The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 87) respecting the incorporation of benevolent societies. He said: The House is aware that, from time to time, benevolent societies, conducting insurance business, incorporated under the laws of the several provinces, have been in the habit of applying to the Parliament of Canada for Dominion incorporation, and the question of the powers that may be properly conferred upon these companies, by the Dominion, has been a very vexed one for a number of years. Last year, it will be remembered, we had several Bills of that character. One Bill was accepted by the insurance department and the Government and passed by both branches of Parliament whereby a standard was established which it was thought was a safe one. Another Bill of a less favourable standard passed this House but did not become law. The purpose of the Bill which I now introduce is to take the legislation of last session—relating to an association known as the Ancient Order of Foresters—as a proper standard of safety, and to make provision that other companies, incorporated by the provincial authorities, which may desire to obtain Dominion recognition, may obtain it by something like letters patent, by filing their papers and making the proper application. In this way they may obtain what is practically a Dominion incorporation under a general Act without special legislation in each case. In this matter, also, I may say I do not intend to treat the measure in the ordinary way of Government Bills, but I shall, on the second reading, ask that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, so that the various companies may have an opportunity of appearing before the committee and stating their objections, if there be any objections, to the policy here outlined.

TOBACCO ILLUSTRATION STATION.

Mr. DUGAS asked:

Has the Government decided to establish an experimental or model farm in the parish of St. Jacques, Montcalm County?

Is the sum required for that purpose to appear in the Estimates for this session?

What is to be the amount recommended?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). An illustration station for the growing and curing of different varieties of tobacco is to be established at St. Jacques, Montcalm County. The sum in the Estimates for illustration stations includes the one at St. Jacques. The sum recommended is $475 to assist in the erection of buildings, purchase of fertilizers and extra labour, in addition to the salary of the tobacco expert. His salary is to be at the rate of $66.66 per month when at St. Jacques, and $5 per day when holding meetings or away from St. Jacques on other business for the department.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

What action, if any, does the Government propose to take in regard to experiments in poultry feeding as outlined and advocated by Professor Robertson of the Experimental Farm? If the Government propose to act on Professor Robertson's suggestion, how many experiments are proposed to be made, where they are to be made, and when?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). It is proposed to establish several illustration stations for the fattening of poultry during the season of 1899.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

Has the Government decided to act on the suggestion of Professor Robertson in regard to "Illustration Stations" as object lessons for the farmers of Canada? What is the extent and nature of the work to be undertaken at those stations, and is it intended to conduct experiments with different kinds of fruit trees as well as roots and cereals? Are any to be established this summer? If so, how many, and where?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Yes, a sum has been placed in the Estimates for illustration stations. These are intended to be in the nature of object lessons (a) from growing different varieties of cereals, roots, fodder plants and tobacco; and (b) from different methods of cultivation. The crops are to be grown in the season of 1900. Some crops of tobacco are to be grown this season of 1899. It is not intended to conduct experiments with fruit trees at these stations.

SPRAYING OF FRUIT TREES—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

Does the Government propose to initiate, as advocated by Professor Robertson, any scheme for experimental spraying of fruit trees?

If so, to what extent is it proposed to extend it this coming summer ?

What sections are to be chosen for these experiments ?

Is it proposed to extend them to all the provinces ?

Is it intended that these experiments are to be made without any charge to orchardists ?

If not, what charge is to be made ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Professor Robertson has not advocated any scheme for spraying fruit trees ; but it is proposed to co-operate with the provincial government of Prince Edward Island and the Prince Edward Island Fruit Growers' Association in preparing for some trial shipments of fruit by the spraying of fruit trees, and in the packing and shipping of apples in the season of 1899.

POINTE CLAIRE WHARF.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. How much money has been expended to date upon the wharf at Pointe Claire for which the sum of $4,009 was voted by Parliament ?

2. How far are the works on said wharf advanced ?

3. What was the original estimate of the cost of said wharf ?

4. How much will it cost to finish said wharf ?

5. Has the work been done by contract or by day work ?

6. Were tenders publicly called for said work ? Is it the intention of the Government to finish said wharf at once ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to move for a return and the address will be brought down immediately. There are some details that cannot be conveniently given in an answer to a question.

ARMOURY AT BADDECK, C.B.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to build an armoury and drill shed at Baddeck, Cape Breton ? If so, how soon ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). It is hoped that this year the Government will be able to build an armoury, and the matter is now under consideration.

NINETY-FOURTH BATTALION.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to increase the strength of the 94th Battalion ? If so, when and by how many companies ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). This matter has been referred to the General Officer Commanding, and it will be decided after his next trip there.

Mr. MARTIN.

DREDGING OF PINETTE HARBOUR, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Has the Government or any member thereof received a petition from the inhabitants of Flat River and surrounding sections in the province of Prince Edward Island, praying for the dredging of Pinette harbour in that province ? If so, has the Government decided to grant the prayer of the petitioners ? Will the work be proceeded with this summer ? If not, when ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There was no petition received.

QUEBEC BRIDGE TENDERS.

Mr. HAGGART (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Has the Government asked for tenders for the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence at or near Quebec ? From whom have the tenders been asked ? How many offers have been received ? Has any tender been accepted, and what is the amount ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government has not asked or obtained from Parliament any authority to build the bridge referred to in the question, and therefore has not asked for tenders for the construction of such a bridge.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a condition necessary in all cases.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I say we have not done it.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it in the Baie des Chaleurs case ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think we asked for tenders.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE REPAIRS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. In what newspapers in the city of Montreal were tenders asked for the execution of works now proceeding in the post office building ?

2. Are said repairs to be paid for out of last year's appropriation for repairs on public buildings in Montreal ?

3. If not, then has the Department of Public Works complied with the law in regard to expenditure for which no Parliamentary appropriation exists ?

4. If tenders were not asked through the newspapers, then from whom were tenders asked ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. List of newspapers in which tenders were called for new roof covering for Montreal post office : Montreal—"Herald," "La Patrie," "Trade Review," "Insurance and Finance Chronicle," "Shareholder"; Quebec—"Le Soleil," "Daily Telegraph," "La Semaine Commerciale"; Ottawa—"Free Press," "Le Temps," "Danebrog";

Toronto—"Globe," "Hardware"; Hamilton—"Herald," "Times"; Kingston—"Freeman," "Whig"; St. John's—"Le Canada Français"; Valleyfield—"Le Progrès de Valleyfield"; Belleville—"Ontario"; Ste. Hyacinthe—"L'Union de St. Hyacinthe." 2. Yes. 3 and 4. The answers to the two first question make it unnecessary to reply to the last two.

P. E. I. PRIVATE BONDED WAREHOUSE—MR. J. G. SCRIMGEOUR.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) asked :

At what date was the privilege of a private bonded warehouse granted to John G. Scrimgeour at Cardigan Bridge, Prince Edward Island? For what length of time is it granted? Is it the intention of the Government to continue it, or, if for a term, to renew it at the expiration of the term?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). On 6th December, 1898, authority was given to grant the application of John G. Scrimgeour for a customs bonded warehouse of class 2 at Cardigan Bridge, on the usual conditions as to the payment of fees and the warehouse being secured under customs locks to the satisfaction of the sub-collector of customs; and the interests of the revenue being protected. The length of time for which the bond is granted is not specified. It is not customary to do so. Representations having been made respecting the granting of this bond, they are being inquired into.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS—CONTRACT FOR MAIL STEAMER.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) asked :

1. Whether a new contract has been entered into by the Government for the carriage of passengers, mails and freight to the Magdalen Islands?

2. With whom is the contract made?

3. On what terms?

4. What are the ports of call?

5. What class of steamer?

6. What is her power, speed, freight and passenger capacity?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. A new contract has been entered into for service between the Magdalen Islands and the mainland. 2. Robert J. Leslie, of Halifax. 3. A weekly service from Pictou, N.S., commencing with the opening of navigation until the close of navigation at Pictou, thereafter until the close of navigation at the Magdalen Islands, from some port in Cape Breton to such port or ports in the Magdalen Islands as the Minister may approve. Subsidy, $9,000 per annum, payable 1st July, 1st October, and at the close of the service. 4. Georgetown and Souris, in the province of Prince Edward Island; Amherst Island, Point Rosse, Etang du Nord, Grand Entry and Grindstone Island, in the Mag-dalén Islands, and once in each month, during the months of June, July, August and September, a trip to be extended to Bryan Island—calls at Grand Entry need not be made after the close of the month of September. 5. The "St. Olaf," or such other steamer of equal class, speed, equipment, capacity and accommodation as may be approved by the Minister. 6. The "St. Olaf" is of a class and capacity of not less than seventy-two tons net, triple expansion engines, carrying 160 pounds of steam, capable of a speed of not less than twelve miles an hour, the service to be run at an average speed of not less than ten miles an hour; saloon accommodation for at least fifty first-class passengers, and for at least 100 second-class passengers; suitable accommodation for mails, &c.

INDIAN AGENT AT RAMA.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Have the witnesses in the inquiry re the conduct of the Indian agent at Rama been paid?

2. Was James Doyle, a witness in the said inquiry, paid his fees as a witness?

3. If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Answered by No. 2.

FENIAN RAID MEDALS

Mr. HUGHES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to issue medals for the Fenian raids and Red River rebellion services to the families of those now dead but who served on those occasions?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). No. The Imperial despatch granting the medal directs the issue of medals only to the surviving officers, non-commissioned officers and men as promulgated in the General Orders for the militia.

EDMONTON-YUKON ROUTE—MESSRS. DIBBLEE AND DUPONT.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Were Messrs. Dibblee and Dupont in the employ of the Government during 1898, in laying out a route from Edmonton towards northern British Columbia or the Yukon?

2. What direction was each to take?

3. What men were taken by each?

4. Is the Government aware that one or both of the gentlemen named was lost for some weeks?

5. Has any claim been entered against the Government by one of the men employed, for damages for injuries from an accident while on the trip?

6. Is the Government in possession of any particulars of the said accident?

7. Has the Government in its possession the field notes of both or either of the leaders named?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. Messrs. Dibblee and Dupont were in the employ of the Government in 1898, making an exploratory survey of a route from Edmonton towards Teslin Lake. 2. Mr. Dibblee was to commence operations near the mouths of the Parsnip and Omicron rivers, and working westward towards Fort Connelly via the Oscilina River. Mr. Dupont started operations at the same point and worked eastward along the valley of the Peace River towards Edmonton. 3. Mr. Dupont's party consisted of: V. H. Dupont, engineer in charge; A. T. Kerr, assistant engineer and nine men. Mr. Dibblee's party consisted of: C. F. K. Dibblee, engineer in charge; H. S. Semple, assistant engineer, and nine men. 4. The Government is not aware that either of these gentlemen was lost for some weeks. 5. One of the men wrote the department that he thought he ought to be paid a consideration in connection with an accident he met with while on the trip. 6. The department is in possession of a report from the engineer in charge as regards the accident. 7. The Government has in its possession in the department the field notes of Mr. Dupont, but not Mr. Dibblee's.

EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES —NEWSPAPER STATEMENTS.

Mr. McALISTER asked:

Has the attention of the Government been directed to the following despatches appearing in the St. John "Daily Sun" of the 20th April instant:—

Upper Dorchester, April 16.—Twenty-two men, women and children from this district left this depot on Thursday last by the Canadian Pacific Railway for the United States, where they expect to get employment.

Moncton, April 18.—A special car was attached to the Canadian Pacific Railway at the Moncton depot yesterday afternoon to accommodate the exodus getting on here. Two or three families were among the crowd that took passage for Boston.

Sackville, April 18.—Captain J. H. Grant, of Port Elgin, has a sale of household furniture, &c., on the 26th instant. He intends going to Missouri.

Tidnish, April 18.—Miss Ada Taylor, daughter of Postmaster Taylor, has returned from Uncle Sam's domains, accompanied by her sister-in-law, Mrs. Robert Taylor, who is visiting her home, Matthew Allen's, at Cape Tormentine. They intend returning to their American homes next month. Miss Mabel Taylor and Miss Kate McKay are going with them.

Fredericton, April 18.—Charles McGrath leaves on Thursday for Butte, Mont., where he has accepted a situation.

Brooklyn, N.S., April 18.—In spite of the so-called prosperity of the country, the exodus from our fair village continues to "Uncle Sam's domain."

Truro, N.S., April 18.—Six bright, intelligent young men called at the "News" office this morning to make arrangements for the "People's Home Newspaper" to follow them to their new homes in the United States, to which they were en route when they came to say good-bye to the "News."

The group consisted of George B. Hamilton and E. H. Hamilton, Springside; J. F. Roberts, Mr. SIFTON.

Cross Roads; Chas. Gammell, Newton Mills; Robert H. Kent, Upper Musquodoboit, and Samuel Reid, Middle Musquodoboit. Miss Sadie Hamilton, sister of the Hamilton brothers above, was to join the party at the railway station, and all were en route for Boston and other places in Massachusetts.

George B. Hamilton and Robert H. Kent are going to work with the F. S. Whipple Ice Company, of Amherst, Mass., where the former has been employed for some three years.

We regret very much indeed to have to record the loss to our country of such a number of citizens, and only wish that we had as great inducements to offer them at home as those that have carried them off to work under a foreign flag.

2. Are these statements in accordance with fact?

3. If not, what grounds have the Government for not accepting them as correct?

4. If in accordance with fact, do the Government intend to take any steps to abate such exodus?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply I beg to say that the attention of the Government has not been directed to the despatches referred to in the hon. gentleman's question. As to question 2, the Government has no official means of knowing whether the statements made are correct or not, but the information the Government has been able to gather would indicate that the statements are not correct—that is to say, not correct in the inference which is drawn from them, and that as a matter of fact the question refers to parties going to the United States for a temporary period with the intention of returning in a short time to their ordinary homes. In answer to question 3, the fact that the despatches all appear in an Opposition paper upon one day and under the same date, and that within a very few days afterwards they appear on the Order paper, would indicate that the despatches were prepared for the political market, rather than the news market. The Government, as I say, have no information of an official character, that these 35 or 40 people did or did not—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR—Did or did not leave the places referred to; but the Government have official information that several thousand people came, last year, from the United States to Canada, and that several thousand more will come this year. While I say that the Government's attention has not been called to these despatches, the Government's attention has been called to the following statement in the "Mail and Empire," which, I presume, my hon. friend will accept as correct:—

It is satisfactory to point out that Canadians are not now going in any number to the United States.—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (reading) :

—but that large numbers of residents of the United States are coming to Manitoba, the Territories and British Columbia.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. It seems to me, in regard to question No. 3, that a Minister is not out of order in stating what grounds the Government have for not accepting these statements as correct. Besides, as everybody knows, in answering a question, a Minister is allowed a very considerable amount of latitude, though, of course, it would not be desirable to exceed the answer to the question, and make a speech. Still, it seems to me that in answering question No. 3 the hon. Minister was quite in order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Lest my hon. friends may have missed any portion of this quotation, I will read it again:

It is satisfactory to point out that Canadians are not now going in any number to the United States, but large numbers of residents of the United States are coming into Manitoba, the Territories and British Columbia. The value of settlers' effects brought into Canada for the fiscal year 1898 was $2,322,000, and the total from all countries, $2,826,000. The exodus is a matter of history.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the hon. gentleman to give the date of that second statement?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will give the hon. gentleman the date.

Mr. FOSTER. My impression is, that it is about two months old. That was before people started to go out.

SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

What was the amount of money paid by the Government for the construction of the Soulanges Canal up to the 31st March last (1899)?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The amount of money paid by the Government for the construction of the Soulanges Canal up to the 31st March, 1899, is $4,762,996.75.

THE DUTIES ON TOBACCO.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to a short paragraph in this morning's Ottawa "Citizen," in which it is stated :

The Dominion Government has notified the Essex Tobacco Association that no change will be made this year in the excise and custom duties on tobacco. The growers wanted a uniform excise duty of ten cents a single license, and an import tax of 60 or 70 cents on United States tobacco.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, whether or not any such intimation has been given?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I hope, Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for me to say that no statement has been made, on behalf of the Government, respecting any item of any kind in the tariff, nor can any statement be made until the Budget is brought down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the attention of hon. members to something that is forgotten in practice, namely, that calling notices of motion is not calling the Orders of the Day, and that the Orders of the Day will not be called until after six o'clock to-day. It is not regular to interpose a question to the Government, when motions are called; it would be better for hon. members to wait until the Orders of the Day are called.

THE DUTY ON COAL OIL.

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, it would be in the interest of the farming and labouring classes and the country generally, to reduce the duty upon coal oil for illuminating and manufacturing purposes. That it would also be in the interest of the consumers of coal oil for lighting or manufacturing purposes to permit its storage in tanks, and its distribution therefrom, and also from tank cars, in tank wagons or other suitable vehicles, to dealers and consumers, thus saving to the latter the cost of barrels and cooperage, and to take such means as may be deemed necessary to protect the Canadian people from the evil effects of trusts, combines and monopolies upon this important industry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with no little embarrassment and diffidence that I rise to propose this motion, which I have had on the Order paper for some time past. I am aware that it is an old acquaintance of the hon. members of this House. I have had the honour of presenting it on three former occasions, and on each of those occasions it has been unsuccessful. I trust that, on the present occasion, better fortune will attend it. My object in presenting this motion again is not to embarrass the Government or any of the supporters of the Government, or any of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I occupy the unfortunate position of being in favour of a motion which has its enemies on the right of the Speaker, and its enemies on the left of the Speaker. My sole object in presenting the motion is to secure, if possible, the closing to some extent of the great gap which exists between the price which the consumers of coal oil pay in Canada and the price which consumers of coal oil pay in the United States. The coal oil industry is a very important industry, and my object is not to injure that industry by taking away any protection to which it is entitled. I have been a protectionist all my life, and I believe the prosperity of Canada depends upon protection to her industrial life, and that every industry that is worthy of being protected in this country should have the consideration, not only of the Government, but of every patriotic citizen of this country. While I believe that, yet there is such a thing as going a little too far in the direction of protection. When protection goes so far as to become a burden to the consumer, then I believe it should stop; and I think, if I may be allowed to say it, that both the Conservative Government and the Liberal Government of this country have gone further in the protection of this industry than was consistent with the interest of the consumers. Now, the coal oil imported from the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1898, was 8,001,240 gallons, on which the duty paid amounted to $400,559. According to the returns from the refiners, the latest returns available, there was produced in Canada in 1897 oil to the extent of 10,493,449 gallons. In 1898 we exported 9,530 gallons. The illuminating oil produced in Canada in 1898 amounted to 10,493,449 gallons, and imported from the United States 8,011,240 gallons, aggregate 18,504,698 gallons, which the people of this country consumed in 1898, to say nothing about the quantity smuggled from the United States across our frontier. I do not know that I have very much fault to find with the statement made by an hon. gentleman on the other side, a few years ago, when he said we consumed in this country about 20,000,000 gallons. We are not consuming quite as much as this, but our consumption amounted to nearly 19,000,000 gallons for the last year, and he made the statement, which I think comes near the mark, that the consumer in Canada has to pay the duty on what is produced in Canada added to the cost of Canadian oil. That will be equivalent to paying the duty on 18,000,000 gallons, which would mean $900,000. The authority of this hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is so good that perhaps I may be permitted to read what he said:

That the duty strikes the poorer classes and the farming community particularly, who use a large amount of oil in their houses.

He claimed that as the families were 1,000,000 in Canada, and used about 20 gallons each, that the consumption would be 20,000,000 gallons, on which a duty of 7½c. would amount to $1,400,000—the duty actually collected was $430,000—leaving a balance of $989,494 that went into the pockets of, and was divided among the refiners of coal oil, or very near $1,000,000 paid by the people last year (1893) to the refiners in Petrolea, taking it for granted that the members avail themselves of the full protection granted them.

On the same principle then some $500,000 in 1898 went into the pockets of the refiners and the oil dealers of the country and came out of the pockets of the coal oil consumers. I have said that my desire was to try and close to some extent the great gap between the price paid by the consumers in Canada and that paid by the American consumers. The consumers in the United States are buying a fine article of oil at retail at from

Mr. MOORE.

8 to 10 cents per gallon, whereas in Canada we are paying about 25 cents for the same quality, showing a gap of from 10 to 15 cents per gallon. What is the cause of this difference in price? The best oil produced on this continent is produced in the state of Pennsylvania. The Water White oil of Pennsylvania delivered on board the cars at Warren costs 4·20 cents per Imperial gallon, the freight from Warren to the city of Montreal costs 3·34 cents, the duty is 5 cents, and the barrelling about 2·50 cents. Without taking into consideration the cost of the oil, the freight, duty and barrelling costs 10·84 cents. In the United States, the oil costs, all barrelled, 6·70 cents, while in Canada it costs laid down in Montreal 17 cents a gallon. That is, oil of the quality I am quoting here to-day. Therefore, the cause of this increase, in addition to the duty and cost of barrelling, is in the distribution, for a different system of distribution is practised in the United States than in Canada. Our Government does not permit the distribution from tank cars in tank wagons as is done in the United States. The barrelling cost 2½ cents per gallon, the inspection 10 cents per barrel, and it costs $6 to inspect a car-load. A tank holds three car-loads, and one inspection would be sufficient, so that the privilege of distributing this oil in tank wagons to the dealers and consumers would mean a reduction of 2½ or 3 cents a gallon. If the Government, thinking it would be an injury to a great industry of Canada, are not disposed to reduce the duty, they have a means of closing partly this gap by permitting the distribution in tank wagons, thus avoiding cost of barrelling and lessening the cost from 2½ to 3 cents. They can go further. They can, if they choose, discriminate to some extent, too, in favour of Canadian oil producers by allowing the oil refined in Canada to be distributed in tank wagons without the cost of barrelling and exacting that the American oil be distributed, as at present, in barrels and inspected as it now is. This would give a preference to the Canadian oil of 2½ to 3 cents a gallon, and the Government would lose no revenue. I can see no objection to this, and trust the Government will consider it and give greater facilities for the distribution of oil in this country, which will certainly reduce its price from 2 to 3 cents to the consumer.

Then there is another reason why coal oil is higher than it ought to be, and that is the existence of this great Standard Oil Trust which controls this industry and all connected with it, which controls railway rates and prevents the competition which is so necessary in order that the consumer may get the article at a reasonable price. I have here a definition of a trust given by Judge Barrett of the Supreme Court of New York:

A monopoly is any combination, the tendency of which is to prevent competition in its broad and general sense, and to control and thus at will enhance the price to the detriment of the public.

I think it is quite evident that the coal oil industry of Canada is controlled to-day by this Standard Oil Company. They control all the refining industries of Canada and practically all the oil wells in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MOORE. I do not say that they own all the oil wells, because they own but a very few of them, but when they own all the refining industries how is it possible that they do not control the price of the oil produced?

Therefore, practically they control the whole industry in Canada, and they do it, not in the interest of the people of this country, but in a way to enhance the price of their products to the injury of the public. I have evidence in my possession to convince—if that were necessary—the Government or any person that it is a fact that this great industry is controlled to-day by the Standard Oil Trust. And not only does the trust control this industry, but it controls the freights upon the railroads, so that an independent company cannot send a barrel of oil over these roads without paying nearly double the cost for freight that is paid by the Standard Oil Company on oil shipped by them. I have here an article from the Montreal "Star" of 16th February last, on "The Standard Oil Trust":

The discrimination of the Canadian railways against the competitors of the Standard Oil Trust in Canada still continues without regard to the prohibition of the Railway Act, and it is practiced from all the leading distribution centres of the Dominion. It was by secretly controlling the public highways that the trust has been able to keep out competition in many parts of the United States, and the parallel in this new Canadian parallel is so striking that the same influence is naturally suspected. While Canadian oil was handled by independent refiners there was no thought of railway discrimination, but as soon as the refiners were absorbed by the Standard Trust and the Canadian product controlled by it the freight rates on American oil were suddenly advanced, in some cases as much as 100 per cent. By some of the secret bargains between the trust and the American railways, rates were doubled to competitors without any advance to the Standard people, while the overcharge was not retained by the railways, but handed over to the trust. Our railways can scarcely be put under the necessity of handing over the excessive collections to the Standard Oil Company, for the advances charged will, no doubt, be the subject of litigation by independent companies who have borne the overcharges. The discriminating rates per cwt. from Toronto on less than car lots is as follows:—

| To Brockville.....  | 25                  | 47                  |
| To Wharton .....    | 24                  | 40½                 |
| To Lorneville ..... | 18                  | 28½                 |

Hamilton is reached by the Michigan Central and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo, two railways not in the discrimination scheme. From that city the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific railways levy the following charges:—

These things are done in spite of the provision in the Railway Act that fares and tolls "shall always under the same circumstances be charged equally to all persons, and at the same rate, whether per ton, per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all passengers and goods and railway carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like railway carriage or engine passing over the same portion of the line of railway; and also that no reduction or advance in the tolls shall be made, either directly (or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway." In this the railways not only violate the law, but usurp the power of Parliament, in levying an impost on a foreign product for the encouragement of the Standard Trust. If this be permitted, it will be an easy matter to crush out all rivalry, for no concern can stand against railway discrimination. Should the design be successful, the well-owners and oil-users will find that the refining monopoly between them can crowd and crush in both directions.

And here is an article from the Montreal "Herald":

It is a matter of public notoriety that the above-named company—

The Standard Oil Company—

—has obtained a footing in Canada, and it is important that your clientele should learn how it is known to manipulate things in the United States. The monopoly, headed by the Rockefellers, buy out opposition in the manner here described, same being extracted from the "National Advertiser," of New York, dated 22nd February last. The heading is, "Tackling a Trust," and the Supreme Court of Ohio State has the case in hand:

"The Attorney General has filed a suit to oust from its charter the Argand Refining Co., of Marietta, Ohio. It is alleged that the company has agreed, in consideration of the payment by the Standard Oil Co., of $1,000 a month for ten years, from December 1, 1898, not to engage in the business of refining petroleum, and that therefore its charter has been invalidated by non-use."

Not satisfied with this method of disposing of opposition, the following extraordinary fact is published in the United States:—A certain railway company contracted with the Standard Oil Company to carry given quantities for them at ten cents, but all competitors were to be charged 35 cents! That is not the whole story, and here comes the astounding exposé of Rockefeller's further methods, namely, the railway company is to hand the excess of 25 cents carriage to the Standard Oil Company! Will the people of our Dominion permit such rascality to be practised here?

Yours, &c.,
D. C. BARKER.

Montreal, 14th April, 1899.

I have also extracts from the Toronto "Globe" and the Montreal "Witness." It might be a little tiresome to hon. gentlemen on the other side to listen to the reading of these. But if the hon. gentlemen are not sufficiently convinced that a combine exists and that it includes the railroads, I can lay the evidence before the House.

Perhaps I might be excused for supplementing my statement with something of a more direct nature. I have here an affidavit from an oil dealer in the city of Montreal, and it gives strength to the case I have made that this discrimination exists, and that this monopoly exists to the injury of the interest of the people of this country:

I, Andrew Downie Gall, of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, oil merchant, do solemnly declare that I am extensively engaged in the wholesale trade of coal oil, burning oil and other oils in the Dominion of Canada.

That all the petroleum oil refineries in Canada at the present time are under the control of the Standard Oil Company or Standard Oil Trust through the said company having acquired some outright and a controlling interest in others.

That since acquiring the said refineries in Canada the said Standard Oil Company which is operating in Canada under the style of the Imperial Oil Company (Limited), has closed up some refineries, demolished others and is operating only such as it sees fit.

That no petroleum oil from Canadian refineries can be obtained to-day unless it is procured from or through the Standard Oil Company or the Imperial Oil Company (Limited), directly or indirectly.

That it is quite apparent, and investigation will establish beyond doubt that the said Standard Oil Company or the Imperial Oil Company (Limited) has so acquired and controls said refineries for the purpose of forming, and they have thereby formed a trust or a combination to unduly enhance the price of such oil and to unduly promote the advantage of the said company at the expense of the consumer.

That the firm of which I am a member and other firms engaged in the oil business are compelled to buy in the United States and import therefrom our supplies of oil to supply our customers and the trade.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

A. D. GALL.

Declared before me at the said city of Montreal this 21st day of March, A.D. 1899.

P. W. DUNTON,

Notary Public.

Mr. MOORE.

I think I have given enough evidence to prove that a great trust exists in Canada that controls the freight rates, that oil has advanced in consequence, that consumers are paying about 3 cents a gallon more than they would but for the existence of this trust in Canada and in the United States. In 1897 the Government wisely, I think, took power to deal with monopolies and trusts. It is not for me to ask the Government to put into effect clause 18 in the Customs Act, which provides when it is evident to the Governor in Council that a trust exists by which the price of an article is enhanced, this article gives the Government power to reduce, or entirely abolish, the duty on that article. I think that power was taken for a wise purpose. I do not desire to have the Government abolish the duty entirely, as I think our oil producers are entitled to a fair protection. But we need to understand that, whatever protection to-day is given to the coal oil industry in this country, is given to Americans, instead of Canadians, that that money goes into the hands of an American company, and that Canadians do not receive any special benefit therefrom. I trust the Government will take into consideration this matter of the distribution of oil, and take some steps by which the consumers in this country can buy oil at less than 25 cents per gallon, while the American consumers are paying for the same quality but 10 cents. If the Government do this, I think they will earn the gratitude of the farmers, the labouring classes and the people of this country generally, to whom the money they pay for their coal oil is of considerable consequence.

Mr. T. BEATTIE (London). I do not intend to take up very much time in discussing this question, as we spent nearly half a day discussing it on a previous occasion. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Moore) has made a statement which is not at all correct. He says that the oil wells of Canada are controlled by the Standard Oil Company. I deny that statement entirely. There is not a single well in the Petrolia district that is controlled by the Standard Oil Company. It is true, they have some property there, and are putting down some wells of their own; but the oil producers of Canada are all Canadians. The hon. gentleman says that the Standard Oil Company is composed of Americans. Well, Sir, in the first place, we have no Standard Oil Company in Canada. There is a company called the Imperial Oil Company, and I will give the names of a number of Canadians composing that company, and who have lived in Canada all their lives. Mr. Fitzgerald, the president of the company, is an old resident of London. Then, there is Mr. Smallman, of London. I know he has lived in this country for forty years. Then, there is Mr. Englehart, who has also lived in this country forty years. There is Mr. Hodgins, the local member in the Legislature of Ontario for the county of East Middlesex, who is also a member of that company. There is Mr. Mills, another gentleman who lives in London. There is Mr. Minhinnick, Mr. Geary, Mr. I. Waterman, Mr. Duffield and Mr. Spencer. All these gentlemen have lived in London, to my knowledge, for the last forty years. And yet the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Moore) tells us that the oil company of Canada is to-day controlled by the Standard Oil Company of the United States. We have already wasted so much time in this House in discussing this matter that it is not necessary for me to dwell any longer upon it, and I, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I stated the other day, my argument on this matter, and it is not necessary to take up the time of the House further than to say that this motion goes into details that the motion we then discussed did not. As regards the reduction of the duty on coal oil, it does not seem to go so far as the motion of yesterday, and in that respect I regard it as falling short. I think the duty on coal oil ought to be abolished. But I am informed that the details asked for by the hon. gentleman would be of advantage to that portion of the community for which we all speak, namely the mass of the people. The more I consider this matter, the more convinced I am that no argument that has been brought forward here touches the contention of those who consider that the duty should be abolished. I suppose I cannot refer, although it is on a cognate subject, to the argument of my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Fraser); but my hon. friend who moves the adjournment of the debate, and with whom I should like to vote, tells us that certain Canadians are members of the Imperial Oil Company, which, however, he admits is controlled by the Standard Oil Company. Now, Sir, you remember that on previous occasions, when we were dealing with Canadian corporations that had placed themselves under the hold of a trust, the Liberal party in this House would not listen to the proposition that these Canadians deserved any consideration whatever. For my part, I certainly think that three or four opulent men are not worthy of consideration, compared with the great mass of the people for whom those of us contend who want relief in regard to this oil business.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). In regard to this oil question it is not necessary for me to reiterate what has been said so often in this House by other members, but I will say that I endorse the sentiment so strongly expressed by those hon. gentlemen who ask for free coal oil, or freer coal oil. Not only should we have oil freer, but of a better quality, because we have not had as good oil from the Canadian manufacturers as the American oil. The poor people of this country have been obliged to burn a much poorer quality of oil, and have paid dearer for it. The amount of money that has been paid in duty on coal oil in this country would, it is stated, pay 6 per cent interest on all the money invested in the coal oil industry, and it would pay all the men employed in that industry $1.50 a day, so that they could sit on the fence twirling their thumbs, at the same time leaving hundreds of thousands of dollars in the pockets of the consumers. I cannot see upon what ground we should grant such protection to this industry. I voted last year to reduce the duty to 3 cents per gallon, so as to give the producers a chance to prepare themselves for the change. I feel that I am in the same position to-day, but I will say that, if a motion came up for free coal oil, I would vote for it this year, but I believe that the motion of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Moore) is reasonable, and that it should have every consideration possible. I heartily endorse it and will vote for it if it is put to the House.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Mr. Speaker, I shall not now repeat the arguments advanced on Monday night on a motion similar to this, but I would like to say that this motion is a different motion from that of Monday. It was perfectly legitimate that the debate on Monday's motion should be adjourned, inasmuch as, if that motion had been carried, it would have been a specific instruction to the Ministry on a certain question, and therefore the Ministry was perfectly justified in asking that the debate be adjourned. The circumstances are different in this case. This not being a specific instruction, but merely a general instruction and the means whereby the House can inform the Ministry of its views on the question, I am not in favour of adjourning the debate now, and will therefore vote against an adjournment.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, I voted the other night for the adjournment of the debate, but I did not feel that in doing so I lessened the position which I took in favour of free coal oil. Had I thought that by doing so, I lessened the position which I took on that question, I should not have voted for the adjournment of the debate. I thought it only fair to give the Government an opportunity of considering this question. I hoped and still do hope that the Government will make some announcement in regard to the reduction of the duty on coal oil. I propose to vote against the adjournment of the debate in order to emphasize the position I take in favour, either of the reduction of the duty, or of free coal oil.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, whether or not the duty on coal oil is higher than it should be is a reasonable and very legitimate matter for discussion, and there may be many reasons why it should be discussed by the House, even in advance of the Budget, so that hon. gentlemen who have strong views on the subject may have an opportunity to express themselves. We hold that it would not be proper, either as respects coal oil or any other item, to press for a division of the House in advance of the Budget. The Government's view of the question is, that all these things should be considered in connection with the Budget, when every particular item of the tariff and the whole tariff come to be reviewed. I do not think, therefore, that we are called upon to express an opinion upon the question at the present time. I think that members of the House, irrespective of party, will assent to the opinion, that the proper time to come to a conclusion and to vote upon any item of the tariff is when the Budget is under consideration. In the meantime, hon. gentlemen having expressed their views, I hope will agree to adjourn the debate until the matter shall come up at a later stage in proper form. I will support, very cordially, the motion of the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. MOORE. I have listened carefully to the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Finance. In regard to the duties that is a matter within the discretion of the Government, but if the hon. gentleman will give me a promise that the distribution of oil will be facilitated in the way I propose, I will be very glad to allow the motion to stand.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue was out during a portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. If the question to which he referred had been separated from that of the regulations possibly the latter part might have been better considered. I am not prepared to give any promise in the matter, but, if attention can be drawn to any part of the regulations which is insufficient for the convenience of the public, I am sure the Minister of Inland Revenue will be glad to give that every consideration. I would not like to give a definite promise that any particular action will be taken in regard to the matter.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. Speaker, in case the House should adopt the motion for the adjournment of the debate, I shall be ready to bring down the regulations affecting the different items mentioned by are not provided for, I shall be able to show that most of these items are already provided for by existing regulations. As to those that are not provided for, I shall be able to show the reasons why it has not been thought to be in the public interest to do what is now suggested. For instance, I will quote only one case. The hon. member declares in the motion that it will be in the interest of the consumers of coal oil for lighting or manufacturing purposes to permit its storage in tanks. This is now permissible; the Government allow the storage of oil in tanks. "And," the motion proceeds, "its distribution therefrom." Any one who understands the danger there is in allowing coal oil to be used, without being duly inspected, will understand the necessity of an inspection. While we consent to the storage of coal oil in tanks without inspecting it at the time it is stored, it is impossible to consent to its being taken out of these tanks without inspecting it and finding out what the flash test is, and without marking either upon the vessels or barrels in which that oil is placed, what the test and capacity are. This is one of the numerous items to which reference is made in this resolution. I would be glad of the opportunity, whenever this question comes before the House, to go over the regulations as they now exist. Any matter that is not already provided for may then become a subject for discussion, and it will be found that the Department of Inland Revenue is justified in upholding the regulations now existing.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). There is one part of the resolution which, I think, we might all readily agree to, namely, that the regulations shall be so changed, if possible, as to lessen the cost to the consumer of coal oil. I am referring only to the regulations. That part which proposes to reduce the duty on coal oil, I dissent from entirely. I dissent from the statement that has been made here this afternoon, and which has been spread indeed all over the country, that Canadian coal oil is inferior to the American article.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I am glad of those "hear, hears," from a set of hon. gentlemen opposite who put that report in circulation in Canada. During the last campaign, and long before it, the Liberal party, one and all—I think without a single exception either in this House or in the country—declared that the duty should be reduced on Canadian oil because the American oil could be obtained much cheaper and it was a vastly superior article. They told us that the duty was being kept on to rob the people and to put money into the hands of the refiners. I am glad that the hon. gentlemen now say "hear, hear," when I state that the Canadian oil is just as good as the American oil. I also dissent from the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Moore) that the duty on coal oil is paid entirely by the consumer. How can the hon. gentleman, or any one else, come to that conclusion, when after two years experience of a one cent per gallon reduction of duty on coal oil, the price to-day is as high, if not higher, than it was under the old duty. If the statement of the hon. gentleman is good, surely we should have coal oil somewhat cheaper than it was when the duty was one cent a gallon more. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact, that he conceded certain regulations to the Standard Oil Company by which they could control the price of refined oil, but the price of crude oil for the future, and under which he gave them a hold in Canada that they never had before. I say that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) did that he struck one of the most severe blows that ever was struck at the Canadian oil industry.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). What regulation do you refer to?

Mr. CLANCY. The regulation permitting Americans to bring their oil into Canada in tank cars. That appears a very innocent regulation on the surface, but my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) knows the late member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) saw with great clearness the damage that regulation would do, and he warned the Government what the result would be. My hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie) says there is no Standard Oil trust in Canada. There is no Standard Oil trust so far as the production of Canadian crude oil is concerned, but there is a trust in Canada of which these gentlemen may or may not be a part, under another name. The Standard Oil Company, whether it exists under that name or not, exists in Canada, and it is a trust that controls the price of crude oil and they could to-morrow close up every oil well in Canada if they thought proper. We are not concerned about the oil refiners in this country; they can take care of themselves, but we are concerned about the production of oil in Canada, which may be snuffed out at any moment if it be the will of this gigantic monopoly to lay their hands upon it. I again repudiate the idea that we produce an inferior oil in Canada, and I repudiate the statement that the duty upon oil is to-day paid by the consumer, for it is clear that the reduction of one cent per gallon in the duty has not decreased the price. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) told us a short time ago that $80,000 had been saved to the people of Canada by this reduction of duty on coal oil. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) that that is an absolute loss to the people. We have lost $80,000 in revenue, but that must be made up from some other quarter, and yet the oil consumers pay precisely the same price as they did before. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we have evidence beyond dispute, that the reduction in the duty on coal oil to-day, after the Standard Oil Company has got a foothold in Canada, is utterly useless and will give the people no relief. While I would be prepared to support the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Moore) so far as the regulations may be changed to make the price lower to the consumer, I must say that I shall at all times in this House vote against a reduction of the duty on coal oil.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I cannot agree with the argument of the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), that the reduction of the duty on coal oil would not reduce the price if the duty were taken off coal oil, it certainly would reduce the price to the consumer, provided you have competition, and that competition can be furnished from the other side of the line, because, as I have already pointed out, there are several independent oil companies in the United States who are quite willing to do business in Canada, and are doing business in Winnipeg at the present time. If the duty were lessened by two or three cents a gallon it certainly would reduce the price of oil to the consumer by that amount. There is no question at all about that. I regret that my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Moore) did not make his proviso as to the oil regulations into a separate motion. I do not believe that these oil regulations are necessary, and I have always looked upon them as an indirect way of getting more protection for the oil producers of this country. I do not see why coal oil could not be sold the same as any other commodity. After it is inspected there is no reason why it should not be sold in wagons or in tank cars or in any other way. The Minister of Inland Revenue tells us it must be inspected to protect the public. Well, we know of other commodities of a more dangerous character than coal oil, such as carbide for acetylene gas, and carbide is sold the same as sugar, without any restrictions. I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), that this motion is different from the one I moved the other day. When my motion was before the House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) asked that it should stand over until such time as his policy was laid before the House, and until we heard what his intentions were with regard to the matter. I thought that was a reasonable proposition at the time, but if it was reasonable in the case of my motion, it certainly is reasonable in the case of the motion of my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Moore). If my motion should stand over until after the Budget is brought down, this motion should stand over too. If there is not some relief given to the consumer when the Budget is before the House, I, for one, shall take the earliest opportunity in committee of moving that the duty on coal oil be reduced.

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead). I wish to offer a brief explanation, so that I may place myself right before the House. I was interested in the explanation given by the Minister of Inland Revenue with regard to the inspection of oil. We have to pay 10 cents a barrel for inspection and marking the barrel, and in this way a car-load of oil will cost $6. A tank car can be inspected as easily as one barrel, and just as effectively. The hon. gentleman from London (Mr. Beattie) made the statement that I was misrepresenting the facts of the case, and I think he even put it stronger than that. I regret that the hon. gentleman should have made such a statement. He tells us that the oil refineries are not in the hands of the Standard Oil trust, and that I misrepresented the facts in stating that they were at one time. I am very well aware of the existence of the Bushnell Company and the Imperial Oil Company, and I am also well aware that the Standard Oil trust has acquired control of all these companies, and thus practically control the oil industry of Canada, since which time oil has materially advanced. When I made the statement which I did, I substantiated it by the oath of a man who is in the oil business and who understands all about it. In his affidavit he says :

That all the petroleum oil refineries in Canada at the present time are under the control of the Standard Oil Company or Standard Oil Trust through the said company having acquired some outright and a controlling interest in others.

This is one of the reasons why I made that statement, and I think I have a right to say that I am correct, and that the hon. gentleman went a little too far in saying that I misrepresented the fact when I said that the oil industry of Canada was under the control of this trust.

Mr. THOS. FORTIN (Laval). I wish to qualify the vote which I intend to give, as I understand the vote will be taken on the motion to adjourn the debate. To that I can see no objection whatever; and while I intend to vote for it, I wish to say that I am entirely in favour of a reduction of the duty on coal oil. In the election of 1896, I, for one, denounced the duty on coal oil as outrageous, as far in excess of what it should have been; and one of the reasons which, in my humble opinion, were in favour of that view was that coal oil was consumed mainly by the rural population. In the cities and towns either electricity or gas is now generally used for the purpose of lighting, and I understand that the greatest consumption of coal oil is for that purpose. Therefore, the duty, whatever it is, is paid by the consumers in the rural districts, and for that reason it seems to me that it is one of those duties which should be reduced as much as possible, if not entirely removed. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am in favour of the principle contained in the motion, of reducing the duty on coal oil; at the same time, I do not see any objection to adjourn the debate in order to wait until the Budget speech is delivered, when I hope we may learn that a further reduction has been accepted by the Government.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Speaker, I am quite unable to accept, for myself, the advice given to us by the Minister of Finance. He asked us to wait until the Budget speech comes down; and if you have no views on the question, as hon. gentlemen opposite appear to have very vague views upon it, then you are to fall in with the course the Government have taken, and it will be all right. The Finance Minister assumes that the Government is greater than the Parliament. That may be the case in practice, but the theory is quite the opposite. The theory is that this House, composed of 213 members, is quite capable of expressing its opinion, and telling the Government what it desires to have done. But the Minister of Finance gets up and coolly tells us: "Oh, you are 213 members, to be sure; but you have not a right to hold an opinion on this matter. The Government are the only power who have a right to express their views on the question." I think it is eminently proper, Sir, that this resolution should come up, and be disposed of, and be disposed of now—not by the subterfuge which is proposed by the Government whenever difficult matters come up—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), you mean. He is the mover of the motion.

Mr. WALLACE. His object is to kill the resolution. I do not care whether that is his object or not. I have my views on this subject, which I am going to express; but if the resolution is to be killed, I believe in killing it in a fair, straight way. Vote it down, if it be not a good one, or adopt it if it be a good one. The motion of the member for London to adjourn the debate exactly meets the views of the Minister of Finance; he says that suits him to a "t"; it is just what he would have done—have the matter postponed. Now, I think we should not postpone this matter, but the views of the members of Parliament should be given upon it now; for we know from past experience that they will not be given after the Government have brought down their proposals. We know from the experience of last year and the year before, and even from the experience of the present session—if it were not alluding to another debate—that those gentlemen who profess to have such strong views on this question, can set aside those views. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) tells us that he is quite favourable to let this motion stand over—what for? So that no decision shall be reached upon it; so that the free and independent expression of opinion by the members of the House of Commons shall be choked off. What else does the motion to adjourn mean? We have heard a good many motions to adjourn the debate in the past few days, and in every one of these cases the Government have been afraid to meet the question or have it met by Parliament. So it is in this case, though the motion is not proposed by a member of the Government. The Government would apparently have proposed it if the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) had not done so. This Government, through the course they have already taken, have become responsible for those disasters which are happening around us with regard to this question, and there are other and greater difficulties threatening the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. I hear the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Fliat) say "hear, hear." Members who are looking for a judgeship, who have their hands tied, who are not free and independent members of Parliament, may sneer at every honest expression of opinion in this House; but, Mr. Speaker, there are other members of this House who are not tied down.

Mr. FLINT. Will my hon. friend allow me to say that I never spoke. I did not give utterance to any word at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WALLACE. I was interrupted from that side of the House, and I noticed that these interruptions came from gentlemen who, it is well known, are looking for judgeships and other positions, and who are ready at any moment to hound down any independent member of Parliament who dares to express his opinion in this House. I can only say that they cannot prevent me from expressing my view at any time on any public question.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he still adheres to the statement that I made any remark?

Mr. WALLACE. I certainly do not. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, that the hon. gentleman made no remark, but the sound came from very close to where he is sitting. However, I see the sinner sitting behind him. I was proceeding to say that this Standard Oil Company, which has made its way into Canada and is threatening our freedom and our liberty by the influences that it controls, has come in, not before the legislation that these hon. gentlemen opposite introduced, but as a consequence of their legislation. And I remember, Sir, that this Standard Oil Company is that monopoly which controls legislation in the United States, which has its hand on the throat of the whole railway system of that country, which buys up the railways of that country, and buys them with the money of the people, because its plan is this. It goes to the railways there, just as it is doing in Canada to-day, and says: We want you to give us a reduced rate to a certain point. We want you to carry our oil for 5 cents, and charge the other fellows your regular rate of 10 cents; and we want you to give us back the 5 cents extra that these others pay you. So that, practically, these people get their goods carried for nothing on the railways, and the opposing companies have to pay the bill, and the people in the long run, of course, have to pay the whole shot. They are doing business in that way in Canada to-day. They have obtained possession of the Queen City Oil Company, a large enterprise, so that that company is simply now the Standard Oil Company of the United States.

More than that. Some gentleman on the other side has said that the company does not control the oil works in Canada. Sir, there are 6,000 oil wells pumping oil to-day in Canada, perhaps a little more. These oil wells are worth, say, $200 each, which would make $1,200,000 investment. I do not believe that the Standard Oil Company has practically a dollar of that $1,200,000 invested.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to correct him, as I am sure he does not wish to misrepresent the facts? There are nearer 10,000 wells in Canada to-day than 6,000, and the cost is near $500 per well than $200.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has said that I do not want to misrepresent him. Well, I was taking a modest figure, but he makes it still larger, which makes my case still stronger. I say that the Standard Oil Company is not the owner of one of those wells, and does not want to own them, but wants simply to control them without having a dollar invested in them at all. It is not going to invest its money in those wells, but is controlling every one of them. And how? Why, by controlling the refineries, and the crude oil is worth nothing unless the refiners buy it. Why, a few months ago, before this company got control, a barrel of crude oil was worth $1.40. What is it worth to-day? It was down to $1.12 or $1.15 a short time ago. The company controls the price. It is practically the only purchaser, and it says to the owners of the 10,000 wells: Here is the price of the oil to-day, and you have to take that price or keep your oil. Those men do not own the wells, and do not intend to own them, but intend to control the product of every one of them, and are doing that to-day under the legislation which hon. gentlemen opposite introduced and carried through this House.

What more? We are told that we are going to get cheaper oil. On the contrary, we are getting dearer oil. The Canadian producer gets less for his crude oil, but the consumer has to pay a higher price for his coal oil. That is the result of the operations of the Standard Oil Company, yet the present Government have put a law in the Statute-book, saying that any combination or anything of this kind will be punishable. They have not, however, attempted to put the law in operation. Is the law so crude and unworkable that it would not reach these men? Why? Because the Standard Oil Company are not particular whether the Canadian oil wells are closed or not. They have a double barrel to their arrangement. Supposing that the duty on coal oil were reduced, or supposing it were abolished, the Standard Oil Company would not care a snap. All they would have to pay would be the leases of those refining works which they now have leased in Canada, and even those, perhaps, they would not have to pay, because we are told there is some kind of a joint stock partnership between the company and the Canadian well owners that might let them out. The result, therefore, would be, that the industry of the Canadian producer of crude oil would be destroyed, and his millions of dollars invested would not be worth a copper, while the company would simply pour in its tank cars to consumers, and by its excellent arrangements send the American products into Canada. These people would pour their oil into Canada; there would be no competition from the Canadian producers, as they would shut down all Canadian wells by refusing to buy from them, and they could charge whatever figure they pleased for their oil. I need only refer to what they have done elsewhere. We know what they have done out on the Pacific coast, where they control the railway rates and have a monopoly. We know what they have done in every place where they have a monopoly. We know that in such places they have not scrupled a moment to use their power to charge the highest figures possible. This resolution, therefore, which I do not approve, may run us into greater difficulties than we have laboured under before, and the Government is bound to come down with some legislation which will do away with this monopoly of the Standard Oil Company and prevent its controlling the price of refined oil in Canada as well as the price of crude oil, besides bulldozing the railways and oppressing the Canadian people generally. I say, that the Government is responsible, and will be held responsible for the exactions and robbery of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, because that company has come into Canada under the ægis and auspices of this Administration.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). It appears to me that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has indulged in considerable exaggeration, though possibly without intending it, in these statements he has made. He started out with the contention, that the legislation introduced and carried through by this Government, encouraged and facilitated the establishment of the oil company in Canada. But the hon. gentleman did not quote the section of the Act to which he referred, when making that statement. He knows well that for a considerable time there was a strong agitation in this country to facilitate the importation of American oil. Owing to the fact that it had to be imported in barrels and be subjected to inspection in barrels, which very considerably increased the cost, it was argued that you might very considerably reduce the cost, without seriously reducing the revenue, by permitting it to come into

Mr. WALLACE.

Canada in tank cars or boats, and I presume the legislation to that effect is what he refers to. Well, I cannot understand how that legislation at all encouraged the establishment of the Standard Oil Company in Canada. It would rather tend to have the opposite effect. It allowed them to send in coal oil on more liberal terms than hon. gentlemen opposite permitted before they left office. And the reason why that was done was, not to encourage the Standard Oil Company to come into Canada, but to reduce the cost of oil to the consumer in Canada. The hon. gentleman makes a very fierce attack upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) because the hon. Minister is desirous of adjourning this discussion, in the meantime, until the Budget is brought down. The hon. Minister of Finance did not, for a moment, suggest that any hon. member should hesitate to express his views on this very important subject. All he suggested was, that in the meantime, and until the Budget speech is made, no definite action should be taken by the House. The hon. gentleman also made other charges, charges that, I think, he should have hesitated to make, when he alleged that members on this side were influenced by the fact that they were seeking for offices, such as judgeships, and so on. I think the hon. gentleman should have refrained from making any of these insinuations. I can say this—that the older members of this House who have sat here for a number of years unquestionably have had a considerable education by example in a course of that kind. We can remember when we sat on that side of the House, and looking over here, could count by the row men who were seeking positions and who afterwards got them. Hon. gentlemen opposite then set us very bad examples. If any on this side can be charged with anything of that kind, hon. gentlemen opposite are the men who set the example. But more than that, I can say that I do not think the charge at all well made; for I think the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in the views he has expressed as to gentlemen on this side seeking positions in that way. For my part, I know of none.

Now, I may be allowed to express my views frankly with regard to the question of coal oil. I think that this is an item that the Government would do well to consider very carefully and very seriously in the adjustment of the tariff. I believe that the people of this country would hail with great satisfaction—more particularly in the rural districts—a reduction of the duty on coal oil. This is a question that has been widely agitated throughout the rural districts for a considerable time, and I think this is one of the items in the tariff that would bear a reduction. I do not say that it would be fair to place coal oil on the free list. I can easily understand how some hon. gentlemen from the North-west would like to see such a change; but I do not think it would be fair to admit coal oil free and charge a duty on other things. Coal oil should be subject to fair taxation for revenue purposes as much as anything else that is imported. In my opinion—and I hope the Government will come to that opinion—the rate at present charged is somewhat in excess of the ordinary rate for revenue purposes, and I would like to see a reduction. I hope the Government will give the matter their careful consideration, and that when the Budget comes down, we may all be pleased to find some little reduction made in the duty on coal oil.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). I would not have made any observations on this resolution, but for the remarks made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) with regard to myself. I think that, upon reflection, hon. gentlemen will agree with me that his observation is uncalled for: and in view of the fact that I made no remark whatever during his speech, particularly uncalled for. Now, I do not suppose that a member who, either in jocularly or in earnest, is accused of being a seeker after office, need feel called upon to rise in his place and solemnly deny that which may be turned aside as a matter rather of jest than of earnest. But as the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) seemed to have a very strong impression of that kind with regard to myself personally, I desire to say for his benefit, and for that of other hon. gentlemen, that there is no foundation whatever for the insinuation that has been made with regard to myself; and I trust that hon. members will have the courtesy not to indulge in charges of that kind which can only be repudiated at the expense of a certain loss of the dignity which belongs to a member of the House.

Now, Sir, the subject matter of this discussion is one of very great interest. I quite agree with the principles of the resolutions; they are quite in line with motions which I have made myself in this House that greater facilities should be afforded for the importation of coal oil in large quantities in order that the price to the consumer may be reduced. Also, to the extent that it declares for the principle that, so far as it is consistent with the general views of the Administration, that the duty upon these articles should be reduced, the resolution is strictly in line with my own views. And, whenever the matter is brought before the House, as I presume it will be by some step taken by the Administration in that regard, I shall have a great deal of satisfaction in supporting any such step. At the present time, however, I have no hesitation whatever in saying the resolution appears to me to be inopportune; and it would be very advisable that the debate should be adjourned until the proposition which the Ministry may lay before the House is made, in order that the matter may be discussed in its relations to all other matters pertaining to the amendment or the improvement of the tariff and looking to a reduction of such duties as the Administration and the House may deem it wise to reduce in the interest of the country.

I trust that the Administration will consider the views which have been expressed favourable to this resolution, and that it may lead them to give such further relief as may seem proper under the circumstances. There is no doubt a great deal of truth in the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) that between the producer of this commodity in the raw state and the consumer at retail there are transportation charges or profits made by middlemen representing altogether too large a margin. The subject is one demanding very careful inquiry; and I have every reason to believe that if that inquiry is made and the point of difference clearly ascertained, some steps may be taken by which the price of this useful and important commodity may be greatly reduced to the consumer. I think that the debate should be adjourned.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I do not think I would have said anything on this question but for the remarks made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I think that if there is one member more than another who ought to be ashamed of himself to appear as an apologist for the Standard Oil Company, it is that hon. gentleman. Year after year in this House we have heard that melodious voice condemning the late Government because they would not allow coal oil to be brought in free or at a greatly reduced rate of duty. Year after year he was ready at any time to support a motion to reduce the duty on coal oil, and that before the Minister of Finance had made his Budget speech. It made no difference to him when he brought up that question, so long as it answered his purpose in this House. But to-day he gets up and says that it is unfair to force on a motion of this kind before the Minister of Finance makes his Budget speech. I think the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is the last man in this House to make any such complaint as that, in view of his past record, for certainly there never was a greater sinner in this House in violating this principle than that hon. member, who now comes to the rescue of his own friends when they are in power. Then he says it is unfair that allusion should be made to those hon. members in this House who are looking for positions under the Government. He was referring to some remarks made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) about some interruptions coming from the other side of the House, and the hon. member for West York remarked that those interruptions usually came from those on the other side of the House who are looking after offices under the Government, or who have promises of offices of emolument in their pockets. The hon. member for North Wellington now comes to their defence, and says that no such remark should be made by an

hon. member, because the members on his side are not, as a class, looking for office. Well, I can only ask the hon. gentleman if he forgets that during the last two years and a half, fourteen of their members have been taken out of this House and appointed to lucrative offices under the Crown. Does he forget that when hon. members opposite were charged with defending the Government while they held promises of office in their pockets, the newspapers supporting that party came to their defence and said that they did not get the offices that were promised them? Why, Sir, how can members of Parliament be independent of the Government when they expect places of emolument from the Government, even if they do not hold the promises of such offices in their pockets? How can we expect them to vote against the Government on any question, no matter how diametrically opposed to the interests of the people such question may be? It is impossible, it is not in the nature of things that those hon. gentlemen can be independent members of Parliament. We have had illustration after illustration of that, to the extent that fourteen members of Parliament during the last two and a half years have received offices of emolument under the Crown, and during the short time they sat in the House they were all found to defend and advocate every measure introduced by the Government. I say the very fact that they have done so raises, at least, a suspicion in the public mind that those members could not be independent members of Parliament. We are told that there are at least twelve members on that side of the House to-day who are expecting offices. I am reminded just now that the number is twenty-four instead of twelve; that only shows how modest I was in my statement. Then, when we hear offensive remarks from time to time from those hon. gentlemen, we have good reason to believe from what we know that they expect to go out of the House after the present session and step into good offices provided for them by the Government they are now supporting. Is it then any wonder that we should be inclined to criticise hon. members when they make those offensive remarks across the floor of the House to hon. gentlemen on this side, who dare to speak a word in behalf of the people of this country.

Now, Sir, I have before me the "Hansard," and I find that whenever a proposition was made in this House to reduce the duty on coal oil, the hon. member for North Wellington always supported it, in the interests, as he was pleased to say, of the large class of consumers in this country. Then he was found practically supporting the Standard Oil Company in their efforts to get into Canada. Yet, he says, what is their object in coming into Canada? Why, it is to reduce the cost of oil. Does the hon. gentleman know so little about it, he, a commercial man in Canada, as to get up and tell this House that the Standard Oil Company desires to get in here for the purpose of reducing the price of coal oil to the Canadian consumer? What was their conduct when they asked for that concession to be allowed to bring in coal oil in tank ships? Was their object to reduce the price of coal oil to the Canadian consumer? Not by any means. The fact is that after they got in here they began to put the railway companies in such a position that they could compel them to lower their freight rates to the Standard Oil Company, and to give them a rebate upon all the coal oil shipped over their roads, while at the same time the Canadian producer was charged a higher freight rate than they were getting. I am justified in that conclusion, because it is a matter of notoriety, and it was brought to the attention of the Government only a few months ago, that after they got in here they were doing the very thing that they intended to do, they took advantage of the concession to bring in these tank ships, and they compelled the railway companies to give them better freight rates than to the producers of oil in Canada. Therefore, they had a larger profit on their business, which enabled them to go further and get control of the oil refineries in Canada, and as soon as they got control of those refineries then they worked to their own profit and to the detriment of the great mass of the consumers in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that the oil wells are not under the control of the Standard Oil Company. That is a fact, they are not. They do not require to own the wells at all, it is much better for their purpose to control the refineries. But it is said they do not control all the refineries in Canada to-day. Well, I think it is well known that any man who can control 65 per cent of a trade can control the whole trade, and he can dictate the market prices on that commodity, whatever it is. So monopolists have found it the world over. American trusts have found that whenever they could control 60 per cent of the output of sugar, they controlled the price of sugar in the market; when they controlled 40 per cent of the output of sugar, they controlled the market for sugar. So it is with Canadian oils to-day. If this trust can control 40, 50 or 60 per cent—and they control more than that, because I am told they control at least 75 per cent of the output to-day—therefore, they are able to control the whole price, and they are doing it to the detriment of the consumers and of the oil producers in Petrolia. I have every respect for those men who are fighting for their rights, but they are to-day under that gigantic monopoly, they are ground down to their own detriment. The poor man who owns his one, two or three wells there, is obliged to take for his crude oil whatever the Standard Oil Company is pleased to give them, and he can get no more for it. The oil producers have no redress, because to-day, by virtue of the regulations made by the present Government and of the relaxation made in those regulations, they have given over the oil market of Canada as completely to that Standard Oil Company as if they had sold out to them the whole oil interests of Canada. So I say that the Standard Oil Company of the United States controls that industry in Canada to-day, to the detriment of the consumer and to the detriment of the producer as well. And they can return thanks to the present Government for enabling them to accomplish that. And to-day hon. gentlemen are found in this House as apologists of that company, as the member for North Wellington was only a few moments ago.

Amendment agreed to, and debate adjourned.

LEASE OF CHAMP DE MARS.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved for :

Copy of lease or agreement and of all correspondence relating to the occupation of the Champ de Mars in the city of Montreal by the Montreal authorities, and the condition of said occupation.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the object of this motion is to obtain a copy of the deed under which the Champ de Mars, in the city of Montreal, is occupied by the municipal authorities, and all the correspondence relating to that occupation. The question has some importance at the present time. As this House is perhaps aware, or at least, as many of the members from the province of Quebec are aware, the farmers in the neighbourhood of Montreal, and indeed, I may say, the citizens of Montreal themselves, are suffering from a very considerable inconvenience which has existed for some time and which may safely be said to be almost intolerable, and that is the inadequate accommodation furnished for the purposes of a general market. To what extent, the farmers of my own county, of the county of Laval, of the counties to the south of Montreal, and, in fact, of all the counties from which farmers are in the habit of coming to use the market of Montreal, have suffered from this inconvenience, it is unnecessary for me to detain the House in describing, but suffice it to say that there is not at present accommodation at the Bonsecours market for one-third of those who go there. Under these circumstances, the question of providing more ample market accommodation has agitated the people of Montreal, as well as those other parties interested outside of the city, for a considerable time. Three plans have been prominently put before the public in connection with this very necessary improvement. One of these plans consisted in the expropriation of a considerable number of buildings in the immediate neighbourhood of the present market in order to make that market place larger and furnish sufficient accommodation for the farmers and the citizens of Montreal having business upon the market. This plan offered some objections. One of these objections was that the expropriation in question was a very expensive one, and would entail a very considerable drain upon the finances of the city. In view of these circumstances other projects were presented to the public, and one of these projects, which was put forward by the mayor of St. Laurent, Mr. Edouard Gohier, a very competent man in matters of this kind, consisted in enlarging the present Bonsecours market proper by extending large sheds and a large platform over the present existing Commissioners Street. That plan, which did not involve the expropriation to which I referred a moment ago, met with considerable favour, and deservedly so. For my own part, I am not prepared to say that Mr. Gohier's plan is not, to a certain extent at least, in respect to the expenditure, one preferable to that which consisted in expropriating to the east of Jacques Cartier square, the present market-place. But another plan was suggested, and it is in reference to that plan that I have made the motion which is at present under the consideration of the House. That plan consisted in taking possession of the Champ de Mars, and transforming that ancient parade ground into a market-place. I presume that if the city of Montreal contemplates executing that project, it will be necessary for the city to obtain the consent of the Dominion Government, because, although I have no knowledge of the terms and conditions of its occupancy of the Champ de Mars, it is the property of the Dominion Government, and I do not presume that it was ever anticipated that the place should be turned into a market-place. That transformation, Sir, is, of the three plans for the improvement of our market, the one which commends itself the least to my appreciation. It seems to me that it presents many objections, and it is for the purpose of bringing these objections to the notice of the Government that I have made this motion. In the first place there is this objection, not without weight, that the Champ de Mars is now one of the public open spaces in that very crowded part of the city. It is a very ancient and historical ground, and without grave reasons I do not think the Government should consent to its destination being changed. The proposal would efface a very old and valuable landmark, and it would destroy for the people who live in that part of the city, one of their breathing places. In the next place, Sir, the Champ de Mars, as people familiar with the city of Montreal are aware, is situated immediately behind two of our most important public buildings. The court-house lies immediately to the south and I imagine that if the Champ de Mars were turned into a market place, the change would not be viewed with favour by judges, lawyers, litigants, nor indeed by persons generally who have business in the court-house. It would destroy to a very great extent, I think, the value of that building as a place for the sittings of the courts. The Champ de Mars is also bounded on one side by the city hall, and apart from the fact of its lending an improved appearance to that building, its transformation into a market would, I think, interfere to a certain extent—although to a lesser extent than in the case of the court-house—with the convenience of those having municipal business to transact. The transformation of the Champ de Mars would also be a great loss to the Montreal militia, for it is situated directly in front of the drill hall and is used by the volunteers very frequently. They would lose this parade ground completely, or if they were to retain its use to any extent, then it could only be availed of in a mere temporary way for market purposes, and that arrangement would, I venture to say, be very inconvenient for the farmers themselves and even for citizens having business there. The plan of using the Champ de Mars for a market place, although it might present at first sight some advantage of economy, does not commend itself to those who have at heart a proper provision for extended market accommodation in the city of Montreal. I do not pronounce between the two other plans, for they have not been sufficiently investigated, but I think either of them would, perhaps, be a little costly, although acceptable to those who have at heart the improvement of our market place. And although that cost appears to be rather considerable, yet we must bear in mind that all farmers coming into the city of Montreal have to contribute to the revenue of the city, and that the fees derived from the farmers form in the aggregate a very considerable sum. I think if the improved market, upon either of the two plans which have been suggested, were administered in a proper way and without additional charges, the city of Montreal would derive a very considerable revenue upon the expenditure entailed by that improvement, and the position of farmers surrounding the city of Montreal would be made much more satisfactory by the change. It seems to me, therefore, that it is important that the attention of the Government should be called to this matter, and that the House should have before it the documents indicating under what terms the Champ de Mars is occupied by the city of Montreal, and that the Government should be on its guard, in case it is attempted to vary these terms in such a way as to permit of the modification to which I have alluded. The Government should see that the interests of the large class who require the improvement of the market of Montreal should be amply protected.

Mr. THOS. FORTIN (Laval). I heartily concur, to a large extent, in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). The necessity of improving the market facilities of the city of Montreal have been recognized for many, many years, and the present condition of things is, as the hon. member (Mr. Monk) said, intolerable. The farmers, in order to secure a place for the Tuesday market, have in almost every case to drive to the city the day before, and they are compelled to remain up all night to watch the products in their carts, and to be there for hours and hours before the opening of the market. Many suggestions have been made as to the manner of improving our market facilities. The three plans mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. Monk) have been studied for some time, and I entirely concur in his conclusion, that the plan by which the Champ de Mars should be annexed to the Bonsecours market, so to speak, is not practical and should not be adopted. There are some very serious objections to it. In the first place, as the hon. member (Mr. Monk) said, the Champ de Mars is just behind the two most important public buildings of the city, namely, the city hall and the court-house. Now, a market place is not desirable within very close proximity to such important buildings, and again, the distance between the Champ de Mars and the space now occupied as the Bonsecours market is considerable. There is also a great difference of level between the Champ de Mars and the present market. Most of the Bonsecours market is situated on St. Paul Street near the market building itself. There is a portion which has been used as a market known as Jacques Cartier Square, but that does not extend further north than Notre Dame Street, and from Notre Dame Street to the Champ de Mars must be at least three acres, so that such an intervening space would prove very inconvenient. We have not in this House authority to compel the city of Montreal to make improvements in its market, for under our constitution that authority rests with the provincial legislature, but I am happy that such an occasion as this has given me—because I represent one of the rural constituencies most interested in this matter—an opportunity to express my views as to the urgent necessity of improving the market accommodation in the city of Montreal. If that be the main point of the motion, I entirely concur in what has been said by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that the Dominion Government should not allow the Champ de Mars to be converted in the way proposed in the scheme mentioned by that hon. gentleman.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is no objection to the production of the papers, and they will be brought down as soon as possible. I do not know what is the nature of the tenure which we have given to the city of Montreal. I understand, however, the object which has been very lucidly explained by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and I may say to the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) that I share the views he has expressed. I am not sufficiently familiar with the matter to know what different schemes have been proposed in Montreal to give more accommodation to the public around the Bonsecours market; but I altogether share in the view expressed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that it would be a great pity if that old historic ground, the Champ de Mars, were to be defaced for utilitarian purposes, no matter what those purposes might be. We have not too many of these historical places; and, wherever they are, they ought to be safeguarded. The Champ de Mars is not only historical ground, but one of the few breathing spaces which we have in that part of the city, where the population is very much congested. The city of Montreal is spreading in all directions, and I believe that in some other place the necessary accommodation could be obtained for the trading public.

Motion agreed to.

JUDICIAL BUSINESS IN MONTREAL.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved for:

Statement of sums paid as travelling expenses to the judges of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec coming from outside districts to sit in the city of Montreal.

1st. From the 1st of January, 1898, up to the coming into force of the statute 61 Victoria (Canada), chap. 52, and

2nd. Since the coming into force of said statute down to the 1st of March, 1899.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the House will remember that last year, when the Act introduced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) was before the House, the hope was expressed that some of the travelling expenses of our judges in the province of Quebec, to which exception had been taken, would be reduced; and it is therefore interesting for us, particularly just now, when we are considering the supplies, to compare the working of the system in force in the year preceding the coming into operation of that Act with the working of the system during the few months that Act has been in force. But the motion assumes additional importance from the fact that since we sat last year a statute has been passed by the legislature of the province of Quebec creating three new judgeships for the city of Montreal; and I think it behooves us, before we are called upon to vote the necessary salaries for these three judges, to examine whether some other plan could not be adopted than that of creating new judgeships expressly for the city of Montreal, in order to meet the undoubted requirements of that locality. There can be no question—and any member of the bar of Montreal who is here will, I am sure, readily corroborate me—as to the great necessity of our having additional judges in the district of Montreal. But among the motives suggested for the creation of these three new judgeships was the fact, stated, I believe, in the local legislature, that the great necessity for judges in the city of Montreal, and the consequent obligation of calling in judges from neighbouring districts, had entailed an expense upon the Dominion Government far greater than the sum necessary to pay the salaries of three additional judges. That statement was made, no doubt, in good faith; and we so often require judges in the city of Montreal that one might naturally think at first sight that we did spend very large sums in bringing judges from the neighbouring districts; but the return I called for will, I think, show that we by no means spend so much as $15,000, which would be the sum required to pay the salaries of three additional judges. In fact, I think this return will show that the expense of bringing judges into the city during the past year did not amount to anything like that sum, or to anything like half or even a third of that sum. In reality, if we continue to bring judges from the neighbouring districts—and we could scarcely bring them frequently enough to meet the requirements of the case—there will still be a considerable margin. But I think we should look at the question from a higher standpoint, and the idea suggests itself to my mind whether we ought not in this necessity of having an increase in the number of judges sitting in Montreal—whether we ought not to seek in some way to improve the present system of judicature, instead of intensifying the defects which undoubtedly attach to the present system. The present system of decentralization, although it has worked satisfactorily, and although I think the mass of the people would be loath to part with it, and although I, for my part, feel we ought to maintain that system, presents many defects which time has revealed, and which, I think, a careful examination by the Government of this Dominion, together with the Government of the province of Quebec, might to a very great extent remedy. One of the objections that I find to the present system is that we have too many districts. It has been said very often that whereas the judges in the city of Montreal, and probably in those centres where there is a large population, are overworked, there are districts where the judges have very little to do, because there is very little business. Looking to the immediate vicinity of Montreal, I see there districts which, in my judgment, might very properly be united. I speak, of course, subject to correction, and merely for the purpose of suggestion, but look, for instance, at the districts of Beauharnois and Iberville. Here are two districts which, if we consider the volume of business done there, I think we will be able to say might very properly be put into one. I think the same remarks would apply to the districts of Terrebonne and Joliette. There is more business, I think, done in the district of Terrebonne, but I do not think that the public good would suffer in any way by their being joined together. The same remark applies also, within a short distance from Montreal, to the districts of St. Hyacinthe and Richelieu. I believe that very properly those districts might also be united. I am speaking of the territory within the immediate vicinity of Montreal. I am not in a position to speak with knowledge of the territory which lies around Quebec, but if the condition of things to which I refer exists in the neighbourhood of Montreal, I am sure that it will also be found to exist in certain districts around the city of Quebec. There is there, it seems to me, room for improvement, by which we might have judges in the city of Montreal without doing any injury to the neighbouring country.

But there is another rule, and I am sorry that I do not see the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) in his place, which has obtained in the past in regard to our judges sitting in rural districts, which rule seems now to be obsolete, and even to a certain extent noxious, and that is the rule of residence. I do not wish to do away with the decentralization which was introduced in the past with much advantage, but why make it necessary for a rural judge to live in his district? Of course, in the inception of this system, many years ago, the modes of communication were difficult, and for that reason and perhaps for others, it was necessary to decree that a rural judge should reside in his district; but now that communications have become so very easy, should not a rural judge be able to reside in some of the large centres within easy reach of his district? I can see no reason against that. The judge who is forced to reside in a rural district lives almost alone. Socially he is obliged to live apart from the people around him to a very great extent, and above all things he is deprived of communication with his brother judges, and we all know what a disadvantage that is. He has not the advantage of conferring with other members of the bench. He has not the advantages, properly speaking, except in exceptional circumstances, of sitting in these large centres and of obtaining the experience and the knowledge which follow necessarily from residence in a place where litigation is more important and more considerable, and where he is every day obliged to consult with his confrères on the bench. It seems to me, therefore, that if, on the one hand, we could arrive with the provincial authorities at some arrangement by which these districts where there is less to do, could be united with other districts so as to give a fair amount of judicial work, and, on the other hand, have our rural judges whom we are very glad to see in the city of Montreal, sit either in Quebec or Montreal, and still be able to attend to the districts assigned to them, a great deal of the present congestion would be done away with, and in that manner we would at the same time preserve the system of decentralization, and do away with the evils which that system has shown to exist. Of course, Sir, I make these suggestions in order to bring them before the notice of the Department of Justice, because I think modifications in the direction I have indicated can be very properly made at present on account of the pleasant relations no doubt existing between this Government and our provincial government. This is, above all things, the suitable moment for a conference upon this subject, which interests us all. But, also, I think that, if it is found impossible to arrive at some arrangement by which these suggestions may be adopted, we would still have to consider whether the considerable expenditure required for the appointment of new judges in the city of Montreal could not be avoided in view of the fact that with probably two-thirds of that sum we could obtain relief in judges from the remaining districts.

Mr. MONK.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks just made by my hon. friend upon a subject which is not new, of which we have heard often in this House, and as to which, up to this time, we have not been able to come to any satisfactory conclusion. There is no doubt whatever that the judicial business in Montreal is congested. Evidence of this we have had and have again in the last action of the local legislature of Quebec. The question is now whether or not it is possible to obtain relief in the manner suggested by the local legislature, that is to say, by appointing three new judges, the salaries of whom would be largely defrayed by the fact that the expenses now incurred in travelling would be decreased, if not altogether reduced. The statement which has been made on the floor of the local legislature, that the salaries of these three judges would be compensated by the decreased expenditure in travelling expenses, I do not believe to be warranted by the facts. In fact the appropriations for the travelling expenses of judges for the province of Quebec is only $16,000, and, therefore, though I have not looked at the figures, the amount expended on the travelling expenses of judges having to attend the Superior Court of the city of Montreal cannot be anything like that amount.

I do not know how much that is, but certainly it is not anything like that figure. But the question at present is not so much a question of expenditure. If this is a need of the country, the country is rich enough to pay for the administration of its judicial business. But, whenever this question has come up, we have always been met with the fact, or rather with the statement, that our judicial system is not adequate, that too many judges have too much to do, and some others have not enough to do. But I would like to ask, for my part, what satisfactory answer could be given to that? It is more a question of geography than anything else. Take, for instance, the district of Gaspé, which is, as one may say, at the other end of the continent, not easy of access and with a sparse population. The judge there has not much to do. But how is this to be avoided? This district is so far away from the rest of the province, so shut up by itself that I do not see how you could do justice to that district without having a resident judge. There has been a resident judge in that district from the earliest years of the century. The judge has never had much to do; but all Governments since confederation, as well as before confederation, have felt that the geographical situation of the district of Gaspé was such that it was entitled to have a resident judge. So, for my part, my opinion is, that, even though the judge in Gaspé may have very little to do, it is impossible to do without a resident judge in a district like that. It is well known that, when the judicial decentralization was carried out in 1856, it was carried out on lines altogether too broad. When we had five districts at that time, it was a great mistake to create twenty-five—ten or twelve would have been enough. But these districts have been created, and my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) knows as well as I do, that nothing would be so difficult as to wipe out any of them. The hon. gentleman has suggested that Terrebonne and Joliette could be united. I doubt it very much. I am not prepared to agree with my hon. friend on that proposition. If the judicial decentralization were to be carried out to-day, I would be quite ready to create only one district of Terrebonne and Joliette. But the district of Terrebonne has been created and the district of Joliette has been created, a court-house has been built in each; and I do not think that any Government in the province of Quebec could get the assent of the legislature to wipe out one of these districts for the benefit of the other. You would meet a difficulty there which no Government could overcome. I think my hon. friend will agree with me in that. If that be the fact, we must accept the fact as it is. My hon. friend says, also, that judges for the rural districts could be required to reside either in Montreal or Quebec, and suggests—or, rather, though he does not suggest, it has been said—that we might adopt the system in use in Ontario. But the hon. gentleman knows that the system in Ontario and our system in Quebec are different. If the ideas of my hon. friend were to prevail, all the judges would be resident in Montreal or Quebec. But that is not the system in Ontario, for in that province there is a resident judge in every group of counties to carry on the local business and the business of urgency which may arise. Surely, no one in this House would contend that you should leave a whole province, such as Quebec, without a resident judge except in the chief cities of the province.

Mr. MONK. I intended that each judge should go to his district.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, but that he should reside in Montreal or Quebec. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, that in the province of Ontario, though the judges of the Superior Court reside in the city of Toronto, the judges of the local courts are all resident in small cities of the province, one in each group of counties, while, under our judicial system in Quebec, the judges of the Superior Court perform the business performed in Ontario by the judges of the Superior Court and also by the county court judges. Thus, our judicial system makes it incumbent upon us to have resident judges throughout the province; and I am sure there is not a Government that could overcome that, unless we change our system altogether, and have county court judges as well as Superior Court judges. If we could have county court judges, well and good; but, so long as our judges do the business both of the Superior Court and the county court, you must have resident judges throughout the provinces. And so we come back to this—that, under our system, the nature of the business is such that some judges must be overworked, and others have very little to do. But, as I say, I do not see how this can be remedied. I do not see how you could bring in any fixed rule which would provide for a proportionate distribution of business among the judges. So long as the city of Montreal continues to advance by leaps and bounds, as it is advancing to-day, the number of judges must be increased from time to time. I am sorry that the limit of time has come, but the subject must be resumed and more fully discussed.

After Recess.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 18) respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

On section 2a,

Nothing in any Act relating to the Ottawa Electric Company, the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company (Limited), or the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, or any other Act, shall restrict the power or render it beyond the power of the Ottawa Electric Railway Company to run its cars or collect fares between midnight of Saturday and midnight of Sunday.

Mr. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) Perhaps the promoter of the Bill would give us some explanation of that clause.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). The clause as it stands now is as it was prepared in committee. Clause 6, of which this has taken the place, read:

The company may run its cars and collect fares or tolls on Sunday on its lines of railway now or hereafter constructed.

There was an objection in the committee to that clause, because some members of the committee thought it would be conferring a new power. Members of the committee thought that it would be more advisable that a clause should be substituted having for its object simply the removal of that disability, and it was thought that section 3a. as now prepared, would remove the disability and not raise the question of conferring any new power which was raised by section 6, as it stood previously.

Mr. BELL. How did the disability arise?

Mr. BELCOURT. The disability arose from the charter. This company is now formed by the amalgamation of three different companies, one of which was granted a charter under the Union, before confederation, which stipulated among other things that the company should not run cars on Sunday. That was followed by legislation in Toronto. These various amalgamation deeds came up before this Parliament, in 1892, I think, and the Acts of the provincial legislature were adopted, and the powers conferred by these Acts ratified by this Parliament. So that, to-day, this company is a Dominion company, and comes under the Dominion Railway Act. In order to allow the company to run cars on Sunday it was felt necessary that the disability which existed under the Dominion legislation should be removed. Hence the necessity of this clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). How does the clause read?

Mr. BELCOURT. It reads as follows:

Nothing in any Act relating to the Ottawa Electric Railway Company, the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company (Limited), or the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, or in any other Act, shall restrict the power, or render it beyond the power, of the Ottawa Electric Railway Company to run its cars or collect fares between midnight of Saturday and midnight of Sunday.

The difference between section 6 and section 3a is apparent at once. Section 6 says that the company may run its cars on Sunday, whereas this section, 3a, simply says that nothing in the Act shall prevent the company from running its cars on Sunday, thereby meeting the objection made in the committee that no new power should be conferred on the company.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Another question was involved as well. It was urged that no power should be conferred that would interfere with the right of the province to say what might or what might not be done on Sunday. The clause as it stood would interfere with provincial rights. It was believed that by putting it in the way in which it is now proposed, it would still leave the question open to the province to exercise its right as to what might or might not be done on Sunday.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince). There is another difficulty with this section. The restriction as to the cars not being allowed to run on Sunday was placed there by an Ontario statute. Now, we propose to directly repeal the Ontario statute by a Dominion law. It cannot be done under our constitution. The Ontario Legislature alone can expressly repeal what it has enacted.

Mr. BELCOURT. The hon. gentleman misunderstood what I said, or I did not make myself clear. The provincial Act, in which the disability was contained was afterwards ratified by this Parliament and became an Act of this Parliament, so that the disability has become a Dominion disability, if I may use that expression.

Mr. HENDERSON. Although I am not a lawyer, it seems to me very strange that this Parliament, having passed a Bill making that railway a Dominion railway, in that way takes away the power of the Ontario legislature. It seems to me to be an infringement of provincial rights.

Bill reported.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 23) an Act respecting the Alberta Irrigation Company, and to change its name to "The Canadian North-west Irrigation Company."—(Mr. Douglas.)

Bill (No. 34) an Act respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Poupore.)

Bill (No. 43) an Act respecting the Canada Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Ingram.)

Bill (No. 8) an Act respecting the Atlantic and North-west Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Calvert.)

Bill (No. 69) to incorporate the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company.—(Mr. Calvert.)

Bill (No. 70) respecting the Bronson and Weston Lumber Company, and to change the name to the Bronson Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Algoma Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Dymont.)

RESTIGOUCHE BOOM COMPANY.

On the Order being called for second reading of Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Restigouche Boom Company (Mr. McAlister),

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I shall have to ask this Bill to stand, as I have received several petitions against it, and I have not had time to look into them.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 19) to amend the Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters.—(Mr. Britton.)

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LANDS.

On the Order being called for,

The House to resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 24) concerning drainage on and across the property of railway companies (Mr. Casey),

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). I beg leave to move, Mr. Speaker,

That the Order for the Committee of the Whole on this Bill be discharged, and that it be referred to a special committee composed of Messrs. Bain, Campbell, Cowan, Chauvin, Fortin, McGregor, Monk, Tolmie and the mover; with power to send for persons and papers, and report from time to time by Bill or otherwise, and to employ a shorthand reporter, if the committee think it necessary.

By this motion I am merely asking the House to renew the course followed last year in regard to this Bill. No expense was then incurred, for I was unable to proceed on account of being too much occupied with another Bill. The suggestion has been made on previous occasions in this House that this Bill ought to go to the Railway Committee. I protested formerly against sending public Bills to the Railway Committee, because it is a practice unknown to our parliamentary usage until the last few years of the late Administration, when various public railway Bills were improperly sent to a Private Bills Committee, with the result that they were uniformly strangled in that committee—I do not say that that was the intention, but that was the result. The fact is, that a Private Bills Committee is not so constituted as to be able to deal properly with a public Bill; it is not their function to do so. This is a Bill which is necessarily somewhat tentative in its present form. It is drawn on the model of the Ontario legislation on the same subject, but the machinery has to be somewhat changed, as we have not control of the municipal machinery, which is taken advantage of in the Ontario Act. Therefore, the whole Bill will have to be considered in a quiet way across the table by half a dozen members in order to test it clause by clause, and to see what details will be most fitting to carry out the intention of the Bill. In fact, it will have to be thoroughly digested by some committee in a way which cannot be done in the Railway Committee. If it went there it would have to be sent to a sub-committee, and go through the delay of being reported to the Railway Committee and back to the House. I am sure that under these circumstances, the Minister of Railways will consent, as he did last year, to allow the Bill to go before this special committee, which is composed of the same gentlemen as the committee of last year, with the exception of Mr. Cowan, the hon. member for South Essex, a gentleman who is specially interested and whose name has been added.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I do not say that the hon. member (Mr. Casey) has not given some good ground for objecting to this Bill going to the Railway Committee, but I think every argument he has used in that respect points most strongly to the desirability of the Government themselves taking the responsibility of dealing with a measure of this kind. The measure is one which has been brought forward again and again, and which, after careful consideration and discussion in this House and in committees of this House, has been rejected.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At all events, the hon. gentleman has never been able to get it enacted. It is a matter of the most grave and serious public importance; and, instead of being referred to a small select committee, it should be referred to the Railway Committee, which is a very large and representative committee, of which the Minister of Railways and Canals is chairman, and which does constantly receive expert testimony on matters of this kind. After it shall have received the consideration of that committee, the House will be in a position to deal with the question, as they would not be, in my judgment, on the report of a small committee such as is proposed, and on which, instead of the measure being advanced, it would probably receive the same fate that it has received on former occasions. The question is one of great importance to the great lines of railway communication throughout this country. I do not speak of any one, but of all parties concerned in railway undertakings. I think the Government of the country should call upon the Minister of Railways to carefully consider a measure of such gravity; and, if it is brought before this House, it should come here with the imprimatur and sanction of the Minister of Railways, who is responsible in a great degree for measures of this kind. It is a responsibility which I do not think ought to be shirked by the Government; and in order to avoid hasty and ill-considered legislation which might result from the report of a small private committee, the measure should go before the Railway Committee, so that the expert testimony would be practically understood by the House, because the Railway Committee embraces a large number of gentlemen on both sides of the House who give attention to matters of that kind; whereas such expert testimony, if given before a small committee, would be entirely lost.

Mr. CASEY. It will report all this to the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman is afraid of the large Railway Committee having all the facts before them, he is taking a very good way to prevent the House having that thorough knowledge on a most important question that the great body of the House should have. I would suggest, in the first place, that the Minister of Railways give the question his consideration; and, if he thinks such a Bill is required, let it come here with the sanction of the Government. If the Government is not ready to take that responsibility at the present moment, let the Bill go to the Railway Committee, which is a large representation of the members of this House, who will hear, not at second hand, but at first hand, the evidence that will be submitted to them on both sides, and let this be submitted to the consideration of the Government and the House. That, in my judgment, is a much more satisfactory mode of dealing with this question than by sending it to a private committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I entirely agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition as to the importance of this Bill, and as to the desirability of the Government giving the very closest attention to its provisions and carefully studying its details. But while I agree with him to that extent, I am not quite prepared to acknowledge that under all circumstances the Railway Committee is a much better instrument to deal with a Bill of this kind than would a committee specially chosen for the purpose. The hon. member has attended the meetings of the Railway Committee with sufficient frequency to know that it is almost impossible to get a close and critical attention from that Committee for Bills which involve very nice questions. It is a thoroughly competent organization, no doubt, to deal with Bills involving one principle, or dealing with a large question, such questions become very thoroughly threshed out before it. But even if it were thought desirable by this House to send the Bill to the Railway Committee, I take it that that committee would find it necessary to select a lesser number of its members to constitute a small committee to give close and critical attention to the Bill's provisions. If we had not hitherto adopted a different course with respect to this Bill, I would have suggested to-night that it go to the Railway Committee, and the Railway Committee would be invited to refer it to a sub-committee of its own members, carefully selected for the purpose. But seeing that we last session allowed this Bill to be referred to a special committee, I think there would be no objection to our continuing to pursue that course in the present instance. Therefore, I do not feel it to be my duty to take any particular exception to the hon. gentleman's motion in that respect. I would, however, suggest to him whether it would not be better to leave the names of the gentlemen who are to compose the committee to be selected later—I do not say after much delay, but after a little consideration. I was scarcely able to catch the names of the gentlemen included in the hon. gentleman's resolution. They may, perhaps, be the very members of the House whom, on mature consideration, we would have chosen for that purpose, or perhaps not. I would desire to see as many experienced members of the House on both sides as possible chosen for this purpose; and if my hon. friend will allow his motion to lapse for this evening, or if a course is taken which will enable us to advise and confer with the hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the composition of the committee, the object which the hon. gentleman desires to serve will be as fairly served as it would be in any other way. I know that the hon. gentleman desires that this legislation should have the thorough and careful consideration of this House before it passes into law, and I think the suggestion I make will tend to that result.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I must detain the House in order to express my views on this important matter. I must say I am disappointed at the conclusion which the hon. Minister of Railways, with his large experience, has come to. The reason I consider it important that this matter should go to the whole Railway Committee is this: As I said the other evening, there is only one large and important general principle involved in it. It is a principle that will change so radically what hitherto has been the law that I would oppose its reference to a sub-committee. Let me say that my experience of the Railway Committee is that when an important principle is involved, there never was a tribunal in any country better fitted to decide it; and when a general principle is at stake, I have always understood that it was invariably left for decision to the general committee. Once the general principle is adopted by that committee, then, and then only, send the measure to a sub-committee to work out the details. The principle of this Bill is one that strikes at the root of the whole jurisprudence governing Dominion railways. We appointed, some years ago, a royal commission to decide what was the best tribunal to which such appeals should be made, and which should decide and control matters pertaining to railways. That committee, the ability and competence of whose members I have never heard challenged, decided that these matters, instead of going to a railway commission, should go to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. That decision had my unqualified approval when the present Opposition were in power, and I remember that I went further at the time, and said I was quite prepared to uphold the same tribunal should hon. gentlemen opposite come into power, as they have done. So far, I have heard no dissatisfaction, to any extent, with regard to the decisions and deliberations of that committee, and if we are to have a change, let us understand it. If the hon. gentleman proposes to delegate those powers to a railway commission, let us have a railway commission, and let that body decide those matters. There is further to be considered the question of litigation that underlies this proposed measure. It has been proved again and again in the province of Ontario, and in every place where systems of drainage are involved, that the railway companies will appeal from court to court, so that instead of the tribunal proposed in this Bill being a cheap tribunal, it becomes a most expensive one.

In justice to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and in proof of what I am urging as to the cheapness of appeals to it—

Mr. CASEY. The point was raised the other night. Mr. Speaker, that it is not in order to discuss the merits of a Bill on a proposition to refer it to a special committee, and you declared it was not.

Mr. TISDALE. I am discussing the principle upon which I propose to justify this Bill being sent to the general committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that the question whether a special committee should be appointed or not, involves a good many broad questions as regards policy. I do not say that the details of the Bill can be considered, but the whole question of the best policy of dealing with railway matters of this kind is open to discussion.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not propose to take any latitude, although in a matter of such importance a little latitude might be allowed. I say that the question of expense is most important. A great many hon. gentlemen, and I am quite sure many people in the country, have misunderstood the question of expense. Why? Before the ordinary courts all the witnesses have to be produced, but before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, which is the best tribunal we could have—and I do not think I can be charged with partisanship in so saying—what happens? If the case submitted to it is of any importance at all, the Government send at their own expense competent engineers to examine into the difficulty, and their reports not only convince this important tribunal of ours, but carry the greatest weight with the communities in which the dispute exists. The only expense to which the suitor is put is the employment of counsel, and he would have to employ counsel equally well in any other court, and would besides be put to the expense of fighting his case through several appeals. I have watched the proceedings and the decisions of this Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and must do it the justice of saying that when a claimant before it does not employ counsel, there are able lawyers sitting on that committee who, like honourable men, feeling the responsibility of their high positions and duties, are very careful that the rights and interests of litigants are protected against the able lawyers whom the railway companies employ. It must be remembered also that the railway companies will be equally well represented by their own able lawyers in the courts, but with this difference, that in the courts the railway companies will not stop at one, two or even three appeals, but will fight the case to the highest court. On the question of expense, therefore, there is no ground on which this measure can be justified.

Just one word in reply to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) with regard to this House having committed itself to the principle of sending a similar measure to a special committee, that may have been done once or twice, but nine or ten times it has been referred to the general committee, and we always refused to allow our federal legislation to be subject to not only the laws of any province that now exist, but that may exist in the future as well. I believe that this Federal Parliament is seized even of higher powers than the local parliaments, and that in the case of any legislation within our jurisdiction, we should not pass any Act that would subject it to a tribunal of less importance.

It would be a great mistake, in my judgment, to send this Bill to a special committee before sending it to the general Railway Committee. Let the Railway Committee pronounce upon the general principle, and I must say that admitting all the want of consideration that sometimes may be urged against it, and admitting that sometimes it is a little noisy and a little unreasonable, its decisions are, as a rule, in accord with substantial constitutional law, and in that respect that tribunal is not excelled by any other in the world. Let the Railway Committee decide on the general principle, and then, if they choose to adopt that principle, let the Bill be sent to a special committee. Another reason for sending the Bill to the Railway Committee is, if the select committee adopt it, it comes back to this House, and the people who are interested have no chance to be heard in answer to the select committee, whereas, if we choose the select committee from the Railway Committee, they come back to the general committee with their report; and, if that report is not satisfactory, the people who are interested have a chance to be heard, as they ought to be heard, in my opinion, before we make such a radical departure in the law as changing the general principle of control of our railway and their many thousands of miles of tracks. That control is in this legislature, and I do not want to see that power and authority, that protection both to the railways and to the public, made less complete. Therefore, I object to, and protest against, any change of this sort.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I think the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Tisdale) arguments are appreciated, generally speaking, by hon. members on this side. His views were, to some extent, voiced by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). The object of both sides is to have a critical examination of the Bill by those most competent to give it that examination; and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) who moved the committee perhaps did so somewhat hastily. I have no criticism to pass on the names of his committee, because, like the hon. Minister of Railways, I did not hear them, as they were read hurriedly. I think the matter deserves some little consideration, and, at any rate, if the special committee is chosen, it should be chosen by conference of the leaders of both sides. I think that, perhaps, the better course would be to move the adjournment of the debate, and then the leaders will meet and select a committee that will fit the circumstances of the case. That is the method that we followed last year. If we had not adopted that method last year, I frankly confess I should be disposed to accede to the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale) who spoke last, and leave it to the Railway Committee to select the committee. But, as the other course was followed last year, perhaps we had better do the same this year. The leaders can confer and select the names for a committee, irrespective of politics, so that we may have a committee in the result of whose deliberations the House will have confidence, and who will have power to summon witnesses and engage a shorthand writer to take down the evidence. I move that, for that purpose, the debate be adjourned.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). I have no objection at all, as the mover of this Bill, to this motion for adjournment—as I understand that the Bill will come up to-morrow—for the purpose of allowing the Minister to look into the personnel of the committee and come to a decision. The committee, as proposed, is the same as that agreed upon last year, my motion then being amended by the leader of the House adding some names; and so, I have no doubt, it will be an acceptable committee for this year. Of course, the committee appointed on a public Bill must be a committee not hostile to the principle of the Bill. That being understood, I do not see that it matters who are on the committee, so long as they are experienced men, who are willing really to go into the subject and provide a Bill for the purpose proposed. But I should certainly object—and object constitutionally—to the presence on the committee of a gentleman like the hon. member from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), who is utterly opposed to the principle of the Bill. I would have nothing further to do with it, if the Bill were subjected to judgment by gentlemen who have already judged it, and judged it, as I think, quite wrongly.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 36) to amend the Criminal Code. He said: I shall say only a few words in reference to this Bill, as I take it for granted that the Bill is of sufficient importance to go to the Committee of the Whole House for consideration, instead of being disposed of so summarily as a somewhat similar Bill was last session. I shall pass over altogether some of the clauses and some of the amendments which seem to me of the utmost importance in the administration of justice, because I think I shall convince the House, not only that the Bill should be read a second time, but that it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole and ought to receive the serious consideration that a subject of such importance demands on the part of this House. Now, I have read the code with a great deal of care. I know its author; and I am second to no man in this House, or out of it, in my appreciation of the great ability and great industry of the late Sir John Thompson, who was the author and father of this Criminal Code. And yet I believe there is no person who, I happen to know, would sooner than Sir John Thompson himself, if he were living and here, admit the necessity for the amendment of the code in several very important particulars. I happen to know that Sir John Thompson said that he regarded the code as not at all perfect, but as a beginning, which would require to have the attention of Parliament for some sessions, in order that it might be made more perfect and workable than it was at the time it passed in 1892. And nothing could show that more clearly than what happened in reference to the code. In 1892 it was passed. In 1893, 23 sections of the code were amended, the amendments being much more numerous, for some sections were amended in two or three ways. In 1894, 16 sections of the code were amended, the number of amendments being also greater than the number of sections amended. In 1896, 23 sections were amended, more than one amendment being made in each of a number of sections.

The first section of this Bill relating to the Court of Appeal, amends the section by constituting another court in the province of Ontario as a Court of Appeal in criminal matters. I may say that this amendment only applies to the province of Ontario. As the law of 1892 stands at present, an appeal is to any division of the High Court of Justice. Now, in the province of Ontario we have three courts that are called Divisional Courts: the Chancery Division, the Queen's Bench Division and the Common Pleas Division. In the interpretation clause of the Act of 1892, any division of the High Court of Justice was made a Court of Appeal for the purposes of this Act. That was amended in 1895 by a clerical amendment to make it strictly in accordance with the constitution of the courts of Ontario, and it was amended by making it read any Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice. There are three distinct Courts of Appeal for criminal matters in the province of Ontario. Now what happened in consequence of there being these three courts? As each Court of Appeal is a place for ultimate decision of questions that would come before it, each of these courts was bound to give an independent decision in matters that came before it; they were not required to follow one another in the decision, and so it happened, and it may happen again, that there were conflicting decisions. In the case of the Queen against Williams, the Queen's Bench Division decided that the admissions made on the preliminary examination of a case were admissible unless there was a distinct reservation on the part of the accused in making his statement so as to render it inadmissible. That was followed by the case of the Queen against Hammond which hon. gentlemen will remember. Hammond afterwards suffered the extreme penalty of the law. It was decided by the Chancery Division that the admission were inadmissible under any circumstances whatever, and a new trial was granted in the case, but there had been a conflicting decision, as I said before, in the case of the Queen against Williams which had been decided by the Queen's Bench Division. As the law now stands in the province of Ontario, we have four judges who decide. I am not speaking now of any amendment that has been made in the Law of Evidence which may affect this question. I am only speaking now as to the question of principle. As the law has now been decided on that point, we have judges of the Queen's Bench Division together with the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas Division, deciding one way; and we have the judges of the Chancery Division, Judge Meredith, and two other judges of Divisional Courts, deciding the other way. Now what has happened once may happen again. We have in the province of Ontario a Court of Appeal for the province and there seems to be no reason why that court, as it stands at present, should not be a Court of Appeal for criminal matters coming up under the Code. And so I ask by this amendment that instead of the appeal being, as it is now, to any Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice, it should be to the Court of Appeal for Ontario.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Where does it lie now?

