reviews of all major airports in Canada, including Fredericton, to assess requirements for extension of runways and expansion of other facilities serving civil aviation in Canada.

MANPOWER—SPECIAL TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 213—Mr. Lewis:

1. How many new trainees, by province, will benefit from the approximately $20 million in additional funds to be provided to the Department of Manpower and Immigration in an extension of its manpower training programs as announced by the Minister of Finance on October 13?

2. What is the breakdown, by province, of the $15 million being provided under a special employment program directed to capital projects in regions where unemployment is higher as announced by the Minister of Finance on October 13 and what special criteria have been used with regard to the financial allocation?

3. For each department and agency, how many people have been and are to be employed for a variety of operations and maintenance tasks under the $25 million allocated by the Minister of Finance in his speech on October 13 and, for each class of employees employed or to be employed, what is the respective remuneration or salary?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and by the Treasury Board as follows: 1. It is estimated that a minimum of 12,000 to 13,000 persons will be trained under the special program. The actual number trained in each province will depend on the kind of training provided, the cost and the duration of training courses, and will not be available until the program is completed.

2. The breakdown by province of the capital projects portion of the special program is as follows:

British Columbia	2,305.2
Alberta	351.8
Saskatchewan	924.5
Manitoba	1,455.3
Ontario	160.0
Quebec	8,464.0
New Brunswick	163.2
Nova Scotia	180.4

The criteria used in allocating the $60 million dollars of additional expenditure involved judgment as to the extent to which unemployment, reflecting long-standing structural relationships in the various regions of the country, exceeded the level of about four per cent. On that basis, approximately half the excessive unemployment is to be found in Quebec, the balance in other parts of Canada. In the distribution of expenditures within Quebec and within each of the other regions, predominance was given to the need to select for implementation work which would create a relatively large amount of employment per dollar expended and at the same time contribute to the programs of government.

3. Figures are not available on the number of people that will be employed nor the remunerations they will receive from the approximate $25 million allocation for operation and maintenance tasks. It is anticipated, however, that some 3,670 man years of employment will be provided through these tasks. Since a man year is the employment of one person for a complete year, it is therefore obvious that many more persons than the 3,670 figure mentioned above will be employed as this money must be spent within the fiscal year ending March 31, 1971. The type of person to be hired will consist of some higher paid people such as engineers; however, due to the type of projects involved, it is expected that the majority of those employed will be in the lower paid categories of unskilled and semi skilled.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Justice and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices as follows: 1. It was decided that the federal government would not intervene in this case, at least not at this stage, before the Provincial Court.

CITIZEN PROTECTION STUDIES

Question No. 326—Mr. Fortin:

1. Is the government studying the advisability of introducing legislation creating an ombudsman to ensure better protection for citizens?

2. What is the status of studies concerning citizen protection against government and bureaucracy?

3. Who is conducting the studies and will they be Tabled?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: 1, 2 and 3. Protection of the citizen has been, and continues to be, a fundamental concern. How best to achieve optimum protection for the citizen in his relations with the federal government is under continuous study, and many steps have already been taken to redress the imbalance between the two. The recently enacted law of expropriation is an example where additional protection was given the citizen against the arbitrary powers of expropriation that existed heretofore. Likewise, the Statutory Instruments Bill which provides for public scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, the re-organization of the Exchequer Court into the Federal Court of Canada, the measure respecting hate propaganda, the establishment of a Law Reform Commission, and measures to be introduced regarding the right to privacy were drafted, or will be drafted, with this fundamental concern for civil liberties in mind. It has not been shown conclusively that the office of ombudsman offers the citizen a greater measure of protection against the state than he enjoys with an informed legislature and a responsive government.

CRIMINAL CODE—IMPOSITION OF PECUNIARY PENALTIES

Question No. 332—Mr. Fortin:

With reference to the pecuniary penalties provided for in the Criminal Code and under Sections 622 and 694 of the Criminal Code, will the government consider imposing the penalty in proportion to ability to pay so that the poor will not be more penalized than the affluent and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): With the exception of a very few cases where minimum penalties are provided for, the penalties provided by the Criminal Code are maximum penalties, and the decision of what is an appropriate penalty is properly left to the courts to determine on the basis of all the circumstances of the case, including the ability of the convicted person to pay. It is considered that adequate remedies by way of appeal are available to a convicted person who considers that the amount of a fine imposed upon him is excessive.

FEDERAL COURT OF CANADA

Question No. 333—Mr. Fortin:

1. Does the government intend changing the name of the Exchequer Court of Canada to Federal Superior Court?

2. The government has no intention of proceeding in the manner indicated at the present time.

3. The intention of the government in respect to the Tax Appeal Board is indicated in Bill C-174 which is now before the House.

"VAPONA NO-PEST STRIP"

Question No. 356—Mr. Anderson:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare undertaken any study to determine the effect of inhaling, over a period of months or years, the pesticide dimethyl-dichlorovinyl-phosphate, the active agent of the Shell Chemical Company's "No-pest Strip" and, if not, for what reason has the sale of this product in Canada been approved?

2. Is it the intention of the Department to require the pesticide to be clearly labelled "Poison", as has been done in Holland and other European Countries?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No. The Department of National Health and Welfare does not approve the sale of any product in Canada and has not approved the sale of the Shell Chemical Company's "Vapona No-Pest Strip". It is understood that this product is, however, registered, for specified purposes, under the Pest Control Products Act, which is administered by the Department of Agriculture.

COMMONWEALTH WAR GRAVES COMMISSION—CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO MAINTENANCE OF CEMETERIES

Question No. 374—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. How many military cemeteries does Canada maintain abroad?

2. In which countries are they located?

3. What is the maintenance cost of military cemeteries abroad?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and Veterans Affairs as follows: 1. Four. In addition, serving servicemen and dependants may be buried in cemeteries maintained by the Commonwealth War Graves Commission and the Department of External Affairs.

2. Two in West Germany and two in France.

3. At present there is a 20 year lease totalling $16,178 for maintenance of graves of servicemen at Werl, West Germany. Maintenance costs of graves of dependants buried at Zwiebrucken, Choloy and St. Hilare, are borne by non-public funds and are not a charge on the Department of National Defence. In so far as service personnel buried in cemeteries maintained by the Commonwealth War Graves Commission is concerned, maintenance costs are charged on a pro rated basis annually and are paid from defence appropriation "miscellaneous expenses". Such costs are not readily identifiable without a great deal of research. The Commonwealth War Graves Commission maintains the graves of all Canadian war dead who are buried abroad. Canada contributes to the Commonwealth War Graves Commission an amount in direct ratio to the number of burials. In 1970-71 Canada's share, paid by the Department of Veterans Affairs, will be $558,000.

RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS—STUDIES OF POSSIBLE ECOLOGY EFFECTS

Question No. 479—Mr. Anderson:

1. What steps does the government plan to take to give legal force to the recommendations of the Science Council of Canada that persons embarking on resource development should first research the possible damage to the ecology of the region in question?

2. Is the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or any other department undertaking any study of the effect of the Bennett Dam on the ecology of the area near Fort Chipewyan, Alberta?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and Fisheries and Forestry as follows: 1. Resource development programs on all lands coming within federal government jurisdiction are controlled by departments of this government and such programs will be studied to ensure at all times that possible ecology effects are known. The recently announced federal government guidelines for pipeline construction in the north is an example of government policy in this regard. Under the Fisheries Act potential developers may be required to submit plans and specifications of their proposed works, so that pollution control provisions can be checked and approved or rejected.

2. The governments of Canada and Alberta have agreed to establish a task force to be headed by a Director nominated by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, to gather all of the information required to make firm recommendations to both governments on the action necessary to assure that the needs of the Peace-Athabasca Delta region are met by the spring of 1972. It is assumed that the region referred to is the area near Fort Chipewyan, Alberta. The information to be compiled by the task force will include study of the effect of the W.A.C. Bennett Dam on the ecology of the Peace-Athabasca Delta region. The Department of Fisheries and Forestry is setting up a task force to gather relevant data on the Lake Athabasca problem, and to determine appropriate remedial action.

CMHC—LOANS TO HOME OWNERS IN ISOLATED AND SPECIAL AREAS

Will the present CMHC practice of granting loans to home owners in larger towns and cities in isolated areas of Canada be expanded in 1971 to include towns and cities in special areas as designated by the government?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): In 1971, direct lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the National Housing Act will continue to be directed, as in 1970, toward increasing the volume of housing available to low and modest income families throughout Canada. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in its direct lending will also endeavour to meet the most urgent housing needs, which have usually occurred in new resource towns and in smaller cities and rural areas throughout the country, arising from an inadequate distribution of loans by the institutional lenders. It is anticipated, however, that an increased volume of lending by lending institutions will decrease lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in some of the smaller towns and rural areas in 1971.

11. Did any CBC official, or other person involved, express opposition to the showing of this program on the network?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. It has not been customary to require the CBC to disclose such details as the cost of specific program material since such information could adversely affect the Corporation in its competitive business relationships. However, payment for the item in question was well in line with amounts normally paid for procured color documentary material of an exclusive nature.

2. The item was made by William J. Warren and Peter J. Lake, two Los Angeles producers. The executive producer of "Weekend" agreed to buy the item following consultation with his supervisors and with legal counsel.

3. The producers were not hired by the CBC but, as indicated above, they were paid a normal amount for the item.

4. No one who appeared in the item was paid by the CBC and, to the best of the CBC's knowledge, no one was paid by the producers of the item.

5. Not to CBC's knowledge, and certainly not by the CBC.

6. The producers, Mr. Warren and Mr. Lake.

7. The people involved in the item were approached by Messrs. Warren and Lake. Last winter Mr. Warren was doing research for a feature article, subsequently carried as a cover story in "Newsweek" magazine, on the matter under discussion. He made contacts then with the officials at the clinic. The girl involved came to the attention of the producers through the clinic. The producers provided written consent from the girl involved.

8. To the best of the CBC's knowledge, the answer is no.

9. The executive producer of "Weekend" consulted with his supervisors extensively on this matter and screened the item for his immediate supervisor, the head of Current Affairs—TV, for the Director of TV Information Programs, and for the Managing Director of Television. As a result of these discussions, several changes were made before approval was given for the presentation of the item.

10. The item was offered to the "Weekend" unit by Messrs. Warren and Lake and the idea was accepted and recommended for presentation by the executive producer, with his recommendation subsequently approved by his supervisors.

11. No.

*BAY OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER DEVELOPMENT—ACCESS TO STUDY PAPERS

Question No. 571—Mr. Forrestall:

2. Is there a conflict between Public Archives policy and the policy of the government with respect to these study papers and, if so (a) what is the nature of this apparent difference of opinion (b) can it be resolved so as to permit free access to the detailed documentation upon which the report of the Board dated October 31, 1969 and entitled "Feasibility of Tidal Power Development in the Bay of Fundy" was based?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board recommended in its report that one copy of the records and supporting technical data and reports contained in its study office, following orderly assembly and indexing, be placed in the custody of the Public Archives of Canada to be made available to any of the subscribing governments, acting jointly or severally, in a future study of tidal power in the Bay of Fundy. This recommendation was concurred in by the government. It was considered that a five-year term of restricted access to this material was appropriate; and this term dates from April 1970, when the material was placed in the custody of the Public Archives.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—NEW MEASURES TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Finance who is supposed to be in the House today, but since the Prime Minister believes that inflation has been licked perhaps it is no longer necessary for the Minister of Finance to sit in the House. In view of the Prime Minister's recognition during the Christmas recess that unemployment is now the country's number one problem, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government proposes to announce any new measures to deal with this very acute problem?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should remind the Leader of the Opposition at the outset that the Minister of Finance, like his predecessors including those from the Tory party, has an annual meeting with the Canadian Club of Toronto and this happens to be the day. I am sure he would wish the Minister of Finance to be there on this occasion.

May I say in direct reply that the government has a program—some of the measures are now in effect—to deal with the unemployment situation which we recognize as being serious. I hope we will have the support of the opposition in forwarding these measures as they come before the House and as they are proclaimed under existing legislation.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand from the Acting Prime Minister that the government proposes to announce additional measures to fight unemployment, and if my understanding is correct may I ask when we may expect to hear these measures announced?

Mr. Sharp: The government is taking the measures that it feels are appropriate to deal with the unemployment situation. The Leader of the Opposition will recognize, of course, that the way to deal with unemployment is not to practise inflationary policies, some of which he has been advocating. If he is disappointed that we are not following his advice in these matters—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are entering the field of debate both in relation to the question asked and the answer given. The Leader of the Opposition has a supplementary?

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I had understood that inflation was licked. Therefore may I express the hope that the government will really be prepared to do something—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SALE OF ARMS BY GREAT BRITAIN TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR POSITION OF AFRICAN COMMONWEALTH MEMBERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Commonwealth conference will begin in a few days in Singapore, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Canadian government intends to support the African members of the Commonwealth in urging Great Britain to reconsider its policy of selling military equipment to the Republic of South Africa?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am sure that the leader of the New Democratic Party is aware of the steps the Prime Minister has been taking in this respect. Indeed, I think it is generally acknowledged that the Prime Minister of Canada has been very useful in his support of the position of the African states and that he has warned the British government of the possible consequences of the resumption of arms shipments.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask whether the Canadian government has received any indication that the British government is likely to alter or reverse its policy with respect to the sale of arms to South Africa?

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman has seen the statements made by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and he is free to draw the same inferences as we are from those statements.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Have any arrangements been made to have the statement of the Prime Minister of Canada at the Commonwealth conference released to members of the House soon after it is made?

Mr. Sharp: It is part of the genius of the Commonwealth that these discussions are conducted in private, and I do not think it would help if we were to turn the Commonwealth conference into a miniature United Nations.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPAYMENT OF DEBT—CARR REPORT

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

I would like to ask him whether the Carr report has been submitted to the cabinet, whether the cabinet has examined it and whether a decision has been reached concerning the repayment or the refinancing of the debt of the St. Lawrence Seaway?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I will take notice of that question, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPLACEMENT OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT BY PERMANENT LEGISLATION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government preparing permanent legislation to replace the temporary public order emergency measures that are now in force?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is the intention of the government to bring this matter before parliament in the near future.

Mr. Ryan: Is the government contemplating proceedings to have certain elements of the explosives act, the coroners act and the fire investigations act of the province of Quebec that are in conflict with the Criminal Code declared ultra vires?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning what the government intends to do or to place before parliament regarding the temporary powers act, may I ask whether it is the intention of the government, now that all those in the FLQ have been picked up who were suspected of wrongdoing, to have this legislation terminated?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to withdraw the present legislation. The right hon. gentleman will have seen the statements made by the Prime Minister of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada in relation to this subject, and I have nothing to add to what they have said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then what did the minister mean when he said certain legislation was going to come before the House in connection with this matter? Why this aura of indefiniteness?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I understood the question that was put to me it related to more permanent legislation that would give the government authority to deal with civil emergencies of a kind that perhaps would not come under the War Measures Act, or for which the government would not wish to proclaim the War Measures Act which contains powers that would not be required. My answer was to the effect that the government intended in the near future to bring this subject before parliament.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, is it the government's intention to keep the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act in effect until such time as permanent legislation is brought before the House?

Mr. Sharp: Not necessarily, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question for clarification to the Acting Prime Minister. When he said that the subject of permanent legislation of a public order nature would be brought before the House did he mean to imply that legislation would be introduced or simply that the matter would be put before the House in some way?

Mr. Sharp: I mean the latter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Acting Prime Minister indicate to the House the manner in which the matter will be put before the House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, a decision has not yet been reached, and when it is it will be announced to the House.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister stated in an interview with the press before he left to attend the Commonwealth Conference that new, permanent legislation would be introduced to take the place of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, has the Minister of Justice been directed to draw up that permanent legislation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not say that and, if you will permit me, I will read what he did say.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

WHEAT—ACCEPTANCE BY RUSSIA OF REMAINING QUANTITY UNDER SALE CONTRACT—FLOUR SHIPMENTS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Has he had any indication from the Soviet Union that they will be picking up the remainder of the wheat they contracted for under the agreements?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): There have been some further contacts, particularly in connection with a certain desire on the part of the Soviet Union to take some flour at this time, and negotiations in that regard are going on.

Mr. Korchinski: Are the negotiations under which the Soviet Union will be picking up some flour part of the agreement to pick up 53 million bushels of wheat?

Mr. Lang: They are properly said to be a part of the over-all long term agreement with the Soviet Union and also of the renewal of the agreement which took place a year ago.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will he ensure that when negotiations are under way for the purchase of flour eastern Canada mills will be given the same consideration in regard to tendering in order that eastern wheat which meets the qualifications may be considered in such export trade?

Mr. Lang: It is very much a matter of the mills in competition for this business to arrange for its disposition. I should think that will make it possible for the mills to provide the kind of flour which is required, which I understand would ordinarily be made up of northern wheat rather than soft wheat.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESTRICTIONS ON USE OF URANIUM SOLD TO PAKISTAN AND INDIA

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was there any difference between the restrictions placed on the use of uranium sold by Canada to Pakistan and the restrictions placed on the use of uranium sold to India, all of which has caused, as the minister knows, considerable controversy in Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are some technical differences. The arrangement with India was under a provision for bilateral inspection between India and Canada, and the arrangement that was made with Pakistan provided for inspection under the International Atomic Energy Authority. This has been the cause of some difference of view between Canada and Pakistan and Canada and India.

Mr. Hees: Is Pakistan now completely satisfied with the explanation the government has given or is there still cause for concern regarding bad relations between our two countries?

Mr. Sharp: I think the relations between Pakistan and Canada are excellent at the moment, as is confirmed by the warm reception that our Prime Minister received in Pakistan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: But there are some difficulties, I am ready to admit, arising out of the difference in the arrangements that were made between Canada and these two countries, partly for historical reasons.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEW ARRANGEMENT RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND INCREASE IN CAPITALIZATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I would like to direct it to the Acting Prime Minister who may know something about this subject since he had to deal with it when he was Minister of Finance. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question arising out of the announcement by the Minister of Finance of a new arrangement with the Mercantile Bank extending the number of years by which time 75 per cent of its capital is to be Canadian owned, and increasing fourfold the amount of its capitalization. Would the Acting Prime Minister undertake that either he or the Minister of Finance would make a statement to the House as soon as possible giving the details of this new arrangement and the reasons which led to it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to table now a copy of the statement made by the Minister of Finance on January 7, and perhaps on the basis of that there might be further questions from the hon. gentleman later.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I can inform the Acting Prime Minister that I have seen the press release which he is now tabling, and I am sure all other members have seen it. As a supplementary question I would like to ask him whether his answer to my first question means that he refuses on his behalf and on behalf of the Minister of Finance to make a statement on motions to the House so that we can get more details?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I will certainly suggest to the Minister of Finance, if it is the wish of the House, that he should make a statement on this important matter. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some misunderstanding, reflected in the question of the hon. member, about a time limit being involved. There is no time limit in the legislation, and there has been no extension of time given.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister's answer clearly shows that a clarifying statement would be useful. As a further supplementary I would like to ask whether the necessary Order in Council has been passed in relation to some of the details of the arrangements made with Mercantile Bank and, if so, would he table the Order in Council?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice. I am not quite certain.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROGRAM "WEEKEND" AND LAPORTE MURDER SUSPECTS —AVOIDANCE OF ABUSE OF DUE PROCESS OF LAW

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice and of the new Solicitor General perhaps I could direct this question to the Secretary of State. In light of last night's trial by cartoon of the Laporte murder suspects on the CBC program "Weekend", can the minister inform the House whether the CBC is prepared to extend the self-imposed restraint it exhibited during the kidnapping crisis to avoid abusing due process of law in Quebec at this time?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I shall take note of the question, Mr. Speaker.

PROPOSED AM AND FM NATIONAL NETWORKS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Has the government now determined whether the CBC should be permitted to set up AM and FM coast to coast networks and, if so, with what completion dates?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the government has no decision to make in the matter. Furthermore, the CBC advises me that a decision has yet to be reached by the corporation itself. We are dealing here with a study now under way with regard to which a decision will be made only later on.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. As the Royal Commission on the Status of Women has made a report with 167 detailed recommendations, some of them with sweeping and important social implications for all the people of Canada, will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House what plans have been made toward the implementation of such of these recommendations as fall within federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Royal Commission of the Status of Women is under study in the cabinet. No decisions have yet been made.

Mr. Brewin: As soon as the government has decided what it proposes to do, will a statement be made to the House, and is there any minister who is particularly in charge of looking into these recommendations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when the government has had an opportunity to consider these recommendations it will, of course, bring its decisions before Parliament, and must do so if they are to be incorporated in legislation. The answer to the second part of the question is that this is a matter of cabinet organization, but in fact the whole cabinet is studying the matter at the moment and specific responsibility has not yet been assigned. I may say I do not know whether anyone in the cabinet wants to be responsible for women.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am sure women do not want to be responsible for the cabinet.

AGRICULTURE

TREE FRUIT INDUSTRY—MEASURES TO ARREST VIRUS INFECTION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture and since he is not in the House perhaps I can direct it to the attention of his Parliamentary Secretary. As a result of the very serious representations that have been made to the government, will the minister inform the House if a decision has been made to make a specialist in plant pathology, and the necessary funds, available to the Harrow Research Station in an attempt to arrest the virus infection which is proving so destructive and costly to the Canadian tree fruit industry?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice and if possible will provide the hon. member with an answer tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED DISTORTION OF NEWS AND BROADCASTING OF PROPAGANDA

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Would the minister give consideration to setting up either a special committee of the House or a royal commission to look into the repeated allegations of bias, distortion of news, and outright propagandizing by the public affairs department of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? I ask this question in view of the fact that this matter has been brought up many times in the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question has often been asked, and I have given it the only answer possible to which I refer the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the government house leader, the President of the Privy Council. Would he prevail upon the Secretary of State or perhaps somebody else in the government ranks to organize the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, which this late in the session has not yet been organized, so that the CBC and many other topical points of interest could be referred to that committee, including the matter of AM and FM networks?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to consider this suggestion.

Mr. Baldwin: Will you allow witnesses?

POWER

SKAGIT RIVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT FLOODING OF VALLEY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Will the minister indicate to the House the steps which have been taken or will be taken by the federal government to stop the proposed flooding of the Skagit River Valley?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might like to reply briefly to the question, but the hon. member, it seems to me, is asking for a general statement and so the question is hardly in order. In view of the importance of the matter raised perhaps the House might consent to allow the minister to make a brief reply to the hon. member's question.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have arranged a visit to Washington on Friday of this week. I will be accompanied by officials of the Department of External Affairs and of my own department.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of reports that the government is planning to provide $5 million for the country of Niger on the understanding that French will be made the official language of that country, would the government consider making the amount $10 million and making that country bilingual?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION OF PASSENGER SERVICE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport but in his absence may I direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. I should like to know if the Minister of Transport will use the influence of his office to dissuade Canadian National Railways from reducing its passenger service across northern Ontario by 50 per cent as a result of its decision to cancel trains Nos. 7 and 8?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McGrath: Remember the Newfie Bullet. Shame!

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Penner: When the Parliamentary Secretary is discussing this matter with the minister, would he also urge the minister to instruct the Railway Transport Committee to conduct a form of public hearing into this cancellation, so that the citizens and the communities affected may know—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DESTROYER CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL COST

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say when he will have official figures ready on the spillage taking place in the shipbuilding program on the St. Lawrence?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the word should be "slippage". I expect they will be available to the House by the middle of next month. I would hope to have an opportunity of discussing this matter in more detail with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a personal question of the minister. Has he had to have his seat moved next to that of the former Minister of National Defence so that he may learn how to wreck what is left of the department?

YOUTH

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF TASK FORCE REPORT AND INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Scarborough. Since the report of the Task Force on Youth is being studied by the cabinet, can the minister indicate to the House when he expects to table it in the House and whether we can expect any legislation?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for youth policy is the Secretary of State.

An hon. Member: Heaven forbid!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Secretary of State. When can we expect the report of the Task Force on Youth to be tabled in the House, and can we expect any legislation to follow?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Task Force on Youth gave me a preliminary report on its work about three weeks ago. We are expecting a final report and as the hon. member may well imagine, the government will have to make its own study of the report before saying when it will be tabled and possibly published.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: By that time our present youth will be the aged.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the Secretary of State say that the House will have this report in its hands before the summer rush for student employment?

Mr. Baldwin: That would be "student unemployment". That is the phrase the hon. member used previously.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

INTRODUCTION OF PROGRAMS FOR UNEMPLOYED YOUTH

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a related question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the prevalence of statements regarding the potential of prospective programs for unemployed students this summer, can the minister say whether such programs are going to be introduced for the unemployed young people now and, if not, why not?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question of special programs is under review. A review is taking place of the success of the programs which were instituted last year. When it is possible for the government to reach a decision on the course of action for the future, it will be announced.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if there is any truth in the front-page report in the Globe and Mail—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

PROVISION OF SUMMER STUDENT MILITIA PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his consideration of the reintroduction of student employment programs for next summer, will the minister consider the student militia program? Also, will he consider doubling the quota in order that it will be available to a much larger segment of the population?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As I stated earlier, Mr. Speaker, the matter of what policy should be implemented is under consideration. When a decision has been reached, it will be announced.

NATIONAL AND ROYAL ANTHEMS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have enough faith in the Minister of National Defence and his intelligence to believe that he will not be persuaded by his new seatmate. My question is directed to the Government House Leader. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that I have been asking this question several times a year from year to year. Could the Government House Leader now give some indication to the Canadian people of when we might expect legislation dealing with our royal and national anthems, so that we can have in the public realm this type of symbol of our nation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the hon. member raised this question some time ago. I have had some communication with the Prime Minister as to how we propose to proceed or might proceed in dealing with the subject matter during the present session. That discussion has not been completed yet but the matter is really under active consideration.

Mr. Forrestall: In his discussions with the right hon. gentleman, could the Government House Leader pursue the matter along the lines of separating the two anthems and not necessarily bringing in one bill dealing with both?

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—PROVISION TO RECIPIENTS OF BENEFIT OF ESCALATION PENDING NEW RATES AND CEILINGS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can the minister say whether the necessary order in council has been passed, one similar to those of the last two or three years, so that war veterans allowance recipients who are also receiving the guaranteed income supplement will obtain the benefit of the escalation which will be in effect for the next three months, pending the new rates and new ceilings which are to come into effect in April?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is consideration being given to this being done before the January cheques go out?

Mr. Dubé: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is under consideration at the present time.

[Later:]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will the minister consider forgoing the reduction in war veterans allowances of 21 cents in some cases and 42 cents in many other cases as a result of changes in the old age pension legislation, since the administrative cost of making such changes would be much greater than the actual reductions in expenditure in many cases?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is being put as an argument.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON OPERATIONS—AVAILABILITY TO PUBLIC

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Has the commission set up to study the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board turned in its report? Also, is it the intention of the government to make that report public?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the report has either been received or will be received before very long. Of course, the report is a report to the Canadian Wheat Board. I, personally, will be awaiting it with interest.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the latter part of my question was not answered. Perhaps the minister did not hear that part of my question. Do the minister and the government intend to make this report public so that the farmers may be able to understand the operations of the Wheat Board which handles their very vital product?

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the report, as I said, is a report to the Wheat Board. I would want to discuss this matter with them. I presume I will be able to do that soon after they have received the report.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PAYMENT BY QUEBEC FOR SERVICES OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Could he indicate to the House whether the government has decided who will pay the expenses incurred by the Armed Forces to maintain order in Quebec since the October crisis?

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister seems to have the answer. Could he give it to us.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at one time when this question was asked the Prime Minister said there would be no difficulty in reaching a decision. As far as I know, none has yet been reached.

FISHERIES

OPENING DATE OF SEAL HARVEST

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Can the minister say if he has yet established the opening date for the seal harvest off the east coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this date will be announced shortly. At the present time it is under discussion with the industry.

EXTENT OF CANADIAN SEAL QUOTA

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question with regard to the seal fishery. In light of the 100,000 seal quota for Norway and 100,000 seal quota for Canada, are the 50,000 seals taken in the gulf included as part of Canada's harvest in the international seal fishery, which would mean that we are getting gypped by 50,000 seals?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that he has put his question in the form of an argument. As such it is not in order. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Are the 50,000 seals from the gulf harvest part of Canada's total quota of 100,000 seals? I ask this question in view of the fact that we only closed the gulf area as part of Canada's waters about one month ago.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): My understanding is that the gulf is an area exclusive to Canada and that the division is made in international waters off the Labrador front.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SPECIAL PLAN FOR RURAL NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Frank Moores (Bonavista-Trinity-Conception): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has the minister's department prepared a special plan for rural Newfoundland to include those areas not presently included in the special areas legislation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Moores: A supplementary question. The premier of Newfoundland has announced that there will be a special plan, Mr. Speaker. Has the premier of Newfoundland advised the minister of this?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, as I have often said permanent negotiations are carried on in this connection with the various premiers and as soon as we come to an understanding the House will be informed.

FISHERIES

AGREEMENT WITH SOVIET UNION RESPECTING FISHING OFF PACIFIC COAST

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Will the minister advise where matters now stand with respect to the conclusion of the two-year interim agreement with the Soviet Union with regard to the west coast fisheries? What further steps have to be taken in order to bring about the final completion of this agreement?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this information might better be given to the House by way of a general statement on motions. However, the minister might like to reply briefly to the question.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have a delegation in Moscow at the present time. The main purpose of the meeting with the Soviet government is to sign the agreement which was negotiated late last fall with the support of the industry.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REFERENCE OF AGREEMENT WITH SOVIET UNION TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Earlier I asked the minister a question with respect to the meetings at which this draft agreement was negotiated. At that time the minister was asked in the House whether he would take steps to have the two draft agreements, I believe, referred to the standing committee for examination. He said he would gladly do that. Can the minister inform us when this will be done?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Immediately after it is signed, Mr. Speaker.

WELFARE

GOVERNMENT GRANT TO CONFERENCE ON POVERTY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio. Has the minister's department in any way subsidized the conference on poverty?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): The citizenship branch of the Department of Secretary of State made a grant of $5,000 as part of the financing of the conference in Toronto, if that is the one to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question. Since there has been a grant of $5,000 made to this conference, will the government provide the House with the names of the organizations or individuals who made this request to the government?

Mr. Stanbury: I can certainly convey that information to the hon. member in so far as it concerns the citizenship branch.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister indicated that he will convey that information. Will he do it at once, please?

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member is not suggesting these names should be given at this time to the House.

GRAIN

BARLEY—ACCEPTANCE OF CERTAIN GRADE AS FEED

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): I wish to direct my question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Because of complaints by western farmers that at many delivery points barley graded as 3 C.W. is being accepted as only No. 1 or No. 2 feed, which affects the price by at least ten cents a bushel, what action does the government plan?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will give me details of the charges he is making, I will be glad to have them investigated.

Inquiries of the Ministry

YOUTH

ALLEGED FREE BUS TRANSPORTATION FOR TRANSIENTS—CONSIDERATION OF PROGRAM BY HOUSE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in connection with the youth program. When the $50 million youth program, which includes provision for a fleet of 25 buses to carry young transients across the country without charge, is finalized, will this matter be brought before the House for consideration?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, these are purely speculative stories to which the hon. member is referring.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MONTREAL—APPLICATION BY CITY UNDER AMENDED INCENTIVES ACT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Are any applications pending or currently in the process of being approved from the city of Montreal under the recent amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Mr. Speaker: I think that a question of that kind should be in writing and placed on the Order Paper. I doubt whether it is in order to ask of a minister from day to day whether applications have been received from different regions affected by the law. I think it would be better if this question were put in writing but if there is urgency, the hon. member may give the usual notice to discuss the matter at the time of adjournment.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my question was prompted by the urgency of the unemployment situation in Montreal which originally prompted the amendments to the Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is not a point of order. The hon. member is arguing the urgency of the matter. The Standing Order is designed to cover this type of situation. If the hon. member thinks there is urgency, his recourse is to suggest that the matter be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. McGrath: I accept your Honour's invitation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF LEGISLATION FOR REDRAFTING

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since the Canadian Mental Health Association has validly and seriously attacked the fundamentals of the young offenders bill, C-192, and since a new minister is occupying the portfolio concerned, will the government consider withdrawing the bill in order that it might be redrafted more in line with common sense?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ACTION TO CONTROL OUTBREAK OF RABIES IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I will direct my question to his Parliamentary Secretary. It is in connection with the current outbreak of rabies in western Canada. What measures is the federal Department of Agriculture undertaking to counteract and control the current outbreak of rabies that is affecting the western provinces?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): I thank the hon. member for his question. I will bring the matter to the minister's attention. I hope a proper answer can be provided on Thursday.

Mr. Mazankowski: Is the federal government prepared to provide full compensation to the owners for the loss of any animals caused by contracting this disease?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

PROVISION OF INCREASES IN BENEFITS

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): moved that Bill C-203, to amend the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, just over a year ago I had the privilege of making public a white paper on veterans pensions, setting forth the views of the government on the recommendations of the Woods Committee for amending the Pension Act. The white paper was extremely well received, both by veterans and the general public. I am delighted to be speaking at this time on a bill designed to incorporate into the Pension Act almost all of the proposals we made in the white paper. Some have been amended, some have been expanded and several have been enriched.

On December 2 last, this bill was tabled in the House for first reading. It was most satisfying to read in the press the next day that the National Association of Veterans Organizations had expressed its satisfaction with the scope of the legislative changes which are included in the bill.

Besides, the Legion, which is the national publication of the Royal Canadian Legion, in an issue which came out during the weekend, was entirely of that opinion.

Before commenting on the provisions of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate to make a few remarks about veterans pensions and the recipients themselves; why they receive them and why we award them.

There are nearly a million veterans in Canada today. They represent the contingents of Canadians who fought in the South African campaign, in World Wars I and II, in Korea and in other United Nations peace-keeping operations. Fortunately most of them do not bear any visible scars from combat but there are many who do. There are also, left behind, many widows, mothers, sons and daughters of those who made the supreme sacrifice. These are the people for whom this bill has been written. There are 133,212 veterans and 29,100 dependents in receipt of pensions as a direct result of death, or disability, arising out of military service; 37,000 of these pensioners are survivors of World War I and 125,000 are World War II veterans and their dependents.

[English]

It was the Canadian fighting men in the first world war who, a few short years after Confederation, brought Canada from a boisterous youthfulness to sinewy maturity. More than 53 years ago, on an April morning on the slopes of Vimy Ridge, they carved, with their bayonets, the name of Canada into the granite monuments to sacrifice. They brought Canada into full-fledged nationhood so meaningfully and so forcefully that this country was included as a signatory to the Treaty of Versailles.

A generation later, legions of Canadians again answered their country's call to arms and, like their fathers before them, sprang to its defence with a fearless defiance. They fought and died for the freedom of Canada. They fought because their institutions and ideals were threatened. They fought against philosophies which were antagonistic to our way of life and to our democratic institutions. And they fought for those ideals in faraway and forbidding places. They fought, and some of them died, in the cold, dark, winter nights in the North Atlantic; in Hong Kong, Italy, Normandy and the low countries; in the dull, smoky skies over Germany and even in the steaming jungles of Burma.

It is for these men, their families and the dependents of those who have died, that my department exists. It is for these men that successive Canadian governments for 50 years have sought to keep pensions, allowances, medical treatment, education and training, up to date with the changing times and circumstances. It is for these men that this government is introducing this bill.

The Pension Act has been the cornerstone of the Veterans Charter for half a century. It is the main legislation through which Canada recognizes her obligation to compensate for disability and death in so far as it is possible to equate monetary compensation with human suffering and bereavement.

The Pension Act provides not only for the payment of pensions to the disabled veteran but also to his widow and orphans and to his dependent parents, sisters and brothers. Pension entitlement can also make the recipient eligible for other benefits such as medical treatment, war veterans allowances, special re-employment training, funeral and burial grants and, after his death, advanced educational assistance for his dependent children.

Mr. Speaker, in all stages of the work leading to the presentation of this new bill, which incorporates such a massive overhaul of the Pension Act, the keynote was flexibility.

[English]

This flexibility was deliberately built into the whole procedure by the use of the white paper technique which invited dialogue and input from the people most vitally concerned, the veterans themselves. Their enthusiastic participation in this dialogue is a credit to the technique and to themselves. It is also a tribute to the open-door policy adopted by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. The standing committee listened diligently, conscientiously and patiently and came up with a most valuable report. I have previously spoken about the dedication of the members of the standing committee and the wisdom and scope of their recommendations. I can only repeat my appreciation of their meritorious services.

There are so many benefits in this bill that I shall not attempt to describe them all in detail at this time, but I am very anxious to explain the five most important ones. There are some changes and innovations which will affect more veterans than others; and there are some which will have a more immediate effect on those veterans whose hardships are more extreme than others.

The first major new proposal which I should like to explain is the exceptional incapacity allowance. This new benefit refers to certain 100 per cent pensioners who suffer extraordinary physical, social and psychological impairments and who, because of the nature of their disabilities, are exceptionally incapacitated. They may be living in a helpless condition or be in constant pain and discomfort. Their disability might be causing loss of enjoyment of life and could even shorten their life expectancy.

There are nearly 5,000 pensioners in Canada today who are classified in the 100 per cent pension category and the capacity of many of them to enjoy life is materially lessened as a result of their service-related disabilities. I would like to mention at this point that the philosophy or intent, of instituting additional allowances of this kind was shared by members of the Woods committee, the government's white paper and by all the veterans associations that appeared before the committee, and is included in this bill.

You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that the white paper proposed to recognize this exceptional burden of disablement by making an annual allowance of not less than $400 and not more than $1,200 for specified amenities for the exceptionally disabled, 100 per cent pensioner. You will see in the proposed new legislation that the government has not only maintained its support of this philosophy but it has doubled the amount of the allowances proposed in the white paper, thus responding to the recommendations of the veterans affairs committee.

The minimum and maximum allowances, as proposed in this bill, are $800 and $2,400 per annum. While these allowances will normally be paid on a monthly basis, they may also be made in lump sums for specified amenities to relieve pain and discomfort and to increase, as far as possible, the enjoyment of life for the pensioner. This new exceptional incapacity allowance is, of course, in addition to any other allowances to which the pensioner is already entitled by the act and will be tax free.

The second important new clause I wish to speak about relates to the proposed pension review board. This part of the bill was given intense and painstaking study by every group and body involved in the overhaul and restructuring of the Pension Act. The students of veterans legislation agree that this proposal is the key change in this up-dating of the Pension Act.

The Woods Committee had urged that appeals of Canadian Pension Commission decisions should be subject to consideration by a completely independent body, whereas the white paper proposed another version which, while similar in principle, was different in structure. The veterans organizations at first concurred with the proposal made by the majority of the Woods Committee but they subsequently modified it considerably. The proposal which is now delineated in this bill is that recommended by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs and demonstrates again the flexibility of the government's position under the white paper technique.

The Pension Review Board which is now proposed will be a new and independent body and will consist of a chairman and four other members appointed by the Governor in Council. This will provide the veteran who is dissatisfied with a previous ruling of the pension commission with a new and improved adjudicating process for an appeal to a higher and independent body.

Under the proposed procedure, the Commission will continue to be responsible for the first two levels of adjudication, as at present, but the Pension Review Board will function as a final court of appeal for all pension claims and will be the final authority on the interpretation of the legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is essential that all decisions concerning veterans be made with the utmost fairness and with scrupulous impartiality. I am convinced this has always been the case but I am wholeheartedly in favour of any change in the legislation which will solidify this impression in the minds of the veterans and the general public.

The third change in this new bill, to which I would like to draw your attention and which is indicative of progress in this area, concerns the creation of a new agency called the Bureau of Pensions Advocates. This Bureau will be independent of both the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Canadian Pension Commission, and will be directly responsible to the Minister.

For the past 40 years or so, the veteran who so wished was entitled to free legal assistance for the preparation and presentation of his application for pension.

It is the Veterans Bureau, a branch of the Department of Veteran Affairs, which puts free of charge at the disposal of veterans this legal assistance service. Such administrative dependance of the Veterans Bureau upon the department or the Canadian Pension Commission has sometimes led to misunderstanding about the role and the allegiance of the Veterans Bureau.

Therefore, the government has thought that it was absolutely necessary to dispel any impression that the Veterans Bureau does not always stand up for the veterans. It is therefore proposed to give this agency the new name of Bureau of Pensions Advocates and to make it, under the act, a separate and independent agency, somewhat in the manner of the Canadian Pension Commission.

In addition, the relation between the new Bureau and the pensioner will be the same as that existing between a lawyer and his client, which means, in practice, that the Bureau will no longer be obliged to convey to the Commission all the information it has on its client.

[English]

The fourth feature in the new act, to which I want to draw particular attention, deals with an area of pension legislation which has always created problems. I am referring to that section of the act which, over the years, has come to be known as the "benefit of doubt" section. This section has application to every facet of pension adjudication. Almost every time the Pension Act has been amended the wording of this section has been subjected to lengthy debate and it has been rewritten several times. Its vagueness has led to many interpretations.

Although the "benefit of doubt" was written into the Pension Act many years ago, "doubt" in this context meant different things to different people. We have now specifically defined what it means. We have now identified the guidelines for both claimant and adjudicator. The onus on the applicant will be less stringent than it is in the ordinary civil courts of the country. It will not be necessary for a pension applicant to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence. It will be sufficient for the veteran to produce credible evidence that is not contradicted. Furthermore, the adjudicating authority must draw every reasonable inference in favour of the applicant. Simply stated, this means that in any case in which any reasonable doubt exists, and in which any credible evidence is not refuted, the claim must be resolved in favour of the veteran.

• (3:30 p.m.)

A fifth impressive innovation in the Bill is also a completely new part of the Act. It is designed to recognize the special situation of those who suffered as a result of being taken prisoner by the Japanese in Hong Kong on Christmas day, 1941. The exceptionally rigorous and debilitating conditions that marked their almost four years of captivity have left an imprint of misery on this group in a way never before experienced by other Canadian veterans. The nature of their disabilities is so unique that the government has proposed special legislation to provide a minimum pension of 50 per cent for all Hong Kong veterans who make application and have an assessible degree of disability. This will, of course, make their dependents eligible for survivor pensions in the event of their death.

This new part also makes provision for the widows and dependents of those Hong Kong veterans who died prior to the effective date of this Act. Their deaths will be presumed to be attributable to their service, thereby making their widows and dependents automatically eligible for survivor pensions. With the enactment of this proposal, the Hong Kong veterans will have finally achieved the special recognition they have sought for the past 25 years.

When I had the honour of addressing the annual meeting of the Hong Kong Veterans in Toronto last summer, I confessed to a special feeling for the men of C-Force; the Winnipeg Grenadiers and the Royal Rifles of Canada. Perhaps, as minister for all veterans, I should not have made this confession, but many members of the Royal Rifles came from my home territory of the Restigouche- and Matapedia valleys, and I can still remember the great grief and sorrow which swept the countryside when Hong Kong fell back in 1941, near Christmas.

Another comment I made at that same meeting in Toronto was the hope that this new legislation could be introduced during this session. I am most happy that this hope has come true. This legislation will apply not only to the Hong Kong Veterans and their survivors, but to all Canadian veterans who were captured by the Japanese in the Pacific theatre of war and who were held prisoners for a year or more.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, these are the five most significant and advanced changes we propose to incorporate into the Act. There are many other new sections which will enhance and enrich the rights and benefits extended to our Canadian veterans and their dependents. I would like to deal briefly with some of these.

The section, in the present Act, dealing with military service in peacetime and in the militia will be clarified by the introduction of guidelines which define military duty. These guidelines will spell out, for pension purposes, the various activities in which members of the forces participate.

Clothing allowances for bilateral amputees will be increased and provision will be made for special allowances to those pensioners who require specially made clothing or apparel due to the nature of their disabilities.

We are proposing additional pensions for those who might suffer the loss of a paired limb, or organ, from any cause whatever. In other words, if a veteran was in receipt of a pension for the loss of a leg as a result of military service and subsequently lost his other leg in an automobile accident he will be entitled to an additional pension amounting to 50 per cent of the normal assessment for the loss of the second leg.

Provision is being made for posthumous assessment where pension was paid at less than 48 per cent at the time of death to determine whether the disability was fully assessed at that time. This may, in some cases, entitle the widow, children or other dependents, to receive survivor benefits.

Another new clause proposes to allow additional pension awards to a member of the forces who suffers an additional disability that is wholly, or partly, a consequence of the disability for which he is already receiving a pension. His right to additional pension in respect of a consequential disability will no longer be denied simply because he engaged in an activity which he ought to have known could cause additional disablement.

We are broadening the legislation regarding the payment of attendance allowance to provide that the allowance will be payable during the month of admission and during the following month of hospitalization.

We are proposing to amend the act so as to extend from twelve months to three years the retroactive period for which a pension may be granted.

I would like to point out that the government is also planning to institute several changes in pension procedure which will not require legislative action but which will have beneficial financial implications for the veteran.

[English]

For example, the stabilization of pensions for World War I veterans was effected in 1948. We now propose to stabilize pensions arising out of service subsequent to the First World War. This means that any pensioner who reaches, or has reached the age of 55, and whose pension has been unchanged for three years or more, will not have his pension reduced even if his condition should improve.

Other recommendations, already accepted but not requiring amendments, include an increase in the attendance allowance for the totally blind to the maximum rate of $3,000 per year; the increase of the attendance allowance for the bilateral Symes amputee to $1,200 per year, and the discontinuance of the deduction of $15 per month from the pensioner's treatment allowance whenever he is admitted to hospital. These changes will be implemented at about the same time this bill is given Royal Assent. It is the government's intention to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I will, of course, be available to appear before that committee along with officials of my department and of the Canadian Pension Commission.

As hon. members know, the terms of reference of the Woods Committee did not include pension rates as set forth in Schedules A and B of the Pension Act. However, hon. members will recall that I announced an increase in pension rates in this House on December 2 last. This is the fourth increase in the basic pension disability rate in the last seven years. The first increase amounted to 10 per cent and was granted in 1964. There was an increase of 15 per cent in 1966 and a further increase of 15 per cent in 1968. The latest increase of 10 per cent, which is effective April 1, results in an actual pension rate increase of 55 per cent over the last seven years as compared to the consumer price index rise of just over 26 per cent during the same period. The percentage increase is, of course, compounded, but when we transfer these percentages into dollars we see for example that the 100 per cent pensioner with a wife will now receive $4,464 per annum compared to the $2,880 he received seven years ago.

The government is proud of this new bill, designed as it is to give the disabled veteran and his family a package deal in pension benefits. The complete revamping of the Pension Act, and the increases in pensions which we are proposing, are synchronized with the social and economic conditions of today. The commitment of the Canadian people and the government to those who forged the steel of this country's character on the anvil of war will forever endure.

At the Dominion Convention of the Royal Canadian Legion in Ottawa last summer I stated that the most important improvements in veterans legislation since the end of the Second World War would be presented to this session of Parliament. I made that same promise to the Hong Kong Veterans Convention in Toronto and to the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans Convention in Vancouver. This bill is the fulfilment of that promise. I am confident that the hon. members of this House will want to give it their support.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask a question of the minister, Mr. Speaker? Do I understand correctly that the burden on the veteran who seeks a disability pension is that he must simply establish his case on a preponderance of the evidence rather than establish his case beyond a reasonable doubt? What is the philosophy in that regard? I am sorry; I tried to listen carefully to the minister at this point but was not able to be sure what he meant. Would the minister indicate what the philosophy is.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to say that the burden on the veteran will be much lighter than it is in criminal or civil courts. As you know, in the criminal courts the Crown must establish proof beyond any reasonable doubt. In a civil court, the plaintiff must introduce a preponderance of evidence in order to have a decision in his favour. With reference to a veteran, we propose that so long as he is able to adduce credible evidence, and that evidence is not rebutted, the case must be decided in favour of the applicant.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I was quite pleased to hear the minister's comments and the announcements he made. Although I congratulate him now, I hope he will not be too harsh with me when he hears the criticisms I have in respect of certain areas. I wish to say I was pleasantly surprised to find that the first item of business to come before the House at this part of the session deals with the second reading of Bill C-203 to amend the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. This certainly is as it should be. When I rose on a point of order on December 18 before Christmas and asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) whether he would assure the House that this bill would be called on a priority basis, little did I realize I had made such an impression that the bill would be the first item called. I extend my thanks to the President of the Privy Council, to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) and probably to the chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee, whom I also wish to congratulate upon his appointment to the position of party whip.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: I am sure that all others who are particularly interested in veterans affairs, both in this House and across the country, are pleased we are now making some real progress instead of dragging our feet as so obviously has been the case over the past many months. At this point in time, when the veterans of the first World War are in the age bracket of around 75 and 77, I am not sure that we who are supposed to govern can ever regain the confidence and trust of the many thousands of veterans who have looked to us, and to those who have gone before us, for a continuing appreciation of what we owe those who sacrificed so much. It will always be a wonder to me how this government can so lightly treat its responsibility to those war veterans who are incapacitated, especially at this point in time when a great many of our veterans are in the twilight years of their lives. We have dragged out the deliberations on the Woods Committee report and the production of this legislation. Over two years have passed, and we are now only at the second reading stage of the bill.

I can well remember the deliberate delays and then the tales of woe which were given as reasons for those delays. There was the five week delay last year when the chairman of the committee was absent, and yet the deputy chairman sat in his place in the House. Is it not strange that with over 20 Liberal members on that committee, in the opinion of the government not one had the ability to chair the meetings of the committee other than the appointed chairman. Then, we had the excuses about printing, translation and the wheels of justice turning slowly. In my opinion we have here more clerical, administrative, legal and translation staff than anywhere else or in any government in the world probably, aside from the U.S.A. If the reasons given were just, then we certainly must review this government's capability in this field because something is drastically wrong.

Since I have been associated with the Veterans Affairs Committee I have communicated with many veterans across this country, not only the many who have written me asking for help in respect of their applications for assistance under the various provisions of the act but also many who were not asking for help but who were trying to help others. It was very interesting to find that not one of these veterans shouted with joy at the announced increases in respect of the disability allowances or pensions. I am sure the minister, and other members on the committee from the government side of the House, must have received some reaction from war veterans in their constituencies and from branches of the various veterans organizations. I would be very pleased to have copies of any letters which were complimentary to these announced increases. I am sure the minister will direct his public relations department to give me a list of those who directed accolades to his department.

Certainly, the recognition by the Legion and the standing ovations the minister received would indicate that the veterans organizations are very happy both about the announced increases and some of the amendments to the veterans legislation arising out of the recommendations in the committee's report. So I can only conclude that there are two distinct groups of veterans in this country of ours. I hope that with more experience I can find out more about this fact of life, so that I may overcome the frustration which has been building up inside me since I occupied a seat of responsibility in Parliament.

Under the War Veterans Allowance Act a single veteran receives $105 per month. If he will really be happy with $120.75 a month, then I am wrong, especially when the poverty line recognized by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicates that he needs around $162 per month. If a married veteran receiving the present combined rate of $175 will now be able to live in this day of inflation on $201.75 per month, when the Dominion Bureau of Statistics poverty line indicates that the sum of $270 per month is necessary to clothe and educate his family, then I will admit I am wrong again. It would seem, therefore, that someone with responsibility for disabled veterans is not being too straightforward concerning the objectives. Some persons somewhere with directive capacity, who could bring pressure to bear on the decisions of government are impeded in their thinking. These are the people on whom veterans depend for their care and welfare.

In this connection, too, I intend to find some answers in the coming months of the session.

For some strange reason this government, until this year of concentrated pressure, has been so bound by its one-track mind concerning what the priorities of this nation really are that it has completely ignored the plight of those burnt-out veterans who receive assistance under the War Veterans Allowance Act and is granting a negligible 15 per cent increase. I say we owe these veterans an increase of at least 4 per cent a year over the past five years to cope with the recognized average increase in the cost of living. This would be 20 per cent. Really, if the government were to follow its own restrictive guideline in respect of increases in wages and prices, the increase should be 6 per cent per year over five years, especially at a time when most of these veterans are in the 75 or over age bracket. I say further that the increases should have been made retroactive for at least one year, which is certainly not unreasonable or at least the increases should have been made effective immediately on their announcement.

Why consideration was not given to orphans of veterans and to associated income ceilings is not very easy to understand. Can the orphan or his guardian manage to continue normal care on $60 a month or, in the case where there are three orphans, on a combined total of $141 a month?

There are other areas of concern within the War Veterans Allowances Act which must be revised. One of the most important pertains to eligibility. I refer specifically to the section in the act which provides that a veteran must have served in the United Kingdom during world war I for at least 365 days prior to 12 November, 1918, including sailing time between Canada and the United Kingdom. So much could be done for the few veterans in this category who are in the late years of their life if this qualifying period were reduced, even the very few who are restricted by the lack of a few days of service.

There is no reason why consideration should not be given, after so many years, to offering relief to war veterans allowances recipients in the area of casual earnings. I refer in this regard to cases where recipients may have casual earnings of up to $800 a year for single persons and $1,200 a year for married persons without their allowances being reduced. We must surely agree that this only deters their initiative and will to live a better life and to provide for their families.

Restriction with regard to farm incomes must also be reviewed, and I hope that these sections in the act will be considered sympathetically when viewed in the context of the proclamations by this government regarding equal opportunity for all Canadians. We know that all the phrases turn out to be only political utterances of computerized thinking without any human feeling.

Before leaving the subject of war veterans allowances, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the newly appointed chairman of the War Veterans Allowances Board, Mr. Don Thompson, who is probably one of the most knowledgeable men in this country in veterans affairs. His knowledge and experience as national secretary of the Dominion Command of the Canadian Legion should stand him in good stead in his appointment, and I sincerely hope that his experience will prove to be of decided advantage to the veterans of this country in his area of responsibility. I hope also that his immersion into bureaucracy will not pollute his thinking in so far as veterans are concerned, and that he will remember forever the contribution he can make in spite of the frustrations he must have experienced during the many years he has served so many war veterans. While I realize the limitations with which he will be faced as chairman of the board, I am sure I speak for all hon. members in wishing him well in his appointment.

I would also like to take this opportunity on behalf of hon. members to offer our sincere appreciation to Colonel W. T. Cromb, the former chairman of the War Veterans Allowances Board, for his spirit of comradeship and dedication in serving veterans over the years, as well as for the assistance he offered to all members in line with their duty to veteran constituents. It is not difficult to use the phrase "service beyond the call of duty" in Mr. Cromb's case, and we wish him well in his retirement. I would just like to remind the minister again that the increases under the War Veterans Allowances Act, even with the new maximum allowable income, are still below the poverty line. I hope that he will make another appeal to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to reach at least this level of requirement.

In moving on to the subject of veterans disability pensions I think I must say, in a spirit of comradeship, that the amendments are in the main satisfactory but, if I may use part of a well worn expression "too little too late"; the "too late" certainly applies. The method of operation of this government has become very obvious. I can refer to their proficiency in delaying tactics when it comes to living up to their responsibility in providing for those Canadians who cannot look after themselves. I must say that I have been rather naive when I look back and note the amount of time that elapsed between the setting up of the Woods Committee and the stage at which we have arrived at this moment.

The Woods Committee was set up in 1965, and we on the Veterans Affairs Committee, after coaxing and cajoling, managed to have the report referred to the Veterans Affairs Committee in 1968. Here we are in 1971, having only reached the second reading stage of the bill. Almost six years have passed, and by April of this year we hope that direct action will be taken for the war veterans of this country. I can only sincerely admit that in my responsibility as part of the opposition I must have been either too naïve or trusting in going along with government action to maintain the status quo and in having allowed the strategy of this government to work. I, therefore, apologize to the dependents of veterans who have passed on for the procrastination of those who govern now as well as those who have governed before, and for their failure to those citizens of our country to whom we owe the greatest debt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: The increases are good and the new amendments will benefit a great many. But when we stop and look at the average age of the first world war veteran whos is in his late seventies, and the world war II veteran who is in his late fifties, whether he is a paraplegic or a quadruplegic, whether he suffered in a Hong Kong prisoner of war camp, whether he suffers from loss of limbs or requires attendance allowance and will now receive the benefits he deserves, we have no reason to be too proud. It is not too difficult to emphasize what I mean by comparing the action of this government in this case with that taken to deal with the other segment of our society which requires the help of the government, namely, the poverty stricken. I refer especially to the aged, the blind, the retarded, and others who fall into the category of the disabled who cannot fend for themselves.

What has happened since 1968 with regard to these citizens? Are not the tactics of this government very obvious by now?

The first step was a proclamation in a throne speech of the goal of the just society. The second step was more proclamations by cabinet ministers and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of our country, which were politically oriented, that every Canadian regardless of where he lives must enjoy a decent quality of life and equal opportunity and that it is our responsibility to see that they do. I have been hearing these proclamations with considerable dismay, and Canadians listened and believed, but to their sorrow and dismay they have not been carried out.

The next tactic, which was as calculated as a military exercise, was the appointment of royal commissions, of Senate committees, and the production of white papers which have only caused further delays because they have to be translated in the two official languages. We have also heard the excuses that no more can be spent on the poverty stricken without taxes being raised. Then, the blame was shifted to the opposition. Now, to bring things up to date, as we have seen in the past few days, the government threw out some bait and provided $68,500 to allow those concerned to hold a conference on poverty and to provide more camouflage to delay support for those who are poor and need help right now. I can only say that even though there is not too much military experience in the cabinet today, its members should certainly be described in military history as the best strategists this country has ever known, strategists in deception tactics.

I understand that a very important member of the cabinet, namely the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), is a former general in the Canadian forces. If he is directing the delaying tactics of this government, then he is doing a first class job. There is certainly not too much military experience in the departments which deal most closely with this type of strategy where it concerns the poor and the veterans. But they have learned well and can be very proud of themselves. I wonder, however, what their consciences tell them. There have been many accolades on the front pages of veterans magazines and in letters from various organizations, but the needy veteran is still waiting for action.

I must say, as I have mentioned with regard to the many letters I have received from the recipients of war veterans allowances, that the letters I have received do not hand out too many bouquets. Let me quote an example of a letter I received from four quadruplegics, signed by four veterans who fall in this category. It reads in part:

The report on the proposed legislation for veterans pensions and supplements leaves much to be desired for the dozen or so quadruplegics. Supplements of attendants and multiple disability allowances are inadequate, as now proposed, to maintain the quadruplegics well-being away from a medical institution—

We are sure by this time that the appointed Commons Committee is well aware of the quadruplegics plight after repeated briefs, demonstrations and pleas. Would it not be feasible to reconsider additional funds plus backdating of the supplements for these few?— We, the undersigned, feel that at least the amount recommended by the Commons Committee would enable a quadruplegic to live on a comparable basis to the paraplegic.

This letter is signed by four quadruplegics, Mr. Speaker. One of the signees was a veteran by the name of T. Damiano, who appeared before the Veterans Affairs committee. He is the only one I recognize, but I will not forget him too easily. I hope that he will forgive me if I remind those veterans of the committee who sit here in this House that he was brought in in a wheelchair. He had no legs, and two uncontrollable stumps for arms as a result of wounds suffered in the Korean war. He should be wheeled into the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, and placed before the cabinet to see the condition of some of those we so easily forget.

One of the headlines that I noticed in a magazine indicated that we were taking a great step forward. I say this headline should have read, "It's About Time We Took a Step Forward." But another headline explains the situation more clearly. It reads, "Amendments to the Pension Act—The Most Extensive Improvements in Half a Century." It has taken us 50 years to realize the needs of the war veterans of this country. Should we be so proud of ourselves, Mr. Speaker? Each and every one of us is responsible.

I hope especially that members of all past governments, who might take the time to reflect on what has happened over the past 50 years, are satisfied that they have done their job conscientiously. I hope I will not hear the same tale of woe in subsequent speeches concerning how much it would cost, or that we would have to raise taxes to increase benefits for the poor and disabled. As I said in my speech on December 2, I cannot accept that ridiculous explanation.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the increases are satisfactory and should be acceptable in the majority of cases. On April 1 the 100 per cent disability pensioner will receive some $4,464 per year if he is married, and his single counterpart will receive $2,640 per year. Provision is now made for an increased clothing allowance to those in receipt of pension on account of two amputations, and a special allowance to a pensioner whose disability requires the wearing of specially made wearing apparel. Special pension status will be granted to former prisoners of the Japanese, those who were captured in Hong Kong in 1941. But please note, Mr. Speaker, this is almost 30 years later. There are, in addition, amendments to authorize automatic pensions for widows and for orphans of these veterans.

Another amendment will authorize payment of special allowance to 100 per cent pensioners who are exceptionally incapacitated, but still qualifying conditions are inserted whereby authority will be vested in a new, completely independent five-man pension review board. A new definition of the benefit of doubt clause will provide a guide for applicants, advocates and adjudicators in the preparation and the processing of pension claims. Other amendments will provide for payment of additional pensions to those suffering consequential disabilities, and will provide for the payment of additional pensions to those in receipt of a pension for the loss of a paired organ or limb, and of an additional pension for the loss of the pair of those organs or limbs. There is also an amendment to extend from 12 months to three years the period for which a pension may be granted retroactively.

There are amendments to establish a bureau of pensions advocates outside of the Department of Veterans Affairs and for the establishment of two new boards for the hearing of appeals, namely, an entitlement board and a pension review board, as well as for new procedures for the making and hearing of applications for awards to clarify certain provisions of the Pension Act. I also welcome the minister's announcement about the Board of Legal Services, and I hope that this will speed up consideration of applications.

No, Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with the recommended increases. These were deliberated over many months by the Veterans Affairs Committee in a non-partisan manner which does all members credit. But I can only say that, unfortunately, they have been recommended too late for many who have passed on before this time.

It is the intention of my party to avoid delay in the passage of Bill C-203 and, in spite of the many shortcomings which could be pointed out, it is our intention to get the bill before committee as quickly as possible so that we may get on with the other stages before enactment.

I am sure we all agree that time is of the essence in the rationalization of the many administrative details which must be worked out so that veterans will receive the benefits afforded by April of this year. There are still many discrepancies in the over-all legislation which must be corrected. There are still many areas where the bill falls short of the expectations of the veterans as recommended by the veterans organizations, the Woods Committee and the Veterans Affairs Committee.

If I seem to be parochial in my comments, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will bear with me while I spend a few moments to present a plea on behalf of the newest province of Canada, my home province of Newfoundland. Under the terms of confederation in 1949, many of Newfoundland's veterans were left hanging in the air because of the peculiar circumstances of their service. Out of a population of 500,000—and at the time of hostilities it was a good deal less—as of October, 1970, there were 1,990 war veterans receiving war veterans allowances and 1,633 receiving civilian war allowances, or a total of 3,623. Some 1,540 are receiving disability pension, and there are 350 who are dependent pensioners.

I am sure hon. members will note that even at today's population figures, over 10 per cent of the Newfoundland population served their country in time of war. It should be clear, then, that I am not being overly forceful when I say it becomes obvious that those who arranged the terms of confederation were not too familiar with the needs of the province in so far as its veterans were concerned. This statement is strengthened by the fact that some 30 people are responsible for the administration of some 5,500 veterans and their dependents. It emphasizes my various appeals to the department to provide more help to seek out the many veterans who are being denied the assistance for which they are eligible, appeals which have fallen on deaf ears in the department ever since 1968. This means, as I have proved, that many Newfoundland veterans are still being denied their just and well deserved benefits.

The staff at the district headquarters in Newfoundland should be complimented on the way in which they handled the workload with which they are faced, especially when the Newfoundland district has a much higher rate of growth in WVA. and CWA. cases than any other of the 18 districts in Canada. I stress, Mr. Speaker, for fear of contradiction, the rate of growth. There are many other areas of shortcomings faced by Newfoundland veterans, not the least of which must be directed to the United Kingdom, causing delays of up to two years. This is a fact that even the Woods committee failed to realize, and deemed acceptable.

There are some 3,700 Newfoundland Foresters who served in World War II and, although they qualify for benefits under the Civilian War Pensions Act, recognition of their service must be reconsidered. I intend to make representations for them in future deliberations of the Veterans Affairs Committee.

To return to the national problem, Mr. Speaker, there are still many deficiencies apparent in the Pension Act to anyone who reviews the provisions which apply to the Veterans Land Act, Canadian Merchant Seamen, Canadian Firefighters and others who offered their lives during wartime. I feel sure that the Veterans Affairs Committee will face these problems in the same spirit of comradeship that was displayed in dealing with the amendments with which we are faced today. We must not forget, when we seek help for war veterans, the contributions that are being made and have been made over the years by veterans' organizations. Not only do they help those in need but they have made a distinct contribution to the youth of Canada—I refer mainly to the Canadian Legion —by contributing to the education and recreation of our young citizens.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times before, that if this government will remove the blinkers when we are struggling in frustration at our inability to instil a sense of national unity, it will be guided by the display of comradeship which is projected through veterans' organizations without regard for race, creed or religion, and only in a dedication to help one another. We need not travel to foreign lands to project an image that we are not able to live up to; so, let us stop and reflect on how we became great as a nation before it is too late. Let us look at the sacrifices of some one million veterans who offered their lives during past world wars to enable us to govern in peace and pride. Let us put some sincerity into our thoughts, so that every Canadian, wherever he lives, will be as he must be, provided with equal opportunity.

[Mr. Marshall.]

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill. It has been a long time in coming. It includes many progressive steps that we, in this party, warmly welcome. I trust that the minister will not be surprised if I have a few critical comments to make as I go along, but I want our initial word to be one of appreciation that, at long last, we have Bill C-203 and that it will soon be on the statute books of Canada.

I should like to join with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) in paying special tribute to the veterans organizations. I have in mind the excellent assistance they gave to us as we studied the Woods Report and the white paper in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. Their principal spokesmen almost became members of our committee. They sat with us for hours on end. I think all members of the committee will agree that they were a tremendous help to us. The officials of the department were also helpful to us; but that is their job. They are supposed to be.

While we are in the mood to extend greetings, I should like to join with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) in paying tribute to the excellent work done by Mr. W. T. Cromb during the years when he was chairman of the War Veterans Allowance Board. We also wish to extend our congratulations to Mr. Donald Thomspon, who recently was secretary to the Royal Canadian Legion but who has now become the new chairman of the War Veterans Allowance Board.

This reference to the War Veterans Allowance Board gives me the opportunity to note, as did the minister and as did the previous speaker, that the bill before us today is not the only piece of veterans legislation to be dealt with in this session. Indeed, we anticipate one or two more pieces of legislation that will come down very soon, namely, bills that will amend the Pension Act in so far as rates are concerned and a bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act as well. These are very important changes that must be made. Otherwise, this bill will have little meaning for many of our veterans. We have in mind the announcement the minister made on December 2, 1970. Like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, we feel, although we welcome any increase, that the amounts of increase thus far proposed are not adequate and it is most unfortunate that they have not been made retroactive. Asking our veterans who have already waited a long time for these increases to wait until the month of April, should not, we feel, be the position of this government and of a grateful Parliament.

I was sorry that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was not able to give an immediate and affirmative answer to the question I put to him during the oral question period this afternoon. It had to do with the increase in the guaranteed income supplement that will apply in January, February and March. One has in mind the fact that over the last two or three years, whenever this has happened, veterans who have been receiving both the war veterans allowance and the guaranteed income supplement have had the total amount of income they could receive raised so that the increase in their guaranteed income supplement would not come off their war veterans allowance. It seems to me that as that has been done for the last three years, there ought to be no question about it this year. I realize that this applies only to the months of January, February and March, because, beginning in April, there will be new rates both for the guaranteed income supplement and for payments made under the War Veterans Allowance Act. We are talking about small amounts of money and it seems a shame that we have to plead and argue for these little amounts to be given to our veterans. However, Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware, the whole question of rates under the Pension Act and of allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act is not now before us. Those questions will be dealt with in separate legislation. At this point we are dealing with Bill C-203 which, in the main, amends the administrative aspects of the Pension Act.

As the minister and the previous speaker pointed out, this bill covers a great many matters. Indeed, the Woods Report contained 148 recommendations. In our standing committee's report on the white paper, we pronounced on each of those 148 recommendations. In some cases where we made favourable recommendations, the government has acted upon them in the bill. So, any attempt to deal with all the details of this bill at the second reading stage would be in vain. Therefore, like the two previous speakers, I wish to direct my remarks to five or six of the main points in the bill now before us.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, we welcome the change in the bill regarding the benefit of doubt. Perhaps it is only a change in wording, but we hope that it will have a far reaching effect. The legislation, as it now stands, in section 70 provides for the benefit of doubt to be given to the veteran; however, the language of section 70 is couched in such a way that it is still necessary for the veteran to produce more evidence than seems to us to be necessary. We are very glad that the language of section 70 of the Pension Act has been done away with and that in its place we are to have the language proposed in a new section 1A. I think it is worth putting that language into Hansard. It reads:

CONSTRUCTION

1A. The provisions of this Act shall be liberally construed—

The word "liberally" is spelled with a small "l", I am glad to say. The section continues as follows:

—and interpreted to the end that the recognized obligation of the people and Government of Canada to provide compensation to those members of the forces who have been disabled or have died as a result of military service, and to their dependants, may be fulfilled.'

That is the basic ground rule, and this has been included in the new act as new section 1A immediately after the title itself. We think that even its location in the legislation is significant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Other sections of the new act will spell out the details of the procedure that are in line with this ground rule. I know that many veterans across this country are hoping that this new and more realistic benefit of doubt approach will result in an opportunity for them to receive a consideration that they have not yet received. So, Mr. Speaker, this is one feature of the legislation that we welcome most warmly, the new provision for a real benefit of doubt to be accorded to veterans who apply for pensions under the Pension Act.

The second feature of this bill to which I should like to refer is the section dealing with the Hong Kong veterans, their widows and other dependents. I believe this is one of a number of instances, and it is an important one, in which the actual recommendation of the Woods Committee has been followed down the line. The government accepted this recommendation when it produced the white paper. The standing committee went along with it as well, and now the heart of this recommendation is contained in this bill.

As I understand it, any veteran who was at Hong Kong, and I welcome the minister's reference to the Winnipeg Grenadiers and others who were there in 1941 and were prisoners of war during the years that followed, who has any assessable disability is to be regarded as having at least a 50 per cent disability and therefore a 50 per cent pension. As hon. members are aware, the magic of 50 per cent is that the widow of any such veteran will qualify for a pension as a right.

The new legislation is worded in such a way that it is quite clear that this also applies to the widows of those Hong Kong veterans who have already died. This provision, Mr. Speaker, is eminently satisfactory except for the effective date. We think it should have been put into effect two or three years ago. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, we welcome it wholeheartedly.

I now move to the third item on which I wish to make a few comments. I refer to the section in the legislation dealing with what is to be called an exceptional incapacity allowance. The minister can point out that in the end the veterans organizations seem to be willing to accept this provision in the form in which the government has included it in the bill, but I am not completely satisfied. The government should at least have accepted the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I remind the minister and hon. members that that recommendation was in the form of a compromise.

The minister stated that the government is doubling its original offer and that this is a response to the members of the standing committee. Whether that means anything depends on the original offer. In the white paper, despite the more generous suggestions in the Woods report, the government proposed what is now called an exceptional incapacity allowance ranging from $400 to $1,200. Because the government is offering from $800 to $2,400, the minister says the amount has been doubled. The difficulty is that the standing committee, after discussing this at great length and being willing to compromise, in order to get something on which we were unanimous, recommended that this kind of allowance for 100 per cent pensioners who require more than the 100 per cent should range from $700 to $3,500 a year. The government is shortchanging the committee and the veterans of this country by proposing a maximum figure of $2,400 after our compromise suggestion of a maximum of $3,500.

I fell there is still merit in the position taken in the Woods report, and by veterans organizations, to the effect that payments in addition to 100 per cent should be tied to special categories. If a person has a certain condition, he should receive an additional pension as a matter of right. We went over this in great detail. We suggested adding together the various percentages in some cases. Quadruplegics would receive very high percentages. Possibly that will not work. That is why we agreed to specify certain categories. This is what was done.

The national veterans organizations of Canada on pages 20 and 21 of their joint statement of March, 1970, set out categories that should be established. They suggested that if a veteran is in one or more of these categories he should receive a certain increased percentage in his pension. The veterans organizations took the position that it should be done in that way as a matter of right rather than something granted by the commission.

The legislation does not use the words means test or needs test. However, it is to be done at the discretion of the commission. Most of us feel there is a danger in that. It would have been far better to grant these increases to those whose pensions are already at 100 per cent, on the basis of a precise schedule, as a matter of right. I hope that when we get into committee and have an opportunity to compare what the government has included in the bill with what the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs recommended, the flexibility to which the minister referred will still obtain and that we will be able to make changes in this portion of the bill.

As is often the case with this kind of legislation, we welcome the fact that something is being done. We are glad that additional amounts are available for those people receiving 100 per cent pensions. However, we do not like the extent to which they seem to be matters of grace and matters of determination by the commission, rather than matters of right on the basis of certain categories or certain precise conditions.

I am sure that all hon. members were impressed with the remarks of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe with regard to the quadruplegic who appeared before our committee. We were all impressed with the letter sent by several of them in the Sunnybrook Hospital in Toronto. The number of quadruplegics in this country is not very great. Indeed, the number of those with extensive multiple disabilities is somewhat limited. It seems that this grateful country that we frequently talk about could well afford to grant these people everything they need. We must do everything we can in terms of money to lessen their discomfort and disenjoyment of life. We do not think this will be done properly if it is a matter of discretion. It should clearly be a matter of right. Although we welcome the exceptional incapacity allowance which is included in this legislation, it is my hope that when we deal with this bill in committee there will be some improvements in this section along the line recommended by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I now wish to deal with a very important, but complicated, question. That is the new set of procedures that will obtain under the revisions set out under this bill. Although in the first instance the government did not accept the recommendation of the Woods committee for a separate review board, but proposed its own arrangement, in committee we were quite pleased that in the end the government agreed in principle that the first two levels of consideration of pension applications be under the jurisdiction of the Canada Pension Commission, first the commission and then an entitlement board, but that in addition, a pension review board should be established, to be completely independent from the operations of the Canadian Pension Commission. We think this recommendation of the Woods committee was excellent. The fact that the government changed its position before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs is evidence of the fact that the veterans organizations made a good case.

I believe this will make a difference to the veterans of this country. They will know that their applications for pensions will be dealt with by the Pension Commission and by an entitlement board, and if they are not satisfied they will have the opportunity of applying to another body that was not involved at the first two levels, namely a pension review board. We think this is good. We are glad it is being done. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, in my attempt to compare the language of Bill C-203 with the recommendations made by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I feel that some subtle but very significant changes have been made. My impression is that the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs not only wanted this pension review board to be completely independent but as informal as possible so that the veteran or his representative would receive the most humane consideration of his case.

As I read the legislation I get the distinct impression that the pension review board is being set up somewhat along the lines of a court; it seems to me that too much red tape has been introduced, too many ground rules are specified. It is all done in such a way that instead of this review board being an informal arena in which aggrieved veterans can have their cases examined in human terms they will be present at a courtroom scene where their chances will not be as great as they would otherwise be. If the government is prepared to go this far, and agree to the establishment of a separate review board as proposed in the Woods Report, as requested by the veterans organizations and as recommended by the Standing Committee, I think it should set the board up in such a way that it will really work—not only that, but give the impression to everyone that it is, in fact, working.

To turn to a few of the details, it seems to me there are certain things that will overload the work of this review board. One has to do with the right of the pension commission to reconsider a matter. As the bill reads, this can only be done if the review board agrees to its being done. It appears to me that hundreds, if not thousands of cases of this kind will go up to the review board and clutter up its operations. Many of these cases are such that they could easily be dealt with by the commission itself at the lower level; if the workload of the review board is cluttered up with them the board will not be able to do the humane job that is called for in the name of the veterans.

Generally speaking, veterans have been pleased with the work of the Pension Commission. Certainly, those who have got their pensions have been pleased. Veterans organizations have had to admit that the Commission has done a good job over the years. Nevertheless there has been enough dissatisfaction, enough feeling that provision for a final review was unsatisfactory, to lead, now, to the setting up of a pension review board. I plead that we should not create a court situation but work out a more humane arrangement in which a veteran will really be given an opportunity to have his case heard sympathetically.

One of the recommendations on this point was ours. I am referring to recommendation number 22 from the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and I should like to read it into the record.

> Leave to Re-Open Appeals: The Veterans Organizations propose that there would be no requirement for a "leave to re-open" procedure before the proposed Pension Review Board. If new grounds or evidence exist, the application for "Leave to re-open" would be the responsibility of the Commission. When the applicant has exhausted his procedural rights before the Commission he would be entitled to have his case reviewed by the Pension Review Board. In a case which had previously been adjudicated upon by the Pension Review Board, and no new grounds or evidence existed, the Review Board would review the case a second or subsequent time, should the applicant's representative request this action. This is believed to be in keeping with the basic concept of the Woods Committee, which was to the effect that there should be no "finality" in applications under the Pension Act.
> Your Committee concurs in this proposal and so recommends.

This is what the veterans wanted. I believe it is what Parliament wants to provide—that in this important matter of seeing that justice is done to veterans there should be no finality, no point at which a veteran is told: There is nothing more you can do. The situation thus envisaged is not established if in setting up this new board we hamstring it with a lot of ground rules and red tape which defeat the purpose of the committee's recommendation. This is a detail we can examine when we get into the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs on this bill, but I give notice now that I would like to see the ground rules for the pension review board made more flexible and more humane so that the purpose we have in mind might really be met.

I move on to one or two other things I should like to speak about. I welcome the clause of the bill which provides for the stabilization of World War II pensions. As the minister says, it took many years after the first world war to take this action in the case of those veterans. Now, at last, we are doing it in the case of World War II veterans. There are a number of other provisions in the bill having to do with dependants and their education, accidents which occur off-duty and so on—quite a long list of things which are good and which make the bill such that it can be said to be an improvement in our veterans legislation. However, as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe said so well, no matter how much we improve the administrative arrangements, if we fail to show proper concern in terms of disability pension rates and in terms of the amounts granted under the War Veterans Allowance Act, the veterans will ask: What was the use of the Woods Report; what was the use of spending all the hours which were spent on this measure? So I hope that after we have got this bill through, and after members in all parties have had a chance to speak on it, the government will reconsider the rates which the minister announced on December 2, shortly before the Christmas recess.

Returning to the bill itself, there are two things which are not contained in it. I regret they are not there. The first is a provision for automatic increases in pensions at certain ages. This, I have to admit, is a point we lost in the committee, but that is no reason it could not have been put in this bill. The Woods Report recommended it and the veterans organizations pressed very hard for it. This, it seems to me, is something we can all readily understand—that as veterans get older their needs become greater, their capacity for making money on the side lessens. It is a sensible and realistic proposal that in certain circumstances disability pensions should move upward, even all the way to the 100 per cent pension at a certain age. As a matter of fact, I think this is a principle which could well be applied to old age pensions generally, but here would be a good place at which to start. This is a question on which we were divided in the committee. We who wanted this proposal accepted were out-voted, but I still hope the government might consider its adoption.

There is one other provision which we approved and which was recommended in the committee's report but which is not to be found in the bill before us. Hon. members who are on the Veterans Affairs Committee will be able to guess at once what it is. I refer to recommendation No. 106, which consists of one sentence:

> That a proportionate pension be paid to a widow where a pensioner in receipt of pension of less than 48 per cent dies.

Recommendation 107 is similar and would have had the same effect with regard to dependants other than a widow. Although we did not win the vote on recommendation 107, we did win the vote on recommendation 106, which I have just read, and again this recommendation is part of our report. It is listed with those matters in which we concur. True, the vote was not unanimous, but it was a majority vote and that becomes the committee's decision.

We hear a great deal said around this place about the importance of committee work. I have seen other ministers come before the House and admit that their position was overruled by the standing committee, and they accepted it. As a matter of fact, I think in all fairness I must say that since we revamped our committee structure most of the changes made to bills by committees have been accepted by the responsible minister when the bills returned to the floor of the House. I am very sorry that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has not seen fit to accept the will of the committee with regard to recommendation 106.

Perhaps I might be permitted to take a moment to explain the obvious. At least, it is obvious to all who are familiar with this particular field of legislation but perhaps I should place on the record what this is all about. As hon. members are aware, under the Pension Act as it now stands if a veteran with a pension of 50 per cent or more dies his widow automatically gets a widow's pension under the Pension Act. However, if a veteran has a pension of less than 48 per cent—and in all of this 48 per cent has become the magic figure—should he die his widow gets no pension whatever. There is no grading at all; this is an absolute cut-off point. Most hon. members are aware of this because they have had to deal with it.

The Woods Committee dealt with this issue and made a very clear recommendation. It recommended that in the case of widows of veterans who have a pension of less than 48 per cent a proportionate pension should be paid. As I say, that was a clear recommendation made by the Woods committee. This was rejected by the government in its white paper but the standing committee in its report back to the House recommended that its recommendation No. 106 be inserted into the act. We are now considering Bill C-203 and we find that the recommendation of the standing committee in this respect has been ignored. I regret and deplore this, and I hope that even yet the government will give consideration to it.

May I just read a few words from the Woods Committee report on this question since, as I say, it appeals to me as one of some importance. I should like to refer to volume III of the Woods report. Hon. members might think that this volume is a whole report in itself, but it is only one third of the report. At page 884 the committee report reads:

> Your Committee considers that a widow and other dependants have a vested right in a pension awarded to a member of the Forces for disability. This right is based on the premise that, by reason of injury, disease or aggravation thereof where such were attributable to, incurred during, or related to military service, the pensioner's earning capacity was reduced in his lifetime, usually during his most productive years.
> The dependants of that pensioner should have a moral and legal right to be maintained through the earning capacity of that member and when the earning capacity has been reduced, and replacement thereof is made by way of pension, the dependant has a vested right in that pension.
> This vested right applies to the pension paid to the dependants while the member is alive, and when he dies, should continue to apply during the lifetime of a widow and dependent parents and dependent brothers and sisters, and during the pensionable age in the case of children.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

> Pension is an integral part of the economic life of a family. Pension, and the causes from which it arose, in one degree or another affect the entire life of the pensioner—and likewise that of his wife, family and other dependents. The effect of this does not disappear on the death of the pensioner, but is continued to the extent that the widow and other dependants are subject to the effects of the results of the member's service. While this effect will vary in degree and extent, it is always present. To a man earning $5,000 a year, for example, a 40 per cent pension of $100 a month represents a significant portion of what he has to live on. To deprive his family of the financial help that he received while alive not only places his dependants in a position of facing a larger problem of readjustment, but in effect terminates the acceptance of responsibility on the part of the state, arising from the service of one who was the cornerstone of the family economy. In effect the view is adopted that the family's right to expect anything from the pensioner terminates with his death.
> The family has a vested interest in the pensioner's estate and in all that he was. The cut-off of assistance by way of pension on death of the pensioner fails to take proper account of the larger implications of his responsibility.

Then, there is a paragraph pointing out that in the case of pension of 50 per cent or more the widow is taken care of because of the already accepted principles that apply above the 50 per cent level. The Woods Committee then concludes by saying:

> The "vested right" principle would of course apply to the dependants of pensioners in receipt of 50 per cent or more, but it is not necessary to make it applicable, in that the "contributory" principle takes precedence. When, however, this "contributory" principle does not apply, in that the pension was in payment at less than 48 per cent, the dependants would still be entitled to a portion of pension on the "vested right" principle.
> Admittedly, they would have entitlement only to the percentage to which the pensioner's assessment had indicated that he was disqualified in the unskilled labour market. Your Committee considers, notwithstanding, that the vested right should be recognized, and has made a recommendation accordingly.

I have read at some length from pages 884 to 886 of volume III of the Woods Committee report because I think those paragraphs put the case very clearly. Certainly, it seems to me that these statements should not be ignored. I repeat that every one of us in this House has had to deal with widows of deceased veterans with a pension of less than 48 per cent who feel aggrieved. I know we are told that these widows can turn to the War Veterans Allowance Board and to other sources, but surely the Woods Committee has stated the case very clearly and we ought to pay attention to it. Let me say again that if it is contended around here that this Parliament is better for the committee system, then let us not spoil it by ignoring the recommendation that was made by this important committee. I hope that when the bill goes to committee something can be done about this particular clause.

As I said when I began my remarks, the bill as a whole makes quite a number of improvements, and we therefore welcome it and give it our support. We shall be glad to deal with its details in committee. However, I hope in particular that we will be able to do something to improve the terms of the exceptional incapacity allowance. I hope we will also be able to do something to make the Pensions Review Board more responsive to the needs of the veterans and to the ideas that the Woods Committee and the standing committee have expressed. I hope that we will be able to do something for the widows whom I have just mentioned in connection with my reference to recommendation 106. Then, when we have done all that, I hope the government will reconsider the amounts mentioned in the announcement of December 2 by the minister and that the increases in pension rates and in the war veterans allowance will be much larger than he proposed. I hope also, that instead of our veterans and their dependants having to wait until April, 1971, the increases granted by Parliament will be made retroactive at least to April, 1970. Surely, we should do nothing less.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, as all those who have spoken before me, I am happy that the House gives consideration to the second reading of Bill C-203 presented by the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) on December 2, 1970, which had been expected for a long time.

As other hon. members have already said, this bill is very valuable because it brings forth amendments that should have been made long ago.

However, the first reproach that we must make is that the amendments to the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act should be in force, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has just said, much earlier than April 1, 1971, not only because of the increased benefits to veterans, but also because of the improved method of assessing their disabilities.

This bill comes too late, for thousands of veterans have suffered in the past from the inadequacy of pensions, taking services rendered by them into consideration.

Generally speaking, the bill provides a 10 per cent increase in the amount of pensions. It also provides a special pension for Hong Kong veterans and the establishment of a Review Board, which, in my opinion, is very important. But here again the 10 per cent increase and the establishment of a Review Board can have very different consequences for certain veterans, since everything depends on the assessment of their disabilities.

In fact, if the veteran's pension is raised by 10 per cent while the assessment of his disability is carried on a stricter basis, this 10 per cent increase will not improve the lot of those who are now entitled to a pension which is not commensurate to the services rendered to the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I have in mind several cases involving veterans. In one case, the Pension Commission has delayed for four years its decision to allow a veteran to undergo surgical operations. That decision was taken only six months ago. Four years ago, the Commission had deemed these operations unnecessary and had sent the veteran back home on the grounds that his pain was all in his mind. However, the Commission has recently ruled that this pensioner's sufferings were nothing far from imaginary and this fellow was given persmission to be operated on absolutely free of charge to him.

Assessing the veteran's disability is the core of the problem. If in the future the criteria for assessing disability are made more rigid, then the 10 per cent increase allowed today will soon be absorbed.

It will be objected that Bill C-203 provides for the setting up of a five-member Pension Review Board. I trust that this body will be able to make the necessary humanitarian rulings but, on the other hand, we all know very well that the extent of the adjudication powers of the Pension Review Board will only go so far as the regulations applied by the department will allow.

Actually, if the department shows too much rigidity in its application of basic criteria for assessing the case of certain pensioners, the Board will have to follow those recommendations, those basic rules before deciding which of the veteran or the Pension Commission is right.

That is why the general principle of the bill is good. We finally have the pleasure of acknowledging that fact. However, time will tell whether review boards are ghost committees much too restricted in their decisions. We are aware of the work of review boards in other fields, in other departments. We know very well that to be really effective a review board must sometimes overthrow the decisions of officials but, on the other hand, it must obey the instructions, rules, recommendations of the department. If the department is too strict when it determines the fundamental criteria to evaluate possible disabilities of veterans, the bill now before us will not be enough. But we congratulate the minister for finally tabling the bill in the House. All admit it seeks to help war veterans.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE LIVING STANDARDS IN CANADA AND THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of legislation to abolish poverty by redistributing income and planning productive resources so that the wealth created by modern technology may provide a much more equal standard of living for Canadians, regardless of who or where they may be, and may also be used to enable Canada to contribute a fair share of this country's wealth toward greater equality of living standards throughout the world.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that this resolution should come up for discussion at the beginning of the new year. Never before has the Christmas season held such a poignant mixture of warm festivity and chilling concern about the future, not only of our country but of the earth itself. Like the rest of you, I had been enjoying myself in my constituency in many happy groups when suddenly the shadow fell across us. We began to worry about the increasing numbers of people, men and women like ourselves, for whom Canada has no place. I spent Christmas Eve as the guest of an organization of unemployed people who had begged the wherewithal for their Christmas dinner from those who had means. On welfare themselves, these people and their families opened wide the doors to those with even less hope, the men and women on Skid Road. There was food and music and friendship for a night. But for all these people there was no prospect of a future where they could earn an income and share in the life and responsibility of the community. They felt it deeply, and I felt ashamed and indignant that Canada's future had no place for them and their children and the other half-million Canadians who are unemployed.

And that is not all: there are the old, the handicapped, the sick, the blind, the single parents and many other groups. One Canadian in five—perhaps the latest figures would show even more—is deep in poverty now and doomed to sink even deeper if this government continues its present policy of selectivity, that is selecting the poor and making their small incomes go to finance the destitute. Oh, yes! I know we have had a Senate committee to study poverty. And I know that the government has just given a grant of $50,000 to finance in part the recent Poor People's Conference whose members, according to one of them, "are all poor and are all working to solve the problems of poverty." Such a conference has undoubtedly been valuable to those who participated, but I think it is time now that the government stopped stringing people along. It is time we stopped sobbing over poverty and took the first steps to get rid of it. The responsibility for taking those first steps is here in this House. If this government will turn its resources to providing a workable plan for a guaranteed income for Canadians in every part of this country, it will have left its mark for all time, not only on a grateful Canada but on a world that sorely needs such an example.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

I say a "workable plan". We all know it will not be easy. We all know it bristles with difficulties. There is the difficulty of providing incentives to work for those who are able to work. But I noticed the other day at the poverty conference that there were those among the delegates who said that even more important than the right to a guaranteed income is the right to guaranteed work. There are a great many who are looking for an opportunity to support themselves and to earn their own way. There is the much greater difficulty for this government to open up the opportunities for socially-needed jobs that private business will not and cannot provide. There is the supreme difficulty for this government to muster up courage to tax people according to their ability, regardless.

But we do know that the idea of a guaranteed income is no longer regarded as impracticable. Why, half the members of the cabinet have spoken in favour of it. It has been urged by provincial leaders and social workers. Indeed, at one time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave the distinct impression that it was just around the corner so far as he was concerned. It has been a rapidly receding corner lately. Indeed, at this point I know I will be told that nothing, but nothing, can be done about a guaranteed income until we can get greater economic growth. Indeed, the white paper on social security is quite explicit about this. But to my mind, the need for greater economic growth is no excuse whatever for failing to redistribute fairly the very great wealth that we can and do produce now. That will not stop us planning for the economic growth we need.

Indeed, until we have proper planning for economic growth we have no hope of achieving the goal of guaranteed work which delegates to the Poor People's Conference have demanded as fundamental. A radical departure is required from our past and present attitudes toward economic and industrial growth. As a matter of fact Kenneth Galbraith is one of the few thoroughly sane economists I can think of at the present time. He is one of those who at present has been saying, for goodness' sake forget the book lore of the nineteenth century and look at the facts of the twentieth century which are staring us in the face. The idea that the faster you run the more economic growth you will provide and the more prosperity you will provide is a myth of the first order. You will provide the prosperity all right, but it will go to the top little group of people who have the control of the economic growth. It will not be redistributed or siphoned off to the people who need it.

We simply cannot go on with the suicidal procedure of seeking more markets for more products in order that industrial corporations can continue to make increasing profit while the gap widens between the haves and the have-nots at home and throughout the world. Some people have always known that this was immoral. Now a growing number of people are realizing that it is unworkable as well. We have achieved miracles by modern technology, but technology has been responsible also for many of the very serious problems facing us today. Among these are the enormous growth in the world's population, the deterioration of our environment and the interdependence of a world shrinking because of the amazing advances in transportation and communications. Now, we must turn our technology toward the new goals of solving the problems which technology has created. Foremost among these problems is how we are going to give practical recognition to the fact that people are people wherever you find them. As humans, they have approximately the same needs for light and air and space, for housing and food and water, for education and work, rest and recreation, for intimacy and privacy, and above all, for growth and self-fulfilment.

If you do not believe me read a book like one of Margaret Mead's books or those of any other person who has studied people with black skins, white skins, yellow skins, rich people, poor people, and you will discover that these people are all human beings under the skin. They have human feelings and will not put up indefinitely with being used as things by people who have more affluence, more prestige and more power and who believe they can use these people indefinitely for their own advantage.

Because of the greater knowledge and inter-relationship among countries and peoples throughout the world today, there will be no end to the unrest and violence we are witnessing in increasing measure until some modicum of equality of income and opportunity is achieved throughout the world. Canada is where we begin. But we must begin elsewhere too. Last summer's white paper on foreign policy made no mention of the targets for external aid called for by the Pearson report. It called for at least one per cent of the Canadian national product by not later than 1975, a commitment that Canada made years ago but has only half reached. It did promise $60 million more for the following fiscal year, but as the Oxfam News commented:

> Here, however, is a conflict between two of the policy objectives given priority in the white paper—economic growth and social justice. In many areas, the review seems to oscillate uneasily between these two objectives—but where there is a clash of priorities, the emphasis comes down consistently on the side of economic growth—that is, growth for Canada. The Just Society is subordinate to the search for increased wealth.

I could add; that is, increased wealth for industrial corporations. This government began with the lofty objective of the Just Society. Today, it operates with a maxim of another kind: Principles are good but dollars are better. The dollars, of course, are reserved for the affluent at home and abroad. The poor must beg and share the pennies. Sometimes, when some of us urge the redistribution of income and the proper planning of production as I am doing today, we are told with an indulgent smile that we are naïve. Someone is naïve all right, but it is the people who believe they can operate the technology of 1971 with the ideas of earlier centuries.

The Canadian Economy

• (5:10 p.m.)

Speaking before the board of governors in Copenhagen last October, World Bank president Robert McNamara warned of the dangers ahead in a world where:

> At least a third to a half of the world's people suffer from hunger or nutritional deprivation and where the average person in a high standard area—

Meaning Canada, among others.

> —consumes four pounds of food a day compared with the average one pound and a quarter in a low standard area. Infant deaths per 1,000 live births are four times as high in the developing countries as in the developed ones. A man in the west can expect to live 40 per cent longer than the average man in the developing countries.

The figure may be a fraction higher in Prince Edward Island which has the highest record for longevity in Canada.

> There are 100 million more illiterates today than there were some 20 years ago—some 800 million illiterates today. The gap between the per capita incomes of the rich nations and the poor nations is widening, both relatively and absolutely. At the extremes that gap is already more than $3,000, and present projections are that it may well widen to $9,000 by the end of the century. In the year 2,000, per capita income in the United States in terms of today's prices is expected to be approximately $10,000; in Brazil $500; and in India, $200.

Mr. MacNamara further comments:

> Frankly I do not see this as a situation in which any of our shared hopes for a long peace and steady material progress are likely to be achieved.

Sober words covering a world of sombre foreboding. Conditions at home in Canada are going the same way, if less dramatically. The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. It is because our government refuses to recognize that the just society is not a slogan on which to get elected but the only way in which technology can be made to work without destroying us. I wish that the government would take the just society seriously and realize that it is the only recipe which can save us from being destroyed by our own technology. In world war II the British government, with its back to the wall in the dreadful struggle to save the British people from Hitler discovered that the only way it could muster the full productive potential and vital morale of the men and women of Britain was to effect fair shares for all. You remember how the King of England had a rim on his bath tub marked permanently so he would not use more water than the prescribed five inches that he felt he should have under the fair arrangements in Britain. They shared the scanty supplies of food and they shared the dangers and difficulties heroically. In the end, the British people proved invincible. I think that, in the end, the Canadian people will prove invincible, but only if we can genuinely share the good things in this country horizontally from coast to coast and vertically from the rich to the poor.

Today, I want to say plainly to the government that if they, and we, are to save Canada from all the forces that will tear us asunder, they must do the same thing. They simply must take measures to bring the incomes of the Newfoundlanders up to the incomes of the Ontarians. They simply must take steps to prevent the 38 per cent of Canadian unemployed people being Quebeckers. They simply must find ways and means of working with the municipalities across Canada to finance hospitals and schools, sewage plants, transit systems and low income housing that are needed so badly and that would provide employment for so many. It is time they stopped pouring public money through the sieve of well-heeled corporations, Canadian abroad, U.S. and others, in the vain hope that the provision of jobs for people and not profits for shareholders will be the main consideration.

We need a new ethic to bind us together if we are to keep Canada in one piece and develop it into the lovely, harmonious country it could become. That ethic is the conviction that every Canadian has the right to share in the good things of this country and the responsibility to share in the planning and development of this country. My resolution is only the first step in building the confidence and co-operation essential for this tremendous undertaking. I commend this resolution to the very serious consideration of this government, knowing well that it embodies the absolutely essential first step to achieving a united country which will be of some use in bringing about a harmonious and united world.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Anyone who has ever experienced the frustrations of being poor; anyone who has ever seen at first hand the social and psychological effects of poverty, must certainly be dedicated to the elimination of this disease in our society. The abolition of poverty, however, by redistributing income and planning production resources so that a more equitable standard of living for all Canadians is brought about is hardly possible within a short period of time. I say that because, on the one hand, a responsible government must concern itself with the goals of economic growth. This is what provides jobs for people.

The hon. member to my left indicated that this is the most effective way to eliminate poverty, and to that extent I agree with her. On the other hand, the government, besides trying to expand the economy and provide for its growth, must also search for ways to bring about a greater equity in the distribution of income. If there were to be a sudden increase in the redistribution of income in the form of a large expansion of income security programs, for instance, this could very well impede economic growth in a number of ways. It would shift government expenditures away from activities that contribute to growth, such as stimulation of new output, improvement in productivity, manpower training, research and so on. Increased benefits would have to be paid for by increased revenues through higher taxes, and that must result in higher production costs. These higher costs would result in a slowdown of the Canadian economy since Canadian producers would be unable to complete in both the domestic and foreign markets, and this in turn would result in still greater unemployment and a greater need for welfare.

In discussing the abolition of poverty, the problem begins with the question of how to define poverty. Although many definitions are possible, it is obvious that any single definition of poverty is arbitrary and clearly subject to disagreement. To the poor, however, poverty cannot be defined in statistical or sociological terms. Their condition exists as a daily fight for survival. Their deprivation is real, not a trick of rhetoric or statistics. Moreover, for many of the poor, poverty is not a temporary situation but an enduring fact of life.

In the usual sense, poverty exists when the resources of people are inadequate to provide a socially acceptable standard of living. The classification of what standard is socially acceptable, and the measurement of resources that people should have to keep up an acceptable standard, of course present many difficulties.

The Marsh Report of 1943 pointed out that a yardstick to determine poverty was necessary because the starting point for all social security discussions must be the minimum level of family income, and because such a standard measures the adequacy of existing legislation and social assistance practices. Once a minimum standard of living has been defined, there comes into existence as well the impetus to eliminate poverty. Therefore, the establishment of so-called poverty lines is necessary in order to have efficient social planning.

Poverty today is certainly something quite different from that which existed in pre-industrial and early industrial societies. Today, poverty in Canada is not so much a question of subsistence although, Mr. Speaker, there still is in existence some subsistence poverty, particularly I think among the native peoples of Canada. Mostly, however, poverty now is a question of relative deprivation.

Generally speaking, the standard of living of Canada's poor is related to a much higher across-the-board standard of living. Thus, poverty is no longer related only to the satisfaction of basic needs but also to the aspirations of people for higher standards. By some this has been called the revolution of rising expectations. The concept of minimum need in our affluent society extends far beyond mere physical needs to include conventional and social needs. A minimum standard budget, therefore, must represent the lowest possible level that does not compromise the family's physical health or their self-respect as members of the community.

In Canada, recommended intakes of food are suggested in the Dietary Standard for Canada, together with the Canadian Food Guide. The Report of the Federal Task Force on Housing stated that everyone in Canada is entitled to "clean and warm shelter as a matter of basic human right." As for space, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a standard for public housing which includes a kitchen, living room, a bedroom for two parents, and no more than two children in one bedroom. Clothing costs can be calculated on replacement rates.

Items other than food, clothing and housing cannot very well be based on scientific calculations, but it should be clear to all that when a family's income is just large enough to cover what is considered necessary for the maintenance of health and working capacity, poverty still exists and poverty still exists because money is also needed to satisfy those social needs which enable one to avoid being an object of pity or of ridicule in the community in which one lives. Canada has tried a number of different techniques in its efforts to fight poverty. There are some universal plans. There are some social insurance plans. But since it would be far too costly to provide social insurance and universal flat-rate benefits sufficient to meet all needs, there will be a continuing need for social assistance programs related to family income and needs.

Social assistance must recognize a family's need for adequate income, for the maintenance of personal dignity and independence, and as well it must encourage self-reliance. Social assistance should progress from poor relief to social insurance by improving assistance benefits, enlarging the concept of need, and by removing the moral stigma attached to recourse to assistance.

I just wish to mention in closing a word about guaranteed income, Mr. Speaker. Using this technique, the government pays subsidies to all poor households in order to raise their already low incomes, and to reduce or fully close the poverty income gap. This approach is less costly than universal payment plans, and is less offensive to recipients than the needs or means test. It is a more efficient anti-poverty tool than either the demogrant or social insurance techniques. The main thrust of this type of program is to help the working poor.

The guaranteed income or income test approach has been used in the case of the guaranteed income supplement for old age pensioners. By using this technique, Canada is one of the few countries in the world to have tried this new approach in which income tax data and the amount of the benefit are linked together. I think that all of us in this House recognize that we have a long way to go in our efforts to eliminate poverty. But having defined the problem, and having had the courage to face up to it, considering that there are always limitations of resources, I am convinced that some important steps forward have been taken, and I know that some other equally important steps may be expected soon.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, to abolish poverty in Canada is not an easy task, and indications are that no legislative action can achieve such an objective within a short period of time.

In the past, public policy in the economic field has been directed, as it continues to be directed today, towards maintaining a high level of income and employment, and in the social field towards the development of a comprehensive range of income maintenance programs and health and social services. It has been generally expected that as national income rose, and social security provisions improved, there would be fewer and fewer people living in poverty.

Much of our concern today centres around the fact that traditional economic and social policies have not solved the problems of our industrial society to the extent expected, and that our programs are not adequately meeting the needs of the poor. In order to examine the shortcomings of our system with regard to the poor, it is important to examine the concept of poverty and its consequences in Canada.

What is the meaning of poverty? The basic meaning of poverty is deprivation. The poverty-stricken are deprived in relation to the affluent and the well-to-do. A moment's reflection on the subject makes it clear that poverty varies with time and place in terms of recognized values. Starvation, death due to exposure, and loss of life due to some lack of resources are the only absolute forms of poverty, while the remaining types of deprivation are relative. Everyone knows that being poor in Canada means something different from being poor in India, and that poverty in Canada is much different today from that in the thirties or in many earlier decades.

Poverty involves both economic deprivation and social alienation. Economic deprivation develops when poor people have insufficient access to certain goods, services and conditions of life which are enjoyed by the rest of the community. The most obvious effect of poverty on personality is that children of the poor soon become conditioned to failure which, in turn, leads to social alienation. Expectations are first learned in the family and if continued failure is the expectation, ambitions of the young remain low. In this way poverty is self-perpetuating, passing from one generation to the next.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to ask ourselves who are the poor in Canada. In labour market terms, the poor can be divided into three classes: the unemployed, the underemployed and the unemployable. The second category includes the working poor who are working full-time but whose earnings are abnormally low in relation to their needs. The third category includes retired people, widows and deserted wives with dependent children, the totally disabled and vocationally handicapped, all of whom have practically nothing to offer in the labour market.

An examination of the incidence of poverty in Canada for 1967 indicates that out of the 840,000 families estimated to live below the poverty line, about 60 per cent have family heads who are participating in the labour force. This includes both the unemployed and underemployed. The income of these families is presumably beyond public assistance levels and, according to the criteria underlying the determination of poverty lines, is not sufficient to maintain an adequate standard of living. More than half of the poor families in the labour force are headed by paid workers employed at low wages and with large families. Somewhat less than half are headed by self-employed individuals who are engaged in farming, fishing, hunting or in small businesses.

Let me now talk about the unemployed. A major factor of poverty in families is the unemployment of the family head. In fact, the degree to which families are exposed to poverty varies with the employment of the heads of families. There is some unemployment even in the best of times and it is generally accepted that some unemployment is unavoidable. Because of structural changes, seasonal and other factors, a 4 per cent unemployment rate on a national basis means that not everyone can work, and that wages will be lower than they would be if there were greater competition for workers. It also means that young people without work experience, the uneducated and many others, fall victim to unemployment through no fault of their own and are thus exposed to poverty. Higher rates than 4 per cent would, of course, aggravate this situation still further.

At any given time people may be unemployed for a variety of reasons. In Canada, on the average, seasonal variations account for about one-third of total unemployment. In many of our depressed areas this is the principal cause of poverty. Those with limited education and marginal skills are finding work only with increasing difficulty. Technological changes, producing shifts toward occupations which call for higher education and particular skills, pose a growing threat to the uneducated and the unskilled. The victims of unemployment may be squeezed even harder in future years by an increase of automation. The combination of the computer and automated machine promises a tremendous increase in production, with a reduction in human labour requirements.

The underemployed are people working less than they want to, in part-time or casual jobs or at occupations where productivity and income are low. Underemployment in the latter sense is a major poverty factor, especially in rural areas, and can be regarded as incurable underemployment. For many male workers who are the heads of families, it is not the current joblessness that is the primary cause of poverty but, rather, the history of an erratic series of short-term jobs or a spell of uninterrupted employment at low pay, coupled with a large number of dependants to be supported out of family income. A large proportion of these people are working full-time, even though their wages cannot keep their families out of poverty.

Most of the full-time workers in this situation appear to be now engaged in low paying occupations. They may have more difficulty in obtaining needed help than a victim of unemployment. An unemployed person is eligible for unemployment insurance benefits and, when these expire, for social assistance. On the other hand, full-time workers with low earnings cannot get any further help even though their incomes are inadequate. Most provincial welfare departments are reluctant to subsidize full-time earnings in circumstances of extreme hardship. Welfare authorities have to consider the twin problems of weakening incentives to work and subsidizing inadequate wages.

The heads of about 40 per cent of families as well as 61 per cent of unattached individuals living in poverty are not in the labour force. As mentioned before, these include retired people, widows and deserted wives with dependent children, the totally disabled and the handicapped.

Let us consider the retired, Mr. Speaker. The aged population exhibits a relatively high degree of economic insecurity, despite the fact that more of the aged than of any other group currently draw some support from public programs. Moreover, the poverty of the aged affects considerably more people. Some aged persons are married to persons not yet 65 who are also poor, and others with no spouse are sharing the house of a younger relative. Still others, whose numbers cannot be estimated statistically, are supported in part by relatives not living in the same house.

As the aged move out of the labour market and into retirement, their incomes go down while certain of their needs grow. An indication of the extent of low incomes in this section of the population is indicated by the fact that in 1970 about 48 per cent of old age security recipients qualified for the guaranteed income supplement which assured an income of $1,337 for a single person and $2,674 for married couples. Deteriorating health adds to the problems of the aged as their faculties decline and their housing needs change. The cost of accommodation to meet such needs is often beyond the reach of the aged, since in most places subsidized housing and special services are not available to them.

May I now talk about the disabled. Of the estimated 1,300,000 Canadians who have some degree of permanent physical disability, about 520,000, or 3 per cent of the population, have disabilities classified as severe or total. One half of this group is of working age, but only one in four has earnings from employment. Disabled persons make up a significant part of the poor in Canada. Physical and mental defects that lead to disability affect a substantial proportion of the population. It is estimated that congenital defects, chronic diseases and accidents restrict at least one person in ten from carrying out the usual activities of daily living. Several provincial welfare departments have indicated that about one-third of assistance recipients are in families receiving aid because of ill health or disability.

With regard to the poverty of minorities, in the last few years, after decades of relative indifference, Canada has become seriously concerned with the plight of its native peoples. The attitudes surrounding Indians, Eskimos and Metis, both from within and outside their communities, have created a wall of misunderstanding between them and Canadian society. In the past they have been given little systematic help either to preserve the values of their own culture or to adapt to the demands of the white man's world. As a result, a high proportion of these people are chronically dependent and live in some of the worst conditions to be found in Canada. The terrible plight of so many of the children of our minorities is unmistakable.

Regarding women in poverty, families headed by women, and unattached women, constitute a significant proportion of the poor. Of all families headed by women, about 35 per cent have low incomes. With a married couple, a wife participating in the labour force can boost the family income. The woman who is the family head can only count on her own earnings, if she works, which average less than a man's. Often such family heads are widowed, deserted, separated or divorced and have dependent children, making their economic and social position that much worse. With practically no income of her own, she may be struggling along on social allowance because she feels obliged to give her children full-time care or cannot find employment. On the other hand, she may be working part or full-time and coping as best she can with her children's needs in her off hours.

Why does poverty persist? It is often argued that anyone who wants to escape from poverty can do so simply by seeking and accepting work. It is contended that the poor should be expected to lift themselves out of poverty without any help from society. Those who favour such arguments ignore the social factors which prevent people escaping from poverty. The more important factors are family size, ill health, education, location of poverty, housing, low earnings and the poverty spiral. I could list many. I wish to deal with a few of these factors.

With regard to family size, the cost of supporting a large number of children can result in poverty for workers with even relatively high earnings. The average Canadian family has three or four children. While the birth rate has been dropping steadily in recent years, the decline has not been uniform. Rural-urban differences and differences between socio-economic classes are still noticeable. Families in which the head had the least education are generally the largest. Consequently, big families have the least capacity for overcoming poverty and tend to have the worst poverty problems.

On the matter of ill health, the results of the Canadian sickness survey of 1950-51 indicate that ill health is one of the main reasons for people becoming and remaining poor. The low income group suffer proportionately from more disabling illnesses than the rich, and receive a smaller amount of health care. Children under 15 in the low income group are also more affected than those of corresponding age in higher income families. Although the most advanced medical techniques in the world are available in Canada, the poor receive a lesser advantage from them. In fact, the sickness survey confirmed for Canada the crude correlation shown by other studies between infant mortality rates and per capita personal incomes. Ontario, with the highest income, had the lowest death rate; Newfoundland, with the lowest income, had the highest.

There is evidence to prove that no group suffers more ill health than the poor. Medical authorities state that the poor have more heart disesase, rheumatoid arthritis, unrehabilitated injury, mental illness, tuberculosis, illness whether chronic or acute, and higher death rates in all ages than do Canadians at large. Medical advances benefit the poor only after a certain time lag.

With regard to education, the relationship between low levels of education and poverty is obvious. A 1966 DBS study showed that in February, 1965, workers with some elementary schooling or less had an unemployment rate of 13.8 per cent, compared with 1.9 per cent for those with high school education or more. Also, with respect to duration of unemployment the study shows that 63 per cent of workers who finished elementary school or less were unemployed for four months or more, compared with 10 per cent for those with high school education or better. In 1961, 47 per cent of all Canadians aged 15 and over had no more than elementary schooling. With a high proportion of the poor being uneducated, it is unrealistic to expect great improvement in terms of income. Those with a low level of education receive the low paying jobs which offer little opportunity for advancement.

Regarding location of poverty, Canada has two kinds of economic inequality related to geography: urban-rural and regional. More than half of Canadian low income families live in cities and 45 per cent live in rural areas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order! I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out to him that his allotted time has now expired.

[English]

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I came into the House for private members' hour today primarily to listen to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) present, defend and develop the motion she has put before the House. I did not intend to enter the debate. However, in light of some of the points she has made, I wish to make a few spontaneous remarks on what I consider to be one of the most important notices of motion to appear on the Order Paper to date.

Having listened to the lecture and the rhetoric of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, I cannot help but feel that she and her colleagues must be disappointed in the substance of what she has said. There is no question but that she was critical of the government. It is undoubtedly true there are areas in which the government can legitimately be criticized. That is a truism. It is certainly the case that poverty presents us with a problem, perhaps the most serious and pressing which we confront at this time. But when the hon. member introduces a motion which deals with the concept of redistributing income, of planning our productive resources and creating wealth by using modern technology, I do not find it easy to forgive her for failing to elaborate on the substance of her motion or to offer any detail concerning the reasonable and important concepts we are asked to consider.

When the hon. member came to the gut issue, the central part of her motion having to do with the redistribution of income, her proposition amounted to this: adopt a workable plan for a guaranteed annual income. We have all heard these clichés, we have heard these slogans, we have heard these suggestions from a variety of sources. The question to which we must address ourselves is: What is this workable plan and what, precisely, do we have in mind when we speak about redistributing income? The hon. lady embellished one cliché with another cliché. She talked about taxation according to ability. Where does that put her, or the party of which she is a member? I am sure there is no one sitting in this House who would not agree that people should be taxed according to their ability. What, precisely, does it mean?

Embellishing the second cliché with a third, and summing up the totality of her argument, she talked about using the resources of technology to deal with poverty. Again I express my disappointment. The hon. member is concerned about this question. She is as concerned about it as any member of this House, and has so demonstrated on many occasions. Today she added nothing to our knowledge of this question or of the possible solutions. I am sure this does not stem from a lack of good will on her part or from a lack of good faith, but it does underline the point that the hon. lady has been unable to advance our thinking on the subject. She has demonstrated the point made by my hon. friend from Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) and my hon. friend from St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), that the whole subject is infinitely more complex than either she or other members of her party are prepared to admit.

I turn now to a conference which took place over the weekend, the Poor People's Conference, in order to make one or two observations about its importance as one of the new and more interesting developments which have emerged in the past two or three years. I have not yet seen the resolutions from the conference but I have read some of the press reports of the proceedings. What is perfectly clear is that in Canada today we are entering upon a new period of militancy. Supported by organization, a sense of purpose and a will to do something about conditions of poverty, the poor themselves are joining forces to do something about their situation. This represents an important change and in my view it is a most hopeful development, though it will not in itself put an end to poverty.

If there is any group in our society which can make hon. members of this chamber and legislatures across the country aware of the national dimension of poverty, the inadequacies of our welfare system and of our housing programs, it is the poor themselves. When the poor themselves organize militantly, strongly and determinedly we shall become more conscious of their needs, and the pressure to get away from the slogans and from the clichés in which we have all been indulging over the years will become so great as to be undeniable. At this point the measure of Parliament and of the legislatures will be taken.

One of the things which has disturbed me most about the Poor People's Conference is that because these people are meeting in Toronto to upset the status quo, questions are raised suggesting that they are engaged in a movement which is, somehow, seditious. The questions were asked today: Who organized this group? What is their background? If I am wrong, I apologize in advance, but it appears to me that implicit in this sort of questioning is the suggestion that this is not an authentic Canadian organization of people who are concerned about the future of their country. Somehow, the suggestion is made, as it was in an editorial in the Peterborough Examiner, that this was a seditious conspiracy; look behind it and you will find the Communist party or some other sinister group.

Well, if the Communist party is behind this, it is to their credit, because they have recognized a problem and are ventilating it. I am tired of the implication that every time people in lower income groups get to their feet and raise questions about welfare or housing conditions, their patriotism and their integrity can be called into question. I am tired of the suggestion that the poor are being used by groups whose intentions are sinister, thus clouding the real issues.

I hope this conference has dispelled some of the myths prevalent in this country about the poor. One of the questions which is invariably asked whenever one talks about welfare is: Are these people really prepared to work; are they really prepared to contribute? As we have seen from the reports of this conference, this question was put squarely by the people themselves and is being answered positively. They say: Give us work and we will do it. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway told us there should be jobs for these people, that everyone in this country should have work to do. This is a noble position to take.

Mr. Peters: You mean there are some who do not support that proposition?

Mr. Faulkner: No one opposes that proposition, but the question to which we must address ourselves—and no enlightenment has come from members of the NDP—is this: How can substantially more employment be provided? Perhaps we should be talking about the prospect of full employment and whether it is realizable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair, to resume same at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PENSION ACT AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

PROVISION OF INCREASES IN BENEFITS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dubé that Bill C-203, to amend the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, before recess we were considering Bill C-203 which aims mostly at making the existing veterans legislation more flexible.

We were saying that this bill certainly had much merit because we often-times noted that the legislation which had not been amended for a long time, was in need of change. We are happy that the minister saw fit, perhaps a little late unfortunately, to make more flexible the legislation which at present makes it possible for all veterans to receive a pension.

Our main criticism of the bill is that it does not provide for an annual automatic adjustment of the pension to take into account the increase in the cost of living.

Although the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated over the Christmas recess that inflation no longer existed in Canada—just as if one fine morning he had met inflation on the street and had grabbed it to throw it into the nearest garbage pail—price inflation and pocket deflation still exist in Canada. In fact, they still exist as far as veterans are concerned and they will continue to exist as long as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) tolerates the present financial system in which price inflation and pocket deflation find their roots.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. member that the House is now studying a bill dealing with veterans and I do not believe that he can take this opportunity to discuss the Canadian financial system.

It seems to me that he is straying from the question somewhat and I would ask him to limit his comments as far as possible to the essence of the bill under consideration.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand that my remarks were not altogether relevant, but as we are dealing with pensions I was saying that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) should have provided for an automatic yearly adjustment of the pension so that the latter would remain in line with the cost of living which I was commenting upon.

If the Minister of Veterans Affairs had included such a clause, he would have rendered a valuable service to all veterans whose pensions are constantly eroded by increases in the cost of living, although the Prime Minister has announced that its vertiginous ascent would be stopped by a suppression of inflation.

The 10 per cent increase of pensions provided by this bill represents roughly the cost of living increase for an 18- month period. That is the reason why the increase provided in this bill does not constitute a long term measure, considering inflation.

Before putting an end to my comments, I hope that the new Pension Review Board which will be asked to study the cases of veterans will do so in a humanitarian spirit, and that veterans who will have to call upon the board do not have to put up with a lot of red tape.

Thus, vexations would be eliminated rather than the greatest possible number of applications from veterans through a useless multiplication of required formalities.

Mr. Speaker, we shall have other opportunities to discuss this bill, whether in committee or on third reading; we hope that the committee will make recommendations out of these suggestions so that the minister will be able to take them into consideration and turn them not into words but into concrete actions; the bill has been delayed quite a while before being returned to the House and I think more time will be needed to complete its consideration.

That is why I feel the Minister of Veterans Affairs should take this opportunity to incorporate all valid recommendations into the act. To my mind, the recommendations of the committee and those of this House are valid because they are based on facts. I am thinking of some of the anomalies in the act which we want to eradicate by the passing of this bill and certain amendments we will propose on third reading.

Still, we must congratulate the minister for having introduced this bill which, on the whole, pleases many veterans, for it has been expected for many years. It will serve at least to reduce the bureaucracy and give more flexibility to the administration. The Review Board is intended to make decisions more human. Formerly, they were made by a civil servant and there was no right of appeal.

I congratulate the minister and I ask him to kindly take into account our recommendations, especially those of the committee.

• (8:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, it was rather amusing for one to sit here all afternoon and listen to the official spokesmen of the opposition parties very grudgingly give credit to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) for the step forward he and the government have undoubtedly taken for the veterans of Canada. I appreciate that books have been written about the duty of opposition parties being to oppose. I always have felt that opposition should be tempered by common sense. In this instance, instead of casting any reflection on the minister responsible for this legislation, each and every member of the opposition parties should give him due credit, and credit is certainly coming to him. Most certainly this is the way the veterans of Canada feel about the minister.

May I respectfully suggest that in your quieter moments, Mr. Speaker—I know that they are not numerous—you read the national magazine of the Royal Canadian Legion. On the front cover of the January, 1971, issue appears the words "A great step forward". If you have time, Mr. Speaker, you might turn to page 10 of that magazine and read the editorial which reiterates this statement on the front page. The editorial is entitled "A great step forward—amendments to the Pension Act—the most extensive improvements in half a century". Those words express the feelings of the veterans of Canada for this government in respect of Bill C-203. These are the observations the minister should read and digest. He should consider criticism when it is advanced in a proper manner and, if necessary, change some parts of the bill.

On the other hand, may I respectfully point out that all that we as Members of Parliament have to do to answer the criticism put forward by opposition members this afternoon is ask this question: Would they prefer to be pensioners under Canadian laws, or pensioners under English laws? Would they rather be Canadian veterans, or Polish veterans? Everyone knows how hard the Poles fought during the last war. I had the privilege of fighting with one of their divisions in Italy and France. I assure the House that no one fought harder than they did, and no one suffered more casualties on a percentage basis I again respectfully ask members of the opposition parties whether they would rather be Canadian veterans living in Newfoundland or any other part of Canada, veterans of the Polish army living in Poland, or veterans of the English army living in England.

Let us examine the pension legislation of the wealthiest country in the world, the United States. Let us compare that legislation with Canadian legislation. I do not refer specifically to the legislation proposed in Bill C-203 but the legislation as it has existed until now. Hon. members will find that even before the introduction of this bill, Canada took second place to no country in the world as far as its treatment of veterans was concerned. That does not mean there cannot be improvement. This government, as has been the case with governments in the past, is worried because of the effect inflation and the rising cost of living has had on pensioners in this country. These veterans, just as anyone else, deserve an increase. According to the Canadian Legion, Canadian veterans have accepted this bill almost in its entirety. They have congratulated the minister for taking this great step forward in veterans legislation.

Once again this afternoon we heard from an hon. member of the House who is looked upon with fondness, not only because of his gentle manner but because of his common sense. I refer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He congratulated the Minister of Veterans Affairs but suggested that these increases, rather than starting next April 1 should be made retroactive to April 1, 1970. Let me say respectfully to that hon. member and others that I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Anyone can promise anything if he does not have to back up his promises. I do not know how long the hon. member has been here, but I would guess it is probably 20 years. I say most respectfully that if he is here another 30 years, and he will be a reasonably old man by then—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, no!

Mr. Whicher: —will never have to back up the promises he made this afternoon or those which he makes almost every day of the week.

Mr. Marshall: Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether, under the War Veterans Allowance Act, the hon. member knows how much advantage a veteran aged 77.6 years will receive from the increases which will become applicable on April 1, 1971.

Mr. Whicher: That is a very good question. I have not figured out the answer. I will let the veterans of Canada figure it out for the hon. member. The Canadian Legion has said that this legislation is a great step forward, and in this way I think the veterans of Canada have answered my hon. friend. We should be proud of the veterans legislation which has come into effect in the past. I have the honour of being a veteran, along with dozens of members of this House. I think we should compare our veterans legislation with similar legislation on a world-wide basis. We should compare our veterans legislation with that of the United States. Pensioners in that country receive much less than our pensioners.

The veterans of this country, including those in this House in all parties, fought hard against a great race of people who were our enemies at the time. Those enemies were very fine fighters. I refer to the German race. I should like to know how much veterans living in west Germany receive in pension. If the hon. member has any idea, I ask him how much the veterans now living in east Germany receive in pension. They receive about 30 per cent of what Canadian veterans are receiving. We should be proud of that fact. We should be proud, not because German veterans are receiving less but because our people are being looked after to the limit of our financial resources.

One hon. member said today that veterans on disability pension were only receiving 10 per cent. It was said that a certain percentage is lost each year because of increasing inflation, and that pensions have not kept up with the cost of living over the years on a comparative percentage basis. We must remember that we are not only concerned with the increases proposed in Bill C-203. We must remember the percentage increases of the last seven years. Veterans pensions have increased in that period by over 50 per cent. This is something of which the Liberal Party, which is in power today, and the Conservative Party, which was in power for some time, can be proud.

There is to be an increase of 15 per cent in war veterans allowance. A married couple will receive $201 per month and a single person will receive $121 per month. We must also remember that veterans will be allowed to earn additional money. A married couple will have the right to earn up to $271 per month, and a single man will have the right to earn up to $161. These figures may seem somewhat insignificant, but I respectfully remind hon. members that the increase in disability pensions will cost the taxpayers of Canada $22 million per year and the increase in war veterans allowance will cost $21 million per year. In total, probably at least $50 million is being given by the taxpayers, and rightfully so, to the veterans of Canada. Perhaps this should have been given in the past. We would have been glad had this happened in the past. Nevertheless, when one is considering what should be done, one must keep two things in mind. First, we must remember that the veterans of Canada are number one, and second we must consider how much the taxpayers can afford to give in order to have happy veterans, which presumably we will have as a result of the implementation of this bill.

I suggest most respectfully, Mr. Speaker, that members of the opposition are whistling Dixie when they try to be critical of this bill. I was impressed this afternoon by the reference of one opposition member to the 100 per cent pensioners who have severe disabilities, for example, the paraplegics. I remember very well a lad who had been wounded in Korea. He was an absolute physical wreck. When he attended our meetings, he sat beside me. I gave him a cup of coffee. I had to hold it to his lips because he was unable to hold it himself. No one can be too sad in such a case. Here is a young man who has given his all for his country. The question, however, is how much money one can pay to such a man. If we gave him $1 million, would he take it? I am sure not one member of this House would change places with that boy for $1 million. Obviously, we cannot give it to him in any event. Therefore, in my opinion we must arrive at a respectable figure for those who are totally disabled. It must be a figure which will allow them to provide for themselves food and drink, the very best housing, an automobile and all the comforts of life. By this legislation which is being introduced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs I am sure they will be in a position to afford these things.

After all, these veterans are to receive an increase of 10 per cent in their basic pension, and it has been suggested they receive an extra $800 to $2,400 a year provided that money is needed. I believe this is good, common sense. I have examined this bill very carefully. I appreciate what has been said about the committee. I appreciate that veterans representing many organizations appeared before the committee which met on many days over a period of many weeks. As has been said, they became part of us. In my opinion, they and the members of the committee did an excellent job. We all realize we cannot give too much to a veteran, but because of the increases suggested in Bill C-203 I, along with other veterans of Canada, agree with the editor of The Legion that this legislation is a great step forward.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind my hon. friend, who referred to German veterans receiving only 30 per cent of what Canadians receive, that they do not deserve .03 per cent because of the hardship they inflicted upon many people and because of the six million people who were destroyed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate; it is not a point of order.

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to enter this debate because of its importance to me and to the veterans of Canada. I was very pleased to see that the first item of government business for this session was to be Bill C-203. I wish to join our distinguished colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who regretted that it had taken so long for this legislation to be brought before the House. I do not entirely blame the minister for this. I think he would have been very pleased to introduce the legislation long before this date.

The veterans affairs committee of this House of Commons has been a good committee. I have been a member of it for 13 years. The committee which studied this matter for 16 months was an especially good committee which had a very good chairman. I think we worked together very well. But it is 16 months since we began our study of the Woods commission report. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, as I believe others have, that the 10 per cent pension increase which is to come into effect on April 1 should be retroactive. I believe the government somehow or other should find the funds with which to make payment to our veterans retroactive to last October or, preferably, for a full year.

I am particularly interested in clause 1A of the bill which provides as follows:

> The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed and interpreted to the end that the recognized obligation of the people and government of Canada to provide compensation to those members of the forces who have been disabled or have died as a result of military service, and to their dependants, may be fulfilled.

There is this statement in the explanatory notes:

> —The purpose of this amendment is to make clear—

That is, to the Parliament of Canada, to the government of Canada and to the Pension Commission.

> —the purpose of the Pension Act and to give guidance to those persons charged with its administration.

I feel this section is well worded. I was interested to see that clauses 57 and 58 in part IV of the bill deal specifically with Hong Kong veterans. We have been promising this particular aid and recognition for a long time. The plight of those who served in Japanese prison camps was more devastating than that of most of us who served in World War I or World War II. It has been said that civilization is just a coat of paint. That was especially true between 1932 and 1945 in Germany, when under Hitler there was the greatest tyranny the world has ever seen. The genocide of six million Jews is one of the blackest chapters in the history of mankind. Civilization was also shown to be just a coat of paint by the Japanese treatment of Chinese, Australian, New Zealand, United States and Canadian prisoners. There is very little parallel in history.

I was glad to see that recently—we all have received this publication—a national association of war prisoners was formed. Now that our Hong Kong prisoners have received some measure of recognition, I think we might very well direct our attention to the men who served in prisoner of war camps in other than the Far East. There is no question that those who were deprived of their freedom and were herded into prisoner of war camps, those who had the minimum of food to keep them alive, who were humiliated and in some cases were shot because they tried to escape, should now be given more recognition than perhaps they have in the past.

The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) will speak later and perhaps he will tell the House that when he was shot down over northern France his co-pilot survived to be taken prisoner of war. When he tried to escape from a German prisoner of war camp, he and 50 others were shot on the orders of Adolph Hitler. We know only too well that those who served in the Royal Canadian Air Force, especially prisoners who were in eastern Germany near the end of the war, were marched across Germany in the late winter and early spring. They slept in ditches, in the snow and in barns, and they lived on turnips.

We know what happened to the prisoners of the 12th SS Panzer division in France which was commanded by a general named Kurt Meyer who later served a sentence in Dorchester penitentiary for his war crimes. Almost every man they took as prisoner never reached a prisoner of war camp but was shot on the spot, usually with his hands tied behind his back. Others who did survive witnessed this.

I have said that we should give special consideration to our Hong Kong veterans. I realize, as one deeply interested in veterans affairs, that every case is different, just as every man's service is different from that of every other man. May I say this on a purely personal note. It is a little more than 30 years ago when, as a young officer, I was stationed on an island in the St. John River at Woodstock, New Brunswick. It was a pleasant time. We were fit, and it was a wonderful way to fight a war. But it was very different indeed from the shell-fire on the Normandy beaches at Carpiquet and Caen. It was different from the service of those who flew over Germany when the flak was so thick that they said you could walk on it. It was different from the service of the men who served on the little ships on the North Atlantic, covered with ice two or three feet thick. If they slipped, they had five minutes in the North Atlantic before they died.

I believe that every man who served in action lost ten years of his life, not just the five or six years that he served. Colonel John McCrae who wrote "In Flanders Fields" wrote other poems, among which was one about South Africa, where he served. He wrote:

> That day of battle in the dusty heat
> We lay and heard the bullets swish and swing
> Like scythes amid the over ripened wheat
> And we the harvest of their garnering.

The effects of the war are now being felt more and more by the men who served. We see it now when we read The Legion each month. I wonder if I will see the names of some of my friends there among those who have died. More and more we see World War II men dying in their mid-fifties, in many cases suddenly. The incidence of heart attacks among them is very high, as I am sure it was among the World War I survivors at that age. Perhaps it was never recognized that this was due to their service.

I have on my desk the cases of two dozen veterans in whom I am interested. Several of them have had heart attacks as young men. There is also a high incidence of mental illness among them. I do not think it is good enough to say that they would have had heart attacks or mental breakdowns anyway. These are men who have been in action. When we were being discharged, the general objective was to get out as fast as one could—to get out of the uniform and into civilian clothes. Perhaps if we had had a more thorough examination at that time much of this might have been discovered. It was even worse after World War I, when if a man could walk and was warm, away he went for discharge and that was the end of his service. Some of them were so anxious to get out that they even concealed disabilities which they had. Eric Maria Remarque, who wrote "All Quiet on the Western Front," said the following of those who served in World War I:

> A generation destroyed by war even if it was spared by its shells.

This also could be said of those who served in World War II. Why did men and women do this? Why did they serve? They served because they valued freedom. It has been said, callously, that some served because they did not have a job; others because they were adventurers. Maybe that is true of some, but the great majority, more than 1½ million men and women who served, did so because they believed in the ideal of freedom. What were they willing to give up? The inscription on the tomb of the Unknown Soldier says that here were men and women who were willing to give the most that man can give, life itself, for God, for King and country, for loved ones, home and empire, for the sacred cause of justice and the freedom of the world. Those are the men and women whom we are considering this evening.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's masterful introduction of Bill C-203 this afternoon, and the speeches of several hon. members who followed him in the discussion dealt with every aspect of the legislation. Inasmuch as there is unanimous agreement on its substance, I propose to be brief and to allow other hon. members an opportunity to be heard.

There was never any doubt about the government's intention to live up to the promise made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) since he was appointed minister, that a bill would eventually be introduced designed to incorporate into the Pension Act the best possible deal for veterans that the country could afford at this time. All the proposals of the white paper, many of which greatly improved and expanded the act, provide better benefits and in some instances even improve the recommendations of the Woods report.

As a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs charged with the responsibility of hearing submissions from veterans organizations from across the land, including studying various recommendations, proposals and counter proposals over a period of several months, I am very happy and proud that the results contained in the bill under discussion are, by and large, considered to be very satisfactory by all concerned.

The editorial in the most recent issue of the national magazine of the Royal Canadian Legion, mentioned by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), expresses genuine satisfaction with the bill. With your permission, Sir, I wish to read part of it. The headline reads, "A New Deal for Veterans." The text reads as follows:

Another milestone on the long road toward obtaining war pension legislation improvements was passed last month with the introduction of Bill C-203 in the House of Commons by the Hon. J.-E. Dubé, Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The scope of the legislative changes in the Pension Act—the most extensive in half a century—reflect the sincere concern of the minister and the government for the welfare of those who, when they were needed, placed their lives at the disposal of their country and for whom Canada has a special obligation.

It is a source of deep satisfaction to the Legion and other nationally chartered veterans organizations that the proposed changes in the Pension Act meet most of the requirements that were set out in the Woods report, and subsequently supported by the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs.

The improvements in the bill, such as the pension review board and the extra allowances for multiple disabilities, have clearly indicated that the minister meant what he said when he gave assurance in the House some months ago that the government's views in the white paper were not "rigid or immutable" and that the recommendations of the veterans affairs committee, which supported many of the proposals by veterans' organizations, would be given "full and sincere consideration."

Other important changes, such as the special pension status to former prisoners of war of the Japanese, the establishment of the veterans bureau as a separate entity with a closer relationship with pension claimants, the broadening of the "benefit of the doubt" clause, the new appeal procedures, and the more humane approach to the whole system of awards, should go far to remove many of the wrongs that have irritated disability pensioners for many, many years.

The sincerity of the government in dealing with this legislation is best illustrated by the appointment of Mr. Donald Thompson as chairman of the War Veterans Allowance Board, who served for 11 years as Dominion secretary of the Royal Canadian Legion, one of the most active, untiring and dedicated persons to the welfare of war veterans that I know. I am sure that this appointment will please war veterans from coast to coast. I should like to extend to him my personal congratulations. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will agree that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who made this appointment, should share in the general congratulations which this move will surely generate.

Every one of us, especially those connected with veterans affairs, knows the minister well, appreciates the fact that he accepted the responsibilities of his office with dedication and humility and firmly resolved to do for our veterans what no other minister dared to do for them in the past. The minister insisted on introducing legislation for the welfare of veterans, legislation second to none in the world, with modern concepts of social justice and of obligation to those who in war and peace have placed their lives at the service of their country.

I should also like to congratulate the chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), who presided over no less than 39 meetings with infinite tact and consideration, to say nothing of the patience which he demonstrated during some especially complicated and long discussions. On the other hand, members were really interested in advancing the best possible methods of dealing with intricate questions.

By introducing this legislation the nation has recognized a debt to the disabled veterans, the crippled and the blind. Mr. Speaker, as the years go by it is regrettable to observe that as November 11 rolls around, fewer and fewer people are formally observing Remembrance Day. But while public response may have paled, the significance of November 11 remains unchanged. The courage and valour of those who fought in the wars for freedom and suffered wounds and loss of limbs, are branded on the pages of history. Mr. Speaker, their contributions are without equal, and by approving this legislation we will merely be expressing our thanks for their blood and their courage.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am especially pleased to have an opportunity to speak briefly in this debate. It is a well known fact that in times of national emergency we call on our young men to defend our country against aggression. In times like that we appreciate, perhaps more than we do in ordinary times, the value of the freedoms we all cherish, and we conclude that we are morally justified in asking our young men to volunteer for the defence of their country, as many living Canadians have done on two or more occasions.

When these crises pass, a grateful nation feels that it owes a debt of gratitude to those who have defended it against aggression, and it is well for us to recall that on at least two occasions we in Canada, in common with most of the western world, came within a hair's breadth of losing the freedoms that we cherish so highly. We escaped that fate by the skin of our teeth. In such a situation there was a common feeling among the citizens of Canada that the nation had a high moral obligation to those who had served in the armed forces in time of war. One way they felt this moral obligation could be discharged was to compensate as much as possible veterans whose health was damaged because of war service, or who were disabled because of wounds and therefore to some degree were incapacitated with respect to earning a livelihood. It was felt that veterans who had disabilities should be compensated at least by an amount equal to the wage of an unskilled labourer. That was the attempt, originally, and in 1920, at the end of World War I, the amount provided under the Pension Act was $900 a year, equivalent to that paid to a cleaner or a helper in the federal civil service.

But as time passed, with the depreciation in the value of money and the increase in the cost of living, veterans pensions always lagged behind. Eventually they were adjusted, but never quite up to the equivalent of the earnings of an unskilled labourer. Adjustments were made retroactively, so to speak, so that our veterans' position always fell behind that of the unskilled labourer. As a result, the differences between the veteran's pension and the wage of an unskilled labourer were cumulative. This was pointed out very forcibly in a submission made to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cabinet entitled, "the Crisis in Veterans' Pensions and Allowances". It was made by the national veterans' associations of Canada. I will not list them. There are 11 or 12 of them. The brief reads in part as follows. I quote from page 3:

A history of pension increases shows that in 1920 the amount provided under the Pension Act was $900 a year. This was the equivalent of the amount paid to the cleaner and helper in the federal civil service. No further increase was granted until 1948, when the basic rate of pension became $1,128. Subsequent increases resulted in maximum pension as follows:

The pension went up to $1,500, then to $1,800, to $2,160, to $2,400, to $2,760, and to $3,180. These would be 100 per cent pensions. I point out that very few veterans, of course, qualify for a 100 per cent pension. Therefore, we should not assume that every veteran who receives a pension gets anything like this amount per annum. The brief goes on to say:

It is understood that the cleaning serviceman (formerly cleaner and helper) is no longer rated as a standard classification and has become subjected to regional fluctuations. It is still possible, however, to isolate and identify a category of male untrained worker in the public service of Canada. In this respect, our survey indicates that the average wage for such category is approximately $4,500 per annum.

Using this category as a replacement for the cleaner and helper, the gap between the original basis of war disability pension and the equivalent being earned by unskilled labour in the federal civil service is now approximately $1,300 per annum.

That is one measure, Mr. Speaker, of the cumulative effect of lags in the adjustments to the pension paid to our veterans. Of course, as time passes it is understandable that the memories of situations which existed in World War I and World War II should fade. Those memories have become less vivid in the minds of the public and, therefore, in the minds of the electors; and governments perhaps tend to be less sensitive about the need of veterans as time goes by. A new generation is growing up which has no memories of the crises through which our nation has passed.

A number of myths about veterans are held by some people, and especially the young. They assume that practically every veteran receives a pension. Although I do not have up-to-date statistics, figures of a little over one year ago indicate that of the 961,000 veterans of world War I and World War II who were then living, only 169,000 were in receipt of disability pension. Therefore, less than one in five received any pension. The figures include dependants, widows, and so on. So far as war veterans allowance is concerned, only 85,000 out of one million veterans receive war veterans allowance. That is less than one veteran in 11.

I want to disabuse the minds of those who think that all veterans receive pension whether they need them or not. According to the history of the administration of pensions, they have been very restricted. It is rare indeed for a veteran to get any pension or benefit to which he is not entitled. On the other hand, I am certain that thousands of veterans receive no pension because of the difficulty of establishing technically their entitlement to pension.

Mr. McIntosh: Shame.

Mr. MacLean: This process has been going on over the years. It is 25 years since World War II ended, but I am sure every member of the House receives correspondence from veterans who are still trying to establish their entitlement to pension. Another view that many people hold erroneously about veterans pensions is this. Many people say, "The Veterans' Land Act administration was set up to help us deal with veterans. We settled them in rural areas of the country, and therefore most veterans live in little establishments that were subsidized by the government shortly after the war." People think that the cost of living of the veteran is not very high and that increases in the cost of living, and the rate of inflation, do not affect him much. Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. Speaker. Sixty five per cent of our veterans live in urban areas. There are 154,000 of them living in Toronto, and 100,000 in Montreal. As a result, they feel the full effects of increases in the cost of living.

I wish to make a few remarks specifically about Bill C-203. I congratulate the minister, the Standing Committee of Veterans Affairs, the officials of the department and the veterans organizations which appeared before the Woods commission and the House committee. Their actions and arguments resulted in these improvements to the Pension Act. I am pleased that special recognition has been given to veterans who served in Hong Kong and were prisoners of the Japanese. I think that, is a good move. I think it is also excellent that special allowances are to be given to 100 per cent pensioners who have exceptional disabilities.

The bill, however, deals chiefly with the administration of the Pension Act. I think that the changes in the bill are improvements in most cases. However, even the improvements will tend to dislocate the administration of veterans pensions. This detrimental effect will be felt temporarily, until those who administer the act become completely conversant with and efficient in its administration. I think the formation of the bureau of pension advocates outside the department will be beneficial. The same applies to the pension review board. The redefinition of the benefit of doubt is long overdue; however, I am still skeptical whether the improvement has gone far enough. I am sure many veterans still suffer because they were not given the benefit of the doubt in the sense that Parliament intended when the veterans legislation was first introduced.

Also, there are omissions from the bill. It is not logical to say that a widow should not qualify for a pension if the veteran to whom she was married was in receipt of a pension of less than 48 per cent. Provision should be made for a pro rata pension for widows of veterans receiving a pension of 48 per cent or less.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As our report recommended.

Mr. MacLean: I am fully aware of that. I think the government should have accepted that recommendation. I wish to deal briefly with what is perhaps an area of omission. I am rather surprised that the minister did not include an amendment to the schedule which increases across the board the rates of disability pension. He no doubt has a perfectly good reason. I am not clear about the intention of the government in that regard. Why was it omitted from this bill? I am only guessing, but I presume an omnibus bill will be introduced which will again amend this act and the War Veterans Allowance Act which will establish schedules of payments. If that is not done, perhaps it will be by way of a bill granting supply. In any event, it is regrettable that these increases are not now established and that they have not been made retroactive to at least some degree.

There are a number of other matters I would like to speak about regarding increases to veterans disability pensions, war veterans allowance and their application to certain situations. However, although Your Honour has been very lenient, technically I would perhaps be out of order in discussing them at this time, because this bill does not grant across the board increases in rates. Hopefully, there will be another opportunity when legislation will be introduced to increase the rates announced by the minister. On that occasion there will be an opportunity to discuss the rates of disability pensions and war veterans allowances and their application to the veterans of this country.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we are considering one of the most important statutes ever enacted by this Parliament, the Pension Act. I speak of this with feeling because my father died of his war wounds when I was very young. I was raised in a home where for many years the only income was the war veterans pension. I am sure hon. members know that this legislation is, and has been, important for the support of a great number of people in Canada. The existence of this legislation in the various forms it has taken over the years has provided hope and opportunity that many thousands of people otherwise would not have had.

I have approached this discussion with some hesitancy. I feel impelled to disclose the reason for this. At the time the Woods committee was in existence, I was occasionally called upon to offer it professional advice. I hope it will not be considered that my connection several years ago with the work of this committee disentitles me to speak at this time. What we have before us this evening is the product of the work of many hands. When the Woods committee was appointed in 1965, it was expected by some people who were not aware of the complexities of pension legislation that it would be able to make simple recommendations that might quickly be enacted into law. This obviously was not possible.

The thorough investigation conducted by the Woods committee is fully evidenced by its excellent and long report. It indicates the degree of complexities which have developed over the many years of the history of the Pension Act. I wish to express on my behalf and, I am sure, on behalf of all hon. members the debt of this nation to a distinguished former naval officer and jurist, the Honourable Mr. Justice Mervyn Woods who headed this committee with such distinction. His committee has made an imperishable contribution to the public affairs of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blair: The government is entitled to great credit for the manner in which it dealt with the recommendations of the Woods Committee. The presentation of the initial governmental proposals in the form of a white paper was commendable because it enabled these proposals to be exposed to the full rigour of a searching inquiry by a parliamentary committee. I cannot speak too highly of the work of that committee. It has justified to a major degree the committee system and has made a very great contribution to the development of the pension legislation of this country.

I do not intend to detain the House very long. My comments will be directed to three aspects of the legislation as it is now placed before us, aspects in which the government proposal varies from the report of the committee. I offer the observation that after the thorough study of the legislation by the committee and the important dialogue between representatives of various organizations and the committee, it is indeed a serious matter to see departures from its recommendations where they deal with important matters.

The first aspect on which I wish to comment is the proposal with regard to multiple disabilities. In effect, the government has proposed that the special allowance for disabilities be limited to $2,400 per annum. After very careful study of the matter, the committee recommended that it should be $3,500. I am sure that no one in this chamber feels the need is not great or that the need is not admitted. The question must, surely, be one of cost—the fiscal consequences of this new and enlightened proposal. I hope there will be in the committee ingenious and informed parliamentarians who will find ways of reopening this matter for discussion.

My second point is in connection with the procedure known as leave to review. At the present time, when decisions are made by the Pension Commission which are adverse to an applicant, the applicant has the option to make application for leave to review when new evidence or circumstance develop. The committee recommended that this procedure be continued. However, the proposal of the bill is at variance with this recommendation. I suggest that it may impose quite severe complications upon applicants and pensioners. It is now proposed that a veteran who wishes to reopen his case may no longer do so by making a simple application to the Pension Commission. He will be compelled to apply to the new pension review board, and only if this board decides that his application can be allowed may he reopen his case with the Pension Commission.

My objection to this procedure is based on two grounds. First, I regard it as one which imposes an unnecessary barrier against a veteran who wishes to have his case reopened. Second, this procedure is completely at odds with the standard procedure which applies to all other administrative tribunals created by Parliament. Parliament has created many tribunals. The decisions of a great majority of them can be appealed to the courts or even to the cabinet on special occasions. But as far as I know, they all observe the distinction between courts and administrative tribunals which is well understood in this country, namely, that the decisions of administrative tribunals are never final and that it is always possible to reopen a case upon application.

For example I cite the Railway Act which governs the operations of the Transport Commission. Section 52 provides that it is possible at any time to apply to the commission to change a decision which it has made. I make a special appeal on behalf of veterans, that the procedure now proposed be simplified in order not to deny them the easy right they presently have to reopen a case. Do not impose upon them the complication which would surely follow from the procedure which is now recommended.

A third aspect on which I wish to comment is the operation of the new tribunal, the pension review board, created pursuant to the recommendations of the Woods committee and the parliamentary committee. It will perform an important appeal function in finally deciding difficult cases, but the statute enshrines it in too much formality. The statute provides that all cases before the board must go to a formal hearing and that the hearing must be conducted before a quorum of at least three board members. It is important to note that the Woods committee, after a thorough study of appeal procedure, recommended strongly against this type of mandatory formality, as did the parliamentary committee.

The recommendation of the Woods Committee and of the parliamentary committee favoured a much simpler procedure: the conduct of ordinary appeals to proceed in writing before single members of the tribunal, leaving it to the tribunal itself to determine when cases were sufficiently important or difficult to require formal hearing. I need not say in this House that to require the necessity for formal hearing in all cases will cause delay, expense and complication.

The representations made by the veterans organizations both to the Woods Committee and to the parliamentary committee indicated clearly that they were interested in expedition in the decision-making process. In addition, this House should have regard to the experience of previous years. In 1924, and again in 1930, Parliament established appeal tribunals of the nature contemplated in this legislation. The experience of those tribunals, locked in, as they were, with all the formalities and trappings of formal hearings, was that they became clogged up and collapsed under the weight of the great number of cases placed before them.

Generally, I have found it is the desire of people that cases before appeal tribunals should be heard in public with a certain formality. What we are now considering appears to be an exception to this rule but, in my opinion, we would be foolish to ignore the position taken by the veterans organizations which have indicated, from their great experience, that the type of formality contemplated here is unnecessary and would defeat the purpose of the creation of the appeal tribunal.

There are undoubtedly other points of great importance in this legislation; they have been commented upon or will be commented upon by other speakers. I conclude by commending the government and all members of the House who have played a part in bringing this important bill before us in its present form. As one who does not have the privilege of being a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I express the hope that the committee will find it possible to improve this great legislation along the lines I have indicated.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, each time there is a debate on veterans legislation, many members want to express their ideas to their colleagues and to the public, which shows how much interest they take in this subject.

The minister told us this afternoon that he had had the pleasure of tabling a white paper on pensions last year and that most of its recommendations had been included in the bill now under consideration. I wish to express my own appreciation to the minister for finally introducing such legslation.

[English]

The minister in his observations commended the members of the Veterans Affairs Committee and the representatives of the veterans who appeared before that committee, and praised in particular the manner in which the discussion of this whole subject had been initiated and carried forward. He stated that this debate was initiated by the Woods report. He praised the technique of the white paper and the dialogue that had been created. This is all very fine, but what a long time it has taken to develop! The debate started in 1965, five years ago. We are now in 1971, and it is not over yet.

The government knew what the veterans wanted, so this could have been a very sneaky trick in order to delay meeting some of the needs of the veterans. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), who spoke this afternoon, said there are many good things in this bill, and I agree. However, I hope it will not take the government another five years to make a review of veterans legislation. I suggest that the government should provide in this legislation the means for reviewing pensions and allowances for veterans automatically so that we do not need to go through the same rigmarole every time we want to do something for our veterans.

I am not a veteran because I have never been in the services, but many veterans have a fixed income, as other hon. members have pointed out, and it is pretty tough for them to have to beg, to write to their Member of Parliament, to the government, to the minister. This is why I hope the committee will examine ways of reviewing the pension situation, with perhaps adjustment of veterans pensions and allowances every year in tune with the cost of living.

I am told that additional veterans legislation will have to be introduced later this session. I ask, what kind of racket is this? As I say, the government has taken five years to produce this legislation. Why cannot the government make a complete review and overhaul of assistance given to our veterans? Too often have we dealt with bits and pieces of veterans legislation during the 2½ years I have been in this House. This makes me wonder whether this is simply typical of this government or indeed has been going on for some time. No wonder the public sometimes becomes disillusioned because governments do not do a thorough job.

