It was insulting, and showed ed her heart—he would surely have staid long," and with these words on her that he had no respect for me to -leave me dependent on my own child, a girl of eighteen, who knows nothing of business." And so she whined and fretted on, her dissatisfaction greatly strengthened by letters from Leonard, in which he expressed a great deal of virtuous indignation on the same subject, but he gave himself no further trouble concern ing his mother and sister, save, as often happened, he found himself in want of money, he did not hesitate to apply to his mother for loans which were never

For the next four years Blanche fought hard, and but for the steady pull which Leonard, through his mother, kept on her purse-strings, she would have won the battle.

"A brave girl, indeed," said Squire Fletcher, admiringly, " with pluck and energy enough to furnish out half the young men in the county."

But when his son Allen carried his admiration to the point of loving and desiring to marry her, the squire blustered and stormed after the usual fashion of fathers who have forgotten their own youth. The girl was a jewel in herself, but then, her worthless, scoundrelly brother, her whining, fretful idiot of a mother, her hopelessly would voluntarily take such burdens on himself!

"Yet Blanche has borne these burdens a long time, and without murmuring," said Allen.

The discussion ended as such discussions usually do. Alten fully resolved to marry Blanche just as soon as he could induce her to say yes, even if it cost him his inheritance, while his father was equally resolved that Allen should give up the girl he loved and marry the heiress he had chosen for him; and if Allen had yielded to his will in this matter, the old man in his heart of hearts would have despised it a white shawl of finest, softest Canton crape, she draped it in graceful folds over her wrapper, a chintz of gravest, soberest tiuts. A black velvet ribbon was tied around her hair in the fashion of fifteen years before, and then she prepared to descend the stairs which she lad not seen since that day, so long since, when her brother had carried her up fainting, almost dying.