Mr. BRITTON. To any Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice.

Mr. BERGERON. Does my hon. friend remember the discussion that took place upon that special point when the Bill was before the House? There was a long discussion as to whether the appeal should be to the division of the High Court of Justice or to the Court of Appeal. If my hon. friend would refer to that, he might find some other reasons.

Mr. BRITTON. I might find other reasons by referring to it; but knowing the constitution of the court, I cannot understand or suggest any reason why it should not be referred to the Court of Appeal. The judges of that court are experienced men, and the latest addition to the court, as the hon. gentleman knows, is one who has had large experience in criminal matters.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is the objection to the existing Appeal Court?

Mr. BRITTON. As I have explained, there are three Divisional Courts in Ontario. Each court is bound to give an independent decision, not to follow one another's decision, and they are in conflict. There are three Courts of Appeal, and no decision of any one court is appealable to any other, or anywhere else.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is there no appeal from that Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal?

Mr. BRITTON. Yes, in certain cases, but not in criminal cases under the Code. That is the final court under the Code. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. McCarthy) calls attention to the fact that since the new rules of the court have been made, they have coordinate jurisdiction, and each one is bound by the decision of the other. That may be so, and would be an argument to some extent why a party should have the option of going to any one of the three courts composed of three judges each, instead of going to one court where there are five judges, which, it seems to me, is the competent Court of Appeal for questions of this kind. There are five judges there instead of three in each of the others, and these five judges, I think, would be more likely to decide a matter in a way that would give universal satisfaction, not only to the accused but to the public, than would be secured by an appeal first to one Divisional Court and then to another court, accordingly as a man might think he could gauge the opinion of the judges. Now we are perfectly aware that the judges are human, very human, too; and in some cases if there was an appeal, and if a man had the option of having a case referred to the Divisional Court, he might desire it reserved to one Divisional Court instead of another. That would be obviated if there was only one court to deal with this matter. Now in speaking thus I am not giving my own individual opinion. This is a matter of common discussion among the lawyers and the judges themselves, and it is thought to be an anomaly. I have a letter from one judge in reference to the matter who agrees with me in the opinion I have expressed. On that point, therefore, I think the Bill should go to a committee and be discussed. Section 2 of the Act defines a word. It may be that there could be no dispute about that word "chaste" as to what it should mean, but there has been a dispute in regard to it. I seek to put in this Bill the meaning that any gentleman would give to it if he were asked, the meaning that is evidently intended by the statute. In the amendment which I propose in section 2, I seek to give that word the meaning that any man would give to it in common conversation. I may say that that word only appears in section 181 and section 182. I shall refer to those two sections when I come to deal with them. You will see from section 181 and 182 that there is merely a transposition of words, which, when you once understand what the word "chaste" means, seems to be grammatical, logical, definite and clear, instead of the wording of the Act as it is in the Code itself. In section 182 these words are the same, but there is also an important distinction that is rendered necessary by the decisions of some judges, which I will explain to the committee when the Bill reaches that stage. It is said that a promise of marriage must be a promise of marriage then and there made, whereas I say that the engaged relation is all that is necessary to exist between the parties. As judges have given different meanings to that section I think that, at all events, we ought to have this matter more fully discussed, and a better understanding arrived at as to the use of the word. I propose to repeal section 181 and section 182 and put them in the words that I have placed in the Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. There is very little difference.

Mr. BRITTON. There is the addition of the words "and while they are engaged to be married."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In section 181, I do not see the distinction at all, but section 182 makes a very broad distinction. The engagement must be continuing.

Mr. BERGERON. I think it is already very well covered by the clause.

Mr. BRITTON. I may explain that in section 181 in the proposed amendment goes a little further. In the Act the words "previously chaste character" are used. That is to say, that it is to be established affirmatively so that it may not be a question of reputation, but the words in the Bill could say that. In section 182 there is, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries says, a broad distinction.

Mr. BERGERON. That clause 181 is drawn pretty closely.

Mr. BRITTON. Clause 182 is drawn still closer.

Mr. BERGERON. I think it is covered very well by the words of the statute. There is not very much difference between the words "under promise of marriage" and "while waiting for the marriage."

Mr. BRITTON. The question is as to what is meant in that section by the words "under promise of marriage."

Mr. BERGERON. That is for the judge to decide.

Mr. BRITTON. We had better not leave it to the judge.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid that hon. gentlemen are under the impression that they are in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRITTON. Section 5 of the Bill asks to repeal section 593 of the Code. We are outside now of any of those clauses that will give any trouble, and we will come to what may be considered general principles. I submit to the House that section 593 should be repealed, because it is entirely unnecessary, because it is only available or applicable in a case where the magistrate has no jurisdiction to try the case. Section 593 is one of a series of sections beginning with section 586. Section 586 is the beginning of this part of the Criminal Code:

A justice holding the preliminary inquiry may, in his discretion, &c.—

Then it goes on to tell what is to be done in these cases. Then it comes down to section 592, which is the winding up of the case so far as the preliminary inquiry is concerned. Then section 593 says:

After the proceedings required by section 591 are completed the accused shall be asked if he wishes to call any witnesses.

Every witness called by the accused who testifies to any fact relative to the case shall be heard, and his deposition shall be taken in the same manner as the depositions of the witnesses for the prosecution.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Why not?

Mr. BRITTON. Because they cannot be used in the disposition of the case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Yes, they can.

Mr. BRITTON. If they are used in the disposition of the case that is a different thing, because the magistrate has no jurisdiction to try the case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course he has.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have seen it done and a man discharged.

Mr. BRITTON. The magistrate has not full jurisdiction to try to finally determine every case except to commit for trial. There are many such cases.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Do you not take away the right of defence?

Mr. BRITTON. You do not take away the right of defence. If there is a prima facie case made out on the evidence which comes before him, the magistrate is bound to commit the man for trial, and if he thinks there is a prima facie case he is bound to call witnesses for the defence. He is virtually trying the man, although the statute gives him no jurisdiction to try him.

Mr. POWELL. Is it not rather in the interest of a prisoner as respects his reputation?

Mr. BRITTON. It may be. I may tell the House why that section happens to come there at all. That section in reference to depositions in the case was put in there so that the depositions of witnesses out of the country or subsequently dead, or too ill to attend court, might be read. And it was for the purpose of putting in depositions and allowing them to be used in court in the case of illness or death or the absence of a witness, that that section was put in there. It has never been said by any criminal lawyer in Ontario or by any judge in the administration of justice that what my hon. friend says is correct. It has never been said that a magistrate should try a person for any serious offence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How do you understand the following section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How can the magistrate discharge an accused person?

Mr. BRITTON. Section 594 says:

When all the witnesses on the part of the prosecution and the accused have been heard,—

If he has heard the accused at all, he has to hear him at the time. It does not say that if the evidence is sufficient to send him for trial. If he is to try the case, then I have not gone nearly far enough in this, because the Criminal Code ought to have gone a great deal further. I think an amendment is serious which takes away from the magistrate jurisdiction except in certain well-known cases. Of course, if that jurisdiction is too small, the sections ought to be amended, but there are justices of the peace and justices of the peace. Some are perfectly competent, I dare say, to try any cases that come before them, and others are not, and, there is often a miscarriage of justice. This section has now worked in this way, and I speak with knowledge, when I say it: In border towns persons have been brought forward by the accused to prove an alibi; it has been known as well as you can know anything that has not been proved in court, that these witnesses were not speaking the truth, and no regard whatever was paid to their evidence. They lived across the border. The man was committed for trial, and, when the case came up in the proper court, these United States witnesses were not forthcoming, and the result was, that, without cross-examination, except the cross-examination they had at the preliminary inquiry, their depositions were read, and, of course, being read under such circumstances, much greater effect would be given to them than would be given, if they were subjected to cross-examination by the Crown attorney.

Mr. BERGERON. That would be a special case.

Mr. BRITTON. That is a special case in border towns.

Mr. BERGERON. I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Britton) knows that most of that code was taken from the English code, which, although not in force, was prepared by the best lawyers in England.

Mr. BRITTON. Yes.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). And this special section is taken from that code verbatim to meet the very case I spoke of.

Mr. BRITTON. I submit, it is a bad thing to be in the code, and ought to be expunged. It has worked very disadvantageously in Chatham, and Windsor, and some other places I could name, without coming nearer home.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The discretion on the part of the magistrate to hear a witness for the defence, in the case where an alibi is set up, never was taken away. I remember a case where the Lord Chief Justice of England charged the grand jury; at Taunton, they were bound to hear witnesses for the defence, where an alibi was set up. That discretion was made an obligation under the code.

Mr. BRITTON. My hon. friend knows that that case, as he puts it, could hardly have happened. He knows that, in the case of the grand jury, the Crown prosecutor does not put on the back of the indictment the names of any of the witnesses for the defence. The next amendment bears on section 593, and, of course, if 593 stands, the words that are asked to be struck out of 598 must also stand. The object of section 684 is to remove the necessity for corroborative evidence in cases under sections 181, 189 and 190. The wording of section 181 is very peculiar :

No person accused of any offence under any of the hereinafter sections shall be convicted upon the evidence of one witness, unless such witness is corroborated in some material part by evidence implicating the accused.

I am not asking to have the amendment applicable to section 182, and hon. gentlemen will see the reason why. But I am asking to have it amended as to section 181, and, if the Bill goes to the committee, I shall give instances where there has been an unquestionable failure of justice because of that section. I say, this ought not be applicable to sections 189 or 190, because the making of it applicable to these sections is a mere oversight, and, if you read those two sections, you will see that it is so. The one refers to idiots and imbeciles, when, if there is a witness at all, it must be an outside witness, a witness who is perfectly credible, and yet that witness must be corroborated before conviction. Section 190 is applicable to Indians and to certain offences in reference to them, where the evidence, if evidence is given, must be the evidence, not of the person against whom the offence is committed, but of some one else ; and yet, according to the wording of the section, that witness, whoever he may be, must be corroborated by some other witness. Making this applicable to 189 and 190 is a mere inadvertence, and I, therefore, ask that it should not be made applicable to sections 181, or 189, or 190. Section 687 has reference to the using of depositions. The section has this peculiar omission, that, if there is a person tried for an offence, as Hammond was tried, and a new trial ordered, in case where the witness has died or removed out of the country, his evidence given at the former trial and under cross-examination in presence of the accused, cannot be used on the second trial, although the evidence of a witness at a preliminary trial and where his deposition is taken down, can be used. Attention has been called to this by judges in dealing with the cases, and the attention of lawyers was specially directed to it by the "Law Journal" of this year, page 91. The "Law Journal" called attention to the very evils I seek to remove by this amendment, and suggested a form of section. The "Law Journal" asked the opinion of eminent criminal lawyers on this subject, and in the following number the opinions of two lawyers were published. One of these lawyers is Mr. Johnston, who has a great deal of experience in Toronto, a very able lawyer, and the other was Mr. Clark, the county Crown attorney of Essex. Mr. Johnston thinks it very inadvisable that the depositions should ever be used as evidence at all. He thinks that anything that is taken down against the prisoner should not be used, except where the person at the trial is subject to cross-examination, with all the safeguards that can be thrown around that person. On the other hand, Mr. Clark thinks that the section suggested by the "Law Journal" is a very proper amendment to make.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not see much difference in the amendment of my hon. friend and the old section.

Mr. BRITTON. The changes are two-fold. As it stands now, we have to prove, beyond any doubt, that the person is out of the country, and in the amendment the judge can draw the inference from the facts before him that the witness is out of the country, and the judge can order the evidence used. The other case, which is perhaps more important still, is this. In the case of a new trial, under the section as it stands, the evidence given at the former trial cannot be used. That is an important difference. As to a person being dead, that would be beyond controversy ; but if a person cannot be found, and facts are given which in the mind of the judge lead to the irresistible inference that the man is out of the country—

Mr. POWELL. The conclusion is the same as may be drawn from the old section. If a thing is proved to the satisfaction of a judge, what does that mean ? It means that such facts are presented to the mind of the judge that in law he may draw a certain inference. The hon. gentleman has changed the phraseology without changing the law at all.

Mr. BRITTON. I am changing the law. It is a fact beyond controversy that the judges will not draw inferences from facts that are put before them. Unless it is shown affirmatively that a person is absent from the country, they will not draw an inference that such is the case. The words of the Bill are much more liberal in that respect than the words of the old section. That is only one point. The other point is not provided for by section 687 at all.

Mr. POWELL. That is well taken.

Mr. BRITTON. Where a new trial is granted, the evidence given at a former trial is not provided for at all. In the case of the Queen vs. Hammond, where a new trial was granted, such evidence as was given at the first trial by a witness who had died in the meantime, or who had absented himself from the country, could not be used. On that point, I may mention that a learned judge, in discussing this section as suggested by me, said that according to his experience of shorthand reporters it would not perhaps be perfectly safe at all times simply to use the stenographer's certified copy, and it perhaps ought to be vouched for by the judge before whom the trial took place as well. That is a matter of detail which, if the committee thinks it should be amended, so be it. Section 9 has reference to the reserving of a question for appeal. As the law at present stands, in order that an accused person may go before the Court of Appeal, if the judge refuses to reserve the case, he has to get the consent of the Attorney General, and also the consent of the Court of Appeal. I simply require him to get the consent of the Court of Appeal. Surely that will commend itself to hon. members. An accused should not have to run the gauntlet of both the Attorney General and the Court of Appeal before getting before the Court of Appeal in a case in which he is mightily interested. That, of course, does not apply to a case which the judge reserves. In such a case, this section has no application. Section 10 is to repeal section 748 of the Code. That is the section which allows the Minister of Justice to grant a new trial. A great deal can be said on that subject, but I do not intend to weary the House by an argument upon it at present. I do say, however, that the Minister of Justice should not have the power to grant a new trial in criminal cases. It is enough to have the courts intervene in matters of that kind. The Minister of Justice, as the representative of the people, standing between the people and His Excellency, can always exercise executive clemency; but it should not be for him to say when a new trial should be granted. So far as I know, that power has only been exercised once in this country; that was in the case of Mrs. Sternaman. I have no objection to its exercise in that case; but the possession of such a power by the Minister of Justice, the head of a great department, places him in the position of deciding judicially whether or not an application for a new trial should be granted; and we know the political influence likely to be brought to bear upon the Minister in cases of that kind.

Mr. POWELL. Was not some such provision as that in the English draft code?

Mr. BRITTON. It was suggested, but it was never adopted.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was recommended by Mr. Justice Stephen.

Mr. BRITTON. But the Parliament of Great Britain did not think the recommendation should be acted upon.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This Parliament did.

Mr. BRITTON. This Parliament should repeal it. I do not say that the Minister of Justice does not exercise very wisely the power that is vested in him; but I submit that, placed as he is, he ought not to have that power. Section 11 of the Bill is to amend section 773 of the Code. That is a very technical amendment, but it is a very important one, as those who have had to do with the administration of criminal justice will see. If a person is committed for trial upon a charge that is perhaps a minor charge, while the depositions disclose a charge of a more serious character, at present there is no power to lay a charge for the more serious offence, and I propose that the Crown officer may, in his discretion, remand the man for trial instead of proceeding on the offence he was sent up for.

Mr. POWELL. Cannot the grand jury indict him for the offence, if they see fit?

Mr. BRITTON. No, they cannot.

Mr. POWELL. Why not?

Mr. BRITTON. I am speaking of a case in which the prisoner does not want to go before a jury.

Mr. POWELL. It is a special procedure?

Mr. BRITTON. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman will have to change the wording, because we have not a county crown attorney in our province.

Mr. BRITTON. That might not be applicable to your procedure.

Mr. BELCOURT. It only applies to Ontario.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would draw attention to the rule that on the second reading the principle of a Bill only can be discussed.

Mr. BRITTON. The next section applies to cases where the offence may be the attempt to commit theft. By the Criminal Code, the jurisdiction of the magistrate is limited to the particular cases in which the value of the property does not exceed ten dollars, but his jurisdiction in the case of an attempt to commit theft is not limited in value at all, and I think it ought to be limited to cases where the property is not worth any more than in the case of theft.

Section 14 deals with another case which is most important. Section 955 of the Criminal Code illustrates probably as well as anything I have said in the beginning that try as you will to make legislation perfect, the best minds, with the best care, will fail in some particulars. Take the offence of attempting to escape. Section 955 of the Code provides for the case where an assault is committed in connection with an attempt to escape, and also for certain other cases of escape, but does not provide for the case of an attempt to escape from a penitentiary, unaccompanied by assault, and in such case the only punishment that can be inflicted is less than two years confinement in the common jail. The result is that although a prisoner is in the penitentiary, and attempts to escape, so long as he does not do anything that brings him under the other sections of the Code, he cannot be legally punished in the penitentiary, but his sentence must be for some term less than two years in the common jail. So that after he has served out his term in the penitentiary he has to be committed to the common jail.

Mr. BERGERON. It is easy to see that my hon. friend lives in the vicinity of the penitentiary.

Mr. BRITTON. The Act with reference to attempts to escape being wholly repealed by the Criminal Code, we are entirely dependent for the punishment, in the case of an ordinary escape, on this section 955 which does not provide for the case I have mentioned.

Mr. WALLACE. Could you not have the sentences run concurrently? The prisoner would be willing.

Mr. BRITTON. No doubt. I have therefore added this clause:

And provided further that where any person is sentenced for any offence who is at the time of such sentence serving a term of imprisonment in a penitentiary for another offence, he may be sentenced for a term shorter than two years, to imprisonment in the same penitentiary, such sentence to take effect at and from the termination of his existing sentence or sentences.

That this amendment is necessary, all who have anything to do with the administration of justice where penitentiaries are will readily understand.

Mr. JOHN H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.). The promoter of this Bill wishes in section 2 to define the word "chaste," and in sec. 3 and 4 to substitute the words "previously chaste" for the words now in the code "of previously chaste character." What does all this mean? Let me illustrate. A young woman to-day steps aside from the path of virtue. She is no longer "chaste" within the terms of the proposed definition. Tomorrow she repents and thereafter leads a proper life. She redeems her reputation and character. Five years hence she is seduced under promise of marriage. The facts are undisputed. Criminal proceedings are instituted against her betrayer. If the amendment proposed became law the prosecution would fail. Why? Because 5 years before she had not been "chaste." Her subsequent purity of life would not count.

An hon. MEMBER. She would be no worse off than now.

Mr. BELL. Yes, she would. Under the present law she would be protected like her other sisters. And so she should be. The punishment that society meets out to the erring woman to-day is too heavy—it is unjust. Shall we add to that injustice by taking away from her the encouragement and protection we ought always to extend to those who seek to lead a more virtuous life? There is another point I would emphasize. A woman may be of unchaste character without being guilty or without being proved to be guilty of "unlawful sexual intercourse." She may be too familiar with men. She may indulge in the grossest obscenity. She may be guilty of the highest indecency that you can imagine, and yet she may be "chaste," according to the definition proposed by the promoter of the Bill. Should such a woman be permitted to institute a criminal action against her alleged seducer? I think not. Under the present law she could not. She would not be a person of "previously chaste character." But under the amendment proposed she would be empowered to institute criminal proceedings. Why? Because it could not be actually proved against her that she was not "chaste" within the meaning of the definition.

If the hon. gentleman who introduces this Bill will look at the English Criminal statutes—if he will examine the criminal laws of the various states of the Union—he will find that in almost every instance they use precisely the same words that are employed in our Criminal Code. And he will find no precedent to justify his amendment. In view of these considerations I think we are justified in saying that the proposed changes in the law would make matters worse instead of better.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I merely rise for the purpose of making a suggestion to my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). There are now about half a dozen Bills before the House to amend the Criminal Code, some of them undertaking to amend the Code in very important respects. This one that has been introduced by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) is more exhaustive than others. I do not know, however, that my hon. friend from Kingston holds that he has covered everything in the Criminal Code which might be dealt with in this House after seven years of experience. Without having looked into the matter very recently, I can recall several other sections of the Criminal Code which require revision and amendment. I think that this matter should be dealt with by the Government through the Solicitor General, or else that all these Bills should be referred to a Special Committee, so that if the Code is to be amended, it may be amended in some systematic and efficient manner. In saying that, I do not desire my hon. friend from Kingston to understand that I am suggesting that this proposed Bill is not a very good Bill. I agree with much that he has said with regard to it and many of the suggestions that he has made; and, I think, he is entitled to great credit for having taken so much pains and for having gone into the matter so thoroughly. Still, we cannot expect him to do all the work in a matter of this kind. If it is to be done at all I think it should be done thoroughly and efficiently.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Last session the department prepared a Bill to make certain amendments in the Criminal Code. That Bill was not introduced because we thought it wise to take some time before coming to a conclusion as to the amendments which should be made. I come from a province where we have codes and where there is an opinion that we should not tinker with these codes merely to make them fit certain cases. We think that a code should be an enactment of principles, and that an enactment once made should remain until time has shown that it is not practicable. If you tinker with a code so as to make it apply to particular cases as they may happen to turn up, I think it will destroy the efficiency and usefulness of the Code. I think that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) would commend itself most favourably to the Government and probably to the House, and that the whole matter of the amendment of the Code should be carefully considered and a Bill drafted by the department—not, I suppose, at once or even this session—and submitted to the House.

While I am on my feet, I may say a word or two as to the Bill. I agree with what my hon. friend from East Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Bell) said as to the first section. I come now to deal with section 5, by which the hon. gentleman undertakes to repeal section 593 of the Code. I venture to say that that would deprive the accused of an opportunity of offering a defence before the magistrate. The hon. gentleman said that it was unknown in the history of the province of Ontario, as had been suggested, that the magistrate should have the right to deal with certain cases—for instance, a man charged with murder who might offer to give evidence of an alibi. I would like to say that this section of the Act is taken from the report of the English commissioners. It is referred to by Greaves, the best authority on criminal law now in existence. My legal friends will remember that the best edition of "Russell on Crimes" is that of Greaves:

Mr. Greaves, in his report to the Lord Chancellor of England upon criminal procedure, criticised the law as it stood at that time (1855), with regard to the discretion of the justices to examine the witnesses for the prisoner, and strongly expressed himself in favour of magistrates being compelled to take the examinations of witnesses tendered for the defendant.

That is a sound principle of law in cases of this sort. In the course of his remarks upon the subject he says:

"It is difficult to imagine a greater injustice than that a man should be committed or bound over in a case where he has evidence so clear and conclusive that no person can for a moment doubt his innocence. And it not unfrequently happens that, whilst an innocent man is unjustly imprisoned, the guilty is afforded an opportunity of escaping.

"The following is an instance of both these inconveniences:—

"A person by the name of Yarmouth was shot and robbed, but lingered some months before he died. Bowen was taken before the magistrates as the perpetrator of the crime, and in his defence offered to call sundry witnesses to prove an alibi. The magistrates, however, declined to examine them and committed him to jail. There he lay till after Yarmouth's death, which did not occur till after one or two assizes. He was then tried for the murder, and his witnesses gave so clear an account of where he was at the time of the murder that, after some only of them had been examined, the judge stopped the case, and directed an acquittal. The same witnesses also gave evidence as to the person who really committed the murder, which, if it had been taken by the magistrates,—

That is the rule now.

—might have led to his apprehension. The delay, however, which took place had enabled him to leave the country, and the result was that the guilty escaped and the innocent lay in jail for months."

Now dealing with the other question as to appeal, that is an open question. The right to give a new trial is vested in the Minister of Justice. It may be proper or it may be improper that he should be vested with that right. But I will say this to the House, that that section of the law is also borrowed from the report of the English commissioners. In that report it is pointed out that in the event of evidence being discovered after the trial is over which would go to show that the person found guilty was really innocent, in that case there is no remedy under our law. The moment after the verdict is rendered, if you could prove beyond doubt by the subsequent discovery of other evidence that the man is not guilty, there is no remedy without this provision. But this section which it is sought to repeal, gives a remedy by going to the Minister of Justice who, on examination of the new evidence, if he thinks it is sufficient to warrant a new trial, grants a new trial. The recommendation of the English commission was to the effect that this right should be vested in the Home Secretary. We have simply adopted the recommendation of the English commissioners in so far as that disposition of the law is concerned. It may be that this right, vested as it is in the political head of a great department, may not be exercised with proper discretion in all cases; that is an open question for the House to decide. This clause has not been interpolated in our Code without reason. But I think we ought to give the matter some fuller consideration. There are other sections of this law which commend themselves to me, but there is one with reference to a reserve case for a Court of Appeal that does not commend itself to me. In a criminal trial, if you have a question of law or a question of evidence arising at the trial and the judge decides against you, all you have to do is to say to him: I want your honour to reserve that case, and if the judge refuses to reserve it, he is still obliged by law to note your objection, and when the matter is disposed of, you go to the Attorney General and get his consent, and then you go to a Court of Appeal. The simple oral request to the judge for a reserved case is sufficient to give you the right of obtaining an appeal. These are all the observations I have to make on the subject, and I make them because I think this matter might be left for more mature consideration at a future time when we may be considering other changes which might be usefully made. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I do not propose to discuss the merits of this Bill, but only to remark that every important subject that is brought up seems to be choked off by an adjournment of the debate. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) has given a great deal of attention to this subject, and it does appear to me a very summary way of disposing of the question to adjourn the debate. His Bill contains a good deal which appears to be, in the judgment of some lay men, at least, in the right direction.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman will see that the hon. member for Kingston has introduced a most important Bill. I take it that the hon. gentleman's object was not so much to carry his Bill as to bring to the notice of the Department of Justice the importance of certain suggested changes. So far as I am concerned, I have listened with the greatest interest to the suggested changes which the hon. gentleman has proposed; but no one who understands the serious consequences of amendments to the criminal law would imagine that because a prima facie case appeared to be made out by the introducer of a Bill, therefore the Bill should be incontinently carried. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is an old, experienced member of Parliament, and he knows well that Bills of this kind contemplating serious changes in the criminal law, require to have very careful consideration at the hands of the Department of Justice. I am quite sure that the Department of Justice in this case, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) says, will value very much the suggestions made by my hon. friend, and will consider them very seriously. But the House will hold the Government responsible for any changes in the character of the criminal law, and these changes cannot be made without great consideration. Speaking personally, there are one or two changes that appear to me to be in the right direction, there are one or two I could not personally approve of at all. I would like to talk them over with the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice. For instance, under our Criminal Code passed in 1892, power was given to the Minister of Justice in certain cases to grant a new trial. In a case where a person was convicted of murder, and the Minister of Justice did not see fit to invoke the clemency of the Crown and release the prisoner altogether, he had power given to him, copied from the recommendation made by the Criminal Code commissioners in England some years ago, to order the case to be tried again. There has been only one case under that section so far, and that was the case of Mrs. Sternaman, who was tried and convicted in the first instance, and a new trial was ordered, when she was acquitted. I am sure so far as experience goes there is not a member of the House who would wish to repeal that clause on the case which has occurred under it. The principle of the clause may be good or bad. The experience we have gained fully tends to confirm me in the opinion that it is a wise and judicious provision. But in matters of this kind involving life and death, involving character, involving punishment for many years in the penitentiary, we can very well adopt the maxim festina lente.

Mr. FOSTER. What is that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When the hon. gentleman was in college it used to be translated "make haste slowly." I was not aware that he had forgotten, as I have myself, a good deal of what I learned in my younger days. I thought he would have some of these common quotations at his tongue's end. I think, therefore, that we will be well advised in matters of this kind, after my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) has given the House the benefit of his experience, to take that experience into consideration and not hurriedly either enact or reject the Bill. Let the matter be considered by the responsible department, and afterwards when it comes up the Government will be in a better position either to reject the Bill or to take the responsibility of considering it another session.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. W. W. B. McINNES (Vancouver) moved that Bill (No. 37) to amend the Naturalization Act, be read the second time. He said: The object of this Bill is to secure the attendance of an alien, seeking naturalization, before the court, and the court is given power, if it thinks wise, to examine him upon his qualification for citizenship. Up to the present time, if an alien seeks naturalization he has simply to appear before a notary, or some one else who is authorized under the Naturalization Act, and take the oath prescribed by the Act. But the notary public, or lawyer, or other person, has practically no interest in the matter beyond that of making out the papers and receiving the fee.

When these papers, consisting of the oath of allegiance and a declaration that he has been in the country for three years are made out, they are deposited with the registrar of the court, and at the first sitting of the assize or county court they are read. At the end of the sitting of the court a certificate of naturalization is issued to the alien. The result is that there is no person holding a position of any responsibility to the public connected with the whole transaction to check the proceedings, and as a consequence large numbers of persons are railroaded through and receive their naturalization papers without any regard, either, to the responsibilities which naturalization imposes upon them or on the country. This is particularly so in a province where there is a special reason, with some classes of our population, for becoming British citizens. For instance, under the fishery regulations, recently issued by the Federal Government, only a British citizen can take out a license to engage as a fisherman. The result is that a large number of Japanese and Americans, whether qualified or not for the duties of citizenship, being anxious to engage in the fishery industry, go through the mere form of taking out the papers, having them presented, and in due course receive their naturalization certificates, by which they become entitled to these rights. The same thing holds good in connection with the Allen Placer Mining Act that has been passed in British Columbia. Where there is this temptation to aliens to become citizens, in many cases, they regard very lightly the oath they take, and in many cases we know that the whole proceedings are characterized by fraud and perjury. Since I gave notice of this amendment I received a letter from a Dominion official in British Columbia, a gentleman who has probably seen more abuses in connection with this Act than any other man in Canada, and I shall quote a paragraph from his letter. He says:

I am glad to see that you have moved in the matter of amending the Naturalization Act in a very necessary direction. It is a matter of notoriety that many Japanese and other aliens, also have secured certificates of naturalization without their having resided in the province for the length of time contemplated by the Act. The aliens, many of whom are ignorant, and unacquainted with our laws and language, are not to blame. They are taken in hand and "put through" by interested parties. The practice is a vicious one, and should have been put a stop to long ago.

I simply read that in corroboration of what I have said in regard to the administration of this Act. I do not anticipate that there is any objection at all to the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, this Bill, if it becomes law, will cause considerable inconvenience in our courts in the province of Quebec, and particularly in the city of Montreal. It may be that there is a necessity for such a law in the province of British Columbia, but we have experienced no such necessity, so far, in the province of Quebec, particularly in the city of Montreal. I have not the Naturalization Act here, but it seems to me that it surrounds the formalities of naturalization with sufficient safeguards. In the province of Quebec the party is required to appear before a notary, who is a public officer; he is obliged to take an oath, in detail, as to his residence in the country. He may also take the oath before a justice of the peace. Then, he must make oath of allegiance before either of these officers. These men in the province of Quebec are qualified men, men of character, men who would not allow parties to take that oath unless they had some knowledge of the parties themselves. In addition to that, these two documents must be accompanied by a further document to the effect that the party seeking naturalization is a fit and proper person to become a British subject. A very large number of people are naturalized in the city of Montreal, and there would be great inconvenience if the proposal in the Bill became law. We have two divisions generally of the Circuit Court sitting, and these two divisions have an immense amount of work to perform. It seems to me that if ten, twenty or thirty persons, and sometimes there are more, were presenting papers for naturalization, if they all had to be examined before the judge, the procedure would take up most of the day. Furthermore, most people who are naturalized are not in a position to leave their places of business or their occupations. Many of them are workmen, and could not spend the greater part of a day in court in order to submit to this examination. After all, what is the judge to ask them? If they give an oath with the details, which are specified in that oath, what more can be asked? There are no lawyers present. What fact could the judge elicit if he proceeded to the examination of these parties? The Bill proceeds upon the principle that frauds have been committed in certain cases. Our experience in Quebec is not to that effect at all. I think it would greatly interfere with the work of the Circuit Court in Montreal if this lengthy procedure had to be gone through. The Bill presents a serious inconvenience, and I think the Government ought to consider it seriously before it adopts that procedure.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I would like to say a word or two. I may say that I have a great deal of sympathy with some of the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). The Bill is one that requires our serious consideration. We are now inviting the best class of immigrants, of different nationalities, to come to Canada, and we are anxious that they will come here, not as transient visitors, but as permanent residents, and that after they have been here a certain time, they will assume the responsibilities of citizens of the state and become naturalized. Every Canadian has an earnest desire that the better class of these people should come here and become citizens. If you have three or four hundred men coming here and living in the Northwest Territories for three or four years.

they could not, if this Bill passed, become naturalized unless they left in a bunch and travelled four or five hundred miles so as to be present at the first day of the sitting of the court, simply to make a declaration if they want to become naturalized at all. The Bill imposes an obligation that they cannot fulfil. You are practically asked to declare that they shall not live in the country and become permanent residents here, and bring up their children here; in fact, that they shall not become naturalized. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) spoke of the Japanese who come to British Columbia and engage as fishermen. There have been some few complaints in respect to the Japanese, but I do not think that these complaints are so general or so well founded as to justify such legislation as is proposed. Under the present regulations in force, any person seeking to become a fisherman in the salmon fisheries in the Fraser River, has to register before he can take out a license, and must be naturalized in the first instance. Therefore, the evils that formerly occurred, have been to some extent minimized by the new regulations. I think my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) would be well advised not to press a Bill of this drastic nature, and I would suggest to him, whether it would not be well to postpone it for consideration.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). The law, if amended as my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) desires, could not possibly work in the North-west Territories. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) spoke of settlers having to go four or five hundred miles, and in the Territories they might have to go very long distances. It is not altogether a question of distances. Many of these settlers would be men eminently fit to discharge all the duties of citizenship, intelligent, even eager to be naturalized, and yet, if you place the obstacles in their way that would be placed by this section, they would shrink from taking on them the burden of citizenship, the white man's burden in fact, in the North-west Territories. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) would do well to press this legislation. I do not know the conditions that obtain in British Columbia, but I know that such a law could not possibly work in the North-west Territories.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In the face of the expression of opinion that has fallen from both sides of the House, I think my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) would be well advised not to press the Bill this evening. It may be, that there may be some reason to justify this legislation in British Columbia, where the immigration is of a peculiar character, but certainly, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), in the North-west Territories and in the older provinces of the Dominion, the Bill would work very great injury, and such great injury that, if we have to choose between one and other classes of immigrants, we would be obliged to oppose the Bill. Under the circumstances, my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) would be well advised, if he allows the debate to be adjourned. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Auditor General for the year ended 30th June, 1898.—(Mr. Fielding).

RETURNS ORDERED.

Statement in detail of all sums expended on account of the Joint High Commission between Great Britain and the United States since its inception to date, with the names of all persons connected therewith as commissioners, secretaries, clerks and attendants and the rate and total amounts of compensation of each as salary, allowances and expenses itemized.—(Mr. Foster).

Statement of all persons or commissions of inquiry appointed to inquire into the conduct of employees of the Government since August 1st, 1896, giving the names of commissioners, their rate of pay and allowances, the aggregate total amount paid to each as pay and allowance, and the total expenses of each commission outside of pay and allowance; also the names and post office addresses of all persons dismissed on the reports of the commissioners.—(Mr. Foster.)

Papers and correspondence in connection with the claim of the British American Bank Note Company for the balance alleged to be due to the company for contract work done for the Post Office Department.—(Mr. Foster.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 27th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar) presented the third report of the Select Standing Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House, as follows:—

The attention of the committee having been directed to the fact that the rule allowing members to revise their speeches without making any material alterations in the meaning has, in many instances, been departed from, which practice, if permitted to continue, will, in their opinion, tend greatly to depreciate the value of the revised edition of the Official Report of the Debates. The committee therefore recommend that hereafter the rule in question be rigidly complied with.

The committee, with a view of ensuring the prompt delivery in future of both the revised and French editions of the Debates have deemed it necessary to alter in one or two respects the rules governing the printing of the Official Report of the Debates, and beg to submit for the approval of the House the amended draft rules appended hereto.

RULES FOR THE PRINTING OF THE DEBATES OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AS AMENDED.

Re Daily and Revised Editions (English).

1. The chief reporter shall see that the printer's copy of the daily issue is furnished concurrently with the Debates as the debate proceeds and said copy shall be accepted as correct by the printer. All the copy for each day's publication shall be delivered to the printer within two hours after the adjournment of the House.

2. The type used in printing to be brevier, with quotations in nonpareil.

3. The printing shall be performed daily on such size of sheet as may be directed and shall contain the speeches which have been delivered at the previous sitting of the House, and these shall be published as reported, in the language in which they are delivered. The said sheets to be delivered at the Distribution office by 3 o'clock, p.m., after each sitting.

4. In the event of the House sitting after 12 o'clock, the daily sheets are to be delivered as expeditiously as possible after 3 p.m. the following day.

5. The type of the daily edition shall be kept standing, and the sheets of the daily issue shall be revised by an officer appointed by the House. Members may send corrections to the said officer to be embodied in his revise.

6. That the time allowed for the aforesaid revision and correction by members shall not exceed twenty-four hours after the delivery of the daily issue to the House; and that all corrections shall be sent to the Debates office within that time. That promptly on the expiration of the twenty-four hours the proof sheets shall be sent to the Printing Bureau, where the corrections shall be made and the final proofs shall be read for the book form; and the work shall be then forthwith printed and constitute the revised edition.

French Edition.

7. The Debates shall be translated into French from the revised English edition.

8. The French copy shall be sent to the Printing Bureau to be set up in type in portions as fast as it is done, without waiting for a complete forme to be translated.

9. The proofs shall be sent in to the translator in galleys only. He shall return them signed within twenty-four hours after their receipt, and they shall be printed off, after correction, without further delay, as soon as a ferme of 32 columns is ready.

Index.

10. Indexes of the English and French editions shall be prepared by the proper officers concurrently with the issue of the revised sheets. They shall be sent to the Printing Bureau within one month after the prorogation of Parliament.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved :

That the third report of the Select Standing Committee to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House during the present session, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. GEO. LANDERKIN (South Grey) moved :

That the time for presenting private Bills be extended to Friday, the 12th day of May next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their eighth report.

Motion agreed to.

HUDSON BAY AND YUKON RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth) moved :

That that portion of the 49th Rule which limits the time for receiving petitions for private Bills be suspended with reference to the petition of the Hudson Bay and Navigation Company, presented this day, praying for an Act to amend their Act of incorporation in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their eighth report, and that the said petition be read and received forthwith.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 89) relating to the Canada Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 90) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Macpherson.)

Bill (No. 91) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec.—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

POSTMASTER OF ST. JEROME.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Monk) asked :

1. Was Mr. Louis Desbiens, postmaster of St. Jérôme, Lake St. John, county of Chicoutimi, dismissed since June, 1896?

2. If so, on what grounds, and who recommended the dismissal?

3. Who was appointed in his place, and on whose recommendation, and why?

4. If his successor is one J. Gauthier, are the Government aware that the said Gauthier had previously been dismissed as postmaster, after an inquiry?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. The answer to the first question is: If the reference is to the former postmaster of Metabetchouan (there is no post office named St. Jérôme in the county of Chicoutimi), the postmaster was dismissed on the 28th September, 1896. 2. The answer to the second question is : For having taken an active political partisanship part in the last Dominion general elections ; on the recommendation of the member for the county. 3. The answer to the third question is : Mr. J. Gauthier, on the recommendation of the member for the county. 4. The answer to the fourth question is : That when so appointed the Government was not aware of his having previously occupied the position of postmaster.

SERVICE AND AGE LIMITS FOR LIEUTENANT-COLONELS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. What, according to present regulations, are the service and age limits for lieutenant-colonels in the militia ?
2. When did these come into force ?
3. What lieutenant-colonels have been retired thereunder, and what was in each case his age and term of service ?
3. What lieutenant-colonels, who have exceeded the regulation terms, have been retained, what is in each case his age and term of service, and the reasons for retention ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Five years tenure of command. Sixty years of age. 2. Age limit, 1st July, 1897. Time limit, 1st October, 1897.

Reason for Retention.—In the interest of the particular regiments and of the Canadian military service generally.

PAYMENTS TO MR. NOBLE.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. What sums of money have been paid to one Noble, a barrister, of Cannington, Ont., by the Government, or any department thereof, since August, 1896 ?
2. Are there any sums yet due the said Noble by the Government ?
3. What services were performed by the said Noble ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I cannot give an answer to my hon. friend to-day. The hon. gentleman asked me to look through all the departments.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The other day I gave the information asked for in this question, with the exception of the second part. As to that, there are no sums due to Mr. Noble at the present time.

THE MAIL BAG CONTRACT.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

What are the names of those who constitute the Ottawa Supply Company ?

What Government contracts has this company received since June, 1896 ?

Has it been awarded the mail bag contract ?

Is Mr. Ronan a member of the company ?

Is this the Mr. Ronan who, during session, is employed in the House of Commons ?

Was not a Mr. Ronan, from 1893, up to last April, secretary of the Ottawa Reform Association ?

If so, is he in each case the same person ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). A contract for the manufacture of mail bags was awarded to the "Ottawa Supply Company," they being the lowest tenderers therefor. The department is informed that Mr. S. S. Stratton and Mr. R. Ronan are the members of that company. The department is not aware whether Mr. Ronan was ever employed in the House of Commons, or as secretary of the Ottawa Reform Association. The hon. gentleman may, perhaps, confound the position of an employee of the House of Commons with the position of secretary of the Liberal whip. If so, this Mr. Ronan was at one time the secretary of the Liberal whip. I am told that he never was the secretary of the Liberal Association of Ottawa, though he did discharge some of the actual duties for the secretary, Mr. H. Bate, of Ottawa.

McKENZIE POST OFFICE.

Mr. ROCHE (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Was a petition received from settlers to establish a post office to be named McKenzie post office, and to be located on N.E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  S. 20, T. 2, R. 9 W., with Mr. Francis Windsor, sr., as postmaster ?

2. If so, did the Government accede to request ? If not, where was the office located, who was appointed postmaster, and on whose recommendation ?

3. Has Mr. C. H. Vrooman the contract to deliver the mails at McKenzie post office ? If so, were tenders called for before contract was let ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The answer to the first question is, yes. The answer to the rest of the question is as follows : The inspector reported that it would cost $160 a year for a semi-weekly service for the proposed office, and the department was unwilling to establish it at such a cost, as the estimated revenue therefrom was $15, and, in fact, has not amounted to that sum, being only $8 last year. On the 28th of December, 1897, Mr. Vrooman wrote offering that if the office were established to perform a weekly service for $50 a year, and on the 29th December, 1897, Mr. Windsor wrote approving of Mr. Vrooman's offer, adding that he would, if appointed postmaster, perform a semi-weekly service for $95. Under the circumstances it was deemed advisable to appoint Mr. Vrooman and have him perform a weekly service at $50, and this was accordingly done.

COST OF BEHRING SEA ARBITRATION.

Mr. McISAAC asked :

1. What was the total cost to the Government of Canada of what is known as the Behring Sea arbitration ?

2. What part of this was expended by members of the Cabinet as travelling expenses ?

3. What amount was paid for living and travelling expenses and disbursements by secretaries, private secretaries, assistants, attendants, messengers or others in the service of the Government who attended or were employed in connection with said arbitration ?

4. What amount was paid to civil servants as allowances in addition to their salaries for extra services rendered in connection with the arbitration ?

5. What amount was paid for legal services ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. $140,781.98, paid between 1891 and 1896. 2. $13,993.93. 3. $51,177.33, including Canada's proportion of the divisible expenses paid the British Government. 4. $3,873.32. 5. $71,827.40.

QUEBEC CARTRIDGE FACTORY.

Mr. INGRAM (by Mr. Bennett) asked :

1. What were the Government's reasons for dismissing the members of the labour association, Mechanics' Assembly No. 10,061, out of the Quebec cartridge factory ?

2. How many were dismissed ?

3. Was it to recompense the aforesaid labour union for the very active part taken by its members in the last general election in support of the Liberal party, and particularly in the elections of the hon. member from Quebec West and the ex-member for Quebec Centre ?

4. How many boys and girls have been injured and maimed in the said cartridge factory during the last two years, and to what extent were they injured ?

5. What remuneration did they receive while suffering from said injuries, including the time laid up from such injuries ?

6. What was the nature of the correspondence which took place between the Labour party in the city of Quebec regarding the refusal of the cartridge factory authorities to admit for the purpose of inspection the provincial factory inspector, Madame Provencher ?

7. What was the result of the inquiries made by the Government regarding the said refusal ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I do not think this is a question which should have been put on the paper. Whether intentionally or not, in two or three parts it is decidedly offensive. But, apart from that, it is a question which should be put in the form of an address, so far as it is parliamentary at all, as it asks for correspondence which took place between certain parties and the Government of the province of Quebec. Therefore, I would ask that the hon. gentleman put his question, so far as it is parliamentary, in the form of a motion.

MONTREAL HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Have the plans of harbour improvements for the city of Montreal been finally agreed upon between the Montreal Harbour Commissioners and the Minister of Public Works ?

2. If so, what set of plans have been finally adopted ?

3. When are the works of improvement going to be proceeded with ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Plans 12A2 have been approved. The work has been pushed as speedily as possible since last year, and is now going on.

SCOTT ACT—BROME COUNTY.

Mr. POPE asked :

Has any application been made to the Secretary of State for permission to have an election in the county of Brome to set aside the Scott Act ? If so, when was said application made, and was an order granted thereon ? If no order has been granted, why not ? When will such order be issued ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes, application was made on the 3rd March, 1899, and the petition has been reported favourably by the Department of Justice on the recommendation of the Secretary of State. The order will be issued in due course.

ISSUE OF STAMPED ENVELOPES.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

2. When will the present 2-cent purple stamped envelope cease to be issued and the red issued in its place ?

2. How many 2-cent purple envelopes were issued, and how many distributed ? At what offices were they distributed, how many at each office, are there any more to be distributed, and if so, where will they be distributed ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to issue an entire new set of stamped envelopes to replace those at present in use ? If so, when ?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to issue a 4-cent and 7-cent stamp ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The issue of 2-cent purple-stamp envelopes ceased when the supply thereof in the department became exhausted, the last issue having been made on the 7th January, 1899. The subsequent issue of 2-cent stamped envelopes was in red, in accordance with the recommendation of the Postal Convention. The Government has come to no conclusion as to whether a 4-cent or a 7-cent stamp will be issued. The schedule hereto annexed shows the names of the post offices supplied with such purple-stamp envelopes and the respective quantities so supplied them.

List of post offices to which 2c. purple envelopes were issued and the quantity in each case.

MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS—TOUR OF INSPECTION.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

What was the name of the steamer used by the Minister of Public Works last season on his tour of inspection of wharfs, harbours, piers, &c., from Montreal eastward, including his trip around the Island of Anticosti ? Is or was said steamer owned by the Government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The "Uranus" was the name of the steamer, and it is owned by the Government.

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Has the Right Honourable the Prime Minister obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice in regard to the use of the French language in the North-west Territories of Canada, and the jurisdiction of Canada in regard to the same, as intimated by him last year ? (Page 2531 of "Hansard.")

2. What is the opinion of the Department of Justice on said matter ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government has obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice, and will communicate it to the House on Monday.

GREEN STAMPED ENVELOPES.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Who was the purchaser of several thousand 2c. green stamped envelopes in Toronto just previous to the issue of the 2c. purple envelope ?
2. How many 2c. purple stamped envelopes were issued in Toronto ?
3. When were they issued ?
4. Who purchased them ?
5. When were they sent to Toronto ?
6. Is the Government aware that secret information anent the issue of 2c. purple stamped envelopes and the quantity of 2c. green stamped envelopes in stock in Toronto was obtained ?
7. Is the Government aware that the person who cornered the 2c. purple stamp stock sold them as high as 50c. each, and they are now going as high as $1 in places ?
8. Was the issue of the 2c. purple stamped envelopes done by mistake ?
9. Are there any 2c. purple stamped envelopes now in stock ?
10. Is it the intention of the Government to issue any more 2c. purple stamped envelopes ?
11. Will that issue, if any such be made, take place before the person who cornered the Toronto lot, disposes of his lot ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I would state that I think this question is open to objection, inasmuch as it is suggestive of a supposed state of facts, which may or may not exist. However, I have endeavoured to answer the question as substantially as possible. 1. The department has no information whatever of the matter referred to in the first question. 2. Two thousand. 3. On the 4th January, 1899. 4. The department has no knowledge whatever as to who purchased them or in what quantities, or how many purchasers there were. The envelopes were, no doubt, sold in the Toronto post office in the usual way. 5. On the 4th January, 1899. 6. The Government is not aware that any such information was given, and the head of the Stamp Branch, which has entire charge of the distribution of stamps and stamped envelopes, states that he is fully assured that no such information was given. But if the hon. gentleman has any reason to think otherwise, and will communicate the same to the department, the fullest inquiry will be made into the matter. 7. The Government has no knowledge whatever as to whether or not any persons "cornered" such envelopes, or on what terms any purchaser may have disposed of them. 8. There was no mistake whatever made in the issue of said envelopes, but on the contrary, the issue took place in the ordinary course of business, and was made on requisitions in the usual way, coming from postmasters. 9. No. 10. No. 11. This question is covered by the previous answers.

HON. MR. JUSTICE GAGNE.

Mr. SAVARD asked :

1. Is the Government aware that Hon. Mr. Justice Gagné, of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, is a director of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company ?

2. That the said line of railway runs through the whole county of Chicoutimi ?

3. That it is a serious inconvenience and a considerable cause of outlay to the inhabitants of the district who have claims against the said company, or vice versa, inasmuch as the said Judge Gagné is obliged to decline to act, and parties are compelled to proceed to Quebec, a distance of 225 miles ?

4. If so, is it the intention of the Government to call upon Hon. Judge Gagné to resign his position of director of the said Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company, or that of judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, in the interest of the ratepayers of the district of Chicoutimi ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government is not aware that Mr. Justice Gagné is a director of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company. We have very strong doubts whether we can call upon the judge to resign, if he is a director of the railway ; but, if complaint is made to us, we shall certainly call the attention of the judge to the complaint.

DOMINION MINT.

Mr. CARSCALLEN asked :

1. Are the Government aware that thousands of dollars annually are paid by Canadian miners and mining companies for United States consular certificates on gold bullion or gold dust, sent to the United States mint ?

2. Are the Government aware that a very large sum each year has also to be contributed to the United States war tax by Canadian miners and mining companies on gold bullion or gold dust shipped to the United States mint ?

3. In order to remove the above burdens and save this money to Canadian gold producers, is it the intention of the Government to erect in the Dominion a mint for refining and coining the gold produced in Canada ? If so, where is such mint to be erected, and when ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government have no information concerning the matters referred to in the first and second questions. As to the third question, the Government have not formed any conclusion with regard to the erection of a mint.

INFRACTION OF CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What further action does the Government propose to take in the case of Schafheitlin & Fitzgibbon, against whom informations for the infraction of the Customs laws were filed by the Department of Justice in October last, and from whom the amount of $188,274.70 was claimed in duties and penalties ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). This case is being proceeded with in the court in the usual way.

Mr. FOSTER. What court ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The Exchequer Court.

DREDGING OF PIGEON RIVER.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government, this season, to remove the unsightly piles of stone which have been dumped in the water along the once beautiful shores at Rosedale, near where the river leaves Balsam Lake

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The question is under the careful consideration of the Government.

CLEARING SCUGOG RIVER.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

Why have not the Government placed a sum in the Estimates for the clearing and otherwise rendering properly navigable the Scugog River from Lindsay to Sturgeon Lake ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The hon. member had better wait for the Supplementary Estimates before putting that question.

MR. J. N. COLPRON, N.P.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. Has the Department of the Interior received an account from Joseph Napoleon Colpron, N.P., for performing notarial papers in the Caughnawaga reserve ? If so, what was the amount of the said demand ?

2. Has the Department ordered the payment of such amount ?

3. When ?

4. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply I beg to say : 1. The Department of Indian Affairs received an account from Mr. Colpron for notarial services. The amount claimed was $547. 2. The department ordered payment of $150, which was considered to be the full amount due Mr. Colpron for the services rendered. 3. January 14th, 1897. 4. Covered by previous answers.

BONUS TO IMMIGRATION AGENTS.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. What bonus per head was paid during the past twelve months by the Government of Canada to agents, owners, or representatives of British steamship companies, for adults and children from Great Britain respectively, brought out to Canada as immigrants ?

2. What bonus per head was paid during the same period by the Government of Canada to agents, owners, or representatives of foreign steamship companies for adults and children respectively, brought out to Canada as immigrants from the continent of Europe ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. A bonus of 7 shillings sterling per head for persons of twelve years of age or over, of either sex, and one-half that amount for children under twelve and over one year of age, was paid by the Government of Canada during the past twelve months to agents of British steamship companies for persons brought out to Canada as immigrants. 2. A bonus of $5 per head for persons of eighteen years of age, of either sex, but nothing for children or persons under eighteen, was paid during the same period by the Government of Canada to agents of foreign steamship companies for persons brought out to Canada as immigrants from the continent of Europe. 3. The above rates are the same as were paid under the late Government.

LOWERING THE WATERS OF LAKE SIMCOE.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. Has a request been made by any person or persons upon any department of Government for a lowering of the waters of Lake Simcoe ? If so, by whom, to what department, and has any plan for such purpose been proposed ?

2. Does the Government intend to act on such a request, if such a request has been made ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. By municipal council of Orillia, Frank Madill, M.P., municipal council of township of Morrison, Thos. R. Morris and T. M. Banting. To Department of Marine and Fisheries and Public Works. 2. The hon. gentleman must be aware that at the request of the gentlemen named above works were executed in 1896-97 for the improvement of the outlet of Lakes Simcoe and Couchiching, and for the regulating of the waters thereof.

IMMIGRANTS SENT BY IMMIGRATION AGENTS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

How many immigrants have been sent into the Dominion of Canada by the immigration agents in Great Britain and Ireland, and how many from the United States, for the year ending 30th June, 1898, and where are they located ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). It is impossible to give this information, as no means have been devised of identifying and keeping an account of immigrants sent by the agents of the Government in the countries named, apart from the general immigration from those countries.

IMMIGRANTS IN QUARANTINE.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Ministry to an item that appears in the Ottawa "Citizen" of this morning :

Toronto, April 26.—The consignment of fifty boys from England for Fagan's Home, among whom a case of scarlet fever had developed at Quebec, was side-tracked last night at Leaside Junction, just outside the city of Toronto, and put in quarantine. It is said that Dr. Montizambert, the quarantine officer of the Dominion Government, gave the boys a clean bill of health, and allowed them to proceed to Toronto, after the scarlet fever patient had been removed, without enforcing any quarantine. But he seems to have taken the precaution to notify Dr. Bryce, secretary of the Provincial Board of Health, and the doctor warned the local authorities here that the suspects were being brought from Quebec to Toronto by special train. Professor Shuttleworth, in the absence of Dr. Sheard, city health officer, protested to Dr. Bryce, that the circumstances demanded that the whole party be stopped en route and quarantined. This was done, and the usual process of fumigation and disinfection will be carried out before the boys are allowed to enter Toronto.

The local authorities did not think that Toronto should be saddled with the expense of quarantine, holding that the provincial department should deal with it, and, if possible, recover in part from Quebec.

I desire to ask whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to this subject, and whether they have made inquiries from Dr. Montizambert as to the truth of the allegations, and if they are true, whether it is the intention to saddle the cost of quarantine on the local authorities of Toronto?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is not in his seat, and that, therefore, I cannot answer, at this moment, the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule).

Mr. SPROULE. It is unfortunate that the Minister of Agriculture is so often absent.

CUSTOMS DIFFICULTY ON ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria). I wish to call the attention of the Government to a matter of great moment to the merchants of the Pacific coast and the Yukon district. It seems that there has been some dispute between the collector of customs at Skagway and the officers of the Mounted Police with regard to getting goods through and I am informed that merchants who have got liquors and other goods in Victoria and Vancouver have found that these liquors and provisions have been kept back owing to this dispute. I would like to know whether the Government has any information in regard to this quarrel, and whether the matter is in the course of settlement, and the goods are going forward; and, if not, whether the Government would take notice of it and try to have some arrangement made so that the goods can go forward. The reason the merchants are so anxious to get the matter settled is that now that the warm weather is coming on, if there is even a short delay, it will be impossible to get goods through the passes until all the snow is gone.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The difficulty to which the hon.

gentleman refers arose, apparently, through a misunderstanding by the officers of the Mounted Police of their instructions. The officer in charge in the district communicated with this department here, and his instructions were amended; and I am now informed by the Controller of the Mounted Police that he was advised some time ago that the matter had been amicably arranged and everything was going forward. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) has information to the contrary, and will give me the particulars, I will try and see that the matter is arranged.

Mr. WALLACE. In what way were the regulations amended?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is no question of regulation; the question was as to the arrangements that were made to carry out the provisions of the customs law at the boundary line. There is a provisional boundary line at the Summit, and the customs officers are six miles inside of that boundary line, while the police officers are at the Summit. The police officers understood that they were not to allow any American customs officer, conveying goods, to come past the boundary. The American customs officer said he would not allow the goods to go until he handed them over to a Canadian customs officer. But the police officer had misunderstood his instructions; and as soon as word got here of the facts, he was told to allow the American customs officer to go through until he reached the Canadian customs post.

LIVE BAIT—NEWFOUNDLAND LAWS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to ask whether the Government have any information as to a regulation made by the government of Newfoundland with respect to the purchase of or catching of bait within the territorial waters of that colony. I have information from the president of the board of trade of Halifax that a regulation or statute has been passed by Newfoundland prohibiting the selling or catching of herring bait between the 15th of March and the 25th of April. Several vessels were sent from the port of Halifax, expecting that fresh bait could be had, and the owners have been heavy losers in consequence of the regulation, of which they knew nothing when they left. I desire to bring this matter to the attention of the Government, if it has not already been reported to them, and to ask if it would not be well to ascertain—if that has not already been done—whether this regulation or law has been passed, and to take steps to have it removed so far as it may apply to the fishermen of Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Representations have been made to me within the last two days to the same effect as the hon. gentleman states. But the department has no information that such a law has been passed or regulation enforced. I can not think it possible; I think there must be some mistake. The Premier of Newfoundland informed me, when I parted from him in Washington a short time ago, that there was no such regulation. We have taken steps to ascertain how it came about that such an impression as the hon. gentleman speaks of could have gained ground. The necessary inquiries are being made.

REGULATION OF GRAIN TRADE.

On the Order for the second reading of Bill (No. 15) to regulate the trade in grain in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assinibola) moved:

That this order be now discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Fisher, Sifton, Joly de Lotbinière (Sir Henri), Rutherford, Haggart, Davis, Tisdale, Oliver, Roche, Richardson, Campbell, Bourassa, Bain, Douglas, Rosamond, Bertram and Casgrain.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY PASSES.

Mr. H. BOSTOCK (Yale and Cariboo, moved that Bill (No. 39) to provide for the issuing of railway passes to members of the Senate and House of Commons, be read the second time. He said: My object in bringing this Bill before the House is to deal definitely with the question of issuing railway passes to members of this House, a question which has become in the minds of a good many people somewhat of a burning question. As hon. gentlemen are aware, it is a common practice at present for the railway companies of Canada, at the beginning of every year, to send to the members of this House a pass entitling them to free transportation over their lines, and there is a feeling throughout the country that these passes are given to the members for the purpose of influencing them in favour of the companies in any legislation that may be passed. My object in this Bill is to dispel, as far as possible, any feeling of that kind. Considerable discussion has taken place on this matter in the press, and I may state that I myself have discussed this matter with some of the railways, and I have been told that there was no intention on their part of influencing in any way the position of a member of the House, but that they issue these passes merely because it has become the custom of the country for railways to issue passes to members of the House of Commons and of the Senate. Now if such is the custom, and if it is going to be regularly followed by the railways of this country, I think it would be much better to put the matter in such a position that, as soon as a man is elected a member of this House he shall have the right to apply to the Clerk of the House for a certificate or to the executive officers of any railway company throughout the Dominion for a railway pass. If the question was put upon that basis there could be no idea of any member being under any obligation to a railway company from the fact of his holding a pass. I think myself it would be of great benefit to this country that the members of this House, representing as they do widely different interests in this country, should have every facility of travelling all over this great country, and seeing for themselves its great natural resources. I think also it would be to the advantage of the railway companies themselves if they understood that every member of this House, as soon as he is returned to represent a constituency of Canada, should have the privilege and the right of travelling over the railways of this country. I think a member of Parliament should be put in a better position than other people to make himself acquainted with the resources of all parts of this Dominion. Now it is with that object, Mr. Speaker, that I have introduced this Bill to the House, and I beg to move the second reading.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker. I can hardly think that the hon. member is serious in presenting such a Bill as this to the House. Does he want to make this House of Commons a laughing-stock; does he want to make it an object of contempt all over the country and all over other countries? Has the hon. gentleman ever seen a measure of this kind passed by any deliberative assembly in the world? If there were any excuse for such a measure it would be different, but everybody knows that the great railway companies in Canada are in the habit of extending this courtesy without any compulsion to every member of this House. I am sure there is no member, on either side of this House, who considers, for a single moment, that the acceptance of a pass from any railway company places a member of this House under the slightest obligation whatever. It is given as a courtesy, which the railways may very well extend, and it is in their own interests, in carrying out a railway enterprise, to give public men every facility for seeing the country and for estimating the value of the service they are performing. This being so, why should we place ourselves in so utterly ridiculous a position as to pass an Act of Parliament to compel railway corporations, or anybody else, to give to members of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada what may be regarded as a favour at their hands? Why, Sir, it is an invasion of private rights. Why does not the hon. gentleman complete the farce by providing that they issue every member of this House tickets to the dining cars and tickets to the sleeping cars as well? There is no reason why he should not, if we are in a position to demand these things as a right. We cannot ask these things as a right; this Parliament has no right to lay its hands upon any portion of the private property belonging to any individual or corporation in the country. They have the power, but they have not the right. I deny the right of this Parliament to lay claim to use the private property and convert it to their own use of any corporation or any individual in this country. The proposal is without excuse, because it is well known that this practice has become universal, that members of Parliament are voluntarily placed in the position of having these facilities put at their disposal, and to say that we will refuse to accept them as a compliment at the hands of these railway corporations, a compliment that is perfectly understood, is to propose something to which there is no justification. No hon. gentleman can go into the Railway Committee at any of the sittings without finding the most abundant evidence that there is no member of the House of Commons who considers himself under the slightest obligation to these railway corporations for the courtesy which is extended to them. The companies, which have given free passes voluntarily to members of Parliament, when their interests are at stake, members on both sides of the House, who have received this compliment, at their hands, giving the most determined and unqualified opposition to the measures which they consider to be in their own interests, showing that there is no person who considers his independence, in the slightest degree, compromised, or that he is placed under the least obligation whatever. I will not waste the time of the House in discussing, at length, a proposition of this kind. I cannot but think that the hon. gentleman is attempting to place this Parliament in a most extraordinary position, and that he is taking a most unnecessary step for which he has indicated no reason whatever. He is asking us to place ourselves in a position, such as has not been taken by any deliberative assembly in the world. I am sure if there is any assembly in which such a measure has been propounded, it is an object lesson to be avoided rather than followed. I am not aware of any such. I shall look with astonishment to any member of this House giving countenance and support to a measure of this kind under the circumstances under which it is brought before us.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, in the session of 1896, I introduced a Bill along these same lines, and I am glad to see that the matter is brought up again. It is evident that attempting to pooh-pooh this practice as having no effect upon members of Parliament does not convince the country, whatever influence it may have upon members of the House. I do not think this matter can be disposed of by pooh-poohing it, and making light of it. It is well known that when this system of free passes was introduced it was not at all general. Some railways adopted the practice while others did not, with the result that those that did not do so considered that they were not receiving reasonable treatment, and they also granted passes. It has been said in this House many times that hon. members were holding their seats with promises of positions in their pockets, and that their independence was affected thereby. We all know that the railway companies of this country do not give any courtesy to anybody unless they get a return for it. These corporations are composed of the sharpest business men in the country, and they do not give these courtesies without the expectation of a return, either direct or indirect. Therefore, I repeat, that to pooh-pooh the matter as the hon. leader of the Opposition has done, does not answer the case. I might give an illustration of how the system works by mentioning the case of an hon. gentleman who had a seat in this House and who had been using a pass from a railway company. He had some legal business from the railway company, and when he put in a pretty large bill against the corporation, they replied to him by saying: "You ride free all over our road, and we think that your charges are a little too high." "Well," he said, "if you look at it in that way, you may keep your pass." He did not reduce his charges on that account. I believe that members of this House are not affected by the reception of railway passes, but the people of this country feel that the practice has a bad effect upon the members of this House. The opinion of this country is, Mr. Speaker, that it is an imposition for members of Parliament to have free passes in their pockets, and at the same time to charge mileage coming to and going from Ottawa. This country has contributed over hundred of millions of dollars and large grants of land to build the railways in Canada, and in my view, it is quite within the power of this legislature which created the railways, to fix whatever rules we in our wisdom decide should govern them. There is not a railway in this country which does not receive a heavy annual subsidy for carrying the mails, and every one knows they are well paid for that. The pass privilege in my opinion has been abused, and I do not believe that it would interfere with the rights of any company if we passed this law and gave effect to its provisions. There must be some change in the regulations in this regard to satisfy the opinion of the country. If the members of this House feel that they are not sufficiently well paid for their attendance, let them stand up like men and vote an additional indemnity, but do not let them increase their indemnity in this roundabout way by accepting railway passes and saving their mileage. The independent agricultural classes of the community have a strong objection to this railway pass business, and I hope this House will adopt some legislation to put an end to the present unsatisfactory state of things in this regard.

Mr. W. B. IVES (Sherbrooke). The hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) has referred to an agitation in the country with regard to this question. The agitation was one of the peculiar platforms of the movement that my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) is the sole representative of, I believe, in this House. But his memory has failed, if he thinks the agitation would be allayed by a law compelling all railway companies to issue passes to members of Parliament. The objection of the Patrons of Industry was, that the railway companies should not issue passes to members at all, and they held that members of Parliament should pay their fares like anybody else. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) is going to settle the agitation, if any still exists, by the passage of this measure. In my judgment, however, that agitation is ended. The aim of the Patrons of Industry was accomplished when they helped to return the Liberal party to power, and that being accomplished we have heard very little from the Patrons of Industry about their platform for the last couple of years.

Mr. HUGHES. They all travel on their passes now.

Mr. BERGERON. They even take their trunks.

Mr. IVES. The serious objection to this Bill is, that it is communistic. If we have a right to compel railway companies to give us of their property, we have an equal right to compel the street railway companies in Ottawa and Montreal to allow us to travel free over their lines, and further, we have just as good a right to ask the railway companies to carry the freight of members of Parliament for nothing—a consideration which would be a great boon to some of us. It would be very nice indeed, but it is very communistic. We have not started to legislate in that line yet, and in my opinion we should not make a start in this trifling matter, which is of so small importance that it does not deserve the attention of the House.

Mr. JAS. McMULLEN (North Wellington). I give to the hon. the mover of the Bill credit for attempting to put a stop to a system which I am satisfied that the people of the country, and particularly those in the rural districts, find fault with. I know that an impression has been abroad for many years, that members of Parliament accepting passes were to a certain extent influenced in favour of legislation that might possibly be beneficial to the railway companies. However, I quite agree with the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition, that he has never noticed in the Railway Committee, that any member of Parliament ever was influenced by the fact that he had a free pass. For my own part I have been a member of that committee for fifteen or sixteen years, and I can honestly say, that I have never seen the slightest indication that members of Parliament were influenced in any vote they gave in regard to a railway Bill. There has also been a feeling throughout the country against members of Parliament drawing mileage to and from Ottawa, while they are in possession of railway passes. Now, Sir, I do not think there is a country in the world where railway companies get cheaper railway legislation than they do in Canada. You know perfectly well that in England, at least so I have been informed, a railway company seeking a charter goes before the Railway Committee, and each member of that committee has to be paid a guinea for his attendance each day he gives his services in the way of helping through a Bill. I have been informed that the members of the Railway Committee in London are paid in that way. There is no such exaction from railway companies in this country, although the members of our Railway Committee devote a great deal of extra time and attention to the consideration of the Bills that come before them. As I have said, I believe that in Canada railway companies receive their legislation as cheaply, if not cheaper, than in any other country.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) permit me to ask him a question. Do I understand him to say that the railway companies in England pay the members of Parliament for their attendance at the committee?

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand so from the information I have received.

Mr. WALLACE. It could not be possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that those promoting charters in England pay the members of the committee for their services in discussing a railway Bill. I have been so informed on good authority. Now, Sir, some injustices unquestionably do exist under our present system. For instance, there is the Intercolonial Railway which belongs to the country, and it is not a paying institution, and has not been a paying institution in the past. Senators and members of Parliament get passes over the Intercolonial Railway as they do over the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. And these members and Senators of Parliament from the maritime provinces get a free ride over this Intercolonial Railway which belongs to the country, and is not a paying institution, and in addition to that they also draw money from the country for mileage. Thus the country loses the fares of Senators and members of Parliament, and loses at the same time the sums paid them for mileage. So far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, this is a double cost to the country, whereas in reality the free passes cost nothing to the country in the case of the other roads. However, I suppose this is a matter that can hardly be avoided seeing that the privileges are granted by other railways to members who live in the west, and I presume it is thought wise that the same favour should be extended to those who travel over the Intercolonial Railway. Nevertheless it is double pay to these men so far as the country is concerned. I would like, Sir, to see some settlement made with regard to this whole question. My hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) said that the Patrons of Industry had agitated this question for a great many years, but that since the Reform party got into power the Patrons were dead. Well, my impression is that the Patrons are not as dead as my hon. friend (Mr. Ives) thinks. They are keeping an eye no doubt upon the proceedings of this House, and every act that bears evidence of extravagance or injustice to the people will be noticed by the Patrons, and I rather fancy that in a great many cases the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) will find that they will be very lively corpses when the next general election comes around.

Mr. ROGERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not at all think that the Patrons of Industry conducted their agitation for the purpose of bringing into power the Reform party. I will tell you what I believe they did want. They wanted to get men in power who would administer the affairs of this country honestly. They have secured that at last, and I believe that they are satisfied that the affairs of this country are now being honestly administered. But I would say to my friends on this side of the House that if they should stray away from the path of national rectitude to the extent that our hon. friends opposite did when they were in power, I should not be at all surprised if the Patrons of Industry would rise again and help to put them out, if honest men could be got. But men would have to change greatly before we could get men who would more honestly discharge their duties than the members of the present Government. At the same time, I would like to see something done to put a stop to the agitation in the country with regard to these railway passes. I would like the country to understand that if passes are issued, the men who receive them are not at all influenced in their action by the fact. I am glad to be able to bear my testimony to the truth of the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition in that respect, for I have never seen any indication of it. But the country does not think so, and I would like to see something done to put an end to the impression which exists in the country, either by compelling railway companies to give passes or by cutting off the mileage altogether. I would be glad to do that. Not that I think members of Parliament are unduly paid for the services they render, or that the indemnity is at all adequate to the expense to which they are put in serving the country. After an experience of many years, I am satisfied that if members of Parliament grow rich, it is not because of the indemnity they receive. But I would like to see this matter adjusted in some way so that the agitation could be put a stop to, and members of Parliament could not be charged with drawing money for mileage and at the same time travelling on railway passes.

Mr. J. ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. leader of the Opposition expresses astonishment that any member of this House should be found to support the Bill of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), the hon. gentleman must know, or he ought to know, that there are members of this House who pay their fares on the railways, and decline to receive favours from the railway companies. I cannot see that the Bill which has been introduced by the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, puts any burden on the shoulders of the railway companies. The Bill simply provides that these railway companies shall be compelled to do what they have hitherto been only too glad to do out of the fulness of their affection for members of this Parliament. There is a strong sentiment in this country against the use of railway passes by members of Parliament. Members who do not accept passes will agree with me that this sentiment is very unfair; for I would not suggest for a moment that members who travel on passes are not just as free from railroad influences as I am. But, unfair or not, the sentiment exists, and the present Bill will remove every semblance of reason for such a sentiment. I realize that the ideal way to approach this question would be to prohibit the issue of passes to members of Parliament; but the practical way to grapple with this evil is to compel the issue of these passes. On the pass question, prohibition is ideal and unworkable; compulsion is practical and automatic. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) referred to the question of mileage; but I see no reason why that question should come up in this discussion at all. The pass question can be settled first; and any grievance which the country can have on account of the payment of mileage can be dealt with afterwards. I cannot see that the country has any reason to feel that members of Parliament are overpaid, even when the mileage is added to their indemnity.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to say to my esteemed and hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) that the Government cannot accede to the principle of his Bill. At the same time, I differ to a large extent from my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in the remarks he made a moment ago. This legislation is far from being unprecedented and farcical. I do not know of my own knowledge, but I am informed that similar legislation exists in several states of the Union; and if these precedents for it exist, I think that is a reason why we should, at all events, treat it with more respect than has been shown to it by the leader of the Opposition. At the same time, I submit to the House that the proposition which is contained in the Bill is one of such a far-reaching character that the House must pause about agreeing to it; because, after all, a railway company is entitled to its own property. If a railway company chooses, of its own free-will or out of the abundance of its affection, as was remarked by my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. J. Ross Robertson), to issue passes to any person, whether he be a member of Parliament or not, it is acting in the exercise of its rights. It acts according to its own interests, or from some other consideration. But to force the railway company to do what it does willingly, is altogether another proposition. It has been the characteristic of all British Parliaments, especially the mother of all Parliaments, to pay the most minute respect at all times to the rights of civil property; and for this reason, I think we cannot, at this moment, compel the railway companies to issue, without remuneration, a free pass to every member of Parliament or to anybody else. But while I say that, I do not know that, after all, by simply rejecting this Bill, we grapple with a question which has often been brought to the attention of the House. It has been felt—and I believe there is some reason for it—that the system of issuing passes is not altogether free from objection. I agree with the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and repeated a moment ago by my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and I believe not questioned from any quarter of this House, that the issue of passes is not a consideration to influence any kind of legislation either in the Railway Committee or on the floor of this Parliament. It is, I am sure, altogether too paltry a consideration to be taken into account by any man who has a duty to discharge as a member of this Parliament. Though it has never had that effect, and will never have it, I hope, we cannot ignore the fact that the public conscience has been more or less touched by the circumstance that passes are issued to members of Parliament who at the same time receive a mileage allowance to pay their fare. If a proposition were made that railway companies which have been subsidized out of the treasury of Canada should be compelled to issue passes to members of Parliament, that might perhaps be considered. The Parliament of Canada has not treated the railway companies gingerly. On the contrary, it has been very free with aid to railway companies; and if it were a part of the obligation of railway companies which receive aid from the Parliament of Canada that they should carry free members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate, perhaps there might be something in such a proposition which would entitle it to consideration. I am not prepared at the present time to offer any judgment on that. But if we were to compel subsidized companies to issue free passes to members of Parliament, certainly, as a consequence, the proportion of mileage which is given to members of Parliament would have to be reconsidered. If the two things were considered together, I think Parliament would be prepared to give them favourable consideration; and if my hon. friend were to review the question at another time upon these principles, he might perhaps receive a favourable hearing from this House. But, as the Bill which he has presented does not meet these views, I think he would consult the best interests of the object he has at heart in not pressing it, but in withdrawing the motion he has made.

Motion negatived.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved second reading of Bill (No. 50) to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: As may be seen, on reference to the first section of this short Bill, it provides that, in the case of the dismissal or removal of any civil servant, he can, upon application in writing to the head of the department within thirty days, obtain from the department what the Bill calls a certificate, setting forth:

- 1st. The duration of his employment in the civil service of Canada;
- 2nd. The nature of such employment;
- 3rd. The reason of his removal;
- 4th. The number and nature of the complaints made against him;
- 5th. The name or names of all persons who made complaints against him;
- 6th. The decision arrived at by the department upon all complaints so made;
- 7th. A copy of all proceedings had at any inquiry held by or under the direction of the department.

As the House will see, this measure provides special protection to the civil servants against whom the pleasure of the Government has been exercised. It does not in any way change the nature and tenure of the service, but enables a civil servant, when dismissed, to obtain a certificate which fully acquaints him with the causes that led up to his dismissal, the offence with which he is charged, the proceedings upon that charge, and the decision of the Government.

The immediate effects of this legislation are to be considered in the first place, but there are remote effects besides, and, to my mind, they are not the least good effects which may be derived from this legislation. If the House will accept it. The House will notice that one of the immediate effects of the Bill is, that it enables an employee to know fully the circumstances which led to his dismissal. I do not wish to enter into the details of any cases, but, no doubt, members on the other side of the House will admit, that since the change of Government in 1896, a great many public employees, both important and unimportant, have been dismissed from the service. Among those dismissed who occupy inferior positions, there is a large number who, to this very day, are not aware of the exact reasons which brought about their removal from office. And I do not believe that those reasons could be easily ascertained. They know the fact, but do not know what particular circumstances led to their dismissal. It seems to me that the position of a civil servant is, to a very large extent, if not entirely, the position of a man employed in the ordinary relation of life, and any man occupying a position of trust, in the ordinary relations of life, is entitled, if that position be taken from him, to know the causes and circumstances which lead up to what must be for him a calamity. This measure will permit a civil servant to know the causes and circumstances which lead to his dismissal, and to learn those circumstances and the cause of his dismissal directly from his employer. If this Bill becomes law he will not be obliged to turn to members of Parliament, or in any other way seek information upon a matter which, to him, is one of great moment; but directly from the department and within a certain time, when all the circumstances attending his dismissal are familiar to the department, he can obtain that information and he can obtain it without publicity. The majority of civil servants dismissed in the past have been obliged to seek information through the members of this House, and that information has been obtained either by questions put to the Government or by motions for returns. This method, apart from being lengthy, involves publicity, and, in some cases, unquestionably, that publicity is calculated to harm the civil servant. It is publicity, I submit, which is always calculated to do an injury to a man who, after leaving the civil service, must, as a general rule, turn to some other means of livelihood for himself and his family. The Bill has another advantage. If it becomes law, it will, I submit, greatly abridge the time that has been devoted in Parliament, at least since I became a member of this House, to discussing dismissals, matters of a purely private—if I may use that expression—or, at any rate, of an individual nature. I have no doubt that all the members of this House will admit that since this Parliament began its sittings, a very large proportion of our time has been devoted to the examination of these cases of dismissals of civil servants, particularly in cases in which it was possible to get information only by bringing the matter up in this House. Very possibly, if the procedure which it is sought to introduce by this Bill had been in use, the civil servant might not have moved these influences which were brought to bear in his favour, and thus a very considerable saving of time in this House would have been gained. I do not wish to take up unnecessarily the time of the House upon a measure which does not seem to me to involve great difficulties or to be likely to meet with serious objection; but I desire to point out another advantage possessed by this Bill. It is that it enables the public servant, immediately after his removal, to have in his possession a document which will put him in a position to seek employment elsewhere. It has come to my personal knowledge that a number of civil servants who were dismissed—I will not, for the moment, discuss the question whether they were dismissed justly or unjustly, dismissed for what is known here vaguely as offensive partisanship—a number of these civil servants on whose behalf I was interested, as well as others whose cases have come to my notice, were absolutely precluded from finding employment for the reason that when we sought to find occupation for these men, parties from whom we sought that occupation, without giving us an absolute reason, seemed to waver in their anxiety to oblige, because they had not proof positive that the real reason for the dismissal of the civil servant was his offensive partisanship and not some graver offence committed by him in the exercise of his official duties. One case was that of a collector on a canal, a man of extraordinary honesty, who, during a period of, I think, seventeen years, was never, in one single instance, found at fault in the exercise of his duties as collector. He was dismissed from the civil service for offensive partisanship. But it took a considerable time to obtain from the Government a declaration to that effect—through the man's own fault, possibly, or through the fault of those who were interested in his behalf, or through the fact that Parliament was not sitting at the time. This man, in two or three instances, I believe, would have obtained an employment of trust, for which he was pre-eminently fitted, if he had had this document of, so to speak, an authentic character, certifying the exact reason of his dismissal from office, from which anybody could have concluded that during this long period of his service to the state in regard to these duties to which he was specifically called, the collection of the revenue of the Crown, he had never in any instance been found at fault. There is, as hon. members will notice, a provision in the Bill which calls for a declaration from the department to the civil servant dismissed of the names of those who have made complaint against him. Now, Sir, here again I invoke my own experience and the experience, I am sure, of a number of members of this House. In a great many instances, particularly in the case of the removal from office of men occupying inferior positions in the civil service—workmen, men whose calling was to manual labour—complaints were brought to the department or to the member of the party who controlled the patronage of the office it was sought to vacate, and it never was possible to find out through whom these complaints were made. Now, Sir, it seems to me that the position of the Government, here again, in circumstances such as these, is very much the same as that of an ordinary employer. Surely no man who had been served faithfully by any employee would think of proceeding to the very rigorous extreme of dismissing that employee without informing him of the names of the parties who had a grievance against him, without telling that employee that complaints had been made and revealing to him the names of those complaining, giving him a chance of clearing himself of such a disastrous imputation as would call for his dismissal from office. I therefore think that where there is a complaint made against a civil servant, that complaint should be articulated clearly by the complainant, and if the complaint is proceeded upon to the extremity of dismissal, he should be made aware of the name of the party who has made the complaint against him and has brought upon him so great a calamity. I believe that another of the immediate results of a measure such as this will be to afford considerable relief to the heads of the departments themselves. I believe that in many cases of dismissals—I do not refer merely to such dismissals as have taken place since I have been sitting in this House, but to many that may have occurred before I entered political life—I believe that in many of those instances the Government of the day, the heads of the departments, have resisted as long as they could the influences brought to bear to bring about the dismissal of a civil servant. Many of these people who offend in this way are thoughtlessly carried away by political passions which are very often merely local in their character, carried away by what we term in this country parish politics, and I believe that if the head of the department was able to say: You must remember that under the terms of the law I am obliged to tell this man, when he is dismissed, all the circumstances that are set forth in section 1 of this Bill, I believe that in many instances matters would not be pushed any further. Such a provision would be a relief, not only to the party whose dismissal is sought, very unjustly sometimes, but to the Government itself. Sir, if this measure becomes law there are, outside of those immediate advantages which I have pointed out, others which, if more remote, are to my mind more important still. In the first place, if this procedure is followed out in the case of all civil servants dismissed, we will have a regular jurisprudence of a valuable character as to what offences may be considered causes for dismissal from the civil service. At the present time we do not know exactly what constitutes offensive partisanship. We have different opinions upon that subject, but I believe there is such an offence, and I believe it is a very serious one. But when you come to apply the vague theories which we have in our minds as to what constitutes offensive partisanship, we find it a very difficult matter. Now I know one case of a man who was dismissed from the civil service after an investigation. In that investigation it was established that during the revision of the lists in the province of Quebec, in his own parish, he had attended to that revision, he had suggested the names of parties who were qualified to vote, he had also mentioned the names of parties who had no right to vote. A witness was asked at the inquiry if, on any occasion, this man had betrayed any desire to deprive any one unjustly of his vote. No, he said, never; he was there attending to the revision of the lists, and he was acting justly; he was himself on the list, and he seemed anxious that everybody who had a right to vote should have a vote, and that those parties should not have a vote who clearly had no right to be on the list. Well, Sir, this man was dismissed for offensive partisanship. Is it right or is it wrong for a civil servant to use the right which the law gives him of petitioning, at the time of the revision of the lists, in order that these voting lists should be correct? If, as in the instance I have just given, it is established that he was not a violent man, that he sought to commit no injustice, but that he was anxious to be fair and impartial to everybody, and that he simply used the right which our own statute confers upon him, because at that time they were proceeding under the old election law—if he uses that right properly, is he guilty of offensive partisanship? Surely we can derive only benefit from the jurisprudence which, it seems to me, would result from carrying out the provisions of this law. There are other cases which, to my mind, are less doubtful than these, but which to many might appear doubtful cases. A civil servant goes to a committee meeting; is that man guilty of offensive partisanship? If he is, if, by attending a committee meeting, he is guilty of partisanship, and if that is once for all established and recorded, then civil servants will be on their guard. The jurisprudence to which I have referred will be useful to the public servants themselves in the first place, and it will be useful also to the Crown. It will enable the head of a department to say: This question has been decided long ago, it has been decided, for instance, that a man who goes to a public meeting and shakes his fist at one of the candidates, is showing offensive partisanship, and you were seen doing this, and you should have known that this was wrong, and you are dismissed for this reason. This jurisprudence may also be useful to the community at large, to the whole electorate, as well as to the heads of departments and to the civil servants themselves. In other words, if the provisions of this Bill are put into force, I imagine that after a certain time we will have a mass of decisions recorded upon which may be based, possibly, rules to guide the civil servant in so far as interference with politics is concerned; and if he violates those rules, or if he proceeds against these decisions of the departments, then he will know that his conduct, however proper it may appear to himself, exposes him to the loss of his position. The adoption of this measure will also put a check upon a principle which, to a very considerable extent for some years past, has been gaining force in this country, and that is the principle that to the victors belong the spoils.

In this regard, let me very briefly remind the House what the experience of the United States has been. The members of this House are well aware that the tenure of office in the neighbouring republic is similar to the tenure of office in our own country and in England. A civil servant, in the United States, enjoys his position at the pleasure of the President, exactly as the civil servant here holds office during the pleasure of the Crown. During the first years of the American republic nobody doubted in the United States but that this tenure of office was one for life, or one for life provided the civil servant behaved properly. From the time of President Washington's accession to office down to 1820, although in the neighbouring republic they had a very large number already of civil servants, there were only sixteen dismissals from office, and these dismissals were for cause. They had nothing to do with politics or with offensive partisanship; they were dismissals for gross neglect of duty. In 1820, in the United States, a Bill was introduced and passed through both Houses of Congress almost unnoticed, and that Bill provided that no man should remain in office more than four or five years, I think. I am not sure as to the length of time, but still, in spite of the want of interest which the people took at the time of the adoption of this important measure, it did not pass without strong protests from Jefferson and Madison. Almost immediately after this law had come into force, it was not acted upon. It was considered that, although there was this disposition of the law stating that four or five years was the duration of the tenure of office, public servants should be allowed to remain in office, as a matter of course, during good behaviour. In 1829, at the time of the accession of President Jackson, after a very stormy electoral contest, President Jackson, who was a violent man, began this system of dismissals from office without any cause assigned, but merely upon the principle that civil servants hold office during the absolute pleasure of the appointing power. This system, inaugurated by President Jackson, grew rapidly, and it was in 1832 that, in the Senate of the United States, Senator Marcy proclaimed the principle, that in all political contests the spoils belong to the victors. From that moment the system spread throughout the whole republic. It became the custom to dismiss civil servants upon the accession of a new political party to power. The President and Ministers surrounding him were not in a position to control the demands made upon them; they were not in a position to inquire as to the validity of the claims made; they had to take the word of the member of Congress coming from the locality where the changes were sought to be made, and it became an accepted idea, that rotation in office came as a necessary consequence of a change of political parties at the helm of state. It became, as I stated a moment ago, a principle, that a person holds office at the absolute pleasure of the appointing power, and also, that office is only granted as a reward for party services rendered by a party man, and that that reward is to be given to a party man who has rendered such service, or to his friend. It became a principle, that any man who occupies a public office must consider that it is necessary for him to leave that office as soon as the political party to which he has not given allegiance, comes to have the power of dismissing him. In other words, the House will see that the idea that public office was a public duty, or a public trust, and that the position which a party appointed would hold during the time of his good behaviour, or during life, if he behaved properly, disappeared entirely and was replaced by the principle to which I have just adverted. Of course, I know that that idea grew more rapidly in the United States than it would grow, probably, in our own country, because at that time it was deemed in the United States that rotation in office was, to a certain extent, the consequence of the democratic idea prevalent in that great republic, that every man should in turn occupy some public position, and that they should strenuously avoid that bureaucratic principle which obtains in many of the countries of Europe. That principle was at first understood to apply merely to federal offices, but in a short space of time it was extended to state positions. It went from federal politics into the administration of the state; and from the administration of the state it was extended in a short time to municipal affairs, so that the system which I have briefly endeavoured to describe, with which members of this House are probably more familiar than I am myself, extended over the whole length and breadth of the American administrative system. What did it produce? We know what that system produced. It produced the professional politician and the boss, the man who really controls political affairs in the state. It produced such evil, that in 1863, or thereabouts, the American people began to protest against that system and to work strenuously to get rid of it. It had become at that time, and it has become since, most distasteful to them. They have realized its incalculable evils. President Garfield it was who said, that more than one-third of the time of a public man in the United States was taken up in attending to these matters, in attending to claims for patronage, and dismissals from office in favour of the party's friends. Well, Sir, the evil grew to such an extent that the reaction began in 1883 with the Act known as the Pendleton Act, which inaugurated the present civil service reform in the United States. Mr. Pendleton was a member of the United States Senate, and he introduced an Act creating a commission much like our own civil service commission, and provided in the wording of the Act that upon this commission both political parties in the United States should be represented. Of course, that Act did not bring about an immediate change, but it had the effect that out of the 120,000 civil servants in the United States, it took 14,000 of them out of the class who changed office whenever there was a change of the executive in power. Since then the provisions of the Pendleton Act have been extended so as to increase by three times the number of civil servants included in the original Act, and we all know that at the present time in the United States the hope of every serious man is that ultimately the provisions of the Act will be so widened as to remove the entire civil service from the fatal influence of the spoils system. We therefore find that the Americans are endeavouring in the most serious and systematic manner, to get rid of the principle enunciated by Marcy: that to the victors belong the spoils. The people of the United States are anxious to make their civil service what it is in England viz., a permanent civil service. I admit that in Canada we are far from the state of affairs which brought about the passing of the Pendleton Act; but I hold that no serious man will refuse to admit that there is a strong tendency in the direction of that evil; a tendency which we should endeavour to prevent by every possible means. I believe that this Bill, if it should become law, will check the efforts which are made, whenever there is a change of government, to obtain dismissals when there is no justification for these dismissals. I believe this law, if enacted, will help to prevent the spread of that spoils system in Canada, and therefore, Sir, in my humble judgment, it ought to commend itself to the attention of this House. As I stated, it does not in any way touch the tenure of office, which remains in the pleasure of the Crown; but it provides that the position of the civil servant, whether he has been dismissed justly or unjustly, shall be surrounded with salutary guarantees.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I have always regarded dismissals from the civil service, for political partisanship, or for political purposes, in an entirely different light from dismissals for other causes. I can understand the justice of dismissing a civil servant at any time that he is negligent, or unfaithful, or untrustworthy. But in the vast majority of cases, the Canadian civil servant is dismissed because he has had the courage of his convictions to speak out his mind, it may be in a manly and fearless way, on the public questions which interest every citizen of the state. In that view, a Bill with such an object as the Bill moved by the hon. member (Mr. Monk) is one that should become law. In many cases, a young man is dismissed from the civil service for no other reason than alleged partisanship, and often it has never been proved that he was guilty of political partisanship, offensive partisanship, or active partisanship. He is dismissed on the mere allegation, and in such a case he goes into the world handicapped when he seeks employment in some other walk in life. It is known that he was dismissed from the service; it is true the rumour was that he was dismissed because he was a partisan, but those who require the services of such a man look upon him with a certain amount of suspicion, and it is sometimes assumed that other reasons caused or contributed to his dismissal. This prevents him from getting employment where he otherwise might obtain it. This civil servant has fitted himself for a special line of service; he has faithfully and efficiently carried out his duties in the interests of the country, and it is a great hardship and injustice to him to be suddenly deprived of his means of livelihood. Some one who is sensitive over what young men do, has a grudge against that civil servant, or has been misinformed with regard to his conduct in a political campaign, and if this some one is a supporter of the party in power, he applies for the dismissal of this young man, and on his mere allegation, the civil servant is dismissed. The allegation may be true or false, in many cases, it is false, but nevertheless the young man suffers, and he is thrown out of employment which heretofore afforded a living to both himself and his family. There is a stain on his character which seriously interferes with his chance of getting employment, but if this Bill passes, and he receives such a certificate as is provided for, after a fair inquiry, or a trial if you like, the facts of his dismissal are set forth, and it puts him on a better standing in the eyes of those from whom he seeks employment. I claim that every civil servant who is dismissed is justly entitled to a certificate, stating the grounds upon which his services were dispensed with. If the civil servant be dismissed upon unfair or unreasonable grounds, or mere allegations not consonant with the facts, then it is a simple act of justice that he should get a certificate stating why he was so dismissed. If the dismissed servant was not given a fair trial, was not confronted by his accusers so that he might have an opportunity to refute their allegations, then a great injustice is perpetrated upon him. It is my opinion that in almost all cases the civil servant should have that opportunity. That is only fair in other lines of life, and it is much more important that it should be the case with regard to our Canadian civil servants, because if we can believe what we hear, in very many cases our civil servants are dismissed because they have spoken out their minds a little too freely to suit those opposed to them politically. In many cases of the dismissal of civil servants which have been brought to the notice of this House, it has been alleged that they were not political partisans, that they took no part in elections, that they did not even vote, and that they were not offensive; but these men were not allowed an opportunity to prove their innocence, even when it was demanded of the Government that they should have that simple justice done them. They asked who were their accusers, but they were given no information as to who they were. What were the accusations against them? They were not given them, but the bald statement was made to this House, as a justification for their dismissal and the taking away of the means of support for themselves and their families, that they were offensive partisans, and they were obliged to go out into the world branded with that character and with a suspicion against them which might prevent them getting other employment. If such conduct, as has prevailed during the last two or three years, is to prevail in the future with regard to the dismissal of public servants, it is high time that we had such an Act as is proposed. Therefore, for my part I am inclined to support the Bill, and the sooner it becomes law the better for the civil service and the general interest of Canada.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE (Champlain). Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I entirely approve of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I do not wish to enter into any lengthy details, as I think the hon. gentleman has fully explained his Bill, and I hesitate not to say that it should commend itself to the approval of every hon. gentleman in this House.

The position of a civil servant, who is dismissed from office, for political or other purposes, is the position of a man employed in the ordinary relations of life, and he is entitled to know the causes which led up to his dismissal. For some time past, it has become the practice of dismissing civil servants upon such flimsy pretenses that it is necessary to specify the reasons of their dismissal from office, and thus put an end to a method which is calculated to harm the civil servant. I am referring here to those employees who have been dismissed on the ground of political partisanship, and for services rendered either to the Liberal party or to the Conservative party. The object of this Bill is to enable the public servant, immediately after his dismissal, to obtain from the head of the department a certificate of an authentic character stating the exact reasons of his dismissal from office. The public servant is thus enabled to have in his possession a document certifying the exact reasons of his dismissal and which will enable him to seek employment elsewhere.

The dismissal of civil servants from office is a matter attended with more or less serious consequences to them. People are apt to think that more serious offences than political partisanship have led up to the dismissal; while, as a matter of fact, several cases have been brought to the notice of the House of civil servants having been removed from office on very trifling pretenses. Well, this Bill enables a civil servant, when dismissed, to obtain a certificate setting forth the grounds upon which his services were dispensed with, so that he will not go handicapped into the world when he seeks employment in some other walk of life. He may obtain, upon application in writing to the head of the Department a certificate setting forth the nature and the duration of his employment, while in the service of the Government. This certificate of character may prove of great importance to a dismissed official, in so far as it will put him on a better standing in the eyes of the business men from whom he seeks employment, by setting forth the number of years he has been in the employ of the Government, and what are his qualifications for the work he has performed. I might call it a certificate of competency, which will give the civil servant dismissed a better chance of seeking employment in some other walk of life.

I desire to point out another advantage possessed by this Bill: There is a provision in the Bill calling for a declaration from the department to the civil servant dismissed, of the names of those who have made complaint against him, of the proceedings upon that charge and of the decision of the Government, after the charge has been investigated. The Bill provides that the number and nature of the complaints made against him are to be clearly articulated in the certificate; and the reason why this provision was made is that complaints are frequently brought against civil servants on more or less serious grounds, by more or less competent individuals who are less qualified than the employees themselves, against whom they bring charges. The consequence of these various provisions of the Bill will be to render more cautious those who have made complaints against the dismissed civil servant, because their names will be revealed to him, and they would not like to see their names affixed to such trifling charges. The result would be that grievances of no importance whatever would no longer be brought to the notice of the House.

The clause which provides that the certificate shall set forth the nature and number of the complaints made against the civil servant dismissed, and the decision arrived at by the department upon all complaints so made, that clause, I say, is of very great moment. Why so? Because it would afford relief to the heads of the departments themselves, who would then be in a position to tell the complainants: You must bear in mind that I am bound to make known to the party whose dismissal you seek, when he is dismissed, the names of the complainants. The result of this clause would be to put the complainants on their guard. On the other hand, it would also impress upon those who control the civil service the necessity of never dismissing any civil servant except on fair and reasonable grounds.

We all know what took place in the past, in the case of civil servants dismissed from office, having asked for certificates of character, or for a copy of the charges brought against them. In order to get information about the causes of their dismissal from office, they have been obliged to turn to members of Parliament, and that information has been obtained by numerous questions put to the Government or by motions for returns. Were this measure to carry, a considerable saving of time in this House would have been gained, and that is another ground upon which I am inclined to support this Bill, and the sooner it is passed into law the better for the civil service itself.