The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) pointed out that new legislation will have to be introduced. Obviously, the government wanted to do something for the veterans because it was politically wise to do so. After a while pensions of veterans must be increased to keep abreast of the cost of living. At the same time, the government does not want to go all out because other areas of assistance might suffer. As I say, I am not a veteran but I am a war baby in the sense that I was born during the war. I know nothing about either the first world war or the second, or even Hong Kong, other than what I have read. I was too young to understand what was going on. However, since I have been a member I have learned to appreciate what our veterans are worth, and in this regard I have learned a lot. I have developed a respect for what these people are trying to achieve and for trying to help themselves. I say that sincerely.

Over the last couple of years a great debate has been waged on the subject of Canadian unity. Many members have referred to the fact that the war brought about unity in Canada; it united Canadians. To prove my point, there was a little war in Quebec very recently and the people stood united. The veterans have done a great deal for Canada, and this is why I do not think we can simply wait another five years before reviewing their lot.

The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) said that Canada had better veterans legislation than any other country. So what? What does that prove? I do not think it proves very much. Let us not hide behind this sort of excuse. Canada is a better country than any other country, so we cannot simply say that since we have better legislation our veterans should be satisfied. We probably live better than most other people.

Mr. McIntosh: And because of the veterans.

Mr. Comeau: Probably because of the veterans, as my hon. friend says. One matter that does irritate me—and I hope the new bill will deal with it—is the bureaucracy that confronts a veteran who applies for veterans allowance or pension. I know it is 25 years since the end of the second world war and it is hard for a veteran to produce evidence that such and such happened during the war, but surely some of these veteran applicants can make a logical case. I submit that many times applications are not looked at in their proper context. They are not given the consideration they deserve, and this is what irritates me. I realize that many applications that I and other hon. members receive are of long standing in the sense that the veterans come to us as a sort of last resort. But many applications are returned with the request for more evidence, or they are rejected, or perhaps an appeal is granted and the whole thing starts over again. It depends, of course, what the application is; an appeal cannot be had on anything.

Having worked on a few veterans cases over the years, though not many, I am becoming more frustrated day by day. To my mind the minister and his department should be the protectors of the veterans from the government and from other ministers who are concerned about looking after their own interests. I sometimes feel that the department is protecting the government from the veterans. It is the department that should make a case for the veterans, and present it to the government. I have on my files many letters from veterans for whom I have done some work. I made a note of how many of the applications they made were rejected or received. I came to the conclusion that 90 per cent of the applications were rejected. In many cases there was no evidence to submit and there was nothing more the veteran could do.

I realize that some lobbying has to be done and that the minister has to deal with the pension office, but the results should not be as they have in the past. I hope this bill will result in an improvement in appeal procedures as well as in respect of the benefit of doubt clause. I will reserve my criticism until I see the results. I hope this measure will assist the veterans. Many of them have no other source of income; they rely on these pensions for a livelihood.

This afternoon a number of members suggested the minister is taking a great step forward. There is no question about that. Many of the veterans who have written to me are disappointed about this bill. I have a letter before me, parts of which I should like to read. After explaining to this individual what will happen with the passage of this legislation, he wrote and said he had hoped something better might have come out of the legislation. He said he was sitting with $2.62 in his pocket, waiting for Santa to do something about it. He said he had four army disabilities and was pensioned in respect of two of them—20 per cent for his back, which in itself keeps him from doing a proper day's work, and 5 per cent for another disability which is affecting his ears. He said he had lost his sense of smell and taste. He then said, "Big deal, democracy". He has a gland problem and one year ago was operated on for cancer. I visited this man and I know he simply cannot work. He is hardly able to talk as a result of the cancer which affected his tongue. He is totally disabled. He asked whether I had ever been disabled, and suggested it was a helpless feeling.

Where can these people turn? This legislation is only reviewed every five years. It is true that in 1966 there was an increase in allowances, and another in 1968. We must establish in legislation such as this a means of automatic review in order that something can be done for our veterans on a yearly basis. There are fewer and fewer veterans as the years go by, and we should be able to treat them better than we have in the past.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when speaking on this legislation we are speaking for 750,000 Canadians, 250,000 of whom are receiving some type of assistance from the government. I listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest to many of the speakers who suggested that Canada has the best veterans legislation in the world. This may or may not be so. I agree that the government has passed legislation increasing pensions by 10 per cent, with a 15 per cent increase to the recipients of war veterans allowance. This is one aspect which affects a large number of veterans. Anyone who thinks that we have been overly generous with those veterans has not considered the contribution they made for Canada. Perhaps as a result of that contribution we are sitting here tonight.

It took us more than five years to decide on this legislation. It is true we had participatory democracy for a long time during which the government set up the Woods committee. That committee investigated this matter at great length and in great detail. It made a number of recommendations. If this government was actually doing for the veterans what several government members have suggested, it would be implementing the Woods committee recommendations. There is not a veteran in this country who would disagree with the recommendations contained in that report. They feel they are fair and just and that they should have been implemented by this government.

Following the receipt of that report, the government did not decide what was equitable but, rather, what could be done for veterans in view of our economic situation. The government asked itself how much it could give the veterans, having regard to what the Woods committee decided the nation owed its veterans. I was a member of that committee and listened to all the submissions. In all fairness let me say I have not been a member of a committee which did more honest work than that one. That committee had the co-operation and support of veterans organizations allied in one group for the purpose of appearing before the committee. The committee also had the benefit of the knowledge and advice of officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs. In my opinion they are all dedicated to the best possible treatment of veterans and the development of the best possible legislation.

This bill represents the opinion of the government in respect of those parts of the Woods committee report that can be adopted. It has been mentioned that approval is expressed in this month's issue of The Legion. I apologize to the Legion for referring to this matter when I have not read the latest issue. No doubt it was delivered to my office, but I have not had an opportunity of going there since arriving this afternoon by plane. I am reminded very much of the days when I was a union representative. After negotiating for a long time on propositions I had put to the company forcefully, I returned to my membership to sell them on the settlement I had tentatively agreed to. I did that on the best terms possible. I do not blame the Canadian Legion for following this course. Their representatives put up a good fight. They are satisfied with many parts of the bill and I am sure they would be less than honest if they did not put their best foot forward in selling the bill to the organization.

I agree with the last speaker who said he has received many letters from veterans. I have received a number of letters, as I am sure most hon. members have, and the majority of them contain complaints about this type of legislation. Many organizations have commented favourably on the recommendations contained in the Woods committee report. Most veterans would have been much more pleased had the government implemented those recommendations. The white paper on veterans legislation is represented by this bill, with a few modifications. Credit in this regard can be given to the committee. One of the changes recommended by the committee which did not meet with the approval of the department involves the question of multiple disabilities.

As everyone is aware, the Woods Committee recommended that in a small number of very exceptional and well-deserving cases the pension paid to the veteran should be 3½ times the amount of a 100 per cent pension. I do not intend to go over all the arguments that were presented, but I believe most veterans and veterans organizations are of the opinion that the veteran cannot be compensated for the disability he received. I am speaking of those with quadruple amputations who are totally unable to look after themselves or who are totally unable to receive any advantage from life itself. We have an obligation to these people which certainly cannot be repaid in money. Then we heard about several who, if they received 3½ times the money they are now receiving, would not have representatives of Household Finance rapping on their door. This is one way in which they could be assisted.

We have decided by means of this bill to increase the maximum benefit, on proof of need, to $2,400. Taking into consideration all the factors, the members of the committee, which includes government members, agreed that the maximum additional allowance should be $3,500. This was a compromise. The compromise was not made because the minister felt that 3½ times was an unreasonable figure, but because the government in its wisdom decided it could not justify the expense. I do not believe the suggested compromise of $3,500 was an unreasonable one. I agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) that this matter should be reconsidered by the committee. I sincerely hope this will be the case.

There really is no point in pursuing other matters. The veterans know that the compromise of the government is a necessary compromise. I think many veterans will be pleased about many of the changes which have been made. I congratulate the minister on the one matter in which he made considerable change. I believe this will be a credit to him and will do a great deal toward solving one of the problems which has vexed veterans over many years. I refer to the establishment of the pension review board. I look forward to it solving some of the problems that have been discussed in the past. It will be a board of last review. I agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and others who said there will be more difficulty in respect of leave to appeal than under the old system. It was exceedingly difficult even under the old system. I believe, however, that this is a step forward.

It is unfortunate, while this piece of legislation will be the charter of veterans for a number of years to come, that we have not written into and attached to it the type of escalator clause which in a very formal way would provide for the changing needs of veterans and would establish a formal method for increasing the veterans allowance as the years go by, rather than having to come before Parliament.

I should like to congratulate the minister, the chairman of the committee, the witnesses who appeared before the committee and the members of the committee. The advice of the veterans agencies and organizations which was obtained over a long period has been very valuable. I was also very pleased with the representations made and the assistance given to the committee by the officials of the department. I am not one of those who very often is in a position to congratulate the officials of a government department for having been helpful to Members of Parliament. In this department, however, we have officials who have shown an independence which on many occasions has favoured veterans. I sincerely hope and expect that this will be true in the years to come.

Mr. Perrault: That is a good Liberal attitude.

Mr. Peters: Liberal with a small "l". Since I came here 15 years ago I have noticed that in the Veterans Affairs Committee little partisan treatment has been given by Members of Parliament to veterans legislation. The committee was very liberal, again with a small "l", in its study of the legislation and I expect and hope this attitude will continue as long as veterans legislation is necessary in Canada.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak for very long tonight. The remarks made by hon. members opposite and on this side of the House reflect the spirit in which the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs made its report, which I believe has been very helpful to the government in the preparation of the legislation which is before us.

As members have pointed out, the process of review of the Pension Act began in 1965. It involved a commission, a standing committee of the House and witnesses who appeared over a long period. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), in speaking for the groups they represent in this House I believe reflected the non-partisan atmosphere in which the work of the committee was conducted. Obviously, the measure before us is very detailed. The work of the committee involved investigation of a very large report and a large number of recommendations. Only in a committee of the House which is charged with this responsibility is it possible to look at the fairly detailed procedures which are spelled out in the bill.

I believe the process which has been involved here, of a parliamentary committee reviewing the white paper and the detailed examination which followed, is something which students of parliamentary procedure might well look at. The minister said the approach of the government had been one of flexibility. Every member of the committee is aware that this is literally true. The members of the committee looked at the evidence and heard the witnesses with an open mind, just as the minister had invited them to do. I believe the unanimous report of the committee had very great influence upon the legislation which is before us.

Hon. members opposite have raised a number of points which I am sure will be raised before the committee. We will examine them, and no doubt there will be further hearings. I hope, however, that we have now reached the stage where any delay will be absolutely minimal. I as chairman, and I believe every member of the committee, was pleased to see that the first item of business before Parliament in 1971 was this legislation. The minister regretted that it could not be brought in before the recess, but this is one of the things which could not be overcome.

However, we are very pleased that it has reached this stage. With those few remarks may I say that I look forward to an early referral of this legislation to the committee which will, I am sure, conscientiously do its job.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Because of the lateness of the hour, Mr. Speaker, and since we want to get the legislation through today, I will be very brief. I am very pleased with most of the bill. The committee worked very hard, and, as our amiable chairman said, the report was unanimous. However, I think an important point should be made. Today, when there are efforts to downgrade Parliament, I think something should be pointed out that is not well known to the public, namely, how hard some Members of Parliament work. Members of the committee came back during the summer recess to spend three weeks of their so-called vacation on committee work in order that veterans organizations across Canada would be given a full hearing. This is what I call participatory democracy. I am a little tired of the negative reports coming in which downgrade Parliament and its members. But in this case at least, I think the public and certainly the veterans appreciate what we have tried to do.

There are three things which please me most in this legislation. First are the proposed changes to the benefit of doubt rule. I and many of our colleagues feel that if proper attention had been given to the benefit of doubt rule, a great deal of the changes in the legislation might have been redundant. Second, I am very pleased to see this new attempt at giving greater independence to adjudication tribunals, because in a great many cases it is not enough that justice be done. If some of our veterans believe they are not receiving an independent hearing, they go away with a feeling of injustice even if they receive a monetary reward.

Third, what I like in this legislation is the attempt to give the Hong Kong veterans the special treatment which we all know they have long deserved. I would be remiss if I did not say that the final good result is due to the fact that the Hong Kong veterans have a very fine organization which has worked hard over 25 years to obtain final adjudication. Even though they have often been discouraged and have suffered from the disabilities about which they have complained, they have been heroic and the victory is all theirs. Even though I and my colleagues, as well as all members of the House, regret that it has taken this length of time for the legislation to be passed, as I am sure it will be very shortly, this Parliament has given the Hong Kong boys what they have long deserved.

I am a little disappointed that we did not do more on the subject of multiple disabilities, but our committee will go on working. It has been a good committee in the past and I am sure we will get our teeth into the subject. We will not take no for an answer. The matter of multiple disabilities has not been properly handled. I think most of us agree that an automatic increase should be written into veterans legislation so that they do not have to come back cap in hand. These veterans are getting older and their needs are greater. Surely this is one group of people who should not have to come to Parliament cap in hand to ask for something that other branches of our society receive.

I have not checked the third point that I want to mention, but I think the attendant's allowance should be looked into more fully. In many cases the woman has suffered, not only during the war but in the 25 years since the war. The sacrifice has been made by the wife and the family. In very serious cases where an attendant's allowance is needed, it is often the wife who is doing the nursing and we should try to pay her in line with the current remuneration which a nurse in civvy street is receiving. If she has given up a career in nursing to look after not only her husband but a service man or woman who has served Canada well, this matter should be at the top of the list in priority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, before we go on to the adjournment debate, may I ask the acting House leader what business will be placed before the House tomorrow and for the rest of the week?

Mr. Francis: It is my understanding that the Canada-New Zealand trade agreement will be the first item to be discussed, followed by the Export Development Act which will be considered tomorrow, following which the House will consider the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I cannot say anything beyond that.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CRIMINAL CODE—SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF ABORTION PROVISIONS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on the third weekend of last November the Liberal party's policy conference meeting in Ottawa voted four to one in favour of removing the matter of abortion from the Criminal Code. The following day I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether he would be guided by that democratic and overwhelming decision of his party and submit such legislation to Parliament this session. He replied that the government had already stated in the Speech from the Throne what they were prepared to do this session, and of course that was to promise a special debate on abortion. As far as I am aware, the date for that debate has not been fixed.

I contend that we have had plenty of debate on the abortion issue. What we need now is legislation to remove the whole matter of abortion from the Criminal Code and to leave it, like every other medical procedure, a matter to be decided between doctor and patient; also, to leave it a matter to be decided, as far as the affected people are concerned, according to their own conscience. At its annual convention in Winnipeg last June, the Canadian Psychiatric Association took essentially the same position. In its August issue the Canadian Medical Association Journal commented editorially in part as follows:

In adopting this recommendation the Canadian Psychiatric Association clearly recognized the underlying moral aspect of this matter which colours the medical, psychiatric and legal considerations, Canadians, including those within the medical profession, range from a truly "liberal" pole, which views abortion within the first 12 weeks of gestation as simply a secondary means of birth control, to a truly "conservative" pole which views interruption of pregnancy in any circumstances as murder. There is no doubt that this spectrum of views will continue to prevail regardless of the law. In a just Canadian society in the year 1970 it would seem appropriate that occupants of neither polar position should be allowed to impose their moral attitudes on the rest of the country. Under the existing legislation with its cumbersome medico-legal machinery which makes it very difficult for women to get legal abortions, it is clear the "conservative" element prevails in spite of the insistence of federal politicians to the contrary.

The CMA Journal is quite correct in stating that we have two definite points of view vis-à-vis abortion in Canada, those who favour abortion and those who do not, and that these points of view are not likely to be overcome regardless of what happens to the legislation. The Journal is also correct in stating that so far those who do not favour abortion have been able to enforce their beliefs on the rest of the Canadian community, as is proved by the fact that up to this point the government has made no move to change legislation under which legal abortions are so terribly difficult to secure. In the province of Quebec, for example, the director of the Family Planning Association recently estimated that during the past year there had been from 10,000 to 25,000 illegal abortions in his province alone.

Pregnancies cannot wait, and where women are concerned they are bound to get relief from unwanted pregnancies in ever-increasing numbers. If they are not given the chance to get legal relief, they will seek illegal relief regardless of the consequences. The only way to stop this practice is to take abortion from the Criminal Code and leave it to the conscience of the individual concerned. There are those of us who believe there are fewer crimes more serious than to bring an unwanted child into the world. No one is going to force an abortion on a woman who does not want one, but surely it is time for the government to change a situation which forces thousands of women to choose between giving birth to unwanted children or undergoing the risks of an illegal abortion.

In view of the overwhelming support from its own Liberal organization for this step, surely the government can find the courage to take abortion from the Criminal Code and leave the matter where all medical procedures should be, that is, between doctor and patient. Surely the Prime Minister, who some years ago had the courage, despite the unpopularity that it engendered, to state that the state had no business in the bedrooms of the nation, should carry this one step further and make sure that the state does not continue to enforce legislation which has proven to be very deleterious to those in the community who believe they should get abortions safely and legally. Those who believe that abortion is wrong have every right to their opinion, but I am not prepared to grant them the right to impose their beliefs on people who do not share those beliefs. I appeal to the government not to delay beyond this session in taking abortion from the Criminal Code.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the persuasive hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson), may I briefly restate the views which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has placed before Parliament and the public on several occasions.

Since the Criminal Code amendments were passed in 1969, the extent of public concern over this difficult question of abortion has increased considerably. All Members of Parliament have been made aware of the deep convictions held by citizens on both sides of the argument and of positions being taken by various groups and associations in Canada. It is the view of the government that this House of Commons must also be given an opportunity to express itself on the question of further liberalization of the law. This will be the purpose of the special debate on abortion to be held later this session, as was proposed in the Speech from the Throne.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—MONTREAL—APPLICATIONS BY CITY UNDER AMENDED INCENTIVES ACT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the previous speech. I sincerely hope, at the risk of a pun, that that will not be another abortive attempt to obtain this badly needed information from the government.

I am glad to see the Parliamentary Secretary in his seat tonight and to know that he will be responding to my question. Our experience with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) when we have tried to elicit information from him in this House has not been a happy one. Hopefully, sir, we shall be able to succeed with the Parliamentary Secretary where we have failed with the minister. I say that with great respect, because I have great respect for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. O'Connell).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The question I raised in the House today, Mr. Speaker, in my view fulfilled the criteria established by the practice and rules of the House as defined by Your Honour. I realize, of course, and know this was the guiding principle of the ruling made today, that it would not be practical for the Chair to allow questions directed to the minister on all the designated regions of the country, especially since most of the country has been designated under this program. There are designated regions in all the provinces of Canada.

My question was prompted by the urgency of the situation in Montreal. That, presumably, was what determined the course that the government followed prior to the Christmas recess in bringing in an amendment to the Regional Development Incentives Act. The government indicated that it was very important for Parliament to pass the amendments to the act. The government had announced that Montreal was to be designated as a designated area under the act, and that until the legislation could be passed by Parliament many pending applications and, indeed, industrial development in the Montreal area and in the other areas to be included under the act would be held in a state of suspension.

For that reason, although the opening up of the act gave us our first opportunity to examine the record of the government in the area of regional development, with special regard to this specific act which is the main thrust of the government's regional policy, we acquiesced reluctantly and we passed the legislation through Parliament on the last sitting day before the Christmas recess, December 18. We were told at that time that the act had to be operative for the first day of the new year because there were a number of applications pending and a number of decisions had to be made. We were told that it would be irresponsible on our part to prevent the passage of the act.

We are now in the new year, and we want to know if the act is operative. We are concerned about this matter from two points of view. First, we are genuinely concerned about the high level of unemployment, the critical unemployment problem existing in Montreal and the Cornwall area and, second, we are genuinely concerned about the act not fulfilling its function in other areas of high unemployment in the country, especially in the province of Newfoundland. Statistics brought out during the examination of the minister and witnesses in connection with the amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act clearly demonstrated this fact.

It was with this in mind that I put the question to the minister today. I hope Your Honour will reconsider the ruling that you made today, because this is an emergent and, at the same time, an urgent problem. We have the statement of the minister during the passage of the bill and the statement of the deputy minister to prove this fact.

If the problem is emergent, and if it is urgent enough to include Montreal under the provisions of the Regional Development Incentives Act, then it must be so treated in terms of allowing members of the House to put questions to the minister during the oral question period. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will be able to answer two questions when he replies. First, is the act now operative in the cities of Montreal and Cornwall and the counties of south eastern Ontario, the newly designated regions? Second, are applications in fact pending and, if so, when will a decision be made on these applications?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for his kind personal references. I am sure his concern is shared by all members of the standing committee who have given a good deal of consideration to these amendments. I welcome his concern that this act become operative as soon as possible.

To answer the first question, I am advised that 12 applications for assistance under the amended provisions of the act have been received to date by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion from applicants in the Montreal area. These applicants have been advised that their submissions cannot yet be considered for processing because the regulations required by the amendments have not yet been passed by the Governor in Council. It is expected that these regulations will be completed next week. They are being given urgent consideration. As hon. members know, these regulations relate to the new loan guarantee provisions of the act, the incentives for commercial enterprises and the removal of the $12 million ceiling as well as other necessary changes related to the amendments.

The enactment of the amendments permitted the government to proceed at once with an Order in Council designating the new region on December 22, and permitted the department to acquire additional space in Montreal and to recruit new staff. The new Montreal office will open next week. Members will be pleased to know that the department is proceeding with all dispatch to prepare itself to fulfill the purposes of the amended act.

At the same time, I wish to point out that the designation of the new region and the provision of incentives within it are not the only important features of the act. In the amended act, for example, the Atlantic region was singled out for special attention in so far as this region, alone among the designated regions of Canada, had the level of incentives raised substantially to offset any adverse effects which might flow from the short-term, temporary designation of the Montreal-Cornwall region. The 12 applications received to date signify on the one hand that there will in all likelihood be a good response to incentives in the newly designated region. On the other hand, the temporary nature of the designation is a practical and reasonable way to balance all the important objectives sought under the act and its programs.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 12, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PURPOSE OF ISSUANCE OF IDENTITY CARDS TO MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: May I seek the indulgence of hon. members to clarify a misunderstanding which appears to have arisen in connection with the issuance of indentity cards to hon. members. It should be pointed out that this initiative was taken at the request of a number of members of the House and that the cards are intended exclusively for the convenience of hon. members who might consider them useful from time to time.

The point I would like to stress is that the issuance of the cards is not related in any way to security measures in the Parliament Buildings. Identification cards for security purposes continue as before to be required only in the case of employees of the House.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL—METHOD OF CONSIDERATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: At the opening of yesterday's sitting of the House, the hon. member for Peace River rose on a question of privilege relating to proceedings before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. The hon. member took exception to instructions issued under the authority of the chairman of that committee to the effect that only certain persons would be invited to give evidence before the committee when it considered Bill C-180. Those instructions were transmitted by letter over the signature of the clerk of the committee.

It should be noted at the outset that the conduct of the clerk has not been questioned by the hon. member since the clerk was obviously acting under instructions received from the chairman. The question to be determined is whether the chairman's action constitutes a prima facie case of privilege.

As hon. members know full well, a committee proceeding is the responsibility of the members of a committee. Indeed, citation 324 (1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition states that it is irregular to refer to the proceedings or to the evidence taken in a committee; such discussions can take place in the House only when a committee report has been received and is before the House for consideration.

The hon. member for Peace River suggested that the chairman of the committee had no right to decide on his own which witnesses should be called by the committee of which he is the presiding officer. In that respect, the hon. member is on sound ground. Only the committee, by a majority, can make such a decision. The hon. member for York East, speaking to the question of privilege, claimed he had acted according to instructions received from the steering committee. That statement was questioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. Obviously, the issue should be resolved by the committee rather than by the House or by referral to another standing committee.

The Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs will meet in due course and will be free to adopt whatever procedure it may deem to be appropriate in the circumstances for the calling of witnesses including, if it so wishes, a procedure different from that suggested in the committee clerk's letter. All that is required is an appropriate motion carried by a majority of its members.

I would suggest, therefore, that this matter is essentially one for the consideration of the committee. The hon. member for Peace River could have had a grievance but I suggest, with respect, that the matter does not constitute a prima facie case of breach of parliamentary privilege and that it ought not to be considered further by the House at this time.

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON—INQUIRY RESPECTING INVESTIGATION OF RECENT VIOLENCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General, but first of all I want to congratulate him on his recent appointment and to wish him every success.

Has the minister ordered an investigation on recent violence in Kingston Penitentiary and if so, when will a public report be available?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the Leader of the official Opposition for the very kind remarks addressed to me. I hope this courteous attitude will continue for many weeks and months in our day-to-day contacts.

To reply more directly to his question, I will say that an investigation has been ordered in the normal course of department operation. It is an internal investigation, and as soon as its findings are in our possession I will study the recommendations with the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and determine what action is to be taken. I shall certainly inform the House at that time.

[English]

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON SUICIDES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, to exercise my rights in both languages, I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of another disturbing problem regarding penitentiaries, namely, the suicide rate, especially at St. Vincent de Paul, we can expect the government to report the findings of the committee of investigation at that penitentiary?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General) Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take into consideration the question of suicides in penitentiaries, and I will also give it priority.

I was stunned by the number of suicides in such institutions last year. The situation is becoming alarming and undoubtedly, we must take action. At this stage, I cannot suggest to the House any other course than that followed up to now.

[English]

SUGGESTED PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I add my wishes to those of the Leader of the Opposition to the newly appointed minister. I hope he accomplishes much more than his predecessors. In light of not only the situation referred to by the Leader of the Opposition but the escapes and riot at Prince Albert penitentiary, the disturbance at the British Columbia penitentiary and the whole concept surrounding our approach to penitentiaries, would the minister not be led to conclude that we need a public inquiry into the structure, organization and administration of penitentiaries?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, due to the initiative of my predecessor who was very active and efficient in the administration of this department, a great number of investigations into the penitentiary system have been held, as I realized when I took over the responsibilities of Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Goyer: I must say that the situation is not alarming, far from it. In fact, certain things which take place in the penitentiaries are perhaps normal, perhaps not, but I am inclined to believe that the administration of penitentiaries is good and the people responsible for the penitentiary system will have my full confidence until I am proved wrong.

[Mr. Goyer.]

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Government House Leader. In view of the important issues raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Skeena, and also the concern of many people regarding the present operation of our penitentiaries, would he indicate to the House whether the parliamentary committee on penitentiaries, which has operated from time to time but has not been convened to my knowledge in the last year or so, might be established early this year so that it might work effectively on these and other problems?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I propose to place a reference on this subject on the Order Paper soon.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES—PUBLICATION OF REPORT TO CABINET AND INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue who has been charged with the responsibility of looking into the question of foreign ownership of Canadian companies. My question arises from the fact that steps are now being taken by foreign companies to acquire the Seaway Hotels and the Aimco Company of Toronto. What steps does the government propose to take to stop the growing takeover of Canadian companies which has brought us to the position where 8,500 Canadian firms are now foreign-owned and controlled?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is asked in very general terms. He has invited the minister or someone else on behalf of the government to indicate what steps will be taken to remedy a situation. It seems to me that the question is too general to be accepted in those terms. The hon. member might like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might make my question more specific. I should like to ask the minister whether the report which he is preparing for the cabinet has been submitted to the cabinet and whether or not that report will be made public? How soon can we expect legislation to be introduced arising out of the report which he has been preparing?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the first part of the hon. member's question, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on what is essentially a matter of cabinet business. In relation to my work, it is essentially work within the government for the purpose of enabling the cabinet to make a decision on policy in this important area. In respect of the third and final part of the question, the matter of legislation and the timing of its introduction is something for decision by cabinet, and it will obviously be dealt with by the government in due course and in the usual way.

An hon. Member: Where have we heard that before?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, after that enlightening reply, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Baldwin: Do you expect anything different?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the report, which has either been submitted or is about to be submitted by the minister charged with the responsibility regarding foreign ownership, will be made public and whether the government will be introducing legislation at this session to deal with this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is very little I can add to the very enlightening reply of the Minister of National Revenue.

An hon. Member: That's true.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The blind following the blind.

Mr. Sharp: In respect of the final part of the hon. member's question, this depends, of course, on how one interprets legislation that affects the question of foreign ownership. It may be, for example, that the taxation proposals which are being brought forward would have an effect in this area. The introduction of the legislation on the Canada Development Corporation is coming forward. So all these matters do have an effect. Other than that I cannot say.

Mr. Baldwin: It was coming forward ten years ago.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that my question was prompted by two specific instances of takeovers that are likely to be effected in the next few weeks, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he intends to bring down legislation to amend the Combines Investigation Act in order to deal with the increasing number of takeovers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped the hon. member would have read the Speech from the Throne and the list of legislation appended to it which indicated that a revised Combines Investigation Act would be introduced this session by me.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary which perhaps I might put in a more specific context. In light of the remarks of the premier of Nova Scotia last night on national television, could the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources comment on the position in which one province of Canada finds itself in having to go to the United States to find the wherewithal to develop Bay of Fundy tidal power? That is a classic example of what the hon. member was talking about.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is inviting the minister to comment and in those terms the proposed question is not strictly in order.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY RESPECTING LOAN OBTAINED IN GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

We hear that Air Canada has just borrowed 30.5 million in Great Britain, from a consortium of six banks. Was the government informed of this transaction between Air Canada and the British consortium?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we were advised of it. It is a normal commercial transaction which the corporation was perfectly entitled to undertake on its own, but they did advise me of their intentions.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In these circumstances, has Air Canada tried to obtain this loan from Canadian financial institutions, and more specifically from the Bank of Canada?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I can only answer the question in a rather general way at the moment. The loan, as the hon. member called it, was arranged in relation to the purchase of Rolls Royce engines in the United Kingdom. It was part of the over-all purchase that was made, and in order to acquire the engines the moneys were raised in England.

FINANCE

REDUCTION OF TAXES ON BUSINESSES TO STIMULATE ECONOMY AND COUNTERACT UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of President Nixon's announcement yesterday of his plan to reduce business taxes in the United States by $2.6 billion this year as a means of stimulating the economy and counteracting rising unemployment in that country, is the government giving consideration to the possibility of adopting a similar plan in this country to accomplish the same end?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would agree that our policies ought to be our own and that we should not attempt to imitate any other country.

Mr. Hees: Does the Acting Prime Minister believe that what the government has put forward as a plan to counteract rising unemployment will have any better success than the calamitous failures it has put forward in the last few years which allowed unemployment to rise?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ACTION TO ALLEVIATE SHORTAGE OF JUDGES—INQUIRY INTO INCREASE IN CRIME

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, speaking of calamitous failures, may I refer one to the Acting Prime Minister. I had intended to ask a question of the Minister of Justice yesterday but because of his absence then and today I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Having in mind the statement by the Chief Justice of Ontario concerning the grave shortage of judges and the alarming increase in criminal offences, is the government giving consideration to discussing with representatives of the province of Ontario and the other provinces the matter of increasing the judiciary and taking steps to meet this particularly difficult problem?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I will take the representations of the hon. gentleman into account.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the Acting Prime Minister also consider the very alarming and serious increase in crime which is taking place and, together with his colleagues, give consideration to the appointment of either a parliamentary committee or the reference of the matter to a commission in concert with the provinces? I ask this question having in mind the responsibility of the government for social unrest arising out of the increasing unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is entitled to ask a question but he is not entitled to indicate why he is asking it.

PRESENCE OF SOVIET NAVAL VESSELS IN INDIAN OCEAN

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the visit of the present Prime Minister to India, does the government support the thesis of the Indian government that Soviet naval vessels are preferable to a western presence in the Indian Ocean?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the question as asked is in order.

AIR CANADA

MOVING OF OTTAWA TELEPHONE RESERVATION SERVICE TO MONTREAL—GENERAL POLICY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. On Friday, December 18, I asked him whether he would be prepared to undertake to make a statement on motions to the House after the recess informing hon. members why Air Canada has decided to move customer reservations telephone services from Ottawa to Montreal, whether he was consulted, and all other details that may be useful.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for recalling this matter to me. This is my first day in the House since the recess. I will re-examine the matter and try to get the answer as quickly as possible.

Mr. Lewis: I imagine that the minister will have to take my next question as notice as well, but when he does inquire into the matter would he find out whether this move by Air Canada is an isolated one affecting only Ottawa or is part of a planned intention to phase out these customer reservation services in a number of locations in Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, I will be glad to do that.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): When the minister is looking into this matter, will he also request Air Canada to allow the Air Transport Employees Association to see the feasibility study on which Air Canada is basing the justification for this move?

CHARTER SERVICES—WARDAIR—CTC RULING ON HOLDING OF CUSTOMERS' MONEY IN TRUST

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can we expect a statement from him with regard to the unsettled situation of charter air services, particularly in the case of the Edmonton based firm, Wardair, which has had its wrists slapped by the Canadian Transport Commission with regard to moneys invested by customers for charter services?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will be more than pleased to enlighten the House to the maximum extent that I can. As the hon. member is aware, the ruling by the CTC is subject to appeal either to the Minister of Transport or to the Governor in Council, and for those reasons I do not want to prejudge the case. I can say, however, that I think hon. members will all agree that in the first instance this is a good Canadian company and that it has been providing a worth-while service but that at the same time of course it is vitally important—again I am sure hon. members will agree—that passengers' investments be protected. I am sure this is the basic aim of the CTC and I hope they will be able to achieve it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): In considering this matter would the minister bear in mind the fact that as a result of the action of the CTC many hundreds of Canadian passengers will be driven to board charter planes just across the border in the United States—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REPAYMENT OF DEBT—CARR REPORT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

I would like to ask him whether the Carr report has been submitted to the cabinet, whether the cabinet has examined it and whether a decision has been reached concerning the repayment or the refinancing of the debt?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. As I advised the House just prior to the Christmas recess, the Carr report has been submitted to me. It is now in the process of being examined. It is a very comprehensive document and as quickly as our assessment has been completed I will then try to get it before the House, or in some other way make the pertinent details of its contents known publicly.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF EFFECT OF FOOD CHAIN PRICE WAR ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Considering the recent reports of sharply declining profits and of losses by the major food chains as a result of the food price war, is the minister considering directing that an investigation be made to determine whether these price wars amount to cut-throat competition designed to eliminate small, independent businesses which compete with the chains?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act is of course aware of the price war situation, and if there should appear to be a breach of that Act he can be expected to take appropriate action.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell the House whether he will direct the director to look into this matter and not just leave it up to him to decide whether or not he would like to do so? Would he ask him directly to do it?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the director has a statutory duty to enforce the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and I have every confidence that he will carry out that duty.

Mr. Hees: So have you.

TORONTO—PROPOSED SITES FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Today seems to be his big day in the House. It has to do with the new airport that is going to be built north and west of Toronto. Before Christmas the minister intimated that three or four sites would be chosen and indicated shortly after Christmas. Is that decision available today?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. The study by the federal and provincial officials has been completed. It was put into my hands yesterday. I am in the process of reading it now. I understand that a few of the Ontario ministers are a bit busier than usual these days but I will try to get together with them as soon as possible.

Mr. Howe: In view of the fact that many small municipalities that could be involved are now making their plans for 1971, would the minister do his utmost to see that a decision is handed down as soon as possible?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is in the form of a representation.

CYPRUS—CONTINUATION OF UNITED NATIONS PEACE-KEEPING MANDATE—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the unsettled conditions in Turkey and Greece and the disturbing news from Cyprus, is the government taking any initiative to continue the United Nations peacekeeping mandate in Cyprus beyond June 15 of this year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have had no request yet for a continuation of this peacekeeping force beyond next June. It would be a matter for the United Nations to take the initiative. If they came to the conclusion it was essential to the maintenance of the peace that the peacekeeping force should be maintained, I am sure we would give sympathetic consideration to such a request.

Mr. Ryan: Will our troop commitment continue if the mandate is renewed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The supplementary question is hypothetical.

GUINEA—SECURITY COUNCIL CONDEMNATION OF INVASION BY PORTUGUESE FORCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the condemnation by the United Nations Security Council of the invasion of Guinea by Portuguese forces, has the government taken any action in support of the Security Council resolution, or does it contemplate taking any action in support of that resolution?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is an important question. I would like to give a full answer, so perhaps I might be permitted to take the question as notice.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would have directed this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but perhaps I could direct it to the Minister of Fisheries because it relates to both departments. Is the minister aware that a number of fishing companies on the coast of British Columbia are now taking steps to curtail their salmon fishing fleets in particular for the coming year, affecting in the Prince Rupert area upward of 100 native fishermen? If he is aware of this, has his department any plans to preserve the position of the fishermen in the fishing industry?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the department is aware of this problem, and alternative means of financing these fishermen have been investigated jointly with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Inasmuch as this matter has been explored, can the minister provide the details to us so that the Indian people will know what is taking place?

Mr. Davis: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, this plan is to be administered by the Indian Fishermen's Assistance Board which is already in existence in British Columbia, and the funds will be made available by the Department of Indian Affairs.

I am thinking now of the most recent action of the Newfoundland government in setting up an egg marketing board in that province.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course if this action is taken pursuant to valid provincial powers there is very little the federal government can do about it.

Mr. McGrath: Has this whole matter been examined in light of the minister's responsibility under the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of inquiries being conducted along that line. Has the government of British Columbia decided to join the governmental groups, including the federal government, in examining the problems caused by the construction of the Bennett dam and its detrimental downstream effect on the people and the ecology of the Peace and Athabasca Deltas?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The government of British Columbia has been approached in this connection. FISHERIES

EAST COAST OF CANADA—DISCUSSIONS WITH SOVIET UNION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Will the delegation now in the Soviet Union be having any discussions with regard to the east coast fisheries? If so, does the minister foresee any agreement or settlement with regard to the problem of overfishing by that country on our east coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the principal purpose of the Canadian delegation to the U.S.S.R. is to sign the west coast agreement. However, while its members are in Moscow they will discuss possibilities for understandings on the east coast with the Russians.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact the delegation is having preliminary discussions, will there at some future date be a formal sit-down with the Soviet Union on a similar basis to that with regard to the west coast last summer?

Mr. Davis: I doubt whether we can reach an understanding with Russia on a similar basis to that on the west coast. As the hon. member will remember, the closure of the west coast ports led to that settlement. I am sure the hon. member is not advocating the closure of east coast ports to U.S.S.R. fishing vessels.

Mr. Lundrigan: The minister is misrepresenting my question and he knows it. He is playing politics as well.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am simply asking the minister whether in fact we are going to have sit-down talks with the Soviet Union with regard to the east coast fishery. It is very simple.

Mr. Davis: We must have continuing talks with the U.S.S.R. The problem on the east coast is serious and we recognize it as such.

TEXTILES—POLICY OF COMMISSION—CONSULTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS

In view of the overwhelming importance taken by imports in the textile industry and in view of the recent announcement by the minister about a new textile commission, I wish to ask the minister whether he went into consultations with executives of Canadian textile industries or if this action stems merely from a unilateral initiative on the part of the government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the new textile policy is the result of an inquiry which has been underway for 18 months. During this period, consultations were held with all interested parties, including management, labour and provincial authorities. I believe there is no question about it; everybody agrees that a maximum of consultations were held.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell us whether those consultations have taken place during the 18 months in order to inform the members on the attitude of the leaders of the industries concerned towards the textile problems?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, a statement on the textile policy was made in this House in May last. Certain administrative measures have already been taken and announced, including the establishment of a commission. Yesterday, the President of the Privy Council tabled a bill on textiles. This policy is therefore in the process of being completed.

In so far as the attitude of business leaders and unions towards the policy is concerned, I believe they have complete freedom to express their views. A majority of those who have done so up to now said that they felt the policy had much merit, but that before making a definite assessment they would wait until the results are known.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, BORROWING, LIABILITY UNDER CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-184, to amend the Export Development Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Despite the obvious desire of all parties in this House that the bill before us should pass quickly, I think it is important to outline briefly some of the changes proposed to the legislation and some of the advantages attached to these proposed changes. I should like to draw attention to the outstanding performance which has taken place in the field of Canada's export business during the past year and to remind hon. members that an important part in this outstanding performance has been played by the Export Development Corporation through the machinery at its disposal.

The performance of Canadian exports has been exceptional during the whole decade. They rose by 300 per cent from $5.2 billion in 1960 to an estimated $16.5 billion in 1970. The latest figures even indicate that we have approached $17 billion. This performance was not only remarkable by Canadian standards, it was remarkable by world standards. In fact, Canada's share in world trade rose from 3.76 per cent in 1960 to 5.02 per cent in 1968. Hon. members will see from this that our performance is not only outstanding in our own terms but that it is outstanding in world terms as well.

It reflects both special and general factors. The large wheat sales in the mid-sixties and the effects of the automotive agreement played an important role. However, the most important and persistent stimulant to the growth of exports was the improvement in Canadian industrial capability, the maintenance of relative price stability and promotional efforts to encourage exports by both the government and industry. A highlight of this performance was the emergence of Canada as a major exporter of technically sophisticated capital goods. The increase in this decade of such exports compared with the last decade was higher than that of any other industrialized country.

One of the features of the government's efforts to promote exports has been and will continue to be the Export Development Corporation. I should like to deal specifically with the provisions of this bill as they affect the corporation. As hon. members will recall, the Export Development Corporation was established during the first session of this Parliament and the relevant legislation was proclaimed on October 1, 1969.

Bill C-184, which had its first reading on November 9, contains amendments based on a year's experience of that legislation. No change in principle is contemplated, simply an extension of those provisions and an enlargement of the powers contained therein. It will be recalled that the act established the corporation as a successor to the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. The new corporation assumed all the property rights, obligations and liabilities of the former corporation. The purpose of the old and the new institutions is generally similar. The new corporation was given considerably greater power than was the former body. Among the changes introduced were those according greater autonomy, providing for a board of directors of 12, eight of whom were to be public servants, four of them persons not employed in the government service; increased ceilings for export credits insurance, increased ceilings for foreign lending, and an entirely new feature, namely, insurance to cover certain risks of investment by Canadians in foreign countries.

The new institution has been operating with such success that it is straining the limits of the ceilings and the capital resources which have been granted. That is why it is necessary to further amend the act, to further increase the ceiling levels and to make other minor changes. The purpose is to ensure that the facilities available to Canadian exporters are equal to those offered the exporters of any other country with whom they have to compete. Every major exporting country has made some provision to do the sort of work the Export Development Corporation is doing. There is provision to insure credit risks and support long term lending and to provide guarantees to protect foreign investments. In most countries these facilities are provided by separate and distinct institutions. In Canada, however, a businessman can go to one institution, one office, and get all these services through the same department.

The exercise of EDC's operation is intimately connected with the operations of the Canadian banking community. In addition to protecting the Canadian exporter, credit insurance facilities have greatly improved the ability of exporters to arrange financing with the banks in the case of sales involving short term credit, that is, credit for less than 180 days. Where longer term credit is needed, arrangements are made for repayment over a five-year period. In the case of long term lending, the corporation normally operates when the period of credit is beyond the normal range of the commercial banks. It is increasingly the case, however, that EDC guarantees the banks against loss, enabling the banks to provide the long term money. Long term financing is intended for capital goods and services which according to internationally accepted practice justify this kind of credit. The basic premise of the corporation's operations is that the insurance is for commercially sound transactions where the sale is to a credit-worthy country and the terms are appropriate to the commodity concerned. The same considerations apply to long term financing. The object is to support export sales for which a buyer will pay.

The growth in the operations of the corporation is really remarkable. The average long term lending annually prior to the establishment of EDC was $50 million. In the previous calendar year the volume will likely amount to $100 million. In 1970, the volume of exports insured by EDC at its own risk rose by about 30 per cent compared with 1969. Insurance at the government risk went up by $50 million in 1970, representing growth of about 15 per cent compared with the previous year. Interest in the corporation's foreign investment program by businessmen is such that if all the applications now before the corporation were accepted the existing ceiling of $50 million would be exceeded very quickly.

In addition to operating in the long term lending field on its own account, the corporation also operates in the lending field on the account of the government when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce makes a recommendation that it should do so. A similar situation exists in the insurance field. For example, when sales are made to developing countries, because of the size of the sales, the terms of the contract, often covering a long period of time, and, on occasions, because of the credit risk, these amounts are insured on behalf of the government itself. Similarly, in the field of long term foreign lending, very large loans such as those to finance sales of nuclear power projects—as one example involving upwards of $100 million—will be made by the corporation on behalf of the government rather than for their own account.

It is against this background of information that I want to deal with the specific amendments that are proposed by the bill before the House. First, with regard to share capital, the proposal is to increase share capital from $25 million to $75 million; the capital surplus maximum of $25 million will remain the same. This means there will be a total authorized capital of $100 million.

With regard to long term loans made by EDC on the authority of its board of directors, the proposed new ceiling is $850 million, an increase of $250 million. Under the category of long term loans made by EDC for capital account, the proposed new ceiling is $450 million, which is also an increase of $250 million. For foreign investment insurance purposes the proposed new ceiling is $150 million, an increase of $100 million.

There are some consequential amendments in regard to export credit insurance at EDC's own risk. A consequential amendment is required for the substitution of the figure of $500 million for a formula which gave the same result. No increase is required for insurance since this was increased a year ago by 150 per cent.

I want to say something about the borrowing authority. The corporation borrows from the government in order to make loans on its own account. If these loans are to reach the aggregate of $850 million as proposed, the corporation must logically be empowered to borrow up to that level. In addition, the corporation must have enough borrowing power to back up the $500 million of insurance that it may write at its own risk. On the basis of the experience so far, $150 million is considered an adequate backing against such an aggregate liability. Therefore, it is proposed to increase the borrowing power to $1 billion from its present maximum of $750 million.

One other item I want to deal with has to do with foreign investment insurance. The present act requires that certain assurances be given the Canadian government on safeguarding foreign investment. This provision has proved to be rather difficult to administer. A number of foreign governments have objected to it and Canada has not yet obtained such assurances. Accordingly, it is proposed to substitute for those requirements by authorizing contracts of insurance where the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is satisfied that EDC's interest in the foreign investment is protected and the government of the host country has signified its approval of the investment. This is really only a minor, technical change.

I have outlined the changes in the bill this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and as hon. members will see they are largely of a technical nature, designed to enlarge the scope and ability of the Export Development Corporation to deal with the growing volume of export business that Canadian businessmen have been able to procure. I commend the bill to the members of the House and I look forward to having the benefit of their views on this very important subject.

Mr. Burton: Might I just ask the Parliamentary Secretary a question, Mr. Speaker. Are his remarks correctly interpreted by suggesting that in fact no bilateral agreements have as yet been signed with any foreign countries under the foreign investment insurance section of this act?

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, the insurance section has not been put into effect yet, but it is anticipated that there is business lined up ready to take advantage of that section. It is expected that it will be used very shortly.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the House agree with the principle embodied in the bill before us—certainly all members of the official opposition do—because the bill is enlarging the scope of an act that has proved to be very useful over the years in enabling exporters to increase the amount of export business they do around the world. As exports increase, increased credit is, of course, needed to help finance those exports, and this is the reason the bill is before the House today.

During the past year, as in previous years, Canadians exports have increased very satisfactorily to the extent of about 15 per cent. This morning, in order to find out just how our various types of exports have been faring, I obtained a breakdown from Dominion Bureau of Statistics of exports during the first 11 months of 1970, the latest figures that were available. I have compared these figures with the comparable first 11 months of 1969. DBS breaks down our exports into three categories. The first category is crude and consists of exports of raw materials. The second is fabricated, namely exports that have received some degree of treatment past the raw stage. Third, we have end product exports, which of course are fully manufactured articles.

Crude exports have increased from $2,998 million in 1969 to $3,961 million in 1970, for an increase of 31.1 per cent. Fabricated exports, which are slightly processed materials, have increased from $4,836 million in 1969 to $5,591 million in 1970, for an increase of 15.6 per cent. End product exports, finished goods, have increased from $5,276 million in 1969 to $5,553 million in 1970, for an increase of only 4.8 per cent.

It is obvious to all hon. members from the figures I have just recited that as our products become more processed the increase in exports during the past year has declined regularly and sharply. The increase in exports of raw materials has been very satisfactory; the increase in exports of finished products has been very unsatisfactory. It is obvious to all members that we have one of the important storehouses of raw materials in the world and that it takes little or no selling to dispose of them. Every industrial country needs these raw materials to feed its manufacturing processes. What does require considerable selling is our finished products. We must do a great deal of selling to increase our sales in this area because we are up against considerable competition.

Therefore, I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), who has not seen fit to remain in the House during the debate on this important matter. Perhaps I should remind him, through his Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. Howard) who I hope will draw these views to his attention, that in future the government should pay more attention to an increased effort to sell these finished products which, after all, are labour intensive products which provide jobs. When there are increases in sales in this area the government can rightly take credit.

The minister should stop spraining his wrist by patting himself on the back everytime he refers to a figure which shows an increase in our total exports, because these increases are constituted mainly of increases in sales of raw materials which every country wants and which require no selling whatsoever. These increased sales provide very little in the way of increased employment. It is obvious from the figures I have mentioned that this government must get out and do a great deal more to increase our exports of finished products, particularly at this time when we are experiencing extraordinary and growing unemployment.

It is the sale of our finished products that provides jobs and successfully combats unemployment. We must concentrate on this area in the future. We must consider our two largest markets, the United States and Great Britain, and I mention them in the order of their importance. We must determine what the opportunities are for increasing our exports of finished products to these markets. I feel sure that those who have followed the trade scene in recent months have been struck by the very strong and increasingly restrictive attitude that is developing in the United States regarding trade. All one needs to consider is the trade bill which is at the present time moving through congress. This bill is aimed at greatly restricting imports into that country, particularly from the textile and footwear industries. These restrictions will be extended more and more into other areas as unemployment continues to increase in the United States. It is clear to all of us that we can expect an increase in this restrictive attitude prevalent in the United States today. We are going to find it increasingly difficult to sell manufactured products in that market. Certainly, we will be able to sell all the raw materials we have because those markets need them to keep their factories operating. They do not want our manufactured goods. We must fight for the sale of these manufactured goods in order to increase employment.

I am convinced that there are two certain things in respect of the British market. Great Britain is surely going into the European Common market. When that happens the British preference will end for all time. I speak with some knowledge on this matter because I faced the same situation exactly seven years ago. At that time Britain was making the same move to get into the European Common Market. That move was terminated exactly seven years ago this month by President DeGaulle when he suddenly decided that Britain should not be allowed entry. At that time Prime Minister Heath, then the minister in charge of shepherding Britain into the common market, visited Canada to talk over with the then Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and myself, the question of Britain entering the common market and the difficulties which would result to this country. We pointed out how important it was to this country to maintain the British preference and how severely our exports to the British market would be hit if that preference were removed.

Mr. Heath explained to us at that time that Great Britain would like to maintain the British preference but that it was completely out of British hands because a condition of entry into the common market was that Britain should set aside British preference for all time. Mr. Heath let us know that our hopes for maintaining even part of the British preference should be set aside and forgotten. This was a great shock to us. As I said, President DeGaulle stopped Britain's entry into the market at that time and the British preference was continued. What is taking place today is exactly the same thing. As I said earlier, and say again, there is no doubt that Britain is on its way into the common market. As soon as it enters that market, the British preference will be as dead as the Dodo for all time.

After Britain's entry into the common market, we will have tremendous difficulties in increasing our sales of manufactured goods to that market. We will have great trouble in maintaining our large volume of sales to that market. All of these factors point to a great need for extensive effort by the government to increase our exports of labour intensive products, namely our finished manufactured products. Anyone can sell raw materials. In fact, we practically have to put up barriers to stop the flow of them out of the country at a faster rate than we desire. Selling our manufactured products will be a very difficult job in the future. We must do whatever we can to increase these sales to our two biggest markets, the United States and Great Britain. We must do whatever we can to increase our sales to our third biggest market, Japan and the European Common Market. We must find our markets wherever we can, and we need increased markets very badly.

Some ten years ago the government, of which I was a member, was faced with exactly the same problem the government is faced with today. We had serious unemployment in 1960. Something had to be done and we decided to make a tremendous effort to increase the exports of those products which in turn would result in an increase in employment. We put on an export drive which was successful. We did a number of things. I will not bore hon. members by going into them all now, but I should like to mention three things because I feel they would be equally effective today.

First of all, we greatly increased our participation in trade fairs throughout the world in an effort to show Canadian goods to people on the ground where the market was and to show them what we could produce. We made a tremendous increase in the number of sales and in the number of exporters who participated. This paid off enormously. Second, we increased by not less than six times the number of trade missions we had sent abroad previously. We sent trade missions abroad composed of Canadian producers so that they could see what the conditions for sales were in the countries in which they wanted to sell their goods. In this manner, they could determine what styles were needed, what kind of pricing was needed and so on in order to make sales. They came back and changed their methods of production, their styles and pricing and made goods to suit those markets. This increased sales very materially.

The third thing we did—these are three of the many things we did but are the three I wish to mention to the House today—was fly in large numbers of buyers, first of all from the four main United States markets, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. These buyers were brought to trade fairs in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver where they were shown our manufactured goods. We showed those potential buyers what we could produce in Canada. They were very interested and many orders resulted.

Finally, we put on a tremendous exhibition to which we brought people from all over the world. We brought some 600 buyers here to see what Canada could produce in the way of finished goods and heavy machinery, another great potential sale item for Canada. This produced great results, but there was nothing clever about it. We simply applied ordinary, business common sense to government operations. In order to sell things, you must show them to the people to whom you wish to sell them and make them available at a price and in a quality and style which will produce orders. If you do not do this, the buyer will not buy and if you do there is a good chance he will.

These are the kinds of things business does when it is faced with the type of problem facing the government today which is an urgent need for greatly increased sales of manufactured products. I offer these suggestions to this government in all sincerity. I do not suggest we were in any way clever or smart in producing these ideas. They were the ideas of business and business helped make them work. The important thing is they did work. In one year these ideas turned 10 years of continuous trade deficits into a surplus, and from then on the country never looked back. This scheme reversed rising unemployment, which is a matter of tremendous importance to the country today, and laid the foundation for the prosperity of the sixties. So, I simply urge this government to seriously consider this matter and consider adopting some of the methods that were useful at that time in order to do what the government must do for the country today. It must increase sales of manufactured goods because they are the labour intensive products we turn out. The government must reverse the rising tide of unemployment and put the economy of the country back on its feet.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the program embodied in the Export Development Act is very important to many Canadians. To give one example, it is very important to many farmers in western Canada. They watch the performance of the export credit insurance program very carefully. They regard it as being one of the important instruments whereby export sales can be facilitated. I should say this, of course, applies in many other regions of Canada and in respect of many other products. Certainly, with regard to wood and wood products, minerals and processed mineral products as well as many other manufactured products, the program is of considerable importance in promoting exports. However, one would not realize the importance of this program on the basis of the minister's attentiveness to this particular bill which is before us today. I say this with the greatest respect to the Parliamentary Secretary who introduced the bill for second reading. I noticed the minister was present for the question period. Then, he spent some time behind the curtains discussing something with some hon. members, but at no time was he paying any attention to the comments being made in respect of the bill now before us.

I think the importance of the instrument established by this act is illustrated by the fact that the act was passed first of all in May of 1969. It was introduced for first reading in March, 1969. I refer to the Export Development Corporation Act. Only one and one-half years later, in November 1970, the government introduced another measure asking for a major extension of the financial limits set in this legislation. I want to say that we in the New Democratic Party feel that the provisions for export insurance, export loans and guarantees are important and useful within the context of our over-all trade policy. To the extent that this assists in filling the objectives of our trade policy we certainly do give our support to it. However, within the framework of the program as presented, and as it has developed, two concerns were expressed at the time this legislation was first passed almost two years ago. I feel these concerns must be expressed again today.

The first concern is in respect of the export of raw materials and semi-finished materials by Canada to foreign nations. As I mentioned this matter was raised during the debate on second reading of the original export development bill. With regard to the operations of the act which is before us, I note that the 1969 annual report classifies exports for which insurance was provided in the year 1969. The 1969 annual report is the most recent report available. The annual report indicates that considerable emphasis is being placed on programs or policies to ensure the export of fabricated materials and their products. This, of course, is rather difficult to judge because of the fact that in the area of fabricated materials, which constitute something like two-thirds of the total amount of exports which were insured, there is a considerable amount of what would appear to be semi-processed materials such as wood pulp, for instance, which by itself constitutes almost 20 per cent of the total amount of exports insured under this program in 1969.

I also examined the loans and guarantees provided under section 29 of this act and the performance in that regard. In my analysis of those loans and guarantees as listed, there would seem to be an indication that some emphasis has been placed on the export of finished products.

The second major concern which has been referred to in discussion of this bill has to do with the percentage and proportion of our trade carried on with the United States.

I wish to make it quite clear that so far as we are concerned we are in favour of trade with the United States, our large neighbour to the south, when this makes good economic sense in terms of promoting the wellbeing of the people of this country. However, I think it must be said that a question does exist in the minds of many Canadians concerning the extent of our trade which is carried on, not because it makes good economic sense, but in fact because it is promoted by the corporate links that exist between companies in Canada and the United States. This, of course, does involve another issue which is of great importance to Canadians and with which I shall deal a little later.

I think the seriousness of this problem was noted by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) in his year end review where he attempted—and I suppose I cannot blame him for doing this—to show that in fact some better balance was achieved in Canada's trade performance in 1970 than in some previous years. He pointed out, as indicated on page 4 of his statement, that there was a marked slowdown in Canadian exports to the United States in 1970, and in elaboration he stated that the gain in Canadian exports to the U.S. may account for less than one fifth of the total increase in Canadian exports. By contrast, the U.S. accounted for seven eighths of the advance in the total value of Canadian merchandise exports in the period 1965 to 1969 inclusive. Then, the minister went on to give some of the reasons why he felt this change in pattern had come about in the year 1970. He indicated that it was due, firstly, to general economic conditions in the U.S. and, secondly, to a slowdown in the automotive sales in the U.S. and the finally upward change in the value of the Canadian dollar.

The minister went on to summarize by stating that the much sharper rise in Canadian exports to overseas markets than to the U.S. has increased the share of Canada's exports going to overseas countries from 29 per cent in 1969 to 35 per cent in 1970, while the share going to the United States has declined correspondingly from 71 per cent to 65 per cent. I suppose I cannot blame the minister for bragging a little about the improvement that did take place in 1970 as compared to 1969, but I think that the basic point that must be noted is that a very bad state of affairs does exist in respect of our over-all pattern of trade. At the same time, we should also take note of the prospects for 1971. This, of course, is of relevance in terms of dealing with the direction which the export credit program should take in the future. The minister noted that there were grounds for optimism with respect to Canadian exports in 1971, and several items that he mentioned referred to U.S. conditions.

I might note, without going into details, that the implications, as I read them, are that in fact we will once again see an increase in the percentage of our trade with the U.S. in 1971. I note as well in the report of the Export Development Corporation for 1969 that the direction of the insurance programs, as they have been carried out, has been such as to at least encourage some shift in our trade because I note, looking at the 1969 annual report which sets out an analysis by countries of actual risks undertaken during 1969, that 11 per cent of those risks were underwritten for trade with North American countries; 13 per cent with central American and Caribbean countries; 17 per cent with South American countries; 2 per cent with the Middle East; 4 per cent with Africa; 9 per cent with Oceania; 8 per cent with the Far East, and 36 per cent with Europe. Certainly, this is the type of trend that I would hope to see continued in future years by the corporation. I feel that, indeed, it can play a useful role in diversifying Canada's trade pattern.

There is one other area of conern with regard to this bill. It relates to the amendments to section 34 of the act which deals with foreign investment insurance. These, I consider to be of great concern to the Canadian people. This concern was first expressed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) when the original act was debated in the House of Commons in April of 1969. He pointed out a number of concerns in that regard. I would like to place on the record one of them, as expressed by the hon. member for Waterloo, which is recorded on page 7481 of Hansard of April 14, 1969. The hon. member stated:

> I very much fear that what we are seeing here is an attempt to enter into the 20th century scramble for investment, just as the nations in the 19th century scrambled for colonies, and it seems to me that Canada is now joining the new investment imperialism.

Later on the hon. member for Waterloo also stated:

> Canadians do not wish to be imperialists. We do not want to join in the scramble for financial colonies. We do not need them. We have no interest in playing that kind of role in international affairs.

It seems to me that those remarks should be kept in mind as we deal with the amendments to the act which are now before us. I suggest that, first of all, we can question the morality of such action and such an approach in our international relationships, and second, from a different plane but a practical one nevertheless, I think we can question whether Canada in fact can compete in this league if it is given the opportunity to do so.

I think a second area of concern is to ask what benefits accrue to Canada by taking such action, that is, encouraging private foreign investment in other countries and, in fact, helping to underwrite any risks that are involved. Possibly there may be short term benefits, but I think they are by no means certain in many cases. From a longer term point of view, I think it can be said quite safely that often there are no net long term benefits when the total picture is examined. Just to give one example, there have been recent indications of resentment toward Canada in some Caribbean countries as a result of private foreign investment by Canadians in some of those areas. I think we have very important concerns about foreign investment as such which need to be kept before us. We are in a difficult position in our own country in respect of the extent that our resources and industries have been alienated from Canadian control. Now, we are promoting Canadian action of the same nature, only on a reverse basis. In fact, we are trying to get the same gains by shipping some of our private capital to foreign countries and thus achieving a similar effect on those countries as some foreign investment programs have had on Canada.

This is a debatable point, but if it is so then I would think there is all the more reasons for concern about such a program. It seems to me to be folly to encourage the export of Canadian capital and Canadian savings, while at the same time continuing to allow the import of large amounts of capital into this country which of course has some very obvious effects on the welfare of the Canadian economy.

A further question that can be asked is whether this is the best way to assist developing countries. We must be concerned with the development of new nations. I feel we have a moral obligation to do so. But in carrying out our programs, we must respect the sovereignty of those nations, both political and economic, and we must allocate funds to help those countries develop their own resources. But this bill encourages private investment as part of our contribution. I suggest that a very important question is: should this be encouraged as part of government policies and programs? I feel we would be much better off to provide our assistance in the form of official aid under public auspices.

There is further cause for concern with regard to the position of the Export Development Corporation when we take note of a reference in its 1969 annual report which sets out what the corporation had done to the end of 1969 in carrying out the provisions of this particular portion of the act. I feel it is important to draw this particular matter to the attention of hon. members. I quote from the report as follows:

> Foreign investment insurance is available for the first time in Canada under the Export Development Act. Insurance against loss due to political risks such as war or revolution, confiscation or expropriation, or the inability to repatriate capital or transfer earnings is available to Canadians wishing to invest abroad. Such insurance is restricted to new investments made in developing countries.
> A bilateral agreement must be signed with the government of the host country as a pre-requisite to operating the programme in that country. Negotiations have been initiated with a number of countries but by the end of the year none had reached the signing stage.
> To enable investors to proceed with their investment EDC has adopted the technique of issuing a waiver letter. The investor, upon receipt of such a letter, should he elect to go ahead with his investment, will not have his case prejudiced at a later date on the ground that he no longer has a new investment.

It is very interesting to note the use of the term "political risk." We need to take a look at this particular part of the program in terms of what we would think if the position were reversed. What would we think if such laws were passed in other countries applying to Canada? Possibly there are some such laws in some countries, but I am not aware of them. We would have some objection to such a law if it might apply to Canada.

Now, we are confronted with an amendment which will remove the pre-requisite of a bilateral agreement. This provision is contained in clause 8 of the bill. If the amendment is passed, that provision will read:

> "(d) that would insure an investor against the risk of loss of or in respect of an investment in a foreign country unless
> (i) the Minister is satisfied that the interests of the Corporation in investments in that country will be protected, and
> (ii) the government of that country has signified its approval of the investment by that investor."

It seems to me that this is a much more loose wording than we had in the original act. Within the framework of policy as it is presently set out, it certainly becomes very tenuous and questionable. The government's action in bringing this amendment before us demonstrates the original concerns expressed regarding the policy itself. I feel it must be examined very closely. I certainly feel that the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary today, together with the answer he gave to my question, indicate that there have been objections by governments of foreign countries, and so we must look at this particular clause very closely.

There are two further points I would like to examine briefly this afternoon in relation to the bill before us. I think it must be kept in mind that credit programs and credit insurance programs are an instrument of policy. They can be effective only if there is adequate policy direction. There is a very real need for policy direction. This concern was expressed in the 1969 debate, that adequate policy direction and development were essential for effective operation of the legislation. At this stage I do not pass judgment on this particular matter. I just wish to draw it again to the attention of hon. members.

We must also keep in mind that trade policy is a crucial and critical area of Canada's economic policy. I have taken note of some of the speeches delivered over the past year by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in which he makes reference to the new challenges and the new trends in trade. He finally ends up by suggesting in effect, "I am all right, Jack," or "We will handle it somehow." Now, there has been something of a change in tone. This was certainly evidenced by the statement which the minister made to the House of Commons on motions on December 1, which in fact indicated a very drastic change of attitude. There is now something in the nature of panic in the approach of the government and the minister. This very clearly indicates that the happy salesman, the smiling salesman approach, simply is not good enough in dealing with trade matters.

We do have new developments in trade, Mr. Speaker. The dangers of an increase in protectionism are with us. We must take note of them and try to counter some of the possible developments. We also note the development of regional blocs in world trading patterns. We have also to take account of developments with respect to the European Economic Community. GATT has, of course, developed into a much broader and different organization from what it was when first established. We have special deals in international trade today. All of these things must be taken into account in developing our over-all approach and policy with respect to trade.

Some of these developments must be related to other phenomena such as the growth of international corporations. Some people predict that by the end of this century nation states will not be the important unit in world affairs, and that the important unit will be the multinational corporation. This has very profound implications. We must take note of the fact that probably one of the reasons for the growth of the European Economic Community was the desire of European countries to develop institutions which could compete with international corporations undertaking activities in Europe.

In our own country we have a problem in respect of the large degree of foreign ownership and control of our economy. All this has produced distortions in our trade and trading patterns. And to obtain further information from the minister I ask, what is the policy of the Export Development Corporation in that regard? Does it have any policy with regard to the manner in which its programs will encourage trade on the part of foreign owned and foreign controlled corporations? Is consideration being given in its programs to the development of the government's long anticipated policy on foreign ownership?

We must also keep in mind the need for restructuring and rationalizing Canadian industry. We have heard various comments from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggesting that Canadian industry cannot be restructured and re-organized adequately within a national framework. I suggest that this reflects something of the attitude of the government, and that it is not looking towards a policy that will develop a viable Canadian economy. Certainly, we want trade where it is in the interests of the Canadian people but it must be related to the over-all welfare of Canadians.

For some time Canada has followed the multi-lateral approach in trade. If it is going to continue to follow that policy it has to take steps to make sure it works, or we will have to consider the alternatives, a move towards continentalism or to some form of isolationism. In my view either alternative would be disastrous for Canada's future. The government must actively negotiate to improve our position in over-all trade. Time is running short. I suggest that the livelihood of many Canadian people is dependent on the actions of the government within the next short period of time. Certainly, I think that the role of Canada as a nation is also involved. For these reasons, I feel this is very important legislation and I hope it receives more detailed consideration by hon. members both at second reading and committee stage.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the bill presently before us is intended to increase our exports to foreign countries. As a matter of fact, it asks that the authorized capital of the Export Development Corporation be increased from $25 million to $75 million, which is a considerable increase. After listening to the speech made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard), and the public statements made previously, everything leads us to believe that the government is trying by this means to find a way to check unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, among the many problems that constitute a chronic challenge to economists—because many economists have also studied this problem, and, to this day, they have not found any real solution—is international trade.

Among other reasons why international trade has become such a cumbersome business is the fact that it has radically changed and its original character and purpose have now been forgotten. In primitive times, when states took shape, there were communities anxious to trade with other communities for the purpose of acquiring goods which they needed and which they were unable to produce for climatic and other reasons.

The original basis for international trade still exists. The most recent and most obvious example has been the sudden impressive demand for wheat in China and the Soviet Union. But while the need for large imports exists and will continue to exist in under-developed countries and in countries lacking raw materials, the demand for imported products is slowing down in developed or industrialized countries.

In those countries, public pressure demands exports. Now and then, one hears the slogan, "Export or perish", as if it were the acme of wisdom. This slogan nevertheless expresses what lies behind the term "international trade".

Our ancestors would have been surprised if they had heard this slogan in the pre-industrial era. If someone had told them: "We must import or perish", they would have understood immediately. But who, they would have asked, ever heard of nations perishing because they could not export their products?

It would be interesting and instructive to trace the evolution of world trade and its development from the days when it consisted merely in the exchange of products for other products, up to the complex and capital role it plays nowadays in the economic life of industrial nations. Even when the industrial revolution started, the major problem was to find consumers with enough money to buy the increasing production. Great Britain solved the problem by lending its overseas customers the necessary funds to pay for their purchases. That was a forerunner of the Marshall Plan. But in that case, sooner or later the buyer had to pay and he did so by way of raw products needed in Great Britain.

As the industrial revolution spread, the search for markets developed and because other countries followed the lead of Great Britain in financing their customers, the international debts known to us appeared. The relatively recent demonstration of the power of money has had an incalculable and often unfavourable influence on world affairs. It has also hidden the real and simple object of international trade and has spread confusion among the people about this matter.

The enigma in the present situation is that developed countries are able today, even without the help of automation, to produce much more than they can consume. The effect of this imbalance is made worse by the fact that there is insufficient purchasing power to ensure the purchase of all products offered for sale. Therefore, markets must be found for the surplus, and that gives rise to these efforts to increase exports.

At the present time, Canada is giving assistance to underdeveloped countries. This does not prevent us from exporting unemployment, operating our industries and finding jobs for our workers, while we are exporting goods we produced at great cost but do not consume.

We find the means of assisting underdeveloped countries by supplying them, for example, with technicians trained at our expense. We also supply them with equipment and machinery in order to help their development. That is another way of keeping our workers busy.

During the last World War, for example, Canada produced a tremendous amount of munitions, of materials of destruction that we exported freely over the heads of our enemies and we also exported some to friendly countries to help them fight Nazism. We produced and exported foodstuffs, mainly to England which was not at the time able to pay for them and we granted it credits amounting to billions of dollars, to allow it to buy from us foodstuffs so that it could carry on its war effort.

But when the time came for Britain to pay back the credits it had obtained from Canada, it was obvious, Mr. Speaker, that Canada could not accept, after the war, these payments from Britain, because it wanted to pay back with British products, which has resulted in severe unemployment in Canada.

The British were at work while at home, we had unemployment. Obviously, Canada could not accept this method of repayment, and that is why, perhaps, the government has let Britain get away with its war debt.

Again, world trade is not aimed at the exchange of surpluses for products that we lack, but rather at keeping our production going and employment at its peak. Lord Keynes expressed concisely this state of things when he said that the object of international trade and commerce was to export unemployment.

It is further argued, however, that international trade is what it used to be, that is to say the export of surplus goods against products in demand. While the government wants to have an act passed in order to expand exports, a bill originating from the Senate is introduced for the approval of an agreement signed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), during his recent visit to New Zealand, and which aims at increasing our imports from this country.

While we are trying to draft a legislation to increase our exports, we are passing another one to establish new relations with New Zealand. This is why we still maintain that international trade is a two-way operation. It is quite well if we wish to promote trade in one direction rather than the other. Our wheat sales to China and the Soviet Union were, according to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, a superb transaction.

We were concerned, however, when those countries did not insist on paying us with their own products? On the contrary, that fact made the transaction truly superb according to the minister and we were all quite satisfied. For the tons of gold they shipped to Canada, the Russians obtained our wheat which they consumed, while the gold which we received was undoubtedly shipped to Fort Knox.

All countries would like to trade both ways, but not too much. They also seek a favourable trade balance, which means more exports than imports. To reach and maintain this position, it is necessary to extend credit and have foreign debtors. There are very few cases of customers paying with gold, as does the USSR, while debts created through export credit must never be repaid because payment would entail greater imports, an unfavourable trade balance, in short, disastrous stagnation.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote French author André Philip who, in his book Histoire des faits économiques et sociaux, explained how the United States paid the 1914-18 war debt of Germany as follows:

> Between 1926 and 1931, the financing worked in a strange way. After the collapse of German currency, the Allies had considerably reduced reparation debts imposed on Germany. The principle of reparations in kind had been rejected from the beginning for fear of the competition that German business leaders could thus make against French and British firms.

Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what I have just explained. In trying to export goods, an effort is being made to export unemployment and that is exactly what the French and English feared when they asked Germany to pay off her war debt.

I resume the quotation:

> Reparations having been transformed into cash annuities, Germany's payments could not be very high since compensation, in the form of products it could supply, was being refused. The Dawes plan (1924) reduced the amount of war reparations and, without anyone being aware of it, a very special system of war reparations settlement developed. At that time, there as an abundance of funds in the United States; the Federal Reserve Bank was starting to put a stop to speculation on the New York stock exchange; available American capital looked for short term opportunities abroad and poured into Germany. German bank reserves being thus strengthened, Germany was able to pay off the smaller amount of war reparations; with the money they received in turn, the French and British governments paid back their interallied debts to the United States. Those settlements increased ready cash in America and provided increasing amounts of American capital for short term investments in Germany. The cycle started anew, and finally, the Americans paid off the war reparations debt Germany owed.

Mr. Speaker, developed countries now face the problem of keeping the wheels of industry rolling, and maintaining employment.

But as production capacity has increased and the industrial revolution is spreading to under-developed countries, the gross national product increases by leaps and bounds while demand decreases. Thus, both on the industrial and domestic scenes, the problem is the same: a glut which stems from an insufficient purchasing power.

The solution to the international trade problem will be around the corner as and when we recognize that the evil is rooted in our own country. The problem to solve is that of domestic distribution. Why should we try to export more when we cannot even find the way to consume more in Canada?

As far as international trade is concerned, the sole need for exports is justified by that of reimbursing the amount due on our imports. The "export or perish" motto is meaningful only if we accept the fact that we must export an increasing portion of our production, over and beyond our imports, so that the employment level be maintained and that workers may earn enough money to purchase the balance of our domestic production.

We now come to one of the Créditistes' favorite themes. In developed countries, production techniques have been harnessed to such an extent that we are now in a position to produce all necessary goods and services to live not only adequately but in ease.

Then, Mr. Speaker, instead of seeking to export more, why not try to consume more? When I am convinced that all Canadians have enough goods at their disposal, that they can acquire enough to satisfy their needs, then I will be in full agreement with the contents of Bill C-184 and ready to accept it. However, it cannot be said that Canadians today enjoy the kind of buying power that would enable them to acquire all the goods and services they need.

Over the Christmas season, I have had the opportunity to meet several Canadians, many of whom family men, who had to eke a living out of unemployment insurance benefits or welfare allowances.

They could not find a job, earn a salary, receive an income. I saw in these families,—and that happens often; others have had the opportunity to realize it; I am sure,—that at the end of the month, before the next allowance comes in, there was not even a quarter left to buy a small box of aspirin to relieve physical pain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, faced with such a situation, instead of trying to export more, we should try to consume more.

We hear everywhere—and that is nothing new—that the workers are asking for salary increases in order to be able to buy more goods, but continued price increases cancel out these salary increases immediately. Therefore, we no longer need what has been proposed by the Beaupré report, the CNTU or other trade unions. In fact, it is not so much salary increases that we need, as increases in our purchasing power, so that we can buy more goods and consume more.

An increase in purchasing power may be achieved in two different ways. First, by increasing salaries and incomes, and then by reducing prices, which can only be accomplished by reducing income taxes and federal and provincial sales taxes. Only thus can we effectively reduce prices and increase purchasing power. We are now faced with a decrease in purchasing power. For instance, before the Yuletide season, the bus fare between Hull and Ottawa had been 20 cents. Now, without any improvement in service, the same fare costs 25 cents. This is a 5-cent increase and by the end of the week, the clerk, the civil servant, the white collar worker, or whoever has to travel by bus, will see his weekly wages reduced by 50 cents. This means that his buying power will have dropped by 50 cents without additional service.

I am not saying that Bill C-184 should be rejected. In my opinion, it should be introduced and referred to the committee for thorough consideration; however, I contend that this is not the true solution for checking unemployment in Canada, for attaining full employment as requested by so many people. I believe that if we want to be able to make every Canadian happy and satisfied, we have to strive for an increase in consumption rather than in our exports.

[English]

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, if the Parliamentary Secretary would stop writing for a moment he would hear me compliment him on the way he presented this bill. I have always been in favour of Parliamentary Secretaries playing a bigger role in the House, especially in the presentation of bills. In the present case, not having the apprehensions that the minister would have, the bill was presented in a much more rosy manner and in much happier vein than I imagine would have been the case had the minister presented it.

We have to go back in history to King Canute, who was alleged to have been brought to the ocean to command the waves to stop and the tide to roll back, or in similar vein to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), coming out of a cabinet meeting and going before the cameras to say that inflation shall cease, and so it did, to find a parallel to this bill that purports to solve our future ills in the field of imports and exports. With all respect to the Parliamentary Secretary, I say that this is a pathetic little bill. In view of what I am going to say, and in view of the vast problems that Canada will be facing in the 1970's I am going to leave it up to the House to decide just how influential this bill is going to be in protecting Canadian export trade.

The dangers posed to our trade are vast and are no longer a secret. Japan has entered into what is almost a holy war, and very successfully too. I am going to outline some of the pieces of legislation passed in Japan in the export field, and I am going to describe the Japanese export blitz and indicate to the House how successful it has been.

Germany is the second threat and is well established in the export game. We then have the United States in a defensive role. However, the three of them are going to place Canada in extreme jeopardy, and again I am going to leave it to the House to decide whether this bill will indeed meet the difficulties raised.

It is now no secret that Japan controls about 40 per cent of world exports, and this in the space of 25 years. This is no accident, Mr. Speaker. It has been done in this way. First, the export offensive has been personally commanded by Premier Sato; his portfolio is the export trade. He heads the supreme trade council where top business and government leaders quietly slice up the world market and set annual goals for the export of every major product to every country of the world.

I have had experience with Japanese exporters and I know hon. members will be amazed to know that as a result of the system, the very tight pyramid system in the economy of Japan, companies are given what is almost an exclusive franchise for their products for different parts of the world. These companies are expected to increase their exports by a certain percentage every year. If they do not, they lose their franchise. We, on the other hand, carefully protect our competitive position. We are very much aware of monopolies and cartels. It is presumed that in Japan monopolies are sponsored for the export market only, but this is not so. The Japanese industrial empire encourages cartels and large growth, as well as what is almost a monopolistic enterprise both internally and externally.

In view of this dedication and concerted effort of the Japanese government, headed by the Prime Minister of the country, in the field of exports, I do not think I need go further and outline how important exports are to Japan. In order to boost exports, the government backs corporations with an arsenal of assistance. For example, it offers credit at preferential rates.

We have credit in Canada, too. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) asked the Parliamentary Secretary how many countries have been approved for credit and he had to reply that none had. When applications are made it is naturally to be expected that the buyers of our goods should be considered triple "A" credit risks. Yet our bankers wag their heads and say: "We are not sure that Company so and so in Argentina is as good as it is made out to be; let us have a financial statement, a guarantee or a bond from them". By this time, of course, there is not much left of that export market.

We export to countries with which we have established trade relations, such as the United States, the United Kingdom and certain countries in Europe. When it comes to expanding and encouraging trade in other countries, there is not a chance. On the other hand, the Japanese, in effect, buy discount paper 100 cents on the dollar and the government absorbs the risk of non-payment. This is the effect of their regulations and combines. Our businessmen have to go to the bank to borrow money to export and have to pass certain tests before the loan is granted. In order to get it insured, they have to convince the government that the buyer is a first class risk. However, by this time they have been beaten by the Japanese and the Germans who do not care who the buyer is so long as the goods are delivered. Then, the manufacturer gets his cash on the barrel head, the risk being absorbed by the government. I say that this bill is a pathetic attempt to match their legislation.

In addition to this, tax incentives are offered. Even overseas advertising campaigns that fail to meet projected sales targets are insured. In other words, the government of Japan not only sponsors companies and provides them with money to manufacture goods, but it pays for a large part of any advertising campaign and absorbs the losses, if any. If a certain company does not quite make it in another country, then the loss is made up by the government, not by the company. Contrast this with the position in Canada, where we say to our small businessmen: "Why don't you export to Colombia or to Argentina? We will give you all the services of our trade department."

There are two different branches in our external affairs department. One is on the political side and is headed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). We then have our trade branch. The head of a mission is always recruited from the political side, never from the trade side. So, naturally the ambitious and the keen young men move away from the trade side and get into the political side because we have not emphasized trade. The Japanese government feels that it is the trade attache who is the important person in a country. Cartels of exporters meet regularly to fix prices and lay plans for overwhelming foreign competition. In Japan, whenever two or three competitors are seeking one contract they are merged into one, whereas in Canada we might have six competitors; in the United States 12 competitors and in France four firms competing against each other for the same contract. In Japan, they have a sales cartel through the efforts of the government or by agreement.

There is a large and growing foreign aid program, which is another export promotion device fueled with long term credit and direct investments. The Japanese have what they call the Soogoo Shoosha, which are general trading companies. These trading companies are given the money with which they can make any kind of a deal. After they have sold the goods the government ensures that the money is provided the manufacturers who, in turn, can pay good commissions. The trading companies can then buy and sell.

In other words, in Japan they have sales men who are sponsored by the government. Here, we have to look for manufacturers' agents who must spend money to go to foreign countries in an attempt to establish contacts. This takes a lot of money. Our Canadian entrepreneurs have a tough enough time to make ends meet in Canada. They have not got the money or the inclination to go outside the country.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question either now or at the conclusion of his speech?

Mr. Otto: At the end of my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Waterloo is not in his seat. He will have to take his place if he wishes to speak.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I was just asking the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to take his place, and then I can hear him.

Mr. Otto: I will answer the hon. member's questions later. He might put them to me at the end of my speech.

Japan also has something we do not have here in Canada. It has an export research organization which coordinates market research, product research, finance research and export research and provides the results to the company involved. We received a report recently from the other house about the status of our research of all kinds, scientific and other. We have absolutely no sense of application of research. We spend millions of dollars on research which is applicable to nothing. We expect the manufacturers in Canada to go to other countries and research a product. They must spend all that money without knowing whether the product will enventually be sold. We are told to get the information from our Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I have been there and have been led on a merry chase all over Colombia and Venezuela in respect of a product that was not to be sold there. It cost my company $46,000 to learn that lesson.

The fact is that we do not have the proper research organization in Canada, or a real Crown owned research organization, which combines market research, product research and other research. I have said this for seven years but have achieved no results. We have junior research organizations set up in each department, which usually amounts to someone who does not have much to do who is put in charge of research.

Japan pays an annual retainer to a company for research programs. In 1953, the Japanese instituted a sales program for Japanese cameras. These companies now control 60 per cent of this market for high and low priced cameras. It also launched a program in respect of luggage and stainless steel products. This was based on research carried out by companies on government subsidy. The result of that research was passed on to the producer. The Japanese realized that if they produced luggage of such a quality and price, they could compete on the Canadian market. The manufacturers were told that the Canadian market would accept products of a certain kind. As a result, they concentrated on this field.

I have outlined very briefly the sales drive in the export field by the Japanese. This is the type of thing we must compete against. Japan has also developed another gimmick in export marketing. Japan is short of fuel and energy. Purchasers have come to Canada to buy coal and oil, but this is a two-way street. Japan might purchase $10 million or $1 billion in coal but will then say that having purchased that coal Canada must purchase radios, television sets and tubes manufactured in Japan. If the government of Canada indicates it will not allow these imports and imposes high tariffs, Japan will then withdraw its imports of coal. We will then receive complaints from the western provinces.

Let us now consider West Germany because that country represents another threat to our export markets. This tremendous increase in West German exports started some 40 years ago. Shortly after the war, Germany concentrated on markets in South America. Any business that is done with South American countries now is done through Germany or German financial institutions. In other words, Germany has a strong hold on the whole of the South American economy. This is a shame because South America and Latin America were ripe for Canadian investment and participation.

The United States had exhausted its goodwill in Latin American countries many years ago, and these countries were looking to Canadians but we were way behind the times. The German government sponsored the development of the export industry in the South American countries. Head office plants were established in Germany.

The money invested in South America is German money and the preference is given to German products. Indeed, the language of business there today is either Spanish or German. The English language is not even mentioned. Throughout most of the world, English is the commercial language but in Latin America the commercial language is German or Spanish.

Perhaps this is the result of our slavish adherence to the terms of GATT. We do not subsidize because we cannot under these general agreements. Germany subsidizes transportation on its canal system, as does Japan. Every firm in Germany, no matter where it might be located, can move goods to the seaports at a pittance. These firms may be located 180, 200, or 300 miles inland. We cannot subsidize the St. Lawrence Seaway System because this would violate GATT agreements.

Germany and Japan directly or indirectly subsidize export financing. They discount all the paper. These governments do all the promotion, all the research and all the export planning. We will not do this because we have to abide by the GATT agreements. The first thing this government should do is re-negotiate Canada out of GATT.

Canada is not the only country in difficulty. The United States is having trouble as well. The trade bill that is going through congress right now includes a device called "DISC". This is an attempt to prevent the onslaught of Japanese, German and European exports on the United States market. One of the provisions that will go through relates to the fact that United States corporations will be allowed to establish sales companies for export trade. The profits made by these sales companies will be untaxed until, if and when the foreign company brings the profits back, and of course this will not happen. Now, do you understand that they receive a 50 per cent bonus? Naturally, the United States parent companies of Canadian subsidiaries will not use the Canadian companies to produce the exports because they want to get the benefit of production in the United States.

Another offence, I believe, against the GATT agreements is the discounting of trade paper which is being done by the Japanese and Germans. While the United States does not have much to fear, it is protecting itself in the 1970's so that it will be able to hold its head above water. The United States will not be fooled by the so-called voluntary restriction by the Germans and Japanese in respect of certain trade items. While we debate the matter of shirts and underwear, they think of much greater problems. The United States is also safe because it has probably the world's greatest accumulation of capital. Much of the money in the European Economic Community is probably United States money, as is the case in respect of Japan and Canada. Therefore, they have a protection which we do not have.

What do we have to do in order to survive in the seventies?

Mr. McCleave: Get rid of Toronto.

Mr. Otto: I think we should have a complete ministry, such as a department of trade and commerce, dedicated solely to the promotion of export trade. We should have a development corporation with a banking system because we are probably the only country in the world which is left with a branch banking system which is headed by a very reactionary and conservative group of men. They are not really businessmen but are men who are of the old school. They look at every penny and cross-examine every applicant to see who his great grandparents were and whether anyone in the family was hanged. They also want to know whether he is guaranteed by the government of Canada and so on. This is our banking system. There is no room in Canada for the young entrepreneur or the daring businessman. It does not matter what we do by means of this bill; so long as our financial institutions are not behind us we will get nowhere.

The only way to handle the banking problem is by controlling the reserves. The banks are still touchy about the reserves. We could say to them that whenever they lend money for export credit purposes reserves of only 2 per cent will be required, but when they lend it for buying convertible cars in Canada or for consumer credit purposes they will be required to have reserves of 30 per cent. That, I believe, would hit them in a way that they would understand. The banks are not likely to cooperate with us and I doubt whether we would ever introduce a banking system which would be involved at all with government. I believe it would be a long, tedious process to attempt to change the banking system and, therefore, we must take control through the only method we have which is through the Bank of Canada.

Canada has a very large bargaining point. We still control probably the largest source of energy in the world. I want to mention the deal made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). We sold $6 billion worth of gas to the United States but that $6 billion worth of gas would supply the energy necessary to produce $60 billion dollars worth of profits from manufacturing. We should say that so long as $20 billion of the profits from manufacturing remain in Canada, they can have the gas. In other words, there is only one way to save our position, and that is to tie manufacturing and growth in Canada with our export of energy because they have to have it. The United States must have our gas and probably our oil. They must have our minerals, our steel, our iron and all these things. I think we can insist on this as we did in respect of the automotive pact. The automotive pact is one reason our exports to the United States are increasing. We could do the same thing in respect of our energy. It is the only weapon we have and I believe we should use it.

We must rationalize our industry. We talk about rationalization, but a few weeks ago we spent a good part of a day protecting the shirt industry. Rationalization, I think, would indicate that the shirt industry is just not for Canada. The aircraft industry, however, is. We have a source of cheap power. About one-third the cost of producing an aircraft is represented by the use of electrical power. We have the aluminum and other raw materials.

Up to 1962, we had the nucleus of an industry and we could have it again. The sponsorship and support of an aircraft industry in Canada would do more for Canada than the shirt, towel, shoe and rubber manufacturers. It must be an industry capable of producing aircraft for the whole world. We have all the necessary materials. We have the ingenuity and the expertise which is required. All we need is the zest for this type of thing. The transportation problems, of course, would be immense.

I wonder whether anyone has considered why we should not enter into an agreement with the United States so that transportation on the St. Lawrence canal would be almost free, as is the case in respect of the Rhine canal in Germany. If this seaway is to be subsidized, we might as well subsidize the whole cost. We could deepen the canal and employ a company from Nova Scotia, for instance, to do it. This would mean a saving in transportation costs. If we do not do this we will not be in a position to compete with Japan and Germany or, of course, with the European Economic community.

I hope I have painted a picture which, if not black, certainly is dark. I believe it is foolish to close our eyes and say we will somehow survive. I will be frank and say that what I say really does not matter. I do not think what the House says really matters, because the mood of the country now is that what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does and says is of paramount importance. More than at any time in the history of any country in North America, this happens to be the mood of the nation. Now, the question is whether the Prime Minister will have the necessary audacity and daring. It is the daring which is needed. I refer to the daring to try a completely different way of doing things, rather than count on conventional wisdom.

I know the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is a man of great expertise. He was a civil servant for many years before he was a member and a minister. We must never underestimate the power of the grey eminence of the government. I think the Prime Minister, however, must see that it is not advice such as that which will save Canada. There must be a completely new approach and we must have people who will take a dare and encourage new ways of doing things. If necessary we must forget a great number of what we call the sanctimonious things about compensation and so on. If we are not prepared to gird ourselves for this battle, then I think we should forget about economic nationalism completely. I think we should tie ourselves as completely as possible to the United States because it will survive, and if it survives we might survive.

If we try to be completely independent we will go down, and all we will have will be nationalism without a viable economy behind us. Hon. members should read an extremely good article on the Japanese export push which appeared in Fortune magazine of September and which also covers the German methods. If hon. members would read those articles and investigate the current export programs of these countries, they would find that no matter what tariffs we impose we will never be able to protect ourselves. We will sink to the lowest economic condition we have ever had unless we take the bit in our teeth, so to speak, and say that we are going to do great things and we will do them on our own. But this means courage and it means going out in different directions; the result may be either failure or success. But we have to take the risk.

Right now the people have given the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) their loyalty and have said to him "we franchise you to do whatever you like. If you make a mistake, we will forgive you; but if it works out, so much the better". However, people will not tolerate a reactionary, conventional, old program which will not work. If we are not willing to follow this course then I suggest, to hon. members opposite especially, that they should tell their group to forget about anti-Americanism because the only way in which we can survive is to tie ourselves almost completely to the United States. Then, we can at least hope that together, with our energy and resources, we will be able to fight off the onslaught of the trading nations and thus will survive.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) indicated that he would accept a question from the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman).

Mr. Saltsman: I wonder whether I could get a clarification from the hon. member for York East. Perhaps I might preface my question by congratulating him on a most interesting speech. I wish to ask the hon. member whether he has completely given up hope for our survival by suggesting that we tie ourselves closely with the United States in order to survive economically. Has he given up hope that we will be able to survive, even though he indicated in his speech that there were possible alternative courses we could take?

Mr. Otto: Without being partisan, and I do not think we should be, I would like to say that I trust our government will do this. But I think you will recall that around 1963 or 1964, in a speech on a fisheries bill, I raised the whole question of Russian factory ships. At that time the minister said we should really have no fear and that factory ships were never going to work out, that they were no threat. It was not until recently, after seven years, that we discovered maybe there is some threat from the Russian fishing fleet. I have letters from ministers, and from the Prime Minister, in reply to the article I sent them indicating that Canada is well on its way to a wonderful future and that really all the fears are groundless. Therefore, I have a feeling that the required courage and initiative will not be forthcoming from this government. I think we will slide along cautiously from panic position to panic position. To be realistic, I will say that our chances of surviving are much better if we tie ourselves economically to the United States.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): In rising to speak on this bill, with which I am in general agreement and which is an extension of legislation already enacted, I should like to say that its main effect will be to increase the capital of the Export Development Corporation to help Canada in its trading position. As for the details of the bill, I will await its appearance before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs where I suppose it will receive a more thorough going over.

I should like to take this opportunity to comment on the bill and the situation in which Canada finds itself in relation to the rest of the world. In spite of the Liberal fiction that Canada is a low tariff country, in fact it is one of the highest tariff countries in the world. In spite of the "song of the shirt" which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) sang just before Christmas, we are as adept as the next country in establishing quotas and other fine points to prevent the entry into Canada of so-called undesirable things such as shirts. While we are all for free trade, it receives little support when our producers are threatened by the entry of some products made by a far away and dimly seen individual.

Some time in the future there is to be action on the full implementation of a new textile policy. Presumably, following that action, there will be no further need for quotas and surtaxes on such things as shirts, even though the industry claims to be in the vanguard of technological progress throughout the world. There will of course be others who feel concern for the electronics, chemical, furniture and shoe industries, as well as other industries, which depend for their sustenance on the tariff structure.

This country depends on trade relatively more than any other country in the western world. The value of Canada's trade is high as a result of the export of the raw materials which the country produces. It is estimated that the export of mining products produces approximately 20 per cent of the value of the country's total exports. The mining industry, more than any other industry, will be affected by the white paper on taxation if it is put into effect. There is no doubt that it will have a detrimental effect on mining exploration and development which will only become apparent in the years to come. In the mining industry more than in any other, it is apparent that taxes are a form of expense, and as taxes rise less mining and exploration development will take place. There will be less mining of low grade ore bodies. At times, we even subsidize mining by means of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Another 20 per cent of our exports are in pulp and paper and wood products. This market has been greatly reduced, and the effects of the strike in British Columbia will not be manifested for some time. The United States, one of our main markets, has had considerable success in increasing the growth of timber, which has tended to reduce our exports. With regard to the agriculture industry, our large western grain industry—the only one which exports in significant amounts—has fallen on hard times. The optimistic predictions that we would export 700 million bushels of grain in the next crop year have been dampened over the Christmas holidays by indications that the U.S.S.R. has harvested a bumper crop so it will not take the balance of the 53 million bushels of wheat for which it contracted. Therefore, instead of 500 million bushels of wheat being exported this year, only 350 million or 375 million bushels will be exported.

When it is considered that of this amount almost 100 million bushels is being offered to developing countries as a means of aid through low cost loans and so on, sales that may not recur, it is obvious that our grain exports are uncertain. The rosy picture painted by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is somewhat clouded by recent developments, and the western farmer will be in a worse cash position than he has been led to believe.

Of increasing concern to those who realize that Canada must preserve a large international trade has been the interesting development of a Canadian nationalism. This was exemplified in a statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) when he preached Canadian nationalism in Denver, which brought the following comment from the United States Undersecretary of State, Mr. Hollis M. Dole:

> With friends like Canada, who needs enemies . . . I am grieved by the position Canada has taken because intense nationalism such as Mr. Greene expressed can be a two way street.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Greene's conversion on the road to Denver is a reflection of an already prevailing mood. Canadian nationalism seems to be mainly centred in Toronto, and its two leading exponents are Walter Gordon and Melville Watkins. In essence it is only logical that Toronto, along with Montreal, should remain the focus of Canadian nationalism because these communities have most to gain from strong nationalism. With a strongly centralized, nationalized country, the fruits of our widespread country would be accumulated in the coffers of the companies and the citizens of those great cities.

Amongst Canadian nationalists, it seems there is a curious view as to the auto pact. The auto pact, which accounted for 25 per cent of our exports last year, has been one of the mainstays of the value of manufactured exports to this country. Recent hard bargaining over the auto pact highlights some curious views in the Canadian stand. It is generally agreed that the auto pact, as it presently stands, has been of great value to Canada, and has worked in our favour to the moment. The Canadian decision authorizing large natural gas sales, followed by the liberalization of Canadian access to U.S. oil markets, have somewhat lifted the cloud from U.S.-Canadian economic relations.

In preparing the controversial trade bill for U.S. Senate action, the powerful Senate finance committee added a provision requiring Canada to agree to meet U.S. objections to the working of the auto agreement by the end of 1972 or face the possibility of U.S. withdrawal. The United States has been increasingly dissatisfied with its balance of payments position in relation to Canada, which it feels started with the implementation of the auto pact. There is no doubt that this agreement is not entirely satisfactory to the Americans, and they have objected strenuously to the safety features built in to protect the position of the Canadian manufacturers. President Nixon has been critical of the continuing of the safeguards, saying that they were an unnecessary burden on the automotive industry and an obstacle to full realization of the agreement's objectives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in the Canada-U.S. auto pact we have an example of trade of mutual importance to our two countries. Even to these nationalists, it should cause some thought. It indicates that Canada cannot live alone or be entirely unsupported by its neighbour to the south. Indeed, it might well appear that in time of international crisis the automobile facilities of Canada would be denied to the United States in pursuit of its national interests. In my opinion, those who say that there should be a total ban on the export of energy resources, such as natural gas and oil, do not realistically recognize that Canada will have to trade in the world.

I would like to point out what will be one of the most important problems facing us in the coming years. At present the way seems to be under preparation for a long trade war between the United States and the European Common Market. The Americans have been considering protection by means of the Mills bill. There have been talks on the problem of the Mills bill, and the general problem of quota restrictions on U.S. imports, as well as voluntary restrictions on the exports of supplying countries. There has been some talk that the European Common Market governments might prepare another round of discussions at Geneva on imposing reprisal restrictions on the import of American goods. In return, the United States has its worries about the Common Market.

The United States is worried that the European Common Market is organizing a free trade area, or at least a preferential trading area, stretching from Iceland to Zanzibar, and from the Arctic Circle to south of the Equator. Four new prospective Common Market members, including Great Britain, as well as other western European countries are anxiously waiting for the preferential trading arrangements that the Common Market can offer. Already in the Mediterranean area there is a preferential trading system which includes Greece, Turkey, Israel, Spain, Morocco and Tunisia, and there are widespread trade preferential arrangements in Africa with 18 countries, as well as Nigeria, Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania. So far as Washington is concerned there is a vast zone of discrimination, actual and potential, against American trade, and it seems that the Geneva experts in GATT can offer little comfort.

As well, Mr. Speaker, many big American companies have invested enormous sums in European subsidiaries, relying on the Treaty of Rome which guarantees them the same status and treatment as local companies. But these six countries now seem to be creating a new class of European company which will have privileged access to finance and official procurement orders. Access is to be limited to corporations for which the ultimate sources of decision are in the European Common Market. Although this has not been finally decided, big American corporations are angrily facing exclusion from some of the largest markets that they supply.

Then there is the agricultural policy of the European Common Market with high prices, ultra-protection, and equalizing levies. The European Common Market farmer has had eight years of subsidy market support, and assured sales without a ceiling. European farmers costs have risen with their earnings so that they cannot readily face a change in the system. They have attempted to resist market changes, and are not really as efficient as their farmer colleagues in North America and Australia.

So, Mr. Speaker, the stage seems to be set for a trade war between the European Common Market and the United States. Canada cannot hope to escape the effects of this. It would seem that this may be one of the moments in history when mankind's reactions may be favourable to mankind's future. Opportunities of this kind occurred in 1951, with the coal and Steel Community, which was the predecessor of the European Common Market, and again in 1958 when the Treaty of Rome was ratified. Britain remained aloof on both occasions, but it would seem it is now ready to join.

The twin issues that will determine the future of the western world are the political cohesion of Europe and the expansion of world trade. Opportunities now exist for both to occur, but at the moment Europe has lost its momentum toward reunification. West Germany is not an equal negotiating partner, and neither the United States nor the Soviet Union is enthusiastic about a strong European trading bloc. As a result of the Moscow-Bonn Treaty, the Soviet Union could veto certain steps towards European unity.

As I have stated previously, there are considerable political difficulties between Washington and the European Common Market over agricultural surpluses. The problems of agriculture and of non-tariff barriers, unless both are tackled together in comprehensive commercial negotiations, could reverse the trend of expanding world trade. There has been an increase in non-tariff barriers, which in many ways have become more important than tariffs. Indeed, some experts fear that the world economy may be at the start of wholesale conversion from tariff to non-tariff protection which would wipe out the trade liberalization achieved to date.

A publication on hidden barriers to international trade lists as priorities in future negotiations on the expansion of world trade the removal of quantitative restrictions, or voluntary restraints on products from Japan, as well as Japanese agricultural protection. Protection benefits certain privileged producers, but is paid for by the community at large through higher prices. Thus the twin issues of a strong united Europe and strong free trading world are closely linked.

Canada, by virtue of its great stake in the trade of the world, and the importance of trade to its own position, will have to be alert to what is happening in the world about it. I think we should have been more energetic in following closely the progress of the British entry into the European Common Market. Mr. Speaker, I have somewhat more hope than the preceding speaker that Canada will be able to preserve an independent position in the world, but we will need to use all our ingenuity to preserve that position.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is five o'clock. If it were not five o'clock, I would have something to say, but now I am quite prepared to let the House wait until eight o'clock when I will make my comments.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMISSIONER FOR ADMINISTRATION

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer) moved that Bill C-23, to amend the Financial Administration Act (Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to bring this bill to the attention of hon. members on two previous occasions during the last 12 months. In fact, it was before the House for debate on January 13 and October 6 last year and again today.

Hon. members may wonder why I feel so strongly about the need for such an office in the House of Commons. It is not a new idea. I have had the privilege of presenting this private bill in the House in one form or another at least 15 times in the last eight years. This bill is concerned with the establishment of the office of what is commonly known as an ombudsman. This bill would name this special office the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration.

Increasingly, Mr. Speaker, the rights of Canadian citizens are being transgressed. This is basically because of increasing domination of government and governmental affairs on the rights of individual citizens. I am convinced of this, not only because of the correspondence that crosses my desk, but also because of the numerous articles in the press and the numerous comments by members in this chamber and in the provincial legislatures. This has resulted in action by most legislatures in establishing the office of ombudsman. It is necessary that we have this office at the federal level to safeguard the rights of Canadian citizens.

This legislation would add this office to the present duties of the office of the Auditor General. His duties would include those of a parliamentary commissioner or ombudsman relating to administrative matters concerning the federal level of government. It is logical that the Auditor General have such authority. He has stated this to the committee on several occasions, particularly in 1964 when a bill to establish a formal ombudsman was being considered by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. When he appeared before the Standing Committee, he stated that he has been called upon to serve in the capacity of ombudsman as it relates to financial matters, taxation problems and other areas where governmental bureaucracy increasingly comes into play in the lives of Canadian citizens.

I think it is very logical that this bill should be considered. I plead with hon. members at this time to agree to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that a more thorough examination of the proposition which this bill presents might be considered by this committee. The Auditor General would have the opportunity to explain to the committee the need for such a bill. Members of the committee, and of this House, would have the opportunity to express their opinion on the need for such an office. I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members a few of the principles of the bill.

The bill is intended to give to the Auditor General the function of parliamentary commissioner. In that capacity, it would be his duty to investigate the administration, by a power or authority or officer of such power or authority, of any federal law of Canada whereby any person is aggrieved or, in the opinion of the commissioner, may be aggrieved.

Citizens who believe that they have been aggrieved could appeal directly through their Member of Parliament or they could make direct appeal to the Auditor General acting in his capacity of parliamentary commissioner. It would be the duty and function of each Member of Parliament to decide whether a complaint should be considered for direct reference to the commissioner.

It has been said that we, 264 Members of Parliament, are in effect ombudsmen. I agree with that. However, our powers are limited. We do not have the power of inquiry. Nor do we have the necessary assistance in the area of research to properly handle and investigate many of the problems that come before us. I, personally, know this is the case. When this bill was before the House in October, I mentioned a number of specific cases where it was impossible for me, as a Member of Parliament, to get satisfactory answers to complaints registered with me by certain constituents. I know that all hon. members face this problem.

It is all right to say that we act in the capacity of ombudsman. Very often we are able to render that service. It is our responsibility. On the other hand, there are many instances where we cannot handle the situation because we do not have the authority or because we do not have the necessary time or assistance to make a proper investigation. The fact that a Member of Parliament would make the referral to the commissioner in his office of Auditor General would safeguard this office from being flooded with complaints of a nuisance character. I do not believe this would curtail the duties of the Auditor General in any way. I think it would enhance his duties. I believe that the Auditor General is one of the most important officers of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Thompson: In recent months we have seen the government attempt to curtail the powers of the Auditor General. As far as governments are concerned, the Auditor General has been embarrassing on a number of occasions. This does not only apply to this or the previous government, but to all governments since that office was established. That should be in itself evidence that such an office is necessary.

It is imperative that we have a watchdog over the expenditure of tax dollars collected from the citizens of Canada. By withdrawing the legislation that would have curtailed the powers of the Auditor General, the government recognized this fact. Tremendous pressure was brought to bear on the government, not just by members of opposition parties, but by members of the government, the public and every newspaper in this country that I have had occasion to see. It is generally recognized that the office of Auditor General is vitally important. I regret that at one time the government thought it was necessary to take this action, and I regret also that his position is still not clear with regard to hiring a staff which is essential for carrying on his work. I believe this additional duty would enhance his position, strengthen his authority and help him to act not only as a watchdog of government expenditure but as the guardian of the rights of individuals as they relate to administrative errors which interfere with the normal rights belonging to Canadian citizens.

The least this House could do would be to allow this bill to pass to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where a study could be made of the situation in depth. The majority of hon. members with whom I speak feel as I do about this issue. They agree that it is necessary that we have the support of such an officer. The services which we ourselves attempt to render to those we represent would, in such a case, probably be more effective then they are now. In other words, the Auditor General acting as a parliamentary commissioner for administrative matters, basically financial matters, would be concerned about the rights of private citizens as they relate to grievances arising from administrative error or interference with a citizen's normal affairs.

I believe it is our responsibility to ask the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to consider this subject in depth and to let the Auditor General himself speak on it. Too often this issue has been passed over. On two different occasions, the prime minister of the day made a commitment to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada in Speeches from the Throne, that the office of ombudsman would be established. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has expressed the opinion that the Minister of Justice could act as ombudsman. In my opinion, he cannot do this; the very nature of his office prevents his doing so. It is true he might handle a few major cases, but it is the minor cases, those about which the general public never hears, that are my major concern as I present this bill.

It is not enough to say we do not need such an officer. I realize that senior officers in the public service resent the making of such an appointment because they feel there would be someone looking over their shoulders in case they made mistakes.

An hon. Member: There should be.

Mr. Thompson: There should be. There are others who feel there is no need for an appointment of this nature because the courts are available to redress the grievances of Canadian citizens. The courts do serve an important role, but any one of us here who has anything to do with the problems of constituents knows it is impossible for the courts to take action in most of these cases.

The holder of the office I propose will be a protector of civil liberties. This idea has worked effectively at the federal level in a number of states. It is working effectively now in five of our own provinces. The bill before the House does not call for the establishment of a general ombudsman over the entire field, it confines the office to the area where most grievances arise, namely, in connection with administrative measures by the federal government itself. Again, I ask that the House give favourable consideration to this measure and refer it to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House will agree, I think, that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) is a persistent man and a man who holds the cause of justice high.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: As he himself told us, this is perhaps the eighth occasion on which he has sought to introduce this bill or a bill similar to it. On other occasions, as he also mentioned, he has sought to introduce a companion piece or an alternative piece serving very much the same purpose as the bill we are discussing this afternoon.

In the debate which took place on October 6 of last year, he stated:

> It has been my privilege to bring before this House the need for an ombudsman, a parliamentary commissioner, a man who would be concerned with the rights of the private citizen particularly as they relate to the growing power and ever-increasing dominance of the public service in the normal life and living of the individual Canadian.

It is a truism to say that government is getting bigger, and as government gets bigger there is a tendency for the individual to shrink, a feeling, which we have all experienced, of a difficulty in getting at the source of power. To this extent we can identify with the purpose of the hon. member's bill. But there are some questions I should like to raise with respect to the provisions of the bill and, indeed, with respect to the concept of an ombudsman. The hon. member says that what we need is a mechanism whereby a citizen who feels he has suffered a personal injustice at the hands of the administrative bureaucracy may have his case considered. The hon. member referred this afternoon to the rights of the individual and to the need for ways in which he can find redress against administrative error or interference.

Before considering in detail the case he has placed before us, let us examine briefly the means which are immediately available for such redress. There are several. He himself put first, the Member of Parliament. I think we would all agree with this order of priority. I suggest there is another, namely, the collectivity of Members of Parliament—the House of Commons. The question period does provide an opportunity for members of opposition parties or, indeed, for any hon. member to call attention to injustice and to seek a remedy. Initiatives have been taken by this government and by other governments and some of these will be dealt with this afternoon by my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard).

In his remarks today and on an earlier occasion the hon. member indicated his view that an ombudsman and, in particular, an ombudsman in the person of the Auditor General, would make civil servants more careful. I believe those are his words, and they can be found on page 8828 of Hansard. Surely, though, there are other ways of creating a sense of care in our public servants. Surely, we do not need an ombudsman to create this sense of responsibility. As the hon. member himself said, we are primarily concerned with administrative error. I do not think he made a case for showing that an ombudsman is going to make civil servants any more careful than they otherwise would be.

Secondly, the hon. member said that we do not have the power of inquiry. In his previous speech he referred to this question as well. He linked this, in effect, with saying that we do not have facilities for research and investigation such as the Auditor General has. I would agree with him that we do not have these facilities. I also think that he would agree with me that we need to improve the facilities of Members of Parliament, and I hope to have something more to say about this. However, we do have a very significant power when we talk about inquiries because we can initiate inquiries, though we ourselves cannot undertake inquiries. Therefore, I will agree in part with him when he says we do not have the power of inquiry, though as I say we do have the power to initiate inquiries.

Thirdly, he made the case that the Auditor General, in the role of ombudsman, would strengthen the confidence of the public in matters of public administration. I do not think that he has substantiated this point; in fact I am not at all sure it can be made. Certainly, it cannot if we examine the proposed bill before us. As I shall attempt to argue, the proposed bill would definitely lead eventually to a lack of confidence on the part of the public in the very agency of Parliament that we all want to protect, namely the office of the Auditor General.

Before dealing with that in detail, let me ask these questions. Do we in fact need an ombudsman for Canada? We are aware that there are four provinces in Canada with ombudsmen, Alberta, Manitoba, Quebec and New Brunswick. Some Scandinavian countries have had an ombudsman for some years; more recently other countries have been experimenting with the idea.

In the last debate the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) raised a number of questions in his remarks. He referred to his experience as President of the Privy Council and his particular duties in that area. He pointed out that most of the successful experiments with an ombudsman have been in fairly limited jurisdictions with small populations. He acknowledged that in West Germany, a very much larger country in terms of population, there is an ombudsman who relates his activities, as I understand it, entirely to military questions, complaints arising from the military apparatus and not from the civil apparatus.

He also argued that in other instances an ombudsman has worked well, such as in a country with a fairly homogeneous society; that is to say, a society that might perhaps be described as a unitary state. I do not mean to imply that the U.K. is necessarily homogeneous in every sense of the word, but in a unitary state there is a direct relationship between the citizen, Parliament and the ultimate authority. I think I would have to say that a federal state, particularly one as far flung as ours, would not be homogeneous in the same sense as the United Kingdom. Surely, distance and accessibility are important when it comes to the individual being able to appeal to his ombudsman.

I believe there have been references in the past to an ombudsman working well in universities. Here again, I think we are looking at quite a different kind of situation. Obviously, there is no Member of Parliament, or representative in the sense of a Member of Parliament, in the university constituencies. I think one could see the idea of accessibility and the relationship of a citizen to one man very much more clearly.

These thoughts surely lead one to believe that if we are going to ignore the problem of distance and the question of numbers, the only way we could deal with the matter would be to have what might be described as a panel of ombudsmen, not one ombudsman. However, this evening we are being asked to consider one ombudsman, the Auditor General, and I would say there are real weaknesses in such a proposal, real questions about whether one ombudsman could serve our country.

Another weakness I should like to outline this evening relates to the independence of the office of the Auditor General. The bill before us, Bill C-23, proposes a new section 75A for the Financial Administration Act. This section has three sub-sections setting out the general procedure whereby a real grievance could be brought to the attention of the Auditor General. I should like to refer in particular to sub-section (1) which provides:

It shall be the function of the Auditor General to act as Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (hereinafter called the Commissioner) and in that capacity, it shall be his duty to investigate the administration, by a power or authority or officer of such power or authority, of any law of Canada whereby any person is aggrieved or, in the opinion of the Commissioner, may be aggrieved.

The wording of this subsection suggests that the powers of the Auditor General would extend to all laws of Canada, and presumably would include municipal bylaws as well as federal enactments.

Mr. Thompson: Federal laws only.

Mr. Gillespie: I appreciate the clarification. The hon. member has clarified the record by saying it refers only to federal laws, and presumably the wording could be changed to reflect that position. Subsection (2) provides:

The Commissioner shall act only at the instance of a member of the House of Commons, as the elective representative body in Parliament, and on a complaint of personal injustice suffered by a complainant.

I think the hon. member made a considerable point of this in his remarks this evening in that he said it was important to maintain the parliamentary process and the position of M.P.'s in that process. He went on to say that, by providing that such grievances must first be processed through a Member of Parliament, this would prevent a great flood of grievances going forward to the Auditor General. Presumably he was suggesting that through this mechanism Members of Parliament would screen grievances received from their constituents. Presumably he was implying that a Member of Parliament would make a preliminary investigation in respect of the grievance of his constituent and then would make a judgment.

I suggest to him that in fact, as he pointed out, Members of Parliament have limited time to make investigations of this kind and that it would become an automatic procedure. A grievance would be received by a Member of Parliament and would automatically go forward with his endorsement to the Auditor General. I cannot see that there would be any screening or any control point by providing that grievances be funnelled through Members of Parliament.

The bill provides as follows in proposed section 75A (3):

It shall be the duty and function of each Member of Parliament to decide whether the complaint appears to be one appropriate for reference to the commissioner.

I am assuming this would be an individual judgment, not a collective one of the House of Commons. We get into difficulty in the next proposed section where it refers to the powers that would be accorded to the Auditor General to refuse to investigate grievances which have been submitted to him by a Member of Parliament. The provision is as follows:

The commissioner, in his discretion, may refuse to investigate or may cease to investigate a grievance if

(a) a remedy already exists;

(b) it is trivial, frivolous or vexatious; or

(c) upon a balance of convenience between the private interest of the person aggrieved and the public interest, the commissioner is of the opinion the grievance should not be investigated.

I suggest that this is precisely the kind of situation which would destroy the credibility of the office of Auditor General and it would perhaps ensure the discredit of his objectivity, impartiality and concern with seeking out facts because it would place him smack bang into the area of political judgment. I agree with the hon. member that it would be important under the plan he has put forward to provide a method whereby the Auditor General could refuse or reject a request to investigate. When he is put in the position of being asked to express an opinion or make a judgment as between the interest of the private individual and the public interest, surely he is being forced right into the political arena by being asked to make a political judgment rather than a statement of fact.

There is one other area in respect of which I would argue that the office of the Auditor General would be seriously affected by this bill. There is no provision for additional staff, perhaps quite rightly because it is a private bill. To suggest that the Auditor General could take on these duties and provide for investigation in addition to the whole spectrum of his present duties is surely to suggest the impossible, unless you are also prepared to accept the idea that he would be less effective in doing what Parliament has already charged him to do. Surely this is an intolerable suggestion to be made in this House.

I suggest there is one other reflection on the office of the Auditor General which should be put straight. The hon. member in his remarks hinted that efforts might have been made to curtail the powers of the Auditor General. In fact, I think he suggested there was evidence that the government wished to curtail the powers of the Auditor General. I think this is specious and false, and the hon. member has been misinformed or is unaware—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): This can only be done with unanimous consent of the House, in view of the fact that the hon. member's time has expired. Does the House agree to allow the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) to ask a question of the Parliamentary Secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) has agreed in most instances with the principles of this bill. He differs only in respect of the ways in which the duties should be carried out. Would he give his consent to the bill and pass the word along to other members of his party who may wish to speak on the bill to allow it to go to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where his arguments and my arguments could be considered in greater depth along with the principles of the bill?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have tried to indicate in my remarks that while I support the thought that inspired the bill, I do not think the hon. member has made a case for an ombudsman. I do not think he has even made a case—assuming that such an office may be desirable—that the Auditor General might act as ombudsman for Canada. For those reasons I am not in a position to advise my colleagues that we should refer this matter to the committee.

I think it is most important that we make every effort to support the effectiveness of Members of Parliament and I very much hope that the recommendation of the Beaupré commission in this regard will find support on all sides of the House, because the more effective a Member of Parliament, the less need there will be for an ombudsman in Canada.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House at about five o'clock I did not anticipate taking part in this debate; therefore, I am not prepared with any very learned material on this motion. I want once again to reiterate my support, and I think the support of all members of my party, for the general principles of this bill and its reference to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee.

At the same time, I cannot refrain from expressing my disappointment at the essentially negative attitude of the Parliamentary Secretary. He expressed extremely well some objections to the bill as drafted. I think he failed altogether to deal with the basic issue of whether we should have an ombudsman. In my view, notwithstanding all the functions that can be performed by a Member of Parliament, notwithstanding the function of Parliament itself, what can be done by the department and by the courts, there remains vast proliferation of administrative law in respect of which an ombudsman could properly function.

I share to some extent the Parliamentary Secretary's doubt as to whether this function could best be performed by the Auditor General. My personal view is that it would be better performed by another officer. I do not think the essentially judicial function is quite the same as the financial administrative function of the Auditor General. However, I understand, because on a number of occasions I have heard the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) put this matter forward, that he is adopting this expedient, as a private member of the House, of introducing a principle that does not involve setting up new machinery in order to comply with the rules of the House.

If this matter were referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the committee could investigate the need for an ombudsman and whether the Auditor General is the officer most fitted to perform that duty. I think a very valuable function could be performed because as is acknowledged on all hands, this instrumentality has worked. It is not novel. It has worked for many years in the Scandinavian countries. My friend the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) said they are homogeneous. That is a pretty weak argument.

I do not think any lack of homogeneity in our population is a reason that this proposal should not operate. It has worked in countries like New Zealand where it has been tried. It has been tried in our provinces which are not wholly homogeneous, where there are mixed populations. Some of the matters which would be investigated by an ombudsman would turn out to be of little substance, but in some cases the ombudsman would be able to right injustices which could not be righted in any other way.

I agree with the proposition that some of the important functions of an ombudsman should be carried out by the members of this House. I hope the Beaupré commission report will be adopted in this respect at least, because it suggests that members of this House should have offices of their own and a staff to enable them to receive the grievances of constituents. I support this proposal; I think it would make our work more effective. But I do not see anything inconsistent in that and the proposal for an ombudsman. In fact, the situation would appear to be quite the reverse. The more complaints of maladministration or administrative injustices which are brought to members' attention through the efficient conduct of their business, the more members will need an ombudsman to deal with matters beyond their responsibility so that complaints may be investigated by an impartial and judicial official rather than by one who is perhaps a partisan Member of Parliament. I say both are necessary.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has, quite rightly, taken considerable pride in saying that the new federal court will be given wide judicial responsibility to review administrative federal tribunals. This is claimed, justly, in my opinion, by the Minister of Justice to be one of the major contributions of the new federal court. This is excellent. I agree with it. But we need all the instrumentalities at our command and not just some of them. We need an enhanced federal court with wide jurisdiction. We need more efficient and effective Members of Parliament who are provided with the facilities to better carry out their function. We need an ombudsman, whether that office be part of the function of the Auditor General or someone else.

I do not complain about the civil service or bureaucracy of Canada because by and large I believe it does a good job. But inevitably in the complexity and multiplicity of its function, things are done which diminish the rights of ordinary citizens. We need all the available instruments with which to fight injustice. It is for this reason we support this resolution. We believe it would be extremely useful if this whole matter were investigated by the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am not sure whether the Parliamentary Secretary was expressing his own conviction when he said what he did, but we regret the negative attitude expressed today and over the years with regard to the importance of appointing an ombudsman.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the bill introduced by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) is the last-born child of a generation that began in 1962 with the coming to the House of the hon. member, according to his own words as reported in Hansard on January 13, 1970, and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-13—

—the bill was given that number at that time—

—is one that I have had the privilege of presenting to the House for the last seven years.

The bill later became Bill C-40, was debated in the House on October 6, 1970, as the hon. member has just said. Such steadfastness on his part shows how important the matter is to him. He is to be commended for it as the subject is an important one. All hon. members recognize the need for it. A protector of that kind in a modern state such as ours, considering the numerous departments, services, agencies, commissions, etc., seems indispensable off-hand.

There is no question I must say, of agreeing to the proposal of entrusting this new responsibility of ombudsman to the Auditor General. The Auditor General's field is different altogether and it would be unfair to give him such a responsibility.

But while the proposal made by the hon. member for Red Deer implies a force of necessity reality and advisability is it really the solution we are looking for to assist all Canadians whose rights are encroached upon by the heavier and more and more complex administrative mechanism of the federal public administration?

I, for one, am not convinced. We know that the hon. member for Red Deer wants more attention, more justice for citizens who feel wronged in their relations with the federal public administration. According to the evidence itself of prominent figures endowed with such authority in certain Canadian provinces the commissioner for administration, or ombudsman, must necessarily, in order to obtain actual results, be able to personally discharge his responsibilities and be supported by a rather limited personnel.

How can one imagine such responsibilities being discharged by an eventual parliamentary commissioner in Canada, which is such a big country, if that commissioner cannot personally do his work, if he has to rely on the services of many minor civil servants to help him directly?

Another bureaucracy would have been created which would make even more difficult efficient relations between the citizens and the state.

Moreover, what will happen if, owing to the very wide authority provided for the ombudsman, the nature of his office and the fact that his decision is final, a citizen, for instance, or a civil servant, is again wronged in his rights by a decision of the commissioner? Such injustice would be irreparable for all practical purposes.

Mr. Speaker, one must remember the objections raised by opposition members—among whom the hon. member for Red Deer—at the time the bill setting up the office of the commissioner for languages was before the House, at what was considered to be a scandal, namely the fact that no appeal was possible. Yet, the commissioner for languages holds no legal office, under the legislation creating his office, which has been corroborated during the very interesting CBC program on which he appeared quite recently.

In fact, the language commissioner does no more than bring complaints lodged with him to the attention of departments involved, of the public and of Parliament.

In the last few years, the Department of Justice, through the minister, has endeavoured to render the administration of justice more flexible, more simple, more efficient and more equitable for our citizens and it is no exaggeration to say that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), as his predecessor did, has done more than anybody to reform the administration of justice, without however minimizing the work accomplished until then.

As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said earlier, major pieces of legislation have been adopted in recent years. The Federal Court has been established at the beginning of this session. This week, I believe, the minister will move first reading of a bill on bail. It will be followed by a bill on statutory instruments and other measures enabling the public to examine not only the powers the government has to make regulations but also to investigate such regulations.

Besides, if the Canadian government proceeds with a constant review of the Canadian legislations, its through the legal help proposed by the Department of Justice, that is to make more accessible to all Canadian citizens, whatever their class or their means, the services of lawyers who will represent them when in need, in short, if the Department of Justice pursues the regular progression of the reforms undertaken, this with the co-operation of all the parties in the House and of all hon. members, since they are, on the whole, parliamentary commissioners or ombudsmen, we will have greatly contributed to making more accessible and more efficient the administration of justice, and in an equitable fashion suited to the modern evolution of our Canadian society.

The goal sought by my hon. colleague from Red Deer will then have been reached without the Auditor General, for that, having been burdened with exacting responsibilities he can easily do without and, above all, without the Canadian citizens being burdened with additional bureaucracy which he is less and less inclined to put up with.

[English]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, in a way I welcome the opportunity to participate in this kind of debate, but unhappily the subject is so controversial and interesting that many of my colleagues have participated and have left me very little time in which to make my comments. Because time may cut me off, and so there is no equivocation about my position on this bill, let me say that I propose to vote against it.

I compliment the hon. member for his perseverance in bringing this bill before the House because I think it is the kind of legislation with which we should be dealing. However, I would have been happier had it come forward in the form of a motion setting forth the ideas that the hon. member wishes to promote. In that way, rather than referring the bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, in effect we would be discussing a notice of motion and making recommendations to the government for its consideration.

Like the hon. member, I feel that there is a role for the ombudsman to play federally. I agree with some of the points made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), who said there may be a gap in the federal area where the rights of individual citizens are not adequately protected. Surely somewhere in that vague area there is a role for an ombudsman to play.

It may be that too much time has been spent in this bill in trying to determine who should fulfill the role of ombudsman. This is where I take exception to the hon. member's suggestion that this function should be performed by the Auditor General. I note that the hon. member was able to bootleg some uncharitable comments about the government's position in dealing with the Auditor General. May I say for the record that I am in favour of a fully independent Auditor General operating in his present unimpeded fashion.

I think the legislation before us could have accomplished the same aim with very minor changes. I was unhappy that the bill respecting the Auditor General was removed, but there seemed to be good reason for doing so. I hope that the bill is only dormant and is not deceased. Because I am for a fully independent Auditor General, I wonder, as did the Parliamentary Secretary, if we would not be dragging him into the field of politics and into an area where he should not be and where he will lose his independence.

I am concerned, as was the Parliamentary Secretary, that we may be diffusing the obligations we have to our constituents as Members of Parliament. I am satisfied that Members of Parliament who represent every portion of this great country are in a much better position to act in the capacity of ombudsmen and to fill the kind of gap which the hon. member for Greenwood and myself perceive. But with our present facilities it is impossible to do this. We do not have sufficient staff, we do not have adequate office space and we do not have sufficient contact with our ridings. Unhappily, sessions now last from nine to ten months, depending on the legislation that must be passed, and for that reason we cannot get back to our constituents as often as many of us would wish.

While the House is in session we often have to visit our constituencies on weekends only and that is the only time we can meet our constituents. I think that sessions should be divided into three or four sections so we would have three or four months in which to perform the kind of service that an ombudsman would perform. I do not like the idea of a Member of Parliament hearing a complaint from a constituent and having to determine whether it is the kind of question he can handle or whether it should be referred to an ombudsman. We would then have to determine what kind of matter the ombudsman could handle.

The pressure would then be on the ombudsman who would be overloaded and asking for more staff because he would constantly be asked by 265 Members of Parliament what he had done about their particular case. I see it as a weakness if a Member of Parliament has to determine whether a person has a grievance that should be brought to the attention of the ombudsman, as suggested in this bill. To quote Mr. Churchill, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job". I think we could do the job better than most, and certainly better than a paid civil servant operating with a fancy title such as suggested in this bill.

There is a place for an ombudsman but that place can be adequately filled by Members of Parliament. It is being done today by good, conscientious, hard working members of this House, but we could do a better job and I hope we will be given an opportunity to do it. This would be better than setting up another bureaucracy which would only increase red tape.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hour reserved for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) that Bill C-184, to amend the Export Development Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I shall say just a few words, in line with the usual modest and moderate contributions that I make from my place in this House, with regard to this bill. In the first place, I do not think the bill is as simple as has been suggested. I think there are some pretty substantial proposals contained in it. I shall not deal with all the proposals, because I am not allowed to do so, but the change in the amount of money involved and the total guarantee which will be available are very substantial. The Parliamentary Secretary has referred to this point and so have hon. members in our party and in the New Democratic Party.

The changes with regard to section 29 of the act, and the rights which would empower the corporation to participate in joint financing arrangements with a third party without obtaining the approval of the Minister of Finance, are novel and constitute a departure from the original legislation. There are some interesting provisions in clause 7 of the bill on which I will question the Parliamentary Secretary later. In clause 8 there is provision that a contract may be authorized without requiring the government of the country in which an investment is made to give a written assurance. All these proposals constitute a departure from the provisions of the original legislation. The amount of money involved is of such magnitude as to indicate that this is not a completely different bill but certainly a bill of a different kind.

I think it is of interest to look at the history of the bill. For 25 years we had the Export Credits Insurance Act. I think that all governments which were operating while it was in effect did a pretty good job. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) is not here, and I know that with his usual modesty he probably would not want to be here while I was saying some nice things about him. As Minister of Trade and Commerce in the administration of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), he was responsible for inaugurating a speed-up and improving and enlarging the administration of the act. He did a good job of selling the products of this country, with his ability to be exceedingly persuasive, to hear the right things and sometimes not to hear and see the things he did not want to hear and see. He has demonstrated this ability when asking questions in the House, when his right eye and ear are not as attuned to the Chair as the Chair might wish. He did a tremendous job in promoting the exports of this country.

In 1969, after 25 years, the present government brought down new legislation. That legislation received royal assent on June 27, 1969, and was proclaimed on October 1 of that year. A year later, when the present session opened, the changes in the bill with which we are now dealing were referred to in the Speech from the Throne and contained in its list of legislative proposals. In other words, almost a year to the day from the time the original bill was proclaimed, very substantial amendments are put forward.

This new bill was obviously ready in October, 1970, Mr. Speaker. It was sent to the other place rather than here. This indicates that the bill had been drafted for some time. It will be perfectly clear to anyone who examines the bill that the changes with which we are now dealing must have been contemplated and brought to the attention of the government within a few months of the other bill being passed. I think this is very significant. This government has received great credit for reorganizing the cabinet system. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is called the great administrator because he organized the cabinet committee structure. He has stated that everything will now go smoothly, efficiently and without delay. On the contrary, with this bill we see a situation which I have pointed out many times. I am not referring to this bill in particular, but often badly prepared bills are presented to this House. They do not take into account their impact on the public which they are designed to assist. Bills are introduced which are hastily conceived and not ready to be presented to the House. What more proof do we need than this measure? These substantial changes must have been contemplated within six or eight months of the original bill being proclaimed. In other words, the original bill was imperfect.

I know it is the fashion for a great many of the intellectual, pompous and pontifical commentators who unofficially belong to the volunteer part of the Liberal propaganda machine to heap great praise upon this government, its efficiency and the way it operates. They swoon when the right hon. gentleman who occupies the position of Prime Minister is within their range. What absolute drivel!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We were involved in a very interesting situation yesterday and again today. Members of this party and of the New Democratic Party made suggestions with regard to the very important legislation which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) introduced in this House. The minister must have had some doubts about this legislation. He indicated that in his view the legislation should be sent to a committee and that the committee should have absolute freedom to interview witnesses. However, it was necessary to take drastic action in this House in order to bring about that to which we are entitled. This bill is an indication of the wisdom of that course. There is no suggestion that this government, its ministers and their advisers have the monopoly on wisdom, good sense and economic provision.

Mr. Basford: That is why we straightened out the committee system.

Mr. Baldwin: I want to make that quite clear, because a number of bills introduced in this House are not original in nature; they are amending legislation. My recollection is that 50 per cent to 70 per cent of the legislative list attached to the Speech from the Throne consists of amending bills, many of them amendments to acts passed by this government. It is very essential that all legislation be thoroughly examined by unbiased, independent committees with the assistance of necessary witness. There have been instances when the committee has made a thorough examination and it has not been necessary to waste our time in considering a matter and sending it back to the same committee.

I do not know the views of the Parliamentary Secretary in this instance. I hope when he replies he will indicate, if he has authority on behalf of the government, that if it is the view of the committee he and the minister will agree that this is an important bill involving changes of some magnitude. If members of export associations and others want to appear before the committee and express their views, I hope the government will welcome them. A declaration of this kind by cabinet members would alleviate the very serious situation which has developed as a result of the peculiar operations of certain people in positions of responsibility.

What about the bill generally? We have had a good debate on it. Exports are of the greatest importance to this country. In view of what has been said by members on both sides of the chamber, I think we are aware of the risks and dangers which we face. Anyone who reads, watches, listens and learns will reach the conclusion that the likelihood of the United Kingdom entering the Common Market is very much greater than it was a year ago. The Prime Minister of that country was the principal negotiator in the previous Conservative administration. I understand that he has very definite views about the conditions involving entry of the United Kingdom into the Common Market. Negotiations have now progressed to the stage where the likelihood of entry appears very great. There is a very strong probability that the financial differences, differences involving agricultural produce and other difficulties with relation to the Common Market will be resolved. Within a year or 18 months Britain may become a member of the Europe—an Economic Community.

We must also look at the situation in the United States. While it is true that the trade restriction bill which went before Congress last year did not pass before Congress closed, this was only because the bill had been tacked on to other legislation which was opposed by members of the Senate. The bill died at the conclusion of the congressional proceedings at the beginning of this month. However, we must remember that it was an administration bill. It was introduced by the government. The bill was apparently proposed by the President because of political obligations which he incurred during the course of the election. There is no doubt that the United States administration, which is receiving increased support in Congress, the House of Representatives and other parts of the United States, tends toward a greater degree of protectionism. We have to live with this. I do not decry the job that our negotiators did during the Kennedy Round talks. They benefited this country. However, they did so on instructions of the government.

If the negotiators had had their own way, they might have been willing to to be more flexible in horse trading. In the result, it seems we have had a free ride for quite a long time. We obtained benefits from the Kennedy round talks for a number of reasons. I will not go into them now. I do not think those reasons exist any longer. We may find that we are left in a hard-hearted world as far as international trade is concerned. I think we will find that the ease with which we have been able to extend our economic operations and external trade in the past has vanished. Some benefits arose from our very large sales of agricultural products, natural gas and petroleum. The United States-Canada automotive trade pact is very definitely being threatened in the United States.

Our opportunity to continue our trading operations, to expand them or even to hold them at the present level will depend on a number of factors including legislation of the kind before us. We do not have the benefit of an economy of scale in our own country. We have to rely on an economy of expertise, on an economy of automation. The well known French writer and political expert, Servan-Schreiber, in his book "American Challenge" referred to this. I do not agree with everything he says in his book, but every Canadian could read it with profit. There are difficulties envisaged there.

There was a debate here today between the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) and some of the members of the New Democratic Party about American ownership and Canadian nationalism. In my view, this is a debate which is not of great profit to the House or to the country. No doubt there are problems, but I thoroughly disapprove of any shrill, strident anti-Americanism. Equally, it is of no use trying to minimize the difficulties which face us in connection with the great multinational corporations which we have.

While the subject is only incidental to the bill before us, I should like to draw attention to the usefulness of the approach made under the administration of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert who instituted, in conjunction with the late President Eisenhower, a study of this question on an international basis. This is not a situation which affects Canada or the United States alone; it is an international situation and we should look at it in this light rather than conduct sterile debates on a topic which I fear may become a political issue in the next federal election. Now is the time to launch, at the instigation of Canada, an international campaign to hold meetings and discussions on an international level.

That is all I wish to say generally. I am sure the bill will receive study in committee. I think it can be improved, but I shall not specify the improvements now. That is a matter to be considered later by the committee. I would, however, ask the Parliamentary Secretary to comment on one point which has puzzled me. I shall not debate the basis of the change, but clause 7 of the bill would make certain changes with regard to the nature of an instrument which can be regulated and dealt with by the corporation in the course of its financial operations. The original wording provided that negotiable instruments could be dealt with under clause 33 of the original bill, but the word "negotiable" has been removed and in its place we find the word "instrument" alone. "Instrument" as defined in the original bill means something far different from "negotiable instrument," as all of us with knowledge of the law or knowledge of business practice appreciate. I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary when he closes the debate to tell us precisely the reason for the inclusion of clause 7. Is it intended to minimize the type of security to be dealt with in the manner set out in clause 33 of the original bill, or is it merely for the sake of bringing about certain changes in terminology?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Parliamentary Secretary speaks again it will have to be by unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there have been many and varied contributions to the debate today. I regret that many of the comments which have been made, however valuable, have not pertained specifically to the bill before us. Nevertheless, I regard them with great interest. They have been concerned with the general subject of trade and Canadian trade policies and are of use to the government as they will be of use to the committee when it studies this bill in detail.

I should like to deal specifically with a number of observations which have been made. I found some of them very strange. We have found ourselves, as Canadians, with an unprecedented trade surplus, with rapidly expanding international trade, and yet at a time like this we have been beating our breasts and calling down upon the Lord to ask him how such a strange thing came about that we should be so successful. I suppose this is typically Canadian and that we all share this trait. We are selling our goods all over the world in unprecedented quantities and we say: There must be something wrong. The government must be making a mistake. Businessmen in Canada cannot be doing the right thing; we are successful. As I say, I suppose this is typically Canadian, but I confess I found some of the comments today surprising.

No doubt there are difficulties ahead of us. It is not just clear sailing and it would be wise for us to pay attention to what may lie before us. It has been pointed out that the undoubted entry of the United Kingdom into the European Common Market will cause us considerable difficulty; we shall have to find markets to compensate for the markets we shall lose when the United Kingdom makes this change. This is a situation we shall have to face honestly. But along with the entry of the United Kingdom into the Common Market there are considerable opportunities for us. This is a rapidly expanding market which is prepared to consume increasingly large quantities of not only our raw materials but our manufactured goods. It is more important for us to concentrate on the opportunities open to us than upon the difficulties. If we do, we shall come out all right.

Another of the pessimistic views expressed here this afternoon concerned the DISC program which has been proposed in the United States. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) a few moments ago that this proposal had not been passed by the United States Congress, that it had been dropped. Perhaps it will be revived and brought before Congress again, but let us cross that bridge when we come to it. Let us enter, well prepared, upon any negotiations which may be conducted, but I believe we should not cry too much before we are hurt.

Mr. Saltsman: May I ask the Parliamentary Secretary a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Saltsman: I should like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary, since he is giving his views on how successful we have been. I should like to ask him whether he thinks the highest rate of unemployment in the western world, and the slowest growth rate, is cause for congratulation.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I did point out, Mr. Speaker, that we are not without problems in Canada. What I said was that we have been extremely successful in the matter of world trade, and I specifically made that point. I suggest that having been successful in this area, we should not cry about our success but be happy with it.

A point made by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) this afternoon concerned our investments in lesser developed countries than Canada. He suggested this was some kind of economic imperialism that we should fear and shy away from; that the instrument before the House made it easier for Canadian businessmen to take part in this economic imperialism and indeed encouraged them to do so. I do not share that view, and I know my view is shared by many other people who are specialists in the field of external aid. I also know that all the official aid that we could ever give would never solve the problem of developing economies in countries that need such help. Unless we can encourage our businessmen to invest, to create employment and thus improve the economies of these countries, even with all the official aid that we could give to them these countries could never hope to bring themselves above the poverty level. The countries themselves recognize this and welcome and encourage the establishment of Canadian industry within their borders.

Perhaps we have to be careful of the terms under which industry goes into foreign countries, just as we have to be concerned about the terms on which foreign industry enters Canada, though that is a very different question. I think our industries must be prepared to live by the laws of the countries in which they do business. They must be prepared to adapt to local conditions and be good corporate citizens of those countries. They must be prepared to recognize that the welfare of the people in those countries must be considered. But as I say, it is the terms on which they operate that are important, not the fact that they are there.

The hon. member for Regina East also raised the question of foreign ownership of industries that are eligible for assistance by the Export Development Corporation. He asked what attitude the corporation took toward foreign-owned export companies, and he seemed to express concern that assistance might be given to these companies which could be inimical to the national interests of Canada. Let me assure the hon. member for Regina East and other hon. members who might be concerned with this point that the operations of the Export Development Corporation are governed by the Export Development Act and are restricted to persons who carry on business in Canada. Further, I am informed that on each and every application without exception the EDC looks into such matters as autonomy, financial and corporate responsibility. The Export Development Corporation takes positive steps to ensure that the objectives of those seeking this assistance are consistent with those of Canada.

The EDC does not cover the credit risk of sales by Canadian exporters to their foreign affiliates; obviously this would be quite improper. For example, the export of raw materials to a parent company would not be eligible for insurance against non-payment. However, I would add that sales of Canadian goods or services abroad by foreign affiliates do qualify, and many of our manufacturers are availing themselves of this facility in marketing Canadian manufactured end products. Thus, it is a matter of concern to the EDC to see that businesses are scrutinized in order to ascertain whether they will make a substantial contribution to the economy of Canada and that it is not a case of somebody else's goods being moved to Canada, given a coat of Canadian paint and exported again with the benefit of Canadian financing.

The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) made a number of valuable points this afternoon. However, he referred to this bill as a pathetic little bill which would not do very much for the great trade problems facing Canada. I do not know about that. I think $1 billion is not a "pathetic little bill". Indeed, it is a pretty big bill to most of us. I suggest to the hon. member that this bill is but one instrument, one part of our trade machinery. There are a great number of ways of aiding, developing and promoting Canada's international trade. The Export Development Corporation fulfils a specific function and fulfils it extremely well.

The hon. member's references to trading methods of other countries, and particularly to the aggressive trading methods of the Japanese and the Germans, are valuable lessons for Canadians. We should never close our eyes to the things these countries are doing in competition with us and we should be prepared to learn, to adapt and to imitate wherever possible and whenever this will be of value to us.

I think I should clarify one matter that was raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Regina East in connection with a question he asked. I understood the hon. member to be referring to export credit insurance and I think I misinterpreted his question and gave him a wrong answer. He was referring to the kind of guarantees that certain countries are required to give to Canada. We have eliminated this provision in an amendment to the act since we found that these guarantees were impractical. Most countries objected to them. In answering his point this afternoon, I said that no country had given this guarantee or had agreed to give such a guarantee to Canada. During the dinner hour I discovered that very recently two countries had given the required guarantee. Nevertheless, this provision is being eliminated and is no longer a requirement under the act. It is also being eliminated for another reason, and it is because these agreements are, in effect, treaties between countries and are normally reciprocal. In this regard, under the Canadian Constitution the federal government would be infringing upon provincial jurisdiction, and as a result we are unable to offer any reciprocity. This is another reason that provision is being withdrawn from the act and the act is being amended accordingly.

I should also like to refer to comments by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who spoke a few moments ago. He pointed out that only a short time ago the act was revised. This is quite true; the act was revised a short time ago. I think it is a tribute to the fast growth and pace of Canadian export business that it is necessary to raise these limits again. In establishing the limits that are set up before us tonight, I do not anticipate that it will be very many years before we will have to raise them again.

It is the policy of the government to bring these changes before Parliament frequently, rather than to set very large limits that might last for 10 or 15 years in the future. We would rather bring this measure back to Parliament in order that Parliament might have an opportunity to review the limits and policies frequently. In this way the House will have an opportunity to comment, amend and negotiate regarding the operation of the Export Development Corporation.

The hon. member for Peace River also asked for assurance that the views of outside witnesses would be welcomed before the committee. I am sure that the House leader of the Conservative party knows much better than I, having been here for many years, that the business of the committee is in the hands of the committee. While I welcome the views of outside witnesses, this is certainly a matter for the committee to decide and I think we would have to leave it to its members to make that decision.

A final point raised by the hon. member for Peace River related to section 33 of the act to be amended—clause 7 of the bill before us. This involves the question of negotiable instruments. This is a technical change necessary because the Export Development Corporation is doing business in many countries around the world where what we refer to as negotiable instruments do not always represent a practical means of binding an agreement. It has been found impractical to follow this to the letter of the law, and for that reason the change is being made. What now is being allowed is an instrument, not necessarily negotiable, which may be approved by the Minister of Finance. This requires ministerial approval.

There have been a great many valuable points raised during the debate today. I referred previously to the valuable suggestions by many members. The hon. member for York East had a valuable contribution to make. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) reiterated the importance that I think we all feel of the elimination of non-tariff barriers in international trade. I agree with the hon. member that we face a growing number of non-tariff barriers and we must find ways to eliminate them. The climate of international negotiation does not seem to lend itself at the moment to another great Kennedy-like round of tariff negotiations. There is no reason why we cannot be negotiating a number of lesser agreements to remove some of the 800 non-tariff barriers under GATT that bother us today.

Many of these non-tariff barriers are of minor consequence, and if Canadian businessmen or members of this House are cognizant of specific items they feel can be removed and are bothersome to Canadian business, we would be very glad to hear from them. This government stands ready to negotiate at every possible level and is most anxious to develop the freest possible kind of trade in order to improve our trading position wherever possible in the face of the complications in the world.

This concludes my remarks on the bill. I look forward to our discussions in committee and to suggestions to be made by hon. members at that time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the Parliamentary Secretary answer a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to ask the hon. member a question on the last point I raised. The Parliamentary Secretary dealt with the difference between "negotiable instrument" and "instrument". As the Parliamentary Secretary knows, under the act an instrument includes a negotiable instrument and also simple evidence of indebtedness. Having in mind the change in terminology, it would now appear there will be an opportunity for the corporation to negotiate, sell or deal with an instrument, which includes only evidence of indebtedness. Can the Parliamentary Secretary assure the House that the corporation is satisfied that simple evidence of indebtedness as defined by the act, which is now included by the elimination of the word "negotiable", can in fact be dealt with by the corporation as in the past? There is a difference between a negotiable instrument as we understand it in this country and evidence of indebtedness which might be given according to the law of a foreign country but which might not be acceptable here.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan-Boundary): If the hon. member is referring to evidence of indebtedness as being a promissory note, then this is clearly a negotiable instrument. The difficulty arises in that it is now common banking practice in international trade to have a fixed interest rate included in the instrument. Because of this kind of change it is necessary to remove the word "negotiable". This is purely a technical change to accommodate the differences in common usage that have grown up in recent years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT (AMENDMENT) ACT

PROVISION FOR APPROVAL AND COMING INTO FORCE

Hon. Ron Basford (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill S-4, to implement an agreement amending the trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding the motion to refer this bill to committee. I wonder why on earth it was found necessary that a trade agreement which deals primarily with dumping and anti-dumping negotiation should be referred to the committee on external affairs, when the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is the committee which has dealt in great detail with the question of dumping and anti-dumping and all that flows therefrom. It seems to me that the motion should refer the matter to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I hope that someone on the government side who is in a position to move an amendment to the motion will consider my suggestion and move such an amendment.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Protocol modifying the 1932 Trade Agreement between Canada and New Zealand was signed in Wellington on May 13, 1970, by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and by the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

Although the protocol does not modify the essence of the rules governing our bilateral exchanges, it constitutes an updating of the existing agreement and provides for certain mutual benefits.

First, a new anti-dumping provision enables Canada to fulfill her obligations under the international anti-dumping code while providing for similar treatment for Canadian goods on the part of New Zealand authorities.

Second, under an amendment included in the protocol, Canada pledges to try, by means of administrative measures, to minimize the difficulties encountered by New Zealand exporters due to certain requirements of the Agreement compelling them to ship their goods directly to Canada in order to enjoy the British preferential tariff.

Third, this new clause covering specifically consultations and the establishment of a joint consultative Canada-New Zealand committee provides means and ways to settle with greater efficiency a wide variety of bilateral problems.

This consultative committee will furthermore have to gather at the ministerial level or at the higher officials level, at least every two years, and will then be free to discuss all subjects of common concern.

Fourth, the protocol provides prior consultations for any significant change to the preferential tariff treatment that either party would consider.

Since the original 1932 trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand was introduced in Canada as an act of Parliament, the amending protocol must be introduced as an act amending the act. By approving the protocol for purposes of official acceptance by Canada, the cabinet has decided consequently that this amending bill, which is required, must also be introduced before Parliament.

And I hope that honourable members will be ready to accept Bill S-4 and to refer it to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

I understand the comments made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) but, as this legislative proposal has been introduced by the Minister of External Affairs, I feel that, in accordance with the House's usual procedure, it should be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

In any case, I will consult my colleagues who have more parliamentary experience than I to see if there is not some other way to deal with this bill in committee in order to satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, why then do we have a committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs?

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by congratulating the Parliamentary Secretary for his presentation. I think I will not quite emulate his brevity, but I shall not deliver lengthy remarks on this bill. I think it is a good thing to have Parliamentary Secretaries involved in legislation. I note, however, that so far as the record shows, at no phase of the consideration of this measure in the other place was any minister present when it was being discussed.

I am not convinced the bill is as innocuous as it may appear at first blush. I think it may be possessed of a little more potential for importance than may appear. This is an interesting measure in that it is one bilateral treaty which has stood untouched for 38 years. It comes into the area of personal recollection. I can remember as a youngster of 11 that in the election campaign of 1930 everybody was talking about New Zealand buttter. Then there came on the scene a great man who was going to blast his way into the markets of the world and make tariffs work for the farmers as free trade had never worked for them.

We had on the scene in the thirties a very vigorous personality and powerful leader. He is not, and was not, my favourite among Conservative leaders but he did many things when it came to economic matters. It was interesting how he looked at the Commonwealth as it was called in his time. While Bennett had no use for the idealistic concept of free trade, he quarrelled with his friend Lord Beaverbrook about that. He did believe in freer trade, and this agreement with New Zealand which has stood since 1932 was one of the emanations of this belief. I think it is appropriate, too, that on the eve of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference we are tonight discussing a measure which directly emanates from a protocol signed by our own Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Prime Minister of New Zealand a few months ago. We are discussing something which had its origin in a year of Canadian centrality in Commonwealth affairs.

We have had periods through the years when Canada and Canadian leaders have given distinct direction to the empire, as it was once called, and to the Commonwealth of Nations as it was later called and is now called. We can think of Sir Robert Borden who in many ways was the father of the modern Commonwealth. We can think of Meighen who gave emphasis to the Pacific, so far as the Commonwealth was concerned, at the 1922 conference. And we think of Bennett in the thirties, making the then outrageous suggestion that Commonwealth conferences should be held other than in Britain and pushing his way to the very centre of things in an age of painful economic nationalism in an effort to get some sort of supranationalism in the world of economic nationalism through Commonwealth agreements. While the hopes of Bennett were not realized and the world did languish far too long in the trough of economic despondence, some of these agreements have stood, and stood well, and we are talking about one of them tonight.