On these several grounds, I deem it my duty, as a matter of fair play and justice towards the civil service, to support the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) were to become law, he will admit that it would create quite a revolution in our system of parliamentary government. I listened carefully to my hon. friend, and I think I do him no injustice when I say that he has discussed the Bill and the question involved in it more from the American than from the British point of view. He has forgotten for the moment that we are not under the American system, but under the British system. Apart from that, my hon. friend has discussed the question very much as if the Government existed for the civil service, and not the civil service for the Government. The fact is, if this Bill were to become law, the whole system of responsible government, such as we have always understood it, would become absolutely nil. But it is not necessary for me to go into any lengthy argument; for my hon. friend, I believe, answered himself effectually when he stated that a civil servant is entitled to the rights of an ordinary employee, and should be so treated. I have no fault to find with that proposition; I agree with him. But a civil servant has no other right than that of any other employee. I ask my hon. friend if such a law as he proposes would be tolerated if sought to be applied anywhere else than in the civil service? Of course, if a man is dismissed from office, whether he occupies a public or a private position, he is quite within his right if he asks from his employer a certificate of character. If a merchant, for reasons which are satisfactory to himself, dismisses a man in his employ, the latter will certainly go to him and ask him for a certificate of character; but it will be at the option of the employer to decide whether or not he will give him a certificate. If the merchant, for reasons of his own, chooses not to give the certificate, who has a right to complain? Or if, from simple caprice, he refuses to give the certificate, what recourse has the servant against him? My hon. friend, being actively engaged in the profession of the law, knows better than I do that under such circumstances the servant has no recourse whatever. Then, can my hon. friend state any reason why the Government should be subjected to conditions which no other member of society is subjected to? If a Minister comes to the conclusion that a civil servant should not be kept in the service, for whatever reason, the civil servant would have no more right against the Government than he would have if employed by a private member of the community. I do not think the principle is subject to controversy, and yet the hon. gentleman wants by this Bill to subject the Government to conditions which he would not dare to impose upon any private member of the community. My hon. friend will therefore see at once the weakness of his position. It seems to me that this is enough, and more than enough, to show him that the position he takes is not acceptable. I share everything my hon. friend says as to the dangers and evils of the spoils system, a system which I hope will never be introduced into this country; but I do not share what he says about civil servants meddling in politics. Especially I do not share in the views expressed by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) on this subject. I do not believe, nor is the opinion shared, I am sure, by any number of the members of this House, that civil servants should be allowed to take any part in political matters.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I did not mean to say that a civil servant should have the right to take part in politics. I said a man was dismissed for no other reason than that he had spoken out freely.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend could not have been very happy in his expressions. When he says that a man was dismissed because he had the courage of his opinion, that is encouraging civil servants to express their opinions. I also want to call attention to certain strictures passed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and to say that, so far as my memory goes, and I believe it is absolutely correct, there has been no dismissal for offensive partisanship in the inside service of the country. The civil servants here understand quite well that they are not to meddle in politics. They are free to exercise their suffrage by registering their vote; and, while the great majority of them, I believe, have taken advantage of this right, which the law gives them. I am not aware that any one of them has been guilty of offensive partisanship. All the dismissals have taken place in the outside service, and chiefly from among that class of officers who receive some remuneration for work which does not take up all of their time, but only a portion of it, and for which they receive a remuneration which would not be sufficient to keep them. But I repeat what I said a moment ago, that we do not want the spoils system introduced into this country. It has not been, and I hope it never will be. I do not think it can be introduced so long as we enjoy our present system of government. My hon. friend has forgotten that there is all the difference in the world in this respect between the British and the American system. The British system is one of responsible government, a government which is responsible to the House of Commons for every dismissal, which therefore exercises that power under a sense of responsibility, and which can be censured, and even dismissed, if it exercises that power in a way in which it should not, according to the judgment of the House. That is not the case in the American system. There the Administration hold office for four years. Whether they use their power rightly or abuse it, they cannot be removed during their term of office, and therefore can dismiss at will thousands of civil servants who are not of their own political views. They can act tyrannically and arbitrarily, and the civil servant has no remedy, and if we had the same system in this country, there might be some reason for the measure proposed by my hon. friend. But under our system the civil servant is amply protected, as well as the public at large. I do not agree at all in the statement of my hon. friend that men have been debarred from any other employment because they could not get certificates. I am not aware that any man dismissed from office ever applied to the head of his department for a certificate of character. If he had, he would undoubtedly have obtained one according to the views of the Minister. If the friend of my hon. friend, of whose dismissal he complains, had applied to the Minister in charge, and the Minister was of the opinion that the man had been a faithful servant, he would have given him a certificate to that effect. That certificate would have shown that the man had satisfactorily discharged his duties, and that the reason he was dismissed was because he had abused his position to meddle in politics. With this certificate, my hon. friend's friend might have obtained employment anywhere. I do not see, therefore, that any reason has been given why we should depart in any way from the time-honoured practice—not only the time-honoured practice, but the principle of responsible government, which I would look upon as seriously invaded if this Bill should become law. Therefore, I move that it be not now read, but be read this day six months.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in submitting this Bill to the House, and I did not notice a single point taken by my hon. friend that was not admirably sustained by argument. It was a clear, lucid exposition of a very plain and practical question, and the hon. gentleman gave to this House most conclusive reasons why his Bill should be adopted. I must say that I listened to the criticisms of the measure made by the right hon. leader of the Government with very great surprise. He did not undertake to challenge a single point raised by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, so far as I am able to judge. The right hon. gentleman said that the position taken by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is based upon the American rather than the British system. Why, it is the very reverse. My hon. friend believes in the British system. He believes in that system, which was not only the British but the Canadian system down to the time this Government assumed office, but which since then has been gradually broken down to the spoils system introduced in conformity with principles that apply to United States rather than to British institutions. The right hon. leader of the Government says that this is a simple question—one between master and servant. He says he can find no difference between the position that a civil servant occupies in Canada to-day and the position which a coachman occupies as regards his master. I join issue with the right hon. gentleman, and I say that the position he gives the civil servant is one that is calculated to degrade the civil service of the country and bring it down to a status such as it has never occupied and I trust never will occupy in the consideration of this House. A civil servant is not the servant of these gentlemen, but the servant of the country; and it is in their position of trustees of the country that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have the power they possess, and which they have abused by attempting to lower and degrade the character of the civil service as it has never been lowered and degraded before. We now learn from the right hon. gentleman what lies at the foot of the degradation of the civil service of Canada. It is the belief that they are the servants of the Ministers instead of the servants of Canada.

We have had a variety of statements made. First, these hon. gentlemen took their ground upon offensive partisanship, and when they found it was not a case of offensive partisanship but of the simple exercise of the right which every civil servant in Canada has always enjoyed—the independent exercise of his franchise—they converted that into a ground for dismissal. That is not all. Does the right hon. gentleman pretend to tell me that he can shelter himself or his Government under even the plea of offensive partisanship? Why, he knows there is a case standing on the records of the House—the papers in which have been laid on the Table—in which a member of the Government is convicted of having swept out of office scores of men whom the Government themselves had declared were entitled to hold office and had so advised the Governor General. And for what reason were these men dismissed? Because they had done anything improper? No, but simply on the ground that they were in the position of private servants of a private gentleman, and therefore could be swept aside and trampled on at pleasure. They could be dismissed on a fortnight or month's notice, just as the First Minister's hired monthly or daily servant may be dismissed. What was the reason assigned for their dismissal, and assigned in a state paper laid on the Table by the right hon. gentleman. "It was not considered in the interests of the country"; and yet the very appointments had been sanctioned by these gentlemen, and the Governor General had been advised by them to approve the appointments. Yet though they had determined, under their own scrutiny and schedules laid upon the Table, that these were proper appointments for the Governor General to make, and though these employees had the assurance from the lips of the right hon. gentleman himself that they would be kept in office, they were simply swept aside and their places given to others, without any ground alleged, without the allegation even that they had ever exercised their franchise or said a word about politics.

There is not a line in the Bill of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier that does not commend itself to the judgment of this House, and that will not commend itself to the independent judgment of the electorate of this country, as a broad and legitimate safeguard which every servant, not of these gentlemen, but of the country, employed in the civil service should be entitled to exercise. He does not touch the right of the Government to appoint during the pleasure of the Crown, he does not touch the right of the Government to remove without cause. He simply says that the man who has taken service under the Crown and faithfully performs his duties, should, when dismissed from office by whoever happens to occupy the position of trustee for the people of the country, be entitled to a statement of the ground on which he was dismissed, and be furnished with that which every free man in every free country is entitled to at the hands of the Government. The hon. gentleman forgets that he does not occupy the relation to the civil service of this country that he seems to think, when he tells this House and this country boldly, that, while he holds the position of Prime Minister of Canada, he looks upon the civil servants of this country, from the very highest to the lowest, as he looks upon the personal servants in his own household. That is the declaration to which the Prime Minister of this country has committed himself, and for which he will be held to stern account by the people of this country. There has been no country in the world, except the mother country, of whose administration of the civil service we are all so proud, in which the civil servants stood higher and occupied a more distinguished position than in Canada, until hon. gentlemen opposite came into office. They have done all they could to degrade and lower the civil service. They have driven the best men in the service out of the service, and have taxed the people of Canada to pay large amounts of money year after year that their creatures might take the places thus made vacant, with their emoluments. And to-day we have the explanation of it all. To-day the hon. gentleman confesses, in the face of this House and of the country, that the relations of the civil servants of the Crown in Canada to the Government are precisely the same as the relations of any employee to his employer. These hon. gentlemen obtained power, and the opportunity of abusing that power, and have virtually said to the civil servant: Though you are an honest, faithful servant of the Crown, though you have discharged your duties in the most efficient and admirable manner in the interest of the country, yet, because you have ventured to poll a vote or have expressed an opinion against the tyrants who at this moment monopolize power—in that you have not shown the subserviency that strikes at the very foundation of manhood—I will serve you as I would serve one of the servants in my own household. And, Sir, the hon. gentleman does not hold himself bound even to observe the justice he is compelled to observe in the case of his personal servants, because he is obliged to give those servants notice or some sufficient cause for dismissing them from service. Hundreds of the best and most faithful civil servants of the Crown in Canada have been ruthlessly driven out of office by this tyrannical Administration, stripped of their character, divested of the means of obtaining employment, not because they did not faithfully perform their duties as servants of the Crown, but because they would not become the humble servants of these gentlemen, and would not exist only for the purpose of carrying out their objects. All that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) asks is, that a law should be placed on the Statute-book, leaving to these hon. gentlemen all the power they should have under our system of government, but giving to the faithful public servant the right to put upon the Government who drive him out of office without cause, the onus and responsibility of saying why and wherefore they have dispensed with his services. It is simply a declaration, that these civil servants of the Crown in Canada are entitled to the protections of British institutions and to British fair-play. Hon. gentlemen opposite have the power, but they have not the right, to stand between this act of justice and the servants of the Crown. But, Sir, they will be held to sharp account for it; and I do not envy them the position they occupy, when they vote down this Bill and declare that the faithful civil servants of the Crown in Canada shall be denied the rights that any honest man in any service in the world is entitled to demand at the hands of his employer.

After Recess.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, we were discussing the provisions of a Bill to amend the Civil Service Act. I am quite in favour of that Bill, but it hardly goes as far as I would like to see it go. I think it should contain a provision such as the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) mentioned just before six o'clock, a provision embodying the policy which, he says, is the policy of this Government and of all Canadian Governments, following the British system. He made the statement that the spoils system, thank goodness, was not in force in Canada. We, on this side of the House, and I believe the country at large, are fully satisfied that the spoils system has been introduced by the present Government, notwithstanding the pledge given by the Prime Minister and by the hon. gentleman who sits at his right, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). Both those hon. gentlemen, one after the other, during the second session of this Parliament, when the question of the dismissal of civil servants was under debate, pledged themselves to the civil service of this country, and to the people, that no dismissal would be made of any public servant without full inquiry and full investigation. Yet that pledge, like every other pledge that has been made to the people of this country, has been violated nearly every day. In the Bill that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has introduced, the second clause makes provision that every civil servant shall, if he makes application within 30 days after being dismissed, receive from the Government:

The number and nature of the complaints made against him, the name or names of all persons who made complaints against him, the decision arrived at by the department upon all complaints so made, and a copy of all proceedings had at any inquiry held by or under the direction of the department.

The Bill makes provision that this should apply to every civil servant who has been dismissed since the hon. gentlemen accepted office. I know in my own constituency several cases of dismissals that have taken place lately, where the public servant simply received notice that he was dismissed—no inquiry, no investigation. He wrote to the department after he had received that notice to know why he was dismissed, notwithstanding the pledge made by the Prime Minister of this country and his first lieutenant, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that no such thing would take place in this country. Yet such are the facts, and I will read the declaration of the gentleman referred to before I sit down. And not only that, but we had a worse state of affairs. An election took place a few days ago at Brockville, and a friend of mine who is in the civil service there, was notified two or three days before the election took place that if he voted he would be dismissed; he was notified by a prominent Liberal that if he went to the polls and voted he would be dismissed, and he advised him not to go and vote. What do we find following that up? The most glaring frauds that have ever been perpetrated in this country have been perpetrated there by the Liberal party, and to-day one of the men who was caught red-handed in the act, was tried before the police magistrate and is committed to stand his trial. Notwithstanding that, we find the paper managed by the member for Brockville for the local legislature of Ontario, coming out and threatening to dismiss every Conservative official if these glaring frauds are investigated; if the Conservative party do not yield and smother this thing up, every Conservative in the employ of the Dominion Government at Brockville must have his head cut off. That is what the Liberal paper of Brockville, the Brockville "Recorder," said a few days ago, in an article published editorially in the Brockville "Recorder" of the 24th, the last lines read as follows:

The "Recorder" has shown no desire to drive these men from office, in fact it has incurred the ill-will of some of its friends for not doing so, and men have left the Liberal party on this account.

They are pretty greedy, for they have left the party because the "Recorder" does not say that these officials must have their heads cut off.

The same thing is true to-day concerning the information to hand about several Brockville men's conduct in the fight just closed. We have advised that the fight be dropped now that it is over, and that nothing further be done to create discord among neighbours, even though advice is being sent from the outside to carry it on by parties who have no interest in Brockville.

The very same men who came here and urged a protest in the provincial election, and then let someone else pay the shot, are now playing the same game in the present instance.

However, patience sometimes ceases to be a virtue.

Because the Conservative party want to find out who committed these depredations, patience ceases to be a virtue, says the "Recorder."

If it is war the Tupperites are after they will have to be accommodated, but they must remember that the Liberals have not begun this thing—it has been forced on them, and they will be free from all responsibility for the consequences that are sure to follow.

The consequences are the dismissal, as the paper says in the beginning of its article, of every Conservative official if this thing is proceeded with, if these criminals are prosecuted. One of these men went into a polling booth with a marked ballot in his hand, marked outside for the Reform candidate; he took that in and got from the returning officer a ballot and took it into the booth, folded it up and put it into his pocket, brought the other one out which was marked and dropped it into the box. He was caught red-handed in the act, and yet this crime must be smothered up because some Reformers might be punished. This Bill ought to go far enough to say that this Government could not dismiss any official without first having the assent of the Governor General. Is any public servant in the employ of the Government who has given satisfaction to the people of this country to be turned out simply because the Reform committee in a constituency decides that he should be replaced by a Reformer? As I will prove, this has been done in one or two instances. The Reform committee met; they decided that a worthy official of the Government must be displaced in order to make room for a Reformer, and the charge of offensive partisanship is brought forward as the ground of his removal. Then the Bill asks that a certificate of character be granted. Now, here is a certificate of character that I got for one of the most efficient servants of this country, a gentleman of high standing, who has no superior in this House or outside of it, either in respect to ability or integrity, a gentleman who has been a merchant for the last twenty-five or thirty years, a gentleman who stands high in the estimation of every person with whom he has had dealings, a gentleman holding the high position of District Deputy Grand Master of the Masonic body, a gentleman who is a warden in the Church of England, a gentleman of unstained character. This gentleman was notified that he was dismissed. I put a question on the paper the other day in order to get a certificate of character from the hon. Postmaster General, and what sort of a certificate did I get in respect to him? I asked first:

Has Mr. John R. Dargavel been dismissed from the office of postmaster at Elgin, Ont.?

The Postmaster General answers: Yes.

I asked:

Were any complaints made against him for not having discharged the duties of his office efficiently?

The answer to that is:

Mr TAYLOR.

Complaints were made against him.

You, Mr. Speaker, ruled yesterday, that if a Minister refers to a public document, it is his duty to lay this document on the Table. I challenge the Postmaster General to lay on the Table any complaint, because I have the affidavit, and will read it in a few moments, of Mr. Dargavel himself, stating that no complaint was or can be made against him, yet the Postmaster General says:

Complaints were made against him.

Now, I put my question plainly:

Were any complaints made against him for not having discharged the duties of his office efficiently?

And he said:

Complaints were made against him.

To the third question:

Was Mr. Dargavel notified that any complaints had been made against him?

The Postmaster General replied:

Yes.

Now, I have here the Postmaster General's letters, not one of which refers to the fact that any complaint was made against Mr. Dargavel for inefficiency or misconduct in his office. To the fourth question:

Was there any investigation held?

The Postmaster General said:

No.

The fifth question was:

Did the post office inspector make any report, recommending his dismissal?

The answer is:

The matter was not referred to the inspector.

Question 6:

Was Mr. W. H. Fredenburgh, the Reform candidate at the last election, consulted, and did he recommend or approve of his dismissal?

The Postmaster General answered:

The Postmaster General assumes full responsibility for the dismissal. The postmaster admits that at a public meeting held by the Liberal candidate in connection with the general election of 1896, he (the postmaster) took part in addressing the meeting.

I will prove by the declaration of Mr. Dargavel that he went to the meeting held by Mr. Fredenburgh, the Reform candidate, that Mr. Fredenburgh requested him to come to the platform, that he then requested him to address a few words to the people, and that he spoke, neither in favour of Mr. Fredenburgh or against his opponent, or vice versa. He is not open to the charge that he was an offensive partisan, but he came to the platform simply at the request of Mr. Fredenburgh, the Reform candidate. I will read the documents that passed between Mr. Dargavel and the Postmaster General.

An hon. MEMBER. Dispense.

Mr. TAYLOR. No. I will not dispense; they are not good medicine for my hon. friend. The right hon. Prime Minister today said, that he thanked God that in Canada we had not the spoils system, yet I will prove by these documents that we have the spoils system. I presume that on an average five officials a day, ever since hon. gentlemen assumed power, have been dismissed from positions of trust under the Government of Canada. The general elections were held in June, 1896, and a year or more after the elections were held, the Postmaster General addressed this letter to Mr. Dargavel:

Ottawa, 27th August, 1897.

Sir,—I am directed to inclose you herewith a copy of a declaration charging you with active political partisanship during the Dominion elections of last year.

The Postmaster General would be glad to receive at your earliest convenience any reply you may desire to make to the charges set forth in the documents in question.

I am also to request that your reply take the form of a statutory declaration.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) W. D. LeSUEUR,
Secretary.

Mr. John R. Dargavel,
Postmaster,
Elgin, County Leeds, Ont.

This is the document inclosed in the Postmaster General's letter, and it is in the form of a complaint:

(Copy.)

CANADA.

Province of Ontario,
County of Leeds.

To wit:

I, William H. Fredenburgh, of Westport, in the county of Leeds, gentleman, do solemnly declare:

1. That I was a candidate nominated by the Liberal convention to contest the electoral division of the South Riding of Leeds at the last general election.

That I did, on or about the 18th day of June, A.D. 1896, hold a meeting in Elgin, in the county of Leeds, in the interest of the Liberal party.

That at the said meeting John R. Dargavel, then being postmaster at Elgin, did come to a platform and speak in the interest of George Taylor, and in the interest of the Conservative party, and against the policy of the Liberal party, and against this deponent, the Liberal candidate, and did conduct himself as an active political partisan at said meeting.

2. That the said John R. Dargavel, then being postmaster at Elgin, did attend the nomination of candidates at Delta, and did take part at said nomination in the interest of George Taylor, and in the interest of the Conservative party, and did several times interrupt W. A. Lewis, barrister, of Athens, while speaking at said nomination, and did at said nomination meeting conduct himself as an active political partisan.

That I am credibly informed and believe, and have just cause to believe, that the said John R. Dargavel was actively engaged canvassing for and supporting Mr. George Taylor and the Conservative party at various other times and places during the election campaign during the month of June, A.D. 1896.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting Voluntary and Extra-Judicial Oaths.

(Sgd.) W. H. FREDENBURGH.

Declared before me at Westport, in the county of Leeds, this 19th day of August, A.D. 1897.

(Sgd.) J. C. JUDD,

A Commissioner in H. C. J.

To that complaint Mr. Dargavel replied on the 6th September, 1897, as follows:—

Elgin, Ont., Sept. 6th, 1897.

To the Hon. Wm. Mulock,
Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Sir,—As requested in your secretary's letter of August 27th, I have now the honour to inclose you my declaration re charge made against me for political partisanship at the last general elections.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) JOHN R. DARGAVEL,
Postmaster.

The declaration is as follows:—

Ontario.
County of Leeds.

To wit:

In the matter of a charge made against John R. Dargavel, postmaster at Elgin, in the county of Leeds, for alleged political partisanship at the last Dominion election.

I, John R. Dargavel, of the village of Elgin, in the county of Leeds, merchant and postmaster at said village of Elgin, do solemnly declare:

1. That I was present at a political meeting held by W. H. Fredenburgh, Esq., at the village of Elgin on or about the 18th day of June, 1896.

2. That at the invitation of Mr. Fredenburgh himself I did address the meeting for the space of fifteen minutes.

3. That my remarks were mostly about provincial affairs, and certainly used no offensive language against Mr. Fredenburgh or any other person or persons, or against the Liberal party, the Patron party or any other political party.

4. That I took no part or spoke at no other political meeting during the campaign.

5. That while I was present at the nomination meeting at Delta, I took no part whatever in the political discussion, and that I did not conduct myself as an active partisan at said nomination meeting, nor did I interrupt Mr. W. A. Lewis further than to correct a statement he was making on the authority of some informant of an alleged incident which he had been wrongfully informed had occurred at a former political meeting held at Elgin, said incident having nothing to do with any political question.

6. That I believe the business post office, since I have assumed control of the said office, has been conducted to the complete satisfaction of the entire community having business to do with said post office, and that the charge made by Mr. Fredenburgh (now fourteen months after the alleged occurrence) is made at the earnest solicitation of parties who have no business transactions with the Elgin post office, but have a private spite against myself.

7. That if granted a public investigation (which I desire), where I can meet my accusers face to face. I can establish the complete absence of offensive political partisanship, either before or since the last Dominion elections.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) J. R. DARGAVEL.

Made before
JOHN CAWLEY, J.P.

There is Mr. Dargavel's explanation upon oath, in reply to the flimsy charge made some fifteen months after the alleged offence happened. There is Mr. Dargavel's reply, sent within three days to the Postmaster General, and demanding an inquiry into his conduct, and an inquiry which the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) stated in this House would be granted in the case of every official in this country. On the 3rd day of November, 1898, he received this letter :

Sir,—I am directed by the Postmaster General to notify you of your dismissal from the office of postmaster at Elgin, and to take steps for the prompt transfer of the office to your successor, Mr. W. W. Brown. I shall, therefore, accordingly arrange to have a personal transfer of the office made at the very earliest date possible.

Yours truly,
H. MERRICK,
P. O. Inspector.

J. R. Dargavel, Esq.,
Postmaster, Elgin.

In reply to that Mr. Dargavel wrote to the post office inspector, and also addressed a letter to the Postmaster General, as follows:

Elgin, Nov. 5th, 1898.

To the Hon. Wm. Mulock,
Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Sir,—I am in receipt of a communication from the post office inspector at Kingston, notifying me of my dismissal from the office of postmaster at this place. No reason is assigned in Mr. Merrick's letter for my dismissal. I am entirely unaware of any reason for my removal, and would be obliged if you would inform me why I am dismissed in such a summary manner.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,
J. R. DARGAVEL.

He received this reply from the post office inspector :

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of yours of the 5th instant, in which you state that you are unaware of any dereliction of duty, and know of no cause for such a curt dismissal, and would be glad to be informed of the reason. In reply, I have to say that I am not informed of the reasons of your dismissal, and therefore can furnish no information on the subject. Mr. W. W. Brown informed me that you were willing to continue the office until the 15th instant, and I made arrangements for the transfer on that date. I had a conversation over the 'phone with Mr. Brown on the date of your letter. This may account for what seems to be a misunderstanding. Please let me hear from you promptly, and oblige,

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) H. MERRICK,
P. O. Inspector.

J. R. Dargavel, Esq.,
Postmaster, Elgin.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Then the following reply came from the Postmaster General :—

Ottawa, 10th November, 1898.

Sir,—I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, inquiring why you have been removed from the postmastership of Elgin, County Leeds, S.R., and, in reply, am to inform you that you were removed from the office in question on representations which the Postmaster General considered entirely satisfactory that you had been an active political partisan.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
A. A. H. TROOP,
(for Secretary.)

Mr. John R. Dargavel,
Elgin, County Leeds, Ont.

There is what the Postmaster General writes and sends out from his department, and the other day, when I asked him (Mr. Mulock) had any complaints been made against Mr. Dargavel for not attending to the duties of his office, he answered, that such complaints had been made. I challenge the Postmaster General, or any other member of the Government to lay on the Table of this House, or to publish in any newspaper, any statement pointing to the fact that Mr. Dargavel ever neglected his duties as postmaster. I can tell these gentlemen that Mr. Dargavel fitted up one of the best offices in the county, and had it in a convenient place. But now it has been removed to an inconvenient place, and is in charge of a man who cannot, or will not, conduct the office one-half as satisfactorily as Mr. Dargavel did. But, Sir, the new appointee was an offensive partisan; he had to be rewarded, and so the Liberal partisans there held a meeting and decided that he should be the man, and that Mr. Dargavel should be dismissed. And so the Government dismissed Mr. Dargavel. I asked the Postmaster General the other day, to answer my question, so that Mr. Dargavel might get a certificate of character, as this Bill calls for. But what did the Postmaster General reply? I dare not say, he did not state the truth; but I will say, his reply was not in accordance with the facts. I challenge him to substantiate his answer, that any charge came to the department at Ottawa, saying that Mr. Dargavel did not attend faithfully to the duties of his office. Yet, Sir, notwithstanding the promises of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine, that no official would be discharged without full inquiry and investigation, in the face of Mr. Dargavel's declaration, that he never did anything deserving a dismissal, and in the face of his further demand that he should have an investigation, so that he might meet his accusers, all the satisfaction he gets is a notice that he will be removed, and that is all there is about it. I ask you Mr. Speaker, is not that the spoils system? Is not that a contradiction of the statement of the Prime Minister, who thanks goodness that we have not the spoils system in Canada?

But, Mr. Speaker, I have a case a little worse than Mr. Dargavel's, and it is a case in which the Postmaster General appears in a still less desirable light. It is a case in the same county. A merchant of high standing there, a gentleman of high character, had been postmaster for years at Delta, and on the 27th January, 1899, three years after the elections, he received this notice :

Post Office Inspector's Office.

Sir,—I am to acquaint you that at an early date the post office at Delta will be transferred from your charge to that of Mr. L. N. Phelps.

Please govern yourself accordingly.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. MERRICK,

P. O. Inspector.

Mr. W. R. Singleton, Postmaster, Delta.

There is the only intimation or knowledge that this gentleman got that he is to be thrown out on the street. On the 10th February, 1899, this gentleman, Mr. Singleton, wrote me the following letter :—

Delta, Feb. 10th.

Dear Sir,—The post office inspector was here on the 8th, and changed the office over to Phelps. You will find inclosed my notice the change would be made. That is all the notice I received or got. Nothing from the Postmaster General. You will also find the document, or at least a copy of it, which I signed. In the first place, Omer Brown came to me, and told me the Reform party had agreed that Delta office should be changed politically, stating that as postmaster they had nothing against me, and if I would resign Mr. Phelps would take my stock and office fixtures off my hands. I gave him no satisfaction one way or the other. In a few days longer Mr. Phelps called on me about the matter. I told him I would never give up my office until compelled to. In a week or two he came again, and said he was sorry we could not come to some arrangement. By this time I found out they had sent in a complaint, and that my chances would be slim for holding. I told him I would not resign, but I would not oppose his appointment if he could get it, providing he would take my stock too. Phelps came to see me again in about a week, and had the inclosed document for me to sign, which I did, as you find it. So how they arranged matters after I do not know. So you have the matter just as it stands, and all I have to say, I do hope the time is not far distant when such men will be put out doors. I will be compelled to leave Delta, as there is nothing in Delta for me now. I am going to Carleton Place.

Yours respectfully,

W. R. SINGLETON.

He goes on to say that he has rented his property in Delta. Mr. W. R. Singleton was a most respectable merchant at Delta, and held the position of postmaster for years, as I have said. The Reform party held a convention and decided that he was a good postmaster, that he had attended to his duties faithfully and well; but the office must be changed politically, and the Liberal convention resolved that, if he would resign, they would buy his stock and fixtures, and if not, they would dismiss him anyway.

There was a document presented to him, to sign, and Mr. Singleton refused. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, the document which I now read was prepared by the Reform Association in the district, to which this Government delegated the power to enforce the spoils system. Here it is :

To the Hon. the Postmaster General.

In the matter of the application of the local executive of the Reform Association of the township of Bastard, in the county of Leeds and province of Ontario.

That I, William Richard Singleton, postmaster of Delta, in the county of Leeds aforesaid, be dismissed from said office, and that Linnaeus N. Phelps be appointed in my stead. I wish to say that I will not oppose the appointment of the said Linnaeus N. Phelps, but will give way to him, and submit to being dismissed without rendering necessary the holding of an investigation into the complaint made against me.

Dated at Delta this 7th day of December, 1898.

They presented that document to Mr. Singleton to sign, but he refused and said he would not sign any such document as that. Then they bantered him a while, and prepared another document of which this is a copy :

Delta, December 8th, 1898.

To the Hon. the Postmaster General.

In the matter of the application of the executive of the Reform Association of the township of Bastard, in the count of Leeds, and province of Ontario, who have asked that I, W. R. Singleton, postmaster of the Delta post office, in the same township, be dismissed from said office, and that Mr. L. N. Phelps, of Delta, be appointed in my stead, I wish to say that I will not oppose the appointment of Mr. L. N. Phelps, and will without appeal submit to being relieved from the position of postmaster at said office.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. R. SINGLETON.

The Reform executive of the Postmaster General put up the job, and he would not oppose the appointment. I asked the following questions of the Postmaster General in reference to Mr. Singleton :

1. Has Mr. W. R. Singleton been dismissed from the office of postmaster at Delta, Ont. ?
2. Were there any complaints made against him for not attending to the duties of his office faithfully ?
3. Was Mr. Singleton notified of any complaints having been made against him ?
4. Was there any investigation held ? Did the post office inspector make any report recommending his dismissal ?
5. Did Mr. W. H. Fredenburgh, the Reform candidate at the last election, recommend his dismissal ?

The Postmaster General did not answer these questions categorically as they were put, so that I might get a certificate of character for the dismissed official; but he said this :

It was charged that Mr. Singleton permitted the use of the post office at Delta as headquarters to the Conservative party, prior to the 23rd June, 1896; that the Reformers attending the office for the mails were insulted.

The Postmaster General made that statement here, but I say that a bigger falsehood never was told in this country than to say that Mr. Singleton ever insulted any gentleman attending his office. He is above such conduct. And yet this is the certificate of character which I got from the Postmaster General for Mr. Singleton when I asked for one.

—that the Reformers attending the office for the mails were insulted, and that the postmaster was a party to such action; and the department would doubtless have notified the Postmaster General of the charges and have referred the same for investigation, but before the same was done—

It was nearly three years before anything was done at all; it was only on the 10th of January, 1899, when the Postmaster General sent the letter which I quoted, stating that he had appointed a successor.

—Mr. Singleton wrote to the department intimating that he had learned of the complaints of the local executive of the Reform association against him, and submitted "to being dismissed without rendering necessary the holding of an investigation," and, accordingly, a change of postmaster was made.

No greater false statement could be made. He never wrote to the department further than to sign that document, got up by the Liberal Association of Delta, saying that he would not oppose Mr. Phelps's appointment. He never wrote to the Postmaster General at all. He wrote me the party who threatened that if he did not sell out his goods to that party, he would have them left on his hands. That is the way the spoils system is introduced, and hon. gentlemen opposite are parties to it. If Mr. Singleton had been guilty of the conduct the Postmaster General says he has in June, 1898, why did he not bring the matter to an issue within two or three months after the election, instead of waiting three years, and then blackening this gentleman's character, after he has left the country and is trying to make an honest living elsewhere? Talk about the spoils system. The Prime Minister thanks God that we have not the spoils system in this country, when in his heart of hearts he knows that they write to the local Reform Association to get them to trump up a charge against an official whose office is wanted for a heeler of their own, and when the local association sends in a letter, they act upon it. And yet he thanks God that we have not the spoils system in this country. I wonder if he expects the people of this country to believe any such statement. I say that this Bill should receive, and I hope it will receive, the support of every honest man in this House, no matter on which side he has the honour to sit.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The hon. member who has just sat down tells us that we have the spoils system now.

Mr. TAYLOR. So you have.

Mr. TAYLOR.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Well, I do not think the hon. gentleman knows what the spoils system is, and I am going to tell him before I sit down what it is, and how it was practised by the party which he supports. It was practised by that party on such a grand scale that I hope it will never be repeated. But before coming to that, I would like to follow the very interesting dissertation of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I listened to him with great pleasure and great attention, especially when he alluded to the efforts that have been made by our neighbours of the United States in order to get rid of that very same spoils system. The hon. gentleman alluded to the commission that was appointed by them in order to organize the civil service. That commission was composed of three members, only two of whom were to be the adherents of the same party. In other words, an attempt was made to give as fair play as possible to both sides. In reading the rules that were promulgated in conformity with the report of that commission, I find that the third rule, which appears to me to be the best description of the anti-spoils principle that could be made, is as follows:

No person in the executive civil service shall dismiss, or cause to be dismissed, or make any attempt to procure the dismissal of, or in any manner change the official rank or compensation of, any person therein because of his political or religious opinions or affiliations.

This is the principle by which we have been guided, and by which every Government and every Parliament that wants to avoid the dreadful calamity of the spoils system ought to be guided. Here is another clause of those regulations:

No person in the executive civil service shall use his official authority or official influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or controlling the result thereof.

This is exactly the rule which has been admitted both here and in England, and which ought to be observed by public officers both as a matter of honour and as a matter of duty. They represent, not simply one party, but they represent the public. They do not represent only one party but both parties; they are not paid by Conservatives or Liberals, but by the country at large; and I think we can pin our faith upon this doctrine and are prepared to follow exactly the views I have just quoted.

My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier urged that if his Bill were to pass, the effect would be to accumulate precedents in the course of time, and thus establish a jurisprudence which would show when the interference of government is justifiable, and which would guide future Governments in their dealings with public officers who are charged with having forgotten the political neutrality which they owe to the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to speak of establishing a jurisprudence but very difficult to do so. I have consulted one of the books to which we always look with veneration, "Todd's Parliamentary Government," and let me cite the opinion of Mr. Todd regarding any attempt to establish such a jurisprudence by an accumulation of precedents:

It has been suggested that the relations between the subordinate class of public functionaries and the executive Government should be regulated by statute, so as to prevent a possible abuse of power on the part of the responsible advisers of the Crown towards their subordinates in office. But it has been well remarked by Lord Grey, that "it would be impossible to limit the power of dismissal to cases in which misconduct could be proved before a court of law, without incurring the risk of having the executive Government paralyzed by the passive resistance of persons holding these situations, and by the obstructions they would be able to throw in the way of Ministers they wish to oppose. Law would be too clumsy an instrument for regulating the conduct of the Ministers of the Crown, and the permanent civil servants of the state in their relations to each other. This is now far more effectually and far more safely accomplished by the power of public opinion. So great is the authority of public opinion, that no Minister now ever thinks of dismissing a public servant from those offices which are regarded as permanent unless for gross misconduct; but, at the same time, he has the power—and public opinion would support him in using it—of dismissing such a servant for misconduct, which it might be impossible for any law to define beforehand, and of which there might be no legal evidence, though there was a moral certainty.

This is pretty sound argument to prove how impossible it would be to establish any jurisprudence which will govern in such a matter. While I acknowledge the zeal and good-will of my hon. friend, I must say that I do not share his hope that it may be possible to adopt any jurisprudence which might guide us in every case that might arise. Now, what are the reasons which would justify the dismissing a public officer? On page 630 of the same work I find the rule thus laid down:

But while every Government must necessarily possess the abstract right of dismissing any of its servants who may hold their offices "during pleasure," whenever they consider that such a step is required by the exigencies of the public service, it has nevertheless been recognized as a rule that persons holding non-political offices under the Crown should only be dismissed for incompetence or misconduct. Dismissals on other grounds are highly objectionable and inexpedient, more especially if they spring from political considerations. Doubtless, an active interference in politics on the part of a non-political officeholder would be a case of "misconduct" sufficient to justify his dismissal.

This term: "Active interference in politics" covers the whole ground, and it is impossible to describe exactly in what shape that activity should manifest itself so as to warrant dismissal. It would be childish on my part to try and go over the whole ground in order to find out in what way, or in how many ways, active political interference could manifest itself.

It is a well-understood rule of constitutional government that all such functionaries should abstain from taking an active part in political contests, observing a strict neutrality therein.

I have asked all the officers in my department to conform themselves to that rule. While I do not contest their right to express their opinions and record their votes, I have notified them not to take an active part in elections.

If a contrary practice prevailed, it would inevitably follow that the opposite party, on succeeding to power, would retaliate on those who had assisted to uphold the rival Ministry; and thus a repetition of vindictive and extensive changes amongst Government employees would occur, that would prevent the growth of experience in office and destroy the efficiency of the public service.

Has there been any vindictiveness manifested in the actions of this Government since we came into power? Has there been manifested any desire for revenge? There has been no vindictiveness, and I am prepared to prove this by my own experience, as the head of one of the departments, having had to deal seriously and earnestly with that difficult and delicate question of dismissals. I was astonished—though, perhaps, I ought not to have been—when I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition misconstrue so completely the expressions of opinion given by the right hon. leader of the Government. Had I been called upon to rise at the time, I could not have found words strong enough to characterize the effect produced upon me, when I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition so twisting an opinion expressed by the hon. Premier as to make it appear to the House, and calling on the country to notice the fact, that the Prime Minister had actually compared the civil servants to domestics, and had treated them as such. That is the position the hon. leader of the Opposition tried to place my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in. Now, the right hon. Premier never, for one moment, expressed such an opinion as that. What he said was in answer to the argument of my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). You will remember, Mr. Speaker, and every member of the House will remember, that the hon. the Premier made an appeal to the legal knowledge of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and said: You know very well that no employer, no manager of a company, even no master of a servant, can be compelled by law to grant a certificate of character to one whom he has discharged from his service. That was not said by the Premier with any intention of lowering the dignity of gentlemen of the civil service by comparing them with domestics. It was simply a legal point urged by the right hon. gentleman to show that what the mover of this Bill wanted to do was a thing that could not be done, that was never done in any civil case—to compel an employer to give, even against his will, a certificate to a person he had discharged. To twist that argument into an insult to the whole civil service, by comparing them with domestics, I think it is one of the greatest injustices of the many from which the Premier has suffered.

Now, I was speaking, a moment ago, of the accusations of the hon. member for Leeds of the wholesale dismissals and the introduction of the spoils system. If you will consider the position in which the Liberal party was placed when we came into power, after having gone through eighteen years of Opposition, you will not wonder if many of those Liberals who for so many years had seen the patronage of the country used exclusively for the advantage of their opponents, desired to have their turn. Nothing could be more legitimate than that wish on the part of these men, who had worked so long, who had worked so hard, and sacrificed so much. They were perfectly justified in thinking that at last the moment had come when they would have a chance of showing that their friends and leaders could appreciate the services they had rendered for eighteen years against overwhelming odds, against every discouragement of defeat after defeat. It was only natural that these men, who had suffered and who had sacrificed themselves, felt that their turn had come, and that, at all events, when there were any vacancies in the public service, they would have the right to them.

Mr. TAYLOR. No person would object to that—when vacancies did arise.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I wish to say that, not only has there been no vindictiveness on our part, but there has been no greediness on our part. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor), who speaks so fluently and so often refers to the spoils system, perhaps would like a sample of the spoils system, as practised on a grand scale by his own friends. If he will compare our conduct with the conduct of our predecessors, I think he will find that he must go to previous Governments to find the spoils system upon a grand scale, such a scale as would do credit even to the palmy days of the system in the United States. In 1878, when the Government of Mr. Mackenzie was defeated and the Conservatives came into power, there existed an important branch of the public service called the Department of Weights and Measures. Now, what did hon. gentlemen opposite do? They wiped away at once the whole of that department, dismissing all the officers, giving a few dollars to each. These men, who had been appointed and had taken up in earnest the duties of their positions, looking upon their appointment as guaranteed for life, found their offices swept away at one stroke of the pen. And, a few months afterwards, that department was reorganized, and, out of these 67 officers who were appointed to that department thus reorganized, only seven old office-holders were appointed, while 60 were new men. Now, there is the spoils system in all its purity, in all its simplicity—sweeping away a whole department, and in a few months reorganizing it and filling it with new men, except seven out of 67—these seven old officers being employed, I suppose, to teach the others their work. There are many of the men who are thus dismissed, who are still alive. Many of these men come to me, and say: We were in this department in 1879, when we were swept out of office; are you not going to put us back in the places we occupied? My answer has always been: I do not want to see the spoils system introduced. Those who were placed there in 1879 by the Conservative Government I am ready to consider innocent of the wrong by which they benefited. I do not want to act in a vindictive manner or to do injustice. These men and their successors have been there for twenty years, and I would not consider it just, I would not consider it fair, to turn them out after they have learned their work and have tried to do their duty. Now, when we are accused of having introduced the spoils system, I say we have not done so, but it was the Conservative party who introduced it in 1879, and introduced it on such a scale that I hope we shall never again see anything like it in this country.

Mr. WM. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). I am sure that had all the heads of departments acted as the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), there would have been little or no cause of complaint throughout the country in regard to the dismissal of officials. I may tell the Minister of Inland Revenue that among the Liberal party in my own riding, and particularly in the town of Orillia, they find more fault with him than with any other member of the Administration, and for this reason, that that hon. gentleman, for reasons of economy, as he stated in the House a year ago, caused to be superannuated an inspector of weights and measures, and to the great disgust of all the Liberals of Orillia, he has failed to appoint a successor. As a result, I can assure that hon. gentleman that should he ever pay a visit to the town of Orillia, he will meet with a very cool reception from the Liberals there, and a correspondingly warm reception will be given to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), because the Minister of Public Works has done a little there to make it easy for a suffering Liberal. Now the Minister of Inland Revenue alluded to the fact that the Liberal party had been suffering in the past 18 years through not having received the positions that they eagerly wished for and sought after. As he said that, I noticed some sympathetic looks passing over the faces of some hon. gentlemen opposite who have not received their promised rewards, and who are consequently suffering like some of the Liberals throughout the country. And their sufferings are accentuated when they remember the fact that about fifteen hon. gentlemen who were elected in the general elections, have had their sufferings alleviated, and these hon. gentlemen who are still suffering are anxious that their wants should be attended to.

Now there is one department in which there has been a ruthless sweeping away of officials, and that is the department presided over by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). It matters not through what section of the Dominion you may go, you hear the old story in reference to that hon. gentleman's department—an utter disregard of common honesty, an utter disregard of common decency, and an utter disregard of carrying out any of the pledges that have been made by the Premier and by other hon. gentlemen in the Cabinet. I was not at all astonished the other day at hearing the case cited from the province of Quebec, when the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) asked a question of the Postmaster General in reference to the postmaster at Batiscan. In 1897, on the 12th of July, the Postmaster General wrote to Mr. Dechêne, Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec, to this effect :

I send you herewith a copy of the report of Mr. Lavergne, commissioner, to whom was referred the charge laid against the postmaster at Batiscan, and you will, I think, admit with me that the report furnishes no grounds to justify the dismissal of the postmaster.

On the 28th of January, 1897, when this postmaster applied to the Premier, the right hon. gentleman wrote :

Nothing will be done against the said postmaster if the charges laid against him are not proved.

Now it will be quite clear from that that the Postmaster General himself wrote and stated that the commissioner's report failed to prove any of the charges that were made against the postmaster, and further on he says :

It is neither asserted nor proved that he canvassed or worked at public meetings. The postmaster says that he did not even vote at the last election, and took no part in the political struggle. Under these circumstances, I see no reason for dismissing the present postmaster.

Now, the House will bear in mind that that was a statement of the Postmaster General based on the report which had been furnished to him by the commissioner, Mr. Lavergne, and yet it is startling to believe that on the 15th of August, 1898, a couple of years after the general elections, this postmaster at Batiscan received this letter :

In reply to yours of the 9th instant, I am instructed to tell you that the Postmaster General having been informed that you did not observe proper neutrality during the election time, deems it advisable to appoint a successor to your position.

Now that is a pretty position for the Postmaster General to be in. The year before he writes to this postmaster, he writes to Mr. Dechêne and assures him that it was an utter impossibility to dispense with the service of that postmaster, owing to the fact that the commissioner had reported that there was nothing against him, that the man had not even voted at the election. Yet the year afterwards the Postmaster General, with his report staring him in the face, notwithstanding his own letter, and the pledge of the Premier that nothing could be done owing to the facts as stated in the report orders the dismissal of this very same postmaster. But it is not only in the province of Quebec we see these things, but experience all over the province of Ontario shows that the Postmaster General cares not and heeds not whether investigations are held or not. Whether the Postmaster General sees fit or not to inquire into the facts, the dismissal of postmasters is a matter to me of some little interest, having in view a case in my riding a little time ago. It is true the post office there was a small office, and the man who had the appointment did not actually conduct the office, as it was conducted by a country storekeeper, but without a word of warning or investigation the Postmaster General decapitated this postmaster. I asked the question the other day in the House why the postmaster had been removed, and the answer of the Postmaster General was :

Because the late postmaster lived a considerable distance from the office, and neither performed the duties nor exercised such supervision as is required by the department. The matter was inquired into and reported upon by the inspector.

Then he goes on to say that Mr. Thomas Goodfellow is now postmaster. Why, Goodfellow lives a couple of miles further away from the post office than the late postmaster. He does not conduct the store at all, and it was simply a question of endeavouring to move the post office from one country store to another ; and so the Postmaster General, by reason of the fact, as he alleges, that the dismissed postmaster did not discharge the duties himself, dismissed him and transferred it over to a farmer living a considerable distance from the post office, and who has nothing whatever to do with discharging the duties of the office. Now it is not a matter of surprise that this is done by the Postmaster General in that riding. I am sure the people of that riding have not had the pleasure of the Postmaster General's presence there in the election campaign, accompanied by the gang that he had at his heels in West Huron, and that were down with him in Brockville the other day.

Mr. TAYLOR. Was Cap Sullivan there ?

Mr. BONNETT. I have not the slightest doubt that he was there, because the Postmaster General would not be in a happy frame of mind without him. Now the Postmaster General has not a monopoly of dismissing officials. It seems really too bad that the Postmaster General should run any danger of having his fame eclipsed in this respect in that part of the province, because the Minister of Public Works has also had his innings in respect to one position which he had in his department. There was in the town of Orillia a public building with an official caretaker. The Minister of Public Works dismissed the man in charge of the building on the ground of economy, and stated that he would allow the postmaster to look after the building, but only at a reduced rate. Yet last week, in answer to a question, I find that the Minister of Public Works had placed in that very same position another official, a salaried officer. Now what does that tend to? It tends to show the people of that neighbourhood that there is nothing, so far as principle is concerned, in this Liberal party. It shows them further that dismissals are made to satisfy the greed of grasping Liberals, eager for everything that is in sight, every office that possibly can be opened; but I gladly make an exception in the case of the Minister of Inland Revenue who steadfastly refused to appoint a successor. I can tell the Minister of Inland Revenue, that I would prefer he should appoint a successor to the decapitated official, and my preference is due to the fact that I know to my own knowledge, that there are over two hundred suffering Grits—I use the word “suffering” in deference to the Minister of Inland Revenue—there are over two hundred suffering Grits who are anxious for the office, and 199 of them will be bitterly disappointed when the office is filled.

Passing over the Department of Public Works and the Post Office Department, I come to the Customs Department; and a case was brought to my notice the other day which occurred in a town adjoining my riding, and which shows what the Customs Department can do in this dismissing business. A Mr. Galna was landing waiter in the town of Parry Sound. Now, it is true that Mr. Galna was a Conservative, but I have always maintained that where a man was supporting the Government that appointed him, there was a marked distinction in his assisting that Government and in his afterwards opposing the Government that he was not in accord with politically. This Mr. Galna, in the discharge of his duties to the State, saw fit to record his vote for the Conservative candidate, Mr. McCormick, and I have no doubt that Mr. Galna was anxious to see the election of that hon. gentleman. So, an investigation was held into Mr. Galna's case, and a charge was preferred against him, and as it was impossible to convict Mr. Galna by any evidence that could be furnished in the neighbourhood, they had to go to Toronto for a witness to work Mr. Galna out of his position. According to the evidence, a copy of which I hold in my hand, they had very little difficulty in securing a gentleman to furnish the necessary evidence, and the gentleman who furnished the necessary evidence, I need hardly say, has since been rewarded with a position—not the position of landing waiter but another one. Here is the evidence given against Mr. Galna, and it will show how strongly incriminative it was:

I saw him on election day going towards the dock, carrying a pair of oars on his back. I was standing at the Mansion House, and came across to Mr. Galna and said to him: “John, you are doing some pretty good work for McCormick.” He said: “You bet your life I am.” I said: “Don't you think your labours will be in vain?” He said: “I don't care, I have lived before, and I can live after.” I said that that was a happy state of mind to be in.

What this gentleman meant was that it was a very happy frame of mind for a man to be in, to think that he was able to exist without a Government job, and as the Minister of Inland Revenue said, “not to be suffering.” Now, the gentleman who supplied this evidence is not suffering, but is an immigration agent. Mr. Pedley, the gentleman in question, knew as much about immigration as the Minister of Inland Revenue does about satisfying hungry Grits, and he knows nothing about it—but, anyway, this Mr. Pedley is now over in the department of the Minister of the Interior. This inoffensive partisan who went 150 miles away to give evidence against a most respectable man is now rewarded with a Government job. At all events, Mr. Galna had an investigation, and after he was dismissed, he, as was his right, wanted to know why he had been dismissed and he asked for a copy of the report. A gentleman named Woodyatt, a police magistrate in the city of Brantford, conducted the inquiry and made a report, and in answer to a letter, he referred Mr. Galna to the department, intimating that probably they would tell why they had taken off his head. But, when the Controller of Customs is written to, his secretary informed Mr. Galna:

The Minister desires me to say to you in reply that he cannot see his way clear to furnish you with a copy of the said report.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BENNETT. There is another department in which the same wholesale dismissals of officials is being exercised, and being exercised with the same high hand, and in which no report is furnished to the dismissed man, and no reason accorded him to show why he had been dismissed. The Department of the Interior has some interest in the riding I represent, and the other day to the astonishment of everybody, a gentleman who held the position of Indian agent there was dismissed. The Minister of the Interior held no investigation, but two or three officials who are connected with the provincial reformatory at Penetanguishene, and all of whom are under the control and pay of the Ontario Government, have sat in judgment on this Dominion official, and as a result he was dispossessed by the Minister of the Interior. I am afraid that my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue is being relegated in this Cabinet to the same position that the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat held in the Ontario Cabinet—he is being put forward as the head and front of the respectability of the institution. Now, I may say that if my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) has as much respect given to him on this side of the House as he has on the other side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. I repeat that if every department of Government had been conducted as has been the Department of Inland Revenue, there would not have been the complaints that there have been about wholesale dismissals all through the Dominion.

Mr. SPROULE. Who are the wicked partners?

Mr. BENNETT. Well, the rivalry is so great amongst them, that I hesitate to take the burden of picking out the chief of the wicked ones in the aggregation. For present purposes we will leave that between the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Public Works, who seem to have the ascendancy in that regard. Take the case of this Indian agent. Here was a gentleman who held a most respectable position. He had been warden of the county of Simcoe—he had held the position for some four or five years. In the discharge of his duties as Indian agent he had the selling of large quantities of timber on the Indian reserves, and it was his duty to account for the moneys he received. Throughout that part of the riding a feeling of disgust, shared not only by Conservatives but by Liberals, has prevailed, that this gentleman should have been dismissed in a summary way without being given a fair trial, and were it not that the gentleman's reputation is so deservedly high as a man of honour in that county of Simcoe, I believe a good many people would run away with the idea that there had been a shortage in his accounts or something wrong in the administration of his office. I am happy to say, for the good reputation of that gentleman that his honour and his credit are so high, that no person believes there has been any wrong-doing in his office, and that it is simply a question of vindictiveness and petty spite and spleen against this gentleman on the part of a great many suffering Liberals in that riding who wished for the position.

But, Sir, it would seem to be reasonable that the Minister of Inland Revenue should exercise his influence among his colleagues, and when the matter of appointments comes up before the Council board, he should ask why each appointment is being made. If it is being made by reason of the death or resignation of an official then nothing can be said, but if, on the other hand, the appointment is being made simply by reason of the fact that a Tory official has been decapitated, and his head thrown into the waste basket, then I say that the Minister of Inland Revenue, if he is to sustain the high reputation he has, must put forth his influence and demand that an inquiry should be made into the case. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) does not do so, then the country will hold him equally responsible with the other Ministers for the dismissal of that official. It is idle for any man to say that there have been no unjust dismissals of officials in the country. All through the province of Ontario every man who holds an office under the Dominion Government knows that he is simply hanging to his position by a thread the whole time; and this is the more plain and palpable because it is so utterly different from what prevailed in former times, when the principle was laid down by the Conservative Administration that there would be no interference with any man in office because he exercised his franchise or even went further than that.

Mr. McCARTHY. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Indian agent he referred to has been discharged and is discharged at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, I understand that he has been dismissed.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the gentleman in regard to whom the hon. member had a question on the paper the other day, and did not press it, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT. I am informed that the Indian agent there is dismissed, and I have no doubt that he is, because I know that the local committee of Liberals at Penetanguishene, composed of three officials of the Reformatory there, met the other day and appointed his successor. I may tell the House furthermore that the successor who has been recommended was recently dismissed by the local government because he did not properly discharge the duties of the office he held under that government. I am rather glad he has been appointed, because it was such a moral shock to the people there to see a man who had held the responsible position of warden of the county dismissed at a moment's notice, and a man appointed in his place who had recently been dismissed from the service of the local government because he did not properly perform his duties. Now, to show what had been the action of the Conservative Government in my own riding, I will mention the cases of three postmasters. At the village of Wyebidge there was a postmaster named McRae, who was invariably found on the platform at election times and assisted in the revision of the Liberal voters' list; the postmaster at Victoria Harbour, Mr. Vasey, was always found on the public platform, and I was always pleased to see him there, because his presence always afforded amusement, and showed how fair and elastic was the principle which guided the Conservative party; and a gentleman named Parker was the postmaster at the village of Hillsdale. These gentlemen always appeared at Liberal conventions and on public platforms, and always took part in the revision of the voters' lists; and yet they were never disturbed by the Conservative Government. But to-day, in marked contrast with that state of things, we have men turned out without investigation or inquiry and without a word being said in excuse or extenuation. Personally, these officials who have been dismissed have my sympathy. Politically, I wish the Government would dismiss every official in the riding, for this reason, that in doing so they are bringing about such a state of disgust among the respectable Liberal element in the riding. I wish to say a word in regard to two dismissals made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies); and I will say to his credit that he has not dismissed an official without an investigation. The men in question were first heard in their own defence, and then they were dismissed. I think that both cases came under his review; and I think it would not have been straining mercy to a very little extent had he permitted both officials to go with a warning. Well, he has dismissed them, and in doing so he has made political capital for me by disappointing about a hundred Grits, who are suffering keenly at not having received the appointment. I can assure the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that all through the province of Ontario—and I have been in many portions of it—there is a feeling that the Government have utterly disregarded their pre-election principles and pledges, and that the whole game of politics to-day is to satisfy the inordinate thirst and greed of these long-suffering, eighteen-year Liberals who have been pining and pining to have their thirst and hunger satisfied. And once again, I can only say that when outsiders are being satisfied in such large numbers, and when so many of the members of this House supporting the Government have been satisfied—because the number is upwards of fifteen at present—I hope that with the close of this session—and we have the promise of hon. gentlemen, at least in the corridors, that there will be another session—the many hon. gentlemen opposite who are longing and pining for office will be satisfied by being placed in those positions for which they have toiled and struggled so hard during the past eighteen years.

The House divided on the amendment of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that this Bill be not now read, but be read this day six months.

Mr. BENNETT.

RETURN ORDERED.

Statement of sums paid as travelling expenses to the judges of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec coming from outside districts to sit in the city of Montreal.

1st. From the 1st of January, 1898, up to the coming into force of the statute 61 Victoria (Canada), chap. 52, and

2nd. Since the coming into force of the said statute down to the 1st of March, 1899.—(Mr. Monk.)

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the hon. Minister of Agriculture any information with regard to the question I put before the Orders of the Day were called, about the car-load of immigrants, who had been sidetracked at Leaside, on account of scarlet fever.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I have not received the information asked for, and have had no communication from Dr. Montizambert.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 28th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ELECTION PROSECUTIONS IN THE PROVINCE OF MANITOBA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I wish to move, Mr. Speaker, and I think it was understood last session that some such motion should be made:

That the evidence and proceedings before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the last session of this House respecting certain prosecutions in the province of Manitoba, be referred to the said committee appointed for the present session, for further consideration.

It was understood, I think, by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches who are members of that committee, that this evidence should be reported in its then condition, on an informal undertaking on my own part, which is recorded in the proceedings, that it would be continued and concluded during the present session. I think, to be regular, that some such motion as this is necessary, in order that we may not be obliged to go over any part of the evidence that has already been taken and reduced to print. Therefore, I move this resolution.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask my hon. friend to allow the motion to stand until Monday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 92) respecting the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company.—(Mr. Landarkin.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Edmonton District Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Yukon Mining Trading and Transportation Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 95) respecting the Lindsay, Hali-burton and Mattawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 96) respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company.—(Mr. McCleary, by Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 97) further to amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. Cowan.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the First Minister to consider whether or not on Monday he can tell the House something as to the course of legislation. Although the Speech from the Throne did not contain a promise of much, I think there was one important measure promised; and we have now been sitting long enough for the House to be informed when we may expect that measure, and generally as to the course of legislation. The leader of the Opposition will not be in the House this afternoon, but he will be here on Monday, when my hon. friend may be prepared to give the House such information.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The demand of my hon. friend is quite reasonable, and I shall be prepared on Monday to give him the information he seeks.

RAILWAY ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN ST. JOHN AND HALIFAX.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders are called, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Railways, whether his department has yet succeeded in making an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for running privileges between St. John and Halifax. I notice by the papers that negotiations have been going on for some time, and there are various reports in regard to them. If the hon. gentleman has any information which he can give the House as to the progress being made, I think we would be glad to have it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have no objection at all to inform the hon. gentleman that no agreement has yet been arrived at on the subject between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The matter, I may say, is still in process of negotiation. We have not reached a conclusion, though the negotiations are not in such a state that I am justified in saying there is no possibility of our agreeing. That is the position in which the matter stands.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer to the remarks I made in the House the other day with reference to the price of coal oil. I have a telegram from Mr. F. A. Fitzgerald, vice-president of the Imperial Oil Company, who makes a general denial of my statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

The statement I made was that the price of crude oil had been reduced and the price of refined oil increased. Mr. Fitzgerald contents himself with a general denial of my statement. He says that the prices were about the same for crude and refined oils, as they have been for some time. His statement, however, is rather indefinite as he does not give the quotations of the prices then and the prices now. But as I do not wish to do the refiners any injustice, I give the House, at the earliest opportunity, the benefit of Mr. Fitzgerald's statement.

LOWERING THE WATERS OF LAKE SIMCOE.

Mr. BENNETT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. First Minister to a matter connected with the Department of Public Works, and I regret that the hon. Minister of Public Works is not in his place. On Thursday I asked a question relative to the lowering of the waters of Lake Simcoe, and in reply the Minister of Public Works said that representations had been made with a view to the lowering of these waters, but while he did not say that these representations had been made some years ago, by reason of the names connected with the application, one of which is that of the late Mr. Madill, formerly member for North Ontario, it is quite clear that the hon. Minister referred to requests made during that hon. gentleman's time. I accepted the statement of the hon. Minister, but to my surprise I found afterwards that the day before a deputation had been here from the riding of North Ontario and had made an application of a similar nature. The reason I now call attention to the matter is this. There is at the head of Lake Simcoe an artificial impediment to prevent the lowering of the waters, and if this were taken away there would be an almost instantaneous lowering of the waters. I would ask the right hon. First Minister to request the Minister of Public Works not to direct any change to be made in the waters of Lake Simcoe until he has received representations on that subject from the municipal council of the town of Orillia. The waters of Lake Couchiching would be seriously affected and the town would practically be high and dry, and I have been asked by the mayor of the town of Orillia to call the attention of the Government to the matter. I would, therefore, ask the First Minister to request his colleague not to take any steps for the lowering of these waters before hearing the residents of the town of Orillia and other towns interested on Lake Simcoe and Lake Couchiching on the matter.

YUKON MINING REGULATIONS.

Mr. FOSTER. I have called for a return from the Department of the Interior comprising copies of the Orders in Council and regulations successively introduced and published on the mining, placer and otherwise, in the Yukon. Those returns sometimes take a good deal of time to come down; and for the purpose of facilitating business, I would ask the hon. Minister to lay these orders and regulations that have been gazetted on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Will my hon. friend put in writing what he wants?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

THE BUDGET SPEECH.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. Minister of Finance persist in his determination to make his Budget speech on Tuesday next?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That is my present intention, but I shall give my hon. friend timely notice of any change.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend will give notice before Sunday.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I hope my hon. friend does not want to work on Sunday on his reply to the Budget speech.

Mr. FOSTER. No, but I wish to be prepared for the future.

LOBSTER FISHERIES.

Mr. RUSSELL. Has the commission appointed to consider the lobster fisheries question made any report?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The commissioners have reported and submitted the evidence. The report itself is within reasonable limits, but the evidence is very voluminous. If the hon. gentleman desires that the report and evidence be printed, as no doubt the members from the maritime provinces do, if he will make a motion to that effect, I will have the return printed and distributed at the earliest possible moment. But as the evidence is very voluminous, and it would take months to print it, and as the report comprises all that hon. gentlemen can desire, I would suggest that a motion be made to have the printing of the evidence proceeded with at first and brought down separate from the evidence.

THE DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HAGGART. I asked the hon. Minister of Railways to bring down, before the Drummond resolutions are considered, any report he has from the engineer in charge of the work as to the condition of the work, and all other information in the hands of the department. That will be very necessary for a proper consideration of the question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). If the hon. gentleman will give notice of a motion, I will have the return brought down as early as possible. Let him state specifically what he desires to have brought down. I understand that by some arrangement between the leaders, the Drummond County matter will not come up to-day, so that there will be ample time for him to have the return asked for.

Mr. HAGGART. It is simply impossible that I should give notice of a motion and reach it in time, and it is not necessary, as the hon. gentleman can bring down the information without a motion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I shall bring down any information I can.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

The Department of Railways and Canals, including $2,200 for L. J. Jones, $1,800 to be paid to the law clerk, and $700 each for J. H. J. Gleason and S. Loftus, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $41,200

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman give the usual explanations. The particular information I want is the number eligible to statutory increases in the department and the number who got the increase.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There are no changes in the personality of the staff. There are fifteen eligible to the increase and it has been given to eight. There is an increase to Mr. Gleason, clerk in the accountant's office, of $150, and to Mr. Loftus, of $150. There is also an increase to Mr. Dion, by virtue of his being promoted from a third to a second-class clerk, and $100 added.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he get his promotion?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He gets promotion and $100 increase in salary in connection with that.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an increase of $250 altogether? His promotion would carry $100?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, he gets only $100 more.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, $50 of a special increase?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. I see by the Estimates that the Minister retains the secretary of the department, notwithstanding his statement in the House that he found no need for such an office, and that if it were not for the statutory obligation that some things must be done by the secretary, he would not need such an officer at all. He has not only retained the secretaryship, but he is increasing the salary $200.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) forgets what was said at the time the change was made.

Mr. HAGGART. No, I have a very good memory.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) has not profited by it. It was made abundantly clear at that time that we could not abolish the office of secretary, but we could do without the particular individual who was holding the office of secretary, and who was in receipt, at that time, of something like $2,300. On making that change the chief clerk, Mr. Jones, was assigned the duties which had been performed by the secretary of the department, and a small increase of salary was allowed him. Thus we saved the salary of the secretary, which, I think, was about—

Mr. HAGGART. It was $2,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was more than that, it was between $2,200 and $2,400, $2,350 in fact, if my memory serves me well. We saved that, less the sum given to Mr. Jones, which was $200. That is the explanation that was made at the time.

Mr. HAGGART. Why do you have in this item, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary"?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That provision would be necessary in any case where the amount is increased beyond the statutory amount. These gentlemen are receiving more than the statutory increase.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I would like to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that he has combined two offices which, it seems to me, for certain reasons, it is not desirable to combine. He calls this officer "secretary of the department and chief clerk in the office of the Deputy Minister and chief engineer." As I understand it, the secretaryship is a statutory office, the duties of which include that of checking the action of the Deputy Minister to see that all contracts are in proper form, and to revise, to that extent, the work of the Deputy Minister. Now, if the secretary of the department is also chief clerk in the office of the Deputy Minister and under the deputy's immediate control and direction, he cannot perform the duties of secretary as the law provides that they should be performed. Therefore, it seems to me that the Minister is abolishing a very proper and necessary safeguard of that department. It seems to me that the present office is an anomaly, and that it is not just to the department in the country to have these two offices combined in the way the Minister has combined them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) does not approve of the change which was made; but I may point out that my experience in the department, now approaching three years, does not lead me to the same conclusion at which he has arrived; and I think his judgment would correspond with mine if he had had experience in that department. There is no reason in the world why the gentleman who is discharging the duties of first clerk in the branch under the Deputy Minister should not also perform the duties of secretary of the department. There is no anomaly and no difficulty in the way of his discharging these duties faithfully and well. I say that after having had some little means of forming an opinion. The hon. gentleman seems to be much concerned about the legal formalities of the contracts. I do not think any difficulty has arisen in that respect. I do not think that either the former secretary of the department or the gentleman who is now discharging the duties had any special acquaintance with law or with legal forms of contracts, or would know whether such forms were complied with or not. We have a law clerk in the department whose business it is to see to that; and, if any question of gravity arises, it is referred to the Department of Justice.

Mr. WALLACE. Do I understand the Minister to say that there is a law clerk in the department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. If my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) made the statement he did in ignorance of the fact, I can understand that he might have thought the secretary of the department necessarily had legal knowledge, and therefore would have these duties assigned to him; but he has not. I assure my hon. friend that he is quite unnecessarily alarmed with regard to the successful working of the department under the present arrangement.

Mr. WALLACE. But the Minister has not met the objection I made, but has steered around something else. I said that the secretary was a statutory officer appointed under Act of Parliament and independent of the Deputy Minister. If the secretary is also a clerk in the office of the Deputy Minister, as stated in the item, that fact interferes with the freedom and liberty he should have as secretary of the department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am aware that the statute requires that there should be such an officer, but I am not aware of any provision in the statute that makes it improper that the first clerk in the office of the Deputy Minister should be called secretary and should be assigned the duties of that office. And I can assure my hon. friend, from close observation and after an experience of nearly three years, that I have not yet discovered any difficulty whatever in the working of the department under this method. The moment any serious difficulty arises, I would feel it my duty to consider whether we should not recur to the original arrangement. In the meantime, we are saving the salary of one first-class clerk.

Mr. SPROULE. I must again protest against the system, which appears to prevail throughout these Estimates, of selecting certain clerks and giving them such advances of salary as are mentioned here. For instance, the first one mentioned here gets an advance of $200 this year. If he had not been receiving a fairly good salary, I could understand why he should have such a large increase. It is not justice either to the service or to the country that selection should be made of a few men for such large advances at one time, while many others equally deserving get no advance in their salaries.

The statute contemplated that $50 a year was a fair advance, and in this case you make it four times $50 a year, while in many other cases there are deserving men in the department who have not even the $50 advance, and perhaps they are quite as deserving as this one. I think the people of the country, who pay this salary, will think it unfair that large increases should be given like that to one individual.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think it is likely to occur year after year.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Dion was made a second-class clerk ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Where does the Minister find in these Estimates provision for Mr. Dion ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not at all sure that provision has been made in the Estimates ; if not it must have been overlooked. That is the explanation that was furnished to me by the Deputy Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. He has given Mr. Dion his promotion, and with it $100 increase.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He gets $1,150.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; my hon. friend cannot show any authority for paying him $1,150.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am stating what it was intended to give him.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has just now pointed out some very extraordinary increases, and he owes it to the House to give the reasons why he has not only given the statutory increase, but he has doubled and quadrupled the statutory increases.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. These increases have been given on the special recommendation of the Deputy Minister of the department. These officers have been especially diligent, especially industrious. They have been available at all hours ; their services have been at all times available. They are exceptionally competent men.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a general rule, is it not ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot say it is. There are some persons—I presume, there are some in every department—who are looking at the clock five minutes before the hour closes, watching in anxious expectation for it to strike so that they may start, and they have their hats on, and are out of the building almost before the hour has struck. There are others who are very painstaking, who are anxious to know if there is not something else that they can do, or if there is anything that they will be required to do before leaving, who are agreeable, and pleasant, and ready, if they are asked, to remain an hour or two after hours, or even to come back in the evening and work cheerfully. As officer at the head of that department, I cannot entirely shut my eyes to conditions of that kind, and when I am supported by the recommendation of the Deputy Minister, I feel warranted in asking my colleagues to support and the House to grant, the substantial increase which has been made here. Those are the reasons.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be good ground for making a statutory increase, and the chap who is always looking for the clock to strike might be shorn of his statutory increase on account of his great anxiety to get away. When a man does his work well and is at the call of the Minister at all hours, as every civil servant ought to be, and is, then he earns his $50 increase. But there ought to be some special reasons for giving three or four times that advance. Why is Mr. Loftus given this increase ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He has been strongly recommended to me by the Deputy Minister, as being very deserving. I may add here, that the salaries both of Gleason and Loftus have been small ; they have been getting $550 each, as third-class clerks. The salary seems to be inadequate, and I think those who are serving in the third class and who are in receipt of small salaries, may well be generously and liberally treated, when they are found to be deserving and capable officers.

Mr. FOSTER. How many in the third class did not receive the statutory increases ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there are none in the third class who have not received the statutory increase or the special increase which I mentioned. I felt that the third-class clerks had a particularly strong claim upon my consideration, and, therefore, I have given them all their statutory increase, or the special increase.

Mr. FOSTER. When was Mr. Loftus appointed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Many years ago. He was in office when I came in. These gentlemen were all in the department before I came in. I have appointed no one in the department since I took charge of it. Therefore, I am not open to the charge of having shown special favour to any of these gentlemen on political grounds.

Mr. HAGGART. Has the hon. gentleman any objection to state who he has recommended for first-class clerk?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no question of a first-class clerk.

Mr. HAGGART. You are asking for another: you are asking for seven, instead of six.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am going to put the law clerk on the footing of a first-class clerk, if that is what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. HAGGART. For 1898 the Minister had six first-class clerks; he is asking for seven this year. Who is the extra clerk?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not made any recommendation yet. In fact, I have not considered the question.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman says that he intends to promote the law clerk. Is it the law clerk in his department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My present expectation is, that there may be a change in the law clerk; the law clerk may not continue to remain in the department. He is now a second-class clerk at a low salary. If the change takes place which I anticipate, and it becomes necessary to appoint a law clerk, I will have to give him the rank which I have provided for here.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the status of the law clerk now? Is he a first-class clerk?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, second-class.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the law clerk leaving the department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it likely he will.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Minister is providing for one extra officer—

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I am not; not that I am aware of.

Mr. WALLACE. He is providing for seven first-class clerks, and the same number of second-class clerks. If he promotes the present law clerk, who is getting $1,150, to a first-class clerkship, he will be increasing his salary to at least $1,400, which is the minimum of a first-class clerk.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot get a first-class clerk for any such money as that. The probability is, that the arrangements will work out in this way: A third-class clerk will take the place of a second-class clerk, and the second-class clerk who is now discharging the duties of law clerk, will take a first-class clerkship, so that the number of second-class clerks will continue as it is at present, and the number of first-class clerks will be increased.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the messenger that is dropped?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think his name is Ide.

Mr. HAGGART. Did I understand the hon. Minister to say it in that way? You say the gentleman now performing the duty of law clerk, and, who is a second-class clerk, takes a first-class clerkship.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said, I think, very clearly; perhaps the hon. gentleman did not understand me, that I anticipated, at present, that the gentleman now holding the position would retire, probably, by the end of the year. In that case it would become necessary to appoint a law clerk for the department. I have made provision here for the purpose of that appointment when it is made. He will hold a first-class clerkship and get the salary usually paid in the other departments to a law clerk.

Mr. HAGGART. I understood the Minister quite plainly when he said that before. It is his subsequent remarks in which he said that a second-class clerk would probably be made a first-class clerk that seemed to differ from his former statement when I asked him. I understood the Minister to say that he will take from the outside a gentleman who is qualified to be a law clerk and make him a first-class clerk, and that is the first-class clerkship that he has made provision for.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is my present expectation.

The Department of Agriculture, including $1,100 to M. W. Casey and $500 to J. Beaudoin, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $52,962 50

Mr. FOSTER. What is the number of clerks eligible for the statutory increase in this department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). There are 30 clerks on the permanent staff eligible for statutory increases.

Mr. FOSTER. How many receive it?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Fifteen.

Mr. FOSTER. How many get more than the regular statutory increase?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. None.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, then, what is meant by "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act?"

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is a promotion from a temporary clerk to a second-class clerk. That gentleman was too old to pass a civil service examination but he has been a great many years in the service, and I think deserves promotion. I wish to put him in the second-class notwithstanding the fact of his not having passed the civil service examination.

Mr. FOSTER. Was he at the head of his class?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, at the head of the temporary clerks.

Mr. WALLACE. What is his name?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. M. W. Casey. He was a temporary clerk, but he had been a great many years in the service.

Mr. FOSTER. He is an addition to these Estimates.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. An addition to the permanent class, but he is only getting $100 more than he would as a temporary clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the same provision be made in the contingencies for temporaries?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Of course he will not receive that.

Mr. FOSTER. No, he will not; but will some one else?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am not reducing the amount of my contingencies.

Mr. FOSTER. What about Beaudoin?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Beaudoin is the Minister's personal messenger. I am giving him an increase greater than the statutory increase.

Mr. FOSTER. How much are you giving him?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He is getting an increase from $390 to $500. He is a messenger who is quite competent and does a great deal of clerical work, copies letters, is a good typewriter and attends to a great deal of work in connection, not only with my own particular correspondence, but with the work of the department. I considered that he was entitled to full consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. You are adding three clerks. What is your explanation of that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In the list of second-class clerks I wish to obtain provision for three to which places I wish to appoint assistant patent examiners. I may say in explanation of that that the examination of patents in the patent bureau has been very much behind, and is still very much behind. For a number of years there have been three patent examiners, Mr. McCabe, Mr. Bailey and Mr. Caron, who are first-class clerks. Of these, Mr. McCabe is an old servant who is still at the head of the branch, but Mr. Caron has had to cease examining patents because he has taken up the work of the classification of patents, a matter which I explained here last session, and for which I got a special vote. This has had to be given into the hands of an expert, and Mr. Caron seemed to be specially fitted for the work, and he is now devoting the whole of his time to it. I have had for some time back three gentlemen, and just the other day I appointed a fourth, who are assisting Mr. McCabe in the examination of patents. Mr. Bailey, who is one of the patent examiners, has lately become seriously ill, and was recommended by his physicians to leave off business for six months in consequence of the failure of his eyesight. As yet I have to leave the examination of patents in the hands of Mr. McCabe, and this vote is for the patent officers who have come in. Of these, Messrs. Thompson and Richard have been at work, for more than a year they were paid out of the contingent fund as temporary clerks. I wish to put them on the permanent staff after having passed the probationary period, and shown their capacity for this technical work. I think in the near future there will be a third required to be put on the permanent staff. I have asked that I shall have these extra three clerks placed at my disposal for the ensuing year.

Mr. FOSTER. How long has Mr. Beaudoin been in the department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He was appointed in 1894 to a position in the department.

Mr. SPROULE. This is another evidence of the stringent economy that hon. gentlemen have been talking so much about and which the country expected—an increase from 39 to 42 clerks in this branch.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. What?

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase in the number of officers in the branch from 39 to 42, an increase of $4,500 in the cost. If we believe what the hon. gentleman and his friends said a few years ago, the work could have been done at a very much less cost and with fewer civil servants. I do not remember exactly whether there were any dismissals after the Government got in, but we were told that the work could be done with a fewer number of men and that money could be saved to the country. But now it has turned out that this was done for the purpose of making vacancies for a few more of their friends. If the hon. Minister is a farmer, and I presume he is, he ought to know something about economy, but if he undertakes to run his own farm on the same principle that he does this department, he would soon find it was not a paying undertaking.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I believe that my explanation is sufficient to show that these are not really additional men.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) started out with the idea of being very economical in his department, and he dismissed clerks in favour of whose character and efficiency he gave his own testimony in the House; dismissed them on the ground that they were not necessary to the work of the department. Now, after two years, the Minister is filling up the department with more clerks. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, served his turn in getting some clerks out, and he is now serving his second turn in getting some more in. His conduct is inconsistent. He should at first have made himself acquainted with the needs of his department before he dismissed those efficient permanent officers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. These new officers are technical experts in the patent branch, and the work there could not be done by those other clerks. I have made it a condition that those gentlemen should be graduates in the applied science course of one of the universities, and all those I have appointed are such. The men dismissed were doing merely clerical work, and nobody has been appointed in their places.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the distinction between a "personal messenger" and a messenger attached to the department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I mean the Minister's messenger, who does his particular work.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose he is a messenger of the department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. He cannot do any more work than the others; he cannot do two things at the same time.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has himself been a Minister, and he knows that the messenger who does the Minister's work has to be there at all hours.

Mr. FOSTER. All the messengers in my department had to be there.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. At nights, and everything like that?

Mr. FOSTER. Whatever messenger came handy was the Minister's messenger, and I never got so far ahead as to have a man of my own. This is just carrying out the principle that some of the members of the Government think they own the whole country, and that these messengers are their personal appurtenances, and consequently the Minister must give them four increases in one year. I know messengers in the departments here, with large families, who every day have to struggle to make ends meet, and are as faithful as men can be, and who have had to scrub along at a $30 a year increase. Here is a messenger who becomes the personal appurtenance of the Minister of Agriculture, and he has four increases given him in one year, because, forsooth, he has advanced to the high dignity of being the personal messenger of the Minister.

Mr. SPROULE. This messenger may be very useful to do chores around the house, but the country will not appreciate the value of his services to the Minister, especially when it comes to pay the cost. Did I understand the Minister to say that there were no more men in the department now than there were before? I find here, however, that, taking the aggregate of all the clerks last year, there were thirty-nine, and now there are forty-two. How can the Minister reconcile that with the statement that there is no increase in the number of clerks.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have explained that the difference is that these additional men are patent examiners, who have been working as temporary clerks, paid out of civil government contingencies, and it is now proposed to put them on the permanent staff. The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) about the personal messenger of the Minister are unworthy of him. It is generally understood that a personal messenger is one whose special duty it is to attend to the Minister's own work in the department. My messenger never does any personal work for me outside of the department. He never waits on me or anything of that kind, and the word which I used in reference to him has been turned to an unworthy use by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) if he thinks it meant that.

Mr. SPROULE. What salary were paid these men as temporary clerks, and what salaries are paid them now?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were first employed at this work of examining patents, and I have engaged them at the rate of $50 a month or $600 a year, on probation, to see if they were suitable for this technical work, on the understanding that as soon as they proved themselves worthy they would get a very much larger salary. It cannot be expected that men of the scientific training necessary to do this work can be got for $600 a year. They will now be permanent officers and get the salary of second-class clerks when they are appointed.

Mr. SPROULE. I ask the Minister what they were paid before and what they are paid now?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. $600 a year before and now too.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the Minister propose to reduce his contingency account to that extent?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not reduced the contingent account, because I do not yet know what contingencies will be required.

Mr. SPROULE. Then there is no doubt whatever that there are three new men going into that department, and that their salaries will be an additional charge. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has taken a roundabout way of trying to mislead the House—well, perhaps, not mislead the House, but to mislead the country—into the supposition that he has no more men in his department now than he had before, whereas he has taken in three new men, and their salaries will be an additional charge to the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister stated that the reason he asks for an increase of salary for his personal messenger is because he has to be at the department day and night. I presume the Minister wants to convey the idea that he himself is in the department day and night doing the country's work.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, the Minister has not been in his department longer than a few hours, day or night, since the session, and if the messenger had to wait on the Minister, and the Minister is not there to be waited upon, his salary should be decreased rather than increased. There are messengers who have to be in the departments attending to other duties outside of the Minister's special work, and it seems to me that these messengers are better entitled to an increase.

Mr. WALLACE. The member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the member for York (Mr. Foster), as well as the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), are very hard to please. Of course, the Minister of Agriculture ought to have a personal messenger. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) says he was not very often in Ottawa. Well, perhaps he was down at his own farm, and he required a valet there. This personal messenger is a new officer, evidently; at least, I have not heard of personal messengers until now. I think the Minister of Agriculture will find them very useful and necessary, and I do not think he should be subjected to such a severe criticism for having one for himself.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member makes a suggestion which is so little founded in fact that my messenger has never left Ottawa to my knowledge since I have been in office.

Mr. WALLACE. Then, with the Minister being away most of the time, and this being a personal messenger, why should the hon. gentleman increase his salary $110?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Minister is not away most of the time.

Department of Trade and Commerce.... $9,240

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Hon. members will see, in the first place, that there is a promotion of a first-class clerk to the office of the chief clerk. That is Mr. Nutting. He is an officer of about a quarter of a century standing, and in my absence and the absence of my deputy, he has had to run the department; and we found it a great convenience to have somebody who could attend to papers and documents in the deputy's absence.

Mr. FOSTER. What is his salary before the promotion?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. $1,550. He is now made a chief clerk at $1,800.

Mr. FOSTER. Any other increases?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There are three increases in the third-class clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. Then all the hon. gentleman's clerks have received increases?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, one has not. The secretary remains at $1,500, as before.

Mr. FOSTER. The number eligible for increases has been—?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The number eligible is five, and four receive increases.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's department seems to be overmanned in one respect: is it for the reason that the Minister of Agriculture assigned? It would seem that with a staff of eight, two messengers is rather overdoing the thing.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think I must refer my hon. friend to his hon. colleague beside him, for the staff is the same as I found it.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, when in Opposition, associated with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), asseverated that this department was absolutely unnecessary and ought to be abolished; but my hon. friend comes in and sits right down in that department and keeps it going with what he then affirmed was an extraordinary and useless expenditure. After all, leaving aside what it was before, does not my hon. friend think that two messengers to six clerks is overmanning that department?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I find that they are wanted.

Mr. FOSTER. Gracious! What do they do?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is communication between my department and the others at various times. We cannot very well retire these people. I require the younger messenger, and the older one has been in the service for a long time, and if retired, he would have to be superannuated.

Mr. FOSTER. Superannuation is not a matter of such dread to my hon. friends that the hon. gentleman should hesitate to use it, especially as it would in this case effect a saving. They have superannuated many men without effecting any saving. I appreciate my hon. friend's regard for the aged messenger, but two messengers for six clerks are a good many.

Mr. IVES. There is this to be said for the two messengers. At the time I was in the department the Minister of Trade and Commerce had a great deal to do with both the Customs and the Inland Revenue Departments, and there was a constant interchange of commerce between them. There must have been a good deal more work for the messengers then than there is now. However, I will not criticise the hon. gentleman for retaining the two messengers. I do not think his department is overmanned in that particular. I would like to know what consideration the hon. gentleman has shown to my late private secretary?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He is one of those who received the increase.

Mr. IVES. I cannot think that case could have been called to the attention of the hon. gentleman before, or Mr. Buck would have received consideration earlier. I think my secretary was about the only one of the officials of the late Government who was not considered in some way or other. Unfortunately, he fell between the upper and the nether millstone at the time of the change of Government, and up to the present he has remained in the same position that he held three or four years ago. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman what he proposes to do, and whether he cannot do a little more under the peculiar circumstances of the case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will take that matter into consideration. I do not know that I can do any more at present. I have found Mr. Buck a good officer, and I think myself that the remuneration he receives at present is by no manner of means excessive. I cannot promise for this year, but I think that next year I shall be able to a reasonable extent to meet his views.

Mr. IVES. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say so, because, although Mr. Buck's salary was, perhaps, sufficient for a young man when he had $600 as private secretary, yet when he lost that and had to fall back upon his salary as a third-class clerk, it was pretty small.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I agree with the hon. gentleman that there is a good deal of hardship, but that is the fortune of war, of course, and private secretaries occasionally share the fate of their chiefs. But, Mr. Buck did duty during the illness of my own secretary, and I had occasion to be very well satisfied with him; and I think I can venture to say, without pledging myself, that he shall receive full consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. It is rather amusing to see an increase of $400 in this branch, especially as it is under the control of the hon. member for South Oxford, who always regarded it as one of the useless departments of the Government, speaking of it as a rather supernumerary and ornamental branch. As the incumbent and head of that department, he seems to be keeping up all the expenses of it and even adding to them. In fact, the same rule appears to be observed in it as in all the other departments. I would like the country to take note of this, that the hon. gentleman who so vehemently denounced the extravagance of the late Government is not able to exercise economy any more than are his colleagues in the other departments.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot forbear congratulating my hon. friend on his humanity, as compared with his colleague who sits to his right (Mr. Fielding). I think it was the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) who took occasion, two months ago, to write a letter to his paper, "La Patrie," over his own signature, which was devoted entirely to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and in that letter the Minister of Public Works declared that, although a great many people did not seem to realize it, there was an abundant flow of the milk of human kindness in the sometimes pugnacious Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he was ready to vouch for that against all and sundry. Well, we have had some proof of this this afternoon. My hon. friend has been good enough to give an ex-private secretary the statutory increase, and in this respect his conduct contrasts favourably with that of his hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, who signalled out a former private secretary of the Finance Department with another gentleman for a refusal of the statutory increase.

Contingencies—

|  |                 |
|--|-----------------|
| The Governor General's Secretary's Office— |                 |
| Clerical and other assistance.....         | $ 1,600        |
| Printing and stationery.....               | 1,200           |
| Sundries .....                             | 11,200          |
|  | $14,000 |

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). With regard to the item for clerical and other assistance, the amount expended last year was a little over the amount voted, and we required to vote a little more to enable the work to be done.

|   |                |

| The Queen's Privy Council for Canada—   |                |

| Printing and stationery .....   | 4,000          |
| Sundries .....  | 3,500          |
|   | $8,800 |

Mr. FOSTER. What is the reason of the decrease, as compared with last year, in the clerical and other assistance, which last year was $2,860.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This is merely a more convenient distribution. The other two items have been increased in proportion.

Mr. FOSTER. That materially changes the kind of service. It seems that heretofore certain clerical work was going on which was supposed to be necessary, and for which the Government took a vote of $2,860. Now they propose to add to the former vote for printing and stationery, which does not, of course, add to the work, but simply relates to mechanical expense, so to speak. Are you doing away with a part of the work for the classification of the old records.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think so.

Mr. SPROULE. Why are those words, "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act," inserted?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The reason for this is, that one or two ladies have been employed who have not passed the necessary examination.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the case that came before the Auditor General, in which he was overruled.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think that is the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they are old workers in the department.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes, they were employed by our predecessors, and continued by the present Prime Minister.

The Department of Justice—

|                                    | $10,700 |

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is an increase of $1,500 asked for under clerical and other assistance.

Mr. FOSTER. We had better let that stand, as the Solicitor General is not here, and ought to be here.

Item allowed to stand.

Department of Militia and Defence—

|                                    |                |
|------------------------------------|----------------|
| Clerical and other assistance..... | $ 2,500       |
| Printing and stationery .....      | 3,000          |
| Sundries .....                     | 3,500          |
|                                    | $9,000 |

Mr. FOSTER. Here are large increases in each of the items.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). This is $300 less than the amount which was actually spent last year.

Mr. FOSTER. The very first thing that my hon. friend urges in explanation is, that he asked for $1,500 in his own estimates, and then went to work and spent $1,500 more than he asked for and got authority to spend.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If the hon. gentleman will wait until I get through, he will the better understand my explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, when the hon. Minister rose, and the first sentence he uttered was that he made his estimate out and came to the House and told us that he wanted so much and got it, and his justification for another year's Estimates is that he spent twice as much, and, therefore, wants twice as much this year.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I was on my feet endeavouring to make my explanation in my own way. But the hon. gentleman saw fit to interrupt me. I think he might at least possess his soul in patience. I was explaining that the Estimates hitherto have been too small. We have adhered practically to the estimate as it was before I came into office. Each year we had to ask for a supplementary vote. The accountant this year consulted with me, and said—and I agree with him—that it would be better to put the whole amount of contingencies in this estimate and have done with it, and not have to come to Parliament and ask for a supplementary vote. I am told, after careful investigation, that this is the smallest amount we can get on with. Instead of asking for supplementary votes, as has been done, not only in this but in other departments, I think we should make one vote of it and ask the House for the money. That is the way we are doing.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot quite understand that either. The hon. Minister says: We have been in the habit every year of asking for two votes, first the general vote, and later, a supplementary vote. Well, this item under the heading 1898-99 should show the whole amount voted for last year, and does so, I imagine—main vote and supplementary vote. So the explanation of the Minister does not seem to hold, for either there must have been a supplementary vote last year, and, therefore, we over-expended, or if there was a supplementary vote, this amount covers the whole vote, main and supplementary. Was there a supplementary vote brought down last year?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I think there was.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Militia and Defence was very anxious to have an opportunity to go on with the explanation, and now that he has concluded it, we are no wiser than we were before. He has increased the general expenditure of the department this year, the salary list, and now he proposes to increase the contingencies by $1,900, or more than twenty-five per cent. And he is not giving us any reason for that increase. He says he found they were only asking for as much as their predecessors. But we were told that their predecessors were very extravagant. I think we were told by the hon. Minister himself.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not think so.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman's memory must be very treacherous; I am quite sure there was no one on his side of the House more vehement in his denunciations of the extravagance of the Conservative party than the present Minister of Militia. Now he proposes to increase this item by 25 per cent, without giving to the House any sufficient reason. He said he had a consultation with his accountant, and they both decided it would be a good thing, and so they are doing it. That is a pretty flimsy reason, and the Minister will have to tell us something more than that—that he and his accountant put their heads together and decided to ask for $1,900 more this session.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have here a memorandum which says that the vote for the current year, $7,100, will require to be supplemented—that would be in the Supplementary Estimates of the current year—to get through with the present year. As I explained a few moments ago, this is the way in which the business has been carried on for many years. And the further statement is made to me that it is desirable that a sum sufficient to meet the requirements of the department be voted for 1899-1900, and that is why we are under the necessity of asking Parliament for the additional vote. The amount asked for.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

$9,000, is thought sufficient to last the entire year. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will look at the Auditor General's Report, I think he will find that in the year 1896-97 the amount expended on this account was $9,300.

Mr. FOSTER. That was 1897-98—it was $9,315.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It is now proposed to ask for a vote of $9,000. As to the different services involved, I went carefully into them, and I am told it is impossible to reduce the amounts if the business of the department is to be carried on efficiently.

Mr. SPROULE. That may be satisfactory to the hon. Minister, but I do not think it can be satisfactory either to the country or to the House. If he had enough last year from all sources, he has increased his vote $1,900 for contingencies and $450 for salaries, making a total increase of $2,350 over what he got last year from all sources. Now, surely if there was enough last year, including both the main and supplementary Estimates, there is no justifiable reason for increasing by $2,350 as proposed in this vote—and that without any real explanation. He has not told us that there is any more work to be done or any more clerks required; he simply says there was not enough money in the main Estimates last year, and they were obliged to ask for a supplementary vote. But allowing for all this, he is $2,350 above the votes of last year.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia has not shown why, having received a total vote, in the main and supplementary Estimates together of $7,100, he expended $9,315, which is the amount shown by the Auditor General's Report for 1897-98.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The memorandum I have from the accountant states that the vote last year was as follows:—Clerical and other assistants, $2,500; printing and stationery, $4,000; sundries, $3,500, making a total of $10,000. So there must be an error. I will send for a copy of the statute and see if there is an error in the Estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. I see my hon. friend has been living up to the traditions of loyalty, so new and apparently so gratifying to the hon. gentlemen, since they have taken office. He pays out the people's money for "The Queen," $7.20, and "Queen Victoria, Her Life and Reign," $4.75. I commend to my hon. friend the diligent study of both those works. One gives the proceedings of the court, to which my hon. friend may some day or other be called, and the other will give him a knowledge of the services, life and characteristics of the Queen.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Have you a copy?

Mr. FOSTER. No, we poor fellows cannot get them, because we have not our hands in the public chest.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I find, on looking up the statutes, two sets of items: First, clerical and other assistance, $1,000; printing and stationery, $1,400; salaries, $500, making $2,900. Then, clerical and other assistance, $1,500; printing and stationery, $2,600; sundries, $3,000, making $7,100 and $2,900.

Mr. FOSTER. Was not one of these supplementaries for the preceding year?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. "Schedule A, sums granted to Her Majesty by this Act for the financial year ending 30th June, 1898," that is one. The other: "Sums granted to Her Majesty by this Act for the financial year ending 30th June, 1899."

Mr. FOSTER. They do not refer to the same year, then?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. You have not got anything out of them. You might as well own up that you are extravagant.

Mr. WALLACE. Printing and stationery last year cost $1,943; you are asking $3,000 this year.

Contingencies—Department of the Secretary of State..... $5,750

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is a small decrease.

Mr. FOSTER. It is said the Secretary of State has not anything to do.

Mr. SPROULE. We might have some explanation of how he managed to save that $300.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Do you object to it?

Contingencies—Office of the Auditor General..... $5,200

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He has applied for a little extra clerical assistance on account of the extra amount of work that he has to do.

Mr. FOSTER. He needs it. I notice by the last Auditor General's Report that he has a very hard time fighting the Ministers.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He does it impartially, you will admit.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he tries to keep you pretty well up, but you ride over him.

Mr. SPROULE. It will be in order for the Minister to give us an explanation why the Treasury Board overrules him so often.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). In order to carry on the Government.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is such a thing as being so particular that you lean over backwards sometimes.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not afraid of anything like that happening on that side of the House.

Department of Inland Revenue—Contingencies ..... $6,250

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I promised that I would give the names of the temporary clerks in the Inland Revenue Department when I was asked for them the other day by my hon. friend. I have them now. They are Miss Lawless, who gets $450; Miss Haggarty, who gets $450; and Mr. J. A. Robillard, who gets $400. These are the three temporary clerks we have now.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if any part of these contingencies is to be devoted to looking after distinguished persons who come from other countries?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When any distinguished persons come, if we can spare anything, we will do our best. I was rather discouraged after looking after one distinguished person two years ago, and when I look after distinguished persons again I will try to find that they deserve it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am rather surprised to hear my hon. friend speaking that way. That is not quite chivalric. Because a man has now fallen from his high estate, he rather passes censure upon him. The hon. gentleman ought to stand by a man who has met reverses in his own country.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I stood by him as long as I believed that he deserved it, even against the opinion of my own friends. I stood by him when there was not even one of my friends on this side of the House to stand by him, but what I have heard about him lately rather makes me feel that I might have made a mistake.

The Department of Agriculture—
 Clerical and other assistance, including $600 to E. A. Rodman and $430 to J. Leafloor, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $10,000
 Printing and stationery..... 3,250
 Sundries ..... 3,250
 $16,500

Mr. FOSTER. What does this "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act" mean?

Mr. SPROULE. Here is the case we were dealing with only a few moments ago. The hon. gentleman denied that he had increased the number of his clerks, but I find he is asking for the same amount for temporary clerks this year that he had last. Will he be good enough to explain how it is that he has taken two or three men and put them on the permanent staff, and that yet he can make no reduction in the amount for temporary clerks.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is true that some of the temporary clerks are to be put on the permanent staff—three of them—but, unfortunately, Mr. Bailey, one of the examiners, has had to have leave of absence in consequence of sickness for six months, and I have to put temporary clerks in to do his work; so that, instead of a decrease of three in the number of temporary clerks, there will only be two in that particular branch. I find that among these temporary clerks, with the exception of three, they are all paid very small amounts, about $500, and I thought it was only just, as they were doing their work well, that they should be allowed the statutory increase of temporary clerks, which is $30 a year, which I have given to all in this work who are receiving under $500. This about makes up for the salary of one clerk. I confess that at the present time my estimates do not show that I am going to use the whole of this $10,000. I am asking that for clerical and other assistance, but I cannot tell what may arise in the year.

Mr. FOSTER. What are these extraordinary cases here?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The case of Miss Rodman is for the typewriter who came into the service two years ago to assist my private secretary. She has very long hours and has a great deal of work to do. The case of J. Leafloor is one which the Auditor General says will have to appear in the Estimates every year. Leafloor was a messenger, and was appointed and paid out of the census vote some years ago and was not on the permanent staff. Before I came to office he had been appointed chief messenger by my predecessor, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). I have retained him, but the Auditor General has decided that his salary must be voted, or specified, each year at that rate, as he is a temporary messenger, really. I put him in at the usual salary of a temporary messenger, which must be voted every year.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one point here which does seem serious. The hon. gentleman comes and asks for $10,000 for clerical assistance, outside of his staff. He has increased his staff by three clerks, and during this present year he has 42 clerks in the Agriculture Department, in Ottawa. Yet he asks for $10,000 for clerical assistance for more than a quarter of the whole of his permanent staff. It seems to me that with the present civil service establishment, and with the class of writers that we can obtain for clerical work for $300 or $400 or $500 a year, to vote $10,000 for clerical assistance is to vote a large amount. The hon. gentleman says, "I do not know whether I will use all that or not, but I desire that you should give it to me in case I should require it." I submit that this is not the way that estimates should be presented to the House. A Minister comes to this House and asks what he thinks he will actually need. If he finds out after a short time that he actually needs more, there is recourse to him in the first supplementary estimates before the session is through. That gives him two months or so to think over as to whether he has need for more or not. Although the Minister may think that he had obtained sufficient, it may happen that, before the year is up, he will find that he does need more. In that case there is the supplementary estimates in the succeeding year to which he can have recourse, but it is neither in accordance with constitutional government, or practice, in Great Britain, or in this country, to ask for a larger sum than you think you actually need for the transaction of the business of your department. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has done that on one or two occasions before. I remember last year, or the session before last, a vote was asked for and the hon. gentleman could not give the least idea as to what he was going to do with the amount that he asked for. He said that it might be sufficient but that it would not be used unless it was needed. You might just as well come down and ask for a lump sum of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 and say, "If we do not want it we will not use it." That is not the rule or basis upon which estimates ought to be brought down. I want to ask the hon. Minister to give the details of the clerical assistance that he proposes now to employ in the department, the names and the salaries, so as to show us how much it would total up. He has made a statement that he does not see how he can use this $10,000. I hope he will give the House all the details.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that "C. A. Rodman" a lady?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. How long has she been in the department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. About two years.

Mr. WALLACE. And she gets $600?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I propose to give her that.

Mr. WALLACE. That is more than some qualified shorthand writers who are in the service for many years, get.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In reply to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), I may say, that the number of temporary clerks of this character who are paid out of the civil government contingencies of the Department of Agriculture, is very considerably less than when I took office. I have not at hand the list, but, if I remember, speaking from memory, there are more than ten less than there were when I became Minister, and there is also a considerable reduction in the number of permanent clerks. I reduced the number of permanent clerks the first year I came into office.

Mr. FOSTER. And you are increasing them this year.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, but for the special purpose which I explained to the hon. gentleman. Of those clerks who are not permanent, there are some three or four last year, including Mr. Casey, who, although temporary clerks, are receiving quite high salaries. At the present, Miss Fitzgerald, who has been some eight or ten years in the service, is receiving $912.50. I do not propose to add to that. Mr. Casey is transferred to the permanent staff. Mrs. Bowden is receiving $636.75; T. H. Graham is receiving $600; Messrs. Thompson and Farmer were the two examiners of the present current year. Mr. Farmer has left the service, in consequence of not getting sufficient for his work, and being able to do better elsewhere, and I have had to replace him by Mr. McGill at $600, the same salary. Mr. Farmer was a graduate of McGill University in the science course, and had special qualifications for the work.

Mr. WALLACE. You pay this young lady shorthand writer the same as the specialist.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have explained that the specialist came in on approbation, and was getting this while on approbation; but I propose to put him into a second-class clerkship at $1,100, in consequence of his technical qualifications, and the lady remains at $600, and cannot get any more as a temporary clerk. Mr. McGill is a graduate of Toronto University, and I have appointed him lately. Mr. Campbell is a graduate of McGill University, a resident of the city here, and he is coming in as a temporary clerk at $600 to do the work that Mr. Bailey has been doing. I have taken these young men at $600 to commence with, as assistant patent examiners. Then, there is Mrs. Kingsmill, who has $577.50; Mr. Bourret, who has $600; Miss Dorion, who has $577.50; Miss Hamilton, who has $490; Miss Rodman, who will have $600 now; Miss Martineau, who has $460; Miss Armstrong, who has $430; Miss Casgrain, who has $430; Mr. Brown, $430; Mr. Lefleur, messenger, $430; Mr. Gorman, messenger, $360. These latter two are getting a statutory increase, as do also all the clerks here under $600. That comes altogether to $7,965; but that amount does not include the extra clerk that I have to have to replace Mr. Bailey, nor the two expert examiners whom I have still on probation, each of them getting $600; so that, altogether, that will amount to $9,165.25.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a tremendously large list.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The fact remains, that the list was much larger until quite recently.

Mr. FOSTER. What do all these people do?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Miss Fitzgerald is a shorthand writer for the Deputy Minister, and helps the secretary of the department. Mrs. Bowden works in the patent branch; Morgan in the patent branch; the patent examiners, of course, are in the patent branch; Mrs. Kingsmill is in the correspondence branch; Bourret, in the patent branch; Miss Dorion, in the patent branch; Miss Casey is working with Dr. Brymner; Miss Hamilton, in the patent branch; Miss Rodman, typewriter to my own secretary; Miss Martineau is either in the patent or statistical branch; Miss Armstrong is in the patent branch; Miss Casgrain is in the patent branch; Brown is in the patent branch, and Lefleur and the others are messengers. The fact is, that in the patent branch there are a large number of temporary clerks. I do not consider I would be justified in giving promotion to second-class clerkships to those, and, as there are no third-class clerkships under the new law, this necessitates a pretty large list of temporary clerks who have to be paid out of contingencies. As I have said, this list is not as large as it was a couple of years ago.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister has provided for everything he could possibly think of, including a young lady assistant to his own private secretary and an extra personal messenger, and yet he has, according to his own showing, $835.25 which there is no need for. Why not strike it out?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We might as well put in the round figure, as heretofore.

Mr. SPROULE. This is a very loose way of making up estimates. The Minister has no necessity whatever for this $825.

Mr. FOSTER. That will do for some exigency.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are always some exigencies.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). To say that there are some exigencies, is an easy way to dispose of it, but it is not satisfactory. There is no way in which the Minister can expend this $10,000, even with personal messengers and every extravagance he can think of. That $10,000 is largely for one branch of his department, and he has increased the regular expenditure of the department by $4,540. The hon. gentleman is proposing, not to decrease the expenditure, but to increase his permanent list. The usual and proper rule is, to decrease the contingent list, but he is increasing the permanent list without decreasing the contingent list at all. It simply means that there is $4,500 of increase in the cost of the clerical work of the department for the incoming year. The Minister cannot point to any necessity for that increase that I know of. The work of the patent branch, I presume, remains pretty much the same from year to year.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Oh, no; it has been increasing steadily from year to year.

Mr. WALLACE. I know it has been increasing in the past, but I think it has reached the point where it is about stationary. The Minister is increasing the expenditure of his department enormously. Notwithstanding that he is paying very liberal salaries, in some cases at any rate, he cannot find a place to expend this $10,000. He says, if we do not require it, we will not expend it; but I think he should come down here with an economical and careful estimate of what will actually be required, and not ask Parliament for a lump sum to be voted without any regard to the interests of the case. There will be a strong temptation to spend the money. Some needy friend will come along and will get a job.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, we will not do that.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call attention to a practice which I paid a good deal of attention to while in the Government, and which is very likely to increase, namely, the practice of departments furnishing themselves with magazines, books, and so on, at the public expense. I do not think that is right. I always fought against it, and I think it is an abuse that should be brought to an end. If the Minister or any one in a department wants one of the monthly magazines, let him subscribe to it; he has his salary. Occasionally a literary magazine is required because there is an article in it which may be useful to the department, but I think there can be no justification for a yearly subscription to magazines.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman says. I could not remember at the moment what these magazines are, but I rather think they are for the purpose of the statistician. I will look into the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Among them I find "The Contemporary," "The Fortnightly Review," "The Forum," "The Nineteenth Century."

Mr. SPROULE. There is another thing which indicates a looseness in the management of the department, which is scarcely consistent with rigid economy. After making provision for everything, I find that there is $835 more in the Estimates than the Minister will require; and that includes the salary of an extra man who is taking the place of one who is always on leave of absence on account of ill-health. It seems to me the Minister could well afford to drop that amount. It will only be a temptation to him to use it if it is left there, and I do not think he is such proof against temptation that he will not use it.

Mr. WALLACE.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is the same as last year. We will not spend it if it is not absolutely necessary.

Contingencies—Department of Marine and Fisheries ..... $12,200

Mr. FOSTER. What about these two extra clerks?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). They are two gentlemen whom I found there, appointed by my predecessor. According to the Civil Service Act they could not get more than $400 each; but, because of their competency, the House voted them $600 each. They are very good men.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, if he looks over his contingencies, will find that he has been dissipating in the same way as other Ministers in the way of buying books.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, except two law books.

Mr. FOSTER. What about "Canada and its Capital"? Here you have also "Les Etats-Unis," $6. There must be a little serial running through all the Ministers' contingencies about "Le Saguenay and le bassin du Lac St. Jean." There must be a great deal of interest taken in the scenery of the Saguenay district, and the Ministers seem to have been tolled $1.25 each for the book.

The PRIME MINISTER. Encouraging native industry.

Mr. FOSTER. If they are going to do that out of their own pockets, it is very laudable.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am putting in the plea that it is a very little one.

The Department of Railways and Canals—
 Printing and stationery ..... $5,500
 Sundries ..... 2,500
 $8,000

Mr. FOSTER. There is one serial that runs through most of the Ministers' departments, and that is the "Encyclopedia of Practical Quotations," $8. That is no doubt very useful, and no doubt it must apply to all the technical work of each department, as I see each one of them has it. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) evidently felt that he especially needed those practical quotations. He is evidently anxious to know what the Canadian press says about him, because he subscribes to the Canadian Press Printing Bureau.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How much does that come to?

Mr. FOSTER. About $25 of the people's money, which would do a great deal to add to the comfort of some poor labourer.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Do you think that newspaper clippings always add to the personal comfort of the Ministry very much?

Mr. SPROULE. Not the way they have been writing about him lately.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably he will discontinue it.

The Department of Trade and Commerce—
Sundries, including clerical and other assistance, with additional to Miss A. C. Kennedy ($80), notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act .....

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is an increase of $590, that is chiefly caused by the extra work thrown on us by the preferential tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend come to the conclusion to change the heading of that in the next work?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What would you suggest?

Mr. FOSTER. It would be very difficult to suggest a fit name.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Let us hear your suggestion, and we will take it into consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose you call it "the discriminating tariff."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. A rose by any name will smell as sweet, I suppose.

Mr. SPROULE. Why are those words, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act," inserted?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. On account of an increase to one of the temporary clerks, which brings the salary to $600.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the clerk a lady?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes.

Care and cleaning of departmental buildings, including amount of $100 required to pay for firing noon gun, which amount may be paid to a member of the civil service, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act .....

|           |          |

Mr. FOSTER. I thought that gun was fired by electricity?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A man has to attend to the loading.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not electricity do the whole thing?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It has not reached that stage yet.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this carried on on the same plan as before?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, by the same man.

House of Commons—

Salary of Deputy Speaker ..... $2,000

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman come to the conclusion to adjure the heretical doctrine of past years and retain the Deputy Speaker?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, he is doing his work, you know.

House of Commons—

Expenses of committees, sessional and extra clerks, &c..... $16,700

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether other members have any objection to the kind of stationery that is distributed, but it seems to me to be perfectly useless stationery for members of the House. I had occasion to go to the little box that was sent me—a very small and harmless looking box—but I found there little but ladies' stationery—absolutely useless to me. It was very nice stationery for ladies. But I supposed this stationery was to be provided for the use of members. If that is the design, the design is not well carried out, in my opinion. I do not know who makes up the assortment, but I would suggest—the other members might have a different idea—that something commonplace and useful should be given. We do not need these double-padded and coloured envelopes. Of course, they are very nice here in Ottawa, where the members of the Opposition have to send so many acceptances to dinners to the Ministers.

Mr. IVES. A more serious objection is as to the stationery we have to use in the House. It is a matter of chance whether you get an envelope to stick or not. As a rule, you have to get mucilage and use it on the envelope to make sure. We have not had such poor stationery, so far as I can recollect, in the 20 years that I have been in the House. The envelopes are so bad that they ought to be withdrawn at once and better envelopes substituted.

Mr. SPROULE. I have several times complained about the stationery, and I find the same complaint would be justified this year. In our boxes we have a lot of small note-paper that is of no use for letter-writing. That is my experience. It may be that I cannot express myself as concisely as some, and therefore require larger paper for my letters. The envelopes also are too small. Envelopes of the ordinary size are always useful, but the number is out of all proportion to the needs. The same thing seems to occur every year, and I suppose it is due to the person who makes the selection. I have always felt, as the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) says, that there is a great deal too much fancy envelopes and paper, which are of no use to a business man, and too little of the ordinary size such as we can use day by day. It would be better if we had more stationery for use and fewer of the little trinkets that are absolutely of no use to any person. One or two new ones seem to be added every year. This year we have a tube of paste, which, I see by the label, is manufactured in New York. This Government seems disposed to get everything from the United States. I do not know whether these Yankee notions please the people of the country, but they appear to me to be of little value.

Mr. IVES. I think it is unreasonable to find fault with the Government for making use of new Yankee notions. They have had to give up so many of the old Yankee notions, that they naturally look for new ones.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may explain that Mr. Clarke has had the selection of the stationery for many years. There was an old gentleman at the head of this office, but he practically left the whole matter to Mr. Clarke. So it is the same man who makes the selection as has made it for many years. As to the complaints that have been made, I may say that a good many members have complained to me that they do not get nearly as nice things in their boxes as the Senators do. I think possibly, that is true; for the stationery which is supplied to this House goes to 213 members as well as to 30 or 40 members of the press gallery and a large staff of officials. And for all this there is only $8,000 voted—whereas the Senate have some 80 members and a much smaller staff, and $6,000 is voted. So the Senate really are much better able to supply themselves with superior stationery than this House is. We had $4,000 taken off the vote two years ago. That was, as I understand it, because the members were not any longer to receive the small trunks of stationery. What the members required to take home was then, until two sessions ago, wrapped up in a paper parcel. An improvement was made last year by putting the stationery in paper boxes which probably would burst before the members left Ottawa. However, there was no money to buy anything better. This year I think they have appropriated a small sum from the miscellaneous Estimates to cover a box that will probably hold together the stationery, such as it is, until the members get home. I am glad that hon. gentlemen have given their opinions, they will be taken down in the "Hansard," and I shall at once call Mr. Clarke's attention to them. He has always general instructions from me to get nothing but the very best articles, and to send an article back if it is not of the very best. I really think myself the mucilage cannot possibly be the very best. However, the discussion that has occurred will be useful, and if the members wish a very superior stationery, something more like that of the Senate, I am afraid they will have to consent to a little increase in the Estimates for stationery.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the trouble is the other way. We must pay more for them, if they are not the right kind, than you would for serviceable stationery. I know Mr. Clarke, I think he is a very efficient officer, and if left to himself, probably he would get a different class of stationery. But he tries to please all, and I have no doubt he receives a great many conflicting recommendations or suggestions, and in attempting to please all, he probably does not get as good as we might have. I do not think we ought to go in for expensive stationery, but we ought to have what is useful.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the quantity of letter pads and note pads might be increased and the envelopes made to suit them. You have not enough of the larger envelopes to go with the pads that you have there. You might reduce the amount of small note-paper of comparatively little value, and give something that would be of some use, with envelopes to match.

Mr. SPEAKER. No doubt tastes differ in that regard. If any members receive stationery in their box which they do not quite like, they can go to Mr. Clarke, and say: Please give me an equivalent in value, of a different kind of stationery. I think he will always do that; I understand that he does so. If that is not the case, I will see that it is done.

Publishing Debates ..... $40,000

Mr. FOSTER. Does that cover the cost?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It depends a little on the length of the session.

Estimate of Serjeant-at-Arms, as approved ..... $33,937 50

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Speaker and the Clerk of the House, by way of suggestion, whether these sessional clerks are all doing the work for which they are supposed to be appointed to this House? The Clerk says they are this session. I hope so; I think most of them do.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think some of the services of the sessional clerks have heretofore been appropriated by individual members of the House to a small extent, but I think that is entirely stopped now. The Clerk has done everything he can to stop it.

Mr. WALLACE. In regard to these Estimates, I am told that soap and other things used around the House of Commons are brought in from Chicago. I think we ought to use such of those articles as are manufactured in our own country.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot answer as to how that is, but I think we ought to get soap in Canada, at any rate. I do not say that it is not the case, because I have not had an opportunity of knowing.

Contingent expenses in connection with the voters' lists..... $2,500

Mr. TAYLOR. What voters' list is this?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). For the by-elections.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does this cover the list for Brockville.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). In the city of Winnipeg at the present moment, we are preparing special voters' lists under the statute.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does this cover the Brockville list?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If there was one prepared.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do the Government prepare the ballots also?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, no.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where are they prepared?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are prepared by the deputy returning officer.

Mr. HAGGART. Under the Franchise Act of last year the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was to get a copy of the voters' lists printed for each constituency, and every member was to get 20 copies. I have not seen them yet. Has the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery got instructions not to print them?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly not; he has no instructions to my knowledge not to do anything which the law requires him to do.

Mr. BENNETT. A few days ago I made application to the Clerk for the lists. He told me the list had been returned by the Clerk of the Peace for the county, but so far no lists had been printed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no doubt he will cause them to be printed at once.

Mr. MOORE. When we were repealing the Franchise Act I understood that the great objection to the old one was its expense; the new one was to be prepared by the municipal officers and to cost this Government nothing. I am therefore surprised to find such a vote as this. I understood that under the new Act the provincial authorities were to do this work.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is for a special case like Winnipeg.

Mr. BENNETT. Was $2,500 required for the Winnipeg voters' list?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not for the Winnipeg lists alone, but the law provides that where the lists are more than a year old a new voters' list must be prepared, and some vote must be taken to defray the expenses of that.

That is being done in Winnipeg at the present time, and there may be many other similar cases.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it expected that the cost of printing the voters' list for Winnipeg alone will be $2,500?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know what the cost will be. It is impossible to tell what it will cost until the lists are printed, it is only guess work. How could we tell how many names are being returned until the revising officers make up the lists?

Mr. SPROULE. Then no one can tell what the item is put here for. How do you know that you need it at all?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because at this moment the work is going on of preparing the list in Winnipeg. It will necessarily cost something.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister ought to know something about it. If they want this sum of money, they want it for some specific purposes, and the Minister has to tell the House what the purpose is.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In case we had a list that was needed, as, for instance, in Winnipeg, the money would be required.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The law says the lists shall be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery by the municipal officers who prepare them. In the province of Quebec the lists are being prepared now, and they will be in force in a few days. I take it that the lists will be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and that they will have to be printed. We have an item in the Estimates to cover the printing of the lists. Surely this is not enough to print all the lists for the province of Quebec or for the Dominion. I know that in the course of this present year they will have to be printed. This item will not be for printing the lists in the whole Dominion.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had better get his compass. The Minister has not the slightest idea what this item is for. We had better let the item stand until he discovers what it is for.

Mr. G. V. McINERNEY (Kent, N.B.). When the Franchise Act was passed last session, there was a clause inserted that ten days after the lists were finally revised the custodians, in the different constituencies should send them to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to be printed. Every list that is sent up is the original list, and that list has to be printed by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery here. I beg to tell the hon. Minister that, in December, the list was sent up from my county, and I am informed that it has not yet been printed, and that there is no intention of printing it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is correct. I do not understand that the intention ever was to print the lists unless there is an election. It would be an unnecessary expense.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think that is the provision of the Act.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Certainly it is.

Mr. HAGGART. The law is imperative.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know that the intention of the Government was not to print the lists in all cases, but only in those cases when it was necessary. There is no sense in printing the lists and using our money for nothing. If an election is coming on in any riding the list can be printed in a few hours, but to have the lists printed in all the different ridings in this Dominion, where they are not required, will incur great expense.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is the law.

Mr. McINERNEY. Is it the intention of the Government to have all the lists printed this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, not unless it is necessary; certainly not.

Mr. SPROULE. Were the lists printed for Huron and Brockville?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. No, not for Huron, not for the whole of Huron.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, they were printed for Brockville.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, for Brockville, but only for a part of Huron.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say for Brockville, and so they would be in any other part of the country where an election is called on.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why were they not printed for Huron?

Mr. HOLMES. They were printed for Huron also.

Mr. HAGGART. Some of the townships were printed for Huron, but not for the whole county.

Mr. FOSTER. This is not for the printing of the voters' lists at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Contingent expenses in connection with the printing of the lists.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. McINERNEY.

After Recess.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the Order being called for,

Third reading of Bill (No. 18) respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). Since this Bill was considered in the committee of the House the other day, some of the parties interested have complained that the amendment to clause 6 does not properly set out the wishes of the Railway Committee, and in order that the parties may be heard, and that the Bill may be again considered so that if any injustice has been done it may be righted, as the member in charge of the Bill I shall now move, that the Bill be referred back to the Railway Committee to be further considered. I intended to make some reference to the circumstances connected with this matter, but as the Bill will come up again before the committee, I shall defer what I have to say until then. I move, Sir:

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 18) be discharged and that the said Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I want to say a word on this Bill before it is referred back to the committee, because I think there is something in connection with it that should be taken notice of by this House. From the information at hand, it seems pretty clear that the Bill was tampered with after it left the Railway Committee and before it was reported to this House. The information we have is to the effect, that the counsel for the railway company was one of the parties who assisted in making the amendments to that Bill—amendments that were never contemplated by the Railway Committee. I say that such a thing as that, justly entitles that gentleman to be brought before the bar of the House to answer for his conduct. No lawyer or no other individual has a right to come before any important committee of this House—and it is by the pleasure of the committee that he is allowed to appear there as an advocate for one side or the other—and then, after the deliberation of the committee, and after they have reported the Bill, take upon himself to rearrange any amendments to the Bill so as to change it from what the committee reported. That is the position with regard to this Bill as I understand it to-day. I have several times believed previously, that such a thing was done with Bills, because I have noticed after the Bills were printed that the amendments were not as I understood them to be passed in the committee—and I usually give very close attention to Bills in the Railway Committee, of which I have been a member for the last 21 years. It is frequently said, that there is a typographical error or a word changed or something done, but we notice that it materially modifies the sense and the legal effect of the measure itself. That practice should be put a stop to, and any one who attempts it, I do not care who he is, should be dealt with severely. If a person is allowed to come before that committee he has no right to touch a Bill after it is signed by the chairman and reported to this House.

I wish now to refer to the amendment of that Bill to which I drew attention before. The amendment which was carried was moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). At the time, I thought that amendment would not meet the views of some members of the committee, and I have still stronger reasons to think so now. I refer to the last clause of the Bill which proposed to give power to the railway company to run its cars on Sunday and collect fares. I moved that the clause be struck out, but an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), which amendment afterwards carried, and I believe that that amendment went further than it was intended to go. It certainly went a great deal further than I intended it should go, and when I drew attention to this fact in the committee I was assured by the hon. member for Halifax that it did not interfere with what I was contending for; that it did not give the railway company the right to run its cars on Sunday outside of the city of Ottawa. I shall read that amendment and afterwards draw attention to what I regard as the power it does confer on the Electric Railway Company. It says:

Nothing in any Act relating to the Ottawa Electric Company, the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company (Limited), or the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, or any other Act, shall restrict the power or render it beyond the power of the Ottawa Electric Railway Company to run its cars or collect fares between midnight of Saturday and midnight of Sunday.

The other amendment is a change from the original amendment and is to the effect that the same should have been authorized in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of the Act entitled "An Act respecting the city of Ottawa," passed by the legislature of Ontario in the year 1899. But what I want to draw attention to is that there is nothing in that Act which shall render it ultra vires of the electric railway company to run cars and collect fares on Sunday outside of the city of Ottawa. The contention that we made before the committee was that while the people of Ottawa voted upon the question of the right to run cars on Sunday, and that was submitted to the Ontario legislature and authority was given, so far as they could give authority, granting that right; that authority did not give the electric railway company the right to run cars outside the city limits. But, as this Bill proposed that the electric railway company should extend its line to Bell's Corners or Britannia, seven miles outside the city limits, my contention was that the people of Carleton County never voted upon that question, never asked the right for this company to run their cars on Sunday, and nevertheless if this amendment passed the company would have the right to so run their cars. The amendment does not say inside or outside the city limits, but merely speaks of the Ottawa Electric Railway Company. Now, the Ottawa Electric Railway Company would be the same if it ran five miles or fifty miles outside the city, and they would have the power to run their cars on Sunday "inside" or "outside" the city limits as asked by the vote of the people of Ottawa, yet it was a different thing to allow them the right to run cars on Sunday outside the city limits, when the people of Carleton or any other portion of the country through which the railway would run, did not ask for it. If the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) looks at the amendment carefully, he will see that it would give the electric railway company the right to go beyond what the Railway Committee contemplated. It will be well to consider that when the Bill is before the Railway Committee again. I have drawn attention to this matter for the purpose of having the House take notice of the fact, that at different times we have had reason to believe that Bills have been tampered with after they have been signed by the chairman of the Railway Committee, and that amendments have crept in which have led to grave suspicion that it was done by somebody after the Bill had been reported. In this instance it appears to be clear, and if the explanation in the "Citizen" is correct, it was done by the lawyer who appeared for the railway company, Mr. Ferguson, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) agreeing upon certain amendments. I do not think that was right; I do not think that should be; I think we should take note of it, and see that when a Bill leaves any committee of this House it shall not be changed in any particular until it is reported to this House, when this House can deal with it as it sees fit.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). I think my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, is correct in his criticism of the amendment of which I gave notice for this evening, and which it will not be necessary for me to move, inasmuch as I understand that the motion now before the House is to refer the Bill back to the committee without instructions, so that the committee may do with it whatever it thinks necessary. I shall read an amendment, however, which I believe will meet entirely the criticism the hon. gentleman makes, and which will embody what I understand were the views entertained by the committee. Suppose we read the Act with this clause in it:

Nothing contained in section 2 of the Act of the legislature of Ontario, being 31 Victoria, chap. 45, shall be held to render it ultra vires of the said Ottawa Electric Railway Company to run passenger cars of the said company and collect tolls for the carriage of passengers thereon between midnight of Saturday and midnight of Sunday within the limits defined in the Act hereinafter mentioned, after the same shall have been authorized in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of the Act intituled "An Act respecting the city of Ottawa," passed by the legislature of Ontario in the year 1899.

That is to say, it shall be intra vires of the company to run their cars within the limits mentioned in the Ontario statute passed last winter, after they have complied with the provisions of that statute.

Mr. CLARKE. What are those limits ?

Mr. RUSSELL. The limits of the city of Ottawa and a mile and a half outside thereof, as authorized by the legislature. I think it is quite right that this restriction should be included in the amendment, which is intended to remove the prohibition, as well as in the legislation which empowers the company to run.

Now, I wish to say a word in exculpation of Mr. Ferguson, the solicitor of the company. I am quite sure that he is not to blame in a single particular. Naturally enough, as solicitor of the company, he was anxious to get everything he possibly could, and he had a right to do that.

Mr. SPROULE. He had no right to go beyond the committee's report.

Mr. RUSSELL. My hon. friend will remember that the amendment was drawn on a piece of paper with a pencil, using the top of a soft hat for a desk, and it was very difficult indeed, sitting where I was, and without any exact knowledge of what those various statutes were, to draw any amendment, because the committee had very scant knowledge of what legislation there was that bore on the question. It was agreed by everybody, for this reason, that the amendment was not in form, and would require to be put in form by somebody after the adjournment of the committee. The committee adjourned without putting the amendment in proper form ; and, just after I left the committee and was on my way to lunch, I was asked to come back and assist the clerk in putting the matter in shape. I sat down with Mr. Ferguson ; and I may assure the House, that I am more responsible than Mr. Ferguson, if there is anything wrong in the Bill. In fact, I am willing to take upon myself the whole responsibility. I am more willing to be thought a fool than to have Mr. Ferguson thought to be a rogue. As a matter of fact, I pencilled the words which are said to have been put surreptitiously into the Bill, and I did it in good faith. It would have been impossible for me to have done it otherwise than in good faith. I was seeking to protect the city of Ottawa against the legislation aimed at it by the street railway company. The House would be surprised to know how many of these Acts there are that had to be taken into account. There are Acts of the old province of Canada, Acts of the province of Ontario, and two Dominion Acts, amending, consolidating, combining, and doing all sorts of things with these companies ; and it was impossible to be sure that we had named all the Acts that should be mentioned in the Bill. I did suggest, therefore, 'ex abundantia cautela,' that these words should be put in. It was my suggestion, I am bound to say, and not Mr. Ferguson's at all. If any mistake was made, it was my mistake. I really do not think any mistake was made ; because, under the principle under which these clauses should be read—and this was the opinion of Mr. Belcourt—they would be read to be restricted to the legislation which constituted the limitations upon the corporate capacity of the company, and would not be read in such a way as to nullify the conditions in the affirmative empowering Act passed by the Ontario legislature.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question—if he does not remember that the only thing to go in was the names of the Acts ?

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand that the substance of the direction was, to make the Bill accord with the intention of the committee ; and, if there were any Acts that we did not know, and could not name, it was intended to include these Acts. I do not vindicate the amendment ; I do not think it is perfect as it is, and I do not think it right to pass legislation about which there can be any doubts. Therefore, I gave notice of a motion to refer the Bill back to the committee, so that, if any doubt existed, as the solicitor of the city seemed to think, the committee would have an opportunity to remove the doubt ; and, if the committee will adopt the motion I have read, I am sure that absolute justice will be done in this matter to both the railway company and the city of Ottawa. The power conferred by the legislature of Ontario will be validly conferred, and anything in Dominion legislation which would interfere with the proper exercise of that power, will be swept away. Everybody will be satisfied ; peace will be restored to this unhappy city, I hope ; but it will, I fear, be found that the newspapers will give us less of what Horace Greeley used to call "mighty interesting reading."

Mr. FOSTER. And will the correspondence cease ?

Mr. RUSSELL. I fancy it will, though I think that is a little too much to ask. The hon. gentleman, if he stops the correspondence in the newspapers, will "eclipse the gaiety of nations." I fancy, that even the compositors must have caught the contagion of the excitement that has been passing over the city for the past day or two. I did not know, on reading the paper this evening, whether the type was upside down, or whether my hon. friend from Guysboro', who has been taking an interest in this question, had made a speech in Gaelic, which the journalist was trying to report.

I think that all that I need to say is, that I am absolutely certain—and it is due to him to say it—that Mr. Ferguson is not blameworthy in any respect in connection with this matter, because he made no suggestion at all. As for the learned member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), he was not anywhere near the Bill until the next day, so far as I know; I think he can successfully prove an alibi. I do not think the clerk is to blame, either. The clerk assumed, very naturally, when Mr. Ferguson and I were satisfied with the way the clause was drafted, that he had no responsibility for it. I am the culprit, and I am willing to take any punishment which this House may choose to inflict upon me—to come before the Bar of the House, if a member can be brought before the Bar, or, if His Honour the Speaker has a tower under his control, to go there as long as may be necessary.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I suggest that the hon. member be sent to the place where the hon. member for Ottawa sent the Mayor of Ottawa.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am willing to take my chances with the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) on that.

Mr. J. McMULLEN (North Wellington). One point was raised by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), which I think should not be passed over without notice. The hon. gentleman said that on several occasions Bills had been tampered with after they had been passed upon by the Railway Committee, and changes made. Now, I was exceedingly glad to hear the remarks which dropped from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) with regard to the clerk of the committee. I have sat in the Railway Committee for 16 or 17 years, and I think a more painstaking and careful officer there is not in this House. I am very glad to hear my hon. friend exonerate him as well as the others supposed to be connected with this matter. I hope that the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) did not intend to pass any reflection upon the clerk. I do not know what he meant when he said the Bills had been tampered with, but I believe everything that passes through the clerk's hands, in the discharge of his duty, is perfectly safe, and that he would scorn to lend himself to anything of the kind charged.

Mr. W. J. POUPORE (Pontiac). I would like to add a few words to what has been said, and my first must be to compliment my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) for having assumed responsibility for the error. I myself was at the committee, and I must say that I understood the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax to read just as it appeared in print, and, therefore, feel very much pleased to know that he assumes the responsibility, for there is no hon. gentleman in this House who would accuse him of having any sinister motive in altering the amendment. I am also glad to know that he removes any suspicion that might be cast on my friend Mr. Ferguson, because he is a gentleman whom no one acquainted with would ever charge with tampering with any Bill or doing anything dishonourable to the profession of which he is an ornament. I, therefore, take much pleasure in complimenting my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) on doing what I considered a manly thing in assuming the responsibility for the words inserted in that amendment. I do not think he did it with any other motive than to protect the interest of the parties concerned.

Mr. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) This portion of the Bill is cleared up, but it seems to me there are other clauses which require to be discussed.

Mr. BERGERON. The whole thing will go back to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. I allowed the discussion to go further than I otherwise would on account of the personal nature of the circumstances which made it desirable to clear them up, but I do not think it would be proper now to discuss the merits of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 47) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company—(Mr. Morrison.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 66) respecting the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company.—(Mr. McHugh.)

Bill (No. 67) respecting the Welland Power and Supply Canal Company (Limited).—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 73) respecting the James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Bill (No. 74) respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—(Mr. Beattie.)

Bill (No. 76) respecting the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

Bill (No. 77) respecting the Canadian Power Company, and to change its name to the Dominion Power Company of Niagara Falls.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 78) respecting the Hamilton Powder Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock, we were discussing the item of $2,500 for electoral lists. I see that this sum was voted last year. And this is the only amount I find except a small sum of $5,000 for elections. Now, reading the law, I see :

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, immediately upon receipt by him of any such certified copy of a list of voters, to cause it to be printed by the Queen's Printer, and he shall thereafter retain such certified copy of record in his office.

This is the duty imposed on the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery by the statute, and it seems to me that something should be put in the Estimates to meet the expenditure. For I take it that every member of this House has a right to have these lists. I have the right, under that law, to get these printed lists. I may have a great interest in knowing who are the electors in my county. So, this list is my property, and there is an obligation upon the Government to vote enough money to have these lists printed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). You are right.

Mr. BERGERON. Then will you explain ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The law goes on to say :

If, under the provincial law any changes in or additions to a list of voters have been made since the final revision, it shall be the duty of the official having a record of such changes and additions, upon the request of any person presenting for the purpose any such printed copy of the list and paying or tendering the sum of fifty cents, to make corresponding changes in and additions to such printed copy, and to certify under his hand as to the correctness of such changes and additions ; and such printed copy, with such changes and additions, and so certified, shall be deemed to be, for all purposes, an authentic copy of the list of voters as it exists and is in force at the time of such certification.

8. The Queen's Printer shall keep standing, in type, every list of voters so printed by him until he is furnished by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with duly certified copy of a later list for the same polling division, or a later list or later lists showing some change in the polling division, whereupon he shall correct such lists so that it shall correspond with such later lists, or shall make such other changes as are necessary, and he shall then keep such list so corrected, or any new resulting list or lists, standing in type until he has been furnished with a certified copy of a later list or lists affecting the same, &c., so that there shall always, so far as practicable, be kept standing in type a correct copy of every finally revised provincial list of voters.

And so on. There is a penalty imposed on the municipal officer of $1,000, if he does not send the lists immediately to the Queen's Printer. It seems to me that the same penalty should be imposed on the Government that does not print the lists. Section 14 says :

Forthwith after the receipt of the writ for Dominion election, the returning officer shall obtain from the officers who are the legal custodians thereof, or of duly certified duplicates, or copies thereof, such provincial voters' lists or such certified copies thereof, or extracts therefrom, and such certified copies of by-laws, orders, proclamations or other documents or proceedings defining the several provincial polling divisions situate either wholly or partially within the territory comprised in the electoral district for which such election is to be held.

So, for instance, if an election takes place during a session of the House, immediately on the writ issuing, there should be in the hands of the Queen's Printer or the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a printed list up to date, of the electors of the country in which the election is to be held. I think it is the general policy of the law—I do not think there can be any doubt of it—that as soon as the lists have been sent by the proper municipal officer, they shall be printed and the type left standing so that any correction which might be made by the municipal council shall be made in the record kept in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or the office of the Queen's Printer. As soon as an election is to be held, the candidate or anybody who is interested may get a copy of the list. Not only that, but I say that it is an obligation upon the Government to ask the House to vote a sufficient sum of money to have all lists printed, so that we may have them in our hands as soon as practicable, that is, as soon as they have been revised by the municipal officers. I would ask for a statement on the part of the Government as to whether it is the intention of the Government to have these lists printed, and for that purpose, to put a sum in the Supplementary Estimates ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) appears to have properly interpreted the law ; and I admit that unless it was the intention of the Government to call the attention of the House to the unnecessary character of the expense that would be caused by fulfilling literally a provision of the statute, he would be right in finding fault, because it is obvious that $2,500 would not print all the lists. Now, the Government assumed that the law would be carried out just as it was passed by the House. But, last December, the Auditor General called the attention of the Government—as I explained before the House rose at six o'clock—to the fact that the publication of these lists would entail an enormous, and, in his opinion, an altogether unjustifiable expense. He pointed out that there was no good reason for publishing and keeping in type year after year the lists for all the counties. But there was the statute in our faces. Still there was also the fact that, if the Auditor General was right, there would be some $60,000 or $70,000 virtually thrown away. If an election was caused in my riding, the proper list was there from which to publish the list of the electors and that could be done in a very few hours, just as it was done in the case of Brockville the other day. The only difficulty is that members will not have, as the law evidently contemplated that they should have, printed copies of the list as furnished by the clerks of the municipalities from the different ridings. I assume that the House must be satisfied either that the Government will bring down a sufficient sum to publish the lists or bring down an amendment to the Act. I called the attention of members of the Government to the representations made by the Auditor General as far back as December last, and they thought it was so important that we might bring it to the attention of the House and consider whether it was well to incur this expense of $60,000 or $70,000 for no real purpose, or whether it would be better to amend the Act and save the expense. That is the reason why only this sum is provided in these estimates, which is enough, in the opinion of the officers of the department to print the lists for the counties that may become vacant during the year by death or resignation.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). I desire to call attention to the great inconvenience that we in Manitoba suffer to-day in regard to these lists. A general revision has just been ordered by the local government in our province and members who have to depend on these lists for their future elections are without a list with which they can check the lists that are being prepared and thus see that they are properly made out. We have no foundation to go upon, for this is a new list altogether. The old lists that used to be in use for elections to this House are discarded, and the franchise is altogether different from that we have had hitherto. And, so, while this revision is taking place, the members from that province are without a single list that has existed in the past for local purposes, and, consequently, do not know whether the lists are being properly prepared or not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is that difficulty. The hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière) is perfectly right in saying that; and when the Government, as they must, I take it, under the circumstances, propose a measure to meet the difficulty, the question will be discussed. If the House determines that it is better to incur the expense of printing the lists, as is evidently intended by the statute, we shall have to bring down a sum to provide for the expenditure; but at the present time the Government do not bring down that, because they thought they would submit to the House the opinion of the Auditor General, which seems to me—I say it with deference—a common sense opinion. It would be utterly foolish to incur an expenditure of $60,000 or $70,000 unless an election was coming on. I do not say the law has not been correctly interpreted by my hon. friend, and if the Government were not coming to Parliament to meet the difficulty, his argument would be irresistible. But, if the House so decides, the Supplementary Estimates must contain a sum to enable the list to be printed as the present law provides.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. At the same time when the Government brings down their proposition, the list of Manitoba will be completed. This work is going on: the enumerators are preparing those lists, and we have nothing to supply our friends with up there. If this list had been printed during the past year, as the law provided, at least for the province of Manitoba, we should not find ourselves in this awkward position. If this had been prepared according to law, we would have them to-day. It is now already too late, and I regret to say so.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). I think the explanation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is an afterthought.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman tells me it is an afterthought. I do not think he is dealing fairly with me. I have the Auditor General's letter before me.

Mr. WALLACE. I say, I think it is an afterthought, for this reason, that last year, when the Act was passed and it was arranged that every voters' list in the country should be published, this $2,500 was voted. What was it voted for last year? For the purpose that the Minister now tells us? Not at all. In the Act that he himself took so much pains to have made into law, it was provided that all the lists were to be published immediately, as was pointed out by my hon. friend for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). The amount is put in this year for contingencies; it is not for printing the lists. The Minister now says it is for printing those lists where a by-election may be held. That was not the purpose of it last year, because it was contemplated then that every list would be printed. Did not the Act provide for that? Did not the Government mean what they said in that Act of Parliament? Then, it goes to December, and he says the Auditor General told him then that the printing of the lists would involve an enormous expenditure. Surely, they did not need to go to the Auditor General to ascertain that fact. They knew that the printing of the electoral lists for 213 districts would cost money, and they provided for it specifically in the Act of Parliament which they passed. They knew they were undertaking that expenditure. But they found towards the close of Parliament, when they were anxious to rush their business through, that they had not provided in their Estimates for the printing of those lists. It was their duty to carry out the law. An Act of Parliament is passed that the Auditor General's Report shall be laid on the Table six or seven days after meeting of Parliament. The Act of Parliament is disregarded. An Act was passed, last session, which says that these lists shall be printed immediately. Then they say they have considered the matter, and decided not to print them. That was decided last December. Not one word is said this session, though we are now in the seventh week—not one word was said until it was dragged out of them to-night in explanation. Now, I think the Government is bound to give us information as to how much of that $2,500 was expended, and what it was expended for. It is clear, that it was not contemplated, last year, that a dollar of that $2,500 should be appropriated for the purpose of preparing voters' lists in the by-elections. Let us hear whether it was expended for the purpose to which it was voted, and how much of it was expended. Before six o'clock there was not a member on this side of the House could get the slightest information with regard to it. Now they tell us it was for preparing lists for by-elections. But we do not know that; we do not know if it was legally applicable to the preparation of voters' lists for the by-elections. Now, Sir, we would like to hear from those gentlemen, what amount was expended of this vote last year. The year is nearly up. Expenditures have been made under that item, and we would like to have the details of those expenditures.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I cannot give the hon. gentleman the details, because the year is not up for which the sum is voted. The year is not up till July. We have gone through part of the year; we have prepared the Brockville election list. The hon. gentleman will understand, that this expenditure is in the Department of the Secretary of State, and I have not got the expenditure for the few months that have elapsed. The hon. gentleman knows that the Brockville election and the Huron election must have required a part of this expenditure, but I cannot tell him how much. The hon. gentleman seems to think that I was bringing up an argument here as an afterthought. I told him that I had in my hands the letter of the Auditor General, dated December 13th, 1898, calling the attention of the Government to the fact, that, if they carried out these sections of the Franchise Act, it would entail upon the country an unnecessary expenditure of $60,000 or $70,000. Well, the Government thought it was better not to incur that expense until they saw a necessity for it. They thought it was better to come down to Parliament, and take Parliament into their confidence, and ask Parliament whether it was necessary to throw away $60,000 or $70,000. If Parliament thinks it is necessary that the money should be spent, why then, it can vote the money.

Mr. BERGERON. I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question. At the beginning of the session, a question was asked about some correspondence which has taken place between this Government and the local governments concerning the franchise lists, and we were told that it was confidential. We saw correspondence that in New Brunswick they are going to pass a law by which the revising barrister, a provincial officer, may make a list upon which the Dominion elections will be held. It would be interesting if my hon. friend would tell us what he knows about it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I saw something in the papers about it, but I have not heard anything directly or personally from any members of the provincial legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not know how far they have gone with their measure yet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know that they have done anything. In one of the provincial newspapers which I have recently seen, it is stated that it is proposed by the provincial Government to appoint for the purpose, one of the revising officers who have the revision of the lists in each parish. There are three of these officers appointed by the county council. The county council names two members of the county council from the different parishes, and therefore they practically would be the revisers. Then a third one is appointed, outside the council, by the two county councillors, and these would be the revisers. The plan of the Government is to appoint the third reviser.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend knows all about it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do know all about it so far as I have read it in the newspapers. I know something about the provincial laws, and I gathered from the newspaper reports that this is the proposition. If I find that I am in error I will correct myself at the first opportunity. The proposition is not an alarming one, even to hon. gentlemen opposite, because it is only proposed that there should be one reviser named by the provincial government out of three. He will not be in the majority by any means; he will be in the minority, but he will see what is going on and will keep an eye, from the standpoint of the provincial government, upon the lists as revised. It is nothing more than a wise precaution, particularly as there seems to be a great deal more interest now taken in the revision of the lists than there has been in the past.

Mr. A. McNEILL (East Bruce). Can my hon. friend give us any information at all as to whether anything has been done in the way of carrying out the arrangement that judges should be appointed in those provinces where judges have not been appointed to revise the lists finally ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I never heard anything of that subject.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) refers to what has been explained by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. If I understood him well, in New Brunswick the position of the reviser selected by the councilmen has generally been that of a judge.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Never.

Mr. BERGERON. I understood that under the new method instead of asking the councillors to appoint a man he would be appointed by the government themselves.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No judge has ever been a reviser in the province of New Brunswick, as far as I know. It is entirely a municipal matter. There was provision for some sort of an appeal to the county court judge, but that was only an appeal ; he had nothing to do with the original revision. The original revision has been made, in times past, and up to the present moment, by the parish revisers. As I have said, they are councillors of the parish, for the time being, and, in addition, there is one outside person named by them. They are usually people resident in the parish and are not persons holding any official position, certainly no judge has ever discharged any such duties.

Mr. A. McNEILL. I may remind the hon. gentleman that this was a question discussed very much during the last session of Parliament. We have, in the province of Ontario, and in the province of Quebec, the right to go before a judge finally. If any man thinks his name has been improperly left off the list, or if it is found that any man's name has been improperly put on the list, there is the right to go before a competent and impartial tribunal of last resort to have the list finally settled, but, in some provinces, this right does not exist. In the province to which my hon. friend has been referring, New Brunswick, I think that right does not exist, and in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Manitoba the right does not exist. In regard to the provinces of Manitoba and Nova Scotia, Nova Scotia especially, there were cases brought before the notice of this House last session of the most enormous kinds of injustice to voters, just because there was no possibility of appealing to an impartial tribunal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This whole matter will be up when the Bill is brought down.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not desire to make a speech. I was just explaining what I was referring to a moment ago. I wanted to know whether anything has been done, as it was promised would be done, in regard to the matter. We understood that there was an undertaking that something would be done to induce the provinces to agree to the appointment of judges. I want to know if any steps have been taken with the view of bringing about that result.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Whatever it is necessary to state will be stated when the amendment is introduced to the Bill. It is quite evident, as the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has stated, that an amendment will have to be introduced to the Bill, and, when the amendment is introduced this session, the whole matter will come before the House. The right hon. Prime Minister is not here this evening. I am aware that he has addressed some correspondence to some of the provinces, but I do not know what it is.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Justice has stated, in another House, that there is no correspondence to his knowledge.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am afraid that I will have to take exception to the statement of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) that any case was brought before this House of gross and monstrous injustice under the laws of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McNEILL. I said it so appeared to us.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know as to how it appeared to the hon. gentleman, but I can assure my hon. friend that in the province of Nova Scotia no such impression as he has stated has ever existed. If any case has occurred of injustice under the Nova Scotia law, I am satisfied that it is a rare one, and that there is no such general feeling within the province as was expressed by one or two hon. gentlemen here.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) stated some cases of gross wrongs and iniquities last session.

Mr. McNEILL. And brought affidavits here to support his statements.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I observe that this statute was passed on the 13th of June, 1898, and I suppose the Government must have been aware at that time that it would cost something to print these lists. I do not quite understand under what authority the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery failed to print these lists. Perhaps the Minister of Marine would be good enough to inform the House whether it was by virtue of an Order in Council or by reason of some member of the Government telling him he need not comply with the terms of the statute ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I quite accepted the reason of the hon. gentleman from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain); the law seems to be plain, as he interprets it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is not the point. Here is a statute which says, under section 10, subsection 3, that it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, immediately upon the receipt by him of a certified copy of the list of voters, to cause it to be printed by the Queen's Printer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If you read that clause fifty times it will not make it any stronger.

Mr. BERGERON. It does not make the case of the Government any better.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The House would like to know whether or not any Order in Council has been passed discharging the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery from the duty imposed upon him by the statute. I do not understand that the Government has any such power by Order in Council.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We did not attempt to exercise it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not understand that any member of the Government has any right to interfere with the operation of this law. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in venturing to disobey that statute, whether by virtue of an Order in Council or by virtue of a suggestion from a member of the Government, is taking upon himself a very serious responsibility. The statute says it shall be his duty. Unless some question of executive power were raised—I do not say it might not be raised—legal proceedings might be taken to compel the printing of these lists, or for some remedy against that officer. I must confess that anything which has been said by the Minister of Marine, so far, does not seem to me to be very much of an excuse. The Government must have known on the 13th day of June, 1898, when this Act was passed, that the printing of these lists would involve expense. They knew that when they passed this statute. Their Solicitor General prepared it; it was gone over carefully, I suppose, by the Government before it was introduced, and every gentleman who heard this Bill discussed in the House assumed that its provisions would be carried out. It appears that this is the letter which caused the Government, or some member of the Government, to take upon himself the responsibility of ordering the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to deliberately disobey the provisions of this statute. What is this letter:

The printing of the voters' lists by the Queen's Printer will probably entail an expenditure of $60,000 per annum, if we have the right to assume that the cost will be about what it has been in the past for voters' lists. So far as I can see, the lists, when printed, will only be similar to those that are already printed for the provincial elections. It does seem that this is an entirely unnecessary expense, and, therefore, I feel justified in bringing it to the attention of the Government for the purpose of again considering the matter. If there is not already a sufficient number of lists printed by the local authorities, it would appear possible to make an arrangement with them for the striking off a sufficient number for Dominion purposes. I think the view of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is that this large expense can be saved.

Well, it would be an interesting thing for the Government to let us know what information they had as to the provinces in which these lists are printed, before they took the responsibility which they apparently have taken. I am informed by my friends from Quebec that the lists are not printed in that province.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Never.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Speaking from my own recollection, and under the correction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I do not think the lists are printed in Nova Scotia; they are simply written and posted up.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That is so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The gentlemen from Ontario seem to inform me that they are not regularly printed there.

Mr. McGREGOR. They are; here are lots of copies of them.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are only printed by each municipality.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Hon. gentlemen from Ontario can discuss that, but my recollection, which is corroborated by the Minister of Finance, is that they are not printed in Nova Scotia, so that apparently the Government have seen fit to dispense with this printing without obtaining information, which was within the knowledge of members of the Government, that there are no printed copies of these lists at all. What was urged by my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) is to the point, and it is this, that it is impossible to deal with these lists as we feel they should be dealt with unless you have printed copies for the purposes of revision. You have not these printed copies under the local law. This statute provided you should have them under a Dominion law, and the Government, without the slightest justification, as far as I can see, have impressed upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the idea that he has the right to deliberately disobey the provisions of this statute. I must confess that the Government are not in a very enviable position, so far as that is concerned. Parliament passed this law with the idea that it should be obeyed, not that the Government should set itself above it, and the Government, without taking the trouble to obtain the information, or possibly without caring whether they obtained it or not, have seen fit to leave matters in this condition, that members of Parliament, who under the law of this land are entitled to receive copies from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, cannot get them at all. Some further explanation, or some more definite statement of policy should be given by the Government before this item is allowed to pass.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to call the attention of the Government to this fact also. Suppose an election takes place now, and these lists are not printed beforehand, but, when the warrant issues, the Queen's Printer prints them and sends them to a constituency, and it is found out at the very last moment that they are not correct, and that there are a great many omissions, the Government must see in what position one of the parties in the election would be placed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. One party would be in the same position as the other.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That could not very well occur.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because the certified list is in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the list could be taken from that.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, but that should not be left in the hands of an officer who may make a mistake or do something worse.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see that is a fair matter for discussion, and I do not question his right to discuss it, when the Government bring down, as in deference to the views expressed to-night by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), they will bring down a Bill to amend the existing law, and do away with the necessity of the publication of these lists. The hon. gentleman can then argue, if he thinks proper, that it is better not to amend the law. You say that the poor Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is liable for not publishing the lists, but he had no money to publish them, Parliament did not vote the money. The Government may be remiss in not suggesting to Parliament a vote.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What about a Governor General's warrant?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If we did that my hon. friend would be the first to denounce us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But the statute says that the lists should be printed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is the poor Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to do? My hon.

friends opposite did not call attention to it in the House, the Government did not call attention to it and the money was not voted. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery might be immured in that prison to which my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) spoke of, but what was he to do? Any person who suffered personal injury, perhaps could sue him for breach of statutory duty, but joking apart, I have explained to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) that there was no money to publish the lists, and the Auditor General suggested it would be unnecessary expense, and the Government thought it would be better to come to Parliament and explain the situation frankly, and amend the Bill in that regard so as to save the $60,000 a year. It may be that Parliament will not think that this is a saving which should be made, and will not accept the Bill, so in that case a supplementary vote will be brought down and the lists published.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Last year this thing was fully discussed, and we were rather overjoyed to think that the Solicitor General was going to give us twenty printed copies of the lists, although believers in the old Franchise Act rather thought that the Government was rather overstepping the mark in making that promise. I am inclined to think that when the Government undertook to provide twenty copies each they rather underestimated the cost. I therefore would like to move that this item stand over until the Solicitor General is in his place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have no desire to press it at all.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Before the item stands or we get away from it, let me say that it is a strange thing which has happened in Parliament, and one of the strange points about it is the extreme levity with which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries treats the whole question. He treats it as of no consequence at all. I cannot see it in that light. I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) stated the matter very clearly. The whole question is this: Can the Government override the law? Can the Government raise themselves superior to a law which was passed by Parliament and which they have no discretion at all to do otherwise than obey.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We had no appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows, and he laughs himself the moment he says it, the absurdity of his contention. He cannot keep a straight face and make it. I wonder whether they had any appropriation when they spent $20,000 and more in running the Bale des Chaleurs Railway. Had they any appropriation from Parliament in that case? No, they had no authority, nothing ever occurred like it before, and I do hope that nothing will occur like it again. There was no question then as to whether they had an appropriation or not, they simply put their hands into the chest and spent the money without a vote of Parliament, and entirely in opposition to one of the first constitutional rules of Government. I wonder if my hon. friends, at another stage in the history of this country, felt the same compunction when they went in for Governor General warrants to the extent of nearly $2,000,000 to provide for services. Why? Because, they said, these services were necessary, because the law makes it compulsory, for instance, that justice shall be administered in the country. What right had anybody, they said, to ask whether there was an appropriation or not? Justice must be administered, the law says so, and, therefore, we will have a Governor General's warrant and see that justice is administered, and when Parliament meets we will ask Parliament to indemnify us. But what is the case in point? After a long discussion in 1885, the House passed a Dominion Franchise Bill, and that Franchise Bill remained in force until last year. Then after another long and thorough discussion, the Government's view as to the franchise law prevailed. It was discussed thoroughly in this House, every member in this House had his views, and if he wished to express them did so, and every clause of that law was a clause in the shape of a contract made here by the members of this Parliament, and after it was signed and sealed by the highest authority, became the law of the land. How does my hon. friend know that members on the Opposition side would have assented to the Bill, even if they had to stay here for six months or a year, unless it gave them the right to see the voters' lists—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). You did not use to have a list for four or five years.

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell my hon. friend what we never did. We never put a revision aside without first coming down and asking Parliament for authority to put it aside. Sir, these gentlemen were bound by the law to have the voters' lists printed and distributed to the members. They did not do it. There may be some differences in detail, but the case I am about to put is exactly on a par. Supposing the late Conservative Government, when they came to the point of revising the lists for a certain year, said: There is not going to be an election, we will not have them revised, there is no use spending $100,000, we will save the money, and the Auditor General will be very much pleased. We will not make the revision. These hon. gentlemen have done exactly the same thing, although it differs a little in detail. The law was authoritative, they were to do what the law told them. Why was it not done? If my hon. friend had admitted it was a matter which they had not thought of before, which had escaped their attention, then the Government might have been excused, but the matter was drawn to their attention, and they must have interfered. There must have been interference. I am here to state my belief that there was interference. I know the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, I believe that an officer in that position knows his duty, and cannot afford to do anything else. If he were to attempt to do anything else than what the law says, we could bring him to the bar of this House and find out very quickly why he did not carry out the law. I do not believe that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery refused to do his duty in the least degree. I believe he acted according to the law. I believe those lists, when they came in, were put where they should be in order to be printed, and that the Government itself or some member of the Government took the responsibility of stepping in and declaring they should not be printed. I think that that is a grave matter. It is not a thing to be laughed at. If the Government is not to assume legislative function, what right have they to say that this Parliament should not have the law carried out as Parliament has declared it should be carried out. What right have they to judge and decide that they will not carry it out; and then, if there is a row raised about it come down and propose an amendment to the law. So far as I am concerned, I do not want any amendment to that portion of the law. I want, in some way or other, to get an authoritative list of my electors. I do not want to have to go round to the cross-roads in New Brunswick and read the voters' lists in writing on the doors of stores and post offices. I do not want to wait until an election comes on, and then, just in the heat of an election, have the voters' lists sent me, while other parties have had these lists for any length of time. The thing is absurd and would be laughable if it were not so grave. But it is a grave matter, and so far as I am concerned, cannot be allowed to rest just as it is here. My hon. friend, by treating it in a light way, did not do himself justice and did not show the respect he must in his heart feel for what is the law. He surely cannot think that in these days of liberal government, the Executive is going to step in and say that the law shall not be carried out. I want to know who it was that prevented the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery carrying out the law. Some one did. The responsible Minister, I suppose, would be the Secretary of State (Mr. Scott). Did the Secretary of State step in and say that the law shall not be carried out? If he did, he did a thing which I do not believe any Minister in this country ever did before, and which I am sure no British Minister would do. Was there any excuse that they had not the money to print it? None. The money was at their beck and call. They had not money to make an investigation into a possible fraud in Manitoba because none at all had been voted. But they expended that money in the teeth of the law of the country. It was criminal justice and Manitoba should have footed the bills, but the First Minister, who was here when this discussion began, but did not consider it of sufficient importance to keep him in his seat or give the least attention to it—talking all around the back benches while we were discussing it—that First Minister did not think it was a matter of money when there was something possible in a party line to be traced in the province of Manitoba, and expended money for ferreting out a possible infraction of the law in Manitoba, but put his hand into the chest of the people which he had no right at all to do. Money could be got then, but could not be got when the will of the people, as expressed in its highest form, the law of the country, was to be carried out. We have a right to know if there is an Order in Council that prevented the officer carrying out the law or if any individual Minister stepped in between that officer and his duty. My impression is that the officer did his full duty. If he did not, we will now know how to deal with that officer; and the matter is in a position now where we must know whether that officer did, of his own free will, interpose and not carry out the law, or whether force majeure had something to do with the matter. My belief is that it is not the officer's fault, but that the Minister or the Government in one capacity or other absolutely set the law at defiance. Now, Sir, is there any party advantage to be got by this? Every party advantage is to be got by it; and hon. gentlemen on that side are getting it now in the province of Manitoba. They are getting it wherever revisions are or ought to be going on. And members of this House, each of whom has a constituency, to which he is responsible and by which he must be elected, have not the least knowledge of what that constituency is, and cannot get that knowledge. But that knowledge can be got in the same way as the Minister of Agriculture got knowledge—when he went into the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery's office and took the returns that were there to use them to buttress his argument in this House. I believe that if an election came off in Huron, the Minister could run into the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and get the lists, or somebody could get them and send them up to the Grit committee in Huron. I think the thing is perfectly monstrous and outrageous. I have not the least compunction in expressing that opinion. I say this can be used as a party engine by a Government which can oust their opponents, whenever the Government wish to descend to that kind of work, and, for my part, I have not such a good opinion of the Government as to be certain that if advantage of that kind can be gained they would not receive the benefit of it. The only safety we have is to have the lists. I ought to have the list for my county now, and so ought every other member. And why have not we them? Because the Secretary of State, I suppose, stepped in and said that the law should not be carried out. Who is the Secretary of State that he should step in between my rights and the man who is endeavouring to carry out the law so as to give me those rights? I think the thing is perfectly preposterous.

Mr. MONK. I desire to ask a question. Under section 10 of the Act, the depository of the list is bound to send a copy to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery as soon as the list is completed, under certain penalties provided under subsection 9. Have these formalities been fulfilled?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I believe a question was put recently in the House to the same effect, and it was stated in reply that this had been done in some cases, and in a number of other cases, the lists had not been sent in. I speak from recollection of what had occurred in the House.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). That simply means that the law has not been carried out. We might ask, if the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has done nothing to have the lists sent to him, whether he has been instructed to do so or not to do so. Hon. gentlemen will see now that it is evident the law has not been carried out at all. Now, I would like to remind my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that there was an object in view in providing that twenty copies of the list should go to every member of Parliament. I am sorry the Solicitor General is not here, because I am sure that he would second what I am going to say. There is in the law as it is to-day, an omission which is most serious. There is nothing to force the registrar in Quebec—I know more about Quebec than I do of the other provinces—to give the lists to the returning officers. Let us say that an election is to take place in Quebec. The Speaker issues his warrant, the Government appoints a returning officer, and that returning officer goes to the registrar and says: I want a copy of the voters' list. If the registrar refuses to give it, there is no law to force him.

An hon. MEMBER. I think there is.

Mr. BERGERON. No, the Government here cannot do it; it can only be done by the local government of which the registrar is an officer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is he not made liable to a penalty?

Mr. BERGERON. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think he is.

Mr. BERGERON. No. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) will consult with the Solicitor General he will find that he is mistaken. The Solicitor General admitted this to me. And if I remember well, the object of having twenty copies was to govern that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the registrar did not send in the list to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery could not supply a copy.

Mr. BERGERON. But he should send them in.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) is speaking of cases where that has not been done.

Mr. BERGERON. No, I am speaking of cases where there is an election and where the returning officer could not get the lists for the election.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). But if they were sent here—

Mr. BERGERON. But my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) has just heard it said, that, in most cases, they have not been sent here. I believe it is no use to detain the committee any longer. I think we have shown reasons why this law should be amended as soon as possible.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Oh, no; not amended.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, then, it should be put in force, if nothing else. I wish to ask, before I take my seat, what this $2,500 is for?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I explained a little while ago that, in case an election takes place, as in the city of Winnipeg, where the lists are more than a year old and a revision has to take place, this money will be used to defray that expense.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend does not seem sure of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I am sure of it as I can be of anything.

Mr. FOSTER. I can tell the hon. Minister that it is not to be used for that kind of thing at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows better than I do—

Mr. FOSTER. This vote has had in the past and has now nothing more to do with the election in Winnipeg or the providing of voters' lists under this Act than any other vote—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not speak of printing the voters' lists, but I said proceedings incidental—

Mr. FOSTER. Or with proceedings incidental. This is what the vote is for. There is a clerk in the printing and stationery department who gets $1,100 a year, who is in charge of the franchise arrangements. He is paid out of this, and the rest is for contingencies which arise. Now, if a by-election comes up, under the old law, for instance, and some copies of the electoral lists were needed, then this money would be taken to pay for 100 copies of the electoral list to be sent down to the voting county. Here is a statement of expenses. There was the salary of this gentleman, $1,100; 100 electoral atlases; the voters' list of Drummond and Arthabaska, 50 copies sent down; West Prince, 25 copies; Smith Premier typewriters, $102, and so on—stationery and office supplies. Against that account go any sale of voters' lists, &c., and so $1,000 odd was expended. That is what that general vote has been for. But when the new franchise Bill was passed provision was made for printing the voters' lists in the Act itself, and the Government should have seen that a proper appropriation was made; if it was not made and was not foreseen, it was a fair matter for a Governor General's warrant.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Nobody can contend that the expenditure which took place last year was not legitimate. The hon. gentleman, I understood, asked me, whether it would be applied to other purposes than paying the salary of this officer and the few dollars which were added to it. I am of the opinion that it would come legitimately within the purview of this vote to expend it for preparing the voters' lists in the city of Winnipeg, as contingent expenses in connection with the voters' list. If the hon. gentleman wants the matter to stand over, we can let it stand over.

Mr. BRITTON. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) was mistaken in thinking that there is no penalty.

Mr. BERGERON. Penalty for what?

Mr. BRITTON. The question was asked, whether the custodians of the list for the purpose of provincial elections were made officers of this Dominion, and whether they had done their duty and transmitted these lists to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. I do not know that the question was answered, but in discussion later on the member for Beauharnois said that there was no penalty.

Mr. BERGERON. No.

Mr. QUINN. It was for not handing the lists to the returning officer appointed by this Parliament.

Mr. BRITTON. No, for not forwarding the lists.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The question was this: Supposing the registrar, as in our province, has not sent it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. An election comes on, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery cannot give the list, as provided by law, so nobody can have it. Supposing the returning officer goes to the registrar, and says: I want the list, and he says: I won't give it to you. There is no penalty for his refusal in that case.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us repeatedly, that this was a sum set apart.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say it was set apart for any purpose; I said it was capable of being used for purposes such as the Winnipeg election.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). We find that this money has been paid for an entirely different purpose than it was moved for; nearly one-half of it goes to pay the salary of one official, $1,100; part of it goes for the payment of a typewriter, for clerical assistance in a certain department, but not at all for the purpose of printing the lists. When we asked the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to tell us what he had done with that money during the ten months of the year that had already elapsed, he could not tell us in what way a single dollar was expended, or he would not tell us, until the information came from this side of the House. They say this is to provide the voters' lists. Take the case of Brockville. A vacancy occurred on the 15th of March; the nomination was hurried along very rapidly and took place on the 13th of April, and the election on the 20th of April. The Conservative candidate and his friends could not get a copy of that voters' list until after nomination day. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries smiles—he thinks that is a great joke.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the return from Brockville was rather a joke.

Mr. WALLACE. If a few more shining lights of the Liberal party were where they ought to be, in the Brockville jail, it would not then be so much of a joke for them. After that nomination was over, our friends found it impossible to get a single copy of the voters' list. I say, it is an outrage. They applied for them here, and could not get them; but the friends of the Government had any quantity of them. The evil that was foreseen, actually took place. I think this item had better stand until the Government ascertains definitely what has been done with the appropriation for the past year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has offered to let it stand, half an hour ago, but the hon. gentleman continues to argue and asks us to let it stand.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Anne's, Montreal). There are one or two things we would like to know, when the matter comes up for discussion the next time. I would ask the Minister to lay before the committee a list of the different lists which have been printed within the last twelve months. I attended a good deal to the revision of the lists in the city of Montreal and neighbourhood, and I noticed a remarkable familiarity with the lists by the gentlemen who were opposed to us, whereas we could not possibly have any knowledge of what names were to go on the list. We have not been provided with our lists, but our opponents all had them; they knew all about it. I would like to know what part of this sum of $2,500 has been used for the purpose of printing these lists in my province. This Act was passed in June, 1898. It was intended that the list should be published certainly in time for the revision which took place between the 1st of January and the 1st of April in the province of Quebec. Yet every member on this side of the House from Quebec, who was entitled to twenty lists for his own county, was at the mercy of his opponents in the revision of this list. I have no doubt that, so far as the city of Montreal is concerned, the lists are properly stuffed by our opponents, taking advantage of the position in which they are placed by the Government. I would ask them to have a complete list made out of the county lists which have been supplied by the Government since this Act came into force, with the name of each county, and the name of the individual to whom the list has been sent.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) We would also like a list of the districts and counties in respect to which copies of the lists have not been received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. SPROULE. I was rather amused at the explanation given by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that there was no obligation imposed on the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to print the lists or upon members of the Government to print them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I made no such statements at all. I acceded to the proposition advanced by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). I said that I had no exception to take to his interpretation of the law whatever.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said that in the early part of the evening, and I appeal to my hon. friend the hon. member for Montmorency if I did not say so.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes; that is so.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I would like to know why the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery did not do his duty. I think the very natural inference might be drawn from what the hon. Minister said that it was not contemplated that the Franchise Act required that the lists would be finally revised every year or printed every year. The law says that :

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, immediately upon receipt by him of any such certified copy of the list of voters, to cause it to be printed by the Queen's Printer, and he shall thereafter retain such certified copy of record in his office.

Immediately after printing such lists the Queen's Printer shall send, by registered mail, twenty copies thereof to the sitting member for the electoral district to which the list belongs.

This I give, as evidence that it was contemplated that the list was always to be printed. I read this for the purpose of showing what, in my judgment, was the intention of the Act, that every last revised list should be printed. The Act says :

The Queen's Printer shall keep standing, in type, every list of voters so printed by him until he is furnished by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with a duly certified copy of a later list for the same polling division, or of a later list or later lists showing some change in the polling division, whereupon he shall correct such list so that it shall correspond with such later list, or shall make such other changes as are necessary, and he shall then keep such list so corrected, or any new resulting list or lists standing in type until he has been furnished with a certified copy of a later list or lists affecting the same,—

And so on :

—so that there shall always, so far as practicable, be kept standing in type a correct copy of every finally revised provincial list of voters.

If I correctly interpret that law, it contemplates that every finally revised provincial voters' list shall be printed by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and kept standing in type so as to be available at any time, if needed, before the next list is revised, and when it is printed, he must supply twenty copies to the sitting member. I do not think there is anything left to the option of any member of Parliament, or, any Minister of the Crown, or the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, at all. I do not think that they have any right or jurisdiction to say that there is no necessity for printing that list or sending twenty copies to every member after it is printed. I want to say one word in regard to something that was said by my hon. friend down here, that there is no punishment for it. As I understand the law there is a punishment for such neglect. The law says :

Every officer or person who, under the provincial law, is the custodian of any list of voters, or has the official record of any change in or additions to any such list since last final revision thereof, and who refuses or omits to perform any duty imposed upon him by this section, is guilty of an indictable offence, and for each such refusal or omission shall incur a penalty of not more than one thousand dollars and not less than one hundred dollars.

I think that it will be held by those who have given attention to the subject that we can impose a duty on any subject in the country, it does not matter whether he is a provincial officer or not. He is a subject under the control of this House, and if he does not do the duty imposed upon him, he is punishable by the authority of the law passed by this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). A statement was made a while ago, by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) which, if I understood it, involved a very grave reflection upon either the Department of the Secretary of State or the Government in regard to the distribution of the printed list for the Brockville election. If the hon. gentleman meant by that statement to imply or to charge that the Government had treated one party in that election any differently from the other, I have the authority from the Secretary of State to give to such a statement an unqualified contradiction. He authorized me to say, and he says his statement will be confirmed by the Queen's Printer, that on the same day and by the same mail, an equal number of printed lists were sent to both parties.

Mr. WALLACE. What date was that ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That was on the first day on which they were able to get out the lists.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the date ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know. It is not germane to the question.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it is.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is not germane to the imputation which the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) cast upon the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. The Secretary of State might be asked the date.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the date can be ascertained. I asked him : "Were they both sent at the same time ?" and he said they were sent to both parties by the same mail, that the same number of printed lists were sent, and that there was no distinction made between one party and another. I hope that no Government, Liberal or Conservative, will ever be guilty of, or will countenance, treating one party differently from another in respect to the voters' lists.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals says that he hopes no Government will ever do such a thing. We will leave the facts to speak for themselves. I would like to know from the Minister when these voters' lists were sent. My information is that the Conservative party could not get theirs until after the nomination, and I say that, if this is the case, the Government, in forcing on the election before they had the voters' lists ready are still more culpable.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is shifting his ground.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not shifting my ground. I am saying that this discloses a still worse state of affairs than what I have pointed out. My information is, they could not get a copy of the voters' lists until after nomination day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says he does not know. The hon. Minister got up to give his explanation, a very important explanation. The essence of the whole thing is as to when these voters' lists were distributed. He says they were sent by the same mail. I would like to ask him were there any copies sent to any parties working in the Liberal interest before nomination day. I have no hesitation in saying that there were, and that the Conservative party could not get theirs until afterwards. It may be, and probably was the case, that a batch was sent down by the same mail to each party on the same day, but the Liberals got their copies before that day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, Sir, they got no copies before the Conservatives got their copies. If they did not get them at the same time there was some fault of either party in not getting them in the mail.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quite satisfied that other copies were obtained before that. If that be so, what can we think of a Government precipitating an election in a constituency and issuing the writ when the voters' lists were not ready? The vacancy was created on the 15th of March, and the nomination took place on the 13th of April, four weeks and one day after the vacancy was created. The Government had this four weeks and one day. They say that they could prepare a list in two hours. Well, then, if they could prepare a list in two hours, it was their solemn duty to have prepared the list for this constituency and in not doing so they were guilty of neglecting their duty. On the shortest possible notice they issued the writs and pushed their election on before they themselves were ready. Did they purposely, for these four weeks, prevent the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or the Queen's Printer from doing that two hours' work which was necessary to let the people know who were entitled to vote in Brockville. Suppose that in a general election we did not receive our lists until after the day of nomination, what a state of affairs that would be. Would the Minister of Railways justify such a course as that? He cannot now justify the fact that these lists did not reach Brockville until after the nomination.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not acknowledge anything of the kind, because I do not know.

Mr. WALLACE. The House is bound to have the information as to when these lists were sent, and the admission as to the condition of affairs, which has been dragged out of the Government to-night, is a disgrace. We are not able to tell you who gave the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery authority to disobey the law, or whether he or the Queen's Printer, or the Secretary of State, or the whole Government are responsible. We must know it and the way to know it is to bring the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before this House. The Minister of Marine as usual gives that vacant laugh as an answer, but that will not be accepted by the people. This is the most extraordinary state of affairs that has ever been disclosed, because it interferes with the freedom of the electors in the discharge of their franchise, and is one of the most dangerous things that a Government can do. All the explanation we get is a laugh or a sneer from the Minister of Marine. Well, that won't do.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the Minister of Marine to say in reply to the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace), that the voters' lists for Brockville went by mail at the same time to both candidates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. And he announced that on the authority of the Secretary of State.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I had it from him.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, Sir, both the Secretary of State and the Minister of Railways made a statement that is not in accordance with the facts. I made application to the Queen's Printer for the voters' lists for Brockville, and he told me that the representative of the late Mr. Wood was not entitled to receive any. I wanted to purchase them, and a few days afterwards he called me up on the telephone and he told me that the Hon. Peter White was then a candidate in the field and he was entitled to twenty copies. He asked what he would do with them, and I said, send them up to me, and I will send a messenger to Brockville with them. They came to me, and I gave them to Mr. Broder, M.P., and sent him by train to Brockville with the lists. Now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) makes the statement here, that they were sent out by mail to both candidates at the same time. That is the sort of stuff we get from Ministers in this House, published as gospel to the people of this country, when we know it is not a fact and when they ought know it is not a fact. Later on, just a day or two before fact. Later on, just a day or two before and I got for the Hon. Peter White the revised lists for Brockville and sent them up to him. That is the way we were treated in the Brockville election. I do not know what mail Mr. Comstock got his voters' list by.

Mr. BERGERON. Blackmail.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, there was blackmail, too. Here I have the lists of my county published in June, 1898, and although the law makes it imperative upon this Government to print them immediately, they are not printed yet, and I have to depend upon the municipal lists to find out who the electors of my county are. This is a nice state of things. The Government passes an Act of Parliament making it compulsory on one of their officials to do a certain thing, and either the Secretary of State, or a member of the Government goes to this official and tells him to violate the law. If a man is drunk and infringes the law he is punished, but the Government can break the law whenever they like. This Government will pass a law to say that you must keep sacred the Sabbath day, but they hie themselves to New York and hold a conference on the Sabbath with reference to the negotiations at Washington. They pay no respect to the Sabbath day or to the law or anything else. They come to this House and they tell us that they mailed the voters' lists to both candidates in Brockville on the same day, when we know that is not the case, for I sent a special messenger to Mr. White with them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How many days before the nomination?

Mr. TAYLOR. After he was in the field as a candidate. They would not give them to the Hon. Mr. White, until he was a candidate, for they said he was not entitled to them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How many days before the nomination?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not remember, but Mr. Broder can tell the date. It was after Mr. White was in the field as a candidate, and after the nomination, I think. They told us that Mr. Wood was dead, that there was no defeated candidate who was entitled to them, and until Mr. White was regularly in the field they would not give the lists. They were not sent through the mail, but they were sent by me through a special messenger.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). This is a grave matter, and the Minister of Marine has not done himself justice in treating it so lightly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not treating it lightly. I consented an hour ago to let this vote stand, and now I see a determined attempt made not to let it stand.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. CLANCY. I can quite understand why the Minister may want it to stand, because it is an unpleasant matter for him. We have here the statement of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) that these lists were not given to the Conservative candidate in Brockville until after nomination day, for it was not known until then that he would be a candidate.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Secretary of State says they were sent to both candidates at the same time.

Mr. CLANCY. There is no doubt he makes a mistake about that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He says further that the Queen's Printer, Mr. Dawson, will corroborate his statement.

Mr. CLANCY. The Government have no right to do such a thing as they have done. If they continue that sort of thing they can take the electors by surprise at any time and prevent a fair expression of opinion. The people of Ontario have taken some care to look after the lists from year to year, and they did it in good faith that the list would be printed, but we are now absolutely without any published lists, and why? Because the Government has set the law at defiance. I hope this item will not be permitted to pass until we are told who prevented the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery obeying the law. We all know how bitterly the hon. Minister himself declaimed against the late Conservative Government for asking the authority of the House to dispense with the revision of the lists. But that Government took the constitutional means of dispensing with the revision and the people knew just what to do. This Government, however, after putting through Parliament a new franchise Act, substituting a new franchise for the old one in order to get clear of the expense, found themselves confronted with the consequences of their law, and what then did they do? They simply violated it and try to fasten the responsibility on the Auditor General. I venture to say that the Auditor General never went to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, but to one of the Ministers, perhaps more than one, and there must have been some communication between them and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in order to have the law set at naught. The people of this country want the law enforced, and will not be content to wait until these hon. gentlemen may bring in some Act to get them out of the difficulty. The revisions of the lists that have taken place this year, at the expense of the candidates, are absolutely worthless: and if these hon. gentlemen are to be permitted to do as they have done, all they need do is to bring on an election and place those printed lists in the hands of candidates only after the nominations have taken place. It is an unfair advantage which they are taking. They have been guilty of bad faith and deception, because the whole electorate believe that the lists were being printed and that we would have official lists whenever required. I hope the House will insist that we should know at whose instance the law was disobeyed before we go on with these estimates.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). There are one or two other features that deserve the consideration of the House. In the province of Ontario we have the municipal voters' lists, which are printed, and when we have a revision of these lists before the county judges. Take the west riding of York. There we revise the lists of every municipality. In the municipality where I live, the Liberals added some 25 or 30 names to the municipal lists and we put on 75 or 80. The lists were under the control of the Grit assessors there, and I do think they did their duty very well. In the township of York and other municipalities the same thing occurred. We added hundreds of names to the lists, but those names are not printed to-day. They were taken down by the county court judge and handed in some where, and we are unable to see the list of voters as it should be. We have the municipal list printed, but it is very imperfect, because many names were struck off before the county court judge in revision and others added. We want that revised list printed. We want to know who the voters of York are, because the law provides that we shall be furnished with copies of these lists. But what does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries coolly propose? He proposes to bring in an amendment to that Act, providing that it will not be necessary to print these lists at all. Why, one of the strongest fights we had last session was that these lists should be printed so that we might know who are the voters in our various constituencies, and to prevent any possible change, as there might easily be, in the written lists. Every precaution should be taken to insure the sacredness of the revised voters' lists; and yet we are told to-night by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that after we have secured the right of having the voters' lists printed in their entirety, the Government are going to bring in a Bill to do away with that safeguard, and thus prevent a voter knowing whether his name is on the lists it is entitled to be on. For my part I must enter my strongest protest against any such legislation. One of the things that reconciled us to the new franchise Bill, with all its iniquities, was the fact that we would have a decent revision, and that after the revision the lists would be printed, so that we would be in the position of knowing who were the voters in each electoral district. But now it is proposed to do away with this provision of the law. I can tell hon. gentlemen they will find a good deal of difficulty in getting rid of it.

The committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 1st May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 98) respecting the Cobourg and Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Guillet.)

Bill (No. 99) to incorporate the Canadian Mutual Benefit Advertising Company (Limited).—(Mr. McAlister.)

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I shall now give to the House the information asked for on Friday last by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) with reference to the business of the House, that is to say, in so far as Government business is concerned. To-morrow my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), will deliver the Budget speech, and after the debate on that speech has been exhausted, the Government will proceed with the two resolutions on the Order paper, namely, the Pacific Cable and the Drummond County Railway purchase. The measures still remaining to be introduced are, first of all, the Senate resolutions, of which the House has already had notice, and then the Redistribution Bill and also certain resolutions in aid of railways and Supplementary Estimates. In addition to these, there may be one or two other matters of minor importance, but still of some moment, which may be introduced. All these measures I have announced, and even those I have not announced, will be introduced before the business now before the House has been completed.

THE OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). With regard to what took place on Friday night relative to the Ottawa Electric Railway Company and the changes which were found in the Bill, after it had been reported by the committee, in justice to Mr. Ferguson, the solicitor for the company, and also to myself, I deem it but right to say, after the explanation of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that I certainly exonerate Mr. Ferguson from any blame in connection with the changes in that Bill. I intended to say this before the debate closed, but was called out of the House, and before I returned the matter was disposed of, and I now take the first opportunity of doing so.

LOBSTER COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. G. V. McINERNEY (Kent, N.B.) Is it the intention of the Government to bring into operation the suggestions or recommendations in the report of the Lobster Commission with regard to changing the seasons in the different divisions along the coast?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The report, as I said Friday last, was only just then submitted to me, and I had not the opportunity of reading it. I have read it since, but before taking any action, it will be necessary for me to submit it to my colleagues and have their decision as to what action we should take on the recommendations of the commissioners.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it is very important that this should be made known at a very early day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I fully appreciate that. Not a moment is being lost. The report is being drafted and will be distributed amongst the members at once. Of course, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) sees that before I could venture to bring into operation any of the recommendations they have made, I must consult with my colleagues.

Mr. McINERNEY. Of course the hon. Minister remembers a conversation I had with him on Friday, in the course of which he told me that he thought he would be in a position on Saturday, or on Monday at the latest—in view of a telegram of some importance which I showed him—to give me an answer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is quite right; and had it not been for the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is so much engaged just now in a matter which will require his attention to-morrow, I would probably have been able to have given an answer to-day. But I would like to consult with him and some other representatives of the maritime provinces—

Mr. McINERNEY. Can the hon. gentleman give me a day when he will probably be able to give me an answer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot fix a positive date; but the answer will be given within a very short time.

Mr. SPROULE.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House, and of those whom it may concern, to the fact that to-morrow morning we are called to attend meetings of the principal committees at the same hour of the day. One of these is the Railway Committee, composed of 172 members, and the other the Committee on Agriculture, composed of 108 members. As quite a number of members of this House are members of both committees, and as important business will come before each committee, I think there should be an understanding between the respective chairmen of these committees, so as not to call their meetings for the same day and the same hour. I think we have enough days in the week so that it can be arranged that members shall be able to attend to their duties on both these committees. These committees have the largest membership of any of the Standing Committees, and the business transacted by each is very important. It should be arranged so that the business we have to attend to shall not clash.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 25) to confirm an agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Hull Electric Company.—(Mr. Poupore.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Canada Permanent and Western Canada Mortgage Corporation.—(Mr. Osler.)

Bill (No. 89) relating to the Canada Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Wood.)

BATISCAN POST OFFICE.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked :

1. Whether the hon. First Minister did, on 28th January, 1897, indite a letter to Madame J. E. de la Bissonnière, of the parish of Batiscan, county of Champlain, promising to pay close attention to the case of her husband the postmaster of Batiscan, in relation to whom a departmental inquiry was then being held? Did he promise that "nothing will be done against the said postmaster, if the charges laid against him are not proved"?

2. Did Hon. W. Mulock write, on 26th July, 1897, to Hon. M. Dechene, Minister of Agriculture, Quebec, inclosing the report of M. Lavergne, the commissioner appointed to inquire into the case of the postmaster of Batiscan, and containing, in particular, the following words:—"I send you herewith a copy of the report of M. Lavergne, commissioner, to whom was referred the charge laid against the postmaster (the present postmaster of Batiscan), and you will, I think, admit with me that the report furnishes no grounds to justify the dismissal of the postmaster. It is neither asserted nor proved that he canvassed or worked at public meetings. The postmaster says that he did not even vote at the last election, and took no part in the political struggle. Under these circumstances, I see no reason for dismissing the present postmaster" ?

3. Did Hon. Mr. Mulock, through his secretary, Mr. W. D. LeSueur, on 15th August, 1898, address to M. de la Bissonnière, postmaster of Batis-can, a letter saying ; " In reply to yours of 9th instant, I am instructed to tell you that the Postmaster General having been informed that you did not observe proper neutrality during the election time, deems it advisable to appoint a successor in your position " ?

4. Is there not an absolute contradiction between the two assertions, and is the First Minister prepared to keep the promise 'he made to Mde. de la Bissonnière, and to reinstate her husband in the position taken from him under the circumstances above set forth ?

Mr. SPEAKER. My recollection is that the first part of this question was answered the other day.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Yes. The answer to the remaining questions are as follows : 2. The Postmaster General wrote a letter bearing date 20th July, 1897, to the Hon. Mr. Dechêne, the same being a private communication. If the words set forth in the question are suggested as being an exact copy of the letter in question, such an inference would be incorrect. 3. The quotation is a fair translation of a letter sent by the secretary of the department to the postmaster.

PAYMENTS TO R. J. McLAUGHLIN AND TO McLAUGHLIN & McDAIRMAID.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. What sums have been paid to one R. J. McLaughlin, and to the firm McLaughlin & McDairmaid, of Lindsay, since July, 1896 ?

2. What sums are yet due the said person or persons ?

3. For what services were such sums paid ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The following sums have been paid : 1898, July 3rd, $20.70 ; October 22nd, $45.95 ; October 27th, $18 ; total, $84.65. 2. The Department of Justice has written Mr. McLaughlin asking if any further sums are due him, but no reply has yet been received. 3. The sums paid were in connection with the acquisition of lands for the Trent Canal.

COST OF PLEBISCITE—POLLS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. How many votes were polled at the taking of the prohibitory plebiscite at the following polling places respectively in British Columbia, viz. : Dease Lake, Lake Bennett, Hazleton, Telegraph Creek, Lorne Creek and Cortez Island ?

2. What was the total cost of obtaining the votes at each of the above polling places ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend will find the information he wants if he looks at the returns which were brought down a few days ago. 2. The total cost of obtaining the votes at the different polling places mentioned is as follows :—Cortez Island, $22.50 ; Lorne Creek and Hazleton, $151 ; Telegraph Creek, $11.60 ; Dease Lake, $55.50 ; Lake Bennett, $293 ; total, $533.60.

THE BROCKVILLE ELECTION.

Mr. BRODER asked :

Who was the deputy returning officer appointed for subdivision No. 2 in the Centre ward of Brockville, in the by-election held on the 20th instant ? Is he an employee of Mr. Comstock, one of the candidates, and was he such employee when appointed ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is impossible to give my hon. friend the information which he asks for to-day. The return of the returning officer has not yet been received.

OFFICIAL POSITION OF W. H. P. CLEMENT.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) (by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

1. Is Mr. W. H. P. Clement under any restrictions or instructions imposed or given by the Government or by the Department of the Interior with respect to his right to practice as a barrister or solicitor in the Yukon territory or district ? If so, what are such restrictions or instructions ?

2. Is the Government aware whether Mr. Clement is engaged in the practice of his profession as a barrister or solicitor in the Yukon territory or district outside of and in addition to his duties as official legal adviser of the administrator or of the council, or of any of the officials of the Government in the Yukon territory of district ?

3. Has the Government any information as to whether Mr. Clement or his professional partners accept retainers from clients who have business which in the ordinary sense may come before the council, of which Mr. Clement is not only a member but also the legal adviser ?

4. Does the Government consider that it is proper for Mr. Clement or his professional partners to accept retainers or business from clients in respect to matters which in the ordinary course may come before the council for adjudication or administrative action ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Yes, Mr. Clement is not permitted to practice before the Gold Commissioner, or to act professionally in regard to mining titles. 2. Yes. 3. No. 4. The Government will require a more definite statement of facts than is contained in the question before expressing an opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER. In regard to this question, the House will perhaps permit me to suggest that the manner of putting this question is worthy of imitation. Question No. 2 asks : " Is the Government aware whether Mr. Clement is engaged," &c., instead of being put, as some questions are : Is the Government aware that Mr. Clement is engaged, &c. Now, when questions include a positive statement as of something that is a fact, they are not likely to be answered by the Government as readily or as pleasantly as if they were put in the way that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) has put questions Nos. 2 and 3. That hon. gentleman is not present at the moment, therefore, I do not hesitate to praise the form of the question.

LEGISLATION IN REGARD TO LOTTERIES.

Mr. MONK (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Is the Government aware of the existence in the city of Montreal of a number of lotteries under the guise and pretense of associations for the promotion of art ?

2. Is the Government aware that these societies claim that they are exempt from the operation of the general law prohibiting lotteries and gaming houses by section 205 of the Criminal Code, which states : "That every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding $2,000 who : (a) Makes, prints, advertises or publishes, or causes or procures to be made, printed, advertised or published, any proposal, scheme or plan, for advancing, lending, giving, selling or in any way disposing of any property by lots, cards, tickets, or any mode of chance whatsoever ; or (b) sells, barter, exchanges or otherwise disposes of, or causes or procures, or aids or assists in the sale, barter, exchange of any lot, card, ticket or other means or device for advancing, lending, giving, selling or otherwise disposing of any property by lot, ticket or any mode of chance whatsoever" ?

3. Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty of $20 who buys, takes, or receives any such lot, ticket, or other device as aforesaid.

4. Every sale, loan or gift, barter or exchange of any property by lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance, depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void and all such property so sold, lent, given, bartered or exchanged, is liable to be forfeited to any person who sues for the same by action or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

5. No such forfeiture shall affect the right or title to such property acquired by any bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.

6. This section includes the printing or publishing, or causing to be printed or published, of any advertisement, scheme or proposal or plan of any foreign lottery, and the sale or offer for sale of any ticket, chance or share in any such lottery or the advertisement for sale, chance or share.

7. This section does not apply to :

(a) The division by lot or chance of any property by joint tenants or tenants in common or persons having joint interests (droits indivis) in such property, or

(b) Raffles for prizes of small value at any bazaar held for any charitable object if permission to hold the same has been obtained from the city or other municipal council or from the mayor, reeve or other chief officer of the city, town or other municipality wherein such bazaar is held, and the articles raffled for thereat have first been offered for sale and none of them are of a value exceeding $50 ; or

(c) Any distribution by lot among the members or ticket-holders of any incorporated society established for the encouragement of art, of any paintings, drawings or other works of art, produced by the labour of the members of, or published by or under the direction of such incorporated society.

(d) The Credit Foncier du Bas-Canada or to the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien."

8. That inasmuch as these so-called art unions claim exemption from the provisions of the general law above quoted under subsection "c" of the latter half of the section, to conduct under the disguise and pretense of encouraging art the notorious gambling game of "policy," whether it is the intention of the Government to so amend the law by the amendment or repeal of the said subsection, in order to prevent this abuse ?

9. Whether the Government is aware that the operations of these so-called art unions are being conducted in contravention of the law in the city of Montreal to an alarming extent, and that petitions have been presented to Parliament at the present session signed by the leading judges on the bench in the said city, and many of the most prominent citizens of the said city, asking for the repeal of the subsection above referred to, and for an amendment to the Criminal Code providing for the summary trial before the police magistrate or judge of session of all cases of infraction of the law against gambling and lotteries ?

10. Is it the intention of the Government this session to introduce such amendments to the Criminal Code as will prevent this abuse of the law against gambling and lotteries by repealing subsection "c" of section 205 of the Criminal Code, and by so amending the law as to make all offences against the law prohibiting gambling and lotteries triable summarily before the police magistrate or judge of sessions ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may say to my hon. friend that the Minister of Justice is engaged at this moment in preparing some amendments to the Criminal Code. Probably this subject will be included in the amendments.

MR. GIROUARD, REGISTRAR OF TITLES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. Is Mr. Girouard, the registrar of titles in the Yukon district, a member of the Bar ?

2. Is he under any restriction or instructions imposed or given by the Department of Interior as to practicing his profession as a barrister or solicitor ? If so, what are such restrictions or instructions ?

3. Is the Government aware what are the office hours of Mr. Girouard in his office or capacity as registrar of titles ?

3. Is the Government aware that during such office hours he practices his profession and appears in court in connection with his private business as a barrister or solicitor ?

5. Is this course adopted by Mr. Girouard with the consent or sanction of the Government and of the Department of the Interior ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. He is under the restrictions imposed by the statute under which he holds office—Revised Statutes, Canada, cap. 51, sec. 31. 3. The Government presume the office hours are those fixed by statute, sec. 33 same Act. 4. No. 5. If Mr. Girouard has adopted any course not in accordance with the statute governing his duties it is not with the consent of the Government or department.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAILS.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. To whom was the contract for carrying the Prince Edward Island mails between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine, during last winter, awarded ?

2. Was the contract let by tender ?

3. What were the terms of the contract ?

4. What was the total cost of the service ?

5. Did the contractors make regular connections with the ice boats at Cape Tormentine so as to deliver the incoming mails from Prince Edward Island 24 hours earlier than the former arrangements ? If not, how many times did they fail to make such connections ?

6. Did the contractors deliver the outgoing mails from Prince Edward Island to the Intercolonial Railway as early as under the former arrangement ? If not, how often were the outgoing mails from Prince Edward Island delayed beyond the time they would have been delivered to the Intercolonial Railway under the former arrangement ?

7. Were the conveyances, &c., provided sufficient to carry the whole of the mails each day ? If not, how often were a portion of the mails left over for want of sufficient teams to carry them ?

8. Is the Government aware that when roads were bad mail bags were sometimes left on the way ?

9. Did the Government have any negotiations with the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway Company for special trains to carry those mails ?

10. Did the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway Company make any proposals to run special trains in connection with the ice-boat service to carry the Prince Edward Island mails ? If so, why were they not accepted ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Mr. H. Dixon. 2. The attention of the department was not called to the matter in time to admit of the winter service, for last winter, being put under contract as the result of tender. Moreover, the plan adopted was, so far as last winter's service is concerned, an experimental one, and therefore a temporary arrangement for last winter was made. The result has proved so satisfactory that it is intended at an early date to invite tenders for a permanent service. 3. The price was $6 per single trip. 4. The total cost of the service was $786. 5. So far as this department is aware the contractor made regular connections with the ice-boats so that mails for Prince Edward Island were delivered twenty-four hours earlier than under the former arrangements. 6. The service was in operation from the 17th day of January, 1899, until the 13th day of April, 1899, both days inclusive, and during that period the same connections were made with the Intercolonial as formerly, with the exception of three occasions when connection was missed with the Intercolonial on account of the non-arrival of the ice-boats at Cape Tormentine. 7. The conveyances, &c., were sufficient to carry the whole of the mails each day, and the department is not aware of any mails having been left over. 8. The department is not aware of any mails having been left on the way. 9. Yes. 10. The department applied to the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway Company to ascertain on what terms the company would run special trains in connection with the ice-boat service to carry the mails to Prince Edward Island, and received three propositions, one involving an expense of $70 per day, the other the payment by the Government of $24 a day for the use of the company's track, the Government to run the train at their own expense, furnish engines, snow plough, necessary cars and train hands, excepting conductor, the company to provide a conductor and to be entitled to retain all passenger fares. The third proposal was to perform the service for a bulk sum of $4,000 for a period of three months. The department considered each of these proposals excessive and accordingly made the special contract referred to and secured the performance of the service as efficiently as if done by the railway and at a cost of $786.

LANDS OF CALGARY AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

1. What amount of land has been earned by the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company ?

2. What amount of land has been selected by them and agreed to as being theirs by the Government ?

3. What amount of land is still due them, and why has it not been granted ?

4. Has the land selected and agreed to as being theirs been patented to them ?

5. If not patented, is it taxable for school and other local purposes under authority of the Northwest Government ?

6. If not taxable for these purposes, is it the intention of the Government to place it in such a position that it will be taxable ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. The Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company have earned 1,888,448 acres of land. 2. The company have selected and had passed to them by Order in Council 1,757,826 acres (including the 407,402 acres held by the Government as security for the earning of the $80,000 per annum subsidy for twenty years for carriage of mails, &c. 3. Area still due to company is 130,622 acres. It has not been granted because the company have not as yet selected it. 4. No, except in some small individual parcels, as the company have not asked for patents. 5. No. 6. The Government has not yet arrived at any conclusion in regard to the matter.

LIGHT-KEEPER AT WOOD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Why has Mr. D. McMillan been dismissed as light-keeper at Wood Island, in the province of Prince Edward Island ?

2. Were there any complaints made against Mr. McMillan for not efficiently discharging his duties ?

3. If not, what was the nature of the charges preferred against him, and by whom preferred ?

4. What was the report of the commissioners appointed to investigate these charges ?

5. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries any information to the effect that the charges proven against Mr. McMillan were of a trivial nature ?

6. If the charges proven against Mr. McMillan were only of a trivial nature, why was he appointed on the 3rd March, 1898, a fishery overseer—nearly one year after the investigation into charges against him was held ?

7. On whose recommendation was Mr. McMillan dismissed and his successor appointed ?

8. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries any information as to the age of Mr. McMillan's successor ? If so, what is it ?

9. Has Mr. William D. McMillan been fully paid up to the 11th October, 1898, when his successor took charge ?

10. Is the Department of Marine and Fisheries aware that Mr. McMillan was highly commended by Commander Spain, as a most useful and efficient officer ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. He was found guilty, after a formal investigation, on the sworn evidence of witnesses, of offensive political partisanship, and he refused to give his evidence in reply, under oath. 2. Not aware of any. 3. The charges were as follows:—Offensive partisanship, canvassing, attending caucus meetings, denouncing the Liberal party, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier in particular. 4. The report of the commissioners was to the effect, that offensive partisanship was clearly shown. 5. No. 6. All light-keepers of McMillan's class were, by a general Order in Council, appointed fishery overseers, without salaries, to exercise, within the limits of their districts, the powers of a justice of the peace, ex officio, for all the purposes of the Fisheries Act. 7. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries assumes the responsibility. 8. John McKay is successor to McMillan. He was reported to be about forty years of age, when appointed. Representations have been since made to the department that he was much older, which are being investigated. 9. Yes. 10. No.

IMPORTS OF SUGAR FROM BRITISH WEST INDIES.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What have been the imports, quantities and values of British West India sugar for the first eight months of the fiscal years 1898-9 and 1897-8 respectively ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I regret that I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information he asks for, as the monthly returns received by the department do not show the countries from which goods are imported. I can give him the statement for six months, if that would be useful.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. For the six months ended December, 1898, 9,049,020 pounds; value, $161,901. For the six months ended December, 1897, 6,245,924 pounds; value, $124,804.

STEEL RAILS FOR INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. McINERNEY asked :

Did the Department of Railways and Canals during the past year or since May, 1898, call for tenders for the furnishing of steel rails for the Intercolonial Railway ? If so, on what dates and for what quantities ? What tenders were received in answer to such notice, for what quantities, at what prices, and what deposit was exacted from each tenderer ? Who were the persons tendering, and their post office addresses ? What tender, if any, was accepted ? Were any steel rails during the said period bought for the Intercolonial Railway bought otherwise than by tender ? If so, why, what quantity, at what price, and from whom ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, the Department of Railways and Canals called for tenders for the furnishing of steel rails for the Intercolonial Railway. Tenders were asked on the 1st of June, 1893, for 5,000 tons, 80-pound rails for the Intercolonial Railway. The following are the names of the tenderers, with post office addresses, quantities tendered for and prices asked:—

|  |         | Tons. |
|--|---------|-------|
| Canada Switch and Spring Co., Montreal .....                             | $23 75 | 5,000 |
| J. W. Wurtele & Co., Ottawa.....   | 21 54   | 5,000 |
| F. E. Came, Montreal.....  | 19 25   | 5,000 |
| James Cooper, Montreal.....  | 21 53   | 5,000 |
| Chas. G. Glass, Montreal .....   | 21 50   | 5,000 |
| Allan & Fleming, Ottawa.....   | 22 75   | 5,000 |
| B. J. Coglin, Montreal.....  | 21 55   | 5,000 |
| Drummond, McCall & Co., Montreal   | 21 92   | 5,000 |
| James Watson & Co., per J. R. Hutchins, Montreal.....                    | 21 55   | 5,000 |
| C. I. deSola, Montreal.....  | 22 74   | 5,000 |
| Steel Rail Supply Co. (G. H. Humphrey) 100 Broadway, New York, U. S..... | 22 05   | 5,000 |
| Carnegie Steel Co. (Charles Cassells), Montreal .....                    | 20 14   | 5,000 |
| Andrew T. Drummond, Kingston...  | 22 95   | 5,000 |
| Bertram, Wilson & Co., Toronto...  | 20 40   | 5,000 |

No deposit was asked from the tenderers. The tender of Mr. F. E. Came to deliver the rails at $19.25 per ton, being the lowest, was accepted, but the party tendering declined to enter into a contract at that price. Offers were received from the Illinois Steel Company and the Cambria Steel Company for 5,000 tons each at $20 per ton, delivered. Their offers were accepted by the department, and contracts were entered into with these two companies at that price.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would like to call attention to the fact, that there is another part of the question that the hon. Minister has not had his attention called to, as to whether there were any rails bought by private contract.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have said to the hon. gentleman, that there were offers received from these two companies, which he will see, when he reads the answer.

COMMISSION OF INQUIRY AT DAWSON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Has the Government received a protest, dated 27th February, on behalf of the Miners' Committee in Dawson against the inadequacy of the commission of inquiry conducted by Mr. Ogilvie ?

2. If so, when was such a communication received ?

3. What action, if any, does the Government propose to take in the matter ?

4. Has any reply been sent to the communication ?

5. If there is correspondence on the subject, will the Government promptly lay the papers before the House without a notice of motion being given ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Yes. 2. April 27, 1899. 3. None at present. 4. No. 5. No.