We are very far from New Zealand, geographically, but in many ways very close to this senior member of the Commonwealth. I used to note at the United Nations General Assembly quite a correlation between the votes of New Zealand and Canada on a great many questions; we were very close in many points of view. I think it is important to note always that this Commonwealth is made up of a gossamer connection of all the states and the special associations of groups within the Commonwealth. We, naturally, could not be as close to New Zealand in deference terms as is Australia. We can be, and I think should be, even closer to the Commonwealth Caribbean than we are now. So the Commonwealth is wound up in a series of bilateral and perhaps trilateral agreements all within the framework of a most unique and interesting institution.

Once again we hear that the Commonwealth is threatened and that it is going to break up. I was appalled to hear on the CBC tonight that the Prime Minister of Canada who is in India was even publicly contemplating that a situation might arise where Canada may perhaps find herself leaving the Commonwealth. You do not leave organizations like the Commonwealth. You do not leave the United Nations, nor do you leave NATO because everyone there is not on exactly the same wavelength as each individual member desires. This is not the way the Commonwealth is structured; it is not the way it is functioning. To even talk about Canada leaving the Commonwealth strikes me as a painful and regrettable example of anticipatory petulance which I think does no good to Canada and no good to the Prime Minister.

There are features in this bill which no doubt the learned economists of my party will want to discuss in greater detail. There are a couple of basic aspects which concern me. I notice that we are following the original treaty and using the British preference. I wonder what will happen to this treaty when the U.K. becomes a full-fledged member of the European Economic Community. What will the British preference in this legislation mean, and will we not in fact have to say about this reasonably ancient treaty—if I may call something reasonably ancient—that it has outlived its usefulness and that we are back to square one so far as trading relations with New Zealand are concerned? Therefore, this is not just a simple piece of legislation: the whole question will have to be reconsidered very carefully.

The thing that has always pained me about the present government is that they seem almost to have been taken by surprise by the fact that the British have seriously contemplated and are in fact on the way into the European Economic Community. Another thing that strikes me as important—it will have to be carefully discussed and I am sorry that no one who has been piloting this measure in either place has mentioned it—is the question of agricultural products today. It was butter in the 1920s and the 1930s, and it is another agricultural commodity—I am not an expert in agriculture—which we should be considering very carefully in the context of the present state of Canadian agriculture. The reference is to the anti-dumping techniques. They strike me as being reasonable and sound. I am not quite prepared to go along with the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) in reference to GATT, but neither do I worship at that particular temple every day of the week.

Having said these general things and noting carefully what my colleague in front of me, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), said about the Trade and Commerce people rather than the External Affairs people, I am inhibited and overly modest about getting into these important matters. I know that probably he will be getting into them with his usual perceptive and comprehensive manner and will deal with them in greater detail.

I have a feeling that this agreement, because of events in Europe with reference to the United Kingdom, will not last anything like 38 years. It will be shortlived, and therefore we must bear this carefully in mind. I think we should approach the matter as one of economics. Of course it is a trade measure. I think the fact that the Commonwealth is involved makes it a little more than just another treaty. I am glad to have had the opportunity to make these few remarks. Having made these observations, I have no disposition to prolong the discussion.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I think it is natural for a Canadian to welcome any enlargement of contacts with a beautiful country such as New Zealand. New Zealand in some ways is very much like Canada. Anyone who has visited that country, as I had the privilege of doing along with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) during the Commonwealth conference in 1965, comes away impressed with the similarity of that country to Canada. In many ways New Zealand stands in relationship to its giant neighbour, Australia, with seven times its population, as does Canada in relation to the United States and the same kind of feeling exists, the same kind of hesitancy about the future.

The New Zealand economy is structured almost entirely on agricultural export. The latest figure I can recall is that 95 per cent of New Zealand's exports are agricultural. This results from the geography and the population of the country. Therefore, when we enter into an agreement with a country like New Zealand, as welcome as that agreement is and as welcome as contacts with New Zealand are, we must realize that it poses a very serious threat to Canadian agriculture at a time when it is already in very great difficulties.

Unfortunately, the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary were not very enlightening in the sense of telling us what will happen as a result of this agreement, what are the prospects for Canadian agriculture and in what difficulties Canadian agriculture will find itself as a result of the agreement. Nor were we told what provisions the government is making to correct any dislocation of Canadian agriculture that might result from this gesture of accommodation toward a country which we like.

As I have said earlier, our farmers are in increasing difficulty. New Zealand is also facing increasing difficulties in terms of her agricultural exports. Most of New Zealand's agricultural exports have traditionally gone to the United Kingdom; it is the single biggest market for New Zealand. We understand that the U.K. is trying to set special terms of entry to permit its trading relationship with New Zealand to continue. Unless she can get this kind of an agreement as a condition of entry into the Common Market, a large proportion of the produce which is now going to the U.K. will be thrown into other world markets, particularly the markets of countries with which New Zealand has a trading agreement. I say this to highlight the danger that exists in signing agreements with friendly countries with whom we wish to maintain trade without making adequate provision for the effect they will have on Canadian production and our farming industry.

The relationship between Canada and New Zealand, although it goes back a considerable span of time, has not been very friendly or very compatible in recent years. I do not think there has been any open hostility, but there has certainly been a considerable degree of coolness in the relationship between our country and New Zealand. New Zealand was one of the few countries that did not exhibit at Expo. This was a great disappointment to Canada. We have had difficulties with New Zealand in terms of reaching agreement for our international air lines to land in that country.

There have been few ministerial visits to Canada. Recently the Prime Minister of New Zealand visited us, but previously there was a tendency for Canada to be bypassed when New Zealand ministers were touring the world. However, Mr. Speaker, when you are in New Zealand the situation is entirely different. One could not ask for greater friendship or greater hospitality than was extended to our delegation when we were in that country, a delegation that was so well led by the very able Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). I am sure he will recall that visit with great pleasure.

If we look at the trade picture between our two countries we find that we sell about 300 products to New Zealand, some in fair sized quantities and some in lesser quantities. We sell New Zealand a considerable amount of chemicals and fertilizers, but virtually all the goods that we sell are industrial goods that come from central Canada and it is quite obvious that in return we buy virtually all agricultural products, which will principally affect the farmers of western Canada. At one time those products were butter, cheese and mutton. Today the principal product is New Zealand beef, which is a prime competitor for our western beef industry. Yet this is at a time when the government through its Lift program has been suggesting to western farmers that they should get out of grain production and concentrate on beef production. At a time when our farmers are being told they should switch from grain to beef, an agreement is made between our country and New Zealand to provide for the importation of more beef products from that country.

I would like to indicate how trade between the two countries has been changing over the last few years. For a long time our exports to New Zealand were at least double our imports from there. In 1968 we exported $31,842,000 worth of goods to New Zealand and imported $18,645,000 worth of goods. In 1969 this pattern changed; we exported $36,976,000 worth and imported $41,482,000 worth. For the first time we started to import more than we exported. There was a reason for that, Mr. Speaker. For years most of the products we imported did not find their way on to the Canadian market. They came into Canada to be transshipped to the United States and did not have a serious effect on our domestic market. Here they were cut up, packaged and prepared for North American delivery and forwarded to the U.S. market. That situation existed until last summer, when serious objection was raised by American farm organizations that Canada was being used as a bypass for New Zealand produce. As a result, this trade was effectively curtailed.

In 1970 we exported $35,192,000 worth of goods to New Zealand. In fact, through the years our export figures remained fairly constant. But in 1970 we imported $38,-311,000 worth of goods from New Zealand, which came on to the Canadian market because the U.S. border was being closed to New Zealand imports; New Zealand products could not enter the United States as easily as before. New Zealand goods that were in storage in Canada for transshipment to the U.S. found their way on to the Canadian market and represented a serious source of competition for the already hard pressed Canadian farmer.

Therefore, while the signing of agreements of this kind with a country like New Zealand is welcome, a country that is very much like Canada in terms of its people, its outlook and attitude, and while we want to extend the scope of our friendship and trade, it raises enormously serious problems and adds to the already great feeling of unhappiness and sense of neglect being felt in our western provinces.

The argument we have always heard is that the east is continually trading off agriculture for manufactured goods. Westerners said this with respect to the Kennedy round, and with a considerable amount of truth. They will say it again with respect to this agreement, again with a considerable amount of truth. This is the great dilemma that faces us. It would not be such an enormous dilemma, Mr. Speaker, if we had a statement of policy from the government. This is the great difficulty.

We know that changes in trade are taking place throughout the world. The farmers know changes are taking place. But what actually is happening? What kind of provision is being made to take account of the dislocations? When my colleagues listen to me speak about the necessity to protect the shirt and shoe industries in my riding, they ask me, with great justification, "What is being done to protect the farmer?" That is part of the grievance of the west. What we need is a policy that takes these matters into account, that recognizes the diversity of interests within this country and in a planned fashion, with an organized approach, with the co-operation and participation of those affected, reaches a decision about the future of industries in such a way as not to disrupt violently the livelihood of those engaged in them and their ability to survive.

Therefore, we feel that the government must provide us with answers to the questions that this agreement raises. We want to know what have been the consequences of trade between Canada and New Zealand and what provisions the government is making to take account of them. We intend to give the bill close scrutiny both in committee and in the House.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments on the bill under consideration and at the same time ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), for some information relating to the expressions "goods", goods the growth", and so on.

Article 2 of Bill S-4 reads as follows:

Articles IV and V of the Agreement are deleted and replaced by the following Article:

Now, in article IV of the agreement signed in 1932 and assented to May 13, we read the following:

Goods entitled to entry under Article I hereof shall not be subject to Section 6 of the Customs Tariff of Canada unless previous notice has been given by the Government of Canada to the Government of New Zealand that the importation of such goods would prejudicially or injuriously affect the producers or manufacturers of similar goods in Canada,—

Since, with Bill S-4, this clause is eliminated, the protection which used to be granted to the Canadian producers would also be eliminated.

I remember that, last year, at the time of the visit to New Zealand of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) it was said on television that the Prime Minister would have stated that the Canadian government's dairy policy was aimed at reducing production to allow the New Zealanders to export their dairy products to Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the end of December, Mr. Roland Pigeon, President of the Coopérative fédérée de la province de Québec, sent a telegram to the President of the Canadian Dairy Commission and requested that the Commission's regulations be amended so as to protect dairy production and prevent a possible shortage of dairy products in Canada.

This is why I am rather worried and this is the reason for my remarks. I would like to know what is the actual purpose of Bill S-4. Is it really to permit the importation into Canada of competing products and to enable New Zealand to export here what we have already in sufficient quantities to a point that the government has already thought of penalizing the producers that would exceed their quotas? Everyone knows that if production exceeds the quotas set by the Canadian Dairy Commission, the producers are subject to a penalty of $1.25 per hundredweight.

What happens when we deal with some country? I am for trade with the Commonwealth countries and others in the world. This is quite normal. But I believe that we should not import goods likely to affect labour, production or income within some sector of our society.

It might be argued that butter from New Zealand can be obtained at 45 cents or 50 cents per pound. In turn, I might say: A pair of shoes from India can be obtained at $2. Also good quality shirts can be obtained from Japan at $3; the same rationale could be used concerning many other goods and many other staples.

By always importing what is cheaper elsewhere, we stifle industrial development at home, prevent our industries from expanding and producing, and deprive Canadian workers of their jobs. Before long our country might become an importing country only for the fact that other countries are able to produce goods at lower cost.

I wish we were told exactly what is meant by "goods the growth..." This is what we find in the bill:

2. Goods the growth, produce or manufacture of ... into New Zealand—

What does this mean? Have we established what are the goods the growth, produce or manufacture of New Zealand which will be imported?

That is what I wanted to stress so as not to be told some day: We would have told you if you had asked about it. You ask about it now that the legislation has been passed, now that the bill has been ratified. It is too late!

I sincerely hope we are given all that information when the bill is examined more thoroughly so as to be able to pass such information along to the people we represent.

I already have enough problems in my own constituency without having to approve legislation that might create still greater problems.

That is why I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will be able to give us all the necessary information so that we may know exactly where we are going.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, after looking at Bill S-4, which deals explicitly with Canada-New Zealand trade arrangements, I immediately checked our import-export relationship with New Zealand. I realize that trade is a two-way street. If we expect to export, we must import. Much to my surprise, I found that Canada and New Zealand are relatively in balance with regard to trade. During the period January to October last year, Canada imported from New Zealand goods valued at approximately $35 million. In the period January to October, Canada exported $35 million worth of goods to that country. In the same period Canada imported almost $27 million worth of beef. Our total imports and exports are about equal.

I wondered about the reason for Bill S-4. After some study I realized that this bill will allow New Zealand to apply anti-dumping legislation against our manufactured goods. I question the motivation of the bill and whether Canada's position is secure in this regard.

I wish to quote from an article dealing with beef. This is of particular concern to western Canada. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) dealt with this matter to some extent. I quote as follows from page 17 of the January 1971, issue of Cattlemen:

The Canadian government, of course, has created problems for itself.

I emphasize those words.

Canada alone among major nations clings to the concept of free trade among nations. Who will deny that this is an admirable goal? Of course it is. However, to adopt this stance, when other countries are moving the other way, is foolishly naïve. The net effect is that Canadian primary industry is forced to "swim upstream" against a very strong current indeed.

Let's look at the record. As mentioned, the United States is now in a protectionist mood and has since 1964 imposed quotas on beef from Oceania. The European Common Market has since its inception imposed rigorous quotas, tariffs and variable levies against all manner of agricultural products, including beef. Japan imposes a quota plus a tariff of 25% of the value (cost plus freight) of beef. Finally, the United Kingdom recently announced a system of variable levies for many agricultural products, including beef, to go into effect April 1, 1971. Thus, Canada stands alone unprotected in any way from world markets. What a ripe target!

Therefore, the position of the federal government is at best naïve and at worst suicidal for primary industry. In times like these we must have rational flexible policies designed to cope with modern realities. Nowhere is this need more in evidence than in the current situation respecting beef imports. Between 1969 and 1970, imports from Oceania more than doubled. What if they double again in 1971 and again in 1972? Why shouldn't they? We apparently have neither the laws of Parliament nor the desire of parliamentarians to prevent just such an occurrence.

That outlines the position with regard to beef and the oceanic countries, New Zealand and Australia. What is the situation with regard to New Zealand and beef imports? In 1969 we imported 28.7 million pounds of beef from New Zealand. This year, with the third quarter complete and statistics for the fourth quarter not yet to hand, we have already exceeded the 1969 total. We are faced with a total of 30 million pounds of beef from New Zealand alone. This gives us some idea of the increase. In fact, last year 7 per cent of the beef consumed in Canada came from Australia or New Zealand. This year it is something in the order of 12 per cent.

I am not particularly objecting to the fact that Canadian producers must meet competition, but I should like to recall the words of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) when he told a recent meeting of the agricultural congress that Canadian agriculture was subsidized to a significantly less degree than that of any other country in the world, including New Zealand and Australia. As the article in the Cattleman said, we must become sharp traders; we must be able to bargain for the rights of our producers. One can readily understand that western Canada is anxious to divert part of its wheat production capacity into the beef industry. For our part we must allow it a market for the products which Canadian farmers and ranchers have decided to raise.

How does this relate to Bill S-4? To explain this perhaps I should read from the proceedings of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. As reported on page 7 of the committee proceedings for November 4, 1970, Mr. J. R. Roy, acting head of the commercial policy division of the Department of External Affairs had this to say when explaining Bill S-4:

This bill is required to put into effect the Canada-New Zealand trade protocol which amends the 1932 trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand. The trade protocol was signed on May 13, 1970, in Wellington by the Prime Minister and the Right Honourable Keith Holyoake, Prime Minister of New Zealand.

We thought our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was attending nightclubs over there, but now we find he signed some important trade agreements which may have repercussions across western Canada particularly. He apparently believes in the theory that all play and no work makes "Pet" a dull boy. Mr. Roy continued:

The protocol does not alter the basic framework governing the conduct of our bilateral trade with New Zealand. However, it does update the present agreement and provides for certain benefits of mutual advantage.

I draw attention to the words "mutual advantage". As I read these committee proceedings, I fail to see the advantage which Canada will derive from this agreement. Mr. Roy continued:

There is a new provision on anti-dumping which will allow Canada to fulfil its obligations under the international anti-dumping code. At the same time it provides for roughly equivalent treatment of Canadian goods by the New Zealand authorities.

Apparently Canada will be able to apply anti-dumping regulations against products coming from New Zealand. Well over three-quarters of the products coming from New Zealand are in the form of meat, lamb and beef—mostly beef. We receive practically all our mutton from New Zealand and there is a fifty-fifty break as between New Zealand and Australia lamb. Can we apply an anti-dumping code against these entries at any time? I doubt it very much. The chairman of the committee asked a question and Mr. Roy replied as follows:

In order to set this matter straight we have requested and obtained a modification to the trade agreement with New Zealand.

Senator Molson then commented:

There is no explanation here of the articles to be amended. For example, article IV and article V of the agreement are deleted. Frequently when legislation is prepared the changes are shown. In this case there are blanks on the explanation side.

Provision of explanations is normally a standard procedure. The effect of changes made is explained on the explanation side of the page. Senator Molson is quite right; Bill S-4 contains no explanatory notes whatever. On the following page, article IV of the GATT arrangements is discussed. Earlier today, a member of the government told us how good GATT was to Canada. I shall not quote his remarks but I wish to draw attention to the following point. Bill S-4 gives the government of New Zealand an opportunity to apply anti-dumping regulations under the GATT agreement to manufactured goods entering that country from Canada. No explanation of the reason has been given in this House, and I fail to see that any explanation was provided during the Senate committee hearings. No assurance was given that similar action could be taken by Canada against commodities, manufactured or otherwise, entering this country from New Zealand.

I invite hon. members to consider the problems facing western Canada agriculture today. One sees a substantial increase in hog production all across western Canada, in the neighbourhood of 70 per cent in the province of Saskatchewan, 26 per cent in Alberta and 23 per cent in Manitoba. One might ask what effect this will have on the price of cattle. It has had a drastic effect on cattle prices, thus compounding the difficulties which Canadian cattlemen face already, quite apart from sharp increases in imports from Australia and New Zealand.

I invite hon. members to read the Washington Farmletter put out by a farm writer, Wayne Darrow. He has this to say about the price of pork in the United States. He writes that because pork prices have fallen so low they have caused a sharp decline in the price of cattle, amounting to 5 cents a pound. I read from the Washington Farmletter of January 8. Hon. members will see that these are current figures.

Not all the damage of the hog glut is reflected in hog price returns. Cattlemen got hurt, too. Choice steer prices at Omaha peaked at $31.48 cwt. the first week in July. Then, although volume of beef kill remained right at 1969 level, price fell to $26.09 in December. Both pork volume and economic sag had a hand in this $5 fall.

New Zealand Trade Agreement Act

This emphasizes that by allowing a surplus of grain to build up in Canada we have brought about a diversion to hog and cattle production. This past year alone, as a result of programs in the province of Saskatchewan the number of cows increased by 86,000 head, and no doubt there was a similar increase in the province of Alberta. This means an increase in cattle herds throughout the country.

Can we sustain an agricultural industry that encourages producers to produce livestock rather than to grow wheat and other commodities that have created a glut? Can we do this by allowing our prices to fall and imports to increase? I repeat that last year in beef alone there was a substantial increase in New Zealand exports to Canada as well as from Australia. Over-all, last year Canada imported something like 7 per cent of all beef consumed in Canada, and this year we have imported something like 12 per cent of all beef consumed in Canada.

With regard to lambs, we have long tried to negotiate with New Zealand and reach an agreement. We have stated that if New Zealand would not export its frozen lamb products to Canada at the same time as Canadian lambs were going to market, we might be able to handle an appreciable amount of New Zealand lamb. Yet repeatedly our market has been hurt substantially by heavy imports of New Zealand lamb at a time when Canadian lambs were going to market. This has had a very depressing effect on price. I am a little reluctant to see Bill S-4 pass when it appears that we are giving New Zealand the right to impose anti-dumping restrictions on Canadian manufactured goods entering their country, while we are not giving ourselves a reciprocal right in regard to the main agricultural imports from New Zealand. Lambs have been an historical problem in the Canadian agricultural market, both as to the timing and the volume of imports.

We should examine this bill very closely and ascertain whether, when the Prime Minister signed the trade agreement on May 13, 1969, he was overtaken by a conciliatory spirit as a result of the hospitality shown him by the New Zealand government. I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo about the New Zealand government being very hospitable to us when we visit their country, yet they are hardly prepared to come here to consult or visit us. The thought has entered my mind that since they have a Labour government in New Zealand, they therefore tend to protect their own market and not be too concerned about their traders. At least, a few years ago they had a Labour government which was not too hospitable to New Zealand's trading neighbours. Since then they may have mended their ways and perhaps become shrewd traders, catching the Prime Minister in a weak moment.

Having said that, I concur with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who stated he could see no reason why this bill should go to the external affairs committee instead of to the committee on trade and commerce. I think this is a very good suggestion since we are dealing here with a country that is almost an equal trading partner with us. If we give them some advantage, we should receive a similar advantage. I say this in view of the concern and the fear being expressed in agricultural circles in western Canada. Since the government is very responsive to fears that are expressed, and perhaps even over-reacts in such matters, I hope it will act normally in this case and refer the bill to the committee on trade and commerce.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate on the debate on this bill for a few moments because I object to the manner in which the government is handling legislation in the House. An agreement has been signed by Canada and New Zealand which, as the Parliamentary Secretary quite properly pointed out, requires ratification by the Parliament of Canada. However, my objection has to do with the fact that we did not hear a single word from the Parliamentary Secretary about some very significant events and developments which have taken place since the agreement was signed. It seems to me that if we are to have any sort of reasonable or sensible debate on the subject of this agreement, it is important that the government give us some information about developments since last May.

As has been pointed out, relations between Canada and New Zealand have not been at their best for some time. Possibly one reason for this is that we both produce similar products, particularly in the field of agriculture, and these products compete with each other. Naturally, this poses some difficulty in reaching a good trading agreement.

However, I think it is important to take note of recent developments, as did the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). Toward the end of last June it became quite clear that a serious situation was developing. There has been a flow of livestock products in both directions between Canada and the United States. Generally, we have seen a greater importation of cattle from the United States to Canada than vice versa. However, we also found there was a fairly heavy movement of cattle or manufactured meat particularly from Australia and New Zealand which was being shipped to the United States via Canada.

This situation reached the stage where toward the end of last June the United States government decided it would have to impose restraints against further shipments in view of the fact that direct shipments from Australia and New Zealand, plus the shipments coming via Canada, were such that there were protests from U.S. farm organizations. As the Globe and Mail of July 17 pointed out, officials were dickering about the duration of the trade suspension, which officials estimated would be two months at the outside. It would be useful to have a further outline from the government as to what actually took place. The Globe and Mail article also noted that the glut of manufactured meat became a threat when the United States called a halt to imports of the Australasian variety by way of Canada.

Then a very important point was made by the Globe and Mail article, which pointed out that about a dozen Canadian dealers, packers, importers and brokers had built up the transshipment of Australasian meat to the United States into a flourishing business. The business has built up to about 50 million pounds annually. It was also noted that the arrangement violated a U.S. program of voluntary restraints on meat imports, with U.S. warnings to Australia, New Zealand and Canadian dealers, and led to a ban order on June 30. When this was protested by Canada, with the suggestion that it be brought in in easy stages, it was pointed out that the United States had reminded Canada of this and that numerous advance warnings had been issued.

It was also pointed out in an article in the Globe and Mail of December 1, that although shipments of Australian and New Zealand beef to Canada had been shut off by U.S. customs officials, there had been evidence that Canadians had been sending in more of its own beef while keeping some of the third country meat. I think this points to the need for a government statement on the situation, if in fact we are to deal with some of the problems that have arisen and if we are to reach the objective of a reasonable and sensible trade arrangement with New Zealand, which I am sure all members in this House would like to see.

The situation I have referred to, and some of the developments over the past several years, are illustrative of the confusion which exists in agricultural industry and agricultural production in Canada. This is illustrated by the fact that last year, I believe for the first time, imports of food into Canada exceeded the value of exports of food. Certainly there is no need for this situation which has resulted solely from government mismanagement and the absence of adequate government policy.

We must avoid some of the problems which have plagued our agricultural industry. We also want to carry on trade with foreign countries, but there is room for further effort to bring about rationalization in respect of the timing of marketing various products, which was referred to by the hon. member for Crowfoot, and in respect of rationalization of production.

I wanted to place on the record our concern about some of the problems which exist. With these few remarks I urge the government to take steps to ensure that in fact the interests of all concerned are adequately protected by arriving at a more sensible solution than appears to have been the case in the past.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say with respect to this bill. First of all, I do not share the views of my friends to the left who express so much fear about the 2,500,000 people of New Zealand. During the war I spent nearly three years with many New Zealanders who were fellow prisoners of war, and I got to know them very well. In 1965 I had the opportunity of visiting that country and formed a good idea of what it can do and what it cannot do.

To suggest that we will be subtly attacked, and that the economy of this country will flounder because of possible changes in our trade patterns with a country of 2½ million people, seems to me a little beyond comprehension. I refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) and the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). New Zealand has a self-contained economy. It has possibly one of the highest tariff walls in the world, in order to encourage its industry. Here in Canada we complain about the unemployment of half a million people. We get very excited about this situation in New Zealand; if 1,000 men are laid off it is a major crisis because the population base is so small.

It seems to me that in the context of the trade pattern and in view of changing circumstances we must do everything we can to contain New Zealand within our family of friends and the family of nations of which we have been part for many years. Of course, trade has to be a two-way street. Frankly, if we shut the door on New Zealand's agricultural products they will not retaliate in respect of manufactured goods. It is not possible within their economic framework.

In the last couple of years there has been an artificial distortion of the facts because Canada was being used as a port of entry to the United States, mainly by Australia. If its people are smart and can find a way to do things, I think that is fine. The United States has little cause to complain, because it would be the first country to avail itself of a similar device if the opportunity was there. The United States has closed the door on New Zealand and Australian beef products which formerly went into the U.S. because Canada had free entry. I deprecate the tendency to economic nationalism that we have witnessed. We spoke about it this afternoon in respect of the United States and Europe.

We should not adopt a dog-in-the-manger attitude with regard to trading arrangements we can make with our sister countries in the Commonwealth. If we feel we can close the door to New Zealand's agricultural products, what do you think will happen in respect of the $30 million worth of manufactured goods we now export to New Zealand? The Japanese are waiting to supply these goods, and Australia is willing to supply them. We will in effect be cutting off our nose to spite our face. It seems to me that if we understand the workings of the anti-dumping code and the necessity to upgrade our agreements with New Zealand, the appropriate explanations will be forthcoming. Now that we have heard informally that an amendment will be made and that this bill will be sent to the Committee on Trade, Finance and Economic Affairs, I am sure all hon. members will envisage better trade relations with New Zealand.

I heartily endorse this agreement. I know that members of the cabinet of that country, wartime friends and acquaintances hope that we will be able to improve our relations with New Zealand. This measure is one way of doing that. I urge the House to adopt the motion.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will require only two or three minutes to complete my remarks. I hope Your Honour will let your eyes glide softly past the clock for that length of time, with the hope that we can complete this debate.

I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) about the reference to committee. The one occasion the Committee on External Affairs delved into economic matters—and I have a great deal of respect for the deliberations of that committee—was an unmitigated disaster. The committee left its natural field and got into matters of United States nationalism. I hope the committee keeps away from this situation in the present case.

As the only member of this House who was born in New Zealand, perhaps I will be permitted to say a word or two on this subject. Having been nourished for the first few years of my life on New Zealand agricultural products, I hope I am a good illustration of their benefits—the mildness and moderation which they engender in the people of New Zealand. To some extent I agree with the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). There are problems in respect of which we must be careful. We must bring these to the attention of the authorities.

I was at a meeting of farmers in the Peace River country some two months ago. Several hundred farmers met to view, with great indignation, the agricultural policies of this government, particularly the unfortunate Farm Products Marketing Act. During the course of that meeting I rediscovered that a fledgling sheep industry was being developed in the north. I conclude what I have to say by placing on the record one paragraph from a letter I received, which I think will indicate my concern with the situation and will draw it to the attention of the authorities. This letter is from the president of the South Peace Sheep Breeders Association. In part it reads:

One concern we have is the importation of lamb from Australia and New Zealand. These countries have built their whole economy around sheep and the environment allows them to raise these sheep in a very economical manner. These importations present the people in the Peace River country who are struggling to develop a new industry with a very difficult competition. This is particularly true if importations are allowed in at the time of our heavy marketing, and we feel that strict import regulations are needed.

I must point out that this is not prohibition but regulation.

We would therefore ask the federal government to conduct a full investigation into the effect imported lamb has on the price of domestic lamb. In this regard we would draw to your attention these specific questions. Why is there an 8 per cent spread between imported lamb and Canadian lamb, the imported being the higher priced product? At times the price spread between Edmonton and Toronto markets appears excessive. We have noted differences as much as 16 cents a pound, and we would like some explanation.

Quite obviously, this bill provides the machinery to do this. I take this opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the authorities and hope that the bill will now pass and be sent to the committee proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have given consideration to the very constructive suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and are prepared to accept the suggestion to change the order of reference of this bill from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I can say from my own experience, having had the honour of piloting the anti-dumping bill through the House and through the finance committee that the members of that committee from all parties are equipped to deal with the matter now before the House. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford):

That the motion be amended to change the reference of the bill from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence Committee to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is the practice of the House to have a written motion. However, with the unanimous consent of the House I think the Chair can change the motion which is before us so that the motion will read that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, rather than to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council whether the government intends to bring in any legislation to assist the economic situation, or are we to follow the rather pedestrian list which we have?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend well knows, the order which has been set for legislation this week. Following the measure just passed will be Bill C-192, the young offenders bill, followed by Bill C-185, in respect of the Crop Insurance Act, followed by Bill C-187, respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, followed by Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act. I do not suppose it is appropriate to make lengthy comment on whether that list of legislation satisfies my friend with regard to the importance of the items therein contained.

Mr. Basford: He should read the editorial in the newspaper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—EFFECT OF CERTAIN BRANDS OF TOOTHPASTE ON TOOTH ENAMEL

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, whether we all have clean hands and a pure heart or not, Canadians do try to clean their teeth quite often, and when I asked a question the other day about abrasive qualities in toothpaste used by Canadians I was not being facetious or loose-lipped. It is very important, considering the dangers inherent in toothpaste as discovered in areas of the United States, that we in Canada know exactly what is the potential for injury in the toothpaste which is used by millions of Canadians.

I have news items here which indicate that three separate organizations in the U.S. have gone into this matter very carefully, the National Academy of Sciences, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the American Dental Association. The findings of these prestigious bodies are quite disturbing. Many of the well known toothpastes on the market, sold by millions of tubes and containers, have qualities which are injurious to the dental health of their users. One news item indicates that there is an abundance of abrasive material in one brand which is injurious to tooth enamel and, therefore, contributes to early decay. Another points out that out of 11 brands which claim to prevent or retard tooth decay, only two have any right to that claim whatsoever, and one is doubtful. The others, they believe, have no efficacious qualities whatsoever in this particular field.

If the U.S. is making such a vigorous assault in this very important area, I say that the mouths of Canadians are important, too. I urge and implore the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and his officials to give the Canadian people reassurance, guidance and suggestion. If people are making false advertising claims and making millions of dollars out of them, something should be done.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and in response to the hon. member's question concerning a recent study by the American Dental Association of the abrasive quality of some brands of toothpaste, I wish to inform the House that the federal government has not to date conducted similar studies although continuing studies are going on regarding other aspects of toothpaste, such as the use of chemical additives and the efficacy and safety of popular toothpaste brands. We are studying the report of the American Dental Association and conducting a survey of Canadian schools of dentistry to determine what action, if any, is required. When this survey is completed, the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be pleased to report to the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT—CONSULTATIONS WITH MANUFACTURERS OF DC-8 ON SPOILERS—EFFECT OF SONIC BOOM

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on December 4, 1970, I asked the following question in the House of Commons:

> Has the government formulated a definite policy in regard to the sonic boom and its effect on Canadian communities in general? If not, what surveys on the problem have been made or are contemplated by the Department of Transport?

You, sir, suggested that the matter be raised at this time. It is obvious that the government cannot long delay a decision on this important matter. Several countries are building and offering for sale supersonic transport planes. There is the joint effort by Britain and France in the building of the Concorde, which has already been test-flown. Russia has also built and tested its TU-144. The United States has been building a supersonic transport model which might be ready for testing in 1972.

It is clear that the technological knowledge to build and fly these planes is now available to the countries of the world. As usual, there has been too little research done on the effects these planes will have on the terrain over which they will fly. This information is required before any sensible decisions about supersonic transport planes can be made. Already the airlines of the world are placing various types of options for supersonic transport planes. These options are not firm orders to buy, but are delivery positions and could be dropped by the various firms with only a small loss involved. However, it indicates that the companies are very interested and will try to incorporate supersonic transport planes in their air fleets.

The problem of noise and the damage it can do is probably the chief obstacle to satisfactory supersonic transport flight. As yet in Canada we have done little to assess this problem. In the United States opposition has been growing to supersonic flights over American territory. Recently, by a vote of 52 to 41 the U.S. Senate rejected a proposed $290 million subsidy for the development of the American supersonic model. A bill has been introduced in the U.S. Senate to prohibit the flight of supersonic transport over United States territory. The rejection of this $290 million subsidy by the U.S. Senate was based on the trouble and damage which sonic boom might cause to the environment. At high altitudes these aircraft could cause a path of sonic boom 60 miles in width. The effect this loud, sudden and frequent thunder-like boom would have on both individuals and animals has not yet been estimated.

There are also economic factors involved. Companies and individuals are interested in the effect that supersonic transport planes will have on air transport costs. Indications are that these will be sharply increased. There is also the serious problem of pollution. Up to the present, tests have indicated that there will be a vast increase in pollution problems at airports and in the upper atmosphere.

It is obvious that in the next three or four years the Canadian government must introduce firm regulations covering supersonic transport. I take this opportunity to urge the minister and his department to press forward with all speed with research on this matter. We have no time to lose. The problem of noise pollution is a major one, not only in Canada but throughout the world. We must ensure that we make no mistakes in this regard in connection with Air Canada and other Canadian air companies when they are placing orders for supersonic air transport planes. If supersonic flight is not to be allowed over Canada, such companies should be told at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) on what appears to be a very sincere interest in the extremely important subject of sonic boom and its effect upon us and our environment.

In addition to the question raised on December 4 concerning definite government policy, I noted that the hon. member asked a related question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) on December 11 regarding the involvement of Air Canada and their future planning on this matter. At that time the minister assured us of the the very constructive discussion which has been held among officials of Air Canada and the Ministry of Transport. This is very encouraging.

The first part of the hon. member's question asked whether a definite policy has been formulated with regard to sonic boom. The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. The government's policy is reflected in the air regulation 515(2) which was promulgated in 1965. It provides as follows:

> No aircraft shall be flown in such a manner as to create a shock-wave the effect of which is to create or likely to create a hazard to other aircraft or to persons or property on the ground.

Where Canadian air space is concerned, this policy is in full effect. Hon. members will recall that the minister has reaffirmed this regulation in recent weeks in reply to questions resulting from the development of giant supersonic aircraft in Britain. Officials of the ministry are following closely the present flight trails of the Anglo-French Concorde and are specifically interested in any facts which may be uncovered by the sonic boom measurement portion of these trials.

The hon. member also referred to surveys on this subject. There is now established an interdepartmental committee on the sonic boom with representation from the departments of Transport, National Defence, National Health and Welfare, the Canadian Wildlife Service, Air Canada and the Canadian Meteorological Service. This committee is attempting to examine the problem of sonic boom from all aspects which appear to have relevance to a Canadian evaluation of the problem.

In addition to this, the Department of Transport has sponsored and is represented on the ICAO sonic boom panel. We are represented by Dr. H. S. Ribner and Dr. I. Glass of the University of Toronto institute for aerospace studies. This panel is composed of technical experts from a number of countries. They have recently completed a 1½ year study of the problem and have submitted to the ICAO air navigation panel their evaluation of the state of knowledge with respect to sonic boom.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—ARGENTIA, NFLD.—REPORT ON EFFECTS OF CLOSING OF UNITED STATES NAVAL STATION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on December 7 I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) the status of the report of the task force appointed by him some time ago to investigate economic conditions in Argentia, Newfoundland, as a result of the phase-down of the United States naval station in that area. The minister replied that the report had been submitted and that some recommendations of the task force had been accepted. The minister referred to the renovation of the Castle Hill project in Placentia, the rebuilding of a road from Long Harbour to the TransCanada highway and the construction of a community stage complex in the Argentia area. The phase-down of the U.S. naval station at Argentia, which imposed very severe hardship on the social and economic life of that area, took place in 1969. It was finalized in February, 1970. It is almost a year since the final lay-off.

The task force was appointed by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in conjunction with his colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), on March 7, 1970. In its report, the task force made a number of recommendations including paving of the road from Long Harbour to the TransCanada highway. They recommended provision of a small boat building and boat repair complex in the Argentia area. They recommended that a community stage be built and that power facilities be provided. They recommended a national historic site referred to as Castle Hill, as well as a few minor jobs involving minor expenditures.

The minister would have us believe, in reply to my question of December 7, that all is well, that the task force has reported, that the recommendations of the task force have been accepted, that work in connection with some of those recommendations has already begun and that as a result there is a real boom in the area. What the minister did not tell the House is that work has started in connection with only one of the projects recommended by the task force—the improvements at the historic site on Castle Hill. This has provided fewer than 50 jobs.

I would point out that the Argentia-Placentia area has a population of more than 7,000 people and a work force in excess of 1,000 of whom, today, approximately 300 are unemployed. We hear figures quoted with regard to unemployment. It is said the national figure is something over 6 per cent. Hon. members should realize that in the area to which I am referring the unemployment rate is something like 30 per cent. The economic situation there has been aggravated by the fact that two or three years ago the government resettled a large number of fishermen and their families in this area. I believe 240 families were moved, probably involving about 1,000 people. This imposed an additional burden on the infrastructure of the area, particularly on the educational facilities.

Centralization is a responsibility of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and I contend that since the movement of people into this area imposed an intolerable burden on the educational facilities, to such an extent that the schools are overcrowded—500 children cannot obtain reasonable accommodation in them—the government has a responsibility to give the school authorities the means of making additional classrooms available to enable these children to get an education. At present, children are taught in the basements of buildings, in parish halls in the area and in other makeshift, temporary quarters.

A number of questions with regard to the Argentia phase-down and the promise by the government to institute a crash program have been unanswered. The Minister of Transport went to Newfoundland in July of 1970 and announced with a great deal of gusto a $2 million program for the area. This was to be a crash program. Seven months later there is very little evidence of the crash program announced by the hon. gentleman. That is typical. A task force was appointed by the government, but it did not take the logical step that should have been taken in a case like this and institute feasibility studies to determine the economic prospects of the area.

I feel this area of Newfoundland has a great future in that a number of industries could, with encouragement from the government and after the proper studies have been carried out beforehand, become viable. The industries of fishing, forestry, mining, tourism and transshipping, to mention but a few, could become viable in this area. I think the government has put the cart before the horse and that it should have initiated studies to determine the economic prospects of the area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the Standing Committee on Regional Development and having had the privilege of visiting the Argentia area last May, I share with the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) his sense of urgency about the need to alleviate conditions there. I do not believe he is correct in saying that the minister wished to convey the impression that there was a boom in the area; quite the contrary.

Before answering him more specifically, I ought to set the record straight with regard to responsibility. In so far as there is federal responsibility in regard to the resettlement program, or centralization program as it may be called, this federal responsibility is carried out by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. But that is a different thing from saying that the responsibility for the program itself is a federal one. This is basically a provincial responsibility; the federal function is to assist.

The task force referred to is a task force agreed to by Canada, the United States, the province of Newfoundland and the Placentia Area Development Association. It is chaired by a senior official of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This task force has made two reports to the federal and provincial governments, in which recommendations were made for projects and measures to be carried out by the bodies represented thereon to alleviate the social conditions and serious loss of employment brought about by the curtailment of operations at the United States naval base at Argentia. I expect that the hon. member is referring to the second of these two reports, which was received by the governments early in December. It is essentially a review of the progress to date, with recommendations for further measures.

As the hon. member knows, in the first report emphasis was placed on short-term measures to be initiated as quickly as possible. The federal government, in July last, accepted the three main project proposals of the task force's first report and agreed to a federal expenditure of $1,625,000 for these three recommended federal projects. These projects are in various stages of construction or initiation, and the hon. member referred to them. Other joint or shared-cost programs to be proceeded with under ARDA were proposed in the first report. One, at least, of these projects has been started, principally the tourist chalet and park at Dunville, to cost $100,000. For these projects the province must submit applications for approval, as it has in several instances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him by the rules of the House has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

POST OFFICE

LABOUR RELATIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43. I base my reason for so doing on the imminent threat of a series of rotating strikes in the Post Office Department similar to those which cost the economy of the country so dearly last spring and summer, and which are now being threatened by the bypassing of the union's national executive in dealing with current issues, in contravention of the minister's pledge when he took over his duties that he would improve labour relations within the department. I therefore move under Standing Order 43:

That the question of labour relations within the Post Office Department be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for investigation and recommendation for correction in the national interest.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity, regretfully I have to advise the hon. member that the motion cannot be put at this time.

NATIONAL PARKS

WOOD BUFFALO—LOGGING WITHOUT REFORESTATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to seek unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and immediate necessity which arises from the report that areas of Wood Buffalo National Park are being stripped of timber at an accelerating rate by logging companies, with no provision for reforestation, thereby doing almost irreparable damage to large areas of the park, which is a complete negation of the whole concept of the national parks trust. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

That immediate steps be taken to repatriate to the public realm all areas of Wood Buffalo National Park alienated under timber lease agreements, and that a program of reforestation be instituted in those areas already logged.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent that the motion be put?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous agreement, the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

LOGGING PRACTICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to deal with a matter under motions. Inasmuch as the government is not interested in repatriating—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should indicate immediately what he has in mind. Under motions he can only have the floor for the purpose of moving a motion under Standing Order 43. If he proposes to do this he should indicate that intention to the Chair immediately. No debate can be allowed on the motion put forward earlier by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I was not seeking to enter into a debate, Mr. Speaker. For the valid and cogent reasons set out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and inasmuch as the government is not prepared to accept that proposal, may I, with the consent of the House, move the following motion under Standing Order 43:

That the subject matter of logging practices in national parks and in particular Wood Buffalo National Park, and government policies with respect thereto, including any agreements or other arrangements which might exist, be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt as to the regularity of the motion proposed by the hon. member. Hon. members must realize that even under the terms of Standing Order 43 a motion before it is put to the House must be in order. I have the impression that the House has expressed its views regarding the matter raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. It may be that this motion is somewhat different from the motion previously proposed by that hon. member, but I thought I should make these remarks to caution hon. members that under Standing Order 43 we should not have a series of motions dealing substantially with the same matter. Having said that, and hon. members having heard the motion to be proposed by the hon. member for Skeena asking that the matter be referred to a committee of the House, I have to inquire whether there is unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that there is not unanimity and therefore the motion cannot be put.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-216, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require that there be no lay-offs of persons employed in federal industries, where a person has been employed for one month, without six months' written notice, and no mass lay-offs of ten or more employees in such industries without six months' written notice.

The bill would recognize the property right of an employee in his job where he has not been guilty of wilful misconduct and would protect this right. There have been many recent examples in industries of mass lay-offs with inadequate notice—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he knows that under the terms of Standing Order 68(2)—would the hon. member kindly resume his seat—he can only give a very succinct explanation. He cannot argue his case. I have the impression he is launching into an argument. He should indicate briefly what the purpose of the bill is and not argue the merits of the bill at this time.

Mr. Brewin: I had come to the last sentence and was going to say that the bill would prevent the consequent disruption of the lives of employees and their families.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SKEENA CONSTITUENCY STATISTICS

Question No. 221—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. What is the population in the constituency of Skeena with an indication of the date upon which such census or estimate was made?

2. What is the population of Indians, by census count or estimate, in the constituency of Skeena with an indication of the date upon which such census or estimate was made?

3. How many (a) male (b) female Indians in the constituency of Skeena have completed (i) grade 10 (ii) grade 12?

4. How many Indians are employed by the federal government in the constituency of Skeena?

5. How many Indians in the constituency of Skeena earn more than $3,600.00 per year?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows: 1. The latest population count available for the Skeena constituency is that of the 1966 Census when the population amounted to 73,682.

2. Statistics maintained in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development indicate that the population of Indians in the Constituency of Skeena as of December 31, 1969 was approximately 13,100.

3. Information is not available on the total number of Indians in the constituency of Skeena who have completed Grade 10 and Grade 12. Records indicate that during the past five years the following number of Indian students have completed grade 10 and 12. (a) (i) 15; (ii) 5. (b) (i) 13; (ii) 6.

4. There are 50 Indians employed in classified positions, and 33 Indians are employed on projects on a casual basis by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

5. It is difficult to provide specific information in this regard. However, according to Survey conducted in 1969, approximately 1,019 Indians earned more than $3,000 of which approximately 720 Indians earned more than $4,000.

PANARCTIC OILS LIMITED—EXPLORATION AND DRILLING

Question No. 277—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Has Panarctic Oils Limited farmed out any of its land to other companies for exploration and drilling purposes and, if so (a) what companies (b) are they foreign or Canadian controlled?

2. What are the specific arrangements agreed to between Panarctic Oils Limited and the companies involved in the farm-out arrangement?

3. Has Panarctic Oils Limited agreed to any arrangements in exploration and drilling on land owned by other companies and, if so (a) what companies (b) are they foreign or Canadian controlled?

ARGENTIA NAVAL BASE

Question No. 498—Mr. Carter:

Has the government made representations to the United States Government with a view to having certain recently vacated buildings, facilities etc. owned by that Government and situated at the Argentia Naval Base made available for use by the Government of Canada, the Newfoundland provincial Government or private interest and, if so, when were representations made and what were the results?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government has not made representations to the United States government on this subject but the matter has been discussed with U.S. officials by representatives of federal and provincial departments. These discussions have not yet indicated that there are any available buildings or facilities which could readily be put to productive use, although further studies of long-term development prospects are being made.

STATUTORY AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT TO URANIUM INDUSTRY

Question No. 592—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the Honourable the Prime Minister state on November 20, 1970 that there was statutory authority to cover the action taken by the government with respect to the Denison Mines and, if so, under which statute was such action taken?

2. Is it the intention of the government to bring in special legislation regarding the foreign ownership and control of the Uranium industry?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices and by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as follows: 1. Presumably the reference in the question to action taken by the government with respect to Denison Mines concerns the declaration on March 2, 1970 of the government's intention to prevent the transfer to non-Canadian hands of control of this company, if necessary by introducing an amendment to the Atomic Energy Control Act to take effect as of that date. On November 20, 1970, addressing the Liberal Policy Convention in Ottawa, the Prime Minister said in part: "We had on our statute books under the constitution the power to do something about the uranium industry because, as you know, it has been declared to be under federal jurisdiction and we had in our statutes something which permitted us to make the decision we did last spring concerning Denison Mines, to prevent the majority of our uranium resources from—the largest part of our uranium resources—from going into foreign control." This statement drew attention to two facts relevant to the government's declared intention: (a) The Atomic Energy Control Act as in force at that time might provide statutory authority for giving effect to the government's intention. (b) If not, the federal government had jurisdiction, as evidenced by that Act, to legislate with respect to the uranium industry.

2. Yes.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that the commissioners for the 1971 census will be appointed under the authority of the Statistics Act by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The answer to the second part of the question is that the commissioners will select, on behalf of the minister, the census takers (enumerators) required in their respective census districts.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In so far as National Energy Board is concerned: 1. PRIMARY DISTRIBUTORS OF GOVERNMENT OF CANADA SECURITIES

Motion No. 11—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a list of (a) the approximately 200 primary distributors of Government of Canada marketable securities, and (b) the primary distributors who are at present eligible to enter into purchase and resale agreements with the Bank of Canada, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 65 and reported in Hansard of December 17, 1969, at page 2067.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move the motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a similar motion during the last session it was explained that publication of these lists as at a certain date could lead to unfair reflection on a firm which happened to be omitted at that particular time, that it could be prejudicial to the banker-client relationship involved and that it was not considered in the public interest to publish the lists requested. In the circumstances, it is hoped that the hon. member will agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS—CORRESPONDENCE PROVIDED BY UNITED STATES ON ANTI-COMBINE MATTERS

Motion No. 14—Mr. Saltsman:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., provided to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs by the United States Justice Department on anti-combines matters related to auto manufacturers and a conspiracy to delay development of anti-smog devices.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): It would not be in the public interest to disclose confidential communications between my department and the United States justice department relative to anti-combines matters because such disclosure would prejudice inquiries in either or both countries. In the circumstances, therefore, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure the hon. member would not like to have his motion withdrawn.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDIES ON IMPACT OF DEFERRED CAPITAL ALLOWANCES, AIR FARE TAXES, ETC.

Motion No. 15—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the studies on the impact of deferred capital allowances, taxes on air fares, speed-ups, in bringing about the final three stages of the Kennedy Round tariff reductions and any other reports, studies, or reviews etc. prepared for the June Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the last spring budget was brought down in March of 1970; the budget to which the motion refers must have been that of June, 1969. In both instances, budget papers were tabled. Other papers, reports, reviews, etc., were internal memoranda prepared by officials for the consideration of ministers. It has not been the practice and is not considered to be in the public interest to make such confidential communications public. In the circumstances, I hope the hon. member will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

STUDY ON EFFECTS OF CANADA-U.S. WAGE PARITY UPON COST STRUCTURE OF CANADIAN AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRIES

Motion No. 19—Mr. Saltsman:

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that in response to his previous motion the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was unable to comply with his request as the study in question is an internal departmental document containing information received in confidence from the industry and therefore cannot be tabled. I would ask the hon. member to kindly reconsider and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by H. R. Kemp on data on subsidiaries in Canada undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year 1966-67, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce hopes that the hon. member will again reconsider his request for this study in view of the circumstances described previously by the minister. The hon. member will recall the minister's response that the consultant had passed away during the time he was commissioned to conduct the study and that the report is in a draft form, he would ask the hon. member to withdraw his request.

Mr. Skoberg: I think that the draft study may contain some information or data regarding subsidiaries in Canada. If that can be provided, I would be satisfied to receive it.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDY OF PERSONS WHO RECEIVED GRANTS UNDER THE MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we think the hon. member for Moose Jaw is prepared to withdraw his motion.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report on Lobbying prepared for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The reply is the same as that given to a nearly identical motion made in the last session. The material is part of a continuing study which was never intended for other than internal use by officials of my department and me. In view of this, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the name of participatory democracy I ask that the question be put.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE REPORT ON APPLICABILITY OF METRIC SYSTEM

Motion No. 109—Mr. Peters:

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I wish to inform the hon. member that the report of the interdepartmental committee is a report to ministers which includes recommendations and is in consequence an internal memorandum and thereby privileged. The white paper on metric conversion tabled last January sets forth the conclusions of the government. In view of this, I wish to repeat my request of January 21 last and ask the hon. member to withdraw his request.

Mr. Peters: Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Motion No. 110—Mr. Peters:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on gold mining operations undertaken in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as mentioned by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and reported in Hansard of January 23, 1970, at page 2738.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the study called for in this motion is an internal working document used by departmental officials for the purpose of investigating the alternative courses of action with respect to extension or termination of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Because of the confidential nature of the document, and in view of the evidence presented to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works during its consideration of Bill C-4, an Act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, I believe the hon. member has indicated his agreement to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the economic study undertaken in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding the development of iron ore deposits on Baffin Island.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has requested a copy of the economic study regarding the development of iron ore deposits on Baffin Island. The material involved has been developed as background for discussions to be held between the federal government and Baffinland Iron Mines Limited to determine the nature of possible federal assistance to the company. As such it would not be in the public interest to release the papers concerned. Under the circumstances I would hope that the hon. member would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my view the public interest calls for the motion to be put.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the motion be put?

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWALS FROM COMMONWEALTH—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister based upon the serious statement reported to have been made by the Prime Minister in Singapore to the effect that if a number of other countries withdraw from the Commonwealth perhaps Canada will also do so to prove its purity. Can the Acting Prime Minister advise if it is Canadian policy to depart from the Commonwealth by reason of the reduction of membership in that organization and, if so, can he advise the number of departees which would be required to prompt such withdrawal action by this country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of this government, and certainly it has been the purpose of the Prime Minister in recent weeks, to reinforce the unity of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, can the House and the country be assured by the government that Canada's membership in organizations in which it once served usefully will not be withdrawn by Prime Ministerial fiat but only after discussion in this parliament?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do hope, and I am sure the hon. member agrees with me, that there will be no withdrawals from the Commonwealth on this occasion but, as the Prime Minister said, if the Commonwealth were to fall apart then I do not think the hon. member would suggest we should remain.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would not be facetious on a matter such as this. Will he repudiate once and for all the egregious nonsense that is reported to have been uttered by the Prime Minister, or is this another step in the erosion of our relations within the Commonwealth?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the most egregious nonsense I read yesterday was a statement by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I now ask the Acting Prime Minister to repudiate this frightful statement which indicates that the government would act without regard to the wishes of the Canadian people in order to bring about the end of the Commonwealth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RUSSIAN NAVAL PENETRATION OF INDIAN OCEAN

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the government's view, when arriving at its policy concerning the supplying of naval arms to South Africa by the United Kingdom, that Soviet naval penetration of the Indian Ocean is of little or no consequence to the political and military balance of the world?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is directing his question in a general way. He is inviting the Acting Prime Minister or the minister speaking on behalf of the government to express an opinion. I would not think that the question as asked is in order. The hon. member may wish to rephrase it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry, Your Honour, if it seemed to be a vague question. I thought it was a direct question. May I put it this way: is it the government's view that the Soviet military penetration of the Indian Ocean is of no consequence to the world's political and military balance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I quite understand the implication of the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Is the hon. gentleman intending to suggest that we should not comply with the Security Council resolution on the supply of arms to South Africa?

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if the Acting Prime Minister is incapable of understanding simple English. Would he answer the question, and not do what his former colleague, Mr. Gardiner, used to do? When he was asked about milk, he would answer about cheese.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED DECENTRALIZATION OF OPERATIONS—SUGGESTED MEETING OF MINISTER AND UNION OFFICIALS—ADJUDICATION OF DISPUTES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General which arises out of statements by the officials of the Letter Carriers Union indicating the possibility of wildcat strikes across the country. In view of the complaint of the union that there has been decentralization in the Post Office without the union being consulted, resulting in actions being taken regarding hours of work, load limits and transportation in violation of the collective agreement, may I ask the minister whether he has had any consultations with the national executive of the Letter Carriers Union? If not, will he undertake to meet with them in order to prevent a repetition of the rotating strikes we experienced last year?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, may I say first that I read the statement which was issued yesterday by the Letter Carriers Union. On the second page I see that they say they do not want repetition of what happened in the May to August, 1970, period. So I think that some newspapers have misinterpreted what the union said.

There have been consultations, Mr. Speaker, on most or all of the items involved, and the department admits that the decentralization of the Post Office administration creates certain problems. Many problems will have to be solved at the local level. I was told that all the decisions that will have a national implication will be discussed or have been discussed at the national level. I therefore feel very sorry that such a statement has been issued, especially when we are trying to bring back confidence in the Post Office and when we are trying to improve service.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, although the minister may feel sorry that the statement has been issued, the fact is that it has been issued and it indicates a very serious situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he is entitled under the rules to ask a supplementary question and he should do so without commenting on the minister's reply.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the very serious charge that has been levelled by the union against the minister's department, may I repeat my request. Will the minister himself undertake to meet with the officials of the union in an endeavour to straighten out the difficulties, which he says he regrets, in order to prevent a repetition of the type of strikes we experienced last year?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have already had many meetings with Union officials, and especially with Mr. Decarie last month. I was surprised that an official communiqué was issued, because we had long meetings. While this communiqué was being issued the president of the association was meeting with the director of personnel. He met with him twice last week, once on Monday and Tuesday of this week. This morning he was in the Deputy Minister's office at 8.30. I have said repeatedly that they are welcome to speak to me any time they wish. There have been certain accusations that the contract between the union and the department has been broken. I am having those accusations reviewed. We will certainly look at them and might have to make corrections. Right now I am asking my officials to give me all available information regarding the matter.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the situation which has arisen in the Post Office and can arise from time to time with respect to alleged violations of existing agreements, does the government propose to set up any machinery to adjudicate on alleged violations of agreements which exist between various departments of government and the employees concerned in order to prevent repetitions of the type of situation which has existed in the Post Office and now threatens to arise again?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the House is very well aware of the most satisfactory services provided by the Public Service Staff Relations Board in this respect. Its task is to adjudicate on matters in dispute between the employees and the employer in the government service.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Since he pledged, when he took over his new duties, that he would do everything in his power to improve employer-employee relations within the Post Office Department and since members of the union's national executive are now reported to be saying that employer-employee relations are considerably worse than they were under his predecessor, will he look into this matter and get it straightened out so that we will not experience serious rotating strikes such as we had last spring and summer?

Mr. Coté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that this matter will be straightened out. I can say that there have never before been so many consultations between department and union officials at the national level and at the local level.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. I wonder if it is not possible for the minister to do something about those people who are marching on Parliament Hill every day? Not only is it extremely cold outside but surely we do not have to have people marching on Parliament Hill every day of the year.

INQUIRY RESPECTING LOAN OBTAINED IN GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Yesterday the minister said that Air Canada had borrowed some 30 and a half million dollars in Great Britain in exchange for Rolls Royce engines. Did the minister try to get back from Britain before the apparently imminent collapse of the Commonwealth 30 and a half million dollars as part repayment of the amount of more than two billion dollars it owes us since the second World War?

REPRESENTATIONS FROM OTTAWA—CARLETON REGIONAL GOVERNMENT RESPECTING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Could the minister tell us if the government, either through him or through the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the National Capital Commission, has received from the government of Ontario, directly or indirectly, representations from the Ottawa-Carleton regional government concerning an upward revision of municipal grants so as to assist in the very serious financial problem that the greater municipality of Ottawa-Carleton is facing?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no such representations have come to my attention.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister say whether the government would be prepared to listen to representations in this regard, since the matter concerns the whole of the national capital area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that the question to some extent is hypothetical in view of the minister's reply.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MEASURES TO RESTRICT ACQUISITION OF WEAPONS BY CRIMINALS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have directed my question to the Minister of Justice but, in his absence I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that our laws to control possession of handguns and concealed weapons have not prevented criminals and so-called urban guerillas from acquiring whole arsenals of deadly weapons, is the government giving consideration to taking further restrictive measures to curb the proliferation of weaponry which is seriously threatening our society?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, answering on behalf of the Minister of Justice, I will take the question as notice.

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN RIVER PROTECTION PERSONNEL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the widespread concern about the conservation and protection of our environment and our resources, can the minister say whether he plans to increase the number of personnel in our river protection services following the drastic reduction of last year?

Mr. Speaker: I would think this question should be placed on the Order Paper, but I may be wrong; perhaps there is an urgency which is not readily apparent. If there is urgency the hon. member might wish to raise the question at the time of the adjournment and have an opportunity to make a longer statement then.

MERCANTILE BANK—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEW ARRANGEMENT RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND INCREASE IN CAPITALIZATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance which in his absence last Monday I asked of the Acting Prime Minister. Would the minister undertake to make a statement on motions to inform the House more fully—I realize a press release has been issued—concerning the new arrangements which he and the governmemnt have made with the Mercantile Bank regarding a fourfold increase in its capitalization and consequently a fourfold increase in the business it may carry on, and requiring that the holdings by the First Citibank of New York—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is making a statement himself. It is my understanding he asked the minister to indicate whether a statement would be made by him. Perhaps the form of the question is a little lengthy.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry it is a little lengthy. I wanted to make sure the minister would deal with all the matters involved in the question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The press release which was tabled in the House explains the situation. It is simply a situation in which the Mercantile Bank is applying for an increase in capital as it is entitled to do under the Bank Act. We, as a government, have indicated we shall not authorize an increase in capital unless they move to a large degree of Canadian ownership and guarantee that this will happen.

Mr. Lewis: I understand the minister is refusing to make a general statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that as soon as the Mercantile Bank reaches the 25 per cent target in foreign ownership it will be able to increase its business without statutory limitation and in view of the fact that 25 per cent ownership would place complete control in the hands of a giant foreign bank, would the minister consider making a statement to the House to explain why it is necessary to expand foreign ownership in so critical an area in Canada as banking?

Mr. Benson: What is really happening is that the last bank in Canada which is owned by foreigners is going to be 75 per cent Canadian-owned ten years from now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the generous and extraordinary provisions accorded to the Mercantile Bank, can the minister indicate what particular benefits are being offered by the bank to Canadians in return?

Mr. Benson: There are no generous benefits at all. Any bank can ask for authorization of an increase in capital. As a matter of fact, no bank has ever been refused such an application by a minister of finance. What is happening here is that rather than merely approve an increase in capital we have asked for a guarantee from the Mercantile Bank that they will move toward 75 per cent Canadian ownership within ten years before they can get it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POST OFFICE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH FORMER EMPLOYEES OF G. LAPALME INCORPORATED

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a question from the hon. Minister of Labour but since he is not here, I shall ask it from the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Post Office Department.

The former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. are still marching in front of the Parliament Buildings today and this has now been going on for several weeks. Would the hon. minister tell the House and the population of Canada how long this is expected to last? Why not come to a satisfactory settlement with this group of taxpayers who are pleading democratically and peacefully for the government's consideration?

Is it necessary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but my impression is that this question was asked yesterday, that it was reiterated a short while ago by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley), and that, moreover, it has been answered by the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REUNITING OF SPOUSES AND IMMEDIATE FAMILIES

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has taken any new action following recent representations about the urgent need to reunify spouses and immediate families? I should also like to ask whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has replied to requests arising from the recent events in Poland?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The government has been actively engaged in trying to reunite Canadians with their families from eastern Europe. We have never given up in our efforts. We continue on almost a daily and weekly basis. We are now looking at the situation in Poland to see whether there is anything useful we can do.

ALLEGED BLACKMAILING TACTICS AGAINST FORMER CZECHOSLOVAKS NOW RESIDING IN CANADA

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the blackmailing tactics used on Czechoslovaks who came to this country after the insurrection there have come to his attention and whether his department is taking any action to assist these people in the face of these blackmailing tactics by the government of that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I take it the hon. member is referring to some recent letters which have come from Czechoslovakia. Tonight in Toronto a meeting is being held at which a number of government officials will be meeting with members of the Czechoslovak-Canadian community to discuss the best way of dealing with this situation. I can assure the hon. member we have this very actively in hand.

Can the hon. gentleman inform the House and the country as to the state of the negotiations between the various unions and the Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): If the hon. member is referring to the Canadian Lake Carriers Association and the dispute with the Seafarers' International Union, I have some information on that subject. G. R. Doucet, the conciliation officer in this dispute, has just wired to say that an agreement was reached between the parties at 5.30 a.m. this morning. Details of the settlement are to follow.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—AMOUNT OF PAYMENTS FOR FORAGE

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): My question is addressed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Has the government any other forage program than the one under Lift and how much money does the government estimate will be spent for forage development under the Lift program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I do not have a complete statistical breakdown concerning the amount of forage applied for under Lift and the payments which will be made under that program, although preliminary indications are that it will be fairly close to the original target figure. The earlier part of the hon. member's question may refer to the future plans which were indicated in the proposals tabled in the House on October 28. I presume he has those clearly in mind.

Mr. Horner: What was the earlier target figure for the forage part of Lift?

Mr. Lang: We spoke of about two million acres.

Mr. Horner: I rise on a question of privilege. The minister has given figures at this time and at other times in the House of Commons with regard to forage expenditure under Lift and the total expenditure under Lift. In a recent article in a magazine issued in January, 1971, in the course of a question and answer series he stated categorically that there would be $80 million paid under Lift in respect of wheat and $40 million in respect of forage.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bring it to the attention of the hon. member that though he may have a point of debate with the minister as to what the facts are I doubt very much that this can be considered a question of privilege. It is essentially a matter of debate and I do not think it can be raised now as a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order concerning my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister has on different occasions stated what would probably be paid in connection with the forage part of Lift and on one occasion in January of this year, as found in the magazine to which I have referred, he stated that $40 million would be paid under Lift. This is a direct deception, a deliberate—

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the announcement that the CNR intends to remove trains Nos. 7 and 8 as of January 31, will the minister provide an opportunity for the users of these services to be heard at a public hearing before the removal of these passenger trains is permitted?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows that the decision as to a public hearing or no is not one for the minister to make. However, I did indicate to the House some time ago the communication that I had received from the Canadian Transport Commission to the effect that there would be no train withdrawals without a public hearing, and I assume that that will apply in this case.

Mr. Peters: In view of the fact that the general manager has now circulated to members concerned the new train schedule, will the minister look into the matter and see that the decision of the board is implemented in the form of a hearing?

REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF OTTAWA EMPLOYEES—UNION REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and has to do with the orders that have been issued for a reduction in the work force in Ottawa of airline employees to the extent of 33 per cent. Representations have been made by the airline employees. Indeed, a series of questions have been asked by them which appear to be reasonable and ought to be answered. Have they made a request to the minister, in whom they have a great deal of trust, to meet with the minister so that they may secure from him the answers to these ten questions and others? This would do a great deal for the morale of the employees—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman has asked a question and I am sure the minister is prepared to reply to it at this time.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as a result of earlier questions on this or a related subject posed, I believe, by the hon. member for York South, I got in touch with Air Canada subsequent to yesterday afternoon's session. In the first instance I was advised that they are meeting with the union, today, I believe. I also asked the officials of Air Canada to meet with me on Monday of next week so I may at least have a full briefing in preparation for the statement that I undertook to make as early as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think that indicates that the statement I was about to make has some basis in fact, namely, that the members of the union want a meeting with the minister. They want to talk with him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister whether he would so meet them.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate that the right hon. gentleman has a supplementary, and I observe that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings also has a supplementary. However, I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that we will shortly be running out of time, and I count on their co-operation. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I now ask the minister whether, in order to assist in keeping up the morale of the airline employees, he himself will meet them? They do not want to meet with the officials of Air Canada because they get no consideration from them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister will not answer.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think I got the gist of the question. I would be very pleased to meet with any group that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking the minister to meet with the union.

Mr. Jamieson: I wish the right hon. gentleman would let me answer his question because I would be glad to. I said I would be happy to meet with any group, but the question is whether it would be more appropriate, as I indicated earlier, for them to meet with the company first. To this moment, to my own personal knowledge I have not had a request for a meeting with the union. It may have reached my office but it has not reached me.

Could he say whether the Department of Labour is now dealing with the problem created by the conflict between the longshoremen in Montreal harbour and their employer? If so, is he expecting an early agreement between the two parties?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that our expert mediator, Mr. Charles Poirier, has sent me a communication to the effect that union and management representatives met this morning in the Department of Labour office and that as a result of Mr. Poirier's mediation, the employees are now going back to work.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the manpower office in Sydney is making its services available in the most effective way possible to those people who seek them.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister has already dealt with this question but I would be happy to bring it to his attention again.

Can the minister also at the same time supply the House with the number of those who have applied for training and the number of those who have been rejected?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that statistical information of this type ought normally to be given the House by way of a written reply to a question. Perhaps the hon. member would consider putting the question on the order paper.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. So are you. My question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerns a gentleman by the name of Abbie Hoffman. Can the minister explain on what grounds Abbie Hoffman was barred from entering Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hate to inject myself into this exchange and I also have some hesitancy in speaking about an individual case, but perhaps I should say that so far as I know Mr. Hoffman has not presented himself for entry at this moment in time. As a result, he has not been barred. If, of course, he does present himself, the normal procedures will follow.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I realize he is not the type that we want in Canada, but I just want to know whether, if there has been such a decision, it indicates a change in government policy.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the continued protest of the Vancouver Parks Board against the granting of a lease to the Four Seasons Hotel because such a project would destroy a great part of the beauty of the approach to internationally known Stanley Park, what action is the government taking in regard to approving or refusing the lease?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am going to have to insist that the delightful hon. member—

Mr. Baldwin: Also irresistible.

Mr. Jamieson: —revert to her former status, because I cannot even hear what she is saying.

Mrs. MacInnis: As soon as hon. members simmer down, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: In view of the continued protests of the Vancouver Parks Board against the granting of a lease to the Four Seasons Hotel, because such a project would destroy a great part of the beauty of the approach to the internationally known Stanley Park, what action is the government taking in regard to approving or refusing the lease?

My question concerns the forage program for 1971-72. Does the minister propose to go forward with the program for 1971-72 and, if so, will it be tied to wheat acreage reduction as it was in 1970?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, formal announcement of the program will be made after a final decision has been taken. YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISIONS DEALING WITH CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Sollicitor General) moved that Bill C-192, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my duty today to submit for second reading a very important bill. It concerns young persons, those who need special assistance and protection from society. Our young people represent our future generations, the fate of our country depends on them. The Juvenile Delinquents Act has been in substantially the same form since 1929, and it may no longer reflect a number of contemporary concerns.

The recommendations for reform of the Act have required a great deal of effort and careful reflection, which explains why it is only in 1971 that the necessary amendments are brought before the House.

[English]

Before I outline the policy of Bill C-192 I wish to pay tribute to the work of my predecessor the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. McIlraith). Many years and much expertise has gone into this bill, but it was the efforts of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre which resulted in the bill being put in final form and introduced here on November 16, 1970. My colleagues I am sure will want to join me in applauding the hon. member's decision to carry on as a Member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Goyer: In this way Canadians will be able to continue to take advantage of his parliamentary experience and they are not likely to forget the services he has rendered to this country throughout the years, not only as a conscientious Member of Parliament but also as a minister holding different portfolios.

[Translation]

In outlining the research and work in preparation for this bill, I will mention only a few of the stages through which it has passed.

On November 6, 1961, a Department of Justice committee was set up to study the problem of juvenile delinquency in Canada; the committee's report was tabled in Parliament on February 7, 1966. The implementation of its recommendations required consultation with the provinces and a Federal-Provincial Conference was held in Ottawa in January, 1968.

It became clear from the beginning that provincial delegates would have to examine the proposed Bill in light of their existing social legislation and administrative structures. Cooperation was required to arrive at acceptable compromises.

One of the main problems was that of the maximum age limit for jurisdiction; another was the kind of offence to be dealt with under the proposed legislation.

As stated in the brief submitted to the Justice Department committee by the Canadian Corrections Association (now known as the Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association) the existing Act created > a new kind of all-encompassing offence, that of "delinquency". This is an offence unknown at common law. No matter how a child is before a juvenile court, he can be tried and found to be in a state of delinquency. No legal distinction is made, between the young person who has committed a serious crime like armed robbery, and one guilty of an offence under municipal by-law, such as riding a bicycle without a licence.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to read this quotation because representative of the attitude of a number of public bodies to the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and emphasize the need for the reforms proposed in this bill. On this point, I should also point out that delegates from all provinces agreed that offences under provincial or municipal legislation should no longer be dealt with under federal law. The Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is in effect criminal legislation, should be applied only to clearly defined offences. Nevertheless, unanimity could not be achieved on all the proposed reforms, and some compromise solutions had to be adopted in order to win approval by a majority of the delegates. Consequently, and I wish to make this clear right from the beginning, the bill which I am submitting to you today for second reading is certainly not perfect. It does however ensure greater homogeneity in the treatment of young people appearing before courts across the country, and it does uphold certain provisions which attempt to eliminate, as far as is possible, arbitrary treatment.

As I have already said, the Juvenile Delinquents Act has not been changed significantly since 1929. However, during this long period of forty-two years, provincial and municipal legislation has evolved in varying degrees in the general direction of greater precision, and often of greater severity in the matter of penalties. More precisely, what was in the past considered only a form of nuisance, to be controlled through the informal means existing within the framework of a given community, is now treated as an infraction or an offence.

This phenomenon is all the more serious since minors are not tried in the area in which they live, but before a court having jurisdiction in the district where the offence was committed. Furthermore, since the definition of a juvenile is not uniform in all the provinces of Canada, a delinquent who is considered a juvenile according to law in one province may be tried as an adult in the neighbouring province, where the Juvenile Delinquents Act applies only to those under sixteen years of age.

It is obvious that such inconsistencies are unacceptable and contrary to the concept of justice.

Allow me to quote here Jean Chazal, a juvenile court judge who by his writings as well as his social action was successful in humanizing justice.

> We are convinced, that judges can only hand down judgments in cases where an offence has actually been committed. This is the most important guarantee against arbitrary prosecution... It is essential to understand in depth the personality of the child appearing before a juvenile court. This knowledge determines what action should be taken. But the offence does not lose its importance thereby. It is only possible to decide whether a juvenile delinquent should be punished or retrained if the offence of which he is accused has been established in fact and defined in law. A juvenile court judge has no right to transform into a delinquent, a minor whose material guilt has not been established, for the purpose of retraining him. We earnestly hope that juvenile court judges will have power to order educative measures for children in danger of becoming delinquents, but if he tries to teach a child by burdening him with even a minor offence, without having gathered sufficient proof, the judge is taking arbitrary action which in our opinion cannot in any way be justified. Moreover, for the juvenile court judge, the offence has not only legal, but also undeniable psychological importance. It often reveals tendencies in the child's character and can only indicate his intellectual level.

Judge Chazal's text, particularly the paragraph which I just read to you, is all the more important in that it conforms with my view that juvenile laws should not limit the power of judges dealing with children, but rather help them better accomplish an extremely difficult task.

In fact, applying the same law to both the case of an alleged juvenile delinquent because of an offence against municipal laws, for example remaining too long in a car parked under a particularly romantic moon in a park, and that of a young person who has just committed a burglary, is placing a difficult burden on the judge and more important it imposes a federal record on the young person in both instances.

The same philosophy also underlies the second major reform in the proposed legislation, that which deals with the definitions of offences proposed in the bill.

According to section 2, subsection (h) of the present Juvenile Delinquents Act, and I quote:

> "juvenile delinquent" means any child who violates any provision of the Criminal Code or of any Dominion or provincial statute, or of any by-law or ordinance of any municipality, or who is guilty of sexual immorality or any similar form of vice, or who is liable by reason of any other act to be committed to an industrial school or juvenile reformatory under the provisions of any Dominion or provincial statute.

In other words, the act authorizes proceedings for delinquencies as poorly defined as "sexual immorality or any similar form of vice" and "any other act".

In contrast, in clause 2, subclause (m), the proposed new legislation clearly defines the meaning of the term "offence" as follows:

> "offence" means an offence created by an act of the Parliament of Canada or by an ordinance, rule, order, regulation or by-law made thereunder or a criminal contempt of court other than in the face of the court.

This indicates clearly that the bill is exclusively concerned with federal offences.

The third element in the proposed legislation which I consider basic in comparison with that now in effect, and which also reflects its philosophy, is that of the age limit. As we have just seen, the present definition of juvenile delinquent is to be replaced by the definition in the act of the "offence", while "child" is defined as:

> a person apparently or actually under the age of seventeen years, or a person apparently or actually under the age of eighteen years to whom a proclamation under section 3 applies.

The following would be the definition of "young person", that is the one against whom an offence is alleged:

> "Young person" means a child apparently or actually ten years of age or more and, where the context requires, includes a person who is found, under section 29, to have committed an offence, until he reaches the age of twenty-one years.

In short, those definitions which describe the young person as a juvenile delinquent have been removed. This shows the intention on the part of the legislator to remove the stigma of some traditional concepts and also to change the application of federal legislation regarding the age limit.

Fourthly, I should like to emphasize that the proposed legislation is intended to encourage the development of social rehabilitation rather than exclusively legal procedures for the treatment of young people who have been found to have committed offences.

Since the protection of children and young persons, or in other words social legislation, is a matter of provincial rather than federal jurisdiction, it is obvious that the federal government does not legislate in that area. Nevertheless, it is of paramount importance that we should draw attention to the following passage from clause 30:

> Where a judge makes a finding that a young person committed an offence, he shall consider the predisposition report, if any, made under section 35 and any other relevant and material information, and he may then make any one of the following dispositions, or any number thereof that are consistent with each other.

In the same clause we also find:

> Where he is of the opinion that the evidence shows that it would be in the best interest of the young person to proceed under a provincial act intended for the protection or benefit of children or young persons, he may discharge the young person

(i) in order that the case may proceed instead under that act, or

(ii) in order to proceed himself under that Act if he has jurisdiction thereunder.

In my opinion, these sections are very important tools, so that court judges in juvenile court are able to choose the act under which they consider it desirable to proceed, even in cases where an offence has been established. This clause clearly shows the desire on the part of the government that young persons should have available social and educational measures for their rehabilitation. This is a far cry from the strict application of punitive justice.

Unlike the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the proposed legislation offers a procedural framework with clearly defined limits. It is a question of protecting the interests of the young person and at the same time of providing him with all necessary legal safeguards.

In the traditional scheme of things, the juvenile was considered incapable of understanding his real interest, and for this reason the act did not confer upon him the formal protection enjoyed by offenders tried in other courts. The new act, therefore, is more in line with the present change in the attitude of the authorities towards young people. Paternalistic and authoritarian theories are being abandoned and an attempt is being made to develop a greater sense of individual responsibility among young people and even children.

This sense of responsiblity, however, cannot be developed unless the individual is brought to a full awareness of his duties and responsiblities towards society and of the protection in the form of certain basic guarantees which society owes him in return.

Since at this stage I cannot possibly provide a detailed review of the procedural framework proposed, I shall simply comment on it in broad outline, placing particular emphasis upon the more obvious effects of the innovations.

The proposed legislation authorizes the young person, if he indicates his intention to admit the offence, to have the disposition imposed in the jurisdiction where he resides. This right likewise applies to the choice of judicial district within a given province.

It is in fact laid down in sub-clauses (1) and (2) of clause 22 that the young person may claim this right in the case of all offences with the exception of those mentioned in subsection (2) of section 413 of the Criminal Code relating to treason, inciting to mutiny, sedition, piracy or murder. This is one of a group of rights all aimed at ensuring assistance from his community for a young person appearing before a judge.

The new legislation includes the stipulation that the judge, justice or clerk of the court shall not issue a warrant unless he has reasonable and probable ground to believe that it is necessary in the public interest to issue a warrant rather than a summons. This measure is obviously aimed at limiting the number of arrests ordered by the court.

The warrant as well as the summons is to include a statement of the alleged offence and a notice that the young person to whom it is directed is entitled to representation by counsel of his own choosing. Furthermore, the court must not accept an admission of an offence alleged in an information laid against a young person unless he is assisted by counsel or a parent or some adult who in the opinion of the judge is capable of advising the young person.

One of the legislation's most important innovations is undoubtedly its intention to relieve certain young offenders from a court appearance or from any formal proceedings. Clause 23 in fact authorizes the judge to designate a person to confer with the person who laid the information with a view to disposal of the case without a hearing.

However, this procedure may be adopted only on condition that the attorney general of the province has no objection. The clause provides that the person designated must draw up and present written recommendations before the expiration of two months; such an informal adjustment prevents the institution of new proceedings for the particular offence, once the judge has ordered acceptance of a recommendation for informal adjustment.

This is indisputably a course which would enable social welfare and child protection agencies centralized at regional level, as advocated by a number of people including Judge Marcel Trahan of the Montreal Social Welfare Court, to co-operate with the magistrates in seeking adjustment of all cases where the formal appearance of the young person is not necessary or desirable. In other words, officers of the regional social services would co-operate with the judges and relieve congestion in the courts by eliminating certain appearances.

At this point we should focus on the other aspect of the proposed legislation—that of its flexibility with respect to the legal handling of different types of cases. In each alternative mentioned, the law in addition protects the young person's rights by ensuring mandatory assistance from his family counsel or some other trustworthy person.

When we adopt the precise rules of procedure as for adults and the same right of appeal we clearly demonstrate the important role of juvenile courts and equal status is conferred on the juvenile court judge with that of other judges.

To end this brief description of the protection of the rights of juveniles under the previous act, I would like to mention that, under the new bill, a representative of the information media has the right, except in certain instances, to attend a hearing.

He is chosen by the judge who may also authorize the presence of one or two other representatives chosen by him. Newspapermen will not however have the right to publish any account which might lead to the identification of the child in question and result in future suffering. Their presence at the hearing is an additional guarantee of the young person's rights before the court.

I fully realize that this proposition may infringe on the freedom of the press. On the other hand, it would be irresponsible on our part not to take into account another right, that of the adolescent not to carry a stigma for the rest of his life. Is there a better solution? I urge newspapermen who might have suggestions in this regard to pass them along to and discuss them with the members of the parliamentary committee.

It is obvious that the measures aimed at protecting the young person's rights before the law are not in themselves sufficient to ensure treatment in accordance with his needs. This treatment will depend on the judge's decision. At this point the crucial question arises: Is he to decide on the basis of the offence or in terms of the total situation of the young person and his personality? The present act stipulates that: "Where a child is adjudged to have committed a delinquency he shall be dealt with, not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help and guidance and proper supervision." This already shows the concern of the federal government to take account of the conditions under which the child lives. The proposed legislation clearly implies that we must go beyond that basic consideration and it defines the forms of help that the judge should require from parents and probation officers before deciding on the appropriate disposition.

When a summons is issued to a young person or when he is arrested, the parents must be advised of their obligation to appear with him and if they are not present they can be found in contempt of court. Furthermore the clerk must notify a probation officer assigned to the court within a reasonable time so that he may be present in court.

This does not mean that the judge must in all cases have a pre-disposition report, but it does constitute a formal recognition of the importance of the probation officers assistance. In all cases where consideration is given to ordering transfer of a young person over fourteen to a criminal court, a probation order is mandatory. The judge must, prior to making an order for transfer, and I quote from the bill:

> cause an investigation to be conducted under his supervision into the background of the young person and the circumstances of the alleged offence, and for the purposes thereof, he may order any social, medical, psychological or psychiatric examination or inquiry that he thinks desirable.

Thus Bill C-192 lays the foundation for applying progressive theories according to which, once the gravity of the offence has been established and evaluated, treatment should not only relate to the seriousness of the offence, but also and above all to the personality and environment of the young person before the court.

The terms of the disposition provided in the bill aim at forging closer links between criminal justice properly so called and social laws protecting children and young people, as formulated and administered by the provinces. This collaboration is indispensable, as it forms the basis for a concerted action regarding the restructuring of intake, education and treatment services.

In this connection, it should be noted that in carrying out the educational or punitive treatment imposed, the same concern for the protection of the young person's rights in establishing certain procedures relating to the hearing of the case, is shown.

The judge after considering the pre-disposition report, determines the maximum time during which a young person may be removed from his home. However, it is open to the provincial authorities to release him earlier, should they think it advisable. On the the other hand if he has not become rehabilitated within the time fixed by the judge, the young person should be detained under provincial law as a social welfare measure.

This legislation looks to the needs of the young persons while not losing sight of their right to just treatment. Nevertheless the proposals will be carefully considered in committee and amendments may be made, since this is its duty.

Furthermore, it is obvious that the effects of the proposed new legislation can only be judged after it has been in force for some time, and even then, not only in a general way, but also in terms of each province; the effects will vary from province to province because their social and legal services may be at differing stages of development.

In other words, although the aim of Bill C-192 is to offer a young person better protection of his legal rights, it is probable that such protection can be fully assured only insofar as provincial structures are standardized at the same time. This observation also applies to all the reforms relating to concurrent penal and social authorities.

The provinces must be concerned with this problem and I would like to offer them assistance and encouragement to define their thoughts on the role of their probation offices or foster and treatment institutions, from the welfare or legal point of view. If such dialogue is established progress will be made towards uniformity in distribution and application of funds. This is our hope.

Now, one of the objectives of Bill C-192 is to ensure that all young offenders receive like treatment; to attain this goal, reforms other than just legislative or federal ones must be made.

The philosophy underlying Bill C-192 is that the imposition of penalties for their deterrent effect alone may not work nor should penalties be imposed for pre-delinquent or quasi-delinquent behaviour. By the proposed legislation we are therefore undertaking to cease stigmatizing deviant, but non-criminal behaviour in young persons and to recognize only offences for which penalties are imposed when committed by adults.

It is all the more unrealistic, then, to consider that criminal law should or could control the wave of pre-delinquent or quasi-delinquent behaviour.

In short, and it is on this general observation I wish to conclude, Bill C-192 is only a legal framework for the treatment of a proportion of young persons in need of protection and supervision, but this framework must be complemented by the formulation of social measures for which responsibility lies with the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, since these are my first words spoken in the chamber in the new year, may I extend to you and to all members of the House best wishes for 1971. I join in the remarks of the minister who has just spoken concerning the long association that many of us have enjoyed with the former solicitor general. We shall miss him in that capacity. I am happy that he is still a Member of Parliament. I trust that he will give some guidance to the department and to the government on these questions. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the new minister, a young lawyer. He has accepted a portfolio which gives great scope for reform, and especially for reform affecting our young people.

Having said that, I am sorry that I cannot be as optimistic as the minister was in his speech. Before this debate ends I hope that he will read the bill thoroughly. His knowledge of it should extend beyond the facts contained in the department's brief to the government. When I have finished speaking I intend, on behalf of my party, to move a motion. That is how serious we think this bill is. At the outset, may I say that I have examined the bill carefully. I have received letters from various academics of universities, from lawyers, professors, psychologists, psychiatrists, and from people engaged in social welfare work. Of course, all of us received the brief from the Canadian Mental Health Association. None of the people I have mentioned are very happy about this bill.

Let me say at the outset that I hope to be able to prove and to document very carefully the argument I am about to present. In my opinion—and these are hard words—this bill will continue in force those sections of the Criminal Code dealing with the conviction of persons seven years of age and over. I think I ought to put the relevant sections onto the record. Section 12 of the Criminal Code reads:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was under the age of seven years.

I shall have something to say about that section in a moment. I tried to move an amendment to that part of the code, but it was talked out by various members of the Liberal party, I think at the suggestion of the former solicitor general. Section 13 reads:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was seven years of age or more, but under the age of fourteen years, unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct and to appreciate that it was wrong.

I had hoped that the bill would have done something to amend these sections. The new bill is most archaic. It is the most punitive, enslaving, vicious and tyrannical piece of legislation that has ever come out of the legislative grist mill. Professors, academics from across the country and members of welfare organizations came to my home because they knew I was to take part in this debate. What they said substantiates what I have said about this bill.

At this time many of our people are unemployed. Many university graduates and college students cannot get jobs. With that in mind, surely the government could have come forward with a better bill than this. Let us see what some people are saying about the bill. First of all, may I read a letter that comes from my home city. It is from Professor Frost of the Faculty of Education, Department of Educational Psychology. He says:

> Dear Mr. Woolliams,
> Re: The Young Offenders Act, 1970
> Because the juvenile courts, which have jurisdiction over children aged 10-17 need many choices open to them and maximum flexibility in order to make decisions that consider the total needs of the child who is before the court:
> I support the recommendations of the CELDIC Report,—

I will refer to this later. I continue:

> —"One Million Children" that the services of health, education, welfare and corrections should not segregate a child but should, wherever possible, provide help to his family, his school and within his own community;
> I oppose the Young Offenders Act—

That is what Dr. B. P. Frost, Associate Professor and Head of the Division of Clinical Diagnosis and Special Education says. I continue reading:

> I oppose the Young Offenders Act because it is designed to segregate the child who breaks the law. It deals only with his behavior and does not consider his total needs nor his resources. It is inflexible and legalistic and it severely limits the discretion of the judge and the supporting staff and agencies that he calls upon to help the child.
> In effect, the Young Offenders Bill is a Criminal Code for children.

We are bringing in a new Criminal Code for children. That is what the government is bringing forward at a time when there are so many young people unemployed that we shall see a crime wave, which may have already begun, more serious than any we have seen since the 1930's. The letter continues:

> I urge you as my Member of Parliament to oppose this new bill, the Young Offenders Act, and to recommend that, in the interests of the children of Canada, the Bill be returned to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—

This bill will go to that committee only under certain conditions, if I have anything to do with it. Of course, the government has an overwhelming majority in the House and after the bill has been discussed for second reading, it will be sent to the committee. We know what is likely to happen. The committee is chaired by a government supporter, and the majority of committee members are also government supporters. Except for a few innocuous amendments, this bill will be presented almost unchanged for third reading. If I have any power to do so, I shall see that the bill as it now stands will never reach the committee. I intend to move a motion so that when the bill, after some changes, reaches the committee, it can be discussed intelligently, in order that we may do something beneficial for the greatest resource of Canada, our youth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The letter ends by saying:

> I urge you as my Member of Parliament to oppose this new bill, the Young Offenders Act, and to recommend that, in the interests of the children of Canada, the Bill be returned to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for revision and that in this process opportunity is provided for public submissions and discussion before the Bill, in amended form, comes again before the House.

If the bill reaches the committee, the government may treat it as it treated the federal court bill. The committee will not want to hear witnesses. They will say, "We will hear two or three witnesses, and then we will wrap it up." The committee certainly will try to wrap it up.

Let us see what other people say about the bill. I have here another letter from another man. I asked him to come to my office in Calgary. I said, "Let us organize a meeting." After that about 30 people came to my home; approximately 15 or 16 of them were academics representing various social agencies of the city. Others were young lawyers. After studying the act they characterized it with the words I used earlier. That is where they were first suggested to me, actually. May I point out that many of our young lawyers wish to help our young men and women who are involved with penal institutions. Here, in this bill, we talk about training schools, yet there are not enough training schools in the country to meet the need.

You know, Mr. Speaker, this is a government of "highs". We have high unemployment and the highest murder rate we have ever had. As a result of drugs and other problems, we have the highest number of young people ever incarcerated in our penal institutions. That is another high. Let us take a look now at what Professor Price from Queen's University has to say. I want to prove this case, since I have used language as strong as I have used. The minister has read out a little essay written by his staff but it is time we exploded the impression contained in it. I am here this afternoon to explode what I think amounts to a complete deception and to emphasize that the act we are dealing with represents a backward step. This is what Professor Price has to say:

Dear Mr. Woolliams,

You may remember that we met at the conference this Spring of the Ontario Association of Corrections and Criminology at Cedar Glen. I understand that you are the critic of the Progressive Conservative Party on matters relating to criminal justice and corrections, and it is in this connection that I am writing to you.

As you know, Bill C-192, the proposed new Young Offenders Act, was given first reading in the House this past week. I am writing to urge that this bill be referred to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee. I perhaps should mention at this point that I served as Secretary to the Department of Justice Committee on Juvenile Delinquency, and was the principal author of its report entitled "Juvenile Delinquency in Canada". The proposed new legislation has its origins in that report.

I think it is most important that interested groups and individuals have an opportunity to make formal submissions in the manner in which Committee hearings would permit. In my view, legislation of this importance should not be enacted without full public hearings.

Apart from the general matter of principle, I would suggest that there is a particular reason why this bill should be referred to the committee. Recently I made a tour to a number of cities in Western Canada in connection with a study that I am doing of The Canadian Law of Criminal Correction. I heard quite a number of complaints that interested groups, such as Juvenile Court Judges and Probation Departments, had not been consulted in connection with the draft Children and Young Persons Act.

I pause there. Wherever you go in this country you find that the government, or the Department of the Solicitor General did not consult with the provinces, did not consult with the agencies which are doing this work and who understand the psychological problems of young people who run afoul of the law. This is why the writer of this letter says there must be a full hearing. I know why this bill is before us in its present form. I read in the newspapers that the government was so busy getting the public order legislation drafted that they only had a small amount of legislation ready. This bill happened to be one that was ready for Teddy, and here it is.

Professor Price continues:

Some that had been consulted wanted a further opportunity to follow up an initial brief contact. Apparently the Government of Canada was careful to consult with the provincial governments as such but many of the provincial governments took a very narrow approach—

I do not need to read any more of that. Let us see what the provinces are saying. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of November 18. Ontario took the same position as we are taking out in Alberta.

Two Ontario cabinet ministers attacked the federal government's proposed Young Offenders' Act Tuesday, saying it had tremendous implications for the provinces.

The bill introduced in Parliament Monday, suggests that "juvenile delinquency" be abolished as a special criminal status. It also would repeal the federal Juvenile Delinquent Act.

It defines a young offender as a youth between 10 and 21 years of age. At the same time it raises by one year in seven provinces the maximum age of children to be tried in family courts rather than in ordinary criminal courts.

One of the ministers went on to say he doubted whether Ottawa would help finance the extra training schools which would be needed if the bill were passed. The responsibility for creating the training schools is being thrust on the provincial governments without any commitment being made for their financing by the federal government. This is typical.

Now, take a look at what the Canadian Mental Health Association has to say about this bill. They use some pretty strong language, too. They say the bill is, in fact, "a Criminal Code for children". I would think that in 1971 we could do something better that that. The Association describes the bill as being "distasteful in its terminology, legalistic in its approach and punitive in its effect."

I intend to deal with some of the clauses, and with one of them in particular. Suppose a child aged 11 or 12 had, in some circumstances, committed murder. What would happen to him under the terms of this bill? It is so easy, under this bill. A child can come forward and say: "I am guilty". There is a clause which says you do not have to plead. You say "I am guilty of all this". However, if an offender were found guilty he would go to a training school until he was 21, with this offence hanging over him all the time. Then, at 21 he would be brought before a court like an adult under part 17 of the Code which deals with indictable, serious offences like murder, robbery with violence, manslaughter, theft of more than a certain amount, rape, and so on. Then, he would be sentenced as if he had been tried on that day. What would be the sentence? It would be life imprisonment, or 21 years. From the time he was charged he would be incarcerated in a training school: He would put in eight or nine years there, and afterward he would put in 21 years unless the parole board leniently interfered with the sentence. And this is supposed to be a beautiful reform at the beginning of 1971.

What does the Canadian Mental Health Association say about this bill? Section 30(1)(k) reads:

> Where he (the Judge) finds that the young person committed an offence for which he might, if he had been tried by indictment, have been sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life—he (the judge) may commit the young person to a training school until he has reached the age of twenty-one years, to be thereupon dealt with under subsection (4)—

That, as I have pointed out, is one of the worst features, right there. Suppose a child aged ten did not understand the consequences of his act. He could still be sent to a training school and then, when he was 21, even though he did not know what he had done when he was ten it would be presumed he would then, all of a sudden, become aware retrospectively of what he had done when he was ten. That is quite a reform. The section further states:

> A person who has been committed to a training school under paragraph (k) of subsection (1) shall, on reaching the age of twenty-one years, be taken before a superior court of criminal jurisdiction . . ., and that court shall thereupon sentence or otherwise deal with him as if he had then and there been convicted of the offence that he was found to have committed and as if he were thereupon liable to imprisonment for life.

In other words, after he has been trotted out at the age of 21 he gets the same penalty as if he had committed the offence at the age of 21, regardless of the fact that he has served all those years in a training school. Yet this is supposed to be a reform. This is supposed to be the beginning of a brand new day for the young people I saw in hundreds and thousands across this country when I drove home this summer. I picked up a lot of them between Ottawa and Calgary—that is only 2,500 miles—and every mile of the road was packed with young people looking for jobs.

I turn to Section 30(1)(f) which provides that a judge may place a young person on probation for a period not exceeding two years. The following paragraph provides he may place a young person—

> (i) in the charge of a children's aid society established under an Act of the legislature of the province—
> (ii) in any municipality where there is no children's aid society, in the charge of the superintendent, for a period not exceeding two years...

Section 30(1) (i) provides that he may commit the young person to a training school for a period up to three years. Here comes a dandy. If a young person under the age of 17 happens to be impaired, is charged with the offence and loses his driver's licence, what do you think happens when he gets caught under this new bill? He will be liable to two years in prison. There is no provision in the Code that treats an adult in that way. So this is the great reform, the beginning of a new age for our children!

An hon. Member: It is also against the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, someone says it is against the Bill of Rights. It is without doubt in conflict with civil rights. One trouble with the government is that it got so tied up with the War Measures Act that, psychologically, it is still feeling the effects of the act.

I should now like to deal with what the Canadian Mental Health Association has to say. Clause 35(6) provides that:

> In addition to the persons mentioned in subsection (4), a predisposition report made under this section shall be made available to—

Then, one of the recipients of the report is the National Parole Board if the young person applies for a pardon under the Criminal Records Act. In other words, there is a discretion, but he will still have a record. These young people would have to make application under the new act. In other words, they would be met by a large bureaucracy. With regard to a young person who had committed an offence at the age of 15 or 16 and who is applying for a job at the age of 21, the Mental Health Association has this to say, and these are not my words:

> A 14-year-old who is adjudged to have murdered his grandmother is committed to a Training School until he is 21—for seven years he has to wait, conscious of the fact that at the end of that time he will be sentenced by the Court for an offence committed seven years earlier. This is totally inhuman and intolerable; it completely ignores the fact that the child may have changed drastically long before he is 21.
> These sections ignore the fact that at the time the child is before the Court, it is impossible to state how long his case supervision and treatment should continue. Form 12(ix) makes it apparent that a child is committed to a Training School for a definite period—a period which may seem appropriate at the time but which may be too long or too short.

Even under the old law that I have complained about, what generally happened when a child appeared charged before the high court was this. I am not, of course, talking about cases of murder, because in such cases the law makes mandatory provision; but if he were charged with a first offence which called for a sentence of less than five years, the court would generally suspend sentence or remand the case for six months or a year in order to find out how the lad or the girl concerned has behaved. If his or her record is clean, then that ends the matter and there is no sentence. We already have this law. This new law is a retrograde step. The Canadian Mental Health Association go on to say:

> Any doubt that the young person is in fact being dealt with as a criminal is removed by these sections which make it clear that his "offence" will be recorded and could be used at a later date unless he seeks a pardon.

So, we are using a computer. We will soon be able to press a button and find out whether a young person has committed an offence. If he has, then we can find him guilty. In a serious case, we will be able to hold him until 21 and sentence him as if he were convicted as of that date. As a result, a bonding company or a corporation would regard him as a bad boy and he would not get a job with them. The Association goes on:

> The Court is given the power, in cases where it wishes to do so, to order the child to be fingerprinted and photographed—records of which are forwarded to the R.C.M.P.
> There have been several cases like the example given. Murder is an act which is rarely repeated by adults. Even more rarely is it repeated by children. In most cases where this act has been committed by a child, his remorse is great and his potential for rehabilitation is such that he is usually returned to the community before he is 18.

So, under this bill we will be able to hold the offence in abeyance until a person is 21. Then, he could be sentenced as if he had committed the offence at the age of 21. This is to be his 21st birthday present, yet we hear these people saying: "Look what we are doing for the young people"!

> The child is made a ward of the C.A.S. or of the Training School for an indefinite period. In actual fact, his normal period in a Training School is less than a year but his wardship is maintained so that he can be given after-care supervision and help in the community. The present bill makes no mention of or provision for after-care; presumably the child is left to fend for himself.

Pausing there, this is a problem even with adults. I have been in practically every penitentiary in Canada—as a visitor, let me assure you, Mr. Speaker—and I have found that generally there is not sufficient staff, there are insufficient courses, classrooms and equipment. It is nonsense to say that we are going to have a great big rehabilitation program. Even if this were a good bill, we still do not have sufficient training schools to take care of the situation. I continue quoting:

> The child is not dealt with as a criminal. As he has been adjudged delinquent and not considered a criminal, his "record" is confidential and cannot be used against him at a later date.

Let us now see what one of these other fellows said. This is how seriously he felt about this.

> On Friday, October 16, 1970, at the request of the Quebec Provincial Government, the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, outlawed the Front de Liberation du Québec, and invoked the War Measures Act. This act gave the police powers of search and arrest without warrant, allowing them to detain all suspects picked up for a period of twenty-one days without preferring charges against them. The above action was deemed necessary after the October 5 kidnapping of British Diplomat James (Jasper) Cross and the October 10 kidnap and subsequent murder of Quebec Labour Minister Pierre Laporte by F.L.Q. terrorists.
> Although I was personally in favour of the action taken by the Prime Minister of Canada, public protest against the operation of regulations under the War Measures Act was voiced by lawyers, labour leaders, academics, students, and politicians many of which cried out that it violated the Canadian Bill of Rights. However, unknown to many Canadians, there is another act in existence today that is just as potent as the War Measures Act. I refer specifically to the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Then, he refers to this new bill and I am not going to deal fully with that. I do not want to take too long to show what a bad piece of legislation this is. He simply says that the government must have got itself in this position as a result of some psychological cause.

I know, of course, what kind of amendments you can request. We asked the government to set up a review board similar to one which existed during the last war, but we were told: "Don't worry, the Attorney General of Quebec will take care of things". I read last week that one of the jails in Quebec had to be closed because of mistreatment of people who had not been charged and were awaiting trial. This is also going to happen to our youth in our training schools, and I want to say something about our training schools in a few minutes.

Let me read some words of Pierre Burton, who put the case in a nutshell in an article on Canadian Justice in the Star Weekly magazine for July 18, 1964. He was talking about young people being sentenced to training school and to the penitentiary. He says:

> One byproduct was homosexuality. Since young offenders were often dumped into prison compounds with old and hardened men—

Pausing there, our training schools are going to be full of people who have run afoul of different sections of the Code. A young person who has stolen an automobile, or a young man who has indecently assaulted some girl at school, or someone who has stolen goods from a store are all going to be lumped together in one big, happy training school. I know the sort of courses that they will be taking and I know the kind of diploma with which they will graduate. I continue to quote what Pierre Burton said:

> —it was almost axiomatic that any youth entering prison (and there were children as young as 13 in Canadian penitentiaries in the 1960's) be forced into a homosexual alliance that could scar him for life.
> The same system of mixing the young and the old, the novices and the veterans, which was prevalent in many parts of Canada as late as 1964, made it easy for youths to learn the fine points of criminal technique before they were once more dumped, with few resources, upon an unforgiving society.

I have stood in my place this last couple of years and recited the growing number of convictions in cases involving drug offences. Two years ago, the courts were sending to prison for three or four years people found guilty of possession of drugs and of trafficking in drugs among kids at school. The courts are taking a little better view of this whole situation today. Many of these people are young university scholars. The parole board has done a tremendous job. On many occasions when I have written the board about a deserving case they have allowed a young person to go to school during the daytime and return to his place of incarceration in the evening. Very often the board allows a young person out of jail for a period of six months in order to see how he can get along. I think this is a tremendous attitude.

Because of the basic function of our courts and our laws, we have in many cases been creating crime factories. Possession of marijuana is against the law as is trafficking in marijuana or any other drug. Under our present laws this is a crime and a judge must pass sentence. Even when these young offenders are put in training schools they are forced to associate with a criminal element. A young man may have been smoking marijuana. He may be placed in prison in association with other young men who have run afoul of the law. As a result, we are manufacturing crimes. This is the breeding ground of criminal activity. For this reason, there is no way I can go along with this bill.

Professors of various universities and the Canadian Mental Health Association have suggested a solution to this problem. They say we should set up a task force to study this whole matter. We have had many task forces in the past. We are now dealing with youth, Canada's greatest resource. In spite of that we are being asked to rush this mad bill through in order to create more crime factories. All the lawyers, academics, psychologists, psychiatrists and sociologists I have talked to support this idea.

The government likes to refer to the support it received in respect of the War Measures Act. We live in a country of regions where people sometimes are happy because the government is kicking someone out of a province, such as it did in Quebec. I am thankful I am not one of those Canadians who share that viewpoint. In any event, that is why the government was so popular. People do not become concerned about many of these things until their own sons and daughters become involved. I received a very sad letter this week. I cannot say much more about it than the fact it refers to 13 young men under age 21 who were convicted of murder by a jury in Calgary. The jury was shocked when they received life sentences.

After reading the appeal books, the only thing I could find against one of these young individuals was that he happened to arrive at a house at a wrong time. He was asked to go for a ride to drink some wine. These people have all been placed in the one unhappy basket. My point is that no one worries very much about these things until their own sons and daughters become involved. They are not really concerned and that is why we have to raise our voices against this type of legislation. If this is the kind of situation we are going to face, I can only say it is not the normal situation I have encountered.

What is the present population of young people in jails in Canada? In 1968, there were 2 under the age of 15 years; 10 under the age of 16 years; 136 who were 17 years of age; 236 who were 18 years of age, and 364 who were 19 years of age. Let me point out that there is not much difference between a training school and a penitentiary. Many young people are incarcerated in one of the new young offender institutions in the city of Drumheller, Alberta. I suggest these institutions are nothing more than child penitentiaries.

What is the situation as far as this bill is concerned? It does not seem to accomplish very much. In fact, I think the old law was just as good. Perhaps in some ways it was better. It has been my experience that the higher the court the greater justice prevails. The high court trial judge uses some discretion on the question of sentence. In most cases they ask for pre-sentence reports and relate the sentence to the possibility of rehabilitation. Unfortunately, many cases are handled by magistrates who are forced to deal with hundreds of cases each week. These cases are all rushed through the courts and these authorities have little or no opportunity to deal with them individually.

The point I am making is that judges can suspend sentence and send these young people home or put them under the care of a guardian. It is useless in most cases to send these people to these training schools or child penitentiaries where the doors are locked and there is loneliness and a relationship with criminals of every kind. I have never seen anyone, whatever the situation, who has come out a better person as a result of being in prison.

I am shocked that our swinging Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is saving the empire, would permit such a measure to come before the House. After all, he is the author of the just society. Surely, this measure must have gone before cabinet. Members on the government side I am sure have received many letters from academics and others on this subject. At least these professional people have time in their world to think about these matters. Businessmen and lawyers very often do not have that time because they are busy making money to pay the rent. These academics have expressed the opinion I have put forward. This is the opinion of the scholars of Canada.

In view of this situation, I would ask the few members who are present on the other side of the House to take this bill back to the cabinet. The new Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) has inherited a very bad package and he has my sympathy. I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-192 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act by the Governor in Council after consultation with the leaders of the opposition parties of this House".

We should also have a bill of rights for the young people of Canada, because that is what they need.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the next speaker I might read the amendment. I do so without accepting it because I should like to have an opportunity to consider it at greater length. I have some doubts as to its acceptability in view of the reference to consultation with the leaders of opposition parties. With the permission of the House, I will read the amendment which is as follows:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-192 be not now read a second time; but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act by the Governor in Council after consultation with the leaders of the opposition parties of this House".

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am prepared, along with other hon. members, to argue as to the validity of the amendment. I am not sure that Your Honour wants to hear argument at this time. It might well be that after an examination of this amendment the Chair will be satisfied that it is valid and should be accepted. I do not wish to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, but I would ask that before any decision is made by the Chair we be given the opportunity to make representations. Perhaps the Chair could indicate to the House the nature of those reservations. We are prepared to argue in support of the validity of the amendment, but there is a question of timing involved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would be pleased to hear from those hon. members who may wish to make submissions as to the acceptability of the amendment. As I indicated earlier, it does seem to me that the amendment may not be in order because of the reference to the setting up of a task force to be appointed under the Inquiries Act by the Governor in Council, and my concern is that this be done after consultation with the leaders of the oppostion parties of this House. It would seem to me, in so far as the matter of consultation is concerned, this chamber is the place where the debate concerning the adoption or non-adoption of motions for second reading should take place. Therefore, my reservation really is in respect of whether or not the referral to a task force after such consultation would be in order. If hon. members have arguments to present on that, I would be very pleased to hear them.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think that point may be one which we could consider, but certainly the precedents have been well established concerning the principle of opposition being taken to the principle of a bill by means of an amendment which seeks, in the first instance, that the bill be not read a second time. I would refer Your Honour to citation 386 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. This is a citation which has been cited by myself and by other hon. members quite frequently. It reads:

> On the second reading of a bill, the House may decide to refer the subject matter thereof to a commission although the bill could not be referred to a committee of the House before its second reading. (The subject matter of a bill and the bill itself are two different things.) On the 17th April, 1934, the following amendment was moved to the second reading of a bill to amend the Railway Act in respect of rates on grain: "That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada." This amendment was as much a declaration of policy as if it stated that the question of adjusting the railway rates on grain should be investigated by the railway board.

Last year an amendment moved in this House by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) was dealt with by Mr. Speaker as recorded at page 1621 of Hansard, Volume 2, the first session of the 28th Parliament. The mover of the amendment, the hon. member for Hillsborough, used a little different wording. Rather than saying in his amendment that the bill be not read a second time, he said that further consideration of this bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada. I pointed out in argument—and other hon. members including the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) participated in this argument at that time—that the circumstances did not differ from a precedent in the fourth edition of Beauchesne recorded at page 396 as No. 93. The wording in the motion moved by the hon. member for Hillsborough was a little different and the Speaker referred to that. He said on that basis the hon. member might well like to change his wording to the more acceptable wording which is the wording used today by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Amendment No. 93, which is offered by Beauchesnes as an acceptable form of amendment on second reading, reads:

> The further consideration of this bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.

The hon. member for Calgary North has been a lot more specific. He said, let us set up a task force and refer the subject matter of the bill to this task force. Now, if Your Honour has reservations on the question of the task force being one in respect of which there must be consultation with the leaders of the other parties, I am sure we might be able to consider modifying it in this respect. Certainly, it would be hoped that in respect of a task force as important as this, there would be that form of consultation and that such a task force, if set up by the government, would be set up only after the fullest discussion with the leaders of all opposition parties in the House. If this constitutes, in the mind of Your Honour, an obstacle to the acceptance of this amendment, I am sure this is something we could discuss. Knowing that the hon. member for Calgary North is always a very reasonable man—I am in close contact with him and am aware how reasonable he is—I am sure he might well be happy to modify that particular aspect of it.

Apart from that, I suggest the wording is in a form which has been accepted in this Parliament on a great many occasions. The only addition involves the words "after consultation". If that is the obstacle, I am sure we can discuss that. However, the precedents are there. I have cited the more obvious ones and shall leave it at this stage for Your Honour's further consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair might ask whether there are any other members who would like to contribute to the point of order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might add a brief word or two to what has been said by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I would invite Your Honour to read not only the first paragraph of citation 386, which has been drawn to your attention, but also paragraphs 2 and 3 of that citation. This citation is in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. The paragraph has already been read which indicates that it is in order on second reading to move a reference to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, which was the name of the board at the time this edition was published. Paragraph 2 points out that it is in order to refer the subject matter of a bill to a select committee. So there do seem to be indications that there are various kinds of other bodies to which the subject matter of a bill may be referred instead of giving it second reading. I believe it is also useful to read paragraph 3 of citation 386 because, in saying what cannot be done, it would seem to me to make clear what can be done.

Paragraph 3 says that you cannot have it both ways. It states that you cannot refer just some clauses of a bill to a committee and have a vote on second reading itself. It has to be all or none. The last words are that the House "shall have to make its choice". So, since the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North does not try to split hairs, or in other words does not refer just some clauses but says no to the second reading of the bill in its entirety and that its subject matter should be referred for study by another body, I suggest it is in order. I am sure if the problem in respect of this amendment is the consultation with leaders of the opposition parties, the hon. member for Calgary North would be prepared to modify his motion in that respect. It does seem to me the reference to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act should not present any difficulty. I recognize that the citations we are reading do not refer to task forces appointed under the Inquiries Act but they do refer to bodies other than this House of Commons. In one case, the reference was to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada and in another case it was to a select committee. It would seem to me, therefore, that Your Honour should give favourable consideration to the proposed amendment.

While I am on my feet I wonder if I might anticipate something I know my colleague the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) wishes to do. I think in the circumstances, since there is some doubt concerning how Your Honour will rule, we should have the whole story.

My friend, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), has an amendment on second reading. It is also a reasoned amendment which would do something else than give the bill second reading. If the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is in order, then my friend will not be able to move his amendment at this time but will have to wait for another round. But if perchance the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North is ruled out of order, then I think at that point the hon. member for Broadview should be permitted to present his amendment. Perhaps in the course of his speech he can indicate what his amendment is and Your Honour can rule on both of them. If Your Honour rules that the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North is in order, my colleague will have to wait, but if Your Honour rules that the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North is not in order, then Your Honour would be in a position to rule on my colleague's amendment.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre.)]

Despite my obvious interest in seeing the amendment of the hon. member for Broadview moved as early as possible, I think Your Honour should look with favour on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Woolliams: I will not speak at this time on the point of order regarding whether my amendment is or is not in order, but I would like to make a suggestion. Following consultation with my colleagues, I wonder whether my amendment can stand until tomorrow which would give me an opportunity to consider whether it might be modified by the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). At that time, I may be able to submit some authorities which I am not able to do now because I was not prepared for Your Honour raising the narrow issue—and I say so with respect—regarding consultation with leaders of the opposition parties. It may be that when I take a look at the amendment, and discuss it with my colleagues, we might conclude tomorrow that it would have to be modified.

I go along with the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that his colleagues should be permitted to put forward his amendment so that if my amendment fails, his could be considered. I am sure we would get the agreement of the House in that regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to thank hon. members who have assisted me on the procedural point. I indicated initially that the reservation I had was with respect to the provision in the hon. member's amendment that the action under the Inquiries Act be taken after consultation with the leaders of the opposition parties of this House. That is the only reservation I had. This doubt would be removed if, as the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Calgary North have indicated, they would consider modifying the amendment. I wonder, and I put this to the hon. member who moved the amendment so that we can proceed and also so that the Chair will have no doubts as to the procedural acceptability of the amendment, whether the mover of the motion might agree to put a period after the words "Inquiries Act" and delete the rest of the amendment. The amendment would then be in order.

Mr. Baldwin: I think both the hon. member for Calgary North and I would support this. The hon. member has put forward his proposition. I am sure that the House would give unanimous consent to altering the amendment in that respect. The hon. member for Calgary North has made his proposal. If in its wisdom the House agreed to this sensible and reasonable amendment, we would hope the minister would bring it to the attention of his colleagues so that a task force may be established to deal with this extremely serious matter. So that there would be a form of consultation, which a democratic institution such as this would demand, we would ask that discussion take place with leaders of other parties.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your graciousness and, with the consent of the House, I would like to delete that part of the motion which you felt in your discretion was somewhat objectionable. I have discussed it with my seconder, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), and he has agreed to this change.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement of the House that the motion be amended as proposed by the hon. member? If there is agreement, I will put the motion as amended in a formal way.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The amendment now reads:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-192 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): I would like to preface my remarks on Bill C-192 by congratulating the new Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) on his appointment and wishing him well in the work to come. I fully appreciate that the youth of Canada is in his hands and the hands of the cabinet. I hope he will exercise wisdom and judgment with regard to this matter.

I should like also to commend the former solicitor general for his good work during his years in service. I hope that his health continues to improve and that he will be with us for some time to come to perform his parliamentary duties.

With regard to the amendment that was just moved, and that has now been ruled in order, let me say that I had intended to move an amendment, to be seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), which would have read: "That this bill be not now read a second time but that this House affirms that young persons should not be treated as criminals and that the principle of flexibility of treatment of young persons should be emphasized rather than the legal technicalities of the criminal law. I will move this amendment at a later time to be voted on by members of the House.

I am particularly delighted this afternoon to see so many lawyers, members of the Liberal party in the House, many of whom have had litigation experience and know the consequences of the contents of this bill. I will attempt to persuade them to go back tomorrow morning to their party members, after listening to the persuasive arguments of the members of the opposition, and ask for a free vote on this particular matter. If we could have a free vote on the question of capital punishment, surely we can have a free vote with regard to an act that affects young people in Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: I would appreciate their help, assistance and persuasiveness in requesting that there be a free vote on this important matter.

Every time I read Bill C-192 I wonder who is responsible for this criminal law monstrosity, this caveman's approach to young people, this bill of legal rights for social wrongs, this simplistic Spiro Agnew approach to young people's problems. I ask myself, is it the young persons involved who are responsible for this bill? The answer is no. Is it the juvenile court judges? No. Is it the social workers? No. Is it the probation officers? No. Is it the superintendents of training schools across the country? No. Is it the directors of children's aid societies across the country? No. Is it the managers of foster homes across the country? No. Is it the sociologists, the psychiatrists or the psychologists? The answer is no. I would further add that these people have never been consulted with regard to Bill C-192. I ask myself, is it the former solicitor general who is responsible for this bill? My answer is, I doubt it. Is it the present Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) who is responsible for this bill? I would be amazed and shocked if it were. How could a man so young in age, in dress and in appearance be responsible for such backward and oppressive ideas? Who is responsible? It must be the Solicitor General's officials. Yes, Mr. Speaker, they are responsible for this civil servant approach, this cold, unconcerned, legalistic, punitive, unsympathetic, letter-of-the-law approach.

I ask myself who is supporting this bill? When I read the criticisms that have been voiced across the country I find little or no support for it. I recall reading in the Telegram of December 29 some of those criticisms recorded by Yvonne Crittenden, who is a writer for the Telegram. Here are some of the criticisms set forth by responsible bodies. It is called, "A Half-Pint Criminal Code for Children," "Inhuman and Intolerable," "A frightening piece of legislation," "The Title is Misleading, Inappropriate and a Step Backward," "Its legalistic terminology—offender, offences, inmates, finger printing, pardon, criminal records—make it a junior Criminal Code," "The approach is punitive," and "Classifying a ten year old an offender is ludicrous."

Where did we get the title "Young Offenders Act"? The old act was the Juvenile Delinquents Act. When a study was launched in 1961 on improvement in the act, a study which was tabled in 1966, I understand that the people concerned drew up a draft bill on juvenile delinquency which they called "The Children and Young Persons Act." What has happened to that draft bill? What do they call such legislation in England? They call it precisely the same name, "The Children and Young Persons Act, 1969." It is striking, Mr. Speaker, that the English bill was passed in October, 1970, and is taking effect in January, 1971.

If we must have a name for this bill I will suggest one to the Solicitor General. I suggest we call it "The Young Persons Act." If the terminology, "The Children and Young Persons Act" is offensive to the Solicitor General, let us call it the "Young Persons Act." The reason for suggesting the change is that when you call it the "Young Offenders Act" this has a condemnatory aspect. But if we call it "The Young Persons Act" this expresses concern rather than condemnation. I would ask the Solicitor General to give full thought to changing the title of the bill.

The Solicitor General went into detail on the outlines of the bill and deftly attempted to demonstrate what a great improvement it is over the Juvenile Delinquents Act. Mr. Speaker, I would direct your attention to the philosophy of the bill, which is contained in clause 4, which reads:

> This Act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

On the face of it, that looks quite laudatory, but it is a shortchanging of the philosophy which is contained in the Juvenile Delinquents Act. In effect, it includes most of the words in section 38 and section 3(2) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, with two important, major exceptions. Section 38 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act reads:

> This Act shall be liberally construed—

In fact, it contains most of the words in clause 4, but it has this one important exception:

> —every juvenile delinquent shall be treated, not as a criminal—

The inference in this bill, because the words "not as criminal" are missing, seems to be that we are going to deal with young people as criminals. Is that the case?

Section 3(2) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act indicates how the child shall be dealt with. It provides that where the child is adjudged a juvenile delinquent:

> —he shall be dealt with, not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency—

So, Mr. Speaker, section 38 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act provides that we shall not deal with a person as a criminal, and section 3(2) indicates we shall not deal with a person as an offender. Now, this bill, the Young Offenders Act, tags a person as an offender. In actual fact, it is the Young Offenders Act, and we are to treat the offender like a criminal.

As the minister said, Mr. Speaker, the Juvenile Delinquents Act was passed in 1929 and 40 years have passed with no major amendments to it. It could be said that the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1929 was an advanced and enlightened document. Now, it can be said that the Young Offenders Act of 1971 is retrogressive, unenlightened, and strikes right at the principles and philosophy set forth in the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

May I direct the attention of hon. members to what was said by the commissioners who prepared the report with regard to juvenile deliquency which was tabled in February, 1966? They said that criminal law has as its purposes deterrence, rehabilitation, incapacitation, and retribution. The goal of juvenile court judges should be to assist the young offender to become a law-abiding citizen. The treatment, therefore, should be disposed to further his education and re-adjustment. The treatment or punishment should not be determined on what he has done but rather on what is necessary and useful for him. Deterrence must also enter into the judge's decision. Therefore there is a difficult distinction between treatment and punishment.

Let me point out the difficulty that the juvenile court judge has. If making an offender a law-abiding citizen is the objective, and rehabilitation is the goal, is the sending of an offender to a training school the answer? Is the imposition of a fine the answer? Should the judge be meting out treatment or punishment? Are the feelings of the child relevant? For example, if one child is sent to a training school, another child is placed on probation, another one is fined, and still another one under this bill can be absolutely discharged, all of whom have committed exactly the same offence, where is the treatment and where is the punishment? These are the words contained in the report, and they sum up the problem in one paragraph.

The difficulty is not in the basic philosophy of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, but in the failure of society to give to the juvenile court adequate resources to fulfil the aims of the philosophy, the philosophy of wanting young people to become law-abiding citizens and directing treatment with regard to their rehabilitation.

I have mentioned that the English act is called the "Children and Young Persons Act, 1969," and it behooves me to direct the attention of hon. members to the philosophy set forth in it. It sets forth the care and other treatment through court proceedings with regard to children and young persons. Section 70 defines a child as a person under 14 years of age. A young person is defined as one who has attained the age 14 but is under the age of 17. Section 4 of the act provides that no person shall be charged with an offence, except homicide, by reason of anything done or omitted while he was a child. In other words, if he is a child, and therefore under 14 years old, he cannot be charged with an offence.

In Canada, we say that a child ten years old or older can be charged with an offence. Mr. Speaker, why is there this gap between the 10 years of age provision in Canada and the 14 years of age provision in Great Britain? Are the English that much more civilized than we are in determining who is a child and who is a young person? In another section of the English act the conditions are set out under which a young person may be brought to court. Subparagraph (a) of subsection (2) of that section lays down these conditions: "his proper development is being avoidably prevented or neglected or his health is avoidably impaired or neglected or he is being ill-treated." It goes on to say in subparagraph (b),

"the above circumstances have been satisfied to another member of his household."

Then, come the following subparagraphs:

(c) he is exposed to moral danger
(d) he is beyond the control of his parent or guardians
(e) he is not receiving efficient full-time education

Next follows the subparagraph I wish to emphasize:

(f) he is guilty of an offence excluding homicide.

As the Solicitor General pointed out, the basis of this bill is that it defines an offence. The big difference between the Juvenile Delinquents Act and the Young Offenders Act is that in the latter piece of legislation an offence is deemed to be an offence committed under a federal statute, probably the Criminal Code. May I remind the Solicitor General that in the English act there is a clear distinction. It indicates that no young person will be charged with a summary offence. We have summary and indictable offences, yet in England no charge will be laid against any person under 14 years old; secondly, no charge involving a summary offence will be laid against a young person. The offence must be an indictable offence; otherwise, the young person cannot be brought before the court.

I always recall the lecture given by the late Dr. William Blatz in Toronto, 25 years ago, when I was a law student. He was an eminent psychiatrist in the field of treating children especially. He asked us all one simple question. He said, "Is there any student in this class who has never stolen anything? If so, will he please raise his hand." There were 30 students in the class, and not one raised his hand, not one. If I were to ask that question of members who are present in the chamber this afternoon, I dare say that the answer would be the same and that not one would raise his hand.

Mr. Greene: I never stole anything.

Mr. Gilbert: —with the exception of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). If I asked the members of the press gallery that question, I doubt if any one of them would put up his hand.

Mr. Baldwin: Elections have been stolen, you know.

Mr. Gilbert: A person ten years old or over could be charged with an offence under the young offenders act. I suppose we can count ourselves fortunate in not having been caught and charged under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. That merely shows you how enlightened and progressive the English are. Under their law, no offence can be charged against a person unless he is 14 years old and over, up to a certain age it must be an indictable offence.

I have mentioned the conditions under which young people in England can be brought before the courts. Once a young person is before the court, the court may make an order "requiring his parent or guardian to enter into a recognizance to take proper care of him and exercise proper control over him." Or, it may make a supervision order, or a care order, or a hospital order, or a guardianship order. What a comparison there is between our new act and the new English act which has just come into force. The English act concerns itself with care and treatment. Our act is one of punishment. It will brand young persons as criminals.

The Solicitor General would have a perfect right to say to me, "What would you do under the circumstances, if you were the solicitor general?" Mr. Speaker, the first thing I would do is accept the definition and the age concept pertaining to child and young person as contained in the English act. In other words, I would accept the definition that a child is a person 14 years of age and under, and that a young person is a person between the ages of 14 years and 17 years. Actually, I would take it a step farther and make the upper age limit 18 years. On the matter of problems involving young people under the age of 14 years, surely we could work out with the provinces the machinery for dealing with them. It is very bad, Mr. Speaker, to tag young people under 14 as either offenders or criminals, which our present act would do.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I would accept the philosophy of the report on juvenile delinquents which says that it is still our duty to make our young people law abiding citizens and that our treatment ought to be so disposed as to further their education and readjustment. When I speak of education, Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking merely of academic education; I am also speaking of social, moral and spiritual education. You know, we of the New Democratic Party do not believe in pushing tough kids around; we do not think that is the answer to delinquency. Many of us are tired of seeing troubled kids go through the revolving doors of social service agencies, training schools and foster homes and end up in reformatories, mental hospitals, or detention homes. We should use the entire resources of the neighbourhood; this means that we must work with the parents, schools, trade unions, businessmen, youth organizations, social clubs and social agencies of the neighbourhood.

We of the NDP believe that such explanations relating to juvenile delinquents as those involving slum living, broken homes, films, deprivation, the frustrations of growing young people, and intense industrialization indicate the complexity of the problem and call for an all-out community effort. We believe that the guilt aspect of the complex ought to be a secondary consideration. We believe that the reformation and rehabilitation of the offender ought to be our primary object. His care and treatment is our concern. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would recommend a panel system for dealing with these problems. Such panels ought to be composed of judges, psychiatrists, trade union officials, psychologists, business representatives, church ministers, social workers, parents and school teachers. Such people ought to compose a panel for dealing with the problems confronting our youth. You cannot look at the particular act of the individual in isolation; you must look at his whole background if you want to bring forward an answer. If you look at the individual and not at the offence, you will first and foremost prescribe treatment and not punishment. You know, if we do not take this approach the Canadian dream of the just society will end up as a nightmare. This is one battle we must win. What we shall do in this area will be just as important as anything we do with regard to any other social problem facing us today.

I would remind the Solicitor General, and the lawyers on the other side, that this approach has been taken by Sweden and other Scandinavian countries. They have adopted the panel system and rather than have a judge alone determine the offence and the treatment, a panel of judges attaches secondary importance to the act committed and primary importance to the care and treatment of offenders. In Sweden they have a volunteer system concerned with the treatment of young offenders. There is citizen participation and two-thirds of all members of the Swedish parliament are volunteers when it comes to taking care of young offenders. These people are paid $10 a month in return for the time and attention they give.

There are four other serious criticisms of this bill. I have dealt with the philosophy behind the bill and our answer to it. When I read the provisions with regard to fingerprinting and photographing they just make me cringe, they are so horrible when applied to young people. When I read the inflexible sentencing provisions, two years with regard to a suspended sentence, two years with regard to a commitment to a children's aid home and three years for a training school, I can uderstand why the social agencies across the country have raised such a furore. They realize the necessity for flexibility with respect to the treatment of these people. Surely, the Solicitor General is young enough and flexible enough to know that we can introduce a mechanism for review of these sentences.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) gave us a vivid and excellent description of what would happen in connection with the provision under which life sentences could be imposed, where a young person is sentenced to serve in a training school until he is 21 and then made to appear before an adult court to receive his sentence. Surely, the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) is a man with some vision, some concern, and would not recommend a provision like this.

Another area of criticism concerns age differences. The government pounds its breast with regard to changing the age from 16 to 17. May I remind the House that raising the age to 17 affects only Ontario, the Maritimes, Saskatchewan and male offenders in Alberta. British Columbia and Newfoundland have already passed legislation fixing the age at 17. Quebec and Manitoba have raised the age for both boys and girls to 18. I wonder why we cannot get uniformity across the country by fixing the age at 18. As things stand, a boy of 18 in Ontario charged with car theft appears in the adult court. A boy of 18 charged with the same offence in Quebec or Manitoba appears in the Juvenile Court. Does this make sense? Is this the just society we are trying to create? I am sure the minister would agree that the age should be uniform and that it should be 18. Would it not be sensible to appeal to the provinces to make 18 the age universally, and to provide some resources for the training schools and other institutions which are necessary?

May I give some humble advice to the Solicitor General? First, I would recommend that he withdraw the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Burn it.

Mr. Gilbert: Why does he not set up a committee composed of judges, social workers, psychiatrists, psychologists, trade union officials, employers, church representatives and representatives of youth organizations. Let this committee travel across the country to hear the views of different organizations. Let it visit training schools and talk to young offenders; let it visit children's aid homes and foster homes and get the point of view of these people. Let it go to Europe, go to England and study the Children and Young Persons Act there; let it go to Sweden and Denmark and other Scandinavian countries, study their enlightened approach to this problem and then report to the government. We do not want a bill that is worse than the Juvenile Delinquents Act. We want one that is better. We certainly do not want this young offenders act. I might recommend that the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs should do the same work as the committee or task force to which I have just referred. But as a member of that committee I would say that our approach would be too narrow, too legalistic. Our training makes us this way. We need men from all orders of society to study this question and help us solve it.

There is an old proverb which says it is easy to say a tulip grows but that it is not easy to make one grow. It is easy to say a young boy grows but it is not easy to make him into a responsible, law-abiding citizen. I would remind hon. members that 80 per cent of all juvenile deliquents are first offenders and that less than 20 per cent return to court during their lifetime. We need the help of all Canadians. Let us not fail in our duty by passing this bad legislation and approving a young offenders act which is worse in philosophy and in practice than the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that this bill to repeal the old Juvenile Delinquents Act and adopt new regulations with regard to those same delinquents reveals true concern about the moral health of our youth.

At first glance, I believe in the efficiency of this bill. It is high time we pause to better protect our young citizens, who have to face the judiciary who, in their eyes, too often constitute an adversary which cannot be trusted.

Unfortunately, obsolete and inadequate sections in the old act at times proved them right.

Our young people, under 18 years of age, are intelligent, resourceful and dynamic, but the potential those excellent qualities represent does not alter the fact that, at that age, they often lack a certain sense of responsibility. There is no reason to hold it against them, particularly since the influence of adults has much to do with delinquent agitation. In fact it we look for the cause, we find out that in most cases, it is the malevolent, not to say diabolical, action of unconscionable and evil-minded adults.

The education that is provided to our young people in these troubled times lacks conviction, vitality and authority. Too many adults are indifferent; too many parents give up; too many leaders show incompetence.

So, we should not be surprised to see that our young people are unstable, apathetic and sometimes discouraged and inclined to use this false safety valve: committing every kind of offence they can.

It is therefore appropriate to rejoice since under this bill, the so-called delinquent seems to retain his dignity as a human being.

Clause 4 on page 5 is eloquent enough in this connection and I would like, Mr. Speaker, to be allowed to quote it:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

To my mind, other clauses of the bill under discussion constitute good points and should help a great deal to improve our young people's behaviour.

Under clause 14, an adolescent must be judged by a juvenile court, even though he might have appeared before a regular court. This will prevent incidents such as have often been witnessed in court where people under 18 years of age were brought to regular courts and considered as adults. This was bound to bring in the end a drifting towards gangsterism and underworld life with all possible implications.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Clause 15 should also be quoted:

> (1) Where
> (a) a summons is issued to a young person, or
> (b) a young person is arrested,
> notice thereof shall be given to a parent or parents of the young person by the person who issues the summons or by the clerk of the court before which the young person will appear, as the case may be.
> (2) Where the whereabouts of the parents of a young person to whom a summons is issued or who is arrested are not known or it appears that he has no parents, a notice referred to in subsection (1) may be given to one or more relatives or friends of the young person.

Mr. Speaker, this clause will allow all responsible persons, when any offence has been commited, and I do say "all responsible persons", since parents who have to see to the education and guidance of their children are always directly and sometimes indirectly responsible, to find that, by this clause, parents or guardians are involved. I think this clause will greatly help to convert these young persons who sometimes go a little too far.

Even though this may seem like paternalism that some would consider in bad taste, I believe it is a reasonable and equitable measure.

Clause 16 clearly indicates the proceeding in the clause I just quoted, but I would make some reservations as far as subsection (3) is concerned, which reads as follows:

> (3) Where in the opinion of a judge a requirement to a parent to whom a notice is given under subsection (1) of section 15 to appear before the court would impose an undue hardship on the parent, such requirement may be omitted from the notice and the notice may state that any parent, relative or friend of the young person may appear with him.

Mr. Speaker, is it not true that there could be abuses regarding this matter? How many parents could find a thousand and one reasons to avoid taking their responsibilities! Snobbery and undue deference for public opinion still exist. I wonder whether it is necessary to make this restriction.

I would also note the soundness of clause 23 which states:

> Where an information is laid against a young person and a judge is of the opinion that there are reasonable and probable grounds for laying the information, but that the case may be a proper one for disposal without a hearing, he may, instead of proceeding under section 26, direct that the information not be acted on for the time being and designate a person to confer with the person who laid the information, the young person, a parent of the young person and any other person interested in or willing to take an interest in the young person, with a view to disposal of the case without a hearing.

That point seems important to me. It will prevent hearings from being lengthy and will also be psychologically more helpful to teenagers involved in offences of any kind.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I could not bring this brief statement to a close without expressing my apprehensions at the thought that at the very time when we are anxious to help our young people develop in the right way, behave properly and receive additional training, our society tolerates laws that are stupid and inefficient, and it is expected that future legislation will be even more so.

I would not like to make unwarranted statements here, but how can we persuade young people to behave well when, because our laws are too lax or too harsh or our legal machinery is heavy and cumbersome, the Mafia, for instance, is allowed to flourish within our society?

However, Mr. Speaker, not so long ago, a certain Minister of Justice was even heard to say in the Parliament of Quebec that we must not use the war measures to fight the underworld because, he said, that would be unfair.

Mr. Speaker, if legislation is designed to protect us, how can someone as responsible as a minister of justice state that one can be unfair to the underworld? And God knows that the members of the underworld know how to use the law in order better to reach their aims.

Mr. Speaker, while we are not correcting those situations and while we are proposing to cure the ills of our young offenders, we should remember that we shall achieve nothing really effective through this bill unless we withdraw from the eyes of our young people these laws which in my opinion are often scandalous.

How for instance could we urge our youth to behave decently when Parliament passed legislation legalizing homosexuality from the age of 21?

How could we urge our youth to be honest and to try and set high ideals for themselves when we are in the process of passing legislation legalizing certain drugs such as marijuana?

If through our laws we are fostering some vices amongst our young people, let us not then try and impose guidelines upon them. This is why it is difficult to rebuke the young, to have them walk the straight and narrow path while, alas, through our own example, we have them straying from it.

This is why at the same time we are drafting legislation in order to strengthen the moral fibre of our children, we should render all laws sound, for they are not always.

And above all, undertakings such as legalization on abortion on request, the unrestricted use of some drugs, etc., will have to be blocked. Should we allow all these to go through, then with the licentiousness which unfortunately is now rampant, again and on all sides, this commendable bill will be of no avail, will prove to be absolutely futile, whereas in my opinion it does contain tremendously positive intentions.

Also to provide it with real efficiency, consideration should be given to amending all the other legislation which as I have already said is much to tolerant and sometimes in spite of its excessive severity, prompts and challenges our young people, sanctions the existence of underworld organizations and parasites who operate systematically outside of the law.

Mr. Speaker, after we pass this bill, I wish we would also try and find solutions to the problems which are at the root of juvenile delinquency.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow the traditional pattern when a new minister is involved in legislation in the House by wishing him well in the execution of his duties. I can do that in this case because we in the official opposition do not really feel that the minister is responsible for the legislation now before us. If I thought he had anything to do with it my words would be at the least of greater warmth. Since he is a new minister, and in view of his attitude toward penitentiary matters, he is obviously an earnest minister and I can wish him well. I hope his very first act to show that he means well in his office will be to march in on his colleagues tomorrow and suggest that they have a long second look at this legislation, that it be withdrawn or that the government accept the amendment of the official opposition. Perhaps in this way a whole new approach could be taken to this matter which would reflect the minister's philosophy. Perhaps the minister does not realize at this time, but I am sure he will tomorrow, that he is getting himself involved in a hornet's nest by presenting this bill to the House of Commons. With these caveats, I again wish the minister well in his duties. I suggest that he take his new broom and begin to beat some new shape into this legislation, Bill C-192.

It is significant that there are no explanatory notes anywhere throughout this very lengthy piece of legislation. I suppose this is partly so because the bill is wrapped up in as much mystery as legal draftsmanship could devise. Perhaps it is because no one wants to put in simple language what this is all about. There are some very complicated features in this measure. In any event, it is a bill that is in a sense unique in that it has nothing in it to help a Member of Parliament understand its philosophy or meaning, except in the words of the bill itself. It is an unjust bill for two reasons. It is unjust in its attitude towards those it deals with, and it is unjust to those who administer it, namely the provinces of Canada. I shall attempt to prove this during my speech.

I note, as other hon. members have noted before, that the obvious weakness in the bill is the threat of punishment hanging over the heads of young Canadian boys and girls. This is a threat which could last for up to 11 years. I suggest that if anyone here thought that some Canadian should undergo up to 11 years imprisonment before knowing the ultimate punishment that was to be assessed, he would wonder about the type of legislation a powerful Parliament was being asked to pass. For that reason, and because of the harshness this measure could work, admittedly in extreme cases, we have to take a long and hard look at what we are being asked to do. This 11 year provision is a sort of Damocles sword hanging over the heads of young people. In a few moments I will go into this in greater detail.

We should ask ourselves what the philosophy is that should be borne in mind in dealing with measures such as this which relate to young people who find themselves in difficulty with the law. The Canadian Mental Health Association made a submission to us, and while I do not necessarily agree with the paragraph I want to place on record, I think it at least sets the guide to an approach which would commend itself more than the approach taken by Her Majesty's advisers in this case.

Let me quote from the submission by the Canadian Mental Health Association dated December 7, last year. I quote from the second paragraph on the first page as follows:

The purpose of legislation directly concerning children and young persons whose behaviour is unacceptable to society, is surely to provide the best means possible to promote growth and development of a healthy personality and of acceptable, responsible, mature behaviour. This must be the main objective.

> The safeguarding of the civil liberties and social rights of a child or young person and the provision of a code of appropriate procedures and consequences which relate to specific unacceptable behaviour may be important and helpful to the court but, in the case of children and young persons, they are of less importance than the provision of legal machinery for meeting their particular needs. A Criminal Code based on the notion that specific offences merit a specified range of punitive procedures may be appropriate for adults but definitely not for children. A particular offence may be committed by two children of the same age. In one case the total social, emotional and intellectual needs of one child may require only a suspended sentence; while with the other child an indefinite and probably prolonged period of re-education, treatment and retraining may be required.

Another sentence immediately following reads:

> Basically it is the position of this association that there should be a separation between the judicial process and the process of determining appropriate treatment, training, supervision and after-care.

Those are good, commendable objectives. At the outset of my remarks, I mentioned that the legislation we are considering, because of certain provisions in it and more particularly the notorious clause on pages 26 and 27 dealing with postponement of sentencing, could provide an adverse effect in respect of a young person for up to a period of 11 years. I refer, of course, to the difference between age 21 when the sentence could be imposed and age 10, which amounts to 11 years. That is a long time to wait, although I presume the offence for which the person was being detained would be of a very substantial nature indeed, such as murder.

When the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wolliams) referred to the motorcycle cases, I was reminded of the rather strange thing that could happen under the suggested law in the case of someone just under 17 years of age who was involved in a misadventure in the course of which a policeman was killed. If two persons were involved in this misadventure it could happen that the more hardened of the two, the one with perhaps a greater responsibility for the killing of the policeman, would have his case adjudicated immediately and perhaps the cabinet in its wisdom would decide his sentence should be commuted. The other person, being under age 17, would have to wait until he was 21 years of age before there would be any disposition of his case. He might be an entirely different person by then. At the time of arrest, he might have been perfectly capable of rehabilitation, of remorse for his crime and of adopting a whole new attitude toward his responsibility in society. But he must wait until he is 21 years of age. God knows where he would be located in the meantime, but since I have had to make certain assumptions for the purpose of my argument let me assume he would be confined with people who would not help reform him in any way. His jailors may wish to reform him but he may be with a group of hardened people who only set him more in his antisocial attitude.

So, being an amenable person before reaching age 17, he is now at age 21 faced with a crime he committed at age 17. Where are his legal rights? The court may deal with him as if he had been then and there convicted of the offence, to which has was found guilty at 17. Perhaps I niggle too much when I look at those words, but it seems to me we then take a man at age 21 and decide to deal with him as if he had committed the offence at that time rather than at some time in the past. Because of his attitude at this time, largely induced by being in prison, I suggest this man could be found guilty of a capital offence, such as capital murder, in which case he might be hanged. We have these two persons, both involved in a crime, one of whom being a few days older than the other knows of his punishment, which may involve commutation of sentence, while the other person must wait four years and a few days until he is age 21. His attitude at this time may be entirely different. For this reason, I believe this is a very dangerous approach and one to which we, as Members of Parliament, should give very earnest consideration. We might wonder whether we should be looking at this type of delayed sentencing at all or whether we should take some entirely different attitude.

This is the reason I reject the philosophy of the legislation which is now before us. I say it is wrong in our enlightened society, and in what we profess to call a civilization, to have a threat of punishment hanging so long over people's heads, in some cases up to a period of 11 years and in many cases for a period of at least four years. What is this supposed to produce? Is it intended to produce a person who will absolutely bow to whatever whim his jailors impose on him? They may tell him not to be fractious because it would have an affect on the judgment given. He is not dealing with parole. He is appearing before a judge who takes the reports and then determines what punishment he should receive. So, I believe it is dangerous in this regard alone. I do not think it helps, because for one thing the rehabilitation period is put off, I presume, until after the time of sentencing. I believe these circumstances alone should make us take a long hard look at what we are being asked to do.

Then, I see things such as clause 4. The previous speaker could not find it, so I shall place it on the record. It has been read by others who have taken part in the debate. At page 5 of the bill under the heading "How Young Person Dealt With", we find this:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest those words are novel words, but if they have any meaning in a bill such as this they would probably be better placed in a preamble or in some pious statement rather than being given the purported sanction of law. I suggest that they are so general as to be almost meaningless. No two judges and no two courts could determine exactly what is meant by these words. With everybody being put in the position of a young person's parents, this would mean there would be that many different opinions concerning what sort of treatment, guidance, care, custody or discipline should be given to a young person. I suggest in this sense the words are meaningless. Their first cousin is clause 7 which deals with the limitation on arrest without warrant. I would like to see that clause couched in different terms.

Earlier I mentioned the objections of the provinces to it. A strong objection has come from Mr. Grossman of the province of Ontario, who is their correctional services minister. He said that his department would have to provide about $20 million worth of new accommodation if the federal bill were passed. He said, and I quote from a Canadian Press dispatch in the Ottawa Journal of November 18:

He said he doubted if Ottawa would help finance the extra training schools. It was a situation where the federal government drafts legislation the provinces have to pay for.

I think he is quite right. There is no financial help for the provinces in this legislation because I notice that we do not have the resolution that normally accompanies legislation when there is a payment out of the public purse. So, I assume that Mr. Grossman's objection is correct. He also makes the objection—and I referred to it in part earlier—that the bill labels children as criminals and that it would return the judge to the legal straitjacket of giving a determinate sentence. He said that research by his department has shown that legislation "should create a suitable framework for positive action to be taken on behalf of the child rather than against the child". Here I am quoting what Mr. Grossman is alleged to have said as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 10. So, on two separate occasions this responsible minister in our most populous province has voiced his objections to the bill. I suggest he has pretty serious reservations to it.

One would like to take a measure such as this, particularly one that is piloted by a rookie minister, and refer it to a committee so that the bugs in it could be ironed out and so that we could come up with a bill that commends itself. But once in a while we have to take a more drastic approach to proposed legislation and we have to reject it out of hand, even at the second reading stage, and say that it is so unworthy of the time of Parliament and its philosophy is so unjust that it cannot be acceped.

That is the reason my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), moved his amendment and the reason that I seconded it. I think the bill, in the words of that amendment, should not now be read a second time but the subject matter thereof be referred to a task force appointed under the Inquiries Act. Surely, Canadian youth not only expects better but should be given something better than what has been placed before us.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the technical problems, I shall begin. I wish to speak on Bill C-192 respecting young offenders, which was long in coming.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Indeed, the last legislation on the subject goes back to about 1929, if my memory serves me well. Nothing much has been done since and today in 1971, we have before us a bill which raises a general outcry from coast to coast, we must admit it, although it contains some good points.

Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset of my remarks to make a review of the main provisions of this bill that I find especially pernicious, and whereby instead of making progress, of becoming more humane, of improving things, we keep on treating juvenile delinquents a little like dirt. I am sorry to say that, but that is the way I see it.

Under the existing Juvenile Delinquents Act a teenager up to 16 or 17 years of age, that depends on the province, can be found guilty only of juvenile delinquency. Now under the provisions of Bill C-192, a young person could be found guilty of any, and I quote:

—offence created by an Act of the Parliament of Canada or by any ordinance made thereunder—

I am now referring to clause 2.

Mr. Speaker, clause 2 puts in another light the problem of the young delinquent, who is practically without any protection at the responsibility level, insofar as the breach of any federal law is concerned. From now on, the young person who transgresses any law of Canada can become a criminal and be considered as such.

Secondly, the procedure of the court before which the young person will appear, once he is charged, will be under Bill C-192 much more formal, and here I refer to clauses 26 and 28.

Let us point out the presence of a lawyer to advise the young person and the elements of a real trial, including the cross-examination of witnesses, as well as the sentence set by the judge, if the latter finds the young person guilty of an offence.

None of these elements is to be found in the old act, but according to the bill proposed today, the young person, the young offender, will be put in the same overwhelming atmosphere as adults guilty of any offence under the Criminal Code.

The young person who knows practically nothing of life, whose experience of life will have been nothing but unhappy, of whom one often says that he is not directly responsible, finds himself in a world of adults where his future is at stake while he, very often, does not really understand how it is that he has ended up there.

We, adults, who want to help the young, give so much importance to their situation that they feel that everybody is against them instead of helping them.

What the young people need is not a court, not a cross-examination of witnesses, not sentencing, not a judge; instead they need more understanding, more human feelings and above all rehabilitation.

One clause of Bill C-192 state that a young person shall be, and I quote, —dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision,—

The bill is in fact a miniature Criminal Code.

The same philosophy still prevails in other clauses of the Bill.

If the hon. minister, on the one hand, seeks to modernize legislation in this field it is obvious that his actions go much farther than his thoughts and, in fact, he puts young persons who have been found guilty of an offence in a situation where they will not be considered as juvenile delinquents but rather as juvenile criminals, a feature which stems from the bill now before us.

For instance, under clause 30 (4), a young person found guilty of an offence for which the minimum sentence is death or life imprisonment can be committed to a training school till age 21. Then, he shall be taken before a Superior Court which shall sentence him as if he had then and there been convicted of the offence that he was found to have committed. Otherwise, the young offender will be struck twice: the first time being committed to a training school—we should rather say a breaking-in school, as for animals—until he is 21, and the second time, at 21, when receiving a sentence now imposed by the Superior Court.

Mr. Speaker, this bill creates not only a criminal condition, but proves harsher for the young person found to have committed an offence than for the adult recognized as such under the Criminal Code.

I am now continuing my analysis and shall refer to clause 74. In fact, according to clause 74 of the proposed legislation, if the judge so orders, the Identification of Criminals Act can apply to a young person. In other words, the police can photograph the young person, take his fingerprints and bully him without the consideration due to a human being, as is still done today for adults.

Mr. Speaker, here again, a de tacts situation is created, the young person is being upset and no effort is made to understand him.

May I be allowed, on the conclusion of this analysis, to revert to this particular point.

According to paragraph (3) of clause 19, and I quote:

—a young person apparently over the age of fourteen years who cannot, in the opinion of the judge or the clerk of the court, be detained safely in any other available place, may be detained in a place where adults are detained pending his first appearance in court or during an adjournment of his hearing.

• (5:50 p.m.)

So, Mr. Speaker, not only is the young person immerged in a noxious legal situation, but still the society will not succeed in rehabilitating him, not even in understanding him. Not only will he be judged, not only will he be condemned, not only will he be sent forcibly to a reformatory, but in addition he will be thrown in prison with adult criminals, with men often perverted in their minds or acts, so that when the youth comes out he will be twice as bad, if I may use the expression, as before.

Under clause 30 (1), the judge may place the adolescent on probation, or place him in a foster home or group home, or again, place him under the care of a children's aid society for a period of two years at the most, which point is important. I am inclined to think that the minister did not dwell on that point, that he did not deal with both sides of the matter with regard to that period "not exceeding two years" during which the judge can still send the adolescent to a training school for a period of three years at the most.

Mr. Speaker, all this boils down to a sentence imposed by the judge for a minimum as well as a maximum period, exactly as is the case with criminals.

Under the present legislation the judge does not have that sentencing power. He commits the young person to one of the above-mentioned institutions until he is rehabilitated. Under the bill for which the minister seeks approval, the judge gives the young person a sentence of two or three years. It is a matter of "take it or leave it." No maximum or minimum sentence is imposed under the existing legislation but under the proposed measure there are definite sentences—for instance two or three years—against a youth depending on how serious the offence or whether the judge is competent or not.

Mr. Speaker, there is no clause in that bill dealing with the delinquent's rehabilitation nor with the humanization of his condition. If a young person has reached the point where he can be considered as young delinquent, in most cases it is because his family or school circle have not shown enough understanding, have forgotten or rejected him. Feeling psychologically rejected, he has reacted and has attempted to create his own society. This is the problem of our youth. Since society does not give him the opportunity to integrate and live like others, the youth breaks away and attacks that society which considers him guilty of offences.

Finally, our society, which is responsible for the situation of the teenager, condemns him because it is stronger. Under the pretext of improving the situation, the minister makes it more serious by considering it as criminal.