CERTIFICATES OF QUALIFICATION.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

Why do not the nature of certificates of qualification appear in the Militia List after the names of permanent corps officers, as they appear after the names of other militia officers ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The officers of the permanent corps are professional soldiers, and it is, therefore, considered unnecessary to give their qualifications prominence. That is the answer given by the General.

REINSTATEMENT OF J. A. L. STRATHY.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

Did Major-General Gascoigne recommend the reinstatement of J. A. L. Strathy to the rank of Lieut.-Colonel in the militia ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Colonel Lake, acting G.O.C., recommended that J. A. L. Strathy's rank be restored, and that he be placed on the reserve list.

OFFICERS REQUIRED TO QUALIFY.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

Are the officers who were appointed to the permanent force in 1898, after the regulations as to qualification had been suspended, required to qualify ?

If so, within what time, and how ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. Time not specified.

ARTILLERY INSTRUCTION IN ENGLAND.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Have officers been sent from the Royal Canadian Artillery to the Artillery College in England for a course of instruction ?

2. If so, did such officers pass any qualifying examinations ?

3. What examinations are they expected to pass in England ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The replies to the above inquiry are as follows:—1. Yes. 2. No. 3. At Artillery College, Woolwich—construction of ordnance, military carriages, ammunition, electricity, steam, hydraulics, machinery and ballistics ; at School of Gunnery, Shoeburyness—practical and theoretical gunnery with all natures of ordnance.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN WALTHAM AND CHAPEAU VILLAGE.

Mr. POUPORE asked :

At whose request was the mail service between Waltham and the Chapeau village abolished ? Is the Government aware that a serious injustice has been done to the inhabitants of the portion of the country lying between the two points above named, viz., Waltham and Chapeau ? Has the Government received a petition from the county council of Pontiac asking for the re-establishment of said mail service, and what is the intention of the Government in relation thereto ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The mail service between Waltham and Chapeau village was put an end to on the advice of the controller of the railway mail service, because it was of no practical use for mail service purposes, the mails from Chapeau being carried by the stage service between Chapeau and Pembroke. The outgoing letters by the stage service between Chapeau and Waltham averaged about two a day, and the incoming about one, and this service is as well performed by the Pembroke route, being the route that mails had always taken. A petition has been received, but, as experience has shown that the abolished mail service was not of any practical value as a mail service, the department does not consider itself justified in re-establishing it.

THE MODUS VIVENDI.

Mr. McALISTER asked :

1. To how many United States fishing vessels not possessing modus vivendi licenses were concessions granted in the Atlantic ports of Canada during the months of November and December, 1898, and January and February, 1899 ?

2. What are the names of such vessels, and under what circumstances were privileges granted to them ?

3. Did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Minister of Customs assent to the granting of such concessions ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). As the answer to that question will involve a large amount of detail, I would suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McAlister), that he would put the question in the form of a motion, so that the information may be brought down in a return.

LIGHT ON BROTCHIES LEDGE.

Mr. McINNES asked :

1. Why has the light on Broтчies Ledge, opposite Victoria, British Columbia, not been completed and operated ?
2. When will this light be completed and operated ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The beacon for Broтчies Ledge has been completed, but delay has occurred, as it was found that the electric cable by which light was to be supplied was defective, and it has been found necessary to procure another cable. 2. The light will be put in operation during the present year.

RATES OF THE CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY.

Mr. McINNES asked :

1. Did the Canadian Pacific Railway Company submit to the Governor in Council for approval and revision its rates and tolls on the Crow's Nest Pass branch, and on its lines connecting with such branch, as contemplated by clause "c" of the agreement between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company respecting the building of the said branch ?
2. If so, did the Governor in Council alter the said rates and tolls as submitted for approval or revision, or in what respect, if any ?
3. In the exercise of the powers contained in said clause "c," what steps have been taken by the Government, of any kind, to secure reasonable rates and tolls over the said branch and connecting lines ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not submitted to the Governor in Council for approval and revision its rates and tolls on the Crow's Nest Pass branch and on its lines connecting with the said branch.

SHOAL IN NEW CHANNEL, LAKE ST. LOUIS.

Mr. MONK (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Has the Government received any representations from the shipping interests of the port of Montreal, as to the necessity of removing the shoal on the south side of the new channel in Lake St. Louis ?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to accede to the demands of said interests and see to the removal of said shoal ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Government have received representations from the shipping interests of the port of Montreal with reference to removing the shoal on the south side of the new channel in Lake St. Louis. 2. There is already a 300-foot channel through Lake St. Louis, and it would involve a very large expenditure to remove the shoal referred to, and the Government have not decided to incur said expenditure.

MEN EMPLOYED AND WAGES PAID ON INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. McLELLAN asked :

1. What is the average length of sections on the Intercolonial Railway ?
2. What is the average number of men employed on each section ?
3. What wages per diem are paid to the foremen and section men respectively on said railway ?
4. Are any of the section men placed on half-time during the winter season ?
5. What men, if any, are on half-time during the winter season on the said railway ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The average length of sections on the Intercolonial Railway is 6 miles. The average number of men employed on each section is 3 men. The wages per diem to foremen are $1.60. The wages per diem to trackmen are $1.15. No section men are placed on half-time during the winter season. No men are on half-time during the winter season on the Intercolonial Railway.

ELEVATOR AT HALIFAX.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. Has the attention of the Government been directed to the following report of a discussion in the Halifax city council on the 14th April, 1899 :—

" THE ELEVATOR.

" Alderman Hawkins asked when the Dominion Government was going to complete the elevator. A skeleton of it had stood during the winter. Alderman Geldert said the contractor expected to have it finished by snow fly (laughter). The United States builders said a structure of that kind could be put up in six weeks."

2. At what date does the Government expect to have this elevator completed and ready for operation ?
3. At what date was its construction begun ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The attention of the Government has not been directed to a discussion in the city council of Halifax on 14th April, 1899. 2. It is expected that the elevator at Halifax will be completed and ready for occupation on the 1st October, 1899. 3. The contract was signed on 22nd September, 1898, and the contractor took possession of the site on 4th November, 1898.

STONE-PILES—BALSAM LAKE.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government, this season, to remove the unsightly piles of stone which have been dumped in the water along the once beautiful shores at Rosedale near where the river leaves Balsam Lake ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, it is not the intention of the Government, this season, to remove the piles of stone which have been dumped in the water along the shore at Rosedale, near Balsam Lake.

ROSEDALE SWING BRIDGE.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

(a) What expenditure has been made by the Government in regard to Rosedale swing bridge, North Victoria ?

(b) Why was it necessary to raise the elevation of the swing bridge ?

(c) Did the Government contribute any sum or sums towards the changes rendered necessary by the elevation of the bridge to the municipality of Fenelon, which has at great cost had to practically rebuild the main bridge ?

(d) What is the rule of the department in regard to assistance to municipalities for bridges part swing, the balance of which is under control and support of the municipality ?

(e) Why did the Government not pay the cost of the necessary changes in the main portion of the bridge controlled by Fenelon township ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Government expended in building the swing bridge at Rosedale, the sum of $5,103.84. 2. The Rosedale bridge was raised two feet higher than the old bridge to allow of water level being raised two feet higher in case it was in future desired to make draught of canal eight feet instead of six feet as at present. 3. The Government did not contribute any sum towards the rebuilding of the approaches to the swing bridge to the municipality of Fenelon. The rebuilding of the approaches became necessary owing to their rotten dilapidated condition. 4. The rule in such cases as the one in question, has been carried out in the case of this Rosedale bridge. 5. The Government paid the cost of the swing portion of the bridge because it was necessary to widen the opening in the swing span. The approaches thereto, being a work for the municipality, the Government did not pay the cost.

SOULANGES CANAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. How long did the Soulanges Canal arbitration last ?

2. How many cases were examined ?

3. Were the arbitrators dismissed ?

4. What was the cause of their dismissal ?

5. Had all the cases been examined when the arbitrators ceased to act ?

6. Was another person sent by the Government to finish their work ?

7. At whose request were the arbitrators dismissed ?

8. How much did said commission cost ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There has not been any arbitration in connection with the Soulanges Canal. Assuming that what is meant by the question refers to valuers of land damages of land taken for canal purposes, I may state that : 1. The first land valuers on the Soulanges Canal were Messrs. A. F. Wood, F. X. Paradis and François Lalonde. Messrs. Wood and Paradis were appointed on the 18th of September, 1891, Mr. Lalonde being appointed on the 20th of August, 1892—about one year later. Messrs. Wood and Paradis served about five years, and Mr. Lalonde about four years. 2. About 158 cases were examined. 3. Their services were dispensed with. 4. There was no reason assigned for dispensing with their services. 5. No. 6. Yes. 7. No request was made for the dismissal of the Board of Land Valuers. 8. Messrs. Wood, Paradis and Lalonde were paid for their services and expenses, $14,235.03.

Second Board of Valuers.

1. Messrs. Emery Lalonde, Roger Duckett and A. McNown, land valuers for the Soulanges Canal were appointed on the 14th of October, 1896, and continued for one year and seven months. 2. From 45 to 50 cases were examined. 3. The services of the land valuers were dispensed with. 4. The position of matters being such as not to require or warrant the expenditure which would be entailed by the further maintenance of the board, their services were dispensed with. 5. No. 6. No. 7. No request was made for the dismissal of the Board of Land Valuers. 8. Messrs. E. Lalonde, Duckett and A. McNown were paid for their services and expenses, $16,635.53.

STANLEY PARK AND DEADMAN'S ISLAND, B.C.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria) moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council respecting Stanley Park and Deadman's Island, Vancouver, B.C., and all correspondence between the different departments of the Canadian Government and the Imperial military and naval authorities respecting the park or island, or both. Also, for copies of all correspondence respecting the same with the Government of British Columbia, the city of Vancouver and the park authorities. Also for all correspondence between the member for Burrard, the Hon. Minister of Militia and Defence and the Department of Militia, the Hon. Minister of the Interior and other members of the Government respecting the same. Also for all correspondence between Mr. Ludgate and his representative and any department of Government respecting Deadman's Island. Also a copy of all applications and correspondence respecting a lease or grant of Deadman's Island. Also a copy of all departmental reports, memoranda or letters on file in the Departments of Justice, Interior, Militia and Defence respecting the park, Deadman's Island or the title and disposal of the same. Also a copy of all grants or leases of the park or Deadman's Island. Also all reports or information obtained by the different departments before any lease or grant of Deadman's Island was enacted. Also all memorials or correspondence respecting the granting of any lease of Deadman's Island.

He said: I do not at present intend to speak to this motion—

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I did not understand that this motion would come up to-day. Of course I do not object, but I would suggest to the hon. member (Mr. Prior) that as there are now negotiations pending with regard to this matter between the city of Vancouver and Mr. Ludgate and the parties with whom the lease has been made, and as these negotiations are with the view of a settlement, perhaps it would be more convenient to wait a day or two until it can be seen if an arrangement may be arrived at. I merely make this as a suggestion.

Mr. PRIOR. I would ask the House to pass this motion at the present time, as I do not think it would make any difference as to the negotiations. I do not wish to discuss the motion at present, but we would like to see the papers brought down so that we may know how the matter stands. It is a very interesting question as to the ownership of this property, and we would like to know who really is the owner.

Motion agreed to.

THE IMPERIAL SERVICE—A CANADIAN BRIGADE.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, having in view the growth and development of Canadian trade, the assisting to perfect the union of Great Britain and her colonies and the maintaining the commerce, prestige and integrity of the British Empire, Great Britain should be given authority to enroll a brigade of Canadian officers and men for the Imperial service abroad, and that Canadian seamen should be afforded opportunity of serving in the British navy.

He said: I respectfully ask the sympathy of this House for this motion, and I trust that hon. gentlemen may come to the same conclusion as I have on the matter. It has been suggested in the press of the country, that members of Parliament who happen to be officers in the militia should not either directly or indirectly criticise the military affairs of the Dominion, or criticise the general officer commanding, or any one in connection with the Militia Department. Inasmuch as my intention is to discuss military matters on this occasion, and, on every other occasion when they arise in the House. I take the liberty of placing before the House, what the custom, the law, and the constitution are on this subject. We will take first the precedent of the mother country, in relation not to militia officers but to officers in the regular pay and service of the British nation. In Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England," vol. 2, page 320, I find he quotes from May's "Parliamentary Practice," as follows:—

There are sound constitutional reasons for the exclusion of all non-political servants of the

Mr. PRIOR.

Crown (excepting, of course, officers in the army or navy, who are exempted from disqualification by the 28th section of the Statute of Anne) from the House of Commons. An exception which constructively includes several descriptions of military appointments when conferred upon officers of the army and navy.

May goes on to say:

In the case of Major Jervis, M.P., who, being appointed assistant superintendent of the Royal Small Arms Establishment, with pay and allowances of over four hundred and fifty pounds per annum, was allowed to retain his seat, because an election committee held "that it was not a place of profit, but was extra work given to a commissioned officer, which he was bound to execute, as part of the duty attaching to his commission." Mere promotion does not disqualify; but a commission given to a civilian avoids the seat, except in certain cases expressly exempted by law.

Todd, commenting on this extract from May, goes on to say:

Strictly subordinate, and accountable for their conduct, to the minister of state who is charged with the oversight of the department to which they belong—and who is exclusively responsible to Parliament for the administration of the same—the presence, in either House, of a permanent officer of any branch of the public service—who might possibly differ in politics with his responsible chief—would be found highly inconvenient, and might lead to unseemly and injurious collisions.

Half a century ago, the constitutional practice in this particular was less stringent than it is now. Nevertheless, in 1820, when Col. Sir Herbert Taylor, the military secretary to the commander-in-chief (the Duke of York) was elected to the House of Commons, he was distinctly informed by the Premier (Lord Liverpool) that "he ought not to interfere in the military discussions on the Estimates," as the Secretary-at-War was the mouthpiece of the Government to sustain any attacks that might be made upon the commander-in-chief, or his office. For the same reason, and in order to prevent the commander-in-chief from interfering in the House of Commons, Lord Liverpool objected to Major-General Sir H. Torrens, the adjutant-general, accepting a seat in Parliament. Sir H. Torrens, therefore, declined the offered seat, as he was to be mute on military discussions, and Sir H. Taylor never interfered in the discussion of the Estimates.

Thus it will be seen that the only restriction placed upon an officer in the English House of Commons is when he holds some position directly in the office of the commander in chief. Thus, for example, it might be very inconvenient that a permanent officer from the militia department, say the secretary of the general officer commanding, should be elected to a seat in the House. You can readily see that he, being directly under the control of the general officer commanding, might, by his voice and vote in this House, make it very inconvenient for the Minister of Militia, who would thus be the responsible head. That is the only restriction placed upon army officers in Great Britain. On page 213 of Todd's Parliamentary Companion, volume 2, I find another reference to this matter:

Furthermore, in the case of military or naval officers, no impediment is placed in the way of their becoming candidates for a seat in the House of Commons and, if elected, no intemperate, or even factious, language made use of by them in their place in Parliament—unless taken up by the House itself, and made the subject of an Address to the Crown—would be accounted a sufficient reason for dismissal from the service. And similar freedom of speech is also allowed at ordinary political meetings, provided that nothing be said that is treasonable, or a direct infringement of the Mutiny Act, or the Articles of War.

These references are to officers of the regular service in the British army, and not the militia officers. Throughout the length and breadth of the constitution. Sir, whether written or unwritten, there is not one line or word that can possibly apply to prevent a militia officer in the British House of Commons criticising to the fullest extent the Secretary of War or the commander in chief, or any other branch of the service. In connection with our own House, I need not do more than refer to that section of the Bill of Rights which prevents any language or criticism made use of in this House of Commons being brought up outside the House against the person who made use of it. However, while this is the case, I do not hesitate to say that it would be very unbecoming an officer of the militia of Canada even to take any stand here in relation to the Militia Department or the general officer commanding, or any person in connection with the militia service, which he would not feel inclined to take outside of the House, or to use any language with regard to those officers here which he would not use to them personally, or make use of any information which he had in his possession, owing to his having been a militia officer, and which was not made public to the country. In the discussion of the subject which I now bring before the House, however, no question can arise as to the fullest rights of any officer, be he a member of the permanent force or otherwise, giving his views on it to the fullest extent. The motion I submit to the House reads as follows :

That in the opinion of this House, having in view the growth and development of Canadian trade, the assisting to perfect the union of Great Britain and her colonies, and the maintaining the commerce, prestige and integrity of the British Empire, Great Britain should be given the authority to enrol a brigade of Canadian officers and men for the Imperial service abroad, and that Canadian seamen should be afforded an opportunity of serving in the British navy.

It may be said at the outset that there is nothing in that resolution which does not already exist ; but, as I proceed, I shall endeavour to point out the various phases of the case in order to show that while indirectly all that is in the motion already exists, indirectly it does not. In brief, the proposal which I make is :

1. Give Great Britain the privilege of enrolling a brigade of Canadians, officers and men, for service in any part of the world.

2. The term of enlistment to be five or seven years.

3. The British Government to pay the force, the pay to be the same as British soldiers receive.

4. The brigade to be composed of : (a) One maritime province battalion ; (b) one Quebec province battalion ; (c) two Ontario province battalions ; (d) one from Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia ; (e) artillery, cavalry, engineers, army service corps, and medical staff in proportion for each unit and each locality. In all, say, 5,000 men, or one to each 1,000 of the population. I may say that these units are merely suggestions as to the basis of proportion. On the discharge of each soldier he should be entitled to receive, not from the Government of Great Britain, but from Canada, say 160 acres of land, with a cottage and team of horses, a couple of cattle, with agricultural implements and other outfit, in all worth a few hundred dollars, sufficient to enable him to begin life as a small farmer. Similar concessions should be made by Canada to her sons who have served a term of years in the Imperial army, and this grant should also be extended to those who have served a term in the Imperial navy. Personally, I would be pleased to see this grant extended to those enlisted in Great Britain, in other words to purely British soldiers, who, on honourable discharge, would come to Canada and take up their homes here.

It is not my intention to enter at length into this subject, my object being merely to place the plan before the House and the country in order that it may take root and gradually grow, if at all possible. I have long looked forward to that day when Canada shall form an integral portion of the British Empire. We are growing in that direction along the lines of trade and commerce, and we expect to grow in the same direction to a considerable extent in military lines. It was only the other day that we read the announcement in the papers of a Queen's New Zealand volunteer regiment offering their services in the Samoan Island, and in this morning's paper we find the announcement that a corps of New South Wales Lancers, under pay of the New South Wales Government, has been sent over to England for military training. We find the same spirit abroad in Canada, and thus little by little the various colonies are gradually shouldering their burden and taking their part in the military events of the Empire.

I may say that in addition to the trade and military associations between Great Britain and her colonies, I look forward still further, in no very distant future, to an alliance between them on political lines.

But I am met at the outset, because this is no new matter with me, with the statement ; Oh, but look at the serious objections to any such scheme. It was my privilege to talk over this matter a couple of years ago with a very distinguished officer of the Imperial service. And, Sir, would you believe it, the chief objection on the part of that gentleman was that it would require a little re-arrangement of the work in the War Office in the old country—a new book would have to be opened, I presume, a new eye-glass procured, or a new clerk employed. This gentleman looked at it merely from the viewpoint of the clerical work in the department in the old land. He said—and he spoke as one having authority—that the scheme could not be carried out owing to the serious disturbances of the clerical work in the War Office.

Mr. PRIOR. Who said that?

Mr. HUGHES. A very distinguished officer of the Imperial service within the last two years. However, Sir, I presume that this difficulty could be overcome.

But there are other objections. A great many say: You are strengthening the jingo spirit, you are pandering to this imperialistic spirit that is abroad. Well, Sir, in the proper acceptation of the word "jingo" I stand here to defend the jingo idea; in the proper acceptation of the Imperial idea, I stand here to defend that idea. We find that it is the jingo spirit that has brought peace to the British Empire on more than one occasion. I do not know whether our friends the leader of the Government and his colleagues displayed a little of the jingo spirit at Washington, when they found that they could not get anything in relation to the boundary; but if they showed that spirit in proper degree, I heartily commend them for it. A display of the jingo spirit will produce more than the old spirit which was so familiar to the people of this country on the part of our friends who now control the Government. It is a jingo spirit that has carried British trade and commerce to the extent we find it carried throughout the world to-day. It is the jingo spirit that has won us the Soudan, and has brought peace instead of war in that part of the world with European nations. It was the jingo spirit that brought Germany to time a few years ago, and that, I trust, may bring her to time in the near future in case she attempts to meddle with the affairs of Great Britain. And we find that it was the anti-jingo spirit, the spirit of subserviency on the part of the Government in England, that brought Great Britain into the Egyptian war away back in 1882. It was the anti-jingo spirit that lost Great Britain the Transvaal, which will ultimately have to be re-conquered. It was the anti-jingo spirit which caused practically all the wars that we have had over affairs in Afghanistan. This spirit was so prevalent in England a few years ago that it threatened to lead Great Britain to throw aside her colonies throughout the world, which would have reduced the old land to the position of little England. I can well remember how, in my early days, when I was teaching school, on the maps of those times England was shown in one colour, Ireland in another and Scotland in another and Wales in another, and every province of the Dominion was shown in a different colour. I remember spending my time one Saturday afternoon painting them all a bright, brilliant red. I think that that old map possibly hangs in that school to-day—

An hon. MEMBER. Green.

Mr. HUGHES. I have no objection to the green. It is a good colour, and quite suitable to some gentlemen who occupy positions in this House. In my young days, I saw no reason why we in Canada, associated as we were with the old land and possessing all liberties that the mother country could give us, should not be regarded as an integral portion of the British Empire; and, as years have gone on, I have become strengthened in the conviction I then formed. In matters of trade, in militia and naval affairs—and in matter of politics, for that matter—there is no reason why the Anglo-Saxon mind cannot overcome all difficulties that stand in the way and bring about the ultimate union of Great Britain and her colonies in one magnificent nation.

But I am met with the charge: Your scheme would be very expensive. Well, there would be no expense to Canada, nor would there be any additional expense to Great Britain, for she has to get these men from somewhere. Great Britain would pay the men under this proposition; and, under any proposition, I do not think the time would ever arrive when any colony should pay for the maintenance of a force in the service of the Empire as a whole. The central authority, whether it be the Government of Great Britain, as it is to-day, or whether it be composed of some great council of the whole Empire, would levy upon each integral part of the confederation its fair share of the expense. Whatever the central authority may be, that should be the paying authority. However, Sir, I do suggest that Canada should bear a share of this expense.

Now, we find brought to the shores of this land a large number of—I will not say anything against the people—let us say a very eligible class of people, the Galicians and the Doukhobors. They were brought to this country at very considerable expense, and, more than that, are maintained at considerable expense to this country. First, there is no gainsaying the statement that this country has met the expense connected with the maintenance of these people for some considerable time. We give 160 acres of land, besides a considerable amount of cash, to the Galicians and Doukhobors coming to this country. I maintain that it would pay the Dominion of Canada ten times better to give 160 acres of land and $500 to a good Britisher to come here rather than $10 to a Doukhobor. But the share that I ask Canada to contribute to this brigade is this—that after spending his five or his seven years, as the case may be, in the service of the Empire, doing duty for Canada as well as the motherland, a man, if he chooses to return to Canada, shall be given his little farm of land such as we give to settlers from any part of the world, and, in addition to that, he shall be given, say, $300, or $400 in the form of an outfit—a cottage, a team of horses, some cattle, agricultural implements, some seed grain, enough to help him to start in the world. Referring to this, I may just point out that the finest class of citizens that any country was ever blessed with receiving were the old soldiers who settled in Canada in the early days. Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces generally were settled almost entirely, so far as the early days were concerned, by discharged British soldiers or men who had served their country in the wars in the United States.

Go down to Fraserville or Rivière du Loup, in Quebec province, and you will find some of our finest French Canadian people there are descended from the soldiers of the old Highland Scottish regiments who settled there. Take the best of the old settlers of French nationality, in the province of Quebec, and you find that they are descendants of the old French soldiers of the 17th and 18th centuries. And, so far as Ontario is concerned, let those who are acquainted with the River St. Lawrence, the Bay of Quinté, or any of those earlier settled portions of the province, aye, or even the more recently settled portions—for we find the Crimean veterans settled in various portions of the country—and we see that the old soldiers are the best class of settlers we have ever had and no country ever had better. But I have been told in discussing this question—by military men, too—that we want our Canadians at home; we do not want to send people out of the country. That is very true. But you must remember this, that during the American civil war, there were 58,000 boys from Ontario alone who fought in the Northern armies. In the recent Cuban war also, there were thousands fighting under the flag of the United States. Why, there is scarcely a town in Ontario that has not buried its boy who was shot before Santiago or who died of fever in some of the camps during the war. It was only the other day that I read of two boys from Almonte who were brought home, having been shot before Santiago.

I know from my own county there were two young men killed, and one young man wounded, fighting at Santiago. In the whole force, I am satisfied there were thousands of Canadians engaged in that war, and there was not a man of them but would have a thousand times rather worn the uniform of the British Empire, serving Her Majesty Queen Victoria in some part or other of the world. There are men, Sir, in every nation, but more especially in a young nation like Canada, inhabited by Anglo-Saxon people, who are imbued with that sort of fearless military spirit, and who will seek service wherever they may find an opportunity; therefore, I, for one, would be perfectly willing to give this class of young men, just as fine a class of young men as you can find in any land, the opportunity of engaging in Her Majesty's service rather than in the service of a foreign nation. I have no doubt in the world but that thousands of them would seek that service. Leave the country? No, Sir; they would merely leave it for a few years, because, under the proposal that I make here, they would return at the end of the service and become citizens; in other words, we would merely give them an opportunity, at the expense of the Empire, of going to college, going out to see the world, going out to broaden themselves in all that pertains to the upbuilding of a great nation, and then return home and become good and permanent citizens.

Then, Sir, the moralist comes in and says: Oh, these questions of war, and of foreign service, and of Canada spending money for the benefit of the Empire, are things that should pass away; times of peace have arrived. Well, Sir, whenever I hear a young lady declare that she is never going to get married, I always look, during the next few months to see her marriage notice in the paper. Whenever I hear serious talk of peace, that wars have ceased for ever, I always look—and if you will read back into history you will find that history bears out my view—I always look very soon to see some intensely stubborn war breaking out among the very people who were professing peace. Take, for instance, Russia. I think there is no one who is familiar with the circumstances at the present time but knows that Russia, in proposing this peace conference to-day, is merely playing her cards. Russia is building her railways, which are to her what Great Britain's battleships are to the British Empire; and just as soon as Russia gets her railways nicely completed to suit her convenience, those who are living at that time will find that it will be very convenient for her then to break her peace proposals and to engage in war for her own advantage. I have very little faith, I may say, in these peace proposals. Does any one suppose that the Fashoda incident would have been settled peaceably had not Britain had her ironclads ready? I maintain that the truest solution of the peace problem is for Britain and her colonies to stand shoulder to shoulder, and present to the world a solid phalanx which no combination of nations can break, and the peace of the world is assured, so far, at all events, as the British Empire is concerned.

We are told also that Canadians would not enlist, and reference has been made to the 100th Regiment, and at the attempted repatriation of the 100th Regiment now stationed in Halifax, as an illustration. Why, Sir, it was placarded up and down the country that the old Royal Canadian Regiment was being brought out to this country, and that an opportunity would be given for the young men of Canada to rush in and fill the ranks. I do not want to say anything disrespectful of any regiment in the British service, but young Canadians will not enlist in any regiment in the British service, to be drilled by British officers, unless that regiment has a record which would commend itself to their pride and to their national honour. Now, I do not want to say, as I have already remarked, anything disparaging of the old Royal Canadian Regiment. At the time of its formation it was not a purely Canadian regiment, it never was a Canadian regiment, and it never can become a Canadian regiment by repatriation here. We have no sympathy here with the officers of that corps, we have no sympathy with the men of that corps. It may be a very fine regiment, but in order to win the affections of the young men of Canada it would require to come here covered with more laurels than are borne on its banners at the present time. I say this with all kindness; and to expect our young men to go off and enlist in any regiment stationed to-day at the borders of the country such as this, is showing, at all events, a lack of appreciation of the spirit of Canadian loyalty. Our young men are loyal enough to Canada to look for officers of their own, and to look for a higher type of Imperial regiment than the 100th Regiment in which to enlist. We are told that Canadinas are not fighters. Well, Sir, let me point out this fact, that wherever a British regiment has stood side by side with a Canadian regiment in active service, victory has always perched upon its banners. In the war of 1812, wherever British soldiers were backed up by, or stood side by side with Canadian soldiers, no disaster ever befell the British arms, and the only disasters that did befall the British arms in the war of 1812 with the United States, occurred when there were no Canadians to help the British troops on to victory.

Another, and I may say the only objection I have ever heard urged to the formation of a Canadian brigade in the British service, is the one that the pay is too small. Now, I will not go into details of the question of pay, but my experience is that, whether it be in militia work or in the regular service, whether the pay be large or small, at the end of the year the soldier has about as much in his pocket who receives a shilling a day as the one who receives fifty cents a day. It is not a question of how much goes in, but it is a question of how much goes out. The rule in any part of the world is that all that goes in goes out. So I think that question could be left to settle itself. I am satisfied that if the Canadian Government could be induced to take up the supplementary position I have pointed out, that is to give to these soldiers, on their return from foreign service, a little outfit along with the land, every man would appreciate that kind of pay, and to a much greater extent than he would were he to get the same amount distributed to him daily throughout the seven years' service. I would again suggest that the privilege of taking up these farms in Canada with the suggested outfit, should also be extended to the reserve soldiers discharged from the British service on good conduct certificates.

Well, Sir, we find a great many objecting to people going into military service for the simple reason that they do not want our sons to be made food for powder. The answer to that has already been given. Our sons will seek service somewhere. Why, during the late American war a young lad from the town in which I live, wrote home saying: I am on board a vessel, a gunboat, in which there are only 85 men, and 65 of these are British or Canadian born subjects. In our ward-room there are 25 boys, and there is only one foreigner among them, and he comes from Vermont. So that in the American service, in the last war, we find our boys offering themselves as food for powder. But it is not in offering themselves as food for powder that the greatest danger consists in soldiering nowadays; the danger nowadays, unless they are carefully looked after, comes rather from disease and that class of trouble than from bullets of the enemy. So that question of being food for powder may be passed over without further consideration.

But we find another class of people who say: We do not want old soldiers; old soldiers are not a very desirable class of a community. Well, Sir, go down into Glengarry, and where will you find a finer lot of men, a broader class of men, than the old soldiers. Go along the St. Lawrence frontier, up the Bay of Quinté, down into Nova Scotia, where old disbanded soldiers reside, and you will find the verdict of their neighbours to be that they are a thrifty class in the community, a class which any one should be pleased to have in the country. There is an old expression which we have heard very often, and which applies to-day as it did in all times:

When war's proclaimed, and danger's nigh,
"God and the soldier" is the cry;
When war is over, and wrongs are righted,
God is forgotten and the soldier slighted.

That is true in all times and in all lands. But, says one, there is no need to give permission to officers or men from Canada to go into the service of the British Empire. That is true, but there should be an official sanction given to this. The Canadian soldier is a democratic individual; he might possibly become acclimated to the treatment of a British officer after a few years' service; but I feel free to say, that the relationship existing between a British officer and a soldier in the old land is not the relationship that exists between the officer and soldier in Canada. The Canadian citizen will find that the system in Canada is not the system prevailing in England, and I am satisfied, that our young Canadians would not put up with the treatment that is accorded to soldiers, as a rule, in the British service. More than this ; it is only natural that our own officers and men would feel more at home under Canadian officers, in a foreign land, than under British officers, so that, this aspect of the case need not be dwelt upon. Then, going as a Canadian regiment, there will be more pride felt in it by those who compose it. If 5,000 Canadians were sent over there in so many regiments, and if, in comparison with that, 5,000 Canadians were distributed throughout the length and breadth of the British forces, which would reflect the greatest honour and glory upon the country ? Under which system would you find the greater feeling of pride and self-respect, and, when it came to an engagement, whether would a thousand Canadians fight better together than if distributed among other regiments ? The national honour, the prestige of the Canadians, and their self-respect would be more up-built by pursuing a system of having them in one Canadian contingent, rather than having them distributed throughout the forces of the Empire.

But, says one, we have no right to fight Britain's battles. Why should we not help to fight Britain's battles ? Has not Britain defended us by her fleets and armies in the past ? I may refer to 1812 and since that. Has not Britain given to Canada millions of dollars of property ? Have we not the use of her consuls and ambassadorial officers to promote our interests in the markets of the world ? In almost every respect, I care not whether it be on the question of finance or of the development of trade, we have the prestige of the British Empire, and it is our duty to take our fair share in up-building the Empire. We are told that Canada has already done so, in that she has built the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is true, we built the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway is not sufficient, I maintain for Canada's share in the future up-building of this great Empire. We are told, also, that, if Canada were to take her part in the armies of Great Britain, it would excite the envy of other nations. I think the British nation, at the present time, has come to the conclusion that the best cure for the envy of other nations is the strengthening of her own fleet and armies. We have had an illustration of the fact, that the best cure for the envy of any European nation, or of any American nation either, for that matter, is to show that the British people have confidence in themselves, and that they are prepared to stand or fall by their rights. I need not refer further to the objections that are urged, or may be urged, in respect to the proposition that I make. But there is one other objection, and it is, that you cannot have all the British Empire loyal. Now, there are two different kinds of loyalty. There is the loyalty which you may call the loyalty of the head, or of reason, and there is the loyalty of the instinct or of the heart. So far as the loyalty of the Anglo-

Saxon race goes, we need not say anything. That is to be taken for granted ; but there is another kind of loyalty, and it is the loyalty which guarantees us civil and religious liberty, which guarantees our rights in every occupation and every association of trade and commerce, as well as in matters of government, which, I maintain, is stronger than the loyalty of the heart. I will take the opportunity, in this connection, of referring to a matter which, I am free to say, is not being referred to in the matter of questioning at all—to the loyalty of the people of the province of Quebec, and I take the opportunity to say, that I regard it in the same light as a distinguished member of this House, the mayor of Montreal, Mr. Préfontaine, from whose remarks, speaking the other night, I beg to quote, as follows :—

He cherished England because of the liberty she had given to Canada. Under the folds of the Union Jack the French Canadians enjoyed a freedom such as they could not secure under any other flag. Liberty of conscience, liberty of thought, freedom of worship, a deep-seated regard for the conscientious religious convictions of the French Canadian race ; these were what had endeared the English nation to the members of that race. The result was that nowhere in Her Majesty's vast dominions were a more loyal people to her throne and person to be found than in French Canada. They had no desire for annexation or independence ; they were as loyal, he felt absolutely certain, and as true in their allegiance to the Crown as were the English, Scotch or Irish.

So much for the French Canadian race, and the words spoken by Mr. Préfontaine, the mayor of Montreal, regarding the French Canadian race. We find, also, that all the native races in the countries governed by Great Britain are loyal to the British Empire. We have only to remember, in that regard, the famous Indian mutiny, to find that, in these tremendous temptations, the native races have stood true to British interests, and that, as often as the Empire is threatened, these races are as true to the civilization of Britain as are those of her own race and blood. I shall not take up the time of the House further than to state that, in case the Government sees fit, at any time, to call for men in Canada to form such a project as this, I feel perfectly satisfied that both officers and men, thoroughly fitted to take their place in any army in the world, would be forthcoming. It was my good fortune, some two years ago, to volunteer the services of a Canadian regiment for Imperial service. Although there was no great war on at that time, merely an Afghan war and some trouble in the Transvaal, I had offers of upwards of 2,000 men from various parts of Canada and upwards of 100 officers, a good many of them equal in rank to myself, and many of them my seniors, offering to take posts in any such regiment as might be raised in the defence of the Empire. I am satisfied, that, if such a corps as is suggested here could receive the official notice of the Government of Great Britain and the Government of Canada, that, in place of having 5,000 men in time of peace, we could double that number; and, in time of war, there would scarcely be any limit short of two or three hundred thousand, who could be obtained in the Dominion of Canada to lend a hand for the defence of the British Empire. I move, seconded by my hon. friend, Colonel Prior, M.P., the motion which stands in my name on the Order paper.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can enlighten the country very much on this subject, or, that I can entertain the House to any extent, but I regard it not only as a right but as a duty, which every member of Parliament owes to his constituents and to the country, to express his views on such a proposal, especially in its initial stage. I am unable to see any relationship between this movement proposed in this resolution and the development of trade and commerce in Canada. That statement in the motion seems somewhat incongruous, and it scarcely appeals to us as a reason for our sympathy. Sir, we are first of all a peace-loving people; our population is engaged in the industrial pursuits of life. We require all the settlers we have, and more, to occupy the soil of Canada and to work in our manufactories. We are offering, year after year, large inducements to foreigners to settle amongst us; we take the trouble to indicate the special class of immigrants that are required here, namely, persons who will settle on the soil, and mechanics who will become sharers in the industrial life of the country. For this purpose we spend a large amount of money every year, and we send immigration agents not only to the American republic, but to European countries, to offer inducements to all who will settle in Canada. We do that because our population is sparse and our acreage broad. We do that for the purpose of bringing settlers to cultivate the soil; who will increase our population, and thereby help us to bear the burdens of life in the development and enrichment of our country. It does seem to me, that while we are doing that, we would not be acting in the best interests of the country, if we were to throw out inducements for our people to enlist in military pursuits, and leave our shores for the purpose of going into the armies of the world. It seems to be inconsistent, that, on the one hand, we should offer inducements to bring people into the country, and, on the other hand, offer them inducements to get out of the country. I believe, Sir, such a course would not be compatible with the best interests of Canada, and I feel it incumbent upon me to express this view to the House. There is another feature of this proposal, which is worthy of our serious consideration. We know that if you put men into the regular army service for five, or six, or seven years, they acquire fixed habits which destroy their usefulness for industrial pursuits afterwards. We are largely governed by force of habit throughout our career. Permit a boy to be lazy for four or five years, and you will never get him afterwards to prosecute labour so successfully as the boy who from his very cradle is trained to be industrious and steady in any line of life. If you think that you can put men into the military career for several years, and afterwards have them settle down in the country, to till the soil or work in our factories, in my opinion you are making a great blunder. The habits they have formed during years of military training, when they have not been engaged in labour and industry, will be so strongly ingrained in their very nature, that they will never become willing or able to take up a laborious life as others do who are kept constantly to work from boyhood to manhood. If men spend a number of years in what I regard, as perhaps one of the lazy lines of life—I am not saying now that it is not a useful and worthy occupation—you cannot expect them to settle down afterwards and become useful citizens. Several examples have been cited as illustrations of the contrary idea. I have not had a very extensive acquaintance with the sections of the country in which the old army soldiers settled in Canada, but I have some limited acquaintance with them. I remember very distinctly, when a boy, that in different parts of the counties of York and Simcoe, some old army pensioners were settled there, and so far as I have been able to remember I fail to recollect a single one who became an active worker. The land given them became practically useless, so far as grain-growing and cultivation went, and the contrast between their lands, and the lands of the genuine agricultural settlers was very marked, indeed. They held that land for a little time and then sold it, sometimes almost for a song. Or if it did remain in their possession, it was not cultivated, so that many of those lands given years ago are to be found to-day almost in their original condition of wildness. That was largely due to the fact that the habits of these soldiers were not industrious. They were not accustomed to labour as are those who have grown up on the land and cultivated it and followed labourious pursuits in life from the time they were of age to begin work. In my opinion the land given would be practically valueless to them. It would be traded off by them almost for a song, and though it might prove useful to others would be of little value to them.

Then with regard to the amount of money to be spent on giving these men an outfit and to the grant of a homestead of 160 acres, why should we do more for these people than we do for our own who remain at home? Why give to them what we are not prepared to give to our own young men who go out from the older provinces to settle in Manitoba and the North-west? We give these young men, in many instances, where our lands are open for settlement a free grant but nothing more, and yet each of these settlers is of more value to us than ten old soldiers who would settle on the land after their term of enlistment had expired.

For these reasons I am opposed to this motion. If there are any young men in this country who desire to enlist in the British army, they have plenty opportunities of doing so. They are perfectly free agents, and at liberty to take up that life if they chose, and I can see no reason why we should offer them special inducements to do so, when by so doing we will be simply tempting them to leave our own soil and thus to that extent retarding the developing of our own country, which we are all so anxious to facilitate, and doing this besides at a pecuniary sacrifice to ourselves. Again, I doubt whether it is wise to encourage military spirit among our young men, because that is not so much needed as some suppose in this country of ours, as is the spirit of settling down and cultivating our undeveloped lands. No doubt we are bound to do a great deal for the defence of the Empire of which we form an integral part. But we are now doing that and doing it on lines which do not interfere with peaceful pursuits and the settlement of the country and without undergoing the expense which would be entailed by the adoption of the principle embodied in this motion. I do not think that what the hon. gentleman aims at is what Canada requires at present. It may be in the interests of the Empire in many ways, but I do not think it is in the interests of the development of Canada, and, therefore, I am inclined to oppose the taking up of this scheme and endeavouring to carry it to a successful issue, as no doubt my hon. friend proposes to do.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John). I followed the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) very closely in his speech, which he had evidently taken some time to prepare, and no doubt one of the objects of his resolution was to enable him to declare his views with regard to what might be done for these soldiers after they have served their term, but the resolution simply affirms that authority should be given to Great Britain to enroll a brigade of Canadian officers and men for the Imperial service abroad and to afford Canadian seamen an opportunity of serving in the British navy. But what is there to prevent their serving in the army and navy of Great Britain at present? The hon. gentleman asks that Great Britain should be given authority to do a certain thing. Who is to give her the authority? Why, Great Britain can do this now without our authority at all, and, therefore, I do not see why it is necessary to give her authority by resolution to do what she is perfectly free to do at present without any resolution. The hon. gentleman did not at all touch that portion of his subject in his remarks, so that I was not able to get from his observations any reason why we should pass this resolution. If Great Britain wants this power, surely her Parliament can take it and it is not necessary for us to pass a resolution of this kind. Without going into the main question at all, as to whether it is advisable for us to enter into a career of warfare, I must say that in my opinion it is not necessary for us to confer authority of that sort by a resolution of this House, on the Parliament of Great Britain or upon Great Britain herself.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The criticism made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) is, I think, a very sound one, and it was referred to by the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution. I understood that hon. gentleman to admit that at present Great Britain could enroll a brigade here or enlist seamen for the navy if she chose, but he thought it desirable that if Canadians were to serve in the Imperial army or navy, they should do so together in a body. Rather than enlist in a dozen different battalions, it would be better for them to enlist together in one battalion or brigade. So far as that part of the speech is concerned, I agree with him, but no doubt, as my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) has said, it is open to the Imperial authorities to-day to enlist men in this country for the Imperial service. In fact, as my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Hughes) knows, a general order was issued not very long ago by the Militia Department here, pointing out that recruiting may be done for the Imperial army at the various depots in this country. Every one must have listened with the greatest of pleasure to the speech which my hon. friend made in presenting his resolution. I assume that his object was rather to call the attention of the country to his views and more particularly the attention of the people specially interested in military matters in this country, and I am convinced that the statement he has made here will prove a very interesting contribution to our military literature.

My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in criticising the observation of the mover of the motion, without intending to be unfair, misrepresented, I think, to some extent his meaning. He seemed to be under the impression that while we were expending large sums of money to bring useful settlers into this country, the proposition of the hon. member for Victoria was one to pay out money to send young men out of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not so understand it, but he wanted us to give a pension to these men after they had served their term in the British service, and thus encourage the loss of their labour during that term.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I thought the hon. gentleman understood that the proposal was to pay money in order to send them out of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In that case, I stand subject to correction. I understood the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) distinctly to say that all the expenses were to be borne by the Imperial authorities, but that on the return of these men from service they should be given land in the North-west in order that they might settle in that country. I think that my hon. friend from East Grey's (Mr. Sproule) criticism of old soldiers as settlers was scarcely fair. Whatever may have been true of some of the old settlers that have come to this country with the Imperial army, I think he will hardly say that young Canadians who had gone away for five or seven years' service in the Imperial army, on returning to Canada hale and hearty would not be good settlers to settle our great North-west country. I think the hon. gentleman would hardly say that; and if he did say it, I should differ with him in toto. One observation was dropped by my hon. friend from East Grey with which I entirely concur, and that is that it is not desirable in this country to give undue prominence to the military spirit. Though I have been connected with the militia for a long time and am now head of the department, I do not desire that undue prominence should be given to that spirit or undue trouble taken or undue expense incurred to build up in this country a spirit of militarism. I think it would be very undesirable to do that. The whole object contemplated by our militia system, so far as I have been able to study it and understand it, is rather that we should be able to defend ourselves in case of attack and aid the civil power in this country in case of any trouble in our own borders. I do not think that we, at the present time at any rate, should look beyond that; and I should be very sorry to see anything of that kind attempted. Nor do I understand that my hon. friend from North Victoria has any such idea in putting forward his motion.

Now, we have enough to do at the present time to perfect our present militia system. We have done a great deal, we have made great progress during the last twenty-five or thirty years in the development of our militia; but there is still much to do. It seems to me that, for the present at any rate, we have enough to do to perfect that system. And I would say to my hon. friend from North Victoria that after we have succeeded in perfecting our system, as I believe we shall do within a few years more, it will be time enough to undertake what he proposes. But when this is done, I think that what the hon. gentleman desires will come about naturally. If we have a perfect, self-contained force in Canada, each branch of that force ready within a reasonable time for active service, then it will be an easy matter, in case the mother country should desire our assistance, to send that assistance forward, for we shall be prepared to do it. In this way, it seems to me, that what the hon. member for North Victoria desires will come about naturally within a few years. The hon. gentleman has referred to trade lines, which he desires to see improved as between ourselves and the mother country; and he says that, pari passu, as the trade lines are improved between us and the mother country, and as our trade relations become closer, our military relations will improve also. I fully agree with him in that; but I would point out to him that we have made very rapid strides in that direction since the Government of my right hon. friend the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) came into power. We have done much to make common interest with the mother country on lines of trade by giving to the mother country a special preference in our market for what she has to sell as against the rest of the world. And, so the relations with the mother country are becoming closer and closer. My hon. friend speaks of "jingoism," and approves of it. I go heartily with him in the idea that he expresses, though, for my part, I think that idea might, perhaps, be better expressed by another word. My idea of jingoism was rather different from that which he expressed; but I entirely concur with the view which he has presented to this House of the desirability of the closest relations between the colonies and the mother country as a sound one. What we want is the unification of the Empire; what we want is the drawing together of every part of the Empire; and, as I said a moment ago, the most important step in that direction ever taken in any colony was taken by the right hon. the First Minister when he held out to Great Britain the offer of preferential trade relations with this country.

Now, in view of the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) has had an opportunity of bringing his views before the House and the country, and in view of the fact that, even at the present moment, what he chiefly desires can be brought about under the existing law. I ask him whether he would not think it wiser to withdraw the motion. I believe that by having the motion discussed, as he has to-day, he has done all that he hoped to do even if the motion carried. So, I would ask my hon. friend to be kind enough to withdraw his motion.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). I presume that I am entitled to say a few words in reply to some of the criticisms and suggestions that have been made by hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House. And, first, in reference to the remarks of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). The hon. gentleman could see no connection between the trade part of the motion and the other. In addressing such an intelligent body as the House of Commons, I thought there was no need to enter into a long argument to prove that there is no truer maxim than that "Trade follows the flag." I feel that if our Canadian troops were in service in India, in China, in the Pacific Islands or in Australia, the fact that our young men were there would direct the attention of the merchants to those lands, and new channels of trade would be opened up which, to-day, are practically closed to us. I would say, whilst speaking of that, that I, for one, object, and will continue to object, to the Dominion of Canada participating in the benefits that accrue to us as British subjects from the defensive forces of the Empire and the rights they secure for us in various markets of the world while contributing only a niggardly pittance of twenty-five cents a year for the support of the militia of this country, while the British people, who benefit to no greater extent, man for man, than we do, contribute dollars where we contribute cents to the upbuilding of the empire. A Canadian doing business in China is protected by the flag of Great Britain just as much as is the British merchant, and yet, all that Canada contributes to the support of her militia is the sum of 25 cents per head of her population, and not one dollar do we contribute to the navy that protects our merchants there. I maintain that it is our bounden duty, sooner or later—and my motion is for “sooner” rather than “later”—to take hold of this matter and contribute our fair share to the upbuilding of this great means of developing our trade and commerce under the flag.

Now, I was fortunate enough to anticipate in my preliminary remarks every objection that was urged by the hon. member for East Grey. I pointed out that it was said that we wanted immigrants rather than emigrants. But I pointed out also that these young men will go soldiering in any case :

The danger's self is lure alone.

There are men who will seek this service ; and if they cannot engage under the banners of the British Empire they will enroll themselves under that of a foreign nation—and, most likely, that of the United States, for that is where our young men drift to, for it is cheaper to go there than to cross to Great Britain. Our men go in thousands, when there is trouble, and enlist under a foreign flag. There is a certain element who are prone to soldier, and who, if they cannot soldier under the British ensign will do so under some other.

You cannot build up a people composed exclusively of farmers or merchants, there will always be some imbued with the military spirit. These men will seek an outlet for their military spirit, and if they cannot seek it at home, if they cannot seek it under the flag of their own Empire, they will seek it, as they are doing to-day, in the United States. I prefer giving these young men an opportunity of serving under their own flag. I also anticipated objections of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that soldiers would make poor settlers. My hon. friend has never done any soldiering. I have seen men before to-day objecting to young men joining the volunteer force of this country. I knew a distinguished clergyman in Canada who objected to military service, and in preaching to the people he endeavoured to prevent their sons from joining the volunteers. I asked him what he knew about volunteers, and told him that if he was not any better posted on the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ that he preached on Sundays than he was on the volunteer force, he had better leave his pulpit. I advised him to put on a uniform and come down to the camp, and he did so, and the result was that he asked to be appointed chaplain of the regiment. He was never more surprised in his life. A conference of clergymen could not conduct themselves better than the boys did in camp. Those men talk of what they do not know. I may say that that gentleman is not chaplain of that regiment to-day, as he has been promoted to a much larger district than the district in which he then lived ; although I may say that his successor, as soon as he came to replace him, asked to be appointed chaplain of the regiment. Talk of old soldiers making poor settlers. Go down to Glengarry, go up along the St. Lawrence frontier, go to Fraserville, up the Chambly Valley, down to Nova Scotia, go to North Victoria, go to the county of Grey, and I tell you the best men in those counties to-day are sons of old soldiers. I will take my hon. friend to the township of Stanhope, in North Victoria, where there are settlers there to-day just as good and as true men, and as energetic farmers, as any that can be found. Talk of soldiers being lazy, why, the very business of soldiering tends to drive laziness out of men. They learn habits of discipline and habits of life that for ever stand them in good stead. The most prosperous farmers I have ever known in Canada are men who have served the long term of twenty-one years, served in the ranks under the flag. I was thunderstruck to hear the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) making use of such remarks about old soldiers making poor settlers, to talk of them as being lazy, as following lazy lines of life. I think the trouble with the hon. gentleman is that he does not find them getting sick, they don't have occasion to call for medical attendance. I am afraid that is what has turned him against old soldiers.

An hon. MEMBER. Perhaps they don't vote right.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, they always vote right. The trouble with the hon. member for Grey is that they never get sick, and he never has a chance to render them doctor's bills. He also spoke of it being a detriment to the settlement of a country to have men engaged in military service. I have heard a distinguished gentleman state that one thing that built up Australia as much as anything else, was the fact that old soldiers had gone out there and become settlers, and the fact that the English cricketers were occasionally going out there on a visit. I venture to say that the arrival of the New South Wales Lancers in England yesterday will bring more immigrants to New South Wales than ten times the money that New South Wales is spending to pay their expenses in Britain. The offer of the New Zealand government of a regiment to go to the Samoan Islands a week or two ago, will do more to bring immigrants to New Zealand than any such beggarly policy as this Government is pursuing, not only this Government, but all Canadian Governments without exception, in relation to the militia of this country. We tax the people of this country a beggarly 25 cents per head a year for the militia, and there is not a country on the face of this globe that does not double that amount. I do not know that there were any other objections made by any of the speakers that had not been anticipated. As the hon. Minister remarked, the objection that was advanced by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) had been advanced and met by me in my introductory remarks. In deference to the wish of the Minister I am willing to withdraw my motion, now that the matter has been ventilated and brought to the attention of the great power which lies behind all these matters, the public sentiment of the country. I will now let this question be discussed and considered by the people. But I may say that I am satisfied the Government would be carrying out the wishes of the country if they were to intimate, indirectly, if they do not wish to do so directly, on the floor of the House, to the British Government in a semi-official manner that the privilege would be given them to enlist men in this country. Now, I will say a word in connection with the recruiting stations that have already been arranged for under an order of the Militia Department for the 100th Regiment. I give the Minister of Militia and Defence fair warning that his recruiting stations for a regiment will be an utter failure, and if he takes my advice, and the advice of men who have studied the question, he will not allow it, because the result will be that it will go abroad that Canadians are not loyal, and do not seek to enlist in the British service. I say that Canadians will not enlist in the British service under British officers, but they will enlist in a Canadian regiment of their own under Canadian officers, men who are familiar with their ways and with their wants and wishes. Then, mark my words, you will fill the ranks of that regiment within twenty-four hours of the first issue of that order. But you will never fill a regiment with Canadians by opening recruiting stations in order to fill up any regiment such as the old Royal Canadian regiment at Halifax. At the request of the Minister and with the consent of the House, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I do not wish to take any part in the military discussion, not being a military man myself. I venture to say, however, that I think we are fortunate at the present time in having the very able military adviser who has been sent out to us by the mother country, and personally I feel safe in his hands. I am glad to see, from what I find in the press, that that officer and the present Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) seem to be acting together in such perfect harmony, and in such a thoroughly good spirit. I would not have risen to say a word on this occasion but for two remarks that have fallen from previous speakers. One remark fell a moment ago from my hon. friend with reference to the question of the expenditure of Canada on military matters, and in defence of the Empire. I would only say that I entirely agree with the view that it is not creditable for a great country like Canada to expend only something like 33 cents per head of her population in defence of the Empire of which she forms so great a part. I think that the time has come when, in duty to ourselves if not duty to the Empire, we ought to show that we are not satisfied that the workingmen of England should defend Canada—for that is the position in which we stand to-day. The labouring men in England are paying to defend us, to take care of us, and I think the time has come when we should consider ourselves to be a little too big for that. How best to contribute to the defence of the Empire is another thing. I desire simply to make that one remark. I may say, as I have said before, that I think we ought to have a common fund raised by special tax for the purpose of Imperial defence and inter-communication. I believe that a fund of that kind could be established over the Empire by imposing a small duty, irrespective of any existing duty or any existing tariff, upon goods imported by the Empire from foreign countries. That, I believe could be done, and a defence fund raised in a broad and statesmanlike way as was proposed by Mr. Hoffmeyer long ago. But there was a remark which fell from the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) which chiefly caused me to say a word, and that was when he took so much credit to the Government for having given to the mother country preferential trade as against the rest of the world. I do not feel inclined, Mr. Speaker, to sit still and hear a remark of that kind made without entering a protest. I have already said that I do give credit to the Government for having done something which has eventuated in a British preference. I think that credit they deserve, but I cannot go further than that.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is enough.

Mr. McNEILL. My right hon. friend says, that is enough.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a matter for congratulation.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, it is a matter for congratulation, and I give the right hon. gentleman my congratulations cordially.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Do not go farther than that, because that would spoil it.

Mr. McNEILL. When the Government brought down their tariff in 1897 they had no intention of giving to England any better terms than they gave to the rest of the world. They brought down a tariff, the principle of which was diametrically opposed to preferential trade with England. By bringing down that tariff, as they did, and by the fact that, under the terms named, English goods had to come in immediately with a preference and no other goods could come in under that tariff, immediately, with a preference, until an investigation took place, they accidentally gave preferential trade for the time being. But my right hon. friend knows very well, and the hon. Minister of Militia knows perfectly well, that, when the Government were pressed, over and over again, in this House, to say that they really meant to give a preference to England, in the true sense of the word, they refused to commit themselves to any such policy. The essence of the offer was reciprocity to the world, not only the essence but the literal term of it, and, as explained by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in the most explicit terms, the preference offered to England was offered equally to any country in the world, whose tariff was as favourable to Canada as Schedule D was to that country. This was a curious kind of preference to England. I do not think the Government should have taken very much credit for that preference to England, in view of the fact that the preference to other countries was claimed, within the course of a few weeks and that their goods must have been admitted on the same terms upon which English goods were being admitted. Under the terms of that offer the goods of other countries must have been admitted and there the matter would have stood. But now there is the true preference. Does the Government claim credit for that? Will my right hon. friend say that his action brought about that true preference as distinguished from the preference his Government brought down in 1897? My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that Mr. Chamberlain, in London, told him and told the other premiers, that in order that there should be any preference to England, it was necessary that it should be given 'nominatim.' He pointed out to him, and to the other premiers, that by the terms of the offer that had been made by the Canadian Government, so soon as a minor country, like Holland, was admitted under the offer of their tariff, every other nation had to come in with Holland, no matter how hostile their preference might be. The intention of the Government was that only those countries whose tariffs were as favourable as our Schedule D was to those countries, should be admitted. Mr. Chamberlain pointed out, in London, to the premiers, the impossibility and absurdity of that offer, because, as he said, as soon as one of these countries was admitted, then, by the most-favoured-nation clause, as he said, almost every great trading country in the world came in, no matter how hostile their tariffs might be. So that the Government were forced to give this true British preference, and when the credit is taken for it by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, I do not feel inclined to sit still and allow a statement of that kind to go without entering my protest. The Government were compelled to give a true British preference. Either the Government had to give a true British preference or they had to withdraw that clause from the tariff altogether, one or the other, and as the right hon. Prime Minister, and the hon. Minister who sits beside him (Sir Louis Davies), had stated in England, in the most explicit language, that they were really desirous of giving a true British preference, and as they had received honours by reason of the course they had pursued in that regard, as a matter of course they could not withdraw the clause, and they were compelled by the stress of circumstances to give this true British preference. Therefore, I say, I do not think it was altogether fair that my right hon. friend and his colleagues should claim credit for something which was really wrested out of their hands, which was imposed upon them, which they had absolutely refused to say they were willing to do, and which is directly contrary to the principle of the resolution they placed on record in 1897.

Motion withdrawn.

DOMINION RIFLE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. S. HUGHES (North Victoria) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, the best interests of the active militia would be advanced were the Government annually to grant transport to, and entrance fees for, the matches of the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association, to two men or more, not previously prizewinners in the said matches, from each battalion or similar unit of other arms of the active militia of Canada.

He said: In moving this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I have at heart the interests, not only of the Dominion Rifle Association of Canada, but also of the militia of this country. At the time I gave notice of this motion I was not aware of the proposition which I find in the very excellent report of the General Officer Commanding in the Dominion. I find the same idea in his report, although it is not the same plan exactly, where he proposes centralizing, in a sense, and distributing, in another sense, the interests of rifle shooting in connection with the Dominion Rifle Association matches. I have, for a number of years, been an attendant at the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association matches, and I have, for a number of years, been an officer of that association. I do not stand here to underestimate or minimize the value of that association to the rifle and militia interests of this country. They are patent; therefore, I need not take up the time of the House in discussing that. However, I feel that the benefits accruing to the country from that association, would be further extended were some such suggestion as the one I have proposed here, carried out. It would stimulate the interest in the objects of this association. At the present time the interest in rifle shooting is largely confined to such centres as Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Victoria, and the few limited centres where the men have the Government rifle ranges at their disposal.

It is a very difficult matter for a rural battalion to pay the expenses of the men to Ottawa, pay their entrance fees to the matches, and pay their board and lodging here. Even if every man who came here won a first prize, he would indeed return home out of pocket. I am free to say, that there are pot-hunters connected with the rifle shooting of the Dominion, but they are very, very few, and, were some such proposition as this carried out, whereby the Government would assume the responsibility of bringing up two of the best new shots in a battalion, we could overcome that difficulty. It is my intention, that the men coming up each year would be men who were not previously prize-winners, and, in that way, at least two new shots could be easily supplied by each corps. Once they developed their ability under the Government patronage, these men would come up year after year, and the old pot-hunters would be got rid of in the only way he ever will be got rid of; that is, by encouraging the rising young shots in the country. The people of British Columbia, I believe, pay the expenses of a few of their shots at Ottawa, and other localities do the same. But, supposing more than the eight who are sent from British Columbia, wish to come to Ottawa, the barriers in their way are insurmountable. In the western part of Ontario, if a rural regiment wants to send a few men down here, the expenses will amount to between from $30, to $50 each. Nevertheless, we find that, year after year, young men come from long distances and pay their way to participate in the Dominion rifle matches and take the chance of the honour of their being selected on the Bisley team. I am satisfied, that, if this motion is adopted by the Government, it will improve the shooting, bring in new men, drive out the pot-hunters, and afford a link between the Canadian militia and the Queen's prize. I have reason to believe that a change in the basis of the National Rifle Association is being considered, and I trust the day is not far distant when, under the auspices of the Government, riflemen from every regiment in Canada will have an opportunity of competing in our Dominion rifle matches, stand an equal chance of winning a position on the Bisley team, and, ultimately, of becoming Queen's prize winners. I have great pleasure in moving this resolution, seconded by Colonel Prior.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Before the resolution is put, I would like to make one observation. I had the honour of attending the annual meeting of the rifle association this year, as representing my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), who happened to be absent, and I listened with very great pleasure to the extremely practical and sensible remarks which were made before that association by His Excellency the Governor General. He more than hinted, that possibly we were spending our money in the wrong direction, and that, while we were cultivating individual shooting in the different battalions throughout the country, we were losing sight of that which experience has now shown to be an essential of all effective work, viz., the training of companies in precision of shooting. The motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) is in the direction of simply singling out a few men in each company, and devoting a great deal of expense and time to enabling these men to become crack shots. We would bring them from regiments in remote parts of the country to compete here, without securing the great practical result which His Excellency referred to. I think His Excellency's remarks were endorsed by the General, when he said that experience had shown that company shooting as a whole was the great essential of all effective field work. I do not wish to discuss the matter further, because I am, perhaps, not competent to do so, but I was deeply impressed with the remarks made on that occasion, and I think my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden)—with whom I have not had an opportunity of conferring since the meeting of the rifle association—if he thinks the matter over, will find that possibly more good will be effected from acting on the suggestion made by His Excellency and the General Commanding, than by spending more money in the development of individual crack shots.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) and the mover of the motion (Mr. Hughes) are perhaps referring to two quite different things. I was not present at the meeting of the rifle association, but I know that for two or three years past the question of volley firing at targets has been considered, and I also know that it is a very important one. While General Gascoigne was here, a commencement was made in that direction, but that shooting will probably take place at the headquarters of each battalion, and will not involve any expenditure, because it will be conducted at the camps. There is now an annual issue of the necessary cartridges, and, instead of firing all their shots individually, as they have been in the habit of doing, the militia companies will fire a certain number of volleys. What my hon.

friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) refers to is something different. I sympathize very much with his views. In fact, I have no hesitation in saying, that it has been my own idea for some time past, that we should restrict even the men going to Bisley to some extent; that, instead of having what is known as pot-hunters, year after year, we should say that, after two years, or three years, or one year for that matter, teams should be composed of entirely new men. This would give new hope for the younger men. As it is now, I know, by personal experience, that the younger men get discouraged. They say: It is no use going into this thing, for here is Mr. A, or Mr. B, or Mr. C, who seems to have possession, and there is no hope of trying to compete with him. If rifle shooting is going to do this country any good, this evil must be overcome, and the exact knowledge of the rifle must be disseminated throughout the whole militia. What we want is a general knowledge of the use of the rifle, and in order to get that, I think we should have some restriction against the pot-hunters, and we should offer some special encouragement to bring a new lot of men into competition. I am entirely in sympathy with the remarks made by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Hughes). I suppose, however, he will be quite willing to leave the carrying into effect of his idea in the hands of the department, and that he will not press his motion to a vote. I will ask the hon. gentleman, therefore, to do what he was good enough to do in the other case, and that is, after having presented his views, in which I entirely concur, withdraw his motion.

Mr. SAM HUGHES (North Victoria). I presume no one wishes to discuss this matter further, and I may say that I would not have put this motion on the paper if I had had access, before the opening of the House, to the very excellent report of the Major-General Commanding. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is correct in saying that no doubt volley firing is an absolute necessity, but I maintain that a man cannot do well in volley firing unless he can do good individual shooting. I have read up the different authorities at home and in this country on that subject, and I find that a great many of them hold that individual firing after all is very essential. In my opinion, good shooting should not be limited to one or two men in the company, which is the result the present system tends to lead to, but that it should be brought down to the ranks of every company in the Dominion. I have pointed out that under the present system, men in the rural battalions and many men in the city battalions are not in a position to take advantage of the competitions at the Dominion matches, and it is to bring such men to the front that I have proposed this motion. If we could enable men in every battalion to come here and take part in the Dominion matches, the effect would be that every man in the battalion would have a prize in front of him which would be an incentive to him to perfect his skill. He would no longer feel that he was not in a position to afford to come to Ottawa to take part in these matches, as many men do now, who say, to themselves: It does not matter whether I win first place or not, I cannot afford to go to Ottawa to compete in the Dominion Rifle Association matches, and, consequently, there is no practical benefit to me in keeping up my practice. Such is the feeling to-day, and under this condition of things it is only those men who are ardent sportsmen or who can afford the expense who practise for competition in those matches. The position I take is that in order to have accurate volley firing, we must cultivate individual shooting; and it is with the view of doing so that I make this proposal. As I have said, I would not have made this motion had I seen the report of the Major-General Commanding, and now that the matter is already in such very good hands, I shall withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

LIEUT.-GOVERNOR OF B. C. AND TURNER ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria) moved for:

Copies of all petitions addressed to His Excellency the Governor General by members of the Turner Administration in the province of British Columbia respecting the conduct of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of that province, and praying for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the same, together with all papers and correspondence connected with said petition; and also copies of all papers and correspondence in any way relating to the action of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia in dismissing the Turner Administration in the said province.

He said: I very much regret, Mr. Speaker, that I find my duty compels me to make a motion of this kind; but it is of great interest to the country, and especially the province from which I come, that the correspondence and papers I ask for should be brought down. The proceedings of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, with regard to the dismissal of the late Government of that province and the formation of a new one were such that I think they should be ventilated in Parliament, and it is for this reason I consider it my duty to call for the papers. I do not intend to discuss the matter—in fact, I am not at present in a position to do so, nor are the other gentlemen who are much abler than I to treat it from a constitutional standpoint—but after the papers are brought down, I hope to have more to say on the matter.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA JUDGES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia and the Government of Canada since July, 1898, to the present date, respecting the Supreme Courts, County Courts or any of the judges for the province aforesaid, the appointments of said judges or any of them, or other matters relating to the administration of justice in the said province.

He said : My object is to have brought down, as soon as possible, the correspondence I ask for, which cannot be at all lengthy. There have been several appointments, since the date mentioned in the resolution, in British Columbia, and there has been some interesting legislation passed by the local legislature of that province regarding the work of the judiciary there. There have been also some rather extraordinary changes with regard to the salaries of the county court judges, who up to this year received $500 per annum more than they now do. I do not know myself what the correspondence there really was, but it is tolerably clear to my mind that before or during 1889 there was some correspondence between the local government and the Federal Government with regard to the payment of county court judges, and the sum, if my memory serves me right, that the local authorities undertook to provide was $500 for certain judges, at any rate, who were to perform, in addition to the duties of county court judges, the duties of stipendiary magistrates in considerable districts. Suddenly, I believe, and without notice, the legislature discontinued voting that $500, which these judges have previously been voted in addition to the amount provided by this Parliament of $2,400 per year, so that the incumbents of those positions now find themselves in a position never anticipated by those of them who accepted an appointment when the salary made up by these two legislatures amounted to some $500 more than they are now getting. If I am not mistaken, there was some correspondence between the Ontario Government and the Federal Government with regard to the adjustment of a similar condition of things in that province. The local legislature of Ontario did not consider the salary paid the judges of the Court of Appeal there by this Government sufficient to secure the services of as strong a court as they would like. Consequently, they were in the habit of voting these judges $1,000 per annum in addition to the amount voted by this Parliament. There were constitutional questions involved, and that was not considered a proper mode of dealing with that court, so that by arrangements this vote of $1,000 was stopped in Ontario, but the deficit was made up by this Parliament. I think that the Federal Government, the Justice Department particularly, took objection to the principle of the local authorities supplementing the amount voted for the judges by this House ; but in order that no one should suffer and no wrong be done, this Parliament made the necessary provisions to compensate them for the discontinuance of the vote by the local legislature. It will be interesting to have the correspondence, if there has been any, in connection with the county court judges in the province of British Columbia between this Government and the local government of British Columbia. Then, no doubt, there was also some correspondence regarding a matter freely discussed in the local press, namely, the appointments to the two vacancies that occurred since July, 1898, in the Supreme Court of that province.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

According to newspaper statements and to rumours among members of the bar, the Government endeavoured to make arrangements or to discuss the questions of residence with possible appointees to the Supreme Court, and it was supposed to be a question whether a leading member of the bar in British Columbia should be appointed to the bench, when he would reside in Vancouver instead of Victoria. There are interesting points, if that question comes up, as to how much this Parliament or the Government is at liberty to consider conditions in connection with the appointment of a judge or whether their duty is not a perfunctory one, as the Prime Minister mentioned in connection with this subject of judicial appointments, the duty of the Government simply being to fill vacancies. There are questions, too, of another character. I understand that a leading member of the bar would not take the position on these conditions, and I venture to think that he had the correct opinion of the position and the importance of it and the connection between any member of the bench and the executive. Then there appears to be, and I think this motion will cover the case, correspondence to show how that was brought about. I may refer to Judge Irving. He lives in Victoria in one sense, but is practically all the time in Vancouver. There may be, I have no doubt there is, some correspondence which will explain how it is that he is compelled to make his arrangements as they are now made, although the Chief Justice resides very near Vancouver, in the city of New Westminster. All of these points are covered by the motion which asks for the correspondence since last July, and I will be very glad if the correspondence could be brought down as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY BRANCHES IN P.E.I.

Mr. ALEXANDER MARTIN (Queen's, P.E.I.) moved for :

All correspondence, petitions, resolutions and other papers in possession of the Government, relating to the proposed branch railway from Southport to Murray Harbour and other proposed railway branches in the province of P.E.I.

He said : A motion of this kind has been brought before Parliament by me on several occasions, but not disposed of. Last session of Parliament met on 3rd day of February. On the 15th February, I gave notice of a motion similar to this. It did not come up for discussion until the 2nd of May. I spoke on the subject that day until six o'clock, when the debate was adjourned, and it did not come up again during that tolerably long session. The same fate had overtaken the motion in two previous sessions.

I think that the leader of the House should make some provision to have such motions concluded during the session of Parliament. At the last session of Parliament, I believe, about 30 motions similar to this were not disposed of before prorogation. I do not say it in any carping spirit, but I think that for the business reputation of this House there should be some way by which such motions would be disposed of. The one I now propose to discuss has been put before this House for three or four sessions, and the correspondence has not yet been brought down. No doubt this motion will cover a great deal of correspondence; a large number of petitions very numerous signed; resolutions passed at public meetings in various parts of the province; and resolutions passed by the Legislature of the province, the majority of whose members are in sympathy with the Government now in power in the Dominion. There were also resolutions passed by the Board of Trade in Prince Edward Island asking this Parliament to carry out the project covered by the motion which I have just read. The agitation for this railway dates back for a period of over 25 years. It is true, perhaps, that it did not come before this Parliament, at least in a tangible form, previous to the year 1895 or 1896, but when the main line of the Prince Edward Island Railway was built and the Tignish and the Souris branches proposed to be constructed, there were promises made that this branch railway would be the first built of the three. But party squabbles at that time defeated the project, and Prince Edward Island shortly afterwards entered confederation. It was supposed that on becoming part of a large country like Canada, that the confederated country would take hold of this project and carry it to a conclusion. But I am very sorry to say that party strife interfered again in carrying out this project, and the measure of justice which Prince Edward Island should have had in the carrying out of this railway extension has not yet been accorded to it. The present Prince Edward Island Railway was in progress of construction at the time of confederation, and I do not suppose there is any person who will dispute that if there was a very great necessity for the building of that road for the advancement of the province then there is a still greater necessity to-day that this project should be carried out. One-fifth of the province is interested in the building of this road, and that proportion of the province is retarded in its growth, progress and development for the want of it. The section traversed by this road is one of the finest in the province of Prince Edward Island, and one of the finest, perhaps, in the whole of Canada. It is peopled by an enterprising, hardy, honest and industrious class of people. But they find a serious drawback in the want of good harbours and proper means of communication. Those harbours are small and in most instances need dredging and attention. As hon. gentlemen are aware, the province is practically cut off during the winter season from communication with the rest of Canada; so much so that in that province we are in a position of what may be called "splendid isolation" during the winter season. True, there is a boat running from one port in the province to the mainland, but the accommodation which that boat gives is not sufficient for the wants of the province. Let me inform this House that Prince Edward Island is the most densely populated of any province in the Dominion; and when I tell you that Prince Edward Island has fifty-four people to the square mile, against 1.5 for the whole of the rest of Canada, it will be understood that though the province is small, its agricultural exports are proportionately large. Being an agricultural country, and the exports being chiefly in the coarser grains, and there being only a limited season in which to ship those products, while that season lasts the people have to improve every opportunity. What remains over after the ice has formed requires a great deal of trouble to ship, and besides there is also a good deal of uncertainty about it. Although we have a boat there which does tolerably fair work, there is still a certain amount of uncertainty, and when produce needs to be shipped the boat may be, and very often is, caught in the ice, so that practically the shipping of that province must be done in a very short period in the spring and fall. Now, the change that has been made with regard to butter and cheese-making, renders it still more necessary that there should be exit from the province during the winter season. A large part of the province is debarred at present from even taking any advantage of the communication which the "Stanley" at present affords. The Dominion of Canada may boast, and think that it is doing a great deal for us in providing a new steamer to replace the "Stanley." But I have this remark to make, and I wish the members of the Government to give some attention to it, that during the time that steamer is performing service in Prince Edward Island in the winter season, the traffic is so great that the boat is self-sustaining, or more than self-sustaining. So that so far as the boat is of service to the province of Prince Edward Island, that province is paying you a quid pro quo, and is not any burden on the Dominion of Canada. I may say that this line is proposed to extend between Southport, opposite Charlottetown, and Murray Harbour, and I am going to make this assertion in regard to the ports between those two points, that there is not one well-equipped harbour between Charlottetown and Murray Harbour South the proposed terminus of this road. I am sure that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will bear me out in every word I say. Take these harbours seriatim from Murray Harbour South to Charlottetown, and I doubt if there is one well-equipped harbour on that coast. Take the first one at Murray River. It is naturally a good harbour, but it needs dredging. Private enterprise had to step in and provide the accommodation at Murray River which the Dominion Government have time and again refused to provide, and you still refuse to dredge it. Take the next harbour, that of Wood Island. The late Government, to be sure, spent a good deal of money there, but the harbour is practically of little service. As it is, it either wants dredging or else still further extension of the western block before it is fit for shipping for vessels of any size. Take the next harbour, Belle River. The Minister of Public Works is not in his place, but last session I asked for a very small sum, one or two thousand dollars, to be expended at Belle River, and what answer did I receive? The Minister of Public Works got up and told me that that harbour was not under his control, and he did not spend money on any harbours in this Dominion which were not under his control. I immediately asked for a return showing the amount of money which this Government had spent for three years on harbours over which he had no control, and the answer made me was that the expenditure was so large, and the harbours so numerous in different parts of Canada in which expenditures were made, that he could not bring the return down last session, and it has not yet been laid before the House. So that when an expenditure is wanted in Prince Edward Island the Minister of Public Works can stand up and say: Oh, well, we are not spending any money on private harbours, I can spend no money on a harbour not under my control, but when it comes to a harbour in Quebec or some other province, the money is freely voted.

REPORTED SEIZURE OF SLOOP "DOROTHY."

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair at six o'clock, I wish to be allowed to put a question to the right hon. leader of the Government in regard to a matter of great importance, to my mind. I see a telegram in the "Citizen" this morning from Vancouver, which says:

United States customs authorities at Skagway have seized the sloop "Dorothy," belonging to Vancouver parties, for alleged failure to report at an American port. The news of this capture has aroused intense indignation here, and it is looked upon as a spiteful bit of retaliation on the part of the local American customs officials.

I would ask the right hon. gentleman if he can tell the House whether any information of that proceeding has been received by the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I can only say that up to this moment I have received no intimation of it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. MARTIN.

After Recess

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair, I was referring to the harbours on the south coast of Prince Edward Island, between Charlottetown and the proposed terminus of the railway. I made the assertion, that there was no shipping port between these two points adequate to the trade of that section of the country. I was proceeding to refer to those harbours, one after another, and I referred to the harbour of Belle River. The next harbour contiguous to Belle River is Pinette harbour. This harbour is one in whose interest the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has often pleaded, when he was on this side of the House, but I am afraid that he has forgotten what he has said so often in reference to the inadequacy of the shipping accommodation there. I hope, Sir, that, perhaps, this session that harbour may receive some attention. Take next the harbour of Vernon River. Perhaps the hon. members of this House may not be acquainted with that harbour, but I am sure the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows the difficulties that harbour has to contend with. That harbour has been in need of dredging for years. The hon. Minister himself has, time and again, during thirteen or fourteen years, advocated the dredging of that harbour, but since he has crossed the floor to that side of the House he has forgotten it completely. Take the next harbour to Vernon River—China Point, and it has a history. The pier at China Point has floated down the river, and has been in that condition for two or three years. I think there was an appropriation of $500 a few years ago, and an appropriation last session of $2,000, but I do not think that there is any accommodation for shipping at that point yet. Take the next harbours from China Point—Pownal and Alexandria. These two harbours need attention. I may say, what I said at first, that there is not one well-equipped harbour between Charlottetown and the proposed terminus of this road. The expenditure on these harbours in Prince Edward Island has been very small; there is more spent on one harbour in some of the other provinces in this Dominion than in the whole province of Prince Edward Island. It may be said, that, if you improve the harbour on the south side of the province, there will be no necessity for this road. You must remember that there is a large inland section, and you must also remember the conditions there in consequence of the peculiar position of Prince Edward Island, and that, during the whole of the winter season, communication with the Dominion necessitates ample accommodation for shipping before they are frozen in. But there is also another argument which I might place before the House, in regard to the necessity of this road. Hon. members are probably aware that the steamer which plies between Pictou and the port of George town has, time and again, been caught out in the ice. The proposed terminus of this road would provide an alternative place for landing passengers and freight. During this last season, the ice-boat floated helplessly in the gulf for eighteen days. After floating helplessly in the gulf for eighteen days, she had to land passengers very near the proposed terminus. Some years ago the boat had been in the gulf ten or twelve days, caught in the same way. So that this road would provide a landing place for the passengers and freight and carry them to their different destinations all over the province. When I make this statement, I think I am justified in saying, that the building of this road is of Dominion importance, as it affords an alternative route for landing the passengers of the ice-boat during the winter season. I may say, also, and I do not think it will be contradicted, that this proposed railway will be a feeder to the main line in Prince Edward Island. I am here to say that one of the great mistakes that was made in regard to the Prince Edward Island Railway was in regard to the fixing of such high rates. The rate on the Prince Edward Island road is the same as on the Intercolonial Railway, but when you consider that the Prince Edward Island Railway is only a cheap narrow gauge road, and when you consider further that it has fifty per cent of a curvature—I believe that is the report in regard to it—you will find that before you make two miles of progress on that road you will have to pay for three miles of travel. Therefore, the rate being 3 cents a mile you have actually to pay four and a half cents per mile; you pay one-third as much more for actual travel on the Prince Edward Island Railway as you do on the Intercolonial Railway, which is comparatively straight. The same holds good with regard to freight, and I contend that there was almost a crime perpetrated on the people of the province—there certainly was a barrier placed against the success of the road, when the rates were fixed on the same basis as on a railway which cost three times as much to build. I am aware that these rates were fixed as far back as 1875, and I am well pleased that a Conservative Government never fixed these rates, although I blame the Conservative Government for leaving the rates so high for such a long period of years. The Liberal party will now redeem itself in my eyes, and in the eyes of the people of that province, and of the whole of Canada, if it reduces the rates on the Prince Edward Island Railway to a fair and equitable basis as compared with the Intercolonial Railway. I referred to the starting point of this road as being at Southport, and I may say that it will pass through some of the richest parts of the province. Starting at Southport it passes in the vicinity of Kippock, Alexandria, Pownal, Village Green, Millview, Cherry Valley, Mount Herbert, Donagh, Johnson's River, Auburn, Fort Augustus, Pilsquid, Fairview and Avondale. Turning to the south, it goes through or not far from the flourishing sections of Vernon River, Orwell, Alberry Plains, Uigg, Kenross, Dundee, Fairville, Lyndale, Valleyfield, Grandview, Newton, Belfast, Montague, Surrey, Garlaich Middleton, Melville, Flat River, Caledonia. Let me say here, and I hope the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) will give me his attention, at this particular point, there is a very large interior section of the country here, which, perhaps, it is rather difficult to place in communication with railways, for there would no doubt be a good deal of trouble in getting a line so as to accommodate a large portion of this section, unless great care were taken to select a proper route. I may say that the proposal of the late Government to build a spur at some point of the new line by the way of Montague Bridge was a good one, and unless that is done, the beneficial results which will arise from the building of this road will to some extent not be fulfilled. I do hope, although the road has been surveyed, that the Minister of Railways will seriously consider this and that the Government will consider the desirability of the short spur I have mentioned. Now that conditions have changed in Prince Edward Island, and that we have shipping in the winter months of fresh fish, butter, poultry, &c., it is all the more important that ten or twelve miles of railway should be built here, which would serve a large section of lots 59, 61, 63 and the eastern parts of lots 57 and 58. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to that, and trust that he will have it carried out by the Government. The road turns at this point to Murray River, and passes through or in the vicinity of Wood Island, Culloden, Mount Vernon, Iris, Dover, Glen William, Peters' Road, Little Sands, High Bank, White Sands, Hopefield and from Murray River down to deep water at Murray Harbour South. As I said, it will afford an alternative route in the winter, should the steamer "Stanley" be caught in the ice as she has been time and again for some years past. Some hon. members of this House may think it a light thing that a steamer loaded with freight and passengers should be floating about ten or fourteen days in the ice. If you build this road and make this the proposed terminus, it will give you an alternative route for that steamer in the winter, and you are doing a work that is not only beneficial to the province, but which assumes Dominion importance. This spur line will be a great accommodation to the farmers and fishermen for shipping in the winter season. It will shorten the route over which they have to ship about four-fifths, and I need hardly say that that is quite an item in shipping freight. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any good reason can be shown why the construction of the proposed road should not be proceeded with. True, you may say that Prince Island is the smallest province in the Dominion; you may say that province has no influence; you may continue to build railways all over the rest of Canada; you may not only do that, but you may build parallel lines of railway, as has been done between Quebec and Montreal; and you may compel Prince Edward Island to pay its share of the interest of the construction of these roads; the Government, I say, may continue to do that, but all the time the Government is doing an injustice to Prince Edward Island. You will remember that a proposal was made some years ago for the admission of Newfoundland into this great Dominion, but Newfoundland saw clearly what was happening in Prince Edward Island; it saw that Prince Edward Island had to bear its share of the railway and canal expenditure all over the Dominion, and got nothing in return, and so Newfoundland said: We will likely receive the same treatment at the hands of this great confederation as Prince Edward Island is receiving, and we will not enter. The same thing happened not very long ago when the Australasian provinces were propounding a scheme of confederation. New Zealand refused to join the confederation, because the larger interests of the greater colonies would probably extinguish the smaller interests of New Zealand. Need I refer to the case of Ireland. Ireland has suffered in the same way. There we find that the strong have oppressed the weak, and the weak have hated the strong; but I hope that you will not introduce into Prince Edward Island the same element of discord by refusing to grant a small measure of justice to that province.

A great objection has been raised against the building of this road in Prince Edward Island by the statement that the railway there was built at the cost of this Dominion. Now, I need not, I think, to any of the hon. gentlemen who heard me last year, refute that fiction again; but, lest there may be any here who did not learn the true position of affairs in regard to that railway, I will refer to it again. When I spoke on this question last year, I quoted the very highest authority which I think anybody could bring before this Parliament to show that Prince Edward Island paid every dollar of its own railway expenditure. What I quoted from to prove that assertion was an Order of the Privy Council of Great Britain passed in the year 1873, when Prince Edward Island entered the confederation, which runs as follows:—

By Order in Council dated Windsor, 26th June, 1873, Her Majesty thought fit to approve the terms and conditions set forth in the Addresses from the Houses of Parliament of Canada and from the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, May, 1873, and it was declared by Her Majesty: "From and after the 1st day of July, 1873, Prince Edward Island should be admitted and become part of the Dominion."

By the resolutions which formed the basis of union it was provided "that the railways under contract and in course of construction for the Government of the Island shall become the property of Canada."

To carry out the above provision it was agreed that the cost of the railway should be borne by the Dominion, and the money so paid, charged as a debt against the Island.

Hon. members will notice the last part of that sentence.

Besides this minute of council, I placed before the House, when addressing it on another occasion, a statement of the different amounts which were charged against Prince Edward Island for the construction of that railway, and I will read that statement again for the information of the House:

|       |    | $   | cts.           |

This was the sum with which Prince Edward Island was charged for the construction of that railway. I may say—and it is a proud boast for the province of Prince Edward Island—that this is the largest expenditure per head made by any province of Canada for railways—very much the largest. On the basis of the population of Prince Edward Island in the year 1873 when we entered the Dominion, it would amount to $32.50 per head. No other province of Canada, as I have said, has expended nearly as much. Even the debt which Canada incurred for the construction of the great Canadian Pacific Railway, which is now the admiration of the world, is not as great comparatively as the debt which the little province of Prince Edward Island incurred in constructing its railway in 1875. The cost to the taxpayers of Canada for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway was only $15 per head of the population of Canada as against $32.50 per head which the people of Prince Edward Island had the enterprise to incur years before in the construction of their railway. Yet we find some hon. members in doubt as to whether Prince Edward Island ever paid a cent for railways. Let me call attention to the railway expenditure by the Dominion. I am going to refer to a return which was issued by the hon. Minister of Railways in the year 1896, asked for by me, showing the expenditure by the Dominion Government on railways since 1873, when Prince Edward Island entered the Dominion :

Statement showing separately the amount of money expended in each province of the Dominion and in the North-west Territories by the Dominion Government, from the 1st day of July, 1873, to the 28th September, 1896, for constructing, equipping and subsidizing railways in Canada :

|                           |                  | Per capita. |
|---------------------------|------------------|-------------|
| Ontario .....             | $29,889,153 51  | $14 13     |
| Quebec .....              | 14,666,937 61    | 9 85        |
| New Brunswick.....        | 9,045,538 07     | 28 15       |
| Nova Scotia.....          | 14,718,155 81    | 32 69       |
| Manitoba .....            | 8,024,432,37     | 52 61       |
| British Columbia .....    | 21,441,700 42    | 218 40      |
| North-west Territories... | 7,604,819 60     | 76 84       |
| Prince Edward Island....  | 635,830 27       | 5 82        |
|                           | $106,026,567 00 | $66 00     |

This Dominion, therefore, had expended in many provinces of Canada over four times as much as in Prince Edward Island, while Prince Edward Island, on the other hand, out of its own resources, paid over four times as much as many of the provinces of the Dominion. I extended that return down to the 30th June, 1898, which shows figures still more favourable to Prince Edward Island, and I submit it in tabulated form :

Statement showing expenditure made by the Dominion Government in each of the provinces, separately, from the 1st July, 1873, to 30th June, 1898 :

|                     |                 | Per capita. |
|---------------------|-----------------|-------------|
| Ontario .....       | $30,323,705 51 | or $14 34  |
| Quebec .....        | 15,382,381 03   | 10 33       |
| New Brunswick ..... | 9,215,361 14    | 28 68       |

| Total .....             | $108,208,924 29 | $22 38     |

While, therefore, we have been spending millions of dollars all over the rest of Canada on railways, Prince Edward Island has to put up with nearly the same railway accommodation she had when she entered confederation in 1873. Even that does not tell the whole story. Besides those large sums I have mentioned, we have given away of the heritage of this country 53,000,000 acres of land to build railways in other parts of the country in which Prince Edward Island had no direct interest. I ask again how in the face of those large expenditures in other parts of the Dominion, compared with the small pittance expended in Prince Edward Island, can you refuse to Prince Edward Island the small amount required for the construction of this railway ?

Now, I am going to submit to the House a statement of the expenditures made by the provinces, and I am going a little more minutely into that to show that the contention I have made with regard to the railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island as compared with the other provinces, is correct, namely, that Prince Edward Island has expended out of her own resources far beyond the amount expended by any other province. I have here a tabulated statement which I submitted last year of the expenditure by the local governments and municipalities of the various provinces on railway construction up to the 30th June, 1896. That statement is as follows :-

So that according to this tabulated statement, which is correct, no other province has paid as much as Prince Edward Island out of its own resources on railway construction. But last year when I made this statement, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who I am sorry is not in his seat, asked if this expenditure by Prince Edward Island was made previous to confederation or since. I replied that it did not change the question very much, when that expenditure was made, because the sums paid by the provinces on railways previous to confederation were charged against them in their debt to Canada, and as Prince Edward Island had no debt on entering confederation, outside of her railway expenditure, she would to-day be drawing interest on the sum of $3,140,000 from the time of confederation up to the present day if she had not made that large railway expenditure. I may say this, that if we take the period previous to confederation and include the expenditure previous to confederation by the provinces, as the hon. Minister of Finance seems to indicate it should be included, it will not change the figures very much. In fact, it will not change those figures at all, as far as the province of Ontario and Quebec are concerned, because they never spent a dollar on railways previous to confederation, while Nova Scotia and New Brunswick spent pretty largely. Let me read for the information of the House an extract from the Minister of Railways' report, which bears out the assertion I am making. On page 10 of that report for 1898, you will find the following:—

The Government expenditure on railways prior to and since the date of confederation (1867), amounts, on capital account, to $123,551,091.77, including a payment of $25,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and for railway subsidies charged against the Consolidated Fund, the further sum of $17,619,222.11, making a total expenditure of $140,834,731.39. In addition, there has been an expenditure since confederation for working expenses of $73,029,631.71, covering the maintenance and operation of Government roads, or a grand total of $213,863,363.03; all of which, with the exception of $13,881,460.65, has been expended on railways during the past thirty-one years.

Mr. MARTIN.

This shows that only $13,000,000 was spent on railways altogether, previous to confederation. Of that sum, there was spent in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick $10,766,725.54, and the remainder of it, over $3,000,000, was spent in Prince Edward Island. So that, if you take the expenditure prior to confederation, and include it in the statement I laid before the House, it will be as follows, giving to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia credit for the expenditure they had made previous to confederation. That would be a perfectly fair statement for all, including those provinces that had no expenditures under this head prior to confederation. I submit this statement, also, in tabulated form:

| Province.                  | Total.     | Provincial aid per Capita. |
|                            | $         | § cts.                     |

| Quebec .....               | 12,991,082 | 8 72                       |
| New Brunswick.....         | 9,085,713  | 28 21                      |

| British Columbia .....     | 75,000     | 0 76                       |
| North-west Territories ... | 25,000     | 0 25                       |
| Prince Edward Island . .   | 3,144,214  | 28 82                      |

This statement is brought down to the 30th June, 1896. But, if we carry the statement down to 30th June, 1898, it will be found still more favourable to the province of Prince Edward Island. The following are the figures:—

| Province.                   | Total.     | Per Capita. |
|-----------------------------|------------|-------------|
|                             | $         | § cts.      |
| Ontario .....               | 17,644,962 | 8 34        |
| Quebec .....                | 13,404,036 | 9 00        |
| New Brunswick .....         | 9,116,575  | 28 37       |
| Nova Scotia.....            | 8,696,042  | 19 30       |
| Manitoba .....              | 1,366,277  | 9 02        |
| British Columbia .....      | 37,500     | 0 38        |
| North-west Territories..... | .....      | Nil         |
| Prince Edward Island ....   | 3,144,214  | 28 82       |

Now, I wish to contrast the expenditures made by the provinces and the aid given by the Dominion to railways in the provinces in order to show this House that the province of Prince Edward Island has not been as generously dealt with by the Dominion in regard to railways as other provinces, although, as the smallest province, it might fairly expect to have the largest measure of justice. I will re-read the statement I have already given, together with the statement showing Dominion aid, in order to contrast these expenditures:

But, if this comparison is brought down to June, 1898, the figures are as follows:—

Dominion aid per Capita in each Province. Provincial aid per Capita in each Province.

|                |          |                |         |

| P. E. I. ....  | 5 82     | P. E. I. ....  | 28 82   |

This contrast is brought down to the 30th June, 1896. If we were to bring the comparison down so as to cover the period between 1896 and 1898, the statement would be still more favourable to the province of Prince Edward Island. The following is a statement in tabular form, giving the aid per capita to 30th June, 1898, by the Dominion and the provinces respectively:—

Dominion aid per Capita in each Province. Provincial and Municipal aid per Capita in each Province.

Now, Sir, I do not think there is any one but will say that, so far as railway expenditure is concerned, the province of Prince Edward Island has nobly done its part. Let us look at it from another standpoint. We will take the railway mileage of every province in the Dominion, and consider the Dominion aid given, in proportion to that mileage. This table I bring down to the 30th June, 1896:

| Province.           | Railway mileage. | DOMINION AID. |              |

Now, if we contrast that with the mileage in each province, and the aid which each province has given towards the construction of those roads, the statement will be as follows:—

| Province.           | Ry. Mileage in each. | Provincial Aid. |              | Aid Per Mile |

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to these figures. I think they are of some importance in a discussion of this question. You will find that these statements bear very directly on the question. If the Dominion of Canada gives at the rate of $3,000 for every mile of railway in Prince Edward Island, and that province out of its own resources, gives $14,000 to the mile; if Quebec receives from the Dominion Government at the rate of $6,370 per mile and only gives out of its own resources $4,043, it appears to me that these figures show that some of the provinces have been doing more than their share of railway construction. I point out especially that the province from which I come has paid more than its share of that work, and when I come to this House and ask for a small expenditure, I think I come with a very good case.

I am going to refer to one other feature of the question which I think ought to be of some interest to this House; I am going to submit a statement of the railway mileage, and I wish the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to give me his attention :

| Province.                  | Miles of Railway. | Population per Mile. |

Now, Sir, Prince Edward Island is by far the most densely-populated province of the Dominion. There is no doubt that the railway mileage of every country increases according to the density of population. Take the world over, and you will find that the railway mileage increases directly according to population. But here you have the province of Prince Edward Island, with the densest population, containing 54 people to the square mile against 1·5 for the rest of the Dominion, and yet having the smallest railway mileage in Canada. I think this fact shows clearly that the railway mileage of Prince Edward Island ought to be increased so as to bear a nearer ratio to its population. The density of population to the square mile in Canada is 1·5; for Manitoba, 2·4; for British Columbia, 1·3; Quebec, 6·5; for Ontario, 10; for New Brunswick, 11·4; for Nova Scotia, 22; while for Prince Edward Island it is 54. That was not the condition of affairs in regard to railway mileage when Prince Edward Island entered confederation. At that time it had one mile of railway for every 480 of the population; while the Dominion as a whole had only one mile for every 1,006 of the population. That is to say, while the population of the whole Dominion has only increased 33 per cent for the last 31 years, the railway mileage has increased 700 per cent. I think it is something to be proud of that the railway mileage of this country has increased 700 per cent since confederation. But in Prince Edward Island the railway mileage has only increased 6 per cent.

While you may boast, and we all may boast of the large railway expenditure of Canada, of this system of railways infusing life in the trade of the country, I say it is something to be proud of, but we have nothing to be proud of as far as railway extension in Prince Edward Island is concerned. When we entered the union, we had a mile of railway for every 480 people, but we have not that to-day. You have increased your railway mileage 700 per cent, and have increased your population 33 per cent. Our population increased 14 per cent, and you give us this small increase of 6 per cent of railway mileage. I think, when hon. members consider this, they cannot, with a proper sense of fair-play, exclude Prince Edward Island from participating in that railway expansion, which is the proud boast of Canada. Now, I will refer to this question from another standpoint, and, I think, a standpoint which cannot successfully be assailed. I may say, that I have gone into the figures in regard to the expenditure in different provinces. I did that, because, when I came to this House some years ago, I was met on either side of the House by members, saying, "Oh, but you have a splendid railway system in Prince Edward Island." I said, "We have nothing to thank the Dominion for, because our own province built it." But there was a number of members who said, that Prince Edward Island did not pay for its railway facilities. So, I have to give these facts minutely, in support of what I say, in order to place this question before the House in its true light.

Now, let me refer to the terms under which Prince Edward Island entered this confederation in 1873. You may remember, that Prince Edward Island at first refused to enter confederation. I have no doubt that, to some extent at least, the province foresaw the conditions of things that exist to-day, that in this great Dominion large expenditures would be incurred from which that small province would hardly have any direct or indirect benefit, although it would certainly be called upon to shoulder the interest on these vast expenditures of money. There was something else, in the case of Prince Edward Island entering the Dominion, it was different from that of the other provinces. When confederation was formed, the other provinces were allowed to enter on the basis of a certain ascertained debt, on the basis of the debt of Old Canada and the debt of the several provinces. But, when Prince Edward Island, a few years later, entered confederation, the debt of Canada had been increased, and not only had the debt been increased, but the Dominion of Canada was pledged to large expenditures on public works. Prince Edward Island said: If we enter the Dominion of Canada we will not only have to come in with a proportionate debt equal to the larger debt which stands against the Dominion to-day, but also with a quid pro quo for the proposed expenditures on railways and canals. I have here, Sir, a statement showing the basis on which Prince Edward Island entered the union in 1873, which I have, for convenience, in tabulated form. The debt of Canada in 1873 was $82,187,072; but, besides that debt, there was an authorized expenditure on canals of $25,000,000, on the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, of $40,000,000, and there were other expenditures authorized of $14,000,000. That would be, that in 1873, with the debt and the authorized expenditure on canals, the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, there would be standing against the Dominion $161,187,072. On that basis Prince Edward Island entered the Dominion. That basis, according to population, would give Prince Edward Island a debt equal to $4,701,000 on entering this Dominion. But this large expenditure, which the delegates were told would be the authorized expenditure, was largely exceeded, and, if the delegates who came up here in 1873, had for one moment anticipated that the Dominion of Canada would not keep within the authorized expenditures on canals, on the Intercolonial Railway and on the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is a very grave doubt, in my mind, whether the union would have been consummated, at least without some further advantage to Prince Edward Island. When these authorized expenditures, which was the basis of the union in 1873, were exceeded, there is no doubt that Prince Edward Island ought to demand, and she does demand, some equivalent. I have been at some pains to take from the Public Accounts what the excess of expenditure was. I will say that, if these expenditures had been kept within the figures submitted to the delegates from Prince Edward Island in 1873, I would have nothing to say; though the province had a right to expect that she should have a fair share of the expenditures since. Not only has that not been the case, but the expenditures which were the basis of union, have been exceeded by sums which I am going to read. The actual expenditure, since 1873, on canals is $51,538,691.89. The actual expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway is $62,214,584.89, and on the Intercolonial Railway, $35,569,140.39, or, altogether, an expenditure of $149,322,417.17. Now, Sir, the authorized expenditure, which was the basis upon which the province of Prince Edward Island entered confederation, was only $65,000,000 on those three public works; but the authorized expenditure, which was the basis of union, went up to $149,322,000, or, in round figures, $150,000,000. Thus the Dominion to the extent of $85,000,000, exceeded the expenditure which Prince Edward Island was assured would be the expenditure on the canals, Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, Prince Edward Island being one-fortieth of the population of Canada, one-fortieth of that over-expenditure may fairly be claimed as her share of that expenditure. That would give Prince Edward Island, as her share, $2,100,000. I say that should be the claim of Prince Edward Island on those three items alone; that is, on the excess of the expenditure on these public works. But that would not be all. You will remember that in the year 1883 there was a new departure made by the Dominion Government in reference to railway expenditures. Previous to 1883 there were no expenditures made on railways which were not of Dominion importance, and the British North America Act did not allow those expenditures; that is, railways which would not connect two or more provinces together. But in 1883 it was said the resources of the provinces were inadequate to building railways, and that the Dominion Government would have to come to their rescue, and consequently since then the Dominion Government have gone largely into the business of building railways which were merely local. When you expend public money in one province it is only reasonable that each other province should receive some corresponding proportion of that expenditure. I declare, Sir, that that has not been done so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned. You may say that you have built twelve miles of railroad in the province, but I have something to say about that, for I think it is worth while to give the House some idea of what benefit these twelve miles are. Remember, it is the only foot of road that has ever been built by the Dominion Government there, and I will tell you what it amounts to. To show you the commercial value of this piece of line, I will say that it was built altogether for the purpose of carrying Her Majesty's mails from Cape Traverse to Emerald. There is not a harbour worthy of the name at the terminus, so that in the summer season when that 12 miles of railway would be of any service, there is no accommodation for a steamer, and as a matter of fact there is no steamer plying there. In the winter season, the only part of the year that it is of any little service, what is the condition of affairs? I think I referred to this a few years ago, and I asked my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) if he could remedy it, but it was overlooked. Now, as to its commercial importance in the winter season, I may say that 3 cents a pound for freight is charged from its terminal point to Cape Tormentine, a distance of nine miles. What trade can there be on twelve miles of a road from Cape Traverse to Cape Tormentine when the freight is $60 a ton across the Straits of Northumberland. That shows that Prince Edward Island is not being generously treated. The expenditure of the Dominion Government from the year 1883 to the present time on local railways is given in the Minister of Railways' report at $43,119,220. I am aware that in that expenditure there is $25,000,000 which I have already counted as being spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that will reduce it to about $17,000,000, and out of that $17,000,000 Prince Edward Island may fairly claim as a proportion over $400,000, which, taken together with $2,100,000 already referred to, amounts to over two and a half million dollars. I have detained the House perhaps a little longer than I expected.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. It is a question which this House may try to put off from year to year.

but as the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) said some years ago, you are only staving off the evil day; you will have to settle with Prince Edward Island some time. It is all very well for hon. members coming from provinces which have received vast sums of money for railway construction to say "hear, hear," because they think I have spoken for some considerable time. But considering that Prince Edward Island is the smallest province in the Dominion, I do not think that the larger provinces, with all their majority, and all their votes, should be ready to jump on Prince Edward Island in that way. I think it ill-becomes the great provinces which have received the aid which Ontario and Quebec have received for railways and canals, to prevent the claims of Prince Edward Island from being fairly and fully put. To show that the people of Prince Edward Island have some confidence in this road, I need only refer to a resolution which was passed in the local legislature of that province some days ago. As to the construction of the bridge across the Hillsborough River, there is no doubt that it will cost a pretty large sum of money, but the provincial government have shown their readiness to come to the rescue of the Dominion Government, and to share in the building of this bridge. I will read to the House the resolution which was introduced by the Attorney General of the province a few days ago. It says:

Resolved,—That the Government be authorized to enter into an agreement with the Government of Canada stipulating that should the Federal Government build a bridge across the Hillsborough River from a point in or near the city of Charlottetown, to a point in or near Southport, and said bridge be so constructed as to be adapted and suitable not only for railway purposes, but also as a public highway bridge for vehicles and foot passengers, and for general traffic of all kinds, the Government of Prince Edward Island will, on the completion of such bridge, pay annually to the Government of Canada towards the interest of the money required to build that part of the said bridge appertaining to local interests only, a sum not exceeding $12,000, and said Bill to contain provision enabling the provincial government to arrange and determine with the Government of Canada, the exact amount so to be paid annually, and the terms of payment, the said sum so determined to be on completion of said bridge a charge on the revenues of the province, and also provision that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may in such agreement make terms for the levying and collection of tolls upon the said bridge, and for keeping the same in repair, and generally upon such other matters relating to the said bridge, and the interest on the cost of construction, as may be agreed upon by both Governments.

I need not say, Sir, that that shows the people of the province have some confidence in the building of this road, and are anxious to proceed with it. This sum of $12,000 a year, will represent the interest on the large sum of $400,000. Now $400,000 is quite a large sum for a small province like Prince Edward island, for it is nearly $4 per head of the population. While they have already spent at the rate of $28 per head for railways in Prince Edward Island, they are now willing, in order to extend the railway system which was proposed there over 20 years ago, to bear the further burden of $400,000. This fact shows the great necessity which exists for this road. The subsidy which is at present voted for this road by the province of Prince Edward Island is one-half as much per capita as has been paid by the great province of Ontario for railways altogether; and I have pointed out that the province of Ontario came into this Dominion without having previously expended anything for railway construction. That great province came into confederation with very bad securities, handing us over $25,000,000 of Grand Trunk Railway debentures, and about $1,150,000 of Bank of Upper Canada stock, which is practically worth nothing, and it can hardly sneer at Prince Edward Island. When the province of Prince Edward Island came into this Dominion she had 1-24th of the railway mileage of Canada, while to-day she has only 1-80th of the railway mileage of Canada. During that time the railway mileage of the Dominion has increased from a mile for every 1,000 people to a mile for every 296 people, and Prince Edward Island has only a mile for every 517.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken much longer than I intended, but I could not do otherwise than go at some length into this question. I trust, however, that this question will be settled at once, and for ever. In the words of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), I hope the matter will not be delayed until a general election. Some years ago that hon. gentleman said that it was not a good thing to agitate for railways previous to or during an election. I hope that now, if the hon. gentleman is going to act squarely with the province this road will not be delayed any longer. Twenty-nine years is a very long time for a province to wait. I shall watch anxiously for the Supplementary Estimates to come down, when I hope to see the promises made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the electors of Prince Edward Island fulfilled. The hon. gentleman is only walking in the footsteps of his predecessors. The late Government was committed to the construction of this road; the present Government, or at least the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is also committed to it; and I hope that this Government, of which he is an honoured member, will think sufficient of him to see that the promise he has made shall be implemented. Let the province of Prince Edward Island not have to wait any longer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, there is no objection at all to bring down the papers which the hon. gentleman moves for. The subject-matter of his address is, of course, very familiar to me and to other gentlemen who come from Prince Edward Island. This perhaps is hardly the time for us to discuss it with any practical object, because, as he remarks, the late Government committed themselves to the principle of the construction of the road he advocates, together with a number of other roads; and the question will be for the consideration of the present Government at a later stage during this session, and I am not without hopes that we shall be enabled to make some proposition. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) is not in his place, but I can say that the matter has not yet been finally decided upon. As the hon. gentleman remarks, the railway is one of very great importance to the people—one which they have been looking for for many years; one which they have every reasonable right to ask the construction of, and one which I hope will be built for them. There was one difficulty that stood in the way heretofore—the construction of a bridge across the Hillsborough River, connecting the chief city of the province with the line of road, without which bridge the road would not be of much service, and the local legislature has already pledged itself to contribute to the construction of that bridge $400,000. That removes one of the difficulties very largely out of the way. I will not go into the discussion of the matter now. I will only ask the hon. gentleman to wait until the papers come down, and I am not without hopes that later on the Government will be able to make some proposition with regard to this matter. I need not say to him how much I have the matter at heart, or how I have pressed it upon my colleagues. It has to be considered, of course, along with other projects in other parts of the country. But I have a right to think that the righteousness and feasibility of the scheme are such as will commend it to my colleagues as they have commended it to myself. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has not had a larger House to listen to his speech. I can promise him that the papers will be brought down without undue delay. A complete and thorough survey has been made of the line of railway and of the bridge, and we have data which enables us to know accurately, with very close approximation, at any rate, what the cost of the undertaking will be, and we know what proportion the province is prepared to contribute, so that every information is in the hands of the Minister of Railways to enable him and his colleagues to judge whether they are in a position to bring down a proposition to the House for the construction of that railway in the near future.

Mr. MACDONALD. Can you give us an approximate estimate of the cost?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When the papers come down, we shall have the details, including plans and estimates. It would be out of place for me to go into that now.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I am not going to trouble the House with a speech after the very full and able speech which has been delivered by the hon. member for East Queen's (Mr. Martin). He has given facts and figures to the House to show the very strong claims of the province of Prince Edward Island for further railway facilities, particularly in that portion of the island which has not heretofore had railway accommodation. As the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, the Government have before them the fact that their predecessors in office were committed to the construction of certain lines of railway in Prince Edward Island, not only the railway that has been particularly referred to to-night as the Southport and Murray Harbour Branch, but also a small branch in my constituency of some seven or eight miles in length, which I contend, and have always contended, is needed even to a greater extent than the Murray Harbour branch. I allude to what is known as the Elmira Branch, running from Souris towards East Point. That is a portion of the country which is very hilly, and over which it is very difficult for the farmers to haul their produce and for the fishermen to get their supplies and take their fish to market. The Government have not seen fit to have a survey made of that branch during the past year, but I trust that when the Government do see their way clear to come down with an amount in the Estimates for the construction of the Murray Harbour branch, they will not overlook the short branch to Elmira. I might further say that the gentleman who opposed me at the last election contended on that occasion that if the Elmira branch were ever built, it would be by the present Government, and I hope, therefore, they will not overlook that promise, but will see that it is carried out. For my part, I shall only be too happy to do anything I can to assist the Government in carrying out the branch lines in Prince Edward Island. I think it is not necessary just now that I should say anything further on this question, as it has already been so fully gone into.

DOMINION CENSUS.

Mr. W. W. B. McINNES (Vancouver) moved:

That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he may be pleased to request Her Majesty's Imperial Government to amend "The British North America Act, 1867," so as to provide that the next general census of the population of Canada be taken in the year 1900, and that each subsequent census be taken every ten years thereafter.

He said: It will be admitted, Mr. Speaker, that the purposes served by a census are twofold in a country such as ours. In the first place, it affords concise information as to the progress made by the country in population and other respects, and in the second place, it furnishes a reliable basis for redistribution. I submit, therefore, that from whatever standpoint you view the suggestion contained in this resolution, it must be admitted to be a wise one. So far as the statistical aspects of it are concerned, you are aware, Sir, that in the United States the census is taken on the even decade, and, therefore, for the purposes of comparison with the United States it would be very desirable that we should have our census taken in the same year. That would serve a very good purpose as regards comparison between British Columbia and our western territories and the western states, between Manitoba and Dakota—between Maine and New Brunswick, as well as between the whole of the United States and the whole of the Dominion. It is also desirable that we should begin even with the start of the next century. For many reasons, I can conceive that it would be very convenient hereafter in looking back for evidences of our progress. Since giving notice of this motion, I have received a copy of the resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, which sets forth an additional reason, and a very strong one, to my mind, why this motion should be adopted. In that resolution the Chamber of Commerce pointed out that the Dominion statistics furnish a great deal of information regarding our country, and that it would be very advantageous to have such facts distributed at the Paris exposition in the year 1900; but if the present system be continued, we will only be able to furnish the statistics of some nine or ten years ago, whereas if the census should be taken in 1900, the statistics could be distributed at that great exposition up to date, and there serve a very good purpose. It is, therefore, evident, from the standpoint of statistics and such considerations, that it is eminently wise this resolution should be adopted. So far as redistribution is concerned, you are aware that a measure has been promised in the speech from the Throne, and that the promise has been renewed today by the right hon. Prime Minister. But while such a measure will, no doubt, be eminently fair, so far as the opportunities of the case will permit, it must necessarily, under the circumstances, fail to do justice to the great western part of this country. The House knows that that section of the country west of Lake Superior has very rapidly increased in population, and if a redistribution Bill is brought on this session it cannot take account of that increase of population, so that we can simply rearrange those districts in the provinces and territories without increasing the representation. But if this resolution be carried, there is no reason at all why the census should not be taken sufficiently early next year for the returns, as regards population, to be in, and a redistribution Bill framed next session which would give effect to the additional information that the census may afford. In that way a measure of justice would be done the western part of our country, which it is impossible to do if the redistribution Bill be brought on this session. I have heard no objection to this motion since giving notice of it except one, and that is that it is the custom throughout the British empire to take the population upon the year after each even decade—1871, 1881, &c. Of course, under ordinary circumstances, where the benefits are in harmony with the conditions, it is not advisable to break away from the custom which prevails throughout the empire, but when, as in this case, all the advantages are on the side of making the change and taking the census of this country upon the even ten years, to hold to the Imperial rule would be a case of imperialism run mad. Where there is no decided advantage, but on the contrary decided disadvantage, in adhering to that rule, I submit there is no reason why we should continue it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not in any way deny that there may be some convenience if the census were to be taken in the year 1900 instead of the year 1901. The advantages which have just been enumerated by my hon. friend would certainly accrue. As he has said, we would be in a better position to make a good showing at the Paris exhibition. We would be in a position to show the undoubted advance which has been made in this country during the last decade. This is a reason, perhaps not a very strong one, but still of some convenience. A reason of greater convenience, however, would be what has just been stated by my hon. friend with reference to the next election and the redistribution Act. The majority of this House, at all events, and I may perhaps venture to hope, all the members, will agree to have a new distribution Act; and, if the next election, which must take place at some day not very far distant, were to take place under the redistribution, and according to the new census, the needs of justice would be largely met. But I must say to my hon. friend, with perfect candour, that I have an objection to his motion, which, to my mind, is an unanswerable objection. I feel very strongly, and I hope that in this I am voicing the sentiment of the House and the country, that the constitution should not be lightly amended. Indeed, I lay down the principle that it is better to submit even to some inconvenience which might be remedied by amendment of the constitution than to have the constitution lightly amended. I am strongly of opinion that the constitution should not be amended except not merely a strong case, but an overwhelming case is made out. And, holding this view, which, I think, ought to represent the better sentiment of this country it should be a matter of duty to all Canadians to maintain the constitution as far as it can be maintained in its absolute entirety; and only change it when it is made plain that a very great wrong would arise if it were not amended. For these reasons, which, I hope, my hon. friend, on reflection, will adopt, I feel bound to say, though I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with his motion, and hope he will have no objection to have it declared lost.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picou). I agree with what the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has said, particularly with regard to the great delicacy that should be observed in connection with any proposed change of our constitution. I have very little to add to the objections which he has so concisely put to this motion. I would point out, however, to the hon. mover of this resolution that I think he is mistaken, and perhaps the Prime Minister is mistaken, in thinking that by the adoption of this resolution, and by the legislation proposed, it would be at all possible to obtain even the enumeration of population in time for the Paris Exposition. According to my recollection of the last census, a considerable time would elapse before even the number of people for the different provinces could be properly tabulated. With a very large staff, and with very great expense, I think it was two or three years before even that portion of the work was overtaken on the last occasion. In any event, it would involve enormous expense, perhaps, out of all proportion to the object the hon. gentleman seeks to attain. It would also involve a radical change in our system of taking the census, and such changes are to be avoided except where there has been admitted inconvenience or admitted impropriety in the system, because it destroys the basis of comparison with enumerations or statistics prepared in times past. I hope the hon. mover of the resolution will take the advice of the Prime Minister.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). It seems to me it would be unwise to make a change in our method of taking the census which would interfere with the comparisons we desire to make between decade and decade. We made one change in our system in the taking of the last census, and if we were to make another it would spoil our figures completely for purposes of comparison. Another objection to the proposal is that the system appears to prevail of taking the census throughout the British Empire at the same time, which enables us to compare our rate of progress with that of other portions of the Empire in the same periods, and it would be unwise to make such a change as would make these comparisons impossible. These are two strong reasons against the motion, and there is the other, which was mentioned by the right hon. the Premier, which is, perhaps, even stronger than either of the others—and that is that we should not lightly interfere with the constitution of the country, that only on the strongest ground should we attempt such a change. If I might give advice, I would advise the Premier to take that into his serious consideration when he thinks of proposing to make any change in the constitution of the Senate.

Motion negatived.

DISMISSAL OF G. W. BALL.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox) moved for:

Papers, documents and correspondence in connection with the dismissal of D. W. Ball from being postmaster at the village of Bath, Ontario.

He said: This resolution is in line with what we have heard so much about since hon. gentlemen took office. I have had two dismissals in my riding in a little over a year. We had a promise of the Prime Minister, according to my recollection of his words, that no dismissal should take place without a trial. It is true we had the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) agreeing that no dismissal should take place without a trial of any person occupying a high position in the civil service, but saying that the ordinary workingman might be dismissed without trial. A year ago last March the caretaker of the public building in my town was summarily dismissed. I think the letter is dated 28th March, but was not mailed in Ottawa until the next day, and he had to give up his position to his successor on the 1st of April. And this was after the Minister of Public Works had promised me to have an investigation. I went to the hon. Minister and told him he had acted very unfairly with the caretaker, that he could not deal with a servant of his own so summarily, but would have to give him notice. The hon. Minister did allow the caretaker a month's pay. So I dropped the matter and had no more to say. Another dismissal has taken place, and I think most unfairly. I might tell you the reason why the first took place and why the second took place. In the first place, we had an Ontario general election, which took place a year ago last March. We have a number of soreheads, commonly known as Grits, who got together and said unless this man was dismissed and a Liberal appointed in his place they would not vote for the candidate. I think the Minister got a gentle hint as to this, and the man was dismissed immediately after the elections. I heard rumours of a similar character before our last by-election, which took place last November; and our postmaster was relieved of his duties, I think on the 8th of December. A certain number of Liberals in the village of Bath—I presume they had found how well it had worked in Napanee—had put their heads together and declared that unless this man was dismissed and a Liberal put in his place, they would not vote for the Liberal candidate. And the man was dismissed on the 8th of December, while the election took place in the middle of the previous month.

Mr. Armstrong, who was postmaster, died, and his son occupied the office for a year, and then Mr. Ball was appointed. Mr. Armstrong and his friends were very much annoyed at the appointment, and you know how a few dissatisfied persons can make trouble for an official in a small place. They watched him and harassed him in every way. They had an investigation, one of the charges being that he had given letters to the wrong persons. It appears there were two families named Hawley that got their mail matter at the village of Bath. In both of these families were maiden ladies, and there came a letter addressed to Miss Hawley, and Mr. Ball gave it to the first Miss Hawley that came in. It happened to get into the wrong hands, and that was one of the charges against Mr. Ball, that he had committed a grievous mistake in giving a letter to the wrong party. I think if the Postmaster General had not been politically opposed to the postmaster of that town he would hardly have been able to tell which of the Miss Hawley's got that letter, but it did not happen to be a very serious matter, for I think on investigation the charge simply fell through. Another charge against the postmaster was made, I believe, by a lawyer who was asked to get up a case against him, that a registered letter had been mailed to that office on a certain day but had not been delivered, and the sender did not happen to have a receipt from the office from which it was posted. He told the assistant inspector that he would look at his books when he got home, and would write him the next day all about it. He did so, but could not find any trace of the registered letter. There was another case, that of an old lady who came in and inquired for her mail matter. It happened that the registered portion of the mail had not been distributed, and as she had received her other letters she did not get the registered letter for two or three days. I did not know whether she had called at the office in the meantime or not. That was another charge, but so far as I was able to learn the whole thing fell through, there was nothing done about it, because Mr. Ball kept the office for two years after that. Then there was another matter Mr. Ball tells me that happened not very long ago. He was charged with having held a letter too long, and then restamped it to destroy the date at which it came to his office. Now, Mr. Ball explained that to me in this way: He said that his wife helped him to distribute the mails when they came in, and when she happened to make a poor stamp she would stamp it over again. The inspector called his attention to this particular letter, and I understand sent in a declaration for them to sign, and both Mr. Ball and his wife made a declaration that they never had restamped a letter to destroy the date upon it. It seems to me that if that was not satisfactory evidence to the Postmaster General, he ought at least to have given them an investigation, and if they were not able to sustain their position, then, I think, they ought to be dismissed, because I would not justify for one moment any postmaster restamping a letter to destroy the date on it after it came to his office. But I think he was at least entitled to an investigation. Well, there was a strong petition sent to the Postmaster General from that district. Bath is a small village, of about 100 voters. There were 90 people who signed that petition, got up on the spur of the moment, and half of them were Liberals.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the salary of the office?

Mr. WILSON. The salary is about $330 or $340.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the salary?

Mr. WILSON. This is the petition:

To the Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Honourable and dear Sir,—We, the undersigned patrons of Bath post office, wish to express our regret and surprise at being informed that you have made a change in the postmastership here. Mr. W. D. Ball, who has been in charge here for the past three years, has given the work his closest attention, and has been most courteous and obliging. He has given satisfaction to all but a few men, who, apparently, were unwilling to be satisfied. We believe the facts of the case have not been fully and fairly placed before you by those persons who are looking for the position.

The man you have mentioned as our future postmaster was assistant postmaster for 19 years, and his father, Mr. Henry Armstrong, postmaster.

During this time, Mr. Fred. W. Armstrong drew the full pay of the office, and for the greater part of the time was under Conservative rule. There were errors during his time, and considerable dissatisfaction at his conduct as postmaster, but no one reported him.

We are quite certain that the proposed change will be quite unpopular and unsatisfactory, and we humbly petition you to retain our present postmaster.

Now, that petition was signed by 90 people, one-half of whom were Liberals. I have in my possession another petition of a similar character that was being circulated, but when they found that the postmaster had been dismissed and his successor appointed, they dropped it, because they felt that it was of no use. To show you the feeling in that particular district, I may mention that the Liberal candidate at the local election carried the town of Bath by over 40. They had a reeve of that town who had been a Liberal, but the people took up Mr. Ball and elected him last January as reeve of the town, showing how dissatisfied the people are with such a change, and one made in such an unfair way. I would like to have the First Minister tell me, if he will, whether he intends to stand by the promise I understood he made to this House that no man would be dismissed without a fair trial. It seems to me that is a fair question, and that this is a fair case. Mr. Ball is a respectable man who has the confidence of the community in which he lives, as shown by this petition which was signed by as many Liberals as Conservatives, and as shown by the fact that in a village which has been Liberal almost continuously, he was elected reeve last January. It seems to me that it is a reasonable thing to ask, even at this late date, that Mr. Ball should have a chance to appear before an investigating committee of some kind to vindicate his character, because I think it is most unfair that a man should be dismissed without any cause, so far as we know, and without any charges being made publicly known. Now, I wanted the Postmaster General to be here. The First Minister will remember the other night that I did not go on because I did not want to make any statement in this House without giving the Postmaster General a fair chance to answer. All I want in this matter is fair play, and I think the Minister ought to be prepared to give us fair play. I know the Government can do as they please about it, but I think we have a right to hold the First Minister to his pledge. If it was the Minister of Railways and Canals I would have no hope, because I suppose he would consider this man as one of the ordinary people, and therefore, not deserving of an investigation.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend has made a personal appeal to me. I feel very much flattered. I may tell him, by the confidence which he places in me, and I will try to deserve it, though, on general principles, I have tried to do that with very little success. But, perhaps, in a special case I may be more successful. At all events, my hon. friend will understand that it is impossible for me to give him an answer at this moment. I am totally ignorant of the facts of the case, and never heard of it until the notice was put on the paper. But I can promise my hon. friend that the papers will be speedily brought down and then he will have an opportunity of again calling the attention of the House, and of myself personally, to the matter.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF MR. W. J. CHRISTIE, WINNIPEG.

Mr. WILLIAM J. ROCHE (Marquette) moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council and all reports and correspondence made by or had between W. J. Christie, late of the Inland Revenue Department, Winnipeg, and other officers of department in Manitoba, and the department at Ottawa or the Minister of Inland Revenue relating to the removal, the suspension and final dismissal of W. J. Christie, lately one of the chief officers in department at Winnipeg.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving for a copy of the Orders in Council, in reference to the removal, suspension and dismissal of Mr. W. J. Christie, late Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue at Winnipeg, I do so, because, in my opinion, that gentleman has been treated unfairly, discourteously and in a manner not commensurate with the position he occupied in the civil service of this country for a number of years, by the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Department of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. Christie, I understand, has been in the service of the country for about eighteen years. He has been in the position of accountant in the office of the Inland Revenue Department at Winnipeg for over five years; he has been Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue for upwards of ten years, and during that time he has always performed his duties faithfully, efficiently, and in such a manner as to win the approbation of his superior officers. No charge of a political or partisan character has been made against him; no charge of inefficiency or dereliction of duty has been levelled against him during all that time; no charge could truly be made against that gentleman in that particular direction. Therefore, I consider that he was deserving of the very greatest consideration at the hands of this Government. Now, it appears, that the former Collector of Inland Revenue at Ottawa, was superannuated, and my information is that he was superannuated much against his own will. To fill this vacancy the former Collector of Inland Revenue at Winnipeg, Mr. H. A. Costigan, was moved to Ottawa. The vacancy that was created in Winnipeg was applied for by the then Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue, Mr. Christie. Now, I think it is a safe rule of government to be laid down that in large cities such as Winnipeg, having a large business, it is only fair and right, all other things being equal, that the one who is next in charge, should receive promotion to the vacant position, providing he has the necessary qualifications and is fitted, in every way, to discharge the duties in an efficient manner. It was, therefore, not at all unreasonable for Mr. Christie to apply for this vacant position of Collector of Inland Revenue at Winnipeg. I do not know whether the present Minister of Inland Revenue has been taking a leaf out of the book, or at least, has had any consultation with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) as to how he might best do away with the services of Mr. Christie, because I am quite willing to give credit to the hon. Minister of the Interior that he has, particularly since coming into this Government, showed himself to be an adept at getting rid, in the most unique manner, of officials, not by dismissing them, but by removing them to far-away places so that he might oblige them to resign and allow the vacancy to be filled by his own political friends. I am quite willing to pronounce the hon. Minister of the Interior an expert in that line, although I do not think that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue with his benign countenance would require any instruction in that particular after having travelled through the country with Li Hung Chang who has proved himself to be an expert in this regard. At any rate, a leaf has been taken out of the book of the hon. Minister of the Interior by refusing Mr. Christie this promotion and by offering the position of Collector of Inland Revenue in the far-off town of Calgary. Now, it was in August, 1897, that Mr. Christie applied for the position of Collector of Inland Revenue at Winnipeg. I may say, in reference to this communication, that he received no reply from the hon. Minister, but in January, 1898, he addressed the following communication to the head of the department:—

Winnipeg, Manitoba, January 8th, 1898.

The Hon. Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière, Minister of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Last August I made application to the commissioner of inland revenue through Mr. District Inspector Barrett for the collectorship of inland revenue here, should the position become vacant. Knowing the well-defined policy of the department to promote officers, who had passed special examinations, I was quite prepared to rest my claims to promotion of my past record in the service.

This record I will summarize here :

I entered the service in 1880, and passed my first examination in the same year. In 1881 I passed my special class examination. I came here in 1882, and was placed in charge of the books of the office by Collector Kenning, and acted as accountant until January, 1887, when I was appointed deputy collector. I have continuously held that position for ten years, and during all that time have faithfully performed all the duties of that office and received the best reports of my superior officers;

Having lived in this city for fifteen years, and having materially aided in organizing and developing our service in this province, I think I am fairly entitled to promotion.

My object in writing you is not to press my claims, for, as I said before, I can confidently rest my departmental claims for promotion with your deputy, Mr. Miall. My reason for writing you are the following: A warm personal friend, who is anxious to see me promoted, tells me that my chances of promotion may be interfered with because charges of political partisanship during the Federal election have been made to you against me.

I do not know who my accusers are, or what is the nature of the charges made; but I give to all charges of partisanship the most unqualified denial. Neither directly nor indirectly have I been guilty of any act of political partisanship at the last Federal or any other Federal election since I entered the service, beyond casting my vote. I never solicited any vote for any candidate. Conscious of the rectitude of my conduct in this behalf, I naturally feel very indignant to hear of these charges. If innocent, it is alike unfair and unjust that these charges should cloud my title to promotion, and if guilty, after this unqualified and positive denial, I am unfit to occupy any position in the public service. I, therefore, most respectfully ask that you appoint a commissioner in whose honesty and integrity you have the fullest confidence to investigate these charges; let all the charges made against me be placed in his hands with full authority to examine witnesses under oath, and

Mr. ROCHE.

I pledge myself if any one serious charge be substantiated before such impartial tribunal, to place my resignation in your hands forthwith. If, on the other hand, they are untrue, I respectfully ask that they do not prejudice my just claims to a promotion which I feel I have honestly earned.

Knowing that it is your policy to promote where merit justifies, and the public interests demand it feel confident that if any charges of political partisanship have been made you will give me an opportunity to defend myself, and thus remove any unjust cause for not promoting me should a vacancy occur in the collectorship.

I am, Sir Henri,

Your obedient servant,

W. J. CHRISTIE.

Mr. Christie only had heard by rumour, that he was likely to be refused the appointment, because of some charges that had been made against him. He, therefore, directed this communication to the head of his department, but received no reply whatever as to whether these charges had been made or not. He was left entirely in the dark in reference to this matter, and the only communication he received was one letter, to the effect that the changes about to be made were solely in the public interest. I hope to show the House, that there was not a single change made in connection with the Inland Revenue Department in Winnipeg that could truthfully be said to be made in the public interest. On April 6th, 1898, Mr. Christie sent the following letter to Mr. Miall, the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, at Ottawa:—

Ottawa, April 6th, 1898.

E. Miall, Esq.,

Commissioner of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have been informed that it is the intention of the department to remove me to Calgary to fill the position of collector of that division.

During the eighteen years I have been employed in the excise service, it has been my desire to comply with the wishes of the department, but if it is your intention to remove me to Calgary I would have to sacrifice the educational advantages that my family have in Winnipeg, and sooner than do that it would suit me better, and at the same time be a saving to the department, to superannuate me.

I, therefore, beg to apply for superannuation.

The saving can be made as follows:—I believe it is the intention of the department to appoint me collector at Winnipeg at a salary of $1,700, and as Calgary is a sixth-class division, the collections averaging about $20,000 a year, a man could be appointed at a salary of $1,000 a year, which is the maximum salary of a sixth-class division. If the department superannuates me, my allowance would be $540 a year, which would be a saving of $160 a year.

According to the divisional salary classification the collections would have to increase to more than $50,000 before the salary of collector could be increased, so you will readily see the saving would not be temporary.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) W. J. CHRISTIE.

Now, it seems that, when Mr. Christie made that application for superannuation, of course it was because he had received information—I will not say how, but, no doubt, from another officer, that he was about to be removed to Calgary, and, sooner than forego the educational advantages afforded to his family, sooner than remove himself from his social and business friends, he decided that he would prefer superannuation. But, in asking for that, it seemed, he asked something which it was beyond the power of the department to give him at the time, according to this communication that was sent in reply :

Ottawa, 23rd May, 1898.

W. J. Christie, Esq.,
Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue,
Winnipeg, Man.

Sir,—Your communication of the 6th April ultimo, asking for superannuation has been laid before me by the commissioner.

I have looked very carefully into the matter, and am compelled to say that I see no grounds that would justify me in recommending your superannuation under existing conditions, and, furthermore, it would be in direct contravention of the provisions of the Superannuation Act.

Your promotion to the collectorship at Calgary is in an official sense an advancement of position in the service, and naturally the department expects its officers to make such change of residence as it deems best in the public interest. Should your private interests prevent you carrying out the wishes of the department, you must yourself see what the inevitable result will be.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) H. J. JOLY DE LOTBINIERE,
Minister of Inland Revenue.

Now, the Minister of Inland Revenue claims that Mr. Christie asked for something in direct contravention of the Superannuation Act. That may be so: but, when the Minister says that Mr. Christie's promotion to the collectorship at Calgary is in the sense of promotion, I beg to disagree with him. As Mr. Christie has pointed out in his correspondence, Winnipeg is a first-class division, and the maximum salary of the deputy collector of inland revenue there is $1,500 per year: whereas Calgary is a sixth-class division, and the maximum salary, according to the law, is about $1,000; so that, anything Mr. Christie might receive over and above that would be in direct contravention of the law, and would only be temporary. It would seem, that, if the attention of the Government was at any time called to this contravention of the law, the salary must be reduced, and, therefore, Mr. Christie drew the attention of the department to it. This, however, was a sinister method of getting rid of Mr. Christie's services, knowing that he would refuse to go to Calgary, and that, therefore, the vacancy would be created. Mr. Christie protested against this action being taken, and protested in a very gentlemanly spirit, addressing the following communication, on June the 25th, to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue:—

(Official.)

Winnipeg, June 25, 1898.

Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière,
Minister of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of 23rd ult., in which you state: "Your promotion to the collectorship at Calgary is in an official sense an advancement of position in the service, and naturally the department expects its officers to make such change of residence as it deems best in the public interest. Should your private interests prevent you carrying out the wishes of the department, you must yourself see what the inevitable result will be."

As the relation of my family and my own interests bind me strongly to Winnipeg, you will pardon my discussing the subject of my removal at sufficient length to put the facts fully before you.

I was appointed deputy collector of inland revenue at Winnipeg on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1886. I believe I can say that since that time I have filled that position with credit to myself and entire acceptance to the department. My services have received the highest approval from my superiors, and I have no hesitation in saying that my record is such that no fault of any kind can be suggested as to the manner in which I have performed my official duties. It is true some time ago I heard, unofficially, that parties interested in obtaining my position had made charges against me on the ground that I took an active part in the last election campaign. As I sent to you (January 8th, 1898) a direct and emphatic denial of any such action, demanded an investigation, and pointed out that if on such investigation my denial was found to be to the slightest extent untrue, it would be highly improper that I should continue in the public service, and as I undertook to refute absolutely any such charges (if, indeed, such were ever seriously made), and as you did not do me the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the letter, and the matter was never officially communicated to me, I presume that either my information was incorrect or my denial fully and frankly accepted.

I must beg you to bear with me if I dispute your suggestion that the proposed change will be "in an official sense an advancement of position." Winnipeg, as you know, is a first-class division. Calgary, on the basis of the Order in Council, No. 216, dated 9th January, 1889, is a sixth-class division. The maximum salary for a deputy in a first-class division is $1,500 per annum; the maximum for a collector in a sixth-class division is $1,000. As I am now in receipt of $1,500 per annum, in what sense can such promotion be termed an advancement even "in an official sense"? It is true, I am temporarily offered an increase of $200 per annum. This increase, after allowing for extra cost of living in Calgary as compared with Winnipeg, is really a decrease of about $100 a year. The nominal increase is thus not only an actual decrease, but is of the most temporary and chameleon-like nature. There is no law or Order in Council authorizing its payment. I must, therefore, should I accept the charge, be in receipt of a salary illegally paid and in the constant anticipation of its reduction to the proper amount should a political aspirant for office, or unkindly disposed person choose to bring the matter to the official attention of the Government.

You suggest, however, that the proposed changes are deemed by your department to be in the best public interests. Could I believe this was the honest opinion of the department,

I would, no matter what my own interests might be, cheerfully accede to your request. With extreme diffidence and great respect for your high office, I regret to say that I cannot believe such conclusion is honestly formed. You may be assured I would not assume to differ from the department on a matter so exclusively and particularly within their judgment if I were not in a position to state reasons, direct reasons, incontrovertible reasons, and reasons of which I know you, sir, and the officers under you have long had full and intimate knowledge, which absolutely and entirely prevent the conclusion you state.

What are the proposed changes? Mr. Costigan, the late collector at Winnipeg, has been appointed collector at Ottawa. To make room for his appointment, Mr. Martin Battle, a tried and capable officer of the Government, has been superannuated against his own wishes and the protests of his friends. A vacancy having been thus created, Mr. T. S. Gosnell, collector at Calgary, is to be promoted to Winnipeg. I am to go to Calgary to fill his position, and Mr. Watson has been appointed deputy collector at Winnipeg to fill the office I am to vacate.

Mr. Costigan's official record as reported to your department, would scarcely lead one to suppose that his continuation in the public service was influenced by considerations of the public good. The details of his shortcomings have been fully and officially reported to you. You, sir, know from these reports, dated as far back as the early part of 1897, and recurring at only too frequent intervals since that time, and from official investigations held under your instructions, that Mr. Costigan has time and again proven his total unfitness to hold any position of trust. You know, sir, that for two years preceding his appointment at Ottawa, his work was practically done by his fellow officials, yet this man is not only "in the public interests" retained in the public service, but with full knowledge of these facts, appointed collector at the capital of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Gosnell was, until the 3rd November, 1894, accountant in the Winnipeg office under me as deputy collector. Mr. Gosnell is one of those gentlemen appointed to public office under the Government of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who, while the Conservative party was in power, could not be accused of strong political activity, but who, since the change in Government, have demonstrated what latent political fires may, under proper circumstances, smoulder unsuspected in the human breast.

As you know, sir, to become entitled to the appointment of collector or deputy collector of inland revenue, it is necessary to pass a most stringent special technical examination. The necessity of such examination is the protection of the public revenue. The determination of the amount to be collected is constantly based upon nice and accurate calculations and investigations of quantity and quality of manufactured and crude articles. Incapacity or inaccuracy would, therefore, lead to direct and possibly enormous loss to the public revenue. It is for this reason the high standard heretofore maintained in the Inland Revenue Department has always been insisted upon by the Government of the day.

Mr. Gosnell tried this examination twice, but was unsuccessful. Failing to win by ability, he determined to pass by strategy. He was notified to proceed to Toronto to try his examination for a third time on the 30th August, 1887. He pleaded inability to make the journey. Having obtained from a friend in Hamilton a full copy of the questions which were set at the Toronto examination, and having prepared himself, during eight months' study, to answer these particular questions, he applied to the department for a special examination, knowing that the Government, trusting, perhaps too implicitly, in the honesty of their employees, would not go to the expense of preparing special technical papers for one applicant. As was anticipated by Mr. Gosnell, the papers which had been used at the Toronto examination were set before him. As one can imagine, his efforts were crowned with hard-earned success.

I am not aware of his standing by marks, but as promotion to the higher offices of the department goes largely by merit, and as Mr. Gosnell was put on the special list, limited to 24 for the whole Dominion, in priority to others who honestly passed on the same papers at the Toronto examination, I have no doubt that his merit was sufficiently demonstrated by the examination to recommend him for promotion.

If you, sir, had ever attended a political meeting in Manitoba, it would be less necessary for me than it is to discuss Mr. Watson. It is true he has been of the greatest assistance to the supporters of the present Government by his public utterances; utterances, however, exclusively and loudly made from the body of the meeting and as interruptions to the speeches of his political opponents. So far as this is a recommendation for his appointment, he is entitled to it. So far, and no further, for in all walks of life, as an implement agent, on the farm, or as the proprietor of a Chicago commission shop, he has not displayed sufficient business ability to commend him to his creditors. He has passed no examination qualifying him for his present position, he is not a man of education, is not fitted to perform the first part of his technical duties, yet your department has placed him in charge, instructing his subordinates in office to show him what he is to do and how he is to do it. If they, sir, know enough to teach him his duties and are honourable men, would it not be equally in the public interests to promote them or to appoint some person who may have passed the necessary qualifying examination, rather than to place this high public trust in the hands of a mere political hanger-on whose sole recommendation is influence and past political services.

For these reasons, sir, I cannot conceive that the proposed changes are in the public interests. You will, I am sure, on the facts being thus stated, make such arrangements as will avoid a prostitution of high offices of public trust. Being forced by the circumstances above stated to take the view I do, I must respectfully refuse "to accept advancement in an official sense," and decline to become the collector at Calgary.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

W. J. CHRISTIE.

I think this is a very terse, emphatic and gentlemanly manner of putting the case, and I am quite confident that the accuracy of this statement cannot be denied by the hon. Minister at the head of the department. The hon. Minister, it seems, rather than receive such a letter as that, decided at once to suspend Mr. Christie from the Deputy Collectorship at the port of Winnipeg, and on 7th July, 1898, Mr. Christie received the following letter from Mr. Barrett, the District Inspector:—

Inland Revenue Inspection, Canada.
District Inspector's Office,
Winnipeg, Man., July 7th, 1898.

W. J. Christie, Esq.,
Winnipeg, Man.

Sir,—I am in receipt of a telegram from the commissioner of inland revenue instructing me to place you under suspension for refusing to comply with your duties as defined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council appointing you to the position of collector of inland revenue at Calgary.

You will therefore accept this letter as an official notification to you of the action of the department.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JNO. K. BARRETT,
District Inspector.

As I said before, this gentleman, although possessed of every qualification, having passed a splendid examination, was refused the promotion which he was entirely deserving of and which his qualifications eminently fitted him for. I claim that the Deputy Collector in Winnipeg was the very man who should have been appointed to the position of Collector, for the reason, in the first place, that by many years' residence in the city he had become thoroughly acquainted with the business men who were transacting business from day to day in the office, and because, in the second place, he was thoroughly conversant with the details of the office, and was in fact instrumental in laying the foundations of the organization of this important branch of the department. He was, therefore, thoroughly fitted to discharge the duties of collector in an efficient manner, not only to suit the convenience of the public, but also to suit the Government of the day. But he refused to be removed to Calgary; and very likely his removal was proposed with the idea that he would refuse, and thereby afford another vacancy for the appointment of another political hanger-on. He was suspended because of his refusal to go to Calgary. He placed his case in a very reasonable manner before the hon. Minister, addressing to him on the 8th of July, 1898, the following communication:—

Winnipeg, July 8th, 1898.

Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière,
Minister of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that I was notified yesterday by Mr. Inspector Barrett that he had received instructions from the department at Ottawa to suspend me.

I can only conclude that the action of the department is due to the statements contained in my letter to you of the 25th ult. In writing that letter I was, of course, aware that unless I could prove the serious charges preferred by me respecting the maladministration of the department my dismissal from the service would follow.

That was something quite reasonable for him to suspect. Therefore, to leave no loophole open, Mr. Christie goes on to lay his suggestions before the department and requests them to act; but no action whatever was taken by the department with regard to his charges, so far as I am aware, further than by some officers against one particular gentleman who was the collector in the city at that time.

I now write to ask the Government to give me an early opportunity of substantiating the charges made by me, which are as follows:—

1. That when Mr. Costigan was appointed to the collectorship at Ottawa the department was aware that while collector at Winnipeg he was from time to time, and for long periods of time, when he should have been present in Winnipeg to attend to his duties, residing in the United States of America, a defaulter in large amounts of public money entrusted to him by the department.

Now, that is a very serious accusation—that a gentleman, acting as collector of customs at Winnipeg, was residing in the United States from time to time, and for long periods of time, having funds of the Government in his possession, and no steps taken by the Government, but, instead, the position kept open, the gentleman's salary going all the time, and paid by this Government.

2. That the department paid Mr. Costigan's salary and expenses for the time he was absent in the United States on his own business, then knowing he was a defaulter in public moneys.

3. That Mr. Gosnell, who has been appointed collector at Winnipeg, passed his most important examinations by means of a fraudulent scheme.

4. That Mr. Watson, who has been appointed deputy collector at Winnipeg, does not possess any of the technical knowledge which is essential to enable him to protect the public revenue.

I would ask that the commissioners be empowered to take evidence under oath, and that reasonable notice may be given me of the date when the investigation will take place.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) W. J. CHRISTIE.

There are three or four specific charges made which go to show, if they be true—and this gentleman claims he can prove them, and some have already been proven—that the excuse given by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, that these changes were made solely and entirely in the public interest, is entirely without foundation; and this third charge, that Mr. Gosnell, who was appointed collector at Winnipeg, passed his most important examination by means of a fraudulent scheme, is a most serious one. I do not blame this Government for this fraudulent passing of the examination, nor do I blame the late Government, because, possibly, they knew nothing about it; but, when this charge was brought to the notice of the Government by Mr. Christie, they failed in their duty in not taking steps to investigate whether it was true or not. The charge is, that this gentleman was enabled to pass his examination by getting surreptitiously an advance copy of the examination papers and studying them for several months. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder he passed the examination and secured his appointment to the position of collector of inland revenue at Winnipeg. This is a most serious charge, and yet this Government did not take the first steps to ascertain its truth or falsehood.

As far as Mr. Watson is concerned, he is, no doubt, a good citizen of Winnipeg, but a man thoroughly unfit for the position of deputy collector, as he has not the education and never passed the necessary examination. I think, certainly, it was a gross case of mismanagement by this Government to appoint a man deputy collector, over a lot of other officers, who did not pass an examination in any shape or form. Why, the officials under him were instructed to show him what his duties were and how to discharge them. If it was in the public interest to appoint Mr. Watson, would it not have been much better, in the public interest, to appoint to that position one of those men who were instructed to teach him what his duties were and how to perform them? Mr. Watson was an implement agent and a commission agent, and conducted his affairs in such a manner that, at the time he received the position, he did not enjoy a very high standing among his creditors, according to those communications I have just read, and his business capacity was not of that high character one would consider essential in a man appointed to occupy the high position to which he was named. On October 18th, 1898, Mr. Christie received his final dismissal, in the following words:—

Sir,—I am directed to inform you that His Excellency in Council has been pleased to dispense with your services as collector of inland revenue at Calgary, N.W.T., from the 1st July, 1898.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) WM. HIMSWORTH,
Secretary.

Now, that is the case, as Mr. Christie submitted it to the department. Mr. Christie, as, of course, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue may say, refused to comply with the instructions of the department; but, on the other hand, he claimed that these instructions were absolutely unfair, and that, instead of being removed to an inferior position, as he certainly was, he was entitled to promotion. He was ordered to remove to Calgary, where, though his salary would be nominally $200 higher than at Winnipeg, still, as Mr. Christie has pointed out, the cost of living was, at the very least, $300 per annum more than it was at Winnipeg. Besides, he did not care to go from the city of Winnipeg, where he had been residing for many years, and where he enjoyed all the educational advantages to be obtained in that city, and, in very polite terms, he refused to comply with the instructions of the department, and submitted to the Minister a very strong case to show that the reasons given were not the true reasons for his removal. It may be said, that the charges were made by a gentleman who was about to lose his position, and, therefore, not of very much consequence; but, when
Mr. ROCHE.

I point out that Mr. Christie offered to have them proven before an impartial commission, one would imagine, naturally, that the Minister of Inland Revenue would have accepted that challenge, and either have the charges proven or shown to be without foundation. But, in order to show that the department was fully cognizant of the truth of at least some of the charges, I may read a letter that Mr. Christie sent to it on the 6th September, 1897:

Winnipeg, Sept. 6, 1897.

E. Miall, Esq.,
Commissioner of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—I beg to report that I called on the executors of Alex. McIntyre for their bonds and license fee for excise bonding warehouse. Mr. Litchfield, one of the executors, informed me that he executed bonds and handed Mr. Collector Costigan a cheque for $20. He produced the cheque, which was dated July 6th, 1897, and made payable to the order of the collector of inland revenue. It was endorsed "H. A. Costigan, Collector of Inland Revenue," was accepted July 9th, 1897, and marked paid. The bond I cannot find.

I called on Messrs. Richard & Co., for their bond and license fee excise bonding warehouse, and was informed that they executed bond and gave Mr. Collector Costigan cheque for $20. They produced the cheque, which was dated July 16th, 1897, and made to the order of the collector of inland revenue. This cheque was endorsed "H. A. Costigan, Collector of Inland Revenue," and either deposited or cashed at the Bank of Hochelaga July 17th, 1897. The bond I cannot find.

I reported the above to Mr. Inspector Barrett. The executors of Alex. McIntyre and Richard & Co., have spirit in bond, and are transacting business as if licenses were issued.

Would you be good enough to advise me what action to take.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) W. J. CHRISTIE,
Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue.

Again, on December 14th, 1897, he sent another communication to Dr. J. K. Barrett, inspector of inland revenue:

Winnipeg, Dec. 14, 1897.

Dr. J. K. Barrett,
Inspector of Inland Revenue, City.

Sir,—I beg to advise you that I called at the city treasurer's office for a cheque for the two drums methylated spirits invoiced by the Department of Inland Revenue (invoice No. 6448), to the medical health officer, Winnipeg.

The treasurer informed me that a cheque was handed Mr. Collector Costigan for $209.64, and showed me the account receipted by H. A. Costigan, on the 27th November, 1897.

He showed me a cheque on the Bank of Montreal, dated Nov. 23, 1897, for $209.64, payable to the order of the collector of inland revenue, cheque was endorsed H. A. Costigan, collector of inland revenue, and W. J. O'Connor. The cheque was cashed by W. J. O'Connor on December 1st, 1897.

Not receiving the cash or cheque for methylated spirit, I take this opportunity of acquainting you of the facts.

Yours truly,
W. J. CHRISTIE,
Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue.

Here again was a case where $209.64 was obtained by the then collector and of which no account was given. Now, the Government did take some action in reference to this communication. On 18th December, 1897, Mr. Barrett received the following telegram :—

Ottawa, Dec. 18, 1897.

J. K. Barrett,
Inspector Inland Revenue,
Winnipeg.

Suspend Collector Costigan, pending inquiry.
(Sgd.) E. MIALL.

Again, on 22nd December, 1897, he received another telegram, as follows :—

J. K. Barrett,
Inspector Inland Revenue,
Winnipeg.

Minister desires you to hold official investigation, and report facts fully to department.
(Sgd.) E. MIALL.

Then, it appears, Mr. Barrett handed in a report to the department, and on 28th January, Mr. Miall received the following telegram :—

Winnipeg, Jan. 26, 1898.

E. Miall,
Commissioner Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

Referring to my report, is it Minister's wish to hold investigation ?

(Sgd.) J. K. BARRETT.

Mr. Barrett received the following on the 27th January :—

Ottawa, January 27, 1898.

J. K. Barrett,
Inspector Inland Revenue,
Winnipeg.

Do not investigate ; the facts are potent.

There is evidence that the Minister was fully cognizant of the defalcations that had taken place by the then collector at the city of Winnipeg. He orders an investigation, then receives a report from the inspector at Winnipeg, and the case was so clear that the department wired : "Do not investigate, facts are potent." Yet the Minister of Inland Revenue says that Mr. Costigan was moved to the city of Ottawa in the public interest. Here was a gentleman who, by the department itself, had been proved to have been guilty of these transactions that should have forced his dismissal, and still he has been removed to the city of Ottawa to occupy a position of Collector of Inland Revenue here. And, when Mr. Christie, the Deputy Collector, a gentleman of the very highest character, private and public, and a gentleman of the highest qualifications, seeks the vacant position he is told that, in the public interest, he cannot receive it, but he is instructed to go to Calgary, while Mr. Gosnell is removed to Winnipeg—a gentleman who has been charged with having passed his examination at the third attempt, after having been plucked twice only by means of surreptitiously securing in advance a copy of the examination paper, a charge to examine which no steps have been taken, so far as I know. Mr. Gosnell was appointed in Mr. Christie's place, appointed without the slightest qualifications or examinations, and still the Minister claims that it is in the country's interests. I leave it to the House whether that is a fair statement of the facts ; and I would like to hear what the Minister of Inland Revenue has to say in refutation of these charges and in his own defence in refusing Mr. Christie his promotion and in making these other appointments.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I hope that no person will object to this motion being adopted at once. I invited Mr. Christie to try to find somebody to bring the matter before the House. Mr. Christie behaved in such a way that, notwithstanding my repugnance to dismissing a public officer, I thought it my duty to dismiss him, and I did dismiss him. And, as I say, I invited him to bring the matter before the House. He has brought it before the House. When the papers are laid on the Table so that you will be able, Mr. Speaker, to understand the case, I think you will agree, and so will all the members of the House, that I did perfectly right in dismissing Mr. Christie. That is all the explanation I have to give for the moment.

Mr. JOHN COSTIGAN (Victoria, N.B.) It is not a very pleasing duty for me to offer a few remarks upon this motion. But the circumstances are a little out of the usual course. The motion is that certain papers shall be brought down. My own opinion is that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche), who moved this resolution, would not be disappointed if no further papers were brought before this House. He has made an exceedingly strong case from the papers he has read, and I am bound to say that, having been at the head of the Inland Revenue Department for some years and having known Mr. Christie, I would not believe that Mr. Christie had penned the letter which the hon. gentleman read to this House ; and, if he penned such a letter, some influence must have been brought to bear to change the feeling and manner that he was possessed of to my knowledge. So far as his record as a public officer is concerned, I am willing to testify that, while I was in a position to have knowledge of it, it was quite satisfactory. The letter of Mr. Christie is made to show that Mr. Battle was forced out of the department to make a vacancy to which my son might be appointed. I have information outside of the department, which, I presume, is possessed by the department also, that the question of Mr. Battle's superannuation was entirely apart from the question of my son's appointment to the place ; that the question of Mr. Battle's superannuation had been settled before the vacancy was discussed. Mr. Battle had reached an age several years past the time when he was entitled to the maximum superannuation allowance, and the department had decided, rightly or wrongly—I think rightly—that he was getting too old for the active charge of the duties of collector of an important division like this. I am not going to go into that part of the subject any further than to say that my son was transferred from a collectorship of the first-class in Winnipeg, at a salary of $2,200, to a collectorship here at a salary, I think, of $1,600. It was not a promotion. I think that the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper) can bear me out in this, that my son was anxious, and I have been anxious for many years, to have an exchange made by which my son could be brought nearer to us here. While we were in power, I might have managed, if I chosed, to bring about the change; but I would never think of doing anything like that to the prejudice of any other officer, and it was difficult to find an opportunity for making the exchange, which was the only way I could see by which the object could be accomplished. The reason I refer to the hon. senior member for Pictou is that I think he will recollect that an arrangement was partly made—at least, the late Sir John Thompson had agreed as far as he was concerned—to a transfer between my son and an inspector then in Nova Scotia. Some objections were made, and it was not carried out. When the vacancy occurred here, then my son applied for that vacancy, being eligible for that position certainly by reason of the position he had already occupied. What I complain of is that the case was dwelt upon very strongly to the prejudice especially of the collector at Ottawa, by reading all this correspondence and making out a one-sided case, before the papers are brought down to the House, while the country will only have the statement that has been made here to-night. Now, I am quite satisfied that when the papers come down they will not sustain the accusation made by the hon. gentleman, or volced by him for Mr. Christie; they will not sustain the charge that my son was a defaulter for a length of time, that he lived in the United States for a length of time, and that he received a salary during the time that he was absent from his position there. When my son went to the United States, he went on official duty, he went on the instructions of the inspector of that division. I am bound to confess, of course, that my son is like other men, human, and he has erred, which I regret deeply to have to confess. But there are few who would not be obliged to make that confession also if they were frank and candid. Perhaps the hon. gentleman who moved the motion may some day have to confess that he has not been infallible all through life. But there is nothing that I know against the honour, or the honesty, or the integrity of the collector of Ottawa today, and I am quite sure that when the papers come down neither the mover nor those behind him will be able to prove anything dishonest in his conduct. With regard to the services performed by this officer, Mr. Christie, I say he has been a good officer, but that he organized the service in Winnipeg, is complete nonsense. The service at Winnipeg was under the control of one of the most efficient officers in Canada, Inspector Barrett, who organized the service there, and who is responsible for it. Mr. Christie was holding a subordinate position under him, that of deputy collector, the highest rank he could have reached. Now, I only rose to say that while I do not charge the hon. member with having pursued a course which was unfair, I complain that the effect will really be unfair to the collector of Ottawa from the way the matter has been handled. The hon. gentleman has read that long, carefully prepared indictment—for it is not a letter, it is an indictment—at a time when there was no chance of having the official papers to speak for themselves. Then the interpretation he has placed on some of the telegrams is most extraordinary, particularly the telegram with regard to the investigation. After the accusation had been made that the then collector at Winnipeg was a defaulter, certainly I presume that the Minister properly ordered the suspension and an inquiry. But I think the records will show that with regard to that point, his absence was already known to the department. The report will show that he was not a defaulter to the extent of one farthing; therefore, there was no necessity for an inquiry, not because the case was established that he was a thief and a defaulter, because he was not a defaulter, and, therefore, there was no necessity for an inquiry. When the papers come down I am sure that they will not sustain many of the statements that have been made before the House to-night.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all petitions, correspondence, letters or documents in relation to the following dismissals:—Job Bilodeau, postmaster of Chambord; Louis Desbiens, postmaster of St. Jérôme; William Larouche, postmaster of Lake Bouchette; Ferdinand Larsouche, postmaster of Delisle; F. X. Setowneau, postmaster of St. Bruno, all in the county of Chicoutimi; together with all petitions, correspondence, letters or documents in relation to the appointment of their successors.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Copies of all letters and telegrams that have passed between the Government and the Ashcroft Water and Electric Company, or Mr. Peter Ryan, or Mr. John Shields, or any other person on their behalf in regard to the purchase of some 4,000 acres of land near Ashcroft, B.C., within the railway belt.—(Mr. Prior.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 2nd May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 100) respecting the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank, and to change its name to the Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Glenora Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Yukon Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 103) to incorporate the Klondike Mining and Railway Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 104) respecting the Dominion Permanent Loan Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That Government Orders have precedence on Thursdays, after Questions, for the remainder of the session.

He said : I call the attention of my hon. friend to this motion. I think he will find it reasonable, and I hope he will agree to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I presume I may assume that if this is conceded, there will be no attempt to infringe further on the business of private members until such business is pretty well forwarded.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend will look at the Order paper he will see that private business has been pretty well advanced these last two weeks. At all events, I think we may fairly take this day, and for some time to come I do not intend, of course, to supplement it.

Motion agreed to.

COMMISSIONER OGILVIE'S REPORT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend if the Government has yet received Mr. Ogilvie's report on Yukon affairs, and if so, how soon it will be laid upon the Table of the House. It is very desirable that we should have that at the earliest possible moment.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am just informed by my colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) that Mr. Ogilvie's report has not yet been received.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like also to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that a number of motions have been carried for the production of papers in regard to matters relating to the Yukon, and I would express the hope that the Government should lose no time in laying those upon the Table of the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ANNAPOLIS ROYAL.

Mr. JOHN B. MILLS (Annapolis). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), if he intends to paint the public building at Annapolis Royal ; and if so, whether he has asked for tenders for the performance of the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). This question is of such vast importance that a notice of motion must be given.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am inclined to think it is not of sufficient importance to put upon the paper.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That the House resolve itself into committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

He said : In availing myself of this motion to make the customary statement of the financial affairs of the Dominion, I have the agreeable duty of dealing with a period which is unquestionably the most prosperous period in the history of the Dominion of Canada. I shall treat, in the first place, of the fiscal year ended June 30 last, and as some nine months have elapsed since that date, and all the main features of the year's accounts have long been public property, I shall be as brief as is consistent with the importance of the subject. Speaking generally, the operations of the year have surpassed the expectation formed by me a year ago in the statement I then made. The marked revival which has been experienced in all lines of trade in the business world has, of course, contributed to this result, and I am persuaded that the policy of this Government in relation to all that touches the people's interests has alike been an important contributory cause. For the year 1897-8, the total revenue amounted to $40,555,238.03, or $1,255,238.03 more than I anticipated, and $2,725,459 more than the previous year. The details of this revenue I give as follows, with a comparison of the receipts of the previous year 1896-97 :—

|                 | 1897.      | 1898.      | Increase. | Decrease. |
|-----------------|------------|------------|-----------|-----------|
|                 | $         | $         | $        | $        |
| Customs ..      | 19,478,247 | 21,704,892 | 2,226,645 |           |
| Excise....      | 9,170,378  | 7,871,562  |           | 1,298,816 |
| Post Office     | 3,202,938  | 3,527,809  | 324,871   |           |
| Miscellaneous.. | 5,978,213  | 7,450,972  | 1,472,758 |           |

Showing a net increase for 1898 over 1897 of $2,725,459. The increase in customs duties is very pronounced. From an analysis of the report of my colleague the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), I find that on the following articles we received an increase in the amount of duty as compared with the previous year:—

|  |          |

Our receipts from excise declined to the extent of $1,298,816, and, had the circumstances been at all normal, this decline would challenge comment. But you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that, owing to the expectation of increased duties in the spring of 1897, large quantities of spirits, malt and tobacco were ex-warehoused for consumption, and, as a consequence, the receipts from excise suffered in the year 1897-98 to the extent of this anticipation. The movement in the various articles of excise is as follows:—

| Articles.             | Quantity, 1897.  | Quantity, 1898. | Duty accrued, 1897. | Duty accrued, 1898. | Increase. | Decrease. |

* This includes 8,506,199 lbs. of foreign raw leaf tobacco, on which a Customs duty of 10c. per lb. was collected.

The per capita consumption of spirits, beer, wine and tobacco for the year 1897-98 and for the three preceding years, according to the report of my colleague the Minister of Inland Revenue, is as follows:—

|            | Spirits,Galls. | Beer,Galls. | Wine,Galls. | Tobacco,Lbs. |

Leaving the revenue, and coming to the expenditure side of the statement, I find the total expenditure on Consolidated Fund amounted to $38,832,525.70. This is somewhat in excess of the estimate of $38,750,000 I made last year, and is $482,765 more than was expended in the previous fiscal year. In the following services I find there have occurred increased outlays:—

|  |           |

There have been decreases in the expenditures on the following services, as compared with 1896-97:—

|                                     |           |

| Dominion Lands .....                | 20,118    |
| Electric light inspection .....     | 1,993     |

The principal increases will be found in Sinking Funds, Immigration, Mounted Police, Public Works (consolidated fund), and Railways and Canals (collections). The increase in the sinking fund is, of course, only nominal, as the money is simply taken out of one pocket and put into another. I need say nothing with regard to immigration other than to mention the necessity of bringing to our shores those who are capable of taking advantage of our vast tracts of unoccupied lands. The increase with regard to the North-west Mounted Police is created by reason of the administration of the Yukon, and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has had to keep our various public works in the best shape, and the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal is the principal reason for the increase in railways and canals collection.

The principal decreases occur in Legislation, Militia and Post Office. You will remember that in 1896-97, we had two sessions of Parliament, and the accounts of 1896-97 contain the charge for the extra session; hence the reduction under the head of legislation in comparing the accounts of the year 1897-98 with those of the previous year. With regard to militia, in 1896-97, we had to expend extra sums on the annual training, in consequence of the camps having been omitted the last year of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and hence the reduction of the expenditure in 1897-98 as compared with 1896-97.

The reduction in the Post Office Department expenditure of 1897-98, as compared with 1896-97, follows as the result of the business-like management of that branch of the public service by my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), whose accounts show an increase of revenue to the extent of $324,871, and a decrease of expenditure to the extent of $214,066, making, as regards these two items of increased revenue and decreased expenditure, a betterment in the Post Office Department amounting to $538,937.

Post Office Department—

|   |           |
|---|-----------|
| Increased revenue as compared with previous year .....    | $324,871 |
| Decreased expenditure as compared with previous year..... | 214,066   |

Total betterment in P. O. Dept.. $538,937

This state of affairs has encouraged the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock), and the Government to take the important step of reducing the domestic postage to 2 cents, and also to extend the advantages of penny postage to a great part of the Empire.

I have dealt thus generally with the revenue and expenditure, and now let me recapitulate. We received a revenue of $40,555,238; we expended $38,832,525, and this left us a surplus of $1,722,712, as a result of the operations of the year on the ordinary services.

|                        |              |
|------------------------|--------------|
| Revenue received ..... | $40,555,238 |
| Expenditure .....      | 38,832,525   |
| Surplus.....           | $1,722,712  |

In my financial statement of last year I intimated that my aim was to insure a surplus for the year 1898-99 which at least would be equal to the deficit of the previous year, namely, $519,000; and leave something to the good. I went on to say, however, that there were certain conditions of the trade at that time which were so hopeful that I would not be surprised if a more favourable result were obtained. I am glad to be able to say that buoyancy of trade and our revenues was even greater than my own expectations, and so we are able to have this handsome surplus, which is largely in excess of the amount which I estimated in my statement to the House last year.

In addition to the outlay chargeable to what is ordinarily known as income in 1897-98 we expended other sums known as capital charges to the amount of $4,156,696, made up as follows :

|   |                       |
|---|-----------------------|
| Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway .....  | $ 270,298 68         |
| St. Lawrence River and Canals....   | 2,535,949 61          |
| Other canals .....  | 671,658 68            |
| Public Works—Government Buildings, Ottawa, improvement in St. Lawrence and Port Arthur Harbours ..... | 376,852 66            |
| Dominion Lands .....  | 127,504 71            |
| Militia .....   | 173,740 32            |
| Canadian Pacific Railway Company.   | 692 17                |
| Total.....   | $4,156,696 83 |

There was also paid out for railway subsidies—an item which goes to increase our debt, but which is not technically chargeable to capital, although it amounts to the same thing—the sum of $1,414,934.78 ; making for capital expenditure and railway subsidies for the year a total of $5,571,631.61.

After paying for this outlay and making provisions for $930,482.25, representing discount and expenses of the loan of 1897 ; the net debt for the year 1897-98 has only been increased by the sum of $2,417,802.

The capital expenditure was, of course, large in 1897-98, and is large this current fiscal year, but with the approaching completion of the enlargement of the canals, a reduction on this head is proposed, as you will see by the Estimates for the year 1899-1900, recently submitted.

The following statement gives details of how the increase in the net debt is accounted for :

Coming now to the current fiscal year, of which but two months have to elapse. I wish to lay before you, Mr. Speaker, what my expectations are as to revenue and expenditure.

Up to the 30th of April of the present year, our receipts were $37,232,700.46 ; being $5,077,160.61 more than we received during the same period last year. From April 30th to the 30th June last year we received $8,399,698.18, and if to these two sums we add the probable proportionate increase of $1,000,000 between the 30th April and the 30th of June, we arrive at an estimated revenue for the current year of $46,632,398.64.

On the other hand, up to the 30th April, 1899, we expended $27,972,847.04 ; or $2,493,503.14 more than for a similar period last year.

If to these we add the amount of expenditure between the 30th April and the 30th of June last year, namely, $13,352,181.80, and estimating the probable proportionate increase of $700,000 this year over last year, between this and the end of the year ; I estimate that our expenditure for the year ending 30th June, 1899, will be $42,026,028.84.

As I have just estimated the revenue at $46,632,398.64, you will see, Mr. Speaker, that for the current fiscal year I anticipate a surplus of receipts over expenditures of, in round numbers, $4,600,000. With reference to this estimated surplus for 1898-99, I must, however, say that in consequence of the buoyancy of trade and the confident tone of business, the making of an exceedingly close estimate is very difficult. Some features which enter into the estimate, such as the amount of the royalties and other receipts from the Yukon, are conjectural, and there are no means of arriving at accurate estimates. But the figures given are based on the actual results up to the 30th of April of the present year, to which are added the figures of last year to represent the expenditure for the unexpired portion of the present year, with a proportionate estimated increase in the revenue and expenditure. It may possibly be the case that the surplus will turn out larger than the estimate I have just made ; but to be within reasonable bounds, and to avoid anything like being over-sanguine. I have put it down at $4,600,000.

With regard to the capital expenditure and the effect on the net debt of the operations of the current fiscal year, I find, Mr. Speaker, that up to the 30th of April, 1899, we expended on capital account and for railway subsidies the sum of $7,162,795.18. To complete the service of the year it is estimated that $1,500,000 additional will be required, making in all an expenditure of $8,662,795.18. If we deduct from this amount the aggregate of the estimated surplus of $4,600,000, and the estimated outlay for sinking fund of $2,355,000, it will be found that I anticipate an addition to our net debt on the 30th of June next of $1,700,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friends opposite, I see, smile at the modesty of the amount, and at the idea that the Government should be able to carry on the vast operations which this Government have engaged in, and show only the moderate increase in the debt of last year of $2,500,000 or less, and an estimated addition to the debt of the present year of only $1,700,000, as against the average of $6,000,000 which hon. gentlemen opposite added yearly to the public debt.

Now, while I put down the sum of $1,700,000 as the estimated increase of debt, it is but right that I should add a word of explanation similar to what I have stated in estimating the surplus of the current year, because the amount of surplus affects the amount of net debt. It may not be surprising if at the close of the year it be found from increased revenues from the Yukon, which we cannot possibly at the moment foresee, that the increase of debt is not so large as I have anticipated. I may say also that the estimate of the capital expenditure and for railway subsidies for the next two months is a very generous one. Keeping these two circumstances in mind, I think the figure I have given of $1,700,000 as the increase of net debt is an outside one. My desire has been to give you, Mr. Speaker, a fair, safe and accurate estimate of my expectations of the year's out-turn, and to keep well within bounds.

In speaking of our debt it might not be out of place to bring to the attention of the House the value of our principal stocks in the London market, as shown by the quotations of the Stock Exchange.

From the year 1894 until the end of 1897 the Bank of England rate ruled very low, for the greater part of that time being only 2 per cent, and during this period of stagnation there was a decided reserve on the part of investors to touch any class of securities except those of the very highest grade. As a consequence of the low rate of interest, the scarcity of first-class investments, and this reserve on the part of investors, all "gilt-edged" stocks rose in 1896 and 1897 to values which a leading financial paper characterized as abnormal. The market prices of Canadian 3 per cents rose with others to as high as 108.

With the revival in business, the rise in the bank rate, and the increasing openings for safe investments the abnormal values of 1896 and 1897 receded. This fall affected not only Canadian stocks but was experienced by all the highest class issues, even consols. In the case of the latter (consols), there was a fall of 2 to 2½ points between the prices of the end of December, 1897, and December, 1898. In India threes there was a similar decline of three points. In the class of securities known as British corporations, that run on all-fours with the colonial stocks, there has been a very special and noticeable set-back of from four to seven points in the prices of December, 1897, and those of December, 1898. In the whole line of colonial stocks there was a fall of three or four points, though in some cases the fall was as much as seven points. Although the Canadian securities were to some extent depreciated, as was the case with other stocks, yet the depreciation was not so great nor so lasting as in the case of other securities of a similar character.

Taking the two stocks that have some time yet to mature, I refer to the 3 per cent and 2½ per cent issues, and eliminating the other stocks that are gradually approaching par in consequence of their early maturity, I find that the 3 per cents are quoted at 102-4 and the 2½ per cents at 91-2.

There is another subject of interest to which I might refer in this connection, and that is as to what has been done in the direction of obtaining Imperial legislation, so that Canadian inscribed stocks might be included in the list of securities in which investments might be made by trustees. Without going at all into the history of the matter, I may say that on the 23rd of February last an Order in Council on the subject was passed and forwarded to the Imperial Government, putting our case as strongly as possible, and urging that Her Majesty's Government take such action as would provide for the inclusion of Canadian stocks in the list of securities authorized for trustee investments. Our efforts are being ably aided by the High Commissioner, Lord Strathcona. This would be a distinct advantage to our securities, and I estimate that their enhancement in price, if they could be put on the trustee list, would be somewhere about two or three points. It was recently shown that in consequence of legislation according some favourable terms to Crown colonies in respect of their loans, the market price advanced so as in effect to place this class of securities on a level with the trustee list. The gain in several cases was from three to six points.

It may be noticed that recently a 2½ per cent loan of £1,000,000 was floated by the corporation of Liverpool. This security comes within the category of trustee investments, and it realized £93 10s. 5d. per £100. So that I am within bounds when I say that I think the effect of placing our securities in this class would enhance their value about two or three points. Looking at the large amount of our debt that matures at an early date, the advantage to Canada of this privilege is a very material one.

It is no doubt very probable also that at an early date, owing to the large absorption of consols by the Imperial Government for savings bank investments, they may have to extend the field of securities in which investments may be made. It is to be hoped that a further impetus will be given towards putting our stocks on a higher plane. In view of the fact that a very large amount of our debt is to mature within a comparatively early period, the very great importance of our inducing, if we can, Her Majesty's Government to place our securities on the trustee list will be realized at once by the House; because, if that were done, it would make a very material saving in our rate of interest.

With regard to the year 1899-1900, I am afraid that I cannot approach the making of an estimate of the out-turn with any degree of certainty. The circumstances of this current year have been so exceptional, and the likelihood of their continuance is such, that I can do nothing but deal in very general terms with the year's operations. The Estimates for 1899-1900 have been laid before you, and I do not anticipate that the year will prove less favourable in its results than the current one.

The net increase in the Estimates for 1899-1900 over 1898-99 is $563,484.99. The main items of increase are interest on public debt, immigration, railways (income and collection), and the government of the Yukon provisional district.

The increase in interest on public debt arises from the retention of the 3 per cent rate of interest on savings bank deposits, and the probable amount to meet new indebtedness.

The increase in the estimate for immigration of $100,000 speaks for itself. The increase in the railways and canals expenditure arises mainly from the repairs to different canals. The enlarged appropriation for the Yukon provisional district speaks for itself. We are also asking for a larger vote for militia in order to put our forces on a more efficient footing.

I have alluded, Sir, in this connection, to the fact that in our Estimates for the current year we include the three per cent rate on the savings bank deposits. In that connection I may remind the House that a year ago it was suggested that we might probably reduce the rate on these deposits from 3 per cent to 2½ per cent, except in the case of the smaller depositors, for whom it was understood we ought to make exceptional provision. I argued then that it ought not to be the policy of the Government of Canada to make money artificially high by paying a rate of interest higher than it would command in the open market. At that time, there was a very evident tendency towards cheaper money, and I thought the probability was that we might be able to make a reduction in the rate with perfect safety. As we had just placed our new issue of securities on a 2½ per cent basis it seemed not unreasonable that we should follow this rate into our savings bank accounts. But the tendency towards cheaper money which appeared to exist at that time was not maintained; the demand for money throughout the world was strong, and we considered that the time was not favourable for reducing the rate below 3 per cent. We have, therefore, in our present estimate included the 3 per cent rate, which adds $237,500 to the charge for interest as compared with last year's estimate, though it does not represent an actual increase of debt. For the time being, therefore, I have postponed making any reduction, though, of course, leaving myself free, if at any time the market should permit, to make the reduction contemplated. It is not likely at present that that will be done, but if it should at any time become practicable, some provision could be made for a reduction of the rate, allowing the present rate to be continued on the smaller deposits.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the fact that in January last we contracted a temporary loan of £500,000 sterling by the discounting of treasury bills, and our anticipation is that on the 1st July next we shall require to discount a further sum of £500,000 sterling, which will then make our floating debt on that date £1,000,000 sterling in all.

I would remind the House that in the session of 1897 we passed an Act giving us power to borrow $15,000,000. At that time there were outstanding borrowing powers to the extent of $8,000,000, so that at the passing of that Act the Government had borrowing powers to the extent of $23,000,000.

It was the general impression of hon. gentlemen opposite that in view of the large obligations which were arising, we would speedily require a larger borrowing power, but I am glad to say, however, that owing to the buoyancy of our revenues we have been enabled to administer public affairs by the exercise of only a part of the borrowing powers I have mentioned. It will be remembered that the loan we placed on the market in the fall of 1897 was for £2,000,000 sterling, or something less than $10,000,000. Having regard to our moderation in borrowing at that time, it would not have been surprising if we had been obliged since then to incur large temporary loans; but owing to the steady improvement of our revenues, it was not until January, 1899, that we had occasion to raise any temporary loan.

I have noticed a criticism emanating from our political opponents in connection with that temporary loan to which I ought to make a passing reference. It has been represented that the borrowing of this £500,000 in the month of January was conclusive evidence that the finances of the Dominion were not in that healthy condition which was had alleged. "The Government," said these critics, "pretend that there is a surplus; but how can that be possible when they have to go on the money market and borrow about two and a half millions?"

Among those familiar with our public affairs, no answer to that criticism would be required. But we shall agree, I suppose, that our duty is to have these matters so explained that they will be understood, not only by financiers, but by the general public as well. And no doubt some people were impressed by the criticism that because we had to borrow, therefore we could not have the surplus we claimed. Let me then point out that there is no connection whatever between a question of a surplus and the question of a temporary loan. It is quite possible that temporary loans may be required, even in the most prosperous years, and reference to the Public Accounts will show that under the administration of our predecessors such loans had sometimes to be obtained even in years when there were handsome surpluses.

There are seasons when the revenue flows rapidly into the treasury and our bank's balance swell to gratifying figures. But there are other seasons when our expenditure not only keeps pace with the income but outruns it. At such times it may be necessary to obtain temporary loans to meet demands. Such a condition would be possible without the expenditure of a dollar on capital account. If the Minister of Finance should begin the year with an absolutely clean sheet, having nothing to provide for but the ordinary service of the year, his first duty would be to go into the money markets and raise a loan. At the very beginning of the year—before receiving a penny of revenue—he would find himself under obligation to provide over $2,000,000 to pay subsidies to the government of the provinces, which under the British North America Act are paid in advance. Then he would require a considerable sum to meet other demands as they might arise. He could not afford to rely entirely on the receipts from day to day to meet the daily demands. The traditions of the Finance Department recognize about a million and a half dollars as about the lowest sum that should be kept available to respond to the demands from time to time, and no Finance Minister feels comfortable when he finds his balance falling below that sum, as may sometimes happen. It will be seen, therefore, that even in prosperous years that the question of a temporary loan has nothing whatever to do with the question of our surplus, and it is quite possible even in most prosperous years—years of surpluses—that it may be necessary to effect temporary loans to meet temporary conditions.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend leaving this matter of the loan? He might give us an idea as to the terms, the interest, &c.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The loan was effected by the discounting of treasury bills with the Bank of Montreal at 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the amount of the balance in the bank on January 1st?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I shall be glad to inform my hon. friend later on but have not the figures at hand. At all events the loan was really necessary in order to keep up our balance to the factor of safety as established by the traditions of the Finance Department.

With regard to the increase in the public debt, it has been very moderate under the present Administration, as will be seen by comparison with the records of previous Administrations.

|                               |                |
|-------------------------------|----------------|
| In 1894 the increase was..... | $4,501,989 87 |
| 1895 .....                    | 6,891,897 61   |
| 1896 .....                    | 5,422,505 68   |
| 1897 .....                    | 3,041,163 69   |
| 1898 .....                    | 2,417,802 45   |

Showing that the increase in the public debt during the two years of the present Administration has been exceptionally low as compared with its increase in the years in which our predecessors held office.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope that my hon. friend will not omit to mention the abnormal increase in 1896.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is quite correct. There was an item of upwards of $2,000,000, some $2,400,000 odd if my memory serves me right, for the province of Quebec, which had been originally granted as a railway subsidy and placed to the credit of that province and which it was not at liberty to draw, but by a subsequent Act of Parliament the province was authorized to draw it, and, therefore, it became a part of the debt. I thought, on coming to office, that it should be added to the debt of the country. Therefore it was shown in the amount for the year 1896 and did go to abnormally increase the debt of that year. But if we compare the whole Conservative period of administration with ours, you will find that during their eighteen years of office the Conservative Government increased the debt from year to year on an average of over $6,000,000 per year against our annual increase of about two and a half million dollars.

That there should be any increase of the debt while the accounts show a surplus is something that some of our opponents profess to be unable to understand. The fact that at the close of the last fiscal year there was a surplus of $1,722,712 appears to have been much more satisfactory to the public generally than to some of the Government's critics.

The statement has frequently been made, that there was no surplus, inasmuch as there was a large expenditure on capital account for railway subsidies, which, if added to the ordinary expenditure, would more than wipe out the surplus. This is a favourite line of attack from the Opposition press. It would be a fair criticism, if the practice of the Government in past years had been to add such railway and capital charges to the ordinary expenditure, before declaring a surplus. But every one who knows anything of the matter is well aware that such has not been the method in the past. We treat these charges in precisely the same manner as our predecessors did. Expenditure for the construction or subsidizing of railways and for the more important works, such as canals, is always charged to capital account. These being permanent improvements, are regarded as legitimate subjects for increase of the public debt, and only the interest thereon as a proper charge upon the ordinary expenditure of the year. If the ground now taken by the Conservative press is a correct one, then surpluses in Canada have been very rare indeed. The Public Accounts for the two periods of Conservative administration purport to show sixteen surpluses. If we could admit the present Conservative argument to be a fair one, that a surplus does not exist unless the revenue exceeds the expenditure on both ordinary account and capital account, we would be obliged to wipe out fourteen of these surpluses and accuse hon. gentlemen opposite of having, in all these years, cooked their accounts. In the thirty-one years of confederation, there have been only two years in which the receipts exceeded the total expenditure chargeable to both income and capital accounts. But I have no intention of making such a charge against hon. gentlemen opposite. There have been many surpluses in the past; and, perhaps, the most gratifying of all was that of that $1,720,000 last year, which was brought about by a policy which, at the same time, reduced the rate of taxation under the customs tariff. I have here a statement of the receipts and expenditure for the Yukon district:

YUKON DISTRICT.

|                      | $1,146,581 22 | $795,757 07   |

This statement shows a balance against the Government on the Yukon account for the present year, but the receipts of the Yukon will likely come in before the 1st July, to more than cover the deficiency, because it is at the close of the fiscal year that we receive a considerable amount of royalty.

It will be remembered that, when the increase was made in the tobacco duties, the opinion was expressed by some hon. gentlemen—and not without reason—that tobacco had, perhaps, reached a point at which any addition to the taxation would fail to produce additional revenue. It is always possible, especially with an article of that character, to place your duty at such a figure that you encourage smuggling to an enormous extent, and so obtain no increase of revenue. In view of the difference of opinion—and a very legitimate difference—I have had a statement prepared showing the revenue collected on tobacco of all descriptions for a series of years:

Mr. FIELDING.

| Year.        | By Inland Revenue. | By Customs. | Total.       |
|--------------|--------------------|-------------|--------------|
|              | $ cts.            | $ cts.     | $ cts.      |
| 1893-94 ...  | 3,136,053 51       | 287,703 95  | 3,423,757 46 |
| 1894-95..... | 3,002,709 69       | 263,392 26  | 3,266,101 95 |
| 1895-96..... | 2,997,852 95       | 267,245 59  | 3,265,098 54 |
| 1896-97..... | 3,232,731 02       | 301,001 45  | 3,533,732 47 |
| 1897-98 ...  | 3,568,554 75       | 481,048 32  | 4,049,603 07 |

It will be seen, therefore, Sir, that, to a very large extent, our revenues have profited by the addition that was made to the taxation of tobacco. I have no doubt, however, that the smuggling of tobacco has, to some extent, been increased; but I think that, with the vigilance of my hon. friends the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), we may hope that that will not go on to any very large extent.

Mr. FOSTER. If I do not mistake, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), when he proposed the increase of duty, estimated an increase of nearly a million dollars from tobacco.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes. The revenue for the year 1897-98 exceeded the average of the four years previous by $677,430.47. Though we did not get the full million, we did obtain a very large amount; and I think that the difference would be, in part, explained by the fact, that there has been a very considerable displacement of foreign tobacco by the cultivation of the native leaf, which has been carried on to a very large extent. Perhaps, the figures on that question would interest the House. I have here a statement of the production and consumption of tobacco, the product of the Canadian raw leaf:

| Year.                         | Number of Factories. | Produced.  | Entered for Consumption. | Duty.     |

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend be kind enough to tell me what the excise on the foreign leaf is?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. 25 cents on manufactured, plus 10 cents on the leaf, 35 cents. During the past year there have been licensed 11 tobacco manufactories using Canadian leaf, 3 tobacco manufactories using Canadian and foreign mixed; 6 cigar factories using Canadian leaf, and 2 cigar factories using Canadian and foreign leaf mixed. In 1897, there were 2 cigar factories licensed to use Canadian leaf; in 1898, 3 were licensed to use Canadian leaf. There has been a large development of the Canadian tobacco industry, and many persons who, in the course of our tariff investigations, testified that there was no probability of Canadian leaf entering into general consumption, must, I am sure, be quite surprised at the extent to which their anticipations have been proved to be mistaken. Canadian leaf has been improved both in its growth and in its curing, and it is entering largely now into consumption in Canada. There is a side of that question that a Minister of Finance has to treat somewhat seriously, for every pound of that Canadian leaf that is used displaces foreign leaf, which would be a larger source of revenue. But, I suppose, there is a large number of hon. gentlemen in the House who will not attach so much importance to the revenue as a Minister of Finance is obliged to attach to it, and who rejoice in the fact that there has been a very large increase in the growth, production and consumption of native Canadian tobacco.

In view of the change of administration which occurred some two or three years ago, it is but natural that comparisons should be made between the expenditures of the late Government and the expenditures of the present Government. Such comparisons are eminently proper, always provided that they are made on a sound basis and with due regard to new conditions. The expenditure charged to consolidated fund for the year 1896, that is the last year of the late Government, was $36,949,142.03. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been disposed to claim the expenditure of that year as a proper measure of the requirements of the country, as the proper standard of our expenditures, as a measure of the sum which would have been required to carry on the public affairs of the country if they themselves had been permitted to remain in power. I have had to take exception to that view in the past, and I am obliged to take exception to it here. I think it must have been quite plain from our past discussions that the expenditure of 1896 is not a fair standard, and if we would reach a fair conclusion by the records of the Government, we may properly see what was the expenditure from year to year. I have here a statement showing the increase for six years, beginning with 1890:

|---------------|-----------------|------------|
| 1889-90 ..... | $35,994,031 47 | .....      |
| 1890-91 ..... | 36,343,567 96   | 349,536 49 |
| 1891-92 ..... | 36,765,894 18   | 422,326 22 |
| 1892-93 ..... | 36,814,052 90   | 48,158 72  |
| 1893-94 ..... | 37,585,025 52   | 770,972 62 |
| 1894-95 ..... | 38,132,005 05   | 546,979 53 |

The average increase for the six years is $427,594.70 per annum. It will be observed that in every year there was an increase. In one year the increase was slight, but in all the other years the increase was very considerable. Can any one, with these figures before him, believe reasonably that that expenditure, which increased year after year to the extent I have mentioned, was going to stop suddenly in the year 1896? Is it not reasonable to suppose, and would not anybody who looked over these figures reach the conclusion, that the apparent reduction in 1896 was only temporary, and effected under conditions necessitating an enlargement of the expenditure in the following year? The figures I have given go far to sustain this view. But there is other evidence of a most conclusive character in the same direction. It is well to remember that the estimates of Parliament are presented in at least three stages. First, we have the main Estimates, usually at an early stage of the session; then, later on, we have the supplementary Estimates. The supplementaries very often contain very considerable sums. Both these books of estimates are submitted usually in advance of the fiscal year, while the old year is still running. Then, at the following session, when the year is well-nigh ended, it is usually discovered that some services have been left unprovided for, and further supplementary Estimates have to be introduced. So that we have these three stages of Estimates whereby appropriation Bills are passed. Now, the Estimates for the year 1897 were prepared in the session of 1896, and submitted to Parliament by my hon. friend the member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster). Events, into which it is not necessary to enter, prevented the hon. gentleman from carrying through their supply Bills; but the Estimates which they brought down remained on record, and they amounted to $38,308,548.13. If we make reasonable allowance for sums which would have lapsed, we should still find that the main Estimates for 1897, so prepared and submitted to the House by my predecessor, contemplated an expenditure largely in excess of the total expenditures for 1896. And all the supplementary Estimates had yet to come. These statements, I am sure, will show clearly to the House that the expenditure of 1896 cannot be accepted as a proper standard for comparison. But we have further information respecting the probable expenditure for 1897. I have shown that the main Estimates submitted were $3,308,548.13. What the Supplementary Estimates for that year would have been if the late Government had remained in power is one of the subjects upon which my hon. friends opposite and myself have occasionally had some discussion. The ex-Minister of Finance has said that these so-called Estimates ought not to be considered, because, he says, no Estimates whatever were agreed to by the Government. Well, under ordinary circumstances, we should be obliged to accept a statement like that coming from the hon. gentleman who had occupied the position of Minister of Finance. But our difficulty is that we cannot accept that statement of my hon. friend without discrediting some of his colleagues and supporters in the House. It is a matter of public notoriety that Government candidates, during the election of 1896, constantly referred to the Estimates which had been prepared and to sums of money which had been arranged for in the Estimates. We have had evidence of that in this House since this Parliament met; we have had hon. gentlemen, incidentally, unconsciously explaining to the House that certain things which were since done by the present Government had been arranged for and provided for in the Estimates of their predecessors. Now, if that was a fact, how can we accept my hon. friend's statement that there were no Estimates agreed to? If I am to accept it, then I am forced to the conclusion, that somebody was trying to play a sharp trick upon the electorate of the country, and the matter may be even worse than that, because it looks as if hon. gentlemen were also trying to play some sharp tricks upon the members who supported them, and who, no doubt, accepted in good faith the promises that were made. If we are to treat these Supplementary Estimates which were submitted and discussed in this House, and the details of which were given to the House, as bona fide Estimates, and if we are to make allowance for reasonable further Supplementary Estimates, which would be necessary to be brought down some months later, we should be forced to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite contemplated an expenditure, or so estimated, at all events, for the year 1896-97 of about $42,000,000. Now, of course, let us remember that we do not spend every item of the money that is estimated. For one reason or another, considerable sums of money which are estimated and voted in Parliament, are not spent. Sometimes appropriations are made in the House, and then they lapse to a considerable extent. If we make a rough calculation in this respect, and, suppose we allow a million for possible reductions and for certain lapses, that would bring us down to the sum of $41,000,000 as that which the hon. gentlemen, on the basis of these Estimates, must have spent in the year 1897, had they remained in power, whereas, we actually expended in that year only $38,349,759. So, if this calculation be anywhere correct—and I admit it can only be a rough calculation—after we have credited hon. gentlemen opposite with lapsed items, the difference in favour of the present Government, in the year 1897, was nearly $2,500,000. But let me, for the sake of argument, give my hon. friend the benefit of his contention that there were no Estimates agreed upon, and, of course, that necessarily implies that some of the hon. gentlemen who made various statements in letters and on the platform, were not as accurate as they should have been: but we need not dwell upon that. Let us assume that there were no Estimates agreed upon; but let us also assume that there must be Supplementary Estimates, in the natural order of events. What is a fair means of ascertaining the Supplementary Estimates that the hon. gentleman would have been obliged to ask for in 1897? I propose a method of calculation to which, I think, my hon. friends opposite cannot object. I have prepared a statement, showing what the Supplementary Estimates had been for three preceding years, which is as follows:—

| Fiscal Year.                | Passed in Session of | Amount.   |      | Passed in Session of | Amount.   |      | Total.    |      |
|-----------------------------|----------------------|-----------|------|----------------------|-----------|------|-----------|------|
|                             |                      | $        | cts. |                      | $        | cts. | $        | cts. |
| 1892-93                     | 1892                 | 1,494,026 | 91   | 1893                 | 1,062,585 | 04   | 2,556,611 | 95   |
| 1893-94                     | 1893                 | 1,023,783 | 62   | 1894                 | 791,876   | 99   | 1,815,660 | 61   |
| 1894-95                     | 1894                 | 1,327,803 | 31   | 1895                 | 707,852   | 61   | 2,035,655 | 92   |
| Total for three years ..... |                      |           |      |                      |           |      | 6,407,928 | 48   |
| Average .....               |                      |           |      |                      |           |      | 2,135,976 | 16   |

This statement shows, that, in the three years, from the actual figures of the hon. gentleman's own blue-books, he had Supplementary Estimates to the amount of $6,407,928.48, and an average per year, in these three years, of $2,135,176.16. Now, if we take the amount of the Main Estimates submitted to Parliament by him, in the first session of 1896, for the fiscal year 1896-97, $38,308,548.13, and add the average amount of the Supplementary Estimates for the preceding three years, $2,135,976.16, we have a total of $40,444,520.29, as the least sum which the late Government would have appropriated for the year 1897. But to get at the probable actual expenditure of the year, we must take into account the sums that were usually allowed to lapse. As I have just said, it is not possible to spend every dollar of the moneys that are appropriated. Owing to various causes there are always sums which it is not found convenient to spend, although Parliament has appropriated the money. To ascertain what deductions should be made for lapses, I again take the average for the three preceding years. The following statement shows the sums estimated, the sums expended and the sums allowed to lapse for the three years, beginning with 1893 :—

Mr. FIELDING.

|                             |                 | Lapsed.        |
|-----------------------------|-----------------|----------------|
| Estimates for 1892-93.      | $38,479,892 12 |                |
| Expenditure in 1892-93      | 36,814,052 90   |                |
|                             |                 | $1,665,839 22 |
| Estimates for 1893-94.      | 38,365,031 13   |                |
| Expenditure in 1893-94      | 37,585,025 52   |                |
|                             |                 | 780,005 61     |
| Estimates for 1894-95.      | 39,103,912 71   |                |
| Expenditure in 1894-95      | 38,132,005 05   |                |
|                             |                 | 971,907 66     |
| Total for three years ..... | $3,417,752 49  |                |
| Average .....               | $1,139,250 83  |                |

It will be observed that, in the two later years, the lapses are smaller in amount than they were in the earlier one, a fact which indicates that the Estimates were more closely made. But, to give my hon. friend the fullest benefit in the comparison, I take the average of lapsed appropriations for the three years, which I find to be $1,139,250.83. From the figures obtained in this way I make the following statement :—

|  |                 |
|--|-----------------|
| Hon. Mr. Foster's Estimates for 1896-97, submitted to the House..                                | $38,308,548 13 |
| Add for Supplementary Estimates the average Supplementary Estimates of the preceding three years | 2,135,976 16    |
| Total Estimates for the year 1897 would thus have been .....                                     | 40,444,524 29   |
| Deduct the average lapses of three years .....   | 1,139,250 33    |
| Balance representing probable Conservative expenditure for 1897..                                | 39,305,273 46   |
| Against the actual expenditure of the present Government of.....                                 | 38,349,759 34   |
| Showing a reduction by the present Government of .....   | 955,513 62      |

The tendency of Opposition financial critics, no matter what party may be in power, will always be in the direction of a large measure of confidence in their own ability to cut down expenditures, and it will not always be found possible for a Government to realize all the expectations of its friends in that direction. My hon. friend who now leads the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has had some experience in that line. Towards the close of the session of 1878, on the eve of his appeal to the people, he made a speech in this House, in which he attacked the extravagance of Mr. Mackenzie's Government, and he made this statement, standing in his place, as an important member of the Opposition of that day in this House. He said he was prepared to carry on the Government of the country with less money than the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie had spent. He said he and his colleagues had proved this by their experience in the past and that they could conduct the business of the country for a smaller expenditure than that which Mr. Mackenzie had taken. We have proved it before, he said, and we are prepared to do it again if we are placed in power.

I have given the quotation from memory, but I am satisfied it is substantially correct, and I shall be glad to give the actual words if they are called for. The hon. gentleman came into power on the strength of that assurance. The expenditure the last year of the Mackenzie Government (1878) was $23,503,158.25. The leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and his friends came into power and the expenditure, instead of being reduced, was rapidly increased, as follows :—

|            | Expenditure.    |
|------------|-----------------|
| 1879 ..... | $24,455,381 56 |
| 1880 ..... | 24,850,634 45   |
| 1881 ..... | 25,502,554 42   |
| 1882 ..... | 27,067,103 58   |

Therefore, it will be seen that during the first parliamentary term after the Conservatives came into power under the assurance that they would conduct the public business for less money than Mr. Mackenzie had spent, they increased the public expenditure from $24,500,000 to $27,067,000. After that the expenditure went up by leaps and bounds, until at last it was more than $38,000,000. Now, I venture to cite that as a proof that whatever expectations any persons may have as to the kind of government which the country would experience under the leadership of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), there is one thing certain, and that is, that nobody will ever expect him to carry on a Government of economy.

Perhaps, Sir, the best test, after all, of the degree of expenditure, and the fairest method of comparison, will be one which takes into account the growth of population and the responsibilities and development of the country. No one, I imagine, will suppose that the expenditure of a country like ours, under any Government, can remain at a standstill. As the country increases in population its needs will correspondingly increase. If the expenditure just keeps pace with the increase of population, or shows a diminution per head of population, there is nothing in it to alarm. If the expenditure per head increases, then there is just ground for criticism, and the increase will have to be justified by some important and urgent outlay. Under the administration of the late Government, not only did the total expenditure increase, but it increased much more rapidly than the population, and consequently the expenditure per head showed an increase. I have here a statement showing the expenditure of Canada chargeable to consolidated fund for all the years from 1867-68 to 1897-98, giving the rate per capita—the population in each year being taken from the census or from the estimates furnished by the Government statistician :

It will be seen from this statement that the present Government, while carrying on the ordinary services efficiently, and meeting large new obligations, have kept the expenditure down to 7.39 per head, against 7.53 in 1895. If we leave out the exceptional year 1896, for reasons which I have already given, we find that the expenditure per head under the present Government has been materially lower than it has been at any previous time during the past fourteen years. In view of all the urgent calls upon the treasury, including additional interest charges on account of large expenditure on canals and railways, the opening of the Yukon district and the extension of the Inter-colonial Railway to Montreal, it would not have been surprising if we had been obliged to show an increased expenditure per capita, but we have the satisfaction of presenting to the House a statement which shows that while meeting all the demands of Canada's "growing time," we materially reduced the expenditure per head of the population in 1897 and 1898. Sir, we are glad to be able to point out that whatever may happen this year or the next year (concerning which we have not the material yet for making a calculation) we are glad, I say, to be able to point out that for the year 1897-98 our expenditure was only 7.39 per head as against 7.53 in the year 1895.

The question of economy is very widely discussed, and I suppose we can all agree as to the desirability of economy, but I am afraid there will not be such a universal agreement and clear understanding as to what economy means. It is very easy for men to advocate economy in classes of expenditure in which they feel they have no particular interest, but it is not so easy for men to favour economy in the case of public works in their own locality, or public works in which they feel interested. A large number of the gentlemen who rise to cry out against this Government in the matter of expenditure, and to call for economy, are among the first to come before the Government and ask that we enter upon large and expensive public works. As a curious example of the Conservative method of treating this question, I note that only a few days ago the chief organ of the Conservative party contained an article commenting on the Estimates which I had just laid on the Table of the House, the article being designed to show that we are spending far too much. But in the very same column there appeared a leading article complaining that we have not provided half a million dollars for Toronto harbour, and intimating that we shall be expected to do so in the Supplementary Estimates. I have no doubt that Toronto harbour ought to have a liberal expenditure, and if the object of that expenditure is half as good as has been represented by this newspaper, I shall be glad to assist my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) in doing what is right for Toronto harbour. I think, however, that we shall have to ask some of our Conservative friends to recognize the fact that economy—like charity—should begin at home. If a gentleman of the Conservative party, whether he is in the House or out of it, looking around, sees the need of some particular public work in his own district or country, or some great scheme in which he feels interested, and if he is going to ask the Government to provide money for that scheme; then we must ask him to be broad-minded enough to remember that there are like public works and schemes in other parts of the country, and, if he expects these things to be done for the development of the country in his own particular district, he must be prepared to have the same things done in other districts, and if necessary in other provinces. The critics, in Parliament and out, who condemn our expenditure as too lavish, and then call upon us to spend money freely in great enterprises, such as fast lines, Pacific cables, railways, canals, harbour improvements and public works of all kinds, can hardly expect to make much of an impression upon the fair-minded people of Canada.