Mr. Speaker, reformatories for young offenders have long been considered as coercive institutes. The so-called Saint-Vallier Home, which is operated by the Corporation Berthelet-Saint-Vallier, has become a dump where more than 250 children and teen-agers are thrown together.

What is the minister doing? Absolutely nothing! But at the same time he considers the young offender as a criminal. Will he change this situation? No, Mr. Speaker. He will show obstinacy, he will argue with Quebec about who is responsible. There is the conflict of jurisdiction!

Mr. Speaker, for a long time we have confused the predelinquent and the delinquent as we still do today. Some delinquents are very dangerous individuals and yet we confuse them with the mentally deficient and youngsters who are simply unhappy or abandoned, so that in the end they are all together and irrecuperable as their situation has deteriorated and we have been unable, I will not say to list them, but at least to understand them and their personal problems.

These adolescents literally rot without proper care. The bill under consideration will contribute to aggravate the problem if the government does not decide to invest the necessary suns of money towards the fulfilment of the human person.

Mr. Speaker, assuring sound fulfilment to the human person, particularly to helpless people, is priceless. It is not a matter of money, it should be a matter of time. This matter should be dealt with; it is of great urgency.

The report of the Prévost Commission of Quebec is a charge against the judiciary system, including legislation, social welfare courts, judges of juvenile courts, government inefficiency, jurisdictional conflicts, juvenile reception and detention centres, and also against the citizenry's refusal to carry out its responsibilities towards the forsaken young.

Mr. Speaker, no account is taken of the findings of the Prévost Commission when—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but, as it is six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to Standing Order.

POLLUTION

LAKES ERIE AND ONTARIO AND ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—TABLING OF FINAL REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table herewith the report of the International Joint Commission on pollution of Lake Erie, Lake Ontario and the international section of the St. Lawrence River. This report is also being released in Washington today by the government of the United States.

The final report represents the culmination of six years of work following upon a request in October, 1964, as supplemented by a further request in 1969 to the IJC by the two governments for an inquiry into the extent, causes and locations of pollution in these waters.

The breadth and scope of this report shatters all precedents. It deals with the most extensive water pollution studies undertaken anywhere to date. The report provides guidelines that can be an inspiration to the peoples of Canada and the United States in the critical period ahead to deal with the Great Lakes pollution problem. It provides a basis for the concrete action that is now already under way with the assistance of the interim reports that the commission has made to the two governments over the period of the entire study.

• (2:10 p.m.)

In this report the IJC states that:

1. The waters are being seriously polluted on both sides of the boundary to the detriment of both countries to an extent that is causing injury to health and property.

2. The polluted waters are lakewide in extent; the principal causes are wastes discharged into the boundary waters and their tributaries by municipalities and industries.

3. Urgent remedial measures are required; these are set out in specific recommendations for action by the two governments and all responsible jurisdictions in both countries. Programs to be agreed upon to meet the water quality objectives are set out in the report. These are aimed to bring about immediate reduction of the phosphorus content in detergents, the prompt implementation of vigorous programs to treat municipal and industrial waste, and the reduction of phosphorus inputs into these waters. The report also contains programs to deal with problems caused by oil spills, mercury, radioactive substances and other hazardous material entering these waters.

The need for urgent action is based on the commission's findings that Lake Erie, particularly its western basin, is in an advanced state of eutrophication, and that accelerated eutrophication is taking place in Lake Ontario.

The report recognizes that governments will have to enter into agreements for the carrying out of programs and of measures and schedules to achieve them. The report recommends that the commission be given the authority, responsibility and means for co-ordinating and ensuring the necessary surveillance and monitoring of water quality and of the effectiveness of pollution abatement programs. It further recommends that the reference of October, 1964, be extended to authorize it to investigate pollution in the remaining boundary waters in the Great Lakes system and waters flowing into it.

A meeting with the United States at the ministerial level in Ottawa last June initiated discussions which are now continuing between the two countries aimed at more effective co-operative action to control pollution and water quality in the Great Lakes.

The June meeting, at which Canada was represented by members of the federal and Ontario governments, established a joint Canada-United States working group to study various ways of creating a more effective basis for co-operation to deal with Great Lakes pollution in light of the findings and recommendations to be contained in the final IJC report as now presented.

The joint working group met in Washington in September and organized ten subgroups to examine in detail particular aspects of the problem. On the Canadian side, some 100 experts from several federal government departments and from Ontario government departments and agencies are involved, together with a corresponding number of officials from United States federal departments and Great Lakes States' governments.

The joint working group will report to a second ministerial meeting on Great Lakes pollution planned to take place later this year. Decisions taken at this second ministerial meeting will provide for concerted programs aimed to achieve agreed water quality objectives and the means to put such programs into action. These programs will include a commitment to implement other recommendations contained in the report and to establish effective mechanisms to perform the necessary surveillance functions.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the many people in Canada and the United States who have contributed to the work behind this important report. In particular, I would like, on behalf of the government and the people of Canada, to thank Mr. Christian Herter, chairman of the United States section. As members will know, the chairman of the Canadian section for the past eight years was the late Arnold Heeney. His contribution to the work of the IJC was perhaps the crowning achievement of a life devoted to the public service of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I would also like to acknowledge with appreciation the help and support of the public in both Canada and the United States by participation at the commission's public hearings and in other ways. Without such public support this great undertaking, to overcome the Great Lakes water pollution problem, cannot succeed.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to extend the thanks of my party for the courtesy of the minister in making a copy of his statement available to us prior to this afternoon's sitting.

What we have heard this afternoon contains both good news and bad news. I should like to deal with the good news first. It is good news that the minister made a short statement on the matter and that after six years the report has been tabled.

Now for the bad news. What we have before us in this report is a compilation of facts that were evident six years ago. I pay due respect to those who compiled the report because I am certain they did everything they could within the guidelines and regulations laid down for them. Nevertheless, as long as six years ago it was estimated that industrially, privately and commercially along the shores of the Great Lakes 2,800 commissions, agencies and bodies were studying pollution in the Great Lakes system.

The report contains some recommendations which, if implemented, will perhaps improve the situation. Unfortunately however, this government, like other governments before it, still seems to base everything on reaction rather than action. It talks of setting up even more committees, making more analyses, conducting more studies and giving the matter more consideration. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have that much time left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: Coming as I do from the shores of Lake Erie I see at first hand the tremendous problems that are caused by pollution. They are not simple because as a result of the actions of this government, the government of the United States, state governments and provincial governments the operations of some of our great industries have come to a halt. The fishing industry has been greatly curtailed because we are not certain whether the fish are contaminated, and until we have established the necessary standards and are certain the taking and using of certain fish is prohibited.

The tourist industry is also affected. People of the world will not come to Canada to enjoy the fishing and recreation in its waters if they feel the waters are polluted. Even worse, expansion of the agricultural industry is being impeded because we do not know what regulations will be established regarding the effluent from cattle feed lots which have become so prevalent because of the rearing of animals in confinement.

There will also be no expansion in the construction of atomic power units or in the development of lumber processing and of steel complexes until the government lays down guidelines and regulations which will enable long term investment in these primary industries. As an indication of how important this is, I point out that while we are delaying in this country the laying down of regulations, Canadian experts are developing a steel complex in Turkey, an atomic plant in India and lumbering in France. We are spending millions of dollars all round the world, money which we need right here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement which, like an old law of physics, is a self-evident truth. No matter how many words or how much verbiage are used, the fact still remains that committees, discussions and studies will not solve the problem. It is evident that to solve it millions and millions of dollars must be expended. Governments on both sides of the water system must be willing to spend such sums now to deal with the problem of pollution and clean up the waters of the Great Lakes.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we too regard the minister's statement and the report that has been tabled as being of the utmost importance and urgency. The report demands a high priority of attention on the part of this and other governments. It concerns Lake Ontario, upon which my constituency abuts and which, to put the words of the report in plain English, is dying. It concerns Lake Erie which is already dead. But its importance extends to all the freshwater resources of Canada upon which the livelihood of many Canadians and the quality of life of many others depend.

The findings of the report are not new but they are clear. First, there is serious pollution on both sides of the boundary. Second, this is caused by wastes discharged in boundary waters and their tributaries by municipalities and industries on either side of the boundary. Third, urgent remedial measures are required. What is now required, Mr. Speaker, is not words but action, concerted action on the international, federal, and indeed provincial levels.

As I have said, the situation is not a new development. In 1909 Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty solemnly engaged the high contracting parties, as they were called, that the boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary should not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other. This solemn engagement, made 60 years ago, has not been observed properly by either side.

In 1950, 20 years ago, the International Joint Commission produced a report on this very subject, which I have on my desk. The conclusions of the commission at that time were expressed in language almost identical with that of the present report. It said that the waters on both sides of the boundary were then being polluted.

With the treaty clear and the facts clear, what has been the reason for inaction? It has been due to lack of determination to take adequate measures of enforcement on both sides of the boundary. I suggest there is a new feature now that perhaps will result in a more genuine effort in the future. It is the weapon of public opinion. Public opinion is becoming aroused by this situation and is demanding action. I know that many of my constituents, particularly of the younger generation, are deeply concerned.

The statement refers to a second ministerial meeting on Great Lakes pollution arranged to take place later this year to plan concerted programs and put them into action. The minister's statement does not reveal when this meeting is to take place. I suggest that if it is not to be held at an early date consideration be given to updating it, in consultation with the United States government authorities, in order to get early action. Both sides have wasted too much time and words. The day for effective enforcement and action is long overdue.

May I conclude by paying my personal tribute to Mr. Arnold Heeney who is mentioned in the statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the subject of pollution of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario brings no news to the members and the citizens who are familiar with our country and particularly with the Great Lakes area.

Since industry has been pouring waste into those two lakes for so many years, their waters have been polluted for quite a while. For several years, all levels of government have been aware of raw sewage being discharged directly into the lakes.

In fact, 25 years ago the federal government was already aware of the problem raised by pollution of the Great Lakes and of the majority of our rivers, but in those days they were not courageous enough to propose solutions to cure it.

Today, we must face the facts, that is: pollution. While we have been afraid to take measures when it was time, we must now spend millions of dollars to control efficiently pollution of the Great Lakes. And yet, we have found no solution.

We are told: Lake Erie is polluted, and so will Lake Ontario be in a short while, as well as Lake Superior. We have organized meetings, ten years ago, between the representatives of the U.S. and Canadian governments, to find out that these lakes were becoming more and more polluted, and, six months ago, to find out again that they were still polluted. We are looking for solutions.

It is said that it will cost a lot to the citizens to improve the situation, but if we had had the courage to take our responsibilities when there was still time, we would not have to face this problem today. Which does not mean that we should not do anything to improve the situation. On the contrary, it is time, for instance, to forbid big factories to spill their waste into the waters of the Great Lakes, and to forbid municipalities to send their sewage into these lakes, and then to take the necessary steps to clean these waters.

The same problem will crop up with regard to other waterways among which the Ottawa and St. Lawrence Rivers. Today there is even mention of pollution in the far North.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I feel that before we have to repair the damage we should pass legislation designed to prevent altogether pollution of our pure Canadian waters.

AGRICULTURE

INDUSTRIAL MILK—ANNOUNCEMENT OF MARKET SHARING AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION AND ONTARIO AND QUEBEC MARKETING AGENCIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the House that an agreement was signed at 12.30 p.m. today between the Canadian Dairy Commission, on behalf of the federal government, and the milk marketing agencies of Quebec and Ontario, bringing into effect a market sharing system for industrial milk in these two provinces which together produce 80 per cent of the total Canadian milk production. It is expected that the marketing agencies in other provinces will join the plan in the near future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Olson: I am not sure whether spokesmen for the opposition parties have received a copy of this statement. If they have not—

An hon. Member: We have it.

Mr. Olson: That is fine, then. I need say no more about that.

The agreement establishes, as of December 1, 1970, a supply management program for milk used in the manufacture of dairy products and is designed to keep production in balance with domestic requirements on a butterfat basis. It applies to all milk used for manufacturing purposes, whether from industrial or fluid milk producers.

The producer's market quotas will be based on his deliveries between April 1, 1969 and March 31, 1970, or on his subsidy eligibility quota if that is greater than his deliveries.

Each producer will receive a market price related to Canadian price support levels for deliveries up to his market sharing quota. Prices for deliveries over market quota will be related to world prices for surplus dairy products.

The Canadian Dairy Commission has been deducting a holdback from subsidy payments and using this money to offset costs in disposing of surplus products, but will discontinue deducting this holdback from producers' subsidy payments on their eligibility quota in Ontario and Quebec on their last December deliveries. Producers in those two provinces will receive the full rate of the subsidy of $1.25 per 100 pounds of milk on the basis of their subsidy eligibility quota.

In place of the holdback from the subsidy there will be a levy on the market price paid to producers up to March 31, 1971, of 26 cents per 100 pounds of milk on deliveries by a producer to his market quota and a levy of $2.40 per 100 pounds of milk on deliveries in excess of his market quota. These levies will be collected by the provincial agencies and the funds remitted to the Canadian Dairy Commission to offset costs in disposing of surplus products.

The agreement also applies to cream shippers in Quebec. The levy on cream to be collected is 1 cent per pound butterfat on deliveries up to the producer's market quota and 50.28 cents per pound on deliveries in excess of his market quota.

Although the agreement now covers only Quebec and Ontario, other provinces are considering entering into a similar program and the present agreement provides for replacement by another which would be open to participation by the appropriate agencies of any province.

I wish to congratulate the provincial marketing agencies of these two provinces and the Canadian Dairy Commission on achieving this agreement as well as the farm organizations which have fostered and supported the plan. It is an example of how a co-ordinated approach by national and provincial agencies and producers can operate for the benefit of farmers and their industry. It is our hope that this type of co-operation will be extended to other areas of agriculture through the national marketing bill now before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, on behalf of my colleagues, that we consider the minister's statement as being a very valuable and a very fortunate one for the producers of Quebec and Ontario.

I also wish to congratulate provincial marketing agencies which did their best so that, as long last, this agreement could be signed. In fact, I believe that this will be done today.

I have received a copy of the statement a few minutes ago and I would like to comment briefly on it.

Undoutedly, this statement is in itself a good thing, but it would be erroneous to think that it will bring about better days for all milk producers.

It might be well to go back to last year, at a time when dairy policies had been quite stormily discussed. I well remember adverse criticism of the "penalization" which, according to the minister's statement, is finally being abolished, a penalization which was fatal for a number of producers both in Ontario and in Quebec. That is certainly good news for those still involved in the dairy industry.

[Mr. Olson.]

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I still regret that no assurance was given to dairy producers that there would be free distribution of milk in schools and shelters ensuring additional consumption of our surplus production.

We had hoped that a pension scheme might be established for older farmers forced to give up dairy production, and also retraining courses for younger ones who want to earn their living in another field because their operation is not profitable enough.

In the light of the current increase in the cost of living and in costs, I would have hoped that the support price would be raised to $10.

I trust that these few comments will be considered by the minister and that following this excellent news our milk producers will also be able to expect to fare better, which can only be achieved through the enactment of a policy which is more human than the previous one. This government must do away with the disincentive policy which resulted in a large number of milk producers being forced out of business and who have been on welfare for year or two.

I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), being aware of such problems, will shortly announce a new policy in the best interests of milk producers, not only in Ontario and Quebec, but throughout the country.

[English]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the producer organizations concur in the program which has been developed, I assume that it is reasonably satisfactory to the producers in those provinces. This may be too much to assume in that similar programs introduced in the past have later proved to be unsatisfactory to a considerable number of producers.

The minister's statement implies that other provinces will participate in this program on the basis of this agreement. It seems to me that the other provinces, particularly those in the west, will be faced with the situation of two major provinces having reached agreement on a pattern and the other provinces being called upon to sign a protocol. I am not sure whether the protocol will serve these other provinces well.

It is not made clear what deduction will apply to cream shippers in other provinces if they participate in a similar agreement. In fact, the situation of the cream shippers in other provinces is not necessarily the same. What will happen to the cream shippers in Saskatchewan who, in desperation, have been producing cream without benefit of the subsidy because they have no other way of obtaining funds? What will be the amount of their deduction if they come into the plan? The minister stated that another agreement will be signed and we do not know what that agreement is.

The minister also stated "It is our hope that this type of co-operation will be extended to other areas of agriculture through the national marketing bill now before the House." If the national marketing bill is passed, I hope this agreement will not set the pattern. Many members from other parts of Canada will insist that the two major provinces should not set the pattern for the sale and subsidization of agricultural products in other parts of Canada. There must be negotiation with all the provinces concerned before an agreement is signed and approved by the government.

I do not think this agreement is good enough. I appreciate the difficulties, but I have strong reservations about the minister's statement that, because an agreement has been reached between the government and the two largest provinces, possibly in due time the other provinces will enter into the same or a similar agreement. The day before yesterday a cream shipper in my province spoke to me about the size of the deductions. The livelihood of many people depends on this policy. I hope serious consideration will be given to the producers of the other provinces. Although the two provinces that have signed the agreement represent 80 per cent of the production, the other 20 per cent is very important to a large number of farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the statement which the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has just made. I had been looking forward to hearing this statement for a number of weeks in the hope that it would announce changes in the area of collection. In short we are just changing collectors since instead of the Canadian Dairy Commission boards and producer organizations are going to do the collecting.

I had also hoped for improvements in price levels.

For three years the dairy industry has been the subject of many discussions between the producers on one side and the government on the other side, not only the present government but also its predecessors as well as the provincial governments.

A lot has also been written about this important industry. For a long while, we have had to contend with the writings of some newspapermen like, for instance, Mr. Jean Simoneau, of the Sherbrooke Tribune. This man was making statements even before the House could learn about the issues and this was absolutely against the rules. This same man has disparaged all of us federal members. We were dragged out into the streets like dirty pigs, like headless animals, during the demonstration which took place in Sherbrooke. Yet, God knows how earnestly we exerted ourselves to improve the lot of industrial milk producers. We worked hard to have certain regulations passed, to obtain a better legislation, to extend the consumer markets wherever possible. People do not seem to be aware of the efforts we made with a view to improving the situation.

Mr. Speaker, the dairy industry is vital to the province of Quebec, even though a lot of farmers—thousands in fact—have been obliged to give it up because of the lack of income. Today, we were hoping for a statement on an improvement in the field of prices.

I remember that for several weeks the Committee on Agriculture has been studying this important question of the dairy industry. We heard knowledgeable witnesses Serious briefs were submitted and interesting suggestions were made which we might implement. All this has been put aside; we let time slip by with the idea that things would settle, so that small producers disappeared one after the other. Our organizations, our industrial milk producers had undertaken to reduce production even in the face of an increased demand by the consumers. Since consumption is tied to the purchasing power of the public, the demand is smaller. So our producers have accepted with difficulty and reluctantly to lower production in line with purchasing power of the masses and the possibilities of the market. At that time we get the promise that, if we could reduce production down to the suggested level, there would be an improvement in prices.

In his statement, the minister said that the agreement signed today would be effective as of December 1, 1970. In my opinion, it would have been possible—and I make the request while it is not too late—considering improvements in the field of exports and the reduced production, to make it retroactive to April 1, 1970. The milk production for the full year 1970-71 would have been covered and there could have been considerable improvements in the revenue as well as a smaller penalty against those who had surplesses.

In any event, I urge the Minister of Agriculture to keep on working to improve the situation so that the few producers who are still active get the greater returns to which they are entitled. I insist because I know the situation. Every day I get letters in my office from people asking that everything possible be done to improve the situation.

I would like, contrary to my habit, make a slight digression, Mr. Speaker, if you allow me—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member makes his digression, I must remind him that under the rules, the remarks of a party spokesman, following a minister's statement, must be brief. The hon. member stated at the beginning that he would speak briefly. He indicated then and there that he might be out of order. I would invite him to conclude his remarks as soon as possible.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I usually follow your advice and I shall do so today. I am respectful of the standing orders.

The digression is this, and I make it without malice. It happens that members of my party represent rural ridings. Some organizers with or without malice say that the dairy industry is in a fix, it is because those ridings are represented by Creditistes. Now, the Minister of Agriculture himself is a Creditiste—

Mr. Speaker: Order, I take it for granted that the hon. member has finished his digression and is about to conclude his remarks.

MEASURES TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion. I base my reason for so doing on the following facts.

During December, unemployment in Canada rose from 476,000 to 538,000 and reached 6.6 per cent of the work force, seasonally adjusted. It was 155,000 higher than in December a year ago. What is particularly alarming is the refusal of the government to introduce measures to stimulate sales of Canadian products and thus increase production and produce more jobs. The government has refused specifically to lower income taxes to stimulate purchasing power and thus increase sales, production and jobs, to lower business taxes to reduce production costs and selling prices, thus increasing production and producing more jobs;—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should indicate what the motion is that he intends to propose under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Mr. Hees: I have just about arrived at that point, Mr. Speaker—and to introduce tax incentives to increase productivity, thereby lowering costs and selling prices and increasing production and jobs.

The reason I move this motion is the government's persistence in adopting the kind of measures that have proved totally inadequate during the past three years while unemployment has been steadily rising. Therefore I move under Standing Order 43:

That the government immediately convene a meeting of representatives of the provinces, municipalities, organized labour and industry to consider and recommend adequate measures to be taken without delay to stimulate the economy and thereby combat serious and rising unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion that would be proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

AIR CANADA

EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I ask the consent of the House to move the following motion:

That the problem arising as a result of the announcement by Air Canada that 415 employees are to be laid off almost immediately be referred for investigation to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, in view of the fact that this announcement comes at a time when unemployment in Canada is higher than it has been during any period in the last ten years.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, of which he has just apprised the House, requires unanimous consent. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the Chair must inquire whether there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent forthcoming and the motion cannot be put.

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY TIDES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43, requesting that immediate action be taken by the government to refer the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board report to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated his willingness to review the findings of this board if requested to do so by the governments of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In view of the fact that such a request has not been made by these governments, I therefore move:

That this House urges the government to refer immediately the report of the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board to the Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works, coupled with all other pertinent information presently available and with the power to call witnesses and introduce evidence that pertains to this proposed development.

Mr. Speaker: Again this is a motion which requires the unanimous consent of the House and the Chair must inquire whether there is unanimity in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

INCOME TAX ACT

On the order: Introduction of bills:

December 19, 1970—The Minister of Finance—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an Act to amend that Act.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether this notice could be dropped from the Order Paper for the time being?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, perhaps I should indicate that notice of a motion under Standing Order 26 has been received from the hon. member who is now seeking the floor and also from the hon. member for Spadina. They are on the same subject and I would assume that the same ruling, one way or the other, would apply to both motions. Perhaps the Chair should allow both hon. members to state the substance of their proposal, after which the Chair can give a ruling.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the present national crisis arising out of the alarming increase in unemployment showing the number of unemployed in December, 1970 as 538,000, the highest in the last decade, an increase of 155,000 over December of the previous year and an increase of 62,000 over the preceding month. Moreover, preliminary surveys show that unemployment for this month will be approximately 100,000 higher than the December figure, thus necessitating an immediate emergency debate so that the government may indicate what steps it intends to take to reduce the human misery involved in this disastrous situation.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also ask leave to make a motion under Standing Order 26 for the adjournment of the House to discuss a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration.

There can be no matter more important and more urgent for discussion in this House today than the unemployment figures released today by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, when considered in light of the social unrest in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated a moment ago, both the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the hon. member for Spadina gave the required notice under Standing Order 26. The Chair has given the matter very serious consideration in the meantime.

As the House also knows, motions under Standing Order 26 dealing with the unemployment situation in Canada have been proposed on a number of occasions since the beginning of the current session, usually following publication of Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports. The last such motion was proposed on December 10, 1970, by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, and on that occasion the Chair made the following ruling:

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has given the required notice of his intention to move the motion to which he has just alluded. As the House knows, similar motions have been proposed from time to time following the publication of DBS monthly reports. The rulings of the Chair have consistently indicated that Standing Order 26 is not applicable in such circumstances.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I should add that since the House still has before it consideration of the budget, including an amendment on the subject of unemployment, I must rule that it would not be in order to initiate a new discussion at this time, under Standing Order 26.

I should think the same ruling would have to be made in the present circumstances. The subject matter of the motions is of the greatest importance; it is one of urgency and of concern to all members of the House. At the same time, because of the continuing nature of the problem it is difficult to see how a debate could take place by virtue of Standing Order 26. It is particularly relevant that there is still before the House, as there was when the motion by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate was proposed about a month ago, an amendment to the budget motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West which deals specifically with the subject matter of unemployment. The fact that the problem is now before the House and that there will be an opportunity to discuss the subject matter of the motions proposed by the two hon. members leads me to the conclusion that the motions ought not to be put at this time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. In view of the fact that your Honour has made a ruling denying an emergency debate on unemployment at the present time on the ground that the budget debate has been adjourned, it would seem to be appropriate to inquire whether the government would be willing to resume the adjourned debate either today or within the next two or three days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that this is hardly a question of privilege. It is a valid question and perhaps it might be asked by the hon. member of the House Leader. When we reach the question period in a few minutes I will then recognize the hon. member for that purpose.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—EMERGENCY OR MIDDLE-TERM PROGRAMS TO HALT TREND

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the unemployment statistics alluded to today, as released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the manpower department, showing the critical unemployment situation across Canada, especially among breadwinners whose ranks have swollen by 56,000 in a one-month period, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the government has any new emergency or middle-term programs which will at least halt the direction of the unemployment trend in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I share, as does the government, the hon. member's concern about the unemployment situation in Canada. As has already been said in the House, the government has brought forward a series of measures which are still under discussion in the House in connection with the budget debate. Indeed, there has been a very rapid shift in government policy toward stimulation of the economy. I would welcome at any time on behalf of the government on this important subject and I would be happy to see a debate take place in the next few days.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED RESCINDING OF INCOME TAX SURCHARGE AND BUILDING MATERIALS SALES TAX

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the very serious statistics which have just been produced regarding mounting unemployment in the country, is he now prepared to revise the position he took when he presented his budget in December? Is he giving any consideration to rescinding the 3 per cent income tax surcharge and removing the sales tax on building materials with a view to stimulating the economy and creating effective demand as one of the best means of helping to solve the unemployment problem?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as has been indicated by the Acting Prime Minister, the government is continuously concerned about unemployment in this country. As a matter of fact, the government's fiscal position has switched almost to the tune of $2 billion since last March. In this regard I should like to point out to hon. members today —

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Don't be so darned complacent about it!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Finance has the floor and should be allowed to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, far from being complacent about it, the government has changed its fiscal position completely over the past year in this regard. I should also like to indicate that in respect of one of the budget measures, which provides $150 million for provincial projects, we have now been in touch with all of the provinces. They have all indicated their willingness to take these funds and proceed immediately with the expenditure of the $150 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know there are a number of supplementaries, but in fairness at this point I think the Chair should first recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR RESUMPTION OF BUDGET DEBATE TO DISCUSS PROBLEM

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Privy Council. I should like to ask him whether he would schedule, as the first item of business for Monday, the continuation of the budget debate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will consider the representation. The program for the business of the House is laid out and members are prepared for it, but I will consider a resumption of the debate at least for a day at an early opportunity.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED WORKS PROGRAM AND REBATE OF BUILDING MATERIALS SALES TAX IN WINTER MONTHS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Acting Prime Minister as the first question was directed to him. As there are now 50,000 persons on relief and thousands more unemployed in Toronto alone, would the government consider a crash program of winter works and a rebate of the 11 per cent tax on building materials for construction in the winter months?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is now a very large expenditure program under way as a result of the measures introduced by the government and particularly by the Minister of Finance. I really think this is a time for constructive measures to deal with the underlying causes of unemployment which are very complicated in North America. As the Minister of Finance said, this government, far from taking a complacent view, has switched its fiscal position by $2 billion within a few months.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see that a number of hon. members are seeking the floor for supplementaries. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South and return to hon. members who seek to ask questions on the matters.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MANPOWER RETRAINING—REMOVAL OF PROVISION REQUIRING THREE YEARS IN WORK FORCE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in the hope that he will not be as satisfied with the situation as other ministers are. In view of the fact that a very large number of the unemployed are young people, 218,000 out of 538,000, has the minister given further consideration, as he promised last December 10 he would, to the possibility of amending the requirement in the regulations or in the Act of three years in the work force before a trainee may be entitled to allowances? Is he ready to announce such a change at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the training programs of the Department of Manpower of course are extremely useful in providing upgrading for people who are unemployed. The three-year rule is designed to put emphasis on the training and upgrading of those who have been in the work force, and who are not simply regularly in the education process, as well as those who are most likely to be vulnerable to unemployment of a long term nature. It is not the view of the government at this time that these directions should be changed.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SPECIAL MEASURES TO ASSIST QUEBEC TO PROVIDE NEW JOBS

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a supplementary?

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that in the province of Quebec in particular 42 per cent of the unemployed are under 25 years of age and that the main objective of the provincial government is to create 100,000 jobs, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether serious and specific discussions are presently underway between the federal government and the government of Quebec with a view to finding a quick and specific solution to the serious problem now facing this province by making sure that these 100,000 jobs are actually created?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated in my budget speech that many of the measures would be of great assistance to Quebec and, as a matter of fact, of the loan fund of $150 million I mentioned a few moments ago about $68 million will go to the province of Quebec. That province has indicated it is ready to let tenders now and proceed with providing jobs out of this amount of money.

UNEMPLOYMENT—INCOME AND BUSINESS TAX REDUCTIONS, PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the very serious unemployment situation and the forecast that it will grow worse before it becomes better, is the government giving consideration to reducing income taxes and business taxes, as well as granting tax incentives to increase productivity?

Hon E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have of course considered these particular matters. I do not think that reducing the income tax would provide an immediate reduction in unemployment in Canada, as is advocated by the leader of the Opposition who is travelling across the country. As a matter of fact, the reduction in income tax he has suggested would cost over a billion dollars.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my understanding of rule 15 (3) is that ministers need not reply but when they do their replies should be responsive, intelligent and relevant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I regret the hon. member's suggestions that what the Leader of the Opposition says across the country is irrelevant.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is also seeking the floor on a question of privilege. I have a suspicion that perhaps it, too, is not a question of privilege. Perhaps I am wrong and should first hear the hon. member. I feel we are dealing with a very important matter, and a number of members are seeking an opportunity to ask supplementaries, but I will first hear the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings on a question of privilege.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the snide remarks made by the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member initiates his remarks by saying that he is replying to the minister's statement. As I have already indicated to the House, there was no question of privilege in the matter raised by the Minister of Finance and therefore it should not be pursued.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROVISION OF JOBS FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES AND STUDENTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that soon there will be graduates and some 100,000 undergraduates of universities who will have no opportunity for employment this summer, outside of being sent around the country in buses, has the government any program for them at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply briefly, but I doubt whether the House would want the minister to give a general reply to the question at this time.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question seems to involve some confusion between long-term programs for employment and programs for summer employment for students who have not yet completed their courses. The indications, of course, are that the economy will be improving in 1971 and hopefully many graduates will find jobs as they enter the labour force. On the question of summer employment, I think this question was asked yesterday and I indicated that possibilities are being considered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North seeks the floor for a supplementary question, but there are seven or eight other hon. members who should be allowed to ask their questions before we get into the second round. I think at this point the Chair should recognize the hon. member for St. John's East.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ACCELERATION OF SPECIAL AREA ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAM TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the critically high unemployment in certain areas of the country, would he consider accelerating the special area provisions in his regional economic expansion program, in order to accelerate employment in these areas, especially since the program is slow in getting started in areas of critically high unemployment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are already doing it and, wherever possible, we will speed up the work.

UNEMPLOYMENT—APPROXIMATE NUMBER OF NEW JOBS IN QUEBEC IN 1971

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

In view of the fact that estimates set at 50,000 the increase in 1971 of the labour force in the province of Quebec, can he give us an idea of the number of jobs his department will create during the year?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that I can give exact numbers at the present time.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT—PLANS TO ASSIST WEST COAST FISHERMEN

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Inasmuch as his licence limitation program for salmon fishing has driven fishermen out of the industry and into the ranks of the unemployed, and inasmuch as the minister is not willing to go to Prince Rupert or at least Vancouver to discuss the matter and face the fishermen whom he is driving out of the industry, would he be prepared—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member recognizes that the form of the question is not in order. Perhaps he might come to the question.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The form of the question was most necessary, Mr. Speaker, in order to put the matter in perspective. Would the minister be prepared, even if we have to wait until Monday, to stay here and engage in a debate during which he could outline what plans his department has to cope with the chaos that has been created?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. According to the roster he was to be present in the House today, but—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Scott: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I believe there are still a number of supplementary questions. I appreciate that hon. members have other matters they would like to raise but perhaps we might have a few more supplementary questions first.

[Mr. McGrath.]

UNEMPLOYMENT—SPECIAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE JOBS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the above average increase in unemployment in the Atlantic region between November and December as reported by DBS, and also in view of the possible diminution of the special areas program for expansion, can the minister indicate whether his department will in fact implement special programs to deal with the abnormally high rate of unemployment in the Atlantic region?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the very object of the program is to create jobs in the Maritimes in particular, and also in Quebec.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ASSURANCE THAT LOAN TO QUEBEC WILL BE USED TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

In answer to my colleague of Lotbinière, he stated a moment ago that amounts of $150 million and $68 million would be paid to Quebec to help that province fight unemployment. Now, I would like to know whether the minister is sure that Quebec will use this money to create new jobs and not to make up the deficit of its Department of Education.

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Of course, I cannot accept all the facts which the hon. member put forward because I am not sure whether they are correct. I question reliability of his information. However, I should indicate that our information from the province of Quebec is that they will use the $68 million to proceed immediately with work with which otherwise they might not be able to proceed with.

UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFECT OF SEAL QUOTA SYSTEM

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and it concerns unemployment. Would the minister consider eliminating the discriminatory quota system which allows the Norwegians to take 100,000 seals as opposed to the Canadian quota of 50,000, thereby putting Canadians on an unequal footing with the Norwegians?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we are getting somewhat away from the original question. But I note that the hon. member has an important question to ask, and I will come to him in a moment.

UNEMPLOYMENT—TORONTO—EFFECTIVENESS OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister resulting from his answer to my first question. Will the time lag on the government's construction program to which he referred be less than three months, and how will the program help the Toronto area in the winter months?

UNEMPLOYMENT—EXPANSION OF ELIGIBILITY FOR WELFARE BENEFITS UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a supplementary question. On December 10 I asked the Prime Minister a question relating to the disastrous increase in welfare costs to the municipalities and communities in Canada arising from increasing unemployment. At that time, the Prime Minister said that the problem was being considered. Can the Acting Prime Minister now say whether the government has considered the possibility of discussing with the provinces the expansion of rights and eligibility for social welfare assistance coming under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As the hon. member probably knows, a meeting is scheduled for later this month with the provincial welfare ministers, at which time I am sure this question will be raised.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON FORECASTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My supplementary question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government's forecasting machinery has gone seriously awry, has the government made any new estimates and forecasts of the expected unemployment parameters? Would the Acting Prime Minister be prepared, in co-operation with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, to make these estimates available to the Canadian people and members of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As I recollect, the Minister of Finance in his budget speech forecast the course of events. He forecast a steady reduction in seasonally adjusted unemployment during 1971. We have no reason to change this forecast.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a point of order, but I suggest that perhaps we might give other hon. members an opportunity to take part in the question period after I have recognized the hon. member.

Mr. Lundrigan: I would like to say for the record that the Minister of Finance did say that the unemployment picture—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member now wishes to rise on a question of privilege, I understand.

Mr. Lundrigan: The Acting Prime Minister, in giving information to the House, is certainly misrepresenting the words of the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ACCELERATION OF PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman whether anything has been placed in the Public Works coffers since December 15 in view of the very serious unemployment situation?

An hon. Member: Wake him up.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Yes, a sum of $23 million has been made available. In addition, we are accelerating the work under way not only in the Maritimes and in Quebec; we are also bringing forward in the Prairie Provinces and in the province of British Columbia work which we had intended to do later.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear. That is the only responsible answer we have received today.

UNEMPLOYMENT—FORECAST FOR MARCH, 1971

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the estimate by responsible academic economists that the number of unemployed by March of this year will be over 750,000, could the Minister of Finance indicate to the House whether the estimates prepared by his department confirm or reject this estimate?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This question was raised a little earlier. In my budget speech I said that I felt seasonally adjusted unemployment had peaked and would gradually work downwards. I also said that there may be month to month fluctuations from the trend, and one-tenth of one per cent represents a month to month fluctuation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we should now give an opportunity to the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton.

HEALTH

REPORTED REJECTION BY ONTARIO OF CERTAIN DRUGS APPROVED BY FEDERAL DEPARTMENT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the minister answering for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns reports that the Ontario health department's Parcost program has been rejecting drugs for use in Ontario that have previously been approved by the federal department of health. I would like to ask the minister if he is aware of this practice, and whether or not he has had discussions with the Ontario provincial Minister of Health with a view to clarifying the situation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice for the minister and get an answer for the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF ARMS BY FRANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I move to another topic arising out of questions that were asked yesterday in connection with the sale of arms to South Africa. Would the Acting Prime Minister say whether or not Canada, as one of the member nations of the Francophone organization, has taken up the question and objected to the Republic of France selling arms to South Africa during recent months? In particular, have any direct representations in this regard been made to France, which today is one of the leading merchants of death?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows, the Francophone organization is concerned wholely with cultural, educational and technical matters. It does not have, as does the Commonwealth, any political ties and it would not be appropriate to raise in the Francophone organization questions of this kind. But may I say that in the United Nations Canada has made its position quite plain on this issue, and I join with the right hon. gentleman in expressing the hope that no country will supply arms to South Africa.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall not answer the misinterpretation placed on my words by the minister because, after all, deception under the new rules has become a rule in which some of the ministers are proficient. I ask the minister directly. In view of the interest of Canada in assuring that South Africa shall not receive arms, have representations been made to the Republic of France against the large sales that are being made by it, not only to South Africa but to other countries?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, as I have said we have joined in the United Nations in opposing France, as well as all other countries supplying arms to South Africa. I have no hesitation in associating myself with the right hon. gentleman on this, and I hope he associates himself with the government's position in opposing the action of the British government if they decide to do so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Scott.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the right hon. gentleman is seeking the floor for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. I am not used to having brush-offs, and I ask the minister specifically, have representations been made to the government of France? Isn't that a simple question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

SALE OF ARMS BY FRANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN ABSTENTION FROM UNITED NATIONS VOTES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since he mentioned earlier that our position has been made clear at the United Nations, could he indicate if this was the reason for our abstention from a number of votes on this question in October?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It was the reason that, with the approval of this Parliament, Canada decided not to supply any arms to South Africa, notwithstanding some of the resent representations I have heard by some members of the hon. member's party to the effect that we should resume shipment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUND FOR LOANS TO PROVINCES TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the reported willingness of the provinces to make use of the loan fund announced in the budget, and in view of the fact that a seasonal upturn in unemployment rates of .1 means some 60,000 to 70,000 jobs, will the minister consider an increase in the moneys allocated to this fund, and will he consider making a portion of the payments from this fund in the form of grants?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the size and the amount of the fund were clearly outlined in the budget speech. I should indicate that the amount of money involved in this fund is about six times what used to be spent annually on winter works.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, have any of the provinces made a request for allocation of a larger amount of funds than was announced in the budget?

Mr. Benson: The allocation was made on the basis announced in the budget speech. Officials of the Department of Finance and of other departments have been in touch with the provinces, and most of the provinces have indicated exactly how they will use the funds.

THE CENSUS

METHOD OF RECRUITING COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

As 1971 is national census year, what procedure will be adopted by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to choose the district commissioners who will be responsible for the census in every constituency?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that this question could be placed on the order paper. If it is urgent, the House would be willing to consider it at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot ask a supplementary to a question which was ruled out of order. However, the hon. member might perhaps ask another question.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is the following: Since the government will certainly appoint commissioners to take the census, could he tell the House what qualifications will be required of them as how they will be appointed? I consider this matter as an urgent one, because, according to my information, this will be done shortly.

Mr. Speaker: If there is an emergency, as the hon. member suggests, it might be useful to discuss the matter at the time of adjournment, if the hon. member would kindly give me notice of it.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INFORMATION CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO OFFICIALS ACCOMPANYING PRIME MINISTER ON ASIAN TRIP

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. Since reports indicate that there are 15 members from the CBC and five from Weekend News Magazine accompanying the Prime Minister on his trip abroad to report on the Prime Minister's numerous frolics, has Information Canada any members accompanying the Prime Minister? If so, are they wearing their maple leaves as described yesterday by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): The answer in both cases, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC WORKS

BRIDGEWATER, N.S.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the statement made today by the Minister of Public Works concerning work projects being moved ahead, could he indicate when the public building promised by his predecessor for Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, in 1968, will be built?

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON TAX REFORM INTENTIONS

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In light of the unacceptable climate of slow growth and uncertainty in the economy, is the minister prepared to state on motions the government's specific intentions in the area of tax reform?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, very recently I stated in the budget, which is still under debate—I understand we are going to have another day's debate on it very soon—the government's outlook with respect to the economy and economic policy. In the area of tax reform, which will not result in any additional revenue for the federal government, I have indicated a system of reforming taxation which I would hope to bring forward next spring.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will assist the minister if I ask a supplementary question. In order to stimulate the housing industry, is the minister now prepared to drop publicly the idea of a capital gains tax with a five-year re-evaluation clause applying to housing?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, there never was a capital gains tax with a five-year re-evaluation clause applying to housing in the white paper.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES OF CRASH PROGRAM TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a very simple question. In light of the fact that the budget proposals advanced by the minister responsible for fluctuations have not been effective, has the Prime Minister or the government any intention of discussing with the provincial governments and other people an immediate crash program to deal with the very serious unemployment situation that now exists and will continue for the next three or four months at least?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing with the provinces, as the Minister of Finance has said, the implementation of the proposals that are already under discussion. I do think, if I may so suggest, that the time to have this debate is not the question period but during the debate on the budget, which I hope will be very soon.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have been trying for six months to persuade this government to do the things which it now finds, too late, should have been done before.

SEALS—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CANADA IN QUOTA

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I again direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I do so with great respect to your earlier ruling. I contend that the question concerns unemployment because the regulations of the department which are being imposed by the minister are having the effect of preventing a number of people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor not for the purpose of disputing the Chair's ruling but for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the minister or to his Parliamentary Secretary. Would the minister give consideration to removing the discriminatory quota which allows the Norwegians to double their harvest of seals from the Canadian front as opposed to our own sealers?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the minister may wish to give that matter consideration.

Mr. Woolliams: Why is the minister not here?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order as a result of a remark made by the Acting Prime Minister and the ruling you just made. When the hon. member for St. John's West asked his question Your Honour said that he could not dispute the Chair's ruling. The Acting Prime Minister has reflected on the decorum of the House and on the Speaker by saying that a debate was going on during the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

GRAIN

WHEAT—SECURING OF FULL SHARE OF MARKETS FOR CANADA IN NEGOTIATING INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the statement made by Dr. Shebeski, the eminent crop scientist at the University of Manitoba, while speaking in Saskatoon, that Canada had lost a substantial percentage of its share of the international wheat market, can the minister assure the House that in the coming negotiations in Geneva for a new international wheat agreement, Canada will make every attempt to negotiate an agreement which will permit us to recover our full share of the international wheat market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement to which reference has been made. Of course, it could have been accurate about a situation which has long since passed. Since then, exports of wheat and other grains from Canada have shown very substantial increases. Canada again has a very significant share of world markets not only in wheat but in other grains, and there have been record rates of exports of barley and rapeseed.

MONTREAL—ALLEGED TAPPING OF NEWSPAPER TELEPHONE LINES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

According to a statement made this morning in Montreal, eavesdropping devices are reported to have been connected to telephone lines of a Montreal daily, and I would ask the minister whether he can tell us if this was done by a police force, federal or provincial. If not, is the minister in a position to assure the House that he will investigate the matter?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a statement. However, I believe it is recognized here that any question covering national security is one to which replies must be restricted, and I am definitely not implying by this statement that such activities are believed to exist.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PLANS TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I see that his seat is now very much closer to me, for which I am very pleased. In view of the very serious unemployment situation on Cape Breton Island, may I ask the minister how soon we can expect a statement either from him or from officials of the Cape Breton Development Corporation regarding that corporation's future plans for Cape Breton, with particular emphasis on creating employment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is a well-known fact that there is a branch of DEVCO whose responsibility it is to promote the industrial development of Cape Breton. So, I urge this company to undertake industrial development projects in as many directions and as quickly as possible; but this is not something that can be done overnight.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if it is correct that there is a large-scale plan on his desk awaiting his approval at the moment? If so, how soon will he approve this plan? Also, how soon will he appoint a vice-president in charge of industrial development, a post that has been vacant for many months?

Also, will he give some assurances, if that body has not completed the investigation, that a public inquiry will be initiated, to investigate whether there is any substance to the allegations concerning drug planting attempts?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SIZE OF TORONTO OFFICES

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Labour or to his Parliamentary Secretary. Are the unemployment insurance offices in Toronto so small that applicants for unemployment insurance must stand in line outside, or, is the picture in Time magazine not what it purports to be?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the question as asked is in order. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I feel the question is urgent. Are the facilities not adequate? These men are pictured as standing outside, and it is cold. May I ask whether the offices are adequate to meet the needs in Toronto?

Mr. Diefenbaker: To be adequate, they would have to be as large as skyscrapers.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that there are no line-ups outside any UIC offices in this country and that the picture in Time magazine purporting to show a line-up outside a UIC building in Toronto is misleading in that the building is not a UIC building in that city.

Mr. Baldwin: Where is it then? In Vancouver?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FAILURE TO ANSWER ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question but I am not quite sure how to proceed. Perhaps Your Honour could advise me whether it should be put as a point of order or as a question to the Minister of Agriculture. The problem is that several weeks ago I put a question on the order paper seeking certain statistical information from the Minister of Agriculture. One part of the several parts of the question was:

> What are the names and addresses of the vendors of herds—

I might say that the question refers to certain transfers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: Just a minute, now. I wish to be accurate, Your Honour, and I had a little difficulty seeing without my spectacles. The question related to the transfer of milk quotas. There were eight parts to the question, only three of which are relevant...

An hon. Member: To what?

Mr. Nesbitt: Relevant to this point of order, at least. The relevant parts refer to the names and addresses of the vendors of herds, and the relevant dates are between April, 1970 and December, 1970. The next part asks, what are the names and addresses of the transferees in each case and, third, what, in each case, is the amount of the quota transferred? I might say, Your Honour, that this information is required, under the rules of the Department of Agriculture, to be registered with the department. The reply that came from the minister's office, or presumably from his office, said that it would take 700 man-hours to provide this very brief information which must be kept in the department's ledgers. May I ask the minister why it would take 700 man-hours, which I frankly do not believe, to provide this information which is required under the Act?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the transfer of subsidy eligibility quotas, of course, can take place only between the person who holds that quota and someone who purchases the herd. The quota goes along with the herd, or any part of the herd.

Mr. Nesbitt: Is that what causes trafficking in quotas?

Mr. Olson: From the way the hon. member put his question, and I will be glad to review it, I understand that all this information relating to all the transfers would have to be taken out of the records. That is where the 700 hours come in. These records are kept by us—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I imagine that the matter might be further reviewed elsewhere between the hon. member and the minister.

IMMIGRATION

GROUNDS FOR BARRING ENTRY OF ABBIE HOFFMAN

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I wish to address my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Yesterday the minister was asked about the admission to Canada of a gentleman named Abbie Hoffman for the purpose of some program. At that time he replied he had not ruled on that matter. I understand that since then this gentleman has been refused admission to Canada. What is the reason for this action? Also, does this represent a change in policy on the part of the department?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will not repeat my answer of yesterday, Mr. Speaker, since it is on the record. I do not think it is necessarily what the hon. member suggests. I can report a little further on the case. Mr. Hoffman subsequently presented himself at a port of entry. He was examined in accordance with the Immigration Act. He was found to be in a prohibited class under Section 5D of the Act and was ordered deported. He did not appeal.

Mr. Brewin: Will the minister state whether advice was sought from the Department of Justice on whether the offence of which he was convicted in the United States is a crime involving moral turpitude within the meaning of the Immigration Act?

Mr. Lang: I will have to check to see whether specific advice was sought with regard to this particular offence. Of course, there would be general consultations between the departments with regard to the question of how these words should be interpreted over a period of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period expired some minutes ago. Perhaps the matter raised by the hon. member for Greenwood might be continued tomorrow by the hon. member and the hon. member for Egmont. For the moment, perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton Centre might be permitted to ask a question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because of the iniquitous roster system it will not be possible to continue this matter tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the circumstances referred to by the hon. member for Egmont, perhaps he might be allowed to ask a supplementary.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Can the minister indicate the reason why this ruling was different from that of the present House Leader when last September this gentleman was admitted to Canada for a brief period? Has there been a change in policy since the September admittance?

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a question of privilege. A moment ago I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration the reason for the change of policy. The minister was not permitted to answer. I wonder whether the minister might be permitted to answer because I believe it forms an important part of the inquiry at this point.

Mr. Speaker: When hon. members ask questions such as why a decision is different from what it was before, that is a debating point rather than a legitimate question. This is the reason I interrupted the minister before he had a chance to reply. I am not certain whether he wished to reply. If it is the wish of the House to conclude the matter in some way, the minister might be allowed to reply to the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lang: The decision does not reflect any change of policy. Each particular case, of course, has to be examined on its own merits. Obviously, differences of time and circumstances can affect a particular decision.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENTS TO ACT TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): In the absence of the Minister of Labour I will address my question to his Parliamentary Secretary. In light of the increasing levels of unemployment, and particularly the increase of 32,000 unemployed persons between the ages of 18 and 24, is the government now going to introduce emergency amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide greater access and assistance for the young and hard-core unemployed?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I am sure the hon. member is aware that extensive changes in the unemployment insurance regulations are pending. We look forward to his enthusiastic support when the legislation is brought before the House.

Mr. Paproski: I hope we will get them right away instead of in 1972.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the President of the Privy Council as to the business for the balance of this week and next week. Possibly by now he has been able to consider the matter of the budget debate. If it is not going to be resumed soon, will the minister take the advice of the Acting Prime Minister and find some means by which the House can discuss the problem of unemployment?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give the business of the House and deal with the question of the resumption of the budget debate. We hope to continue today with the young offenders bill. This will be followed by the crop insurance bill, the Northern Canada Power Commission Act amendments, Yukon minerals, the textile legislation, statutory instruments bill and the Canadian National Railway and Air Canada financing bill and then the government organization bill. I have been calling legislation rather than the budget debate in order to get as much legislation as possible before the committees.

In view of the representations made by hon. members and the desirability of dealing with the issue that has been raised, if it is agreeable I propose to interrupt this program, call the budget debate on Monday, have one day on the budget debate and then resume the normal business.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the minister consider extending the debate to two days? At the end of the second day, a vote could be taken on the very reasonable amendment moved by this party. We could then ascertain the views of the government with regard to unemployment. Could there be a two-day debate rather than one?

Mr. MacEachen: For the moment, Mr. Speaker, I think that the opportunity of a full day's debate on unemployment is much more advantageous to the opposition than if Your Honour had accepted their proposal today, which would provide for a debate after the dinner hour. We might review the situation on Monday evening to see whether there would be any profit in resuming the debate on Tuesday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister to review this matter very seriously. It is not a case of a concession being made to the opposition. The rules permit six days debate on the budget. We have only had two days debate. There must be a further four days. I think that the suggestion that there be at least two days debate on this question at this time is reasonable and that the government should agree to it.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I suggest to the Government House Leader that it might assist in getting some of the legislation he mentioned dealt with rather quickly if he were to withdraw the young offenders bill and not further offend the House with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, it seems that a two-day debate should take place on the question of unemployment, in view of the differences of opinion which are now obvious. It would perhaps be advisable before the President of the Privy Council takes a decision that he should call together the House Leader of each party in order to discuss this matter and come to a decision which would be acceptable to all parties concerned.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISIONS REGARDING CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed from Wednesday, January 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-192 respecting young offenders and repealing the Juvenile Delinquents Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the amendment of Mr. Woolliams (p. 2381).

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, at the time of adjournment yesterday, I was speaking about the problem of young offenders and especially about Bill C-192 introduced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer). I then raised several points which I found unfortunate in that bill.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I said things and made criticisms that I think are valuable and I hope the Solicitor General will consider them carefully and find there food for thought in order to improve the bill that is before us.

Before closing my remarks, I think it is my duty to suggest to the government some ways to improve the most regrettable aspects of this bill, and, some day, we will have to agree there are many, beginning with the title.

While speaking to the House yesterday, the Solicitor General extolled in every way the merits of this bill, and I quote:

In short, those definitions which describe the young person as a juvenile delinquent have been removed. This shows the intention on the part of the legislator to remove the stigma of some traditional concepts and also to change the application of federal legislation regarding the age limit.

Mr. Speaker, in the title of the bill, we find the contradiction in this philosophy of the Solicitor General, and I quote:

An Act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

The minister himself said yesterday that we had to modernize the definitions used to refer to the young person. He said that we had to eliminate the odious aspect of some traditional concepts in the old 1929 act. But the minister is not inordinately logical and continues to favour the use of negative and odious concepts and expressions.

Let me now quote the recommendations No. 5 and No. 6 at page 283 of the report of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on juvenile delinquency. I quote:

The term "juvenile delinquent" should be abandoned as a form of legal designation and the term "child offender" and "young offender" should be adopted.

Recommendation No 6 reads as follows:

The title of the "Juvenile Delinquents Act" should be changed to "Children and Young persons Act".

Some might think those recommendations are secondary and unimportant. If the minister had had the slightest logic, when he introduced the bill, he would not have hesitated to change those terms which prove that nothing has been done and that the youth is still submitted to an atmosphere of terror.

We realize that the Solicitor General has limited intentions. His bill is a step backwards. It would have been an improvement if he had at least dared take his inspiration from the legislation of Britain or the Scandinavian countries where the emphasis is not put on the act or offence to condemn or treat the young offender as if he were a criminal, as we shall do if the bill before us is passed, but where there is concern to understand and help the individual himself. They try to give young people moral, physical and spiritual help. In Canada, we sentence them and pile them up in utterly inadequate houses of detention.

Mr. Speaker, the countries I have mentioned are applying methods designed to further young people's education so that these poor fellows are welcomed by society with understanding, love and support.

In Canada, we just herd them together, delinquents and pre-delinquents, alike, morally abandoned children with perversed children so that in the end they come out even worse than before.

Young people need help and understanding, not a disdainful judgement and sentence. If at least justice was fair and not of the kind that the Solicitor General is trying to impose through this bill!

[Mr. Fortin.]

Judges in general, and I am very sorry to have to say this, are not qualified in such matters. They have neither specialized knowledge nor proper training in this field, most of them having been appointed through political patronage as a reward or in order to stop them from hindering politics.

Mr. Speaker, it is the young offender who has to pay the price for this shortsighted policy which benefits only some politicians instead of insuring the development of man.

Now, the problem is much more serious than one would think. Mr. Speaker, may I point out that in the social welfare courts of Quebec alone, incompetent judges—and the solicitor general is well aware of this—have passed judgment on 25,133 young offenders, and, in 1967, on over 28,277.

Mr. Speaker, this represents an annual increase of more than 3,000 cases of teen-agers which have been caught red-handed and to whom no pity is granted. They are thrown in some hangars, jails or completely inadequate homes, with results such as can be seen at the Corporation Berthelet-Saint-Vallier.

When one realizes that henceforth, under the federal legislation under consideration, no distinction shall be made anymore between a 10 year-old child and a 17 or 18 year-old one, one can rightly wonder how far this inhuman system will go.

Mr. Speaker, one must not be surprised if, as of tomorrow, the problem of youngsters who do not integrate in society keeps worsening. We must establish consultation machinery by using the competent services of psychologists, doctors, psychoanalysts, social workers and teachers.

It is urgent that we set up shelters where young people will find peace, security, respect, moral support and understanding. It is urgent that we establish detection and protection services instead of relying on certain irresponsible parents who are anxious to be rid of their children and leave them in charge of welfare courts, saying: Look after them!

Detection services would make it possible to get hold of the adolescent before he becomes delinquent rather than having to try and recuperate him once the case has become practically desperate.

Mr. Speaker, retraining services for judges should also be set up in co-operation with universities so that they may acquire greater competence instead of being political slaves. Also, more judges should be appointed, in order that these cases should no longer be made to drag on, resulting in the rotting away of young people in absolutely unsanitary conditions.

Mr. Speaker, a distinction should also be made between age groups, so that 10 to 14-year olds are not dealt with in the same way as 14 to 18-year olds, since the responsibilities, concepts and experience of life of the latter group are not those of the former.

It is also necessary that the principle of a minimum or maximum sentence of two or three years, which is tantamount to dealing with criminals, be removed from the bill now before us. When a young person appears before the judge, he is subjected to cross-examination. Furthermore, he has been photographed and fingerprinted. This is absolutely heinous, since he is treated like an out-and-out criminal. And, accordingly, the judge hands down his decision saying: This young person will be confined to such and such a place for two years at the least and three years at the most.

As I pointed out the minister yesterday, there will be cases where young people will be tried twice because of their age if and when this legislation is passed.

It should be kept in mind while we consider this bill that it is not the young offender himself who wished for this unfortunate situation to develop, but our society is responsible for it has rejected him, it has failed to understand him, and has never given him the chances he needed.

Knowing, for instance, that 42 per cent of the unemployed in Quebec are less than 25 years of age, Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves whether the younger brothers of these jobless young men and women, realizing the situation which the latter have to face, are not giving up all hope saying there is nothing for them to look forward to. And what do they do then? They try to build a society of their own. This is in fact our problem today.

Bill C-192 is indeed a marvellous tool that will allow the Solicitor general and the judges to sentence and to judge young people for an offence for which they are not responsible.

These young people are victims. They are not guilty as the Solicitor General would like us to believe. According to the bill these young people are young offenders. As far as we are concerned we would like them to be considered as young victims. By considering these young people as offenders we punish them. We would like them to be understood, assisted and given a chance. It might be the only opportunity, the first opportunity these young people will have had in their lives.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleague for Champlain (Mr. Matte) pointed out yesterday, owing to the baleful influence of some irresponsible parents, of certain authorities which do not give a good example, of certain persons who administer justice just like they were sweeping a floor, by simply getting rid of young delinquents or criminals, those youth lose confidence in the future, in the society which adults have erected, in the concepts of understanding, help and hospitality, they lose confidence in the concepts of human respect. If we throw them in rotten foster centers, we will not make decent men and women out of them, only derelicts.

When one reads the report of the Prévost Commission which was set up by the Quebec government to consider this situation, one sees that this study represents a merciless reproof of whatever is going on in this area. On reading the voluminous reports of the Prévost Commission, one realizes that everything remains to be done in the field of juvenile delinquency.

I am astounded to see that the federal government is aware of these things, yet does not act accordingly; they are quite content to introduce a bill to crush the young delinquents further by treating them like so much dirt. Moreover, to hide their inaction or incompetence, they are quite content to nurture the conflicts of jurisdiction between provincial governments.

As hon. member of the NDP said yesterday that the age limit for young people varies according to the provinces.

No uniformity prevails in the administration of justice for a young offender so that in one province he will be convicted whereas, for a similar offence, in another province, he will not be.

Mr. Speaker, one wonders therefore what is the exact purpose of Bill C-192 at a time when everything has to start from scratch, when undertakings should be built on solid ground, when legislation should be based on the humanitarian principles which alone can insure self-fulfillment among young persons.

Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I see the hon. Solicitor General going for this legislation. Now, in 1971, the most acute problem for Canada is that of its young people for whom we seem to have no use. In fact they are let to vegetate because they were misleadingly told: Do study, do get diplomas, do improve on your qualifications. Today these young people outvie each other with their diplomas, but they have nothing to do for there are no jobs available to them.

Mr. Speaker, youths aged 10 to 18, aware of the situation, are not interested in falling into the trap and undertake studies. Nor are they interested in integrating into this society which denies some happiness, respect and security to their parents. Those young people lack comprehension and have no luck. However—and this is the most dramatic point—it is those youths who will be at the controls of our country tomorrow and it is on them that we rely for building Canada and fulfilling her ideal.

Mr. Speaker, they have been lured in the past and now they will be downgraded by Bill C-192. If in building this country the government fails to use this enormous potential of our youth, if it fails to understand them and give them a sound opportunity to participate really in our country's economy and its socialization, tomorrow we shall have an upset society and past Quebec troubles will keep on aggravating.

It is extremely important that the hon. minister should adopt new ideas, withdraw this pernicious bill, reexamine his concepts, draw inspiration from the new British law and the legislation of the Scandinavian countries since he is a young man. Let him prove it by showing us he understands young people. I have no doubt that if the minister were to put himself in the place of one of those young people huddled up like garbage in reception centres—rejection centres would be more like it—he would immediately throw the bill into the garbage can. Like the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), he would say: Enough nonsense. If the nonsense is over, let us be realistic and give young people a chance to build this country as our forefathers did.

But if we keep on rejecting young people as we do now in the economic, social and political fields, if we keep on deluding them by saying: Get educated and you will find a position, and that in the end they discover they have nothing, it will be a tragic tomorrow and I say it is this government that will have to bear full responsibility for such a situation.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I urge the minister to reexamine his position, to forget he is a liberal member and to try to forget that we are in the opposition. I hope in his new function of Solicitor General he will serve all Canadians and not the interest of the Liberal party and will realize that this bill should serve the interest of the young people. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if he can get across the narrow political barrier, young people will be happy.

[English]

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the minister. He is a young man who is well trained in the law. Unlike previous speakers, including the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), I do not believe the minister is not sincerely behind this bill or that it is something he inherited and, therefore, as a good civil servant or a minister he has to go along with it. I have known the hon. gentleman for ten years and he is not that kind of man. I think he is telling us the situation as it is. This is not a perfect bill but it is as good a bill as we could have at this time, and it is a lot better than the Juvenile Delinquents Act now in existence.

After listening to the speakers who preceded me one might think we were discussing a bill in respect of the conduct of young gentlemen and ladies in our social environment, or a bill which might be entitled, how to educate and accustom people to live in our society. What we are dealing with here, and I am looking at the title again, is an act respecting young offenders. In other words, this relates to a part of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Woolliams: Like the young man who loses his driver's licence.

Mr. Otto: Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary North will just listen and hear me out. We have a very small and confined sphere in which we, as Parliament, can act. I am sure we could have a bill that extended to all the corners in respect of treatment, care and mental health of young people. I am sure the hon. member for Lotbinière would not support this government if it were to usurp the jurisdictions of others. What we are saying here is that we have the jurisdiction to draft a criminal code. We are also saying that young people should not be subjected to the severity of the Criminal Code. We are saying the Juvenile Delinquents Act is not doing the job, after so many years, in respect of young people because of the caprice of juvenile court judges. Time and time again, this has been pointed out. So, we have a revision of the law. We hope it is better and I believe it will be proven to be better.

The objections seem to have centred around three points. The one in respect of the name I believe I can dispose of very quickly. In fact, I believe the briefs I have read complained about this bill being called an act respecting young offenders. It does not matter very much what it is called. Should we call it the Juvenile Delinquents Act? The connotation now is bad. We call this legislation the Young Offenders Act. This is the effect of it since we are dealing with young people who have committed an offence against official mores. Therefore, I do not believe the argument really has much bearing. We are not dealing with the behaviour or the social environment of children. We are not dealing with parental responsibilities in respect of children. Neither are we attempting to control their environment. We are dealing with a very narrow sphere.

I should like to deal with the objections in respect of a clause in the bill which would give very broad powers to a judge. Dealing with clause 30, I believe the hon. member for Calgary North outlined the awesome tribulations which would confront young people and the great power the courts would wield. One would think there could be absolutely no area in which these judges could be circumscribed. The hon. member referred to subclause (1) (k) of clause 30. I should like to paraphrase clause 30 since I believe it should be placed on the record. It is a broad clause. It provides that the judge shall consider the predisposition report, if any, made under section 35 and any other relevant and material information, and may then make any one of a number of dispositions. We are not giving the judge the absolute authority he has had in some cases under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. We circumscribe his power within these broad clauses. Subclause (1) (a) reads:

> where he is of the opinion that the appearance of the young person before the court is all that is necessary to render it unlikely that the young person will commit further offences, he may discharge the young person absolutely;

In other words, if in the judge's opinion there is no chance of repetition of the criminal activity he can discharge the person immediately. There is nothing wrong with that. Another discretion on the part of the judge is that he may adjourn the hearing for a period not exceeding two months if the young person and, in the discretion of the judge, a parent of the young person, agree to follow a course of action directed by the judge. Then, there are several subclauses. The judge may decide to proceed under a provincial act. He may impose a fine. He may order the person to pay a certain amount of money by way of compensation. This power is very narrow and he can do this only under certain terms and in respect of a certain amount. He may place the young person on probation. He may direct him to go to a foster home or to a group home. This, again, is restricted to a period of two years. It is not in perpetuity or for a period of five or six years. The young person has some protection. The judge must consider the predisposition report. He may place the child in the care of the children's aid society or in the care of the superintendent in some cases. He may commit the young person to a training school.

Now, we come to subclause (1) (k) which has aroused so much ire. Subclause (k) reads:

where he finds that the young person committed an offence for which he might, if he had been tried by indictment, have been sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life as a minimum sentence—

That narrowly limits it to capital crimes. The judge must use his discretion. He may commit the young person to a training school and so on, but first he would have to consider the predisposition report prepared by the staff. So, it is not an entirely mandatory thing; it is permissive. It is up to the judge to decide what he will do.

Then, we come to subclause (4) in respect of which there has been objection. This subclause reads:

A person who has been committed to a training school under paragraph (k) of subsection (1) shall, on reaching the age of twenty-one years, be taken before a superior court of criminal jurisdiction before which he, but for this act, might have been indicted under Part XVII of the Criminal Code; and that court shall thereupon sentence or otherwise deal with him—

That means he can be released. There is no mandatory duty on the part of a judge to sentence him again. He can be dealt with as if he had then and there been convicted of the offence. Then it goes on to state that the superior court shall have regard to the period of the detention he has undergone under paragraph (k) of subsection (1). So, indeed the comments made in this House that clause 30 is a very severe clause do not stand the test of careful scrutiny. We must circumscribe the judges' powers in some way but they certainly could not be looser than they are here. I believe that a careful examination would show there is no other way in which we could have dealt with this clause, and the circumstances which caused it to be there.

Now, I wish to deal with the subject of reform, because the minister has been accused of not being reform minded. I take it from the comments made in this House that the idea of reform held by many members is that it must be a constant movement toward permissiveness. Also, in other political ways, the idea of reform seems to be a continual movement to the left. This may be the opinion of some people in respect of reform but it is not my opinion. To me, reform means an examination of the facts as they currently exist. After an examination of the facts and the results of certain pieces of legislation, reform is the introduction of new methods and new techniques in accordance with those results and is not merely a constant movement toward permissiveness.

From the gist of the conversations that I have heard on the other side, it would seem that in all cases hon. members are very impressed with the fact that there really is no criminal intent among young people who commit an offence. Indeed, it is said that the only answer for a child or a young person who has run afoul of the law is education and a change in environment because this is a psychiatric problem. The prevalent idea is that criminal activity is unnatural and that the normal young person would never get involved in the theft of a car or a similar offence. This has been the conventional thinking up to now and we have gone along with it for 50 years. If we are going to pay any attention at all to the new psychologists and writers on these subjects, we should reconsider our approach. I might bring to the attention of the House writers such as Lionel Tiger, Desmond Morris, both of whom have now become fairly respectable, Mr. Robin Fox, Mr. L. Berkowitz and Dr. Konrad Lorenz. All of these authors are studying and researching the instincts of men and their reactions in society and to society. Let me quote from Mr. Tiger's book entitled "Man Aggression, and Men", in which he speaks of the reason for violence. He also speaks of the criminal conduct of certain individuals. He says: that the process which leads finally to violence is the same process which underlies a predictable, biologically "normal" pattern of social aggregation.

He says further that the emergence of violence depends on a number of facilitating circumstances which are social in expression and variable from place to place, time to time and group to group. All of these writers indicate that a young person who commits a criminal act is not necessarily abnormal. In fact, often he is quite normal. The only thing he wants to gain is a position of dominance and prestige by a short cut. Instead of going about it in the normal, conventional way which society dictates, he takes the short cut.

We say that this young man is not really committing a criminal act but rather that he is off his rocker. That is not so. He is probably much more normal and his psychological reaction is much more normal than that of many other people. There is nothing abnormal about the desire to gain a position in society among one's peers, except that this young man does not go about it in the conventional way. I say to you that many people are prone to park their cars in prohibited areas or to speed, even though they know it is not the right thing to do, but they want to get there first and they want to park their cars more conveniently. They will do it so long as they feel they can get away with it. All of us in society decide among ourselves which norms we are going to follow. So, the argument expressed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) that all these young offenders are really not criminals, but that what they really need is psychiatric treatment—

Mr. Gilbert: I did not say that.

Mr. Otto: That is what I understood the hon. member to say. He may want to look over Hansard, but this is the gist of what he said as I understood it. I also understood other hon. members to say that there is something abnormal about these people and that it is our job to treat them. I do not think they need treatment. For hundreds of years, when judging these people, the common law approach was to decide whether they knew right from wrong. On that basis, we continued year after year and decade after decade. The common law approach later changed somewhat to the extent that a determination had to be made whether or not a young offender knew the consequences of his action. We proceeded on that basis for a long time. For the past 50 years we have taken the approach that minors who act criminally should be treated differently from adults. This is the purpose of the bill. However, this does not mean that we should forget completely about the fact that a criminal act has been committed against society which laid down a certain code for the conduct of all people so that society can continue.

I do not think that reform means more permissiveness. I think it is time we reviewed the conduct of young people in society and also the whole question of deterrence. Some time ago we debated capital punishment in this House and whether or not capital punishment was a deterrent. We accepted the idea that punishment of any kind was never a deterrent of any consequence. The fact is that we argued in a very narrow field, and what we said in the House was that a person who does not contemplate murder but who commits murder is not deterred by capital punishment. That is true, but society does not yet say that the threat of punishment is not a deterrent. I think it still continues to be a deterrent and that young people who are taught a code of behaviour are aware of the consequences of their actions. This is indeed the role of the Criminal Code. If you want to say that this bill is the criminal code for young people, I cannot see much objection to that.

Mr. Gilbert: Shame.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member for Broadview finds this objectionable, but it does not matter what you call the bill, it is a criminal code and that is a fact. I think hon. members should reconsider their points of view.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Especially your minister.

Mr. Otto: No, I say hon. members should reconsider their points of view and consider carefully whether, first, this House should get involved with every aspect of a child's upbringing, education and environment. If that is the case, then we must consider a completely new constitution and a new confederation because our laws do not cover all those aspects. I would not be exactly in favour of it. This is not a country like the United Kingdom. Education is not under the jurisdiction of the federal government but of the provinces. Therefore, if hon. members would consider the very narrow field in which we have to work, I think they would find that the bill is a good one. The bill could be better if we had a little more freedom of movement, but we do not have it. We have the right to pass a criminal code, and we are now replacing the Juvenile Delinquents Act with much better legislation which gives the minor more rights, more protection, and indeed gives the minor the protection of the law which he did not have in the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to be an expert on the subject of the treatment of children in trouble. It is a subject I suggest which, to fully understand, requires many years of training and experience. The thing that alarms me about this legislation is that as far as I can make out anyone who has had training and experience in this field rejects the philosophy of the bill and rejects many of the details in this Young Offenders Act, Bill C-192. It is for this reason that I propose to vote against the bill, and to support the amendments.

The bill has been described by Judge William Little, who is Chairman of the Ontario Juvenile Court Judges, as frightening. It sets the clock back 60 years. Judge Little says the reason for that is it strips children of the special protection of the existing law which says they are not to be treated as criminals.

The bill has been attacked by the Canadian Mental Health Association. The Canadian Corrections Association has made critical submissions. The John Howard Society of Ontario is deeply disturbed, and a large number of qualified individuals have expressed their fears. It is my submission that it would be irresponsible for this House to proceed with the enactment of the bill without giving people representing these and other similar institutions, with years of experience and concern in the specialized field of dealing with children in trouble, the right to make representations, preferably before second reading when the bill is adopted in principle.

Someone already in this debate, I think it was the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), referred to an article in the Toronto Telegram of December 29 last by Yvonne Crittenden. In it she describes the barrage of criticism directed against the legislation in the following terms, "a half-pint Criminal Code," "inhuman and intolerable," and "a frightening piece of legislation."

The bill is full of legalistic terminology. It appears to be the work of old fashioned lawyers, who may indeed be conscientious and who may be seeking to give protection of the legal criminal rules to children in trouble, but who seem to be unaware of the basic need for flexibility and individual treatment, and the need of getting the case out of the criminal atmosphere of the criminal courts.

Nor is it sufficient to say, as the former solicitor general has said in a letter to members of this House—I think the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) was hinting at the same thing—that because the constitutional justification for Parliament legislating in this field is criminal law, the legislation must reflect the fundamental concepts of the criminal law. Such a statement begs the question, "What are the fundamental concepts of the criminal law?" Are they, as this bill implies, punitive, or are they remedial? Even in dealing with adult criminals, the remedial aspects of law are regarded in modern criminology as more important than the punitive and deterrent. How much more should this be so in the case of children?

In a publication of the Home Office in Great Britain, presented in April, 1968, to the British parliament by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, entitled "Children in Trouble," it is stated that juvenile delinquency has no single cause, manifestation or cure, and the range of behaviour which it covers is equally wide. At some point it merges almost imperceptibly with behaviour which does not contravene the law. The child's behaviour is influenced by genetic, emotional and intellectual factors, his maturity, and his family, school, neighbourhood and wider social setting. It is probably a minority of children who grow up without ever misbehaving in ways which may be contrary to the law. Frequently such behaviour is no more than an incident in the pattern of a child's normal development. But sometimes it is a response to unsatisfactory family or social circumstances, a result of boredom in and out of school, and indication of maladjustment or immaturity, or possibly a symptom of a deviant, damaged or abnormal personality. Early recognition and full assessment are particularly important in these more serious cases.

This report says, and I want to stress that this is at the very core of my argument, that variety and flexibility in the measures that can be taken are equally important if society is to deal effectively and appropriately with these manifold aspects of delinquency. The social consequences of juvenile delinquency range from minor nuisance to considerable damage and suffering for the community. An important object of the criminal law is to protect society against such consequences, but the community also recognizes the importance of caring for those who are too young to protect themselves. In recent years these two quite distinct grounds for action by society in relation to young people have been moving steadily closer together.

It has become increasingly clear that social control of harmful behaviour by the young, and social measures to help and protect the young are not distinct and separate processes. The aims of protecting society from juvenile delinquency, and of helping children in trouble to grow up into mature and law-abiding persons, are complementary and not contradictory. It is my complaint that in the present legislation before us, according to the best advice I can get, these principles are overlooked. Emphasis is on the protection of society by means of criminal law, and imposition of penalties or other punitive measures.

The present system, despite its defects, is flexible enough to deal with individual cases under indeterminate provisions for probation and detention in training schools. This enables the social measures to help and protect the young, as well as the interests of society, to be taken into account and the remedy to be fitted to the individual case. If a person is adjudged ready to be released from training school in three months, he is released in three months. If he is adjudged not ready to be released he can be detained, if necessary, for another six months. The present legislation would require that detention be for a fixed, determinate term, and I say that the most retrogressive feature in this legislation is this return to determinate sentences. I understand the reasons for the change suggested. I believe that it is to try to encourage uniformity of sentences, which may be desirable in dealing with adults but is entirely inappropriate when dealing with children.

I have had the advantage, Mr. Speaker, of consultation with Professor Stuart Ryan, Q.C., of the Department of Law at Queen's University. He has pointed out what he feels to be a lack of sufficient attention to the experience in other countries in the drafting of this bill. In West Germany the minimum age of criminal responsibility is 14, and in Sweden it is 15. The Kilbrandon Committee report, now implemented by legislation, forbids prosecution of a child under 16 in Scotland, except for homicide.

The committee report upon which the legislation before us is based seems to have been greatly influenced by the fact that in England children were charged with specific offences. Perhaps that is why it recommends specific offences here. Up to the time of the preparation of the committee's report, no indication of intention to change this practice had been given in England. But later, in August, 1965, a white paper entitled "The Child, the Family and The Young Offender" announced a change in policy. It was proposed to remove young people as far as possible from the penal jurisdiction of the courts, and to authorize local authorities to appoint local "family councils" to deal with each case, as far as possible, in consultation and agreement with parents, and with the power of reference to family courts where agreement could not be reached.

After more than two years of review and criticism of this proposal a new white paper in England entitled "Children in Trouble," to which I have already referred, was published in August, 1968. This paper proposed that no criminal or penal proceedings should be taken against a child under the age of 14. No proceedings should be taken against a young person between 14 and 17, without a special order to be made by a Justice of the Peace after hearing an application to show cause why a prosecution should be commenced. This proposal has been implemented by the Children and Young Persons Act of 1969, United Kingdom Statutes, Chapter 54.

I say that whereas the British, both in England and Scotland, having clung so long to the legalistic "young criminal" approach to the misconduct of children, have now completely abandoned that principle in England for children under 14, except for homicide, and almost completely abandoned it in Scotland, it seems strange that we in Canada are being asked to turn the clock back and pick up a method of dealing with the problem that has been cast aside. At the very least, if the new bill is accepted, the minimum age of criminal responsibility should be placed at 14, and children under that age should be dealt with under provincial care and protection legislation. In my view, Mr. Speaker, it is wrong to provide for uniformity of treatment and penal responsibility for all children between the ages of 10 and 17. Adolescence creates a barrier between the two groups within that range, and the fourteenth birthday may be a convenient barrier.

I want to speak about another aspect of this legislation that has already been dealt with in a number of speeches. I wish to speak about the combined effect of clause 31(a) and clause 34. Mr. Speaker, the combined effect of clauses 31(a) and 34 of the bill is grotesque. It appears that under these provisions a juvenile court judge can either prevent a superior court judge from sentencing a young offender or compel him to do so, as if he were convicted on his twenty first birthday. Does that mean that if the young offender is convicted of a murder which he committed at the age of ten, and if he has been detained until he has reached the age of 21 and is now before a supreme court judge, that that judge should now sentence him to life imprisonment, or to six months, or to four years or put him on probation? This provision should be entirely omitted, since it offends against the Bill of Rights as interpreted in the famous Drybones case, and because it imposes discriminations among classes of Canadians. It discriminates against young Canadians. I say that this is wrong and should be removed from the bill. If we believe that we should be punitive or retributive about homicide, why not do as the British legislation does and have the child tried in the criminal courts from the beginning for offences of that nature?

The other provisions, Mr. Speaker, will have to be dealt with in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and there are a great many of them. One extraordinary provision found in clause 31(a) and 32(1)(a) indicates that a judge may in certain cases prohibit the driving of a motor vehicle or the operating of a power boat for life. Imagine taking a child of 10 or 12 and saying, "You have driven a car or boat negligently, and therefore you cannot drive one again for the rest of your life." I suggest that this is obviously grotesque and ridiculous. There should be a limitation of three years; that should be the maximum limitation.

The stated principles of the new bill are all very well. Clause 4 reads:

> This Act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the rest of the bill, by the rigidity of its provisions, distorts these very principles and makes them difficult of application. I have had an opportunity of discussing this bill with those who are actually in this field in the province of Ontario. I have discussed it with people who have the responsibility of looking after children in trouble. They are alarmed and depressed about the proposals of this bill.

[Mr. Brewin.]

One can assume that when a bill is introduced under our parliamentary system, the prestige of the government depends on the bill being passed. For this reason, I suppose that an appeal to the government and to the minister to take a further look at the bill and either oppose it or withdraw it at second reading may be an illusory gesture. It is difficult to imagine a subject with such social consequences as this which ought less to be a matter of partisan considerations and of a vote along party lines. However, bearing in mind the way we do things in this House, I suppose the vote on the bill will be on party lines. I appeal to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer), if he cannot and will not withdraw the bill at this stage, to insist that the process of revision in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be broad enough and non partisan enough to enable the rethinking of the bill as a whole. If the principle of the bill is embodied in clause 4, which I have already recounted then, in my view, substantial amendment must be made to the bill to make it consistent with this admirable statement of principle.

I hope that the new Solicitor General, to whom I wish the best of luck in his new responsibilities, will accept the criticisms of the bill which have been made by opposition speakers. These criticisms do not always embody their own views only. They are the views of people experienced in this field. We hope that he will accept these criticisms, and if he cannot withdraw the bill, that he will at least ensure the approval and consideration of a substantial number of amendments in the committee.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to add my congratulations to those of the previous speaker. I congratulate the new minister and wish him every success in his new field. I enter this debate, Mr. Speaker, because I feel that although many good things have been said on the other side of the House about this bill, I, like my friend from York East (Mr. Otto), do not think it is a perfect bill. Many changes will have to be made or discussed in committee. Nevertheless, I feel that some of the criticisms which have been levelled at it from the opposition side of the House have been highly unfair and highly inaccurate.

I am referring particularly, Mr. Speaker, to certain comments that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) made in his speech yesterday. I notice that he is not in the House at this time. I feel that I must draw the attention of the House to some of the serious errors wich appear in the comments he made yesterday. He began by saying, as recorded at page 2374 of Hansard, that he hoped the minister would read the bill thoroughly. That was a fair comment, because a few sentences later he said, "...may I say that I have examined the bill carefully." He suggested that the minister had not been briefed properly. If the minister had not been briefed properly by the member of his department, then may I suggest in all earnestness and fairness that, in view of what he said, the hon. member for Calgary North must have been briefed by the writers of "Laugh-in" or of the "Red Skelton Show". At page 2374 of Hansard the hon.

member is reported as having referred to the Criminal Code. He read section 12, which reads as follows:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was under the age of seven years.

Then, he read section 13 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was seven years of age or more but under the age of fourteen years, unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct and to appreciate that it was wrong.

Next he said, "I had hoped that the bill would have done something to amend these sections." Well, on page 63 of the bill, Mr. Speaker, appear the two amendments to which the hon. member had not referred. Apparently, he could not find them; but they are in the bill at page 63. I just thought I would draw those amendments to his attention.

In the next paragraph there is a statement which is one of the greatest non sequitors I have ever seen. He said:

> At this time many of our people are unemployed. Many university graduates and college students cannot get jobs. With that in mind, surely the government could have come forward with a better bill than this.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I admit that a good many college graduates are unemployed at this time. However, I fail to see how this situation can be corrected by the contents of a bill dealing with young offenders, persons under the age of 17.

Mr. Benjamin: Get to the main point.

Mr. Murphy: I will get to the main point. The specific mistakes begin appearing at the bottom of page 2375 of Hansard and I quote:

> I intend to deal with some of the clauses, and with one of them in particular. Suppose a child aged 11 or 12 had, in some circumstances, committed murder. What would happen to him under the terms of this bill? It is so easy, under this bill. A child can come forward and say: "I am guilty". There is a clause which says you do not have to plead. You say "I am guilty of all this". However, if an offender were found guilty he would go to a training school until he was 21,—

I know that the hon. member is a very competent counsel. As such, I expect that he knows the intent and meaning of the words he uses. However, in this case he obviously must have been mistaken, misled or misinformed. He leaves the distinct impression that in the situation he describes it is mandatory under the terms of the bill for the juvenile court judge to send a young offender to training school until he is 21. As has already been pointed out, a reading of the section shows that is not the case at all. It is a discretionary power of the judge. He then said:

> —he would go to a training school until he was 21, with this offence hanging over him all the time. Then, at 21 he would be brought before a court like an adult under part 17 of the Code which deals with indictable, serious offences like murder, robbery with violence, manslaughter, theft of more than a certain amount, rape, and so on. Then, he would be sentenced as if he had been tried on that day. What would be the sentence? It would be life imprisonment,—

Nothing could be further from the truth under the terms of this bill. It could be life imprisonment. It could equally be an absolute discharge or a suspension of sentence without one further day being served. The hon. member seems to have overlooked that aspect of the bill. The hon. member maintains that he carefully examined the bill, but somehow must have missed that particular section. I continue quoting:

> From the time he was charged he would be incarcerated in a training school: He would put in eight or nine years there, and afterward he would put in 21 years unless the parole board leniently interfered with the sentence.

Again I say balderdash. The bill says nothing of the kind. It is less than fair for the hon. member to attempt to leave that impression before the House. The next mistake appears at 2376:

> That, as I have pointed out, is one of the worst features, right there. Suppose a child aged ten did not understand the consequences of his act. He could still be sent to a training school and then, when he was 21, even though he did not know what he had done when he was ten it would be presumed he would then, all of a sudden, become aware retrospectively of what he had done when he was ten. That is quite a reform.

That is not the case. As I read the proposed amendment to the Criminal Code which appears at page 63 of the Bill, the exact opposite is true. I will not take the time of the House to read the amendment. It states, in effect, that if the young lad did not know the nature and the consequences of the act and if the act occurred between the ages of 10 and 14, he could not be convicted of the offence. That is exactly opposite to what the hon. member stated in his speech yesterday. He further states as recorded at page 2376:

> In other words, after he has been trotted out at the age of 21 he gets the same penalty as if he had committed the offence at the age of 21, regardless of the fact that he has served all those years in a training school. Yet this is supposed to be a reform.

That is absolutely contrary to the contents of this bill. If a lad is brought before a court at age 21 for sentencing, if he is not discharged or put on probation, the bill specifically provides that the sentencing judge should take into consideration the time spent in training school. I do not know how the hon. member arrived at some of these conclusions. I feel they should be corrected. I quote from page 2378:

> All the lawyers, academics, psychologists, psychiatrists and sociologists I have talked to support this idea.

On two occasions in his speech the hon. members quoted letters. At page 2374 he quoted the letter from Dr. B. D. Frost. I presume he is one of the academic, intellectual, professional people to whom the hon. member referred. At page 2375 of Hansard he quoted excerpts from a letter from Professor Price of Queen's University. I gather he is one of the professionals with whom the hon. member talked. Both of these gentlemen recommended that the matter go before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. They made no mention of a task force as proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North. I believe that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is quite competent and capable to deal with the problems raised in this bill.

Mr. Gilbert: Nonsense.

Mr. Murphy: You do not have the faith in that committee that I do.

Mr. Gilbert: I am a member and I do not have faith.

Mr. Murphy: I feel that the members of that committee can call and interrogate witnesses as intelligently as any task force which might be appointed. The final insult is at page 2378 where the hon. member is recorded as saying:

> Let me point out that there is not much difference between a training school and a penitentiary.

I do not know whether the hon. member has ever visited training schools. According to his speech, he has visited penitentiaries. I point out to him that nothing is further from the truth. He winds up by saying:

> In fact, I think the old law was just as good. Perhaps in some ways it was better.

The hon. member refused to recognize some of the major differences. Under the old law it was not possible for the juvenile court judge to give an absolute discharge to a person appearing before him. This will now be possible under clause 30 of the bill. Under the old law, there was no maximum term of commitment to a training school. A child aged 12 could be committed until he was 21, at the pleasure of the school. Under the present law, the maximum is three years. That is a maximum, not a minimum. Under the old law there was no provision for disposal of a case without a hearing. There is such a provision under the new law. The juvenile court judge, under clause 23, has the power to dispose without a hearing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Airports—Provision of rapid transit ground facilities; the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—Oil—Possible review of National Energy Board policy; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave)—Wheat Board—Production and receipts policy—Statement in budget respecting stabilization payments.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

[Mr. Murphy.]

REQUEST FOR COPY OF A STUDY INTO THE CONDITIONS OF THE DISADVANTAGED IN QUEBEC

On the order: Notices of Motions (Papers); No. 115—Mrs. MacInnis—October 28, 1970:

> That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study undertaken by Le Centre de Planification Familiale, Montreal, in the fiscal year 1970-71, funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare on "Projet de recherche auprès du milieu défavorisé urbain Québecois".

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I might say there have been discussions with the hon. member who is the sponsor not only of motion No. 115 but the several notices of motions that follow it. It will be observed that these several notices of motions are directed to the Department of National Health and Welfare and pertain to certain studies they have conducted.

These motions can be grouped under headings dealing with birth control, family planning and genetic counselling. Because of the fact that they are grouped in this way, and also because it is obvious that, in view of the position these notices of motion enjoy on the Order Paper, many other members on the opposite side of the House would be deprived of the opportunity of bringing forward the subject matter of their particular notices of motions, the hon. member has very kindly agreed to drop from the Order Paper notices of motions Nos. 115 through 120, and today she will proceed with notice of motion No. 121. Then, subsequently one of the remaining group dealing with genetic counselling will be selected by her and proceeded with. Thereafter, the remainder of these will be dropped as well.

I think the hon. member will confirm that, and for these reasons we are prepared to proceed in that manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent to the dropping of notices of motions 115 to 120 inclusive appearing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and to the proceeding to notice of motion No. 121?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions dropped and orders discharged.

REQUEST FOR COPY OF A STUDY INTO THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE THERMIC METHOD OF BIRTH CONTROL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

> That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study "Causes et conséquences démographiques économiques et sociales de la pratique de la méthode thermique de régulation des naissances" funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the fiscal year 1969-70.

She said: Mr. Speaker, may I say that the Parliamentary Secretary has explained the matter before us very well. I have no wish to prevent other members from having their turn. I am not dropping these requests because I am satisfied to go without them, but because I feel it would be exceedingly unfair to hold up the House when there are other members waiting.

Last session, and on October 28, 1970 of this session, I placed a number of requests on the Order Paper for the production of papers. The government has been unwilling to produce the reports requested, basically on the ground that these reports were made under private arrangements with researchers and that the government was not at liberty to divulge their contents. I think that is the basis for the government's refusal in the case of these reports.

In this motion today, I am asking that an order of the House do issue for a copy of the study "Causes et conséquences démographiques économiques et social de la pratique de la méthode thermique de régulation des naissances". I do not think this should be a subject kept under wraps privately by the department. On a former occasion, I quoted the remarks of someone who had engaged in research projects for the Department of National Health and Welfare who said he felt that most people doing research would be only too glad to have the public informed of their findings. He said he felt that most researchers felt exactly that way. Therefore, I should like to suggest that in future the department, and the government as a whole, consider changing the ground rules relating to disclosure of these reports. I think the government should lay down the general rule that researchers are told that, under ordinary circumstances, their reports will be available to the public. There is no reason under heaven that I can possibly see for withholding this report.

In the meantime, as long as the present ground rules obtain I think the government—in this case the Department of National Health and Welfare—should at least inquire whether or not there is any objection on the part of those who did the research work or headed up the research team to making these reports public. Quite frankly, I think the government is in a very vulnerable position in this regard. It is using taxpayers' money to get this sort of work done by scientists and others who have every interest in giving the facts to the public, yet the government is refusing to make these facts known. I believe this is particularly the case with regard to the resolutions standing in my name, since most of them have to do with the business of family planning or family counselling, with contraceptive methods, and with the effects, social, economic and otherwise, of, in this case, the thermic method of regulating birth control. The thermic method is, of course, used in connection with the rhythm method of birth control. I think the people of this country have a right to be told the effects of this method of birth control.

I am glad to see that in another regard the department is beginning to loosen up a little. Back in April, I asked for a report that had just been made by a special committee appointed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) which was to advise the Food and Drug Directorate with regard to all aspects of the safety and efficacy of oral contraceptives marketed in Canada. I asked for the report in April and we received it before Christmas, which is not too bad. I suggest that if a report of this importance can be made available, then some of the other reports which do not cover so wide a field also ought to be made available to the public at a time when it is imperative that we examine birth control methods and contraceptives in as full a way as possible.

Mr. Baldwin: They have a long period of gestation for reporting.

Mrs. MacInnis: Perhaps they do, but ordinary women do not. Pregnancy does not take all that length of time and cannot wait. This is exactly the point I want to make.

The thermic method used in the rhythm method has to do with temperature, and there are three or four different ways of working that out with the period of ovulation and so on. I will spare hon. members from going into all the fine details at this time. There will be other opportunities to do this, I am confident, particularly if the government insists on keeping so much of this information from us.

In the bulletin that was published by the Food and Drug Directorate embodying the report of the special committee on oral contraceptives, there is this paragraph dealing with the rhythm method:

> The contraceptive effectiveness of the rhythm method if correctly taught, understood and consistently practiced, especially if the temperature rhythm method is used, could achieve a low pregnancy rate of 1.8 per 100 women per year. However, statistics show that, possibly because of irregular cycles, or inexpert and careless timing, the result is a pregnancy rate of 25 per 100 women per year.

This represents an effective failure rate of 25 per cent. This is a very serious failure rate and means that there are going to be a great many unwanted births for those people who use the rhythm method. As I say, I have nothing against people using the rhythm method if it is in accordance with their religious beliefs, but I think these women ought to be told that among women who use the rhythm method one out of four will become pregnant. This method is at the bottom of the efficiency scale of effective methods of birth control.

This is not unconnected with the estimate made just before Christmas by the head of the Family Planning Association of Montreal, Dr. Serge Mongeau that in the preceding calendar year there were between 5,000 and 10,000 illegal abortions in the province of Quebec alone. I use this figure only because I happen to have it in respect of that one province. Let me point out that because we have not approached the birth control situation in the way we should have, by getting the information to the people through enough clinics, along with birth control devices, we have this vast number of illegal abortions. They take place in every province.

For this reason, we must get busy on birth control methods. If we want to avoid a great number of abortions, illegal and otherwise, we must get busy disseminating birth control information and contraceptives. As I have said over and over again, abortion is not the first line of defence against unwanted pregnancies. The first line of defence should be effective contraceptives used consistently and diligently. People do not have the information they should have on how to use these contraceptives or which ones are effective. The physical and mental suffering from so many illegal or legal abortions, would be quite unnecessary if we had proper birth control information available throughout this country.

In this connection, I want to refer to the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. The sooner the government gets busy dealing with this report the sooner they will stop hearing from us over here on this subject, because we are determined to make sure the government has clearly before it the various important sections of this report. The supplying of birth control information is now legal, but as the report on the status of women points out, for 40 years before the law was amended few people dared to operate birth control centres because of the risk of being prosecuted. Since the ban was lifted a number of centres are being planned, but there are still relatively few in Canada. In 1969 it was estimated there were approximately 38 centres, including seven family planning clinics under the Family Planning Federation of Canada, eight public health clinics and 23 hospital clinics. The need for more facilities is obvious. In 1968 there were 4,378,000 women of childbearing age, that is between 15 and 45 years, in Canada, yet according to their own estimate, one of the family planning clinics in Toronto could process only 1,250 calls in one year.

At the present time only about 23 of the 948 general hospitals in Canada have family planning clinics attached to them. I know that the Vancouver General Hospital is one of them. When I visited that hospital during the Christmas recess one of the doctors told me with great pride that the family planning clinic at the Vancouver General, one of 23 attached to hospitals in Canada, was the very first outside clinic which had been permitted in the Vancouver General.

The status of women report recommends that birth control information be available to everyone, and recommends that the Department of National Health and Welfare should be prepared to offer birth control information free of charge to provincial and territorial authorities, organizations, associations and individuals, and to give financial assistance through health grants to train health and welfare workers in family planning. The report further recommends that the provincial departments of health organize family planning clinics in each public health unit to ensure that everyone has access to information, medical assistance, birth control devices and drugs.

It also recommends that the provincial departments should provide medical clinics where they are needed, particularly in remote areas. I may say that in Britain today there are mobile clinics which travel around and operate in conjunction with metropolitan and civic health centres. The people in charge of these units find out from social workers and other people where the women are who want birth control information and devices. The doctor and nurse in charge of the unit visit these areas to make sure that this information and these devices are provided.

If you had encountered as many women in various income groups as I have who, if they had known how to prevent unwanted pregnancies, might have avoided abortions, I think you would realize that this country should move ahead at a faster rate than it is moving now. Those people who are opposed to abortion, whether legal or illegal, would do well to help cut down the incidence, and the only way to cut down the incidence of abortion is to provide people with other means of preventing unwanted pregnancies.

I think it is far better to deal with birth control measures than to wait until you have to deal with an abortion. I do not deny that the Family Planning Association is a good organization, and I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is working through that organization. However, I do not think the Family Planning Association would claim that by itself it can handle the need which exists today. This whole matter of birth control should be a part of our health department machinery in cities and large towns. These mobile clinics should travel under the auspices of our metropolitan and municipal health authorities. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare should provide funds and information to assist in establishing these clinics across Canada.

In looking across the chamber I think I can anticipate who is going to reply. I believe it is the minister who is in charge of designated areas. I hope it will be he because I wanted to indicate to him that the whole of Canada is a designated area as far as this matter is concerned. Let me indicate to whichever member does reply that in his constituency, as in mine, there is a great need for the implementation of these recommendations of the report on the status of women. This implementation should be carried out with the least possible delay.

I urge upon the Department of National Health and Welfare and other government departments the need to get away from their present vulnerable position of keeping these research studies secret. These departments should do everything they can, using material available, to help forward the campaign of birth control that the minister is so anxious to see brought to a successful stage of development.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is wrong to begin by anticipating, as the hon. member who just completed her remarks did, who may be speaking from the opposite side, but I notice that the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) has some notes in front of him. With his medical background, surely his contribution to this debate will be more productive than mine, if "productive" is the right word in this context. I certainly look forward to listening to his contribution.

First of all, in respect of what the hon. member has just said, I feel there is absolutely no doubt about the merits of many of the points she has made. It is an unfortunate commentary on the procedure that private members, under the existing rules of this chamber, must go through such a tortuous route in order to comment on subjects which are of importance. Often we are trapped by somewhat archaic parliamentary procedures into having to comment on subjects of importance by the most circuitous route. The hon. member addressed herself to the relationship of family planning to the report on the status of women, to the prevention of unwanted pregnancies and to the situation so far as abortion is concerned. In this regard, her remarks had a great deal of merit. I would perhaps go further than she has. I am one of those who have a fundamental difficulty in principle in respect of the idea of abortion, and particularly the idea of abortion on demand, simply because I hold the belief that a human life begins at the moment of conception and accordingly we do not have the right to take that human life for the convenience of other human beings.

Be that as it may, I believe that something should be done in respect of the terrible tragedy involved in attempts to terminate unwanted pregnancies and the dangers involved in the carrying out of abortive procedures in hazardous circumstances and by surreptitious procedures. The hon. member has frequently delivered weighty arguments on this subject, and I agree that a great deal can and should be done in this regard. I feel the positive action which should be taken in respect of this danger and evil which exists in our society is not by liberalizing the laws in respect of abortion, but rather by doing two things. One of these I believe is a good deal more possible than the other. The first thing I have in mind is counselling on family planning and contraception. The second is, if I am correct in the theory that we must protect human life when it begins, notwithstanding the fact that it begins in circumstances which may inconvenience the parent or parents, that we should be taking steps to eliminate the social stigma we place upon children born out of wedlock.

Of these two steps, expanded counselling and family planning in respect of contraception certainly is within our grasp. This is a realistic possibility and certainly is a positive step which could be taken in an attempt to encourage a social climate which would eliminate the pressures we place upon unwed mothers and children born out of wedlock. This is by no means a project which is easy to achieve because obviously there are so many areas and factors which influence people's opinions, prejudices and views on morality and on the proprieties of such things. So, leaving that as an area which presents enormous difficulties and turning to the area with which the hon. member is concerned in this particular discussion, I endorse the idea of expanded information and clinics because I continue to be amazed, as I believe most mature people are, by the frequency of the total ignorance of people who are fairly mature otherwise concerning the basic fundamentals of gestation, conception or the nature of childbirth and everything connected with it. When we see these terrible examples of young girls who have found themselves in circumstances which for one reason or another have driven them to abortion, frequently we find they are astonishingly ignorant of the basic principles of conception and the birth of a child. So, I totally endorse the idea of expanded information in that regard through clinics such as we are talking about.

Returning to the subject matter of the notice of motion, I lament the fact that hon. members are forced to follow this procedure in order to discuss a subject in which there is a great deal of interest. However, we cannot forget the fact that this is being done through the device of a notice of motion for the production of documents. It is not here and now a question of whether or not the government endorses the kind of policies the hon. member is bringing forward. I believe it is fair to say the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has been as active in this field as he has been in all others which embrace his huge portfolio. It is well established that he is a progressive individual and is forward-thinking. I do not doubt for a moment that he would welcome an opportunity to discuss the kind of clinics the hon. member suggests and I am sure his department is working actively on this.

We are all hopeful that such work can go forward. So, the question we are debating here really is not the merit or lack of it of this subject but rather whether the government is right in failing to produce the studies it has commissioned on this subject. On that aspect of the matter, I shall address myself to three brief headings. First, I believe we must all agree it is desirable that this or any other government attempt to get outside of its own bureaucracy and outside of its own so often stiff and stultified machinery. The use of such research projects and studies gives the government the opportunity for flexibility by having other agencies working and studying subjects so far as possible away from the identification of government and officialdom. If it is desirable that the government proceed in this way to inform itself concerning problems of depth and frequency, then surely the hon. member will go one step further and agree that the freedom and flexibility desired in connection with such a study would be seriously impaired if every study commissioned by the government on this or on any other subject had to be done with the knowledge that it would be published as part of the government record and become a public document.

In respect of the report, for example, on the status of women concerning which it was known from the beginning the document would be public, we know very well that the kind of work that went into it had to be much more careful, prolonged and all-embracing in an official way. In such a case we know there must be safeguards and steps taken to see that everyone wishing to present views has an opportunity to do so, and that everyone who wants to contribute to an official public study should have an opportunity to do so. That might be fine for the kind of study that gave rise to the report on the status of women, but I am sure the hon. member would agree that not every study would benefit from such an official atmosphere.

The ease of establishing a group to work quietly in an unofficial and anonymous way and to get to the heart of the problem that faces us in this or any other field is an advantage well worth retaining. But in order to do that, there must be assurance that the study which is being prepared is of a confidential nature. That is so, whether it be in private industry or for the government. If this were not so, every one of these studies would have to be undertaken by way of a public inquiry. As soon as that is done, I submit that much of the value of research and study will be lost.

Accordingly, the pressure that would be on the government to insist that every study be carried out so that no one could say that such and such a group did not have an opportunity to appear, to insist that all hearings be conducted in public and all inquiries conducted officially, the pressure that would be put on researchers to conduct their function in a public and open way and, finally, the position in which the government would be put, would seriously restrict the value of the research.

This leads us to the conclusion that there are many studies, and in fact the long list of the hon. member's notices of motion covering many different studies indicates that each one may have dealt with a different aspect of the work and may have been able to explore just one aspect in one part of the country. Indeed, it may have benefited from being done in a quiet and unobtrusive way. The length of the list testifies to the fact that it is an advantage to carry out studies in this way.

That being the case, we come to the point where the hon. member is suggesting that all these studies should be released and tabled, becoming public information. I come back to my original point. I do not blame the hon. member for taking advantage of private members' hour to put forward the excellent views she has on the important subject of family planning. But I say it is a pity that our system necessitates adopting this procedure in order for the hon. member to put her views on the record. Personally, I am hopeful that in this session the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization will have an opportunity to review not only this aspect of private members' business but, indeed, all aspects of it and of the use of this valuable time of the House so that it can become more meaningful and productive. It may well be that the hon. member, having examined some of these studies, would be the first to agree that it would be detrimental to publish them and that she has had to use this procedure to press for this kind of disclosure simply to get her views on the record, when she should have had many other opportunities to do the same thing.

So from the procedural point of view, I endorse the substantive remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I regret, however, that this procedure had to be used. At the same time, I endorse completely the government's refusal to disclose these studies, because to do that would, in my opinion, virtually destroy their usefulness.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who preceded me, I find myself in substantial agreement with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). It is unfortunate in many respects that there is only one representative of her sex in this House. We are delighted to have her here, but obviously the House would reflect Canada's problems much better if it had more representatives of her sex.

The motion she has placed before us and the tenor of her remarks today deal with some of the problems that are of great concern to women in society. I found myself in almost total agreement with what she said today. In this respect I dissociate my personal opinions from those of the previous speaker, my colleague on this side of the House, with regard to the abortion legislation. But I agree with the argument he put forward that we should re-examine our procedures.

In putting forward this motion, the hon. member has used the device of a motion for the production of papers to put forward substantive arguments for changes in a wide variety of public policies and legislation. I recall when in 1964 as a member of this House I had the privilege of introducing a second private member's bill dealing with family planning. The first member of the House to introduce a bill on this subject was a gentleman who is no longer here and who now, I believe, is the mayor of Burnaby in British Columbia.

These were the first of a number of bills on this subject which eventually led to the amendment of Criminal Code provisions which many of us believed were unjustified and unduly restrictive. I could not help but feel, as I listened to the first two speeches in this debate, how great the change has been in public opinion in seven years and in opinions expressed in this place. We have made a great deal of progress.

The hon. lady quoted from a number of documents that have been put into the public domain. One of the first from which she quoted was the report of the royal commission on contraception, which was produced a matter of weeks ago. I think she must give credit to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) for his initiative and for his consistent interest in this matter. I know that her quotations from the report were favourable ones. I detected from her remarks—she can easily correct me if I am wrong—that she thought the report was a good one and that by and large it was the kind of document that should be repeated, dealing with a number of subjects in this general area.

The hon. lady also quoted from the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I may say that occasionally telephone calls have come to my house asking if there is a Miss Anne Francis in our household. We are not in any way related. But I agree with the hon. member that many parts of this document are worthy of serious consideration. There is no question that this document came as a result of a public inquiry initiated by the government which I have the honour to support. The inquiry was very far-ranging and complete. Many of the recommendations have stirred public debate. There is by no means unanimous agreement, but there is agreement that it was a very original type of investigation, a very thorough and competent investigation which will certainly have an impact upon social thinking. We hope it will result in legislation.

As the hon. member who preceded me pointed out, this kind of document is based upon a number of investigations. It is based upon the work of not one person but of many people who work in a team. Similarly, in the whole area of family planning and genetic counselling, a large number of research documents have been created, as the hon. member has been able to determine. This is evidence of the initiative of the government in the matter. But research into physical science problems and social science problems in the twentieth century is much more complicated than it was before.

Any one of these documents standing by itself, produced as a public record, could be misinterpreted. I have not seen them. I doubt whether the hon. lady who moved the motion has seen many, if indeed she has seen any of them. But the fact that investigations are undertaken by individuals, in most cases, is part of the process of major investigations. It is the kind of thing that was undertaken for the inquiry into the status of women. These documents do not stand, each and every one of them, alone. They have to be assessed and correlated. They have to be verified. The pattern that emerges may suggest further inquiries, further investigations, and at the appropriate point a series of carefully prepared public documents must come forward.

The report on oral contraceptives is a very good example of the kind of document which can take into account a wide range of investigations involving a number of different circumstances, with the carefully balanced judgment of scientific and professional investigators able to make a determination within the freedom of their own, shall I say, academic considerations. I use "academic" in the best sense of the word.

Mr. Speaker, there is no other way in which this kind of research can be undertaken properly and flourish within the framework of government grants. The requirement that any single document should be, at any particular moment when it is produced, put into the public domain would have an inhibiting effect. I repeat that in this area it will have an inhibiting effect upon the conduct of this kind of research. I wonder whether the hon. lady felt that every one of these documents should be put into the public domain, or whether she was moved in her purpose, which I commend very heartily, of using this device to call attention to the need for more research, the need for more information and the need for more reports. The basic information is required in order that we who sit in this place can determine what type of legislation and what kind of policies are most appropriate to be enacted.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is proper that every investigation of this nature should be put into the public domain at a predetermined time. I do not believe it should be a condition of grants by the federal department of health that every one of these reports should be made public. I think the effect of such a requirement—if I understand the hon. lady correctly, I think she made that suggestion—would be to inhibit and change the nature of the reports. If every report that comes to government in the form of a document is made public and has to stand the test of sensational reporting that occasionally takes place, and misinterpretation of premature results which have not been properly assessed in relation to factors not yet understood, not yet even guessed at, I think we will not be serving the people of Canada well.

I believe that changes in public policy that are to come are absolutely necessary. We have taken a step forward in the amendments to the Criminal Code in relation to abortion. This kind of step has come about as the result of public debate, further investigation, better knowledge and understanding. The concern I have at this point is the uneven character of the application of the law. In some parts of the country a number of hospitals are co-operating. The required committees are established, and abortions do take place. In other parts of Canada the hospitals and the medical profession are not co-operating in this respect. Those who live in some parts of Canada can take advantage of the changes in the law, and those who live in other parts cannot.

The evidence is abundantly clear that a number of lives are lost and a number of people are maimed as a result of the illegal and improper abortions that are continually taking place. The law has failed to come to grips fundamentally with what we all recognize was an evil. But the question we have to face is, what is the next step in the law? What is the stage at which public opinion is prepared to accept further change, and what is the further change that the public of Canada are prepared to accept? We live in a world of what is possible and, as many people have said, politics is the art of the possible. Changes in the law have come hand in hand with changes in public understanding and public opinion. These are based in no small part upon investigation, research and knowledge. But research, Mr. Speaker, must be done within the discipline of those capable of doing it, without undue inhibitions or arbitrary requirements for premature public disclosure, with every opportunity for assessment and further investigation and probing that is indicated by the recommendations of those who have done the research.

There has to be confidence in the professional integrity and responsibility of those in charge of the over-all research direction, that at the appropriate time the proper documents will be produced and will be put into the public domain. I offer as evidence of this the report on oral contraceptives, the report on the status of women and the numerous other investigations that have taken place.

I think the hon. lady will have to be satisfied with the fact that there is much initiative, much interest and much support in this field. I am sure she would not want to defeat the purposes of such investigations by a restriction that would place upon them any inhibition and thus destory the net effect we hope to achieve.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I must first compliment the mover of the motion. It is a bilingual motion, but in spite of the fact that I have been taking lessons for some time, the meaning of some of the French words escapes me. I believe I understand the gist of the motion, but if I stray slightly from the subject I hope you, Sir, will appreciate that this is the reason.

I concur with the mover of the motion that the public should be informed. An informed public is a much more constructive and understanding public. Quite often, when governments move in particular areas and endeavour to do something, the cry goes up, "Why has it taken so long?" or, "Why are we spending so much money on it?" But when the public knows all the facts, it can understand the reasons why decisions are sometimes made that leave certain people out of programs in the interest of helping those who really need assistance.

As I look at this motion, I believe it calls for ground rules that would reverse what seems to be the present trend. Nowadays, when studies are prepared for the consideration of government the tendency is for government to want to get as comprehensive, factual, honest and true reports as possible. Preparation of these reports should not be inhibited by a requirement that they be disclosed perhaps prematurely. Publication of reports out of context may damage the kind of reports that should be made to government. As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) has said, premature disclosure might have an inhibiting effect. As has also been mentioned, Mr. Speaker, sometimes five or six reports are considered together before conclusions are reached. If an individual had only one report available to him and based his total argument on that, he might mislead the public and to great disservice.

When I look at the title of the report mentioned in the motion of the hon. member, I think I must agree with her that there is no reason under heaven why its contents should not be revealed. On the face of it, just reading the title, it seems to be innocuous and not something that will damage public morality. Apparently government members who have read the report have decided otherwise. I shall be interested in hearing other government supporters tell us why this motion should not be carried. I am waiting to be convinced. Unfortunately, nothing the hon. member said convinced me that the report should be produced. However, having used my intelligence, such as it is, and having read the title of the report, I cannot see that the report would be particularly damaging to the public interest.

I think this government must be congratulated, rather than condemned, for the kind of information it has made available to the opposition and to the general public, because for the first time in history funds have been given to opposition parties so they can retain suitable personnel and undertake studies that will enable them to reach correct decisions.

The study that the hon. member wishes to be produced covers a wide variety of subjects. One of the areas that has been of particular interest to me—it is an area that my wife has researched more thoroughly than I have—is important to all married people. I refer to the matter mentioned by the government whip, genetic counselling. The World Health Organization set up what is called an expert committee on human genetics. The sad part of genetic counselling, Mr. Speaker, is that people most often come for this kind of counselling after a defect has been discovered in a child. More information must go out to the public so that people will be aware that genetic counselling services are available.

This committee of the World Health Organization brought forward a report. The deputy director general said that genetic counselling is the most immediate and practical service that can be rendered in medicine and in surgery. He said it is probable that in all countries 4 per cent of live births suffer from some genetic condition which could benefit from genetic counselling, either in relation to repercussions on the family or to successful diagnosis and treatment of hereditary diseases. That is the point I have emphasized before. The report then notes that the experience of existing genetic counselling services shows that about 90 per cent of inquiries are from parents whose offspring are suffering from some disorder. It is the fear of recurrence that prompts them to seek advice. The bulk of the remaining 10 per cent of inquiries relates to the concern that an abnormality in the family may be passed on to future generations.

In some parts of the world there are special genetic problems. It is therefore proper that the World Health Organization saw fit to set up the special committee to study this particular aspect of health. It came to the conclusion that during the past 15 years great advances have been made in the field of human psychogenetics. Those advances have made it possible for us to provide, in many cases, effective genetic counselling. Those who have dealt with retarded children and helped them probably appreciate much better than others the necessity of proper genetic counselling. According to the research that I undertook in the subject—most of it was done before I came to the House of Commons—many places in Canada provide this service. Locally, the department of paediatrics of the University of Ottawa provides such a service. The advances made have also served to stimulate lay as well as medical interest in the field of genetic counselling. It is important that information should be available not only to doctors but to lay persons as well. Not only must this kind of information be imparted to laymen and others, but our communities must know there are genetic counselling agencies which may be used particularly by young people and young married couples.

It seems to me that the report the hon. member asks to be produced is innocuous and I cannot see any great harm in producing it. I shall be interested in hearing what other government supporters have to say about this matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my colleagues on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis).

Mr. Skoberg: The hon. member has three minutes left.

Mr. Pringle: I must agree with my colleagues, Mr. Speaker. More consideration must be given to those who are responsible not only for the formation of certain reports but for their distribution. It is vital for the people of Canada that we are not hindered in any way in obtaining all necessary information. Sometimes it is essential for us to withhold some information which has been submitted in report form. Hon. members should understand this. This point relates to the motion being considered.

I regret that I do not have more time in which to express some of my thoughts. I believe that when we have talked about amendments to the Criminal Code and matters relating to abortion, too much emphasis has been placed on permissive attitudes, on the reproduction of the human race, and not enough on family life and the moral approach to this question. We should give more consideration to preventive methods and to family planning, to the use of oral contraceptives, if you like, which according to the Food and Drug Directorate constitute the safest and, until now, the best method of birth control. However, we are a long way from the termination of any exhaustive research with regard to oral contraceptives.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISIONS REGARDING CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-192, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. Woolliams.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to continue the remarks I was making at five o'clock. I was dealing with the differences between the proposed legislation, the young offenders act, and the provisions of the old act, the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I was pointing out the improvements in the new act. One difference that I did not mention at that time is that which exists for the young offender, under the provisions of the proposed act, who is charged with an offence for which he might be imprisoned for life or sentenced to hang. Under the act which is now in force, a young man under the age of 15 who is convicted of murder or where it is found that he has—committed the offence of murder—

Mr. Woolliams: That is the same thing, is it not?

Mr. Murphy: It is probably the same. If he were convicted in the criminal court and sentenced to life imprisonment, there would be no way in which the minimum sentence would be reviewed for a period of at least ten years, even by the Parole Board. Even if the Parole Board after ten years recommended that the person should be let out immediately or at an early date, as the law now stands that decisions would have to be approved by the governor in council, or the cabinet. Under the new legislation, a young man convicted at the age of 15 could be—not would be—detained in a training school until the age of 21 and then brought before a supreme court judge. At that time the supreme court judge could deal with him in whatever way he thought fit, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time and the background of the case. He could conceivably discharge that young man at that time, with no further problem.

That advantage far surpasses the possible disadvantages mentioned by some opposition members, particularly the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). The hon. member for Greenwood referred to this provision. He thought that it would be discriminatory in respect of the young person. I cannot follow his reasoning on that point. It is discriminatory in the sense that the young person could be dealt with more leniently than an adult offender. I feel that discrimination in this way is not adverse to the young person.

I had the impression from the comments this afternoon of the hon. member for Greenwood that he felt the discrimination would be too adverse to the interests of the young offender. I cannot agree with him. So there we have another difference between the present legislation and the proposed legislation which I think is a distinct improvement.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) during the course of his speech in this debate suggested that we in this country might follow the English system or even the Scandinavian system of dealing with youthful offenders. In some respects I do not disagree; no doubt we might consider some aspects of the English system and beneficially adapt them to our system. However, we cannot simply say that the British system is much better than ours because it does this, that and the other and our system does not. The hon. member knows as well as I that the English system of government is different from that which prevails in Canada. Theirs is a unitary system of government and the Parliament at Westminster has jurisdiction to pass all types of legislation, be it social legislation or otherwise, with impunity. It is the duty of that Parliament to do so.

On the other hand, as the hon. member knows, we in Canada have a federal system, and the jurisdictional limitations placed on this Parliament are considerably different from any that might be placed on the British Parliament. For that reason we cannot go into the social aspects of many questions, into fields that are by the British North America Act handed over holus-bolus exclusively to the provinces.

The hon. member also referred to the Scandinavian system of establishing panels that determine the outcome of a charge that might be made against a youthful offender. These panels are comprised of elected representatives as well as representatives of unions, teachers, the professions, businessmen, and so on. This is quite true. But what the hon. member neglected to point out is that these panels deal with youthful offenders in a paternalistic way, one that would be quite incongruous in Canada. For example, the panel sits to consider a case and the youthful offender concerned does not even have the opportunity of appearing before the panel. Decisions are made, so to speak, in a vacuum, in the absence of the accused. Neither does the accused have an opportunity to confront those who are levelling accusations against him. That is the way the panel system in Scandinavia operates. If that is what the hon. member is suggesting we adopt in this country, I can only disagree with him most wholeheartedly.

Mr. Gilbert: The hon. member would rather be punitive with our young men.

Mr. Murphy: I would rather have the young man given an opportunity to stand up and confront his accusers than be tried in absentia, definitely. In conclusion, may I say that basically I think we have a good bill here. The structure of the bill is good though it is not perfect. There are some changes that can and should be made, and I say they will be made.

Mr. Gilbert: Such as?

Mr. Murphy: I refer in particular to some points that have not been picked up by members of the opposition. If they look at the provisions of clause 14, I think they might find some things in there that are much more objectionable than some of the criticisms they have levelled at other clauses. There are also those provisions referred to by members of the opposition relating to the potentially heavier punishments for young offenders as opposed to those meted out to adults who commit the same offence and are found guilty in court in the regular way. I say that these provisions can and will be looked at.

[Mr. Murphy.]

If the opposition is serious and wants to obtain amendments, and if the opposition is serious in inviting the support of the government members of the House and of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee, let me ask opposition members why they do not base their arguments on truths rather than on misstatements of fact, as has been the case in many instances during the course of this debate. Why do they not base their arguments on truths instead of half-truths, as has been happening so far? Let them give us logical arguments. Let them give us reason we can follow and believe. If they do, they may find that we will believe them. But do not give us the type of balderdash known as "Eldonbull" any more, because we are not interested in it. We will listen to facts and we will end up with a good bill.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Murphy: Yes.

Mr. Orlikow: Since the hon. member is suggesting that the arguments which have been presented are not the truth, may I ask him whether he is telling the members of this House that the criticisms of the bill made by organizations such as the Canadian Mental Health Association, which has taken very serious objection to major provisions in the bill, are based on untruths?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been in the House this afternoon to listen to the examples of misstatements of fact cited by me earlier in my comments, he would have discovered that those examples were taken from a speech made by a member of this House. I am not referring to excerpts from representations made by organizations such as the Canadian Mental Health Association, and so on, although I could have gone into a few of their comments as well. However, time did not permit. When I talk of misstatements of fact and reliance on half-truths and innuendo, I am referring to particular statements quoted by me this afternoon from a speech made by a member of the House.

Mr. Woolliams: Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I realize the hon. member, and also the hon. member for Broadview wish to ask the hon. gentleman a question, but they can do so only if the hon. member who had the floor consents.

Mr. Murphy: I have no objection.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I read the hon. member's remarks before supper and I know what he said. In my speech I made reference to the remarks of a number of academics and to representations made by various associations. Is the hon. member suggesting to this House that it is he who has all the truths, that he has the right interpretation to be placed on this legislation? As a lawyer, is he going as far as saying that it is he who is interpreting the bill with truth; that the law is such an exact science that he alone has the answers?

Mr. Murphy: If I may answer that, Mr. Speaker, let me say no.

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad of that. I knew you would say no.

Mr. Murphy: I agree with two of the people quoted by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), Dr. Frost and Professor Price, and I mentioned that in my remarks this afternoon. They recommended that the whole question be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study, and I agree with that course. I do not agree with the proposition of the hon. member for Calgary North that a special task force should be set up to deal with the matter.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would consider the case of a young man between the age of 10 and 14. Should a young man within that age bracket be charged with an offence under the Criminal Code—with the possible exception of homicide—and if convicted be faced with the possibility of being fingerprinted and photographed or should we follow the English act which says that no youngster under the age of 14 years should be charged with any criminal offence with the exception of homicide?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has touched upon a very interesting point. Personally, I am not locked in with any age, 10 years or 14 years. I am willing to discuss this and listen to argument about it. All this bill does is give the juvenile court judge certain power. It does not say the individual shall be fingerprinted or shall be photographed. This is a discretionary power given to the juvenile court judge which may or may not be exercised. I am open to argument on this point and no doubt we will be discussing it at a later date.

I cannot speak for the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer), but a number of recommendations have been made. If the hon. member will read the minutes of the special committee which studied this problem and filed its report in this House in 1966, he will see that the limits varied from age 10 to age 14. The provinces have other ideas on this matter and they will have to be considered as well.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not first of all congrulate the new Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) on his appointment and wish him well in his new responsibilities. Many people who are concerned with the administration of justice in this country must be pleased that a relatively young man has assumed this important portfolio in government. In offering these congratulations, I think they must also be tinged with sorrow because I feel somewhat sorry for the Solicitor General in that he has to pilot, as his first piece of legislation, this bill through the House of Commons.

I know from the record of the Solicitor General that before assuming his portfolio in this government he had an outstanding career in his native province. He has from time to time espoused a most progressive cause, and I am sure it must be difficult if not painful for him to have to be identified in this initial period with what I call a most reactionary piece of legislation. The minister is faced with a bill that was given first reading in this House on November 16. He could not have known, neither could anyone else, that within a very few weeks he would be appointed to the post of Solicitor General, charged with putting this bill before the House on second reading and piloting it through the legislative process.

I think what other hon. members have said is in fact the case. We see reflected in this bill an attitude and concept in respect of crime and criminal offences which is not only out of date but completely removed from all the understanding and research which have come to play a very large role in our understanding of justice and crime in society. I think the best one can say for this piece of legislation is that it is a fine seventeenth century approach to what are some very pressing twentieth century problems.

It is provided as follows in clause 4 of this bill, which has been referred to by other hon. members:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

I would doubt that if a quick canvass were to be made we would find much, if any, disagreement with that statement. It is contradicted at every turn, however, by the succeeding clauses which categorize, restrict and, in fact, in some cases punish those who in certain instances could hardly be aware that they had committed an offence. That passage, if it were kept and a new bill constructed, might indeed show some leadership as well as enlightened understanding of the problems that confront young people who run afoul of the law. Instead, we are faced with this weighty document of 85 clauses which has already been referred to as the criminal code for young people.

How disillusioning it must be for any young people in our country who still believe that this government, under the leadership of the man who is Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has a special understanding of youth when in fact they read the retrograde, regressive and reactionary approach that is being taken toward children, really, between the ages of 10 and 17 years who commit what may be defined as a criminal offence. If there is any doubt left that this government does not have leadership or the sensitivity to understand the particular problems of youth, I think this bill will be extremely convincing.

We have here an attempt to put forward in a new dress an approach to young people who commit crime. The approach fails because, even though the dress is new, when you remove the veneer the approach is just as reactionary and just as punitive as that which has existed in the law to this date. In fact, certain aspects of it are even worse than in the present situation.

It has already been said that an adult in our society who commits an offence for which the sentence may be life imprisonment or capital punishment knows that the process of law will take place. However, in regard to a person under the age of 21 who commits an offence—we are thinking here of an offence that involves capital punishment or life imprisonment, not just narrowly defined as homicide, but a number of other things defined in the Criminal Code as warranting this severe penalty—can it be said that he understands the process of law?

There are other offences which according to the code warrant these penalties, including rape, sedition and treason. I am sure if we examined the Criminal Code closely, we might find others. Are we, then, saying that children who commit these crimes must in the first instance be detained for a period of time that may be as long as 11 years, whereupon when they have reached the age of 21 they are to be tried and sentenced for the crime which they committed earlier but to which they may not have been able to give sufficient recognition? That is certainly not the law as it applies or will apply to adults. Are we prepared to bring that law into force for children?

One can take this kind of legislative provision to its extreme to illustrate the utter unreality of this proposition in law. We have gone through a very difficult and serious time in respect of the crisis in the province of Quebec. At the moment we have a public order bill which, hopefully, will shortly expire. Under that bill we are told that people can be arrested for membersip in or attendance at meetings of a certain organization. What would be the position in law under this new measure if an 11-year old walked in off the street and, through chance, took part in a casual way in a meeting of the FLQ or like clandestine organization? Under this bill, I presume he would not only be detained but after a period of some years, perhaps until he reached age 21, he might be sentenced and then serve his time. How utterly foolish and ridiculous that is. That demonstrates how utterly foolish and ridiculous is this particular provision in the legislation.

The legislation attempts to be a screen giving, in essence, a sense of being fair-minded, positive and progressive. But when this screen is removed and the veneer is scraped away, we discover underneath that there is a heavy punitive element. For instance, we are told in one clause of this bill having to do with young people who may commit an offence under section 387 of the Criminal Code, which would be the abuse of animals, that the judge in the disposition he makes of the case may prohibit the young person from owning or having custody or control of the animal or bird during any period not exceeding two years.

We might consider the example of a young person who at the age of 11 or 12 may, without knowing it is more than a childhood prank, carry out some form of cruel activity which if committed by an adult would be considered to be criminally sadistic. This might not be the case, however, in respect of an imaginative youth of 11 or 12 years of age. This bill would remove any imagination in respect of the positive rehabilitation of a child, such as guidance, counselling and the establishment of relations with the child and his parents and, perhaps, with members of the animal kingdom.

There is no recognition in this legislation of the positive value of trying to redress the aberrations or perhaps fears which may exist in a child's mind. Throughout this bill it would seem that the drafters of the legislation have attempted to narrowly define the limits under which justice can be served, to the extent that one would think that in a sense they have entered the world of Lilliput and are following Gulliver in one of his travels, and that in dealing with children who commit acts regarded as offences by adults, they consider these children to be pigmy sized adults who in the final analysis are to be treated in that manner.

There is no recognition of the process of growing up or of maturity which, surely, is one of the most basic processes of life itself. There is no awareness, in the concept of this legislation, that relationships, particularly basic relationships in family and community, are vital to the healthy development of young people between ages 10 and 17. There would appear to be a stereotyped concept in this legislation. One wonders, in fact, whether the drafters of the legislation were ever children themselves or whether they had much acquaintance with children.

An hon. Member: That is a sick argument.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is a sick argument, an hon. member says. It is a sick argument, perhaps, in response to a sick bill and the sooner members recognize that and remove this legislation the better off we will be.

An hon. Member: The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is laughing.

Mr. Drury: He sure is.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am not so much worried about members being in their second childhood as I am that they have forgotten their first. In dealing with youngsters there must be a recognition, in respect of offences regarded as crimes by society, that there is a process of maturing or growing which is not absolute and which is not predictable. There is nothing absolute about one child at age 10, 11, 16 or 17 and his ability to recognize and make moral judgments in respect of the acts he performs. I have not heard, and I know I will not hear, from the minister any categorical statement concerning how anyone can define with precision the ability of a young person aged 13 or 15 to judge the worthiness or unworthiness of his acts. There is no real indication of a desire to recognize that in this bill.

I do not question the sincerity but, rather, the judgment of the people who drafted this legislation. We are not just dealing here with young people between the ages of 10 and 17 and their relationship with the law. Really, we are dealing with what could well be regarded as the foundation stone for the relationship between the mature adult, his society and the law. If our prisons and penitentiaries are repeatedly filled with what we often refer to as chronic offenders or high-rate recidivists, it is because we have not been realistic at the point at which crime becomes a part of the psyche of an individual.

If we do not realistically recognize this fact in respect of our young people, how can we ever face the situation realistically in respect of adults. The time to make these changes and be responsible and realistic is when we bring in changes and amendments in respect of the law and youth. It is doubly tragic, therefore, that we will be doing a disservice not only to children and young people but to the adults they will eventually become. One can only shudder to think that we will continue to make an enormous payment, not only in terms of the money we spend annually to detain people and to carry on the expensive business of arrest and surveillance but in the even more enormous payment in human lives and in the wastage of human potential that very often comes as a direct result of a backward and punitive approach to those who are no longer able to handle themselves in society.

In looking at this legislation one would think that the drafters—not the minister, because he did not really participate in the drafting—did not hear or read anything regarding human understanding in this century. I wonder, in heaven's name, where they have been. Have they not heard that in these enlightened periods we have discovered new and better ways to deal with criminal offences, particularly in the early stages? No one will argue that men who have already entered upon a long and determined life of crime are very difficult to rehabilitate. In many cases it is well nigh impossible. But all of us believe, and all of us hope, that in respect of a child of 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 or 16 years of age who commits a criminal offence there is a tremendous possibility for rehabilitation and reform.

Where is that presented in this legislation? Where is there a realistic approach to the individual differences and the individual difficulties encountered by young people? The difficulties are growing, rather than lessening. Because our society is becoming increasingly complex, because the demands of society require more and more laws which often restrict and prohibit individual judgments and decisions of men, we know it will not be easy for young people in the future to be sure they are not committing a crime. Therefore, if we are to redress the balance of increasing bureaucracy and restrictive laws of this nature, we must attempt to deal in a realistic fashion with young people who in many cases are unaware of or unable to control the actions they enter into.

There is so much in this legislation that is reprehensible in my view that I shall not take the time to go into it in detail. The fact, for instance, that there are references to the young person who runs afoul of the law as if he were a pint sized adult is so shocking as almost not to need reference. The fact, for instance, that on the discretion of a judge the same records can be kept for young offenders that are now being kept for adult offenders is in itself most shocking. Also, the fact of the process by which a young person might retain legal counsel, something on which he may not himself be able to make a judgment, is in itself putting the cart before the horse.

When taking this legislation in total, one is almost faced with the proposition that surely those who drafted this bill have looked at the whole process of law as it operates today, have passed judgment on it and then have said, "Well and good. Now, where can we fit the young person into this process, because we feel kind of embarrassed that he does not seem to fit in very well?" Perhaps we have too many people who are too satisfied with the way in which those processes operate, and not enough people willing to question their basic operation. Perhaps it is not so much a matter of fitting the child or the young person to the system; perhaps it is high time the situation was reversed and we asked ourselves what kind of system is needed to help those young people who are unable to help themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): This legislation refers to offences, but I find this legislation offensive. I do not like to think that in an enlightened society, for which I hope we are at least striving in this country, we can refer with equanimity to 11-year olds as inmates and offenders. Surely, that must be offensive to every member of this House. Surely, those 11-year olds who do things which we regard in adult society as crimes are not now to be regarded as prisoners and felons in the normal sense. Surely, there is reason to think that those who have drafted this bill must be sent packing until they can present something to us that is worthy of both this House and this country.

It seems to me there are some basic aspects that are simply not accounted for in this legislation. Surely, there is a fundamental requirement that when young people or children have committed a criminal act, the basic questions related to home, community and environment must be attended to. These are certainly basic to the development of the child. Instead of that, we have this legislation proposing that the parole officer be some form of undercover policeman. I think the act refers to him as a peace officer, which some hon. members will remember has a pretty wide connotation in the administration of the law—a person who in fact can give the kind of evidence given by a police officer and act in a police officer's capacity. Is this the concept of rehabilitation that we have for young people whom we are trying to somehow put back positively and in a healthy way into society? Surely not. Yet that is the definition found in this legislation.

Mr. Woolliams: It is too bad the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) is not here.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Recently the government received a task force report on youth. I wonder if that task force has had a chance to study this bill. I know a few of the individuals who have given a great deal of their time and energy in trying to advise the government, in a positive way, on how the federal authority can more positively assist the growth and maturing of youth in this country. I think the members of this task force would, frankly, be shocked that a government would be putting before this legislature the kind of recommendations found in this bill. Surely, there is a responsibility laid upon them to ask that group for their frank and objective opinion of these kind of measures in law.

An earlier speaker suggested, in reference to some of the comments from this side of the House, that we were asking for more permissive legislation. I am sorry that the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) did not go on to indicate what he meant by that remark. I presume he meant a kind of laissez faire approach to those who do not want to follow the law as well as those who commit what are called crimes. I think he was not listening very closely to what was being said from this side of the House, because what we request is not permissiveness but understanding. That, in the first instance, is what is needed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: He does not know the meaning of that word.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): One fails to find in this bill a genuine understanding of what the problems are today with respect to the treatment of young people and children who commit crimes. Surely, what is needed in the first instance is understanding. Coupled with understanding there is a need for realism. Again, there is no realism in this bill which would suggest that by this approach the government will be able to substantially lessen the number of young people who eventually accelerate their way into hard-core crime. Third, it seems to me that the government has to accept some measure of responsibility, and I see very little of it here except in the drafting of suggestions which other people may have to implement.

We have already heard from the largest province in this country about the expense that will be incurred to even begin to put into effect some of the suggestions in this bill. Yet there is no obvious intention so far indicated by the government that they are prepared to give that kind of leadership, not only to the wealthiest province which has already indicated the cost that will be put upon them but to many of the other provinces which have not nearly enough resources to try to change their methods of rehabilitating young people.

In spite of what I have said this evening, I retain some measure of optimism about the government's behaviour in this matter. I would not have said this two or three months ago but, frankly, I was surprised and pleased when not too many weeks ago the government willingly dropped their measure attempting to restrict the power of the Auditor General. It was an important gesture when the government, realizing that it had put forward an unwarranted and unacceptable measure, willingly let it drop.

I feel that for the second time in this session of Parliament we have a similar piece of legislation. There is an amazingly high degree of unanimity among people, running the gamut from those who are concerned with the social welfare aspects of young people and their criminal behaviour to those who must administer the law in the courts and elsewhere. Almost to a man they have said that this is bad legislation and that it can do nothing but harm to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I appeal to the minister and to the government to listen to these voices, not just the voices of those of us who are speaking from the opposition but of those who speak from the various positions that they hold in public life and who say: Please reconsider these serious measures. This country needs leadership, but the leadership that is being placed before us now can only take us back to the dim, dark recesses of the past.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, to the newly-appointed Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer), who is well fitted for his position, I should like to convey my congratulations and express the hope that he will enjoy success in his portfolio which holds a great deal more responsibility today than it did a few years ago.

To my friend of many years, the former Solicitor General, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. McIlraith), I express my regret that he has found it necessary for personal reasons to resign from the cabinet. He was a cabinet member whose views often appeared to be closer to my own than the views of some others in the cabinet. He has been an excellent House leader, has graced his ministership, and retires from the cabinet respected for his accomplishments. I do not think he had very much to do with the drafting and launching of Bill C-192, Mr. Speaker. I suspect it came up from below at a time when he was too busily engaged with public order and other problems.

Neither do I believe that the lawyers in the cabinet committee, nor the cabinet itself, have given much screening to the bill, otherwise they would have rewritten or revised it thoroughly. If the amendment is defeated, then either the cabinet must rewrite the bill or hope that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will revise it sufficiently to make it at least palatable. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the bill is written, like so many of the government's bills, in too verbose and vague a fashion. The idea seems to be to fill bills with verbiage to give the impression of great accomplishment. But for practising lawyers, administrators, social workers and members of the judiciary, long, confusing codes cause chaotic cases and unnecessary appeals. The fact is that this bill is just about twice as long as the act it repeals, the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1929, and it is not half as good as that act.

Some reform is needed, but not in the way Bill C-192 is conceived and worded. Section 38 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1929 reads almost the same as clause 4 of this bill, but the old act specifically said that juvenile delinquents must not be treated as criminals. The new bill omits this caution and gives a very vague notion of how some parental guidance is to be given in new reformatories to the committed offender.

Clause 7 of the bill reads:

No person shall arrest a young person without warrant where he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the public interest may be secured by proceeding otherwise than by arrest without warrant, unless, in his opinion, it is in the best interest of the young person that he be arrested immediately.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the second part of this clause completely cancels out the effect of the first part. The arresting officer is the sole judge. It is his opinion that counts as to whether he makes the arrest or not. So, I ask, why have the clause at all? I submit that this is another example of verbiage. There is a little note to one side saying, "Limitation on arrest without warrant." But where is the limitation? Is this not just a futile attempt to give the appearance of a special deal for a young person, when there is no special consideration there at all? The old act had nothing like that in it. In my opinion, the old act is much better in this case, because it does not do a young offender any harm at all to be picked up by a police officer and taken to a juvenile court. Sometimes a good scare is all that is needed to straighten out a young lad or a young girl. The police officer is usually a very kindly fellow. The child comes before the judge and is admonished. In most cases he is promptly released to go home and there is no more problem with him.

In some cases a child cannot be dealt with in this way, but I found as a practising lawyer and Big Brother, working in the Toronto area for 20 years with the juvenile and family courts, that there was seldom need to have a child or young offender represented by a lawyer in juvenile court unless it were a very serious case. However, under the provisions of this bill there will be great need for consideration by lawyers of the charges involved. No longer will you be able to rely upon the judge and probation officer when the judge has the right to have a child fingerprinted and has the power to have him photographed if he happens to get particularly alarmed about an alleged offence.

Under clause 16(5) there is a new penalty in this bill, with provision for a fine of $100 or 90 days in jail for failure of parents to appear if found guilty, on the basis of contempt of court after having been notified. In my opinion, the 90-day provision is too severe. I submit it should be reduced to ten days for a first offence. I am not altogether against the provision, but I do think it is too severe.

With respect to clause 24(1), if I read it correctly, a young person over 14 may have his case transferred to a regular court at any time before the verdict of a juvenile court is finalized. Thus he, his witnesses and his family may be subjected to two almost complete trials or hearings, possibly lasting many days. This is a bad feature. It means more work for lawyers in juvenile cases, work they are not particularly seeking.

Then there is clause 30(1)(k) which, along with clause 30(4), has been either conceived unintelligently or written in an inconceivable fashion. It gives power to hold young persons in certain serious cases until they are 21 years of age and sentence them to a possible life sentence. which is 21 years in practice and probably ten years in effect. Many other hon. members have spoken about this and I do not want to pursue the matter further. These portions of clause 30 should be reconsidered and revised, if not discarded completely.

In Ontario in the past, Mr. Speaker, parents were always responsible for the support of their children until they reached the age of 16 years. But under clause 15 and clause 16 of this bill they can be forced to appear on behalf of young persons until they have reached the age of 18, and in some cases 21, or else be held in contempt of court. I think this should be limited to the age of 17 and that subpoenas should be used in other cases because, after all, the voting age is going to be lowered to 18.

By raising the age limits in the definition of "child" from 16 to 17, and 18 in some cases. the government puts a laurel wreath on its own head but a heavy burden on all the provinces. The Hon. Allan Grossman, Minister for Correctional Services in Ontario, points this out. He says that this factor in the bill, and others such as fixed sentences, will cost his province $20 million for additional training schools and they are not ready for that kind of forced virtue, particularly when they believe that their way is much more flexible for the young offender and for all concerned. If enacted in its present form, the bill may be largely ignored for some time in this respect. Of course, grants for the extra training schools could sweeten the picture, but there is no mention of these or of other kinds of similar assistance from the government.

Under present legislation in Ontario, a child's record is confidential and cannot be used against him on a later charge. A judge cannot make an order under the Identification of Criminals Act, which involves finger-printing and photographing for RCMP records. But under this bill a judge can make such an order if he sees fit, and the record is there presumably for future use in evidence if the child is ever again in trouble.

Mr. Speaker, a child has not needed to have his record pardoned in the past, but some will need to have theirs pardoned in future if the bill is enacted as it now reads. With this feature in it, more lawyers will be retained to advise parents to let or not let their children go unrepresented in court. This, in my opinion, is a very bad power. I hope the Solicitor General will look at this provision very, very carefully before supporting it further.

In Ontario at the present time, children are confined in institutions for indefinite periods, which is far more satisfactory than fixed terms. I say this on the basis of my own experience. All concerned about the welfare of the child can determine in such cases when to hold him further or when to release him. It is almost invariably in his interest that this be the case, although he may not think so at the time. This is the solution that is much preferred by the Canadian Mental Health Association which, as we know, has a very poor regard for the effort demonstrated by this bill. Mr. Crossman suggested that a review board be set up which would from time to time review the cases of all children confined in training schools, in order to make sure that no child is being incarcerated unreasonably. I think this is an excellent suggestion.

I think the government is making a bad mistake in lowering the age from 12 to 10 years, as will be the case in Ontario. That will be the fact if this measure passes, and I think the government will be making a bad mistake. No matter how nicely you skate around it, the 10-year old and 11-year old child will be charged with an offence. Mr. Speaker, why does the government ignore years of experience and knowledge in the handling of young offenders, for the sake of an image that I submit will prove to be false? If a bill like this is enacted into law, young offenders will need friends. I submit that the amendment should carry.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate I wish to join other members in congratulating the new minister on his appointment, wishing him well yet expressing my regret that he has begun his important task as a minister by bringing in a bill which, so far as I can tell, has met with the almost unanimous condemnation of everyone who does not work for the federal government but works in organizations active in dealing with young people unfortunate enough to get into difficulties with the law. That is not surprising. As we look at the record of the Canadian approach to crime and to correction over the past number of years, we see a country which has more people, per thousand of population, in prison than any other country in the western world—2½ or three times as many people in prison as is the case in Great Britain.

We see a country which has consistently over the years taken the view, openly or through failure to act, that the way to deal with crime, the way to deal with people who break our law, is to send them to prison, to send them to some kind of correctional institution, training school or whatever else you may want to call it. When we made progress in recent years, it was as a result of the insistent demands and tremendous work of public education carried on by organizations such as the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society, the Canadian Corrections Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association and other organizations too numerous to mention.

As one looks at their reaction to this bill, one finds almost unanimous rejection of its entire proposals. I say "almost unanimous' because I want to protect myself; I have not heard all the people who have commented on the bill, nor have I read all the literature on it. But I say to the minister that everything I have read, all the reaction I have witnessed, all the reports I have seen and all the comments are adverse to it. I have yet to see one report which does not suggest that this bill contains such serious defects as to make it unworthy of being rejected in toto or being sent back for the most fundamental and searching scrutiny.

I want to put on record some of the comments which have been made, because at least one report that I saw last week in a newspaper which is read, I suppose, by more English-speaking Members of Parliament than any other in the country—it is my impression that the reporter obtained his information from the public relations officer, or someone similar, in the minister's department—indicates that there is no real objection to this bill except those objections which might come from the Ontario Department of Corrections and its minister. Well, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. I want to put on record some of the comments of individuals and organizations which have had more experience than any member of this House, including the minister, in connection with the difficulties and problems involved when young people get into trouble.

Other members have already spoken about objections of the Canadian Mental Health Association to this bill. If I have time, I will come back to that subject later. That body has objected vehemently and in a manner which I have seldom heard in connection with any question it has dealt with in recent years. Judge William Little, chairman of the Ontario Juvenile Court Judges' Committee on Delinquency, has taken serious objection to this bill. I shall quote a few sentences from a statement Judge Little made. He said in part:

> "The intent of the original act (the Juvenile Delinquents Act) was to have a social objective of the rehabilitation of children," he said. "It seems to me this intent has been lost in the new bill"—
> "They (federal legislators) have turned the focus from treatment to an attempt to make the Juvenile Delinquents Act consistent with the Criminal Code. They are assuming that a judge can measure the required amount of treatment. With a time limit, it's like taking a person out of hospital in the middle of treatment."

Don Sinclair, executive director of institutions in the Ontario Department of Corrections, according to an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of December 29, 1970, said flatly that if the act is adopted as it stands, Canada would be taking a backward step. The metropolitan Toronto Children's Aid Society sent a telegram to the former Solicitor General asking that it and other agencies be given ample opportunity to comment on the bill before it obtained final passage. The Children's Aid Society of Toronto is preparing a brief, I presume, to the Standing Committee. The director of the Children's Aid Society of Toronto, Lloyd Richardson, was horrified at many aspects of the bill. He said:

> The framers of this new act asked for and got a great deal of expert advice and opinion . . . Unfortunately, not many of their ideas seem to have been incorporated.

That is consistent with other actions of this department. For example, it went ahead and built a maximum security institution which was universally condemned because it had no windows. In response to a telephone call, I received a letter from the director of juvenile corrections and metro probation, Department of Health and Social Development, of Winnipeg, dated November 27, 1970. I want to put this on record so the minister will know it is not only a few people in the city of Toronto and elsewhere in Ontario who are angry with his department and are opposed to this bill. I wish to quote part of what was said by the director of corrections and probation in Manitoba:

> The act on first reading impresses one as being a Criminal Code for juveniles. Despite an attempt in section 4 to establish a philosophical base, the act contains so much procedural detail as to overshadow its intent. Furthermore, it is important, it seems to me, that an act which establishes a general approach for the handling and treatment of children in conflict with the law (a matter that can touch any individual or family) should be comprehensible to the lay reader. Only those whose responsibilities require an intimate working knowledge of the act are likely to develop a clear understanding of its basic philosophy and operation.
> One stated objective of the new legislation is to eliminate the terms "delinquency" and "delinquent," which it has been suggested impose a stigma on a child brought before a juvenile court. However, what is in fact gained when the terminology that has been substituted is copied from adult court practices, for example, "arrest," "offence" and "offender"? It does not seem particularly appropriate to call a 10-year old a young offender.

That is what the bill states, Mr. Speaker. I continue quoting:

> It may be that upon more thorough study of the act, section by section, that enlightened practices may be possible. Be that as it may, one would like to have seen in the act greater recognition of the variety of programs and approaches now being used in the juvenile field, as well as greater encouragement to pioneer new approaches. The act tends to suggest a stereotyped approach. For example, the details which are to be included in a probation order imply a stereotyped idea of probation, and fail to recognize the irreversible trend in the field toward the development of an array of services between probation and institutional placement, which combine—where appropriate—features of both—
> The act appears to place undue authority and responsibility on juvenile court judges without saying anything about qualifications for appointment to judgeships. Neither does the act offer any guidance or ensure that the court will have available to it the services of suitably qualified people to conduct enquiries into the background of children appearing before the court, to propose treatment plans for the court's consideration, or to provide treatment. Without such services, a juvenile court is little more than an adult court.

I could quote Dr. Dewalt's letter in more detail; however, I think I have read enough to clearly show that in the province of Manitoba there are serious objections to the proposals of the government. If the minister and the department wanted a philosophical basis on which to deal with young people, they did not have far to go.

In Ottawa we have Dr. Charles Roberts. Dr. Roberts is professor and chairman of the department of psychiatry, University of Ottawa, and psychiatrist in chief of the Royal Ottawa Hospital. He was formerly executive director of the Clarke institute of psychiatry, University of Toronto. Dr. Roberts, together with Dr. Denis Lazure, the executive director and medical superintendent of the Hôpital Rivière-des-Prairies, Montreal, was co-chairman of the committee sponsored by a very impersonal group of organizations working in the field of children and young people. This study was sponsored by the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded, the Canadian Council on Children and Youth, the Canadian Education Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association, the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled and the Canadian Welfare Council. The result of this study was published more than a year ago. It is entitled "One Million Children."

If the minister or his department had referred to that section of the volume which deals with the child as an offender, and had read the relatively short analysis of the problems of young people who get into trouble, they would have read a philosophy which completely rejects the approach embodied in the bill brought forward by the minister. The report points out that what is required is informal and timely handling of minor offences. This could be extended by the development of youth bureaux, as recommended in the 1969 report of the Ontario Law Reform Commission. Instead of informal and timely handling, we will have formal, legalistic, detailed judgments by judges rather than by people who are experts in rehabilitation.

The report points out that children who appear in the courts as offenders are oftentimes children for whom the community can find no other placement. These children have had difficulties more than once and have frequently been seen by many agencies. Often they are sent to training schools because there is no other place for them. That is what we have had until now. Will we have anything different when this bill is passed? Not really. The government is proposing to examine the actual crime much more formally. The bill does not contain anything with regard to the cause of the crime or how to deal with a child of 10, 11, 12 or 13 who has committed an offence and is brought into court.

The report points out that probation officers and clinical personnel working with the courts, report that there is not adequate staff to deal with the problems of children who are brought before the courts. The whole area of care and treatment for juvenile offenders is given low priority by those handling funds for education, health, welfare and manpower services. That is an indictment of municipal, provincial and federal governments. Some years ago we were willing to embark on a program which would have cost the people of Canada $100 million. New institutions were to be built to help adults convicted of crime. We have not indicated to the provinces that if they will extend their probation services the federal government will pay one-tenth of the cost. We are willing to pay to lock up people. We are not willing to find ways to treat people so they will not commit crimes in the future.

In 1966, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported that over 20,000 juveniles under 16 years of age were charged with being delinquent. Of those charged, 90 per cent were found to be delinquent. I refuse to believe that in a country the size of Canada 20,000 young people were branded as criminals in the year 1966 by the police, prosecuting authorities, and courts. It is not true. We have not adopted modern methods which may eliminate the causes of young people getting into difficulty. In the report "One Million Children," Dr. Roberts and Dr. Lazure sum up their approach to the problems of young people as follows:

> We believe that the process of labelling a juvenile as delinquent, and the associated names—incorrigible, truant, sexually immoral, vagrant, is unsupportable because the effect is to increase the alienation of the child from society by defining him in a derogatory way and isolating him from his normal social environment.