I will give the House briefly a few statistics of Canada's trade—not because they have already appeared, but because they usually are a portion of the Budget speech. I have here a statement showing Canada's foreign trade on the basis of "total exports and imports" for the last five years, which is as follows:—

CANADA'S FOREIGN TRADE FOR FIVE YEARS.

Statement showing Canada's foreign trade on the basis of "Total Imports and Exports" for the last five years:

|            | Total Exports. | Total Imports. | Total.        |
|------------|----------------|----------------|---------------|
| 1894 ..... | $117,524,949  | $123,474,940  | $240,999,889 |
| 1895 ..... | 113,638,803    | 110,781,682    | 224,420,485   |
| 1896 ..... | 121,013,852    | 118,011,508    | 239,025,360   |

| 1898 ..... | 164,152,683    | 140,323,053    | 304,475,736   |

I have now a similar statement of our foreign trade for the last five years on the basis of goods entered for consumption and Canadian produce exported, which is as follows:—

Statement showing Canada's foreign trade for the last five years on the basis of "Goods entered for consumption and Canadian produce exported":

|            | Goods entered for Consumption. | Canadian Produce Exported. | Total.        |
|------------|--------------------------------|----------------------------|---------------|
| 1894 ..... | $113,093,983                  | $104,161,770              | $217,255,753 |
| 1895 ..... | 105,252,511                    | 103,085,012                | 208,336,523   |

| 1897 ..... | 111,294,021                    | 123,959,838                | 235,253,859   |
| 1898 ..... | 130,698,006                    | 145,594,385                | 276,292,391   |

The following is a statement of goods entered for consumption for the nine months ending March of the following years, made from the monthly returns:—

|          | 1896.      | 1897.      | 1898.      | 1899.       |
|----------|------------|------------|------------|-------------|
|          | $         | $         | $         | $          |
| Dutiable | 50,972,796 | 50,299,935 | 56,534,679 | 64,772,597  |
| Free     | 28,915,510 | 30,249,701 | 36,505,121 | 43,939,716  |
| C. & B.  | 4,263,958  | 4,553,388  | 3,116,081  | 4,077,693   |
| Total    | 84,152,264 | 85,103,024 | 96,155,881 | 112,790,006 |
| Duty     | 15,463,213 | 15,169,626 | 16,585,938 | 18,751,708  |

I also give the exports for the nine months of the following years:—

|             | 1896.       | 1897.       | 1898.         | 1899.         |
|-------------|-------------|-------------|---------------|---------------|
|             | $          | $          | $            | $            |
| Produce     | $2,387,098 | $8,513,890 | $112,575,032 | $104,544,707 |
| Not produce | 5,182,349   | 7,822,895   | 10,521,046    | 14,807,944    |
| C. & B.     | 4,475,101   | 3,344,339   | 4,245,124     | 3,519,696     |
| Total       | 92,044,548  | 99,681,124  | 127,341,202   | 122,872,347   |

There is here a slight falling off in 1899 as compared with 1898, but in comparison with any previous year the increase is very large; and it is not unlikely that the difference, as compared with 1898, may be made good before the close of the fiscal year.

I want now briefly to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary growth of the trade of Canada during the past two years. I have here a statement showing the total trade of Canada for several periods—imports and exports, but not including coin and bullion—as follows:—

|               |               |
|---------------|---------------|
| In 1868 ..... | $121,266,217 |
| 1878 .....    | 171,432,739   |
| 1896 .....    | 229,099,732   |
| 1898 .....    | 295,461,754   |

The increase in the total trade of Canada from 1878 to 1896, eighteen years, was $57,666,993; the increase in the total trade of Canada from 1896 to 1898, two years, was $66,362,022; showing, Mr. Speaker, that the total trade of Canada in two years, under this Liberal Administration, the advent of which to power we were told was to bring ruin and disaster to our country, increased more by $8,695,029 than it did during the eighteen years of the Conservative Government.

The attention of the world is being drawn more and more to Canada as a mining country. Apart from the precious metals, there is a wealth of other metallic and non-metallic substances the mining of which gives employment to numbers of our people and affords remunerative avenues for the employment of capital. That there has been a very great development of these mineral resources will appear from the tables issued by the Geological Survey, giving the mineral production of Canada for some years back, I give the total values of mineral production from 1890 to 1898:

|            |              |
|------------|--------------|
| 1890 ..... | $16,763,353 |
| 1891 ..... | 18,976,616   |
| 1892 ..... | 16,628,417   |
| 1893 ..... | 20,035,082   |
| 1894 ..... | 19,933,857   |
| 1895 ..... | 20,758,450   |
| 1896 ..... | 22,584,513   |
| 1897 ..... | 28,661,430   |
| 1898 ..... | 37,757,197   |

In 1898 there is an increase of over 32 per cent as compared with 1897. Whilst the large increases of late years have, of course, been partly due to the discovery and working of the rich gold placers of the Yukon, other important mineral industries have also contributed to them and there is every reason to expect a continued rapid growth in many of them for some years to come.

Speaking generally of the business of the past year, I can fairly congratulate the country on having experienced the advantages of marked prosperity and sound progress. On every hand we are met by evidences of expansion, and at the risk of wearying you, Mr. Speaker, I propose to allude to a few of the many directions in which the activity has made itself felt, so that we may measure and compare what has been done in the past year with what has been done in years previous. In banking circles I find a healthy and strong tone pervading the returns coming to us from month to month, and running through the reports presented at the various annual meetings of these financial institutions throughout Canada. It is of interest to note the very striking advance in the aggregate of the deposits of the people in the chartered banks and the two classes of Government savings banks. For the two years 1896-97 and 1897-98, the figures tell their own tale. I give the detail of these deposits for the past eight years :

|           | Deposits,CharteredBanks. | Deposits,Gov. SavingsBanks. | Total.        |
|-----------|----------------------------------|-------------------------------------|---------------|
| June 30—  |                                  |                                     |               |
| 1892 .... | $160,942,778                    | $39,529,547                        | $200,472,325 |
| 1893 .... | 170,817,433                      | 41,849,658                          | 212,667,091   |
| 1894 .... | 174,930,936                      | 43,036,012                          | 217,966,948   |
| 1895 .... | 180,664,121                      | 44,450,498                          | 225,114,619   |
| 1896 .... | 183,769,992                      | 46,799,318                          | 230,569,310   |
| 1897 .... | 201,141,688                      | 48,934,975                          | 250,076,663   |
| 1898 .... | 227,063,343                      | 50,111,118                          | 277,174,461   |

On the 31st of March last the total reached $297,483,152, indicating that the pronounced increase of the last two years in this direction is being more than maintained in the current fiscal year.

That there has been an unusual activity in business generally will be apparent if we look at the returns of the clearing houses throughout Canada. The total clearances in the six cities—Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Halifax, St. John and Hamilton—during the year 1898, reached the aggregate of $1,390,019,394, as against $1,174,710,345, during the previous year, or an increase of over $215,000,000, or over 18 per cent. You will remember that the clearings of the same six cities in 1897 were over $125,000,000 in excess of those of 1896. So that the year 1898, so far as the clearings reveal it, shows a very much larger volume of business than 1897.

In the case of the city of Montreal, which now, I may say, comes ninth in the list of American cities according to bank clearings, coming immediately after San Francisco, the increase in 1898 over 1897 has been over 21 per cent, and in the city of Toronto the increase has been in the same proportion.

There is another feature of banking business that is of interest to us, and to which I will now refer, that is the note issue. In times of activity there arises a strong demand for currency. From year to year this is specially noticeable at harvest time, and immediately after, when the crops are being moved.

During the past year there has been a continued demand for currency, especially for small notes. At times it has been difficult to keep pace with the demands.

To show the extent of the issue, I give a statement of the circulation of the notes of the chartered banks and of the Dominion notes for the past years, taking for the purpose of comparison the 31st of October in each year, when as a rule the demand is greatest :

|            | Banks.       | Government.  | Total.       |
|------------|--------------|--------------|--------------|
| 31st Oct.— |              |              |              |
| 1892 ..... | $28,688,429 | $18,647,063 | $57,335,492 |
| 1893 ..... | 36,906,941   | 19,844,248   | 66,751,189   |
| 1894 ..... | 34,516,651   | 22,212,834   | 56,729,535   |
| 1895 ..... | 34,571,028   | 22,893,259   | 57,564,287   |
| 1896 ..... | 35,955,150   | 21,607,553   | 57,562,703   |
| 1897 ..... | 41,580,928   | 24,751,932   | 66,332,860   |
| 1898 ..... | 42,543,446   | 24,315,988   | 66,859,434   |

In the case of the Dominion notes of the small denominations, $1 and $2, the demand in the fall of the year has been very great, indeed. So much so that my department has at times had difficulty in keeping up with it. The amount of these notes outstanding on the 31st of October in each year for the past seven years is of interest, and I give it, as follows :

|            |             |
|------------|-------------|
| 1892 ..... | $7,266,569 |
| 1893 ..... | 7,266,937   |
| 1894 ..... | 7,031,368   |
| 1895 ..... | 7,295,368   |
| 1896 ..... | 7,583,712   |
| 1897 ..... | 7,940,520   |
| 1898 ..... | 8,612,602   |

Closely allied to the banking business is that of insurance. The prosperity of to-day leads the prudent man to think of to-morrow, and so we find that the buoyancy in business generally is reflected in the business of life insurance, which is regarded more and more in the light of an investment as well as a provision for a rainy day.

In the life business there is a very pronounced development in the net amount of insurance in force in the straight life companies, as will be seen from the figures of the past eight years :

|            |               |
|------------|---------------|
| 1891 ..... | $261,475,223 |
| 1892 ..... | 279,110,265   |
| 1893 ..... | 295,622,722   |
| 1894 ..... | 308,161,436   |
| 1895 ..... | 319,257,581   |
| 1896 ..... | 327,800,499   |
| 1897 ..... | 344,012,277   |
| 1898 ..... | 368,517,074   |

The amount of life insurance effected in Canada in the straight life companies during the same period was :

|            |              |
|------------|--------------|
| 1891 ..... | $37,866,287 |
| 1892 ..... | 44,620,013   |
| 1893 ..... | 45,202,847   |
| 1894 ..... | 49,525,257   |
| 1895 ..... | 44,341,198   |
| 1896 ..... | 42,624,570   |
| 1897 ..... | 48,267,665   |
| 1898 ..... | 54,270,775   |

or nearly $5,000,000 more than in any previous year. These figures do not include insurance on the assessment system.

That the year has been a prosperous one with the traders will appear from the records of failures kept by the commercial agencies. Indeed, in this respect 1898 has the best record we have had for years. The commercial agencies give the total number of failures in Canada in 1898 as 1,300, with liabilities of $9,821,323, against 1,809 failures with liabilities of $14,157,498 in the year 1897, or a reduction of 28 per cent in number and 30 per cent in amount as compared with the year 1897. That is the best record for the past thirteen years.

The showing of the principal railroads have been very favourable, notwithstanding the rate war that lasted throughout the greater part of the year. The earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway increased $1,973,000, and those of the Grand Trunk Railway $582,000 over those of the previous year. The figures for these two companies for 1897 and 1898 are :

|            | C. P. R.     | G. T. R.     |
|------------|--------------|--------------|
| 1897 ..... | $23,822,000 | $23,530,000 |
| 1898 ..... | 25,795,000   | 24,112,000   |

The large street railway companies have experienced an impetus from the improved conditions of the people. Their earnings show a steady progress. The following table gives the amount of the receipts of these companies in operation from 1894 to 1898 :

|            | 1894.     | 1895.     | 1896.     | 1897.     | 1898.     |

In the city of Halifax, the receipts of the Halifax Tramway Company for 1897 were $194,775, and for 1898, $198,837. In the city of St. John, the receipts of the street railway company were :

These are some of the features, Mr. Speaker, of the business record of the Dominion. They carry with them the inference that there exists a strong feeling of confidence, not only in the resources of the country, but also in the basis on which its business is founded.

There are other interesting figures of a like character which I am desirous of laying before you. These I have had incorporated into diagrams, copies of which will be placed in your hands. They cover fuller statements of the import and export trade ; the shipping and coasting trade ; the railways and railway traffic ; life and fire insurance ; deposits in chartered banks and savings banks ; discounts of the chartered banks ; and deposits made with loan companies ; and show at a glance the strides that have in recent years been made.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, instead of using words of my own to describe the prosperous condition of Canada, I shall do better by quoting the words of others who are in a good position to speak with authority. Of the great development that has taken place in the Yukon gold fields, I need not speak. We have had abundant evidence of that in our recent discussions. As one of the indications of improvement in the North-west, I take this passage from the latest annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway :

The satisfactory progress which has been made in the settlement of the North-west is evidenced not only in the largely increased land sales of the company, but in the number of homesteads taken up from Government lands in Manitoba and the territories beyond, which, according to official returns, were 4,848 in 1898, as against 2,406 in 1897.

To show what has been accomplished by the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, let me quote a recent article from the correspondent of the Montreal "Star" :

Never before in the history of the Canadian North-west did a wave of prosperity at once so sudden and so general, sweep over any portion as completely as did that ushered in by the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Everywhere along its line new towns have sprung up, as mushrooms in a warm shower. The land office and the newspaper led the van, and the settlement and upbuilding of the entire district has been nothing short of phenomenal. Nor are the towns so built carelessly knocked together, to be abandoned the moment the novelty wears away. The line runs, in its entire length, through a country of vast and varied resources ; and while the wild-cat operator may be here to-day and away to-morrow, the fact remains that the natural wealth of the country is such as to demand and abundantly repay years of development, so that all signs point to steady and permanent growth.

The last report of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto offers abundant evidence of business activity in Ontario and throughout the country. I quote a passage from the address of the retiring president, Mr. Elias Rogers :

Turning to the always interesting subject of inter-Imperial foreign trade, the retrospect was no less agreeable. For the first time in the history of Canada the total imports and exports had exceeded $300,000,000 in value.

The increase was due in part to the high price of wheat during a portion of the year, and to the large crops of 1897, which permitted heavy exporting. With the single exception of foreign products, however, all classes of exports contributed to the increase. The result was seen in the freedom of importation during the past summer, even before assurance of another good harvest gave added strength to the movement, and in the increasing demand upon our own factories and mills.

How much of the prosperity now to be seen on every side is due to the increase of the export trade must remain a matter of opinion. It may be noticed in passing that until six years ago the exports of Canadian produce never exceeded one hundred millions, and that, as compared with a date so recent as 1896, the exports of 1898 show an increase of thirty-four and a half million dollars.

The greatest increase of late in the volume of free imports give to some extent the measure of the country's industrial development, because the free imports consist largely of raw materials for manufacture.

At the annual meeting of the Montreal Board of Trade, the retiring president, Mr. Charles F. Smith, spoke as follows:—

I think the time opportune to call your attention to this fact, for we are now in the enjoyment of prosperity such as this country has never known, and it is pretty evenly divided throughout Canada. Our railroad extensions are bringing to life new villages—indeed I might say new towns. Our population is steadily increasing, with a development in our agricultural and mining resources, to the importance of which we should be fully alive. Many of the towns on or near the lines of traffic are building elevators, deepening their harbours, or otherwise preparing to share in the profits of handling the produce that is moving eastward. Gentlemen, I believe that we cannot realize the valuable growth of the trade and traffic that must become our portion in the near future.

From an address delivered at the same meeting of the Montreal Board by Mr. James Crathern, one of the oldest members of the board, I read as follows:—

I think to-day I may venture to congratulate this board, that the past year has certainly been to us what may be termed a jubilee year, in connection with the trade and commerce of this country. During the forty-five years in which I have been actively engaged in business as a merchant in this city, I have passed through many seasons of mercantile and financial depression; but at no time have I known the commercial and financial interests of the country to have been on a sounder or better footing than at present. We have been blessed with a bountiful harvest, and all engaged in commerce and manufacture report a satisfactory volume of business.

While the condition of the country generally is remarkably good, I recognize the fact that in the Lower Provinces they have not shared in that prosperity as fully as have the provinces further west. Nevertheless, we have very encouraging reports from that quarter. I have not at hand a quotation from the St. John Board of Trade meeting, but, from personal knowledge of the community. I am led to believe that the business of the port of St. John was a very encouraging one indeed. They have a good winter port trade, and with the revival of the lumber industry, which is of the utmost importance in New Brunswick, I think we may make up our minds that, in that province, there will be a fair degree of business activity. As to Nova Scotia, I take the following from the annual report of the Halifax Board of Trade:—

The business of the year has been of a fairly satisfactory nature, and although the prosperity which has attended the upper provinces, through abundant crops and high prices, has not been participated in by us to the same extent, we have great cause to be thankful. Our gold mines have yielded a larger return than ever, the production of our coal mines has increased, our fishermen have had their smaller catch largely made up to them by higher prices, our fruit-growers have been similarly blessed; our lumbermen, although compelled to accept lower prices than during the previous year, have not done badly; our new enterprise of pulp manufacture is flourishing, and generally speaking there has been throughout our province a very fair degree of prosperity. Failures have been much fewer in number, and smaller in amount, and we all look forward with confidence to the great future which awaits our province, with its varied interests, many of which are capable of great development.

Now, I am going to ask the attention of the House to a statement respecting the foreign trade of the United States and Canada. I have had prepared a comparative table, comparing, in very considerable detail, the foreign trade of Canada and the United States from the time of confederation down to the present moment. Living, as we do, alongside the great republic, it is natural that we should make comparison from time to time between their affairs and ours. I realize, Sir, that the United States, more than any other country, is a self-contained country: it does not need to go beyond its own borders for variety of products so much as does Canada, because they have a greater diversity of soil and climate than we have. Nevertheless, the people of the United States are very anxious to develop a foreign trade; and many of our American friends would be surprised to know how far behind Canada they are in this respect. The total trade of the United States, imports and exports, exclusive of coin and bullion, in 1898 amounted to $24.60 per head. For the same year, the corresponding figures for Canada are $56.29 per head.

Mr. FOSTER. That is foreign trade.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am speaking of foreign trade. And I quite recognize the fact that we must not draw from this too quickly the conclusion that we are more prosperous than our neighbours, because, as I have said, from their natural condition, they do not need to go abroad for so many goods as we. Still, I think the comparison is a very interesting one. It will be seen by the table to which I refer, that in 1868 the total trade of the United States was $17.29 per head, and thirty years later, in 1898, it had increased to $24.60 per head, an increase of $7.31 per head. The total trade of Canada for 1868 was $35.96 per head, and in 1898, $56.29 per head, an increase in thirty years of $20.33 per head, as against an increase of $7.31 per head in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) happen to have the population of both countries in 1868?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not the figures in the statement before me. The United States domestic exports per head, last year, were $18.05, while the Canadian exports, during the same year, were $27.54 per head. Making a comparison for two years, I find the following:—The total trade of the United States for 1896 was $23.32 per head, and for 1898, $24.60 per head, an increase in two years of $1.28 per head.

The total trade of Canada for 1896 was $44.69 per head, and for 1898, $56.29 per head, an increase in two years of $11.60 per head for Canada, as against $1.28 per head for the United States. The total trade of the United States for 1897 was $24.94 per head, and for 1898, $24.60 per head, showing a decrease in 1898, as compared with 1897, of 34 cents per head. In the same time the total trade of Canada increased from $48.01 per head in 1897 to $56.29 per head in 1898, showing an increase for the year of $8.28 per head, as against a decrease of 34 cents per head in the United States.

This statement I shall ask the House to allow me to put in "Hansard" for future reference; it covers many details with which I do not wish to trouble the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection personally. But I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that I was very strictly kept to the rule. I think it was all nonsense to do it, and I do not propose to ask my hon. friend to do it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Not tables.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend denies that, I shall stand by my demand, that every thing be read.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not deny. I am much obliged to my hon. friend for his suggestion.

Mr. FOSTER. I remember it, time and again.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I accept my hon. friend's statement. Last year, I spoke to the editor of "Hansard," and he told me, that, while that was the rule, an exception was made in the case of the Budget speech. However, I accept my hon. friend's statement, and, thanking him for the courtesy he has extended to me, I will put this statement in.

Mr. FOSTER. We will be as generous to you as we can under your difficulties.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend must see that the presentation of these interesting statements must be a matter of exceeding difficulty. In the Budget of a year ago we extended the benefit of the preferential tariff to the British West Indies (including British Guiana). This step on the part of Canada was received with great satisfaction by the press and people of the West Indies. Some improvement in our trade with these islands has already been accomplished, and we have ground for hoping for further extension, although there are certain conditions respecting the United States tariff which tend to check the growth of trade with Canada. Our West India trade has not been in a healthy condition for several years. Our imports from the British West Indies have been steadily declining. In the year ending 30th June, 1898, before the preferential tariff came into operation as respects the West Indies, our imports from these islands were a little more than half what they were in 1897. Our exports to the British West Indies also showed a steady falling off. The situation was such that but for the preferential tariff our trade with those islands would have been almost destroyed. While the trade is still far from what it should be, I am hopeful that when we have the statistics of the present year, which will include 11 months of the preferential tariff, we shall be able to show a very decided improvement as compared with the year before the preferential tariff began. Our imports of sugar from the British West Indies (including British Guiana) for the six months ending 31st December, 1898, were :

Mr. FIELDING.

|                       | Lbs.        | Value.    |
|-----------------------|-------------|-----------|
| Six months, 1898..... | 9,049,020   | $161,901 |
| Six months, 1899..... | 6,245,924   | 124,804   |
| Increase .....        | $2,803,096 | $37,097  |

There is a feature of the United States tariff which tends to encourage trade between the West Indies and that country, and which to some extent, balances the preference we have extended to the West Indies. I know that when we extended a preference rate to the West Indies there was a disposition in some quarters to criticise us for giving a preference when we were getting nothing in return. But I am afraid that the advantage to our West India friends which we intended them to have, is not as great as some persons imagined. We give a preference of 25 per cent on sugar coming from the West Indies, and the United States, though they have not a preference in the same form, actually give a preference on cane sugar over beet sugar, which is more than 25 per cent ; in fact in some instances it may be as high as 35 per cent, and possibly more. They do this by a system of countervailing duties. They levy the ordinary tariff on beet sugars which come into the United States ; then, in addition, they have a provision in their tariff that wherever any sugar comes from what is called a bounty-fed country, then that sugar shall pay, in addition to the stated ordinary duty, an additional duty equal to the amount of the bounty which is paid by the Government of the country from which the sugar is exported. Now, as beet root sugars of the continent are all bounty-fed sugars, they are subject to this additional countervailing duty in the markets of the United States, and the difference thus made between the cane sugar which comes from the West Indies and the beet sugar which comes largely from the continent of Europe, amounts, as I said a moment ago, to fully 25 per cent, and indeed in some cases to a considerable more. Therefore, there is a great demand in the United States for cane sugar. There are strong inducements on the part of the American refiner to buy cane sugar, because he can enter it at a duty very much less than beet sugar. Whether we can do any large amount of trade with the West Indies, even under our present preferential tariff, is a question which, I frankly say, is open to some debate, and we may have to consider, if we desire further to encourage our West India trade, whether we can not devise some other methods of doing it. For the present, I think the figures of the present year show a considerable increase in our West India trade, but I am afraid we cannot look for any great increase while the United States tariff stands in the position to which I have referred.

In this connection my attention has been called to the fact which is very interesting indeed. It will be remembered that attention has been drawn to the fact, both in the press and in the House, that one result of the arrangements recently made between the United States and Porto Rico was to place Canadian shipping at a decided disadvantage. A considerable proportion of the shipping of our maritime provinces, and possibly some from the St. Lawrence also, carried the products of Canada out to Porto Rico, then loaded with sugar and carried the sugar back to ports of the United States. Under the changed condition of affairs whereby Porto Rico becomes virtually part of the United States—at all events it is so treated—that at once became a coasting trade, and under the coasting laws of the United States our ships were no longer permitted to take sugars or any other products from Porto Rico and land them in the United States ports. It was a matter of considerable embarrassment to our shipping interests, and though I do not know that we could have expected anything else, still it was a very regrettable arrangement, and one that we were particularly anxious to have modified if possible. I am glad to be able to say that from information now received, orders have been sent by the War Department to the general commanding in Porto Rico to permit all vessels, American or foreign, to load and clear for the United States. This is information which comes to us from the Foreign Office. I understand, of course, that they will always have the right to go to a foreign port ; the difficulty was that they had no right to go to a United States port, but they can now clear from Porto Rico for the United States.

The extent of the tariff reductions made by our Act of 1897 have been the subject of much discussion in Parliament and in the press. The positions assumed on this question by hon. gentlemen opposite from time to time have been strangely inconsistent. When the new tariff was brought down nobody doubted that the reductions were numerous and important. The fact that there was a sharp reduction on a great many items all along the line was recognized by hon. gentlemen opposite and by their press. If it were necessary I could quote abundant proof of that fact, and if the accuracy of my statement is called in question, some of these quotations will be given before the debate closes. It is enough for my present purpose to say that hon. gentlemen opposite and their press have recognized that we made a great many important reductions. Indeed the charge was made against us that our reductions were of such a character that we would paralyze the industries of the country. The opponents of the Government either believed or hoped that under the change of tariff policy the business interests of the country would suffer, and so they were prepared to condemn the Government roundly for the reductions that were made. But their expectations or hopes in this direction were doomed to disappointment. The Liberals claimed that under a policy of tariff reform the business interests of the country would be benefited, not injured. Time proved the correctness of their views. In almost every branch of industry the settlement of the tariff question was followed by a revival of business. Trade, commerce and even manufactures flourished as never before. Then, finding that all their predictions as to the disaster which was to follow under a Liberal Administration had proved unwarranted, our opponents quickly swung round to the other side of the question, and took the ground that we had made no tariff reductions, and that the old so-called National Policy was still in force. This appears to be the last attitude of the Conservative party, and, therefore, I propose to devote a little attention to it. How a tariff in which, by their own admission, the duties in many lines had been cut unsparingly, could still be described as the old National Policy, is one of the things that an independent observer will have much difficulty in understanding. The facts and figures show conclusively that the old National Policy has not been continued, but that under a Liberal Administration a very large and substantial measure of tariff reform has already been accomplished. I shall invite the attention of the House to some of the evidences of this tariff reduction.

Our method of tariff reform involved the taking of three steps, two of them at the beginning and one at a later stage. In the first place, we prepared what we called a general tariff in which large reductions from the old tariff were made. Then we made our preferential tariff, whereby we provided that as compared with the general tariff, there should be a reduction of one-eighth of the duty in favour of British imports. And we made a further provision that, after the lapse of a little more than a year, there should be a further reduction of one-eighth so that at the end of that time, the duties on British goods would be one-fourth less than the duties on other goods. In the making of our general tariff, there were a few cases in which the duties were increased. In nearly every one of these, however, it will be found that when you apply the preferential rate, you have these duties lower now than they were under the old tariff. As the effort has been made to lead the public to believe that our reduction of tariff burdens was confined entirely to the preferential rate, I think it is important that the error of this view should be clearly pointed out. The preferential tariff was a most important and valuable feature of our tariff reform. But apart altogether from that, there was a large degree of relief from burdens in the form of reductions made in the general tariff, and of goods which were formerly dutiable and were transferred to the free list.

I have here a statement showing articles now in the free list of the tariff which were dutiable under the old tariff, and showing also the rates of duty imposed under the old tariff. These lists have been made by the officials of the Customs Department and they are guaranteed to be correct. I hope my hon. friend will consent to my putting them in without reading.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I cannot do that, not because I do not want to be quite generous, but we have to reply to that statement, and we cannot reply to a thing which is not read.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will give it to my hon. friend with permission to put it in the "Hansard" afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will have to read this too.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not object, but these statements are rather long and tedious.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a heavy importation?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, many of these items are not heavy, but they were regarded as very important to be put on the free list nevertheless. Of course, I could have selected only the heavy items, but I have taken them all fairly, big and little.

This is a large list of items, some of which go directly into general consumption, such articles as cordage, barbed wire, binder twine, &c., but many of these articles are the raw material used by the manufacturer, and the cheaper raw material which is furnished to the manufacturers has been the secret, to a very large degree, of the manufacturing prosperity which Canada is now enjoying.

Mr. McNEILL. Does this statement say that these goods are now free ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. These are now free, and I gave the duty that they formerly bore.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not a fact that a large number of these articles could, by Order in Council, be admitted free for the use of manufacturers ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That may be so : I have received the statement from the Customs Department. I will have that matter looked into, and, if it is so, I will have that correction made. The hon. Minister of Customs says that some were subject to Order in Council, and to that extent this list should be modified, and I will see that it is done.

Besides this transfer of goods from the dutiable to the free list, that were, as I have said, important reductions in the general tariff. I shall now submit a statement giving a list of the dutiable goods upon which the duty under the present general tariff is lower than it was under the old tariff and giving also the respective rates under the two tariffs. It is to be noted carefully that the rate of duty on all such articles is reduced still further by one-fourth under the preferential tariff. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will consent that I should put these items in. I will send the statement across to him and he can have the privilege of taking it home and studying it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the statement which I am now about to read, it should be noted that if any of these articles come in from Great Britain the present rate of duty is further decreased to the extent of the preferential tariff. These rates of duty which I shall read have no reference to the preferential tariff at all, but the statement is entirely a comparison of the present general tariff with the old tariff, and, as I have said, the present general rate of duty is to be further reduced to the extent of the British preferential rate on goods coming from that country.

STATEMENT giving a List of Dutiable Goods upon which the Duty under the present General Tariff is lower than it was under the Old Tariff, and giving also the respective Rates under the two Tariffs.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if even no further reductions had been made than those shown in the above statement, there would still be a large and substantial measure of tariff reform. But when we take into consideration the preferential tariff, whereby the duties of the general tariff are further reduced to the extent of one-fourth, we begin to see how large and important the tariff reductions have been.

I have pointed out the extent of the tariff reductions as applied to a large list of articles. I purpose now to invite the attention of the House to a further evidence of tariff reform ; but before doing so, I think I shall ask you to call it six o'clock.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Just before you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had read to the House a very long, and, possibly, a very tiresome, list of the items in our present general tariff the duties on which are materially lower than the duties in the old tariff of 1896. And I had observed, Sir, in commenting on that list, that if there had been no other tariff reform than that which was contained in the list of items I submitted to the House, our tariff we have been far from continuing the old National Policy, but would have given a large and substantial measure of tariff reform. But when in addition to that we consider that on every one of these items which can be purchased from the mother country, there is a further reduction of one-quarter of the duties, then I think we shall satisfy the House and the country that instead of having the National Policy still in force, as my hon. friends opposite have been contending, we have given the country a very large and substantial measure of tariff reform, which may be regarded as a fair and full compliance with the pledges in the Liberal platform of the convention of 1893.

But I propose now to take another view of the extent of this tariff reform. I have pointed out the reductions on a large number of items ; let me now invite the House to the question of the amount in the gross or the lump sum which these reductions represent in the taxation of the people during the past year. We want to ascertain what the tariff taxation would have been on the trade of 1898, if instead of having the present tariff we had continued in force the tariff of 1896.

Now, there are two ways in which we may ascertain this fact. If we ascertain the average rate of duties imposed under the tariff of 1896 and apply that to the importations of 1898, and then compare the results with the actual payments of duty under the tariff of 1898, we shall approximately reach the sum which represents the saving to the people. But there is a more exact way of making the calculation, and that is the way which I propose to take. That exact way is to take the tariff of 1896, item by item, and apply it to the importations of 1898, and see just what the taxation would be if the tariff of 1896 were applied in that way. I have here a statement of the tariff of 1896, applied to the importation of 1898. The duty on the imports of 1898, applying to these the tariff of 1896, would have been $24,752,827.08. The duty collected under the tariff of 1898 amounted to $22,157,788.49, and deducting the refunds under the preferential tariff, estimated at $120,000, that makes the net duties collected under our tariff in 1898, $22,037,788.49. Deducting this amount from the duty that would have been levied by imposing the rates of 1896 on the imports of 1898, we find that the reduction by the tariff of 1898 amounted to $2,715,038.59. Such is the result of a comparison between the sum collected on the imports of 1898 and the sum which would have been collected if the old tariff rates had applied.

But there is one item which may, perhaps, be the subject of special consideration and may go to qualify that statement. I allude to the imports of Indian corn. We imported in 1898, 19,771,314 bushels of Indian corn, which, being free, was entered for home consumption, notwithstanding the fact that a considerable portion was really intended for export and was afterwards exported. It may be said that if the old tariff of seven and a half cents per bushel on corn for home consumption had been in force—corn, of course, being free when passing through in transit—that corn would not have been entered for home consumption, and, therefore, we ought not to consider it in the home consumption at present. I have to observe on that point that if one of the results of our tariff has been that we have not only encouraged the use of corn for home consumption, but besides have attracted into the country a large quantity of corn for export, we have thereby given employment to our railways, elevators, steamships, and all the workmen who are associated with those various industries; and in that respect, we have something to credit the tariff with which is by no means unimportant. But for the purposes of argument, I propose to give our opponents the benefit of their contention respecting the item of corn, and to apply the tariff of 1896, not to the total imports of corn in 1898, but only to that part which remained in the country. That is to say, from the total imports I deduct the quantity, not the produce of Canada, which was exported, and I find the following result:

|   |                 |
|---|-----------------|
| Total duties collected in 1898.....                       | $22,157,788 49 |
| Less—Estimated refunds under the preferential tariff..... | 120,000 00      |
| Net.....  | $22,037,788 49 |

The duty that would have been collected under the 1896 tariff on all goods, allowing a duty of 7½ cents per bushel on 5,440,764 bushels of Indian corn—being the difference between 19,771,314 bushels set forth in the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1898, as imported free for home consumption, and 14,330,550 shown as the exports of Indian corn not the produce of Canada—I find would have amounted to $23,678,035.83. Or giving our opponents the benefit of all reasonable contention with regard to this particular item of corn, we still find that the duties levied by our tariff in 1898 were $1,640,247.34 less than they would have been if the old tariff had been applied to the imports of last year. The foregoing calculations are based on the trade of the year ending 30th June, 1898, but I have had a statement prepared—

Mr. FOSTER. Before my hon. friend leaves that portion of his argument, will he give the House some idea as to the method by which he has arrived at his conclusions. It is all very well to state that such is the case, but how does he arrive at it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. By instructing a very competent officer, who, I am sure, has acted very impartially, to apply the tariff of 1896, item by item, to the importations of 1898, as shown in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend the statement worked out?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Only the results. I have not it by me, but I think I could obtain it for my hon. friend subsequently. At all events I gave instructions that the inquiries should be made. I do not know that I could give more than the results, but I will speak about it later with my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be satisfactory to have it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) thought you said the results were satisfactory.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, he thinks queerly these days.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have now a statement for the nine months ending the 31st March, 1898, in comparison with figures of a similar period for 1896:

Comparative statement showing the value of goods entered for consumption for the nine months ending 31st March of the fiscal years 1898-99 and 1895-96, and showing also the reductions of duty under the present tariffs :

This reduction is equivalent to 11 per cent of the old rate, or, in other words, one-ninth of the whole duty.

Applying the rate of nine months of 1895-96 to the importations of nine months of 1898-99, we have the following result : —

Calculating on this basis, the reduction in duty for the whole year will be over .....

$3,000,000 00

Summing up these statements, I think it will be clear to the House, that the reduction in the tariff, as compared with the so-called National Policy, during the last fiscal year, when our preferential tariff was only partly in operation, amounted to $1,640,000, even when allowing for the corn. When our preferential tariff came fully into operation, this reduction became greater, amounting in the nine months of the present fiscal year to more than two and a quarter millions. And, if we make our calculation, as I said, for the whole year, we will find that total reduction on imports for 1899 is about three millions, as compared with what the duties would have been under the National Policy. I think, then, I may reasonably ask the House and the country to believe, that we have made a large and substantial measure of tariff reform; and I think I may say that the facts and figures which I have quoted will silence for ever the story that the National Policy remains in full force and operation.

There has been some discussion in the House, from time to time, over the change from specific to ad valorem duties. Specific duties are admittedly wise in many cases, especially in the matter of food products, because ad valorem duties might cause a temptation to import adulterated food. But in some cases, where you have, upon manufactured goods, specific duties or compound duties—that is, duties partly specific and partly ad valorem—those duties are likely to become excessive. There were cases in the old National Policy in which, adding the specific and ad valorem duties, or taking the specific alone, the duties ran up to an ad valorem equivalent of as much as 50 or 60 per cent, and, as my hon. friend beside me reminds me, in some cases even higher. Whether wisely or not, it was deemed a point of great importance to reduce these specific duties. They have not all been wiped out; but there are 59 items on which the duty was either specific or partly specific and partly ad valorem, which have now been transferred to the ad valorem list.

Mr. FOSTER. How many remain ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Quite a number. I have said we have not removed them all. But give us a little time.

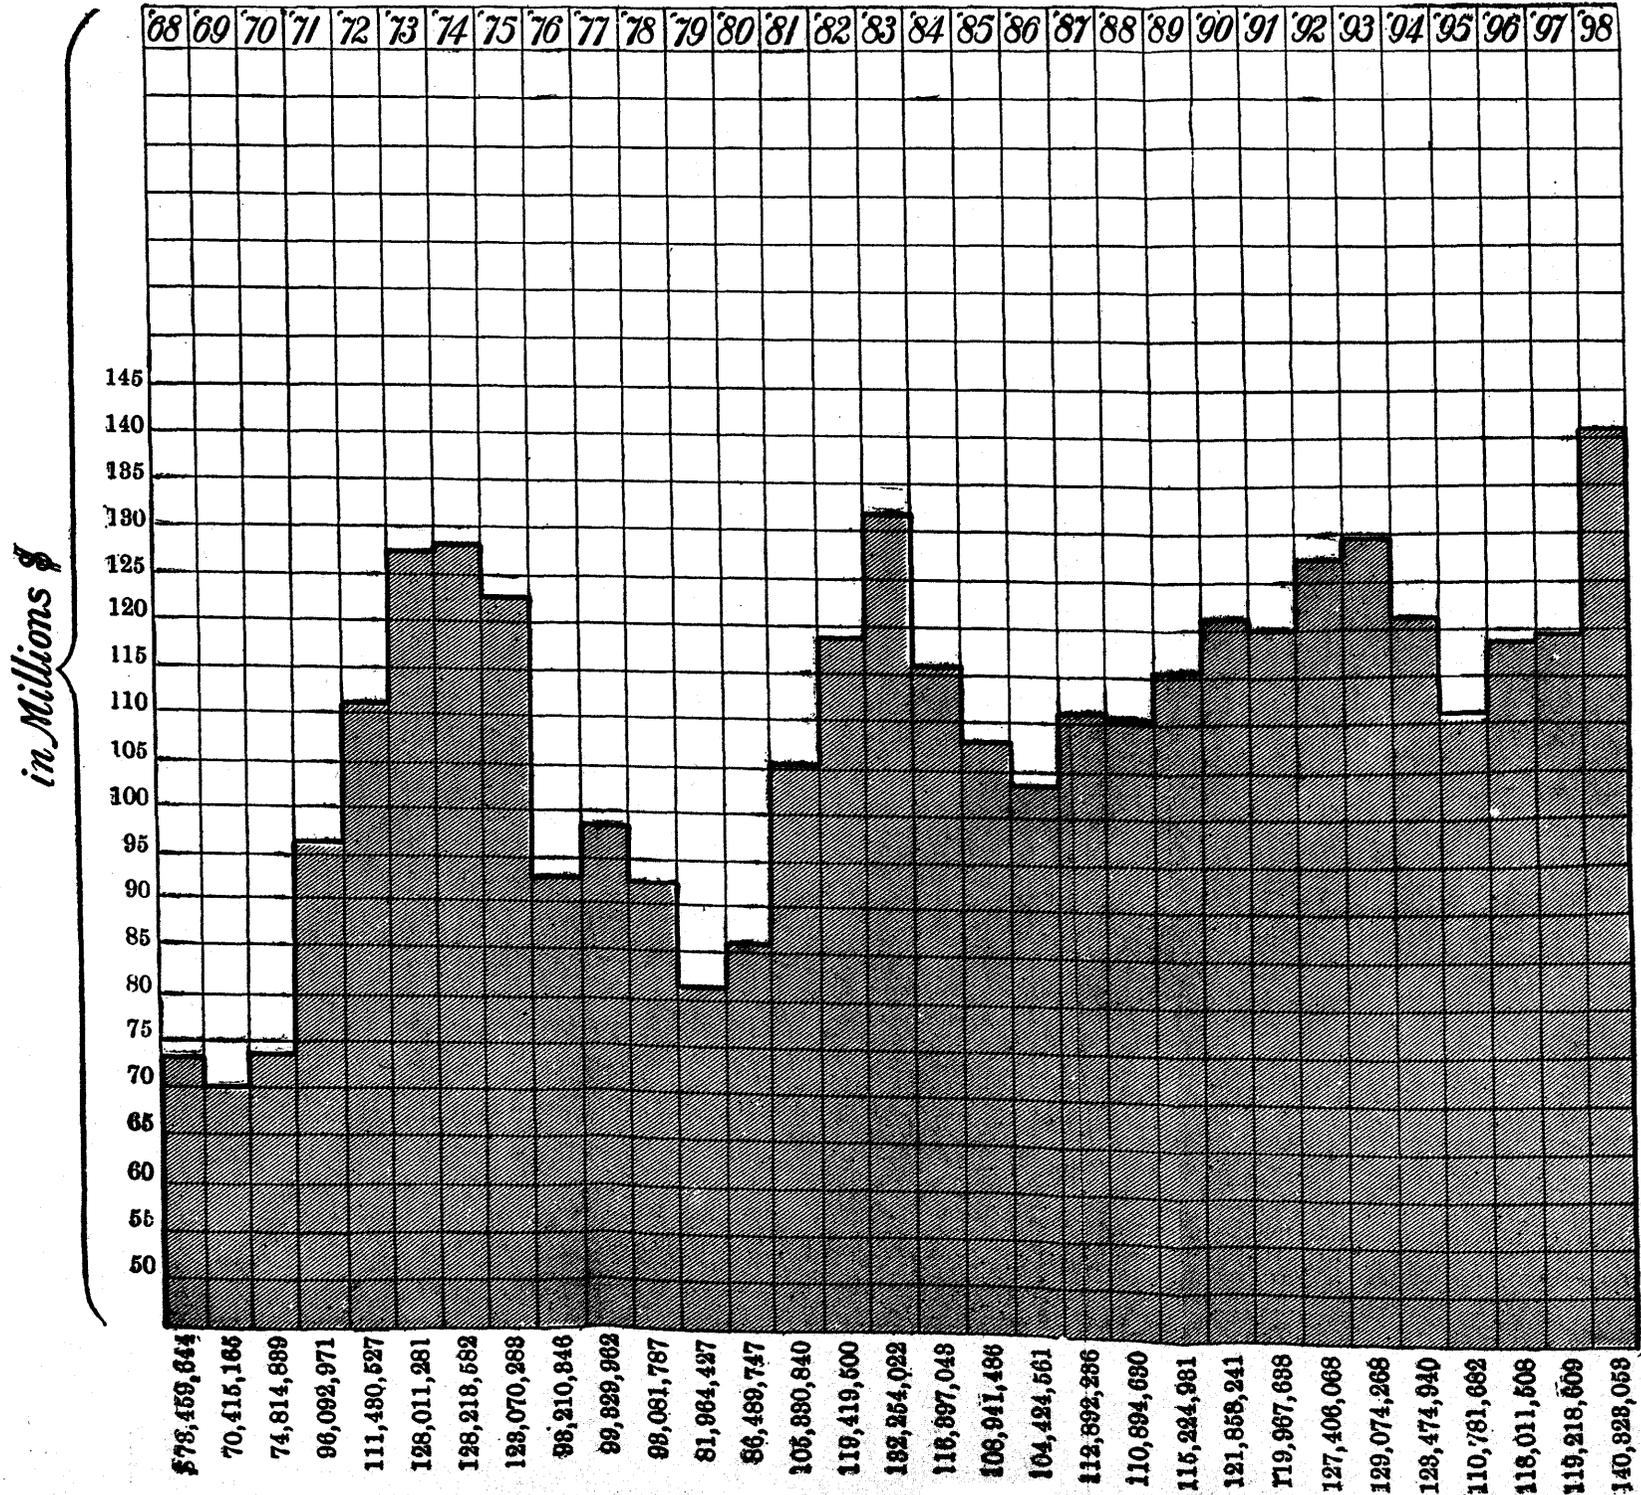

I wish to say something now with regard to the operation of the preferential tariff. I have observed that the opponents of the Government have of late adopted a new line of attack with regard to the preferential tariff. The signal success which followed the adoption of that measure, its effect upon public opinion, both at home and abroad, do not appear to have been entirely gratifying to hon. gentlemen opposite. Hitherto, their chief complaint has been, that we had granted this preferential tariff to Great Britain without receiving anything in return.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman evidently wishes to emphasize that as a policy which they have talked about in the past. However, according to their latest view, there is a different argument. They now tell us that this preference, which formerly they complained of our granting freely, and which they said we ought not to have given without receiving something in return, does not amount to anything at all. They have spent considerable time in trying to prove that, after all, there is not any preference. They have said that we humbugged and deceived the British people, that John Bull has been sadly humbugged by this Liberal Government. I have here a recent article from the leading Conservative organ; and I am justified in quoting from it as if it were the utterance of the party:

Now we have the exposure of the British preference. The British people, when this offer was first made public, were made to believe that the full 25 per cent was being knocked off in their favour—that is to say, that where the duty was 35 per cent it would remain at that figure for foreigners, but that it would be only 10 per cent for British goods. This tremendous discount was the cause of the jubiliations in Britain, and of Kipling's poem, "Our Lady of the Snows."

The article concluded as follows—I am reading from the Toronto "Mail and Empire":—

The so-called British preference is an imposture on Great Britain, and, owing to the flourish of trumpets with which it was introduced is a dishonour to us.

Now, the statements in the Opposition organ are a little stronger than those made in the House, but they are in line with those of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who leads the Opposition, and others, who declare that there is no preference, and that we have humbugged and deceived the British people. Well, Sir, whatever else may be said of the British people, I do not think that anybody outside of the Conservative party in Canada would say that the British people are so unintelligent, so ignorant, that they cannot read the plain words of English in the preferential tariff. No member of this Government, or of this House, ever made such a statement as that we proposed to reduce duties from 35 per cent to 10 per cent in favour of British imports. No such statement was ever published in an English paper. There is absolutely no foundation for such a statement. But we find the chief Conservative organ solemnly publishing that statement, and saying that we have deceived and humbugged the British people.

The preferential tariff stated in the plainest words that the duties provided under the general tariff—not the old Conservative tariff, but the revised general tariff, the duties of which, as I have shown, in many cases are much lower than under the old tariff—that the duties under the general tariff were to be reduced in favour of British imports to the extent of one-eighth of the duty, and that at a later date there would be a further reduction of another one-eighth, making a total reduction of one-fourth of the duty. That preference took effect from the moment the tariff was brought down, in April, 1897. Owing to the action of Her Majesty's Government, based upon the German and Belgium treaties, the disposition on the part of this Government and this Parliament to give Great Britain the benefit of that preference at once, had to be postponed until a later date, as respects our transactions with many of the countries of the world. But I want to call the attention of the House to an important point which I do not think has hitherto been dwelt upon, and that is that while there was some unavoidable delay, owing to the action of Her Majesty's Government, in bringing that preference into operation as between British goods and goods of the continent of Europe, as respects England and her great competitor in Canada, the United States, there never was any delay in the preference, but the preference took effect on the 23rd day of April, 1897, and continued from that time down to the present moment. Consequently the preference over her chief competitor, the United States, was a substantial preference from the beginning, it was a preference of one-eighth for the first 14 months, and it is now a preference of one-fourth. I would commend this particularly to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who has repeatedly made the statement that there was no preference in this matter, carrying out the same line of argument that they do now, that all this story of a preference was a humbug. Now, whether the duties in the general tariff are high or low, does not in any way affect the extent of the preference. No matter what the duties may be on the general tariff, the preference rate is one-fourth less. Even if the contentions of hon. gentlemen opposite were correct, and if we had largely increased the general tariff, the fact would still remain that there is a real and genuine preference of one-fourth of the duty. If the goods of a British merchant come into the custom-house of Canada alongside the goods of a foreign merchant, the preference makes itself manifest immediately, because while the goods of the British merchant are admitted for 75 cents, the goods of the foreign merchant cannot be admitted until they have paid $1. That is the simple fact, and I am sure it is understood by the British people, it is understood by the British merchant, it is understood by the British manufacturer and, therefore, there is not any shadow of foundation for the statement that we have misled or deceived the British public. My hon. friend beside me reminds me that it is also thoroughly understood by the American manufacturer. In support of that I may call attention to the fact that Colonel Bittinger, the American consul at Montreal, recently addressed a report to his Government at Washington, in which he pointed out that the decided preference which is given British goods in Canadian markets was operating against the trade of the United States. Now, as an illustration of the extent and value of this preference, I want to give the House a specimen invoice of goods imported by one of the large mercantile houses in Canada. The merchant imported 91 packages of dry goods covering a wide range. I will read you a list of the articles :

Gloves, caps, wool fabrics, lace, wool cloth, garter elastic, wool yarn, white cotton tape, ribbons, lace curtains, linens, damask, handkerchiefs, towels.

I think we may regard that as a fairly representative statement of a general line of British dry goods. Now, what is the effect of the tariff on that importation? Under the old tariff, the duty would have been $3,754, equal to 30.62 per cent. The amount actually paid by the Montreal merchant who imported these goods was $3,058.88, equal to 24.93 per cent, making a reduction in that one importation under the preferential tariff in favour of British goods of $695.12, being equal to 5.69 per cent on the value of the goods.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the value of the bill of goods?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it was about $12,000, but I find I have not put down the statement of the value. The value is given by the gentleman in the invoice, but I have not put it down in my notes. I have heard it said that the British preference is of no value after all, because it is only sufficient to meet the increased cost of importation of goods from Great Britain as compared with the cost of goods from the States. Well, the fallacy of that argument will be seen at once. If, with the preference, the British importer is only able to meet the American on even terms in the markets of Canada, then it follows that if there were no preference, the British importer would not have the ghost of a chance to get into the markets of Canada; therefore, the argument is evidently baseless. But in addition to that I have ascertained by the experience of a very large importing house in importing goods from England, that the freight, insurance, inland freight and shipping charges, &c., amount to about 10 per cent of the whole duty; therefore, there is 15 per cent of the 25 per cent duty still left, clearly to the advantage of the British importer. But the main point I want to note is the one I made a moment ago, that if it be a fact that the cost of importation from England is somewhat greater than the cost from the United States, and if by the preference the British exporter is only able to get amends in whole or in part for that increased cost, then it clearly follows that if there were no preference the British exporter would have no chance whatever in the Canadian market. The preference therefore is of very substantial value to him.

Attention has been drawn to the fact that imports from Great Britain have been increased but little, while our imports from the United States have increased a great deal. Well, there is nothing in that which our British friends can take exception to. We import from the United States a large amount of raw material, articles which England herself has to import, and which of course she could not expect to send us. Take, if you will, the matter of corn. No Englishman is going to complain because we admit corn free, for free corn, in a much wider sense than we have it, is one of the things of which most Englishmen are disposed to boast. Take the matter of iron. To a considerable extent England herself is buying iron from the United States to-day, and England cannot complain if we are importing from the United States the very class of goods she is obliged to import herself. The Englishman knows that we have given him a plain, straight preference of 25 per cent of the duty. Whether he can avail himself of that, is his business, and he can be safely trusted to look after that for himself. If he finds that the things which are being imported from the United States into Canada are things which by some accidental circumstances are made cheaper than he can make them, then the Englishman is going to look after the matter, and provide a remedy in due course. If, on the other hand, these increased imports are the result of our wanting to purchase things which England has not to sell, things which, by reason of the climate and soil of the United States, can be produced more cheaply in that country, or by reason of any special circumstance which cannot be overcome, then England will recognize the fact that we ought to import these goods from the United States, and she will herself follow in the same direction by importing these same goods, as she actually does. There are several reasons, however, why the British merchant has not been able to take advantage of this preferential tariff as largely as we hoped he would. I think the first reason, and it is a reason that we are pleased to note, is this, that under the broad and liberal tariff of the British Government the English manufacturer, the English merchant, is so busy, and has been so busy for several years, that he has no time to exploit new markets. It is a fact that the manufacturing industries of England are and have been for some time very prosperous, and when the manufacturers are so busy, naturally they are not disposed to stretch out their hands in search of new markets when they have all they can do to supply the old ones. Then there is another difficulty, and this is perhaps not entirely creditable to our English friends—and his only excuse must be that he is so busy—and that is the fact that the English manufacturer does not, in many lines, produce articles which the Canadian merchant and the Canadian people want.

I had a conversation, a day or two ago, with a gentleman who is a large consumer of cottons in Canada, and I asked him why he could not get these cottons from England. He told me that he had to buy them from the United States, because, as he said, the English manufacturer did not make the style of goods that he required, and was not prepared to change his machinery to suit the Canadian market. Then, there is another reason. I read recently an interesting article from the London correspondent of the Montreal "Gazette" on Anglo-Canadian trade, based on a statement made by Mr. Chamberlain in the British Parliament, as to the extent to which trade with Canada was increasing. The writer, referring to the small increase that had taken place in British exports to Canada, said he had discussed the subject with several well known London merchants, who said that, before we could have any large increase in British exports there must be a body of Canadian merchants in London to whom the manufacturer could go and sell his goods. It is pointed out by the writer that the large business which is being done between England and the Australian colonies is carried on, not by direct communication between the Australian merchants and the manufacturers, but through Australian houses in London. "In this year's London directory," says the correspondent, "there are some 250 Australian and New Zealand export merchants and only five Canadians." All these things, I think, may be taken into account as reasons for the British merchant and manufacturer not being able to avail themselves more largely of the advantages of our preferential tariff. But, while the increase has been less than we would have been glad to see, let us not for a moment suppose that our new tariff has not been of substantial advantage to the British manufacturer, which he understands and appreciates. I have here a statement of British importations in 1898 showing the duty that was actually paid, and the duty that would have been paid under the old tariff. It is as follows:—

|---|--------------|
| Value of goods, dutiable and free, entered for consumption from Great Britain (less coin and bullion) .....   | $32,043,461 |
| Amount of duty that would have been collected on such imports if the average ad valorem tariff rate of 1896, on British goods, viz., 22.42 per cent, was applied..... | 7,184,143 96 |
| Duty that was actually collected, less estimated refund of $100,000 on account of preferential tariff...   | 6,549,428 60 |
| Amount of reduction on British goods in 1898 was .....  | $634,715 35 |

There is another view of this question of British imports which deserves consideration. If the imports of British goods have not been so large as we had hoped for, let us ask ourselves the question, how much worse would the situation have been if this preference had not been in operation? The blue-books show that the imports from Great Britain had been declining for a number of years. The importations for consumption for the three years 1896, 1897 and 1898 were as follows:—

|            |              |
|------------|--------------|
| 1896 ..... | $32,979,742 |
| 1897 ..... | 29,412 188   |
| 1898 ..... | 32,500,917   |

It might be of interest to go back a little further and see how these importations have been steadily going down as appears from the following statement:—

|            |              |
|------------|--------------|
| 1893 ..... | $43,148,413 |
| 1894 ..... | 38,717,267   |
| 1895 ..... | 31,131,737   |
| 1896 ..... | 32,979,742   |
| 1897 ..... | 29,412,188   |
| 1898 ..... | 32,500,917   |

So, it will be seen that British imports into Canada had been declining from year to year. But the effect of our preferential tariff has been to arrest this decline, and to show an increase in one year of $3,000,000. I venture to say that, when we reach the end of the year, there is a strong probability that the imports of the present year from Great Britain will show a still further increase of $2,000,000. I have shown that the preference that has been given by Canada to Great Britain is a substantial preference, that Great Britain has availed herself of it to a very considerable extent, that we have been gaining because of this preferential tariff in our trade with Great Britain, and, I have no doubt that we will continue to gain as the matter is better understood by the English merchant.

There is another side to the question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been constantly complaining that, while we give to Great Britain a preference, Great Britain herself gives us nothing in return. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is strong on that point, and he has emphasized it by offering hears, hears, again and again. I must remind hon. gentlemen opposite that they sang the song of preferential trade for a long time, but they never accomplished anything, that they talked preferential trade, that they moved resolutions on preferential trade, but they never accomplished anything in respect to preferential trade, so long as they coupled with the proposition a demand for taxation on British food. I do not say that it would not be largely to the advantage of Canada to have a preference on Canadian grain. If the British people are prepared to tax the grain of foreign nations and admit Canadian grain free, no doubt it would be a very material advantage to Canada. I am not one of those who say that it will never be done. I know that some gentlemen think that it is so unreasonable that it will never be done. I am willing to believe that it is possible, not through the policy which has been pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, but by the spirit that is fostered and encouraged by the action of this country in respect to the preferential tariff, and by similar offers that probably will be made by other colonies, there may be brought about such a state of public opinion in Great Britain that a change will be made in our favour. I am not going to set my face against that, of course. But what I want to point out is that, so long as we demanded a preference, we never succeeded in accomplishing anything. When the question was approached in the right way, when we ceased to demand unreasonable things, when we said that we were prepared, in recognition of the generous treatment which we have always received from England, to give a preference to her in our markets, the heart of the Englishman was touched, and what he was not willing to do at the dictation of any colonial government he is willing to do voluntarily of his own account. So, it comes about that though there is no preference for Canadian goods on the British statute-book, there is a preference for Canadian goods in the hearts of the British people, and we are sending over every year increased quantities of the exports of Canada. This argument, which has been used before, I have heard it said, is not well founded. It has been said that the increase of our exports to Great Britain is only a part of the general increase of trade, and that the United States has had a similar increase. But the facts do not sustain that view. On the contrary, they show very clearly that the increase of Canadian exports to England have been, proportionately, much larger than the increase of American exports. The total exports from the United States to Great Britain for 1898 show an increase of something over 11 per cent, but, at the same time, the exports from Canada to Great Britain increased more than 35 per cent. The following are the figures showing the exports from both countries, coin and bullion not included :

| Total exports from United States to Great Britain for 1897.....  | $483,270,398 |
| Total exports from United States to Great Britain for 1898 ..... | 540,458,367   |
| Percentage of increase—11·833 per cent.                          |               |
| Total exports from Canada to Great Britain for 1897.....         | $ 77,227,502 |
| Total exports from Canada to Great Britain for 1898 .....        | 104,998,779   |
| Percentage of increase—35·960 per cent.                          |               |

Some of our opponents are not willing to recognize the preference which really exists in England for Canadian goods, but the information before us is most conclusive on this point. My hon. friend who represents the county of Kent (Mr. Campbell) gave us the other night an illustration of the preference which England gives to Canadian goods to-day. He told us that a few years ago, to his own knowledge, it was the practice of British importers to have Canadian goods marked as "American," for the reason that Canadian goods were not popular in the British market, but within the last year or two, so great is the interest in everything Canadian, he has received advice that he had better mark his goods under the name "Canadian," and now his goods are being sold under that name.

Mr. FIELDING.

But that is not the only evidence. I shall give to my hon. friends opposite another piece of evidence to show that although there is not any preference on the statute-books of Great Britain, there is, as I have said, a preference in the hearts of the British people. I have in my hands the report of the Federated Association of the Boot and Shoe manufacturers, at the annual meeting held at Leeds, on the 23rd November, 1898, and a further report of December, 1898. I quote from the report :

PREFERENTIAL TARIFFS FOR BRITISH GOODS.

The question as to the tariffs that are imposed upon boots and shoes by foreign and colonial countries, and the changes that have recently taken place in some of them, was brought before the meeting, particular attention being called to the fact that Canada had in August last established a preferential tariff in favour of British goods to the extent of remitting 25 per cent of the ordinary duty, and that this preferential treatment had already caused a very considerable increase in the general trade between Great Britain and Canada. It was pointed out that although the reduced duty on boots and shoes into Canada may not lead to a demand for English boots and shoes, yet the extra British trade in other goods must indirectly benefit the home boot trade, and that as Canada, Australia and other colonies are large producers of hides and leather, it would be wise to favour the importation of such colonial productions for manufacturing purposes.

It was resolved, on the motion of the president (Mr. S. Leonard), seconded by Mr. W. Hickson (Northampton) :

"That this meeting of the Federated Associations of Boot and Shoe Manufacturers of Great Britain records its appreciation of the change in the Canadian Government's commercial policy, which has, by the establishment of a preferential tariff for British goods, largely increased the trade between Great Britain and Canada, and trusts that further reductions in the tariff may be made. This meeting recommends boot manufacturers to give a preferential consideration to the leather imported from Canada, Australia and other colonies which admit British goods free or under a preferential tariff, and that a copy of this resolution, together with a complete list of the duties now imposed upon boots and shoes by foreign countries, be printed and forwarded to the members of the Federated Associations."

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that there was nothing selfish in this resolution. Is it not another strong proof of the increased appreciation of Canadian goods in England? This resolution shows that the boot and shoe trade in England realize that they could not send any great quantity of boots and shoes to Canada, for no doubt they are aware of the fact that that is a line of manufacture in which we can compete with the world. But notwithstanding this, so keen was their appreciation of the new trade policy of Canada, that they passed a resolution advising their members to purchase Canadian leather. I have no doubt that the increased exports of the Canadian product in that line are due, in some considerable degree, to the fact that these boot and shoe manufacturers have in this way shown their appreciation of the preferential tariff adopted by Canada.

I have another bit of testimony of the same character which I will give to my hon. friends opposite. They seem to be unwilling to believe that there is anything in this preference, but I want to give them evidence to show that the Englishman does give a preference to Canada, and that he gives it voluntarily and cheerfully, although he was not willing to be dragooned into it by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the Montreal "Herald," of the 22nd of April, there was a very interesting article on the growth of the canning industry in Canada. Mr. Innes, a gentleman largely engaged in the canning trade, tells the "Herald" of the extension of his business in various directions, and mention is made of the gratifying increase in sales to Great Britain. I quote from the interview :

"Are the goods giving good satisfaction?" was asked.

"Yes," said Mr. Innes, "they are giving excellent satisfaction, and British customers especially are inclined to favour us all in their power. They give the preference to Canadian goods, and are learning to trust us as to quality."

"Do you think, Mr. Innes, the strong Imperial sentiment that the present Government has fostered has helped your sales at all in Great Britain?"

"I do," most certainly," was the reply, "and I may say that we have sold thousands of dollars' worth of canned apples this past season through a happy idea in having the labels engraved so as to convey this sentiment."

And then, Mr. Innes exhibited to the reporter some handsome labels which he was placing on his cans, including quotations from Rudyard Kipling's "Lady of the Snows," a poem which is itself one of the most notable products of the preferential tariff.

An hon. MEMBER. Mr. Innes is a great Tory.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend behind me says Mr. Innes is a great Tory. Well, this interview does great credit to Mr. Innes, and I have no doubt that there are thousands of men who used to be great Tories in the Dominion of Canada who are going to follow the Liberal Government hereafter, and will not any longer follow the hon. gentlemen opposite.

In another matter also, Canada is receiving a preference, as will be found from this despatch, which appeared in our newspapers, and which is dated London, April 28th :

London, April 28.—British Board of Trade emigration returns for the first three months of the current year are very flattering to Canada. The number of people leaving the United Kingdom ports for Canada show an increase of 24 per cent over corresponding period of 1898, while emigration to the United States shows a decrease of 15 per cent, and that of other British colonies, including South Africa, has practically remained stationary or shown a slight falling off.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, they are giving preferences to us in the matter of our goods, and they are giving that most valuable preference to us in the matter of immigrants who hereafter are going to come to Canada in larger number than ever before.

There is one item in our tariff to which I wish to make special reference, because it has been a subject of two discussions in this House during the present session. I refer to the duty on coal oil, and also to the regulations relating to the trade in that article. It must be admitted, I am sure, that the duty imposed on coal oil, although lower than it was under the old tariff, is still so high as to arouse much opposition, and it is quite evident that the Finance Minister will have little peace until he makes some further reduction.

The cost of coal oil has been made high in Canada, not only by the duty, but also by restrictions that have hitherto been placed on the trade. We removed some of these restrictions at the time we reduced the duty, and I have reason to believe that, so far as such removal of restrictions went, it had a good effect; but the complaint is made that we did not go far enough. Several hon. gentlemen making quotations of the prices of coal oil in the United States and in Canada have made the difference twice as large as the total amount of duty; so it is quite evident there is something at work besides the duty to increase the cost of coal oil in Canada. Now, the regulations which have been imposed in times past—partially for good reasons, and possibly in part taking the form of protection—have materially increased the cost of coal oil. Besides reducing the duty by one cent per gallon we increased the number of points at which oil might be delivered in tank cars; a change which, I think, was of some relief, especially in the North-west Territories. We also granted further liberty to the oil trade by permitting oil to be carried in tank vessels, subject of course to proper restrictions for safety. By some strange process of reasoning, or, rather by assertions without any reasoning, opponents of the Government have solemnly argued that by reducing the duty we made the oil more expensive, and that by permitting the carrying of oil in tank vessels we were doing some great injury to the public. Well, the one argument is about as reasonable as another. The folly of such representations will be apparent to all who give the matter a moment's consideration. The demand for freedom to handle oil in the most economical way, through the medium of tank vessels came from the maritime provinces. To refuse them that privilege would be very unreasonable. The system of tank cars is excellent for the inland districts, but water transportation is generally cheaper than rail transportation, and consequently wherever there is the open ocean or navigable water of any kind the people who live beside it carry their freight chiefly in ships. To grant liberty to use tank cars, and refuse liberty to use tank vessels, was simply to deny to the people of the sea coast the advantages of cheap transportation which nature had provided for them. Throughout Canada to-day the problem of transportation is one of the most important that occupies public attention. Everywhere the desire is to economize in the cost of handling and transporting merchandise. For this we deepen our canals and increase the size of our steamers and barges to insure the cheapest water carriage. For this we increase the size of our locomotives and railway cars, improve grades and straighten curves, so that goods may be hauled over the land at the cheapest possible rate. Would it not be very absurd were we to do all these things in the interest of cheap transportation and then say that we would make the carriage of oil as expensive as possible?

Since the carriage of oil in tank-ships is a recognized means of transportation, what possible reason could be given for shutting out the people of Canada from that method? To say that the people on our sea coasts should be compelled to receive their oil in barrels, would be about as reasonable as to say that the people of Ontario might import coal from the United States, but should be compelled to bring it in wheelbarrows. Whether one company or half a dozen companies avail themselves of the privilege which we grant, is no concern of ours. Our duty was to remove the restrictions and give to the people who live beside the sea, an opportunity to enjoy the same privileges of cheap transportation as are possessed by the people of other civilized communities. I believe that the privilege of tank vessels has only been used to a moderate extent, but there is no doubt that it will grow and cheapen the cost of the article, just as cheap transportation in any other line of goods reduces the cost to the consumer. While the Government have unquestionably taken a step in the right direction by reducing the duty on oil and removing some of the restrictions which have added to its cost to consumers, there is still room for improvement; and, though we put aside until another time the question of further reduction of the duty, we propose to make further concessions to the people with respect to the restrictions imposed on the oil trade. At present, all petroleum, whether Canadian or imported, must be barrelled before being inspected. The package must bear the inspection marks, and inspection fees must be paid, varying from  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent to  $\frac{1}{4}$  cent per gallon according to the size of the package. We propose to sweep away all these restrictions. Canadian oil will be inspected at the refineries, and imported oil at the port of entry; and, having been so inspected, it may be removed or sold without restrictions as to packages. The inspection fees will be entirely abolished. The present law contains provisions for guaranteeing the safety of the oil. These must be adhered to and rigidly enforced. But, apart from what may be necessary in the interests of safety, our aim will be to allow the utmost freedom in the handling of the oil. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue will introduce immediately a Bill to abolish all the restrictions to which I have referred. There is no doubt that a large part of the oil business will still be handled in barrels. The tank cars and ships will come to large centres, where the oil will be stored in tanks, and from thence distributed in barrels to different parts of the country. Wherever the conditions of the trade require that, well and good; but, where they do not, we do not propose, hereafter, to compel the people to buy oil in barrels. Such regulations as may be necessary to insure safety to the people by the confiscation of any oil found in Canada which does not come up to the proper standard, must be maintained, and possibly made even more rigid; but beyond that we shall abolish all these troublesome regulations, and in that way give to the people a large measure of relief, although not at present reducing the duty on oil.

We do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to make any changes in the tariff this session. In making this statement, I do not, for one moment, assume that the tariff is perfect.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend says, No; but, if it is the same old National Policy that he, last week, said it was, it ought to be perfect, in his estimation. I may find some little fault in it, but my hon. friend ought not to do so.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE. I did not make any remark whatever.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I understood my hon. friend to say, "No," when I said that the tariff was not perfect. Some other hon. gentleman said so. I wish, however, to point out several reasons why it is not expedient to change the tariff at present. In the first place, a certain reasonable degree of tariff stability is always important, if we are to have that confidence in business without which we cannot hope to have prosperous times. Therefore, even though in all respects the tariff may not be as we would like it, it is better to bear some imperfections than to enter upon revisions which might create disturbance in the business of the country.

But there are further reasons against present change. It is to be remembered that our Tariff Act of 1897 legislated not only for the present, but for the early future. It was a graduated measure, the latest stage of which only came into effect a few months ago. It was not until the 1st of August last that our preferential tariff came fully into force. Our tariff policy, therefore, has been in operation in its present shape for only nine months. Hence, while recognizing the fact that there are imperfections in the tariff. I feel that it will be better, for the present, to bear with those apparent imperfections than to enter upon a revision of a tariff which, in its present condition, is only nine months old, and under which Canada is prospering; as never before.

There is another reason which is entitled to consideration, although I will frankly say, that it may not weigh as much in the mind of the House now as it did some time ago. I refer to the negotiations between the United States and Canada respecting commercial relations and other matters, which are soon to be resumed by the Joint High Commission, at Quebec. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, in a recent speech, said it appeared as if Canada no longer wanted reciprocity. Perhaps that statement was a little stronger than some of us would care to make it. This I will say: There never was a time when reciprocity was not desirable, and I do not suppose there will ever be a time in the history of Canada when it will not be desirable that liberal trade relations should exist between the people of Canada and the people of the great republic to the south of us. The people who live along the boundary line, whether in the United States or in Canada, must always find it a source of inconvenience and embarrassment to be denied a profitable and reasonable commercial intercourse. The people who live near the sea shore, in the New England States on the one side, and in the Maritime Provinces on the other, must always feel keenly the denial of that trade intercourse which nature seems to have intended them to have. All this I fully recognize, as respects the Canadian side of the subject. Nevertheless, it is true that the demand for reciprocal trade relations with our neighbours to the south is by no means so strong as it was a few years ago. Whatever our American friends may have intended by their trade policy, there is one thing that they certainly have done: they have made Canadians more independent and self-reliant, and have caused them to look more steadily than before to their home market and their markets over sea, where there is an open door. Especially have our producers given attention to the British market during the past two years, when our trade relations with the mother country have been so developed and increased by the preferential tariff. Therefore, the market of our friends to the south is much less important to us than it was a few years ago, and we are better able to do without reciprocity than we have been at any previous time in the history of Canada. Nevertheless, I say again, there never has been, and I trust there never will be a time when reciprocity between the United States and Canada will not be desirable. Our commissioners will resume their important duties at Quebec in August, with the same earnest desire that they have manifested in the past to bring about a satisfactory trade arrangement with our American brethren. If it shall appear that no such arrangement can be made, while we shall all regret it, we shall be prepared to go on our own way cheerfully, with full confidence in the resources of our country and in the ability of our people to develop them successfully, for there is but one feeling among the Canadian people from ocean to ocean—that Canada shall have a fair treaty or no treaty at all.

I have presented, Mr. Speaker, some evidences of the remarkable growth and prosperity of Canada, which I am sure, even though presented in the dull form of statistics, must make a deep impression upon the minds of all who give attention to them; and this growth will be the more striking when viewed with the assistance of the diagrams which will be distributed in a few moments.

And now, Sir, in conclusion, let me say that Canada has much reason to be proud of the position she occupies to-day. It is a splendid exhibit of her financial and industrial condition which we are permitted to present to the world. But, Sir, in the midst of all this prosperity I would venture to utter a word of caution. It is said that one of my distinguished predecessors in office, at a time when trade was fairly prosperous, advised business men to "clap on all sail." Far be it from me to utter that sentiment to-day. I can assure you, Sir, that I have no disposition to offer such advice as that. I would much rather, if I thought that words of mine would have any weight, utter a word of caution in the spirit of Kipling's "Lest we forget; lest we forget." In the midst of this great prosperity, I would remind my hearers that the conditions which have brought it about cannot be expected to prevail always. It will not constantly fall to the lot of a Finance Minister to make such an agreeable statement as I have the pleasure of submitting to-day before the House of Commons of Canada. We cannot always have good crops and good prices. Conditions at home and conditions abroad may be such as to bring about a check to all this prosperity. From the experience of the past we know that the pendulum which has now for two or three years been swinging strongly in Canada's favour may soon fall back. There may soon come a time when things will not be so prosperous, and so I would to-day rather, as respects our national housekeeping and in the business world, utter a word of warning and advise our people to make a wise use of our present opportunities so that when less prosperous times come to us, as come they will, we shall be able to bear them easily.

Let our aim be, not to have what is commonly called a "boom" in trade, but to lay strongly the foundations of our business, so that Canada may move steadily forward in all things necessary for the welfare of her people and the advancement of her position as the greatest colony of the British Empire.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to ask any favours, but we have been here since three o'clock, and I have been trying to listen and take notes of the immense mass of details which has just been presented to us, and though I would much prefer myself to go on and get through with my reply to-night, I think my request would not be unworthy of consideration—more especially as I have been suffering with a severe cold for the last two days—if I were to ask that we should now adjourn the debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I fully admit that my hon. friend, if he wishes it, is perfectly justified in asking that the debate be adjourned. We have had a most interesting and able discourse and we would be paying a very poor compliment to my hon. friend if we were not to give hon. gentlemen opposite a day to digest and answer it.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The House has listened for a long period with great patience, and unless my hon. friend desires it, I do not propose to ask him to stay any longer. Of course if he wants, we can go on with supply.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not on the list of wants.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 9.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 3rd May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ELECTION FRAUDS IN MANITOBA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I have a motion to make in relation to a matter which I have already mentioned on two occasions. On both occasions the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked me to let it stand, and finally asked me to bring it up to-day. It relates to the Ninth Report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts presented last session, reading as follows:—

Mr. FIELDING.

The committee have had under consideration an item of $10,964.41 to Archibald & Howell, J. D. Cameron and W. E. Perdue, for legal services and expenses in connection with prosecutions for election frauds in Manitoba (including $4,000 transferred from Unforeseen Expenses), as set forth under the heading Miscellaneous Justice—North-west Territories, on page 1—7 of the Auditor General for the year ended 30th June, 1897; and in connection therewith have examined witnesses under oath, and for the information of the House report herewith the evidence given by such witnesses, and the exhibits filed during the said examination, so that the inquiry may be dealt with and continued at the first available opportunity at the next session of Parliament, and your committee recommends that the said evidence and exhibits be printed.

Hon. members on the Treasury benches who were members of the Public Accounts Committee, will recollect that they attributed some importance to the fact that this inquiry was to be continued at this session of the House. There were suggestions that there should be a report, and a motion that the committee should report at that stage was withdrawn on the undertaking I then made that I would be prepared to continue the inquiry, as in the language of this report, "at the first available opportunity at the next session of Parliament." Accordingly some days ago I proposed to move the motion that I have now in my hands, but at the request of the Prime Minister I postponed that until the next meeting of the House, and again at his request I postponed that motion until now. I therefore move:

That the evidence and proceedings before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the last session of this House respecting certain prosecutions in the province of Manitoba, be referred to the said committee appointed for the present session for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

BRIDGES OVER THE PIGEON RIVER.

Mr. HUGHES asked:

Is it the intention of the Government, this year, to construct swing bridges over the Pigeon River, in Emily Township, in order to allow vessels to reach the village of Omemeé?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There has been some correspondence on this subject, and it is now in the department, with reference to building swing bridges over the Pigeon River, but it is not the intention of the department to construct such bridges. We do not consider that the river is under the control of the department, as it forms no part at all of the Trent Canal.

BOND OF PETERSEN, TATE & CO.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. Has the Government enforced payment of the guarantee or bond for the sum of £10,000 stg., received or held by the Government or by Her Majesty from Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co. as security for the performance by that firm of their contract with Her Majesty ?

2. If not, what is the reason for the failure to enforce payment thereof, and for the delay, if any, which has already taken place with respect to enforcing payment thereof ?

3. Does the Government propose to enforce payment thereof ? If not, for what reason ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Government have not enforced the payment of the guarantee or bond referred to in the hon. gentleman's question, nor will it be enforced. In consideration of the consent given by the contractors to the termination of their contract at a much earlier date than was originally provided for, the guarantee bond was practically released, the Government, however, keeping in their hands the sum of ten thousand pounds sterling as security, which they still hold.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE YUKON TERRITORY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Is the Government, or any member thereof, aware that Major Walsh, when Commissioner for the Yukon territory, issued permits to take spirituous liquors into that territory ?

2. If so, (a) Under what authority did he act ? (b) How many permits did he issue ? (c) To whom were said permits given ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. (a) Major Walsh was under the impression that his authority as Commissioner empowered him to issue these permits. (b.) Two. (c.) McLeod and Sullivan, and P. McCauley.

DOUKHOBOR, FINLAND, MENNONITE AND GALICIAN IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked :

1. What is the exact number of Doukhobors, Finlanders, Mennonites and Galicians brought into the country this year ?

2. What has been the cost per head, to the Government, of this immigration ?

3. What advantages have the Government given to these immigrants who have reached this country, in money, lands and provisions ?

4. At whose instigation has this immigration been effected ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Up to the present, the number is as follows : Doukhobors, 4,072 ; Finlanders, 162 ; Mennonites, 16 ; Galicians, 1,494. 2.

The cost to the Government for Doukhobor immigrants was one pound ($4.86) per head. For Galicians, Finlanders and Mennonites, the usual commission of one pound per adult ticket to be paid to the booking agents. 3. In the case of the Doukhobors, a certain tract of land has been set apart to be homesteaded. No money, lands or provisions have been given excepting as a charge against bonus. 4. The immigration of the Doukhobors was effected through negotiations between a representative of an English committee, consisting of members of the Society of Friends and others interested, and the department. No special arrangement was made regarding the immigration of Galicians, Finlanders or Mennonites other than the ordinary work of the foreign agent of the department.

BROCKVILLE VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

On what date and to whom were the voters' list, as required by the Franchise Act, sent to the Brockville constituency for the late election ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Queen's Printer furnished the following information, and I will read it just as he sends it to me :

Ottawa, May 1st, 1899.

MEMORANDUM RE BROCKVILLE VOTERS' LISTS.

The law provides that when the voters' lists are printed twenty copies should be sent to the sitting member and twenty copies to the defeated candidate. When the sitting member dies the only direction then remaining is that lists shall be given to the defeated candidate.

The printing of the lists was done between March 31st and April 3rd, and twelve copies were sent to the hon. the Secretary of State, intended for the defeated candidate. It was observed, however, just as the lists came to final verification, that some trifling errors existed in them. Lest others should exist, and to have them perfectly accurate, the Queen's Printer gave orders that they should all be re-read, from the first, and printed on better paper.

While this was being done Mr. H. A. Stewart, of Brockville, wrote for the lists, which he said belonged to him as executor and representative of the late Hon. Mr. Wood. A reply was sent, as attached, marked "A," under date of April 3rd.

This letter is as follows :—

Ottawa, April 3rd, 1899.

Sir,—In reply to your letter dated April 1st, I beg to say that the lists for Brockville were not printed until some time after the death of the Hon. Mr. Wood. The law provides that lists shall be sent to the sitting member, and it is clear that an executor cannot be included in that designation.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

S. E. DAWSON,

Queen's Printer and

Controller of Stationery.

H. A. Stewart, Esq.,

Brockville, Ont.

This was followed by another letter on April 7th, marked "B." The letter is as follows:—

"B."

Ottawa, April 7th, 1899.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated April 5th, and in reply I beg to say that I am not aware that the lists should have been printed some time ago. As a matter of fact, very few lists have been printed, for very few have been required.

It will, however, be a waste of time to enter upon a discussion of a question so theoretical. Practically the matter will no doubt be settled to your satisfaction when I inform you that I have this moment sent to Mr. George Taylor, M.P., twenty copies of the complete list for Brockville district, for the Hon. P. White, who is the Conservative candidate for the next election. Mr. Taylor has undertaken to forward them to Mr. White, and therefore I pray that I may be excused from discussing the other points in your letter.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

S. E. DAWSON,

Queen's Printer and Controller of Stationery.

H. A. Stewart, Esq.,
Barrister, &c.,

King Street, Brockville, Ont.

Afterwards an application was received from Mr. George W. Dawson, for five sets of Kitley and Elizabethtown. These were sent him on April 5th. Mr. George Taylor, M.P., called on the 4th or 5th and asked about the lists. A complete set of the Brockville lists was given to him then, and the same explanation was made to him as to Mr. Dawson, and to the hon. the Secretary of State—that there were some slight inaccuracies in the lists—that they must be looked upon as proofs, and that the lists were being re-read for printing.

On April 7th the lists were completely printed, so far as sent in, and on that day twelve copies were sent to the hon. the Secretary of State, twenty copies to Mr. George Taylor, M.P., for the Hon. Peter White, and twenty copies to Mr. Comstock.

The lists had been printed without the manhood suffrage names. The manhood suffrage lists came in afterwards, and kept coming in, as the revision was made, until April 12th. They were finally printed on April 13th, and on the same day copies were sent as follows:—

Twelve to the hon. the Secretary of State.

Twenty to Mr. George Taylor for Hon. Peter White.

Twenty to Mr. Comstock.

The complete lists were, therefore, ready and delivered to those entitled to them, the chief lists on the 7th, and the manhood suffrage lists on the 13th of April respectively.

On the 13th of April the nomination was held, and on the 20th of April the election was held.

The Hon. Peter White was chosen at a convention held in Brockville on April 6th. The news was announced at Ottawa on April 7th, and on the same day the Queen's Printer received orders to send him twenty copies of the lists. These were at once sent through Mr. George Taylor, M.P., who undertook to despatch them at once to the proper address. Hon. Mr. White's post office address is Pembroke. A day or two would have been lost by sending them there.

The law does not provide that the candidates shall have lists. It provides only for the sitting member and the last defeated candidate. It seemed clear that whoever was entitled to the lists, the executor of the late member was not, and if the lists had been sent to him, the candidate, after he had been chosen, might have applied for them.

No other lists but the above for Brockville were sent out, excepting three official copies to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

S. E. DAWSON,
Queen's Printer and Controller of Stationery.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Railways said the lists were sent by mail. I contradicted him and said they were sent by special messenger, and now this corroborates me.

REQUEST FOR SCRIP FOR MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. OLIVER asked:

1. Has the Government received any requests or petitions asking that scrip be granted members of the North-west Mounted Police force who were under fire in 1885; thereby to remove the invidious distinction made by the late Government in granting scrip to all volunteers who served in the west in 1885, but refusing it even to members of the police force who took part in the engagements of that year?

2. If so, what is the decision of the Government in regard to the request for scrip?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that question is rather objectionable in casting a slur upon the late Government. I think the words "invidious distinction" should be changed, and, I have no doubt, the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) will drop the word "invidious" in this question.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to cast any reflection; I simply wished to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior to the question.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Numerous representations have been made to the Government since 1885, urging that scrip be granted to members of the North-west Mounted Police who were under fire during the rebellion. On the 30th June, 1894, an Order in Council was passed to the effect that when the subject of rewards for services during the rebellion was under the consideration of the Government, a distinction was made between the Mounted Police, whose ordinary duties of maintaining law and order within the limits of the disturbed districts, and the militia, who were called upon to leave their homes and occupations at great personal inconvenience, resulting in many cases in serious embarrassment to themselves and their families. The same Order in Council stated that under the circumstances the Government would not feel justified in recommending the issue of scrip to the Mounted Police. 2. The Government has not arrived at any conclusion upon the matter.

PIER AT CHINA POINT.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. How much has been expended upon the reconstruction of the pier at China Point, in Prince Edward Island, since October, 1896 ?
2. What was the date of such payments ?
3. To whom made, and how much was paid to each person ?
4. How much was paid for actual labour performed on this pier ?
5. How much for material used ?
6. How much for material not used ?
7. How much for superintendence, and to whom ?
8. How much has been done towards actual reconstruction, and what is now the condition of this pier ?
9. Has it been in condition to ship at since 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to move for a return, the papers will be brought down immediately. He will see that it is not possible to give a short answer to his question. I will bring the information down if he moves for the papers.

FRANCIS MCKENZIE, OF CHRISTMAS ISLAND.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

Why was Francis McKenzie, of Christmas Island, refused instructions in the Military School at Fredericton, in 1897 ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The only answer I can give at present is, that nothing is known of this case at headquarters. The officer commanding the Military School at Fredericton has been communicated with. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will leave his question on the paper, or repeat it at some later date, as the information is not forthcoming to-day.

Mr. McDOUGALL. May I be permitted to state, that this question was asked of the Minister last year, and he then promised me the information.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question stands.

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE POST OFFICE— CARETAKER.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

Who is the recognized caretaker of the Portage la Prairie post office, and what salary does he receive ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The name of the caretaker is Mr. Ephraim McNeill ; his salary is $400 a year.

COUNTY OF ESSEX—EXPERIMENTAL TOBACCO STATION.

Mr. COWAN (by Mr. McGregor) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to establish an experimental tobacco station in the county of Essex during the present year ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The Department of Agriculture is taking steps to establish some such station in the province of Ontario, in the district in which tobacco-growing is now so largely undertaken.

FOREIGN LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. COWAN (by Mr. McGregor) asked :

1. What is the minimum percentage of foreign leaf tobacco required to be used in mixed factories under present regulations ?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the percentage of foreign leaf tobacco required to be used in mixed factories ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The answer to the first question is, 25 per cent. The answer to the second question is, that the matter is under the consideration of the Government.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. D. H. MACDOWALL IN RE HALF-BREEDS.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

1. Was there any correspondence between D. H. Macdowall, M.P., of Saskatchewan, in the year 1891 or 1892 with reference to putting the half-breeds of Batoche, Duck Lake and Saskatchewan on a reserve ?
2. Did the Government make any suggestions with reference to this matter to Mr. Macdowall? If so, what was the nature of the same ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The records of the department disclose nothing on the subject in question.

THOMAS MCKAY, OF PRINCE ALBERT.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

1. Was or is Thomas McKay, of Prince Albert, N.W.T., indebted to the Government for timber dues ?
2. If so, what was the amount ?
3. Was McKay's brother, James McKay, Q.C., legal agent for the Crown at Saskatchewan ?
4. Was he instructed to collect this account ? If so, did he collect the same ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. $732.01. 3. James McKay, Q.C., was legal agent for the Crown at Prince Albert ; but the records do not show whether he is Thomas McKay's brother. 4. The answer to the first part of the fourth question is "Yes," and to the second part, "No."

Mr. DAVIS asked :

1. Was Thomas McKay, of Prince Albert, N.W.T., employed by the Dominion Government in the month of January, February and March, 1886? If so, what salary did he receive?

2. Was the Government aware that for those three months he was electioneering in Saskatchewan?

3. Was he allowed travelling expenses from Ottawa to Saskatchewan and return?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. 1. Thomas McKay was employed from the 25th August, 1885, to the 6th January, 1886, and from the 15th March, 1886, to the 4th July, 1887; his remuneration was at the rate of $15 a day, the total amount paid him being $9,135. 2. The records do not disclose whether the Government was aware that he was electioneering in Saskatchewan during the months mentioned in the question. 3. The records show that he was allowed his fare from Winnipeg to Ottawa and return.

N.W.M.P.—BARRACKS AT BATOCHÉ.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

1. Did the Government enter into any contract with any person or persons at Batoché, Saskatchewan, in 1891, for the supply of stone for a barracks for the North-west Mounted Police?

2. Was any contract entered into with parties there for the supplying of lime for said barracks?

3. How long were these contracts entered into before the general election of 1891?

4. Was the site for the supposed said barracks at Batoché surveyed? If so, by whom, and what was the cost?

5. Was the said barracks built? If not, why not?

6. What was done with the stone and lime, if same was purchased?

7. How much was there expended in this transaction?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No contract was made, but a quantity of stone—about 20 cords—was hauled from the river to the site then contemplated for police barracks. 2. No. 3. The stone was hauled during the months of March and April, 1891. 4. The owner of the property had offered to deed to the Government, free of charge, sufficient land for the erection of police detachment buildings. No special survey was then made. 5. The contemplated barracks were not erected, as the owner of the land subsequently offered suitable buildings, already erected, at less than cost price. 6. Some of the stone has been used; the remainder is still available. 7. $149.50.

CANADIAN PERMANENT CORPS—PENSION SYSTEM.

On the Order being called for the following motion :—

That in the opinion of this House, a pension system should be established for officers and men of the Canadian permanent corps, and of the headquarters and district staff who are not under the Civil Service Act.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, I am informed by hon. members, that this motion is likely to be considerably discussed, and I would ask the leader of the House to let it stand until some day next week.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Very well.

BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. J. G. RUTHERFORD (Macdonald) moved :

That the public interest demands that the railway companies of Canada should at the earliest possible moment be brought under the control of a board of railway commissioners, clothed with full power to enforce the provisions of the Railway Act and to prescribe and enforce the observance of such regulations as may be necessary in the public interest.

He said : It will be within the memory of most of the members of this House, that a resolution identical with this, was discussed during last session, and it is, I believe, due to the importance of the question that it should be once more brought to the attention of the Parliament of Canada. It is unquestionable, that there is urgent necessity for proper and systematic control of the railway systems of the Dominion of Canada, and there is no way in which that control can be better obtained and maintained, than through the establishment of a properly constituted and regularly organized railway commission. For some time past, there has been, in some portions of the country, at least, an agitation in favour of government ownership of railways, and, while there is no doubt that government ownership of railways is the proper solution of the transportation question in the Dominion of Canada under existing circumstances, such a proposition is surrounded with so much difficulty as to render it at present outside the field of practical politics. A consideration of the sums of money which it would be necessary to expend in order to acquire possession of the railways of Canada would convince most people of the truth of this statement. At the present time there are in Canada some 16,870 miles of railway, the average capital cost of which per mile has been up to the present $55,244. This gives a total of $937,066,280 as the cost of the railway system of Canada, being an average debt of $1,000 which every Canadian family would have to assume in order to make the purchase. This would nearly quadruple the national debt, and the annual interest charges on this sum, at 3 per cent, would amount to $30,000,000. I think this very effectually disposes of the question of the present purchase of the railways of Canada by the people of the Dominion.

Of course, it is claimed by those who argue in favour of Government ownership of railways that the roads would pay the interest from their earnings; but the past history of our railways does not tend to bear out this statement. At no time have the dividends of our Canadian railways equalled 3 per cent; and if the interest was to be paid, it would be impossible to lower the rates to anything like the point at which it would be desired by the advocates of Government ownership of railways to maintain them. The returns from railways in Canada have never been equal to the working expenses. The total working expenses of the railways in Canada, covering maintenance and operating expenses since confederation, amount to $73,029,631, and the earnings amount to $64,510,650, leaving a considerable loss. The loss for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1898, was $263,401.78.

It is claimed, however, by many of the advocates of Government ownership of railways that, while the roads now existing might be left in the hands of the corporations, any roads which are constructed from this time henceforth should be built, owned and operated by the Government of the Dominion, in the interest of the people. I have never been able to take this view of the matter. In the discussion which took place on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, I took the ground that an isolated railway, situated as that would be, in the Rocky Mountains, and without connection either east or west, would be of no benefit whatever to the people of the Dominion of Canada. This sentiment was, I think, fully endorsed by the members of this House and by the people of the Dominion at large.

During the last few months we in the west have experienced an agitation having for its object the purchase of the franchises or charters of three railways, the combination of which is expected to constitute the new route from the Red River to the great lakes, namely, the Winnipeg and South-eastern, the Ontario and Rainy River, and the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western. The same objection would apply to the Government ownership of these railways as applied to the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway; that is to say, they would form an isolated piece of road without feeders, and would consequently be of very little service to the people they are designed to serve, namely, the farmers and producers of the great west.

It is claimed by many of the advocates of Government ownership of railways that the construction of a Government railway from Winnipeg to Fort William or Port Arthur would settle for all time the question of transportation for the west. Such, however, would by no means be the case. A Government railway might be constructed from Winnipeg to the great lakes, and it might be operated at cost, or, as the advocates of Government ownership would wish, at even less than cost; but that would not cheapen through freight from the wheat fields of Manitoba and the Territories to the head of navigation. We have at the present time in the province of Manitoba a proof of this in the refusal of the railways now existing there to interchange freight, or to enter into arrangements with each other for through freight purposes. We have, in the town in which I live, Portage la Prairie, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Northern Pacific Railway. We have also a railway running up to the north-western portion of the province, known as the Manitoba and North-western. This railway has an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway by which it transfers grain to that road for carriage to Fort William at a very small advance on its rate from Portage la Prairie. For instance, the town of Neepawa is situated sixty-one miles from Portage la Prairie on the line of the Manitoba and North-western. The rate on freight from Portage la Prairie to Fort William over the Canadian Pacific Railway and to Duluth over the Northern Pacific Railway, is 16½ cents per 100 pounds at the present time. Next fall it will be reduced to 15 cents; but to-day it is 16½ cents. The rate via the Manitoba and North-western Railway from Neepawa to Fort William is 17½ cents, or only 1 cent per 100 pounds more than the rate from Portage la Prairie to Fort William. Now, the rate from Neepawa to Duluth over the Manitoba and North-western and Northern Pacific is 28½ cents per 100 pounds, or 11 cents more than the rate via the Manitoba and North-western and the Canadian Pacific Railway to Fort William. This difference is owing to the fact that the Manitoba and North-western Railway refuses to interchange freight with the Northern Pacific, although the latter railway occupies exactly the same position as regards asking for freight as a Government railway from Winnipeg to the head of the lakes would occupy. It is anxious to enter into an arrangement with the Manitoba and North-western Railway to obtain a share of the business which the Manitoba and North-western persists in refusing, and transfers the whole of its wheat to the Canadian Pacific Railway for transmission to Fort William. The people of Portage la Prairie, where these two roads meet, have the advantage of competing rates; but the people of Neepawa, which is not touched by the Northern Pacific, have no advantage of competing rates; and, if there were to-day a Government road from the city of Winnipeg to the head of the lakes, it would be practically useless as an exporting factor, because the other railways would not furnish it with freight, would enter into no arrangement with it, until there was a strong and capable and efficient railway commission which would compel these railways to hand over their freight to that road if it were deemed in the interest of the people of Canada that such should be done. Nevertheless, as far as the Ontario and Rainy River route is concerned, the interests of the people of the west must be guarded; and if it is not considered best that the Government should build and own that road, it must control its rates and control them in an efficient and thorough manner. It is true that, under the present Railway Act, the Government have a nominal control of rates on all railways which come under the operation of that law, but I gather from what the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) said last session that such control is far from being effective. The hon. Minister then said :

I confess to you that I myself am not very much enamoured of the sufficiency of the machinery, of the sufficiency of the power which can be exercised by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council or by the Governor General in Council.

Now, if the Minister of Railways, with his experience and knowledge, is not enamoured of the power possessed by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in controlling freight rates, if, in other words, that power is not sufficient and it is impossible for that committee to control them, it is a self-evident fact that some legislation ought to be enacted which would place the railways of Canada, whether constructed or projected, in such a position that they will be of use and service to the people for whose benefit they are supposed to be built and who have the privilege of paying for them. The rates on the new road must be controlled, the rates on all railways ought to be controlled ; but as this railway in particular is the road which is going into the western country in opposition to the Canadian Pacific Railway—in opposition to that road, which, through the action of the late Government, was placed outside the Railway Act, and which owns no master and acknowledges no law—I say that in the case of this road it must be arranged and predetermined before it is built, that this country, through its Government, shall control the rates in every possible way. If the present Railway Committee of the Privy Council is, as the hon. Minister of Railways admits, ineffective, if its powers are not sufficient to enable it to cope with this question, then I say that the appointment of a railway commission is imperative.

We often hear it stated that railway commissions in other countries have not proved successful and have not justified the expectations of those who were instrumental in their creation. I do not think that the history of railway commissions in general bears out that contention. In England, for instance, although railway legislation there is by no means perfect, they have a very effective and efficient railway commission, known as the Railway and Canal Commission. For forty or fifty years the people of England have been legislating in order to obtain better control over the railways of that country. In 1888, they embodied a great deal of previous legislation in an Act appointing the Railway and Canal Commission, and since that time, some eleven years, a great many grievances have been remedied and a great many wrongs redressed by its action. The Board of Trade in England also, as is well known, has control of the railways to a large extent ; and it would be perfectly impossible, under the Railway and Canal Commission and the strict supervision of the Board of Trade, for railways in England to do as they do in this country, and ignore the law in so many different ways. In the United States there are two species of railway commissions. There is the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been in existence a number of years and has done a great deal of good work in the way of regulating rates, but which has not been as marked a success as its promoters anticipated. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its last report, acknowledges that it has not been able to control the railways and transportation companies in the way it would like. It gives, however, as the reason for its failure in carrying out its good intentions, the fact that it has not got the power behind it to enforce them, that its powers are too limited, and it demands new and stronger legislation, it demands that more strength be given to it by the people in order to enable it to carry out the wishes of the people and protect them from the rapacity of railway corporations. Until such powers are given, as it says, "it must continue to rest under the responsibility of a duty which it is powerless to discharge." If a great nation like the United States acknowledges—because the acknowledgment by the Interstate Commission is practically an acknowledgment by the nation—its powerlessness with existing machinery, to discharge its duty, it stands to reason that steps must be taken to remedy that state of affairs. It is impossible that any nation, either the United States or Canada, should rest content under such conditions ; and the demand that the United States must pass such legislation as will empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry into effect the work which it was intended and created to do, is one that cannot long be resisted. The other class of commission which exists in the United States is what is known as the State Railway Commission. But before leaving the Interstate Commission I may say that the powers nominally held by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council are just such powers, from what I can gather, as the Interstate Railway Commission desires to have, and as far as regards Canada, the difficulty which that commission has met with in the United States would not be encountered by a Dominion railway commission.

With regard to the various state railway commissions, there are some twenty-four of them. They vary in size and expenditure. In the state of New York, for instance, there is a railway commission composed of three members whose salaries total $24,000, and whose expenses in the aggregate amount to $53,325 per year. Massachusetts has three commissioners, whose salaries amount to $11,000 per annum, and the total expenses of the commission in that state amount to $27,430. Illinois has three commissioners, whose total salaries are $10,500, and whose expenditure aggregates $23,200. The State Commission of Illinois has been most successful, as also has that of Iowa which has three commissioners at salaries amounting in all to $6,600, and expenses $10,510.42 per annum. It is unnecessary to read all the figures of the cost of these various state commissions. They run down to the little state of Rhode Island, which possesses one railway commissioner with a salary of $1,000 and expenses $1,021. Now, no good argument can be adduced to show why, if these various states can establish and maintain railway commissions to stand between the railways and the people, the Dominion of Canada cannot do likewise. The only difficulty which the state commissions have had lies in the fact that the railway corporations extending as they do outside the individual states are not and cannot be fully controlled by them, but this difficulty would not be encountered in the Dominion, because a federal commission would not be hampered in this way. The failure of state commissions to control transportation in the way they desire is due to the circumstances which I have stated; whereas a railway commission whose power extended from one end of Canada to the other and whose control extended over all the railways in the Dominion would not have that difficulty to contend with.