• (9:20 p.m.)

If it is wrong to label young people delinquents, it is just as wrong to label them offenders, because the two terms are in fact synonymous. The report is critical of the use of detention during the pre-hearing period and in the period between trial or hearing and the day the judge disposes of the case. It points out that there are few institutions which accept delinquents for a course of real treatment, because these courses are difficult to carry out. They present a demanding task requiring highly trained staff, which we do not have. They wind up their relatively short section on the child as offender by making a number of recommendations that I should like to put on the record. One realizes, on listening to the recommendations, how far short this bill falls in meeting the recommendations which Dr. Roberts and Dr. Lazure propose. The report recommends:

> That the juvenile courts/tribunals for minors be restricted to the 14 to 18-year age group.

This bill provides that the act, which defined a child offender as someone over the age of seven, will be amended, so the age is raised to ten. I suggest that nobody aged 10, 11 or 12 should be labelled a juvenile delinquent, a child delinquent or an offender. The report also recommends:

> That children under the age of 14 be brought before the courts only under child protection legislation.

That provision is not made in the bill, either. The report recommends:

> That only violations of the Criminal Code or provincial or municipal statutes be classed as delinquent behaviour requiring appearance in juvenile court.
> That legal counsel be easily and freely available to the offender appearing before the juvenile court and to the parents accused of neglect of a child who is alleged to be in need of protection.
> That professional schools training personnel for work with children and adolescents or for the administration of justice include delinquency in their curriculum.
> That juvenile courts and training schools encourage the participation of individuals and community groups in the planning and operation of existing programs to increase the community understanding and support for the needs of the juvenile delinquent.

My colleague from Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) said that this method is being used in Great Britain, and I think my colleague from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said it was also being used in Sweden. Instead of this, we are more and more to rely upon a very legalistic approach, more and more to rely, if this legislation is passed in its present form, upon a judge to make the decision as to what shall be done in a given case. The report also recommends:

> That the personnel working with the young offender have access to a variety of community, education, health and welfare services.
> That all juvenile courts use specialists in child and adolescent behaviour to assist in the diagnosis of the problems and needs of the young offender and to formulate rehabilitation programs.
> That aftercare services for delinquents be given budget priority to increase the number of staff involved in this function and to improve their training.

I have read those recommendations into the record to show just how much we have ignored such proposals and just how far we have gone in the direction of a much more rigid, more legalistic and punitive approach to those young people who get into difficulty and break our laws.

I want to spend a few moments to put on the record arguments advanced in opposition to the bill by the Canadian Mental Health Association. I do so because to my knowledge no organization has made a greater contribution to a better understanding of the problems of people who get into difficulties, be they adults or the young, than has this organization. This organization has over the years called for greater concentration on rational methods of dealing with people who find themselves in this sort of difficulty. This is an organization that has called again and again for governments to stop using punitive measures and to begin adopting humane approaches which will have positive effects in assisting those who have fallen afoul of the law. In a letter that the Canadian Mental Health Association sent to all members of this House and to the members of the other place, the following paragraph appears:

> To appreciate the significance of our association's strong objection to this act, it must be recognized that the psychological and physical needs of children are different from those of adults . . . A Criminal Code based on the notion that specific offences merit a specified range of punitive procedures may be appropriate for adults but definitely not for children—
> Basically it is the position of this association that there should be a separation between the judicial process and the process of determining appropriate treatment, training, supervision and aftercare. The former should be considered to be a matter of due process—

In other words, considered by the court.

> —while the latter deals with decisions concerning the particular needs of the child with a special emphasis on his rehabilitation. For this reason, decisions concerning the disposition of the child should be for an indefinite period with his civil rights fully protected by provisions of an independent external review board for review at stated intervals—

What this bill provides is exactly the opposite; it provides that judges shall impose sentences for specific periods of time. The Mental Health Association goes on to say:

> With these principles in mind, it is obvious that the proposed legislation limits the options of the court for making disposition for the child. No provision whatever is made for after-care and rehabilitation—and the suggestion that a child would benefit by being "sentenced" to become a ward of the Children's Aid Society for a period "not exceeding two years" is not only impractical—it is ridiculous.

The letter concludes with this paragraph:

It is the hope of the Canadian Mental Health Association that Bill C-192 will either be defeated or drastically amended and that in the event of it passing second reading, it be referred to the chairman of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs with the recommendation that provision be made for receiving submissions from concerned organizations and from the general public.

I am reasonably certain that submissions will be called for, but I want to say a few words in response to a speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) who rejected almost in toto the arguments made on this side. I think he implied that the arguments were being made for political and partisan reasons only, and the hon. member refused to deal with the arguments put forward by some of the organizations and persons to whom I have referred. The hon. member suggested we ought to pass the bill, and he said that he and other members—I presume he was talking about government members—would be quite open-minded in regard to amendments when the bill received clause by clause consideration in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee. What the hon. member conveniently forgot to say was that once this bill is given second reading, the House has in fact adopted its provisions in principle.

In the news story I referred to earlier, which appeared in the Globe and Mail and which obviously came from sources within the department, it was made very clear that while the government would be prepared to consider certain minor amendments, there was no disposition to consider any major revisions or amendments to the bill. Under those circumstances, I do not see how members on this side of the House or on the government side can vote for a bill which has been condemned, criticized, attacked in whole or in part by almost every authority and organization interested in the field of child welfare.

I should like to close by putting on the record, although I know this has already been done, some of the specific objections made by the Canadian Mental Health Association to clauses of this bill. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, other government members and the minister did not deal in detail with the specific objections to the bill which have been made both inside and outside the House. I hope that at the committee stage government members and the minister will deal with the specific objections which have been made by the Canadian Mental Health Association, other groups and associations.

The Canadian Mental Health Association pointed out in a pamphlet they circulated under the title "The Young Offenders Act and the Children of Canada" a number of objections to this bill. They pointed out that under proposed section 35 (6) a person over the age of ten is in fact being dealt with, under the provisions of this bill, as a criminal. This proposed section makes it clear that his fingerprints and photograph will be taken and placed in the records for use at a later date unless the individual seeks a pardon.

The association also points out that in proposed section 74 (1) power is given to the court, when it wishes to exercise that power, to order a child to be fingerprinted and photographed, with the record being forwarded to the RCMP and kept in the central files of that organization. I submit there is something monstrously wrong with a proposal which would suggest that a child of 10 or 11 years of age, having committed an offence, is subject not only to punishment for the offence committed at a very young age but also the stigma of having his fingerprints and photographs placed on record for the rest of his life.

The pamphlet points out that a 14-year-old who has been judged to have committed murder could be committed, under the provisions of proposed section 30(1) (k), to a training school until he reaches 21 years of age—in other words, for seven years—and then could be brought before the courts and sentenced possibly to life imprisonment. The pamphlet suggests this is totally inhuman and intolerable. I think these are mild words to describe that kind of provision.

The last proposed section I wish to refer to is section 30(1) (f) which, as is pointed out in the pamphlet, ignores the fact that at the time the child is before the court it is impossible to state how long his case supervision and treatment should continue. The form it calls for makes it apparent that a child is committed to a training school for a definite period, a period which may seem appropriate at the time but which may be too long or too short. In order words, it takes away that flexibility which is required and which the present act provides.

I have tried to list some of the difficulties which people who have worked in the field, people who have practical knowledge and have seen the inadequacies of our court system, our training school system and with the very large number of young people incarcerated, see in the proposed bill. The difficulties which have been pointed out are so serious and so numerous that I could not vote for this bill. I hope when the bill goes to committee—I have been here long enough to be practical and to realize that since this bill was brought forward by the minister, it will pass second reading and be referred to the committee no matter what members of the opposition say—the minister, who has not had his ministerial post long enough to have any personal responsibility for this bill, will be willing to call as witnesses Dr. Roberts and others, including some of our judges, social workers, correctional officers, probation officers and representatives of organizations such as the Canadian Mental Health Association, the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society and a host of others who already have indicated they are unhappy with the bill. I hope the minister will be willing to call these people before the committee and listen to them with an open mind.

If what some of us on this side have reported to be our feelings proves correct, and if these people make the kind of objections we have listed, I hope the minister will be big enough to listen to the objections of people who have an interest in young people, as I think members on all sides of this House have, and rewrite the bill with the spirit and motivation we have expressed, in order to improve the law for young people. The motivations on the part of people who have worked in this field have already been made very clear, but they are not found in the bill as presently worded.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to congratulate the new Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) on his appointment. I have listened to many criticisms in respect of the bill he brought in and explained so thoroughly to this House in his address. Somewhere along the line there was a bad slip-up, because I am sure the previous Solicitor General, who is and has been a member of this House since I came here, did not see the bill before it reached the present Solicitor General. If there was not any doubt in the minister's mind that he had a bad bill, I think he should now know that it is a bad bill and should withdraw it.

I am not going to deal with all the legal implications of the bill because this has been done very well by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and others. It has been rightly named the criminal code for children. I am wondering why it was not labelled in the same way as the English act, which has been referred to in the House as the Children and Young Persons' Act. I am also wondering why, during the 64 years since this measure was put into the Criminal Code, it was not changed to parallel the English law which has mercifully concluded that age 14 is an early enough age, rather than age ten. In Great Britain no one under 14 years of age can be charged with an offence. Under this bill, however, they may be charged at age ten.

• (9:40 p.m.)

From a humanitarian standpoint, and from the standpoint of plain ordinary common sense, I ask how many members of this House when they were in the age bracket between 10 and 17 did not do something for which they could have been charged had the authorities been present at the right time. All of us have done something wrong, and some of us more than others. Yet we escape scot-free. I think we should bear this in mind. He who is without sin, let him cast the first stone. I do not think the people who drafted this bill thought about their own past.

An hon. Member: They forgot that.

Mr. Rynard: I think the problem is that they have forgotten the humanitarian way of life. Our aim should always be to direct and readjust young people so they can remain on the road to good citizenship. It is not unfair to ask a child to accept responsibility for actions which may be more serious than the signing of a legal document? Although, since he is a minor, he may not sign a legal document, we hold him responsible for his acts. Is this not an example of foolishness?

In this bill the emphasis is on punishment. The drafters have entirely forgotten about prevention and rehabilitation. They have forgotten to specify that in each case there should be a medical and physical examination and an examination by a trained psychiatrist. The home of such a child should be investigated.

The other day a young man 19 years of age came to me. I would point out that never have so many people approached me hungry and in need of help as during this holiday season. This young man came to me and told me he had no money. He said he was trying to live with his mother but that she did not have any money. I checked with the employment agency in an effort to find out why he was unemployed. I was told that he had not been very successful in his last couple of jobs. When I asked the people in the agency why he had not been successful in this employment they told me he was not a very responsible person and was untrained. Since he did not have a trade, they had sent him to a school. This is a school for which we as taxpayers pay. He remained there for three months and then he was let out without any money.

I had the impression that he was not a bad boy. When I began questioning him I found that he had spent six months in the Penetang institution, which is an institution for disoriented people. Then he was sent out to find his way in everyday life as being fit and capable of looking after himself. He went to school for three months through Manpower and was then advised that he was not capable of taking training. Then I asked him about his home life. I asked how many brothers and sisters he had, and he said he had one sister. When I asked him where she was, he told me she was at school. He said she was in grade 8 and was 14 years of age. When I asked if she was living with her mother, he told me she was in the correctional school at Guelph.

I asked this lad what had happened to his sister, and he said she had been convicted for using drugs. I asked him what she had used, and he said marijuana. Then I went a little further and asked how many children there were in the family. He told me he had a brother ten years old who was home with his mother. I discovered that this family had bought a home but were losing it. The mother had been working part-time but could not earn enough to look after the home and the children. This boy told me his father had died when he was ten years of age. When I asked him what had happened to his father, he told me his father was an alcoholic. This lad was ten years of age when his father died, and what he remembers are the beatings he and his mother received. Who is responsible for this boy and the girl who is in a training school? Not this boy who is 19 years of age and without a job, or the girl who is in a training school. We, society, are responsible for these people.

Fortunately there is a quality of mercy. I have taken this matter up with the authorities and am hopeful that a suitable home and some welfare can be provided for this mother so that she will have enough to live on. This woman has only a grade 5 education and is unable to do anything but unskilled work. The responsibility is ours. I think of the drug question and the girl being put away because of using marijuana. We might ask where she obtained the marijuana, and who is responsible. Then I think about the way we treat our young people, discredit them and say they use drugs. Then I look at the statistics in Canada concerning the number of alcoholics. Mr. Speaker, the statistics in respect of alcoholics show that there are half a million people involved. I am sure that if alcohol were a new drug today, it would be outlawed because of the damage it does to human beings. Because of the use of drugs our young people are branded as criminals and now, with the social security number, they carry a record for as long as they live.

This is not fair and it is not right. I think everyone in the House is aware that some children develop later than others. I have seen teenagers of 17 or 18 who were considered pretty stupid, only to find them later on in their thirties and forties much smarter than the kids they were compared with when they were younger. I remember that even in my own field of medicine there was a fellow who was not considered the brightest scholar. He had sups year after year. But there was a humanity in the world then that does not seem to exist today. That student was carried along by professors who believed in him. Finally, he came to his last year and graduated. He was a fine fellow morally and spiritually, but he had to be carried along.

Such a course would not be considered today. We have lost contact with the great principles that count for so much. Today, materialistic things count more than anything else and people would be looking at his marks and at nothing else. However, that medical student became a doctor. Twenty years later I was in another country and saw his name up on the blackboard announcing that this top-flight medical man was coming to address a meeting two weeks hence. I point this out to show you the mistake that can be made regarding youngsters between ten and 17 or even older. People do not mature at the same age and kids are not all the same, as has been pointed out over and over again. You can consider two kids who have committed the same offence—one needs no treatment and the other needs a period of supervision to keep him under control and to guide him.

If we follow the statistics, we find this proven over and over again. Eighty per cent of young offenders never come back to the courts; they only commit one offence. Is it fair, then, to label that 80 per cent for the rest of their lives, or to bring them up for trial when they are 21 years of age for acts which they committed when they were not responsible, when we would not accept their signature on legal document's as minors under our law?

As I have said, some young people develop much later than others. There is also the question of differences in intelligence, experience and judgment. We have seen people who are quite intelligent but who have poor judgment. If this is the just society, let us change the meaning of the term. The hon. member for Calgary North spoke very well indeed. I think most of us who heard his speech in the House heard a very excellent exposition of this bill. He referred to a young teenager who might be convicted for driving while impaired, who drives again and again is caught. That fellow can get a two-year sentence, but the same thing will not apply to an adult. Obviously this is unfair.

The same thing would apply in the case of murder. A young fellow can be arrested at the age of 12, 13 or 14 and, as the hon. member for Calgary North and others have pointed out, when he is 21 years of age he will again stand trial, after which he may receive a life sentence for an offence which he committed when 14, an offence which is probably only dimly remembered by him and for which he can hardly be held responsible. If the government now complains that their bill is misunderstood, I do not think they have anyone but themselves to blame. I read from a letter I have received, one of many:

Dear Dr. Rynard:

I am writing to request your support in protest of the proposed new young offenders act, recently given first reading in parliament. It is to replace the Juvenile Delinquents Act now in effect in Canada. As a supervisor of juveniles with the Ontario Department of Correctional Services, I feel that this is a definite step backwards in the rehabilitation of juveniles. The new act proposed appears to be shifting the major orientation of training school programs away from treatment, toward custody and punishment. The terminology alone, as "inmates" and "sentence", testifies to this. Such labelling in young persons is bound to have a backlash effect; the terms will become self-fulfilling in producing a deeper negative self-image and in perpetuating anti-social behaviour. Juveniles are not hardened criminals; they are still capable of being rehabilitated if given encouragement and a flexible program geared to their individual needs . . . Fingerprinting, RCMP photos, and set sentences are not good basics for effective juvenile treatment, and I feel certain that the rate of recidivists will soar if this proposal is accepted.

That is just one example of letters that we are receiving. Now the government complains. If it is anybody's fault, it is theirs that they have not been able to explain their own bill. The Globe and Mail puts the finger on it when it writes as follows:

But the basis of the act, the concepts upon which it is built, have been so thoroughly undermined by qualified criticism that, in the absence of adequate replies by federal officials, we can no longer accept it as a progressive document. No doubt it would improve the situation in some provinces. But the conviction is growing that in many key areas it would be a retrogressive piece of legislation—

The trouble so far has been that federal officials have refused to answer the criticisms. Refused even to discuss them. And government spokesmen give every indication that although they will accept changes to the bill, they will not accept any that touch upon basic issues.

The most damning criticism of the proposed act is that "it is, in fact, a criminal code for children, which is distasteful in its terminology, legalistic in its approach, and punitive in its effect". It is a criticism often voiced.

But it is one that is still to be answered. In conclusion, I say that this bill should be withdrawn. I believe that in this House we have able and capable people who have been active in the field of sociology and who are quite capable of advising the government of changes that should be made to this bill. However, it is such a bad bill that it will have to be withdrawn. Let us start again and write a new bill of rights for the children and young people of this country.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the adjournment debate I would ask the President of the Privy Council to confirm, for the benefit of all members, the items to be placed before the House tomorrow. Would he also confirm the understanding that we will continue the budget debate on Monday and, hopefully, Tuesday?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I confirm the order of legislation which I announced today, with the change that instead of continuing with the bill that has been before the House today, tomorrow we will take the crop insurance legislation and continue the order of business as announced. On Monday we will take the budget, definitely. Perhaps the quality of speeches will be so persuasive on Monday that a debate on Tuesday will only be redundant. We will only know that on Monday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the information that the minister has given us. May I ask him whether the fact that we are not proceeding with the young offenders bill tomorrow means the government is giving consideration to the possibility of withdrawing it?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. We want to give consideration to the two days' debate on the bill, but not for the purpose of withdrawing it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

AIRPORTS—PROVISION OF RAPID TRANSIT GROUND FACILITIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question involves comments on a reply received from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) when I asked a question on November 17 regarding provision of rapid facilities on the proposed bridge to serve the Vancouver international airport. All of us are aware of the dangers to humanity of the internal combustion engine, and of the fact that many large urban centres are suffering from emissions from it. In fact, some large cities are slowly strangling to death.

We all know that the oil companies are trying to capitalize on the knowledge of the people and the resultant popular apprehension by a vigorous advertising campaign directed to selling low-lead or no-lead gasolines. Whether these new products are just advertising gimmicks and the people who buy them just willing suckers, or whether they are real scientific advances is not for me to say since I do not have the expertise; but I strongly suspect that the former is true.

The point is that for the past quarter of a century our cities have become slaves to the automobile and we cannot build freeways and bridges fast enough to meet the demand. As our freeways develop and spread into suburbia, people move farther out into the suburbs, ultimately putting more traffic in the arteries we have developed. The traffic density which grows, prevents the freeways from accomplishing what they were intended to accomplish and they do not provide much in the way of transportation efficiency for very long.

Collaterally, many of our urban cores have become large parking lots. Sometimes these are tax havens. Anyway, our city cores are hollow in the centre and devoid of those characteristics that make up a balanced, viable community. People do not live there anymore; they get out of these areas as fast as possible. The construction of freeways is something like a dog chasing its tail. The construction of freeways and urban core disintegration are coincidental. But, Mr. Speaker, people will not put up with this situation forever. One need only look at Ottawa and its Queensway during rush hours to appreciate what I am saying. The Queensway is packed with automobiles from one end to the other during rush hours, each vehicle usually containing one driver only, grimly attempting to get to work and return home again without developing ulcers because of the tie-up frustrations and without developing lung cancer from exhaust emissions.

Even if we built another Queensway I do not think it would help a great deal. The result would not be less traffic on the present one, but more farmland would be gobbled up, so we would have the same situation of one driver in each car driving more miles every day to get to one more downtown parking lot. We have all heard about the Spadina expressway in Toronto. That story further documents the fact that people are beginning to react and are not just accepting these things. There is no such thing any more as a cowed electorate, and that is a good thing.

Some Members of Parliament, notably the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), have been extremely critical of the chairman of the National Capital Commission, Mr. Douglas Fullerton. In my opinion, his comments on automobiles and expressways and his criticism of the depredations of the automobile, with their resultant social disintegration, are bang on. His speeches on the subject are certainly worth reading. This all started, as I said earlier, on November 17 when I asked the Minister of Transport a question which was supplementary to one asked by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). The minister assured the hon. member that he was indeed very well aware of the need for rapid transit systems in cities. I asked this supplementary question on the subject of rapid transit systems, as reported at page 1235 of Hansard:

> In view of the discussions on this question, could the minister advise the House why in his consideration of rapid transit systems to and from airports in major cities there has been no provision for rapid transit facilities in respect of the new bridge to serve Vancouver airport?

The minister replied:

> For the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that a number of authorities on the matter, excluding the authority of (the) hon. gentleman opposite—

The minister was referring to me.

—do not believe this is the best way to proceed on this question. That is why a full and detailed study is being undertaken.

It may be undertaken; yet the point is that there is no provision for rapid transit facilities on that bridge. I must have nettled the minister. He is usually quite affable and friendly. I do not know what I did to upset him, but his reaction seems to suggest that he thought I was questioning his experts. I did not suggest his experts were wrong. My purpose in asking the question was merely to ascertain whether, in spite of his fine words, the minister was really sincere about the future of rapid transit in any city. I have decided that he is not.

We are about to spend $21 million of public money on this bridge over the Fraser River, to serve principally the Vancouver international airport on Sea Island. Since this bridge may have a lifetime of 50 years or more, and the recent greater Vancouver transportation study—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Rose: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, since a few points of order were raised just before I began, I wonder if I might be allowed the extra time that was taken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair has taken into consideration the two minutes taken up that way after ten o'clock. The hon. member began just about two minutes after ten. All I can do now is ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Duquet) to reply.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) has raised the subject of rapid transit systems and their potential as a future form of transportation in Vancouver. I know from listening to the hon. member that he has acquired a more than adequate knowledge of this very complex subject. I join him in expressing concern about the need to provide fast-moving transit systems in our larger cities, including Vancouver. It is something we should be looking at now, and I am pleased to note that in fact close consultation is under way with many major cities.

On the question of a rapid transit system to the Vancouver airport, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), in his answer to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) on December 17, explained why it was not possible to become involved at the present time in the general form of rapid transit which was being proposed for the greater Vancouver area. Within the Ministry of Transport there has been established an urban transportation development division. It is responsible for a program of research and development, and it is in constant communication with interested groups across the country on the complex subject of public transportation.

I wish to assure all members that a great deal of work is being done on this matter, and I am advised that the subject is being studied intensely by all three levels of government. I would be pleased to inform the minister of the several additional points the hon. member raised this evening.

OIL—POSSIBLE REVIEW OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD POLICY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, on November 26 last, I asked the following question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Since the Caloil Company of Montreal announced it was dropping plans to build a refinery in St. Augustin in the Portneuf riding, because the National Energy Board has refused to allow it to sell imported oil west of the Ottawa Valley, could the minister say whether the policy will be reviewed and amended as required?

Here is what the minister said in reply:

No consideration is being given to changing it because it is felt that it was adopted in the interest of the whole country.

This prompted me to ask the following supplementary question:

Does the minister know that the trade barrier put up by the National Energy Board between Quebec and Ontario is a one-way barrier since Ontario can still sell oil in Quebec?

The minister kept to his seat preferring not to answer any further.

Mr. Speaker, because I had mentioned that I wanted this matter to be discussed, my name was put on the list for Tuesday, December 1st. This list, as everybody knows, becomes official only at 5 p.m. when it is read by you. But hear this: at 4.45 that same day I received a telephone call from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) who had been asked to answer for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who was not in attendance. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was merely asking me whether I would not be kind enough to postpone the discussion to a later date because, he said, he did not quite know what to reply.

Mr. Speaker, the reason I feel that the policy of the National Energy Board is in need of revision is that with the population of Quebec I realize the government is trying to direct the refining and petro-chemical industries toward Ontario, which is a sabotage of the development of a peak sector in Quebec.

It is true that the Supreme Court did pronounce a judgment recently but it is also true that the companies involved were represented there by their lawyers, who believed they were right.

In short, even if we recognize the judge's authority to dismiss a case, this does mean that his verdict is always fair.

Allegedly to protect western oil, whose free access to the United States is now announced, very high prices for oil are allowed to be maintained in Ontario, thus increasing profits from these operations and attracting in the province maximum investments in the refining industry.

In order to continue this game, even the smallest quantities of oil must be kept out because, if sold at a lower price, they would attract public attention and cause the public to make comparisons.

On May 7, 1970, the National Energy Board and the Department of Energy Advisory Council (made up exclusively of major companies' representatives) caused the federal government to adopt rules concerning the transportation to Ontario of oil imported from Quebec. On the following day, the barrier raised between the two areas was closed.

The Caloil Company of Quebec having been prohibited by the National Energy Board from distributing west of the Ottawa Valley the oil that it imports from overseas, this prohibition having been confirmed by the Supreme Court, the company is thus deprived of half of its market and is unable to build a refinery near Quebec City where it owns land valued at $300,000. The land owned by the company, which was incorporated in 1963 pursuant to the Quebec Companies Act, is located at the limits of the municipalities of Saint-Augustin and Neuville. Bordered on the south by the St. Lawrence and on the north by the C.P., this land, across which can be found Hydro-Quebec transmission lines, C.N. tracks and part of Highway No. 2, will also include part of the Northern Highway.

All the company's investigations have confirmed the fact that the site has all the necessary requisites to be an economically valid choice in all respects.

Furthermore, this land is located 13 miles from the Quebec bridge, 60 miles from Trois-Rivières and 110 miles from the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region.

The setting up of that refinery in Portneuf was announced in 1966 by the former Quebec premier, Mr. Jean Lesage. The project had been part of the electoral platform of liberal candidate Paul-Émile Duplain in the provincial campaign of June 1966. Then, when the federal elections of June 1968 came up, the candidate Jules Lapierre, a friend of the member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand), also included the project in his program. More recently still, in April 1970, during the last Quebec elections, the project was part of the program of Mr. André Sauvageau, liberal candidate for Portneuf.

The regional Chamber of Commerce and the Economic Council of Portneuf have also continuously supported the project. Through the years the company had managed to develop a market for the distribution of imported gasoline and its by-products. That market extended as well in the province of Quebec as throughout Ontario, and annual sales were $35 million, including $18 million in the western part of the Ottawa River.

These last few months, Caloil Company multiplied its representations in an attempt to arrive at a compromise. It suggested for instance that for two years and a half it be granted an imported oil sales quota for Ontario.

Afterwards, it would have sold the neighbour province only oil refined in Quebec. That was refused. It also asked for a quota that would apply only for a few months until it could conclude an agreement with one of the refineries established in Quebec, pending the construction of its own facilities. That was also denied to the company.

[Mr. Godin.]

This discrimination will have serious consequences for Caloil which, with a daily capacity of 10,000 barrels, could consider building its own refinery. Not only will Caloil be prevented to do so but the president does not dismiss the possibility of layoffs among its 2,000 employees. All that on account of new regulations.

But the most revolting thing is that the trade barrier raised by the Board between Quebec and Ontario is one-sided and the National Energy Board representatives were even overbearing when they stated to the company spokesmen and I quote:

If you wanted to establish a refinery in Ontario, our attitude would be quite different.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I ask whether the Supreme Court is authorized to rule in favour of Ontario and if I am here as a member of the Ontario legislature or the Canadian Parliament.

[English]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has attempted to relate the national oil policy to some sort of dispute between Quebec and Ontario, when in fact the national oil policy has been designed and maintained by the present government of Canada and by previous governments of Canada in the interests of Canada as a whole.

Our national oil policy reserves certain Ontario oil markets for products refined from western crude oil. The government has made it clear to all companies planning refinery construction and expansion in eastern Canada that their planning should not be based on completely free access to Ontario markets. This caused neither surprise nor protest; after all, the oil policy is nearly ten years old. And it has not prevented other companies from proceeding with projects that have included a large refinery at Quebec City, built with federal assistance and due to come on stream shortly.

The claim that sales in the central Ontario market are a precondition for Caloil's refinery project is difficult to understand. A refinery at Quebec City today has access to an eastern Canadian market which is bigger and faster growing than that of Ontario. Moreover, there are large imports of petroleum products to this market which new refineries could displace. The government categorically rejects any suggestion that the national oil policy adversely affects Quebec. Rather, Quebec has been a primary beneficiary of this policy. Quebec's free access to imported oil has given it the lowest petroleum product prices in the country. Industrial development, including the petrochemical industry, has been encouraged, and private consumers have paid less for their oil. At the same time, Quebec has benefited from western Canadian purchases of oil industry equipment and from the use of Alberta natural gas.

As to refining, more crude oil is processed in Quebec than in any other province. There are six refineries in Montreal with a capacity of 450,000 barrels a day. Three refineries in Sarnia producing 205,000 barrels a day and four in Toronto producing 162,000 barrels a day rank next. More crude oil is processed in Quebec than in any other province. In 1969, Quebec processed 395,000 barrels a day, compared with 343,000 barrels a day in Ontario and 111,000 barrels a day in Alberta. Out of Quebec 66,000 barrels a day of refined products moved mostly to Ontario, comprising all grades of products to the Ottawa Valley, fuel oils and other products to central Ontario. About 8,000 barrels a day of motor gasoline was shipped into Ontario, contrary to the national oil policy.

Ontario is a large net recipient of products, mostly from Quebec and some from the west. The Atlantic provinces ship to Quebec a net volume of 7,000 barrels a day, while Alberta ships most of its refined products to British Columbia, the Northwest Territories and eastward as far as Ontario.

WHEAT BOARD—PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—STATEMENT IN BUDGET RESPECTING STABILIZATION PAYMENTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House a situation in the rapeseed market which is working to the disadvantage of the producer, and to ask questions of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board who has not been prepared to answer them in the House up to this time.

On December 7 I asked the minister whether he would accede to the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool's policy of bringing this grain under the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. I received, to say the least, an equivocal answer. On December 8 I asked the same minister whether he would investigate the manipulation and rigging of the rapeseed market, and his answer was that he would make inquiries of the Winnipeg grain exchange as to the situation that then existed.

On December 17 I asked the minister if he would report to the House the result of his inquiries, and his answer was that he had nothing to report to the House at that time. Let me report to this House that the market was rigged. I must inform the House that I know of no other product in respect of which there are two futures markets operating in Canada for one product—one futures market at Winnipeg and the other at Thunder Bay.

I should like to report to this House the spreads of the futures, comparing Vancouver with Thunder Bay. I use as my source the Winnipeg Free Press of October 1. The spreads were 1-1/4 cents on October 1, 3/4 of a cent on October 8, 4 cents on October 15, 1-3/8 cents on October 22, 5-1/2 cents on October 29, and then all at once on November 5 there was a 49-cent difference between these two near futures markets. On November 12 it stayed at 41-1/2 cents and finally, on November 19, it stayed at 45-1/4 cents. This spread continued during a time when maximum deliveries from farmers were starting to come from the new crop, and they have narrowed since. In addition to this, one can compare the difference between points in Saskatchewan such as Maidstone and Lloydminster. A farmer will receive 6 to 15 cents more for rapeseed at Lloydminster than a farmer will receive at Maidstone. A similar situation exists at other points which are close together. The price is higher on the Alberta side of the border.

I maintain there is not, and has not been for this period of time, a market which accurately reflects the value of the product. I maintain that the producer has been paid one price in western Canada on the local market, and the purchaser who wished to purchase rapeseed for future delivery at the west coast has been held up as to price. This took place at a time when there were 2 million bushels in storage on the west coast and 2 million bushels in storage at Thunder Bay.

I maintain that these two futures prices, if they were working properly, would reflect only the additional cost of keeping rapeseed in storage at the port of Thunder Bay over the winter season. The spread of 45-1/2 cents does not reflect this cost of storage but reflects, rather, the ability of certain interests in the trade to manipulate the price to their own advantage. Under these circumstances, the minister should report to this House the result of his conversations with the grain exchange in Winnipeg. If he is going to involve himself at all, he should take action to correct this situation. After all, the minister involved himself by going to Thunder Bay and officiating at the opening of the second futures market there.

I do not know how two future markets can operate for a single product in western Canada. I think the producer has suffered as a result of the two futures markets and the manipulation which has occurred. The plea of those who handled rapeseed a year ago was that there was not enough at Vancouver to meet the market. This year, I submit, there was enough of this product to meet the market and while that product was there those who controlled it used their control to their own personal advantage and to the disadvantage of both the producer and the purchaser who wanted to come into Vancouver and purchase rapeseed for future delivery.

I believe it is about time the minister responsible, if he wants to call himself responsible, replied to this House. If he wishes to divest himself of responsibility, he can do so. It is an open-market operation. However, in his answer to me he did not divest himself of responsibility; he said he would investigate the circumstances that existed. I think at this time it is up to the minister to report to this House, not only what he found but also the steps he is prepared to take to correct the situation which I have documented and which existed. I would tell the minister I have spoken to people I know in the grain exchange who are knowledgeable about this situation, and they tell me the situation should not occur.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, close to a year ago a committee was set up primarily to look into the situation in respect of rapeseed in Canada and to report on a number of matters to which the hon. member referred. I shall not go into all the items they recommended, but I would point out to the hon. member in particular that this committee, composed of two well known producers of rapeseed in the Prairies and a distinguished member of the rapeseed association, recommended that a second futures market be opened. Subsequently this was done. I was happy to be present in Winnipeg at the opening of the Thunder Bay futures market. This will allow the permanent extension of prices for rapeseed which is properly moved out of the east into European and eastern Canadian markets, which we hope to see increasing very much in the future.

I would point out to the hon. member that the existence of the two futures markets can occur because, as he will have noticed, the futures used in the two places involve different months in order to avoid any particular problems. A long time ago I was also concerned about the matter of inverted prices and the spread of price between street and nearby futures. This is one of the matters I asked the rapeseed committee to look into. They made suggestions and some of these were acted upon. Following that it continued to be a matter of concern to me that these situations existed. As well, in October I followed the suggestion of the rapeseed committee to invite the grain exchange to examine these practices.

I would point out to the hon. member that prices in this country are set as a result of discussions between elevator companies involved, particularly the pools, as well as other companies. The grain exchange's reply to my inquiry, after a very thorough investigation, was mailed in a letter to me dated January 8 which came to my hand today. I did have in mind making this reply available to hon. members and I shall take an early opportunity to do so. It suggests a number of things which may allow the removal of the inverted price situation, and several other things which they believe may deal with the spread between the country price and nearby futures.

This spread, of course, is essentially the result of a squeeze on the rapeseed available for immediate delivery in Vancouver, and one recommendation from the grain exchange, made also to the Wheat Board, was that there be no idea at all of a fixed limit on rapeseed in Vancouver. This has already been acted upon by the Wheat Board, and much larger supplies are present there. After seeing the reply from the grain exchange, I am still concerned about the availability of clean rapeseed, in the hands of a variety of people, readily available for shipment to Vancouver and I will be looking into that matter in the future.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House under Standing Order 43 to present a motion. I do so because of the many people across Canada who are making statements about the critical unemployment situation and the desirability of having some of these people appear before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration so that we can get the picture and come to grips with the problem. I therefore ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That the critical unemployment situation in Canada be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and that the committee consider calling witnesses who can underline the seriousness of the problem and who have proposals to make, including the Minister of Labour for Quebec who has stated that there could be a revolution in that province if unemployment gets any worse.

Mr. Baldwin: And the Leader of the Opposition who has been travelling around getting information.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—DESIGNATION OF ONE MINISTER TO CO-ORDINATE DEPARTMENTAL POLICIES AFFECTING ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. As the policies of six departments—the Department of Finance, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Transport, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of Manpower and Immigration—largely determine the condition of the Canadian economy and consequently the level of employment in the country, has the government given consideration to designating one minister, preferably the Minister of Finance, to co-ordinate the policies of these six departments as they affect general economic conditions in the country so that a co-ordinated and more effective attack may be made on the problem of unemployment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has been a member of cabinets in the past and he knows that the best way of co-ordinating government policy is through the cabinet itself. Many countries have tried the experiment of appointing super economic ministers and invariably they have failed. I do not think it is a useful precedent.

UNEMPLOYMENT—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES BY AIR CANADA

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question. I might just say that the results to date do not indicate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: May I carry on with my supplementary question? We used to have co-ordination, but not you fellows.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: I will now carry on with my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Tell us about your cabinet, George.

Mr. Hees: Will the Acting Prime Minister look into the reasons why Air Canada, a government controlled Crown corporation, has laid off between 400 and 500 employees at this particular time, thus setting a very undesirable example—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have two reservations about the hon. member's additional question. I have some doubts whether it is a supplementary question. I think that the hon. member is really taking advantage of the opportunity to ask a supplementary question dealing generally with unemployment to ask a supplementary question not immediately related to the first one. Second, I have the impression that this question was asked yesterday, but if I am wrong perhaps the minister might like to reply to the hon. member's supplementary question.

Mr. Hees: May I just finish my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? As I was about to say, this is setting a very bad example to private industry at the present time.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has been discussing this situation with Air Canada and perhaps he could be permitted to reply.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House, I believe on Wednesday, I have meetings with Air Canada scheduled for Monday of next week, but up to now I have been following the exemplary conduct of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings when he held this portfolio in keeping my distance, as it were, from Air Canada internal management matters. However, there are some basic questions involved here and I have undertaken to consult with the highest level of management of Air Canada to see if a solution can be worked out.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Transport also discuss with Air Canada at the same time the proposed transfer of the reservation service from Ottawa—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): As a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have had two supplementaries which have had little to do with the original question. I recognize they are legitimate questions but they should not be brought in as supplementaries. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF LABOUR, MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Scarborough West in his capacity as chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. Will the hon. member consider covering a meeting of his committee so that we might invite a person like the Minister of Labour of the province of Quebec to appear before that committee to discuss with us the seriousness of the unemployment situation in the province of Quebec?

Mr. MacEachen: You know better than that, Stanley.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I think we can take this matter up in our steering committee, but I am a bit doubtful at this time that we have any authority to do this.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): How about desire?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

IMMEDIATE CHANGES IN REGULATIONS TO ASSIST HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has any emergency plans to assist the 84,000 people who are classified as the hard-core unemployed, people who have been unemployed for more than six months, compared with the total of 46,000 last year, in view of the fact that most of them cannot qualify for unemployment insurance benefits and are forced to go on short-term welfare which is not adequate and certainly cannot provide a decent standard of living for their families?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a question which is very general in its terms. He is inviting the minister, or someone on behalf of the ministry, to make a statement as to what plans may be contemplated by the government to alleviate the very serious situation to which he has alluded. I would think this statement ought normally to be made on motions.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question. This is an urgent matter and I think there should be some latitude so we can get a response from the Acting Prime Minister. May I ask him if there is any contemplation of immediate changes in the unemployment insurance regulations so that many of these people can qualify who do not now qualify under the old Act, and also whether any changes are contemplated in the Canada Assistance Plan with respect to assistance to the provinces, so that these people can at least survive until spring?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the government now has under consideration legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and has published a white paper on this subject. On the second point, Mr. Speaker, the ministers of welfare are meeting here in Ottawa toward the end of this month, and I repeat what I said yesterday that this subject will undoubtedly be under discussion. May I also point out that these suggestions of the hon. member can be discussed during the debate which will take place on Monday.

Mr. Lundrigan: I would ask the minister if in fact we can conclude from his statement that the amendments to the unemployment insurance benefits, which were to be brought into effect some time later in 1971, not earlier than July, are being pushed forward so that people can qualify now, particularly the 84,000 hard-core unemployed who have been out of work for longer than six months and who cannot qualify under the old regulations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I understand from the Government House Leader that he would like to bring the unemployment insurance legislation forward as soon as it is reasonably possible. We are, of course, having discussions with the provinces. I am sure the hon. member recognizes they have a very active interest in this subject, and we would want to have a plan that is generally acceptable throughout the country.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT OF MEASURES TO REDUCE NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the very serious statement made yesterday by the Minister of Labour of Quebec that a revolution could occur in that province if unemployment grows larger, is the government considering meeting with the government of Quebec to consider what further steps can be taken in the very near future to reduce the number who are likely to be unemployed in Quebec in the next few months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to repeat what the Prime Minister of Quebec himself said, that violence is not going to help to improve the climate for investment in the province of Quebec. I would hope conditions there will not develop in such a way as to discourage investment, which is the key to employment in that province. We are having discussions continually with the province of Quebec on the unemployment situation, and I can assure the hon. member that no one is more concerned than the federal government about dealing with this very serious problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette on a supplementary?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to direct a question to the hon. Acting Prime Minister.

Since the premier of Quebec has formally recognized his inability to create 100,000 jobs and rejected part of the blame on the federal government, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he does intend to meet the premier of Quebec to discuss this matter?

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—GRANTING OF FRANCHISE TO IMPERIAL OIL TO BUILD FACILITIES TO SERVE TOURISTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I change the subject. My question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerns the tourist industry and the parks. Since the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has spent $3 million in putting in water and sewer services for business enterprises serving about two million tourists who visit Banff and western Canada, would the minister please check into why the franchise for the building of various facilities for the tourists was given to Imperial Oil, a corporation that is 66 per cent foreign controlled, and at a spot other than the visitors' centre where the taxpayers' money has been spent to put in the facilities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there has been a development at Lake Louise, a beautiful spot in the Banff national park, and public tenders were called. Several companies submitted bids, but finally only those of Imperial Oil and a few other financial interests were kept. That is why the contract was awarded to them; in fact, they were the only tenderers.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I follow up that answer with a supplementary question. Would the minister be prepared to discuss this matter seriously with the citizens of that area and of Banff, who have served tourists for ten years, and ascertain why road and sewers were put in at a cost of $3 million at a place where there are no enterprises and why the department is now giving a franchise to a foreign corporation over and above their rights?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a suggestion to the minister. He must assume that it will be considered.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member could rephrase his supplementary question. After that, perhaps we could go to another subject.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, we have only been on the present subject for a few moments. Would the minister be prepared to make a full and clear statement on this subject on motions in the near future, as there is urgency in that it is going ahead now and the taxpayers' money is being squandered?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Calgary North should be the last person to raise this question because the National Parks Service has done more for Alberta than for any other province and if there are millions of visitors in Alberta, the credit goes to this government—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ALBERTA—ESTABLISHMENT OF FACILITY IN DINOSAUR AREA

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, while we are on the question of parks may I ask a supplementary question related to national parks in Alberta. In view of the statement made by officials of his department on the question of timber cutting in Wood Buffalo National Park, following the matter having been raised by myself and the hon. member for Skeena, can the minister tell us whether we are any nearer to having a national park in the dinosaur area of Alberta than we were one year ago when the minister from the Alberta government told the committee that the provincial government was prepared to negotiate the transfer or exchange—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that this question ought to be placed on the Order Paper.

HIGHWAYS

MONTREAL AND TORONTO—DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING EXPRESSWAYS—STE. SCHOLASTIQUE ACCESS ROUTE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the controversies which have arisen in Montreal and Toronto over the construction of expressways, would the minister inform the House if his department is undertaking joint research with the provincial and municipal governments involved in order to bring about new solutions in the sphere of mass transit, particularly since the province of Quebec is indicating that it will use the majority of funds made available by the Minister of Finance to continue with the controversial trans-Canada link in the city of Montreal?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is quite a complicated question. I will do my best to answer it briefly. In the first instance, we have a section within the department which is working closely with the provinces on the question of rapid transit within the large metropolitan areas. Our primary responsibility at the moment is in general research not connected with any one specific project, such as the ones the hon. member referred to in Toronto and Montreal. In the case of Montreal, there is an added complexity or an added federal involvement in view of our participation in a route system to link Ste. Scholastique airport. Meetings on that subject have not yet taken place, certainly not at the ministerial level. For that reason I am not really in a position to say just what attitude we would adopt with regard to work that has already begun on a controversial section of this road. There may be something to report after our first meeting with the province.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question. The reason I raise this question is that controversies have arisen. The Minister of Finance has indicated that supplementary work—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly ask the supplementary. That is why he is seeking the floor.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and it was part of my original question which remains unanswered. In light of the funds being made available by the federal government, the province of Quebec has indicated it is going ahead with its proposals respecting the Trans-Canada highway—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member. It seems we are reaching the area of debate. It seems to me that the hon. member's supplementary goes beyond the limited terms of a question.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that $68 million have been made available to Quebec to provide jobs through the construction of expressways, is the minister in a position to say if the total amount will be used to build roads in Montreal?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking from memory but, as I recall, the amount that was specifically assigned to help with the construction of access routes to Ste. Scholastique airport was in the neighbourhood of $20 million. That has not yet been assigned specifically to any one route. We have simply stated that in principle this is what we are prepared to do. The discussions with the province with regard to how it is to be employed have not yet taken place.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question. This immediately points up that the minister misunderstood or did not seize the import of my previous question. I am not talking about the $20 million and the airport roads. I am referring to the money which the Minister of Finance indicated yesterday was being made available by way of loans to the provinces. The province of Quebec has now stated that as far as its share is concerned it will be used—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIRPORTS

REGINA—MEETINGS WITH CITY REGARDING SALE OF CITY-OWNED PROPERTY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister be holding further meetings with the city of Regina with regard to the sale of city-owned property at the Regina airport? If so, will the minister inform the House when such meetings will be held?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in a telephone conversation with the newly elected mayor of Regina I accepted his invitation for further discussions. These will be held at a later date to be indicated by him. I informed him that I would meet with him at his convenience either in Ottawa or in Regina.

Mr. Burton: Does the government find unacceptable the land values established by the two appraisers selected by the government and the city?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDUSTRY

ACTION TO PREVENT CLOSING OF DUNLOP TIRE PLANT IN WHITBY

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the serious reports with respect to the possible closing of the Dunlop tire plant in the town of Whitby, can the minister indicate what steps, if any, his department intends to take in order to prevent such an occurrence?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have no report to that effect, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member was kind enough to bring this to my attention yesterday and I am having it checked now. I know though that officials of my department were recently in Whitby and received no indication of such action. It is well known that my department is trying to bring about a tire plant for Canada. Everyone agrees there is a need for rationalization in that. I was amazed to find out, for example, that 191 different types of tires make up for only six per cent of the Canadian production. This has to be rationalized.

Mr. Woolliams: You need a retread.

Mr. Pepin: We are working along the line of freedom of imports of certain types of tires against increased production of a fewer number of types.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Cafik: As many people feel that the regional development loans made available by the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia to the Michelin tire plant in Nova Scotia have contributed to some of the difficulties that Canadian manufacturers are experiencing, will the minister indicate whether such loans will be made available to plants already existing in this country to assist them to be more competitive?

Mr. Pepin: I do not think anyone who is familiar with the problems of the tire companies in Canada would say they originated with the Michelin deal. These difficulties have been with us for a number of years and I do not think they can be attributed to the recent decisions of the governments of Canada and Nova Scotia.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ACTION TO ALLEVIATE HARDSHIP AT SOUTHEND

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has action been taken on reports from the Indian settlement at Southend where people are existing on meagre means because of low fur returns, the unavailability of game and the difficulty in catching fish because of slush on the ice?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have inquired about the matter and I am pleased to advise the House that we have granted supplementary assistance to the persons concerned owing to their difficult position. We have obtained from the Saskatchewan government the authorization for Indians to kill elk and moose. My department has provided the Indians with the necessary means of transport to carry that meat to the village. It now seems that the situation has again become normal.

BONNE BAY—DECISION ON BOUNDARIES, COMMENCEMENT OF SURVEY WORK

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question, too, is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister advise us whether a definite decision has yet been reached as to the boundaries of the Bonne Bay park in western Newfoundland and, if so, when will survey work be started having regard to the unemployment crisis we are facing?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that a question of this nature should normally be put in writing. If there is urgency, the minister might like to reply, but I have suggested on earlier occasions that questions of this nature are normally placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, 32 questions in my name have now been on the Order Paper for some months and have not been answered. I have to try to get answers somewhere.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO WEST COAST NATIVE FISHERMEN—REQUEST THAT MINISTER ATTEND MEETING

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Incidentally, I congratulate him on attaining a batting average of 33 per cent in his required roster appearances this week. I asked his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, the other day a question with respect to the situation of at least 100 native Indian fishermen who will be put out of work. The Minister of Fisheries told us there was a finance plan available under the Indian Fishermen's Assistance Board. Now that the minister is here, can he explain what this program is and tell us when it will come into effect?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): First, I should like to congratulate the hon. member on his candidacy; it is too bad he will not get 33 per cent of the votes, but I wish him the best of luck. As far as Indian fishermen in British Columbia are concerned, I am well aware of the situation to which he refers. I know that some fishing companies are cutting down their fleets. We have some funds available. I have sent some of my officials to the area; we shall try to assess the situation and adjust our financial program so as to assist as many Indians as possible to stay in business as good fishermen.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Might I say that my objective is not 33 per cent; it is much higher than that. Inasmuch as the Minister of Fisheries has refused an invitation to attend a meeting called by the North Coast District Council in Prince Rupert, for the 25th of this month to deal with this matter, will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be prepared to attend that meeting and speak to the people personally?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I have received an invitation to go there and I am afraid I could not accept such an invitation at this time. However, I have on several occasions met here in Ottawa the leaders of the Indian Association concerned with fishermen and I will always be pleased to see them. If I had any occasion to travel to British Columbia—

TRANSPORT

TRENT AND RIDEAU CANALS—DEPARTMENT RESPONSIBLE THEREFOR

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): My question can be answered by either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It deals with the Trent and Rideau canal systems in Ontario. Under whose jurisdiction do canals fall at the present time, as they seem to be in a state of limbo?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think the hon. member's question should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question, since the navigation season—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is suggesting that questions placed on the Order Paper are not serious questions. Even if it is serious, this is the type of question which should be placed on the Order Paper. If there is urgency, as there may very well be, the hon. member can give me notice of his intention to raise the matter at the time of the adjournment and it will be given precedence.

Mr. Scott: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

PLANS FOR PROVISION OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. It relates to student employment during the coming summer months. I know this subject has been alluded to several times this week but in view of the representations all hon. members are receiving I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, some time during the next week or two, he will give an outline to the House of Commons of the general type of plan the government has in mind for student employment. I realize that some of these plans take a long time to work out—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked his question and perhaps the Acting Prime Minister might be given an opportunity to reply.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The Minister of Manpower did make reference to plans that are under discussion. These will be brought before cabinet shortly. I do not know whether it will be possible to give an answer within the next week or so but certainly the matter is under active consideration.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will allow a supplementary but if hon. members will look around the House they will see there are perhaps 50 or 60 members who are seeking to ask questions. There are only a few minutes left and obviously all of them cannot expect to have their questions answered during this 40-minute period.

Mr. Nesbitt: A brief supplementary. Since the Secretary of State, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Minister of Labour, together with other ministers, have already expressed views on this subject, would the Acting Prime Minister give priority to this problem as many students are very concerned about the future?

PROPOSED MEETING ON FORMATION OF ONTARIO PASSENGER TRAIN NETWORK

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. According to press reports the Ontario Minister of Transport has proposed a meeting between officials of his department, the federal transport ministry, and executives of the railway companies operating in the province to discuss the formation of a network of passenger trains for Ontario. Did the minister receive an invitation to this meeting and, if so, will he or senior officials of his department attend, and will he use his good offices to urge the CNR to participate with an open mind?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

WOOD BUFFALO—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CUTTING OF TIMBER

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the fact that the National Parks Act prohibits the cutting of timber in a park save for dead and diseased timber for the protection of the forests in the park itself, has the minister taken note of the situation in Wood Buffalo Park and will he make a statement to this House shortly, when he gets the information, as to the number of timber licences which have been granted for operations there, the quantity of timber to be removed, and the extent to which the forest has already been stripped of timber as a result of the cutting which has gone on?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): It is true, Mr. Speaker, that timber is being cut in Wood Buffalo park. That is only in a very small portion of the park, and these operations provide work for approximately 100 Indians from this area. Nevertheless, we are presently negotiating with the government of Alberta to establish new limits, as far as Wood Buffalo park is concerned, which would enable us to obtain in exchange the areas where dinosaurs are still to be found, in Alberta.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ARGENTIA, NFLD.—IMPLEMENTATION OF CRASH PROGRAM

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and I might say it is prompted by my deep concern for the hon. minister's image in my riding. Would he undertake to speak to his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to have the promise made by the Minister of Transport on July 6 last summer to the people of the Argentia area respecting the $2 million crash program implemented because at the present time not even a quarter of that amount has been spent there?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for St. John's West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Carter: This is a very important matter, Mr. Speaker, to the 30 per cent unemployed in that area, because last summer a crash program was announced but it has not been carried through. My question to the minister is, will he talk to his colleague to have this program implemented?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question was heard by the Chair and I feel it was in the form of a suggestion or a submission to the minister. The hon. member has to assume that it has been noted and will be taken into account.

TRADE

DEVELOPMENT OF U.S. MARKETS FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PRODUCTS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the great speech of the Prime Minister in Saint John, New Brunswick, before Christmas about the glowing prospects for trade with United States, and particularly the relationship of the Atlantic provinces thereto, can he now indicate what the plans of his department are for the new year, such as increased staff or trade missions and the like, which will bring this about?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that unless the minister is prepared to reply very briefly—

An hon. Member: He never is.

Mr. Speaker: The question is one that normally should be placed on the Order Paper, or the hon. member might ask the minister whether he proposes to make a statement.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to take a chance if the House agrees. I sent him notice of this question and hoped this would give him time to gather his thoughts about the great work they are doing in this regard.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I can be very brief on that subject. Very recently I wrote a colleague of the hon. member giving him an indication of the activity of my department in the Maritimes in terms of industrial research and development and trade promotion.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, would the minister make that letter public so that the people of the Maritimes can know a little bit about this? They are greatly concerned that the minister is not doing anything.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GUINEA—SECURITY COUNCIL CONDEMNATION OF INVASION BY PORTUGUESE FORCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I asked him a few days ago about the Security Council's resolution condemning the Portuguese forces' invasion of Guinea. He said it was an important question and he would look into it. I wonder whether he is now in a position to answer?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can answer this reasonably briefly. It may be, however, that you would wish the question to be put on the Order Paper for answer in writing.

An hon. Member: You are on your own, there is no help there.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government's opposition to the maintenance of Portuguese colonialism in Africa has been firmly declared and abundantly demonstrated. It has been reflected in our support for United Nations resolutions calling on Portugal to grant those territories self-determination. It was specifically enunciated in the government's paper on foreign policy.

Moreover, and this relates directly to a major clause of the December 8 Security Council resolution, Canada maintains a complete embargo on the sales of military equipment to the Portuguese territories, and we have long since ceased providing military assistance to Portugal under NATO mutual aid.

The resolution also asks Portugal's allies to influence the government of Portugal to comply with its terms. The government of Portugal is in no doubt about the Canadian government's views on Portuguese policies in Africa.

TRADE

FEASIBILITY OF FREE TRADE BETWEEN ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND NEW ENGLAND STATES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I attempted to ask it in the form of a supplementary to the question posed by the hon. member for St. John's West. Have studies been undertaken by his department in respect of the feasibility of free trade between the Atlantic provinces and the New England states in certain commodities, using the automobile pact as a model?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this sort of preoccupation is constant in my department.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley.

ACTION TO DEAL WITH TRAFFICKING IN JAPAN IN CANADIAN IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, you have given me a substitute for the 5BX plan today. I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What steps does the government propose to take to deal with the rapidly increasing amount of trafficking in Canadian import quotas which is taking place in Japan and other low cost exporting countries, creating a new class of millionaire Asian speculators at the expense of Canadian consumers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regretfully have to advise the hon. member, in spite of all the exercise he had completed prior to his asking the question, that his question is phrased in such a way that it would normally invite a statement that should be made on motions. Unless the hon. member is prepared to rephrase his question, I suggest it is not acceptable.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, in that case I ask the minister whether the government has taken any steps to deal with this situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the existence of quotas in Japan is well known. When I became the minister there were 120. They cut off 20 about a year ago. Last week the Ambassador of Japan wrote me that they were cutting off 10 more, including the quota on whiskey, about which we are pleased. The administration of quotas in Japan is not really my preoccupation. I assume it to be the exclusive responsibility of the Japanese government. However, as an exercise in academic intelligence I will look into the problem and report fully to my hon. friend.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL INSTRUMENTS CORPORATION, SYDNEY, N.S.—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the vast work that is being done by his department in the Atlantic provinces and the expertise that is allegedly being shown by his staff, and in view of the fact that another 200 employees have been laid off by General Instruments Corporation of Sydney, manufacturers of electronic components, what is he prepared to do in respect of the provision of his officers to this corporation and to the workers who have been laid off to assist them in getting back to work?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not familiar with that particular case. I presume that the services of different departments of the federal government have already been offered or used, but I will look into this immediately.

PUBLIC WORKS

NORTHUMBERLAND CAUSEWAY—RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION NOT TO PROCEED

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the diligent and conscientious Minister of Public Works. In light of his recent statement exalting the virtues of a permanent Northumberland causeway, can he advise whether he and his colleagues are now reconsidering the government's decision to repudiate its commitment to go ahead with that important project?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have some knowledge of an initiative being taken by the province of Prince Edward Island. I have indicated to my people that I would like them to find out for me what success Prince Edward Island is having in encouraging private enterprise in that area. We would like to know what they have in mind. It is our intention to enter into discussion with the province as soon as possible.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I might ask the minister whether he does not consider that the resources of the government of Canada are a little more ample than those of Prince Edward Island?

POLLUTION

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—INVESTIGATION OF SLAG DUMP FIRE

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is he in a position to answer a question I posed earlier this week regarding the slag dump fire at Springhill?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked a question about the Springhill slag dump fire. I had an inquiry made into the matter and I find that the inquiry by the officials of my department is not yet complete. It is the intention at the present time that this is not to be a public inquiry and that the results of the inquiry will not be made a public document but will be made known to the Nova Scotia government.

HEALTH

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to ask the Government House Leader, having in mind the statement made a few days ago by his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to the effect that consideration is being given to the introduction of legislation in the field of cigarette advertising and disease. Will such legislation be placed before us prior to the Easter recess?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a definite assurance that such legislation will be before the House before Easter. It will depend on the progress made on present legislation and the priorities that have been established.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF LEGISLATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Government House Leader. In view of his contribution before the recess in which he exercised good judgment and also protected the President of the Treasury Board by withdrawing the legislation concerning the Auditor General, I wonder whether he would exercise the same good judgment and protect the young Solicitor General by withdrawing the Young Offenders Bill?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT ON ROLE OF FORCES IN CIVIL RIOTS AND EMERGENCIES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is a formal report being commissioned by the government on the use of the army and its role in civil riots and emergencies such as the emergency that occurred recently so as to have an assessment of its use in the future in similar situations?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Not exactly a formal report, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned in the House several times, there has been an evaluation by mobile command and air transport command of their participation in the recent emergency. I would expect that the results might be included in discussions of the aid to the civil power aspect of the defence white paper.

AIR TRANSPORT

CHARTER SERVICES—REGULATIONS TO PREVENT CARRIERS DEFAULTING ON FLIGHT UNDERTAKINGS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the affable and somewhat overworked Minister of Transport. In view of the concern expressed over irregularities in the use by some airlines of enormous amounts of funds received from air charter flight groups, is the minister planning any regulations that would prevent a carrier defaulting before the trip or failing to show up to bring back passengers from a charter flight?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the whole issue of air charters and the regulation of them is now under active consideration both within Canada and internationally. I might add as an aside that we are also engaged in bilateral negotiations with the United States on the question of protection of passengers. A few days ago I indicated in the House that we do have regulations under the Canadian Transport Commission requiring that protection be provided but these at the present time are the cause and source of some difficulties which were referred to in the House a few days ago.

PUBLIC WORKS

NORTHUMBERLAND CAUSEWAY—REQUESTS BY PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is really supplementary to a question asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Hillsborough. It will be directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the increased interest by the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the construction of the Northumberland Causeway, has either of these governments requested from the federal government assistance in the planning stage or possible financial assistance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not personally aware of this but will make inquiries.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

KING CHRISTIAN ISLAND—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GAS WELL BLOWOUT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I directed a question to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I should like to pose it now to the minister. Would he make a statement on motions on the natural gas blowout on King Christian Island which has now meant a loss of over four billion cubic feet of natural gas and is having a serious ecological effect on Canada's northland?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the House immediately.

They have not yet succeeded in putting out the fire involved. It is hoped, I have been told, that the digging of the supplementary well undertaken in order to put out the fire will be completed shortly, and that the first efforts aimed at the definite control of the fire may be undertaken next week.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE EXTENDED COVERAGE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-185, to amend the Crop Insurance Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before we start detailed consideration of Bill C-185 and the amendments it is to make to the Crop Insurance Act, I feel it would be useful to briefly summarize the background of that act, emphasizing its objectives and its achievements to date.

The original Crop Insurance Act, enacted in 1959, provided for government financial assistance to provincial crop insurance programs, provided they met certain standards.

Initially, the criteria were that guaranteed protection remained below 60 per cent of the average long-term production for the crop insured, in the particular region, with total premiums adequate to justify the program from the actuarial point of view. In the case of programs conforming to such criteria, the federal government paid 50 per cent of the costs to the province of the administration of the premiums, plus an amount equal to 20 per cent of paid premiums. The act also enabled the federal government to make loans to the provinces for those years when benefits greatly exceeded premiums and reserves. A deduction of $200,000 was provided in this instance.

In 1964, the act was amended in order to enable the federal government to re-insure provincial plans, in addition to the loans to which I have just referred. In this connection, the province pays a premium to the federal government and, in return, the latter assumes 75 per cent of the losses incurred by the province.

Again, the act was amended in 1966. This time the purpose was to extend its application in order to insure perennial plants and fruit trees, and also summer-fallowed land which could not be seeded because of climatic conditions. But even more important probably was the better protection that provinces may provide, since it was increased from 60 per cent, as it was in the beginning, to 80 per cent, as well as the 5 per cent increase of the federal contribution, which was raised from 20 to 25 per cent of total premiums paid.

So, the act guarantees presently to the provinces offering a crop insurance program deemed sound by actuaries, and covering losses up to 80 per cent or less, federal assistance amounting to 50 per cent of the administration costs, plus a contribution equal to 25 per cent of total premiums paid. The expenditures of the Department of Agriculture for crop insurance now amount to five million dollars yearly. Estimates show that this figure will increase to approximately seven and a half million dollars within the next three years.

[English]

Let me turn for a moment to the current status of the program. How have the farmers of Canada received this program? How has it worked? At the present time, eight of the ten provinces have active programs covering crops such as potatoes, wheat, oats, barley, mixed grains, grain corn, forage, silage, tobacco, soya beans, white beans, flax, rapeseed, yellow mustard seed, sugar beets, apples, peaches, pears, apricots, prunes, plums, cherries, grapes, strawberries, raspberries, cranberries, logan berries, blue berries, strawberry plants, grape vines and fruit trees.

With the exception of last year when coverage was aected by the Lift program, the total numbers of farmers involved in the program across Canada and the amount of coverage provided has increased significantly each year. In 1968-69 some 64,376 farmers purchased crop insurance coverage totalling just under $175 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I must bring to the attention of hon. members who are obviously having interesting conversations that it is difficult for some of us to follow the Parliamentary Secretary's speech.

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Premiums paid that year amounted to over $13 million, and indemnities paid out were in excess of $15 million. The actuarial soundness of the program to date is probably best demonstrated by the fact that from the time the program commenced up until the end of last year, the loss ratio was .97; that is, for every dollar that was paid into the program, whether by farmers, by the federal government or in some cases by provincial governments, 97 cents was paid out to farmers in indemnities.

During the current year the program within the province of Prince Edward Island was used by 216 farmers who took out $602,000 coverage. In Nova Scotia some 340 farmers took out just over $800,000 coverage. In Quebec, 12,000 farmers took out $29 million coverage. In Ontario the figures were approximately 4,200 farmers with a coverage of just over $9 million. In Manitoba, which was the first province to introduce the program, some 14,200 farmers had $27 million worth of coverage. In Saskatchewan, 9,000 farmers had $16 million coverage. In Alberta, just under 13,000 farmers had $32 million coverage, and in British Columbia, 810 farmers had just under $8 million coverage. Since this program has been started, indemnities paid to farmers have totalled $47 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in enacting this legislation, the federal government recognizes the importance of social and economic benefits deriving from farm income stability. Although it deals with only one aspect of farm revenues, it is likely the one that causes the most inequities between the operations and the damages in particular cases, namely heavy crop losses caused by meteorological conditions and other unfavourable circumstances such as, for example, damages caused by insects, wild animals or birds. Income stability is an economic advantage not only for the farmer himself but also for all those who deal with him and for his fellow-citizens. Even if farm research and progressive technology have largely contributed to the solution of problems occasioned by diseases and other factors that have a bearing on yields, inevitable and unforeseen disasters will continue to hit farm revenues with the same frequency as in the past. Therefore, an all-encompassing insurance program, easy to apply, is of increasing importance for the farmer because he is more and more dependent upon it in respect of the costs involved in purchasing the items needed for implementation of his production program.

[English]

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Crop Insurance Act to provide for contributions to insurance programs which will cover losses of preplanting costs. On occasion, due to wet weather or other similar conditions, farmers are unable to plant a crop which they intended to plant and in which they have already made investments, such as preparation of the land, the purchase of plants, and the application of fertilizer. As the crop insurance program is expanded to a greater variety of crops, this type of problem becomes more important. Such losses could include investments made both in the previous fall as well as prior to seeding in the spring.

Both Ontario and Manitoba have indicated that they would like to be able to offer insurance against this type of loss.

[Translation]

In the past, the losses mentioned previously were covered to some extent, for instance, in the case of fallows which remained unsown because of excessive rain. These special provisions with respect to fallows will be extended and integrated into the new sections of the act.

There naturally will be conditions to be met by the insured who will undertake to sign a permanent and valid insurance contract since the hazards to be covered are liable to occur beyond the growing period.

This provision is seen as a new step of ever increasing importance with regard to the protection of the capital invested by the farmer for crop purposes.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): At the outset, I should like very much indeed to compliment the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lessard), on his presentation this morning and the manner in which the detail of this legislation was given to us. I wish to compliment him because it is a tremendous responsibility that has been delegated to him by his minister. However, I feel that it is unfortunate indeed, on a measure of this importance dealing with the entire agricultural industry, that the minister himself was not able to be present in the House.

Crop insurance is becoming ever more serious and of ever greater interest to the farmers across this nation. Experiences in the past have proven that the reimbursement for the drastic losses suffered by farmers every year in various regions cannot be obtained through representation directly to their municipal, provincial or federal governments. In my own particular area in southwestern Ontario, we suffered a very severe hardship as a result of weather over a year ago. Although representatives of the various governments visited the area and saw at first hand the tremendous losses of crops and money suffered by the farmers in the area, some of whom have not yet recovered and will take years to recover, and although at that time assurances were given that financial aid would be immediately sent to reimburse them, farmers have learned from bitter experience that when it comes to receiving cash for their losses it is almost impossible to obtain it by grants or loans. So, they are turning ever more to the sound business practice of insuring their crops in order to have a legal claim when they have suffered grievously in circumstances over which they have no control.

I am very delighted indeed to see that the government is proposing this amendment in Bill C-185 to the Crop Insurance Act because I think that had this particular provision been in it at the time, the farmers in our area and others who suffered grievous losses could have recouped at least their initial expenditures on the crops that were destroyed. This is what the government should be trying to do. It should make it possible for farmers, when such conditions arise, to recover their losses, and not be placed in a precarious economic position. However, there are some difficulties with legislation such as we have before us.

One of the difficulties is that it is a joint effort between provincial and federal administrations. We have different applications of the measure in each of the provinces. It is at the prerogative of the provinces whether they wish to participate in it or not. There is joint responsibility with the federal government. In such matters, it is always difficult to act immediately to change apparent weaknesses.

Another thing which complicates a measure such as this is the fact that Canada is made up of a series of regions whose crops and crop conditions vary greatly from coast to coast. Thus, it is difficult to get an all-encompassing piece of legislation which will provide insurance with respect to all the agricultural commodities involved. This is the reason there has been some delay in changing the act, and why there has been a rather go slow attitude in trying to bring other crops under the umbrella of protection that is provided.

We have specialized crops in my particular area of Ontario. The same is true in British Columbia, in the prairies, in the Maritimes and also in Quebec. There are local areas specializing in certain agribusiness, and means will have to be found to provide insurance for their crops. Even if such crops are now covered the producers find that the premiums they must pay are so high that it is almost impossible for them to take advantage of the legislation.

We should look at the measure in the light of the in-put expenses now faced by farmers, expenses which are ever increasing, and which are at a level never contemplated years ago. If many farmers ten years ago had any idea of the actual in-put costs with which they would be faced in the 1970's, they would have gone out of the agricultural business, retrieved as much of their capital as possible, and put it into investments that would give them a greater return on their money. The fact that only 64,000 farmers out of approximately 400,000 to 500,000 have taken advantage of crop insurance gives some idea of the magnitude of the problem, and of the necessity of making the legislation more encompassing.

There is another aspect to which more attention should be given. As was so ably explained by the Parliamentary Secretary, the basic principle of crop insurance is to return to farmers at least 65 per cent of their normal expected earnings in cases where disaster strikes. This is confined strictly to weather conditions, or things legally termed acts of God. However, there is another large field which must be examined. In my area during the last few years we have experienced situations where a crop was produced by a farmer in good faith, delivered to a food processor, and due to business malpractice on the part of the processor, or to bankruptcy, the farmer not only lost the value of the crop but all the expenses he had incurred in planting and harvesting it. Here, Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking of small amounts of money. Thousands of dollars were involved in the case of some farmers.

Farmers, farm organizations and parliamentary representatives have been very much aware of the serious nature of this problem. Many attempts have been made to see if something could be done about it. A prime example was the private bill introduced by our colleague from Essex, I believe in 1963, the purpose of which was to place the farmer in a preferred position whenever a canner or food processor became bankrupt. That was a good attempt to protect the primary producer. Although the bill's intent was sound, unfortunately it did not protect the farmer and it seems it could not protect him under certain circumstances. Now, we find once again that the farmer must seek legal redress, with little hope of reclaiming the grievous losses he has suffered.

I suggest that the government should give serious consideration to the possibility of extending crop insurance to cover losses suffered by farmers in such circumstances. Inasmuch as the Parliamentary Secretary has pointed out that the actual loss suffered by the government to date in the funding of crop insurance has been minimal, I suggest here is an opportunity for us to provide, through legislation, a more complete crop insurance service to farmers. What I am suggesting may be complicated, and there may be valid reasons why it cannot be put into operation at this time, but I do encourage hon. members, and especially those who support the government, to see when the bill goes to committee if it is feasible to propose yet another amendment making it possible for farmers to obtain redress when their crops are lost in this fashion.

There are other circumstances under which farmers can lose. Here, I am not dealing with mismanagement or malpractice, but with conditions over which they have no control, weather conditions and the actions of other sections of agribusiness which cause grievous loss. What I am suggesting is not out of line, because very definite steps have been taken by various governments to protect the agribusiness in this fashion. I am speaking now of bills that have been passed by the House to protect primary producers when there is loss of crop through government seizure because of the presence of residue chemicals which make the crop unfit for human consumption.

Another prime example is that of reimbursement by the government in cases where animals are destroyed as a result of contagious diseases. So, we have taken steps in this direction, and I propose that we continue taking them, because farmers today are faced with the necessity of making tremendous investments, not to expand their businesses necessarily, but just to keep them operating. Having read the history of farming in this great land, I have learned that, not too long ago, farmers paid for their implements and residences less than farmers of today pay in interest on their chemicals and seed. That shows how necessary it is to make available large sums of money for crop protection. Like others engaged in industry, farmers, if they so desire, may now obtain insurance protection which will compensate them against loss. Certainly, anyone engaged in the industry of agriculture is as much entitled to this protection as others who wish to protect their business investment.

So, I support wholeheartedly this measure as well as the amendment brought in by the government. If I have any criticism at all, it is that we are not moving fast enough in this direction. During the committee stage discussions, we ought to consider other means, which are similar to this measure, of helping farmers directly. I appreciate the opportunity I have had this morning of discussing briefly some of the ramifications of the bill. My colleagues will deal with it in more detail. May I take this opportunity of congratulating the Parliamentary Secretary and the minister upon this measure.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this measure may I say that I think the government is quite right in proposing the extensions in coverage proposed in this bill. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is not in the House to pilot the bill through and hear what is said. It is an important measure. I mean no disrespect to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lessard) who, as we all know from our experience in the standing committee, is a most competent and able man. I hope that the minister's absence does not in any way indicate the importance the minister may attach to crop insurance.

The particular changes with regard to the flooding of land are important for many areas of Canada. They are important for western Canada and, in particular, for Saskatchewan. Normally, Saskatchewan is considered a dry province; yet there have been years when significant areas of a farmer's land were under water, and stayed under water until it was too late for him to plant a crop. None the less, even in those cases, the farmer has had to cultivate that land when it has dried. He has had to control the weeds. In short, quite apart from the expense of seed and fertilizer, he has been saddled with the total expense of managing that land, because his capital costs continue, as do his cultivation costs. Indeed, in those cases they might be greater.

I must say that the part of the bill referring to the further protection of those engaged in fruit growing is outside my scope. I hope that some of my colleagues who are closer to that kind of operation will comment on it. there is one thing that I should like to take the opportunity of saying about this bill and about the program now being considered by the House. This program will lack effectiveness in a major part of the wheat growing area of Saskatchewan and, indeed, throughout the prairie region. The figures published in the annual report of the Minister for the fiscal year 1968-69 under the Crop Insurance Act show this very clearly. I am surprised that the government has not given more consideration to improving the act, so that it might provide more effective coverage.

According to the report, the number of farmers covered in the relevant period in Saskatchewan was 12,343. Although I do not have exact figures, I think that that number represents about one sixth of the number of operating farmers in that province. We must surely ask ourselves, as must the government, why it is that a crop insurance program which has been in force as long as this one is only serving that small number of farmers in that province of western Canada which contains the largest agricultural area west of the Great Lakes. If the government does not know, then, perhaps in a general way, I can tell them. One of the major reasons stems from the basis on which crop yields are established. The basis on which a farmer must take out crop insurance is the basis of his previous yields. In going back over the period of previous yields, the yield average that is established is so low that it is of no advantage to the farmer to insure with respect to that level of yield. In other words, the program establishes a level of yield on which the insurance shall be based that is so low as to be tantamount to or very close to the yield in a crop failure. That is the real reason crop insurance has not been as effective as it might have been in the prairie regions, and in Saskatchewan in particular.

I have attended meetings held under the auspices of municipalities at which farmers examined very carefully this whole program on an actuarial basis and decided that they could not avail themselves of the program. Indeed, most of west central Saskatchewan is excluded from the plan. The provincial government has not brought a great deal of west central Saskatchewan into this program; neither has it taken steps to bringing that area. I do not particularly lay the blame at the door of the province alone; I lay it at the door of the provincial and federal governments, those who are administering the plan and those whose responsibility it is to make the plan an effective instrument for the farmers of western Canada and, indeed, of all Canada.

Again, if you look at the figures, you will see a large and continuing increase in coverage in some areas, but not in other areas. We must ask ourselves why that is so. We must assume that farmers in one area are as anxious to obtain crop insurance protection as farmers of another area. I therefore urge the minister, and I am saying this to his Parliamentary Secretary in his absence, to take the necessary steps to undertake an investigation in order that this may become an effective insurance program benefiting the majority of farmers.

[Mr. Gleave.]

I wish to now deal with the proposals of the task force on agriculture. Hopefully, the government will not accept these proposals. However, they deserve comment. In part, they provide some guidance. The task force recommends that an independent body be appointed by the National Agriculture Advisory Council, which does not as yet exist, to evaluate the actuarial structure of the crop insurance program in Canada and to make the results of such an evaluation known annually at the proposed national conference outlined elsewhere in this report.

I do not know whether there is a need for an annual review. Perhaps there is. The task force thought there was a need. There is certainly need for a review of this program by competent people. The majority of these people should be from farm organizations and provincial bodies. They should assess the total program as it is affecting farmers. The task force recommended:

> In 1975 a Federal-provincial committee should appoint an independent body to make a comprehensive evaluation of the effectiveness and efficiency of the crop insurance program and, in particular, to recommend on whether or not the current subsidy should be continued.

Apparently the task force was as concerned about the subsidy as anything else. It is significant that two of the recommendations of the task force placed emphasis on an evaluation of this program to determine how well it was working. I will not go into the body of the report because there is not time. However, this should indicate to the government that this program should be carefully evaluated. The task force also recommended:

> The immediate discontinuance of the PFAA program.

I do not think that the PFAA program should be discontinued until there is an effective replacement. We should not seriously consider discontinuing the PFAA program because the crop insurance program is not an effective instrument to replace it. It is not workable in much of the area where crop insurance is required.

In Saskatchewan, crop insurance is used in the area with the highest yields and the best crop production record. It is not used in areas where the greatest crop variations occur from year to year. I do not believe it would be possible to discontinue the PFAA program at this time. I quote another recommendation of the task force:

> The equivalent of the annual subsidy paid to the PFAA program by the Federal Government should be allocated to the financing of the Prairie Grain Price Stabilization Program.

In this recommendation, I feel that the task force is confusing apples with oranges. The PFAA program is a very rough and ready crop insurance program. The wheat stabilization program, as outlined by the minister responsible for the wheat board, is an income stabilization program, not a crop insurance program. Similarly, a crop insurance program is not a full income stabilization program. I mention this because these recommendations were made by the task force. I hope the government will ignore this particular recommendation. The PFAA program should not be discontinued until we have an adequate crop insurance program. The government has no right to use that levy for any other purpose.

It has already been mentioned that those responsible for the crop insurance program should investigate the input costs and increased costs of production. When this program was introduced there was a much lower level of fertilizers, chemicals and other aids being used by farmers. This has caused increased costs and increased yields. If a crop insurance program is to be effective, it must take into account the rapidly changing technology in agriculture. If the costs and yields are affected, then the basis for a crop insurance program is affected. The program is based on yield return. In order to estimate the pay-out, we must consider the farmers cost of production. If this is to be an effective instrument in disaster areas, we must pay out enough money to cover the cost of production so that the farmer can carry on the next year. Surely, that is the purpose of the program. However, this aspect is not being given consideration.

Instead of considering the average yield for the past 10 years, we would get a better picture if we considered the actual yields in west central and central Saskatchewan. I suggest that those responsible should examine the studies made by Mr. Craddock recently with regard to cereal production in western Canada. I was surprised to read his conclusions with regard to yields compared with what we assumed were the yields in that area. This is fundamental to a crop insurance program.

These are the main points I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker. I repeat that the proposal to make the PFAA program part of the income stabilization program should be avoided. The income stabilization program, as outlined, has some serious shortcomings. I will not deal with the matter at great length because there will probably be an opportunity to do so in the future. My main reason for speaking was the task force report. Since the government is apparently implementing some major parts of the recommendations of the task force, I wish to issue a warning with regard to proposals of this report as they affect crop insurance. The problems that would occur with the stabilization program should not bring into disrepute the practice of a deduction opportunity in certain areas in order to facilitate a crop insurance program. Indeed, I have wondered why those who administer this program have not tried to integrate it with PFAA deductions and the acreage insurance program. Perhaps this has not been done because it is not possible, actuarially, to do so. I have no way of knowing. But I have wondered why no attempt has been made, particularly in grain-growing regions, to work these two programs together and make an effective program which would serve, say, 90 per cent of the farmers, or at least all those who want a viable crop insurance program, as many do.

It really does not make much sense in this region to pay out hundred of dollars a year for hail insurance, for example, when hail is only one of the risks to be faced. The ordinary operating farmer really has no other crop insurance. It is true he is paying into PFAA which may come along with a maximum of $800 should he encounter trouble—a sum which is of no practical value at all to a man farming over 1,000 acres. Yet, we are limping along with a second rate approach of this kind. The farmer pays into PFAA at the rate of 1 per cent of the total value of the grain he sends to the elevator. Maybe he buys hail insurance. The cost of this would vary with the cover, but on 1,000 acres it would probably cost between 60 cents and a dollar an acre. PFAA will not pay enough money to be significant in the case of large operations such as we have in Saskatchewan. True, a farmer may carry hail insurance, but there are other risks such as frost, drought or a late harvest which can greatly reduce the value of a crop. So, farmers are paying out on two fronts, yet they do not have adequate crop insurance against the risks they ordinarily encounter. I have mentioned only a few of these risks. Where the crop is rape seed, insect pests can destroy it in whole or in part. Some of our crops can be substantially damaged by rust. Against all these major risks, we are protecting only some 12,000 farmers in the province of Saskatchewan.

The minister brings down a bill which is concerned about land coming under flood. Very fine. I do not know what proportion of our land comes under flood in Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Alberta, what fraction of one per cent it is. But it is proper to be concerned about it. I am saying to the minister that it is about time he got together with responsible people in the prairie provinces to work out an effective crop insurance program, put it in the form of a bill and bring it before the House so that it could be properly debated. Then, proper crop insurance could be made available to the majority of farmers in western Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the bill now before us, an Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

I should perhaps at this stage quote a few passages from the bill, and in particular paragraph (b) of subsection (1):

> (b) loss arising when the seeding or planting of a crop is prevented by excess ground moisture, weather or other agricultural hazards.

These changes would increase the extra coverage now offered under the Crop Insurance Act by extending it to the loss incurred when excess ground moisture, weather or other agricultural hazards prevent the seeding or planting of a crop.

I wish first to emphasize that the crop insurance plan is an excellent initiative from the federal government. I think that this insurance program has greatly helped and will continue to assist farmers who were victims of bad weather which can totally or partly ruin their crop. Perhaps this is not sure since this bill as it was and is today covers only 80 per cent of a potential or insured loss, of the independant factor of production and sales possibilities of the cultivated product.

In my view, the previous bill was not perfect and I would go as far as saying that it was merely a rather rough sketch of a measure intended to really help the Canadian farmer.

It was better than nothing, Mr. Speaker. The legislation we had in the past required the farmer to be the co-insurer of a portion of the loss of his crop. I think the principle involved is wrong.

The amendment it is sought to bring about through Bill C-185 specifically indicates that subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (b) of subsection (3) of section 5A is to be replaced by the following:

"(ii) in the case of a loss described in paragraph (b) of subsection (1), eighty per cent of the average cost of such of the following operations as have been carried out, namely:

(A) summer-fallowing of the land, (B) cultivating the land, (C) fertilizing the land, (D) purchasing plants for transplanting, and (E) other preparation for seeding or planting a crop;"

This joint insurance is tantamount to penalizing the farmer by a minimum of 20 per cent of his crop by way of payment due or accepted by the government. Furthermore, in view of the complexity of loss assessment, the farmer can even lose up to 40 or 50 per cent of potential reimbursements provided by the act under the crop insurance plan.

Mr. Speaker, when an inspector visits a potential plantation or a piece of land for potential crop seeding, that, I believe is when application of the whole act becomes complex. Whether or not the new bill covers excess ground moisture, will possible irrigation be taken into account? Will it take into consideration the state of the farmer in name only or that of the man who really works his land and expects a maximum yield?

I also suggest there are several important weaknesses in the bill as it is now stands concerning crop insurance.

For example, if a farmer gives his farm good care in order to get the maximum yield per acre, if he practices irrigation in a well planned and satisfactory manner, if he uses chemical fertilizers or other organic matter in sufficient quantities to increase his production per acre, all these factors should be covered by the legislation.

Unfortunately, I must say in support of the member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) that the former act was not precise enough with regard to these conditions. No mention was made, any more than in the present one, of the production of the land owned by the farmer and cultivated by him, in the last three, four or five years. Yet, that is decidedly the determining factor in establishing the possibility of a loss, or evaluating the loss the act should cover.

And so, that farmer will receive the same indemnity as his neighbor who has lost everything because he manages his farm haphazardly, who has a hard time getting even a meagre crop, compared to the other who manages for instance, to get two crops of hay a year, or even three.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

I feel we should assess the amount of the loss, not according to what is seeded, but by evaluationg the annual profit per acre of the land insured, and this on the basis of the average for the last three, four or five years.

I also feel that Bill C-185, which is meant to be a forerunner of notable advances in the crop insurance plan, by paying indemnities to victims of crop losses before planting if the weather is not favourable and the soil not adequate for good production due to factors beyond the farmer's control, is not profitable to the latter because it places him in the position of co-insurer of his own crop.

I do not like to see the farmer penalized at the start by at least 20 per cent of his possible crop returns on account of bad weather which is beyond his control. I understand that in the case of automobile and public liability insurance or any other type of insurance, the insured becomes co-insurer in certain cases of his eventual loss because he has probably a share of responsibility and this is often due to negligence on his part or to factors which can generally be controlled by the insured.

The farmer is in no way responsible for the weather or the damage done to his crop. I think that is why section 5A(3)(b)(ii) of the present legislation reads as follows:

—eighty per cent of the average cost of summer-fallowing the land;

Besides, Section 5A(1)(b) states:

—loss arising when the seeding of summer-fallowed land intended to be used to grow an insured crop is prevented by excess ground moisture, weather or other agricultural hazards.

It is always 80 per cent to start.

To conclude, I must say that Bill C-185 is far from perfect for the reasons explained above, but I admit it is a step forward and an improvement for the Canadian farmer.

I therefore support the bill but with great reservations.

[English]

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make a few remarks about the amendment introduced in respect of crop insurance. This is not a contentious matter. The need for this amendment is apparent as a result of our experience earlier this spring when many areas of western Canada were flooded and it was doubtful that crops could be put in at various locations. As a result, the government initiated the Lift Program. There was some concern about the reduction of wheat acreage.

Much of this land which had been in summer fallow and normally would have been sown was under water. Because of the shortened season, it was unreasonable to expect farmers to put in crops. Had they done so they would have run the risk of not being able to harvest their crops before frost set in. The government was particularly concerned at that time with insurance coverage because of the knowledge that many farmers would not be able to make a living or get any revenue from their land. I congratulate the government in this regard.

This crop insurance plan was initiated some 10 or 11 years ago. With the knowledge we have gained since then, we can take a closer look at the situation and perhaps come up with amendments which will make it possible for a greater number of farmers to participate. I was surprised when I first looked up the records to find that only 53,000 farmers in the whole of Canada participated in the crop insurance program.

I think everyone agrees with the principle of insurance in one form or another. Very few people would go without fire insurance and the like. Similarly, when it comes to a question of personal income, and where livelihood is derived from farming, an insurance program is extremely important. No one will argue against the need for crop insurance legislation. Promotion of this program has been lax. Not enough initiative has been taken by the federal or provincial governments. These governments should do a great deal more to sell this idea to the farmers.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair. The House will meet again at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, before we rose at one o'clock, I was trying to point out that even though the crop insurance legislation has been in effect for over ten years there have been relatively few farmers in Canada who have participated. I realize that in the initial stage it was necessary that one should gain some experience in this respect. At that time, some provincial governments were reluctant to enter a plan in respect of which they had no experience. I well remember some of the arguments that were raised. Some suggestion was made that perhaps a provincial government could become bankrupt if there should be a series of crop failures in a particular province. Since then, amendments have been introduced whereby loans could be provided to provinces. I believe this, to some extent, has eliminated that particular criticism.

Before I venture too far into some of the remarks I wish to make, I might raise a question with which either the Parliamentary Secretary or someone else speaking in reply might like to deal. I refer to the matter of whether this particular amendment would require that the same rules which had been in existence before would apply or whether the total amount of flooded land might be considered separately from other cultivated land in calculating any award to farmers who have crop insurance.

When the plan was first introduced, there was a fair amount of enthusiasm in many provinces. Perhaps this was enthusiasm from people who were willing to learn about schemes with which they were not too familiar. On looking back at some of the annual reports on the province of Saskatchewan for the year 1961, one finds there were around 118 municipalities which indicated that they wanted a study carried out in their municipalities to see whether a particular plan might not work in their area.

Of course, in its infancy the administration was not capable of coping with some of these problems because naturally the staff was inexperienced and inadequate. In addition, they only had a limited time during which to solve these problems. In subsequent years, such as in 1961, many farmers in western Canada would have gladly participated in the program because the awards that would have been made would have helped to stave off the slump in the economy of western Canada at that time and might have tided us over.

We have had similar experiences in other years. Three years ago we had a severe frost, particularly in the northern part of Saskatchewan. This was another time when I saw completely frozen crops. Following that year, the Saskatchewan pool invited representatives from all parties to attend their meetings. At that time members of all parties in the House had an opportunity to visit some of these areas which could have had a tremendous 40 million bushel crop. There was every appearance of a good crop; the stand was big, the heads appeared to be well formed, but when you shelled them out you found they were frozen in the flower stage. Insurance in this case would have proved of enormous benefit.

After 10 or 11 years we find that, despite all that can be said for crop insurance, only a small percentage of farmers in Canada have taken advantage of it. Either the Parliamentary Secretary or the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) indicated that some 12,000 farmers in Saskatchewan had participated. He based his comments on the report that is available. I checked the number of farmers who participated last year, and I find that there was a decrease of some 3,000 in Saskatchewan. I think that perhaps there may be a reason for this decline. Last year was a particularly critical year financially in western Canada. Many farmers were cutting down on expenses wherever they could. For example, they cut down on fertilizers or on insurance. Perhaps this was not wise, but it enabled them to carry on their farming operation. As a result of the lack of cash in western Canada last year, there was a drop from the 12,000 farmers who participated the previous year to 9,000 last year. If this is a continuing trend, I imagine we will be struggling hard to get them back.

In addition to the fact that there were fewer farmers participating—a decrease of 25 per cent from those who participated the previous year—another factor must be taken into consideration. Among the farmers who had participated in the scheme by making a payment of approximately $1 or $1.25 per acre, many reduced their coverage to 50 cents an acre. This was done for several reasons. The first and foremost was to cut down on the premium, and perhaps this was the deciding factor. The second reason was that many of them would have liked to continue the insurance program but elected to stay in it only at the lowest possible rate in order to avoid paying into the PFAA program. As any farmer in western Canada knows, this was a deduction that might be levied as part of any future elevator charge. While many farmers are searching for a group insurance scheme, I think they would like to get out of the PFAA program.

As I look at the map indicating the areas in which Saskatchewan has participated, I am sorry to see that to this date Saskatchewan has been slow in promoting the idea of crop insurance. There may be several reasons for this with which I would like to deal briefly. On looking at the map, one finds that the eastern half of the province, outside of certain pockets that may be excluded, is by and large included in any kind of plan, but the number of participants in this particular area may be very small. This is a sad fact because out of a total of about 180,000 to 190,000 farmers in the three provinces only about 35,000 farmers are participating. This is a sad state of affairs, particularly in view of the fact that Manitoba has joined in the scheme quite substantially. There is another very valid reason for this low level of participation. Perhaps this is the fault of the provincial administration. On looking back, I see that the 1961 report indicates that at least 118 municipalities wished an analysis of some kind to be carried out regarding the need for crop insurance.

According to the latest available report, I find that only 60 agencies exist in the whole province of Saskatchewan. This is ridiculous because everybody knows that insurance is not usually bought without a push to sell it. Anyone who has had any experience in buying insurance knows full well that there have been times when he has been talked into buying insurance and been happy about it simply because somebody made the effort to sell it to him, perhaps for a reward or on a commission. However, the point is that the fine details have been explained. This is one of the reasons there was such limited participation in Saskatchewan.

If one looks at the map and draws a straight line down from Prince Albert to Moose Jaw, one sees that the eastern half of the province can be said to have participated in general, but the western half, outside of the Saskatchewan River area around Rosetown, is participating only in a very limited way. Although the area may be shaded on the map, this does not necessarily mean that there are very many farmers who participate. In fact there may be only half a dozen farmers participating. The reason is that there are not sufficient agents. The provincial government administration in our part of the country is at fault by not allowing many of the other areas to participate if they wish.

When I look at some areas, I find that one agent may have to cover six municipalities. Unless he does a lot of travelling he cannot do a good job of selling crop insurance in the area. I realize what happens in these cases. Somebody applies for the job, and the usual kind of thing takes place. They pick out an applicant and see if he is the right political shade. But even though he may be the right political shade, if he is gainfully occupied in some other activity, in business or farming, this cuts down on the time he has available for selling crop insurance. Usually, the agent will select a particular day to try to sell crop insurance coverage. It may be the day when an auction sale is taking place, or a community picnic. Then, he will try to see how many farmers he can convince to take out crop insurance. That is a sorry attempt to sell coverage.

The minute disaster strikes, the provincial government is under the gun. The farmers are under financial pressure. They do not have the resources to fend for themselves. What is required is a full-time agent, although I do not suggest he should have no other source of income. However, Mr. Speaker, this is one area in which we are at fault.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), the rates of average yield established for many locations are away out of reason. All practising farmers know that the use of the long-term average is wrong, and after paying high premiums for several years they find that unless they have had a complete crop failure they do not qualify, so they stop thinking about participating in the plan. Generally speaking, the farmer who participates in the plan can be the best salesman for it. If it works to his advantage he will sell it to his neighbours. Farmers are willing to share their experiences with each other, and their experiences to date indicate that the method of calculation is all wrong. It is not advantageous to many farmers.

As I understand it, the Saskatchewan provincial scheme works on a 25 year average. Mr. Speaker, in 1945 we did not have some of the varieties of grain that we have today. How many farmers were using fertilizers in 1945? Some portions of my area were not even opened up in 1945. Consequently, there is no just way of basing accurate averages over 25 years. Take 1961 as a good example. Even in that year we did not have a total crop failure despite drought. We took off a crop because of the practices the farmers had followed, the fertilizers they had used, the new varieties of grain the had sown, and the modern machinery which was available. Thus, there is no reason for calculating the average on a 25 year basis. We would be better off if this were reduced to ten or 15 years, to something nearer reality.

Another reason many farmers do not participate in the crop insurance program is that they cannot raise enough money for the premium. If the premium is $200, a farmer may be hard pressed to raise the cash to take advantage of the program. Farmers realize the danger of being without crop insurance, but sometimes they do not see how they can spare $200 to participate. Thus, they will take a chance on doing without insurance rather than putting out money that they badly need for other things.

There is an element of compulsion in the 1 per cent deduction which is made at the elevators when a farmer delivers his grain. Perhaps another method of premium payment could be worked out, with all the necessary deduction made at the elevators. If a farmer is willing to participate in crop insurance he could have 2 per cent, 3 per cent, or even 4 per cent and 5 per cent deducted at the elevators. It should be possible to work out such a schedule to cover his premium. I, myself, would be willing to allow a 5 per cent deduction at the elevator because it would be a small portion of the total amount that I would receive. This would avoid some administrative costs and red tape. Perhaps it could be operated in the same way as PFAA. To some extent, it is compulsory. Everybody participates.

Of course, the onus would be on the individual to select the type of coverage he wanted. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I think it is true that the day of PFAA is coming to a close. I think it may have outlived its usefulness. In my region the area that was first willing to enter the plan was the northeastern part of Saskatchewan, but we always felt we might be contributing to the plan only to help some areas where the average yield was lower. For example, our yield has always been higher than that in the southwestern part of the province, and therefore PFAA has not worked to our advantage over a long period of years. It has worked to the advantage of the southwestern part of the province. Consequently, there may be reluctance on the part of the provincial government to move into that area. Crop insurance is gradually working its way west, although I find it difficult to accept the fact that it has taken 11 years to sell the plan. More flexibility in the method of paying premiums could bring about greater participation.

There is another reason for the lack of participation. The only three crops that can participate in crop insurance in the province of Saskatchewan are wheat, oats and barley. As everybody knows, there has been a diversification of farm products. Farmers have been growing rapeseed, yellow mustard, flax and other crops for which there is no coverage. There is no reason for that. If one crop can fail, so can another. If it can hail on wheat, it can also hail on rapeseed. I do not need to go outside my own experience to know that that is true. Yet, not only must farmers carry crop insurance, they must also carry hail insurance separately; I think that is stupid. Why should a farmer have to pay an additional premium for hail insurance? I imagine that many farmers do not bother with general crop insurance because in their area the incidence of hail is greater than in other areas. I am quite willing to have some percentage deducted from my deliveries to cover insurance; yet I ask, why should I need to take out two or three different kinds of insurance to cover my crop. If the idea of crop insurance is valid, and I think it is, then I say there is room for amendment in the present legislation.

I think we should do our best to urge the provinces to participate in this plan. According to the annual report of the Minister for the fiscal year 1968-69 under the Crop Insurance Act, the only crops covered in Saskatchewan were wheat, oats, barley and mixed grains. Alberta provided insurance for wheat, oats, barley, mixed grains and peas grown for processing. I understand that there were plans in 1969 for the inclusion of rapeseed. In Saskatchewan, we have grown rapeseed over the years. Why has rapeseed not been included in that province, particularly in the north? I find this omission difficult to understand. In Manitoba the crops insured were wheat, oats, barley, mixed grains, flax, rapeseed, yellow mustard seed and sugar beets. Surely, the insurance program of that province is more in line with the sort of programs we ought to adopt everywhere. These figures pertain to 1969. I have not seen the figures for 1970. I also understand that in 1969 it was intended, in addition to grain and corn, to cover tomatoes for processing and potatoes. It seems to me that provincial governments bringing forward such programs were acting to meet the needs of their people.

For some reason or other we have been slow in Saskatchewan in moving to provide the type of protection which is needed, especially since we have been urged to diversify. I think governments could work out a plan that would to a large extent eliminate the operation of some of the hail insurance companies. Of course, individuals could still obtain individual coverage to meet their individual needs. I think that the exclusions in the bill render it unacceptable to many producers in the west. Hail comes down intermittently, a factor which farmers must consider. In addition, the growers of rapeseed must also consider that every 20 years some sort of blight settles on rapeseed. It follows a cycle of approximately 20 years; we cannot know the exact day when it will come. Nevertheless, I shall be unable to obtain coverage for my rapeseed. My hail insurance will not cover blight. Consequently, I must pay my premium for hail insurance and, if I want other crop insurance, I must pay an additional premium. As a result, I shall be forced to contribute to two or three insurance companies. They will collect premiums.

I shall also have to contribute to the government's insurance plan if I want protection. Nevertheless if my rapeseed crop is infested with beetles, or if some other disaster affects my yellow mustard or my flax crops, I will not be covered under this plan. That, to me, is reprehensible, and I do not think this should be so. That this can happen shows that there has been an oversight on the part of the government, and that there has been sheer negligence on the part of the relevant administration. I submit it is negligence, Mr. Speaker, because everyone knows that not only does the individual concerned in the disaster suffer agony but that the disaster affects not only that particular part of the country but the entire country.

I, therefore, welcome this amendment and wonder at the same time why the entire scheme should not be overhauled in conjunction with the provincial government. Surely, it would be of advantage if the federal government could talk to the provincial authorities and try to work out improvements to the act. After all, when disaster strikes, the first administration that you blame or that you turn to is the federal administration. That is the administration that will provide the relief or welfare that may become necessary, in the event of a disaster, to tide the people concerned over their difficulties. I only hope that the administration in the province of Saskatchewan will take heed of the many comments which have been made here. Although we have not necessarily covered all the areas we ought to, nevertheless, as federal legislators—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words this afternoon on the crop insurance bill, which is a matter of great importance and concern to the people of Saskatchewan, my own province, as well as to all farmers across Canada. With respect to the amendments before the House this afternoon, I am sure that no hon. member can take objection to the provisions proposed in Bill C-185. Nevertheless, I think we have to examine some of these amendments within the framework of the performance and operation of this program to date, within the context of needs as they are developing within the agricultural and farming community at present, and in relation to new developments and new programs which may be considered either at present or some time in the future.

The Parliamentary Secretary in his remarks introducing this bill, outlined something of the history of the federal government's involvement and participation in crop insurance programs. That was a very useful background for the debate we have embarked on today and, of course, helped to set some matters in their context. Crop insurance has interested farmers across Canada and, particularly, in my province of Saskatchewan for a long time, partly because in my province there is a history of instability of production. That has been a characteristic of the agricultural industry in Saskatchewan. The provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan pioneered crop insurance legislation. They started their crop insurance programs without complementary federal legislation or participation.

The province of Saskatchewan, for example, commenced its program in 1961. The program was started on a very limited scale that year. As a matter of fact, it turned out that farming and crop conditions that year were disastrous, and this helped to prove the need for a crop insurance program. When federal legislation was introduced, it was of some help. Yet it was also immediately recognized that there were serious limitations to the legislation. It took a number of years, as the Parliamentary Secretary outlined, before we saw legislation on a federal level which complemented and assisted provincial programs and which was in keeping with the requests made by the provincial governments. This afternoon, I should like to examine briefly three points which I think are of concern and importance in dealing with this legislation.

First, why are more farmers not participating in this very important program? This point has already been raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski). They pointed out that for the last crop year for which reports are available, approximately 12,000 farmers in Saskatchewan participated in this program. Only 12,000 out of a total of 85,000 participated. That is not a very satisfactory state of affairs.

As the Parliamentary Secretary pointed out, there was a drop in the participation in the program last year. Only 9,000 farmers in Saskatchewan participated in the program. This was not because of a lack of interest on the part of the farmers. There are other causes which must be examined by both provincial and federal governments. The provincial and federal governments have a responsibility to examine this program to determine why farmers are not making greater use of it. Why is more use not being made of the program when there is such an obvious and great need?

In so far as my own province of Saskatchewan is concerned, a good deal of the blame can be laid at the doorstep of the provincial government of that province for not having pushed this program more in recent years. When the program was commenced in 1961 by the province of Saskatchewan, the province proceeded very cautiously. At that time, there was not the full participation that was required. As I already mentioned, the actions of the government of that day in proceeding very carefully in the initial stages of the program were well founded. They gained experience with the 1961 crop. If a widespread program had been in effect that year, the province would have been bankrupt.

At that time the program was new. Only the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan were involved in the program. They had to gain experience in the administration of the program. It was necessary for them to gather a body of actuarial data which was very vital to the development of the program. This experience and data was gathered over a period of several years. After five or six years operation, sufficient data was gathered. In the view of people with experience and competence in dealing with this program, it was possible to embark on a campaign to help bring about widespread participation by farmers. This was not done by the province of Saskatchewan. As a result, there has not been complete success. It certainly would have been possible to achieve much greater success than has been the case up to the present.

In addition to this particular defect in operations, it is necessary for both the provincial and federal governments to examine this program very carefully to try and determine what has to be done in order to bring about the degree of participation which is required if this program is to be a success, and if it is to play a full role in stabilizing the agricultural industry in Canada.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar and the hon. member for Mackenzie have outlined the points which they feel should be taken into consideration in such an examination. I feel some of the points they have raised are valid for consideration and study. At this stage of the debate, I do not intend to deal with the specific points or to try and develop other points. I think they have done an adequate job. I simply wish to stress and underline the point that we do need a review and further study by the governments concerned.

Second, I wish to deal with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Some references have been made to the inadequacies of this program. Some suggestions have been made that it is time to eliminate this program. I have a great deal of sympathy with that suggestion. We should eliminate the PFAA program if it can be safely concluded that it is no longer playing a role which is essential within the framework of the agricultural industry. I want to make it clear that I am not suggesting scrapping this program without complementary action in terms of developing other programs such as the crop insurance program and the income stabilization program, which would ensure the degree of stability which we desire for the agricultural industry.

I recall when the PFAA program was introduced. I was only a boy at the time but I have heard a great deal of discussion about it. At that time, it was only a half-baked program and was very unsatisfactory. It was unacceptable to many farmers in western Canada at that time. Nevertheless, it was proceeded with by the Liberal government of the day. This program was pushed through under the leadership of the then Minister of Agriculture, the late Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner. I recall some of the statements made then with reference to the rules that should guide this program in its introduction. One of the points was that we needed to ensure that farmers were efficient. Inefficiency among farmers was not to be encouraged. That has a rather familiar ring in light of some discussions being carried on at the present time with reference to some new proposals which have been advanced by the government.

PFAA at that time had a very rigid framework for its operations. It was only a matter a matter of time until this was shown to be unsatisfactory. One by one, changes and amendments were made to the rules and methods of operation until there was a greater degree of flexibility introduced into the program. This was very essential. Great stress was placed on the need for encouraging efficiency among individual farmers by the manner in which the program was introduced. Many people who have studied this subject have concluded that the way in which PFAA operates today encourages a type of inefficiency within agriculture in western Canada. This is not demonstrated in terms of an individual farm operation, but in terms of the industry. It is very important that we consider this. The crop insurance program is to be a substitute. This, of course, has been recognized within PFAA, although I think it would be useful to dispense with the program. It is no longer serving a useful purpose. This can only be done if it is complemented by other programs which would bring about a greater degree of stability within agriculture.

The third point I should like to examine with respect to the crop insurance program and the bill before us is in connection with the relationship between crop insurance programs and the grain stabilization proposals advanced by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), who is also the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I wish to underline the term "grain stabilization program". In all official documents which have been released, the government has been very careful to say grain stabilization plan, program or proposal. They have avoided the term "income stabilization" in the official documents. As soon as the minister and others who have been advancing this proposal get into a discussion on the subject, they immediately use the term "income stabilization". I want to make it clear it is nothing of the sort; it is not income stabilization.

I think it is important to take into account all the relevant factors when examining this particular proposal by the government. The crop insurance program is, of course, related to physical production; this is the basis upon which the program is operated and upon which compensation is paid. The stabilization proposals were limited to western Canada and they deal with the situation from the standpoint of gross cash receipts to farmers. These, of course, are determined by the deliveries farmers are able to make to the grain handling and movement system. Without going into detail at this time, it seems to me the government should give consideration to the features of a crop insurance program in addition to any proposals it may bring forward in connection with the grain stabilization plan. It is important to avoid duplication of services and the proliferation of programs which prove a burden to the farmer in the long run. We need a commitment by the government to stabilization programs—to an adequate degree of stabilization.

Hon. members may recall our criticism of the grain stabilization program already announced by the government in this connection. My hon. friend from Saskatoon-Biggar has drawn attention to the difficulties which farmers face by reason of deductions for PFAA, hail insurance and so on. There is urgent need for the coordination of these programs, regardless of the fact that they approach the problem from different standpoints. I urge the government to take steps to ensure there are adequate public stabilization programs, an adequate degree of public involvement, and a commitment of public expenditure to those programs. On the other hand, the government should avoid any unnecessary duplication of programs and services.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on Bill C-185, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

Having listened this morning to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, I soon realized he was giving us a picture of all the accomplishments since the Crop Insurance Act came into effect and it seems to me the purpose sought is worthwhile and worthy of the attention of all members.

One must also recognize that many farmers have not yet been able to obtain the security they are entitled to. A guarantee of stability, such as the one enjoyed nowadays by union members, is certainly not shared by farmers and I believe that is all the more reason for considering carefully this amendment to the Crop Insurance Act.

The proposed changes seem good, but is that enough? They can never be too good as far as the producers are concerned, but they nevertheless seem commendable and advisable.

I deemed it my duty to explain briefly the difficulties the Quebec farmers met with in order to adjust themselves to this crop insurance program since it came into effect. I do not merely wish here to criticize this piece of legislation. On the contrary, considering the difficulties met by many producers in this province, I am wondering if the few minutes available to me will be enough to convince the federal government and the Quebec members to urge the Quebec government to be more responsive to this important piece of legislation on crop insurance.

It is our duty to inform the Quebec farmers about it. Some producers have often complained that the federal government failed to do this or that while perfectly aware that it was a provincial responsibility and that the federal government is only paying 50 per cent of the crop insurance.

The federal government is playing—and I mean "playing"—an excellent card by offering quite a valuable subsidy so that each province may use it without any hesitation. The Quebec government's hesitation in participating in this program or the lack of cohesion in its administration makes some producers feel uneasy because, so it seems, the program administration is too slow and unfortunately the claims are kept waiting. Once more, the blame is not on the Canadian Parliament but I dare hope that my contribution will urge Quebec federal members to inform Quebec farmers that this administration is, so to say, 100 per cent under the Quebec government's responsibility and that we are prepared as federal members to co-operate financially to this program.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to call the attention of the minister responsible for this legislation, since he is now in the House, to the fact that in my constituency as in others of the province of Quebec, important potato growers, unfortunately, have not yet benefitted from this crop insurance program. I know that we cannot blame the Canadian government but, before such wavering and the Quebec government's lack of consideration towards potato growers, may I request the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to have his opposite number in Quebec invite the potato growers to take part in this crop insurance program since they make up a rather significant economic force in the province of Quebec. Those potato growers deprived of the benefits of this program still feel concern about bad weather and frost. Still, rain is their greatest enemy, and they have suffered huge losses in bad years. Obviously, they are all the more unhappy other cultures are today covered by crop insurance.

I dare hope that members from Quebec in this House as well as the Minister of Agriculture will pay particular attention to this problem so that Quebec will finally understand that potato growers must enjoy the same coverage and benefits as others across the country. I am making these comments in the interest of these producers generally. There was also reference to a review of the estimates, taking into account, for instance, changes pertaining to soil preparation, etc. A review is required as in any other field since "technicalities" are changing and requirements force us to modify frequently our method of administration and operation.

Those estimates, which may have seemed sufficient a few years ago, are less and less so today because costs appear to be increasing. It is perhaps important that the government consider the problem and bring out some solutions in order that producers may obtain compensation more in keeping with their expenses.

I do not want to forget to ask the government to consider paying a premium to certain producers or rather to consider the difficulties in which these people find themselves when they have to pay their contribution to the plan. One of my colleagues stated a minute ago that this payment could perhaps be made at harvest time. I suggest that it should be possible to establish a plan allowing the producers to pay this insurance premium at harvest time.

Should there be crop failure, governments will not lose anything as they will be able to collect insurance premiums. Now, if the premium could be paid at harvest time, this would give a certain number of producers the feeling that they have protection since they deny themselves this kind of insurance because the original premium is too costly.

Protection is never too costly but, on the other hand, one has to be realistic and appreciate that for some people this is getting to be pretty hard. We might consider allowing the producers participation in this program by having them pay their insurance premium at crop selling time.

Now, I would not like to encroach upon the time allotted to the other hon. members, but let me repeat that this bill is positively most commendable and most acceptable. I do hope that the farmers, whether they live in Quebec or in any other province will avail themselves of these ever-increasing and ever-improving advantages. Canadian farmers must take advantage of this insurance to which they are entitled, in our society, just like any other class of workers.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the member for Joilette (Mr. La Salle) would further specify the nature of the problem concerning the potato crop in his area in Quebec. I have not completely understood the essential point of his argument. I would like to know if the provincial government is refusing to include the potato crop in his insurance plan or if on the contrary, the potato producers do not want that insurance.

Mr. La Salle: No, it is the Quebec government which did not deem it advisable to make that insurance available to potato producers. I know for a fact that a great number of important potato producers in my area are demanding that insurance and since the provincial government is now refusing to take part in this plan, I have taken care not to blame the federal government but to invite it to make the Quebec government understand that its hesitation is disastrous for a certain number of potato producers. I hope that our appeals to the province of Quebec will enable our potato producers to take advantage of that insurance as other producers.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this amendment to the Crop Insurance Act dealing specifically with losses arising when the seeding or planting of a crop is prevented by excessive ground moisture, weather or other agricultural hazards, I can find no real issue with the measure and think it will be a useful addition to the crop insurance armoury. I assume that this will mean extended insurance coverage, and while it is a useful addition I think it may be somewhat difficult to administer. I note, also, that the term "agricultural hazards" is used. I would be interested to know what is meant by that term and under what circumstances the term "hazard" will be applicable.

Dealing with the situation in western Canada as applicable particularly to my own area, this program probably will have a limited application because I have only known of one or two years in which there has been an almost total failure or widespread loss of opportunity to plant crops. On the other hand, there have been numerous occasions when farmers have been unable to plant the crops they intended to sow because of excessive moisture. This has happened very often in respect of a piece of summerfallow a farmer intended to sow in wheat, but due to a wet spring he was forced to seed late and thought it would be better to put in another crop which was not as desirable, either because of the return per acre or because it did not fit in with his particular plans.

Another question I think might well be raised is this: When does a farmer apply to take out crop insurance? If he had the privilege of waiting for even part of the spring before applying for coverage, this could cause unusual losses. No doubt the minister and his departmental officials will have explanations and answers to these questions which will be raised during the committee's consideration of the bill.

I should like to speak briefly about the principle of crop insurance and how it effects western agriculture, particularly the farmers in my area. We are all aware that western farmers use two main vehicles to obtain compensation in respect of a disaster that has befallen them because of the elements. One is the PFAA and the other is crop insurance. Both these vehicles have been useful and have their proponents. Crop insurance seems to find favour with intensive farmers, those who perhaps may be credited with bringing considerable knowledge and acumen to their farming operations.

If the price of grain is fair and the grain is moving readily, there tends to be a larger acceptance of crop insurance. However, when farming profits are more tightly squeezed and the grain is not moving, crop insurance is not so attractive to the farmer because he may well be required to pay a premium on grain which will sit in the granaries for years before moving into the markets of the world. So this becomes a matter of value judgment of the farmer facing a grain situation such as has existed in western Canada for the past two years. A farmer may well be unable to market his grain and thus is faced with added expenses with no return. I think crop insurance should remain on a voluntary basis with as wide a range of options as possible, consistent with reasonable administrative costs. There has been a feeling that crop insurance should completely replace PFAA, but I am not in agreement with this concept.

In my opinion, the PFAA has been a great boon to western Canada. It has its faults and it is outdated in many ways, but it is a very useful tool to aid farmers in times of distress. Many farmers have told me that it was tailored for the time when a farmer had four horses and a gang-plow, and it has not kept up with modern needs. There is general agreement among the farmers to whom I have spoken that the PFAA could be a useful tool if it were upgraded. Although my riding is in an area where drought is a most infrequent cause of crop failure, and although the original PFAA was largely designed for widespread drought, I have been struck by how helpful it is to many recipients.

Crop insurance tends to be taken out by farmers who by virtue of their business ability would be able to survive in any case. Crop insurance, to them, is like life insurance or other forms of insurance to the prudent. There are a great many people involved in farming who have neither the ability nor the ingenuity to make such complete plans. Even the small PFAA payments have often been enough to turn what would be a disaster for many small and insecure farming operations into a situation with which the farmer can cope.

In my experience, most of these people would not have bought crop insurance in any event; they just never get around to it or ar perhaps unaware of it in spite of the publicity it has been given. Perhaps they felt they could not afford the premium. These are very often the people the Liberal party has suggested should leave the farm. I do not know what they would do in the cities, in view of the mass unemployment we have now, which no doubt will be a recurring feature in our fast-changing society.

Crop Insurance Act

The PFAA should be amended. On one or two occasions I have tried to bring this to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). I cannot recall the exact details, but it seems to me that in its 30 years of existence it has cost the government substantial amounts on only one or two occasions. Nearly always the 1 per cent levy has represented as much as the cost, so the cost to the federal treasury has been very little. If I recall correctly, the cost of administering crop insurance—which is carried out by the provincial governments with the assistance of the federal government—has been in the neighbourhood of $5 million annually to the federal treasury.

PFAA seems to be reasonably easy and cheap to administer, but if the $5 million were allocated to increase payments to PFAA this could well increase by 50 per cent, in most years, the payments under PFAA. I do not say that PFAA should replace crop insurance, and I do not think that PFAA should supplant or diminish the scope of crop insurance, nor would I wish to have a significant proportion of farmers opt out of crop insurance in favour of PFAA. I believe, however, that governments should involve themselves in preventing the worst results of a disaster, particularly a climatic disaster, to farmers.

Consideration should be given to upgrading the PFAA in a more modern setting and with a more realistic payment to farmers. Money spent here, in my opinion, is extremely valuable from a social point of view, if nothing else, and we should consider it in that light. It is perhaps difficult to reach a perfect balance between social spending and pure crop insurance, but I believe PFAA goes some distance in this regard. I believe that a study of this problem should be carried out, and I am sure that the PFAA should be retained with useful modifications which would not detract from the crop insurance principle.

I have one other grievance to raise which affects particularly my own constituency of Dauphin and that of my colleague the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart). This point concerns the damage done to crops of farmers all around the edges of Riding Mountain National Park. I believe other parks are in this category and that provincial parks also are involved. A great deal of attention has been given to conservation and preservation of wildlife. It is to our credit—and I am very happy about this—that we have been successful to a considerable degree, but the supply of game has increased at least in relation to the wildlife habitat that can support it. Increasingly there is damage to the crops of farmers who live in these areas. It does not matter that the number of farms involved is relatively small in number; it is a problem that the farmers are powerless to do anything about.

In Riding Mountain National Park there is a large herd of elk variously estimated at 7,000 to 11,000. Periodically, as happens in respect of all animal populations and even, unfortunately, in respect of humans, population explosion takes place. At the present time there seems to be a very excessive population of deer, mainly elk, in the Riding Mountain National Park. The term "game management" is increasingly being used to define the keeping of game within reasonable limits in a given area so that it may cause the least possible damage to other interests. Unfortunately, the people who administer our national parks never seem to have heard of this concept. I believe that in Riding Mountain National Park the game people will have to decide to manage deer population so that depredation of surrounding farmlands can be kept at a minimum.

The national parks administration has been singularly unresponsive to complaints and attempts to see that reason is exercised in respect of this problem. I think this is one more example of the national parks being administered as if they were a fiefdom, with complete disregard for the surrounding communities. It is very much like the days of the old feudal lords. No matter what game management is carried on, there will always be damage from wildlife. It seems very necessary that the federal government and provincial governments take a hand in compensating those who sustain severe losses which in a few cases are disastrous. Up until now, both levels of government have largely closed their eyes to this problem. With increasing hunting licences and higher fees, more money should now be available for this purpose. As more and more people move into the cities, there is a greater demand for hunting recreation and more money must be allocated for compensation for crop damage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word about the grain situation that crop insurance is designed to correct. There is no doubt that the next 12 months will be critical. We have completed the Lift program. So far as the western grain producers are concerned, this program has left them in despair. They know not where to go from here. There is an enormous summerfallow from last year, of 38 million acres—the largest in Canadian history. This could produce an enormous crop, but this land will have to be seeded because it cannot be re-summerfallowed.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has been credited with saying that exports of what could reach 550 million bushels in the crop year, but recent indications are that with Russia likely to refuse the 53 million bushels left over from the 1966 deal, there is no likelihood that Canadian export sales will reach this figure. A figure of 360 million bushels to 450 million bushels seems much more likely. It is estimated that there will be a carryover of at least 650 million bushels on hand at the end of July, 1971, although I think no one really knows what is on hand in the farmers' bins. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics method of estimating does not seem very accurate and many competent people doubt that there is as much grain on Canadian farms as indicated. Nevertheless, there still is a large amount of wheat in storage.

Although grain has been moving out of western Canada, so far as wheat is concerned, most of it has been coming from stocks that have been held in storage by the Wheat Board. The decision of the government to do away with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act means that $70 million allocated for this will be used, presumably, for the crop stabilization program and will cover a good portion of the estimated $100 million for this program. Because there will almost certainly have to be an increase of probably 50 per cent in grain handling charges, this may mean farmers will not be much better off than they were last year.

The cash flow of the farmers of western Canada was down considerably in 1969 over previous years, and as the price of meat, particularly hogs, has dropped significantly it seems to me that this is a significant factor. The cash position of the western farmer will become increasingly severe before next fall, and serious cash shortages may develop. I believe that the farm cash situation in respect of the west is not good, and the remedial action taken by this government so far does not seem to be the answer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on the proposals of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board for a production and grains receipts policy for the western grains industry. Almost all farmers whom I have queried about this matter have complained of the lack of detail and information necessary to carry out a value judgment, particularly as it relates to their own situation. Most farmers have good reason to be wary of too much enthusiasm by those who initiate policy and who sometimes have been led astray in their planning. One farmer pointed out that although the barley market was moving and barley is in strong demand, if other governments should increase their subsidy there would be a limit to what Canada could use and at what price barley could be grown. The idea that if there were a loss in a pool in a certain year, to be made up the following year, could present problems and inequalities which could easily upset plans for a more uniform production plan for any type of grain.

The cash stabilization plan may have a place in producers' plans, but until it is known what the premiums will be it is difficult to know whether it will be acceptable or not. Here again, the government intends to sit it out until all the producers' premiums have been exhausted. It makes good headlines to say that the fund will be supported by government, but it would appear that in most cases this support would be in the proportion of one horse and one rabbit. All farmers with whom I have spoken agree that the suggested 3 per cent levy on all crops is too heavy a price and one which would make the plan unacceptable. The pay-out under the proposed stabilization plan would seem to be too global to be practical. It would not be regional or even provincial. The program would not be selective enough, as far as recipients are concerned, to ensure that good value was received for the money spent.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Farmers are worried and concerned. They are uneasy. As individuals, they may find themselves left out in view of all the changes in the rules and regulations that have been made. The resolution passed by the Manitoba pool elevators, that the grain stabilization plan should not be instituted before a thorough study is made, could be prophetic and should be heeded.

Crop Insurance Act

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make on Bill C-185. First I would say that I approve of the bill, but I want to take this opportunity to make further comments on the crop insurance plan in general. I have commented on crop insurance and suggested several improvements to it in the last three sessions of Parliament. It seems to me that the federal government could very well pick up more than 25 per cent of the premium cost of this plan, which is presently the case. It should also be remembered, of course, that the federal government and provincial governments share equally the administration costs of this plan.

The report of the task force on agriculture gives a résumé of what has taken place under the Crop Insurance Act since it came into effect in 1960, and it is broken down by provinces. It is interesting to note some of the figures. For instance, at page 392 of the report it is stated that in Prince Edward Island, for every $1 that the farmers have paid into crop insurance by way of premium in the last nine or ten years—this report was in 1968-69—farmers have collected $2.28. In Quebec, farmers have collected $2.34; in Ontario, $1.41; in Manitoba, 58 cents; in Saskatchewan, the lowest figure of the provinces quoted, 44 cents for every $1 that they paid in; and in Alberta, 83 cents. Because the federal government pays 25 per cent of the premium cost, farmers should really get back $1.33 in the long run for every premium dollar they pay. Therefore, the plan in the Prairie provinces is not what it should be, particularly in Saskatchewan.

I have been saying at many of the meetings I have attended in my constituency in the last three or four weeks that crop insurance needs overhauling so that it will become more acceptable to the farmers and will be made available to all farmers in all parts of the Prairies. Instead of becoming more acceptable, farmers are dropping out of crop insurance in Saskatchewan. According to reports, in Canada in 1968 there were 64,376 contracts taken out by farmers under the crop insurance plan. In 1969 this figure dropped to 62,359. In Saskatchewan, during the same period, there were 12,343 contracts in 1968 and in 1969 this figure dropped to 11,637.

With regard to PFAA, I think the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) should look at the latest report on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which gives all the figures with regard to pay in and pay out over the 30 years since it was first established in 1939. These figures show that the total levies paid by farmers in that 30-year period were in the neighbourhood of $207 million, while the total pay-out to all farmers in the same period was $383,516,518—almost two to one. This does not mean that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is satisfactory. It is the opinion of farmers to whom I have talked, and I think this also, that we could very well phase out PFAA and there would be little regret.

I shall point out some of the things that are wrong with PFAA. First of all, the ceiling is $800 per farm, which is not very much for an average grain farm; it is hardly worth while. Second, it is not done on an individual basis. Under the PFAA regulations, some farmers who should not be paid are paid, and in other cases farmers who should be paid are left out because of the block basis upon which claims are adjusted.

Mention was made of the stabilization plan and how crop insurance might fit into it. In my discussions of the grain income stabilization proposal in recent weeks, I have found a great deal of concern about the involvement of crop insurance with this proposal. Suggestions have been made, and I think they are valid, that crop insurance receipts should be treated as grain income for purposes of this plan if it becomes effective, because that is really what crop insurance payments are, a substitute for grain income. Of course, they would have to be not only eligible for the benefits but also subject to whatever deductions there might be, hopefully, less than 3 per cent, which may eventually be applied in this proposal.

However, before this can be done equitably, crop insurance has to be made available to farmers in all parts of the Prairies as well as in all parts of Canada, and it must be made available on terms at which the farmers will buy it. At present, they cannot afford to buy it because the premiums are too high for the coverage that is given. That is so in Saskatchewan, at least, as indicated by the figures in the task force report. Therefore, I suggest to the minister that he should contact people in the various provinces, especially in those where there is not complete coverage, negotiate with them and try to persuade them to provide, as quickly as possible, full coverage for all areas in their provinces so that all farmers may have an opportunity to participate. This is a very real concern.

In recent days I have been talking about the stabilization plan because I believe there should be subsidies, including crop insurance benefits, as grain income for purposes of a stabilization plan, otherwise farmers in many parts of the Prairies who are subject to recurrent crop failure could very well find themselves, after two or three crop years, with little or no basis upon which to collect stabilization payments. I say again that I support this bill, and I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the government will ensure that crop insurance is improved in all parts of Canada, particularly in the Prairies. I hope the minister will hold consultations with his provincial counterparts in order to attain this goal.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Would he not agree that the pay-out of PFAA, the very excessive intake over output, has in the past 30 years been confined to the last two or three years, and that had there not been PFAA another method of government support would have been necessary?

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): In reply to that question, I would suggest that in the last 30 years the pay-out has been greater than the take-in. The figures are to be found in the last two pages of the annual report. If the hon. member had read the annual report he would not have to ask me this question.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, a number of members of this House have contributed adequately to the debate on this bill, but I want to add a few ideas based on my experience with various forms of crop insurance as a practical farmer in the province of Saskatchewan and, more particularly, in the west central part of that province where for some time grain growing has been the principal industry.

I believe that in our area of Saskatchewan the PFAA has in the past served a beneficial purpose, but at present there is a considerable feeling among farmers that this act is out of date and we should have a different approach to crop insurance. I was in a farmers' study group a few years ago which discussed crop insurance, what it would cost us and how it would benefit us as individual producers. We considered the 1 per cent which we contributed to PFAA, and what we paid out in hail insurance. Then we considered what we received in the way of income from these various sources, and decided there should be a more adequate form of crop insurance to cover additional emergency situations.

It would be of advantage to us if there were insurance covering such situations. I am thinking specifically of hazards such as frost and grasshopper damage. We discovered that we were already paying a great deal of money to hail insurance companies but that we did not get a dime back unless our farms were hailed, and we could go a number of years without that happening. But, Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that a hailstorm can wipe out a crop in 15 minutes and we cannot afford to be without some form of protection in this respect. In effect, I am suggesting a comprehensive plan adequate to cover all forms of crop disaster, which would be cheaper than the plan we have at the moment. At that time we wanted to go into crop insurance but found that the Saskatchewan government was dragging its feet. It did not want to expand crop insurance to western Saskatchewan. At that time it did not have its maps ready and it did not seem to be in a big hurry to get them ready so that we could participate. I am sure we would look at this matter again if we had a chance.

There is another problem with regard to PFAA in some parts of Saskatchewan. I am thinking more of the Melfort-Tisdale area which produces big crops, where the farmers contribute the 1 per cent levy but when harvest comes they may lose a 40-bushel crop because of wetness, snow, etc. Consequently, they are more interested in a complete form of coverage.

I would like to talk just briefly about changes in farming methods which have increased crop yields in many parts of the country, changes in better cropping procedures, in better grains, in the use of fertilizer, as a result of which the old maxima allowed under PFAA are no longer valid. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) and others have already made this point. I want to emphasize it because it is certainly true. It is now quite easy, even in a dry year, to get a 12-bushel crop. But we have to remember that our costs have risen considerably and that the $800 maximum payment does not have much relevance to the costs of production and cropping. At one time it did have relevance. As a recipient of PFAA payments in the past, I know they were a help to me, but I think we should now take a new look at what we need in crop insurance.

Insurance is a cost, whether it be crop insurance or income insurance, as the minister from Saskatoon is suggesting in his income stabilization plan. Mr. Speaker, I believe that our farmers over the last two years have not been in a position to afford additional costs. The bulk of the farmers in Saskatchewan have lost money over the past two years and do not want any further costs of operation. At the same time, they need protection against crop failure. Some of them took a chance in not taking out insurance, and paid painfully. We should consider insurance as a cost, and to cover it obviously we need a more adequate income. The difference between the cost of insurance and complete crop failure could be the difference between bankruptcy or ruin and a profitable operation, if the crop failure occurs at an awkward time in a farmer's career. I am thinking of young farmers who might owe a lot of money, and of older farmers who would not have time to recoup.

An insurance scheme for farm production is somewhat similar to unemployment insurance for labour and to other forms of income protection for other groups in society. In Saskatchewan, if the farmers have no money, the merchants have no money; and if the merchants have no money there will be a considerable amount of unemployment. We see this happening at the moment on the Prairies. It is essential that we look after the main industry there and stop some of the crazy fluctuations in farm income. I believe that an adequate form of crop insurance would help do this.

As a final comment, Mr. Speaker, I feel that some change in crop insurance must be considered, some change in stabilization of income, some change in PFAA or, if you will, some change in subsidies to agriculture. I would be quite willing to consider changes, but I am not anxious that we do away with PFAA or any other subsidy until we see how a new form of income protection will work. I do not believe the purpose of the debate on this bill is to discuss all these things, but while I had the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to point out that things are not as satisfactory as they could be and that we should be taking a more extended look at the problem in connection with crop insurance and income insurance. We in this party support the principle involved in the bill and hope its passage will make farming more profitable.

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is quite important that I take part in this discussion. I compliment the government for introducing this amendment; I think it is necessary. Undoubtedly, a number of other amendments must be introduced before crop insurance becomes a good, sound, working vehicle, although I doubt we will ever get it to that level throughout Canada. I realize that areas with different crops and different conditions means that crop insurance applies in different ways. Although I compliment the government for making an effort to come up with a workable plan, I can see that a lot of study still needs to be undertaken.

When I first started studying crop insurance when it was introduced in Saskatchewan back in 1961, I found out how difficult it would be to work in the area with which I was concerned. It was hard to get the support of the ratepayers behind it. The trouble was largely due to the existence of a great deal of submarginal land. Farmers on that land could not afford crop insurance. To prove my point I invite hon. members to consider the number of crop insurance participants in the northern part of Saskatchewan over the last few years. Their number has been so few that it has meant they have had difficulty paying the premiums. For this reason I do not believe we should scrap PFAA. I realize it is outdated, but fail to see any scheme that would replace it.

Of course, the maximum payment of $800, considering the present-day cost of operating a farm, is too low. That amount would have to be rectified. I realize that the collection method envisaged is far superior to one under which you have to collect premiums before the farmer puts in his crop. That, of course, would be utterly impossible. These days, $8 per acre does not go very far toward meeting the operating costs of a farm. Yet before scrapping the PFAA I think the scheme should be examined by the provincial governments and municipalities.

What happened to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is more or less what happened to the Lift program. Far too much of the money was used in administration. A previous speaker noted that many people obtained assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act who were not entitled to that assistance. Yet, if one looks back at the improvements introduced in respect of the PFAA, one will see that the legislation was made effective almost down to the level of the individual farmer. It was effective at the level of the township and was made effective almost at the level of the individual farmer. I think that more could have been done along that line. I believe a great deal more could be done, through co-operation among provincial governments and municipalities, to improve the concept of crop insurance. I am the last one to throw cold water on the idea. I realize that in many parts of Canada this program will work satisfactorily, especially when it covers root crops and similar crops. It will benefit many farmers of western Canada especially.

Much money is paid out in hail insurance premiums alone, yet hail is only one of the hazards farmers face. There are many other hazards. Besides hail, a farmer might face frost difficulties, drought, flooding, insect damage and many other hazards. This concept began with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and so far I do not think we have come up with anything that looks better in the part of the country that concerns me.

I realize that the PFAA provisions are obsolete. We ought to brush up the legislation and give our farmers a better form of insurance coverage. This holds true especially for the farmers in the northern part of Saskatchewan. Let us look at the method of collection. I submit that premiums cannot be collected as cheaply as they can under PFAA. If farmers do not object to the 1 per cent increase, perhaps there will be available to them better insurance coverage and better compensation in the event of crop failure. I think the government should not hesitate to consider these matters.

I realize that of necessity many amendments must be introduced to the crop insurance plan in order to make it a workable program throughout Canada. Nevertheless, I hope the government will take a good look at the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and make it a more workable vehicle. I believe that is possible. That also would give the farmer insurance against many forms of pests. The compensation paid in the event of total crop failure should be much larger than the present maximum of $800 under the act. Despite its shortcomings, we should not condemn it too hastily. It has served a great and useful purpose down through the years. In these days of skyrocketing farm costs, perhaps it is not quite so useful. The maximum amount of compensation a farmer can receive should be revised. I am all for taking a good look at the PFAA before throwing it completely out of the window.

I do not wish to throw cold water on the idea of crop insurance, because I think that in many parts of Canada it will work. Having looked at some statistics, I have noted that the cost of administration in Saskatchewan in the period 1968-69 was $172,015, while premiums paid were only $559,837. If one looks at these figures, one will realize that crop insurance is not the only vehicle that will work in my part of the country.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part in this debate and say that the party I represent supports the extention of coverage outlined in this bill. Not many farmers of the province of British Columbia participate in the crop insurance program. I notice that we are distinguished by having almost the smallest number of contracts, 876 to be exact, and by being burdened by far the highest administrative costs. That factor is probably inversely related to the small percentage of farmers who take out contracts in British Columbia. We must, therefore, look for the reasons why more people are not taking advantage of the program.

I am sure that anyone who has lived, as I have, in two principal agricultural areas of British Columbia, the Okanagan and the riding I represent, Fraser Valley, knows full well that there have been very difficult periods for farmers during the past 25 years. Despite these difficult years during the past quarter century, it seems odd that so few farmers—only 876—in British Columbia have taken advantage of this scheme. Something must lurk behind that small figure. Perhaps we should examine some of these factors. It is not because there have been no agricultural disasters during that time. There was, of course, the 1948 flood which inundated the Fraser Valley. In the Okanagan a freeze of the fruit crop occurred in 1949, 1950, 1955, 1965 and 1969. Three years ago in my riding we saw a particularly severe kill in the strawberry fields and plantations.

We therefore support the extended kind of coverage which the two clauses central to this amending legislation provide. Crop insurance is a device, as is marketing legislation, on the part of legislators to take some of the risk out of that particularly risky business known as agriculture. Those who have sat in this House for the past three years have heard members who represent farming communities emphasize how hazardous and often unrewarding that business really is. I should, therefore, like to note, as set out in the 1969-70 annual report which relates to the Crop Insurance Act and is submitted by the minister, that 1969 was a particularly hazardous year in British Columbia. I read that the indemnities for 1968, expressed as a percentage of the coverage, were 13.22 per cent, while the figure for 1969 reached the whopping level of 42.61 per cent.

This increase in pay-out is due largely to problems in the grain industries in British Columbia's Peace River area and the Okanagan fruit crop damage of that year. We can see that such large pay-outs make substantial inroads into the stabilization fund which, incidentally, was established in British Columbia in 1967 with the sum of $5 million. Because of a pay-out of almost $500,000 in 1969, the fund contains approximately $4.75 million today. Therefore, the fund is down somewhat. That is not unusual. The report emphasizes that this has been the case in most areas. It is more pronounced, however, in some other parts of Canada.

In my constituency the strawberry crop suffers the greatest hazard. Strawberries have suffered some severe years, depending on the nature of the winter. It is notable that the large growers are the ones most likely to take advantage of crop insurance. The smaller growers, in contrast, those who need the crop insurance most, do not have this coverage. They are not able to take advantage of the protection that this legislation provides, perhaps because they are operating on marginal financial levels. The premium cost of roughly 7 per cent of their coverage is perhaps close to their normal profit margin. While they vitally need protection, they cannot afford the premiums. I think the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) referred to this situation in connection with the grain industry. A similar anomaly prevails in my constituency.

Commodities such as strawberries and other small, soft fruits and vegetables are not planted in large enough acreages in various parts of Canada and they are grown in widely separated regions. Some can only be grown, in the temperate parts of Canada such as the Niagara Peninsula, the Annapolis Valley in Nova Scotia and portions of British Columbia. As the act is administered by individual provinces, the acreages provide too small a base if each commodity is considered separately province by province.

The British Columbia Federation of Agriculture recommended to the task force on agriculture that certain commodities should be considered nationally for the purpose of crop insurance. A larger base would thus be provided. There would be lower administrative costs, and greater stability in the industry would result, because disasters do not usually occur in all regions of Canada in one year. As a result, the premiums could be lower. Those people who need it most might then be encouraged to buy the crop insurance at lower premiums. I hope the minister will consider and accept this suggestion.

There may be some problems of administration that I have not visualized, and I am not the originator of the suggestion. However, it seems reasonable in view of the fact that those who really need this coverage are not able to take advantage of it. There is not much use having legislation which provides protection, if the protection is inaccessible.

Another point I wish to make concerns the five-year averaging for maximum coverage limits for tree fruits. This applies mainly to the Okanagan Valley where I lived for a number of years. The years 1965 and 1969 were extremely difficult in the tree fruit industry in the Okanagan. The maximum limits for coverage are based on a percentage of the five-year production average. If 1965 and 1969 were included in the five-year average, the maximum limit on the amount of protection that a farmer could purchase under this legislation would be necessarily limited. It does not take a genius to see how including two poor years in five works against the kind of insurance protection needed by the orchardists. I ask the minister to review this policy so that five more normal years could be used to determine a maximum coverage limit. The present policy makes it particularly difficult, also for those people starting production with new orchards. When a new enterprise is commenced, it is expected that there will be low yields for a great many years because the orchard needs years to mature.

The strawberry farmers in my constituency have suffered some severe years. A number of them have applied to the processors asking for an agreement with the processors to buy all the production for the lifetime of a particular patch. We can understand why the farmers want this agreement. They want this assurance because it provides stability. The processors are not very sympathetic to this proposal. The processors are faced with a glut. This is not because there is no demand for their production, whether it is canned, jam or frozen. The state of our economy is in such a disastrous condition that there is no purchasing power to fulfil the demand. It is not caused by any lack of demand. People are not in an economic position to purchase the products of the producer. Everyone is being hurt by present economic policies.

I hope the minister will use his great weight and influence on other members of the cabinet to initiate policies to help the economy and get us out of our self-induced economic slump. In this way there will be greater purchasing power. The production of the farm, forest and other industries will then have a better chance of being marketed.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker the legislation before us is very important. Normally I am very brief in my remarks in the House. However, under the circumstances I wonder whether I might have the privilege of calling it four o'clock and contributing to the debate at a later time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, notices of motions.

Environmental Pollution

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions through what are described as usual channels. I think there might be a disposition on the part of hon. members to proceed to motion No. 23 which stands on the Order Paper. The preceding ones will stand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And retain their position.

Mr. Francis: And retain their position, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that all motions preceding No. 23 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED SETTING UP OF AGENCY TO DETERMINE DEGREE OF ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION AND ITS EFFECTS UPON HUMANS, ETC.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpèque) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider setting up, in co-operation with the provinces, an institute of human environmental studies to determine among other matters (a) the degree of air, soil, water and noise pollution the human species can tolerate without serious effects on physical and mental health (b) the type of environment which stimulates the most desirable qualities of physical and mental health in the human species (c) the type of national development which would give satisfactory environment to the greatest possible number of Canadians, and (d) the minimum of modifications to the present-day indiscriminate and largely unplanned growth of our metropolitan areas necessary to put within reach of the inhabitants of these areas a quality of environment which would provide (i) adequate housing (ii) adequate recreational facilities, including parkland, and (iii) adequate social infrastructure such as transportation, education, hospital and recreational facilities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to initiate this one-hour debate on a very important general subject. I do so because I believe the general subject is of immense importance with regard to the type of environment in which future generations of Canadians will live. This is a subject which has application not only to Canada but to other parts of the world.

I am one who believes that a representative of the people at any level of government has the heavy responsibility of doing his share to ensure that the inheritance this generation hands on to future generations of Canadians is the best possible, not only in terms of material things but in terms of spiritual, moral and cultural values. It is well to ask what kind of heritage this generation is about to pass on to future generations of Canadians. I think I can do no better than quote briefly from the opening remarks made at the opening of the federal-provincial conference on housing and urban development in 1967 by the Prime Minister of that day. Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson said this:

> The organization, structure and amenities of our cities already have far-reaching implications affecting the opportunity of Canadians to enjoy a good life.
>
> The need to improve access for the individual and the family to this opportunity in our urban environment has become one of the most urgent challenges confronting every level of government in this country.
> The broad facts and forecasts about urban growth are well known to all of us.
>
> Almost three-quarters of our population now live in cities and towns.
>
> By 1980 nearly two-thirds of all Canadians will live in 29 major urban communities; one-third will live in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver.
> At least 500,000 acres of new land, including much of our best farm land, will be needed to accommodate the physical expansion of these 29 urban centres by 1980; three or four times that much if we don't make more efficient use of land in the future.

This, briefly, is a forecast of what is to happen with regard to urbanization in Canada during the present decade. I do not believe it is necessary for Canadians to sit by and allow these things to take place in an unplanned and unorganized fashion. After all, cities were invented thousands of years ago because of the conditions of those days. They obviously offered an advantage as far as communication was concerned when communication was by word of mouth or writing only. Transportation was by muscle power only. So a city in those days had an advantage as compared with dispersed settlements. Then there was the matter of defence—one could be relatively safe inside the walls of a city in those days.

All these considerations are now on the debit side of the ledger. Large cities complicate the process of transportation. Today, instantaneous communication can be established with any area, no matter how remote it might be. I had the experience of sitting in my own living-room and watching a man set foot on the moon, and I live in a relatively remote part of Canada—indeed, it is so remote that 50 years ago it took a whole day before the majority of the local inhabitants were informed that the first world war had ended. This illustrates the dramatic change which has come about in communications during a relatively short time.

Urbanization on the scale presently contemplated ignores the fact that man is part of the balance of nature. Very high concentrations of human beings give off pollutants, and in a modern civilization the amount of pollutants given off is larger per capita than it used to be. The amount of pollutants given off is so high and in such concentration that it cannot be assimilated or purified by the processes of nature. Water, soil and air pollution result, to say nothing of pollution by noise. Many of our unplanned, rapidly growing cities are, if you will pardon the malodorous pun, committing "sewercide."

I believe there is an optimum size for cities. I do not know what it is, but I have the notion than many of our larger Canadian cities have probably passed that size already. For a city to boast that it is the most rapidly growing unplanned community in the world is like someone saying he has the fastest growing cancer in town. It is nothing to be proud of, in my judgment. The time has come when we should be astute enough to recognize that size is not a measure of quality, that because a thing is big it does not necessarily follow that it is better. The dinosaurs found that out, and they are now extinct.

Some of our cities are already collapsing under their own weight, from an economic and administrative point of view. The cost of establishing such necessary facilities as schools is now so high as to be almost unbearable, with the result that the provinces have to subsidize the cities and the federal government has, in turn, to subsidize the provinces. People living in smaller communities and in rural areas are in fact subsidizing those who live in the larger urban areas.

A great deal of work needs to be done to establish not only the optimum size of urban communities but also the best environment for people to live in. It does not follow that the best environment for people is the most comfortable one. If this were so, one would have to conclude that animals in a zoo were the happiest: after all, they have the equivalent of three square meals a day and all sorts of security. But anyone who knows anything about zoology realizes that animals are best in their natural environment. Environment does, of course, affect human beings as well, and we may be totally unaware of some of these effects.

I believe we are not fully aware of all the effects overcrowding and stress have on human beings, either from a psychological or from a physiological point of view. There is statistical evidence, in growing amounts, which would seem to indicate there is an effect. For example, the impact of crime seems to be highest in urban centres. Drug use seems to be highest in urban centres. We seem to have the highest rate of emotional instability in urban centres, especially where they contain slums and poor environments; and we have the reasoned phenomenon of riots, protests and urban guerrillas. Indeed, it could be argued that civilizations of the past collapsed after they became urbanized to an extreme extent.

What has to be done about this is an important question. Cities are the creatures of the provinces, but if we become a highly urbanized country this will be a federal problem, as it is now. There is divided jurisdiction and, of course, this complicates the matter. I believe that urgent, joint action is required in this matter. I recognize at once that at the federal-provincial conference on housing and urban development in December 1967, the Prime Minister of that day made the following suggestion:

> Before we can make any real progress toward an improvement in our urban environment, we must first improve the planning of that environment.
> The need for such improved planning has already been widely recognized.
> To help meet this need, I would like to propose the establishment, jointly by the federal and provincial governments of a council on housing and urban development whose functions, generally, would be to gather and publish comprehensive, objective, and regular assessments of housing and urban development needs across the country; to suggest priorities of need and plans to meet them.

The federal government is prepared to participate at once in the establishment and maintenance of such a continuing council.

As I envisage it, the council would comprise members drawn from a broad range of skills and experience in this field and appointed in a manner agreed to by the provincial and federal governments.

As far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, nothing came of that suggestion, although I think it is one of the few good ideas the previous Prime Minister had. I think it deserved a better fate than it has had. We might, perhaps, turn for guidance to things that are being done in other countries. In France, for example, just recently their Prime Minister issued, in the official bulletin, a decree establishing an environmental committee. This committee will be dealing with problems of improvement of living space, crowding, pollution and nuisances of all kinds, management of the landscape and, in general, all the positive and negative elements involved with man and his environment.

I read also that the University of Quebec has set up the Institut National de la Recherche Scientifique. The University of Quebec has announced the establishment of the Centre de Recherches Urbaines et Regionales. The centre will focus on the problems of spatial, economic, social and political reorganizations caused by increasing urbanization, and on the search for solutions. The creation of this is very close to the basic idea contained in my resolution. I commend the University of Quebec for setting this up and suggest that the government should carefully study the possibility of giving a grant to that institution to help in its research.

Certainly we have to find out many presently unknown facts. What is the best environment and how can it be achieved, if it is within our means! What is the best design for an environment which will minimize pollution and minimize the tremendous wasted effort that Canadians put forth every day of the problem of getting to their jobs from their homes in our urban centres? What are the effects of stress? How can we provide most efficiently, and at the most reasonable cost, the social infrastructure that is needed for the good life—schools, parks, churches and everything that goes to make a well-rounded and balanced life? How do we provide recreation and even solitude for millions of Canadians? There are forces that cause crowding. People seem to crowd into our large cities in droves. The larger the city, the more they crowd in, like lemmings going over the cliff. They do not know why they do this. I do not believe they do this by choice but because of economic forces.

I believe in free enterprise and I am a free enterpriser, but I do not believe in unrestricted and perhaps unwarranted licence to free enterprise to haphazardly and unthinkingly determine by accident the structure of our country's future. I believe that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. I do not think it is good enough for business to determine where it is to be located, creating primary jobs and also creating additional jobs by the multiplier effect of service employment in an area simply on the basis of a balance-sheet of that particular company as related to where the greatest market will be.

I believe that a method must be found to relate the location of primary employment to where it would serve the best general interest of the country. I do not think it is good enough for business to locate in certain places without having any requirement to give consideration to the problems that location creates in the way of pollution of air, water and soil, or any consideration to where workers will live, the cost of the land where they will live, how they are to be transported from their jobs to their homes, what level of government, at what cost, will provide new schools, churches, parks, roads, sewage disposal, and so on.

Business should not be allowed to locate without any consideration to the tax burden involved. I believe a tax structure could be adjusted to reflect the total burden of governments at all levels which the presence of any business which provides employment would create. If this were done, and if this relationship between the problems were created and the location reflected in the tax structure, I think the population increase would be attracted to areas of our country where its presence would be an asset and not a liability in the over-all sense. This would help us create a country which we can hand on with pride to future generations.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that I rise not to kill the motion but to praise it and the hon. member who brought it to the attention of the House this afternoon. On first reading the motion now before us one may be led to believe that this is a wonderful new proposition the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) has put before the House. As he carefully pointed out, such a proposition was made years ago.

I think all hon. members will recognize that the various components of a proposed institute of human environmental studies already exists, but in a somewhat disorganized way at this stage. By that I mean we already have a hard core of expertise, research facilities and probably enough accumulated data to launch such an institute to incorporate these various elements under one roof, so to speak. What has been wrong up to now is the lack of organization and orientation of policies, standards, aims and the confusion over the sometimes abundance of methods to attain our goals. We have the talent and the potential. What has been lacking until very recently has been a sense of direction. Finally, we seem to know what we want and seem to be prepared to pay the price.

I am pleased to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Malpeque. Once again I should like to congratulate him very sincerely for his excellent presentation. Among matters contained in the hon. member's motion which are of particular concern to me, and I am sure to other hon. members, is that of the government considering setting up, in co-operation with the provinces, an institute of human environmental studies. The proposed activities of this institute would relate to tolerance levels and the effect on the general well-being of the human species. I take this to refer to all humans, but to Canadians in particular, and to air, soil, water and noise pollution in our environment.

First, I should like to deal briefly with the subject of pollution control agencies and the responsibilities and efforts of my government in the all-out fight against pollution of our environment. The hon. member for Malpeque will recall that the need for urgent, assertive federal action was outlined in the Speech from the Throne on October 9, 1970. It proposed the establishment of a new department of the environment which would be responsible for the principal government activities relation to environmental quality in general and pollution in particular.

I might add that legislation was introduced in this House before Christmas to provide for the establishment of this new department which would have the principal tools with which to lead the fight against pollution of all kinds and to help co-ordinate the efforts of others. At or about the same time, the Science Council of Canada presented its ninth report which it aptly entitled "This Land is Their Land". In the introduction of the report we find this passage:

> Fish and wildlife are important in Canada's future. As resources of economic value, they will contribute significantly to the national income of Canada. As vertebrate animals, they are man's closest biological relatives, which brings a feeling of kinship and affection for them. As barometers of environment, they will reflect the virtues and evils of good and bad management of air, land and water resources. The interdependence of human and animal populations and the mutual need for appropriately rewarding places to carry on their daily lives require consideration of fish and wildlife populations in the context of the environment aspired to by mankind. Thus, for economic, social and aesthetic reasons, the protection and enhancement of fish and wildlife are synonymous with the development of our environment.
> In this spirit, a stable and healthy environment of high ecological quality, maintained over the long term, should be defined as a new national goal.

Co-operation with our provincial governments is essential to effectively carry out the fight against pollution of our environment under the responsibility of the new department and for the enhancement of our quality of life in general. This fight against pollution is far beyond the capacity of one minister and his department. It cannot even be effectively waged by the federal government alone, by provinces individually or even just by Canada: the fight must be waged by all departments of all governments and all people of all nations. In setting up this new department the government is determined to seek and obtain the present and future co-operation of all provincial departments and agencies concerned with pollution and the quality of life in general. There are actually too many pollution control agencies working independently of each other at the present time. Sometimes their individual goals and standards vary too much.

The necessity of dealing with many independent agencies can lead to conflict and confusion. The setting up of an institute of human environmental studies, therefore, would add to the confusion involved in dealing with more agencies. In addition, one must remember that the responsibility in respect of the enhancement of the quality of our environment is a responsibility of the government and not of a separate institute. However, in co-ordinating the efforts of government in pollution control there may be a need for a national environmental council which would look at the international as well as the national scene. Such a council could anticipate problems of a technical nature and warn us against unnecessary trade-offs between cost-cutting industry on the one hand and the protection of all kinds of life on the other.

This government already has the National Economic Council which tells us what the economic trends are. It suggests broad policies to deal with these trends. A national environmental council, looking with particular concern at our living resources, could do likewise. Furthermore, the following was specifically recommended by the Science Council of Canada in its October Report:

> The achievement of specific goals in fisheries and wildlife is completely dependent on the existence of national goals which reflect a strong component of environmental awareness. In large measure, all other aspects of fisheries and wildlife science are subordinate to this central theme. In consequence, a major step in planning for the future would be the creation of a non-political organization sponsored by the government which would have, as its basic role, the provision to the public of facts about their environment, upon which they may base adequate value judgments.
> The cost of sacrificing even immediate material welfare for a quality environment may not be high, but if it is, Canadians deserve to have the facts and the chance to make their choice.
> The structure of the organization is a prerogative of the government; however, an independent Crown corporation, with a directorate representative of environmental interests and a small professional staff, is suggested. A suitable name for such an organization might be the Environmental Council of Canada.

• (4:30 p.m.)

At the constitutional conference held on September 14 and 15 of 1970, the subject of environmental management was considered and the problem of pollution of our environment was identified as one of the most pressing and serious issues facing the people and governments of Canada today, and one that will assume increasing dimensions in the future. It was made clear by the first ministers during these constitutional discussions on the problems of environmental management that the federal and provincial governments would continue to act co-operatively and to implement co-ordinated programs of environmental management under the present constitutional arrangements.

In addition, the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers agreed that the development of common approaches to environmental management depends on good communication and a substantial body of common ground understanding. It is important that in addition to an intergovernmental forum there should be an interchange of ideas among senior personnel of all governments. It was recommended that the council make arrangements for a working conference for the purpose of obtaining a full-scale exploration of problems of the environment, to determine the components, the alternatives available and their implications. With all the federal activity in human environmental studies and the pollution control of our environment, in co-operation with provincial activity, the picture seems promising. The tolerance levels of pollution and its effects on the general well-being of humans is naturally included in this activity.

I would like now to speak briefly on the various types of pollution in our environment and outline government activities in dealing with them. These activities are indirectly aimed at detecting human tolerance levels of pollution that will not seriously affect their physical and mental health and, at the same time, obtaining the type of environment to stimulate physical as well as mental health. Hon. members know that the government has been active and will continue to be active in investigating air pollution. The government is already drafting legislation for a clean air bill that Parliament will be asked to consider in the current session. My minister will again consult with provincial authorities on this very matter next week. Discussions have been and will continue to be held with the provinces on the matter of air pollution, and our technical experts are working on regulations related to the control of atmospheric pollution. The question of air pollution will be one of my minister's major concerns in his responsibilities for the environment. Much research and monitoring is being done by our Department of Agriculture, our Department of National Health and Welfare and other government agencies on soil pollution, that is, the determination of pesticide residues, and so on, in soils.

The government, as well, is doing much in the field of water pollution abatement. National effluent standards are being developed at the present time which will deal in specific terms with pollutants in the effluent of any industry. These standards will be part of the amended Fisheries Act which was passed by Parliament during the last session. Development of these strict national standards that all industry, both new and existing plants, will have to meet will result in a cleaner and better environment.

Under the provision of the Canada Water Act, and in agreement with the province in question, an area could be designated as a water quality management area. Pollution of waters in such a designated area would be punishable by a fine up to $5,000 for each offence. Each day this pollution continued, it would be regarded as a separate offence. Under the provisions, no industry, new or old, could afford not to have pollution abatement facilities that are the most up-to-date that modern technology can provide.

The problem of noise pollution, which is also referred to in the hon. member's motion, as it affects the physical and mental health of humans as well as other species is receiving much more attention as each day passes. The federal Department of Transport has much to do with the control of noise abatement regulations with regard to commercial transportation, that is, noise abatement regulations at commercial airports, for example. Many municipalities, cities and towns in our provinces have strict regulations concerning excessive noise pollution. In addition, research is being carried out to determine the degree of noise that the human eardrum can withstand without damage.

In the all-out fight against pollution in order to preserve and enhance the quality of our environment, we must clearly identify the various pollutants to be able to develop the expertise to deal with them effectively. I would like to refer once more to the 1970 report of the Science Council of Canada. The conclusion of that report has some sense of urgency. It reads as follows:

> High priority should be given to the formation of an environmental council of Canada. It would give immediate tangible evidence that a growing public concern was being recognized in government. It would ensure an early start on assessment of environmental problems before they become a major national backache.

In conclusion, I would like to remind all hon. members of the government's awareness of and concern for the necessity of providing the best possible environment for all the men, women and children of Canada. I know that my minister believes that shaping our environment is the biggest challenge we face in the seventies. I am sure that all hon. members share his concern.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on the interesting motion which the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) has placed before the House. I say at the outset that I endorse the idea of setting up an institute of human environmental studies. I think such a body is vitally needed in this day and age in our fight against the over-all pollution problem facing not only this nation but every nation in the world. I certainly endorse the principle of this motion.

I feel there is urgent need today for adequate research into the effects of environmental pollution on the health and well-being of the human species. Studies along the lines suggested by the motion are preventive in nature. They would be of tremendous value both in the treatment of those who suffer ill-health through avoidable environmental problems and also in the setting of standards in every field so that our citizens would not be subject to health hazards from these avoidable environmental problems.

To date, environmental problems have been caused primarily because this type of pollution has been almost totally ignored in the planning and exploitation of our resources and in the industrial development which has sprung up without adequate controls being placed upon it. Today, despite the urgency of the pollution problems in the world environment, we still find that most countries, including our own, are ignoring many of the basic pollution problems facing them.

Only yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) tabled a report dealing with the grave pollution problem of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. We find that these pollution problems have been caused because for the past 60 or 70 years pollution has been ignored by the nation, not because we have not had regulations in our laws and treaties but because the regulations have not been observed. Only yesterday we talked about Lake Erie, which comes under the boundary waters treaty of 1909, in which it is clearly set out that neither Canada nor the U.S. are to pollute the Great Lakes' system. It is a rather sad commentary on the present and past governments that legislation affecting our environment has been allowed to lie dormant on the statute books, with no action being taken by the United States or Canada to try to end pollution problems. I wish to point out to hon. members that we have a host of legislation on our statute books—as does our neighbour across the forty-ninth parallel—under which, if action had been taken, we would not be facing the pollution problems we are talking about this afternoon.

The motion is extremely wide in scope, Mr. Speaker, and I intend to deal only with one or two aspects of it. I do not intend to talk it out. I hope we will be able to have a vote on it this afternoon and that it will pass, so we may set up an institute of human environmental studies. I believe that one of the keys to the solution of pollution problems has to do with population growth. This is something that should be rather simple for nations to understand, yet we have ignored population growth control because it is a question which might upset groups of people politically. If over the next 30 years we are able to cut pollution in half, but the population of the world doubles, we will end up having just as much pollution in the world as we have now. It seems to me that governments are not paying attention to this matter, outside the efforts of the United Nations.

We must sit down, study, determine and chart the paths that we feel this and other countries should travel. There is another aspect to this population growth matter. If the population of the world doubles within the next 30 years, the need for resources will also double. Then we get down to the basic problem of resource planning. Mr. Speaker, what has been done by the government of Canada and by the governments of other countries in the field of resource planning?

We have done precious little planning in Canada. People who have spent much time studying the problem have indicated that if all the resources of the world could be dug up and used within the next few years, the present population of the world would never reach the living standards that we Canadians presently enjoy. That is a disturbing aspect of the over-all picture so far as resources and pollution are concerned.

Dealing with the question of raw materials, we have not yet made a survey to determine how much iron ore Canada will need in the year 2000, and how much of the various other types of minerals we will require for domestic use. Government departments have not yet determined how much of the raw material we have already taken from the earth and turned into manufactured goods can be re-used and recycled. All this is part of the pollution problem. The recycling of minerals and other materials which we have used once, and which can be used again, is something that would help combat pollution. Governments, industries and individuals should examine this matter. I suggest it will only be a matter of time before we are forced to undertake a tremendous amount of re-use and recycling of our resources, resources which the nations of the world are presently wasting. I have been told that we would not need another pulp mill in Canada for a number of years if we re-used the paper and paper products which we currently waste. We should be researching and taking action along these lines in order to find out just what we can do to cut down pollution which arises, for example, when we get rid of paper by burning it.

There are two or three more points I should like to speak about briefly before sitting down. We are talking about the pollution difficulties facing Canada. The Parliamentary Secretary has just spoken, and I enjoyed his speech very much. He is to be involved with a new department relating to the environment. Although that will be a step forward, I do not think it goes far enough; I do not think the responsibilities of the department will be wide enough to handle all the pollution problems of Canada. He indicated the steps the government was taking, but here we are in January, 1971, and land use regulations have not been introduced. Half of our country consists of the northern part of Canada where a great deal of oil and mineral exploration is going on. Today there are no land use regulations laid down by the government for the direction and control of development in this vast area. Is that modern thinking? No. This is stupidity of the worst kind.

Indications have come from the minister that we are to see such land use regulations next month. Nevertheless, for years this type of development has been going on unregulated and we now find that vast areas of our great north are being destroyed. The people of Canada for hundreds of years to come will pay the penalty because governments of the 1970s did not have the vision to lay down these regulations and make certain that industries and organizations developing and exploiting our resources did so under conditions which are considered safe. Great disasters have occurred in the north. Recently a most disastrous fire broke out which is still burning. Over 4 billion cubic feet of gas have been destroyed. In the drilling of the well concerned, the regulations were broken. We need land use regulations and we need many of them.

Other members have mentioned noise pollution. I have spoken briefly on the need for research into the sonic boom from supersonic transport aircraft. The minister has indicated that such research projects are under way. This is all to the good. As this motion very ably points out, noise as well as other types of air pollution produces a detrimental effect on the quality of the lives of Canadian citizens and the citizens of other countries. The motion asks the government to set up the new department already mentioned.

I urge members of this House to vote in favour of the motion this afternoon and, if necessary, to refer it to the appropriate committee in order to define the type of environmental agency which should be set up. Our constituents have entrusted us with the task of coming to this House of Commons and dealing with pollution. Not only must we try to save the lives of the people of our own country but we must help in the fight against pollution which threatens the existence of mankind. I urge hon. members to vote for the motion we are debating.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, unhappily, because of the manner in which members are recognized in this House, it is not always possible for one to speak until it is almost time to adjourn. The hon. member who preceded me made much of the fact that he did not want to talk this motion out, and then talked for 17 minutes. Other members who wish to speak, therefore have only two or three minutes left in which to put their point of view forward.

Mr. Skoberg: Why not refer the subject matter of this motion to a committee?

Mr. Cullen: I feel that not only is this motion interesting, as the previous speaker said, but that it is too all-encompassing. I congratulate the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) for introducing the motion. It is the particular responsibility of Members of Parliament and those members who sit here in a governing capacity to keep the spotlight of publicity on this problem which pervades every area of Canada, whether it be on the land, the sea, our inland waters or our air. When there are no opportunities for members to speak about pollution, I think they are under an obligation to do what is obvious and bootleg their comments, so to speak, wherever it is possible for them to do so, into other speeches they might make, in order to keep this area of concern very much before the public and the press.

I am not certain that we need an environmental study at this time. My reason for being somewhat loth to support the motion at this time is that governments and industries may use such study as one more excuse for failing to take action. There is no point in a study being made unless we can convince governments, industry and the Canadian citizen that this is simply a study, that everyone has a responsibility in this matter, that the point of a study of the environment is really to suggest standards and that, once set, we should try to meet those standards. Frankly, I wonder whether we need one more study or whether we need more action.

The federal government has long since recognized its responsibility in the field of pollution, and now there are five ministries responsible for dealing with the matter. I wish we could have a special minister whose responsibility would be the control of pollution. I would hope that polluters in Canada would look upon that minister as the sinister minister. I hope they would be afraid of such a minister. I hope that they would know that the minister and his officials were looking over their shoulders.

The minister and his officials, as I say, will be responsible for the control of the environment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At present the cabinet is full of sinister ministers.

Mr. Cullen: If I may be parochial for a moment, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in the Sarnia-Lambton area we have the Lambton Industrial Society, an organization set up by industries to look into the pollution problems of the area and to try to work with industry in the solution of pollution difficulties. In the area we have pollution alerts. The society presents films to the general public to make people aware of where the problems lie. Those films show what industry is doing. Our concern has reached the stage that valuable advertising time, either during or immediately after "Hockey Night in Canada", is used by one industry to point out what steps it is taking to control pollution in its area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if any member on the government side can tell the House whether we will be considering the budget on Monday as well as on Tuesday, so that those of us who wish to make speeches can go to our retreats during the weekend and prepare them. If the government will not listen to that reasonable request, perhaps we might be told what we are to consider on Tuesday.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there is a definite agreement for the budget to be considered on Monday. It is also my understanding that there will be discussions with the representatives of the various parties on Monday as to whether that debate is to be continued on Tuesday. Following the budget discussion, I understand there will be a resumption of the order of business previously indicated.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXHIBITION BRANCH DISMISSALS AND DEMOTIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. My motion deals with a matter which I believe the House would like to have referred to the appropriate committee. I have tried to word the motion without incorporating any adjectives or argument in it. It relates to the announcement that some 15 public servants are to be dismissed from the exhibition branch of Information Canada, and another seven or so demoted, despite the fact that these people have obtained world recognition for the job they have done for Canada, their most recent achievements being at Expo '70.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That the proposed dismissal of some 15 public servants, and the proposed demotion of several others, by the exhibition branch of Information Canada, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates for consideration and report, and that the said committee be asked to make its report to the House not later than February 1, 1971.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The reason for suggesting that committee, Mr. Speaker, is that it is the committee to which matters relating to Information Canada and also matters relating to the Treasury Board are usually referred. We suggest no debate, and we hope the House will accept the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

23786—16½

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous agreement and therefore the motion cannot be put.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DARTMOUTH PUBLIC WHARF

Question No. 126—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Who owns the ships now tied up at the condemned Dartmouth Public Wharf?

2. If privately owned, what revenues are being received by the government and how long will they be there?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. The Dartmouth Public Wharf is restricted to the berthing of lay-by vessels due to its surface. Each of the following companies has one vessel using the facility; Shaw Steamships Co., Atlantic Salvage Co., and J. P. Porter.

2. Shaw Steamship Co. are paying $50 a month as per Board Minute. Vessel is there all year except during seal hunting season. Atlantic Salvage Co.: Vessel to be sold or dismantled and will remain alongside awaiting such action at $50 a month. J. P. Porter: This is an old ferry boat, previously used in P.E.I.; it has left this wharf and is currently being used in the filling operation at Pier "C". When this work is completed the vessel will return to Dartmouth to be converted into a barge. Charges are $300 per month, due to larger size of vessel. During the utilization of this vessel at Pier "C" no charges are made because it is then considered as part of the contractor's equipment.

STUDY OF AVIATION TRAFFIC IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Question No. 231—Mr. McCleave:

1. Has a study by Professor A. M. Stevens and F. R. Wilson been completed of aviation traffic in Atlantic Canada, as commissioned by the Department of Transport and, if so, what are its recommendations?

2. What is the cost of the study?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. The final report is being reviewed by the Department and it is hoped it will be possible to make a decision as to its disposition before the end of January.

2. The total cost of the study was $57,000.

Questions

INDIAN ASSOCIATION OF ALBERTA PRESENTATION "RED PAPER"

Question No. 260—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development make any arrangements to print or otherwise reproduce the transcript of any proceedings relating to a presentation made in 1970 by the Indian association of Alberta in conjunction with the National Indian Brotherhood which presentation was commonly referred to as a "Red Paper" and, if so, how many copies were printed or reproduced and at what cost?

2. In what manner, and to whom, by quantity, were the said copies distributed?

3. Are any copies in the possession of the Department and, if so, how many and at which locations?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes. Twenty five thousand copies at a cost of $3,881.02.

2. No copies were distributed. The Department complied with a request from the Indian Association of Alberta that distribution be withheld.

3. The Department has in its possession only file copies at departmental headquarters.

TRANSPORTATION CONSULTANTS—R. DIXON SPEAS ASSOCIATES OF CANADA LIMITED

Question No. 385—Mr. Robinson:

1 What is the job of the special consultants R. Dixon Speas Associates of Canada Limited?

2. How long will this firm be engaged at the Montreal International Airport?

3. What studies and projects is the firm presently engaged in by the Department of Transport and what is the estimated cost of each?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. R. Dixon Speas Associates of Canada, Limited, is a company of transportation consultants, specializing in aviation matters. Since reference was made to the Montreal International Airport, it should be noted that the parent firm, R. Dixon Speas Associates, Incorporated, Manhasset, New York was engaged in planning work for the new Montreal International Airport (Ste Scholastique). They too are aviation consultants and are one of the very few companies in the world which specializes in runway and taxiway capacity analysis.

2. R. Dixon Speas Associates, Incorporated, New York, conducted two studies at the request of the planning team developing the new Montreal International Airport (Ste. Scholastique). In their first contract, they were asked to analyze and evaluate several of the proposed runway designs. This contract ran from early Spring 1969 to August 1969. The second contract, an analysis of the new airport taxiway system, followed immediately afterward and ran until January 1970.

3. Neither R. Dixon Speas Associates, Incorporated, New York, nor R. Dixon Speas Associates of Canada Limited are currently engaged in any projects for this Ministry.

[Mr. Duquet.]

CONVENTION CONCERNING "CAUTIO JUDICATUM SOLVI"

Question No. 422—Mr. Fortin:

1. Has Canada signed agreements concerning cautio judicatum solvi?

2. Does Canada intend being a party to the March 1, 1964 Convention of The Hague Conference concerning cautio judicatum solvi?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. There is no record of signature by Canada to conventions concerning cautio judicatum solvi.

2. Canada only acceded to the Statute of The Hague Conference on Private International Law on October 7th, 1968. Our participation in that organization is, therefore, of very short standing. One aspect of Canada's participation in The Hague Conference will involve consideration of past conventions, drafted by that organization, having legal implications relevant to Canada. Among these Conventions is the Convention on Civil Procedure of March 1st, 1954, which, in Part III, Articles 17-19, is concerned with cautio judicatum solvi.

POLLUTION EMISSIONS FROM ENGINES OF LOCKHEED 1011 AIRCRAFT

Question No. 500—Mr. Anderson:

1. Has the Department of Transport conducted any test or will it conduct any test on the pollutant emissions from the engines of the Lockheed 1011 which Air Canada intends to put into service soon?

2. What pollution emission criteria were applied by Air Canada in evaluating this aircraft?

3. What pollution emission criteria will be applied by the Department of Transport when evaluating this aircraft for commercial use in Canada?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The Department of Transport has not conducted any test on the pollutant emissions from the engines. Tests to the satisfaction of the Department may be required to be made by the manufacturer or operator if standards being developed by the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) prove to be unacceptable to the Department.

2. During the initial Air Canada evaluation of the RB 211-22 engine, Rolls-Royce Ltd. guaranteed a smoke visibility index number (at that time a Von Brand index No. 27) which corresponds to an engine exhaust which is invisible to the naked eye. Subsequently, the Ringelmann scale has been used and Rolls-Royce Ltd. has stated that the inservice aircraft will meet, or better, the smoke concentration related to Ringelmann No. 1, which again corresponds to an invisible exhaust from the engine.

3. The Department anticipates that it will accept the engine emission standards which are being developed by the FAA, as standards to apply to the operators of this aircraft in Canada. Pending the finalization of these standards the Department is taking into account the smoke standard guaranteed by Rolls-Royce Ltd. for certificated engines. This guaranteed standard is likely to be a more stringent standard than can be applied retroactively to all currently operated aircraft without incurring a heavy cost penalty to the industry.

AVERAGE LIFE SPAN

Question No. 510—Mr. Mather: (Supplementary)

By province and territory, what is the average length of life of (a) females (b) males?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: A review of the answer of December 16, 1970 (page 2102 of Hansard) indicates that there may have been ambiguity regarding the interpretation of the term "average length of life". The figures quoted by DBS were for "average age at death" of those who died in 1969, this being their actual average length of life. DBS also routinely calculates various life table functions for the Canadian population and various sub-populations such as provincial and territorial. Two types of life tables are currently being produced: one, referred to as complete, are based on quinquennial censuses and are considered to be official; the other, referred to as abridged are based on population estimates and are prepared for analytical and research purposes. The life expectancy values at birth, sometimes referred to as the "average length of life", shown on the next page, are the latest available and, therefore, originate from abridged life tables. Life expectancy values are theoretical or expected and are based on the assumption that the population structure will not change and that the mortality experience on which the life table is based will remain constant during the life time of the cohort. The "average age at death" and the "life expectancy at birth" (average length of life) will be equal for a population where the births and deaths are equal for any period and where age specific mortality rates remain unchanged. The Canadian population structure and mortality patterns are changing; this is why the "average age at death" and "life expectancy at birth" are different. If it is assumed that the term "average length of life" means life expectancy at birth then the two tables attached show such figures for provinces and territories by sex.

Life Expectancy at Birth By Province, and Sex, 1968

Province	Male	Female
Newfoundland	69.46	74.85
Prince Edward Island	68.25*	77.20*
Nova Scotia	68.55	74.93
New Brunswick	68.36	75.38
Quebec	68.12	74.54
Ontario	69.08	75.96
Manitoba	69.86	76.58
Saskatchewan	70.55	76.89
Alberta	70.51	76.25
British Columbia	69.38	76.07

Life Expectancy at Birth By Territory and Sex, 1964-68

Territory	Male	Female
Yukon	66.32*	74.38*
Northwest Territories	64.45*	66.52*

*Life Tables constructed for areas with populations of less than 100,000 persons are subject to wide fluctuations and considerable error because of the relatively small number of deaths in each age group for each sex; the above life expectancy figures for Prince Edward Island, Yukon and Northwest Territories should therefore be interpreted with caution.

The life expectancy figures for the provinces are based on 1968 mortality experience and June 1, 1968 post-censal population estimates. The life expectancy figures for the territories are based on the 1964-1968 mortality experience and June 1, 1966, Census enumeration of population.

REGULATIONS COVERING FLAMMABILITY OF MATERIALS USED IN AIRCRAFT COMPARTMENTS

Question No. 517—Mr. Anderson:

1. What regulations govern the flammability of fabrics and other materials used for the covering of seats in Canadian registered aircraft?

2. Are all plastics used in the interiors of Canadian registered aircraft required to be non-flammable or fire resistant?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The applicable Canadian regulation for seat coverings in aircraft compartments occupied by either crew or passengers is specified in Part II, Chapter III, Paragraph 3.4.1, of the Department of Transport Engineering and Inspection Manual. For compartments where smoking is permitted the covering of furnishings must be at least flame resistant, (i.e., not susceptible to combustion to the point of propagating a flame after the ignition source is removed). All other compartments must be placarded against smoking. In addition to the foregoing, the following design requirements apply: (a) United States Federal Aviation Regulation 23, Paragraph 853, applicable to aircraft under 12,500 pounds specifies that all covering of furnishings in aircraft compartments must be at least flame resistant if smoking is allowed and flash resistant, (i.e., not susceptible to burning violently when ignited), if placarded against smoking. (b) United States Federal Aviation Regulation 25, Paragraph 853, applicable to aircraft over 12,500 pounds specifies all compartment materials must be self extinguishing after flame removal, i.e., flame resistant. (c) United Kingdom British Civil Air Regulations Section K4-3, Paragraph 6.1.2 for aircraft under 12,500 pounds and Section D4-3, Paragraph 9.2.2, for aircraft over 12,500 pounds requires all compartment materials to be at least flame resistant. The subject of flammability of fabrics has been the subject of discussions in ICAO. When the ICAO standard is finalized it will be adopted by Canada.

2. Plastics used in aircraft interiors for the lining of walls and ceilings, the covering of all upholstery, floor and furnishings are subject to the same design requirements specified in answer to Question 1.

Part II, Chap. III, Para. 3, 4. Smoking in aircraft: 3.4.1 For all civil aircraft certified in Canada, the wall and ceiling linings, covering of all upholstery, floors and furnishings in compartments in which smoking is permitted must be made sufficiently flame-resistant to preclude ignition by cigarettes or matches, and ash trays of the self-contained type which are completely removable must be provided. All other compartments must be placarded against smoking.

JOHN DOYLE—INCOME TAX ASSESSMENT

Question No. 519—Mr. Coates:

1. Has a decision been rendered on the claim by the federal government against John Doyle?

2. What was the total amount of the federal government's claim and for what period of time does the claim cover?

3. If a decision has not as yet been rendered, on what date is a decision anticipated?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): 1. The Exchequer Court of Canada has rendered judgment in respect of Mr. Doyle's appeal from his 1950 assessment and in respect of one of the issues under appeal from his 1954 assessment. The Exchequer Court dismissed both these appeals. Mr. Doyle has now filed appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada from these decisions of the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court has adjourned sine die the hearing of Mr. Doyle's appeal from his 1953 assessment and the hearing of the second issue under appeal from his 1954 assessment.

2. It is public knowledge that a Writ of Extent was issued out of the Exchequer Court of Canada on July 8, 1963 for the sum of $3,410,130.90, and that the years involved in the appeals are 1950, 1953 and 1954. However, the provisions of Section 133 of the Income Tax Act prevent the disclosure of the amount of taxes assessed or owing.

3. It is hoped that the remaining issue can be heard by the Exchequer Court during the Spring and that the appeals to the Supreme Court will be heard during 1971.

GREATER VANCOUVER—RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM

Question No. 527—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to the proposal of the Government of British Columbia that the provincial and federal governments contribute a shared 75% of the costs of a rapid transit system for Greater Vancouver?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No, consideration is not being given to this specific proposal at the present time. The Department of Transport has not received a request regarding this form of rapid transit financing.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—CHANGE IN NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 553—Mr. Robinson:

As a result of the use of computers by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, how many employees have been (a) laid off (b) hired?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As a result of the use of computers, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has not laid off anyone, but since 1966 has hired an additional 28 data processing employees. The additional staff was required to process greatly expanded personalized promotional campaigns and to develop and maintain other computerized systems used in the Department.

SUSPENSION OF DBS PUBLICATION "PRICE INDEX OF COMMODITIES AND SERVICES USED BY FARMERS"

Question No. 555—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to suspend the Dominion Bureau of Statistics Publication of the Canadian Price Index of Commodities and Services used by farmers "until it has been updated to truly reflect the costs of inputs" as recommended by the Task Force group discussing goals?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has suspended publication of current indexes in the series, Price Index Numbers of Commodities and Services Used by Farmers, pending completion of a comprehensive updating of the items, weights of items and the price samples of the index. The revision is expected to be completed early in 1971. In the meantime, current indexes are continuing to be compiled and are provided to users on request only, and in such cases users are advised of the need for the revision.

CANADA'S BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

Question No. 562—Mr. Saltsman:

1. For each year 1955 to 1969, what were the total managerial fees, royalties, etc. (a) receipts (b) payments (c) net balance in Canada's Balance of International Payments?

2. For the same years, what were the total interest and dividend (a) receipts (b) payments (c) net balance in Canada's Balance of International Payments?

3. For the same years, what was the net balance in Canadian managerial fees, royalties, and interest and dividends, as a percentage of Canada's Gross National Product?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: Questions 1, 2 and 3 are answered by the table below:

2. The salary range applicable to Mr. O'Haver is $19,084 to $21,687.

3. Mr. O'Haver is not bilingual.

4. Mr. O'Haver does not have Canadian citizenship.

6. His position has not been identified as specifically requiring a bilingual incumbent.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Question No. 576—Mr. Roy (Timmins):

Has the government given consideration to the effects created by the denial of Canada Pension Plan benefits to individuals who have not and cannot contribute for a minimum of five years to the plan and, if so, will the government (a) allow benefits prorated to contributions under five years (b) return the contributions by those who will not receive benefits?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) and (b) Under the Canada Pension Plan anyone who has made a contribution is eligible for a retirement pension and consequently no minimum period of contributions is required in order to be eligible for a benefit of this kind.

At present a person must have contributed for three years in order to qualify his survivors for benefits. This minimum qualifying period will gradually increase over a period of time.

At present a person must have contributed for five years in order to be eligible for disability benefits. This minimum qualifying period will also increase over a period of time.

When the Canada Pension Plan was being designed, these waiting periods were deemed necessary for actuarial and other reasons. Contributions which are required under the legislation are not refundable.

In developing the White Paper on Income Security the foregoing considerations were reviewed again and it was felt that no changes should be made in them. It might be noted that the great majority of Canadians have now contributed to this plan or its counterpart, the Quebec Pension Plan, for the minimum qualifying periods specified above.

AIR CANADA—BUTTER SERVED ON FLIGHTS

Question No. 627—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Is all the butter served on Air Canada flights produced in Canada?

2. Is the butter bought after tenders are called?

3. What was the quantity of butter purchased by Air Canada during 1969 and 1970?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: In so far as Air Canada is concerned, 1. Canadian butter is specified for all Company flights originating in Canada. Flights originating from foreign countries are provided with locally available butter for logistical and economic reasons.

2. The Company contracts with independent caterers for meals to a defined standard, including the butter specification mentioned in Answer No. 1. The caterers choose which food to purchase, by contract or otherwise, including butter.

3. As it does not purchase directly, Air Canada is unable to reply to this question.

CHANGE OF NAME OF DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS

Question No. 654—Mr. Mather:

Has a decision been reached to change the name of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to include the word "Canada" and, if not, is consideration being given to such a change?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: Bill S-2 respecting statistics of Canada was read in the House a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on December 16, 1970. Section 3 of this Bill, if passed, would change the name of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to Statistics Canada.

EQUIPMENT OF AIRPORTS CONTROLLED BY DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Question No. 581—Mr. Nielsen:

By location, what airports controlled by DOT are equipped with (a) ILS (b) PAR (c) VASIS (d) ADF (e) VOR (f) runway overruns (g) runway grooving?

Return tabled.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the House to question No. 606 which I should like to have answered. In view of the minister's own wish that more information be provided regarding his income stabilization program, perhaps he will look into this matter and answer the question as quickly as possible.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I have made a note of the number and I certainly will look into the matter to see whether the question can be answered expeditiously.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—INTERIM REVISION OF REGULATIONS TO ASSIST THOSE NOW UNABLE TO QUALIFY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the very alarming increase in the number of members of the work force who are having to seek recourse to welfare, for example, in Vancouver the number of single men is double the figure for last year, is the government now prepared to bring in an interim revision of the rules relating to unemployment insurance with a view to reducing the qualifications so that those unable to qualify this winter because of existing rules will be able to get some benefit from the fund?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to welcome the Leader of the Opposition back to the House. This question was asked in his absence and I said at that time that the general subject of unemployment will be debated this afternoon. I expect that the Minister of Labour, who is directly responsible, will take this question into account when he answers.

An hon. Member: You have said nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that we will get some information from the minister.

FORECAST OF 1971 EMPLOYMENT TREND

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the increasing unemployment in the country, for example, at the rate of 17 per cent in the Kelowna district, the minister has now revised his forecast of employment trends in 1971, or is he still predicting a reduction in the seasonal rate of unemployment in this country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the forecast remains the same.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what his forecast is? I ask this question in view of the boast he made during the past year that his forecast with regard to employment and unemployment was out by only a fraction of one per cent. Will the minister tell the House what his forecast is, because he has not told us yet?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that my hon. friend read the budget speech—

Mr. Stanfield: I have read it.

Mr. Benson: —in which I indicated the general outlook for employment this year.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO IMPLEMENT WHITE PAPER RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the revision of the payments and eligibility for unemployment insurance really depends directly on the government's willingness to supply additional funds, and since the government's own white paper suggested that the federal government would assume the additional responsibility if unemployment rose over 4 per cent, may I ask whether the government is prepared at this time to make additional funds available so that the Minister of Labour can put into effect as of January 1 this year the recommendations which were made in the white paper for implementation later in the year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that that course would commend itself to the government. As the hon. member knows, we have been having discussions with the provinces about unemployment insurance as well as about other aspects of social security. We want to act in such a way as commends itself to the provinces as well as to the federal government.

Mr. Baldwin: How about the unemployed?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the government is giving any consideration to emergency measures with respect to the unemployment insurance fund that would not involve the provinces, such as increasing the maximum from $53 a week to $100 a week and extending benefits for those who have already exhausted their eligibility until at least May 1 in order to see them through the winter months?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may have forgotten that we have just increased unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Baldwin: But the government has also increased the number of unemployed.

TORONTO—ACTION TO ELIMINATE DELAYS IN PAYMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question that is supplementary to the first question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I direct it to the Minister of Labour. In view of the lengthy delays that have developed in the payment of unemployment insurance claims in the Toronto area, which has resulted in many of the claimants having to go on civil relief until their payments are sorted out—one case took seven months—is the minister taking steps to see that this regrettable situation is straightened out in the immediate future?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the premise and therefore I cannot answer the last part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hees: Would the minister be good enough to read what has appeared in the daily press almost every day since he went away? He will find out that what I have said is correct.

UNEMPLOYMENT—TORONTO—CREATION OF JOBS THROUGH EROSION AND POLLUTION CONTROL PROJECTS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Has the government been approached by the city of Toronto regarding direct job-creating projects such as erosion and pollution control? If so, is the federal government prepared to extend assistance?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no such approach has been made to me.

Mr. Ryan: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are eight or ten members who wish to ask supplementary questions. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that there is to be a debate on unemployment later this afternoon. I suggest that the question period ought not to be devoted entirely to this very important matter.

CALGARY—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will not preface my question with a premise. May I ask the minister to investigate seriously the situation in Calgary—it is similar to that which is said to exist in Toronto—in order to make sure that unemployment insurance payments, which are paid out of the Winnipeg office because of automation in the department, are made on time to the 20,000 unemployed in the city of Calgary and other places inasmuch as they did not receive their payments in time for Christmas?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): A question posed that way, Mr. Speaker, merits an answer. I will obtain this information from the UIC and report tomorrow.

HALIFAX—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): We welcome the Minister of Labour back to the House to look after the problems of unemployment. Will the minister check with the Halifax office in the Atlantic area to determine the reason for the delays in the payment of unemployment insurance benefits?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is a legitimate one but similar questions were asked about Toronto and Calgary. Perhaps we might stop at Halifax. I do not think that much would be gained by hon. members asking the same question with regard to different centres all across Canada. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a supplementary.

Mr. Gleave: I want to move to another subject, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Before doing so, the Chair might recognize the hon. member for St. John's East.

UNEMPLOYMENT—RECOMMENDATIONS BY MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the special responsibilities that the minister and his department have by statute for the creation of jobs and in view of the special responsibility the minister has taken for unemployment in cyclical areas like Montreal, what recommendation has he made or is he prepared to make to the government to alleviate the immediate problem of unemployment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe I made all the recommendations I thought necessary to the government.

As for those that concern the whole economy, I know they will be under discussion later today.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION—PRODUCTION CONTROLS IN NEW INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of newspaper reports of proposed changes and modifications in the outline of the cereal grains program issued by the minister some time ago, is the minister prepared to make a statement on motions on his present position as a result of his talks and discussions with farm organizations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the position is the same as it was last week. Consultations and discussions are still going on. I have no further statement to make to the House at this stage.

Mr. Gleave: If the minister is not prepared to provide information on that subject, in view of the fact that negotiations toward a new international wheat agreement are commencing today, can he indicate to the House what Canada's stand will be with regard to production controls among the exporting countries?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that it would be very productive to analyse at this stage what our position may be in the course of the negotiations that will be taking place. However, the discussions are likely to deal more with the possibility of a new agreement in all its aspects, including price and supply, rather than with production policies in particular.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): In view of the fact that some news reporters are able to learn more about the grain stabilization program from officials of the minister than members can learn from the minister, will the minister take the House into his confidence and state when he expects to be able to announce government policy on this matter? Also, will he indicate whether the government has made a decision to proceed with a plan?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, no further decision has been made other than what has been made known to the House. As I indicated in answer to the previous question, consideration of the issues is still going on. When we reach further conclusions and make final decisions, they will be announced.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS PROGRAM—DEVELOPMENT OF COMMUNITY PASTURES

Mr. J. S. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question inasmuch as I raised this question about a month ago. In view of the information contained in his pamphlet, will the PFRA program, under which new land will be developed for community pastures, no longer be part of the government policy under the new program? In light of the information contained in his pamphlet, will the new government policy be that the pastures are not going to be opened up?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): My difficulty is that perhaps there was a slight misstatement of what was contained in the original statement. The statement as put out is what we intend to do, what we propose to do.

ARRANGEMENTS BY FARMERS FOR STORAGE BY COMPANIES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the fact that a senior official of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has quoted the minister as saying that farmers could make private deals with grain companies to store some of their grain, without asking the minister to divulge the details of any policy he may be considering, will he inform the House whether it is his intention to introduce legislation that will allow such action to be taken by individual farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The quotation in question even purports to be a second-hand quotation of a quotation. However, a change in relation to elevators and their ability to store grain would not necessarily require legislation; it might be carried out by way of regulation or decisions by the particular bodies. Of course this question will come up as we move to new situations with perhaps more space available in the future than in the past.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize one last supplementary. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

ADEQUACY OF FLOUR MILLING CAPACITY TO MEET POSSIBLE SALES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Will the minister assure the House that sufficient Canadian flour milling capacity is available to produce enough flour to satisfy all possible flour sales to Russia or Cuba?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I think I can give that assurance. I certainly have received no report of any difficulty; there seems to be adequate capacity available.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD POLITICAL AND MILITARY EVENTS IN INDIAN OCEAN AREA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister concerning the Singapore Commonwealth conference. It refers to the reported statement of an aide to the Prime Minister to the effect that Canada "could care less about the Indian Ocean and would not mind if they pulled the plug." Can the minister tell us whether this officer was speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister who at the time was far away from Singapore, and is the Canadian attitude—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member could find some way of asking his question which would be acceptable procedurally. He knows quite well that he cannot ask the Acting Prime Minister or the government whether or not a statement made by an official outside the House represents government policy. The question might be asked in another way.

Mr. Macquarrie: I put my question in that form because the Prime Minister was absent from Singapore and the official I mentioned was there. Can the minister advise whether it is in fact the Canadian attitude toward political and military events in the Indian Ocean area that "we could not care less"?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Quite the contrary. When I saw this report I sent a cable and I was assured that whoever it was who spoke was not speaking on behalf of the Canadian government.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. If that is the case, does the Acting Prime Minister not feel it would have been a good thing for the Prime Minister to have done his job in Singapore instead of going off skindiving—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELATIONSHIP OF INCREASE IN CRIME TO UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker, whom I welcome back at this time when the government needs all the strength it can muster. In light of the fact that statistical information shows that as high a proportion as two-thirds of those in penitentiaries were unemployed at the time they committed their crimes, has the minister attempted or will he attempt to establish an inquiry into whether or not the recent sharp increase in crime is connected with the present high level of unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this is a matter which the Minister of Justice should be given an opportunity to study.

MEASURES TO RESTRICT ACQUISITION OF WEAPONS BY CRIMINALS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Justice; the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs took it as notice last week. In view of the fact that our laws to control possession of handguns and concealed weapons have not prevented criminals and so-called urban guerrillas from acquiring whole arsenals of deadly weapons, is the government giving consideration to taking further restrictive measures to curb the proliferation of weaponry which is seriously threatening our society?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Last year I met with officials of the Department of the Solicitor General, of my own department and of other agencies of government and asked that a review be made of the current situation, particularly the definition of restricted and prohibited weapons. I would think the new Solicitor General might well wish to report to the House at a future date.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Justice say that he looked at this last year because I asked a question at that time. Can he now assure the House that serious action is being taken, particularly in Montreal where the weapons were sold by war surplus stores to the criminals who did the kidnapping and may have committed the murder?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the full range of that premise but I certainly agree with the hon. member that the question is serious enough for a thorough review.

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—RESPONSE BY U.S. GOVERNMENT TO REQUEST THAT AGREEMENT BE CANCELLED

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is not in the House today following his conference in Washington. May I therefore direct my question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Can the minister indicate to the House what was the response made by the U.S. government to the minister's request that the agreement under which 6,000 acres of the Skagit valley in British Columbia would be flooded be torn up?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The question is taken as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, since the question is being taken as notice, perhaps I can ask the minister to assure the House when he replies to my question that the Canadian government will not permit flooding of the Skagit River valley to take place under any circumstances.

INFORMATION CANADA

DISMISSAL AND DEMOTION OF PERSONNEL—BUDGET PRIORITIES—FEDERAL IDENTITY PROGRAM

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Information Canada. It has some reference to unemployment but generally to the principles of his department. In light of the announced dismissal and demotion of employees of Information Canada, will the minister be clarifying the priorities for Information Canada's budget in regard to personnel in order to offset the paralysing problem of morale in that department, let alone another statement on the Logo incident, not only in regard to the possible cost of a suit but also as to how much it will cost the government of Canada to implement this symbol—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: —and I think they had better use black, the way things are going.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister should not attempt to reply to that question now but he might make a statement in due course on the question put by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I hope my reply will not be as confused as the question. There is no difficulty about implementing the announcement made some time ago with respect to the federal identity program; it is proceeding satisfactorily. As far as any staff reductions are concerned, it is the hon. member, among others, who has indicated that one of the purposes of Information Canada should be to bring about some tightening of personnel in this whole field of information. I hope we will be able to do that without the loss of very valuable people, and that any people from the Exhibition Commission who cannot be accommodated within Treasury Board's requirements for its operations will find employment elsewhere in the Public Service. None of these people has lost employment.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question. The only reason I was a little confused was the confused antics and policies of this fledgling embryonic department and its embryonic minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask his supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to make sure that the minister understood the difference between "embryonic" and "imbecillic".

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member ask his supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister make a statement on motions this week clarifying some of the confusing policies and practices of Information Canada which, while we all have doubts about the efficacy of the program, now that it has been launched we would like to see get off the pad?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern and would be glad to discuss it with him any time. Other hon. members have not indicated that they are experiencing the same confusion he is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

FURTHER REVIEW BY PUBLIC OF TAX REFORM PROPOSALS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the dampening effect that his original white paper had on the entire economy, and in light of the many requests being made for a review of the new proposed program that is being redrafted, will the people of Canada again have an opportunity to review the minister's latest proposals once they are redrafted?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question is rather confusing. First of all, new proposals are not being drafted. What is being drafted is a bill to be introduced through a budget in the House of Commons. Not only will the people of Canada have an opportunity to discuss it but, more importantly, the bill must be discussed clause by clause in the House of Commons.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister whether it is the intention to send a committee across the country again to hear representations from the people?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the only reason I can think of for that suggestion is my hon. friend wanting a trip.

PROPOSED LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES OF CANADIAN ARSENALS, MISSISSAUGA—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF CLOSING OF PLANT

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Acting Prime Minister in view of the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services is not in the House today. In view of the fact that the employees of Canadian Arsenals at Mississauga have been given notice that they will be laid off work within six months due to the decision to close down the plant, thereby resulting in the possibility that 175 to 200 people will become unemployed, could consideration be given to postponing or deferring the closing of this plant, especially in view of the present economic situation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will bring those representations to the attention of the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SINGAPORE COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING SALE OF ARMS BY BRITAIN TO SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. As the survival of the Commonwealth may well be at stake in the debate that will take place this week at Singapore, can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that Canada will remain firm in its opposition to the British sale of arms to South Africa and will make it clear in the forthcoming debate that uncompromising insistence by Britain on its plans may well torpedo the Commonwealth?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there has been no change whatever in the position of the Canadian government. We have not been supplying arms to South Africa and we are opposed to the British government supplying arms. If the hon. member is asking me whether we will leave the Commonwealth if Britain supplies arms to South Africa, I doubt very much whether that kind of threat would be useful.

Mr. Brewin: I did not make the suggestion put forward by the Acting Prime Minister. What I asked him to answer was whether in the debate Canada would make it clear and would state that the Commonwealth is in danger of being torpedoed by the continuance of Britain's plans to sell arms to South Africa?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset of my answer, we have no intention of changing our policy. The Prime Minister made that clear to Mr. Heath when he wrote to him and warned him about the danger of breaking up the Commonwealth. This remains our position.

SALE OF ARMS BY FRANCE TO SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in like fashion to the Acting Prime Minister and also as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada written to Premier Pompidou of France to protest the sale of arms by France to African countries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when this question was put to me the other day I pointed out that France is not a member of the Commonwealth, and that it was in the Commonwealth connection that we wrote to the Prime Minister of Britain. As Secretary of State for External Affairs I have, of course, on behalf of the Canadian government expressed our opposition to the sale by any country of arms to South Africa, and that certainly includes France which is one of the suppliers.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I take this opportunity to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance that he has apparently lost everything from his pockets but his money.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, on that question of privilege, I should simply like to say that if my hon. friend had been over here I would probably have lost my money too.

Mr. MacInnis: Further to the point of privilege, if the minister is like the rest of us he should be taking his own money.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROPOSED WINTER WORKS PROGRAM TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

During the weekend I had the opportunity to meet a number of civic administrators who stated their concern about some unemployed who are unable to draw unemployment benefits. Could the minister say whether the government is now considering the possibility of concluding agreements with the provinces and municipalities, in order to organize winter works as soon as possible to assist those individuals?

Mr. Speaker: I think that this question has already been asked but the Acting Prime Minister may care to answer it.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the plans that were put forward by the government just before Christmas, a very large program of works was laid out, much of which will be implemented this winter. This is the most effective measure that could be taken. I quite agree that measures should be taken to deal with winter unemployment, and that is what we have done.

PROPOSED MARKETING OF RYE, FLAX AND RAPESEED BY WHEAT BOARD—REQUEST FOR VOTE BY FARMERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. What consideration, if any, is the government giving to the recent request of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that the government conduct a ballot among farmers of the Wheat Board area on the question of extending the board's powers to cover the complete marketing of rye, flax and rapeseed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, when such a request is received it is given consideration.

WHEAT—ACHIEVEMENT OF EIGHT-BUSHEL DELIVERY QUOTA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the minister's previous commitment in respect of an eight-bushel quota during the present crop year and in view of the fact that many points are on only a three-bushel quota, can the minister still carry out this commitment to the House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As of today I think 41 of the 46 points are going on a four-bushel quota and there seems to be no difficulty in moving forward rapidly as the crop year proceeds.

MANPOWER

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS TO INCREASE NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED ELIGIBLE FOR RETRAINING PROGRAMS —EXTENSION OF PERIOD

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. If he wishes to so indicate, perhaps he could answer in greater detail during the debate which is to follow. In view of the relatively small number of unemployed people who are able to make use of the manpower training programs as an alternative to employment, is the minister making plans now to revise many of the regulations which prohibit many unemployed Canadians from taking advantage of the programs?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in a program as large as the retraining program of course all aspects of it are continually under review. The number of people now receiving the training program is of course very high indeed. We have had a look at whether or not any changes would be an advantage having regard to the amount of money which is available for the purpose. At the present time we are satisfied that, given the training facilities and the amount of money which is available, it is serving its purpose fairly well.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that roughly only one out of every ten unemployed can take advantage of these programs and specifically in view of the limit on the length of training that can be taken, is consideration being given to lengthening the 52-week period so that many people will not have to face unemployment simply because their time has run out under present training regulations?

Mr. Lang: As I indicated earlier, all aspects of the program are under consideration and this is certainly one which deserves continual consideration. The programs, of course, are not designed simply to put people who are unemployed into training but rather to offer training to those people who are unemployed where a training program is specifically indicated as the route back to employment for them.

RETRAINING PROGRAMS—USE OF CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN PROVISIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the previous series of questions about persons being ineligible for manpower training. Are the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Minister of National Health and Welfare giving consideration to increasing the emphasis on the work activity program section of the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, discussions are going on between several departments and several provinces about the direction in which these programs should go in the years ahead. I look forward to these discussions leading to some fruit.

POWER

MINAS BASIN TIDES—REQUEST BY NOVA SCOTIA FOR REOPENING OF STUDY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. I ask it in light of the tremendous enthusiasm of the newfound supporter of Minas Basin Tidal power. Has the government received any formal request from the province of Nova Scotia and for the premier of that province to reopen the study in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not having followed through on the answer I gave the other day. I did not have time to do so, but I will inquire today.

GRAIN

FORAGE INCENTIVE PROGRAM FOR 1971—WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Can the minister assure all concerned that the proposed incentive program to increase cultivated forage crop acreage on the Prairies in 1971 will not be tied to a reduction in wheat acreage as it was in 1970?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention whatsoever to tie any reduction in a particular crop to the forage incentive. The forage incentive as proposed would be directly in relation to increases in forage acreage over previous levels.

AGRICULTURE

IMPORTATION OF NEW ZEALAND AND AUSTRALIAN BEEF IN LIGHT OF FORAGE INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the incentive program to increase forage acreage in western Canada and thereby by implication the production of feed, will the minister review the present trade program in respect of the importation of beef from New Zealand and Australia to avoid a real conflict in policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is constantly under review. There is no indication that there is a conflict of policy. Indeed, the projections indicate that a substantially higher increase in the rate of production of beef would have to take place to meet the demands of the North American market.

INFORMATION CANADA

DISTRIBUTION OF BROCHURES ON OBTAINING OF A PASSPORT

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the minister charged with responsibility for Information Canada. In light of the government's policy which apparently requires a Canadian citizenship card for those citizens who immigrated to this country from Great Britain and other Commonwealth countries in order to obtain a Canadian passport, even though these people have resided in Canada for many years, and in view of the difficulty involved in obtaining suitable information, with resulting confusion, will the minister undertake the responsibility of making the excellent brochures on this subject readily available at post offices and other local federal offices for public use?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question is so urgent that it should not be placed on the Order Paper. However, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member bringing this to my attention. If there are not sufficient brochures available I will try to make sure more are made available, both in my capacity as minister responsible for citizenship and as minister responsible for Information Canada. I believe it should be pointed out, however, that there is no special requirement in respect of former British subjects. The requirement for passports to be issued by the Department of External Affairs is simply for evidence that a person is a Canadian citizen. The citizenship registration branch is willing to issue proof of that just as the vital statistics office of a provincial government is able to issue proof of birth.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF INCOME TAX SURCHARGE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if the fact that he withdrew the tax bill last Thursday can give the people of Canada any hope that he intends to drop the 3 per cent income tax surcharge which he proposed to extend until the end of 1971?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker; it was merely a technicality. Usually the tax bill is not introduced until the budget debate is completed.

HIGHWAYS

QUEBEC—APPLICATION OF FEDERAL GRANT TO CONSTRUCTION OF EXPRESSWAY IN MONTREAL

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

It has been said that the federal government has granted $68 million to Quebec in order to create employment in that province. It has also been said that this amount will be used to build an expressway in Montreal, which would provide jobs for 1,400 workers.

Has the federal government made this grant of $68 million to Quebec for creating jobs or for building an expressway in Montreal?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the announcement was that the federal government had made available to the provinces a sum of $150 million, to be distributed in accordance with the employment situation in each province.

Accordingly, Quebec is entitled to $68 million of the total amount.

The use to be made of the fund is in fact left to the province so long as it tends to create jobs.

Mr. Asselin: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the minister find logical that a grant of 68 million dollars to Quebec will create only 1,400 jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member invites the minister to express an opinion. In this sense I do not believe that the question is in order.

Mr. Paproski: In light of the rising unemployment crisis, will the government consider lifting the deferment of capital cost allowances on commercial buildings in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia so that construction can commence on some major projects to provide needed jobs, not words?

DAMAGE TO PEACE-ATHABASCA DELTA BY BENNETT DAM—ASSISTANCE TO THOSE PLANNING LAWSUITS —STUDY OF IMPLICATIONS OF PROBLEM

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It is in reference to the damage done to the Peace-Athabasca delta by the W. A. C. Bennett dam. I was wondering whether the minister through his department had in mind the offer of any assistance to the towns on the Peace River and to the Alberta Métis Association which are planning lawsuits against the British Columbia government for damage done to the delta region?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I do not see how I would be able to do that, Mr. Speaker, under the statutory duties given to me by parliament.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We will be running out of time within a few minutes. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Athabasca on a supplementary question, but I would ask him to proceed quickly so as to give some time to several other hon. members who wish to ask questions.

Mr. Yewchuk: My supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, could the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the studies being carried out by the federal and provincial governments will include a study of the illegal aspects and implications of the Peace-Athabasca delta problem which has resulted from the dam construction?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

THE PAS—CHANGE IN MANAGEMENT OF FOREST PRODUCTS INDUSTRIES—POSITION RESPECTING FEDERAL GRANTS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and deals with the complex of forest products industries in The Pas, Manitoba, which were recently taken under trusteeship by the Manitoba Government. In view of the fact that the four companies involved are qualified for an aggregate of some $15 million in federal grants, can the minister say whether it is his intention to advance the money to any one of the companies should it meet the qualification deadline, even though the management has in effect changed since the original agreement was signed?

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—PROVISION TO RECIPIENTS OF BENEFITS OF ESCALATION PENDING NEW RATES AND CEILINGS

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The documents have been prepared and are now before the Treasury Board. I am sure a decision will be made in time for the proposed increase.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the minister mean that it will be made in time so that the adjustment will be made in the January cheques?

Mr. Dubé: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson, that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (page 1808).

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before this debate commences, may I say it is my understanding that we are to spend not only today but tomorrow on the budget debate. I think we have indicated that at this time we intend to direct our attention to the question of unemployment. May I make a suggestion which the government may take into account regarding the future of this debate?

These two days plus two more days will take up four of the days allotted to the budget debate. If during the course of the debate today the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) or the minister responsible would indicate that the government intends to bring in at once supplementary estimates covering certain proposals to deal with the unemployment crisis, including expanded unemployment insurance benefits and expansion of the Canada Assistance Plan, a program of works and certain selective tax reduction this party would be prepared to review its position with regard to the debate. If the government is prepared to indicate in this way, through supplementary estimates, that it will provide leadership, in this crisis we would be prepared to suggest that the debate may be brought to an end.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that that was not a point of order but rather a point of a debate. The hon. member may want to make that suggestion when he has the floor in the course of the debate which is to follow.

Hon. Robert Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the past few months I believe the only words we have heard repeated as often as the recommendations of my colleagues and myself with regard to fighting unemployment have been the stand-pat responses of the ministers of this government. There is, however, one difference developing daily in this situation. These same recommendations that we have been making are being heard from an increasing number of Canadians, including an increasing number of economic experts, not just from the opposition benches. So, it is becoming more and more apparent that if the government continues to stand pat, it may well be standing alone in the short term.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: As to the terrible unemployment faced by hundreds of thousands of Canadians this winter, admittedly there is limited action that can be taken at this date. However, let there be no doubt as to who is responsible for these hundreds of thousands of Canadians being in this position this winter.

Some hon. Members: Trudeau.

Mr. Stanfield: The stubbornness of this government in failing to act has been mainly responsible. At least let this government do what can be done at this stage this winter, and at least let it make the suggested changes with regard to unemployment insurance. Let us have an end to these stand-pat, complacent statements emanating from ministers of the Crown.

Looking a little further ahead, and recognizing the time factor involved in achieving a desirable level of employment in this country as well as the mess into which this government has put this country, the prime and major recommendation of the Progressive Conservative party is for the government to immediately implement selective cuts in taxation, including cuts in personal income tax of the order of 6 per cent or so.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought in this budget on December 3, there was a general expectation that he would at least allow the 3 per cent surtax on personal and corporate income to expire as it was supposed to do, and as he originally stated it would. However, the minister did not allow this 3 per cent surtax to lapse, and the budget, with all its high blown phrases, became merely a means of extending the life of the surtax and in fact increasing taxes. In so far as the technical requirements, are concerned, the budget has no more reason for existing than this. Spokesmen for the government suggest that tax cuts would be inflationary. I do not for a moment subscribe to that philosophy under current circumstances, nor do many economists who are registering their objections to the present policies of the government. The Financial Times, for example, espouses a 10 per cent cut in personal income tax as well as cuts in corporate tax. An increasing number of economists and business people are calling for immediate tax cuts.

Let me say again that in present circumstances, far from a tax cut of this nature being inflationary, there is very good reason to believe that it would be anti-inflationary. In fact, there is very good reason to believe that it might very well moderate the demands for wage and salary, increases which Canadians feel they need to offset the expected increases in the cost of living. I am not suggesting for a moment that we should abandon our concern about fighting inflation. I do not believe we have inflation licked. For example, I have been urging the government not to abandon sincere attempts to achieve voluntary wage and price restraints. The government got started on this program at a time when inflationary pressures were at their peak, the most difficult and very worst time to implement such a policy, and the program was in deep difficulty from the beginning.

The experience of other countries, notably West Germany, suggests that efforts to achieve successful economic guidelines and restraint policies, call it what you will, have a fair chance of success if they are based on consultation and co-operation among governments, business and labour rather than dictation from on high, and if they are instituted at a time when inflationary pressures are not too heavy. I say again that it seems obvious that rather than abandon efforts to achieve such a program at this time, this is the very time when the government should be redoubling its efforts to bring business and labour together to achieve a meaningful restraint program on a co-operative basis. Instead of this, the government has chosen to abandon its efforts. I hope nobody in the government is going to continue to give lectures to us on this side of the House about the importance of continuing the fight against inflation.

Another tax cut that could get a significant segment of our private sector moving ahead would be a substantial reduction or, preferably, the elimination altogether of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. This would give a very necessary and immediate stimulus to an entire job-creating construction industry. It is important, too, that if this government is going to fight unemployment effectively there must be some structure of responsibility. It is very difficult, looking from this side, to know who is in charge, or whether the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) is trying to spend one-third of his day fighting unemployment as well as handling immigration problems and problems in respect of wheat. From this side of the House there is no apparent co-ordination of government policy in respect of fighting unemployment, and it is urgent that someone be given the responsibility to fight unemployment rather than to have the divided responsibility we now see. Judging from the interest that he has shown so far, I hope that responsibility will not be given to the Minister of Finance.

The most optimistic forecast of Canada's economic growth for 1971, on the basis of the present budget arrangement, indicates that the highest expected growth rate will make no appreciable reduction in our present seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment. I have challenged the government a number of times to come clean and tell the country what its forecasts are in respect of unemployment for 1971. It has not accepted the challenge. Again this afternoon I sought this information and

I got an evasive answer. I repeat the challenge now, Mr. Speaker. I repeat the forecast, which I think is accurate on the basis of what I read, that unless additional and powerful stimulus is given to the growth of this economy, for this year unemployment, seasonally adjusted, will not be below 6 per cent.

During the past week I have been in the western part of this country and I should like to talk for a few moments about some of my impressions. At the outset of these remarks, I want to pay tribute to the personnel who staff the many agencies which are being pressed to the very limit in trying to serve the unemployed people in this country. I had the opportunity of meeting a number of these dedicated staff people, and I was impressed with their concern and the humane approach they are taking in trying to do their job. They are dealing, under pressure, with an abnormally high number of unemployed persons who would feel even more degraded by their circumstances were they being dealt with by case workers and counsellors who did not really care.

Some reports of my travels have given the impression that I was abusively greeted by a large number of people in Vancouver who, having no current eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits, were lined up to receive welfare assistance. That impression is inaccurate, and I think it is important that I clarify the details of this event. This has an important bearing on conditions in our country. Certainly, there were men in that line up who took the opportunity of my visit to speak out from anger to me. They are the men whose pride is hurting in a most unspeakable way. In addition to those men, and quite separate from them, there were a few vocal representatives of other groups who took advantage of the media coverage available to get their message across. All over the world today, people have become familiar with the techniques of abusive confrontation and the effectiveness of this tactic in gaining coverage. This effectiveness can hardly be minimized.

What concerns me about the nature of this kind of confrontation is that those indulging in it seem to have passed beyond the will or desire to discuss things. They feel that their only recourse and satisfaction lies in their organized ability to incite. I am, of course, troubled by this development because of the rejection and disillusionment that it represents. I caution the government, and I caution the people of Canada, not just to write off people in this state of mind as a disturbing nuisance. We must, to a large extent, endure some loud abuse and keep working at the problem.

By far the majority of the jobless Canadians I met in the line-ups at Vancouver and elsewhere have not reached that point of despair. They are trying to sustain their hope in the face of hopelessness. They are not the ones who have been making loud noises. Their anger and frustration is not visible on the surface. It is masked by whatever degree of pride they have left to display. To a casual observer, they would appear to have accepted their blows from a mismanaged and depressed economy with a reaction of sad resignation. But when you talk to them, there is no mistaking that the same anger and frustration lies beneath the surface. They get their message across, too. It is delivered in a more restrained and quiet way, but the bitterness is there. They are shocked and frightened by what the government has made happen to them; and when they gather in welfare lines, hostels and manpower offices, I believe they are justified in directing bitter comment at anyone who sits in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of Manpower and Immigration was the object of some expressions of this bitterness when he spoke in Vancouver last Friday evening. In his response, he conceded that his government's policies had been a cause of unemployment; but then, to his great discredit, he tried to run for cover and shift a substantial portion of the blame to industry and labour. He said that industry must "foresee shifting demands and plan accordingly for its manpower development".

No one will deny that this is a worthy aim. No businessman in this country will quarrel with the minister on that score. But, surely, such a gratuitous piece of advice is nothing short of contemptible when its intent is to mislead and to place blame on somebody else. Industry in this country did not deliberately create unemployment. Labour did not deliberately create unemployment and the unemployed certainly did not create it. This government created it and this government must answer for it.

Mr. Muir: The Prime Minister said that it did not worry him.

Mr. Stanfield: Certainly, as the minister indicates, industry is responsible for looking after its planning programs; but these do not exist in a vacuum. I remind the minister that for months and months I have been urging the removal of the many uncertainties which the government has created in the Canadian economy. I have urged this because I know that industry cannot plan properly in a climate of uncertainty. Yet, in spite of all those months and months of cautioning and warning, the Minister of Finance has smugly refused to take any action. If we have reached a point now where industry is losing confidence in the good faith of this government, there certainly cannot be any doubt as to where the blame really lies. For the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to scold industry at this point and to ask it to act now without the government first doing its part, is more, Sir, than just putting the cart before the horse. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration is attempting to justify that kind of reverse arrangement after the Minister of Finance has wounded the horse and taken the wheels off the cart.

The prospect of a December budget brought fresh hope to many in the Canadian business community. Small businessmen in particular were hopeful of an indication that significant action would be taken by the government to stimulate the economy of this country. Their reaction to the budget which was actually presented by the Minister of Finance was, in many cases, a reaction of outrage. For many it meant that the Christmas message to a further number of their employees would have to be one that would make them sick at heart. I talked with some of the jobless persons who got the bad news following the appearance of this so-called budget. They are not particularly mad at their employers who let them go. They are not blaming industry or labour for their situation. They know who has caused their jobs as well as their pride in being productive contributors to our Canadian society to be taken away. They know too that inflation is a bad thing and they want to be fair in assessing their treatment. Above all they know that they need hope to sustain them, and they know that this hope can only be offered by the government now scrapping this do-nothing budget and taking quick and effective action. That hope, Sir, will be necessary to sustain them over the long months that it will take the economy to recover, even if a tremendously stimulating beginning is made immediately. Yet, the government continues blindly to withhold the required actions.

Well over half a million Canadians right now are paying a deeply degrading price for this government's arrogance and economic incompetence. Those hundreds of thousands of Canadians have had to swallow their pride and take whatever assistance is available to them to provide food and shelter for another million and more innocent bystanders, the families who depend on them. Is this government now prepared to swallow some of its own false pride and take action? A growing body of respected economic experts says that it should. Industry says that it should; labour says that it should. Yet, I am afraid that because members in the opposition in this House say that it should, the prideful members of this prideful government may stubbornly continue on their ruthless course and be bent on saving political face at any cost.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of Finance may continue to be proud of his one forecasting success. He smiles at us on television and lets us know that he was only a little bit out on forecasting the present dismal state of affairs in this country. He may continue to boast of the wonderful coming effects of his $2 billion turnaround and he may continue to gloat after achieving stellar price performance for the economy. But at what price, Mr. Speaker, and who is paying that price? It is not the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration may continue to tell us how it is "still reasonable to expect that the corner of unemployment has been turned." He says this, although well knowing we can expect a further 200,000 unemployed before the winter is over. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration may continue to lecture us in his patronizing way about "controlled recovery". But who is standing out in the cold and in need of more immediate recovery? It is not the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) may continue to treat with disdain and a verbal wrist slapping the warnings concerning potential unrest caused by unemployment that were expressed last week by both the Prime Minister of Quebec and his Minister of Labour. But who has to live and make a living in the province of Quebec? It is not the Acting Prime Minister. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) may continue to pride himself on the policies of his department at a point in time when most of the country is a designated area. However, who has to travel Canada's designated cities and countryside in search of work? Not the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) returns to this country, he may again give us his word that unemployment is now the number one priority of the government. He may again tell us how inflation has been licked and how he will not lose his nerve in the face of six per cent unemployment and higher. But who needs the nerve to face a family and financial obligations without a job? Not the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I fear anything I say will likely result in little action being taken by this prideful group of men who control and manipulate our economy. In characteristic style, I fear that they will complacently refuse any counsel but their own. There is every probability that they will stick by their mistake as long as people far removed from them are taking the lumps. Opposition argument and attempts at persuasion through debate seem to fall on deaf ears. All the arguments have been stated and all the warnings have been issued time and time again, but to no avail. My resolution to stick at it has been reinforced by the visits I have made this past week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Any one who has seen what I have seen would be moved by the human beings involved in this terrible situation. I appeal to the members of the government to go out among the people to see for themselves the effects of what they have done and are continuing to do. I plead with them to do that, if pleading is what it takes to satisfy their egos. I cannot believe that the human hurt, anger, frustration and degradation that is being massively experienced all over this land would not penetrate even their insulated minds and stir them to take corrective action now. The action that is needed is clear. A mounting body of expert opinion supports this.

There is no time left to sit in the comfortable chairs of cabinet impressing each other with figures, graphs and computer type language. There is surely no time left to remain smug about a hopelessly inadequate budget. There is no time left to alibi and defend an indefensible mistake in economic planning. There is only time to honestly recognize the mistake and to start correcting it. That time, Mr. Speaker, is right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I say to the members of this House, particularly the members of the government, that the unemployment crisis in Canada, which grows worse every month this winter, is economically unnecessary, morally indefensible and socially disastrous. I accuse the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) of deliberately and unnecessarily creating inhuman misery for hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I accuse them of cruel and heartless policies which sacrifice the welfare of Canadians on the altar of outdated and irrelevant economic policies in a modern and industrialized society.

I accuse this government of placing an impossible burden on the hard-pressed municipalities of Canada which now have to meet welfare costs beyond their means. I accuse this government of thoughtless disregard of the young people of this country, too many of whom are suffering the frustration and degradation of idleness and hopelessness. In short, I accuse them of creating conditions which cannot help but be an obstacle to orderly progress and will invite restless disorder and revolt against our society. What is most distasteful of all is the indecent smugness and complacency of the government in the face of this critical situation, a smugness and complacency that only arrogant men are capable of in a situation such as that which faces Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The Minister of Finance complacently says there may be some difficulty now, but there is not a crisis. He says that everything is on the up and up. I say to him, tell it to the unemployed. Have the courage to tell it to the desperate young. Tell it to the men and women over the age of 40 who are out of work and who, in the best times, find it difficult to find a new job when they become unemployed. Tell it to the children of the unemployed who faced the Christmas holiday with doleful faces. Tell it to the hundreds of thousands of Canadian families who suffer from the policies which you so stupidly and callously introduced in this country.

There is no crisis for the Minister of Finance and his friends. Nor is there a crisis for hon. members of this House. However, there is a desperate crisis for hundreds of thousands of Canadian families and single men and women from one end of this land to the other. This situation, Mr. Speaker, is unforgivable in a country like Canada. We have riches which are almost beyond limit or description. Our people are industrious, loyal and proud. We have all the capacities to meet the legitimate needs of every section of this country. Instead of setting out single-mindedly to fight and eliminate poverty, this government deliberately set out to increase poverty in this country. It has succeeded. Instead of setting out to remove the glaring injustices and inequalities of our society, it adopted policies deliberately intended to increase those inequalities and injustices. It has succeeded.

With much fanfare, the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion was established. I do not think its policies will help Canada. Even those policies are incapable of being implemented in a general economic situation such as the Minister of Finance and the government have produced. This government, led by an insensitive technocrat, is the most reactionary and insensitive government this country has had for many years. I suggest that the unemployment situation in Canada is far worse than the unemployment figures show, and the figures are bad enough. Let me remind hon. members of them.

In December, 1970, there were 155,000 more people unemployed than there were a year ago in December, 1969. That represents an increase of 40 per cent in one year. In December, 1970, 62,000 more people were unemployed than in the preceding month, an increase in one month of some 14 per cent. But I suggest this is not a real description of the situation. The number of unemployed in Canada in December was not merely 538,000; anyone who reads the release from the Bureau of Statistics will notice that the labour force in Canada was reduced by 71,000 between November and December of last year, and the Bureau comments that this decrease is in excess of the usual seasonal contraction. What this technical language means is that many thousands of Canadians left the labour force in despair, young and old, male and female, and are no longer numbered among the labour force. The likelihood is that last month there were about 600,000 unemployed instead of 538,000.

It is certain that one month later the unemployment figure will reach about 600,000—that the actual number out of work is around 650,000 as we debate this subject today. It is certain that next month, and the month after that, unemployment in this country will go up to 700,000 to 800,000. The minister said the other day that this forecast is wrong, but I tell him that before the winter is out he will have to admit that not only are his policies wrong but that his understanding of the situation is limited, unimaginative and inadequate.

The range of unemployment in this country is not only the worst in the past ten years, it is worse than it was during the worst years of the depression. In this situation, the figures ought to be looked at again in order to see them from another angle. We have always drawn attention to this aspect but it is necessary to do so again. It is heartbreaking to note the number and percentage of the unemployed who are the youngest people in the labour force. No less than 19.7 per cent of the total of those unemployed are between the ages of 14 and 19. One in every five is younger than 19 years of age. Some 21 per cent of the unemployed are between the ages of 20 and 24. Taking these figures together, 40.5 per cent of the total number of unemployed are under 25 years of age.

What does this mean for our society? What does it mean for social conditions in a society where young people who leave schools and colleges to start out in life, perhaps to raise a family, are the ones who find themselves out of work, the ones who must face the despair and frustration of failure to find useful work to do? What does it mean in terms of the danger created for the orderly processes of society when circumstances such as these encourage young people to revolt, not only against their own condition of despair but against the society as a whole which has created those conditions? The danger is great, as has been shown in the Province of Quebec, and it may be seen again not only in that province but in all parts of Canada.

The stupidity of the government's policy is greater even than I have described it when one thinks of what it has done to our total economy, and particularly to production. In 1970, the prevailing level of unemployment resulted in a loss to Canada's total production of about $5 billion. Between $5 billion and $6 billion were lost in the production of goods and services out of which $1 billion at least would have gone into the public treasuries to deal with situations which required to be dealt with. So, the stupid and insensitive policies of the government have produced havoc at both ends—havoc through the loss of productivity worth billions of dollars, and havoc through the loss of revenue available to federal, provincial and municipal treasuries.

When the government says this has been done to fight inflation it is talking not only nonsense, but criminal nonsense. I point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) that even his protegé, Professor John Young, the chairman of the useless and almost dead Prices and Incomes Commission, admitted a couple of days ago that the price which has been paid in terms of unemployment in the fight against inflation has been far too high and is unacceptable. Dr. Young should have thought of that seven or eight months ago. We have not had any influence on the minister's thinking but had he tried he might have succeeded instead of failing in the task he undertook.

I say to hon. members that the unemployment situation and the state of our economy today surpass all the other problems which face this country and make it impossible to deal with those other problems. They make it impossible to deal, for example, with the threat of the FLQ in Quebec. They make it impossible to deal with pollution and the remodelling of our cities. How can this be done when there are hundreds of thousands of unemployed and a reduction in the production of wealth which could be channelled to these ends? They make it impossible for a government, which in any case has not the heart to do so, to improve the condition of the aged people, for hon. gentlemen opposite can now claim poverty even though this is the direct result of their own economic policy.

This government will go down in history as a government which instead of dealing with the social and economic needs of Canada arrogantly created a situation which it could use as an excuse for ignoring these needs. Unfortunately, in a situation of this kind, when a government has mismanaged the economy for a period of two years, it is not possible immediately to meet the unemployment crisis in any meaningful way. When the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) say to this House and to the people that there are no policies which could be immediately effective in reducing substantially the number of unemployed, they are right. But whose fault is this? Whose fault is it that no policies are available because of the time lag necessarily involved from the point at which investment is made to the point at which it results in jobs? Whose fault is it that this time lag has been allowed to accumulate so that in January, 1971 very little can be done to reduce the number of unemployed which presently exists and which will increase in the months ahead? If the government had any consideration for the dignity and pride of human beings and was not so completely controlled by its technocratic concern with squares, computers, diagrams and excuses, then the government could do some things immediately in order to alleviate the condition of those who are suffering the misery of unemployment. I refer not so much to decreasing the number of unemployed but to alleviating their misery and hopelessness.

I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) will speak shortly in this debate. The minister has done a fair job in his department as head of labour relations and negotiation. He has frequently spoken with a voice that sounds almost progressive in its concern and sympathy for the condition of ordinary people. If this voice of concern is genuine and sincere, then the minister has an opportunity of proving it by introducing legislation in the House, either today or tomorrow, to provide for an immediate increase in unemployment insurance benefits to $100 a week. I suggest this step be taken on an emergency basis for the next three or four months. This will give the hundreds of thousands who are unemployed sufficient income immediately to live in dignity, even if their self-respect still remains hurt by having to be idle. If the minister's voice of concern and sympathy for the underdog is not only sincere but also courageous, then today or tomorrow he can introduce changes to the unemployment insurance regulations to extend the period for unemployment insurance benefits for those whose eligibility has already expired.

If the quiet and professorial Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) sincerely means some of the things he has been saying in the past two years, then he too can make an immediate contribution to alleviating the plight of many of our unemployed by changing the regulations governing manpower training and allowances. This would enable young people who have left school and college, who are therefore not in the labour force and have not been in the labour force for three years, to receive immediately the necessary retraining and allowances, thus providing them with some hope ahead, rather than the hopeless wandering across the country looking for work that is not available, in which they have been engaged. If the reason given by the manpower department for not taking this action is that the government has not provided them with sufficient funds to do so, then every member on the government side who has anything but partisan consideration for the unemployed ought to demand, along with every member of the opposition, that the government make more funds available to the manpower department in order that these improvements in manpower training and allowances be made immediately, at least for the winter months.

I am, of course, as concerned for the older unemployed as I am for the younger unemployed. Each time that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has sneeringly tried to suggest that we are asking for these improvements for the younger unemployed at the expense of ignoring the older unemployed—and he has done that on a number of occasions—I have resented it, though I have learned to expect this kind of irrelevant, smart-alec remark from the Prime Minister, particularly in regard to important matters with which he cannot deal consicientiously in any other way.

Although we are as concerned about the older unemployed as we are about the younger unemployed, the fact is that there are too many younger unemployed. Some 20 per cent of those without work are under 19 years of age. When you introduce young people like this into an atmosphere of idleness and despair, Mr. Speaker, you are making it impossible for them to make the kind of adjustment to life, the sort of integration with objective conditions, that is required to make them good and loyal citizens. Instead, you are cheating opportunities for degradation not only at their present stage of development but probably in their future development as well. You are creating opportunities for revolt against the entire democratic process.

It is, therefore, right that we should be concerned about these young unemployed, this 20 per cent that is under the age of 19. It is also right that the government should immediately make funds available to assist this group. I say that the Minister of Finance, who I think is listening to me even though from behind the curtain, has a duty immediately to make available funds to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in order that he on his part may make immediate changes to the regulations along the lines I have suggested.

As I say, the government can take immediate steps, not to reduce the number of unemployed but to reduce the misery of the unemployed, by making grants available—not loans but grants—to the municipalities so they can meet the increased cost of welfare now facing them. If this were done, two things would happen. First of all, the municipalities would not come under a burden that they cannot possibly bear and be forced to go to the provinces to press for things that reflect themselves in the provinces' accounts, thus making it much more difficult for the provinces to obtain the necessary funds. Second, and more importantly, it would enable the municipalities to liberalize their welfare requirements and make welfare available to more people. It would enable them perhaps to be a little more generous in the amount of welfare granted, increases they cannot presently bear on their own.

It is possible for the government to do at least three things that would have some effect on the number of unemployed in Canada. No one claims they would have a large effect, but as I said on December 12 last, I think it was, even reducing the number of unemployed by 50,000 or 100,000 is an act of decency that no one ought to ignore. This could be done if the government were immediately to undertake with the provinces and municipalities a great many more works than the Minister of Finance has provided for, particularly in the area of social capital, such as the building of schools, hospitals, sewage plants and all the other things that improve the quality of life of our people.

When my leader asked today whether the Minister of Finance had changed his mind about removing the 3 per cent surcharge, I wish with all my heart that the minister's answer had been "Yes, I have changed my mind". The minister ought to remove this 3 per cent surcharge instead of extending it to the year 1971. To a large extent this 3 per cent surcharge on personal income tax—I am not so much concerned about the corporations—falls on the lower and lower middle income groups of this country which would use every penny of this 3 per cent tax to purchase goods and services and, therefore, immediately stimulate the economy.

Finally, I suggest the immediate removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, especially for housing, though I warn the government that if it does this it should also take steps to make sure that the price of houses will go down and that the benefit of this reduction goes to the purchasers of houses instead of to real estate developers.

I must say I regard the Commonwealth conference as a very important conference. I hope with all my heart that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will stand fast by the Canadian policy so far announced that we oppose the sale of arms by Britain to the despicable government of South Africa. But I say the moment that conference is ended, it is the duty of Canada's Prime Minister to come back home to take the necessary steps to improve the unemployment situation and end the suffering of the unemployed in this country. In view of this crisis, he ought not spend a single hour visiting anywhere else or amusing himself or doing anything in any other part of the world. His place is here to deal with a critical unemployment situation and the dangerous social situation which he and his government have created.

At the end of the war, 25 years ago, there was a great deal of discussion in Canada and throughout the world concerning the meaning of that war. Everywhere throughout the western world, after the defeat of the Nazis and Fascists, there was a determination in people's minds that the sacrifices of that war must result in a society which no longer suffered from the inequality, the misery and the unemployment which existed during the decade before the war broke out. At the end of that war, the Liberal party then in power produced a white paper in which the primary objective was a policy of full employment which must be introduced and maintained in Canada throughout the post-war period, said the Prime Minister and all his ministers. Like every promise of the party across the aisle, like every other social pretension of the Liberals throughout the history of this country, and like every other arrogant assumption of the rightness of that party throughout history, this promise of full employment which dates as far back as 1945 has been broken with heartless unconcern by this government as it has been broken by other governments, both Conservative and Liberal, in the past.

I shall conclude by saying to hon. members that in one sense, with my social philosophy and social beliefs, I am not really surprised about what has happened in Canada. The total lack of public planning in our economy, the total reliance of this government on private enterprise to do the job for the Canadian people, the total failure to do anything about the allocation of investment in socially necessary areas, and the total unconcern of this government, the Liberal party and indeed the official opposition as well, about seeing to it that Canada's economy serves the needs of all the people of Canada and, in so far as it is possible, the needs of people in other parts of the world as well—these are the basic reasons for the failure of this government. The reliance of this government, and the reliance I suppose of the official opposition as well, on the large foreign-owned corporations in this country to be concerned with the welfare and future of Canada's economy in terms of human welfare and human well-being is responsible for the failure of the policies.

I say that, in addition to the specific suggestions I have made, the people of this country ought to demand a new approach, a new policy, greater public involvement in running the economy, greater public involvement in allocating investment and a determination to make full employment the first priority in any government policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the present economic situation in Canada is alarming, even frightening and disturbing.

I just listened to the speeches delivered by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). The latter gave a brilliant account of the economic situation in Canada: 42 per cent of the unemployed are in Quebec, about 600,000 people are out of work in Canada; almost everywhere people do without the necessaries of life; the young are disturbed; heads of families over 40 are extremely concerned; the older ones are despondent; in short, misery hits an increasing number of citizens.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition as well as the hon. member for York South have very well described the present situation. However, there are solutions, and all hon. members, including the government members, know the wretched conditions in which too many citizens live.

Reference was made to misery among students, among the young who cannot find employment, among heads of families who lack the necessaries of life in their homes. All this is true, but there are reasons to that and the conditions tolerated by the present administration are exactly the same as those which prevailed in 1961, when Canada experienced the highest level of unemployment in its history. In fact, there were almost a million unemployed, while the Progressive Conservative government had 208 members and the highest majority ever held by a Canadian political party. And just the same, the fact that there were a million unemployed doubtless contributed to the overthrow of the Diefenbaker government in 1962 or 1963.

Mr. Speaker, there are causes for this situation, and no action is being taken to eliminate them. Generally, the same causes produce the same effects. When the system is unrealistic, the whole population suffers.

Mr. Speaker, the first cause for the present situation is the government's failure to face its responsibilities.

Another cause is inflation, which has been talked about for the past two or three years. Two and a half years ago, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said: Because of inflation, I ask provinces, municipalities and school commissions to curtail all expenses. We will not improve services. We will put off projects of a national scope as well as the development of certain areas which are in trouble.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, hardly ten days ago, the same Prime minister was telling us: inflation? We have found it; it does not exist anymore. Yet, prices have remained the same and the number of unemployed has increased in the last month or two. Consequently, as regards this inflation we had two and a half years ago, the Prime minister was lying, or he is presently lying in the face of the Canadian people.

So, there was no inflation two and a half years ago and there is none presently. What Canada is suffering from right now is deflation, a lack of purchasing power in the hands of Canadian people to obtain products available in Canada. There is the problem that our country is facing.

Taxes are too high. We ask for a basic income tax exemption of $5,000 for married persons and from $2,500 to $3,000 for single persons. The government and the ministers laugh at us. This is absurd, they say.

Moreover, our financial system is stupid. Because of inflation and to fight it the chartered banks have been allowed to raise their interest rate from 6 to 9 or 10 per cent. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is aware of that. Either he was lying two years ago or he is lying to the Canadian people in the present crisis.

Mr. Speaker, although the Ralliement créditiste has been stigmatizing the stupidity of the financial system for 10, 15 and 20 years, our proposals are laughed at. We are told: The application of social credit would bring inflation. But inflation exists already and Canadians are asked to swallow that.

Mr. Speaker, the glut of goods today happens to be one of the causes of the unemployment situation in Canada.

The other day, I was pondering over statistics. Besides all the wages that are spent in Canada, our Canadian workers, from all social classes, owe the finance companies more than $12 billion. This is approximately half the amount of money now in circulation in Canada. We are told that to alleviate this situation, large projects will be implemented.

To the employed workers of Vancouver, the Leader of the Official Opposition said recently: Gentlemen, let us reduce taxes to fight inflation. Let us reduce the tax of a poor fellow who has nothing in his pocket. How are we going to help him buy the products on the market? If he is not working, if he has no income, he does not pay taxes. What is the point in telling him that he will not pay any taxes? He is not paying any right now, because he is not earning enough money.

Mr. Speaker, those solutions are irrelevant, like poultices on wooden legs; the government refuses to face reality and then face the necessary reforms.

A few moments ago, I heard the Leader of the Opposition and the member for York South propose benefits of $100 a week for the unemployed. How are those who earn $65 a week going to react? They will be tempted to leave their job in order to receive $100 a week instead of $65, because they get less from their jobs than they would in unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a solution, and to take from those who have money in order to give to those who have none is not a solution either.

I said in English in Western Canada:

[English]

"taking away from the haves to give to the have-nots. In the end you will have all kinds of have-nots and no more haves in this country."

[Translation]

That seems to be the policy that is now applied. The intention is to tax those who have money to help those who do not have any. Even if we took one or two million dollars away from millionaires and the money were distributed among twenty million Canadians, it would mean a payment of ten cents to each one of them. But what would that achieve? Absolutely nothing.

The old age security pension has been increased by 42 cents a month. What a big increase!

Mr. Speaker, those are not solutions. The Opposition Leader was laughed at in Vancouver when he advocated tax reductions. What would that be worth to those who do not pay taxes or have not enough money to pay taxes? Nothing.

We are in favour of increasing unemployment benefits provided the employed are respected. If the employed are taxed so that money can be given to those who do not work and who thus receive more than those who earn their living, economic chaos will ensue.

We are aware of the present conditions. We know what are the causes and it is not by practising socialism that we will be in a position to restore the balance or respect the human being in the economic situation.

I have visited several socialist countries as I have already stated in the House. I have travelled in Russia. Highly placed people or union leaders in Russia work 46 hours a week. Everybody has a job. Full employment exists, that is true. Everybody works but the wages are about half ours. In Russia, the monthly wages of an ordinary worker range from $45 to $55. The member for York South would not live there very long. What can one do with $45 to 55 a month? A Russian worker cannot buy a car that we pay $3,500 or $5,000 and which sells for $8,000 or $9,000 in Russia.

With $45 to $55 per month, one walks! This is exactly what happens.

Not television set, no radio, generalized poverty but within security. The freedom of the individual is entrusted to the state. The barber gives out a little ticket meaning: this belongs to the state. The taxi driver also works for the state.

Mr. Speaker, that is a system where security is gained at the expense of individual liberties. It is the same regime as that of my little dog: it has security, but in my home I hold the controls. It is exactly what I saw in Russia, Mr. Speaker.

Is this what we want in Canada? No. If achieving full employment as mentioned by the member for York South means that we will have to ask Canadian workers to accept salary cuts or a reduction in working hours so as to give jobs to everyone, I will have none of it. Two in the place of one with the salary of one only, that is the socialist solution which I will not accept.

The same reasoning could be applied to the two men standing besides a hole, each holding a small shovel, watching large trucks being loaded with a shovel-dredger. One says to the other: We are unemployed because a machine is used in our place. If that machine was not there, there would be jobs for 50 men like you and me, each with a small shovel. The other says: What for? The first answers: There would be work for more people. So, says the second man, 200 men with teaspoons could be used. Then, the same work would be done, the same trucks would be loaded, but 200 men would have jobs.

Mr. Speaker, the press people may laugh but that is the solution they have been advocating in their papers for years and years. That is socialism, in all its splendour.

Not only in Russia, but in Czechcoslovakia also, it is the same.

It is often said: What a splendid country Sweden is! Yes, it is a spendid country. Here is an example. I arrive there one day and I take a bus at a street corner. I note, it is true, that everyone is working, but freedom is in the hands of the state, and that of the individual is not respected.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Four people were at work there—a New Democratic Party member is starting to "sound off" a little because his party has no solution to offer—four employees running one bus: one selling tickets, another perforating them, a third driving the vehicle and a last one supervising the other three checking on whether they were doing their job properly. That was in Sweden.

Whether New Democratic Party members like it or not, it must be pointed out that during the big economic depression and immediately after the war the Canadian province with the greatest number of unemployed was still Saskatchewan, under a Socialist government. For 17 years, people were leaving Saskatchewan for Alberta or British Columbia because they could no longer live in Saskatchewan with a Socialist government.

Mr. Speaker, is that the kind of government we want in Canada? No. What, then, do we recommend? We have a solution. It does not involve creating jobs, but consuming Canadian products. First of all, let us set up the consumer goods system in order to consume what is being produced, because there is too much of everything. Would it be advisable for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to grant a $200 million subsidy tomorrow for the construction of a new shoe factory, when we already have too many shoes?

Is the clothing industry any better off? There is an overabundance of shoes, clothes, TV and radio sets, automobiles. Shall we subsidize the automobile industry? No. Because there are already too many cars and we would not know what to do with them.

In Western Canada, there are too many tractors, there is too much wheat and milk. We penalized milk producers because they were producing too much milk; they must not exceed their quotas. There is a glut of corn and potatoes in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island and in Manitoba. There is also a glut of butter and eggs!

The Prime Minister went to New Zealand and he said there: We will buy your eggs. Canadian farmers are not even able to sell theirs! There are too many chickens. Even now there is quarelling going on from Manitoba to Quebec because Quebec chickens are being dumped in Manitoba and Manitoba potatoes are being dumped in Ontario. The time of day is being spent dumping. The whole population of Canada is being dumped with that crazy system.

There is too much meat, beef, pork and chicken. What is lacking, then? New funds, new credits from the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, but not to build new plants or expand old ones to produce more: we already have too much.

What is lacking, Mr. Speaker? Purchasing power that corresponds to our production. What do the Créditistes suggest? We will be very specific in our proposal.

First of all, the Bank of Canada must be used—not the New York Bank, but the Bank of Canada—in order to use our credit and not American credit. A domstic economic organization must be set up in Canada without jeopardizing external trade. Americans are not interested in knowing what is the colour of the Canadian dollar or Canadian credit but rather what they can purchase in our country for one Canadian dollar. If we offer more goods for one dollar, they will be interested in coming here. Our dollars are not in circulation in the United States, in Sweden or in England. It is so true that if we go in the Southern United States and we show people a Canadian dollar, they wonder whose likeness appears on it. They wonder what currency it is, whether it comes from Mexico. It looks like a Mexican peso. Even 25c. coins are not accepted by cigarette machines in the United States.

There are some solutions. They are not those suggested by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who made a statement during the weekend.

Here is what one can read in today's Le Droit:

Marchand outlines federal policy
Measures against unemployment

The Canadian Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Hon. Jean Marchand, has said, over the weekend, that it was "really unfair" to claim that Ottawa is doing nothing to control unemployment.

We try something that fails, but at least we do something.

Speaking during the telecast "Les affaires de l'État" of the CBC French network, Mr. Marchand has submitted that for more than one and a half years, the federal government has waged a systematic battle against unemployment in Canada.

Now that we have fought, the number of unemployed has increased by at least 100,000 during December. According to Premier Bourrassa's program, in Quebec, 100,000 jobs were to be created. Instead, we have had 100,000 layoffs; that is not at all what had been recommended. And the minister goes to Quebec and tells the people: "It's coming, we have been working on it for the past 18 months. Results are forthcoming. But in the meantime, things go from bad to worse. There is no solution because we do not have any money.

The minister also said, and I quote from the newspaper Le Droit.

He said that during the past 18 months the government has injected well over $2 billion in our economy.

Injected where? Into what? Into the construction of plants that will manufacture goods that people cannot afford to buy. Into assisting people who happen to be in a precarious financial situation? This we did. We prevented people from toppling over because their products could not be sold. Then we injected into the economy billions of dollars which failed to allow the consumer to buy these goods, which will prolong the consumer's destitution and maintain these industries in operation for 18 months. Eventually, the minister will have injected those $2 billion to maintain the industries in operation but the Canadian consumer is ignored completely. The government forgets about him. Old age pensions are increased by 42 cents a month. The minister went on as follows:

There was an expansionist taxation policy—

Let us ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) whether there was an expansionist taxation policy. In what area? In what sense? Where has the field of taxation expanded? The provinces are always at a loss against Ottawa and all of them blame Ottawa without exception for this taxation system which prevents them from developing. The minister knows that.

—and an expansionist monetary policy,—

—with debts, of course. It was not credit granted by the Bank of Canada, but credit begged on bended knees in New York and Washington, in order to get permission to develop our country, Canada. Then, we are surprised to hear people say: Our economy is controlled by Americans. Of course, and it is normal since they finance the development while we could use our financial institution, the Bank of Canada. I dare the Minister of Finance to deny this. We, in Parliament, have the power to use the Bank of Canada and to make it serve the provinces, municipalities and school boards to allow them to expand through interest-free loans such as those that are given India, China and other countries.

Instead of using the Bank of Canada, we make it a branch of chartered banks in Canada and then we go to New York and Washington and beg for money to develop the far North and the province of Quebec. We go there to borrow $75 million at a rate of 8¾ per cent during 25 years for the implementation of a Hydro-Québec project in the province of Quebec. In 25 years we will have paid $200 million in interest alone and we will still owe the $75 million we have just borrowed. Mr. Bourrassa, who succeeded Mr. Bertrand, is to blame for that. Bitten by a dog or bitten by a bitch, what is the difference, Mr. Speaker? It is the same thing. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said also, and I quote:

Mr. Marchand mentioned the selective measures used by the government to fight unemployment with regard to the old people—

How nice: the old people and the unemployed. But what marvellous thing were done for the unemployed? One single day does not go by without our receiving 25, 30 or 50 phone calls from people without work who are treated like intruders at unemployment offices. Their cases are not always solved by the regional offices; they are referred to Montreal where there are electronic machines. And when these do not work, the unemployed starve at the other end.

Back to the quotation:

—family heads; in areas whose growth is inadequate—

Talk about welfare! Big families are asked to live on $160, $165 and $170 a month. Has the minister a formula look after the needs of a family of seven with $175 per month? I would then listen to the minister and to the government. I continue to quote:

—in areas whose growth is inadequate—

I mentioned that a while ago; they are especially those which are helped.

shipyards, footwear industries, etc.

We have too large stocks of footwear. I will speak to The Manufacturers' Association next Monday in Sainte-Adèle at the Chanteclerc Hotel. I invite the minister to come with me so that we may discuss together problems of the footwear and textile industries, of gold mines and the entire Canadian production. The newspaper also reports as follows:

• (4:20 p.m.)

The minister has emphasized that under the new plan . . . the province of Quebec is now a designated area—

[Mr. Caouette.]

In fact, that is a beautiful quality.

—which will enable it to get grants amounting to $100 million in the next few years.

$100 million are taken from other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be too long, but I wish to say in closing that the solution advocated by the Creditistes is as follows: first, instead of saying "increase the rate of benefits", we recommend the immediate distribution of a national dividend to each Canadian citizen, whether employed or unemployed. To make a distinction between the one who works and the one who does not there will be the difference of a salary, but every human person, the unemployed and the one on welfare alike, should be provided with the security of a guaranteed vital minimum. That is what is called the guaranteed annual income in scientific terms, such as those used by the government. We advocate payment of an old age pension of $150 per month, not 42 cents per day or $135 monthly. Such a pension would also be payable at 60, because at that age one is too old for family allowances and too young for the old age pension. The older person would receive a pension of $150 at 60 and his spouse, regardless of age, would also receive the old age pension. This would create purchasing power and enable people to acquire goods. Instead of doing away with family allowances or reducing them, they should be adjusted to the cost of living and family allowances should be increased, with the money coming from the Bank of Canada and not from my pockets. What we have in our pockets we need. So, why take it away from us?

The answer is to seek the money where credit is created, that is at the Bank of Canada. Why go to New York to ask Mr. Nixon permission to support my child, back home, in Abitibi? President Nixon never saw Abitibi in his life but the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion did, as well as the Minister of Finance. As for me, I go there fairly regularly.

Mr. Speaker, why not use the Bank of Canada to grant interest free loans to the provinces, municipalities and school boards, in order to allow them to develop normally.

Then, a presalary should be paid to students. I am not the one who advocated this idea, it comes from United States. Rather than have to ask $2 to his father who earns $75 a week and has five or six children to support, the student should receive a presalary and therefore be saved any embarrassment. Instead of letting him fooling around as he does now, without knowing where to turn, we must organize his spare time, give him some guidance and guarantee him his right to live in our society.

Why do young people rebel? Because they are refused the right to live within our society. Since they cannot find a place for themselves in that society, they attempt to destroy it. That is precisely what is happening.

But where would this presalary paid to students come from? Out of my pockets? Certainly not, because I need what I have in my pockets. I am sure the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) also needs what he has in his pockets.

However, there is no reason why we should not get the credits required from the Bank of Canada, based on Canadian production, not on the moon or the planet Mars. Canadian production reached $77 billion this year, whereas we receive $55 billion. Economists object to the Creditiste theory, claiming that there must be a depreciation of production for income tax purposes.

That is quite obvious. The man who does a lot of business will try to effect a maximum depreciation in order to pay a minimum of income tax. That is obvious. Everyone understands, and so does the minister. But what does the depreciation result in? In the present surplus, surplus goods now standing on shop shelves.

And to prove it, you see, all our national income has been spent. Stores are still full of goods. Plants are operating on a slow-down basis because the goods they manufacture cannot be sold and this situation creates unemployment. There is the problem.

Then, where does depreciation hit us? On the shelves of our stores. The Bank of Canada must be used to distribute purchasing power by means of a compensated discount, or by a national dividend that would permit the consumer to buy the goods piled up in our stores.

Once the shelves in our stores become empty, the plants resume operation and unemployed workers are put to work. Then, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will be extremely pleased to see the Canadian consumer back to work.

Instead of subsidizing plants, let us subsidize consumers; they will put the plants back into operation when they buy the goods manufactured by the plants. We will then experience a sound economic system fit for human beings and in which every Canadian citizen will feel secure in his own country while preserving in its integrity his own personal freedom. That is what we have been striving to accomplish for so many years.

Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise the chamber that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take advantage of the kindness of my colleagues.

That is the solution the Créditistes have been proposing for many years. I will be told—as I was on Sunday afternoon on channel 10—that this has never been tested anywhere. That is true, but things are going wrong everywhere!

If our solutions would be tested somewhere things would perhaps go better again. If they are not good, then we simply discard them. We are convinced that the present system is not good, but the Canadian people have to live with it.

Some citizens still praise that system. If prosperity is brought to one area, nobody looks elsewhere where there is misery. Mr. Speaker, the solution to the present problem rests with the economic system. We must resort to an economic solution in order to safeguard personal freedom and personal security. This is what the Créditistes wish for.

I appeal to the Minister of Finance, to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to the Prime Minister of Canada who is now travelling in India, Pakistan and Singapour, in short I appeal to the present government, for a more human economic system, a system which will enable young people to develop, to understand things better, to get training, to choose a course in life, and which will give Canadian fathers and mothers the assurance of raising a normal family in a normal system.

And for our older people, the assurance of security and independence for their later years. This what the Créditistes have been urging for quite a long time without any partisan spirit. Let the Liberal Party take on these concepts and I am sure that my colleagues from the Ralliement créditiste and myself will fully support it in giving the people of Canada a political system that will ensure security and freedom for everyone.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I participated in a similar debate on the budget a few weeks ago, probably on an amendment of the New Democratic Party. When listening to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and other speakers, there was something all too familiar about their participation today. In the weeks since the budget was first introduced into the House, none of the speakers from whom we heard this afternoon have been able to find any fresh material.

I presume that the purpose of the debate, asked for by the official opposition, is to justify the fact that the Leader of Opposition had suddenly discovered unemployment and the problems which unemployment brings to the less fortunate people of this country.

Mr. Lewis: And the government.

Mr. Mackasey: There is my friend. He always provides me with the cue I want. I listened to the speech of that would-be-leader of his party. I compared his radical statements with those he made when he confronted the waffle group. If any one is in a dilemma, it is the hon. member for York Centre—

Mr. Lewis: York South.

Mr. Mackasey: I suspect the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) will be unemployed following that convention, but he will always be welcome in the House. He has the audacity to speak about ordinary people as if he were an ordinary person, and therefore, should know something about the subject.

One of the themes, which has permeated the debate, certainly the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, is a concern with the plight of the unemployed. I would be much too partisan if I pretended that his concern for the unemployed of this country were superficial or new found. The record of the Leader of the Opposition when he was the premier of Nova Scotia indicates that he does have a social conscience and does care for the people. I take issue with the Leader of the Opposition and others who presume that concern for the unemployed people of this country is limited to the Opposition. This is not so, Mr. Speaker. We do not need a lecture on what unemployment does to a country. No one on this side of the House is happy with the rate of unemployment.

Some speakers have said that we must look back to the great depression to remember unemployment. We do not have to look back that far, Mr. Speaker. We need only go back 10, 11 or 12 years in order to remember unemployment in this country. Some newer members in this chamber do not remember the debates of 1962 and 1963. I wish to deal with the rate of unemployment in those years, but not to be highly partisan because this is not a partisan debate.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member said "oh, no". I wrote down some of the adjectives he used, such as stupid, arrogant. He suppressed the hope that the Prime Minister would not stay away to amuse himself. The hon. member does not know how to be nonpartisan. He does not think this subject is worthy of being nonpartisan. He is now in the unfavourable position where everything he says in the House of Commons will have some bearing on the events that will take place in the months to come. He is on the horns of a dilemma. His position is not unlike the position adopted by his party toward the problems of Quebec. At one time, they could hide behind the communications wall. Now, there is instantaneous communication and, events in Quebec can be reported ten minutes later in British Columbia.

In 1958, when the Conservatives were in power, the national rate of unemployment in this country was seven per cent. That was not in the hungry thirties, it was only 12 years ago. In 1959, the rate of unemployment was six per cent; 1960, seven per cent; 1961, 7.1 per cent and 1962, 5.9 per cent. I think we are interested in regional figures. The rate of unemployment in 1958 in the Atlantic region was 12.3 per cent. In 1959, it was 10.9 per cent; 1960, 10.5 per cent; 1961, 11.2 per cent and 1962, 10.7 per cent. I put these figures on the record, Mr. Speaker, not as a partisan Liberal, not because I want to engage in this type of debate, but to emphasize the fact that we do not have to go to the hungry thirties to remember unemployment in this country. We only have to go back to the last time the opposition party happened to be in power. When the opposition party was in power, they were faced with problems of an inflation which they inherited. What did they do about it between 1958 and 1962, other than fighting with the Bank of Canada? They ran the unemployment figures in this country to a consistent seven per cent figure between the years 1958 and 1962, then the Canadian people put them out of office.

I do not want to be dishonest and say that we are not concerned about the December rate of unemployment which was 6.6 per cent. That is not a very nice figure. It does not give me any consolation when I compare it with the 1960 figure. In 1958, today's official opposition had just come into office and their financial policy did not have time to take effect. By 1960, midterm, it had a chance to take effect. The actual figure for unemployment in 1960, and I can give seasonal figures because they are similar, was 8.2 per cent for the month of December. As a matter of fact, the Tories had an interesting year in 1960. In January, 1960 the rate was 8.8 per cent; February, 9.6 per cent; March, 9.7 per cent; April, 8.8 per cent, and right down the line to December when the rate was 8.2 per cent.

But, of course, it is no consolation to the unemployed of today to know that Canadians were in a much more precarious position in 1960. In December, 1962, when the opposition was still in power, the rate of unemployment was 6.3 per cent. It may be interesting to note that when we took over the figure, by years, dropped to 5.1, 4.1, 3.5, 3.6, 4.6, 4.7, 4.7, 6.5. If there is any doubt in anyone's mind as to whether we can lick unemployment, that doubt should be dispelled. We were faced with unemployment when we took power in 1963. We did something about it then, and we are doing something about it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Last night I watched the Leader of the Opposition on television. I have also watched other people on television. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will participate in this debate tomorrow. He will show that he made the proper adjustments to his policy as far back as March. He will indicate that we are about the experience an effective stimulation of the economy.

There is one thing missing which would help this country to take off again. The Leader of the Opposition spoke about this as late as February of last year. I am referring to the psychological effect of confidence in this country. If investors, foreign and domestic, who look to Canada as a place to invest their money and stimulate the economy over the next decade, read some of the speeches of gloom and doom which were made this afternoon, they would be damned fools to spend a nickel in this country. Fortunately, they know that the record of Canada is good. They know that we are going to take off again. They know that we are on the right track financially.

We need a bit of confidence, not only from the people of Canada, the bankers and industrialists, but from members opposite. They should understand that the fate of this country depends to a great extent on the future prosperity of the future of this country.

All of us should get together to examine the problem of unemployment. I have not been in the House all that long but, in my view, there is one basic difference between the plight of the unemployed in 1970 as compared to 1960. I live in a residential constituency of the island of Montreal. It can be quite adequately described as a workingman's district with railway, Northern Electric and aircraft workers. They suffer unemployment to an unprecedented degree when the economy pulls downward. I remember their plight in 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961 and 1962. Where did they go in 1960? Unemployment insurance benefits were very low in those days as compared even with the present benefits. There was welfare, where welfare existed, but what other programs were on the books to look after the unemployed between 1958 and 1962? There were none, Mr. Speaker. No winter works program, no Department of Manpower, no manpower program. There was no Canada assistance program, no Canada pension plan, no Quebec pension plan. There were no mobility grants, no medicare except in the Province of Saskatchewan and we must pay tribute to hon. gentlemen who belong to the New Democratic Party for that. In fact, there was very little unemployment in Saskatchewan because most of the people were on their way to British Columbia. Statistically, that is so. In any event, there was very little for the unemployed in those days.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The greatest thing we can do for the unemployed is, of course, to provide jobs for them and this should be the prime objective of the present government or of any government. Increasingly, an educated work force demands this, and will continue to do so. But at least we can console ourselves with the knowledge that today the unemployed can turn to some programs. Daily during the question period some people in the opposition laugh at the manpower training program. I do not have to defend the record of that program or of my colleague, the hon. minister responsible for it. However, I looked up the statistics which reflect a program which exists today but which was not in existence during the great depression when the Tories were in power between 1958 and 1962.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Mackasey: I did not interrupt the hon. member and I am not running for any office, so just leave me alone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: An intelligent response on the part of the minister.

Mr. Mackasey: I am glad the hon. member has judged me to be intelligent. Coming from him, I consider it to be a real compliment. He is quite a judge.

We spent on manpower training in 1969-70 no less than $245,044,076, a staggering sum of money when we realize it comes out of general revenue. This sum was not placed at the disposal of the unemployed ten years ago. As my colleague mentioned today during the question period, the manpower program not only helps the unemployed by providing a weekly income but it trains unemployed persons to be able to take advantage of the economic upswing when it comes in the next few months.

Since 1960, as a result of prodding by many members of this House—I think it is fair to say they were representative of all parties—we have seen the introduction of the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan. These were not around in the days of 7 per cent and 8 per cent unemployment in 1960. Many regard the Canada pension plan as merely providing a pension at the age of 65 for those who contribute, but those who know the act better realize that it provides an income for people who are prematurely retired from the work force as a result of disability or illness or other circumstances. This program was not around when unemployment reached its highest peak in the sixties but it is one to which the unemployed will be turning increasingly as the plan reaches maturity in the next few years.

There are other programs such as medicare which are of enormous assistance to the unemployed. I have already paid tribute to the NDP for introducing it first in Saskatchewan. It has now been extended across the country and it removes a tremendous financial burden from the shoulders of those least able to pay the cost of hospitalization and medical fees. It is another program which did not exist when the Conservatives were in power and we had a 7 per cent unemployment rate in 1960.

An hon. Member: A forward looking minister.

Mr. Mackasey: All kinds of insurance—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Tories came in 1958. Come on!

Mr. Mackasey: I did not quote the really bad figures, though I could have done so. I thought 1960 was a good year to quote because hon. gentlemen opposite had had two full years to introduce their economic policies and bring down the unemployment rate. What did they do? Unemployment reached the rate of approximately 7 per cent at a time when there was no manpower program to help the unemployed, no medicare except in one province, no mobility grants to help those who had the necessary skills to move to places where jobs were available. There was no ministry of regional economic expansion capable of directing money to parts of the country which needed it more than others; there was no Canada pension plan, no Quebec pension plan. In short, in 1958 and 1960 there was no alternative but to go on welfare. This is not the case today, because a Liberal government had the foresight and the courage to introduce social legislation between 1963 and 1970 which can now be used for the benefit of those who are temporarily unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Just in case I have been too modest with regard to the accomplishments of this government when describing medicare, we ought not to forget that hospital insurance legislation came in during 1957 or 1958 when the leader of the Liberals in the other place was the Minister of Health and Welfare. I think it was back in 1957. But this action was taken before our government was replaced. As I recall, the opposition party never saw fit to enlarge that program so as to make it even more meaningful, as we have done since 1960.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Mackasey: I thank hon. members opposite for their help. They have really been a great help to me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When will you tell us what you intend to do now?

Mr. Mackasey: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will tell the House tomorrow—

An hon. Member: God help us.

Mr. Mackasey: I will tell you what I recommend. Let us not panic or take advantage of this situation in such a way as to make the people feel we are in a depression of the kind we were in between 1958 and 1962. We are not. The Minister of Finance took the proper steps six or eights months ago. They will bear fruit in the early spring, and from then on the number of unemployed will be reduced. The opposition cannot have it both ways. As late as last February, the Leader of the Opposition was talking about the detrimental effect inflation was having, particularly on people living on fixed incomes. One of the statements that he made—this is reported in Hansard though I do not have the page; however, I read everything that the Leader of the Opposition says in debate—was to the effect that we would have to go back a long way to find a country that is in a worse position psychologically than we are today. Having made that statement, what has been the thrust in the debate today of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), and even of the leader of the Creditistes, who gave us a dissertation on Sweden, the evils of socialism and all the benefits of "funny money"? There has been an almost fiendish glee at the predicament they think the government is in—the high rate of unemployment, gloom and doom.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) reduced the interest rate and freed the money supply in this country, there has been ample money in the banks of this country for investment, borrowing and economic expansion. But we must get over the psychological hurdle first. If I were a businessman sitting in the Gallery today listening to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and of other speakers, I would ask what kind of country this is. I would say to myself: "If they have no more confidence in our future than that displayed by their speeches, why should I invest my money in such a country?" I think all of us, the opposition as well as the government, have a responsibility to create the right psychological climate for investors to invest. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out in February, psychology is a very important weapon in the fight against unemployment and the lack of investment.

I have been sitting here since two-thirty listening to speeches in the hope that someone would bring forward a blueprint. But when I heard the Leader of the Opposition repeating some editorials, then I knew there was nothing new in his approach. He talked of reducing income tax in the hope that some money would find its way into the economy sooner or later.

The hon. member for York South made it very clear today that he would reduce taxes, but only personal income tax not corporation tax. Somehow this would stimulate the economy, and so he wants it all ways. I presume the hon. gentleman must have been hampered by the shortness of time in his interview last night, because today I expected him to expand on the kind of programs he would introduce if he were head of the government. He said that perhaps he would take off the building tax since our housing starts are not going to break any records with or without the tax. Certainly, the sales on building materials in no way has impeded our housing starts for this year.

An hon. Member: They are 20 per cent short this year.

Mr. Mackasey: Not because of this tax. We are now reaching our target because we have injected into the economy the money necessary for the construction of the low cost housing which the people need. Built in the right part of the country, this housing will do a lot to reduce inflation and to create a surplus of housing in those areas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what it is about my mannerisms that so upsets the opposition members today, though they seem to make more sense sitting down than when they stand up to make speeches. However, this is not unusual for hon. members on the other side. If hon. members think I have not much to say, then I am continuing this debate as it began two hours ago. What has disappointed me in this debate is that there has not been one fresh idea put forward by any member of the opposition as to how he would tackle the problem of unemployment. That is, of course, apart from the representative from the Creditiste party.

Mr. Baldwin: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Peace River is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, before this debate commenced I rose and suggested that if the government would see fit, through the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp), to bring in supplementary estimates—and I indicated at least four specific items—we would be prepared to suggest that the debate be abandoned. I have not spoken in the debate; I simply raised a point of order to make that suggestion.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I said "new suggestions", and the hon. member has not made a new suggestion in the last ten years. His only answer is that we spend more money, though he does not tell us how we should spend it. He is a member of the party which a couple of years ago complained about the size of the deficit of this government and the effect that it was having on pushing up interest rates in Canada. Interest rates were being driven upwards and therefore this affected investment and borrowing. Hon. gentlemen opposite now want it both ways. As I say, they are barren of new ideas. I was referring to new, refreshing ideas.

Once again the Minister of Finance will emphasize, as he patiently did a few weeks ago, the steps that he has taken during the last six months to stimulate the economy of this country. He will review the funds that he has placed at the disposal of the provinces amounting to $150 million. He will remind hon. members of the drastic decrease in interest rates that has been characteristic of our banking system during the last few months. He will remind hon. members of the injection of money into the housing field. He will mention the $50 million put at the disposal of the unemployed this winter.

Hon. members have talked about extending benefits to the unemployed during winter. Surely, they should know that even under the present scheme benefits are extended on a seasonal basis during the winter. The requirement for eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits in this country are relaxed in order to extend the period of coverage. Virtually any member of the work force is eligible for seasonal benefits if he is laid off during the winter months. So, this is not new; it is already in operation.

It has also been suggested that we should introduce some new programs. The hon. member for York South suggested the immediate payment of $100 a week to people in receipt of unemployment inusrance benefits. I know what the hon. member meant; he meant to a maximum of $100 a week—I do not think the leader of the Creditistes made that clear—or two-thirds of salary up to a maximum of $100 a week take home pay. The unemployment insurance commission plan is designed to do more than simply turn over money to the unemployed. It is designed to co-ordinate the efforts of the departments of manpower, health and welfare, labour, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and other social agencies across the country that have a common interest in the work force of this country.

I would be insulting the members of this House if I suggested that unemployment could be solved immediately; that we can continue to compete with other countries that are highly automated. To do this we must first rationalize the textile industry in Quebec, for one, which is so labour-intensive that it will price itself out of existence if it does not automate. Automation may, of course, cause some unemployment, at least temporary unemployment, until this new automated industry becomes competitive with that of other countries.

This is a process now going on in the textile industry, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) mentioned some months ago. The minister may or may not have mentioned that he is also studying the shoe industry. Where Canadian industry is fully automated and has the economy of scale that the auto and steel industries have, then Canadian workers are as productive, in some cases more productive, than their United States or Swedish counterparts. But this requires new thinking on the part of governments. It means, at times, having the courage to create temporary unemployment intentionally.

It takes a great degree of courage for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to say to the textile industry of Quebec: "If you want to survive you must rationalize your industry. You must accept automation and technological change. You must let us help you rationalize your industry, even if this puts 50 per cent of the workers in the textile industry out of work temporarily". Because this kind of automation is the key solution to our problem. We must make the transition from labour-intensive industry to highly automated industry or this country will not survive in the export market. Certainly, we cannot survive simply by exporting primary products. Our production must be competitive and we must expand our exports of secondary products. This will result when we automate labour-intensive industries such as textiles and shoes.

• (5:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Where are the new ideas?

Mr. Mackasey: They are newer than the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him and the chamber that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mackasey: Well, I cannot satisfy everybody at once.

An hon. Member: Talk about the seventies.

Mr. Mackasey: I rarely can understand what anyone says when he talks in his sleep. If the hon. member wants to talk in his sleep, he should go outside. It takes courage sometimes to create unemployment. We have created unemployment in the textile industry and we will probably create it temporarily in other industries as we automate and as we rationalize these industries.

So far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned, it should be before the House fairly soon. The co-operation of the particular committee which was seized of this problem, and which met during the summer months and early fall, was commendable. I gather its report was fairly unanimous. If my review of the recommendations is accurate, the report endorses most of the proposals in the white paper. July 1 is the target date in respect of the legislation and with the usual co-operation of the House I visualize little difficulty in meeting that target date. The new plan will, I believe, provide not only more moneys for the temporarily unemployed of this country, but will provide a better education for people where education is a problem or is the root cause of unemployment. This should help young people as they enter the work force for the first time. Several members, quite properly, alluded to these people. The government will have to look after the older people who are affected by automation. This will be done through other plans such as the TAB program which was introduced simultaneously with the auto pact. When we rationalize the auto industry it will be up to the government to do something for the people who are displaced because of age or because of an inability to adjust to the new plan so that they will be able to finish their days with dignity.

In conclusion, let me say I take no consolation in the high rate of unemployment, but I am consoled by the fact that although the number of unemployed people in 1970 has been relatively high it has been much lower than in the period between 1958 and 1962 when the Tories were in power. The people now are better off because they have at their disposal not only manpower programs, the Canada pension plan, the Quebec pension plan, transitional benefits, mobility grants, but also additional jobs because of regional and economic expansion. Together with others, these are programs designed to help the Canadian people as a right and not as a privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) is rising to ask a question, but since the minister's time has expired it would have to be asked with unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would merely ask the minister, since he referred to the manpower training plan, whether he retained in his mind the fact that those who are in receipt of allowances and are receiving training are not included in the figure of 538,000 unemployed. If they were considered as unemployed, another 100,000 would have to be added to that figure.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made my point. The 1960 figure would be 100,000 higher because there was no manpower program in those days. In setting up the proper department, we had the vision to provide the proper measures to take 100,000 people off the unemployment rolls and give them up to $108 a week under certain circumstances as well as provide them with an adequate upgrading of their skills and their education where necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister also agree that, in addition to having high unemployment in Canada, in 1971 we have the highest cost of living this country has had for a great period of time?

Mr. Mackasey: Well, the Leader of the Opposition today mentioned the very tools we used to combat inflation. He suggested that one thing we must not do is lose track of the need to continue voluntary restraints in wages and prices. I think these were his words. In other words, he endorsed precisely the policies introduced by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, before I see the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), perhaps hon. members would permit me to deal with the notice required in respect of the adjournment proceedings this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner)—Canadian National Railways—reduction of passenger service in Northern Ontario; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Wheat Board—production and receipts policy—statement in budget respecting stabilization payments; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Trade—development of U.S. markets for Atlantic provinces' products—transportation facilities.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson, that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (page 1808).

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the speech that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) just delivered.

Even with my great admiration for the minister, I must say that his speech is the weakest he ever made since he became Minister of Labour and that it merely amounts to an attempt to justify the government's incompetence in dealing with unemployment.

When a Minister of Labour feels the need to uphold the government's position, to refer to the previous administration, namely the Progressive Conservative administration, and to compare unemployment figures for 1958, 1960, 1962 with the present statistics, this shows that the government is unable to come up with a solution to solve the present unemployment problem.

The minister says: We, in the government, need the understanding of the population and of the members; we seek their suggestions to solve the unemployment problem. I could retort to the minister and to the government members that we have been making suggestions for a year and a half. However, every time the opposition has made representations or suggestions and a problem was settled, the government hastened to say. The opposition had nothing to do with that, we on the government side found the solution.

In this house we have often said and I say it again: the government was elected to administer the country. It is not up to the opposition, but rather to the government, to solve the problems now facing the Canadian people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we analyze the speech delivered by the Minister of Labour, we find that the government offers no solution but acts as if it did not care a hang about the problem and the required solutions.

The opposition has been talking about unemployment We can recall that from 1958 to 1963 when we were in power, the former prime minister or the former hon. member for Essex-East used to ask questions to the government about the unemployment situation.

An hon. Member: But there was no unemployment at that time!

Mr. Asselin: There was and it may have been the reason behind our defeat in 1963. It also explains why this government will be defeated in 1972 unless they find solutions to cope with this national problem.

Some hon Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Asselin: But recalling the past will not solve our problem. We must look ahead and the government should be able to tell us the kind of solutions they are considering.

In September 1970, the Economic Council of Canada warned the government about the unemployment situation, as we can see on page 21 of the report titled:

"Performance and Potential mid-1950's to mid-1970's", and I quote:

> We regard recent and current rates of unemployment as unacceptably high. Canada probably now has the highest rate of unemployment among the more industrially advanced nations, even after allowance for the differences in the bases for unemployment estimates. The current rate is about double the medium-term target for Canada suggested in our Sixth Annual Review. The building up of unemployment to such high levels reflects a very considerable enlargement of burdens and hardships imposed on individuals and families. It also reflects a considerable waste of human resources and a large economic cost to the whole society.

All that can be found in that report.

> Reducing this high level of unemployment must therefore be considered—in human, social and economic terms—as a matter of the highest priority.

What is the present situation? As a Quebec member I would like tonight to describe the present situation in Quebec.

At the time of the last provincial election, the Quebec people were given false hopes. Seconded by the federal Liberal party, Mr. Bourassa stated that in 1971 he would create 100,000 jobs. This was a fine electoral slogan. The unemployed who heard that promise could think that among those 100,000 jobs there would surely be one for him. The Liberal party got into office in Quebec thanks to it.

It was said that if the Liberal party was elected in Quebec while a Liberal government was in power in Ottawa, there would no longer be any problems for Quebekers. Everything would be fine. What is the present situation in Quebec? We have there 197,000 unemployed, i.e. 8.4 per cent of the working population as compared to 7.2 per cent in November and 6.7 per cent for the same period in 1969.

In Quebec, the number of unemployed has increased by 31,000 in one month only and this is exactly half the unemployment increase for the whole of Canada.

The City of Montreal has 2,000 more unemployed than last year at the same date. There were 62,346 unemployed at the end of December. In 1970, only 10,000 jobs have been created in Quebec as compared to 50,000 the preceding year. And the Union Nationale government of that time was no good. It has created 50,000 new jobs in 1969. It is reasonable to hope that this total will reach 14,000 when December figures will be known. In the first eleven months of 1970, there were 10,000 new jobs and 23,000 new unemployed due to the fact that there were 33,000 more people in the labour force.

Such a statement of affairs makes responsible people think because it is a dark picture and it brings people close to desperation. In short, this situation is intolerable in a country such as ours.

We are talking about 25,000 young jobless in Montreal. Many of them are educated.

One of the most modern education systems has been introduced in Quebec. I agree on that point. But the present government forgot one other principle: when providing retraining and trying to educate the young people, we must also find employment opportunities for them. This has not been anticipated!

This is why when we are in our office or in our constituency, people come to ask for employment. They are almost desperate when they realize that conditions are worsening from day to day with no prospective solution to their problems.

Without making any practical suggestion, the Minister of Labour merely blames the previous administration even though the unemployment rate is higher at the present time.

It is not surprising then to note that there is turmoil and dissent in Quebec. It is not surprising that the Quebec Minister of Labour, Mr. Cournoyer, stated not long ago: If conditions do not improve, the number of persons bent on revolution will increase! If we do not take all possible steps if we do not face the conditions and reality, what worries me is that we will never have enough policemen to control the reactions of those victims of our system.

He is not the only one to say such things. The Quebec premier, Mr. Bourassa, said last week that he was concerned and questioned the possibility of creating 100,000 jobs. He did not propose any solution, neither did he say what measures his government might adopt in order to remedy the situation.

Also in the province of Quebec, leaders in industry are sounding the alarm. Mr. Daoust, for instance, said that a disaster is imminent when one finds an 8.4 percent rate of unemployment in Quebec, and that 11,500 permanent jobs were lost last year.

Last night, I read in the papers that such an important concern as SOGEFOR was laying off 800 workers. This concern is made up of four plants which have cost the public and private sectors $9 million.

• (5:20 p.m.)

When we know that 52.8 per cent of business bankruptcies reported in Canada take place in Quebec and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) feels satisfied with the steps taken by his government until now to correct the situation, I say that the government shirks its responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, what are the causes of such a situation? Obviously some will say it is the October crisis, but the October crisis did not come out of the blue. On the contrary, it had roots; unrest existed before but the government had not been wise to it.

The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was saying this afternoon that the main cause of this unrest was the fiscal policy of this government. In this regard, I would like to have recorded in Hansard a statement made by Claude Ryan of the newspaper Le Devoir, in the January 18 1971 issue, in connection with the fiscal policy of the government, which reads as follows:

> With regard to public finance, the Trudeau government has followed one of the most reactionary policies . . . Obsessed with the idea of a balanced budget, it has forced provincial and municipal governments, by driving them to deficit budgeting through its fiscal miserliness, to increase their debt abroad—
> The government has also—
>
> —withdrawn from the private sector such a large share of the national product that this sector has lost much of its punch—
>
> —at the expense of the majority of workers. Thus—
>
> —numerous categories of citizens, who depend more directly on government allowances, have been reduced to an income level close to poverty.

[Mr. Asselin.]

Mr. Speaker, if our country is to survive, the time has come to return to a more dynamic concept of public finance. I continue to quote:

> The government should offer new incentives to economic agents whose decisions and creativity are essential to economic development.

For almost three months we have been asking the government to re-establish the winter works program so that instead of making people dependent on welfare funds or unemployment insurance as the present government wants to do, paying them measly allowances, they may be provided with jobs.

Many of our welfare recipients are not interested in welfare grants. A large number of them are on welfare because they have to be. Most of them would like to have jobs.

Why did not the government re-activate the winter works program? It will be said that the system produced fraud. This is obvious. But it is possible to pass legislation to prevent it. It is more interesting for a person who is engaged in winter works, in a municipality, to earn $15 a day than to receive a scanty allowance of $150 a month. He is less inclined to idleness and passivity.

Mr. Speaker, we made suggestions to the government. When we asked it to remove the 11 per cent tax on building materials, why did it turn a deaf ear? It would have been possible thus to provide work for the unemployed. People would have sold more manufactured products.

When the government was requested to drop the 3 per cent surtax, what did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) answer? It had been imposed for one year only. The Minister of Finance maintained it.

I heard this afternoon the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) speak about taxes, the 3 per cent surtax; it is his party that voted in favour of maintaining the 3 per cent surtax in 1967—along with the government.

Mr. Speaker, when when will the federal government give up part of its jurisdiction to the provinces so as to permit them to use the best economic means to face their situation?

This afternoon I put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (M. Marchand) who answered that the federal government had given Quebec $150 million to fight unemployment. Then we are told that from those $150 million, $68 million will be earmarked for the building of roads in Montreal. How many jobs will this create, Mr. Speaker? Fourteen hundred jobs for $68 million! The building of roads entails expropriations, the purchase of land; judiciary and extrajudiciary expenses have to be paid. Then, is it logical to grant $68 million to fight unemployment and create only 1,400 jobs in Quebec? I am not blaming the Quebec government for accepting this money and for building roads in Montreal but I suggest that it is illogical that only 1,400 jobs should follow.

I am taking the floor because I represent a riding where unemployment is at its peak and 25 per cent of the labour force is idle. When the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion claims that the granting of subsidies is creating employment I say that they are not distributed proportionately throughout the province, since several ridings of the Lower St. Lawrence region and the North Shore have received nothing.

We have made representations. At Sacré-Cœur, in my riding, a card-board plant has been set up by the C.F.U. and the farmers have invested several thousands of dollars into it. Government help is necessary and we need a few million dollars. We called on the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. We were sent back to Quebec to inquire whether the Quebec government would agree to the proposal. Mr. Speaker, this cardboard plant at Sacré-Cœur could provide jobs for some 1,500 people.

To what use were put the grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion? Indeed, such grants have helped some industries, but have jobs been created in numbers as large as was hoped? Have the unemployed benefited from them to the maximum? It was said today that automation and technology have entered the labour market. Formulas should be found to directly help a worker find employment. And this is the challenge that this Parliament and especially this government should meet considering the tragic situation facing us at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, there is also need for a more thorough selection for retraining among the labour force. In that respect, huge amounts of money are being lost in my own constituency and in several others in the province.

In my constituency, housewives are attending seventh grade classes, to receive $60 per week of course. The housewife hires a babysitter for $15 per week, and she earns $60 per week while retraining. For what purpose does she need retraining?

• (5:30 p.m.)

Retraining courses should be more rigorously selective, to prevent the taxpayers' money from being wasted in such a shocking way.

Mr. Speaker, the government's employment policy and fight against unemployment have failed. They resorted right off to a long term policy. What is being done? Were there consultations with the economic councils and Chambers of Commerce of each area? Those people, Mr. Speaker, have studied all aspects of the situation. They spend hours and hours examining economic conditions in their area and find solutions to their problems. The Minister of Economic Regional Expansion as well as the Department of Labour should immediately have a mobile team meet the responsible persons from those regional economic councils as well as the Chambers of Commerce to seek advice from them on projects that could be launched immediately in order to alleviate unemployment in Canada and especially in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, another way would be to ask this government whether they are really willing to fight unemployment. A federal-provincial conference on unemployment problems should be convened immediately, a conference which municipalities' representatives could attend so as to find solutions to this acute problem. When an emergency occurred in Quebec, emergency measures were passed. Unemployment has now become an urgent issue and the government should take the steps available to them to cope with the situation.

Should the government, in spite of all our suggestions, Mr. Speaker, persist in not making rapid, urgent and efficient decisions in order to fight against unemployment, it will show that this government was not sincere when they talked about war on poverty, that the prime minister's "just society" slogan was merely window-dressing and that the government was not ready for action. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I say that if the necessary steps are not taken in order to cope with this problem, this government will be very severely judged by the Canadian people on the day of reckoning.

[English]

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is an understatement to say that the time has come for us to shift primary emphasis in economic strategy for policies of restraint to expansionist policies. In the budget address, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was pleased to note how well Canada has succeeded in containing inflation. Perhaps we have succeeded too well.

Since we are a relatively thin economy which is dependent upon foreign trade more than any other country in the world, we cannot afford to have a rate of inflation which exceeds that of our trading partners, making our goods uncompetitive. On the other hand, it is not good for us to have zero inflation when inflation gallops ahead in countries which are our suppliers and our customers. If we have zero inflation, or an acceleration too far below that of the rest, we find, especially with the long-term capital inflows which Canada generally attracts, the balance of payments pressures pushing our dollar upward. Thus there is the possibility of as much damage in this direction being caused as accelerating prices would cause. The hardness of our dollar, in which the minister took such pride, can be as much a problem as inflation itself. This, for example, is the testimony of the pulp and paper industries.

The target, I suggest, is to have only slightly better performance than the others. It is easy enough to say this, but the implication is that our policy has to be that of hitting a moving target whose momentum can only be guessed, and of having to fire the shots well ahead of time. This, I feel, shows how tough the job of formulating price stability policies can be. No one has to be reminded that fiscal and monetary price stability policies which have been pursued have implications on economic growth and employment and that in some areas the results produced by the government's policies have been unacceptable, especially if one considers the regional implications.

It is too simple and too misleading to focus on one economic performance target at a time. When ministers of finance assess the performance of the economy and make their periodic prescriptions, they must do so in terms of a number of goals and not just shoot at one.

These important goals include full employment, reasonable price stability, sustained economic growth and a stable balance of payments.

Looking at the problem around us in the Canadian economy today we can see how difficult it can be for the government to meet the challenge of finding that balance. Why is it so hard? The measure of the challenge has a number of dimensions. They are: First, the apparent cyclical nature of a free market economy. Second, the extent of our dependence upon foreign influences over which Canada has no control, both in the international market for capital, long and short term, and in the international market for commodities and goods. Third, the division of jurisdiction over the public sector in our federal system, with its implications for taxing, borrowing and spending. Fourth, the lag between the occurrence of economic events and the collection of sufficient information to permit them to be seen. Fifth, the lag between the taking of corrective action and the coming into effect of such action. A final element is the limited number of measures which the government has chosen so far to adopt in order to achieve the economic performance goals. This is the aspect of the problem on which I wish to concentrate.

The present administration has increased the number of measures that it is prepared to adopt, but not far enough. Fiscal and monetary policies have been relied on, and their regional and sectoral impacts have been sharpened by this government more than by any of its predecessors. In addition, more effective measures to increase the geographical and occupational mobility of labour have been devised and heavily financed. Rationalization of industries, agricultural, industrial and financial, is taking place to some degree, with important government intervention. Hopefully, more will take place through an improved competition policy which has been promised for this month. There are efforts to improve the workings of the marketplace through better consumer information.

The budget that we are debating, Mr. Speaker, calls for a direct stimulation to the economy. The Minister of Finance has referred to it as a $2 billion shift in direction. Some critics would like to see the government spending more, and spending it faster. In addition, there are calls for sweeping tax relief. I ask, what are the implications of this about-face which is indicated in economic policy? After buying price stability by paying so high a social cost in unemployment—a toll which may get worse before it gets better—is the government going to abandon the inflation battle without taking precautions against the recurrence of inflation? The hard fact is that for all the experience of the last 18 months we are launching the economy into a phase in which there will inevitably be increased pressure on prices, which will heat up the economy, and yet we have produced no new tools for cooling it off. The government's defence to this charge is that the expansionary policies chosen are more selective than expansionist policies have been in the past. I submit that these assurances are not entirely convincing.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, needs a policy of selective controls on prices and incomes. We need machinery to control prices, to control rents, to control wages and to control incomes. Jawboning does not work, public pressure does not work, guidelines do not work, and voluntary formulas have failed for want of volunteers. We need a system of controls, and so far this government, which has been very determined in its economic policies, has not had the guts to propose one. Especially in dealing with the labour sector, the government has not yet shown the kind of courage which will achieve results. Of course, a system of controls presents its own problems.

Firstly, it should be recognized that a free market is preferable to one with controls. The Gallup polls recently taken tell us that the public is prepared to accept price controls. But how much public understanding is there of the implications? One of the fundamental values in our society is the free bargaining process, labour being free to bargain for the price it is to be paid for its services and producers being free to determine the goods which they wish to produce and the prices they will seek to obtain. Whatever policy of controls we adopt, its ultimate objective should be a return to the free market. Second, selective controls are inevitably unfair because they permit the sectors which are not selected to continue to exercise whatever market pressure they can, and in the state of our present marketplace this can be considerable. For this reason, a package of controls would have to be selected on a basis which would be politically acceptable to a broad cross-section of the Canadian people.

It seems clear that the danger area in the economy today is wage pressure. This is demonstrated by the price performance of labour in the market in the past year of economic decline. Historically, the labour market has responded like other markets to pressures of supply and demand. More recently, labour, especially unionized labour, has ceased to be a dependent variable in the economic picture. Wage increases are an inexorable, independent variable: they tend to move independently, irrespective of market forces.

In contrast by no stretch of the imagination can corporate profits, however measured, be considered the culprit in today's inflation. Notwithstanding this, I cannot imagine an imposed control on labour costs being acceptable or successful without some control on rent, which is one of the greatest and fastest growing expenses of the average Canadian. Again, justice would require some control over the incomes of the professionals who serve the public and of management personnel, particularly in the key industries which might be chosen for wage control. A third consideration is that the controls must be used on a short-term basis.

It can be seen that permanent price and incomes controls could not be selective. They would have to be comprehensive, otherwise there would be a damaging distortion of the economy as resources moved from the controlled to the uncontrolled sectors. Further, the longer the term of the control period, the more complex the machinery would have to be. Inevitable inequities, which may be sustainable on a short-term basis, would have to be ironed out by reviews and appeals as the term lengthened.

A final problem that I want to touch on is the need that such machinery be established and put into place quickly when it is required, complete with the bureaucracy needed for administration and policing, and the necessity of communicating quickly to all individuals affected a clear understanding of their responsibilities. For this reason, I would propose that Parliament enact a kind of economic war measures act, that is to say, that a control system be legislated but not put into effect for the time being.

Let us have a proposal from the government that can be considered by Parliament, interested groups and the public at large. Let us improve it as a system through the process of public participation; and then let it sit on the shelf for implementation if and when special sectors or regions of the economy begin to heat up as expansionary policies now being debated take effect. Then when the powers are required to be put into place, there will be the public understanding and acceptance which is necessary to make them work, and there will be an effective method of breaking the spine of the inflationary spiral.

Mr. Frank Moores (Bonavista-Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech shows vividly that the government and its advisers do not realize what is going on in the economy of this country. In view of the unemployment figures recently released, the budget speech, which when presented was an admission of the uncertainty of the government on the unlikely course of economic developments in Canada, has now shown further the grossly inadequate appreciation that this government has of the economic situation.

The budget, Mr. Speaker, is the product of a man who really does not know where the ball is going to bounce. It offered no immediate stimulus to the economy. It was based on an assumption that the economy will swing up. In the most recent unemployment figures, as has been reviewed by my colleagues, we have seen the numbers of persons unemployed leap to the highest point experienced in Canada in ten years. What was the reaction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to this situation? It was the usual verbal platitude, "that new measures included in the budget... would start to take effect in the near future". I would like to know what the Minister of Finance means when he uses the word "start". When does he intend to start? It is obvious that he has not started yet? How does he intend to start? There is certainly nothing in this minibudget to allow for even a ministart—and what is required is very much more. It would seem obvious, Mr. Speaker, that this government has only one economic transmission, start, stop and reverse, but obviously no ahead.

At the end of last December there were in Canada 150,000 more people unemployed than at the same time a year ago. In total, 538,000 able-bodied Canadians were unable to find work. This figure of 538,000, Mr. Speaker, is the number of people eligible for work, but a great many others are affected and affected directly by these people not being able to find employment. Taking the average number of dependants per worker in Canada, we have between 1,700,000 and 1,800,000 Canadians, men, women and children, directly suffering the cruel effects of unemployment. This means that the number of people directly affected by unemployment in Canada today is more than the population of any province in Canada with the exception of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. In fact, it is more than the total population of the three Maritime provinces.

The present situation has been reached as a direct result of government action in certain areas, and inaction in others. At no time have we seen planning with wisdom, or even reaction, once the crisis was obvious. Even now, when the crisis is upon us, what is the government's position? The Acting Prime Minister noted that the government had predicted a steady reduction in unemployment and now says, "We have no reason to change this forecast". He further indicated that the government has no immediate plans or new crash programs aimed at easing unemployment.

I think it is now quite obvious to even the most complacent Canadians—except the government, which seems to be the most complacent of all—that this government is incapable not only of planning with any degree of wisdom but of even carrying out any worth while plan that may be offered by others. We have a situation facing Canada that approaches the catastrophic, and it is handled by the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the other ministers with all the initiative we have come to expect from computerized inertia. Successful programs and accurate forecasting have never been the government's strong point, yet members of the cabinet are quoted as remaining optimistic about the economy and are sticking by earlier forecasts predicting a steady reduction in unemployment. This afternoon we heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) say it took courage to create unemployment. He seemed to be proud of it. I say it will take wisdom to correct it, and this is what is lacking.

We have been advised that the ranks of the unemployed have risen by 13 per cent since the end of November—40 per cent above the figure at this time last year. And still the government remains optimistic. What does it take to persuade the government to accept the reality that a very real crisis faces the country and that something must be done about it? We need a great deal more than we have witnessed lately, which one could almost call government by extrasensory perception.

One of the characteristics of the government since its election is that it has treated people as if they were numbers: it has depended upon the computer to provide the answers, when what is needed is realization that Canadians are individuals, individuals with human emotions. People cannot be computerized, nor can their emotions. By failing to recognize this, the government has been responsible for the cruelest neglect and waste of the greatest resource a country can have—the people themselves. The government deliberately ran down the economy in order, we are told, to fight inflation. What we have seen is the fighting of inflation at any cost—and the cost has been far too great. The unhappy feature all along is that the government has been behind the play; it was late getting on to inflation, and late getting off. It took so long to recognize the situation that it had to go for the overkill.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was quoted as saying on December 23 that inflation had been licked. Inflation may have been temporarily subdued, Mr. Speaker, but for the Prime Minister of Canada to encourage the public to believe that inflation has been licked is misleading. Wage increases during the last six months cannot but be reflected in price increases in 1971. The bond market, which is the best indication of the government's handling of the economy, exposes the Prime Minister's statement that inflation has been licked. Rates for long-term lending are still very high, and the long-term security yield has budged almost not at all.

The treasurer of the Ontario government, Mr. MacNaughton, called upon the federal government on December 7 to expand the output of the economy, to stimulate the economies of high-growth regions. He warned provincial and municipal governments that they would be forced into incurring higher levels of borrowing and/or tax increases if Ottawa continued its policy conducive to low average growth. One step the Minister of Finance should have taken immediately was the ending of the 3 per cent surtax. Canadians expected him to announce tax cuts to stimulate the economy. Instead, he imposed an additional tax, as it were, by retaining the surtax.

Canada cannot afford continued excessive unemployment. The Economic Council estimates the country has lost $3 billion in production because of high unemployment levels. The government accepts this inhumane, disgraceful fact with complacency. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) was quoted on January 2 as saying he would accept an unemployment rate of 6 per cent, or even a rate as high as 10 per cent. No Canadian should accept this, Mr. Speaker, and any representative of the Canadian electors who does should resign.

The supplementary estimates approved in the closing hours before the Christmas recess are another indication of the direction of economic policies of this government. Sixty-nine million extra dollars were needed to finance the public debt because the government had been forced to borrow more than was originally intended. Fifty-one million extra dollars were needed for payment to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan because more people were on dole, had been forced on dole, than was expected.

What the government does not realize, apparently, is that once the economy has intentionally been slowed down, it cannot be stimulated again by words alone. People who a few years ago were expanding and developing the economy as entrepreneurs have become frightened of government policies and are reluctant to begin again where they left off. You cannot just turn a switch and change the mood of the people. Something much more positive and meaningful must be done to get the economy going again. A great many businesses have slowed to a walk. The easing of interest rates on money probably means they will not actually go bankrupt, but neither will they develop to the extent which is required. Speaking of bankruptcy, I say that mental bankruptcy seems to be the forte of this government. It is vital that hon. gentlemen opposite admit they are wrong, if only for the sake of the people they were elected to serve.

The stark statistics of unemployment are the most eloquent comment which can be made on the failure of the government's economic policies. The Minister of Finance cannot, or will not, offer the slightest hope that the worst may be over. Neither can he fall back upon some statistical rationalization by saying that the seasonally adjusted rate is improving. It rose last month, and there is every indication that later this winter these figures will become much worse. Yet the government carries on in the same optimistic vein, predicting that things will get better soon.

Regardless of what the government may say, unemployment is the direct result of its economic mismanagement. Surely members opposite must realize by now that their policies are altogether inadequate. I plead with the Minister of Finance to be honest and truthful with the people. We must tell the people the truth about the seriousness of unemployment, and the government should release its forecasts showing how bad it is likely to get. Only after first admitting the gravity of the situation will we be able to find a solution for it.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Moores: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying at six o'clock, before the government can find a solution to unemployment it must appreciate the enormity of the problem facing Canada. Trying to curtail inflation by creating unemployment has not worked in other countries and it will not work in Canada. The government's policy of deliberately creating massive unemployment to stem inflation is wrong. It is easy for me to criticize lack of action by this government over the past year or so, but the future is what is important now. Where do we, as a nation, go from here? What can we do to initiate a policy that will not only correct the present situation but ensure that a similiar situation does not happen again in the years ahead?

It is essential that we implement tax cuts, as was outlined by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) today, and it is imperative that the Minister of Finance give consideration to making these tax cuts immediately for the good of this country. Even doing this now will mean that it will take time before the effect is fully felt, but it is imperative that it be done now in order that the situation does not get out of hand. The over-all Canadian economy must be put back on the track, and it is the duty of this government to take the first step by acting now.

High unemployment affects all Canada, but particularly the have-not regions. In my province of Newfoundland the situation is very much worse than in any other province in Canada. At the end of last August, the provincial department of social services and rehabilitation revealed that 93,000 Newfoundlanders were receiving assistance from that department. That in itself indicates that almost 19 per cent of the population are on social assistance. The recent unemployment figures show that 68,000 men, women and children in Newfoundland are directly affected by unemployment. This, in a province with just 500,000 total population, is a staggering statistic.

One notices in the statistics for all of Canada that 8,940,000 was the number of people in the work force in November, 1970, and 8,329,000 was the work force in December. This is a drop of 611,000 people in the work force in one month. The minister shakes his head, but these are the figures published by the department. These 611,000 people find it impossible to get work, and after many calls to manpower have just given up in frustration. Many of this group live in areas such as Newfoundland where work opportunities just do not exist. Their dropping out of the work force is now shown in the unemployment figures. I believe that if an accurate assessment were made of the Newfoundland work force, it would show close to 20 per cent of our population presently unemployed, and this figure will increase as the winter progresses.

The Premier of Newfoundland does not even admit that we have an unemployment problem. As a matter of fact, a short time ago one of his ministers said on a television program that a "wave of prosperity" was sweeping across the province. No problem will ever be solved if those in authority do not first realize that it exists. In Newfoundland the government is forecasting a miniboom for next summer. If this occurs, so much the better. But the question should be asked: What about next winter? What we are seeing in Newfoundland is the creation of temporary jobs of a seasonal nature, with virtually no consideration being given to long-term prospects. The Premier is introducing a master plan—or, as some prefer to call it, "The master's plan"—at an economic conference he has called for February 4, 5 and 6.

Any plan for Newfoundland would have to include heavy inputs of money from the federal government. Yet last Monday in this House, when asked if any special plan was being prepared for Newfoundland, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) admitted having no knowledge of such a plan and afterwards intimated that he did not have any knowledge of the conference. This is the type of harebrain scheme we have come to expect from the provincial government in Newfoundland. There are promises and more promises, but very little is accomplished.

Newfoundland is badly in need of a plan for its future development. It needs a great deal more than the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has provided to date. An infrastructure for industrial development is being established. No one can say that services are not required nor that they are not desirable, but they will be meaningful only if the people who are to use them have the opportunity to earn enough to maintain a decent standard of living, which is not the case at present.

A short while ago the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council met with the House committee here in Ottawa. They suggested that Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland be included in the incentives program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which is to be made available for primary industries. I agree with this and believe it is very essential. The federal government, with approval of the provincial government, has a wrong order of priorities. The problems of Newfoundland are very different from those of Montreal. The type of urban, bureaucratic thinking we have had to date will not work in Newfoundland.

The Atlantic Advisory Council was commissioned to undertake a study in Newfoundland to determine why the regional incentives program is not working. It is not working, and the minister and his department are aware of this. I hope when they find the answer they will come up with something that will be workable in our province. To date the program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has created very few permanent jobs in Newfoundland. The reason is that the department responsible for that program has ignored the resource development of our province which many people, including myself, feel is by far the top priority if we in Newfoundland are to establish our identity. Our people must develop an excellence in what they know, and they must develop the industries that are natural to their situation. It is not reasonable to expect Newfoundland to develop a sophisticated industrialized base. The people of Newfoundland have not been trained for sophisticated industry. Our people have a knowledge of the industries with which they are familiar. The people of Newfoundland want the industries to become better than they already are.

The future of rural Newfoundland must include the development of the resource industries and the establishment of an excellence in respect of these industries. It makes no more sense to establish an industrialized base in Newfoundland whereby our people would have to become involved in scientific training, than it does to ask the maître d' of the Queen Elizabeth Hotel to operate a chainsaw. We must develop our primary industries, which would include direct assistance to small operations based on raw materials such as fish, lumber, minerals, agricultural products, and so on. We are witnessing a program that will create part-time jobs while what we must have is full-time employment.

Our people must be given the opportunity to contribute to this great nation. Regardless of the Premier's attitude there is in Newfoundland a reawakening of the people who want to opt in. Our people in Newfoundland are basically peaceful, but they are becoming fed up with government mismanagement and misinterpretation both at the federal and provincial levels. They want opportunities. They want to play their part in Canada and not be treated as second-class citizens. It is the responsibility of the federal government to develop programs that will realistically help develop provinces such as Newfoundland. It must be realized that the people in these areas will never have the same degree of affluence we find in large Canadian cities. However, the degree of affluence must be increased so that the people can live decently and enjoy the many advantages their locations provide.

The province of Newfoundland has a great future. The resource potential is greater than that of the other Atlantic provinces put together. This resource potential must be exploited for the benefit of all the people and not just a few, as is presently the case. As I said earlier, the people of Canada cannot be treated as just so many numbers. Each individual and each region is different, and all in their own way have a contribution to make. This has not been appreciated by the present government, and it must be if our country is to have the destiny which is rightfully ours, from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. It is not in any way in criticism of what he said. If I heard him correctly, he indicated there had been a decrease in the labour force of 611,000. I heard this figure and I am sure it is wrong. The change in the labour force, on a seasonally adjusted basis, was 65,000 and on a non-adjusted basis it was 79,000.

Mr. Moores: What is the actual figure?

Mr. Benson: I just gave it, if my hon. friend would listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the minister asked a question. If the hon. member wishes to reply, he may do so.

Mr. Moores: The information I received this morning from DBS would indicate that the figure for November was 8,940,000 and the figure for December was 8,329,000. After having made a mistake a few days ago, I am sure the minister would not want to make another one now.

Mr. Benson: I would simply say I have not made a mistake.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would hon. members resume their seats? I believe we are entering into an area of debate; it is not a matter of question and answer. I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler).

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, before entering into this debate I should like to clear up a small matter. I am a great admirer of the province of Newfoundland. I have visited it only once, but from what I have seen it would appear to be an intriguing place. However, there are not eight million people in Newfoundland; therefore, I do not know how eight million people could be involved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would hon. members resume their seats?

Mr. Moores: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. member that Newfoundland did join confederation and I was talking about Canadian and not Newfoundland figures.

Mr. Osler: It does not really matter whether we are talking about eight million people, 800,000 people, 80,000 or eight people in Newfoundland who are unemployed and who find difficulty. The point is that no one on either side of this House has the slightest reason to rejoice when there are unemployed people in Canada. Therefore, I do not think our intent or either side of this House differs greatly.

• (8:20 p.m.)

It rather appalled me that the only constructive criticism I have heard so far today on this subject has come from the government side of the House and not from the opposition side; yet it seems to me the opposition should be the ones to criticize constructively. So I would like to add my little bit of criticism, after saying that I must agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) that much has been done since the last time we had a bad unemployment problem in this country. Much has been done to make this grievous problem less grievous for those who are suffering from it. But much more must be done and we must reach the time when we do not have unemployment at all.

For a moment I would like to consider the country as a whole and ask, as one who comes from a non-central province, are the dice loaded in this confederation of ours? I think they are. I think the central provinces control the House of Commons, and therefore they must control the caucus of any national party that has gained power in the House of Commons. The Fathers of Confederation anticipated this. They supposed they would be able to have the regions represented equally by setting up a Senate to which they would give regional responsibilities. But the Senate does not represent regions, and because Senators are appointed it is very hard for us to convince anyone that the Senate represents anyone at all.

Even if the Senate were truly to represent regions, then the Fathers of Confederation did not allow for western Canada becoming part of confederation later, and we have never had the right number of Senators to represent our region in confederation up until today. So I say there is something wrong in confederation; there is something wrong at the seat of power. The federal government always derives all its power from the centre, because the federal government gets its power solely by representation by population, which cannot help but be detrimental to those living in Manitoba, Newfoundland or anywhere else that is not at the centre.

To solve the problem of unemployment and many other problems, we need constitutional reform. I will not talk tonight about constitutional reform. We also need reform of the rules of the House of Commons, which does not necessarily call for constitutional reform. We are not a unitary state, and it is ludicrous for us to go on into our second century pretending that to embody unitary machinery for our government, which is good enough for Britain which is a unitary state, is good enough for us. It is not good enough for us. We need constitutional reform. But be this as it may, in recent years there has been a new concern for true federalism in Canada and a new concern for the unemployed and the unemployable, as the Minister of Labour pointed out this afternoon. The present government has shown very encouraging signs of heeding this concern in both directions, so that some day Canada may provide equality of opportunity for all its citizens no matter where they live or under what circumstances they happen to have been born. Surely that is the good thing toward which we must always work.

I want to illustrate what I am talking about. I picked up the Globe and Mail of last Friday and found on page 1 two important articles on the subject of pollution. The first article said that the lower Great Lakes and portions of the St. Lawrence River already constitute a serious health hazard, thanks to industrial and human pollution. Canada's share of the clean up costs would be around $211 million, in 1968 dollars. The second article said that rapid urbanization and industrialization will accelerate this trend. Within 30 years, more than half of Canada's population will have become concentrated in the St. Lawrence valley and the lower Fraser River valley. So there will be a very serious pollution problem in two beautiful areas of Canada. Does this have to be so? We as Members of Parliament can do something about it if we really want to.

During the holidays I read Pierre Berton's book "The National Dream". I think it is a very interesting book and I would like to paraphrase one thought in it. He said that before confederation, Canada was a country whose population was trapped in the prison of the St. Lawrence lowlands. Now, 100 years later, does it make any sense to sit idly by while the average Canadian needlessly and mindlessly reimprisons himself in that same St. Lawrence Valley and fouls his prison irrevocably in the process?

It is my contention that the latest budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will, unwittingly I am sure, add its little contribution to the process of fouling up this prison that is being reconstituted in the St. Lawrence valley. All of us surely must decry this process and the fact that it is continuing. This budget may also tend to add to another form of pollution, which is mind pollution, namely, regional discontent that any thinking person who is interested in Canada as a whole must equally abhor.

Let me tell hon. members why I think this is so. In the minister's budget speech I heard no less than six observations and statements indicating his and the government's concern for the principle of equality of opportunity for those living in Canada's various regions. I found, however, that in the specific measures the Minister of Finance proposed, only about a third of them seemed to me to have any direct bearing on the aim of narrowing the regional economic differences which presently exist. Yet it is in regional differences of economic opportunity that the root causes of our present grave unemployment problem are to be found.

Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, for illustrating this statement by being very Manitoban in my approach to the subject. In the latter part of 1969 it became clear that the main impact of the government's anti-inflation policy was being felt in Ontario, British Columbia and the Prairies. There were other problems in other places, but they had been continuous or were consistent. These were the ones that showed up as aberrations at that time. Demand was certainly excessive in Ontario and British Columbia, and the government was right when it attempted to cool things in these two areas. Perhaps adverse results on the Prairies, which might not have derived from this policy, could be blamed on the world wheat glut. Well, today the Prairies are selling wheat again. But when we look at the latest unemployment figures we find that the Prairies, Ontario and B.C., in that order, have experienced the greatest percentage of unemployment increase, compared with the increase in December of last year, of any of the provinces.

The Prairies are trying to diminish their relative dependence upon agriculture. For its part, my own province has made real progress in this direction. Manitoba's figures for 1968 reveal that while agriculture accounted for only $480 million, manufacturing was $1,052 million, and mineral productivity was up to nearly $200 million. This should be a healthy trend, one toward which we are all working and one that we hope to accelerate, but our markets for manufacturing are as follows: Some 37.8 per cent of Manitoba's markets are in the rest of Canada, with Ontario and Quebec together being by far the largest portion of these customers, to the extent of roughly 20 per cent. On the other hand, our foreign markets amount to only 5.5 per cent of our manufactured production. In other words, we depend to a large extent on the very markets that the federal government has been trying to cool, while our manufacturers, unlike those in other places, share only marginally in the benefits of Canada's booming export trade.

But if you look at the corresponding figures for Ontario and Quebec, you find that their manufacturers depend upon sales to the rest of Canada to the tune of a mere 13.2 per cent as compared with our 37.8 per cent, far less than either their domestic consumption or their exports to foreign lands, which together account for some 86.6 per cent of their production. We in Manitoba consign or export only 62 per cent. Thus, Manitoba is far more vitally concerned with prosperity in central Canada than one might at first suspect, and Ontario for its part is far less concerned with the west. Here we see a fundamental change from the days of long ago, and here we see that when you diminish activity in Ontario and British Columbia to fight inflation, Manitoba's prosperity is bound to diminish. Other parts of Canada may have needed deflation last year, but we certainly did not need it in Manitoba.

Now, I should like to look at some population figures for a moment. In 1911, the Prairies had 18.5 per cent of the population of Canada and enjoyed 12.2 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons. In 1931, that figure had gone up to 22.6 per cent and Manitoba enjoyed 22 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons. In 1951, that figure had gone down to 18.1 per cent of the population, with only 18 per cent of the representation in the House of Commons. In 1968, Manitoba had dropped to 16.7 per cent of the population, with only 17 per cent of the representation in the House of Commons. It is quite clear that Manitoba and the Prairies have slowly dropped in relative importance, both in population and representation. This has happened since the mid-1930s, and our net migratory figures back this up. Between 1951 and 1956 Manitoba lost 185 people. From 1956 to 1961 Manitoba lost 4,360 people, and from 1961 to 1966 it lost 28,960. Unofficial figures show that this trend has continued from that point.

These facts reveal that trade links within Canada no longer pull east and west, if you look at this matter from the viewpoint of a westerner. They do not seem to bind the east and west together as they did in days gone by. Canada's trade centres are important, but Manitoba's relative trading position within confederation is diminishing all the time. At one time the population of the Prairies was growing and providing domestic markets for the centre. It grew and provided domestic markets for the centre until the 1930s, but it has been steadily declining as a market in recent years. So has the muscle of the Prairies in the House of Commons been declining. At the same time, the importance of the external market for the central province has been increasing steadily.

Thus my figures show, Ontario may be prospering by exporting goods from Canada, but we are exporting chiefly our unemployment problem. We in Manitoba have been an exporter of people for years. We export them to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. That is why our seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment is only 4.3 per cent, well below the national average. Our unemployment problem is relatively much less severe than it is in many places, but there is very little consolation in this because the people we might otherwise have available to employ have simply left and swollen the ranks of the unemployed in other parts of Canada. When times are good these people have left Manitoba, they have added to the population problem in Ontario and B.C. and they have contributed to inflation in the areas to which they have moved. Then the federal government has taken anti-inflationary measures that inevitably clobber Manitoba and some other provinces as well. Manitoba was clobbered last year as an unintended by-product of federal government concern to keep our exports competitive and to keep inflation from taking hold in central Canada. Now we find when times are not so good, the federal government comes along with remedies based on total unemployment figures at above 4 per cent, which inevitably benefit chiefly the provinces which caused the trouble in the first place but presently have the highest number of unemployed.

Very few measures proposed in this budget will help to improve Manitoba's relative position in confederation, a position, as I have said, that we have seen slowly being eroded over the last 20 years. Some of those measures will apparently worsen that position. By themselves they are good measures and I will certainly support them, but they show little evidence of truly federal thinking, and federal thinking is required today as never before. One chief objective of a federal state must be to bring into balance the elements that make up the whole. This is the stated objective of the government that is presently in power. We must never forget this objective. To achieve it we must return to our earlier preoccupation with the national axis we have built, the axis that flows east and west. If we fail to do so, we are nothing as a nation. Furthermore, we must deliberately foster policies that will move our surplus population into the west and into the north.

Immediate hope for a change must lie in the activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I was glad to hear the minister say that upward of $300 million will be spent in 1971-72. But I would like to know what yardstick will be used to allocate these funds. If unemployment is the sole criterion, the money will evaporate as far as Manitoba and some of the other provinces are concerned, because we have exported our unemployment for years. On the other hand, if the yardstick is to be equitable economic opportunity for all regions, which is the stated objective of this government, we in Manitoba will be able to retain our hope for the future of Manitoba and Canada as a whole. Regional economic expansion, coupled with measures already being taken to get Prairie agriculture on a sound, long-term basis, may then become something that is truly effective as we go into our second century.

I have in mind regional economic expansion, plus rationalization of agriculture. A third vital measure which I propose is a regional stabilization fund. Some machinery must be devised so that monetary and fiscal policy can be regionalized in this federal state, and provincial fiscal policy can then be used for purposes of stabilization. I am heartened to know that various ministers of finance are devoting some thought to this problem. I repeat, some way must be found to stimulate or hold back the economy in a specific region without affecting the Canadian economy across the board.

Dr. André Raynauld of the University of Montreal proposed such a scheme some time ago. He is a very respected economist. It would seem to me that the federal government has accepted some of his suggestions, at least in part, by creating a loan fund of $150 million for provincial public works. But by making actual unemployment figures the sole criterion, the government has made it impossible for the fund to contribute to fiscal planning on a regional basis, which is what Dr. Raynauld was talking about in the first place. Yet that is one key element in any progress that Manitoba and several other provinces vitally need.

The prime, long-term objective of this or any other federal government must be to work toward a more equitable distribution of income and employment opportunities in Canada as a whole. We must never forget this fact. I have spoken about Manitoba but no doubt my remarks apply to other areas as well.

I commend the minister for his budget. I hope that his next budget in March and his new tax bill, for that matter, will show more aggression toward the question of regional disparity. Then we shall be able to look forward to a Canada in which it is no longer necessary to turn the St. Lawrence valley and the lower Fraser River into a polluted slum, for then, Mr. Speaker, there will be equality of opportunity for Canadians everywhere, no matter where they may choose to live.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, the performance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) tonight in answering an opposition member's question reminded me of a cartoon in today's paper in which the caption reads, "You will feel better when you are seasonally adjusted". I am sure that the unemployed who are walking the streets do not care if we are talking about actual or seasonally adjusted figures. They know they are unemployed, they know there is some reason for their unemployment, and they know the government is not doing anything to help them.

Canada today is a computerized society in which there is unemployment and underemployment. Apparently, most of our problems are fed into computers and before taking decisions the government consults its computers. It seems that the government is not prepared to ask sociologists what the trouble is in this society; it would rather feed some facts into a computer and try to obtain answers that way. It is high time that people realized our society is being controlled by computerization. Until our people realize this, the situation will not be corrected.

Some who have no knowledge of the matters concerned are trying to bring about change. The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development has substantiated the fact that Canada has the worst unemployment figure in the western world. That is nothing to be proud of. Apparently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says, "It is normal to have unemployment." I suggest that the Prime Minister—who is overseas riding turtles, or whatever it is he is riding—ought to be more concerned about Canada. I am sure that we do not disapprove of an individual's recreation or relaxation. However, we want our Prime Minister to stand up and be counted before the nations of the world. His conduct in going off on a weekend when dynamic questions must be settled in the world, was disgraceful, to say the least, and it is hightime the people of Canada told this government that they want the Prime Minister to stand up and tell the rest of the world where we stand on certain questions.

We may well ask ourselves who has created the long queues across Canada for unemployment insurance benefits. Who has made queues outside soup kitchens the norm? The other day I saw the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on television. He was outside a soup kitchen in Vancouver. No doubt he could tell many stories about what he saw in that city. Other members of this House could also recount what their constituents have told them. As a matter of fact, the day before yesterday I learned of an individual, 50 years old, who worked all his life. Now, because he cannot find employment, he must stand in the soup line. He has raised a family and now he is humiliated and is asking himself what has happened to him in this society. It is high time situations like his were corrected.

We must not do what the Prime Minister is suggesting. He is suggesting that only by creating unemployment can Canada fight the inflation that is besetting it. One man alone cannot create the confusion we see around us. The Prime Minister is surrounded by many people who advise him. I understand that he has his own little hierarchy which operates independently of the cabinet. The people in this hierarchy tell the Prime Minister what he should do.

I cannot for one moment imagine the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), who spoke this afternoon, really saying what is in his mind, because he merely parroted certain words and phrases. We do not expect the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to say, "We are not concerned about people". This makes me wonder whether it is not the Prime Minister's hierarchy that is prepared to do away with the pride and dignity of individual Canadians and to curtail their civil rights, as happened recently.

This afternoon the Minister of Labour suggested to my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), that those who are taking manpower retraining are not effectively shown among the ranks of the unemployed. He tried to suggest, in my opinion, that those who are receiving manpower retraining should not be included among the ranks of the unemployed. Yet I have heard of situations across this country, Mr. Speaker, in which people who tried to obtain manpower retraining were not able to obtain it because they had not been on the labour force for a sufficient number of weeks. In other cases, people were not eligible to be paid relocation costs because they had gone out and obtained jobs on their own. I think these are matters the minister ought to look into.

Only last night the editor of one of the Montreal newspapers called Canada the "the publicipatory" democracy of Mr. Trudeau, and I agree.

According to well-documented figures and facts mentioned this afternoon, it appears that unemployment in this country has increased by 40 per cent since last year. We know that these figures do not necessarily tell the whole truth, because many of the unemployed will not go down to the unemployment insurance offices and be classed among the unemployed; neither will they go to offices offering social aid and place themselves in a humiliating position. Many people across this country are parroting the phrase: things could be worse! But I suggest that if one examines the facts he will see that things will be worse. The facts show that they will be worse, and this government has told the House of no plans for making them better.

I now turn to the situation in Saskatchewan. The Liberal Premier of that province makes much of the fact that unemployment on the Prairies, particularly in Saskatchewan, has not increased appreciably. I know that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, is a personal friend of the Premier of Saskatchewan. I also know that he would like to try to educate the Premier of Saskatchewan. That feeling seems to be mutual as between them.

The Premier of Saskatchewan has suggested that unemployment in his province stands at only 2.5 per cent. The Dominion Burea of Statistics says that it stands at 4.7 per cent. The DBS says that in 1969 only 16,000 persons of the combined work force were unemployed in Saskatchewan, and that in 1970 the figure remained at 16,000. Yet according to DBS figures, 4.7 per cent of the people were unemployed. The Premier prides himself on his figures; they look good. But the export of unemployed to other parts of the country is nothing to be proud of. I suggest that the Premier of Saskatchewan had better look at the situation across the country so that he may know what it is all about.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Skoberg: If it is not too long.

Mr. Lang: I wonder, in the matter of the export of unemployed from Saskatchewan to British Columbia, whether the hon. member has included the leader of his party.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That is a truly sarcastic response. The minister sounds just like a professor—no brains, but all smart talk.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I realize the minister's position. He is a friend of the Premier of Saskatchewan and he wants to protect him in the coming provincial election. Of course, that is not why the minister is worried. He is worried about what may happen in the next federal election. He may face problems of his own in Saskatoon-Humboldt, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): He may even go back to the university.

Mr. Skoberg: As the leader of the NDP (Mr. Douglas) suggested, he may not be back here. I wish to deal with some of the problems in the province of Saskatchewan. On October 1, 1968, the population of that province was 926,000. On October 1, 1969, the population was 956,000, and on October 1, 1970, the population was 933,000. There was a drop in the population in Saskatchewan of 23,000 at a time when there also should have been a normal national increase of 10,000. There are 33,000 people who should be living in Saskatchewan today but who are living elsewhere. This is attributable, mainly, to the Premier of that province and Liberal policy. It is no different in Saskatchewan than it is at the federal level, even though they may like to divorce each other. We have seen that happen. There has been quite a lot of discussion about abortion, and I am sure one applies to the other.

• (8:50 p.m.)

In a four month period, 7,000 people left Saskatchewan. What does this mean? If these 33,000 people had remained in Saskatchewan, it is estimated that the unemployment figure in the province would be in the vicinity of 9 per cent. The Premier of that province was interviewed by Charles King of the Ottawa Citizen on December 11, 1970. Mr. King was on a coast-to-coast expedition to catch the Canadian mood. The Premier was interviewed with regard to the general mood of the province. Mr. Thatcher is quoted in the article as saying as follows:

> We had our depression here last year. Now we have the lowest unemployment in the nation—only 2.5 per cent.

The article continues:

> Premier Thatcher thinks it is a tragedy that Prime Minister Trudeau doesn't pay more attention to the west if for only selfish political reasons.

I do not know if the minister from Saskatoon-Humboldt is aware of the fact that for selfish political reasons he could swing some of the central Canada wealth to western Canada. We have heard about how much money went into wheat input, but there has not been very much encouragement with regard to most of the province. Mr. Thatcher was asked by Charles King what he planned to do in the future. Mr. Thatcher said it will then be time for someone else with new ideas to take over. Although he had not made up his mind, it may be his last election to fight. The article reads:

> "And when I go, it won't be to return to Ottawa or accept a Senate appointment."

I understand the Premier of Saskatchewan receives a federal pension. The article continues:

> "I've got 10,000 acres running with cattle, and when the weather gets cold, I can always take a holiday in the south. What more can I ask?"

I ask Premier Thatcher whether he would consider passing a little of the 10,000 acres over to the 33,000 people who found it necessary to leave that province. The time has come to look at the situation to see whether we are really concerned about the population. Are we concerned about co-operating with certain people, or with the people in general? In my opinion, this is not being done. I believe the situation in Saskatchewan also holds true so far as the federal government is concerned. The Thatcher Liberals have not used all the money available for public housing. I do not blame the federal Liberals for this. If there is unemployment in Saskatchewan, and the government has not used all the money that is available, who is to blame for the unemployment in that province?

When do the Thatcher Liberals start planning their winter works program? In the middle of the winter the Saskatchewan government decides what to do. Hon. members know that nothing can be accomplished with planning of that nature. The hon. member who spoke before me was quite concerned about the problems of Manitoba, even though he had some good words for that province. The province of Manitoba started to plan its winter works projects last spring and some are being carried on at the present time. The government of Saskatchewan allocated the grand sum of $15 million for winter works. In Manitoba, $74 million was allocated. If the government of Saskatchewan is trying to create employment in this way, I say that province has the wrong government. I am sure something will be done about this situation at the next provincial election. Some of the announcements made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) and other ministers with regard to establishing new projects were as a result of the pressure put on them by opposition members. Pressure was also applied by many thousands of people in today's bread lines. The government knows there is no way that the announced programs can begin this winter.

There will be a very opportune time before the next federal election to lower the unemployment figure. The government knows that by lowering the unemployment figure they can possibly get back in the good grace of the people of this country. I have confidence that the people of this country will remember the length of time they spent on the unemployment rolls and trying to get a bowl of soup. They will remember when the government brought about unemployment. It has been suggested that the Prime Minister is gearing all these programs for a federal election. The Prime Minister has stated we must now fight the economic ill—unemployment. Why has he waited until now? Not very long ago a businessman told me he would be happy if there were a line of unemployed people stretching from his doorstep to the street so that he could pick who he wanted. I wonder whether the federal government and the Treasury Board are using the same philosophy?

This afternoon the Minister of Labour spoke about people getting together, and gloom and doom. I wonder whether he has talked to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. They claim that law, order and pollution are all top issues. I wonder whether the minister has told them not to preach gloom and doom or we may lose some of the carrots hung out by some corporate enterprises. This is another situation wherein the unemployed are not being considered.

There have been many recent news releases and observations in connection with Information Canada. I do not know whether the government is trying to adopt the philosophy of Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railway and other companies in connection with contracting out. Information Canada does not hesitate to unload people with many, many years of government service. One such individual is Mr. Stranks. A newspaper article concerning Mr. Stranks reads as follows:

> In the past year Mr. Stranks feels the branch has been cutting back on expenditures and "generally tightening up the operation" to meet Treasury Board edicts that it pay its way—
> Mr. Stranks charged that Information Canada was following the government hard line so closely that it was sacrificing talent to its budget goal.
> "No computer or accountant can tell you the people, the talents and the experience you will need. It can't evaluate related strengths in various fields."

The computer is trying to take over from human beings who are needed in today's world. There is no consideration whatsoever to social issues. In the nineteenth century there were what were called robber barons. They accumulated everything that they could without any regard for mankind or the social and economic concerns of the society in which they operated. We see this today in the actions of the government. There are robber barons in the transportation system. The president of the Canadian Transport Commission is a typical robber baron. I understand that he has one philosophy with regard to the operation of the Canadian Transport Commission, that is, to do away with anything he considers to be not in the best interests of the fast buck process of the railways. As far as I can figure out, the only criterion under which the CTC is operating now, under the direction of its president, is to make sure of a dollar wherever you can, without worrying about service to the people.

We saw a typical example of this in connection with the recently announced abandonment of trains 7 and 8. The railway company called it a curtailment because they hoped that by doing so they would avoid having to hold a public hearing. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) told us the other day there would be a public hearing. We shall have to wait and see. But under this proposal about 57 men on the work force will be directly affected. In addition there are whole communities which will no longer be served under the proposed arrangement—communities where the primary source of employment is the railroad. Again, we will find one factor affecting another, one abandonment leading to another right down the line.

Across this country from Newfoundland to Victoria, passenger trains are being abandoned. The Transport Commission and the Minister of Transport himself have initiated research projects in this connection but these projects have not been completed. I am sure that had they been completed they would have shown that some of the abandonments should never have taken place.

I see from a news release that the Minister of Transport the other day announced the automation of the Canadian portion of the world wide ICAO aeronautical, fixed telecommunications network. The report stated in part:

> Not only has the adoption of this automated system provided improved message transmission standards, but savings in the order of $500,000 a year have been made by the department through reductions in office space, equipment and personnel.

Again we find arrangements made designed to bring about reductions in the number of personnel employed, without any provision for the social climate in which these people live. Similar considerations apply to the CNR servo centres which are being introduced across the Canadian railway system. My information is that as many as 4,000 jobs will disappear with the implementation of these centres. The plan is proceeding, apparently, without any thought being given to the situation of communities which used to have services provided along the line. Again, workers are being told: You are through, fellows. You have been here for 20 years, but too bad.

Most of us have read about the large amounts of money which have been put into the bilingual program. I am a firm believer in a bilingual program, but it makes no difference whether an individual speaks six languages—if he is unemployed, he is unemployed. Millions of dollars are being spent today on language training, and in the end the people who have been able to take advantage of this training find themselves still unemployed. I agree 100 per cent with the leader of the Créditistes when he said some time ago that the bilingual program should start at the bottom and work up to the top.

There is a need for people who are able to speak two languages in this country, but there is also a need to make this possible under a system from which everyone will benefit. It should not be brought in in an atmosphere where individuals in government departments and elsewhere are more concerned about that program than they are about an employment program. The recent settlement with General Motors is an example. The language issue presented no difficulty when the workers were given job security. When people from coast to coast have the opportunity to work, the rest will work itself out. But this does not appear to be the way in which we now operate in Canada.

On May 4 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the following question:

> In view of the Prime Minister's assurance to Mr. Bourassa of Quebec that he would help him to meet his pledge to create 10,000 new jobs in that province by the end of 1971, can the Prime Minister give a similar assurance to the Premier of Saskatchewan who in 1964 promised that 50,000 new jobs would be created within four years?

Of course, Mr. Speaker, you correctly said "Order, please," as you did today, and the question was ruled out of order. The people of Quebec and Saskatchewan know that political promises of this type can do more harm than anything else to the unity of a nation.

I also note that the Quebec Minister of Labour said recently that the province faces more social unrest and political instability if mounting unemployment there is not checked. A news report states in part:

> Asked whether this would mean revolution, he replied: "Well, if you want to put that type of word in my mouth, fine. It leads to revolution, certainly not evolution."

[Mr. Skoberg.]

I would ask hon. members to recall what others have said as far as revolution and evolution in that province are concerned. The Quebec Labour Minister recently made the statement I have quoted, that perhaps there could be revolution. But has he been brought up under the provisions of the public order bill which was recently before the House? Not long ago the leader of the Liberal Party in B.C. said there could be blood running in the streets of British Columbia. What are these people saying? When one person tries to warn the government about social and economic problems in the country he is accused of trying to bring about an insurrection. But what is the government really doing about its friends, Liberals, who make the same kind of statements on television and in the press?

I turn from those unfortunate remarks, in my opinion, by the Minister of Labour of Quebec and the leader of the Liberals in British Columbia, to the activities of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is also concerned about wheat. One special interest of his is retraining. He has tried to chase the farmers off the land so that he can retrain them, I suppose. I am sure this is why the Prime Minister put these two jobs together. The minister has not yet told us how he intends to put to work the farmers who have been chased from the country into the cities, but we know they will have to take on the lowest jobs there are. No better example of his approach could be found than the proposal for a production and grain receipts policy. In a description of these proposals, on page 20, I find under the subheading "Encourage adjustment of farm units to more efficient sizes", the following:

> The problem of farm consolidation is one which is not peculiar to the prairie region and which, perhaps, is less critical in this region than in other areas of Canada. It is therefore believed that it would be inappropriate to propose programs for the prairie region to deal with the consolidation issue in advance of the availability of programs to deal with this problem in Canadian agriculture generally. Such a general plan is in preparation.

I can only say that I hope the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, who is responsible for this proposal, will tell the people what it is all about. If he does not tell these people, then they are the ones who will become unemployed. Corporate farming will become consolidated and many more people will join the family of unemployed in this country. I urge the minister not to make a hasty decision with regard to this program, and to take into consideration those people who will be affected.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan).

Mr. Gordon Sullivan (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, since this is the budget debate I intend to speak about the cost of our medicare program, because if we do not do something to alleviate the cost we will find ourselves unable to afford medicare whether or not we have unemployment. It is to be hoped that this government will take a long, hard look at some of the rampaging costs and questionable services that have arisen as a result of our present health care philosophy. Undoubtedly, much good has been achieved by this government's medicare program, but we must examine whether or not this good is sufficient when we consider the cost.

In 1957, Canada spent 3.23 per cent of the gross national product on health care and occupied third place in health care costs throughout the world. By 1966, Canada was spending 4.55 per cent of the gross national product, passing the United States, New Zealand, Great Britain and Norway, on health care costs. The cost of physicians' services rose from $271 million in 1957 to $605 million in 1966. According to the task force on medical care, in 1970 it is probable that Canadians paid just over $1 billion for physicians' services, out of a total personal health bill of $4.7 billion. If we project this forward to 1980, it is estimated that total costs for health care will be nearly $14 billion, with hospitals taking around $10 billion and physicians' services around $4 billion.

It is our responsibility to see that these costs are controlled without sacrificing our ideal, which must be to provide good medical care to each and every Canadian. Ideally, all Canadians should be protected by a health care program which a truly universal scheme would provide. In some provinces—I am speaking specifically about Ontario—this admirable quality has not been achieved. It is reported that approximately 98 per cent of Ontario's population have health insurance coverage. Some have hospitalization without medical care, and some medical care insurance without hospitalization. Two per cent does not seem very much, but in Ontario it amounts to around 140,000 individuals. If these people fall ill, with hospital beds at $60 to $100 per day and medical and surgical fees as they are, this amounts to a real catastrophe for their families. The people without coverage fall into four main categories. First, minorities in ethnic groups, often with language difficulties who do not understand the necessity for application forms. The complexities of having their premiums subsidized in part or in whole when necessary completely eludes them. The second group comprises youth who want no part of establishment premiums, transient tobacco field workers and various other "travellers" with no fixed addresses. Often these people are in poor health and need more care than the general population. The third group is those people who believe they are covered but when sudden illness strikes find to their horror that they are not. Neglect of the last premium notice, errors in billing, change of address and human forgetfulness account for this group.

The fourth group is the young, newly married couples who are not planning a family and are anticipating good health. To them, the monthly $11 for hospitalization and $11.80 for doctors' bills seems a waste of money. No doubt many of them do not require health care, but an emergency appendectomy or an automobile accident without insurance coverage is a staggering blow to their already meagre resources.

In our examination of our health care philosophy it is hoped that we all remember that it is twofold. We must not only insure people against financial hardship arising out of illness, but it is incumbent upon us to prevent the illness itself. The degree of our victory over such diseases as typhoid, diphtheria, and in our own time tuberculosis and poliomyelitis, came not from advances in health care schemes designed to pay doctor bills but from our ability to prevent disease.

Setting aside for a moment all of the humanitarian aspects and human suffering caused by illness, let us consider how many dollars and cents can be saved by prevention. Let us take cancer of the lung as an example. It is, as hon. members know, the most common form of cancer in the male. Leading authorities agree that it is 85 to 90 per cent preventable by proper health education to eliminate cigarette smoking. The addicted unbelievers here should carefully reread the report of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on tobacco and cigarette smoking, presented by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) in the 1969-70 session. The pamphlet "Smoking and Health" from the Royal College of Physicians of London, England, also emphasizes the importance of prevention of this form of cancer.

Let us suppose the disease is not prevented and for a moment follow the usual course of treatment of a lung cancer patient. First, diagnosis must be made. This usually entails hospitalization, repeated sputum examinations by cystologists, multiple X-ray studies and tomogram studies by radiologists, and a bronchoscopic examination. To decide whether opening the patient's chest is warranted, a lymph gland biopsy under general anaesthetic is carried out. If all is favourable, a few days later removal of the lung or part of it is done. This is a long, difficult procedure. Two or three days or more in intensive care with highly trained nursing care, oxygen, respirators and chest suction, etc., follows the surgery. Massive radiation treatment at great cost, usually with the cobalt bomb, is given before or after surgery, and often both. Recurrences are common and a long lingering decline in a nursing home or hospital is usual. Approximately 5 to 6 per cent of all people with lung cancer survive five years.

Forgetting about each one of these unfortunate patients for a minute, let us consider how many thousands of dollars each one requires for such attention, and with so little to show for it in the final result. It is no wonder vast sums are paid for health care under our present system. As matters are now, the first line of defence is prevention of disease, early intervention and health education, and this lies with the general practitioner. In 1955 there were 9,800 general practitioners in Canada and 4,800 specialists, making a total of 14,600 practising doctors. The population of Canada was 15 million. In 1965 there were 10,000 general practitioners and 9,400 specialists, for a total of 19,400. The population was 19 million. Between 1955 and 1965 the population increased by 18 per cent. In these ten years, the number of specialists increased by 94.6 per cent but the number of general practitioners increased by only 4.1 per cent. These figures demonstrate the increasing lag between population growth and the number of family doctors.

In view of these facts, it is apparent that government spending must be more firmly directed toward producing more general practitioners to keep pace with the increase in population, and away from the expensive post-graduate training for specialists. This is the only way day-to-day family medical care needs can be satisfied. With each passing year hordes of eager, well trained neurosurgeons, orthopaedic surgeons, internists, neurologists, and so on ad infinitum, finish post-graduate courses, and each year there appears to be less and less need for them. In a country with the population of Canada it is unwise for each and every one of our medical schools to be an assembly-line factory, producing every variety of specialist. Canada simply cannot afford to support these comparatively unnecessary training programs with federal funds. The over-all doctor-population ratio in 1957 was .79 per 1,000 population, and in 1966 it was .86 per 1,000 population. So if the surfeit of specialists could be diverted into general practice, the family doctors who now have too little time to spend on prevention of disease and education of patients would be better able to perform these functions.

• (9:20 p.m.)

A general practitioner who sees anywhere between 30 to 60 patients in his office in one day has little time for health care or education. Since this is of prime importance, it follows that much greater emphasis must be placed upon the development of larger graduating classes to general practitioners. The old-time family doctor on call 24 hours a day, seven days a week—friend, counsellor and father to his patients—is fast becoming a legend of the past. The bell is tolling for the passing of the individual, competitive practice of medicine. The game has become too complex and too complicated. Doctors themselves are recognizing this is a practical way. To provide good grassroots medical care, clinics should be encouraged and geographically scattered to allow easy access to all our people. These should not be large nor burdened down with non-productive administrative personnel.

Basically well trained nurses, laboratory technicians and other paramedical personnel would assist the physician in his work by performing many of the routine tasks. Each clinic would have access to the services of certified specialists when deemed essential by the family doctor. Home care programs by visiting nurses, with house calls being made by doctors when required, could eliminate much unnecessary hospitalization. Hospitals could then devote themselves primarily to the care of the more seriously ill. Non-productive administrative staff that has nothing to do with the actual care of the patient would be trimmed to a minimum. Teaching of doctors and nurses, and whatever training of specialists is necessary, would be carried out at a few large university hospitals.

I shall conclude by quoting the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who said that local doctors' groups in their discussions and examination of our health care system should keep an eye on duplication of services, should look for ways in which we can take a more balanced approach to health care and should make recommendations regarding more efficient operation of the system, as well as continue to improve the quality of our health care system.

[Mr. Sullivan.]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker could I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Sullivan: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rose: I was very interested in the hon. member's concern about health care and health costs. I ask whether he sees perhaps a diminution of health costs under medicare or under the various other schemes we have across Canada, and whether he would recommend that doctors abandon the very costly fee-for-service basis of charging for health care.

Mr. Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I suppose the hon. member was not listening to me. I certainly think they should abandon the fee-for-service.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate which I can only term most important under the present circumstances.

I assume that the aim of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in his last budget was the reduction of unemployment, which has developed into a very serious problem both in Quebec and in the other provinces.

This situation of course is getting more and more critical and people are losing confidence in the government because of the increasing climate of unstability.

Catchy slogans have been dreamed up, such as "just society" and "Quebec at work for 1971".; The government seems to have lost control of this situation, and I must simply recall that in 1968 the number of unemployed was near 300,000 whereas today there are about 600,000.

In spite of the tremendous amounts of credit injected into the economy of various areas, and especially into that of Quebec by the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), that action apparently was not enough. In fact, we still hear day after day about industries folding up or about substantial reductions in the number of workers in various Canadian industries. Obviously, the injecting capital as was done by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is necessary, but in my opinion it is equally important that the existing industries be protected and I think that the government's hesitation in limiting the import of certain goods that we produce in Canada accounts for the closing down of a certain number of plants and for the substantial reduction in personnel.

Several members have spoken before me and they all have quoted statistics which are becoming more and more tedious to listen to. I think that during this debate it is not enough that we should know what is happening. It is also our duty to submit suggestions liable to promote government action and this, not only in order to regain the confidence of the Canadian people, but to provide jobs for an impressive number of unemployed. We are all committed to seeking the solutions they need to earn their living honourably.

Of course, this could be an opportunity to express only strict criticisms of the government. I still believe it to be the duty of all members to seek solutions. The government, if it shows a minimum of broad-mindedness, could accept good suggestions in order to improve this increasingly critical situation.

I cannot help mentioning the situation prevailing in Quebec.

I imagine that other hon. members will take the liberty of discussing what they are most interested in, that is the provinces they represent. As a member from Quebec, I cannot refrain from deploring the present situation in that province.

No doubt the recent budget is very acceptable to Quebec, since an important part of the funds provided will be available to that province, but one must not believe that such injections of capital into Quebec will, in the short run, correct the situation. One must be sufficiently honest to admit that their effect may be favourably felt next summer. With regard to the present situation, it is enough to refer to a statement that the Quebec premier made only ten days ago admitting his deplorable inability to create 100,000 jobs. In fact, it is the second time that we hear the "song of the 100,000 jobs".

I was very disappointed to learn over the weekend that the development of the Sainte-Scholastique Airport which could create 100,000 jobs will only give employment to 22,000 at the most by 1985, according to the statistics supplied by the civil servants of the province of Quebec. We had been brought to dream of this extraordinary project and the majority of people on the North shore were very happy, as 22,000 jobs is a very acceptable and even necessary thing at the present time in the province of Quebec.

But why was this figure exaggerated to reinforce the slogan of "100,000 jobs"?

I would imagine that all municipalities situated near Sainte-Scholastique and those on the North shore were most satisfied to hear that this project was going to provide 100,000 new jobs. Yet sober statistics indicate that the real number is but 25 per cent of this figure.

In April, last year, we heard another promise of 100,000 jobs. With the pitiful failure that ensued, Premier Bourassa must have been hard-pressed (bourassé) by a great number of newspapermen for a good reason, over the past ten days. So, I ask all members from the province of Quebec to come to the aid of the Quebec government and to make it realize that some help from the federal government is obviously needed. I will not let the Quebec government accuse the federal members of being responsible because this promise is proving to be impracticable.

As I said, that slogan was exaggerated. Some now suggest that it was not a promise but that conditions were dramatized. It was not necessary to make such a promise to dramatize conditions; they were then dramatic enough.

I will make some suggestions, because I said that I would not merely criticize. We could make this government responsible for all the evils which Canada is now experiencing. It would be unfair to do so because some members have shown their goodwill.

Besides hesitation created an atmosphere which further deteriorated the situation. The responsibility of those in power should nonetheless be recognized. As for us, for the last two years and a half we have been trying to make suggestions which more often than not are unfortunately rejected.

We must be realistic and honest enough to recognize that the government is unable to check unemployment at present for several reasons. If unemployment is out of hand, we should be honest enough to admit it. I feel that the people insist that we tell them the truth.

In these circumstances, I believe that the federal government should seriously consider calling together representatives of labours unions, businessmen, industrialists, Boards of Trade, certain service clubs, as well as of provincial governments, in order to discuss this problem.

That meeting has to take place urgently so that a solution may be found. It is obvious that the government does not have a solution, and that it cannot find one.

Thus it has to address itself to experienced people and to let them know that this meeting is called in the interest of industry, of financiers and the government, in short of the whole population.

I trust the businessmen. I trust those who have been active for many years in industry to give advice to the Minister of Finance as well as to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and to hon. members.

Such a meeting would first prove the good will of the government with regard to this problem. Such a meeting would prove to the union members and their leaders, to the business world and the population as a whole that we are in earnest about trying to find a solution once and for all.

We could pretend that the present government, in charge of the future of Canada, has found a solution. While the Canadian people waited, it was realized that the government has not really found a solution, that it should ask for the help of experienced men, of businessmen. It must interest them directly so that we might find again the stability which is absolutely necessary for the survival of Canada and the betterment of its people.

Such a meeting might enable us to find solutions for processing our natural resources, here, on Canadian soil, something our governments seem to have overlooked in years past.

It seems to me that in the last few years the government applied itself to improve social measures when it would have been more urgent to improve conditions for industry. Therefore, it would have been possible to create new jobs through research and development of new products.

Now, to turn to another subject, should we seriously consider paying the old age pension at 60? I would not know exactly how many persons of that age would qualify. I believe it would be more profitable first to set up an increased pension for people 60 and over.

With an adequate pension to live on, they would make room for thousands of young workers who are now getting benefits out of social legislation. It is inconceivable that so much energy should be wasted in Canada. It is also important to provide jobs for those who are able to work, in order to be able to pay an adequate pension to those who deserve to take a rest. The government should remember this suggestion.

• (9:40 p.m.)

We should also consider the need for student employment next summer. I have had the opportunity, recently, to ask the minister a question in this regard and he answered that he would make a statement in due time. I suggest that the time has now come. In fact, students are concerned about finding a job next summer and I think that a conscientious government should consider the possibility of providing students with summer employment.

Of course the government could consider apportioning a few million dollars more to this end but I think it is high time to restore a climate of confidence in this country.

We must consider giving all our students the possibility of earning a minimum income during the summer season and the government should set up a work program to be assigned to these youth in various fields and departments. It is too late to wonder about what we are going to do. The government must find a solution so that young people will be able, next summer, to earn enough money to complete their education.

As these new skilled workers are entering the labour market, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should consider the possibility of creating as many specialized positions as possible.

Everybody must be given an opportunity for education, but it is not less important to create as many new jobs. It seems that this has not been the case so far and that our leaders have not taken due account of this situation.

In taking part in this debate, I take the opportunity to urge the government to come back not to reason, but to a more serious approach to these options, to these suggestions.

We must also seriously consider offering alternatives to all those who will eventually have to give up farming. Willy-nilly, a policy was established; it means dissuasion compelling some farmers to leave the farm. In some cases, when the operation is not profitable, consolidation is necessary to achieve profitability. I would be short-sighted if I asked the government to make sure that all the farmers will keep their farm and get enough subsidies to live on.

[Mr. La Salle.]

However, a minimum of organization is required. A number of operations should remain, provided they prove profitable. Considering such a policy, now more and more common, a government is bound to carry on a program affording those forced to relinquish their land and operations an alternative other than social welfare. Unfortunately, for some years, this is all that could be offered them. I hope that our suggestions will be accepted. We have already been urging the government to a sufficient extent.

As concerns construction, it affects a large part of the labour force in Canada. Again, I beg the government to seriously consider repealing the 11 per cent tax on building materials.

The government should also be invited to study the possibility of granting a rebate on mortgage interests commensurate to the income of the individual contemplating ownership.

Could we not also think of a short-term building policy, of paying a premium to all those who want to buy property within a year or two? Such a measure should be followed by capital investments but how can we contemplate this in view of interest rates now prevailing? How can we launch a short-term building program with monthly rents of $130 to $150? This is why it is most important to eliminate the 11 per cent tax on building materials as it would markedly decrease the price of a house and we should also set up an interest refund policy in proportion to the salary of the would-be buyer of a house.

Since the minister in charge is in the House, I will take advantage of this opportunity to draw his attention to the speculative loans which he permitted in certain regions last fall and which were welcome. These loans enabled the average contractors to benefit from anticipated loans and the small contractors to give jobs to some workers.

I agree that the government could and should normally keep at the disposal of contractors a significant amount of money. On the other hand, with the elimination of this distasteful 11 per cent tax and the adoption of a lower rate of interest, manufacturers of building material and officials of carpenters' and of other trades' associations might be encouraged to increase salaries.

Maybe a meeting between the minister and the representatives of all the construction trades associations should be considered in order to come to a 2 or 3-year agreement. There could also be an agreement on the suspension of the right to strike and the wage freeze. Thus the minister seeing the willingness of the people concerned in the building industry, could accept the provision of additional funds for the creation of a short term construction program.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that those suggestions will arouse the attention of the minister. I hope the government will approve such a policy for the good of those who wish to own a house.

I also wish to avail myself of this opportunity to voice vigorous protests to the government for having terminated the winter works program. We already criticized severely the government for that. The abolition of winter works shows more than ever this year what a colossal error was made and how costly it is for most of the areas in Canada. A serious study of the desirability of certain works should have been made. On the other hand, a selective system was essential as to the kind of works and the municipalities as well as the provinces should have been given a certain form of guarantee. Keeping the winter works program as regards certain public services and buildings would have enabled us to cope with unemployment. But as the government did not want to understand anything, we must now recognize that the situation is more critical than ever.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government to vote credits for the construction of sewage treatment plants in several Canadian municipalities. We want to fight pollution, but what are we doing to help the municipalities build them? As long as we continue to talk pollution, we are wasting our time. The municipalities in need of sewage plants cannot afford them; they are already overburdened with debts. The government should, in conjunction with provincial governments if need be, grant the required funds for the construction of sewage treatment plants and thus fight against pollution while creating new jobs.

I want to remind the Minister of Finance that considering the debts of municipalities, it would be opportune to grant them low-interest loans. Almost all municipalities in Quebec must spend 33 per cent of their budgets just to amortize the interests of existing debts. Large sums of money will have to be appropriated so that these municipalities may redeem their debts at a reasonable interest rate. Whether we like it or not, the way things are going it is unthinkable to let municipalities operate as they do now.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot conclude without a few words about the future of the tobacco industry. I had the opportunity to discuss the matter briefly last week when speaking to an amendment to the crop insurance legislation. I hope that the government will seriously consider the future of the tobacco industry.

I met during the weekend some tobacco producers of my area who represent 90 per cent of Quebec cigarette tobacco producers. There are still more in Ontario. They are already concerned because the government plans to introduce a bill to prohibit all publicity concerning tobacco.

I hope that the government will first pass a legislation to prohibit the entry of drugs in Canada and the use of marijuana. How can we win the people's confidence if there is talk of prohibiting any publicity relating to tobacco, an industry which brings in millions to the Canadian government? So, the mere fact of raising this question leaves people puzzled, and rightly so.

On the one hand, the Minister of Agriculture keeps on, and I commend him for it, investing huge sums in the improvement of certain tobacco soils in Canada, and, on the other hand, the Minister of National Health and Welfare makes sure to inform all the people that if they keep on smoking, they will die.

Thus, this contradiction will do nothing but widen the credibility gap among the people. Let us therefore be serious and practical; let us not allow drugs into Canada as it is being done right now, and we will then be able to consider seriously, rather than condemning the tobacco industry, undertaking studies to help the people understand better the use of tobacco. There is certainly a lot to do in that connection, and in regard to a number of other products as well.

I venture to think that Parliament, in all honesty, will have the courage to take a stand and show sincerity, if we are to really regain the public's confidence and establish a favourable climate. In this way, all financiers and businessmen will come to trust Parliament again and believe that it is possible to find a solution to the unemployment problem so that we may know better times. I hope that this two-day debate will not have been useless, that the time for words has come to an end and that the government will take some concrete measures for the good of the Canadian people.

The Canadian people will be able to regain confidence in this Parliament, if we tell them the truth and if we take action.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I think that it is my duty to take part in this debate in order to offer my co-operation. I call upon the government to apply solutions to the serious problem of unemployment and to all other resulting problems.

This afternoon, I listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). From this speech, I kept in mind three main points.

First, he said that in the banks, there was much money awaiting borrowers. Everybody knows that! I am convinced that those who need it more are more aware of it, because it happens very often that businessmen, industrialists come to Ottawa—as was the case last week—to meet officials in order to avail themselves of certain pieces of legislation to offer bankers guarantees allowing them to borrow money so as to carry on their operations.

Mr. Speaker, we know there is a lot of money around somewhere. Everyone knows that banks have the privilege of coining the nation's credit and that is what we are fighting. We consider that is abnormal. I will try to prove that within the few minutes available to me.

Would it not be democratic for the Bank of Canada, the people's bank, to have the power and the duty of coining the nation's credit? What is the nation's credit? In my opinion, the nation's credit is a product of people and of activities of all kinds. It is the product of the work of Canadians, whether they work in construction, in a shoe factory or in a garment industry, whether they are professionals, providing professional services to those who require them, businessmen, industrialists or members of Parliament. In my opinion, a nation's credit is made up of all their activities and thus we can live in society, making use of goods and services exclusively created by Canadians.

The trust that, as the member for Bellechasse, I may have in society is what makes me call on a tailor, tomorrow, and buy a suit if I need one or to call on a doctor to get medical care. This trust in society is what makes up a nation's credit.

If this is what the credit of a nation really is, why should we let institutions cash in on this credit, this wealth of the people, created by the nation, and then lend it to us at high interest rates? Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, would the distinguished deputy whip of the government party confirm by a nod of his head that we are to go on with the budget debate tomorrow and thus continue the discussion on this very serious matter that is of interest to all Canadians?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I am nodding my head. Yes, we shall continue the debate tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. nember will yet be Prime Minister.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REDUCTION OF PASSENGER SERVICE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, a week ago in this chamber I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to intervene on behalf of northern Ontario to dissuade Canadian National Railways from its callous and ill-advised decision to cancel trains No. 7 and No. 8 which presently provide essential passenger and express service in a part of this nation which the Bishop of Moosonee has called "Canada's cutting edge". In a letter to the Canadian Transport Commission, the bishop wrote as follows regarding the decision to cancel these trains:

> comes as a heavy blow to those who live in the communities along the line as well as to those who try to serve them in varying capacities. These communities may be small, but they do contain people whose only access to the outside world is by rail. If I have learned my history right, the principle upon which the railway was built was to weld Canada into a nation by serving such people in isolation. It is a sad day if we change such a worth-while base to that of economic expediency.

At a time in our history when we are trying to unite our nation, we have a publicly-owned railway eliminating services which are essential for the orderly development of our rich natural resources. Federal and provincial governments are offering incentives to industry to locate in slow-growth regions, and meanwhile a heavily subsidized Crown corporation drastically downgrades its services in one of these very regions that governments are trying to help.

On previous occasions this House has heard reference to the Mid-Canada Development Foundation, an organization with a plan for the rational development of Canada's habitable mid-north which is fabulously rich in untapped forest and mineral wealth. Canadian National Railways have encouraged this concept and have acted on the advisory council of the foundation. When you consider how the CNR operates across northern Ontario, and when you witness the poor quality of the service they provide, it is easy to conclude that they are in no way an active participant in the plans and projects to unite and develop Canada.

The CNR, in its defence, argues that profit and loss have dictated their decision; that these trains are money losers and serve no useful purpose. Crews working these trains think otherwise. Despite the downgrading of the service on Nos. 7 and 8 to a single coach in which one cannot even purchase a poor cup of coffee and a stale sandwich, these trains frequently travel filled to capacity, with some passengers having to ride in the baggage car while others are left on windblown station platforms due to lack of space. There is not much room in the baggage cars either, because they carry express, especially perishable goods destined for isolated communities along the line and for shipment further north by air.

The railway company argues, further, that its so-called "Super Continental" will assume the workload of trains Nos. 7 and 8. Those who know consider this to be a very bad joke. From December 1, 1970, to January 8, 1971, the "Super Continental" ran on time only once. Over this short period of time it was late for an accumulated total of 200 hours. This performance clearly points out that had trains 7 and 8 not been operating, there would have been many days when daily service would not have been available in many northern Ontario communities. On some days the "Super" was as much as 16½ hours late on its eastward run. If it takes on the work of train No. 8, we may expect it to be a day or more late, in which case this transcontinental service will be reduced to milk run status. Perhaps that is part of CNR's grand design, to downgrade this service as well and at some future time apply for its cancellation also. To some it seems clear that the CNR wants out of the transportation business altogether.

The public attitude to the CNR across northern Ontario is one of anger and disgust, employee morale is at an all-time low, and the service provided ranges from poor to none at all. My constituents have asked for a public inquiry into the situation, but the railway transport committee is not so obliging when the service is only a reduction rather than an absolute cancellation—a neat little game of semantics.

CNR officials were ordered to inform the people of the alternate service to be provided, and they travelled shamefacedly across the north like thieves in the night, avoiding as many people as possible, especially railroaders who know the truth of what is happening. I ask the minister to find some way to launch an inquiry into Canadian National's services across northern Ontario. Perhaps the time has come for a major shake-up of CN's top-level management, because whatever they are doing it has nothing to do with serving the public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate fully the genuine concern and interest of the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) regarding the reduction in rail service in his area. A similar question was raised January 13 by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), and I might add that further representations were directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and to the Canadian Transport Commission which has responsibility in this subject under the Railway Act. I assure the hon. member that the minister has informed the railway of the representations which were made here in the House.

I think it should be made clear, Mr. Speaker, that the action which the CNR is proposing in this instance, effective February 1, is a reduction of service, not a discontinuance of service. The railway is entitled, subject always to the provisions of section 315 of the Railway Act relative to adequacy and suitability of accommodation, to take care of traffic offering, to effect reductions in service on its own initiative, without the approval of the Canadian Transport Commission. Since approval of the Canadian Transport Commission is not required, there is no requirement for a hearing. The minister dealt with this distinction a year ago, on January 12, 1970, to be exact, when in reply to a question by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) he said:

I have to emphasize that where it is only a reduction in service there is no legal mechanism which can be employed. Where there is a discontinuance the Canadian Transport Commission has indicated it will hold hearings on such discontinuances.

With respect to this particular reduction in service, Canadian National has given assurance that if trains Nos. 7 and 8 are no longer operated, every station now served by those trains will be served on precisely the same basis by trains Nos. 1 and 2.

An hon. Member: Worthless!

WHEAT BOARD—PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—STATEMENT IN BUDGET RESPECTING STABILIZATION PAYMENTS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on December 8 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson):

In view of statements made in the House last week by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board that payments under the grain stabilization plan will not be made until after the end of the crop year, could the minister throw some further light on the statement contained in the budget speech that cash stabilization payments would be made next spring and summer totalling $100 million?

• (10:10 p.m.)

The minister's answer was:

I checked that statement with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and he agrees that the statement is fair and reasonable.

Thus I am happy to see the minister in charge of the Wheat Board in his seat tonight and I understand he is going to reply to my representation. I asked the question of the Minister of Finance on December 8 in view of two paragraphs contained in his budget speech which I should also like to place on record. As reported at page 1742 of Hansard, the minister said:

Much of the same stimulus would flow from new government proposals in quite a different area. I refer here to the grain receipts stabilization plan outlined to the House five weeks ago by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. If that plan is enacted and made applicable to the 1970-71 crop year as recommended, it will involve cash stabilization payments to western farmers next spring and summer totalling over $100 million. This would be the net payment contributed by the government to stabilize 1970-71 receipts. There would, of course, be important offsetting savings in government expenditure by the elimination of the temporary wheat storage payments which have been shown to be an inefficient form of assistance. However, the immediate effect of such a stabilization plan would be to put much needed cash into the hands of the farmers next spring.

The largest part of this flow of cash would go to Saskatchewan, where the provincial economy has been hardest hit by the decline in grain marketings since 1968. Large numbers of farmers in both Alberta and Manitoba, however, would also be helped. Taken together with the much higher grain sales and the prospects for further improvement, this early injection of cash would give a significant boost to the entire Prairie economy.

The immediate impact of the minister's statement in his budget speech was a series of headlines to the effect, "$100 million for western grain farmers". These headlines, of course, ignored the very big "if" in the minister's statement, and I think this was to be anticipated. It was underlined this afternoon by the minister's refusal during the question period to confirm that a basic decision had been taken to proceed with such a program. If he wants to confirm that now, I shall be very happy to hear it. These headlines also ignored the elimination of the temporary wheat storage payments and other expenditure reductions which would be effected as a result of the proposal.

I suggest that the Minister of Finance did a disservice to western Canada by giving the impression that a $100 million gift was going to the Prairie grain farmers. This was sloppy thinking and sloppy drafting. I was concerned about the reference to "payments to western farmers next spring and summer totalling over $100 million" because it implied payments before the end of the crop year on July 31. I suggest that this would be impossible unless some sort of complicated advance system were worked out.

Thus, on December 4, as reported at page 1755 of Hansard, I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board the following question:

In view of statements in the budget address last night concerning the grain stabilization proposal, could the minister indicate if it is the intention of the government, on the adoption of such a proposal, to arrange for payments under the stabilization plan to the farmers during the spring months?

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, the proposal indicates a hope to have a payment made for the current crop year. The final determination of the payment, assuming the legislation required is in place, would of course require figures which can only be final at the end of the crop year so it would likely be made in the fall, but it is envisaged that payment of up to $100 million might be made.

The reference to "might be made" was certainly different from the implication of the remarks of the Minister of Finance in his budget address. I suggest that his budget speech is inconsistent in referring to payments to western farmers next spring and summer totalling over $100 million, in view of the statement of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that payments would likely be made in the fall. I also suggest that the statement in the budget address was unfair and misleading because it gave the impression that $100 million of new money would be injected into the western economy. This is a false statement, for the reasons I have already indicated.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) is in the difficulty of having to find something to complain and worry about in face of a very good proposal for Prairie agriculture. One must also bear in mind his well-established desire for not saying anything very praiseworthy about anything the government does for this sector.

The proposals which were made in this House in late October were, of course, proposals. They were proposals for the purpose of discussion of detail or principle with the agricultural community. But they did convey a clear indication that if put into force they would involve a payment of approximately $100 million to the Prairie farmers for the current crop year. That is the way the situation still stands. Both me and my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in answering questions made it abundantly clear that a number of factors require to be settled before the payment in fact is made. These proposals must become a firm policy statement and, indeed, parts of the proposals very clearly would require legislation for them to be brought into effect. In looking at the question of a stabilization fund we have looked at the possibility that over the long haul it might well be wise to have interim payments in the course of a crop year, rather than have the whole of a possibly large stabilization payment wait for the end of the year.

Oftentimes the shortest cash position will be in the middle of a crop year, which by definition is falling below the previous five-year average. Since we are in that kind of year this year, it has also occurred to us that would be one possible way to deal with the situation now. But, of course, the "ifs" in this circumstance become much more complicated because we have not only to settle the proposals but we must have the legislation in place in time.

The hon. member's difficulty, of course, in terms of specific questions relates to the fact that he asked me one in one term and the other in different terms. My answer clearly indicated that I was focusing on the issue of the final determination of any final payment and the possibilities and probabilities of the payment being made. It is, of course, both in my mind and in the mind of the Minister of Finance, extremely unlikely that the reaction of the farm community will be such as to stand in the way of our going ahead with these proposals. Indeed, I hope in fairly short order we will come before this House with the firm proposals we hope to put in place and which we see as very greatly benefiting agriculture now and in the years to come.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

TABLING OF REPORT BY D. WILLIAM CARR AND ASSOCIATES

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in the two official languages a report entitled "The Seaway in Canada's Transportation", volume I, prepared by D. William Carr and Associates, Limited.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before we leave motions and because of the restricted nature of the question period I wish to make a suggestion which might facilitate the business of the House today and for weeks to come. I suggest that the Acting Prime Minister should make a clarifying statement on motions right now indicating whether Canada has abandoned its major goal of full employment as outlined by the Economic Council of Canada some years ago, which was the burden of the statement by the Minister of Labour yesterday and seems to have been supported by a number of other ministers over a period of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member seems to be asking a question which he might want to ask during the question period.

• (2:10 p.m.)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT AND INDUSTRY RATIONALIZATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Labour expressing the view of the government when he said in the House yesterday, as recorded on page 2507 of Hansard:

> It takes courage sometimes to create unemployment. We have created unemployment in the textile industry and we will probably create it temporarily in other industries as we automate and as we rationalize these industries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Acting Prime Minister may wish to reply to the hon. member and I will, of course, allow him to reply to the question. I suggest to the hon. member, however, that we are immediately, with the first question, becoming involved in the debate which will continue after the question period. I hope hon. members will keep this in mind. This having been said, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister might like to reply to the hon. member's question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the Minister of Labour when he spoke yesterday. He spoke of what is undoubtedly a very difficult problem which my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has been dealing with. It is, and I hope the hon. member recognizes this, necessary if we are to continue to compete in world markets that we should rationalize our industries and bring them up to date. That may involve some temporary difficulties, but in the long run there will be more people employed in Canada.

Mr. Hees: As the Minister of Labour said yesterday and as the Acting Prime Minister has reaffirmed today, the government intends to create additional unemployment. I was wondering how much additional unemployment—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister how much more unemployment, with the misery and hardship that it imposes upon the Canadian people, does the government intend to create in order to fight something which the Prime Minister recently advised us had been licked?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Baldwin: How much more courage does the government have?

UNEMPLOYMENT—FULL EMPLOYMENT GOAL AND GOVERNMENT PLANS RESPECTING UNEMPLOYED

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister—the Acting Prime Minister who is aspiring to be Prime Minister—if he can indicate why the government had abandoned the goal of full employment, and will he state whether there are government plans to accommodate unemployed persons who one minister indicated should amount to approximately 10 per cent of the work force at the present time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to comment on the first part of the question put by the hon. member. It was never my ambition to be Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Bell: The minister is a great actor, then.

Mr. Sharp: May I say that the government has never changed its policy which is to work as effectively as possible toward full employment for all Canadians.

Mr. Baldwin: What about that healthy 10 per cent?

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the aspiring Acting Prime Minister whether he would indicate to the House on motions the reason behind the statements continually emanating from ministers that we must tolerate high unemployment and, as the Minister of Labour said, that we should not be concerned in 1970-71 about unemployment because we have had it in previous winters?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Minister of Labour, as did the hon. gentleman, and the minister did not say that. What the minister said and what we must recognize is that even in the best of years, even when this country's economy was booming, there was a big increase in unemployment during the winter. We are trying to remove regional disparities and with some success. But we have not yet succeeded in eliminating winter unemployment.

UNEMPLOYMENT MEASURES TO AVOID LAY-OFF OF AIR CANADA EMPLOYEES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Air Canada has announced the lay-off of over 400 employees and that unemployment is critical in Canada, does the government intend to do anything at all to prevent Air Canada from laying off those 400 employees?

Mr. Speaker: If my memory serves me right, that question has already been put to the minister. However, if there are new developments with which the minister wants to acquaint the House, he might answer the question of the member for Témiscamingue.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I met for several hours yesterday with the chairman of the board, the president of Air Canada and a number of top officials of the company. We discussed certain proposals and possible alternatives that might at least delay the present plans to lay off approximately 400 employees. The company officials undertook to take these suggestions back to their head office to see whether they will be in a position to implement them. They hope to be in a position to advise me either late today or tomorrow regarding their intentions.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport in connection with the Air Canada lay-offs. Can the minister assure the House that he has taken into consideration the extra overtime required, particularly in the Maritimes, because of the adverse weather conditions? Has the minister considered that aspect in connection with these proposed lay-offs?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This was one of the many considerations that were discussed in detail yesterday. The problem is the uncertainty as to just when these workers are going to be required. This is one of the matters the company is trying to work out to at least alleviate the lay-offs to the maximum extent possible.

[Later:]

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES TO AVOID LAY-OFF OF AIR CANADA EMPLOYEES—YARMOUTH AIRPORT

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that Air Canada lay-offs are supposed to be in the order of two per cent, will the minister consider investigating the reduction of approximately 33 per cent at Yarmouth airport?

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROVISION OF MORE HOUSING STARTS AND LOWER INTEREST RATES TO COPE WITH PROBLEM

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing and urban affairs. In view of the serious unemployment, what immediate steps does the government intend to take to provide more housing starts and lower interest rates in order to cope with the unemployment problem? If this is too large a question to be answered now, will the minister make a statement on motions?

Mr. Speaker: I was going to suggest to the hon. member that this is a large question which should be replied to by way of a statement on motions. The minister might like to answer the question in this way.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I think that very significant results are showing up right now in the statistics recently released with regard to housing starts in the last quarter of 1970.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that the statement should not be made now. He might indicate to the House whether a statement will be made in due course.

[Later:]

UNEMPLOYMENT—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE IN REHABILITATION OF EXISTING HOUSING TO COPE WITH PROBLEM

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a further supplementary question for the minister in charge of housing. In the statement that the minister makes, will he give consideration to the possibility of government assistance to finance the rehabilitation of existing housing as a means of combating unemployment?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): We are already embarked on a program of that nature, but I will give consideration to elaboration in any statement I might make on the subject.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EXPANSION OF AMERICAN-OWNED SUBSIDIARIES BY USE OF CANADIAN MONEY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to a survey conducted by Mr. David Belli of the United States Department of Commerce, which indicates that 94 per cent of the money used to expand American subsidiaries in Canada has come from Canadian sources. Upon examining this report, will the government be prepared to make a statement as to what steps they intend to take to prevent the Canadian economy being bought out with Canadian money?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Like the hon. member, I also saw this report in the paper. I have not seen the original report. I will look at it now that it has been brought to my attention. This information is also in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue who has been preparing a study on the whole problem. I know that this is one aspect of the problem which is concerning him very much.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware of this situation described in the survey made by the United States Department of Commerce? Are there any recommendations in this regard in the report which he will be making to cabinet, and will the minister be prepared to disclose those recommendations at a later date, if not now?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): I am aware, generally, of the thrust of the points to which the hon. member has referred, although I have not seen the specific report. This is a matter which I certainly have been looking at in the course of my work. With respect to specific recommendations, these, of course, will be among the matters to be considered by the government and dealt with when the government is in a position to make a statement to the House on the matter.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Can we be given any indication when the House will be appraised of the investigation and recommendations of the minister?

Mr. Gray: Not as yet, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN PERSONNEL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Postmaster General a question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Did the announcement he made yesterday that a program called "assured mail-delivery" would be established, mean there will be an increase of personnel in his department and did the minister want to have a share in the fight against unemployment?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think this service can be given with the personnel we now have.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELATIONSHIP OF INCREASE IN CRIME TO UNEMPLOYMENT—CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES ON PROBLEM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Solicitor General. I have already asked it twice, but perhaps the Solicitor General might be able to answer. In view of the alarming increase in crime and violence and the anticipated acceleration of the increase because of social unrest related to high unemployment, does the Solicitor General have any thoughts in mind as to what can be done? Is there any intention to hold a special conference with the provincial authorities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the relationship that may exist between unemployment and crime in general, or manifestations of violence, is not always as direct as one would think. For instance, there may be people who commit criminal acts and who may be considered, from a statistical point of view, as unemployed persons, because they cannot report an illegal job.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Has the minister any intention of discussing this very serious problem with the provincial authorities?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, we maintain constant relations with the provinces, in order to discuss the agitation which can occur in our society, but I do not see at the present time any alarming situation which could compel us to hold special consultations. We consider that the present social situation can affect unemployment, which does not mean that the general situation in Canada is alarming.

QUEBEC—PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF IDENTITY CARDS —DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTER AS TO CONSTITUTIONALITY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the province of Quebec is moving quickly toward the implementation of identity cards, can the Solicitor General tell us whether he has had an opportunity to discuss this very controversial matter with his counterpart in Quebec as to its constitutionality and so on?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Is it the intention of the minister to discuss this matter with his counterpart in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Goyer: It could be discussed, once the Quebec Minister of Justice has indicated that he intends to take such a step.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF UNIONS AND INDUSTRY TO FIND SOLUTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question.

Since the government has been unable to control the increase in unemployment, could the Acting Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot preface his question in this way, he must ask the question directly.

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if in view of the present situation the government is willing to call a meeting of representatives of all sectors of the private industry and of labour leaders to try and find a solution to the unemployment problem?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The government's policy, the encouragement which has been given to private industry to expand, the very large increase in government expenditure directed to the easing of unemployment, and the big drop in interest rates are indications of how effective these measures will be in promoting employment in the private sector.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister be so good as to outline at the first opportunity on motions what inducement the government has given private industry to expand, because private industry is not aware of any inducements having been offered?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I might point out to the hon. gentleman that the surveys we have regarding investment intentions indicate a very substantial increase in activity during the present year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TORONTO-WINNIPEG PASSENGER SERVICE REDUCTION—OPPORTUNITY FOR REPRESENTATIONS BY PUBLIC

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement he made on January 13 in answer to a question of mine concerning the dropping of trains Nos. 7 and 8 of Canadian National Railways and the minister's indication that a public hearing would be held before withdrawal of the trains, has the minister any information to convey to the House following his discussion with the Canadian Transport Commission in this regard?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I made an investigation following the hon. member's question. I was under the impression that it was abandonment of a service to which he referred, in which case a hearing would have been mandatory. I now understand that there is to be a reduction of service and therefore the railway is not obliged to go through the necessary hearing procedures. Subsequently, however, I was informed that the railway has undertaken to ensure that service is maintained at its prior level through some other arrangement involving the utilization of other trains.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, from the reply of the minister I think he did understand the original question because he said that there would be no train withdrawals without a public hearing and indicated that the two trains were being withdrawn. As the minister who is empowered by the Act to intervene in such matters, is he willing, on behalf of people in northern Ontario scattered across an area of several hundred miles, to exercise his ministerial prerogative in this regard?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, to the extent that I have the authority. I do agree that perhaps I did unwittingly mislead the hon. member when I spoke of train withdrawal. Under the Act a train can be withdrawn as long as service is maintained on that route. It is the total abandonment of a service or route that requires a public hearing. I will take a look at this matter and see whether there is any means through which I can intervene, and if I can help I shall be glad to do so.

[Later:]

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that some centres in northern Ontario will be completely without passenger service, would the minister consider setting up a public hearing at these centres?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think that is virtually the same form of question as that asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming earlier. If there is a total abandonment of service as the hon. member indicated, then it is my understanding that a hearing is required. If in fact an area is going to be without service in the way that he suggested, then, of course, the commission may possibly recommend its continuation and subsidization. But I would have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY BY HOUSE COMMITTEE INTO NORTHERN ONTARIO SERVICE

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister could find a way to have the House of Commons transportation committee inquire into all aspects of Canadian National service in northern Ontario, which has deteriorated to a shocking extent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I assume that either the estimates or the annual report of Canadian National, for example, will at some point during the session be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and I suggest that this would be the most appropriate time to carry out an examination.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question for the Government House Leader. Will the committee be allowed to call witnesses?

BANKRUPTCY

PROCEDURE IN CONSIDERING REPORT OF STUDY COMMITTEE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On December 18 the minister tabled a report in regard to bankruptcy and indicated that he would ask for representations from the public. At that time I suggested that perhaps it would be better to refer the report to the appropriate house committee for examination and report back to the House. Has the minister made up his mind yet as to what procedure he is going to follow, and can we soon be told precisely what is going to be done with regard to the report on bankruptcy?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, my inclination is, of course, as indicated in the Speech from the Throne, to proceed to the drawing of a bill which would then be government policy and would be examined very carefully by a committee. I have heard and seen little that would persuade me that this would be the wrong course, but I am still giving the matter consideration.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Did the minister ask the public for any representations on this bankruptcy report and, if so, when and where?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the wording in Hansard, but I think I mentioned there that I looked forward to receiving representations from the public. Certainly in press statements I urged the public and those interested to respond to the report and make comments to me. I have already had a number of comments and I know of a great list of people, organizations and groups who have indicated to my office or to my officials that they want to make comments on the report.

REPORT OF STUDY COMMITTEE—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO MINISTER BY PUBLIC

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister has invited representations from the public but has stymied those representations in that they have to be in the minister's hands by January 31, and there is a great deal of apprehension about this, has he now made up his mind to extend the time in order that he may receive full representation from throughout the country?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I urged people to get their representations or comments in as quickly as possible and said I should like to proceed to the drafting or drawing of a bill by the end of January. Naturally, of course, this government, being a democratic government, will receive representations and comments at any time.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it took four years to prepare this excellent report, would the minister speed up the drafting of the legislation so we can study it?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State being absent, I wish to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister.

Would he tell us whether Information Canada will be completely established and ready to operate when the next federal election is called?

Mr. Speaker: That question could be put on the order paper.

TRANSPORT

SAFETY STANDARDS FOR SNOWMOBILES—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the number of tragic fatalities this winter involving the use of snowmobiles, and the multiplicity of designs and makes of these machines, can the minister inform the House whether his department is attempting to draw up minimal safety standards for the production of snowmobiles so Canadians can be assured of a safe winter recreational pastime?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as to the objective of a safe recreational pastime, of course, this depends in large measure, as I am sure everyone is aware, on the skill and care of the driver. We have drawn up basic safety regulations for these machines and before they leave the factory they have to meet certain specifications. I would have to check to see whether these regulations are in effect now or are about to be proclaimed. We have also undertaken to make certain research grants in respect of the whole question of snowmobile safety to see what kind of standards might be adopted in this field.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the great degree of difference between provinces in the standards enacted by them regarding the safe use of these machines, has the federal government entered into consultation with the provinces, or will it be calling together provincial representatives in order that the best form of national safety standards may be enacted in consort with the provinces?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have had two or perhaps three meetings, two of which I attended personally, with provincial ministers of highways, or whatever their titles happen to be in each province, and we are working toward the goal the hon. member has outlined—the maximum degree of uniformity. Actually this does not so much relate to the vehicles themselves as it does to the driving conditions or regulations within each individual province.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INCREASE IN PRODUCERS' DELIVERY QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board but in his absence perhaps I should direct it to the Acting Minister or to the Minister's Parliamentary Secretary. In view of the fact that current wheat sales have been made from stocks owned by the Canadian Wheat Board and have not been reflected in delivery quotas to producers, when will wheat quotas to the financially depressed producers be increased?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of my colleague.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENTAL INCREASE FOR PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Can he now confirm to the House his department's plans to raise the basic levels of rent for PMQ's across the country and, if so, can he indicate to what levels rents will be raised and when these increases will be effective?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for the notice he sent to me at my seat in the House today. I would be glad to make an inquiry and give the hon. member a precise response.

Mr. Forrestall: When the minister is making the inquiry, will he determine and then advise the House what percentage of the recent pay increase will be absorbed by the rental increase?

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED REMOVAL OF CERTAIN OPERATIONS FROM CALGARY TO EDMONTON

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Post Office. What are the Post Office operations which it appears the department proposes to move from Calgary to Edmonton, and what is the reason for this proposal?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that this is a matter of immediate urgency and I wonder whether this question could not appropriately be placed on the Order Paper. If there is an urgency, the minister might want to give the House the information sought by the hon. member.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): I do not know exactly what the hon. member means, Mr. Speaker, but I will take notice of the question.

INDUSTRY

RENFREW AIRCRAFT AND ENGINEERING COMPANY—INVESTIGATION OF PROPOSED CLOSING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is he aware that the Renfrew Aircraft and Engineering Company is scheduled to be closed entirely by March 31 next, putting a lot of people out of work, and is his department looking into the situation, particularly in view of the fact that Renfrew is a designated area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am not personally aware of that situation but I presume my department is, as usual. I will look into it.

BALLAST PUMPED INTO GEORGIAN BAY BY IRON ORE VESSELS—ACTION TO RECTIFY PROBLEM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of recent complaints by the town council and chamber of commerce of Parry Sound concerning pollution caused by iron ore carrying vessels pumping polluted ballast into Georgian Bay, can the minister say whether any action is contemplated by his department to rectify this situation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not personally aware of this particular incident and I will take the question as notice. Of course, if there has been a breach and we can identify the culprits the normal course of the law will be followed.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I received many favourable requests and very few unfavourable representations, Mr. Speaker.

MEMINI SATELLITE PROJECT—INVOLVEMENT OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND FRANCE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister regarding the involvement of the government of Quebec with the government of France in the regional telecommunication satellite project Memini, in respect of which the Quebec Minister of Communications recently made a statement. Can the Acting Prime Minister advise whether the Canadian government is being officially informed or is in any way involved in the discussions now going on in Paris on this important matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I saw this report in the newspapers also and I have made some inquiries. When I have the answer I shall give the particulars to the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT

CONSULTATIONS WITH MANUFACTURERS OF DC-8 ON SPOILERS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on December 4, as recorded on page 1759 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Transport whether there were consultations between officials of his department and the manufacturer of the DC-8 for the purpose of perfecting the design of a fail-safe spoiler for that aircraft. The minister said he would look into the matter and report to the House. Has he now had an opportunity to do so and is he able to say whether such consultations are going on?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in respect of consultations I am not sure whether they are continuing. I can say that the steps which were recommended or ordered by the Civil Aeronautics Board of the United States, in which we concurred, regarding the posting of the necessary notices, etc. in the cockpits of the DC-8's, and also the manual changes which were recommended, have been undertaken.

Mr. Nielsen: As the minister knows, the posting of notices is not a fail-safe device. Has he looked into the specific question of a fail-safe device to prevent the inadvertent deployment of these spoilers in the air?

Mr. Jamieson: As the hon. member is a pilot he has me at a bit of a disadvantage in terms of the technical side of this matter. I can only say that I have been advised by the officials that as a result of the incidents which brought this to the fore discussions by our department with the manufacturers and also with the airlines are under way. I would be pleased to get him a written statement indicating the status of these discussions at the moment.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have less than ten minutes left in the question period. I must seek the co-operation of hon. members. If I allow two or three supplementaries to every question asked, we will be in difficulty in a few minutes. Perhaps the hon. member for Yukon might ask the last supplementary, and again I will seek the co-operation of hon. members to get on as quickly as possible.

Mr. Nielsen: My question is a related one and very brief. May I refer the minister to the answer to my question on December 1, to be found at page 1632 of Hansard, and ask him whether he is yet ready to report to the House, which he undertook to do at that time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

POTENTIAL RISKS IN OPERATION OF CORVAIR AUTOMOBILES—WARNING TO CANADIAN OWNERS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I want to direct my question to the attention of the Minister of Transport. Having in mind the warning which has just been issued by the United States Department of Transportation alerting motorists to certain potential risks in the operation of General Motors Chevrolet Corvair models, 1961 to 1969, is the Department of Transport aware of the situation and is a similar warning being issued to Canadian motorists?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will have to consult the officials regarding the specific nature of the situation. The hon. member was good enough to send me the general notice from the United States national highway traffic safety administration. I note that it is a general warning at the moment and it does not require the specific notification of individual Corvair car owners. I assume we will be doing exactly the same thing, but I will look into it.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NOISE STANDARDS FOR SNOWMOBILES

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the consideration the department is giving to safety standards for snowmobiles, is the department also considering the establishment of reasonable noise standards for the use of such machines in order to reduce the serious problem of noise pollution?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and they are working at it twice as hard as before last weekend when my son nearly drove me out of my mind.

AIR CANADA

GENERAL CONSOLIDATION OF TELEPHONE RESERVATION SERVICES—PROTECTION OF EMPLOYEES' JOBS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Questions have been asked with reference to the submissions made by the Canadian Airline Employees Association with regard to the Air Canada reservations staff in Ottawa. Will there by any closing of other offices across Canada, particularly in Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): This was part of the discussions which were held yesterday. I am also expecting further information from Air Canada on their plans in this regard. They did tell me yesterday that it is part of a program which it is anticipated will be expanded to other parts of the country. They did not give me the specific locations. I have asked for them and will pass them on as soon as I get them.

Mr. Woolliams: When the minister does find out—equipment has already been installed in Calgary—will he also ascertain how many employees will be affected and whether a serious effort will be made to make certain that their jobs are protected and that they will be able to move to other departments of Air Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes. I brought this up again yesterday at great length and I am told that the relationship between the union and the company is such, and the nature of their agreement is such, that personnel cannot be displaced as a result of technical changes of this sort.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): My understanding is that the Dow Chemical Company is not dumping any mercury into the river in that area. I will check our records, but my understanding is that all of its effluent is now being recycled and has been for many months.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister who is co-ordinating the idea of spending $50 million to take the young people of this country for bus rides instead of providing them with jobs?

At the same time, would the minister consider using his good offices to get the jobs back for those men who were fired this morning because they had enough courage to sign a written statement bringing these questionable practices to light?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That assertion is in the form of a representation rather than a question. The hon. member will have to assume that it will be taken into account.

CHARTER SERVICES—WARDAIR—CTC RULING ON HOLDING OF CUSTOMERS' MONEY IN TRUST

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Transport. At the beginning of last

Is he in a position to tell us when he expects to make a decision or what the situation is with regard to Wardair?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Contrary to press reports, there has not been a formal appeal filed with me as of this moment. I have some information informally to the effect that the officers of the company are at present seeking ways and means of meeting the requirements of the CTC order. The last word I had was that they were having some success in that direction, but there has been no appeal of any kind.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture because I do not like to see him sitting there unnoticed. Is the minister conducting any special research in his department to develop some kind of chemical that could be used in these pits which would be helpful in holding down these odours?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question should be placed on the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, January 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson, that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (page 1808).

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned last night, I was discussing the important problem of unemployment and the solutions that should be adopted in order to remedy an unceasingly deteriorating situation. I also said that real credit is the fruit of the labour of the whole nation, of the whole community. It is therefore a social credit. The Crédistes neither discovered that, nor added anything thereto. They merely propose a more social financial system enabling the whole community to benefit by that real credit, without private financial institutions cashing in on it for their own profit. That is why we suggest using the Bank of Canada to coin the nation's credit.

Furthermore, if we consider how our society is organized and how it is administered, we discover that we are living within a constitutional system in which there are three clear-cut power levels. In this respect, I would like to quote the following from the publication entitled "A Super-Power":

> Civics manuals generally identify three power areas within a political regime: the legislative power, the executive power and the judicial power.
> The legitimate government in any free—

—such as Canada—

> —and truly sovereign nation must have the power to make laws designed to control the relationships of its citizens between themselves and with the established bodies, without having to request permission from a foreign authority. Such is the legislative power.

This assembly of hon. members here is called the Canadian Parliament. Le me quote further:

> Similarly, the government of a sovereign nation must administer the country in accordance with its laws and its constitution, without having to submit its actions to the approval of a foreign government. Such is the executive power.

This is known as the cabinet. The cabinet has no intention of unfairly blaming the inefficiency of ministers, for they rarely have access to the wherewithal required to implement plans which might profit the whole of the community.

> The last aspect is that the government of a sovereign nation must have the power to implement the laws of the country, to prosecute and penalize those who break them, to judge disputes between citizens, throughout that country, without having to obtain approval from a foreign government. Such is the judicial power.

This is what is reported on front pages by all newspapers in Canada, especially in the Province of Quebec, in connection with the trial of the members of the FLQ. Reading the newspaper, one might think that there is only that association in Canada, while there are so many serious problems which should get attention from the newspapers, the radio, and television.

I listened to the news last night and I noted that very little information was given on the study of the unemployment problem which this Parliament is currently conducting. I found that very disturbing.

Why should there be this silence, this collusion? This is because aside from the three powers I have mentioned, i.e. legislative, executive and judicial, there is a super-power.

I quote further:

While the three powers—legislative, executive and judicial—are the great established powers of any sovereign government, there is another power, not classified as such, but which overrides them all and dominates governments themselves.

This super-power whose authority stems from no constitution and which does not care about it more than a bandit in the exercise of its power, is the monetary power.

This power is especially significant among those who, as absolute masters of money, govern and grant credit at their own sweet will.

It is that credit I spoke about yesterday, that credit created by the people, through the activities of the people, that credit which is coined by private institutions and granted according to their will.

—Thus they distribute in some way blood to the economic body whose life is in their hands so that nobody can breathe without their consent.

Lacking that consent the governments—in Ottawa, in the provinces and the municipalities—must because of lack of money and finance, postpone the implementation of public works useful to society. The monetary superpower controls and dominates governments elected in a democratic way by the people and those governments are paralysed.

Monetary power is the power to issue money and credit of the nation; to condition their circulation; to determine the term of financial credit; the power to require its reimbursement at a time set in advance under penalty of confiscation of the goods which are the fruit of the labour of those from they are confiscated; the power to impose upon governments themselves the conditions of liberation and return, demanding as a guarantee the power all governments have to tax their citizens.

They are granted loans on condition that they have the courage to levy even higher taxes on the worker who creates the real credit of the nation.

Now, that financial credit, that money, is the authority to use the productivity, not of those in control, but of the people of the nation. Money and credit controllers cannot make a wheat stalk—

I ask my friends from the West to go and see if those who control money and issue credit to make the economy work, have created a single wheat stalk or succeeded in making a single oat seed grow. Credit controllers, I go on with the quotation:

—do not produce a single pair of shoes, do not make a single brick, do not dig a single mine well, do not have one square inch of road. Therefore, it is his own real credit. But he cannot use it without the consent of credit controllers, of financial credit which is only an entry in bank books representing the value of the nation's credit.

The pen of the banker who accepts or refuses to give individuals, companies, governments, the right to mobilize talents, good will, the natural resources of the country is the one that controls; it accepts or rejects; it lays terms when granting permission; it drives into debt individuals and governments to whom permissions have been given. It is a despotic pen in the hands of a super-power, a monetary power.

There is no worse tyranny than that of the monetary power: a tyranny which can be felt in households, in all institutions, public administrations and governments.

From where does that super-power obtain its authority? The other three government powers get theirs under our national constitution. But which constitution could have granted to a super-power the right to control governments themselves?

It is a fiendish power so permeated with a sacred aura that we are looking for the causes of economic and social evils everywhere except in the application of the monetary and credit systems. Looking elsewhere is permitted; but there, hands off, even for sovereign governments.

It is forbidden to search that particular field.

But how many minds eminently qualified to understand, to differentiate between a domination system and a service organization have preferred to close their ears and eyes for reasons of pride or interest!

Why would not the media give to the population the necessary information so that it would better understand that the present difficulties due to unemployment and its attendant hardships, are not solely the consequence of a contract, of a written constitution, but are due to the fact that our financial system, this super power, does not serve the community. It would seem normal that information media would very objectively echo the proposals made in this House by those who seek the means to settle this very serious problem before it is too late.

Yesterday, in this House, the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) made a sincere and honest outline of the situation and suggested solutions that should be not only considered but applied, and newspapers do not even mention it. If the leader of the Ralliement créditiste had made a blunder or a statement worthy of some interest, by its unusual character, it would have been published.

I do not, by any means, blame the newspapermen who are in the pay of a controlled and conditioned press that must necessarily keep its influence, because it benefits from this super monetary power.

What we need, instead of this power, is a monetary power legally instituted so as to put it at the service of the community, as are the three others I have referred to earlier.

Yesterday, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said, and rightly so, that there were in banks huge sums of money waiting for borrowers. But that is not the problem.

To illustrate my point may I give the following example. A motorist crossing the Laurentian Park has a breakdown and tries to find out what caused it. Someone discovers that his tank is empty. The motorist would like to reach his destination but he has no more gas. A third one comes along, a representative of the monetary superpower, who says: You are wrong, and you are complaining for nothing, my good man, because gas is not lacking in Quebec, there is some at Wolfe's Cove and at Bagotville. And the motorist answers: I know all that, I know there is some in those huge tanks, but it is my own small tank that is empty, and that is why my car won't run.

What is going on now is that the small tanks—the individuals' wallets—are empty and that is where it is necessary to put purchasing power. That is where a remedy should be applied.

In the second place, I remember a comparison made by the minister in his remarks. He contrasted the present Liberal administration with the previous Progressive Conservative government.

The minister may divert himself by comparing the present number of unemployed with corresponding statistics of the then Conservative administration, but it does not solve the problem. It is petty politics; it is making fun of people, especially those who are hit by unemployment. Whether the figures are 8.4 per cent in 1971 or 8.2 per cent in 1962-63, all the same, this is unemployment and a dangerous social plague at that.

In the third place, the minister rightly said that the leader of the Ralliement Creditiste made concrete proposals. I agree with him on this point.

Since I have been elected to the House of Commons, I hear the government talk about fighting inflation. Yet, we had told him so, and I remember having also said on many occasions, that his anti-inflationary policy would gradually push up unemployment, and this is what happened. As a matter of fact, the restraint policy, higher interest rates, and so on, discouraged initiative.

For these reasons, projects have been abandoned, that otherwise would have created jobs and precisely because of rent increases, higher interest rates and poor control of the money supply, all of which precluded companies and entrepreneurs from carrying out public works projects required by the population, by municipalities, by provincial governments and even by the federal government.

• (3:10 p.m.)

How many building jobs have been delayed or abandoned precisely on account of that notorious fight against inflation. At a certain time, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says: There is no more inflation, boys, we can make a fresh start! It happened overnight!

Mr. Speaker, unemployment is serious because it is the primary cause for diminished purchasing power. Here I would like to express my view of matters clearly.

When the purchasing power decreases and the number of unemployed reaches 500,000, families, especially large families, are the first victims of the stagnation. The decrease in purchasing power automatically is followed by reduced sales.

It is obvious that if I have an annual income of $6,000 I will work out my budget according to that income. But, if at a certain time my budget is reduced to $2,000, I will have to reduce my purchases.

The drop in sales is the cause of the slowing down of production, which brings about an increased number of unemployed.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

The increase in the number of unemployed cuts down on purchasing power; the decrease in purchasing power is reflected in a lesser sales volume and this in turn causes a slow-down in orders from industries.

When plants have to store their products because of a shortage of orders or a decrease in sales, they lay off their workers who become unemployed.

This is the way we go around in circles. Misery, and destitution prevail in spite of a glut of goods made by Canadians for Canadians.

Progress in the field of manufacturing has as one of its side effects a decrease in the number of workers needed to create a larger productivity. This I will prove to you.

In 1970, in spite of an increase in the number of unemployed, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics tells us that the gross total production in Canada has increased by $22 billion; this goes to show that the machines did not stop operating. When machines operate, workers are laid off; they lose their buying power while the machines go on producing goods which people still need to buy.

Progress in the field of construction has had the effect of creating the same situation.

I have been in construction. I once had many workers under my supervision to erect some sort of building and today, when I visit a construction site, I note that with a very small number of workers, a similar building is erected in a relativly short time, which means that progress has also come to the field of construction.

With modern implements, producers have become more efficient. While employing less and less manpower, they can do more and do it faster, which means that the unemployed are simply watching machines do the work. Through a window of the plant, they can see that the machine is doing a tremendous amount of work but at the end of the week they are not paid for watching because they did not participate in the work. They are the unemployed: people with a lower purchasing power and dissatisfied people.

The same phenomenon can be found in public works for the construction of roads, bridges and public buildings. I will tell a good story hon. members in this connection.

As for the younger members who did not witness such a horrible thing, I ask them to check the story in old newspapers.

Forty years ago, when settlement roads and even highways such as the Trans-Canada Highway were built, many laborers were hired. The hon. T.-D. Bouchard, the great Liberal genius at that time—he was a minister in the Godbout cabinet in Quebec—had authorized the grading of Highway 20. Indeed, he had authorized the spreading of gravel on the road by a grader drawn by men to increase the number of jobs and tractors were rusting in the yards. I saw and experienced that situation and I can say where it happened. It was in Villeroy, in Lotbinière. I even have pictures. And we pretend to live in a civilized country.

The hon. minister was serious when he cited the Lord's words: In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread. He forgot that at the same time, God created man in his own image to make him resort mostly to his intelligence. That is what man did. He used his intelligence to find out how to make natural elements work for him: water, wind and everything that God had created, in order to ease his physical tasks, in other words the work he had to do as an animal since animals are not intelligent. Our good Lord permitted that. Man wanted to adjust to nature's design.

At one time, man refused to make use of his intelligence to control a financial system that does not correspond to the needs in 1971.

Man is caught in a vice, a victim of his own inventions, because to this day governments have always considered the financial system a master and not a servant. That is the problem!

Mr. Bourassa, premier of Quebec—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that his time has expired. He may not continue without the unanimous agreement of the House. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kindness and also thank my colleagues. I shall try to condense as briefly as possible the main ideas I wanted to develop in the course of this debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will allow me to point out that several members wish to speak before the closing of the debate and I believe it would be fair on his part to limit his comment as much as possible.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Very well, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to say that the premier of Quebec Mr. Bourassa made a great discovery as recorded in The Gazette of January 15, 1971, by Richard Cléroux. I quote the premier's statement as reported: "The unemployment in Quebec is due to the postwar wave of births." It is extraordinary! Due to the great number of young people born shortly after the war and now reaching the employment market. Acording to Mr. Bourassa, that is the main reason for the high rate of unemployment in Quebec.

According to Mr. Bourassa, the birth-control pill came too late. If we were less numerous in Quebec or Canada, the problem would be solved. But at the same time, Mr. Bourassa, his party and his economists, say that the population should be increased through immigration to insure Canada's prosperity. There is nothing to understand.

The previous week, Mr. Bourassa had said that the high rate of unemployment stemmed from the fact that we were living in North America and that we were dependent upon the United States. Finally, he confirmed what many people say: that we mortgage our future to the U.S., that we promote there the actual credit, the nation's credit.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion in order to improve the present situation. In my view, eliminating the 11 per cent tax on building materials would greatly contribute to solve this problem, because it would give a boost to the building trade.

Secondly, I would invite the Prime Minister to read carefully the letter he received in the first days of January, from the mother superior of a religious congregation who, on New Year's day sat at her desk to meditate on the serious problems concerning agriculture and unemployment. This letter contains some most interesting suggestions that deserve to be read and pondered over by all hon. members.

I had intended to read this letter, but since my time is rather limited, I shall close my remarks by thanking all hon. members for granting me some extra time.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) wishes to ask a question to the hon. member who has just sat down. I suggest, however, that, because of lack of time, we should allow hon. members who intend to take part in the debate, to do so immediately.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, my question is a very brief one. I would like to ask the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the hon. member's time has already expired, that question can be asked only with the unanimous consent of the House. Now, as this consent does not appear to have been granted, the Chair must recognize the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, has the House been asked to allow the hon. member for Joliette to ask his question?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

• (3:20 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak further about the state of our economy during this renewal of the debate on the budget which I introduced in the House on the night of December 3.

In discussing our economy, it is essential to keep our primary objective as a nation foremost in mind. As I pointed out in my budget address, that objective is a steady and sustainable improvement in the real income of Canadians everywhere. This, in turn, requires the fullest possible utilization of the nation's human and material resources. Because of the serious strains imposed in the economy in the past by the long upward surge of costs and prices at home and abroad, the utilization of both our human and material resources at present is below the level any of us would consider desirable.

As I have emphasized on a number of occasions, the government is deeply concerned about the current levels of unemployment existing in this country and the hardship this entails. But I am firmly convinced that, as a result of the strong fiscal and monetary stimulus progressively injected into the economy during the course of the past 10 months, the stage has been set for a substantial improvement in production, employment and real incomes.

In the budget which I presented to the House last month, I pointed out that a development of prime importance was that employment appeared to be rising in Canada and unemployment to be falling when seasonal factors were taken into account. In September of last year, unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis reached a peak of 6.9 per cent. It declined to 6.6 per cent in October and 6.5 per cent in November. The figures for December, published only last week, show that adjusted unemployment during that month amounted to 6.6 per cent, which was also below the September peak for the third month in a row.

It is important to remember that this decline in unemployment was maintained during the balance of 1970 despite the fact that a substantial number of workers were jobless as a result of the impact on associated industries of the General Motors strike in Canada throughout the whole three-month period. Had that strike not been in effect or had it been settled sooner, unemployment would have been significantly less than that actually recorded. I might observe, in passing, that the General Motors strike south of the border, which also caused extensive unemployment in industries supplying the automotive company, had been settled by the time the labour force survey was taken last month. Nevertheless, unemployment in the United States rose from 5.8 per cent in November to 6 per cent in December, also on a seasonally adjusted basis.

For political purposes, Mr. Speaker, members of the opposition choose to ignore the real, underlying progress that is beginning to be made in reducing unemployment. It pleases them instead to concentrate exclusively on unadjusted unemployment rates and to totally ignore the fact that the actual number of people without work always increases sharply in Canada during the winter months even in the best of times, as I pointed out in my budget speech last month. During 1966, for example, average annual unemployment declined to the lowest level during the past decade at 3.6 per cent. In that year, actual unemployment varied between 2.6 per cent in September, when 205,000 workers lacked jobs, and 5.1 per cent in January, when there were 359,000 without work, a differential of 154,000.

[Mr. Benson.]

The amount of work which can be undertaken in the tourist industry and by farmers, fishermen or construction workers, for example, is severely curtailed in winter by ice, snow and freezing temperatures. Over a period of years, the proportion of the labour force unemployed during the wintertime because of seasonal factors has declined quite markedly. In part, this is the result of the development of new methods that make possible continuation of some kinds of outdoor work. In part, it is the result of the fact that a growing proportion of the labour force is engaged in occupations less affected by seasonal changes. Nevertheless, it remains a fact that during our Canadian winter there are a large number of people who are unable to work at their occupations.

During 1970 as a whole, unemployment in Canada averaged 5.9 per cent, compared to 4.7 per cent in 1969. An important factor which contributed to this increase was the continued rise in the number of Canadians put out of work because of industrial disputes. Since 1962, the amount of time lost as a result of such disputes has been growing at an average annual rate of more than 25 per cent. In the second quarter of 1970 alone, more than three million man-days were lost as a result of strikes or lockouts. On the assumption that each person involved in an industrial dispute results in one other person in a related industry being laid off, industrial disputes in the second quarter alone accounted for some 50,000 persons being added to the ranks of the unemployed. This is quite apart from the strikers themselves, who are not counted among the unemployed. It is estimated that in the absence of layoffs resulting from industrial disputes, average unemployment during 1970 would have been reduced from 5.9 per cent to 5.5 per cent, which compares with the average rate of unemployment between 1961 and 1969 of 5 per cent.

Perhaps the most important single element in our manpower situation is the fact that Canada has by far the fastest growing labour force of any country in the industrialized world. It is, of course, obvious that during the past year the creation of new jobs failed to keep pace with the increases in the size of the labour force. Nevertheless, the increase in Canadian employment during 1970 of 1.3 per cent exceeded that in the United States by a third and was significantly higher than the average annual employment growth of every major European country between 1961 and 1968. In two leading European countries, Germany and Italy, average annual employment actually declined by .2 and .9 per cent respectively during this eight-year period of strong economic expansion.

Mr. Baldwin: Why are people going back to Europe, then, from here?

Mr. Benson: It is not to increase the labour force. Even in the period of moderate economic growth which we experienced last year, it is probable the figures will show that in relative terms Canada led the world in the creation of new jobs for its citizens.

Beginning with the budget last March, fiscal and monetary policies have been geared progressively to promoting a major expansion of the economy as the dangerous pressures of inflationary prices have been brought under control. To refresh the memories of hon. members of the opposition, I would like to outline briefly the measures the government has taken to turn the economy around—

Mr. Baldwin: Turn it upside-down!

Mr. Benson: —during the past nine or ten months. Last March although the financial critic for the official opposition was wringing his hands about inflation and suggesting spending cuts and tax increases, we produced an expansionary budget, a switch on a cash basis of over $750 million. In June we increased outlays to the provinces by some $350 million. Another $73 million went into a summer employment program for students, and expanded social assistance programs. In August, we pumped an additional $100 million into the 1970 CMHC capital budget and a further $140 million in 1971 to finance an additional 15,000 units of low cost housing. Construction of these housing units is already under way in regions where the need is great and unemployment highest. At the same time there was a special program of $60 million for capital and other projects in regions of slower economic growth and for manpower retraining.

• (3:30 p.m.)

As I emphasized earlier, we did all these things in stages, as we found that we could responsibly take additional measures consistent with the maintenance of economic stability. By December we determined we could take further action, and we did so. The budget then provided for additional expenditures of $100 million this fiscal year, and $400 million in fiscal 1971-72, for a total of $500 million.

In the December budget I announced a 10 per cent increase in unemployment insurance benefits, an additional $23 million for capital improvement projects in areas of highest unemployment, another $20 million for the development of roads and other local services for the new Montreal International airport, another $40 million for CMHC for additional low cost housing construction on top of the 15,000 units mentioned earlier, loans totalling $150 million to the provinces for quick job-creating capital projects, an industrial incentives program for southeastern Ontario and southwestern Quebec, direct loans and loan insurance to the footwear industry, substantial assistance to the shipbuilding industry, and a capital cost allowance supplement to encourage an early expansion of capital investment in the manufacturing and processing industries. I said then the $150 million loan program was to encourage provinces immediately to undertake projects that they could not otherwise afford to finance at the present time.

Activity is moving ahead rapidly. We have reached agreement with Quebec on a full allocation of their $70 million share of the fund. Contracts are being let for sections of an auto route through the city of Montreal which will form part of the trans-Canada highway. Already, there are 1,000 men at work on the site and the Quebec government expects 2,400 men to be at work by April. Several times that number of jobs will be created in supplying and carrying material to the site. Our officials have agreed with the government of British Columbia on allocation of that province's $37 million share of the loan fund for municipal projects in the province. B.C. plans work on these to start immediately. We have been meeting with the other provinces in order to expedite projects and they will be submitting applications within days. There will be no delay in granting approval for qualified projects.

We are accused by the opposition of being complacent about unemployment. This allegation is pure nonsense. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet spend the bulk of their time studying and taking action aimed at improving the circumstances of Canadians.

Mr. Baldwin: That is not what we see.

Mr. Benson: That simply proves that as usual the opposition has not been listening for the last five minutes. We took the decisions which succeeded in bringing under control the worst peacetime spiralling of prices and costs, and we have and will take the decisions to achieve a substantial and sustained economic expansion.

The effect of all these changes in fiscal and monetary policy over the course of the past 10 months has been to provide a very large stimulus for expansion of the Canadian economy. Predictably, however, they have not satisfied members of the opposition. These opposition parties, Mr. Speaker, were totally devoid of any sound policies or programs for dealing effectively with earlier problems that plagued our economy and they are bankrupt of sound ideas in respect of our current needs. They are engaged, I believe, in a frantic scramble to outdo each other in their demands for massive tax cuts and increased government spending without the slightest consideration for the severe damage that could be inflicted on our economy if their proposals were adopted. The official opposition, the Conservative party, appears to have as many ideas about the economy as it has spokesmen. This should come as no surprise to anyone, for when they were in office several years ago—and some members of that government are still seated on benches opposite—the nation suffered through the longest and most severe bout of unemployment in the postwar period.

As an example of will-o'-the-wisp thinking of the Conservative party, we have only to look at the shifting position of the party's financial critic, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Last March, when the government saw the time had arrived gradually to restimulate the economy, he complained about the $900 million increase in spending that was proposed. "That is not controlling expenditures," he said. "If there were to be real control, if there were to be a real fight against inflation by fiscal measures, we would be taxing to defeat inflation, not merely to catch up with the bills that are coming into the government." In October, seven months later, he told us that the spending measures taken in March were not enough. He said that a "much more massive injection must be furnished by the government."

Beyond suggesting for several months that the government should "do something", the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) had no concrete proposals to offer until only a few weeks before the December budget. At that time he decided that all our problems would be solved by slashing taxes, in addition to all the vague and undefined increases in federal spending he has also been proposing. The Leader of the Opposition sets off across the country proposing wholesale tax cuts that would cost the governments of this country up to a billion dollars. Since he pooh-poohed my calculation, let me just put on the record how this figure is arrived at. The removal of the surtax would cost $240 million; removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, $360 million; and a 6 per cent personal income tax cut would involve a loss in federal and provincial revenues of $445 million, for a total of $1,045 million. This would mean a loss to governments, because reductions in federal income taxes also reduce the revenues of provinces which the Leader of the Opposition says have not enough money now. I hope he drops in on the Conservative premier of Ontario as well as the Conservative premier of New Brunswick and tries that idea out on them.

Then, we have the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), who was a senior member of that ill-fated Conservative government. He wants a massive but unspecified reduction in business taxes. I had hoped his leader would make it clear during this debate whether a corporate tax cut is official party policy. And if the Conservatives are talking about a corporate tax cut similar to their proposed 6 per cent personal tax cut, then they are talking about another $118 million.

I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition did not find it possible to remain in the House for the continuation of this debate which was requested by his own party.

Mr. Baldwin: He has gone to meet a few more of the unemployed.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: This indicates his obvious disregard for the House of Commons.

Mr. Baldwin: He will be here to vote tonight.

Mr. Benson: He is going to be like so many other Conservatives who only show up for the votes. I have a few suggestions I wanted to make to him before he continued his travels to central Canada and the Atlantic provinces.

For instance, he might tell people who call in on the hot line shows what he would do after cutting taxes. The one billion dollars has to come from somewhere. Perhaps he would cut some government programs like unemployment insurance, or social assistance programs. Or perhaps he would keep the programs at their present level, increase the deficit and borrow the money to cover the deficit. He might wish to explain how he would do this without shoving up interest rates at a time when we are trying to provide housing in regions where housing is poor and unemployment is highest.

If he proposes to maintain programs at their present level and increase the deficit, he should tell the Canadian people what this adds up to. Already, with our present programs, we are forecasting a deficit for the next fiscal year of about $600 million. So, if the Leader of the Official Opposition had his way, the Canadian public could look forward to a deficit of at least one and one-half billion dollars, and that is without one further cent of spending beyond what we now forecast. I hope the hon. gentleman will explain to Canadians the consequences of a budgetary deficit about double anything we have ever run in Canadian peacetime history.

The Leader of the Opposition might also like to explain on his travels who would directly benefit from his proposed tax cuts. Tax cuts would have a stimulating effect; I have never denied that. Nor have I said they would be unduly inflationary at the present time. Government spending also has a stimulating effect, and when it is aimed at industries and regions that need help results are achieved faster and more directly. But who would directly benefit from a tax cut? Normally, the people who benefit from a tax cut are those persons and regions that enjoy the higher incomes. It is not the unemployed, because their incomes are not high enough. And, of course, if government programs were cut to pay for the tax cuts, then those most in need would suffer even more.

The Opposition appears to have embraced the trickle down theory, the theory that if you leave enough money in the hands of the well-to-do it will eventually trickle down to the people who really need it. While it is not surprising, that this position has been adopted by the Conservative party, it is surprising to find members of the New Democratic Party rushing to adopt the same position for the first time only after I brought down my December budget. They called for tax cuts of 10 to 15 per cent, in addition to urging the government to spend billions of dollars more for social assistance, social capital and for economic development, the result of which would be an astronomical federal deficit, with the result I previously indicated.

Members of the Opposition parties are like the Bourbon kings of France, Mr. Speaker: They learn nothing and they forget nothing. Those responsible for governing the affairs of nations around the world have learned that attempts to accelerate economic growth too quickly and too hard are in the end self-defeating. The lesson has not penetrated the minds of members opposite, whose approach seems to be dominated by a lemming-like instinct for self-destruction.

The measures we have already taken to spur the growth of production and employment will require the federal government to raise a substantial amount of cash in the coming fiscal year, which in turn has an important bearing on the extent to which the monetary and banking system is expanded. As I said in my budget speech last month: There are limits to the extent to which the banks can be encouraged to increase their holdings of government securities without running the very serious risk that the expansion and increased liquidity of the banking system will trigger inflation and expectations of inflation.

We have learned from hard experience that what is regarded by the public as an excessive increase in the money supply can play a major part in triggering such inflationary expectations. These expectations, in turn, can very well have the perverse effect of causing interest rates to rise sharply as lenders demand a higher return on their money to offset the anticipated erosion in the value of their money.

A reversal of the recent marked trend toward lower interest rates would have the effect of discouraging business capital investment, housing construction and many other forms of economic activity. Higher interest rates would also tend to set a vicious circle in motion. Funds from abroad would flow into Canada to obtain the higher return, putting further upward pressure on the value of the Canadian dollar and further reducing the competitiveness of Canadian goods at home and abroad. If the government took steps to restrain the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar by buying foreign exchange, its cash requirements would be increased still further and so would the upward pressure on interest rates, which is the last thing we want at the present time.

At the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I readily acknowledged that the performance of the economy generally over the course of 1970 was not as buoyant as we would like to see. Nevertheless, there are substantial elements of strength apparent that auger well for the future.

In the budget, I pointed out that real output in the economy has begun to rise again in the third quarter following a pause in the second. It will be some time yet before the national accounts for the fourth quarter are published, but it is encouraging that in November the industrial production index, an important indicator of economic activity, increased by 1.3 per cent over the previous month. This increase, which is the largest month to month rise since last February, occurred despite the serious drag on industrial output resulting from the General Motors strike.

A further sign of gathering strength in the Canadian economy is evident in the value of non-residential building permits issued in October and November, which were above the levels of a year ago for the first time in 1970. After lagging earlier in the year, housing construction increased sharply during the latter part of 1970 because of the heavy injection of funds provided by the federal government as part of the series of measures adopted to promote faster economic growth. During the fourth quarter of last year, the number of housing starts was running at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 260,500, which is the highest rate recorded since the first quarter of 1969.

Only late last week, the DBS reported that as a result of a substantial increase in exports, Canada achieved a merchandise trade surplus with other nations of $2.95 billion. This is not only more than double the previous peacetime peak of $1.3 billion, in 1968, but also exceeds the 1945 wartime record of $1.7 billion by more than $1.2 billion.

During 1970, business capital investment lagged significantly behind the increase originally anticipated by private companies contributing to the moderation of economic growth. Despite this shortfall, however, it is encouraging that a recent survey of some 200 large corporations in Canada undertaken by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated that these companies expected their capital investment during 1971 would exceed actual expenditures last year by approximately 11 per cent.

A major source of economic strength is the extraordinary progress made during the course of the past year in bringing inflationary prices under control. In December, the consumer price index declined by .4 per cent from the previous month. The year to year increase in the index for December of 1.5 per cent was the smallest rise since 1964. Between February and December, the consumer price index also rose by only 1.5 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis, which is a substantially smaller increase than that of any other major industrial nation.

During 1970 there was a substantial decline in interest rates, reflecting the easing of monetary policy started last year when the opposition were still fighting inflation, and the growing confidence that inflation was being brought under control. By mid January of this year, the yield on 91 days treasury bills was 4.66 per cent, compared to yields of more than 7.5 per cent recorded in late 1969 and early 1970. Earlier this month there was a further reduction from 7.5 per cent to 7 per cent in the prime lending rates of the chartered banks which, during January, have also led a movement toward lower NHA mortgage rates. There has been a substantial decline in other long term rates as well. By the middle of this month, the rate on long term government of Canada bonds was down to around 6.7 per cent, compared to rates of more than 8.3 per cent at the turn of 1969/70. All of these developments on the monetary front will contribute in a very real way to economic expansion.

Mr. Alexander: When?

Mr. Benson: I will get to that later.

In the budget which I presented to the House last month—

Mr. Baldwin: We have been waiting for a year.

Mr. Benson: But you have not been listening for a year. That is the problem.

In the budget which I presented to the House last month, I expressed confidence that the economy would grow at a healthy rate during 1971 and that unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis would progressively be reduced throughout the year.

Mr. Bigg: Can you bet on that?

Mr. Benson: Yes, I am willing to bet.

This forecast was, of course, greeted with scorn by members of the opposition who have vested political interests in painting the darkest possible picture of the state of our economy at all times.

An hon. Member: What about Paul Martin?

Mr. Benson: I can remember back in 1966 when unemployment was 3.6 per cent, but the economy was going to pieces according to the opposition.

It is worth noting, therefore, that a number of other, more objective sources are inclined to share our view of the economic outlook. In its most recent international survey, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development foresaw the prospect that the growth of GNP during the second half of 1971 would equal or perhaps even slightly exceed potential capacity in Canada. As they said "this would be consistent with a decline of unemployment after the early part of the year".

On December 10, the Globe and Mail reported that "a sharp acceleration of Canada's real economic growth rate in 1971 was predicted yesterday by participants in the annual business outlook forum held by the University of Toronto school of business". On January 12, the Gazette reported that the European Financial Society, a major international financial consortium, forecast that Canadian GNP would increase by 8.5 per cent and industrial production by 5 per cent during 1971.

I noted with interest that one of the aspirants for the Conservative leadership in Ontario, education minister William Davis, was reported in the Toronto Star yesterday to have expressed confidence that measures taken by the federal and provincial governments will soon ease Canada's unemployment problem.

Mr. Alexander: That was yesterday. Wait 'till you read his speech today.

Mr. Benson: Only this morning, the Globe and Mail reported that the Ontario department of treasury and economics—and here I am quoting good Tory sources—expected the provincial economy to recover ground lost in 1970 by the middle of 1971 and, as the Globe and Mail put it, "to be on the way to a boom by year's end".

I am sure that this confidence in the renewed vigour of our economy will prove to be fully justified in the months ahead if we, as a nation, maintain our orderly course and refuse to be panicked into rash and ill considered actions that inevitably would do our economy far more harm than good.

Yesterday, when the Leader of the Opposition was speaking of the government he used the words "prideful" very often. He referred to us as a prideful government. If this means that we have pride in the accomplishments of the Canadian people, we have pride in being Canadian and we have confidence in the future of this great country, then we are pleased to be called prideful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) seeks the permission of the minister to ask a question.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I listened very attentively to all that the minister had to say. With governments at all levels taking some 38 per cent of the gross national product, I would like to ask the minister how much higher this percentage rate will go and at what point the minister thinks rising taxation will retard the economy by discouraging both saving and capital investment.

Mr. Benson: Without accepting the 38 per cent figure, which I think is debatable, I think the hon. member will find if he looks at it very carefully that the percentage of GNP taken out of the economy by all governments in Canada is slightly higher than that in the United States and lower than in almost all European countries.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): It is not my intention to reply directly to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) had to say because when I collected my few throughts on this important budget debate I was unaware of the fact that the minister would be speaking immediately before me. However, one thing is clear from his remarks, and that is that he is not aware of the fact that national budgeting and the national monetary pol cy are more complicated than balancing a household budget, or something of that sort. It is obvious to anyone that when tax levels become very high they sometimes pass a point of diminishing returns. I am of the opinon that some of our taxes have already passed that point under present conditions.

I wish to refer briefly—and my speech will be brief—to the budget on which this debate is based. The budget, in my opinion, is a budget of missed opportunities, a budget filled with sins of omission. The government has failed to take the opportunity offered to it on December 3 to come down with a budget which would have a beneficial effect on the economy at this time. I think the government failed because it did not have its eyes on the horizon. Instead, at best it had its ear to the ground or at worst its head in the sand.

An hon. Member: And its rump in the air.

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps those were the only two choices it had because, as some cynic has said, you can only have your ear to the ground or your head in the sand when you are prostrate before your leader. Incidentally, a leader who, through no fault of his own, has no personal knowledge of want or privation, no doubt finds it difficult or impossible to have sympathy for and rapport with workers who find themselves out of work through no fault of their own and are therefore unable to earn the income which they and their families require.

If the government had had its eyes on the horizon on December 3, or even last summer, what would it have seen? It would have seen dark economic clouds on the horizon. It would have seen that by mid-December 538,000

Canadians would be unemployed. It would have seen that 133,000 Canadians would be losing their jobs in four short weeks from mid-November to mid-December. It would have seen that the ranks of the unemployed would be swollen by 162,000 in the same short period from mid-November to mid-December, the latest period for which we have figures. It would have seen 28,000 people lose their jobs in the Atlantic provinces in the same period. That is about 1,000 people a day, Mr. Speaker, with the ranks of the unemployed in that area swollen from 42,000 to 54,000 and the labour force reduced by 16,000, about 4,000 a week, through emigration from the Atlantic provinces because of total despair.

The government would also have seen that this was not a world-wide condition brought on by unknown forces affecting all countries alike disastrously, as was the case during the great depression of the thirties. It would have seen full employment in such diverse countries as Japan, South Africa, the United Kingdom, West Germany and many others, and in contrast would have seen unemployment growing at a disastrous rate in Canada. It should have divined that Canada was affected by some unique misfortune, and found that that unique misfortune likely was its own policies.

What did the government do in this situation, Mr. Speaker? Did it listen to suggestions from the business community? No. Did it seek the advice and guidance of its own supporters? Apparently not. Did it show anything but disdain and contempt for warnings repeatedly offered by all opposition parties? Again, the answer is no. Did it show any humanitarian attitude, or any humanity for those who were shortly to be unemployed? Again, the answer is no.

Only yesterday in this debate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said:

> It takes courage sometimes to create unemployment. We have created unemployment in the textile industry and we will probably create it temporarily in other industries as we automate and as we rationalize these industries.

It does not take courage, Mr. Speaker, to create unemployment. It takes callous incompetence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean: The Minister of Finance, and the government generally, have made a great deal about the fact that the figures we quote have not been seasonally adjusted. The experience of the unemployed people in my constituency is that that they do not find themselves any better off after they have been seasonally adjusted.

What did the government do, Mr. Speaker? It argued with irrefutable logic from false premises, and arrived irresistably at the wrong conclusions. What should the government have done? There are a number of things it should have done in this situation. It could have reduced or eliminated the surtax, and given some short-term tax relief which would have stimulated the economy. It could have eliminated part or all of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. It could have instituted an effective winter works program. As a humane move, it could also have taken some immediate steps to extend temporarily unemployment benefits to many who are now out in the cold. But, Mr. Speaker, all these are short-term programs. What about medium and long-range action?

It is my belief that the government must resist, contain and eventually reverse certain forces which, if allowed to continue, can only lead us to disaster. One of these forces is that flowing from the government's monetary policies, which is leading the Canadian people deeper and deeper into debt both for consumer goods and for government at all levels, municipal, provincial and federal. As a people, we cannot continue to go everlastingly deeper in debt at an ever-increasing rate. The federal debt is increasing relentlessly, and there is an insatiable appetite for borrowing money, with the result that interest rates are unconscionably high. Between the increasing cost of money and the increasing debt of Canada, we are now in the position where the Canadian taxpayer is paying more than $4 million a day in carrying charges on the national debt, not to mention the debts of the provinces and taxpayers' personal debts. The federal government must set an example of better financial management than that. Surely, Canadians deserve a better fate than to live life from the cradle to the grave in arrears.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the government must lead in a progressive approach to the objective of eliminating sales tax on consumer goods where it in any way increases the costs of the basic essentials, shelter, food and clothing. The cost of living cannot be anything but high when in many cases it is commonplace for the combined federal and provincial sales tax to make up 18 per cent, or an even higher percentage, of the total price of an article. We, as a country, must strive for higher productivity in order to be competitive, and the government has a responsibility in this field. It must lead the way. Labour and management must realize that they are in the same boat. They are a partnership whether they like it or not, and are not adversaries. Together, they must develop a common objective of successful competition, in world markets.

We must develop a tax structure that will encourage profit sharing by companies with their employees. Employees should have an opportunity to have some direct financial interest in the success of the company for which they work, to the benefit of the employees, of the company and of the country as a whole. Conversely, the attitude of employers, especially in large companies, should be that their employees are going to seek out a life career with their companies, that together they are in a life partnership for their mutual benefit. I know that profit sharing with employees is practiced in Canada by a few companies. It has worked in other places, with striking success. An added advantage would be that Canadians would be encouraged to invest in Canada. I believe that Canadians should be as willing to invest in Canada as Americans are. After all, it is our country. We must learn from other countries, from their successes and from their failures. For example, we have much to learn from the Japanese. They have the highest growth rate in gross national product in the world. Over the past decade the annual average rate of growth of the Japanese gross national product, in real terms and with full employment, has been a little above 10 per cent. In contrast Canada's growth, although better than that of many countries, is only at about 5 per cent, which is half the Japanese rate, and we have had varying amounts of unemployment from time to time.

Unemployment, Mr. Speaker, is wasteful. Our failure to use to full potential the human resources and skills of our people not only is reflected in a lower standard of living but also in a lower standard of opportunity for all of us. It is a waste that we cannot afford. We must find the means and the determination to eliminate it. Perhaps in this northern climate we cannot entirely eliminate seasonal unemployment. Yet, we ought to succeed in eliminating the more permanent type of unemployment. Our economy should be such that everybody capable of working is fully employed during the spring, summer and autumn months. We must develop, I believe, industries employing a high degree of technology so that we may be in a competitive position in the world's markets and not be so dependant for our export trade on resource industries such as the pulp and paper industry, minerals, agricultural products, fish, and so forth. In all this, the federal government has a vital and important role to play. In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, the government, in common with all governments, has a great and vital responsibility.

I know that the ambition of those who support this government has been achieved. Their party has acquired power. Nevertheless, their responsibilities have not been fulfilled. This government is presently the custodian of a great trust on behalf of the Canadian people. It is responsible to a great degree not only for the immediate economic welfare of the Canadian people but also for the future well being of our great nation. That great future cannot be realized in a climate of economic uncertainty in which everyone becomes, sooner or later, the victim of economic vicissitudes flowing from the fickle whims of an incompetent government. In these trying times, even our economic system is on trial. All those whose future depends on its and on its well-being, and that is everyone, should realize that. If it fails, then it provides rich soil for the growth of every kind of extremism. Economic distress such as we have at present, Mr. Speaker, creates the troubled waters in which the professional agitators who wish to see our system destroyed love to fish.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government to repent some of its ways, to reconsider some of its actions, to keep a more open mind to advice, from whatever source it comes, to weigh that advice, and to consider it. To the Canadian people generally I say, although this is the new year, that I cannot be too hopeful about the short run. I say this because of present conditions. Yet I believe, with the Minister of Finance, that our country has a great future and that if Canadians learn to work together towards economic prosperity and the acquisition of other forms of the good life, we can all go on to a great future. I say to the Canadian people, be patient. Though we have the most incompetent government in memory, even that will pass.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, having taken part at an earlier stage of the budget debate, I had not intended intervening again. Nevertheless, the unemployment situation has grown ever more serious since I spoke in this debate on December 8, last. I think the Canadian people are aroused and appalled at the extent of unemployment in this country, and I think they are even more appalled at the government's indifference to meet this situation. Yesterday the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said that nobody on his side of the House is happy about the unemployment rate. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of being either happy or unhappy about the unemployment rate. What we are asking for now is, first, who and what is responsible for this crisis; second, what immediate steps and what long term measures does the government propose to adopt in order to cure the unemployment crisis confronting the Canadian people?

Mr. McCleave: The answer is, none.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt as to who is responsible for this situation. There, on the treasury benches, sit the guilty men. They must accept the responsibility for the fact that between 500,000 and 600,000 are unemployed in Canada. In addition, 100,000 persons who are taking manpower retraining are also unemployed but are receiving training allowances. The government is responsible for the situation in which we now find ourselves. They are the men who deliberately set out to create an economic slowdown and unemployment because those were the only means they could think of to curb inflation. The government turned a deaf ear to all advice relating to the consequences of their austerity program and their fiscal and monetary policies. They refused to take the necessary steps to prevent the unemployment which they knew would flow from their policies. After all, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself said that they were so anxious to defeat inflation he was even prepared to accept an unemployment rate of 6 per cent. It has now reached a rate of 6.6 per cent, seasonally adjusted. The Prime Minister and his colleagues knew that the policies they were following would bring about massive unemployment, yet they prepared no programs to remedy the crisis which they themselves created.

• (4:20 p.m.)

The first mistake was in accepting the thesis that the government had to choose between inflation and unemployment. They paid no attention to the recommendations which were made year after year by the Economic Council of Canada. These recommendations pointed out that by planning our economy, and with proper fiscal, monetary and investment policies, it was possible to have an economic growth rate of 5.5 to 6 per cent as well as to keep unemployment at three per cent or less. At the same time, price stability could be maintained and price increases kept to two per cent or less. The government paid no attention to this. Instead, they proceeded with their austerity program. The New Democratic Party warned the government that unemployment would be the result.

We urged the government not to fight inflation by creating an economic slowdown. We urged them to set up machinery for capital investment and for some control of investment on the basis of social priorities and for employment creating purposes. We urged them to establish a prices review board in an endeavour to stop unjustified increases. We said that if that was not successful, we were prepared to support selective mandatory price and income controls. We warned the government that the methods they were using to combat inflation would inevitably result in the kind of economic recession in which this country now finds itself.

It is interesting to note that Mr. John Young, the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, said, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of January 16, that the price paid for victory over inflation, massive unemployment, was too high. He said and I quote:

"There is a way to fight inflation and save jobs,"—

Young said the best method of fighting inflation is to get voluntary support for mandatory price and wage restraint, then force adherence to the voluntary guidelines through legislation or government pressure.

This is preferable to the alternative of forcing a slowdown in the economy, which inevitably involves higher unemployment,—

We certainly welcome the change in attitude by Mr. Young. It is precisely what we have been saying for the past two years. We cannot stop inflation by periodically creating economic recessions. There are tools which this government did not have the courage to use. Today, this country is paying the price of a government that was short-sighted, incompetent and lacking in moral courage to deal with the problem of inflation without putting half a million people out of work. As the Economic Council of Canada has been pointing out for the past four or five years, Mr. Speaker, what we need in this country is a greater measure of economic planning designed to promote full employment, economic growth and a high level of national income while at the same time maintaining a relatively stable price structure. This requires some changes in our institutions for governmental planning.

The government should establish an economic planning board or a department of economic affairs to plan the economy of this country. It could co-ordinate the work of the Department of Finance, Bank of Canada, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Labour. In this way, we would not have the kind of program that we have had for the past five or six years. We have had a stop and go program. In one budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) put his foot on the gas, in the next budget he put his foot on the brake and in the next budget he again puts his foot on the gas. A stop-go policy will only lead us into more trouble.

If we accept the premise of the government that the choice is between inflation and unemployment, are we to assume that the steps that are to be taken now, too late, to put money into economy, merely means that in 12 or 18 months from now we will again have inflation? Once more we will be putting on the brake, and once more we will have unemployment. Surely, in this day and age with our sophisticated economic tools, our knowledge of Keynesian techniques, it is possible, as demonstrated in other countries, to avoid periodic booms and busts. We should be able to plan an economy which will meet the needs of our people without terrific and catastrophic changes in the business cycle.

The attempts of the government to cope with this crisis are, as Winston Churchill said of certain activities during the war, too little and too late. In the budget which the Minister of Finance brought down on December 3, he proposed some of the things which should have been in his budget of last March. Moreover, he refused to bring down some of these things and ridiculed us during the debate on the budget of last March. The fact that he had to bring in a second budget in December is proof that the budget he brought down in March was completely incapable of coping with the problem of unemployment, which even then was beginning to manifest itself.

In March, the Minister of Finance ridiculed those of us on this side of the House who talked about winter works programs and assistance to the provinces and municipalities in order to assist the unemployed in finding work, particularly in the winter season. In December, when it was too late for the provinces and municipalities to make use of financial assistance to help solve unemployment this winter, the minister announced a $150 million loan fund. A loan fund of $150 million is totally inadequate. Approximately $70 million will be loaned to the province of Quebec. The rest will be spread over the other provinces. The individual provinces, including Quebec, will not receive sufficient money to even begin to cope with the problems which are facing the provinces and municipalities. It has come too late to help this winter. It is too little to be effective for the coming year.

Premier Bourassa of the province of Quebec, at the federal provincial conference, asked the federal government to set up a fund which would be partially on a loan basis and partially on a grant basis. The amount of the contribution that would be grants would increase on the basis of unemployment in each province. Apparently, the government has rejected that suggestion. The entire $150 million will be in the form of loans to the provinces, if I remember correctly, at 7.91 per cent interest. When a province borrows from the federal government, that debt becomes a contingent liability and this directly affects the ability of the province to borrow money on the open market to meet its other responsibilities and obligations. If the government really wanted to help the provinces and the municipalities this fund should have been a fund from which grants would be made to the provinces and it should have been of a size many times the $150 million the government is offering.

We have heard from the government statements which indicate they are taking refuge in the time lag between the point at which money is pumped into the economy and the point at which jobs result. Of course, the government must take responsibility for that time lag. Yesterday, the Minister of Labour said the Minister of Finance had taken the appropriate steps and that these would bear fruit in the spring. Well, it is great consolation for the unemployed to know they will bear fruit in the spring. But why has the government procrastinated? Why did they not do last year some of the thing they are talking about doing now?

As we have pointed out in this debate, there are certain things which could be done immediately. Unemployment insurance benefits could be increased and the number of persons entitled to benefit could be enlarged. When I asked whether the government would do these things, the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) said I must have overlooked the fact that the government had already raised the amount of benefit by 10 per cent. So, a man drawing the maximum of $53.34 would get $5.30 more. Yet the white paper says the maximum should be not $53 a week but $100 a week. We have asked that the categories should be enlarged and that persons who have exhaus ed their right to benefit should have that right extended. If we do not take action of this kind, many of these people will find themselves in extremely difficult circumstances.

We have pressed the government to amend the manpower training regulations so that young people who have not spent three years on the labour market will be able to take training. When are these young people to get training when we exclude them from the benefit of training allowances until they have spent three years on the labour market? Are they to be perpetually unemployed because they are untrained and cannot qualify as a result? If the government really wants to cope with the problem presented by unemployment among young people—218,000 below the age of 25—they ought to be prepared to amend the regulations so that these young people will be covered.

We have suggested the government should have allowed the 3 per cent surcharge on personal incomes to expire. Criticizing us today for making this proposal, the Minister of Finance said it would cost money. I want to point out that last March he said with great pride that the 3 per cent surtax would be dropped at the end of December. Why is it a bad thing, now, when it was a good thing last March? If the government was able to wipe out the tax in March, 1970 as a means of stimulating effective demand, why, in January of 1971, does it suddenly become disastrous to suggest that the government drop it? The government should have allowed the tax to expire, as was originally announced, and this would have done a good deal to leave a little more money in the pay envelopes of every worker so that he could buy more goods and create the demand the economy needs at the present time.

We have pressed the government to increase old age pensions and veterans pensions and to make the increase effective on January 1 for the same reason; this also would help to create effective demand. It is interesting to recall that last March, and since then, when we talked about increasing pensions, the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister would say we were trying to foster inflation. Now, the government decides it can be done, but not in time to be of help this winter. It can be done on April 1 next.

We have pressed for the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, particularly in housing, and today the Minister of Finance complained about the loss of revenue this would entail. I want to point out that this tax was imposed not for the purpose of increasing revenue but for a different objective. When Mr. Walter Gordon introduced that tax, he told the House it was a question of slowing down building in this country because there was a shortage of both building material and construction workers. At that time, there may have been some need to cool off the amount of construction under way but surely if the sales tax was imposed for that reason, now is the time to take it off. I think the effect would be that instead of falling short of its housing target by 20,000 dwellings, the government could reach its objective next year besides putting a great many more people to work. There is no greater multiplier in the whole economy than housing construction.

I want to suggest something the government could do without waiting for next spring when housing construction will start. Our party has for a long time been agitating that the government, either on a permanent basis or as a temporary measure this year, should offer interest-free loans to individuals for home improvement. There would have to be a ceiling, of course, but there are literally hundreds of thousands of people with old homes that need to be renovated, that need alteration, that need improvement, that need to be made weatherproof, and this would provide all kinds of jobs for carpenters, plumbers, electricians and plasterers across this country. Such a program could be put into effect even in wintertime if the government were prepared to shake itself out of its lethargy.

In addition to short term measures the government ought, of course, to be giving the House details of the long term measures it proposes to take to develop a policy of economic growth and full employment accompanied by relative price stability. The government has to take action so that the country may know we are not going to oscillate constantly between boom and bust, between periods of affluence and periods of economic depression. I must say that in this debate I have been extremely disappointed that the two ministers who have replied on behalf of the government have completely failed to tell us of one concrete measure the government intends to take to relieve the misery and the hardship experienced not only by the 538,000 unemployed but probably by another 750,000 or a million, of their dependants.

Yesterday, the Minister of Labour followed the old debating technique of attacking the other side rather than tackling the problem. He began by saying there was nothing fresh from the opposition. Then he, himself, proceeded to reiterate the old catalogue of pathetic alibis in an attempt to explain why the government has done nothing about unemployment. When the minister was telling the House all the things he has told us before, about why the government could not do anything to fight unemployment, it was like listening to a cracked record. His main comfort to those who are out of work was that conditions were much worse in 1959 and 1960. It should certainly make the unemployed feel better to know that ten years ago the people who were unemployed had it just as tough.

I am not going to get into the argument whether unemployment in 1960 was worse or better than it is today; I think that is totally irrelevant. Nevertheless, let me tell the Minister of Finance that in spite of his optimistic statement this afternoon, some of the best economists in this country are now predicting that the unemployment figure this winter will peak in February at 740,000. This does not take account of the 100,000 who are taking manpower training but are also unemployed. Nor does it take account of those who have dropped out of the labour force.

Then, the Minister of Labour fell back, as did the Minister of Finance this afternoon, on the old defence that governments always adopt. He talked about the psychological effects of the gloom and doom that are being created by the opposition. He stated that any investors sitting in the gallery listening to the speeches of opposition members would certainly not be interested in investing in this country. This, of course, is the line taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

According to the Globe and Mail for Saturday, January 16, the Acting Prime Minister criticized the labour minister of Quebec, Mr. Jean Cournoyer, because the latter had said that unemployment would undoubtedly cause further outbreaks of violence. According to the press, the minister said:

> This kind of talk is not going to encourage the establishment of new industries. There has been some loss of confidence in Quebec since the FLQ trouble—

Does the government think that the people of Quebec are children? Does it think that investors are simpletons? Does it think that investors and business tycoons are not as aware of the unemployment statistics as anybody else? Is the government asking all of us to enter into a conspiracy of silence and not tell anybody that unemployment in Canada is the highest in the western world? Are we supposed to keep quiet about unemployment? Does the government think we will create public confidence by putting our heads in a hole and hoping that the unemployment problem will go away?

The Minister of Labour talked about foreign investors being frightened away. Does the minister think that foreign investors do not read the reports of OECD which indicate the degree of unemployment in Canada? I say that this is a specious type of appeal. Instead of trying to sweep the problem of unemployment under the rug, the government ought to be going to the people of Canada today and admitting: "We goofed. We started out to fight inflation and we have created something that is much worse. Like Frankenstein, we have created a monster that we cannot control. But we are now prepared to try to remedy the situation, and we ask your co-operation". Instead of that, we have had nothing but pathetic alibis. Finally, the Minister of Labour tells us that it takes courage to create temporary unemployment intentionally. Perhaps it does take courage, but it also takes a good deal of stupidity to create unemployment unless at the same time you have created the necessary programs to take care of the unemployed and to provide other jobs for those affected.

The Minister of Finance made the statement today, for which we had all been waiting. But it is not going to provide any consolation for those men and women walking the streets of this country in search of work. It will provide no comfort for the old age pensioners and veterans who are trying to eke out an existence on an amount which the government admits is totally inadequate. It will provide no encouragement whatever for the provincial and municipal governments that are now burdened with a great load of welfare payments which they cannot meet. Problems that are not of their making are now being dumped on their doorstep.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the House for its long suffering patience and I will draw my remarks to a conclusion very quickly.

The minister took refuge in the fact that the high rate of unemployment is the result of winter conditions. Everybody in Canada knows that it is much more difficult to provide jobs in the winter than it is at other seasons of the year. But let me point out that the unemployment figures for December 1970 are higher by 155,000 than the December 1969 figures. And working conditions in December of one year are much the same as working conditions in December of any other year. The Minister of Finance also trotted out the old bogeyman when he said: "If we carried out some of the programs that the opposition has been suggesting, where would we get the money?" This statement is really not worthy of a Minister of Finance who lives in a period when the Keynesian philosophy and techniques are so well known. The fact is that unemployment and the lack of a full utilization of our productive capacity is costing this country $100 million a week, or over $5 billion a year. If the government has to deficit finance to get the economy rolling again, then it will get this money back many times over by creating full employment and promoting economic growth.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I just want to close by saying that unemployment is a human tragedy. It is a human tragedy because of the suffering and hardship it imposes on those who are unemployed and on the families who depend upon them for maintenance. It involves a loss of self respect, a loss of human dignity and eventually a loss of hope, and that is the most serious thing of all. As long as people have some hope that conditions will be better, they can hang on. Once they have lost hope, they become the material out of which social unrest is created.

A man who once sat in this House and for whom I have great respect, J. S. Woodsworth, often used to quote Edwin Markham; the long, long patience of the plundered poor. I think this government should be warned that there is a limit to the patience of the plundered poor and that the people will not forever be made the victims of the government's economic errors, of its arrogance and its indifference. I hope if this debate has done nothing else it will have shaken the government out of its lethargy, and within the next few days we will see it bring down some measure which will at least partly alleviate the suffering which it has brought upon the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are now faced with a choice between a brilliant economic future and poverty, namely a choice between priorities and means to fight inflation.

How will they ever come out of this cluster of needs and aspirations?

Mr. Speaker, this is the question I would like to submit to the House. I would not want to be taxed with parochialism but since I am relatively a newcomer here, I would rather deal with matters I am closely concerned with because they condition the life of the whole community in my constituency of Frontenac.

As I mentioned earlier, there is presently a confused cluster of aspirations and needs which are merely impossible to implement or to satisfy completely and simultaneously because of the limited financial resources of the government.

In its first report published in 1965 the Economic Council of Canada set its goal very clearly, namely a maximum annual price increase of 2 per cent and a maximum unemployment rate of 2 per cent also.

It would be ludicrous to remind hon. members that these two objectives have never been fulfilled. This may be the reason why this agency gives such importance to the fight against poverty in its last report. Would this tend to prove that the Canadian economy did not operate as expected?

The Canadian government, being aware of this situation, has enacted legislation creating the Department of Economic Regional Expansion, which has already produced tangible results across the country, and my area is no exception. Indeed, grants of the order of $715,810 to seven industries have helped create 482 jobs. At the present time, several other projects are under way and should straighten out the situation, economically and socially.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Evidently, we have new goals to reach, but to succeed we must see what the reality is, according to some indicators.

On October 1, 1969, Quebec's population stood at 6,002,000 inhabitants, that is 28.3 per cent of Canada's population.

In 1961, Quebec included 28.8 per cent of the country's population, as compared to 28.9 per cent in 1941. Therefore, Quebec's population does not grow according to an ascending curve consistent with today's requirements.

In 1969, the gross provincial product, according to market prices, amounted to $19.88 billion, that it to 25.4 per cent of the gross national product. In 1965, the corresponding figure was 25.9 per cent, and in 1961, 25.7 per cent. Also in this field, we can note a decreasing curve, lower than the population curve.

The unemployed are distributed over a large territory, made up of 1,600 municipalities. Paralysis, the reason of the ultra-conservatism prevailing among so many workers, is a serious problem, a source of trouble and of social unrest. Hon. members are looking for solutions; technocrats are preparing programs; economists are studying and analyzing; intermediary bodies are demanding and condemning; editors are talking and thinking. Mr. Speaker, the need is for people—for us and for those ready to accept the challenge—to find the clue to the riddle.

It is high time that we located the evil and made a diagnosis implying practical solutions. Everybody can contribute part of the solution through a humane approach to the problem.

Mr. Speaker, knowing our situation, we are now more determined than ever to take the necessary corrective steps and turn our liabilities into assets. The Canada of tomorrow will be as we shall build it, starting in 1971, since we are able to conceive our future society. All the issues I have raised become determining factors.

In fact, anyone listing the dangers to be fought, anyone examining the conditions required for our economical and social development, anyone looking at the experience gained by other countries to find a policy that would fit Canada will understand that our industrial development has top priority since it means employment and productivity. To this end, we have understood we should increase our production so as to reach not only our domestic market but also the world markets.

Although our industrial structure is weak and our production ill-oriented, we sell our surplus to certain sectors. For example, Quebec is producing 64 per cent of clothing, 57 per cent of textiles, 57 per cent of hosiery, 54 per cent of tobacco, 46 per cent of leather and 37 per cent of furniture. We should be glad of such statistics. However, because of dumping of foreign products and our faulty marketing organization we find competition very hard and this implies quite low salaries which do not correspond to the requirements of our consumption society.

For instance, in the footwear industry, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has initiated the creation of a sales agency known as Faber which should enable our factories to sell more easily their present production while increasing it by finding new customers.

In that field as in many others, our Quebec industries are mostly primary and traditional. Our production surpluses are often subsidized. One needs only to look at the agricultural sector for instance to see that milk production is being subsidized while by-products like cheese are imported.

A good number of farmers in my riding are engaged in dairy production. Many of them dread the report of the federal task force on agriculture, suggesting the phasing out of subsidies for industrial milk production before 1976. I am sure that to a great extent the problem related to the sale of that product could be solved with the co-operation of our universities, by stimulating research at the marketing level and the discovery of new by-products. Provided there would be co-operation between researchers and producers, who seem to establish voluntary quotas on their production, and with the assistance of their associations such as the C.F.U., we could together find a fair solution for everyone.

We recognize that would call for new outlooks and new methods of production. We should assume also that producers presently engaged in that field will inevitably have to head for some other economic sectors. That is why I consider the agricultural problem as the that of all of us.

The farmer produces. The city dweller buys and consumes those products. A dialogue leading to understanding between individuals would enable the farmer to get a fair price for the outcome of his labour, which would bring him closer to the industrial worker. Indirectly, the consumer would protect himself against abusive increases in the price of food products. The strengthening of the industrial structure would permit to absorb labour surpluses from the farm sector.

Efforts are being made already in the Manpower Centres. Indeed, courses are being provided to upgrade the schooling of all workers, thus enabling them to adjust to the world of technology. Apart from technology, another move is under way which will gather momentum, so as to group industries together, in order to make them more competitive in the face of giant American concerns.

In this regard, competition from foreign products must be analyzed, before launching into production. The cost of manpower and its training affects the decision to specialize our production. However, it is mainly our determination which will affect our capacity to conquer the world markets and to join the ranks of post-industrial countries.

Our region is already playing a more important part in the conquest of world markets. The greater part of the production of our asbestos mines is sold outside the country, because the Canadian consumption represents 70,000 tons, that is 5 per cent of the total production. The balance is exported to 75 countries. Canadian asbestos exports have increased by 72 per cent during the last decade. The demand on the world market seems excellent for the next ten years. In fact, this helps provide some stability for the 3,000 workers engaged in this field, who now earn an average weekly salary of $133.75. Moreover, in view of the changes which will probably be made in the white paper on taxation, increased investments in the mining sector are to be expected.

In the past few years, thanks to the sustained efforts of some leaders in this area, we were successful in innovating in the field of secondary industry. Indeed, the manufacturing of snowmobiles, camping equipment, sports clothing, domestic products enables us to face the future with much greater hope. The sale of our asbestos and of our snowmobiles on world markets contributes to improve Canada's trade balance. Therefore, thanks to the investments made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with a view to improving and modernizing the harbour facilities in Quebec City, our shipments will make those investments profitable.

In 1969, the shipments of asbestos from Quebec harbour amounted to 235,284 tons, or 9.6 per cent of the total shipments. Re-organizing the CN and CP rail networks would bring about a decrease in rates, and improvements in the services which would open a door to the world.

Apart from shipping which will resume in a couple of months, we will, thanks to the co-operation of the federal Department of Transport, be able to use an airport which will have a favourable influence on the development of the whole of our area. Far from avoiding the challenge, we meet it resolutely, abiding by modern development standards which will result in social progress for us through economic growth.

We must be bold and resort to a rational utilization of the knowledge gained and also to a rational manpower development policy in terms of new requirements and the development of vocational training. According to this resolutely progressive philosophy, the curricula of our general and vocational education institutions are designed to enable the students to master new techniques better and, through automation, to adjust constantly to industrial progress.

At the College d'enseignement général et professionnel in my area, we have a mining techniques department which offers students from every part of the province courses on new mining techniques. Moreover, these students benefit from the very important advantage of practice through the co-operation of our mining companies. Aside from training future citizens, academic institutions must also develop a creative spirit in the student. Our destiny will depend on our qualities of ingeniousness, initiative and constructive imagination.

In our competitive system, we appraise an individual's worth not only by his attitude and his performance, but also by the diplomas he can produce. And yet, one prerequisite to productivity in a technological society is the optimum utilization of human resources. Let us think of all these men and women whose experience of life and of the working world, as well as their cultural background, if they could be translated into figures or percentages, would be worth many degrees. We can no longer afford to deprive ourselves of the intellectual and economic capabilities of this multitude of adults who are unable to attend the regular courses which would sanction their actual knowledge. We must use the talents and the potentialities of our adults in order to check "intellectual capitalism". Our youth realizes that the object of studies is not only education, but also teaching how to learn, teaching methodology.

Since money is the motor of economy, savings should be channelled and humanized through being used to foster economic and social recovery. We no longer believe capitalist philanthropists and expect them to alleviate poverty. Besides, capitalists see their revenues being heavily saddled with taxes of all kinds so they too must humanize. Our joint commitment is assuredly the best way to clear the air. Its most meaningful result will be economic recovery.

Now that we are collectively aware of what we want to become, all Canadians, whether they are federalists or separatists will have to achieve the future I have just outlined.

Mr. Speaker, let us hope that all will want to contribute to prosperity, which is an essential factor for the creation of a just society.

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I would first like to congratulate the hon. gentleman who just spoke. Certain of the ideas which he put forward in his maiden speech were very acceptable, and I am sure they will be well received in his riding and in his province.

A few minutes ago we had a rather unusual experience in the House of Commons during a debate on what is certainly the most critical and chronic problem facing the Canadian nation at present when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), made a speech in order to fill in 30 or 40 minutes for his party, rather than accepting the challenge of every Canadian, and certainly of the 538,000 unemployed, that the government present some positive or encouraging statement to try to offset the serious psychological depression as well as the actual depression in Canada at present. Five hundred and thirty eight thousand people are waiting at the proverbial door of the government for the minister to make a statement which would give them a little encouragement. A tremendous number of people in the business community of Canada were anticipating a statement which would be positive, encouraging, rational, sensible, and not arrogant. Mr. Speaker, we have had a bitter disappointment. The Minister of Finance indicated that his government accepts the unemployment problem in Canada, that unemployment always exists in the winter, and that it is nothing new. It existed in the thirties, and even existed in the sixties.

We also heard about the fact that the government recognized the problem last March, and the minister went on to say that the government started to do something about it in December, 1970. I believe it was the mayor of Edmonton, Mayor Dent, who summed up the feelings of all Canadians when he said it was unrealistic for any government to expect that announcing a loan fund pittance of $150 million in December, 1970, with the proviso that work under it start immediately, would have an effect on an unemployment problem which is so vast now that in excess of half a million Canadians are seeking employment.

The Minister of Finance went on to point out in great detail that he did not agree with the position of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). He ridiculed our leader for lining up with the 3,000 to 5,000 bread seekers in Vancouver who assemble on the welfare lines twice a month. He ridiculed the fact that the Leader of the Opposition visited the soup kitchens in Vancouver, attended the unemployment offices in Winnipeg, and tried to console the 17 per cent unemployed in Kelowna. Today, Mr. Speaker, our leader is visiting Montreal which was the highest rate of unemployment among young Canadians of any part of Canada. The Minister of Finance was also going to advise the Leader of the Opposition on the proposals he could offer to eastern Canadians when he swings down that way in the coming days. He ridiculed our leader's proposal for a reduction in taxation. At the end of all these comments, he put an exclamation mark and a full stop, but left a question mark in the minds of all Canadians with regard to his proposals for alleviating the serious trend toward a critical unemployment problem for the rest of the year.

The minister talked about the fact that the government could continue to keep the screws on the economy in order to tighten it up. Our leader referred to this as a mechanistic approach to economic development. The minister said that things will get better by and by. Mr. Speaker, it would not be as tragic if that kind of attitude did not pervade the whole cabinet, and perhaps the whole of the Liberal party. We can tolerate one minister of the Crown having that kind of attitude. We can pass it off as a political move on his part, but having heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) yesterday, and having listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the last couple of years, one has to wonder whether this is not a really serious, calculated plan. Perhaps it could be described as election economics. I do not know if that is included in the new economic theories or not, but this is what one must try to determine.

I sat in the House of Commons all day yesterday, Mr. Speaker. Seriously I wanted to hear the Minister of Labour speak. In the past, he appeared to be a man with a big heart and soul, and some conscience. Then yesterday he talked about the courageous creation of unemployment in his own province of Quebec, and bragged about the fact that governments in the western world will have to have a great deal of courage in future in order to undertake the creation of unemployment in view of the need to automate and rationalize certain industries. That statement of the minister's is reported on page 2507 of Hansard. I hope each Canadian gets a copy of Hansard and reads it.

The Prime Minister has also been talking about the need to create unemployment. We have been ruled out of order when we asked questions on this statement. I am not questioning the ruling of Mr. Speaker but apparently it is difficult, even for Mr. Speaker, to accept the fact that the Prime Minister has bragged about the need to create unemployment in this country. On a CTV W-5 program back on June 28, 1970, the Prime Minister said that they were going to continue to create unemployment, that unemployment was necessary, and the Canadian people could either like it or lump it. I could not believe it, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister said, "If you don't like my approach you can lump it. That is your choice. We are going to go ahead with our policies to kill inflation." This statement seems to imply that inflation is tucked away in one corner of the economy, and unemployment is to be used as a weapon to kill it.

Last evening on the national television network the Minister of Labour referred to the fact that in the winter of 1971 we were going to continue to have unemployment, that it was not new, so why should we worry about it? Why should we get all upset about the unemployment problem this year? For comparison, he used the figures for the 1958-62 period when a Conservative government was in power. As a Canadian who has not lived as long as the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Finance I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not too concerned about what unemployment was like back in 1962, or what it was like back in 1932, 1933 and 1934. The fact is that the 538,000 Canadians who are unemployed, plus 100,000 who are in trade and vocational schools, plus perhaps another 100,000 who have gone out of the labour market, plus many other people who will never find their way into the statistics—and it must be remembered that these statistics are really a guesstimation of the seriousness of unemployment—are little concerned about conditions as they existed a decade ago. They are faced with a bleak, distressing problem in 1970-71.

As was mentioned by the leader of the New Democratic Party in this debate, the Minister of Labour said we need not worry because we have the dole in 1971 and we did not have the dole in 1960. That is the most disgraceful statement I have ever heard in the House of Commons from a member of the Privy Council. This afternoon the Minister of Finance is probably appearing before the television cameras in the Commonwealth Room. Perhaps he is still there. As a matter of fact, I hope he will be there for the next six or seven months, because if he stays there we may be able to do something about this problem. But, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon he was beaming and smiling as if he were attending a garden party, when in fact we are having a funeral in Canada. There he was, smoking his pipe, and telling the 538,000 unemployed, "Yes, we have a problem all right but it will go away one of these days."

The Minister of Finance, in his usual tricky way, like his Prime Ministerial friend, uses statistics to great advantage to minimize the seriousness of the problem.

An hon. Member: You mean cold facts.

Mr. Lundrigan: An hon. member over in the corner refers to cold facts. I hope he gets on his feet and tells us about unemployment in his region of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, we have members in this party who will start talking about unemployment in their regions. I will give you the facts now.

The Minister of Finance talks about seasonally adjusted figures every time the seasonally adjusted figures are convenient for him to use. I know that there are very few Canadians, including Members of Parliament, who are conversant with the seasonally adjusted figures. They are very complex statistics and very useful statistics, which have been used for the last 30 years, but if you start comparing various months you can create a tremendously false impression. For example, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said that we have had a decline in unemployment since September because in September the seasonally adjusted unemployment figure was 6.9 per cent; in October it was 6.6 per cent; in November it was 6.5 per cent and, speaking quietly, he said it was 6.6 per cent in December. But what he did not point out was that if we go back to June, 1970, we had 6.6 per cent unemployment, seasonally adjusted, in that month.

Does that mean that there was the same amount of unemployment in June, 1970, as there was in December 1970? That is the impression the minister was trying to create. Why doesn't the minister go back to 1965 and tell Canadians that during December that year we had 3.5 per cent unemployment, seasonally adjusted; that we had 3.6 per cent in December, 1966; 4.7 per cent in December, 1967; 4.8 per cent in December 1968; 4.8 per cent in December, 1969; and 6.6 per cent in December, 1970? That is a comparison the minister did not place before the people of Canada when he spoke in the House of Commons. But, we are not worried about these seasonally adjusted figures. As the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) pointed out, it is little consolation to an unemployed Canadian whether he is seasonally adjusted or an actual unemployed unit if he has to go on the dole to carry his family through the winter months.

• (5:20 p.m.)

During the month of December we had 320,000 people over the age of 25 unemployed, compared with 231,000 during the same month last year. In the under 25 age group we had 218,000 unemployed, as compared with 152,000 previously. Can anyone even begin to imagine the effect on 538,000 Canadians, plus the 200,000 more Canadians who do not show up in these unemployment statistics? Can anyone imagine what the effect has been on their outlook? Can anyone imagine the psychological depression that comes from living in a community in which there is no hope for the future and the outlook for 1971 is bleak. The Prime Minister has talked about the just society for Canadians. The Prime Minister, who is at the Singapore conference, may talk about the just society but many Canadians are wondering just when the just society will be born in Canada.

Yesterday the Minister of Labour said that the Leader of the Opposition was creating a tremendous psychological depression in this nation. I know the Leader of the Opposition is competent. I know he is a man of great integrity and capability, but I did not realize he had such all pervasive powers as to instil in all Canadians the psychological depression which is now sweeping the country. Yes, the Minister of Labour is absolutely correct about psychological depression. There never has been a period, since I have been a Canadian, in which there has been less incentive for people to engage in certain forms of economic endeavour. The Leader of the Opposition has not created this tremendous psychological depression. The Minister of Labour did not mention that there has been a severe increase in taxes since 1968. I am sure that had no effect on the psychological depression of Canadians—oh, no. The middle income Canadian is terrified about his future; he does not even want to look at his pay cheque any longer. I am talking about people earning between $10,000 and $20,000 a year, who comprise a healthy chunk of the Canadian population. They are the people with incentive, who are developers and promoters on a private, individual level.

The taxes of these people have been increased, and are to be further increased, because family allowances for those earning more than $10,000 are to be eliminated. This represents a substantial loss to anyone with five or six children. To such a man, the family allowance means an income of about $500 a year. Actually, it represents an earned income, if you consider the tax structure, of about $1,000 a year. That will be the extent of his loss, and that will be the extent by which his taxes are to be increased.

Again the Minister of Labour never mentioned the white paper on tax reform. We shall never know what effect that white paper has had as a disincentive to Canadians, especially those who make up the business community. We shall never know what the effect was, not only on those in the business community but on small investors who might have invested moderately in the stock market. Again, what about people who wanted to own their own home and hoped to be able to acquire an equity in a modest home and later to buy a better home? The white paper has acted as a disincentive to such people. It has had a detrimental psychological effect on Canadians because it seeks to revolutionize our social system through the taxation structure.

Housing starts have been down. The housebuilding industry has had an important effect on our economy. I do not know the correct term to use, but, I think it can be said that that industry has an important multiplier effect on the economy. Housebuilding is a catalyst for other development.

Let us for a moment look at other disincentives that face Canadians. I am not an economist; I am just an average Canadian who has tried to size up what has been going on in Canada. Unemployment has created tremendous disincentives in the economy. I wish to refer to statistics which I have not heard quoted in the House so far, and I do not mind taking a minute to do so. For example, in December, 1970, there were 124,000 people who were unemployed for less than one month. I will not talk about people who were temporarily unemployed. If one examines these statistics one will find, I think, that 43,000 were temporarily unemployed. They are not classified among the unemployed. They know that they will be recalled to work in about a week or a month and that their condition will improve. Let us assume that the 124,000 unemployed persons would each have earned $500 in that month. Their loss of income, therefore, represents a loss to the economy of $72 million.

In December 1970, 203,000 people were unemployed for between one and three months, as compared with 149,000 people who were unemployed in December 1969. If those people had each made $1,000 during that period, we can see that there has been a direct loss to the economy of about $203 million. In that month of December, 1970, 84,000 Canadians, as compared with 49,000 in December, 1969, were unemployed for between four and six months. If each of them had earned $1,500 during that period, and I do not think we are being very generous with them, we can see that the economy has lost $126 million. In that same month, December 1970, there were also 84,000 Canadians who had been unemployed for more than six months. Assuming that those Canadians would have earned on the average $3,000 each, one can see that their loss represents a loss of $252 million to the economy. About 46,000 Canadians were unemployed for that length of time in the previous year. These losses to the economy represent a massive disincentive. We are looking at a loss of about half a billion dollars that is to be attributed to the losses of these unemployed groups. I know that these figures can be picked apart, argued about, and criticized.

We are now talking about 538,000 unemployed people. Mr. Speaker, let us try to calculate how much those 538,000 people would have lost by being unemployed for three months, and we can calculate the extent of the disincentive in our economy. We are not talking only about the effect of unemployment on these people, and on the productive aspect of their labour. We are not talking only about the fact that there has been a serious impairment of Canadian productivity, and that we have to dish out large chunks of cash to help the unemployed to survive. We are not only talking about that.

The Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, has taken great pride in picking apart our proposals. The Leader of the New Democratic Party has supported us right down the line, almost to a "T". He supports the positions we have taken. We have recommended immediate changes in the unemployment insurance regulations in order to modify the periods and conditions to qualify. We have recommended the establishment of a ministry that would deal with the unemployed. We have recommended the lowering of taxes and the elimination of the 3 per cent surcharge. The retention of the surcharge is tantamount to a tax increase. We have recommended the elimination of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and a reduction in the levels of personal income tax. The Minister of Finance said today that if the government were to remove that tax and listen to our other proposals the government would lose about $1 billion in revenue and that this loss would be felt by the provinces. I do not know whom he is trying to fool; he is much more brilliant than that. Is he trying to mislead the House and the people?

We have made good proposals which I submit are sound and rational. We are not saying that there should necessarily be an across the board reduction of taxes for all Canadians. We are offering a number of proposals for the government's consideration. Removing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials alone would mean an impetus to the Canadian economy of about $200 million. Removing the 3 per cent surtax would add about $150 million to the economy. Also, there are at least five or six ways by which personal income tax could be reduced. Such a reduction would have a beneficial effect on the economy. Our proposals, depending on which ones and how many are adopted, would mean, an injection into the Canadian economy of between $200 million and $1 billion or more. They should not be ignored.

In the present circumstances we cannot, because of the time factor, develop our suggestions in any great detail. Nevertheless, we feel that our suggestions are worthwhile. If the minister is not prepared to accept the proposals of the opposition, perhaps he will be prepared to outline to the Canadian people what the government proposes to do so the Canadian people can judge how effective they will be. If the minister is not willing at present to accept the proposals of the opposition, then we challenge him to come forward now with concrete proposals. Let him advance them to the House of Commons and to the Canadian people. Let us assess their value in terms of their potential for reducing unemployment.

In summing up, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is one basic need over and above everything else which is needed in this country at the present time. This need has little to do with dollars and cents, building material tax, surtax or a reduction of personal income tax. I contend that the Canadian people believe the biggest need in our country today is a change in the attitude of this government. This is more important than anything else. Even cabinet secrecy is not able to hide the fact that the government has a cold, calculated and planned approach to the economy. This message is coming through from the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour. It has been preached by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) throughout the years. The government is not prepared to deviate for one moment.

None of the ministers, including the Minister of Finance, has travelled around the country recently. They have not visited the bread lines. They have seen the effects on the unemployed. They are not aware of them. I cannot think of a more adequate phrase to describe the attitude of the government than that used by the Leader of the Opposition. He said the government has a mechanistic approach to the economy. This is sad. The government is not concerned about the effect this is having upon 538,000 Canadians.

I find it hard to accept the attitude of the Minister of Finance. Many Canadians, including some of my constituents, cannot believe that he has adopted this attitude. The minister appeared on television with his pipe in his mouth and stated "I would like to tell the people of Canada that 538,000 people are unemployed. There is no problem. The government is considering it. We recognized the problem last March. We are going to loan $150 million in December." This is an unbelievable attitude.

The Leader of the Opposition said something yesterday which struck home to every member of this House and to many people outside it. He talked about the bitterness reflected in the attitude of between 3,000 and 5,000 people in the bread lines of Vancouver. This bitterness was not necessarily directed toward the Prime Minister or the government. The bitterness was toward the institutions of government and Parliament—for their inability to handle the unemployment problem in Canada. These people have given up hope; there is a tremendous amount of despair. This holds true for every province. It is even permeating the attitude of many people in the province which I consider to be the most peaceful in Canada.

A couple of years ago the Canadian people purchased what I considered to be a pig in a poke. I suppose we all made that mistake. We must accept a democratic decision. At that time Canadians were promised a just society which was to be on the platters of all Canadians for Christmas that year. Since that time there has been an apprehended insurrection in the province of Quebec. Canadians felt that the government at least took action in bringing in the War Measures Act. The fact is that the apprehended insurrection occurred during the reign of this Prime Minister. Last week Mr. Cournoyer, the Quebec Minister of Labour, stated that there is an apprehended revolution in that province. I do not know the gentleman. He must be reasonable and responsible, because he was appointed to the cabinet of that province by the Premier.

In my opinion we have had an increase in regional disparity and in taxes. I contend that also we have had an increase in separatism. There has certainly been an increase in the length of the bread line. The unemployment rate is now 6.6 per cent. It is almost one per cent higher than in the month of November. I contend that this is a planned effort on the part of the government. One minister of the Crown stated last week that we will probably have to tolerate a rate of 10 per cent unemployment in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lundrigan: The Minister of Finance said, "We accept that." The Minister of Labour asked what was different about unemployment in 1969, 1970 and 1971. The Prime Minister stated the government will create unemployment regardless of circumstances or results. Another minister, a real heavyweight, indicated we might have to tolerate a 10 per cent rate of unemployment in this country. The Prime Minister is misjudging the mood of the Canadian people. He is relying on experience gained while visiting some of the eastern countries in the last couple of decades. I think it is possible to plan an approach to the economy of a grossly underdeveloped nation and have a very authoritarian approach to the economy, politically and otherwise. However, I do not think the Canadian people will accept this kind of solution.

Recently, it has been widely stated that the Prime Minister is using a system of election economics. This is probably closer to the truth than anything I have heard in recent weeks. We in this party have offered suggestions. From what I have read and heard, these suggestions are widely accepted by the economists of this nation and by many politicians. We challenge the government to accept our suggestions or, in the few hours remaining, to offer proposals which will at least encourage the Canadian people and will offset the great psychological depression and real problems of unemployment in Canada today.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, in this debate I had hoped to hear concrete suggestions with regard to the problem of unemployment. It is obviously a serious problem. This problem affects not only the 538,000 who are unemployed but an additional 400,000 or 500,000 Canadians who are apprehensive about losing their jobs. I had hoped that politics would not play the major part which they have played to date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: I watched the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on television when he was interviewed in Vancouver. I was unfavourably struck by the vicious treatment of those who attacked him, as well as by their frustration. I do not think he deserved it; I believe he was sincerely trying to get at their problem. That attack was one against every member of this House. We have lost face. We have lost all meaning to the people who are unemployed. They do not blame us. They say there is no sense blaming the members of the House of Commons, because they have nothing to do with it. They say we are meaningless. These people did not even attack the government.

Between 1959 and 1962, particularly in 1962, I received a great deal of correspondence and many telephone calls from those who were unemployed. Today other people are receiving this correspondence and these telephone calls. I refer to provincial politicians, local politicians and businessmen. Hon. members must examine themselves. How many hon. members feel they have a real entente with the people? The people of this country, especially the unemployed, have demonstrated their attitude toward the Leader of the Opposition and this House. We probably deserve it.

I had hoped to hear many new ideas in this debate. Instead, the government has been condemned for what it has done, even though it has admitted it may have made a slight mistake. What do opposition members want the government to do? Do they want the government to kneel and flagellate themselves and say, "Mea culpa, mea culpa"? That will not solve the problem of unemployment.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

• (5:40 p.m.)

I think the government has quite logically answered the suggestion made by members of the opposition about tax cuts. Tax cuts are of no concern to the unemployed who will be paying no tax anyway, and the person who has work is so happy that he does not mind the tax. And where would the government get the money to finance these programs, without taxes? I believe the answer the minister gave deserves some logical comment from the opposition. There have been two speakers since then, but we have heard nothing constructive.

An hon. Member: The minister does not want to listen.

Mr. Otto: He does. He would be happy to hear good suggestions. He has answered the proposal concerning the tax reduction in a logical way, because this is a problem to be faced now, not later.

Then there is the question of the 11 per cent building tax. I am glad that members opposite so anxiously want this tax removed. I have been in the housing business for about 20 years and I can tell them that the removal of the sales tax will not cause land prices to go down at all.

An hon. Member: So what?

Mr. Otto: The tax does not apply to the land. The cost of land is half the cost of housing. More starts are being made this year than in previous years. I am not saying the housing picture is perfect; I have had some tough things to say to the minister about our housing programs. But I do not think removal of the sales tax would put more people immediately to work.

As I indicated, the debate has been lacking in constructive proposals. We have been hearing nothing but political strife back and forth, instead of ideas for immediate and long-term measures. We are wasting our time, and it is no wonder the people of this country, employed and unemployed, are dissatisfied with us and give us no credence whatsoever. We can examine these things until doomsday, but until we come up with an idea of what the facts really are we shall not be able to deal with them effectively.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Vous vous reposez.

Mr. Otto: Ah, oui. Attendez une minute. Écoutez. The real problem is still one of inflation. The government has explained that if we allow inflation to continue, it will price us out of the export markets in which we are so heavily engaged. It is as simple as that. When we do so, we are no longer employed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) unfortunately made a remark to the effect that if we do not agree with restrictive policies, we are for inflation. That is not true. I agree with the government that the ultimate problem is inflation. But inflation was not caused because too much money was chasing too few goods: it was caused because we are not very productive in Canada.

Among all the industrialized nations in the world we stand ninth in productivity although we enjoy the second highest standard of living. We are behind Greece, France and Spain. We are living high off the hog through the sale of our resources. We are mortgaging our resources to maintain a standard of living which we do not deserve. So the ultimate problem lies with our efficiency, our productivity. This is what we should be addressing ourselves to, not restrictive policies. But those are yesterday's potatoes and we shall not eat them again.

We have to examine the situation as it is now and decide what to do about it in the future. If we were to adopt some of the concepts advanced by hon. members opposite, we would be facing another cycle of inflation within ten months. If we return to the easy money idea, as has been proposed—tax cuts along with the costly support programs the government is already engaged in to create expansion in many areas—we shall be faced later with the responsibility of getting this money back. And where shall we find it? We shall have to get it from the taxpayers, who in turn will get it from the employers, in most cases, who in turn will charge higher prices to the public. Again, it is a vicious circle.

We ought to be extremely selective in our policy decisions and adjustment processes. This is not to say for a moment we should belittle the unemployment crisis. But we should remember that we still have to submit to an accounting in the future. One of the problems I believe we face is that regardless of what the government may have in mind, our financial institutions will not always go along with them. I have been studying this question for some time. There is a tendency to believe that because we have a responsible banking system there will be a reciprocal entente between the government and the banks; that the banks will consider government policy as part of a national policy. But this has not been the case. The Bank of Canada has reduced its interest rate very considerably, but I do not see any move by the banks and the financial institutions to put money out where it is needed, that is, in business. It is being put out in convertible loans at 18 per cent; it is being put out in bond issues across the border. I could give instances where a bank recommended an investment involving short-term money in the United States rather than one which would help build up an inventory for a company in Canada.

So we do not have a responsible banking system. I have regretfully come to the conclusion that the government ought to consider carefully the nationalization of our banking system. I hate to say this because I have always been opposed to the nationalization of any industry, but I believe our banking and financial institutions have been so irresponsible, so much out for their own ends, that we should carefully consider whether we should nationalize them.

Mr. Rondeau: Credit!

Mr. Otto: Well, I once voted with hon. gentlemen in that party when I voted for debt-free money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rondeau: You did not know about credit.

Mr. Otto: That is quite true. But in a serious vein, if hon. members opposite do not agree with nationalization of our financial institutions, perhaps the government should exercise a much stronger voice in their policies. Maybe we should hit their reserves. This would be a strong weapon. When the government has decided that certain policies should be followed or certain directions taken, it appears that the banks and other financial institutions have said: That may be good for some people, but as far as we are concerned we are part of a great international business, and if you do not lay down rules which we like we shall put our money elsewhere. We have to contend with this. Therefore, I do not think we can go very far without giving serious consideration to placing more severe restrictions or tighter controls upon our banking institutions.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The next problem, one that we are still facing, is labour. Labour problems have not disappeared merely because we have unemployment. We still have greater emphasis on labour problems than we had before. Hon. members will notice that during the last two weeks two companies have had to adopt ultimatum tactics—I think they have done so sincerely—because they are in a complete quandary as to what to do. These two firms have told their employees they must either stabilize their wage demands or the companies will close their plants and go out of business. This was not said for publicity reasons or for purposes of bargaining. I know the management of one of the companies, and this was a serious statement. So both labour and management have now been driven to the position where there is no longer room for negotiation; it becomes a question of ultimatum. Either the employees do this, or the company shuts up shop. Ultimatum tactics have never paid off and they never will.

I suggest the government seriously consider the whole complex question of devising a labour policy, because eventually, whether it be this year, next year or the year after, wage demands will have to be geared to productivity. I do not care which way you slice it, Mr. Speaker. This policy could be applied industry by industry, plant by plant, right across the nation. But eventually we must face the position that if labour wants a 6 per cent wage increase, it will have to show at least a 6 per cent increase in productivity on a per man-hour basis. If labour wants a 10 per cent increase in wages, then it will have to show a 10 per cent increase in productivity. Only in this way will we stabilize inflationary pressures.

If we do not adopt this policy, I predict that a year from now we will experience a 10 per cent inflationary cycle more severe than any we have had. Costs are still increasing. We speak of stabilizing the cost of living, but the fact is that many entrepreneurs and business ventures are selling off their goods and inventories at cost, even less than cost. When these inventories are replaced, they will be replaced at higher cost and the cost will have to be paid by the public. The over-all remedy, therefore, is not to have a political debate along these lines: We told you what was going to happen. You did a bad job; you should not have done so and so. Hindsight is very easy.

Mr. Rondeau: The proof is there.

Mr. Otto: I agree with the hon. gentleman, but does that put people back to work?

Mr. Rondeau: No.

Mr. Otto: I am glad my hon. friend agrees.

Mr. Rondeau: You must have solutions.

Mr. Otto: I hope to see a continuation of this debate that reveals concrete policies outlining what could and should be done. If that is the case, I am sure the minister will consider all ideas. To say that the minister is not listening is just nonsense.

Let me just summarize what I have been trying to say. The final solution must be one of gearing production to the increase in the standard of living or, if you like, to increases in wages. We must also be very selective during the next four or five months in regard to how we ease credit or the money supply. If it is eased right across the board, then inflation is bound to follow. But we can still be selective and employ more and more people.

I think the minister was on the right track in his budget when he gave certain incentives to industry as a tax write-off for replacement of capital goods. I think at least he should have doubled those incentives. The government should spare no effort in inducing industry to replace its antiquated capital equipment, because Canada is a country with some of the most antiquated capital equipment in the world. It has been said that Canadian capital goods are older and less efficient than those in some of the new countries of Africa and Asia. It has also been said that if there is a concerted effort by our banking system and by government to induce industry by means of tax write-offs, by forgiveness grants, in matter of replacing capital equipment, we could increase productivity by approximately 28 per cent.

Mr. Rondeau: Fantastic!

Mr. Otto: Yes, it is a fantastic figure; I am glad my hon. friend agrees. I think this can be done. It would be selective in approach because it would still keep Canadian companies making new equipment and machines and constructing new plants. But in the long run it would be to our benefit because we would gain from the increase in productivity and inflationary pressures would not be nearly so severe. A great amount of money is being spent—though I think more should be spent—on the retraining program.

Mr. Rondeau: You will create more inflation.

Mr. Otto: No. My hon. friend does not understand, so let me explain it to him carefully, if he will listen. One out of seven Canadians needs retraining now, but they are hanging on because there is still an opening for their type of effort. The fact is that they should be retrained during the next two or three years. This is one direction in which we could use our retraining program money. A much larger share of the budget should be devoted to the retraining program to enable it to encompass more people. Then, over the course of a year or two years, we would get the benefit of their productive capacity.

This involves more than those who are now out of work; it involves those who are really unemployed even though they are still drawing wages. Many companies are keeping on key staff for reasons of seniority and other factors, but these people are really unemployed. They have not yet created a problem, though they will eventually because each company has a reserve. When the reserve is exhausted, these companies will have to tell these people that their talents or skills are no longer required, that the companies cannot afford to keep them on staff any longer. By placing a greater emphasis on retraining we will be able to find a solution to those inflationary pressures that are bound to break at a later date. In addition, we must break up the financial establishment by introducing new ideas, by having more control over the banks.

Mr. Rondeau: Who are these people?

Mr. Otto: I told hon. members who listened to me. Most of our banking and financial institutions are controlled by a very small number of people.

Mr. Rondeau: Is that a fact?

Mr. Otto: It is a fact. They are controlled by a small number of people who are extremely conservative and apprehensive.

Mr. Rondeau: How do you know that?

Mr. Otto: Because I know them. They are reactionary and will not accept new ideas unless they are hit over the head.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I outlined some of the ideas I hoped to hear from members of the House, especially new ideas as to what might be done from now on. I said that I anticipated this debate would take the form of a presentation of ideas rather than of recriminations in respect of what has happened and an indication of who has been at fault. I also outlined some of the prime aspects of the financial crisis, inflation and unemployment in this nation.

In the next few minutes I should like to deal with the immediate problems facing those who are unemployed. The unemployed in this country fall into three groups.

There are those who have lost their jobs and are on unemployment insurance or welfare as a means of gaining an income. There are also those who are still working —that is a very important segment of the population— and being paid but their employment depends largely on the confidence their employers have in the future economy of this country. We must also consider the third group, which is comprised of young people who have just entered the labour force.

It is most important for this House, not just the government, to indicate that we in Canada have a great deal of confidence in this country in respect of the ensuing months and years. If the business community gets the idea that we in this House lack confidence, this feeling will prevail throughout industry and will induce our entrepreneurs and businessmen to restrict enterprise and curtail inventory build-up. As a result, the whole economic situation could become very critical. I suggest that in the next few months the government should enlarge its retraining program by including the many young people who have not been part of the labour force for three years or more. It is essential that we include as many people as we can in this program because their contribution to our economy will be of great benefit.

The government should reconsider instituting a special measure to indicate to our financial institutions that we mean business when we say they must encourage and finance business enterprise, particularly for the young people in Quebec but also those in the rest of Canada, who desire to enter this field. If these institutions fail to give an indication of their willingness to go along with government policy, more severe controls should be imposed. I encourage the government in the program it has outlined to provide employment for young people during the summer months, in pollution control and other fields in which they can become engaged. This is of prime importance.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Prime Minister are exuding confidence in our business community. We should encourage this attitude. If we can convince our commercial and industrial communities that we are behind them and that we have confidence, I think businessmen will act accordingly. We must convince them that if it takes $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion we will put this might behind them even though things do not look rosy. I think then we will be well on the road to recovery. This is what the House should be doing, rather than recriminating about what has taken place up to now.

I commend the government for its thinking and its confidence. I emphasize that it does not matter very much what we say in this house, or whether we take political, partisan viewpoints; we will not be doing a service to Canada unless we get behind the government in this time of crisis by showing confidence in Canada and its people. If we do that, I am sure we will manage very well.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, is the member rising on a question of privilege or an a point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I merely wished to put a question to the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired and as several other members wish to speak before the end of the debate, I think that the House would like me now to recognize the hon. member for Moncton.

[English]

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the most disturbing aspect of the budget presented to the House in December is the complete failure of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to recognize the real nature of this country's economic problems, his stubborn insistence that he and his advisers are right and everyone else is wrong and his refusal to admit that this country is now faced with the greatest economic crisis in its history, that is, mass unemployment brought on deliberately by employing woolly, nineteenth century, classic economic theories which are outdated and discredited by most economists. I wish to read from an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of January under the caption "Wrong way Benson". It reads in part as follows:

• (8:10 p.m.)

> —the government marches determinedly along the wrong route to recovery. What is wanted are tax reductions which, by restoring a measure of profitability to business, offer attractive incentives to new growth; tax reductions which, by leaving more of the individual's money in his pocket, give him the means to increase his spending.

The Minister of Finance this afternoon laughed off the opposition's suggestions for tax cuts by saying this would cost the treasury over $1 billion. I say to the Minister of Finance that if he would take some action to get the economy moving again and to produce full employment, perhaps he would recover most of the $1 billion about which he is worrying today. The editorial continues as follows:

> What is presented, instead, is a stubborn insistence that Ottawa knows best how to prime the pump—by spending tax money on public works which provide, at best, only temporary employment and that at the expense of more productive sources of employment.

The editorial goes on to point out that it is time the Minister of Finance and his advisers realized that this country has almost reached its capacity in regard to the amount of money the taxpayer can cough up for federal government expenditures which are doing nothing to increase the economic output of the country. The editorial concludes by saying

> Hopefully by spring, when, just possibly, Mr. Benson may be persuaded to do what he should have done in December—cut taxes.

This party has consistently proposed such a course of action. We have been pleading with the Minister of Finance for almost a year to change the direction of government policy to implement selective tax cuts which would encourage the private sector of business and industry to expand, provide more growth and more jobs. But all these suggestions have been laughed off by the Minister of Finance and his colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). We have been told that we are spreading gloom and doom. We have been accused of doing a great disservice to the nation. We have been told our so-called gloomy prophesies will discourage businessmen from investing in this country.

Here again we have the arrogance of a government that has come to believe itself omnipotent and all-competent, that goes sailing blithely along on a course which, in their words, "must be right because we say it is right", a government which refuses to change its course even though most of the country's best business minds and best economists are condemning its policies as outdated and inadequate.

It was interesting to hear the Minister of Labour yesterday in his historic apology for government policies. He spent most of his speech talking about the 1950s and 1960s but had very little to say about the 1970s except to condemn the opposition and chastise us for spreading gloom among businessmen. They created the gloom which now they are unable to dispel. The Minister of Labour said that if he were a businessman sitting in the gallery today listening to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and of other speakers, he would ask what kind of country this is and would say to himself, "If they have no more confidence in our future than that displayed in their speeches, why should I invest my money in such a country?"

I think all of us have the responsibility to create the right psychological climate for investors to invest. I am glad that the Minister of Labour appreciates the importance of decisions by the private sector of the economy, even though his colleague the Minister of Finance will not recognize them. It is interesting to hear the Minister of Labour when he talks about the opposition spreading gloom among our businessmen. It is interesting to hear what some of these businessmen have been saying about the government's policy. Mr. G. Arnold Hart, the chairman of the Bank of Montreal, said in a recent interview:

> The most effective and least risky route to take toward expansion of the economy in present circumstances is tax reduction.

Many economists interviewed last weekend by the Toronto Daily Star urged the government to embark upon a system of tax cuts to combat unemployment. One of them, Professor Abraham Rotstein of the University of Toronto, called for a substantial cut in personal income tax. Charles Neapole, president of the Montreal stock exchange, said:

> Take the surcharge off; give some relief in the corporation income tax. Give people more confidence, give business more confidence, and they will be going back to work.

I have heard many people on this side of the House make that plea to the Minister of Finance many times in the past six months. John Meyer, financial writer for the Montreal Gazette, when referring to the widening credibility gap between government and business said the fact that business has no more faith in the government is because it does not know what this government intends to do. They have lost all confidence in government policies. Mr. Meyer said:

> Something of that confidence might have been restored by bold and imaginative tax reduction but, in Canada at least, that course was rejected in favour of more government spending.

Are these the mouthings of a futile opposition? These are statements from some of our best business leaders. Yet the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour laugh them all off. The minister said that this is just the opposition proposing cockeyed schemes that will cost the country a lot of money. There is not much to be gained now by deploring the situation, by pointing out what should have been done or by saying that the government could have combatted inflation, not by deliberately creating unemployment in the vain hope that it would keep wages down but, rather, by employing selective fiscal and monetary measures.

For example, when there was a serious housing shortage and mass unemployment in the construction industry, firm, strong action could have been taken to increase housing starts. This would have put the unemployed carpenters, labourers and all that sector of the business community which the construction industry affects, back to work and certainly it would not have contributed to inflation. But the government refused to accept the suggestions offered by the opposition and by business leaders. The Minister of Finance continued to bask in that false optimism so aptly portrayed in his repeated statements that all is well and that all that is needed is faith. I think the unemployed have pretty well lost all faith in the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Woolliams: So has everybody else in Canada.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): True. Even in his budget he is carried away by his stubborn insistence that father knows best. He says, "Don't complain; you do not know what you are talking about". In his budget speech he bragged about employment rising in Canada and said that unemployment, on a seasonally adjusted basis, appears to be falling. Here we go again! The minister gets so caught up between seasonal and unseasonal, adjusted and unadjusted, that we cannot even get a true picture of the employment situation in the country.

We all know what has happened to his prophecy of December 3 that the situation was improving. We heard many times in the House yesterday and today about the 62,000 more unemployed as of mid-December, only a little more than a week after the minister made his optimistic forecast. We heard about the drop of over 100,000 in the number of employed. These figures have been mentioned over and over again and I hope the minister is now aware of them.

I will not dwell further on the national picture but I would like briefly to speak on the effect this government's policies have had on the outlying regions of Canada, those areas of slow growth to which the government, through its Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), has been paying lip service. He has referred to their great program of bringing these areas up to the Canadian standard. Let us see what has happened in these areas as a result of the government's policy of fighting inflation by throwing people out of work.

• (8:20 p.m.)

We have been worrying in this House about an unemployment rate of 6.5 per cent, but let us see what is happening in the Atlantic area. In the Moncton Transcript of January 14, an article on its front page is captioned, "16,000 Lose Jobs in Atlantic Provinces." It points out that unemployment in December went up to 54,000, compared with 42,000 in the preceding month. The seasonally adjusted rate, which is the rate the minister tell us to use, was 8.8 per cent, compared with the national average of 6.6 per cent. That is the figure for the Atlantic area as a whole. The article also reads as follows:

> The Atlantic unemployment rate for last December was exceeded in the nation only by Quebec where the rate was 8.4 per cent of the labour force.

That is an unadjusted rate. The sad part of all this is shown when we look at the size of the labour force which in the Atlantic area has also declined. Either people gave up looking for jobs or left the region and headed for other parts of Canada where they thought things might be better. The most shocking figure I wish to emphasize this evening is contained in the caption to another article on the front page of the newspaper, "18.8 Per Cent Jobless in Moncton Area." It reads in part:

> G. C. Robinson, acting manager of Canada Manpower in Moncton, reported today 18.8 per cent of the working force of Moncton and surrounding areas is unemployed.

Yet here we have the Minister of Finance telling us everything is fine and that although these people are out of jobs, they will get unemployment insurance, they will get Canada Pension Plan benefits, and all this and that. How can one tell this to people in an area where one in every five of the work force is unemployed? This is worse than anything I have experienced in my time, and it is probably worse than the hungry thirties.

In December, 1966, there were 3,279 people unemployed in the Moncton area, and by December, 1970, this figure had increased to 8,748, some 2½ times the 1966 level. How can we in the Atlantic area accept the bland assertions made by the government, through the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, that everything is fine, we should just be patient, the economy is on the upturn, we must not worry, and everything will be all right in the spring? Our worry is that by spring the unemployment figure in the Moncton area will be 25 per cent instead of 18.8 per cent. The situation probably will be worse because the next two months are usually the worst months of the year. These figures illustrate the emptiness of the government's policy in trying to control a national problem by over-all national fiscal and monetary policies. It fails to recognize that the country is made up of five distinct economic areas and that what is good for one area is not necessarily good for another.

As a leading economist has said, the burden of maintaining price stability seems to fall particularly heavily on the poor. A recent study carried out in the United States has concluded that while some of the poor may be seriously hurt by inflation, more of them are hurt by high unemployment. It has been said many times, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government is fighting inflation on the backs of the unemployed. I add that it appears willing to fight inflation on the backs of the slow growth areas of the country.

I appreciate the difficulties under which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is labouring. Here he is, starting out with a great policy for the economically depressed areas of the country, but every time he makes some move to create a few jobs in the Atlantic area, one of his colleagues gives him the back of his hand and takes action to lay off as many people as he has created new jobs for. It is no wonder that not long ago in this House he remarked plaintively that some of his policies will not work unless we can achieve a healthy national economy, and that there is no use pumping in money on a regional basis when the government is taking action that negates all his efforts.

The most recent illustration of what is happening in the Atlantic area is contained in the announcement by Air Canada that it will lay off 400 employees. Here again, this is a government organization, a Crown corporation, that has consistently shown a profit over the last four or five years. Its net profit, after taxes, in 1966 was just under $3 million, in 1967 it was $3½ million and it increased to over $8 million in 1968. Even in 1969, when its revenues were seriously reduced by strikes, the company showed a net profit of $1½ million after taxes. We do not yet have the figures for 1970 so we can only take in good faith the company's assertions that revenues are down, expenses are up and they must cut down on expenses. But what if it loses money in 1970? Why should a Crown corporation be treated differently from a private corporation?

For the last six months or so the Minister of Finance and his colleagues have been hammering away at private business, trying to force it to hold price increases down and making pleas not to lay off employees in view of the tightening economic situation. Private businesses have co-operated very well, in fact to the point where they are now faced with declining profits. Why should Air Canada or any other Crown corporation receive preferred treatment compared with private business? Why should this company, which has consistently shown a profit, be allowed to use a mythical statement which to my knowledge has not yet been presented to this House, and because of these estimated figures say it must cut down and that it will lay off so many employees?

In Saint John, Mr. Yves Pratt, chairman of the board of Air Canada, brushed off the lay-offs very lightly by saying they represented only 2.55 per cent of Air Canada's total labour force. Here again is the fallacy that what is good for Canada is good for the Atlantic area.

True, these employees may represent only 2½ per cent of Air Canada's total labour force, but in the Atlantic provinces the number to be laid off in many cases represents a third of Air Canada's working force there. In Yarmouth, as my colleague points out, 33 per cent of Air Canada's jobs have been declared surplus. As Mr. McDevitt said in Saint John, the number laid off in the Maritime provinces represents about one-third of the number in Canada.

Where is the justice and what is the reason for such a failure? Air Canada must be told, and told immediately, by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) or someone in authority, that that organization has the same responsibility to the Canadian people as it has to private business. It must be told that this country is waging a battle against unemployment and that it cannot be allowed to slow down the fight by ill-considered lay-offs. In short, Air Canada must be told that the announced lay-offs must be postponed until the economy is once again going full steam ahead. As I said earlier, time after time we have hammered away to bring this situation to the government's attention. We hope the government is finally aware that unemployment has become a serious problem. Sometimes you wonder if that idea has ever occurred to them.

The government keeps saying, "What shall we do? " We have often heard them say, "You cannot give us any suggestions." Quite apart from the fact that the government is trying to evade its responsibilities, it has the responsibility of telling us what to do. We on this side have made many suggestions. They have been ridiculed, laughed at. Nevertheless, as I have said, many responsible businessmen in the country are thinking the same way we are.

What can the government do now? We need constructive measures to get the construction industry back to work and to supply the housing that is so desperately needed. If we enable the construction industry to get back to work, we shall immediately bring about a rapid increase in employment in the construction trades, and that will have a multiplier effect throughout all industry. To begin with, I suggest to the Minister of Finance, as many others have suggested, that he remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. The Premier of New Brunswick has already taken the lead in this field, having recently removed the 8 per cent sales tax on building materials. This already have given an encouraging impetus to the building industry. This step alone would have a tremendous effect in reducing the 18.8 per cent unemployment figure in Moncton.

We need substantial cuts in both corporate and personal income tax, to place more money in the hands of consumers and to reverse the pessimistic attitudes held by businessmen about the immediate future of the economy. Above all, the government must admit that it has been wrong in its political philosophy that everything must be brought under government control. We need an admission that it has been wrong in its theory which suggests that economic expansion can only be achieved where, when and how the minister and his bureaucrats decide.

We need the government to admit that other people also have good ideas about how to create jobs, and when. The government must realize they do not know everything; they do not have the complete, decisive say as to where and at what times jobs should be created. We want assurances that this government does not consider itself the sole fount of wisdom, omnipotent and omnicompetent. Above all, we want from the government recognition that private enterprise, and not the government, is the only lasting source of economic growth and jobs.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speeches in this debate yesterday and most of today and have found that the analysis by this House of the very complex problem of unemployment has been, for the most part, an ultrasimplistic one. Opposition members have repeatedly stated that the unemployment we are now suffering in this country has been due completely and solely to government policies.

An hon. Member: You are so right.

Mr. Alexander: That is true for 99 per cent of the unemployment.

Mr. Allmand: It seems to me this is just not true, and I am not saying that because I am a government supporter.

An hon. Member: I suppose the hon. member is going to set us straight.

Mr. Allmand: I say that because a great many other causes occur to me which have something to do with the problem. The policy of the government has been one cause, but I do not feel we shall do much toward solving this problem in the long run by continually ranting that the entire problem has been caused by government policy. If we look at countries which have governments of a different colour we see that they, too, have been faced with cyclical unemployment. Right now the United States faces a growing problem of unemployment. I should like to put before this House some of the other causes which have occurred to me and which I think should be considered.

An hon. Member: Primarily, people are unemployed because there are no jobs.

Mr. Allmand: First of all, it occurs to me that we have an economic system which is not flexible enough to adjust its cost factors when economic conditions change, particularly the cost of capital and the cost of labour. Second, we seem to have developed an economic situation which, contrary to the classical prototype, has been faced with increasing prices combined with increasing unemployment.

An hon. Member: And bigger profits.

Mr. Allmand: Third, we have an economic system in which there is a shortage of money for jobs and for investment, while the banks continue to make large profits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, these situations which we observe in our economic system lead me to ask further questions. What has been the role of our financial and credit institutions which have unduly promoted a dislocation in investment and spending priorities and have promoted long-term, inflexible fiscal obligations causing unemployment? What has been the role of large unions which have pressed for higher wages than their productivity would warrant and have insisted on wage parity and other demands out of line with existing economic conditions, causing unemployment?

I am putting these questions to the House because I feel they are important and should be considered. For two days I have listened to this debate, and only one cause for unemployment has been put forward by the opposition. I do not pretend to have the answers to these questions. I am merely suggesting that we investigate these things. They should not be sacred cows. We should not treat them as clichés which should not be looked at. For too long conventional wisdom has given us its opinions, as if their correctness is beyond question. I shall speak of other things that occur to me, but I say let us look at this problem honestly. I agree with the opposition; it is a most serious problem, especially in my city of Montreal. I wonder how many men have either not been hired or have been laid off because of conditions which have been imposed by strong unions and strong industries.

An hon. Member: Give us some examples.

Mr. Allmand: It is fine for those who are working to receive ever-better wages and to enjoy ever-better working conditions. But what about those who are not working, either because they have been laid off or because they have not been hired? I say this not as one who is anti-labour but as one who is an observer of a system in which only part of our working force is unionized and in which those outside the unions are often victimized by the actions of the unions.

Furthermore, I ask: What has been the role of technological change in bringing about unemployment, and how does this factor relate to government and to union policy? What has been the role of international trade in causing unemployment? How does the change in the value of our dollar fit into this situation? What has been the role of our educational institutions? Have they been directing the right people into the right areas of study? Have we overproduced people in the arts field and in the teaching field, and have we produced too few people who could be of great help in the areas of production, investment and employment?

What has been the role of our three-tiered tax system, the tiers of which do not always work in co-ordination? I refer to the federal, provincial and local taxing powers, including municipal governments and school boards. Have the contrary actions of the different levels of government in Canada caused unemployment? What has been the role of the central banking system? Is it too central? As the previous speaker said, should we have a more decentralized banking system in Canada?

Mr. Peters: With all these questions you sound like my constituents.

Mr. Allmand: Unfortunately, I still do not hear many brilliant comments from the other side.

Mr. Yewchuk: Neither do we.

Mr. Allmand: I listened to you for two days. Keep quiet for a while. Have our welfare and income support programs been a cause of unemployment? I suggest that we must do much more, if we are really interested in investigating the cause of unemployment, before we can come forward with answers. We should know more about the background of those who are unemployed. From what industries do they come? How long have they been unemployed? What are the regions with most unemployment? In what types of industry or commerce were these people formerly employed? I ask these questions because I feel the analysis of unemployment has been far too shallow up to this time.

Some programs have been implemented to help the unemployment situation on a short-term basis. Some of these programs have already been started by the government, others have not. There has been a public works program, an increase in unemployment insurance, and tax cuts. All these are short-term solutions. There should be an intensive study—into the causes of unemployment and programs for full employment and price stability.

The other day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that a committee of this House be set up to study the problem. He gave the impression that this committee would only hear grievances. I support him in the establishment of such a committee; however, I do not think the committee should merely hear grievances. I think that a committee of this House, embracing all parties, should be set up to study and identify the basic causes of unemployment at this time and to suggest solutions. In addition to hearing grievances, the committee should hear witnesses, question conventional wisdom, slogans and clichés of both the right and the left. It should attempt to solve this serious problem. In addition to Canadian experts, the committee should interview experts from abroad. I would like to see the committee examine such people as John Kenneth Galbraith.

Mr. Peters: Maybe he could answer some of your questions.

Mr. Allmand: I wish to suggest a few short-term solutions. Although they may appear to be simple, I offer them to this forum for discussion. The suggestions are not new. The government should negotiate with labour, industry, business and local governments in an attempt to reduce the work week by 10 per cent and increase the work force by 10 per cent. In other words, the work now available should be spread around in order to encompass more people. This would mean a 36-hour work week instead of a 40-hour work week, or a seven-hour day for five days a week instead of an eight-hour day. If such a program were adopted, one additional man could be employed for every seven men now working.

There have been objections to such a suggestion. Some people say it would be inefficient. I do not understand that. Inefficient for whom? I do not think it is more efficient to have eight men working seven hours a day rather than seven men working eight hours a day. It has been suggested that this would decrease the weekly pay packet by five hours a week. That is true. However, if the work force was increased by 10 per cent, taxes could be reduced because social and welfare payments, manpower training payments and other payments could be decreased. This would result in approximately the same take-home pay as at present. It has been suggested that the problem of unemployment could be solved by economic growth. We are achieving economic growth today without employment growth. Our economic growth is due to technology, not labour-intensive industry.

An hon. Member: It is also due to the Liberals.

Mr. Allmand: There is also a trend from productive industries to service industries as well as service industries on a higher level. Those who say we should provide jobs tend to think that productive capacity can be expanded indefinitely in the work force. According to what I have read, this is not the case. This type of program could be carried out by negotiation or by government incentives. I wish to suggest another solution. This might also appear to be very simple, and there may be arguments against it. I offer it to this forum for discussion.

Mr. Woolliams: We will not have time to discuss it.

Mr. Allmand: Preference for new jobs should only be offered to the chief breadwinner of a family unless he is earning less than $6,000 a year. I know of many cases in my own city, as well as here in Ottawa, where the head of the family is earning in excess of $10,000 a year and his wife is earning $6,000 or $7,000 a year. Something should be done about changing jobs which are either man-oriented or woman-oriented. Many secretarial and other types of jobs in the House of Commons, some of which pay fairly well, are held by women. Many other jobs are held exclusively by men. The system should be more flexible. Many of these jobs could be held by people who support a family, rather than by people who are supplementing a family income. These two proposals are minor to my first proposal that a special committee be established to study in depth the problem of unemployment.

Many members suggested a tax cut. I think that should be considered further. However, at this point I am not convinced that it would solve the problem. If personal and corporate taxes were cut, would that money be used to create new jobs? I am not convinced that it would. It may help the rich much more than it would help the poor. People with low incomes pay a low rate of tax; I doubt whether a cut in taxes would stimulate the economy sufficiently to create jobs for them. I understand that a few years ago in the United States taxes were cut and that money did work its way into the economic system quickly and it did create jobs. However, I am not sure whether in this case it would do so.

I wish to close my contribution to this debate by expressing the hope that what we have been saying in the last two days will result in action helpful to the unemployed. When I listen to these debates I often wonder whether they are of any value; I have the impression they are used by members on all sides of the House just to score political points. I would hope we could all make a contribution to the solution of this problem which is beyond politics.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, during the last two days we have heard in this debate analysis after analysis, but when all is said and done we are left with the cold fact that there is mounting unemployment. There are today in Canada about 600,000 people unemployed, and the number is steadily increasing. We ask ourselves: When will the end come? There are many more who are not even on the list. Many of them are young people who have never been on the labour market before. They receive no benefits and they may not even be eligible for manpower training because they have not been in the labour force for three years.

This is not a negligible factor. Nearly 50 per cent of the unemployed are 25 years old or younger. Nearly 20 per cent are less than 20 years of age. They are to be found across Canada, mostly in the cities. Some of them hold university degrees. Some are bitter and disillusioned. They were told that if they were well trained and educated the world would be at their feet. They have heard the story of the just society. If some of them are now bitter and disillusioned, can you blame them, Mr. Speaker? They are young, they are willing, and there is no work for them.

Many of them are single and are not eligible, in a number of places, for welfare. Many are going around begging. In all the time I have practiced medicine I have never had so many people coming to me for help, and a great many of them are young people, some with university degrees. The interesting thing is this: the only way you can aid these people who are not eligible is by giving it yourself or by getting it from somebody else, for example, from the Salvation Army. The government does not cover these young people who have not been in the labour market. They put me in mind of the doctor who had a sick patient. He said, "I can cure this patient's disease; there is no question about that. I can give him the right medicine. All that bothers me is whether the patient will survive long enough to benefit from it." In this young group the seeds of dissent and revolution can easily be planted. The present situation is worse than it was during the great depression because most of these people know only an affluent society.

This is the personal side, the suffering and the disenchantment of the unemployed. What about the goods and services they would have provided had they been working? The economists tell us that had these people been at work last year they would have produced about $5 billion worth of goods. These are goods which could have been sold in the marketplace. What about the taxes which would have been paid by these 500,000 people had they been employed? It would have amounted to perhaps another $1 billion in income tax alone. As it is, we have to pay them welfare or unemployment insurance and they are obliged to buy less in the marketplace because they do not have the money to spend.

The government stands condemned for completely ignoring the fiscal and social programs it should have introduced a year ago. Just last summer the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated he would not change his policy; people could like it or they could lump it. Well, the lumps are hurting, Mr. Speaker, yet no one in the government will admit that its economic record is a tragic one. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is like the boy who stood on the burning deck whence all save he had fled, but he does not realize it. Yes, they were going to cure inflation.

I was interested in an article which appeared this month in a paper which has been quite friendly to the government, the Financial Times. It reads as follows:

> Back in 1965, governments at all levels got along with less than one-third of the gross national product. Many people thought that was already too much. By 1967 the government's share had grown to 35 per cent. In 1970 it was just over 38 per cent.
>
> In terms of personal income alone, the average Canadian in 1967 contributed $15 to governments for every $85 that he was allowed to keep for himself and his family. In 1970 the governments took $19 and left him $81.
>
> Many Canadians, of course, gave up a much larger share of their income to governments. A majority of the active population with earning capacity kept far less than 80 per cent. A minority with low earning power kept a higher proportion. The substantial minority with little or no earning power drew from the pot contributed by the rest. And a growing army of government employees lived on it.
>
> The average figure understates the burden of government which every productive citizen is carrying. Corporation and business taxes compound the understatement because in the last resort they are all paid by individuals too. They may be paid by consumers in higher prices, by employees in lower wages or by investors in lower dividends. But they all come back to individuals.
>
> Governments love these taxes which they like to call "hidden". They are like dentists—experts in the art of painless extraction. That is why they cling to devices like the manufacturers' sales tax which forms part of the final price paid by consumers (and, incidentally, escalates at every stage of distribution). That is why they like "hidden levies" such as payroll deductions for pensions.

• (9:00 p.m.)

> The supposedly "hidden" taxes, under the innocent name of "contributions", are now approaching one-tenth of the individuals' payments to governments. For businesses they may be even higher. At this level it is an illusion for any government to imagine that they remain either painless or hidden.

What has been forgotten is that productive Canadians—in every walk and at every level of income—are determined to offset the growth of inflation and taxes. The thing that concerns them is the real income which they have left to spend; and that has grown less than either prices or taxes.

This is why wage increases have been necessary. The government was going to cure inflation, even at the cost of unemployment. Although the government has dampened the fires of inflation a bit, it has also created the highest level of unemployment in a decade. Is that an accomplishment of which they should be proud, Mr. Speaker? The government has crimped economic growth and industry has been slowed down. As a result, jobs have been lost. On top of this, we have had the worst unemployment record of any developed country in the world.

Welfare rolls have multiplied in number across the country, to a point where the municipalities are hard put to handle them. In despair they tend to scrimp and scrimp, to the discomfort of the individual. What is the government going to do to remedy the situation? It is the government that has placed us in this difficulty. If the government did not know the answers before administering the treatment, then it should have known. With a record which is the worst of any western country, the government stands condemned at the bar of justice.

What is the cure? In the United States the government cut corporation and personal income taxes. This was also done in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Germany; but not in Canada, Mr. Speaker. Our finance minister stood like the boy on the burning deck and refused to cut corporation taxes or personal income tax. I ask the government why it refuses to cut taxes. As a matter of simple mathematics, if a man's take-home pay is increased by the removal of taxes, he does not require as large an increase in his wages. Indeed, there would not be the same pressure to ask for more wages. The same is true of corporation taxes. Immediately corporation taxes are lowered, businesses are placed in a better competitive position in the marketplace of the world. But the government has refused to take either step, even though, as I have said, a similar step has been taken by the United States, Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Germany.

In failing to remove the federal sales tax the government stands condemned by a newspaper that has generally been favourable to government policy, the Financial Times. With regard to low-cost housing there are many hidden taxes, and these are very well described by the Financial Times. For example, I was talking to a man the other day who had had a simple little board made up with an inscription upon it. This board had cost him about $9. He had to pay the federal government $1.08 tax, which brought the price of the board up to over $10, and on top of that had to pay 5 per cent provincial tax. This amounted to about 55 cents. In other words, he had to pay $10.63 for an article that he should have been able to purchase for $9. This is why the working man, members of the work force, the professions, and so on, require more money; and it is why we have inflation. The Minister of Finance raised taxes, not lowered them, and this policy has been a dismal failure.

If income tax is cut, pressure is taken off wage demands. If corporation tax were cut, there would be money for expansion and goods would become more competitive in the marketplace. It would give the people back their own businesses. Yesterday I attended the election of a warden in one of the biggest counties in the Dominion of Canada. One of the speakers said it was about time government was given back to the people, because the people knew when money was getting scarce and made the necessary adjustments; the people knew how to handle it.

I want to dwell for a moment on the subject of regional government. I know of an industry that wants to build a factory under the government's incentive legislation but cannot afford to do so because in this area there are no incentives and taxes have been too high. There is just not enough money left over from business activities to build and expand. The government should offer assistance in the building of this factory because it would create employment. Instead, regional government is running wild and we have a sort of balance of payments between the various provinces—in effect, a stabilization fund.

Since the government's guidelines have been unsuccessful and have only depleted profits, I suggest the government should use public funds to create public works. One of the suggestions made yesterday at the County of Simcoe's meeting was to establish a work program directed toward the removal of dead elm trees that stand out stark across the country. Such a program could be commenced in each province. Dozens of similar projects could be initiated.

So many people are living on fixed pensions. While the government boasts about beating inflation, I suggest they examine some of the rents these pensioners are paying. To show the House how benevolent this government is, Mr. Speaker, about two years ago they introduced the national medicare scheme across Canada. But no provision whatever was made for the poor who could not afford to pay for drugs prescribed by doctors under the medicare scheme. If that is not a national disgrace, I do not know what is. Since the government brought the program in, it should have completed the job by introducing a drug care bill, because there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country today who cannot afford to buy drugs prescribed by their doctor. Another matter of a humanitarian nature is the standard of continual care of patients in nursing homes following intensive care in hospitals. Those who are chronically ill and require nursing care receive no assistance at all from the federal government.

Those are the things I am advocating to the government today. It must show its humanitarian principles in looking after those who are unable, under present circumstances, to look after themselves and provide work wherever it can be provided. I have suggested one project. There are others. The government must lower taxes immediately and cut the sales tax in order that people will be able to purchase more goods. In the final analysis, the government must bring the value of the Canadian dollar down from 97 cents or 98 cents to 93 cents or 92 1/2 cents in order that we can again become more competitive in world markets and have the trading advantage that we need. Let us hope that before we have more serious problems the government will act.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as many members have pointed out, the present level of unemployment is distressingly high. There is no disagreement on that from this side of the chamber. No one concerned about people can fail to be unhappy about the situation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has pointed out that there are encouraging economic indicators which show improving trends. I think that we welcome these indicators, regardless of party affiliation. There is real encouragement in our export position and we can draw heart from Canada's price performance in comparison with other trading nations.

However, I agree with hon. members in the opposition when they say that this is very small consolation to the family man who may have been working for years and been a good worker, a man with youngsters and a mortgage who is out of work through no fault of his own. Let me say, this, Mr. Speaker: I would be delinquent in my responsibility as a former member of the opposition if I did not commend the opposition for speaking out and commenting on the situation. That is their job, as much as we on this side of the House may resent some of that criticism.

Some hon. members in the opposition have presented alternative ideas, and I have marked some of them down. As in other debates, some of the ideas appear at least to some of us to have more merit than others. But ideas have been expressed during this debate and that is good. In my view, some of their statements have been unfairly critical. I agree with my minister when he said last night that psychology is important in assisting the economic readjustment we all seek. The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has pointed this out in many speeches across the country during the past few months and I agree with him and those who have echoed this position.

We do not need statements in Canada which seek to alarm or disconcert for purely political reasons. They render a notable disservice to our country. Hon. members opposite know, as we on this side know, that the long-term prospects for Canada are simply magnificent, regardless of present difficulties. We all know that. We need reassurance and confidence in the Canadian economy so that normal growth patterns can be restored as fully as possible. Again, I say that this does not mean the opposition has no right to criticize. Churchill said on January 27, 1940, during one of his great speeches to the House of Commons:

> We do not resent the well-meant criticism of any man. We do not shrink from any fair criticism—that is the most dangerous of all. We take it earnestly to heart and seek to profit by it. Criticism in the body politic is like a pain in the human body. It is not pleasant but where would the body be without it? No health or sensibility would be possible without correctives and warnings of pain.

We have had many warnings of pain here, particularly in the last few hours. What are we facing? The figure of 6.6 per cent unemployment has been bandied around this House of Commons and speakers have quoted this figure at great length. The figure of 6.6 per cent is a high per cent. About 40 per cent of it, however—the economists on the other side of the House know this is true—represents frictional and structural unemployment. Unemployment of about 2.5 per cent or 3 per cent is inevitable. Hon. members know this, and we know it. Let us not attempt to inflate these figures in order to frighten the Canadian people into the belief that we have some kind of a depression from which it is impossible to emerge.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Perrault: I am simply giving the opposition some facts. They know that they are facts and they know that this is accurate information I am dispensing. The problem, and it is a difficult one, relates to the remaining 3.3 per cent or so of the work force. I repeat, under present highly-developed technological conditions we will have, even in good times, something like 3 per cent unemployment. This is a fact which has been admitted by opposition members during some of their statements in the House of Commons. So we are talking about 3.3 per cent of the work force.

Everything possible must be done for those people now. We cannot afford any fatalistic or passive acceptance of this figure. Indeed, the percentage of unemployed may be expected to increase if the seasonal trend continues to manifest itself. We know this. It can be expected that unemployment will increase in January and February, as it always has. There is reason to hope, however, that a significant improvement will be registered soon and that by summer levels of unemployment will be at least within a respectable distance of the 10 year norm.

Whose responsibility is unemployment? There has been an earnest attempt by the opposition to grasp this issue as something it can race to the electorate with, saying that the big bad government in Ottawa is responsible for it all. This afternoon the leader of the Socialist party in this House commenced his speech by saying the government is responsible. He said the government was responsible for inflation a few months ago. I have some comments from the NDP council convention and I should like to share them with the House. This is what occurred at the New Democratic Party Council meeting:

> Economists Jack Weldon and Rosalind Blauer told the New Democratic Party council during the weekend that efforts to control U.S. generated inflation in Canada are worthless.

The NDP has been blaming the federal government these many months. The report continues:

> David Lewis, NDP Member of Parliament for York South, said it would be politically impossible for NDP in its present position to say: "Full employment and we don't care where the prices go".

> If in power, the party could take measures to keep prices reasonable.

I ask whether there has been fair NDP criticism of the government during recent months. They level a full measure of blame at the government and then in their inner council party meeting say it is a U.S. generated inflation. I think we have done very well to control this "U.S. generated inflation" in Canada—indeed, the best of any nation in the western world.

Our Socialist friends, and many of them are good, personal friends of mine, profess to be friends of the working man. May I read into the record of the House this quotation from "The Annals of the American Academy." This is an article by the learned Mr. C. Canby Balderston, a man with impeccable credentials; indeed, he has been quoted by some members of the Socialist party. He writes as follows:

> Inflation is not an effective long-run means of creating job opportunities. Eventually inflation endangers and disrupts job stability for it is during inflationary booms that the seeds of deflation are sown.
> Nor will inflation cure structural unemployment that stems from shifts in the use of resources. A dynamic economy forsakes the old for the new, and so one may expect rapid economic growth to bring about some unemployment of a structural sort.

• (9:20 p.m.)

> Even though further expansion will tend to put more people to work, an unemployment percentage higher than that reflecting frictional unemployment might lead to the question of whether job opportunities would not be greater if certain prices were lower.

It has been the effort of the government to keep prices under control. In saying this I want to advance some ideas on how we can improve the present situation. There has been a great volume of comments from the hon. member from the great province of Alberta. I want to ask him about a statement made by the financial critic of his party, because so many members of that party have been critical of what they allege is a fight against inflation which the government has designed to deliberately create unemployment. I ask because I am confused. I cannot reconcile the statement made on November 4, 1969, with what we have been hearing during the past few hours. The following is from the record of the House. It was said then by the financial critic of the Conservative party:

> If the national effort against inflation results in an underkill on the score of inflation, it will be far worse than the overkill; because if we have a national underkill in this fight against inflation, we will have to start all over, and I think the square of zero is going to be much further back again.

So in 1969 the Conservative financial critic said, "Even if it is overkill, even if we create unemployment, we have to fight inflation." I wonder if the members of this House, indeed the Canadian public, have a right to question exactly what the opposition really believes to be the line of attack against unemployment and inflation, because the line changes so frequently.

In so far as the government was given a mandate to govern in 1968, it has certain responsibilities to attempt to influence the development of the economy. But Canada's economic welfare is everyone's responsibility, including that of the opposition. It is in part the responsibility of other levels of government, provincial and municipal. We do not have in Canada a unitary state of the kind they have in Britain, for example. We do not have a unitary state of the type they have in Sweden. It is impossible under the constitutional powers vested in the government for Ottawa unilaterally to bring into effect all the economic measures they would wish.

Mr. Korchinski: Bring that up in the next federal election.

Mr. Perrault: I asked a question about my own province of British Columbia. Is Ottawa responsible for the 300,000 man-days of labour lost in British Columbia last year in industries primarily under provincial jurisdiction, and the 11,800 man-years of work because of strikes under provincial jurisdiction? Not a word has been said by the opposition here about the responsibility of the trade union movement in Canada, of business, of municipalities and of provincial governments. There is an inspired attempt to blame Ottawa for everything that is wrong, but when times are good the provincial governments and other levels of government take the credit.

It is in part the responsibility of the business community, some of whom talk about the need for rugged, free enterprise during prosperity and actively seek government intervention when the economy slows down. This fight against unemployment is in part the responsibility of the trade union movement and their leaders who represent the labour force of Canada. Inordinate demands on the economy by labour and management act to retard economic progress.

In a free society, one which all of us profess we would like to maintain, a society with a maximum degree of freedom, even national governments with their powers are not able to decree full employment. The opposition knows this; they said so in 1961 and 1962. I am not going to go back to those days, but the speeches are on the record. We could have full employment overnight if Canadians would accept the kind of direction over their lives which would be unacceptable to the great masses of them.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't talk nonsense.

Mr. Perrault: Does the opposition assume that the Canadian people would like to have a national work force office established, giving orders directly to the unemployed men and saying to them; "You are going to a job in the Northwest Territories on the six o'clock train, or else"? Is that the way to solve unemployment? There is full employment in certain dictatorial states. Is that what we want? Does the opposition assume that a national government is able to pull magical financial levers to bar U.S. inflation from Canada, the kind of inflation which the NDP council of economists admits comes from the U.S.?

Do we really believe that federal efforts can affect the amount of lumber required for houses in the republic to the south? Does the opposition really seriously suggests that there are not good workers out of work in many parts of eastern and western Canada because housing starts are down in the country to our south? I know that my friends directly opposite me, the Socialists, talk about Sweden being the home of social democracy. Let me read the following into the record.

Mr. Korchinski: Your leader is one.

Mr. Perrault: It reads:

This Scandinavian country once put full employment first—and paid no heed to resulting inflation.

Now, in a dramatic turnabout, Sweden thinks it is better to let unemployment rise than to risk heavy inflation that could lead to a money crisis.

Reasons for a switch to a new policy become clear when you look at Sweden's inflation problem in recent years—

Result: higher costs, which quickly were reflected in higher prices. Inflation pace in Sweden climbed to nearly 5 per cent a year—

Sweden's labour government, faced with a looming crisis that could force a devaluation of the Swedish currency, decided to put its currency first—and accept a higher jobless rate.

An hon. Member: What is their rate?

Mr. Perrault: It goes on to read:

As expected, the clamp down took hold. The jobless rate has risen . . . double that of past years and the highest unemployment in Sweden in the postwar period.

And yet government officials and labour leaders have accepted it all with scarcely a whimper.

Reasons for the acceptance are very easy to find. Labour costs have come under control. Prices are almost stable.

An hon. Member: Tell us how much.

Mr. Perrault: It continues:

Main idea behind the new employment policy is to create job opportunities by making labour more mobile—transferring workers from districts with unemployment to area where employers need workers—

In these and other ways, social hardship due to higher unemployment has been held to a minimum.

A social democrat from Sweden said as follows:

You can't really cure or prevent unemployment by inflationary policies. We know that from our own experience. A much more subtle approach is needed to avoid both inflationary overemployment and chronic underemployment.

I am not saying that because they have had a certain experience in Sweden we should sit on our hands and say that everybody is in the same boat. I think that much of our unemployment today stems from an increasingly automated industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Perrault: Increasingly, I think, the fear exists that automation, the new technology and cybernation have not as yet led to the evolution of a system which enables benefits which flow from these processes to find their way into the pockets of all these people. When large numbers of men and women are laid off because of automation, and a slack economy exists which does not permit them to be absorbed in another sector of the economy, these men and women have a right to ask, "What's in automation for me?"

Why should the lives of Canadian workers, whether they be in London, Ontario, in Saskatchewan, the Maritimes, B.C., Ontario or Quebec, be dislocated by what is supposed to be an economic boon and a blessing? Why should long-term employees be dismissed without adequate notice? Believe me, this is a concern of the government and, hopefully, something will be done about it. In some countries unemployment levels are very low because a deliberate and conscious effort is made to bar automation: wages are low as well. We in Canada know that in order to remain competitive in today's world, efficiency is required and the latest technological techniques. But all of us fail, whether we are in government, labour, management or the professions, if we cannot resolve the challenge of distributing the undoubted benefits which automation brings. This is the challenge with which we are faced.

• (9:30 p.m.)

If we believe Canada is a land of opportunity, then there must be opportunity for a job and the income that goes with it. And if in our pursuit for more sophisticated technology all the Canadian work force, excluding the unavoidable 2½ or 3 per cent, cannot be absorbed into the economy, we must remove the economic penalties and the social stigma associated with this unemployment, and it has to be done now. Mr. Speaker, the good ideas which have been advanced from the various sectors of this House should be considered seriously by the government and studied by members of the civil service, and if they are good ideas let us not be partisan. Let us adopt them if they are good.

Now I want to say a word about the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I know that some members are receiving complaints about late cheques. May I say to hon. members, and through them to their constituents, that if there are delays in receiving UIC cheques, or other problems with the UIC, these problems should be referred immediately to the minister's office and the best possible service will be provided to expedite matters. I have looked into the situation so far as many claims are concerned and I am able to give the House this information: In spite of the high volume of claims, over 79 per cent are now ready for payment in the second week and claims, of course are payable after three weeks. Benefits are payable after three weeks. Some 96 per cent are ready for payment or are paid in the third week.

Understandably, Unemployment Insurance offices across the country are having a very difficult time. Their staffs are to be commended for the work they are doing in meeting a very heavy workload. But I say to hon. members that wherever you sit in this House, you and your constituents have a right to good service from the department and from the UIC. If there are allegations of delays for no good reason, you should contact the minister's office immediately—yes, contact me. Each case will be investigated. It is difficult enough to be unemployed, let alone to be one of those in the small group unable to secure benefits because of one problem or another.

There are three main reasons for delay. One is that the employer has failed to submit a record of contributions which he is obliged to make on behalf of his employees. We undertook over 160 prosecutions last year alone against employers for this offence. The second reason is that the employee may have filed an incorrect claim and some mistake has been made. I point out that service offices and information offices are now being established in some constituencies. To hon. members I say that if they believe the volume of claims in their areas requires this kind of office, I hope they will let the department know immediately. The third reason is that clerical mistakes may have occurred. All sorts of things could have happened.

I also want to point out, Mr. Speaker—I think hon. members are aware of this—that very soon changes will be proposed in the House with respect to unemployment insurance—

Mr. Woolliams: Let us get on with them now.

Mr. Perrault: Certain members of the opposition were most helpful to the government in framing some sections of the labour committee's report on unemployment insurance. They should be commended for this. I confidently believe that after the legislation comes before the House, Canada undoubtedly will have the finest unemployment insurance system in the entire world, designed not only to cope with the contingency of an interruption in earnings resulting from unemployment but a plan to assist those unemployed because of illness, to assist working wives who are unable to work because of pregnancy—a plan not only to cope with unemployment but one which will see the UIC working with other agencies engaged in social development. There will be co-operation with manpower programs. There will be co-operation with provincial and municipal bodies. It will be a plan concerned with helping those who have lost a job to become reemployed as quickly as possible. It will be a plan which will allow benefit rates and contributions to adjust automatically to fluctuations in employment and changes in average earnings.

In addition to a more flexible and responsive benefit structure, the government proposes to assist the unemployed worker more effectively by providing a claimant assistance program. I know that hon. members who have asked for increased assistance for the unemployed will not in any way impede this program and that we will receive their co-operation when the new legislation comes before the House.

In conclusion, I want to take issue with some remarks made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) last night, which were printed in the newspapers today. These were some of the words that he used to describe the alleged attitude of the government, "unnecessary, indefensible, disastrous, cruel, heartless, inhumane, smug, complacent, arrogant," and so on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read on.

Mr. Perrault: A government which invested over $1 billion in housing last year—is that a "heartless" government?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Perrault: A government which has spent $245 million on manpower training—should that be described as a "disastrous" program?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes.

Mr. Perrault: What about the creation of 17,312 jobs last year through regional expansion, and thousands of additional jobs which resulted from the establishment of these basic jobs in the economy? What about $96 million spent on bringing about jobs for the constituents of every member of the opposite side of the House? Is that a "cruel" program?

Mr. Olikow: Yes.

Mr. Perrault: Tell that to Reilly, and say it to your constituents.

Mr. Orlikow: I will say it to the unemployed.

Mr. Perrault: What about the $50 million which the Canada Pension Plan paid out in the 1969-70? Presumably this is a "reactionary" and "technocratic" plan.

Mr. Orlikow: It is.

Mr. Perrault: And a 10 per cent increase in unemployment insurance benefits?—I could continue this list of helpful government measures. I have another list of adjectives for our friends on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker, to describe their kind of descriptive statements. These words, too, are to be found in the Thesaurus near the pages from which the hon. member for York South assembled his list. They are, "void, vacant, hollow, vacuous, blank, devoid, destitute, depleted, desolate".

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I never thought I would be fortunate enough to have an opportunity to take part in this important debate. I would just like to bring the government back to earth. I would advise the ministers that I, too, have had an opportunity to talk to our manufacturers, particularly in the city of Hamilton. If they think these manufacturers show a great deal of confidence in the government's fiscal and monetary policies, they are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Speaker, I want to give you some indication of what these manufacturers have been telling me, what makes them so concerned and so worried about the policies of the government, policies which are strangling our secondary industries to such a point that right at this particular time they do not have a great deal of faith in what is occurring in terms of this country's progress, economically speaking, particularly with reference to the near future. I just want to mention five or six items about which manufacturers are very concerned. One is the freeing of the Canadian dollar, which has certainly affected our exports. Then there is the dumping of goods on the Canadian market and other actions by foreign countries. There are the increased costs of government in Canada, and the high corporate taxation rate, vis-à-vis Japan, of 26 per cent.

Manufacturers are concerned about research and development policy in Canada having an impetus toward government and universities and not toward industry. They are concerned about non-tariff barriers to exports. Let me explain what that means. I refer to an article in the Hamilton Spectator of January 16, written by James Carr, business editor, which leaves no room for doubts. In it he says:

> The problem today is not tariff barriers but non-tariff barriers—a much more subtle form of trade discrimination designed to keep certain Canadian products from competing in other countries.
> This is a familiar problem in the electrical industry, which is also being pushed hard by imports. Yet when a Canadian company tries to bid on electrical equipment in countries like Japan, West Germany, France and Britain, the bid is ignored in favour of a domestic manufacturer—even though the bid may be substantially lower.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Carr continues:

> The big job creators are our manufacturing industries and until their products are given an equal chance at home and abroad, Canada will always have an unemployment problem.

Do I need to read any more? I now wish to talk about another area. I found out, as a result of participating in the work of the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which travelled west, that there is a considerable amount of alienation in western Canada. This has been epitomized by an editorial in the Edmonton Journal of January 15, 1971, known as "Comment". The headings is, "Lumping it". I quote from the editorial as follows:

> When May unemployment figures showed 513,000 people still without jobs, Mr. Trudeau was even more emphatic about the policy which was fighting inflation at the expense of jobs and growth.

The article then quotes what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said on television as follows:

> 'If the Canadian people don't like it, you know they can lump it,' he said on television.

The editorial continues:

> The time to have done something about this winter's unemployment was last summer, when Mr. Trudeau was telling Canadians that he wouldn't change his policies and they could like it or lump it.
> We're lumping it now. And the worst thing about it is not the misery, heartbreak and human tragedy of this winter's unemployment. It is the fact that the government shows no awareness that there has been anything wrong with its economic record or that better, more effective, and less brutal policies are needed in the future.

This afternoon I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and to my friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault).

Mr. Baldwin: The minister's speech was terrible.

Mr. Alexander: It was a disastrous speech. There were people in the press gallery waiting in great anticipation to hear something, but all he did for 15 minutes was berate the loyal opposition. He also berated the New Democratic Party. I have discovered that this government is good at rhetoric but is no good at actions or deeds. I stand here and say confidently that in my opinion the Canadian people have no faith in this government. In the Hamilton district alone, which has a population of approximately 200,000, almost 19,000 people were unemployed on December 30. What the government must do is create a climate which encourages human endeavour and initiative and does not discourage them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: We must create a climate of hope as opposed to one of despair and frustration. We must create a climate for economic growth in which the talents and expertise of the Canadian people can bring about the betterment of Canada.

What are the facts, Mr. Speaker? The Economic Council in its recent annual review gave what I would call a backhanded, scathing and sarcastic condemnation of this government. It said that Canada probably has the highest rate of unemployment of the more industrially advanced nations. Do you know what this means, Mr. Speaker? It means the loss of our valuable human resources, the loss of productivity and the loss of taxes. And what did the Minister of Finance say?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 60(7) to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment before the House. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The text of the answer follows.]

Mr. Jerome: 1. On August 6, 1970 the Department of National Revenue, Taxation entered into a contract with a firm of management consultants to carry out a study which would assist the Department in making decisions on the best scheme of field officers to serve the needs of the public and the Department to at least 1980.

2. What are the details of each agreement?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—SAVING OF MAN-HOURS AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 459—Mr. Robinson:

How many man-hours have been saved as a result of the utilization of computers by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion during each year since computers have been used?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The use of computer facilities in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has contributed significantly to availability of information. Since the department's information systems have been developed on the basis of computer using techniques, there is no precise measure of the alternative manpower costs of manual methods of compiling, storing and retrieving the data. It is certain, however, that these costs would be high.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 460—Mr. Robinson:

As a result of the use of computers by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion how many employees have been (a) laid off (b) hired?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): (a) None; (b) 29.

REPAYMENT BY BOTSWANA OF $20 MILLION LOAN

Question No. 505—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. What are the required conditions for repayment by Botswana concerning the $20 million loan made to that country?

2. What is the rate in interest for this loan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. This loan has a life of 50 years and a ten-year grace period with semi-annual payments of $250,000 beginning on March 31, 1981.

2. There is no interest charge on this loan.

SALE OF "NO RETURN" DISPOSABLE GLASS BOTTLES

Question No. 566—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to the request of the Consumers Association of Canada to make the sale of "no return" disposable glass bottles unlawful?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The government is concerned over all types of solid waste pollution, including that attributable to non-returnable bottles. Most non-returnable bottles are sold within a province in a limited geographical area and do not enter into interprovincial trade and are therefore readily controllable by provincial government.

[Mr. Sharp.]

IMPORTATION OF BUTTER

Question No. 572—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Has Canada imported butter during the past twelve months and, if so (a) in what quantities (b) from what countries?

[Translation]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: From October 1969 to September 1970 inclusive, Canada's imports of butter were as follows:

Belgium & Luxembourg	19,115	440

All of the butter imported from Belgium and Luxembourg during the above-mentioned period was processed into ice cream and exported from Canada.

NUCLEAR POWER—SAFETY ASSURANCES FROM U.S. WITH RESPECT TO IODINE-131

Question No. 611—Mr. Forrestall:

Has the government sought safety assurances from the United States with respect to Iodine-131 which results from exhaust gases from nuclear reactors and associated fuel processing plants that could be carried over to Canadian soil from nuclear plants programmed for construction during the next ten years on the shores of the Great Lakes?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy Control Board reports as follows: The United States Atomic Energy Commission routinely transmits detailed information to the Atomic Energy Control Board on nuclear-electric generating stations which are planned for construction on the shores of the Great Lakes or elsewhere along the common Canada/-U.S.A. national boundary. This data is available for AECB evaluation and comment. All waste materials accumulated as by-products of the operation of a U.S. nuclear-electric plant whether gaseous (including Iodine-131) liquid or solid are subject to stringent regulations concerning handling and disposal. These rules may be found in Title 10 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, and, as for most countries, are based on the standards recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection, the world authority in this field.

RELOCATION OF CRUSTAL GEOLOGY DIVISION, GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF CANADA

Question No. 637—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the government considering a transfer from Ottawa of the Appalachian, Eastern Lowlands and Atlantic Margins Branch of the Crustal Geology Division, Geological Survey of Canada and, if so (a) what locations are being considered (b) for what reason is the transfer being considered (c) when will a decision on this move be announced?

2. Has this Branch ever been located in an area other than the National Capital Region and, if so (a) where was the Branch located (b) when was it transferred to Ottawa (c) for what reason was it transferred?

3. How many employees does this Branch now have?

4. Would all employees be expected to transfer to any new location being considered and, if not (a) what categories of employees would not be expected to move (b) for what reason (c) would they be assured other jobs in the Public Service without a reduction in salary?

5. What is the current annual budget for this Branch and what portion is allotted for salaries?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. A study has been underway for several months in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in an attempt to determine how the Department might best fulfill its scientific and regulatory roll in Eastern Canada and along the Atlantic Margin. In view of recent redistribution of functions within departments no plans could be definitely formulated. One of many proposals under consideration involves the transfer of some staff concerned with eastern activities on the Crustal Geology Division to the east coast. (a) The only location so far considered is at the Bedford Institute, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. (b) Such a move is being considered to coordinate departmental activities related to increased offshore exploration. (c) Hopefully before the start of the next fiscal year.

2. (a) Two scientists of the Section (the "Branch" referred to in the question) were previously located at the Bedford Institute. (b) One scientist resigned and the second transferred to Ottawa in 1968. (c) The scientist concerned required a closer association with his scientific colleagues and better access to the scientific services provided in Ottawa.

3. Twelve continuing positions including nine scientists and seven man-years of casual employees, mainly summer students in geology.

4. According to the one proposal all would transfer.

5. $277,000 of which $228,000 is for salaries and wages.

Mr. Korchinski: Is No. 606 not to be answered, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, on the previous occasion when questions on the Order Paper were considered the hon. member who has asked question No. 606 made a similar inquiry. He has referred to the question again today. May I say briefly that the Canadian Wheat Board regrets the delay in answering the hon. member's question. The question is rather involved and the reply warrants extensive research. However, the reply is in the final stages of preparation and I will do my utmost to give the matter priority and see if we cannot bring down the answer on Monday next.

ADOPTION AND DESIGN OF LOGO SYMBOL

Question No. 420—Mr. Hales:

1. On what date was the logo adopted by the Department of (a) Consumer and Corporate Affairs (b) Industry, Trade and Commerce (c) Labour (d) Manpower and Immigration (e) National Health and Welfare?

3. If it was designed by a consultant, what was the fee charged?

Return tabled.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Starred question No. 40, relating to the so-called information leak in regard to the interim report of the LeDain commission, has been on the Order Paper since October 8, and the leak occurred some time last spring. I raised this matter before Christmas. At that time either the minister of his parliamentary secretary said they would look into it and provide an answer. Would they mind taking another look?

Mr. Jerome: I will certainly undertake to do that and make a statement about it on the next day.

Motions for Papers

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notices of Motions Nos. 44, 157 and 167 are acceptable to the government.

REPORT BY D. W. CARR AND ASSOCIATES REGARDING FUTURE ROLE OF SEAWAY IN CANADA'S RURAL TRANSPORTATION

Motion No. 44—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by D. W. Carr and Associates of Ottawa, prepared for the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority regarding the future role of the Seaway in Canada's rural transportation.

Motion agreed to.

FEASIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING PUBLIC LIFE INSURANCE PLAN

Motion No. 157—Mr. Rowland:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Department of Finance, the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Housing and Mr. Sydney Bell, C.L.U., Managing Director, Insurance and Financial Consulting Service, Winnipeg, Manitoba, concerning the feasibility of establishing a public life insurance plan.

Motion agreed to.

CARR STUDY REGARDING ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Motion No. 167—Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Carr Study or Report regarding the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion No. 37?

STUDY BY TIM RYAN FOR DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

Motion No. 37—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by Tim Ryan, Port Arthur, Ontario, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding "Evaluation on the activities of the CNR-ILA Joint Committee at North Sydney, Nova Scotia".

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the study referred to in this motion is not yet completed and the author is doing further work on it at the department's request. When it is completed, consideration will be given to tabling the report. In the meantime, therefore, the member may wish to withdraw this motion.

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder if the government would consider leaving it on the Order Paper until the report has been completed. They can then make a decision on whether they are prepared to table it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining Notices of Motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MANPOWER

SUGGESTIONS FOR SUMMER EMPLOYMENT OF YOUTH

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In working out the government's $50 million program for providing employment for our youth this summer, is the government giving consideration to employment in reforestation, cleaning up our salmon spawning beds and other waterways and partially subsidizing the wage cost of employment on farms, as well as other healthy and useful work, so that our young people may be constructively employed in work that is useful to the economy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise of the hon. member's question, the work which is being done on the question of student unemployment involves an examination of all ideas which come forward and seem to be reasonable. I previously made it clear to hon. members that I welcome their suggestions whenever they seem to have an air of reason about them.

Mr. Hees: In considering constructive jobs that will or might be available for young people this summer, does the minister consider that there will be sufficient of this kind of work available so that it will not be necessary to send our unemployed youth throughout the country on free bus tours as is presently planned by the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

RETRAINING PROGRAM—NUMBER OF APPLICANTS NOT ACCEPTED UNDER PRESENT REGULATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the concern and possible confusion with respect to the effectiveness of the manpower retraining program to deal with substantial numbers of unemployed during this period of high unemployment, is the minister able to give to the House today in short form or is he prepared to make a statement on motions as to the number of people who have applied for training and assistance under the manpower training program and have not been able to qualify under the present regulations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I would be glad to give very serious consideration to the question of whether I can put together figures along the lines suggested by the hon. member in order to make a statement on motions.

OIL

FEASIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTING PIPELINE FROM WESTERN CANADA TO MONTREAL—COMMITMENT TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING SECURITY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the report that there is likely to be an increase of at least two cents a gallon in gasoline prices east of the Ottawa valley. In view of the fact that the reason given for this proposed increase is the rise in price of offshore oil, may I ask the minister whether this price increase now makes it more feasible from the minister's point of view to consider the extension of the pipeline east to Montreal?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We are not yet certain what offshore oil prices will be subsequent to the negotiations between the producer countries and the oil companies which are now under way. We do know that tanker prices have gone up very considerably in the current year and this, of course, lends itself to higher prices for offshore oil. But from the standpoint of the economic feasibility of extending the pipeline there is no certainty that oil prices will be such as to render such a project economic. If it is economic, I feel sure that the private sector will consider the construction of such a pipeline, and the government would certainly consider seriously any suggestion that a pipeline would be economic once offshore prices are determined.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement made by President Richard Nixon that Canada will have to satisfy United States security arrangements under its mandatory oil import program before the United States will be prepared to grant free access of Canadian oil to the United States market, has the Canadian government made any commitment as to the way in which this security is to be provided, and is the extension of the pipeline to eastern Canada part of this program for guaranteeing security as requested by the President of the United States?

Mr. Greene: We have made no commitments with regard to a pipeline or security. This is one of the concerns of the United States in connection with opening up the oil market to our western oil, and they pay a very heavy price for this security. But the Canadian position has been and will and, I think, should continue to be that question of security affecting Canada should be Canadian decisions. What the United States deems to be security and what Canada deems to be security might well be two different things, and our constant representation to the United States has been that we shall make the decision in Canada as to what we deem to be security for Canadian sources of supply. We feel sure that decision will meet with the approval of the United States, as it will be a Canadian decision made in the Canadian interests and should satisfy the Americans, but it will not be made by the Americans for Canada.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the decision as to what is in the best interests of security for Canada ought to be determined by parliament, will the minister reconsider his decision not to make available all the data to the appropriate committee of the House so that members may have an opportunity to examine the feasibility study which has been undertaken and determine whether or not an extension of the pipeline would be feasible in Canada's interests?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think I said previously that the government and several of its departments have the question of the cost of a pipeline and its feasibility under continuing review. But we have maintained throughout that in keeping with the practice in Canada, which I think has been a highly successful one that has brought prosperity to the oil and gas industries and has contributed to the well-being of Canada as a whole, the decision as to construction of pipelines or no will be made by the private sector. All pipelines in Canada are owned by the private sector, not the public sector. Therefore we do not really have a comprehensive survey as such, as to the economic feasibility and viability, of such a pipeline—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The minister set out some economic facts and partly answered the question a few moments ago, but I should like to know whether there is any study now being made under the sponsorship of the government regarding the economic feasibility of a pipeline to the Montreal market from western Canada? Is this just a matter of guesswork or is there any study being made so that the minister can provide some economic facts?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, there is no complete, comprehensive study as such. Under the law in Canada, anybody who wished to build a pipeline would make a presentation to the National Energy Board who, with the knowledge and information they have of a continuing character, would determine the feasibility of such pipeline and would then make a recommendation to the government. It is in this way that such a decision would be made under existing Canadian law.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hope Your Honour does not regard this question as argumentative because I am seeking knowledge from the minister. How, then, can the minister set out the economic facts as to the feasibility of such a pipeline if there is no study on which to base those facts?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I would have to regard that question as at least slightly argumentative.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SECURITY OF UNITED STATES TRANSPORTATION ROUTES—ANTI-SUBMARINE PATROLLING

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the security of United States oil routes. In view of the fact that the United States Department of the Interior published earlier this month a study showing that the Alaska pipeline and the offshore tanker route would be entirely within United States hands and thus would be more secure than a pipeline passing through Canadian territory, would the minister please inform me whether or not the United States government has entered into discussions with the Canadian government with a view to handing over anti-submarine patrolling on the west coast of Canada to United States forces rather than, as is presently the case, leaving it to Canadian naval units?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not as far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker.

FEASIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTING PIPELINE FROM WESTERN CANADA TO MONTREAL—APPEARANCE OF MINISTER AND NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD CHAIRMAN BEFORE COMMITTEE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister stated that he has no study to present to the House for us to examine. Since this is a most important matter for the Canadian people, would the minister and the chairman of the National Energy Board be willing to appear in the near future before the appropriate committee of the House to answer questions so that the Canadian people can become better acquainted with the facts surrounding this important matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, when the estimates of the National Energy Board are before the committee we would certainly be most pleased to appear. I reiterate that the question of the economic viability of pipelines in Canada is left to the private sector. It is not for the government to determine whether or not to build pipelines; that is not the way we operate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but perhaps at this point we might pass on to another subject.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—ESTABLISHMENT OF PARK IN ST. MAURICE VALLEY—CONSTRUCTION OF SKI AREA AT ST. GERARD

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Could he make a statement on the articles published in the Mauricie newspaper Le Nouvelliste which referred to one Hawai trip where the minister would have signed agreements with local businessmen with regard to a proposed ski centre in Saint-Gérard and the construction of an access road to the national park in the St. Maurice valley?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that this question could be placed on the order paper. If the hon. member considers this to be an urgent matter, perhaps he could send me notice so that it may be debated at the time of adjournment.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Matte: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister on a question of privilege.

Mr. Chrétien: I wish to inform the hon. member that yesterday on its editorial page Le Nouvelliste extended its apologies to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for these unfortunate suggestions, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question of privilege is not in order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BANKRUPTCY

REPRESENTATIONS BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF JUSTICE ON STUDY COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Is the minister in a position to inform the House whether he has received from the Quebec Minister of Justice, on the subject of the Tassé report on bankruptcy, a communication in which the minister expressed his opposition to several points of the report and asked the federal minister for a further delay that would allow the Quebec officials to make their own comments on this report? If so, would he tell us what has been his answer to the Quebec Minister of Justice?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that there have been discussions between officials of the two departments but whether there has been formal communication I do not know. I have not seen any but I will certainly make an inquiry. If the Quebec government or anyone else wishes to make representations or comments on the report on bankruptcy and insolvency, naturally I will welcome those comments and representations whenever they may be made and will pay very careful attention to them.

REPORT OF STUDY COMMITTEE—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO MINISTER BY PUBLIC

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that many submissions may guide the minister in drafting the legislation, if it has not already been drafted, will he now indicate whether he is prepared to extend the time for receiving representations beyond January 31, as I asked him yesterday? In view of the fact the minister said that this government is interested in democracy, will he answer me point-blank and advise the House whether he is prepared to extend the time for submission of briefs before the legislation is to be drafted, namely, January 31?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is going to take a good deal of time to draft something so complicated as a revised Bankruptcy Act. Therefore it seems to me that during the time our people are working out this Bill there will be all sorts of opportunities to make representations. I certainly will receive these representations and look forward to paying attention to them as well as giving them a great deal of study.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the minister finds it so difficult to answer such a simple question. The answer he has given me today is the same as he gave me yesterday. My question is simply this; is the minister prepared to extend the time from January 31 to some subsequent date? That is all I am asking.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the hon. member has such difficulty in understanding the answer. I have obviously said twice that anyone is free to make representations at any time and I will be most interested in receiving them. That seems to me to extend the time.

Mr. Alexander: I have one further short supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary question, but we should move on to another subject.

Mr. Alexander: As a result of the minister's evasion I should like to know whether I can now be assured that we can disregard the January 31 date at this time?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I thought that is what I had said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: No, you didn't.

Mr. Basford: But I should like people to get their comments in as quickly as they can because this would be helpful to me and the officials of my department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DIRECTIVE RESPECTING DENTAL SERVICES TO CHILDREN IN SCHOOL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from a directive sent out by the Department of National Health and Welfare in respect of Indian health services. Therefore I direct the question to the responsible minister, although I feel the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would also be interested. It refers to dental services to Indian children in school, and the following order is set out:

> We are only allowed to supply such prosthesis where it is considered that better than average education is contemplated or has been achieved by the student, and where the student's likely vocation will require inconspicuous dentition.

Is this government policy in respect of dental treatment for Indian students and, if so, will the minister act to remove this obvious discrimination?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will look into that matter and reply later to the hon. member.

DRUGS

REPORT OF U.S. FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION ON INEFFECTIVENESS OF CERTAIN PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister indicate to the House whether he is aware of the United States food and drug administration's recent report to the effect that 14 per cent of the over 16,000 drugs sold on the market were found to be ineffective? If so, would he make a statement on motions regarding what action he is contemplating inasmuch as the same drugs are sold on the Canadian market?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, I am aware generally of the matter in the United States referred to by the hon. member. Although I have made a statement previously, I would be prepared to consider making another one later.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF SERVICE BETWEEN CANADA AND PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Are discussions or negotiations going on at the present time, or about to start, between Canada and mainland China with a view to having a Canadian air carrier establish a route to mainland China?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any such negotiations between the governments of China and Canada since in fact our respective diplomatic representatives are not yet in place. It is quite possible there will be. I have seen the speculative stories in the papers relating to one air carrier. The Canadian government has not yet made up its mind whether that would be the chosen instrument.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether there was any reference to the establishment of such a service, or a reciprocal one between mainland China and Canada, when the negotiations were taking place with regard to the exchange of diplomatic representation?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. Of course there were general assurances that we would want to promote intercourse between the two countries, but not other than that.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ACCELERATION OF HOUSING PROGRAM IN VIEW OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the abnormally high unemployment rate in Canada, particularly among our native Indian people, can the minister advise the House whether he has any plans to accelerate the housing program on Indian reserves this winter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this kind of information should be given to the House by way of a general statement. The minister might indicate whether he proposes to make a statement in this regard.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement about this matter. However, I might say to the hon. member that I have asked the officials of my department to hasten this project in order to supply Indians with employment this very winter, and we hope this program will be proceeded with more quickly than it has been anticipated.

[English]

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider giving priority to cases where few, if any, houses have been constructed during the last two years?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a suggestion which he must assume will be taken into account.

[Mr. MacLean.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—PROSPECTS FOR REACHING AGREEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the amount of press speculation concerning the possibility or probability of a basis of agreement being arrived at at the Prime Ministers' conference, is the minister in a position on the basis of the information he has to date, to assure the House that a reasonable prospect of agreement is apparent today?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been awaiting further information from Singapore about the course of events. I am not yet in a position to give a detailed answer, but it would seem to me from what we know that it appears that there will be a favourable outcome to the conference and that the Commonwealth, as both he and I wish, will be maintained.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am of course entirely in agreement with that objective. After that rather uncertain answer in respect of not having full information, is the minister in a position to say whether the basis of agreement will be in the terms of a declaration that is before the Prime Ministers' conference?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. I was referring particularly to the issue of South African arms.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF DAY-CARE CENTRE IN DOWNTOWN OTTAWA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Has he received representations from the Public Service Alliance of Canada requesting the establishment of a day-care centre in downtown Ottawa for the purpose of assisting members of the Public Service, and will he give favourable consideration to this representation having in mind the strong recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women on this subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member's question is in the form of a submission. To the extent that it is a question, I would not think it should be answered at this time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ASSISTANCE IN UNION-MANAGEMENT NEGOTIATIONS AT DUNLOP TIRE PLANT, WHITBY

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Has the federal Department of Labour taken any steps to offer assistance in the negotiations presently going on between union and management at the Dunlop plant in Whitby? I ask the question in full realization of the jurisdictional problems that may be involved.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has answered his question. Under the constitution of Canada this is a provincial matter, and I am sure the Department of Labour of Ontario is quite capable, under its very efficient deputy minister, of looking after their own particular problems.

REJECTION OF NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT BY CERTAIN RAILWAY SHOPCRAFT UNIONS

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Labour received a communication from the secretary of Local 1233 of the United Transportation Union in Edmonton expressing its satisfaction with present negotiations with the railways in Montreal? Is he also aware that the railway shopcraft unions have rejected the terms of the negotiated settlement, and what action is the department taking to avoid a potential strike?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that some of the craft unions have rejected the collective agreement that was submitted to their members for ratification. Other shopcrafts have accepted. Under the constitution of division No. 4, which is the collection of these craft unions, they are now going through what is known as the moratorium period of 30 days during which the craft unions meet to iron out internal differences of opinion concerning whether or not the proposed collective agreement between division No. 4 and the railways should be ratified.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION CHANGES IN NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND SHOPCRAFT UNIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent vote to which the minister has referred and in view of the dissension that has been created by the lack of inclusion of the pension changes recommended by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, would the minister say now whether or not he would personally intervene in the situation and try to get the railways to include this matter in the so-called bargaining process or accept some of the recommendations proposed by the committee?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the question of pensions in the recent negotiations between the shopcrafts and the railways is not at issue. They have opted to consider the whole question of pensions outside the process of collective bargaining.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Could he tell us if he has definitely abandoned the idea of making a substantial grant to the Sno-Jet Company in Thetford Mines as he promised to do during the by-election campaign in Frontenac riding, if this riding would elect the Liberal candidate?

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the expurgated question could be put on the order paper.

HIGHWAYS

MONTREAL—EAST-WEST EXPRESSWAY—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND OTTAWA

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Because of the importance of the project and of its effects on the employment situation in Montreal, could the minister make a statement in the House today in order to inform the public as to the provisions of the Quebec-Ottawa agreement concerning the East-West Highway in Montreal, and the use that will be made of the $68 million granted by the federal government. Otherwise, does the minister intend to table a detailed report on the matter in the House within the next few days?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Has the Quebec government indicated, or been required to indicate the minimum number of jobs which will be created with these $68 million, and whether the cost per job will be more than $5,000?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations have been carried out with the Department of Finance and not with mine.

[Later:]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, when I put my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, he indicated that it was the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. I think that the latter should be called upon to answer this very pressing question for the people of Montreal.

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I would simply refer the hon. member to yesterday's Hansard, page 2545, where I answered this question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion referred the question I asked him to the Minister of Finance for an answer. It is a very specific question concerning the minimum amount of employment that is going to be created by the $68 million to be applied to the auto route in Montreal. That is the question I asked and which was referred to the minister.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, again I point out that the question was answered yesterday at page 2545 of Hansard.

Mr. Valade: In that case—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIMINATION OF DELAY IN PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Would the minister get in touch with the heads of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and see if he can do something to cut, untie or burn the massive administrative red tape which is delaying the payment of unemployment insurance claims at the present time?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this question to the attention of the House because it is one that is receiving much publicity these days. I met with officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission this morning and found out that over 97 per cent of the claims are processed on time, which is a tremendous improvement over the situation two years ago. I know this is of little consolation to those involved in the 3 per cent of claims which are not always processed on time, but in 90 per cent of those cases the fault does not lie with the commission but with the employers or employees.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, would the minister have further consultation with the commission and find out what they mean by "on time"? There is a great difference of opinion on that matter.

USE OF IMPREST ACCOUNTS BY OFFICES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. In regard to those cases where delay has been caused by errors made by the officials in the unemployment insurance offices, would the minister not consider giving these offices an imprest account on which they could write cheques immediately rather than have to go through the area offices?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is a very helpful one. It is being considered in light of the new legislation coming forward, and particularly closer relations with the welfare officers in many communities. It might be of interest to the House to know that last year we took to court and prosecuted 186 employers who callously held up the records of their employees, presumably causing intentional hardship to their employees. We have not hesitated to take legal action and have prosecuted—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TORONTO—REPORTED DELAY IN PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. I asked him several days ago if he would look into the situation in Toronto, which was widely reported in the Toronto press, concerning delays in the payment of claims. Has he looked into these cases, and what is the result?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into these cases and I would rather table the report or perhaps make a statement on motions later in the week. The hon. gentleman is quite familiar with the co-operation that is usually extended to him, particularly in his own riding, by officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and I know he would be the last in the House to complain about their efficiency.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the way that the minister has usually handled these cases. That is why I found it hard to understand the delays in Toronto.

INDUSTRY

MAINTENANCE OF OPERATION OF McBEAN COAL MINE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he advise the House of the results of the meeting he had a few days ago with the Nova Scotia mines minister with a view to keeping the McBean coal mine in operation? May I also ask the minister whether he shares the view expressed by the Nova Scotia mines minister, namely, that he is totally behind the idea of keeping this mine open?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is no decision in that regard yet. As the hon. member knows, the Donald report indicated that the McBean mine was not economically viable. With the increase in coal prices it may be that that decision should be reviewed. My department is in the process of considering the representations made by the Minister of Mines from Nova Scotia at the present time.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the mine is scheduled to be closed in March, and in view of the fact that every second person in the Atlantic region is unemployed at the moment, will the minister do his utmost to see that this mine continues to operate?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSURANCE THAT INDIA HAS NOT PRODUCED WEAPON-GRADE PLUTONIUM

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he now in a position to reply to my question of last Thursday, January 14, when I asked for an assurance that India has not produced weapon-grade plutonium since the Canada-India reactor was supplied in 1960?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the 1956 Canada-India agreement for the provision of a nuclear research reactor the Indian government pledged that the reactor and the products resulting from its use would be used for peaceful purposes only. We have no evidence to suggest that the Indian government is not standing firm on the assurances it has given to Canada.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware of the article by John Gellner in which he alleges that there is such a stockpile—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPORT ON BUSINESS OUTLOOK IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It relates partly to the rosy picture which he and other ministers have painted during the past couple of days about employment possibilities. Has he seen a report which I received today from the government of the province of British Columbia about that province's business outlook for 1971, which points out that of 300 businessmen surveyed 65 per cent say there is going to be no improvement in employment this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the minister whether he has seen a certain report. A question in those terms is not quite acceptable.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rephrase the question. Has the provincial government been in communication with the minister pointing out these facts?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

PARTICIPATION OF WHEAT BOARD COMMISSIONERS AND FARM ORGANIZATION REPRESENTATIVES IN NEGOTIATIONS ON NEW INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat

Board. Can the minister inform the House whether or not commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board and representatives of various Prairie farm organizations are assisting in the current negotiations at Geneva which it is hoped will lead to an acceptable new international wheat agreement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Two commissioners will be attending the meetings in Geneva in connection with these negotiations, and a group of leaders of farm organizations is also attending as part of the delegation.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate whether any Canadian cabinet ministers will be present at some time during these negotiations in Geneva?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, at the present time there is no intention to turn these negotiations into a ministerial meeting.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR NEW INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—CANADIAN POSITION ON GIFTS TO NEEDY COUNTRIES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that gifts of wheat to needy countries may be curtailed under a new world wheat pact, which would adversely affect Canada's export position, can the minister indicate to the House the position the Canadian delegation is taking with respect to this development in the current talks under way at Geneva designed to draw up a new world wheat pact?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Of course, Mr. Speaker, no conclusion has been arrived at with regard to what will be contained in any new agreement. The Canadian position with regard to food aid is so very strong and clear in favour of food aid that there is no doubt about our advocating the inclusion of such terms in any agreement at any time.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

AGREEMENT RESPECTING PAYMENT OF OVERTIME OUTSIDE CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. At the time the Department of Labour, Devco and the unions involved mutually agreed on an extension of time respecting the application of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code regarding overtime, was there any agreement arrived at respecting payment for overtime work outside that laid down by the Canada Labour (Standards) Code?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would have to qualify my answer by asking the hon. member to give me the right to verify my facts later today. I have not been fully aware of the matter, but normally if there had been any exemption with respect to the application of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code to Devco it would have been the result of a joint request by management and labour and not only by management.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the minister has only repeated in his answer what I put in my question. I said there was a mutual agreement between the Department of Labour, Devco and the unions involved, but what I am asking the minister is whether, outside of the regulations laid down in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, there was any arrangement respecting payment for overtime?

Mr. Mackasey: I would have to take the question as notice and find out.

Mr. MacInnis: As a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a further supplementary, but we are running short of time.

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER—AMENDMENTS AFFECTING IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Some weeks before Christmas I asked him about the possible date of publication or tabling of the white paper on immigration and also for an indication regarding amendments to the Act concerning the Immigration Appeal Board. He indicated that this would be done soon in the new year. Could he tell us how much closer we are to that date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are closer by the amount of time that has elapsed.

Some hon. Members: Oh , oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in answering that question the minister has bitten just as he should bite. Will he now be more precise and indicate whether we are to see the legislation before Easter or is it going to come before us just before the June adjournment?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I hope that it will be forthcoming earlier rather than later. Of course, many things have to be considered, including the whole question of the very important other business before the House.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. S. J. I wonder whether, in promoting this event, he has yet had an opportunity to obtain his $2 ticket? I have one available if he wants it.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Following the reported meeting of the minister and the Manitoba Minister of Agriculture and provincial officials, can the minister tell the House if there was any undertaking to make any new commitments with regard to the proposed stabilization plan other than the proposed transfer of moneys paid under the present Temporary Wheat Reserves Act? Also, does the minister intend to have meetings with the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there were no new commitments and nothing in the form of a final decision. I think the discussions were, as ever, very useful. We propose to have meetings with all the Ministers of Agriculture of the Prairie provinces together on some occasion. I think the date has now been set. I am also prepared to meet with them individually whenever this may seem to be helpful.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROJECTS, ADVANCES FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Northern Canada Power Commission is a Crown corporation operating under the authority of an act of Parliament known as "an act respecting the supplying of electrical power and other public utilities in northern Canada".

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the Parliamentary Secretary should begin by misleading the House. I do not charge him with doing this intentionally. The NCPC is not a Crown corporation, but a Crown agency.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. That is not a point of order. I suspect that the hon. member will be taking part in the debate. He may want to make the point at that time.

Mr. Buchanan: Created in 1948 as the Northwest Territories Power Commission, its name was changed and its operations expanded by an amendment in 1956. The commission is empowered to survey utility requirements and to construct and operate public utility plants in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory. The act provides that the commission is responsible to and subject to the direction of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the governor in council. In particular, the rates charged the general public by the commission are subject to approval by the governor in council. In addition to the commission's facilities, there are small government-owned installations in the north operated by departments of the federal government or by the territorial government which supply power to airports and smaller communities throughout the territories.

The federal government, largely through the Northern Canada Power Commission, owns approximately 75 per cent of the generating capacity in the north, with 10 per cent being controlled by three private utility companies and 15 per cent being controlled and operated by private organizations primarily associated with mining operations. During its first fiscal year of operation, the commission's operating budget totalled approximately $231,000. Consistent with growth in the north, the commission's operating budget this year will exceed $10 million. In the ten-year period 1961 to 1970, the generation of electric power by the commission has more than tripled, from 120 million to 383 million kilowatt hours. In 1961 the commission operated 10 plants; today it operates 22 plants in 20 locations. During this period gross revenue has increased from $3 million to $9.7 million. It can therefore be said that the commission has kept pace with northern growth. In these exciting days of northern development, the commission finds itself on the threshold of a new and accelerated period of expansion.

The private utility companies in the north are mainly involved in retailing power to a number of communities and do relatively little generation of power. These private companies are virtually free to set their own rates. At present there are no territorial utilities commissions in operation which would be responsible for regulating their rate-setting practices and reviewing their profit margins. In the Northwest Territories a territorial ordinance was passed in 1963 authorizing the establishment of a public utilities board, but this board has not yet been set up. A similar ordinance died on the other paper of the Yukon Council in 1968.

The Yukon Electrical Company Ltd. is a private utility company concerned with the generation and distribution of power in the Yukon. In 1958 the company became a wholly-owned subsidiary of Canadian Utilities Limited which is currently controlled by International Utilities Corporation. As of January, 1969, the Yukon Electrical Company distributed power to 2,642 of the Yukon's 3,000 domestic customers, and to 741 of the 925 commercial and industrial consoumers. Gross commercial power generation in the Yukon in 1968 amounted to about 103 million kilowatt hours, 90 per cent of which was generated by the Northren Canada Power Commission. The Yukon Electric Company Ltd. registered sales of 55 million kilowatt hours in 1968, of which 46 million kilowatt hours were purchased from the NCPC at wholesale rates for subsequent distribution.

In the Northwest Territories, Plains Western Gas and Electric Company Ltd. distributes NCPC-generated power in Yellowknife under a franchise granted by the city of Yellowknife. The company has no generation or transmission facilities of its own. Northland Utilities Ltd., also controlled by International Utilities Ltd., operates generating and distribution facilities in three communities in the Northwest Territories—Hay River, Fort Providence and Enterprise. Northland Utilities Ltd. accounts for approximately 6 per cent of the territories' commercial electricity production. As in the Yukon, the bulk of commercial generating capacity in the Northwest Territories is currently being supplied by the Northern Canada Power Commission.

The act we are considering today, Mr. Speaker, was last amended in 1956. It is being amended at this time so that the commission can adopt a more flexible approach in meeting northern needs and in planning future long-term power development in both territories. The proposed amendments are as follows—: One, to increase the number of commission members by two. Two, to change the amount of the investigation or studies' fund from $50,000 to $250,000. Three, to allow the commission to set regional rates rather than to charge on the basis of individual plants costs. Four, to allow the commission to defer repayments of principal and interest where new capacity is in excess of immediate demands. Five, to eliminate the requirement that the commission obtain governor in council approval to undertake any project or enter into any contract in excess of $50,000.

The first amendment deals with commission membership. At the present time the commission consists of a chairman and two members appointed during pleasure by the governor in council on recommendation of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Appointments have traditionally been made from within the public service. There is a continuing requirement for close liaison and co-ordination with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as well as with other departments, particularly the Department of Finance and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Therefore, I believe that this practice should continue in the foreseeable future for those three members.

The minister had stated on several occasions that there is a need to involve northern residents to the fullest extent in the developments that are now taking place and will continue to take place on a steadily increasing scale in the years ahead. It is proposed at this time to increase the membership from three to five in order to provide for appointment of a member from each of the northern territories. These appointments will be made on the recommendation of the commissioner in council of each territory. They will allow the commission to benefit from the local knowledge which such members will bring to it. In this way the commission will be more closely related to the territorial councils and will be more readily responsive to the requirements of the residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I believe this to be of the greatest importance at this time in the development of northern Canada.

The second amendment is with regard to advances for investigations. Section 14(1) of the act now provides $50,000 as a fund for the purpose of meeting expenditures incurred by the commission in carrying out engineering and other studies in accordance with section 13 of the act. This amount is being increased to $250,000 to permit studies and investigations more in keeping with the growing scale of development projects in both territories.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The Northern Canada Power Commission, under the present terms of the act, is bound to set rates which will ensure that individual plants in each locality, no matter how small, are operated on a self-sustaining basis. Consequently, rates changed by the commission for utilities supplied must provide sufficient revenue to cover all costs attributed by the commission to that plant, including interest on investment, repayment of principal over a period of years, operating and maintenance expenses and a contingency reserve.

This rate structure is too restrictive in light of the present and future size of the commission's operations. The proposed amendment would allow more flexibility in setting rates. Most provincial utilities already enjoy some similar measure of flexibility. Rather than operating each plant on a self-sustaining basis, the commission would in future be allowed to base its rates on regional costs and to work toward some measure of rate equalization where this is felt to be desirable. Thus, the commission would be permitted to take regional differences into account, to consider the system's energy links and to preserve equity in establishing rates within natural areas and power grid zones.

It is a well-known fact that transmission lines and grids have no territorial boundaries. It is essential for the orderly development of the north that administrative boundaries do not prevent efficient and sensible steps being taken to help both territories. By encouraging the interchange of electricity the commission can take full advantage of economies of scale within the north's three major economic regions—the Yukon, the Mackenzie and the eastern high Arctic. Also, there is and most likely will always be a mutual benefit to both territories by reason of electrical interconnection between the two. A power plant in the Yukon may be generating energy which is consumed in the Northwest Territories and, conceivably, in the adjacent provinces to the south.

Mr. Speaker, It should always be remembered that the Northern Canada Power Commission is a public corporation operating in the public interest and bringing the benefits of low-interest borrowing and profit-free power to northerners. The commission does not seek a profit. It seeks to provide power at the most economical cost to its customers, three of whom are private distributing utilities. Therefore, its rates are based on costs. It is only logical that they be averaged within the regions and that there be some latitude to average costs throughout the system without excessive subsidies to high-cost regions at the expense of low-cost areas. This requires that the commission be given latitude, and the proposed amendments are designed to provide that latitude. However, the commission's schedule of rates will still remain subject to approval by the governor in council.

Also, the presence of territorial representatives on the commission, the minister's accountability to Parliament for the commission's activities, and the continual and close scrutiny of the Auditor General, provide the necessary safeguards. Power being produced and distributed by the public sector in the north will continue to serve the public interest. Further scrutiny by a board or committee responsible to the minister would, therefore, appear to be unnecessary as far as the commission is concerned.

I turn, now, to advances for capital expenditures. In developing power for relatively small markets it is sometimes necessary to build a plant which has capacity not immediately usable. A dam which will generate more power than can be used immediately might work at half load, for example. Such a situation would result in very high power rates under the present law. The amendments before us would allow deferral of part of the capital investment until load has increased to take up the capacity. Such deferral would require the approval of the governor in council.

Currently, the commission is required under section 16(3) of the act to commence payments of both principal and interest immediately following completion of a project, except that the principal portion of the first two instalments, which usually are relatively small amounts at that stage, may be deferred. In the Yukon, for example, extensive studies carried out over the past four years indicate that a large capacity power site may be required to enable orderly development and economic stability in the long-term supply of electrical energy. The only sites which offer long-term price stability are those which involve a relatively high capital cost for initial development.

The commission's capacity additions over the past few years have been based on a low capital cost consistent with dependability during the period of gradual load growth so as to cater to this concept of larger capacity installations. The addition of one or two large-scale mining developments, however, would triple or quadruple present power demand in the Yukon and would likely justify the initial development of a least one large scale installation within the next five years.

In connection with the approval of contracts, section 6(3) of the act requires the commission to obtain the approval of the governor in council to undertake any project or enter into any contract in excess of $50,000. While the proposed amendment to the act would delete section 6(3), the commission would still be subject to government contracts regulations under the Financial Administration Act, which limit entry into contracts without Treasury Board approval to $100,000 for construction contracts and $50,000 for purchase contracts. Thus, there will still be adequate review by Treasury Board of contracts entered into by Northern Canada Power Commission.

I wish to deal, now, Mr. Speaker with the question of surplus funds. Any surpluses or profits generated remain with the Northern Canada Power Commission system to the ultimate benefit of its consumers. Thus, profits are not drained off as a source of revenue to the federal government nor to other parts outside the north. Surplus funds may now be held for six months, after which time the commission may reduce rates or use surplus funds for the expansion or improvement of that plant in respect to which such surplus funds accrued.

Under the proposed amendments, surplus funds could be used to benefit the entire system rather than the individual plant in respect to which such surplus funds accrued. Again, the objective is flexibility. However, I should insert a few words of explanation as well as of caution here. There is a tendency to think that rate equalization will lead to two results. First, that rates in the smaller, higher-cost communities will be lowered by applying surpluses earned in the larger, more profitable communities until rates are equal across the board. Second, that the more industrialized regions in the west will be expected to carry much of the cost of supplying service to the eastern Arctic. If applied without thought or planning, this could be the outcome, but this approach will not be taken.

The policy of the commission will be to set rates on a regional basis with the Yukon and Northwest Territories regions, possibly encompassing areas beyond their political boundaries but within their economic development zone. Thus, consumers in Whitehorse or Yellowknife, for example, will not directly support the cost of electricity in communities literally thousands of miles away.

The precise boundaries of the regions should be left to the commission to determine. This will be one of the more important contributions that the new territorial members will be able to make. It must also be recognized that flexibility must be maintained so that extensive areas of the north can take advantage of the future development of large generating facilities capable of serving and, indeed, requiring the markets of more than one region.

I must also caution against great expectations or great apprehensions. As in southern Canada, rate equalization cannot be taken to the extreme and a uniform rate set throughout a whole region. Consumers in a lower-cost community expect to receive, and indeed should receive, part of the cost benefit available. Thus, the rates in a larger community will not be increased by any substantial amount—indeed, in some cases it may not be necessary to increase them at all—while those in the smaller communities should not expect their rates to come tumbling down. There will be reductions possible in some regions, but do not expect miracles. I want to emphasize that the policy of regional rates will be applied in a sensible and fair manner. Some of the extreme suggestions already made about this new approach are gross exaggerations of the manner in which the commission will carry out its responsibilities to the public.

The commission's annual report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1970, showed a total surplus of $1.19 million. The bulk of these surplus funds resulted from operations of the Whitehorse plant which commenced supplying the Anvil Mine with electrical energy in August, 1969. Under section 16(2)(a) of the act, repayment of principal and interest need not be commenced until the year following completion of a capital budget, and in the case of Whitehorse it was decided not to commence repayment of the loan—$10 million for the addition of new generating capacity and transmission facilities—until this year. The surplus has been delegated to surplus and contingency funds, consistent with good financial management practice, wherein it will be available for further plant improvement.

Consideration was given to applying a portion of this surplus to effect a rate reduction to customers, in this case the Yukon Electrical Company. However, part of this surplus will be required in the near future to provide peaking capacity and other plant improvements. It was therefore decided to delay action in this regard until the situation became a little more clear. There would be little point in lowering rates by what would be a relatively small amount, only to have to set them back at the old level within a short time.

The commission's record of rate reductions over the years deserves to be mentioned. In 1958, when the Whitehorse hydro plant began operating, the commission sold power to its customers at a wholesale price of 2½ cents per kilowatt hour. Successive rate reductions have brought the commission's price down to 1¼ cents per kilowatt hour, exactly one-half of the original wholesale price.

The Northern Canada Power Commission is one of the important instruments of development in the north. It also ensures that as far as practicable power costs to domestic, commercial and industrial customers are at the lowest possible level. By providing electric power at cost, the commission serves to encourage both better living standards for our northern residents and to help in promoting orderly commercial and industrial development.

The government's commitment to northern development is again borne out by the fact that the Northern Canada Power Commission has supplied power to all major resource undertakings north of 60. These include Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines, Discovery Mines, the Imperial Oil refinery at Norman Wells, Pine Point Mines, United Keno Hill Mines, and the Anvil Mine. Possible new power loads to developments now under study include Casino Mines, Kerr Addison Mines, Hudson's Bay Mining and Smelting, Cadillac Exploration, Cassiar Asbestos and the building of oil and gas pipelines along the Mackenzie River. The commission's position in the northern power field is underlined by the value of its capital assets at a cost of $60 million, and by the fact that it generates over 75 per cent of all hydroelectric power in both territories.

The government is well aware that power planning must take environmental factors into account. Thermal power does create air pollution. Hydro power developments alter the natural terrain. Every proposed development must be weighed against the alternatives, and the selection of a development plant must take environmental factors into account. The Northern Canada Power Commission will be considering these factors when making its decisions.

Providing sufficient northern power in the years ahead will require innovative thinking, effective management and the development of high capital cost generating capacity. This will most likely be in the form of hydroelectric plants and associated high voltage transmission lines. The commission is aware of future requirements and is developing plans accordingly. The publicly-owned sector of the utilities industry—which in northern Canada, as I have indicated, is by far the larger segment—must also be service-oriented and responsive to the needs of the people and industries it serves. Hence, the commission's concern with development in the years ahead must be matched by an equal concern for the welfare of northern residents and the protection of northern lands and waters.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, when I saw the minister in the House this afternoon I thought he was here for the purpose of dealing with a very important piece of legislation, the bill now before the House which appears obstensibly to be rather innocuous but is far-reaching in its effect. Instead—and I mean to cast no personal reflection on the Parliamentary Secretary—the minister has left a boy to do a man's job, a member who has simply read by rote from a speech that had been prepared for him, obviously not by any member of the commission for they know that the NCPC is not a Crown corporation but a Crown agency whose chairman is the deputy minister of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. So that is the first correction that has to be made.

I was going to ask the Parliamentary Secretary for a copy of the speech from which he read but, as is usually the case when anything is being said by the NCPC or on its behalf either in this place or in committee, it is so utterly devoid of facts as to be absolutely useless. But even more seriously, it is grossly misleading to the members of the House who have to consider this legislation.

The Parliamentary Secretary has attempted to explain small plant losses. He has attempted to explain why the amendments are being brought forward to deal with the surpluses that are now required to be applied to the benefit of the individual plants—and until recently those surpluses were very few. He has informed the House for the first time, notwithstanding the very detailed examination of the officials of NCPC in committee in 1969, and notwithstanding the sidestepping on innumerable occasions by the minister, the general manager of NCPC and the deputy minister, who also wears the hat of chairman of the commission, that the commission, the government is going to adopt a policy of rate equalization, a question the answer to which was asked by northerners everywhere.

The Parliamentary Secretary has also been very sketchy in tracing the history of the NCPC, and what tracing there was has been inaccurate. Neither has he traced the history of private capital investment in power generation and distribution in the north. He said the NCPC was established in 1948 and that at that time its activities were confined to the construction of generating and distributing facilities in the Northwest Territories. Because a specific need had to be fulfilled in the Yukon, namely, the supply of power to United Keno Hill Mines Limited, which for several years had supplied its own power and was until recently the richest silver mine on the North American continent, the NCPC decided to have the act amended to permit the commission to construct this facility in the Yukon. I believe that amendment was made in 1952.

The hon. gentleman also inaccurately stated that the commission's activities are confined to northern Canada. They are not confined to areas above the 60th parallel. Of the 20 locations at which the commission operates, one is in northern British Columbia, at Field, and another is in northern Saskatchewan at Moose Factory. There are three locations in the Yukon at which the NCPC operates, namely, Dawson City, Mayo and Whitehorse. All the remaining generation and distribution facilities of the commission are in the Northwest Territories.

I shall have a few words to say in a moment about rate equalization and what that means to Yukoners as well as what the policy of this government means in terms of creating out of the area above the 60th parallel a vast experiment in state socialism; but for the moment may I rectify and set straight some of the omissions and inaccuracies in the material from which the Parliamentary Secretary read.

According to the evidence of the then chairman of the commission at the time the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development was examining the commission's estimates in 1949, the NCPC was created for the purpose of generating and distributing electrical power in places where private investment was either unwilling or unable to go. This is a very important criterion, one that has been omitted from the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary. So apart from the installation at Mayo to assist the specific mine at Elsa, the commission had no other installation in the Yukon. The act was amended to enable the commission to supply electrical energy to communities that were being supplied by the Department of National Defence, the Department of Transport and other agencies.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

• (3:30 p.m.)

It was not until 1958, some six years later and ten years after the advent of the NCPC, that the commission decided to build that dam because of the power needs of the area which could not be handled by the Yukon Electrical Company, which at that time was still in the hands of the descendants of the original incorporators of that company in 1901 as a private enterprise. The NCPC sat on its hands for all that time. Even after 1958, when the Whitehorse plant was established, not until a year and a half ago did the commission awaken to the fact that development was occurring in the Yukon and the time was ripe to come in and skim off the cream.

So we in the Yukon waited from 1948 until 1968, 20 years, for the NCPC to do this job. There were communities at Old Crow, Keno City, Stewart Crossing, Pelly River, Carmacks, Beaver Creek, Burwash Landing, Destruction Bay, Haines Junction, Carcross, Teslin, Watson Lake and Lower Post all waiting for this government-established agency to go in where private capital investment was either unwilling or unable to go.

The Yukon Electrical Company was acquired, as the Parliamentary Secretary has said, by Canadian Utilities through a purchase in the late 1960s. It went into each and everyone of these communities. There are power-generating facilities established there, with power being distributed by the same company that is generating the power. The NCPC had an opportunity when Keno City was up for grabs and knew about the intention to sell out to the Yukon Electrical Company. Then, all of a sudden, the NCPC generated a good deal of interest.

When the Parliamentary Secretary plays down the role of investment capital in this fashion, by not mentioning the extent to which in terms of dollars—some $250 million—private enterprise has gone into the power-generating field in the Yukon Territories, he does this House a disservice. I am sure this was not intentional, because he was not reading his own material but was just distributing facts to this House. The truth of the matter is that the NCPC and its officials were dragging their butts. They did not know anything more about northern development than they could see from this distance, as is usually the case. I feel very sorry for the hon. member in that he was making sounds precisely like those that might be made about the Yukon and Northwest Territories, in terms of development, by a person who lives in Toronto or somewhere else. He certainly is not acquainted with the real facts of northern development.

Let me place in proper perspective some of the statistics he put on record. He spoke of rate equalization and he lumped together, as is the policy of this government, the two territories in the north for state administrative convenience. There is a role to play in the development of this country, particularly in the development of our northern areas, for private enterprise capital. I am not one who believes—I think I am speaking for every member of this party—that investment capital should be dried up and frightened away by state control of development processes. This is precisely what is happening.

The same story can be told of the Northern Transportation Company, which also comes under the minister's responsibility. The same story can be told of the formation of Eldorado Aviation. During the war years, the formation of these two companies was essential because they were producing a strategic mineral, uranium, and there was no other way the product could be transported to market. I well remember the debates in the committee which considered the continued usefulness of the Northern Transportation Company, I believe in 1958, and the continued operation of Eldorado Aviation.

At that time the functions and operations of the Northern Transportation Company could have been assumed by a private entrepreneur. They had expended considerable investment capital in providing that transportation service. They could have purchased the government-owned Northern Transportation Company. That is not what happened. The private enterprise was gobbled up with the support of the huge financial coffers of the federal government.

Pacific Western Airlines offered to purchase the assets and operations of Eldorado Aviation. I cannot understand why, in this world of today when investment capital is being spoken of by the government as being continually encouraged, there should be an Eldorado Aviation Company at all, with private enterprise willing to assume the task that is being discharged by this company, supported by the Canadian tax dollar. That is precisely what will happen here. In spite of the assurances which the Parliamentary Secretary read, rate equalization will not mean that the rates of large consumers in one area of the north, as he was pleased to describe them, will be applied to loss leaders in other areas of the north. That is precisely what will happen.

If we look at the financial statements of the commission for 1966-67 and subsequent years, we will find that the profits the commission made on the Whitehorse operation paid off the losses on the whole system. When the Parliamentary Secretary refers in a very casual way to the extent of these profits in the Yukon, let me remind the House that in the 1969-70 fiscal year this income amounted to $828,853. This exceeded by almost 600 per cent any other producer, including Pine Point.

Let me put it in percentage terms and tell the House that the income on the Whitehorse operation alone, given only eight months of operation, increased by 600 per cent and the sales increased by 100 per cent. Yet the Parliamentary Secretary stands here and reads to us that it is not the intention of the commission or the government to apply these profits to the losses on other parts of the system. That is rubbish; that is precisely where the profits will be applied. We in the Yukon ask: Why should the Whitehorse consumer pay for the loss in Frobisher Bay because of government extravagances there? Why should Whitehorse consumers pay for losses in Inuvik and Cambridge Bay? Why should they have this burden, any more than the residents of British Columbia should have the burden of supporting equalization in Nova Scotia? It should be done with tax dollars, but not with the consumers' payments for electric power in Whitehorse or anywhere else where the system is making a profit.

That was precisely the reason for writing in the original legislation that each plant should be self-sustaining. That was a good, sensible principle then and there is no reason why it should not continue to be a good principle. Every year, in respect of the estimates of consumption the explanation given was that the plants were to operate on a businesslike basis. If they were suffering losses because of the nature of the business of the company, or if they were required to supply electrical energy to an area of Canada where private enterprise capital was unwilling or unable to go, the losses should be picked up by the general tax dollar. I submit it would be grossly unfair to the Canadian who lives in Whitehorse and who pays the same taxes as everybody else to add to his burden the tax which would be necessary in order to carry the losses of a government operation in other parts of the country.

When we look at the gross picture for the Yukon it becomes very obvious that with the exception of Whitehorse—I ask hon. members to refer to the 1969-70 financial picture—all other points served by the facilities of NCPC maintain in a general way the same profit or loss position which they had in the previous year. I have already pointed out that the Whitehorse operation had a 600 per cent gain in net income and a 100 per cent increase in sales. When examining the figures it is interesting to note that even in respect of the Talston River, Pine Point, system the commission realizes the same percentage of profit on sales as in the Yukon. It would seem to me this must be due to the fact that the major income of that system is coming from a mine, and hence the selling price of the energy has been priced as low as possible.

I charge that the officials of the NCPC have been aided and abetted by a succession of commission chairmen who have been deputy ministers of the department. These chairmen have been deliberately misleading in respect of the evidence they have adduced before the committee and the evidence they have supplied to their respective ministers. There can be only one motivation for this kind of evasiveness or this kind of misleading on their part. The motivation is that they want private capital out of the north so far as power-generating facilities are concerned. Private investment wants to know one thing, that is, whether it is wanted there. This is precisely what they asked at the hearings in 1969. Again, the answer was evasive. They want to know whether their capital is welcome in development efforts in the north, because if not they will put it somewhere else. This is what one of the officials of Yukon Electrical asked when he appeared before the committee. Did he receive an answer? He did not.

In the past two years, like other hon. members, I have received the annual report of the northern Canada Power Commission. In addition, I have asked for the comprehensive financial statements of the commission. These become available at the end of March in each year. The financial statement was delayed for months before I got it. If the amendments to this act are passed, members will never see that kind of statement again in respect of the operations of this company. I challenge the Parliamentary Secretary to gainsay me on that. Right now we know the plant is operating at a profit in some locations and at a loss in others. Right now we know the rates charged to government installations at these various locations, compared with the rates charged the ordinary user. Right now we know that the profits from one location are being applied to pick up the losses on the whole system.

The government, through the Parliamentary Secretary, has asked us to believe that real equalization will not be applied except on a regional basis, and that the profits from large consumer areas will not be applied to pick up the losses of the smaller consumer areas. I would assume that when he uses the term "regional", he means geographic region. He certainly would not want to include an area embracing places in the Keewatin, the Mackenzie and the Yukon in order to make up the region.

If that should be the case I ask how, in all that is reasonable, is the NCPC—if it has to take the whole eastern Arctic region—to become a profitable producer, especially when its operations are continually broken up into projects like Frobisher and Cambridge. One has only to look at the financial statements to realize that such an assertion is as hollow as it is foolish. It does not seem realistic that places such as Inuvik, Frobisher and Cambridge, which are mainly creations of the federal government, should be supported by the consumers of Whitehorse. That is precisely what will happen.

It should be government policy that these plants be supported by the taxpayers of Canada as a whole. That was the original concept of the act, and conditions in the north have not changed so as to justify any alteration of that concept. All that has changed is that they have a pretty viable economic unit now in the Yukon, whereas there was only one mine producing at the time the NCPC went into Mayo. Even the much vaunted Mr. Carr of the royal commission and his colleagues who studied the economic prospects of the Yukon in 1968 grossly underestimated the growth of the territory when they said its mineral production in 1975 would reach the level it has reached this year. That is the reason the NCPC is there.

The Parliamentary Secretary mentioned Anvil Mining Corporation. Let me tell the House about events there. Upon realizing that the officials of NCPC and the department had better get in and skim off the cream of the operation and establish a solid base for state-owned power in the Yukon, it was decided that when dealing with the officials of Cyprus Mine and the major shareholders of Anvil Mining Corporation, in addition to other federal aid granted to bring that mining operation into production they should have federal assistance in respect of access roads and other facilities in order to supply power. That was the decision the government made. It was not a decision made by Anvil Mining Corporation or by Cyprus. Indeed, I strongly suspect, although I have no evidence for putting it forward as a fact, that the government said to Anvil at that time, "We will provide the monetary aid you need in order to come into production, in keeping with our general developmental policy in the north, provided you will take your power from NCPC."

The government had to do that because there was private enterprise in the area willing to do it. Although it may be difficult to obtain an admission in this regard from officials of the NCPC or from the deputy minister, the Yukon Electrical Company, before that decision was made by government, said, "We are prepared to build the generation and the distribution facilities to supply electrical energy to this mining operation," and the government said, "No, we are going to do it." Yukon Electrical then said, "Let us bid, and see who will do it at the lowest cost," and the government said, "No, we are going to do it." Yukon Electrical then said, "Let us bid on the basis of rates. Perhaps we can supply it at a lower rate than NCPC". Again the government said, "No, we are going to do it regardless of the cost."

The same story can be told of the events that led to the acquisition by the Northern Canada Power Commission of the facilities in Dawson City. Again an offer was made to the government by Yukon Electrical to take over those facilities and to provide power at a rate less than that now being charged to the consumers in Dawson City. The Parliamentary Secretary read from his script that the intention of NCPC is to supply power at the lowest possible rate. Tell that to the people of Dawson City, where private enterprise, had it been allowed to go ahead, would be supplying power to the consumers at a rate lower than they are being charged today. The Parliamentary Secretary speaks about rate reductions as though the commission is being extremely magnanimous in passing on these rate reductions. Let me tell the House that every single rate reduction made to the distributor in Whitehorse has been passed on to the consumer and, further, that Yukon Electrical have applied their own rate reductions to the consumer despite none being given by NCPC.

In committee we heard the argument of the deputy minister, John MacDonald, who said that NCPC can supply power at less cost to the consumer than private enterprise. I asked him, "How do you know?" His answer was, "We don't have the attendant cost of borrowing money." Mr. Speaker, the assets of NCPC are in the neighbourhood of $60 million, but the assets of the International Utility Company, which is the controlling shareholder of Yukon Electrical Company, are in the order of $250 million. Yet the deputy minister had the audacity to say in committee that private enterprise is not capable of raising the capital to establish these facilities in the Yukon and in the north generally. Again, that is rubbish. Let me also inform hon. members of the House that the Yukon Electrical Company, through its new majority shareholders, offered to buy the whole of the plant and generating facilities of the commission in the Yukon at one fell swoop. Again, naturally, they were refused.

I am now directing my submissions to the House to the relative merits of private, investor-owned utilities as opposed to public utilities in the north. It is all very well for the government, with great fanfare, as the minister is wont to do, to announce all these schemes which offer incentives for the development of northern resources and to hold out his arms in an embracive fashion and say, "We welcome foreign investment capital." Indeed, he takes trips to Europe to try to raise investment capital to plunge into Canada's north. In effect, the government says to International Utilities, "We want investment capital, but we do not want any of your $250 million to help develop power because we are going to do it ourselves and we will charge the consumer a great deal more."

For the first time, Mr. Speaker, from the notes of the Parliamentary Secretary we have an indication that there is to be no review board. His notes say there is no real reason to have a review board because there is to be an expanded commission of five members, including one representative from the Yukon and one from the Northwest Territories. I submit to the House that whether a utility is owned by the private sector or by the public sector, there is an increasing demand by the consuming public that the utility's activities, particularly the rates of suppliers and generators, be subjected to the decisions and reviews of a public utilities board.

That position was taken very recently in the province of Ontario by the resigning Premier. Here I refer to a report in the Globe and Mail of just a month or so ago, where Mr. Robarts was quoted as saying with regard to a recent Ontario rate increase that his government was looking for an appropriate forum to review rates, but he added that no decision had been made on whether the review body would have authority to reject planned increases. Unlike what is written in the notes of the Parliamentary Secretary, I urge that regardless of the outcome of this debate, regardless of what hon. members' views might be as to public versus private utilities in the north or anywhere else, there should be established a public utilities board to review rates. There is no reason why that board should not be established forthwith.

The excuse that is made in the notes of the Parliamentary Secretary is that the Yukon Territorial Council rejected an ordinance which was placed before them in 1968, which would have set up a public utilities review board. The reason they did not agree to this was not explained to the House by the Parliamentary Secretary, as is usual with the kind of evasion prepared by people who write nonsense like that read to us by the Parliamentary Secretary. The reason was that the proposed body was to be too confined. What the people of the Yukon wanted, as expressed through the Territorial Council, was a public utilities commission similar to that which operates in the province of British and the province of Alberta. It is essential that any electric utility, including Yukon Electrical, Northern Canada Power Commission and Plains Western in the Northwest Territories, be subjected to regulatory processes. The introduction of such a review board would provide protection to the residents of the Northwest Territories and of the Yukon.

I am sure no one would be too disturbed if it were proposed that the commission be allowed to pool the revenues in the Yukon to the benefit of the Yukon consumer, no more than my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories would object if revenues generated by the NCPC were applied for the benefit of the Northwest Territories. That sort of principle and that sort of application will not meet objection. I do not think anyone in the Yukon would object to rate equalization in the Yukon, any more than anyone in the Northwest Territories would object to the same kind of principle. But we do object to the government continually, by its policy, lumping us together for the purpose of bureaucratic or administrative expediency.

We object to revenues generated in one territory being applied to the benefit of the other, just as the citizens of British Columbia would object to revenues arising from the consumers of that province being applied to the benefit of the province of Manitoba, Quebec, or other places. If the notes of the Parliamentary Secretary mean what they say, namely, that the revenues from the Yukon are not to be applied against losses in the Northwest Territories, it would be a simple matter to write this into the act now. Consumers ought to have that assurance.

It is interesting to note, too, that the Parliamentary Secretary's notes speak of certain northern developments. This merely shows how insidious is this kind of forked-tongue approach taken by the government. They speak of the need to keep pace with development, and of the operations of the Northern Canada Power Commission throughout the north. What developments did the Parliamentary Secretary mention? Among others, he mentioned Casino Mines, Kerr Addison Mines, Hudson's Bay Mining and Smelting, and one other. These operations are all taking place in the Yukon, every last one of them. Perhaps he did not do his homework. He forgets, too, that private investment capital to the tune of $3 billion was ready and available to carry out the development of the whole hydroelectric potential of the Yukon watershed in 1953, and that this would have generated twice the existing capacity of the St. Lawrence Seaway projects. He could not have done his homework, because if he had he would have read the remarks of the minister of that time, Mr. Lesage, and the remarks of the prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, indicating that the private investment capital was rejected by that Liberal government.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Nielsen: That development did not go ahead. What happened, Mr. Speaker? The government headed off that development. In 1961 the Northern Canada Power Commission retained a Montreal engineering firm, Montreal Engineering, to carry out a study of the cost of rehabilitating Dawson City.

An hon. Member: Which government was then in power?

Mr. Nielsen: They wanted to know the cost of rehabilitating the utilities, the electrical power system and the water system. This was prior to the departure of the mining operation of the area, Yukon Consolidated Gold Corporation. This was a field in which it had operated as a monopoly for over half a century. Later, Mr. Humphrys, who was the general manager of NCPC in Ottawa, said in public that the commission could not justify the spending of public funds in such a venture because of Dawson City's uncertain future. That was the end of the first chapter written on the opportunity on the part of NCPC to fulfil the reason for which they were established.

In 1964 a private company, Yukon Electrical Company, attempted to negotiate the purchase of the Dawson electrical system, and got nowhere. It is interesting to note that the NCPC would not do it and neither would they give it to anyone else. The chairman of the commission is also the deputy minister. I can imagine him juggling his hats, receiving an application from Yukon Electrical Company to do the Dawson City job, saying no to that company and then putting on his hat as chairman of the NCPC, replying to himself as deputy minister and speaking as chairman of the NCPC, saying, "NCPC would not do it." This is a great state of affairs. That body ought to be a Crown corporation.

Mr. Dinsdale: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: It should not be a commission whose chairman is the deputy minister, through whom the commission chairman must report. He must have a gay time at annual report time, reporting to himself. In 1965 the same private company, Yukon Electrical, tried again. It confirmed its offer to provide electrical generators and to take care of the operation of the water system for Dawson City. The result, again, was nil. The Yukon Electrical Company at that time guaranteed to supply the electrical services as soon as Yukon Consolidated Gold Corporation closed down in September, 1966. They pointed out that the capital would not come out of public funds, that the company was operating other, similar diesel plants and was well equipped to enter into a franchise agreement with Dawson City. Also, they said that the company's facilities would be added to the tax rolls of the community. This brings me to another point.

The government has been saying, "We can supply your electrical power at lower cost." The residents of Dawson City are finding, to their sorrow, that this is not the case. The government authority pays no interest on its investment, whereas private capital does. It pays no fuel taxes in the Yukon, although it does in the Northwest Territories. It has all these fringe benefits in order to compete with private capital, and still the government cannot do it. These amendments would give the commission more power. All this is done for the sake of complete state control.

In 1966, to carry on with the sad saga of Dawson City, the deputy minister of the day, Mr. Côté, who was also chairman of the NCPC, wrote that there were several reasons why it was deemed better and in the public interest—we heard the same words spoken today by the Parliamentary Secretary—to develop this entire project with federal government financing. The power portion was to be operated on a self-supporting, self-liquidating process by NCPC. The act says it is to be self-sustaining. In other words, the answer was the usual no to private enterprise; the government said, "We will run it ourselves."

Let us see what the picture has been in Dawson City since the commission went in there. I am reading from their financial report. Their loss for the year 1967-68 was about $39,000. Their loss for the year 1968-69 was $13,823. Their loss for the year 1969-70 was $10,590. There are some pretty nice losses in other plants as well. In particular I have picked out Fort Simpson, where they suffered a loss, and Frobisher, which suffered a dandy loss of $17,000 according to the last statement, and Chesterfield, which suffered a $5,000 loss. Only marginal profits were made with the other operations, the exception being, perhaps, Pine Point. The Parliamentary Secretary's speech writers are trying to convince the House that these losses will not be set against revenues obtained throughout the whole system. If he believes that, he is less intelligent than I give him credit for being.

In 1968 there was a closed meeting in Whitehorse. The problems of Dawson City were discussed, problems posed by the high cost of power production. These questions were faced by the federal, territorial and municipal representatives. It is my understanding that the session had been called because it was discovered that it was costing $90,000 to operate the water system for 200 outlets at Dawson City. Half that amount was recovered; the remaining $45,000 was to be forked out by the territorial government. No business will ever take over a utility under those conditions. I will not continue with the sad saga of Dawson City. That is the tale of only one area into which the NCPC has ventured.

• (4:10 p.m.)

We speak of the obligations of the commission with respect to northern employment. It is a pity that instead of reading from the notes which he was provided, the Parliamentary Secretary did not take the trouble to read the minutes of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The actual statistics are set forth there as to the efforts made by private enterprise as opposed to NCPC in the employment of our native peoples. Some of the members of that committee had the opportunity of travelling throughout the Northwest Territories and the Yukon in order to take a comparative look at the two operations. In Watson Lake they saw a diesel electric power generating and distribution facility that was being operated with a total staff of three. It was automated and required only three persons to operate it. A similar operation is being carried out by NCPC in the Northwest Territories. They are operating with a staff in excess of 20. The excuse given is that they run the boilers in the hostels because it is in keeping with a homogeneous operation in the generation of power.

The Parliamentary Secretary does not know a grid from a waffle iron. When he presented the kind of arguments contained in the notes that were prepared for him, this became even more obvious. This bill, if passed, will have a harmful effect on northern development, perhaps not so much in the Northwest Territories as in the Yukon. It will have an immediate and harmful effect on private investment capital being attracted to the Yukon. I urge all members to consider the whole package with which Parliament is being presented with respect to northern development. This includes not only the amendments to this act but the amendments to the Yukon mineral act which follow. Other land use regulations which will be introduced will literally inhibit the existing base of development and exploration in the north. In addition, the impact of the regulations of the inland waters act are being felt. Above all, there is the white paper.

I have been almost universally charged by the residents of the Yukon to urge this government to stand this bill until such time as the impact of all this legislation can be viewed as a package in terms of its economic effect. The Yukon Chamber of Mines, the Yukon Chamber of Commerce, the Prospectors' Association, the Mining Association and hundreds of Yukon citizens make this appeal through me to the government. Failing that, they make the plea to all members of this House to support the motion I am about to make. They do so because of the intense and universal objection of the principle embodied in this bill, the danger inherent and the likelihood that revenues generated in the Yukon or any part of the system will be applied to defray losses in other parts. Because of the unacceptability and unfairness of that principle, I wish to move a motion. I hoped that my motion would be seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), who is in his seat, but I do not think he will do that.

Mr. Orange: Right.

Mr. Nielsen: I move:

That all the words after "that" be left out and the following inserted:

"this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the recommendation in relation to the bill be referred to a committee of the whole House."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would like to hear representations from hon. members at this time. I have some reservations about accepting the amendment. I state frankly that I have a completely open mind. It appears, initially, that the amendment purports to change the procedural aspect of the motion. As I understand the motion now before the House, the bill now under consideration will be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Hon. members may be able to make a distinction. The amendment moved by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) suggests that the subject matter of the recommendation with relation to the bill be referred to a committee of the whole House. I have some reservations about the procedural acceptability of the motion and I will be happy to hear argument.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, prior to the change in the rules hon. members will recall that it used to be the practice of the House to discuss the principle of a bill at the resolution stage, because of the requirement in regard to the financial responsibility of the government. Because of the far-reaching economic impact this measure will have, the motivation behind my amendment is that the matter is far too important to deal with other than by this House in committee of the whole. That is precisely what will happen if the amendment now before Your Honour is accepted. Rather than going to a standing committee, a committee of the whole House should deal with the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will hear from the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in a moment. The hon. member for Yukon refers in his amendment to the subject matter of the recommendation. I presume he is referring to His Excellency's recommendation. My impression is that this is a prerogative of His Excellency; it is not within the capacity of this chamber to go to His Excellency with a directive even though a committee of the whole House may make such a directive. I would like to hear from the hon. member on that point.

Mr. Nielsen: With respect, Mr. Speaker, a motion cannot, even inferentially, be read so as to result in a reference back to His Excellency. The House is now seized with the matter through the recommendation of His Excellency. The motion simply asks that the recommendation of His Excellency be dealt with in a slightly different fashion than is called for by the resolution on the Order Paper, that is, that it be dealt with by a committee of the whole House.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to plow new ground in connection with these motions. I think we are developing very useful jurisprudence which will extend the rights of the House to deal with motions of this kind in a more adequate way. I agree with Your Honour that if the motion of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) purported to indicate that the committee of the whole had the right to make suggestions to His Excellency with regard to changing the recommendation, I would have some difficulty supporting it.

Implicit in the motion is that the committee of the whole might have an opportunity to consider this issue, and its consideration would be directed not only to His Excellency but to the government. I recognize that under the British North America Act there is a connection between the government and His Excellency, and that His Excellency should listen to his advisers and not necessarily to this House: the government must intervene. I am assuming that the purpose of part of the motion by my hon. friend is that the committee, having considered this matter, might then make a recommendation to the government. The government may or may not act upon it. The committee might decide, in its collective wisdom, that the original recommendation was proper. In those circumstances, that is the way it would be brought about.

As to the substantive part of the motion, with respect, I would think there is that freedom, I do not think a motion could be put that the bill be referred to a committee—I think we had some discussion on that—and Your Honour might well, within the terms of the Standing Order, require a different form of motion than one to refer the bill itself. But my hon. friend has been most careful to make the distinction between the bill and the subject matter of the recommendation.

The bill is founded on the recommendation, and I think this is a neat device permitting the committee of the whole in a very brief way, I hope, at an appropriate time, to consider this recommendation and make suggestions to the government. If it is a sensible government—which I always hope for, so far without anything to back up my hope—it will accept the suggestions and say to His Excellency: We think this recommendation should be changed in accordance with the suggestions of the committee of the whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me that the amendment we are discussing amounts to a direct negation of the motion before the House, which asks that the bill be read the second time and referred to a Standing Committee. It would appear to the Chair that if hon. members do not agree with the main motion, they will vote against it. I wonder whether any other hon. member would care to assist the Chair on this point.

Mr. Nielsen: It certainly was not my intention, when the amendment was prepared, to negate the motion now standing on the Order Paper, though it would have been very easy to do so; one would simply have to present a motion that the bill be not now read the second time. But I was careful to avoid doing so and to direct the amendment toward removing this bill from the Standing Committee and discussing its subject matter, because of its importance, in committee of the whole.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): With great respect, I was rather surprised to hear the comments Your Honour made a few moments ago while in the chair. In any event, I think that what we have to consider is the practicality of what we are doing. On other occasions, in the absence of any formalized procedure for dealing with matters in this way, Mr. Speaker has ruled that it is not possible to do these things; in other words, unless there is an ability on the part of the House to handle matters in the way proposed, such motions are out of order.

I believe the reverse situation is easy to understand. If a bill is set down for referral to a committee of the whole House, it is quite proper to move that it be read a second time and that the subject matter be referred to a Standing Committee. This is because a Standing Committee has the opportunity to examine witnesses in an informal way, explore the possibilities of the subject matter and then report its findings back to the House.

The amendment under discussion conceives putting this course in reverse, that is, not reading the bill a second time but sending the subject matter thereof to committee of the whole, without any procedural conception of what is to happen after that. I submit that the force of the amendment is to defeat the bill, because if it were carried the bill would not be read the second time and, as I understand the rules, that would be the end of it. The subject matter of the recommendation would be referred to a committee of the whole House. But for what purpose? The recommendation might be debated or examined, but there is no connected follow-up procedure for bringing the bill itself back before the House. On this ground alone, I believe Your Honour must find the amendment is not in order and should so rule.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. members for their assistance in connection with the procedural point. The hon. member for Peace River said we were plowing new ground for the Chair. Speaking personally, I should like to have some time to consider the arguments made by hon. members. If the House is agreeable, and if no other hon. members wish to contribute to the procedural discussion, I will reserve my decision on the procedural question and we will proceed in the interim.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, it would be very easy to amend the motion the Chair now has before it and simply move that the bill be not now read the second time. But I did not want to deprive the House of debating the subject matter of the recommendation.

Mr. Davis: You are all heart.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Before I begin my address, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to make sure I understood him correctly. Did he say he was in agreement with the principle of the equalization of power rates within the Yukon or within the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Nielsen: That is correct. No one would object to Yukon revenues being applied to Yukon equalization. I am sure this principle would be agreed to by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange).

Mr. Thomson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wished to make sure I understood the hon. member correctly.

I should like to comment on one statement the hon. member made in his speech, namely, that a public utilities commission or board should be appointed to review electricity rates in the Yukon and in the Territories. I must say this is my view. I think we should set up a board to look after the interests of consumers in that part of the world, perhaps a local board which could have regard to local situations. It could take into account the profits made locally by these companies and see that they are providing service of an appropriate standard. I commend the hon. member on his suggestion and regret it is not embodied in the legislation. This is something which should be done in the future, and I hope the Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. Buchanan) will consider it in this light.

The stand taken by the New Democratic Party in connection with public power is well known. We believe public power is a good thing, for a variety of reasons. Let us consider the general situation, not confining ourselves to the arrangements made for one particular region of Canada. The economics of public power are better because of the non-profit motive, because of the lower interest rates which can be obtained and because large public corporations are in a better position to undertake long-term financing.

Some of these projects are so huge that they require 33-year or longer financing before they can go into production. I am thinking of some of the hydroelectric plants or atomic power stations we have at the moment. Since a large corporation would have a larger market, it could afford to initiate hydroelectric projects of a size frequently beyond the capacity of the small, individual, private power operators. It is for reasons such as this that the members of this party in general favour publicly-operated power stations.

I understand from my reading of and acquaintanceship with the situation in the Yukon that there are a large number of hydroelectric power sites available just waiting to be developed once an adequate market has been found. It seems to me that here a large public corporation would be able to guarantee a power capacity that small individual corporations might not. In this respect, a market for power may well be developed, since mining operators and business concerns would be sure of a power supply to put their projects into operation. As a result, these concerns might proceed with their ventures where otherwise they might hesitate.

In cases where a mining operation, say, required additional multimillion dollar loans over and above normal capital needs, the assurance of power supply by a public corporation might make all the difference between commencing and not commencing operation. Consequently, I feel there are some definite advantages to having a government-operated power corporation in this part of Canada. In addition, I think that a large public corporation would tend to standardize its supply of parts. Certainly this was the experience in Saskatchewan where we discovered that small individual corporations had a whole variety of differently sized parts. One large corporation would combine volume, parts would be cheaper, and as a result everybody would benefit.

We would favour the government going further than it already has. We feel the bill should have implied a direct undertaking to proceed with public power development in all its phases in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, not simply in what I might call the fringe areas. Too often we feel that the profitable power developments, as is the case with other industries too, are left to the private corporations and the fringe areas, areas in which the others cannot make money, are left to government corporations. It stands to reason that in such circumstances the establishment of a public power corporation does not show up to advantage. The only way to view such a corporation is to look at it from the over-all aspects, as one corporation that looks after the power requirements of a particular area.

I should like to talk for a moment about equalization of power rates. I come from a farm situated in a scattered farming area in Saskatchewan. From the point of view of straight economics, I doubt that it would ever be profitable to put a power line through my part of the province. However, I do not believe that the waters of the South Saskatchewan River or the North Saskatchewan River impounded within the Squaw rapids, for example, belong solely to the people of Saskatoon, Prince Albert or other large cities in Saskatchewan where power development makes money. These cities are there to serve farmers such as myself, and I have equal claim to power from the Saskatchewan River and to equality of price as anybody else in Saskatchewan.

Whether power users are assisted by operating or capital grants, or in some other way, it is to the advantage of all that there be one over-all rate. I am not talking about rates only; I include the establishment of power lines to distant areas where it may never be economically feasible to provide power. I remember when parts of Saskatchewan had no power. I personally had trouble with my private power plant and finally with public power moved from a 5-horsepower to a 10-horsepower transformer. I have seen an expanding use of power in the province, and this has had an effect upon businesses and allied ventures in some of the fringe areas. In this regard I take particular issue with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who had much to say about the people in Whitehorse and other cities and hardly said anything about those living in the fringe areas. When he did say anything about them it was to point out they had no power, and I think his criticism is justified there.

From my experience, if power is produced purely from the point of view of straight economics, the fringe areas will have no power supply. Or if they have a supply, the rates will be expensive or they will have trouble with the supply. There will be no connecting grids and as a result the supply will be uncertain. This is why I say we must look at the supply of power in the over-all sense, in the total economic picture of areas of the country as a whole, rather than individual cities. In this respect people living in Whitehorse and other cities, and operators of mines, should not object if some of their money is used to extend power to other areas of the Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Why not a reduction of rates?

Mr. Thomson: I come from an area which would never have had power if economics had been the sole consideration. But the waters of the Yukon River are not only for those who live in Whitehorse; they are for the people of the Yukon as a whole. Similarly, mines are not for the benefit of the operators of the mine alone but are, rather, for the benefit of the people as a whole. The people of Whitehorse should help pay for the power needs of others. After all, must the people of the Yukon live in Whitehorse or in mining areas only?

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Thomson: Yes.