Now, a Canadian railway commission, if it were appointed, ought to have full power to enforce the provisions of the Railway Act; it ought to have a full working power. As the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said, in the speech which I have just quoted, he is not enamoured of the power now possessed or the machinery now controlled by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for dealing with these questions. But, if a real, live railway commission were appointed whose duty would be to see that the provisions of the Railway Act were carried out, and also to suggest and regulate all amendments to that Act, to recommend such changes as might be found necessary in the light of experience, to facilitate the working of the Act, to bring it up to the standard which the people of Canada would like to see, I do not think there would be any difficulty about its having sufficient power to control the great corporations. If the legislation which is brought before this House affecting railways were first submitted to the railway commission as it ought to be constituted, there is no doubt but that such legislation would be more carefully safeguarded than is possible under our present system and with our present machinery.

Another duty of the commission would be to investigate all grievances and complaints.

And I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that in this particular line there is a very wide field of usefulness open to a railway commission. We have, in the first place, the control and regulation of all rates for freight and passengers. Now, nominally, I understand, at the present time, that power is vested in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But, with all due deference to the gentlemen who form that committee, who, I am sure, are men of great ability, as is evidenced by the fact of their being in a position which entitles them to become members of that committee, it is out of all reason to expect them to have the special knowledge which it is necessary to have in dealing with such complex questions as these; and also, it is unreasonable to expect them to devote the necessary time and attention to the careful study of the intricate questions which constantly come before them. I do not think that it is possible for a body constituted as is that committee to deal in a manner even approaching satisfactory with such questions. Then, we have such questions as that to which I alluded a few moments ago, when I referred to the Manitoba and North-western Railway and the Northern Pacific Railway—the interchange of traffic between one railway and another, a matter which is of very great importance to the people of Canada. Then, it would be the duty of a railway commission such as I have outlined to check discrimination. We all know that there is discrimination, and, no doubt, some of the hon. gentlemen who are to follow me will quote for the benefit of the House instances in which these great corporations have discriminated and are in the habit of discriminating against individuals, corporations and localities. Sometimes they discriminate against people and places, and sometimes they discriminate in favour of them. But railways which have been so liberally subsidized by the people of Canada ought not to be allowed to interfere in this way with individual rights and interests. Not only do the railways discriminate against one Canadian in favour of another, but there are cases on record where these railways, built up, as they have been, by grants from the people of Canada, have been and are actually discriminating against Canadians and in favour of the people of the United States. All these matters would come under the control of a railway commission. The question of overcharges would be a very wide field of usefulness for them, as also would the classification of freights—and, I may say, that in the classification of freight very many wrongs are perpetrated upon the shipper. They would supervise traffic generally, and see that cars were supplied to shippers and that there was no discrimination in this respect as against one shipper and in favour of another. In the shipment of grain in Manitoba and the North-west, there has been serious discrimination against the producer and in favour of the large milling and grain-buying corporations. This matter has received the attention of the House on more than one occasion, and I trust that ere this session is over it will be so dealt with as to place it beyond the power of the railway companies in Manitoba and the North-west to continue this unjust system of discrimination against the producers. Then, I wish to mention one matter, which, to those who are not familiar with the question may appear insignificant. If any member of the House thinks that what I am about to mention is too insignificant to be discussed on the floor of this House, I must crave his indulgence, as I feel it my duty to bring it to the attention of hon. members. I refer to the question of cattle guards. That may seem a small matter. But all through Manitoba and the North-west—I do not know from my own knowledge whether the same grievance exists to the same extent in the older provinces—we have a very real and genuine grievance because of the kind of cattle guards provided by the railway companies. They simply refuse to place at the crossings cattle guards which are sufficient to keep animals from going on the railway tracks; and large numbers of horses and cattle are annually killed in Manitoba and the North-west through this cause. This is a matter of live interest to the settlers of the west, and I am sure that a railway commission could find no better use for its ability and time than in standing between the farmer at the railway companies in just such questions as this. It is hopeless for a farmer at the present time, even though he loses a considerable number of cattle or horses, to undertake a lawsuit against one of the corporations. Such a suit would spell ruin to a man, because the case would be appealed from court to court, and, though the plaintiff might win in one or two of the inferior courts, the case would be carried on to the higher courts, until he either threw up the sponge in disgust or was financially ruined. There is the matter of railway crossings, and the matter of drainage across railways, which has been a subject of special legislation in this House every session since I became a member of it, and which, I see, is still engaging the attention of the House. There are, in fact a thousand and one different grievances which the farmers have against the railway companies, which the ordinary citizen has against the railway companies and for which, at the present time, there is no possible redress. The railway commission would stand between these people and the railway companies. The railway commission would take up the case of the farmer or merchant by correspondence. If they found he had a good case, it might be settled in an amicable way; but, if not, it would be the duty of the railway commission, acting on behalf of the people of the Dominion of Canada, to see that, if the man had right on his side, his arms should be strengthened sufficiently to enable him to secure justice.

Mr. RUTHERFORD.

Now, I would offer a suggestion as to the constitution of this commission. A commission such as I have described should be composed of three capable men. It is not so very difficult to obtain capable men in the Dominion of Canada: we have many of them, and it is only necessary to select men who are peculiarly adapted for the position, and to pay them salaries sufficient to enable them to devote their whole time and attention to the subject in hand. In order to obtain a railway commission which would be effective and beneficial to the country as a whole, there should be, first, a railway man, a man of great experience in railway matters, a man who has been superintendent or manager of a railway, and who has a thorough practical knowledge of all the intricacies of railway work. Secondly, there should be a good, sound commercial lawyer, having a thorough knowledge of commercial and railway law, and who would be in a position to advise the commission as to the legal status of any case which they might be called upon to deal with. Thirdly, there should be an experienced business man, a man with large experience as a shipper and dealer, a man who could look on every question that came up, from the shipper's point of view, from the point of view of the public. Take these three men and organize them into a railway commission, and give them high salaries. In the state of New York there are three commissioners, whose united salaries are $24,000 per annum. That would be $8,000 apiece, and that would not be at all an extravagant salary to pay to such men as I have described. Then, I would give them a thoroughly competent staff. They should have all the assistance necessary.

Mr. BERGERON. A great idea.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I am glad I have met with the approval of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), because I think a great deal of his opinion. I am glad to see that he is favourably impressed. Now, legislation along this line is, in my opinion, rendered absolutely necessary by existing conditions. We have in Canada a very peculiar state of affairs. We have several large railway corporations which practically, under existing circumstances, do as they like, and it is about time that some restraint was placed upon them, and that they were regulated in such a way as to render them amenable to their masters, the common people of the country. The whole world has been overtaken, as it were, by the rapid development of the last sixty or seventy years. There was never in all history, it is unnecessary to say, anything like the growth, and development, and transformation which have taken place in the conditions of life during the last sixty or seventy years. People were taken by surprise, people generally all over the civilized world have been caught napping, and some men of more sagacity, more astuteness than others, have taken advantage of the conditions which have sprung up, in order to amass power and wealth. The world is only just beginning to awaken to the fact that people have given away many of their most precious possessions in valuable franchises and rights. To-day we are undergoing a bitter experience in the Dominion of Canada on that very line. The figures which I quoted here this afternoon, giving the amount of money which has been expended in building railways in Canada, furnish a case in point. The same thing has gone on all over the world, and to a greater extent, perhaps, on this continent than anywhere else, people have fallen into the hands of corporations. Corporations, it is well known, have no souls, we do not blame them for that, because they cannot help it. But, at the same time, they ought to be thoroughly held in check. Education and the diffusion of general knowledge among the masses of the people, have awakened them to the fact that many of their fellows are enjoying privileges and emoluments to which they have no moral right.

I have never classed myself as a demagogue, and I do not propose, at this late day to take up that role; but I think the House will bear with me for a moment, while I say, that we must face this situation in Canada at an early date, and the sooner we face it, the better. The situation demands relief for the man who works. The man who works ten hours a day with his hands, in this Dominion of Canada, is, after all, the backbone of the country: he is the strength of the country. That sentiment is applauded. It is all very well to applaud a sentiment just because it is a sentiment, but at the same time, we must not lose sight of the fact. We are never allowed to lose sight of the other side of the case because vested interests are well represented in this House, they are constantly with us. But we are very apt, I think, to forget the workingmen, and it is on behalf of the workingmen—with whom I class all the farmers who are toiling throughout the country and producing from the soil the real genuine wealth which is being diffused throughout the land—it is on their behalf that we ought to legislate. My experience is, that the other fellows can take care of themselves; we have them fully represented here. It is the bounden duty of the Liberal party, which has always been proud to style itself the party of the common people, it is the duty of the Liberal Government, as representing that party, to legislate in every possible way in the interests of the working classes of his country. We never expected anything in this direction from the gentlemen who now occupy seats on the opposite side of the House. Their political history as a party is before us. In this matter I do not accuse them of inconsistency: but, as a party, their history has not been that of champions of the workingmen. The history of the party on this side of the House, however, has been such, and it is our duty to live up to our principles, and now that we have the power, to enact legislation as rapidly and as thoroughly as possible which will protect the interests of the working classes in the Dominion of Canada. Now, I have only one word more to say, and I trust that the House will pardon me in taking up its time at so great a length. We must admit, every one admits, that a wrong exists; every one admits, that present conditions in Canada are indefensible and unbearable. We do not need to be told, that the railway corporations and the other corporations in Canada at the present time are endowed with too much power, too much strength, and that a private individual has no chance to hold his own against them. Now, if such a condition of affairs exists, as it does exist, it is our duty, as representatives of the people here assembled, to pass such legislation as will remedy this wrong, and I hope there will be no further delay. I trust the Government will at once take steps to establish such a commission as I have ventured to outline, and I hope that the House will in the meantime pass this resolution.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak upon this very important question, I beg to say that I consider the question of transportation to be one of the greatest questions that can be brought before the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada. I consider that it is one of the questions that lie at the foundation of the future prosperity and development of this country. Let me say that it is a question the magnitude of which few people have any idea of. I myself, until I began to read up upon railway commissions, had no idea of the difficulty and trouble that will have to be gone through in order to get a fairly well organized and well-equipped railway commission in Canada. But the day has arrived when I believe our Government must take up the question of a railway commission. Last session, when I put a question on the Notice paper, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), replying to that question, said:

The Government have it in contemplation to take up the subject of a railway commission, and deal with it at an early date. I may say that it is not found practicable, owing to the condition of public business and other reasons, to submit a measure with that object in view during the present session, but I am in hopes that we may be able to do it next session.

That was the present session, and I hope the Government will see their way clear to take up the question at this session. The Government of Canada to-day stand in the position that they are more able to deal with the question of a railway commission than almost any other country that I know of. I remember that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, last year, made the statement that the people of Great Britain had not derived the benefits that they had anticipated from the passage of a Bill granting railway commissions in England, but, I hold in my hand the ninth report of the railway commission in Great Britain, showing that in that country they have amended the law from time to time and that they are certainly drawing great benefits. This report shows that not only the traders and business men of the country, that not only the farmers of the country, but that the railway companies themselves have largely benefited by the railway commission. Let me give a single instance. On the North British Railway, from Edinburgh to Berwick, the North-eastern Railway Company have running powers over their line. The railway commission, on being asked to fix the compensation that should be paid, adjudged that the North-eastern Railway Company should pay the North British Railway Company 75 per cent, or 75c. on the dollar, upon all the money that they received from the traffic on that line. This also included the right of using their freight sheds, and the hands to handle their business in Edinburgh. That question was settled at once and without trouble, but, had it taken place in Canada, with the condition of things in this respect to-day, what an amount of trouble there would have been! What makes me say so? Hon. gentlemen will remember the trouble that occurred between the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company when the latter tried to prevent the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company from getting a crossing. We know that it had almost come to open war between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the people of the North-west before they got that crossing effected. For these reasons, and many others, we should have a railway commission. Let me give another statement to the House. We had an application for a railway charter before the Railway Committee of this House last session. That was for the Kettle River Valley Railway. I saw lately, Sir, that an agreement had been come to between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in consequence of which they were not going to apply for a charter to build a road into the Kettle River country. Let me say, Sir, that it is too bad that two great corporations should rule the country, that they can chalk out the country and employ every means to prevent railways being built in this country. This is more than any corporation ought to be allowed to do in Canada. I have another statement here of a company that had been shipping over a line of railway in Great Britain since 1884. That is a long time back. They claimed £730 from that railway corporation for extravagant charges; they claimed £50 for not providing proper accommodation at the railway station for their goods, but the railway corporation, before they would allow them to go before the railway commission, settled this question. They knew that it would go against them. There was another case of a company that had a siding. The railway corporation charged this company 13½d. for every ton of freight they shunted over that siding. The company took it before the railway commission, and the railway commission, considering it an extravagant charge, reduced it from 13½d. to 9d. per ton. This shows what the railway commission is doing for the people of Great Britain. In 1888 the Imperial Parliament passed one Bill, but the last Bill that was passed was in 1894. They have a small railway commission besides the large railway commission in that country. They took up the question some years ago, and they passed a Bill granting cheap railway rates to workingmen who lived out in the country and who went into the large cities in the morning and returned in the evening to and from their labour. It had been found that the railway corporations were not giving justice to the workingmen. The railway commission has taken that question up, and they have not only settled the rates that workingmen will have to pay, but also the hours at which trains should be run to accommodate workingmen, showing conclusively that the people of England are greatly benefited by the railway commission.

Now, with respect to the United States, we know that they have had railway commissions in that country. We know that there are forty states in which there are railway commissions. There are only two states in the United States which have appointed railway commissions and which have given them up. Why did they give them up? Because, Sir, the legislatures of those states acted treacherously to the people, and in favour of the railway companies, but the railway commissions have been a benefit to the people of that country. I hold in my hand a work published this last year upon railway commissions, and which shows that in Illinois they have one of the most efficient commissions to be found in the western states. Benefits have resulted from it there. The people say emphatically that they have been benefited very much, that discrimination against individuals, against localities, and in respect to the classification of freight have been removed and that freight rates have been reduced. I have a list which I got in order to show that, in the United States, freight rates are very much lower than in the Dominion of Canada. There is a circular issued by the Joint Freight Association of the United States, and I have compared it with the circular sent out by the Canadian Joint Freight Association, and I will just give a few statements in this respect of the cost of carrying 100 pounds of freight for a certain distance in the United States and in Canada. The classification of freight is not quite the same in Canada and in the United States. In Canada we have freight divided into ten classes, while in the United States there are only six classes of freight. I have taken class No. 1 in Canada and compared it with class No. 3 in the United States.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). What part of the United States are you referring to?

Mr. McMILLAN. This is in the classification of the eastern states. I have got the book in my desk, the classification of the Joint Tariff Association of the United States, and it is taken from that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But those rates do not apply all over the United States.

Mr. McMILLAN. They apply to all the eastern states; west of the Mississippi they have another classification. The classification I have here is east of the Mississippi. It shows that for 115 miles per 100 pounds, in the United States they pay 24 cents, and in Canada 38 cents; for 160 miles, 28 cents in the United States and 42 cents in Canada; for 475 miles, 45 cents in the United States and 78 cents in Canada; for 565 miles, 76½ cents in the United States and 86 in Canada. I have other examples that I might quote, but this is sufficient to show conclusively that they have lower rates in the United States than in Canada. And, Mr. Speaker, I hold that the lowering of the rates in the United States has been due to the appointment of railway commissions; first, the appointment of the States Commissions, and then the Interstate Commission. I read the book published by Mr. Frederick C. Clark on "State Railroad Commissions," immediately after its publication last year, and it shows conclusively the benefits which the people of the United States have derived from these railway commissions. It shows also conclusively, that there is necessity for the Canadian Government, in appointing a railway commission, to give it much more extended power than even the Railway Committee of the Privy Council enjoys at the present day. The Government must give this commission full power to examine the books of railway companies, for instance. It has been found in the United States that it was necessary to pass a law compelling all railway companies to have a uniform system of bookkeeping, and that was necessary, because on many of the roads there are rebates given that are not shown in the books; there were private contracts entered into with individuals which were described by ciphers, in the books of the companies, and Mr. Fred C. Clark, in his book, explains that even some of the high officials of the companies did not understand what all these private contracts were and what rebates were given. Therefore, in order to have an efficient railway commission, you must have the books of the railway corporations kept in a uniform manner, so that an expert when he goes there can understand them. It was also found necessary that the railway commission should have power to classify freight, and not to allow the railway companies to do it as they do in Canada. I saw an account last year that 36 men representing the different railway companies met in Ottawa, and settled the freight and passenger rates between them. There was no commissioner sent by the Government to be present at that meeting, but the railway men did it all themselves. Let me remind the House that the people of Canada contributed towards the building of the railroads 21·33 per cent, or more than one-fifth of all the money required to build these roads, and yet the people had not a single voice in the regulating of the traffic or the controlling of the rates. The Canadian Government now have an opportunity of benefiting by the experience of the people of England, who had not a uniform law to regulate their railways, because Scotland had its own laws and England had its own laws, and the railway commission had to deal with both of them. In the United States they are obliged to have state commissioners, and inter-state commissioners, but in Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Government has all the railways under their control and can regulate them by the one railway commission.

It is not because I have no confidence in the Government of the day that I ask for a railway commission, but it is because I believe that the question is too broad for any one Minister to give his attention to it. I believe that a Canadian railway commission should be composed of such men as were spoken of by my hon. friend (Mr. Rutherford), for depend upon it, that notwithstanding all the laws and all the regulations you may make, unless thoroughly efficient and honest gentlemen are appointed as railway commissioners, the scheme will be an entire failure. The efficiency of a railway commission depends more upon the character of the men appointed upon it, than upon anything else. In the several states of the Union there is a difference of opinion as to how the railway commissioners should be appointed. In some states they are appointed by the Government and in others they are elected by vote. But I am willing to leave it to the judgment of the Dominion Government to deal with that question. The Government of Canada, when they come to appoint a railway commission, have the experience of Great Britain and the United States to guide them, and the question ought not to be a very difficult one to solve. I agree in the statement made last year by the Minister of Railways, when he said, that unless a railway commission had greater powers than the Committee of the Privy Council possesses at present, it would be perfectly useless to appoint one. But the Government of Canada most certainly can take power to appoint a commission, to make rules for it and to give it judicial power to enforce their regulations such as is possessed by the commissioners in Great Britain. I hold it is the duty of the Canadian Government to do this. In the United States, the commissioners hold office for various periods. In Ohio for three years; in Alabama for four years; in New York for five years; and in Missouri for six years. In Ohio the Governor appoints one commissioner for two years; in Rhode Island one commissioner for three years; in Vermont three commissioners for two years; and in New York three for five years. These state commissioners are paid salaries ranging from $500 to $8,000 a year. These salaries are fixed neither according to the amount of responsibility nor the amount of work to be done, nor according to any marked superior ability in the men themselves. In Rhode Island the Governor appoints one commissioner at $500 per year; in Ohio the Governor appoints one at $2,000 per year; in New York the Governor appoints three commissioners at $8,000 per year each, for the term of five years; in Georgia the Governor appoints three at $2,500 per year for six years. In California the people elect three at $4,000 per year for four years; and in Missouri the people elect three at $3,000 per year for six years. In Massachusetts the president of the commission receives a salary of $4,000, the associates $3,500 each; in Alabama the president receives $3,500, the associates $3,000 each. Therefore, the different states do not agree with respect to the manner of appointing the railway commissioners, nor yet with respect to the powers conferred on them. If the Government of Canada should appoint a railway commission, we need not expect that all the evils would be redressed at once; but here is an example of what took place in Great Britain. In the last report of the British Commissioners for 1898, I find that there were 103 complaints, but there were a large number of these settled by the railway companies when notified that the complaint had been made, and before they allowed the complaints to be heard by the commissioners. That conclusively shows the advantages of the railway commissioners in England, and I believe that like advantages would accrue from the appointment of a railway commission in this country.

Why, some of the most extravagant charges which it is possible to conceive have been made by the railways in this country. During a visit to the North-west, I went from Calgary to Edmonton, and in conversation with a few of the merchants of Edmonton, I said that it must have been a great benefit to them to have that branch of railway from Calgary to Edmonton. One of the merchants, in a sneering manner, replied, "Benefit! Why, before the railway was built I could get all my freight freighted for 75 cents per hundred; and to-day I can get my freight freighted for 75 cents per hundred, and pay the half or even the whole of it in trade; but the Canadian Pacific Railway charges 82 cents per hundred, and the money all goes out of the country." The same condition of things existed everywhere from Regina to Prince Albert. Is that a proper condition of things in view of the fact that the Government partly built the Canadian Pacific Railway, and gave such large tracts of land to the company for the purpose? The sooner we get a railway commission, the sooner we shall have the railway companies of Canada placed in the right position. Look at the war of rates that took place a year ago between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. If we had had a railway commission, that dispute would have been settled speedily and to the satisfaction of the people. Mr. Hays, the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, in a recent visit to the old country, stated that the very best of feelings existed between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that there was no danger of any war of rates taking place in the future between these two corporations. They have settled the dispute to their own satisfaction; but, depend upon it, Mr. Speaker, the farmers and the workmen of this country will suffer in the future through that arrangement. It is highly satisfactory to these companies; because, in all probability, when they make a change, they will not place their rates before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I understand, from an answer that was given in the House the other day, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not yet submitted to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council the rates they charge on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. It is true, that road may not be finished; but it is carrying a large amount of freight. I hold that every railway that receives a charter from this Government should be obliged to submit every change in its rates to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for approval. In England, one benefit that has been derived from a railway commission is the preventing of the building of a larger number of railways than is required for the business of the country. In Great Britain no railway can be built until the question is brought before the railway commissioners, and afterwards before the Board of Trade, which makes a thorough investigation into the condition of the country through which the proposed road is to pass, and ascertains whether it is likely to take away business from railways already in operation or is required in the interest of the country. Strangers going to Great Britain have often remarked how very few leading railways there are in England and Scotland. It has been the policy there to have a few leading lines, with numerous feeders, and to have these railways carrying to their fullest extent; and this is a wise policy. Wherever you find a large number of railways in a country competing against each other, you find that, instead of lowering the rates, this condition of things tends to increase rates: for you have more railways than the business of the country requires, and they cannot carry freight as cheaply as could a few railways running to their fullest capacity. We all know what a batch of petitions come every session from the province of Ontario for railway charters; and if these projected railways were built, many of them would compete with existing railways and render them less efficient than they are at present. Before we allow more railways to be built in the older sections of Canada, we should have a railway commission with authority to examine into the condition of the country proposed to be traversed, its settlement, its capability for settlement, and the necessity of further railway accommodation, and in this way prevent corporations getting charters and building railways beyond the business needs of the country. The farmers of Canada to-day are suffering, and suffering severely, at the hands of the railways. For instance, a farmer who deals in stock can get a rate from Chicago to St. John or Portland of 38 cents per 100 pounds, while the same rate will be charged from London to the same point. I know a farmer who shipped a car-load of cattle 190 miles to North Bay, and paid $90. He shipped another car-load from the same locality in Ontario to 100 miles west of Chicago, a greater distance by 400 or 500 miles, and only paid $60. Is it fair to the farmers and business men of this country that such differences should exist? Our millers in the province of Ontario for a length of time suffered gross injustice at the hands of the railway companies. They were paying 6½ cents per barrel more on flour brought into Ontario and transhipped to the maritime provinces than the millers of the North-west were charged. I will give a little of my own experience. I shipped apples to the old country: and because we had only the Grand Trunk Railway at Seaforth, we had to pay 5 cents per barrel more than was paid by shippers at Wingham and Ingersoll, where they have both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. That difference on a car-load of apples amounted to $9; and we had to submit to that discrimination simply because we were living in a locality which had not railway competition. The grain rate from Chicago to Peterborough, by Owen Sound, is 6½ cents, while from Chatham to Peterborough, the Canadian farmer must pay 9½ cents. From Owen Sound to Toronto the rate on Canadian oats is 3½ cents a bushel, while the rate on American oats, including elevator and handling, is only 2½ cents a bushel. That is one of the clearest discriminations, as it is for the same freight over the same line. American corn from Owen Sound to Ottawa is 6½ cents, while Canadian corn from Chatham to Ottawa is 10 9-16 cents. At Teeswater, American corn is delivered from Owen Sound for 4½ cents per bushel, while the rate on Canadian corn from Chatham is 7½ cents. The rate on American corn from Owen Sound to Peterborough, 4½ cents a bushel, is a strong contrast to the rate of 9½ cents charged between Chatham and Peterborough. These are rates which a railway commission would have power to control.

The departure of a number of Canadian cattle-buyers to Chicago is another illustration of the effect of freight discriminations. The rate on cattle for export from Chicago to Montreal is 26 cents, and the rate is the same from London to Montreal, although the distance is 400 miles less. From Toronto to Montreal the rate is 18 cents, or perhaps in some instances 15 cents, which preserves the higher scale of charges against Canadian points.

“Globe,” April 24th, 1899:

Every railway question that crops up presents one more reason why an independent railway commission should be created. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council has shown by its recent action on the agreement between the Standard Oil Company and the railways that it has considerable powers, and that as at present composed it has the courage to exercise them. But, at the best, its powers are not sufficient, and its members are busy men whose attention can be called to that vast body of facts which we call the railway problem only occasionally. In this particular case it would have been a useful and influential thing if Parliament had before it a report from such a body giving reasons whether a charter to such a line as the Kettle Valley Railway should or should not be granted. A report in favour of the line, coming from a well-informed and independent source, would, we think, be practically conclusive on Parliament.

Let me say again, that the railway companies enforced, last fall, heavier rates upon oil coming from the United States into Canada. Here are some of the old rates, as compared with some of the new rates enforced last fall: From Toronto to Brampton, the old rate was 14 cents, and the new rate 22½ cents.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Is that for railway transportation?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, the rates imposed by the railway companies, last fall, under the dictation of the Standard Oil Company.

| Southampton .....  | 29                           | 40½                          |

Here are increases, in some instances, close on to 50 per cent, and yet I guarantee that these railway companies did not lay their increased rates before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are liable to be called upon to refund every dollar paid.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope they will be. Now, if it had not been for the fact, that we had one or two independent railways in Ontario at the time these companies entered into that combine, depend upon it, the rates would have been put up all over the country. But there were one or two companies that would not join the combine.

Here are the rates that were charged by the railways, after the change took place, on oil from Hamilton, in barrels, less than car lots :

| Beeton .....       | 20                      | 28½                     |
| Cookstown .....    | 21                      | 30                      |

You will understand, Sir, that the Canadian oil belonged entirely to the Standard Oil Company, and the American oil belonged to a few independent companies that were sending oil from the United States, and these rates I have quoted are the rates charged from Hamilton to the different towns mentioned. The arrangement I have just quoted is certainly one of the basest ever entered into by railway companies, and it was not from Hamilton alone that the rates were increased. From Toronto to adjacent points a similar policy of discrimination was adopted, as the following figures will show :—

|                  | OnCanadian.cts. | OnAmerican.cts. |
|------------------|-------------------------|-------------------------|
| To Warton .....  | 24                      | 40½                     |
| Brockville ..... | 25                      | 47                      |

And so on. I shall not weary the House with any more quotations, because no doubt many hon. gentlemen have seen them. But I would ask, is it right that a corporation, which is crushing out all the opposition it can—a corporation such as the Standard Oil Company—should have full control of railway rates in this country? I say, it is too bad. That corporation, in the United States, offered one lawyer, in a case pending before the courts, $400,000, if he would throw up the case against it. It offered another lawyer $260,000, if he would not appear in a case against it. If a corporation of that description has got hold of all the oil refineries in this country, it is high time the Government took steps to prevent our railway corporations entering into a combine with it, and I hope the Government will take prompt and effective steps. The appointment of a railway commission, with full power to draw up their tariff of rates, would be a most effective step. In the first place, that commission should classify the goods to be carried, put them into separate classes, because the present classifications—and I have here a copy of both the Canadian and the American—are not properly made out.

Mr. McMILLAN.

One of the first things to be done would be, to insist on a regular and uniform system of book-keeping by these railway companies, so that we might be able to examine and understand their books. To-day you cannot get any two railway corporations in Canada that follow the same system; so that it is impossible even for an expert to get at the true condition of things by examining their books. These books are kept in such a manner by each company that its officials alone can understand them and nobody else. It was found necessary in the United States and it is equally necessary here, to insist that the railway companies should keep their books on a uniform system.

Although there is a great pressure of business upon the Government, I hope they will not fail to grapple with this question, because, the longer they delay doing so, the more difficult will be the task. The longer the Government delay in appointing a commission, the more difficult will that commission, when appointed, find it to settle these questions. We know that, when these corporations are uncontrolled for any length of time, they begin to think that they own the whole country. And just because these railway corporations are the largest in the country, they ought to be most under the control of the Government and the most amenable to a commission. I believe that it is the intention of the Government to create such a commission at an early day. At least, we were told so last year, and I hope the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has not since changed his mind on that subject. I feel confident that he will not, and I believe that he made the statement he did in perfect good faith.

With regard to the benefits derived from the establishment of a railway commission in Great Britain, let me point out, that 103 cases were brought before that commission during the last year, and that, of these, a number were settled without going to trial, because the railway companies found that the commissioners were dealing justly with the people and the country, and that, if they pushed their cases further, they would lose their suits, and have to pay the expenses besides.

I must ask pardon of the House for having taken so long in dealing with this question, but it is one in which I feel deeply interested, and I have but another word to add. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) stated, the other day, that 10 per cent more is paid in transport rates on goods over our Canadian routes than over the American routes to the old country. Let me say, as a farmer, that it is the duty of this Government to make the cost of transportation from this country just as low as possible. As long as the city of Montreal charges wharfage and harbour dues, vessels going there can never compete with vessels going to New York and Boston, where neither harbour dues nor freightage of any kind is charged.

I would say to the Government, whatever may be the condition of the harbour of Montreal, we want a great national harbour. By all means, have these anomalies removed, so that freight passing through Montreal may not have these burdens to bear, but may pass through as cheaply and as easily as through the ports of the United States; and I, for one, will be ready to uphold the Government in assuming that position. This is the time for the Government to strike, and I hope they will strike effectively.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). This is not a new question in the House of Commons of Canada. I think that a dozen years or so ago this same question of the appointment of a railway commission came before us, introduced by the late hon. member for North Simcoe, Mr. Dalton McCarthy. I can remember the circumstances connected with the effort made at that time. I remember that a deputation came down from all parts of the province of Ontario, and probably from other portions of the Dominion, a deputation so numerous as to fill this Commons Chamber. But this was not a deputation to promote the formation of a railway commission, though I will venture to say that a majority of those who composed it were in their hearts in favour of such a commission; but they came down at the direct instigation and at the expense of the railroad companies in order to protest against the appointment of a railway commission. They succeeded at that time in burking the question. If I remember correctly, the appointment of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council was the outcome of that agitation and the attempted solution of the problem at that time. But, Mr. Speaker, while the work of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has been admirable in many respects, while it is a court that has many features to recommend it—for it does not require that those who have complaints shall appear by counsel, nor are its proceedings expensive, but any aggrieved person can go and state his case—yet it must be admitted by every one who has looked into the question that that committee has fallen far short of the solution of the problems which come before the community and which a railway commission such as is proposed would be able to solve. A railway commission would have many advantages. In the first place, every person would not be compelled, as now, to come to the city of Ottawa in order to present his case. Difficulties are arising in British Columbia, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Manitoba and the North-west Territories; and the railway commission would visit the points where the grievances exist, examine into the conditions there, and find a solution for the problems presented. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council cannot do that, and so they cannot be and are not as effective a court in solving the difficulties presented as a railway commission would be. But, Sir, beyond that, what has been the history of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, under both political parties and both Governments? I think I am quite safe in saying that they have not attempted to solve the question of freight rates; or, if they have, they have done so in a very limited degree indeed. The question of freight rates is a question of the greatest importance. It has been charged against the railroads that they will carry foreign freight through Canada twice the distance that they carry Canadian freight and at the same figure as they charge for the Canadian freight or even at a lower price, thus doing an injustice, an actual injury to the Canadian farmer, manufacturer or producer who has to compete with foreign rivals thus favoured. I contend, Sir, that under such circumstances, the railway company should be called upon to appear before a tribunal—not one that would do them an injustice, for I do not apprehend that the railway commission appointed would do an injustice or wrong to the railway companies—to answer for their conduct. The members of that railway commission would have a judicial duty to perform, and they would be men who had acquired all the technical knowledge necessary to enable them to understand fully the questions coming before them. It was proposed, I think, in the old days that there should be a lawyer—or two lawyers, perhaps, and a business man.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A man of common sense.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, a man of common sense. But, Sir, I do not know that the presence of a lawyer would be needed. The members should be men who understand the problems, who have studied the position of affairs, who have an acquaintance with the business of the country, and would recognize the business conditions in the various localities, and would give an honest and straight interpretation of the law and one that would prevent Canadian interests from being sacrificed at the desire of foreign interests. We find that every large railway in this country has branch lines in the United States and connections with the railroads of that country. The Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Railways have large portions of their lines in the United States. And so we have practically no control over these railroads. Now, on the other side of the line there is an Interstate Commerce Commission, a railway commission somewhat like that which we propose to have for ourselves. That commission has control over the American portion of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific. They also, we are told, control, in a sense, their operations on the Canadian side of the boundary. But there is no efficient control or protection of Canadian interests. The appointment of this commission would protect our Canadian interests where conflicts arise in this regard. But there is another important matter, one that I conceive to be of great interest to Canadians. If there was a necessity a dozen or more years ago for the appointment of a railway commission—and I believe there was; I voted for it at that time, and I have never seen any reason to change my views on the matter—there is still greater necessity to-day. We find, Sir, that in the United States, and also invading this side, there are combinations that are inimical and injurious to the best interests of the people of this country. Take an example; it is only one, but it is the greatest and most dangerous of them all—the Standard Oil Company. That company to-day assumes to dictate to the railroads of this country. The railroads need protection against such an enormous monopoly as the Standard Oil Company. If the railways are not strong enough to fight these monopolies themselves, then we should have a railway commission to investigate such complaints as that we heard the other day. What was it? It was that this Standard Oil Company were compelling the railroad companies—we will assume that they were compelling them against their will—at any rate, they were causing the railroad companies to give them a better rate in Canada than was given to other forwarders for precisely the same article—coal oil.

Well, that, of course, is directly contrary to all rules of fair-play in business. By the law of the country, by the common law, every forwarder, every man who is doing business, has a right to the same treatment, and the laws of the land presumably give him the same treatment and the same fair-play that others receive. But this Standard Oil Company have undertaken to control business affairs in Canada as they are doing in the United States. We require a commission to-day, we require power, an effective power which the Railway Committee of the Privy Council does not possess, or if they possess it, they do not exercise it, in combatting the influence of all such combinations which are injurious to the progress and the prosperity of the country. I say, then, that I cordially approve of the proposal made by the hon. member who has brought this matter before the House. If a commission be appointed they will become thoroughly versed in all the business conditions in every portion of Canada, because that will be their duty. Every one who had a grievance would come before them with the knowledge that they would give it the most careful and exhaustive consideration, and would give justice to those who are aggrieved. The railroad companies themselves would be protected against those who are to-day presenting a pistol to their heads. The railroad companies, in their hostilities with one another, would have to come before this commission, and justice would be done to them in the difficulties that from time to time arise. I do not see to-day,

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. Speaker, any objection that can be validly urged against the appointment of this railway commission with the view of giving justice to those who have been oppressed, if they have been oppressed, as we are told they are, by the exorbitant charges of the railroads, where such charges would not be justified. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council has in the past and has to-day, utterly failed to grapple with this subject; they have not regarded it as a portion of their business, and I say it is therefore the more imperative that this commission should be appointed in order that the interests of every portion of the people may be protected.

Mr. J. ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). From a reading of the motion of the non-member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford), I did not gather that he proposed to discuss the question of a railroad commission from the standpoint of Government ownership. The discussion of the question from that point of view would, to my mind, be useless, simply from the fact that such a proposition is neither feasible nor within the range of practical politics. I think, however, that his remarks concerning the Conservative party are just worth a reference. The hon. gentleman speaks of what the history of the Conservative has been, of how little the Conservative party has done in this country for the workingmen. All I can say is that it is to the Conservative party that the workingmen of this country owe all that they have got. If it had not been for the action and policy of the Conservative party, there would be no workingmen in this country. The hon. gentleman talks about the man who works ten hours a day being the backbone of the country. All I can say is that the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity shortly, in connection with the Bill of my hon. friend the member for London (Mr. Beattie), to vote in favour of a service of eight hours a day for the workingman, as is proposed by that Bill. I do not think, however, that the hon. member for Macdonald has said a word too much as to the evils which the unchecked supremacy of the two great railways, yes, all the railways, has inflicted upon the people of this country. I must also compliment my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) for the capital presentation of the case, from his point of view, that he made in his speech this afternoon. There is not a member in this House, Mr. Speaker, who is more in sympathy with the people of western Canada than I am. In fact, I saw the future metropolis of western Canada before any of the hon. members who now sit in this House. I surveyed the town site of Winnipeg—I do not mean that I surveyed it with the theodolite of a surveyor, I surveyed it through the barred windows of old Fort Garry, during the historic winter of 1870. Therefore, I have some associations which make me the friend of the people of western Canada; and I would like to tell the betrayed and deluded people west of Lake Superior that I think they will be a long time looking for the blessings they expect from the creation of a railway commission. People talk about a railway commission and railway commissioners as if there were some magic almost divine in the name. Pretty much the same sort of talk used to be heard in favour of a change of Government. The country was groaning, and is for that matter groaning to this day, under the tyranny of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the country was told to look for deliverance to the Liberal party. The country finally took the Liberal party at its word, and the country is still looking for deliverance. I do not know how much truth there is in the statement that the friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway were included and the enemies of the Canadian Pacific Railway were excluded from the present Government; but I do know that Sir William Van Horne must be a mighty hard man to please if he is not pleased with the conduct of the present Government. I must qualify that statement, however, by admitting that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has shown some desire to put the interests of this country ahead of the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway in his management of the Intercolonial. I listened yesterday afternoon with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks which he made at the Railway Committee, in connection with the location of railway stations on the Canadian Pacific Railway route, and to his expressed determination to put the law, so far as the Government could put it, in force with regard to selecting those stations. I only hope that the hon. gentleman's words will materialize, that some day we will have a practical proof that he means what he says, and that the Government will exercise this power. I hope that the hon. gentleman will not backslide but that he will stick, and if he only follows up the words that he uttered yesterday in the Railway Committee, I can tell him that he will have the entire people of this country at his back. However, I wish to say that the Government has not shown in its dealings with the Canadian Pacific Railway that strength which the country had a right to expect. A commission appointed by the Government would be no stronger than the Government, and a commission as weak as this Government is in its dealings with the railway companies, would not be worth its salary. People who thought that the railroads could be controlled by changing the position of parties in this House, were mistaken; and if the hon. member for Macdonald thinks that the railways can be controlled by any commission which his section of the Liberal party may appoint, all I can say is that I do not share his faith. A railway commission without energy would be as useful as a boiler without steam. A commission could only get its vigour from the character of the Government that created it, and a commission which partook of the characteristics of the present Government, would neither be energetic or useful to the public.

I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to the resolution at the present time, because, I believe, that the people of western Canada will get more justice from the railways if the Government is not allowed to stand behind a commission. A commission would be a mere buffer to keep the Government leaders from being jarred by the anger of the people whom it would refuse to protect. There are good reasons why many hon. gentlemen in this House should have little faith in any commission appointed by the present Government. The Government had its chance to serve the country in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass matter, in which it practically surrendered to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, instead of compelling the Canadian Pacific Railway to surrender to it. The Canadians in southern British Columbia asked this Government for the right to have a railway built without any expense to this country and this Government, which is going to cure all the ills with a railway commission, had not the courage to frame a policy of justice for the handful of Canadians who were at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I need not recall the behaviour of the hon. Minister of Justice, who shilly-shallied until there was no chance of fixing the responsibility for the fate of the young Canadians who were done to death on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. These are the facts that make me extremely dubious as to the value of any commission which this Government might appoint. I do not share the opinion of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) as to the blessings that would follow the creation of a commission. The form without the substance is nothing and my fear is that the hon. gentleman's friends would give the country the form of a commission which would lack the courage and public zeal which alone could make a commission useful. There is danger, also, Mr. Speaker, that all this talk about a commission may blind the eyes of the people of Canada, in the east and the west, to the possibility that their chance of getting an independent road from Winnipeg to Lake Superior is being frittered away. The hon. member for Macdonald, perhaps, might allow his railway commission idea to rest until he assures himself that these deals of Mackenzie & Mann, for the Rainy River Railway and for the South-eastern Railway, are not deals with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; I know all about the theory that Mackenzie & Mann are independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but, Mr. Speaker, I do not take any stock in that theory. What I want to know is: Why the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be so indifferent to the many designs of Mackenzie & Mann and so hostile to the one design of Corbin? Now, if Mackenzie & Mann are not the agents or allies of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. they must be dangerous rivals of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Certainly, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has more to fear from the many projects of Mackenzie & Mann than from the one little project of Corbin in the Kettle River Valley. But there are no signs of Canadian Pacific Railways hostility to the designs of Mackenzie & Mann. No, Mr. Speaker, the Government winks the other eye, and suggests that all these subsidies to Mackenzie & Mann are part of a clever design to cinch the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is strange that the Canadian Pacific Railway does not seem to be afraid of being cinched by Mackenzie & Mann, but, when Corbin proposes to cinch the Canadian Pacific Railway at one point on the Kettle River Valley, its agents camp out in the lobbies and corridors of the House, and Van Horne and Shaughnessy come and camp out in the Railway Committee room as if they owned the whole place. But all these Canadian Pacific Railway influences are quite indifferent to Mackenzie & Mann's schemes. The meaning of this, Mr. Speaker, is very plain, and is practically found in the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway and Mackenzie & Mann are working together and when they have drawn all the subsidies in sight, it is the country and not the Canadian Pacific Railway that will be cinched. I yield to no member of this House in my desire to see the people of Canada get fair-play from the railways, but I am not going to support this resolution, at the present time. The appointment of a commission would enable the railway lawyers to practice a new sort of law; I do not know whether any of these railway lawyers would be of the same sort as was referred to by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), but it will not save the people of the west from practising the old sort of economy. There is law enough; and there is machinery enough at the present time. The people of the west should insist that this law and this machinery should be used for their protection. I am open to conviction in this matter, and when the Government shows itself strong enough to disagree with the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with the Kettle River Valley question, I will be tempted to believe in the value of any commission that they might appoint, but, on the evidence in sight, I believe that a sub-committee of the Canadian Pacific Railway brakemen would be as useful to the people of the west as any commission they are likely to get from their representatives in the present Government.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I do not think I need offer any excuse for making some remarks upon this subject. I, myself, have a motion on the Order paper calling for a commission of a somewhat different character from this, it is true, but my view is that probably such a commission as that which is now called for might, if sufficiently expert, prosecute the inquiry designed by my motion. The importance of the transportation question cannot be emphasized too much in this country. In my belief it overshadows the tariff and all other questions before the people at the present time. I am free to confess that, in my opinion, there exists a great amount of popular ignorance in regard to the real bearing of the transportation question, and I would urge hon. members to make a careful study of it, and, in doing so, I would ask that they should read the speech delivered by the Hon. Edward Blake on the 17th of June, 1885, in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was my intention to have read considerable extracts from that speech, but time will preclude my doing so in connection with this motion. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to give a few facts with regard to the transportation question, in the country, in order that hon. members may see how it has been handled for the last twenty years and how farcical has been the railway policy of the Government during that time. Take, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, our great transcontinental highway. We find that the country gave that corporation $25,000,000 in cash and $35,000,000 worth of completed railway. In addition to that, we gave them 25,000,000 acres of land, one-quarter of which, according to their own report, has been sold for some $17,000,000. If we multiply that by four we will find that they obtained land in value equal to $75,000,000. We have, therefore, given that corporation $135,000,000, or its approximate value, and their own estimate, as to the cost of this railway, was $91,500,000; so that, you will see, according to their own estimate, the country has presented them with their railway and given a large bonus into the bargain. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, this company received large amounts in other bonuses, and the Government also gave a monopoly to them of the railway business of the North-west. Hon. gentlemen will recall the struggle that the people of Manitoba had in order to secure their rights in that connection. The Government of the day placed in their charter what is known as the "10 per cent clause," which provides that, until 10 per cent has been earned on the capital actually expended on the railway, the Government should have no control over the rates. The motion that I have placed on the Order paper has reference to that 10 per cent clause. I want to know, Sir, what the Canadian Pacific Railway actually cost. As you are aware, a construction company was formed, and, according to their book-keeping, the nominal cost of the road was enormously enhanced. I want to know whether the $135,000,000, in lands and cash and completed road, given by the people of this country, should be considered as part of the capital actually expended on that railroad. I, for one, claim, that it should not be so considered, and the object of my motion is to have experts appointed, in order that they may go into the entire transaction, from start to finish, and let the country know what the actual cost of that railway was, so that the Government may have some chance of securing control over the rates, as it is my belief that the company now earns more than ten per cent upon the capital actually expended by it. Now, if the Government cannot control the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, of what value will a railway commission be, so far as it affects the Canadian Pacific Railway? We cannot, at the present time, give the commission power to control these rates, so that hon. gentlemen will see it is very essential that the inquiry which I propose to move for, should be gone on with.

In addition to the enormous subsidies which we gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway, we gave them the privilege of "stocking" their road to the extent of some $65,000,000. The House probably knows, or if it does not know, I propose to tell it, that the amount realized from these issues of stock did not average more than 25 per cent of the par value of said stock. The members of the syndicate which was then formed, paid themselves as high as 6 per cent per year on the par value of this stock for which they had only paid 25 per cent on the dollar when they allotted it to themselves. In this way they actually paid themselves out of the proceeds as high as 24 per cent on the amount they paid. Let me read for the benefit of the House, an extract from the Sessional Papers 31, vol. ix., 1884, which shows what members of the syndicate and other stock-holders realized in five years, out of the $20,000,000 issued on August 17th, 1881:

| Name.              | No. of Shares. | Par Value. | Amt. actually paid. | Dividends received in 5 yrs. |
|--------------------|----------------|------------|---------------------|------------------------------|
|                    |                | $         | $                  | $                           |
| Geo. Stephen.      | 23,411         | 2,341,100  | 585,275             | 652,330                      |
| Duncan McIntyre .. | 975            | 97,500     | 24,375              | 29,200                       |
| R. B. Angus..      | 19,509         | 1,950,900  | 487,725             | 585,270                      |

Others to whom stock was allotted realized on the same basis.

All these men realized in five years more than they actually paid for the stock, so that you will see, Mr. Speaker, that we are not under any very great debt of gratitude to these people for taking up the construction of this road.

Notwithstanding the fact, that the people of Canada gave to this company in cash, completed railway and lands, an estimated amount of $135,000,000, let me present to the House a few figures to show what the Canadian Pacific Railway have done in return for, Canadians, and also to show how they have discriminated in favour of the people of the United States, as against the people of Canada. A few months ago I sent down to St. Paul for the latest freight tariffs on the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie Railway, and I also got the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in order to make a comparison. Hon. gentlemen probably know, that the Canadian Pacific Railway owns what is known as the Soo Line, which runs through Michigan and Minnesota, connecting with the Canadian Pacific Railway at the south end of Lake Superior. Let me give this comparison of the rates.

The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg is the same as from New York to Minneapolis, and here are the latest Canadian Pacific freight rates for these respective hauls.

First-class freight from Montreal to Winnipeg, via the Canadian Pacific Railway, $1.98 per 100 pounds; the same from Minneapolis to New York, via the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie and New York Central, $1.05 per 100 pounds.

On second-class freight over the Canadian road they charge the people of the Dominion $1.70 per 100 pounds, and they carry it for the people of the United States for 91 cents per 100 pounds.

On third-class freight they charge the people of the Dominion of Canada, who practically paid for the railway, $1.35 per 100 pounds, and they carry it for the people of the United States, who contributed not one penny towards the construction of the road, for 70 cents per 100 pounds.

On fourth-class freight they charge the people of Canada $1.05 per 100 pounds, and they charge the people of the United States 49 cents.

On fifth-class freight they charge the people of the Dominion of Canada 88 cents per 100 pounds, and they charge the people of the United States 42 cents per 100 pounds.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that, notwithstanding the fact, that the people of Canada have practically paid dollar for dollar of the entire value of this railway, yet the Canadian Pacific Railway is charging the Canadian people almost double the rate that they charge the people of the United States for carrying their freight over the same distance. It seems to me, that such a state of affairs ought to emphasize to this House the fact that the railway policy pursued in this country is certainly not satisfactory to the people, and that, if any control can be exercised over these railroads, it would be in the interest of the people that it should be done.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) takes the view, that government control of Canadian roads is out of the question. On that point I differ from the hon. gentleman. We hear from time to time the statement, that government would never exercise proper control over railways, and could not manage them to the satisfaction of the people of the country; and, as an evidence of this contention, we are pointed to the Intercolonial Railway. It is quite true, that the Intercolonial Railway has not been a success; but is not that largely due to the fact that it is a political and not a commercial railway? Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have in the Dominion of Canada men who are sufficiently able, honest and shrewd to manage and administer our railways in the interest of the country. Are we obliged to confess, that we have not sufficient honesty and ability in our whole Dominion to properly manage our railroads? Take the experience of Belgium, and of the Australasian colonies, and of other countries, where government ownership has been in existence for some time, and you find that the railways in these countries very often carry passengers at 1 cent per mile, that their freight rates are very low indeed, and yet these railroads are paying institutions. In Germany, I understand that the annual revenue is something like $25,000,000, showing a handsome profit. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be in the interest of the country, that the present Government should reverse the existing railroad policy. It is high time that the policy by which this country pays sufficient money to entirely build the railroads, and by which these roads are then handed over to private persons, should be put an end to. It is in that view, and in order to lay before this House some facts that I believe to be important, that I have placed my motion on the Order paper. Take the case of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. The cost of that railway was something like $3,000,000, and it has a debt at the present time, approximately, of $11,000,000. Take, also, the case of the Hudson Bay Railway, 40 miles of which were constructed within the province of Manitoba a number of years ago, and for which the province of Manitoba was jockeyed out of $256,000. The same policy has been pursued with regard to the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway. On this subject let me quote from a pamphlet published by Mr. Willison, the editor of the Toronto "Globe":

The history of the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway is faithful to the details of American railway methods. More than $3,500,000 was received from the sale of bonds. The road cost for construction and commissions, and disbursements in connection with the sale of bonds, probably $2,500,000. Rolling stock and terminus were supplied by the Canadian Pacific. The road received also a land grant of 1,400,000 acres and a cash subsidy of $80,000 a year. It was leased for six years to the Canadian Pacific, without rental, and this lease has just been renewed. But the original promoters got a million or two out of the speculation.

With regard to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, let me quote a few figures:

The cost of the road, according to the company's own figures, has been $3,717,882, or $13,000 a mile. Actually, however, the construction did not cost more than $7,000 a mile. The road-bed is now in very poor condition. At this rate the total cost was $2,065,000. Over against this is a bonded debt of five and a half millions, and the 1,888,000 acres of land grant.

And so you see, Mr. Speaker, the carnival continues. The railway exploiters are more clever to-day than they have been in past years. They obtain bonuses from the provincial governments and from the Dominion Government; they do not let their right hand know what their left hand does, and in that way they are able to secure, and have in some cases secured, more than the entire cost of the railway; and then they place large fixed charges upon it, which the country is obliged to pay for in the form of high freight rates.

It seems to me, Sir, that it is time there was a reversal of that policy. We are liable to have it repeated in connection with the Rainy River Railway; and I want to emphasize, in all solemnity, this point, in order that the Government may realize exactly the feeling of the people of the North-west in regard to that enterprise. At the present time the Canadian Pacific Railway controls the only outlet on Canadian territory from the North-west to Lake Superior. Now, it is proposed to build another line to be known as the Rainy River Railway. A portion eastward from Winnipeg has been built, and the Ontario Government has granted $4,000 per mile to assist the construction of a section from the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western up to the mouth of Rainy River, where it is proposed to connect with the Winnipeg and South-eastern, now under construction. The promoters of this railway, who have a promise of $4,000 per mile from the Ontario Government, are now after the Federal Government for a further bonus of $6,400 per mile. I myself was asked recently to join a deputation to urge that that amount of money be granted, and a member of the delegation informed me that it was the intention of the Manitoba Government to give some $4,000 per mile on the same section of 280 miles. If that is done, there will be an aggregate bonus to this railway, granted by these three Governments, of $14,400 per mile. Some people tell me that this is quite ample to build the railway. On that point I know nothing; but I would say to the Government that the country, and particularly the people of the North-west, will hold the Government responsible to see that that railway is built under proper auspices. When we do get that railway built, what is its position going to be? If it is to be owned by a private company, the Government will exercise no authority over it, and the company can either sell out to the Canadian Pacific Railway or make a working arrangement under which the people of the North-west will have their interests completely sacrificed and will suffer just as much as formerly. I want to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to what I am about to say. I, for one, was delighted to hear the remarks that hon. Minister made yesterday morning in the Railway Committee. It was satisfactory to hear him speak so strongly and independently and fearlessly of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway as he did on that occasion. When the subject of this very Rainy River Railway was before the House last session, the hon. Minister of Railways made a speech from which I may be allowed to read an extract :

I confess to you that I myself am not very much enamoured of the sufficiency of the machinery, of the sufficiency of the power, which can be exercised by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, or by the Governor General in Council. * * * The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) has said, why does not the Minister of Railways consent to a clause being inserted in this Bill that this railway shall not pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Well, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you why. Not that I would not very much regret seeing this railway, if it becomes, as is hoped, an important trunk line in the future, pass under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but I am not at this moment really able to advise this House as to what kind of words, or what sort of a section could be framed which would prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from acquiring this road. I wonder how you would go to work to do it. Would you say that the persons who shall invest their money in this enterprise shall not sell their stock or their bonds to anybody who might be acting in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway? The only way you could do that would be to say that they shall never sell their stock or bonds at all—that the stock or bonds shall never pass out of the hands of the people who invest in them, and that no person who is, or is likely to be, directly or indirectly subject to the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall invest a dollar in this enterprise. Would you not make yourself entirely ridiculous by inserting any such clause in the Bill? If the hon. gentleman cannot come any nearer to a solution than that, he will have to leave things as they are, and run the possible risk of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company buying up those interests. You will have to submit to that contingency, so far as I can see; and no provision that we can incorporate in any law is capable of avoiding it. I would be as averse to the Canadian Pacific Railway getting control of this railway as the hon. gentleman. I am willing to give them fair-play; I think they are entitled to fair-play; but I do not like to see them picking up every little railroad that may be constructed in Canada any more than the hon. gentleman does.

So you see we have the clear declaration made on the floor of this House by the Minister of Railways himself, that he knows of no way under heaven by which the interests of the people can be protected so long as this railroad shall be in the hands of a private company. If that is the case, does it not occur to you and to the Government and to the members of this House, that if there is no other way to control this important railroad—a railroad which is to carry the commerce of that country in the future, or at least to share it with the Canadian Pacific Railway—the Government of the Dominion should make overtures to the Government of Ontario and the Government of Manitoba, and invite them to come forward and join in constructing and owning this important link for themselves? That seems to me to be the only solution of this difficulty. There is no object in building a railroad to compete, for experience in both Canada, the United States and other countries, has shown that competing railroads do not compete, but that the moment they find it to their interest, they put their heads together and make a working arrangement by which the benefits of competition are destroyed. But in addition to that, inasmuch as the country pays for these railways the country has got to bear the extra burden in freight rates. In my opinion, it would be better for the people if the Government were to pay the Canadian Pacific Railway a certain amount in cash and obtain a reduction in rates, because if we build the other road we have to pay for it, and in addition we will have to maintain the staff that runs the road. There is no way in which the Government can avoid responsibility in this matter, and I am here to declare, in the name of the people of Manitoba and the North-west, that they propose to hold the Government responsible. I feel quite warm on this question, because it is one of the greatest importance to the people of that country, who have suffered probably as no other people in any other country have suffered by virtue of the high freight rates and the manner in which they have been treated by the railways in the past. They have endured this treatment until finally patience has ceased to be a virtue, and the country is thoroughly aroused, and intends that if possible a new order of things shall be brought about. While not demanding that the Government shall immediately proceed to own and control all the railways, I believe that it is the firm conviction of 90 per cent of the people of that country that the Government should at least take control of this important link, because if we own that line from Winnipeg to the head of the lakes, nine-tenths of the trade that goes into or out of that country will go via the lakes, and we will then have competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway from the western plains to the east via rail and lake. I regard that as the most important piece of railway that will be constructed in this country for many years, and the Government has it within its power to protect us at this point. We look to the Government to do so, and the Government will be held responsible if the interests of the people are not protected.

With regard to the creation of a railway commission, I do not propose to take up any time discussing that question, but will content myself with reading a brief extract from the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission presented at Washington. The report declares that the situation has become intolerable, both from the standpoint of the public and the carriers. What this situation is they describe partly as follows:—

Tariffs are disregarded, discriminations constantly occurred, and the price at which transportation can be obtained is fluctuating and uncertain. Railroad managers are distrustful of each other, and shippers all the while in doubt as to the rates secured by their competitors. The volume of traffic is so unusual as frequently to exceed the capacity of equipment, yet the contest for tonnage seems never relaxed. Enormous sums are spent in purchasing business, and secret rates accorded far below the standard of published charges. The general public gets little benefit from these reductions, for concessions are mainly confined to the heavier shippers. All this augments the advantages of the large capital and tends to the injury and often to the ruin of small dealers. These are not only matters of gravest consequence to the business welfare of the country, but they concern in more or less degree the higher interest of public morality.

Again :

A large part of the railway business is now transacted upon illegal rates, and in certain quarters charging the published is the exception. The results are gross discriminations between individuals and gross preferences between localities—which most always favour the strong and oppress the weak. Probably no one thing to-day does so much to force out the small operators and build up those trusts and monopolies, against which law and public opinion alike beat in vain, as discriminations in freight rates. A further result is that railroad business is carried on largely in conceded violation of law. This condition of the present law is powerless to control.

The Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States is one of the ablest bodies, I believe, on the North American continent, and if that body finds itself utterly unable to cope with the situation—

Mr. RUTHERFORD. In that same report is there not a suggestion that that commission be granted more power by Congress?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Exactly, and the railway companies contend that if the additional power asked for be granted, it will mean the practical confiscation and control by the Government of the railways of the country. That being the case, my hon. friend will agree that if this commission in the United States is unable to cope with the question, it is very doubtful if we can appoint a commission which will be able to cope with the same question in Canada. I am disposed to think that if the sentiments expressed by the Minister of Railways yesterday in committee should be carried out to the letter, we would go almost as far as if we appointed a commission, although, as I said at the outset, a commission such as my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) suggests might do very great good in ascertaining exactly where we are at by untangling all the tangles into which our railways have become twisted in the last twenty years.

It behooves every hon. member of this House to study this transportation question thoroughly, and I am satisfied that if they do they will come to the conclusion that it is high time something should be done. If the Interstate Commerce Commission in the United States is practically a failure, the natural assumption would be that it would not be a success in this country. So far as my own view goes, I feel that the only proper and satisfactory solution to the railway problem in the Dominion is for the Government to control our railways. I am not prepared to say at present that the Government should purchase all these railways now, but I am prepared to say that the time has come when the country should cease building railways and then presenting them to private individuals. The time has come when the Government should own the railways for which the country pays, and I believe the country is thoroughly alive on the question, and will hold the Government responsible for seeing that the country owns the railways for which the people pay.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 17) respecting the Ottawa and Gatineau Railway Company.—(Mr. Champagne.)

RESTIGOUCHE BOOM COMPANY.

On the Order being called for :

Second reading Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Restigouche Boom Company.—(Mr. McAllister.)

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McAllister) to allow this Bill to stand. Some communications have been sent to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) about it, and he desires to have time to consider it.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 83) respecting the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company.—(Mr. Rutherford.)

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company, and to change its name to "The Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company.—(Mr. Carroll.)

Bill (No. 92) respecting the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Yukon Mining, Trading and Transportation Company (Foreign).—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 95) respecting the Lindsay, Haliburton and Mattawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Bill (No. 96) respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company.—(Mr. McCleary.)

Bill (No. 99) to incorporate the Canadian Mutual Benefit Advertising Company (Ltd.)—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 104) respecting the Dominion Permanent Loan Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 2) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction.—(Mr. Charlton.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Chairman, one word upon the clause under consideration. I explained the character of this Bill briefly upon its second reading, and will do so more briefly on this occasion. The Bill simply provides for the raising of the age of consent from 16 years to 18 years. The law as contained in the Criminal Code, 1892, section 182, upon this matter, is as follows:—

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces and has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character, of or above the age of 14 years and under the age of 16 years.

If this Bill is adopted, the section will read: "Of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of eighteen years." The word eighteen is substituted for the word sixteen in this section 182 of the Criminal Code. I do not know that it is necessary to enter at any length upon a discussion of this provision. The law as it at present stands has been upon the statute-book for some twelve or fourteen years. The law in its operation, I think, has given general satisfaction—at all events, to the lovers of morality and law and order; and the influence of the Bill has unquestionably been a salutary one in Canada. Last year a great number of petitions were received in this House from various societies representing moral and religious movements, in favour of the adoption of this provision, among other things petitioned for. The evidence of an overwhelming public sentiment in favour of this change in the Criminal Code was, I think, quite satisfactory. I imagine that there can be no question that the adoption of this change extending the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen years will meet the approbation of the Christian and moral people of this country. I am well aware that it may be objected to in some cases, but I think the trend of sentiment is overwhelmingly in favour of the proposed change. There can be little or no doubt that the proposed change in the law is one in the public interest, in the interest of morality, in the highest interests of society in this country. It is not a feature of law that is novel or untried. It has been in operation in many countries. It has been in operation in the state of New York, with the limit of eighteen years, for a great number of years, and if in Canada the limit of sixteen has been satisfactory, I do not see that it can be very reasonably argued that an extension of that limit to eighteen years will not be equally satisfactory. Without detaining the House by entering at this stage, at all events, upon a full discussion of the merits of the matter, I move that that change in the law substituting eighteen years for sixteen as the limit of consent, be adopted.

Mr. CRAIG. I have pleasure in supporting this motion for this reason, that it is asked for by the women of the country. They have sent deputations here more than once asking for this change. Though they have no votes in this House, I think it only right that their opinions should be respected.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not intend to oppose the Bill as it stands; I only want to call the attention of the House to this state of things. There are several Bills before the House for the amendment of the Criminal Code. When a Bill of a somewhat more extensive character came before the House the other evening, it was suggested by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) that these Bills all be referred to a special committee to report upon; and I rather understood from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who was leading the House on that occasion, that that course commended itself to him. In another Bill this section is dealt with, not in the way the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) deals with it, but in other particulars an amendment is asked for in reference to that section. I just mention this fact, as it seems to me that perhaps it might be better to allow all these Bills to go together to a special committee to be dealt with, instead of amending the Criminal Code piecemeal in this way.

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume it would be better to adopt the course suggested by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) if the desire was to defeat the Bill this session—that would simply be the effect. The provision presented to the House is not by any means a new one; it is not one of a character so novel that it requires consideration by a special committee. The whole principle of this Bill has been argued before this House year after year, and has been embodied in law. There is nothing very complex about the proposition, it is easy to understand the extension of a provision raising the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen years. I certainly must protest against the idea of referring this Bill to a special committee, because it is a plain issue, it is not a difficult matter to understand at all, the House does not require the investigations of a special committee with regard to this provision. It is a proper thing, I imagine, either to approve or disapprove of the proposition, and I would rather have a decision now than to refer it to a special committee and wait for another year for the outcome of the affair.

Bill reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Order called for resuming adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill (No. 36) to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. BRITTON. I would be glad if we could advance this Bill a stage. Of course, I have not had any intimation myself as to the position the Government intend to take about it. If the hon. gentleman leading the Government consents to our going into committee—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would be glad to have the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) present when we consider this Bill. If my hon. friend will not object, I would ask him to allow it to stand.

Mr. BRITTON. Of course, he was present, the hon. gentleman will remember.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I know, but he wanted to make some remarks upon it.

Mr. BRITTON. I am afraid, then, it will not be reached this session.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think it will.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion for the second reading of Bill (No. 37) to amend the Naturalization Act.

Mr. McINNES. I may say with regard to that Bill that I have given notice that if it is allowed to pass its second reading when in committee, I will amend it in a way to make it meet with the approbation of the House, that is, to make the Bill solely applicable to the province of British Columbia. Upon that understanding, I would like very much if the Bill could receive its second reading.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). This matter has been under the special charge of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who is unfortunately unable to be present to-night. I will have to ask my hon. friend to allow it to stand until he appears.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

ADJOURNMENT.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The House has been so industrious in despatching its business that it has gone through the whole Order paper, and unless we go into Committee of Supply we will have to adjourn. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns, I might say that I casually mentioned to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to-day, that an important piece of information had reached me, and that on the first available opportunity I would mention it to the Government, so that possibly, tomorrow, some information may be given on the subject. This is the information to which I refer, and I may say, that it is from the Canadian Development Company (Limited):

United States boats are allowed, without the slightest hindrance, to ply between Seattle and Skagway, calling at Victoria and Vancouver both, and passing through some 600 miles of British or Canadian waters, while this boat (a ship of British register), is obliged to stop at Mary Island, for an hour, to enter. Mary Island is, of course, an American port some 40 miles north of Port Simpson. In addition to entering the ship, a United States customs officer is placed on board, to whom meals and passage are provided free. The ship's bar is closed, and no one is allowed to enter. Now, why should not precisely the same regulations be enforced on all the American boats between Vancouver and Victoria or Port Simpson, and why should not they be made to land their officer there and clear thence for Skagway?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I would just ask my hon. friend, if it is not giving him too much trouble, to inclose a copy of that statement to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I will call his attention to it, but it would be better that he should have the ipsissima verba of it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The matter relates more particularly to the Department of the hon. Minister of Customs, but I mentioned it to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because the hon. Minister of Customs is not in his place to-day when I spoke of it. I would like to say to the Treasury benches that this is not a spiteful suggestion or a proposed retaliation for what has been called a pin-pricking policy, but it is simply a suggestion that these restrictions, for which there does not seem any tremendous reason, might be examined into. If there is good reason for their careful protection of their waters, the same reason ought to apply to United States vessels coming through our waters and that such restrictions or precautions may be taken, the suggestion is made. I will be very happy to send to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the extract which I have read.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the matter. Of course, my hon. friend will understand, that very often these things can be better arranged without a formal proceeding by communicating with the authorities at Washington. It is more likely to have been some interference on the part of some subordinate officers than in consequence of instructions from Washington.

Motion agreed, to and the House adjourned at 8.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 4th May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the certificate of the Election Return of William H. Comstock, Esquire, for the Electoral District of Brockville.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. ELLIS presented the Fourth Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Debates of the House, as follows :—

Your Committee recommend that Mr. J. G. de la Durantaye be appointed to fill the vacancy on the staff of translators of the Official Report of the Debates, and that for this session he be paid for his services the sum of eight hundred dollars.

Mr. ELLIS moved :

That the fourth report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Debates of the House be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 106) to incorporate the Canadian Birkbeck Investment and Savings Company.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 107) respecting the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company.—(Mr. McInnes.)

Bill (No. 108) respecting the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pontiac, and to change the name to the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pembroke.—(Mr. Guillet.)

REVISION OF ELECTORAL LISTS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. McINERNEY (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

What suggestions or recommendations, if any, were made by this Government, or any person authorized by this Government, to the Government of New Brunswick concerning amendments to the Electoral Acts or Franchise Acts in force in that province ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In accordance with an understanding come to last session, the Prime Minister himself, communicated with the Prime Minister of New Brunswick to ask him to have the provincial Act amended so as to give an appeal to the court from the revision of the local officer.

ELECTORAL LISTS FOR NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. McINERNEY asked :

When were the electoral lists for the various constituencies in New Brunswick received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery ? Have any of such lists been printed ? If not, why not ? If not, is it the intention to have such lists printed, and if so, when ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With the exception of the electoral district of York, the voters' lists for 1899 for all the electoral districts of the province of New Brunswick have been received at various times between the latter part of December and the beginning of March by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in accordance with the provisions of section 10 of the Franchise Act. None of them have been printed so far.

FORWARDING OF REVISED VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What officers and for what electoral districts were in default in sending in the revised voters' lists to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at the proper time as defined in the Franchise Act ? Has the Government taken any action, and if so, what in regard to them ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have just given an answer to that question—the same thing as No. 4.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to call the right hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not the same as No. 4.

The PRIME MINISTER. No ; well, I am not in a position to give the answer to-day.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY—CLAIMS OF SETTLERS.

Mr. McINNIS asked :

1. Did the Government transmit to the British Columbia Government or communicate with them regarding the reports of Commissioner Rothwell on the claims of certain settlers upon lands within the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway land belt on Vancouver Island? If so, when?

2. What reply, if any, has been received from the Government of British Columbia?

3. Are the said reports to be included in the Report of the Minister of the Interior for the year 1898?

4. Why was the Return to the Address passed by the House of Commons on March 14th, 1898, calling for said reports, and the evidence upon which they were based, not printed?

5. What further action does the Government propose to take with reference to the said claims?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes; by letter to the Provincial Secretary of date the 9th July, 1898, and by a despatch of the 28th November, 1898, to the Lieutenant-Governor. 2. An acknowledgment merely. 3. Yes. 4. Because the Joint Committee on Printing did not so recommend. 5. The Government has not decided as to the further action, if any, to be taken.

I. C. R.—EXPENDITURE ON CAPITAL AND REVENUE ACCOUNT.

Mr. POWELL (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

1. What was the total amount of expenditure on capital in connection with the Intercolonial Railway and the extension thereof to Montreal from June 30th, 1898, exclusive, to the 1st day of May, 1899, exclusive?

2. What was the total revenue of the Intercolonial Railway and Montreal extension thereof from June 30th, 1898, exclusive, to the 1st day of May, 1899, exclusive?

3. What was the total expenditure charged to revenue account in connection with the Intercolonial Railway and Montreal extension thereof from June 30th, 1898, exclusive, to the 1st day of May, 1899, exclusive?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It would not be possible to furnish the information in reply to a question. If the hon. gentleman would move for a return, I shall be glad to bring it down.

YUKON MINERS' GRIEVANCES—MR. OGILVIE'S INQUIRY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. Does the Government know that the inquiry recently conducted by Mr. Ogilvie into certain grievances of miners in the Yukon territory has been concluded?

(a) If so, when was it concluded?

(b) Has Mr. Ogilvie's report on the same been received by the Government?

(c) What is the latest information the Government possesses which will indicate when the report will be ready to be laid before Parliament?

(d) Will this report be promptly laid on the Table of this House when it is received by the Government, or will the Government require a formal motion to be made to that effect?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No. (a) It is not known. (b) No. (c) The Government has no information indicating when the report will be ready. (d) The report will be laid upon the Table as soon as is reasonably convenient after it is received.

RUPERTS' LAND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL—DISMISSAL OF MR. FAIRLIE.

Mr. BOURASSA asked:

Is Mr. Fairlie still principal of the Rupert's Land Industrial School, in the province of Manitoba? If not, has he resigned or has he been dismissed? If dismissed, was an inquiry held and what was the result of it?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No. 2. He has been dismissed. 3. Complaints of improper conduct of the principal in regard to pupils in the school having been received, an inquiry was held by the Indian Commissioner, Mr. Laird, who reported that it was not advisable to continue Mr. Fairlie in the position of principal.

GRENVILLE CANAL—COLLECTOR OF TOLLS.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

1. Who was the collector of tolls on the Grenville Canal until 1896?

2. Has he been dismissed, and why?

3. Who has replaced him?

4. By whom recommended?

5. Is the present collector of tolls on the Grenville Canal the keeper of a general store, and is it with the permission of the Department of Railways and Canals that he does work in a store?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Alexander Pridham was collector of tolls on the Grenville Canal until 1896. 2. Yes, his services were dispensed with for political partisanship. 3. John Wade replaced him. 4. As the Government takes the responsibility of all its appointments it is not customary to state on whose advice it acted in selecting and appointing officials. 5. The collector made application to be permitted to keep store; but he was informed that it was contrary to the rules of the department, and he could not be allowed to do so. The department is not aware that he is doing so.

C.P.R. AND G.N.W. CENTRAL RAILWAY LINE FROM MCGREGOR'S STATION.

Mr. ROCHE asked:

1. Is the Government aware that a line of railway is being surveyed from a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway at or near McGregor station, to a point on the Great North-west Central Railway at or near Varcoe station?

2. Has any application been made to the Government, by either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Great North-west Central Railway Company, for the approval of the Government for the location of a road on this line, and has any company power to construct such a line?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government is not aware that a line of railway is being surveyed from a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway at or near McGregor Station to a point on the Great North-west Central Railway at or near Varcoe Station. Neither the Canadian Pacific Railway Company nor the Great North-west Central Railway Company have made application for the approval of the Government for the location of a road on this line. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, under their charter, have the power to construct branches (which power would cover this line).

I.C.R. SHOPS AT RIVIERE DU LOUP.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Railway Department to effect a change in relation to the shops of the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup, by removing them to Lévis or elsewhere ?

If not, has the hon. Minister of Railways given orders for an extension of the shops with a view to rendering it possible to execute therein all necessary local repairs, and to increase the working staff in consequence ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government have not under consideration the question of removing the Intercolonial Railway workshops from Rivière du Loup to Lévis or elsewhere, nor is it intended to remove same from Rivière du Loup. The Minister has not given orders for an extension of the shops.

I.C.R.—SUPERINTENDENT MR. W. A. DUBE.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

1. Whether the Minister of Railways has had cognizance of the following notice issued by J. E. Price, general superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway :—

“ Intercolonial Railway, “ General Superintendent’s Office, “ Moncton, N.B., 25th April, 1899.

“ Circular No. 11.—To whom it may concern :
Mr. W. A. Dubé has been appointed superintendent of the Montreal and St. Flavie district, and his office and headquarters will be at Lévis, P.Q. Effective on the 1st May, 1899.

“ Approved, J. E. PRICE, “ D. POTTINGER, General Superintendent.
“ General Manager.”

2. If so, is the hon. Minister prepared to state why the said step has been taken, and why a change has been made in the headquarters of the superintendent which had been located at Rivière du Loup for the last 20 years ?

3. By this change of headquarters are the “ despatchers ” to be transferred from Rivière du Loup to Lévis now or hereafter ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Minister has had cognizance of notice having been given that Mr. Dubé has been appointed superintendent of the Montreal and Ste. Flavie district, with headquarters at Lévis. 2. The extension to Montreal made it advisable and necessary to locate the headquarters of the superintendent at Lévis. 3. No arrangement has been made for the removal of the despatchers’ offices to Lévis, nor is it at all probable that such transfer will take place unless it shall be found imperatively necessary in the interest of the railway service.

N.W.T.—SETTLERS FROM OLDER PROVINCES OF CANADA.

Mr. GILMOUR asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to make any grant or give any assistance to persons in the eastern provinces of Canada who desire to remove to the North-west Territories for the purpose of taking up their permanent abode there as settlers, and who, without such assistance are unable to remove or settle in the North-west Territories ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to make any such grant or give any such assistance for the purpose of preventing the removal of such persons to the United States and for the purpose of retaining them as settlers in Canada ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to afford the persons in the eastern provinces of Canada who desire to settle in the North-west Territories, any such aid or assistance, pecuniary or otherwise, for that purpose, as has been given or extended to the Galicians and Doukhobors during the past few years ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. It is not the present intention of the Government to adopt a new policy regarding the giving of assistance by way of grant to persons removing from one part of Canada to another. 2. When applications are made to the Government for grants or assistance with the view of preventing the removal of any persons from Canada to the United States, or for the purpose of retaining them as settlers in Canada, the Government will decide upon its policy with regard to the matter ; but the Government is not at present aware that there are any persons who desire to settle in the North-west Territories, but who are unable to do so without some assistance, and who otherwise are likely to remove to the United States. 3. Yes. It may be added that no distinction has been or will be made between different classes of settlers as to giving of assistance.

MISS ANNABELLA HUBERT, OF ARICHAT.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

Has the right hon. Prime Minister received a petition from Miss Annabella Hubert, of Arichat, N.S., about the month of September last, complaining of injury to her property at Arichat, N.S., and asking for Government investigation ; the following letter having been received by Miss Hubert :—

“ Ottawa, 7th February, 1898.

“ Madam,—I am requested by the Prime Minister to inform you that your favour of the 3rd instant will receive all due consideration.

“ Yours respectfully,

(Sgd.) “ RUDOLPH BOUDREAU,
“ Miss Hubert. Private Secretary.”

Has this letter been authorized by the Prime Minister ? If so, has the matter received the consideration of the Government, and if so, what is the result?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes, such a letter was received. The claim of Miss Hubert has been examined, but, so far, I am sorry to say, without any satisfactory result to her.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the Government to a matter, that I think affects very materially the progress of the business of the House. The session is now in, I think, its fiftieth day since the opening, and I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he would lay on the Table of the House the only measure which has been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, namely, the measure proposing to provide for a redistribution of the constituencies.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) was not in the House on Monday last when I announced the intention of the Government with regard to what should be the business from this time up to the end of the session. I then stated that the Government intended to bring down at an early day the redistribution Bill, and the Senate resolution, and I stated also, that those two measures would be introduced previously to the business now before the House being disposed of.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid my right hon. friend has not quite comprehended me. I was quite aware of the statement which the right hon. gentleman made to the House on Monday, but what I wish to say is this: That on this fiftieth day of the session, the time has come when the progress of business in the House will be greatly promoted by promptly laying so important a measure as that upon the Table of the House. My right hon. friend will see that we would fail in discharging our duty upon this side of the House if we prevented the progress of public business, and allowed a measure of that importance to be brought before us in the last days of the session.

The PRIME MINISTER. I quite understand the hint given by my hon. friend, and I am happy to tell him, that the character of the measure which we will introduce with regard to redistribution will be such that there will be no cause whatever for obstruction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And, consequently, no cause why it should not be promptly laid upon the Table of the House.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY—RUMOUR-ED MODUS VIVENDI.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to draw the attention of my right hon. friend to a matter of some importance which I see mentioned upon the news bulletin boards to-day, as a cable from London, expressing the opinion that Her Majesty's Government have arrived at an amicable arrangement with the Government of the United States in regard to a subject which my right hon. friend has mentioned to the House, namely, the modus vivendi touching the Alaskan boundary. I would like to ask whether that news is authentic?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government has received no instructions whatever to that effect.

THE BRITISH COLUMBIA ANTI-JAPANESE LEGISLATION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is another matter to which I am sure the House would attach very great importance, and to which I wish to call the attention of the Government. About a month remains, I believe, within which the Government have the power to disallow the anti-Japanese legislation of British Columbia, passed in 1898, and I would like to ask my right hon. friend, if the Government has decided upon its policy with reference to this legislation.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I can inform my hon. friend, that the Government is at present expecting an answer to a despatch sent lately to the Imperial authorities.

FLOODS ON THE GRAND RIVER.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Railways and Canals. Last session, I brought to his attention the subject of the dangerous floods at certain points along the Grand River, particularly those points where it was claimed, and, I think, very properly, that the floods were caused by the construction of Government works. The hon. gentleman promised then that an engineer would look into the matter, and I should like to know now whether the hon. gentleman has the report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say to my hon. friend, that I gave instructions in keeping with the statement I made to him. I have not seen the report, and, to be absolutely frank with him, other matters quite drove it out of my mind. I will inquire about it immediately.

YUKON LEGISLATION.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior to the provisions of the Yukon Territories Act, sections 7 and 8. The hon. Minister will remember, that, under section 7, the executive council are required to report to him so soon as ordinances passed by the council have been adopted. Section 8 is the section referring to orders which may be approved by His Excellency in Council. As these two sections provide practically for an extension of legislation, I would like to ask him, if he would be good enough at an early day to lay upon the Table of the House such ordinances as he has received under section 7, and such Orders in Council as have been passed under section 8.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I shall be very happy to bring the papers down.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding):

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, whatever the impartial critic may say as to the address which was read to us the other day by the Finance Minister—as to its merits as a Budget speech—I am quite sure he would be willing to award the palm of merit, such as it may be, to that speech as a campaign document. I would think it an invidious matter to criticise harshly the effort of my hon. and genial friend; but I think it would be rather a surprise in a British House of Commons to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer rise to make an exposition of the finances of the British Empire, the conditions of trade, and the like of that, and to do it with the spirit and the manner that characterized the address of the Finance Minister the day before yesterday. I am not going to cavil with a large part of the figures which were presented. I could not do that. They are taken from the public documents, which, happily, in our country are above reproach, and we accept them loyally on either side of the House as they are issued from the different departments. The figures which were given to show the commercial and industrial progress and development of Canada along different lines from 1868 up to the present time, are just as gratifying to this side of the House as they are to the other; and there is not the least disposition on my part, or on the part of any gentleman sitting on this side of the House to say one word which would detract from the splendid progress which Canada has made from the time of the inception of confederation, in 1868, up to the present time—a progress which has been material and substantial, no matter what Government has been in power; but a progress which has had its eras of greater and of less expansion, determined by conditions imposed by Parliament, and conditions imposed by the circumstances of the country. So far as that is concerned, I have no criticism to make. That Canada's trade to-day is at the highest point that it ever was, is a matter of pride to every Canadian; and may there not a year pass when the figures shall not have climbed yet higher by millions; or, if it happens, in the revolving cycles of depression and of progress, that these figures diminish, let it be that it shall be the result of world-wide causes rather than the result of mistakes in policy or in administration on the part of whatever may be the Government of the day.

While I have said that the speech to which we listened, was largely a campaign document, there are two characteristics of it which probably may be singled out for a moment's remark. In the first place, I think that address was the most complete and full apology that I ever heard a party in the Dominion of Canada make for past errors and past delinquencies. I think it will go down to history as the most complete recantation of the pledges, and the promises, and the policies propounded by these hon. gentlemen for eighteen years of political prominence in this country; a recantation which was as full and complete in these respects as it was lacking in one other essential respect—that candour which should have impelled gentlemen to confess that they were in error and made mistakes, instead of, while acknowledging the fact by making the recantation, absolutely doing it under the disguise of still keeping a consistent position. And, Sir, I could not help contrasting the period of 1896—to keep to somewhat modern history—with the period of 1899. I think the leaders of the Liberal party in this House will never be able to turn around to their followers, so long as they are constituted as they are to-day, and say to them: We have piped unto you, and you have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and you have not lamented. For I noticed that when these gentlemen, the leaders of the Liberal party, mourned unto them over the extravagance of the Government three years ago, over the additions to the public debt, over the continual increasing expenditure, over the burdensome mass of taxation, they, in concert, like docile followers lamented tearfully and well. And the day before yesterday, when the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) piped to them quite a different strain, they at once ecstatically, almost frantically, responded in a chorus of joyous assent. Why, the very same gentlemen who in 1896 applauded my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he stood on this side, and in reply to my presentation of the Budget, declared before high heaven and an awaiting electorate that it was absolutely monstrous that any Government should come down and ask for $38,300,000 to be expended in a country like ours, equally applauded to the echo my hon. friend the Minister of Finance when he declared the other evening his intention of asking for an appropriation four millions higher. I remember well the hearty, the impetuous, the ostentatious way in which in 1896 my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen)—and his expression is just as strongly imprinted in my memory as though it were but last night—applauded that sentiment as one that burned itself into his very heart, as one that embodied the political convictions and opinions of eighteen years. He then applauded it heartily and I believe honestly. But what was I to think when, on the Minister of Finance declaring the other evening that he required some $42,000,000 or $43,000,000 or $44,000,000 for the expenditure of the country during the coming year I saw that my hon. friend, though he did not applaud quite so ostentatiously, tried to look pleased, and raised no word of dissent? What applies to my hon. friend from North Wellington applies to all, or nearly all, who sit on that side. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who looks so complacently upon me as I am speaking now, applauded that same sentiment in 1896, and he did not rest content with applauding, but arose to his feet and made the House ring with the reiteration of that sentiment. He called upon the electorate to stamp out the Government and the party which dared, with the expenditure, the increasing debt and the burden of taxation, such as it was at that time, to appeal to the electorate for their support. What am I to think of my hon. friend now? Will he arise and denounce an expenditure which is nearly $10,000,000 greater on the whole for the coming year than it was at that time? And so I might gather from individual members of the party sitting opposite instances of what I take to be unquestioned proof that the party and the gentlemen who support it, who three years ago applauded with all the force of conviction that was possible to them every sentiment which went against any increase in the expenditure of that time, any increase in the taxation, any increase in the burdens of the country, are to-day willing to dance when the Finance Minister pipes a strain which is pitched many keys above the one of 1896 on all these points. So much for that. But I think that speech is remarkable in another sense. It is also a splendid vindication of the policy and the result of the policy of the great Liberal-Conservative party. I shall illustrate that remark as I pass on in the course of my remarks.

We must be thankful for small mercies, and we are exceedingly thankful for this small mercy that the hon. Finance Minister accorded to us, namely, that he would give a little credit for the changed circumstances, as he portrays them, to the general revival of business throughout the world. But he insisted on our conceding that a contributing cause of very great strength and force—such was the way he put it at that particular part of his speech—was the policy of the present Government. As he proceeded in his speech, he forgot that temperate allusion, and began to claim everything for the policy of his Government, down to the 20 per cent increase in immigration from Great Britain in last January, February and March; down even to the canning labels of Mr. Innes, to which he alluded with so much feeling and so much pride. Well, at the end of his speech he was good enough to utter a word or two, which evidently escaped him in a moment of frankness, and without thinking what effect it would have upon his assumptions of the two or three hours previous, for turning to his followers he said to them: But we may not always have good crops and good prices, and therefore must be prudent, "lest we forget, lest we forget." Now, as to the aptness of that quotation in that particular part, I must confess that my mind is a little misty; but if he had quoted some of the impassioned utterances of my somnolent friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) with reference to expenditure and taxation, and then brought in his lines from Kipling: "Lest we forget, lest we forget," I should have understood the allusion.

I do not propose to attempt to follow my hon. friend through all the figures he gave or to follow him closely in all the conclusions to which he was able to come, I am afraid, by a rather rude and vigorous logic, which would hardly conform to the prescribed rules as they are generally taught in the schools, and generally admitted in the country. But there are some points which I wish to deal with briefly.

In the first place, a word as regards the Estimates. My hon. friend can quite see that very little that is apt and definite can be based upon such Estimates as we have now before us. We have nothing before us but the main Estimates, and only the first section of these. And it is quite impossible, as my hon. friend knows, for us to pursue a discussion upon Estimates only one section of which is brought down while a most important second section remains yet to be brought down, and a third, and probably a fourth section to come later in the financial year. Such as it is, however, it gives food for thought. The total Estimates of my hon. friend in the first year he was Finance Minister were $39,698,000. In the second year, 1897-98, his total Estimates were $39,282,000. The Estimates for 1898-99, without the second supplementaries, amount to $40,964,814. The main Estimates for 1899-1900, without any supplementaries at all, amount to $41,598,298 on consolidated account. Now that, incomplete as it is, shows an increase over the total Estimates of 1898-99—less the last supplementaries—of $2,403,419. There is food for thought in that for men of an economical turn of mind, and especially to a party which had its birth in the atmosphere of economy—though it seems to have outgrown it now. If the supplementary Estimates are proportional to those of the preceding year, we must add $1,838,934 to the amount already estimated. On this basis the Estimates of the Finance Minister for 1900 will be $43,367,232 on consolidated account alone. Now, if my hon. friend is not going to bring down any more supplementary Estimates—which it is not possible to conceive—he can contradict that. But this much is clear as a basis for argument, that the supplementary Estimates of this year will probably be proportionate to those of last year, and on that assumption, the Estimates run up to the large figure I have already quoted. This shows an increase over the Estimates of the first year the Finance Minister was in office of nearly $4,000,000, that being the increase in the space of three years. Well, Sir, that is a very strange commentary upon the Prime Minister's promise to the electorate of Canada before he was Prime Minister and when he was seeking the favour of the electors and making a compact with them. Then he pledged his word—not knightly at that time, but I should hope, just as dear to him as though he were a knight—that if the electors put him and his party in power, the expenditures on Consolidated Fund account could be reduced by two, three, yes, and the Hon. David Mills had said, by four millions of dollars. His Finance Minister sits beside him to-day asking for an estimate four millions greater than the first estimate he made after coming into office, and my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) sits there with his broken pledges in his pocket—they do not go any deeper—and looks complacently on the electorate of Canada whom he has deceived by his failure to carry out the promise he made.

But besides consolidated fund expenditures, there are capital expenditures. The Estimates of capital expenditures brought down by the Minister of Finance so far are $4,698,900. If you add a proportional increase to that of last year for supplementary Estimates you find that the whole estimate on capital account will be $5,847,882. That is without counting any railway subsidies, without counting any bounties on pig iron or expenditures of that kind, which will amount to a large sum. Adding the Estimates on capital account to those on consolidated account, we find the total Estimates, exclusive of railway subsidies and bounties, to be $49,215,114. And yet my right hon. friend the leader of the Government sits there and fancies that he enjoys the unalloyed respect of the electorate of Canada when he sanctions, through his Finance Minister, the calling for an expenditure of fifty million dollars and over just three years after he pledged himself to the electorate that if they put him into power he would reduce the expenditures of the country by a large amount. It will be satisfactory to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen)—and I must call his attention to it—to know that there are many increases in these Estimates. I am not going through them all, but there is one increase that I might mention—that of $19,484 on account of Civil Government. And, just on that point, I do not think it would be amiss for me to read a deliverance by my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) in this House in 1895. He will find it in "Hansard" of that year, page 1015 :

We are now paying over three and a half million dollars for the civil service, and under a proper administration the staff and expenditure could be very considerably reduced. But, Sir, we cannot expect the hon. gentlemen opposite to do that. They have too many friends and relations to provide for. It appears to become a weakness with every Minister, when he is installed in office, to place his friends and relations in positions, and when Ministers set that example, it is only natural that their followers should try and benefit by the example.

I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the expenditure on Civil Government, without any supplementary Estimates yet down, shows an increase of $19,487. Will the hon. gentleman kindly have a private conference with some of these Ministers who have their relatives fattening in office and who refuse to reduce the civil service—why? Because of the importunities of their friends behind them—and their own weaknesses, as my hon. friend said in 1895, in submitting to these demands.

But, Sir, in dealing with the Estimates we are not on very firm ground. Let us come to something definite. Now we leave the uncertain ground and stand where facts and figures are known. With reference to the expenditure of the country, let me then call the attention of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to some few facts which have, no doubt, escaped his attention in the multiplied duties which have been thrust upon him of late. In 1895-96, the last year of the late Government, the expenditure was $36,949,142 on Consolidated Fund account. In 1896-97, it was $38,349,759. In 1898-99, the whole of which is passed, except two months, the Estimates for which have been given us by the Minister of Finance himself—will my hon. friend from North Norfolk believe it?—the expenditure on Consolidated Fund account amounts to $42,026,028, or over five million dollars more than the expenditure of 1895-96. Or, if it will suit my hon. friend opposite better, $5,000,000, or a little more than the average expenditure of the Liberal-Conservative Government from 1887 to 1896, a period of 10 years.

But there are other expenditures besides expenditures on Consolidated Fund account; and if my hon. friend will take the Public Accounts, or listen to the figures that I give him, he will find that the other item which goes, of course, to capital account has also very largely increased. In 1895-96, the amount paid out of capital, taking out the North Shore Railway book-keeping entry was about $4,700,000; in 1899, the year just passing, the amount chargeable to capital account is $8,662,795, or creeping up very nearly to twice the former amount. But let us take the whole expenditures, and I find that a table has lately been put in the Public Accounts which is very useful; it gives you at a glance all the expenditures, so that you can see the expenditures on consolidated account, you can see what are those technically known as capital expenditures, and you can see the total expenditures, which take in railway subsidies and some other items outside the two former categories. Well, taking that total expenditure, what does it foot up to? Why, Sir, the first year these hon. gentlemen were in their total expenditures amounted to $42,900,000. That was the grand total that was expended, an immense amount of money. But in 1898-99, when the 1st day of July comes, that expenditure of $42,900,000 will have soared up to $50,688,000, an increase, in round numbers, of $9,000,000 on the total expenditure between the last year of our administration and the third year of their administration.

Now, Sir, suppose we take some of the figures that my hon. friend gives. My hon. friend, although making an exposition of the Budget, was careful to stop when he came to thin ice. Now, a scrupulous and thoroughly honest exponent of the Budget of a country on an important occasion like that of the Budget exposition, is more careful to warn the country of the thin ice than he is to talk of the safer and more secure paths of finance and of trade. My hon. friend ventured the assertion in his speech that they had done what they had done, expended what they had expended, and they had expended less per head of the population than the Liberal-Conservative Government in 1895, going back one year before the last year of the outgoing Administration. Well, Sir, was that true? It was true for the year 1898, but it was not true for the year ten months of which he had actually travelled over, and the other two months of which he had given us the closest figures as to what the expenditure would be. Now, Sir, it was his duty to have told the House, and especially the country, which cannot find out so well for itself, what his operations, as perfectly known to him for the current year, would have brought about in this matter. Let me read the percentages. In 1895, on Consolidated Fund expenditure, the per capita tax expenditure was $7.53; in 1896, it was $7.21; that was the last year of our Administration. In 1897, it was $7.39; in 1898, $7.41; and in 1899, on the 1st day of July, it will be $7.90 per head of the population. That puts a very different colour on the question; that gives you, as compared with 1896, the last year of Conservative administration, an increase of 69 cents a head of the population of this country on Consolidated Fund expenditure alone. Compared with 1895, it makes an addition of 37 cents, or nearly half a dollar per head of the population. But suppose we take the total expenditure. The total expenditure in 1896 was $8.13 per head of the population. The total expenditure for this current year, on the 1st day of July, will be $9.60 per head of the population, or an increase in these three years of $1.47 per head of our population. Now, Sir, that is a most astonishing conclusion to come to, and I challenge my hon. friend to dispute those figures, alongside the assertion which has gone everywhere before the country, and will float before the country for the next two years, that he has been able to make all his expenditures, as a Government, and to do it with less expenditure per head than the Liberal-Conservatives did in 1895. So much now with reference to the actual expenditures of the country.

I notice that my hon. friend had a good deal to say with reference to surpluses, and the party press, taking up the cue, are headlining the Minister of Finance's speech with, amongst other legends, this: "The era of surpluses has again arrived." You would think, from listening to the Minister of Finance, and from perusing those headlines and what is written under them, that surpluses are a discovery of my hon. friend, a discovery of the party of whom he is the Minister of Finance. But I beg to say to my hon. friend that surpluses, such as we know them technically in our administration, have been known from 1868 up, more or less; and I propose to give a very short statement of the surpluses that have been recorded in the Public Accounts from 1868 up to the present time. I find that from 1868 to 1875 there were $12,000,000, in round numbers, of surpluses. One of them only can be credited to the Liberal Administration, and that was largely because of good preceding administration which continued itself over into their term of administration. From 1881 up to 1883-84, there were $18,250,000 of surpluses, an average of $4,500,000 per year, and all those surpluses are credited to a Liberal-Conservative Administration. There was a surplus in 1886-87 of $97,313, a little one, but still gratifying. From 1888-89 up to 1892-93 there were $9,500,000 of surpluses, an average of $1,900,000 per year. In 1897-98 there was a surplus which is credited to a Liberal Government. The total surpluses from confederation up to the present were $41,600,000, and of these surpluses just $2,600,000 are credited to Liberal Administrations, and $38,900,000 are credited to Liberal-Conservative Administrations.

But if my hon. friends were not fortunate in the matter of surpluses, they were more fortunate in the matter of deficits. When we turn to deficits, we find that from 1875-76 to 1879-80 there were five deficits, and four of them most assuredly belong to my hon. friends opposite; I think the fifth one properly does, because it resulted from the bad times and faulty administration of the hon. gentlemen who held the reins of power for between four and five years.

Eighteen eighty-four and 1885 we had two deficits, and hon. gentlemen quite well understand why these occurred. That was the time of the most expensive work on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the payment of the expense entailed by the North-west rebellion. Eighteen eighty-seven-eight saw a deficit of $810,000. From 1893-94 to 1896-97 there were four deficits, amounting to $6,214,739, three of which were created during Liberal-Conservative administration. Of the deficits, then, amounting in all to twelve in number and $23,000,000 in amount, $16,100,000 belonged to the Liberal-Conservative party, and the remainder belonged to the Liberal party. I can give in brief a statement of the surpluses and deficits. The Liberal-Conservative surpluses were seventeen in number, and amounted to $38,937,000, and the Liberal-Conservative deficits were seven in number, amounting to $16,000,000, in round figures, the excess of surpluses being $22,814,000. Liberal surpluses were two in number, and Liberal deficits five; surpluses, $2,658,000; deficits, $6,946,000; excess of deficits, $4,288,588. But I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to the country as well, that the net deficit from 1890 to 1895 which occurred, along with the surpluses, in that period of depression, amounted to only $1,617,000. The debt increase, during that time, amounted to $15,544,000, a part of which was due to the deficit of $1,600,000. A fact that I wish to be noted is, that, during that period of depression from 1890 to 1895, the Liberal-Conservative Government met the wants and necessities of the country by reducing the taxation of the people, and in that period they remitted, on sugar alone, $19,850,000 of taxation; an amount sufficient to cover the whole addition to the debt in that period, including the net deficit, and to have wiped off $4,400,000 of the national debt. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) to-day prides himself upon his surpluses, and taunts us on the deficits, whilst we remitted taxation to that enormous amount, and whilst he remitted the least possible amount of taxation, on the one hand, and added heavily to the burdens of taxation by the actual new taxes that he has placed upon the country, on the other hand. With reference to the increase of the debt, there was an astounding statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance; correct in the mere technical point, but altogether wrong in the impression that it gave to the House and that it would give to the country. My hon. friend says: We have increased the debt less than $3,000,000 per year since we have been in office, against an increase of the debt of $6,000,000 a year by the Conservative Government, while they were in power for eighteen years. Now, whilst this is technically correct, it is probably the most incorrect and glaring misstatement that could be made, so far as the real facts of the case exist and ought to be known. What are the real facts of the case? The facts of the case are, that, when you take the period from 1878 to 1886, you have a period during which we paid out on the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway alone $50,641,000; you have a period in which we spent on canals liberally, $15,000,000, and you have a period in which we gave on provincial debts $10,281,000, in which we bought back lands from the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, if they had gone as part of the original subsidy, would have been an increment to the road, in lands, but would not have figured in the accounts to $10,199,000. And yet my hon. friend thinks it is fair to make a comparison with these extraordinary expenditures, these extraordinary payments in respect to our indebtedness to the provinces, and these extraordinary commutations in reference to Canadian Pacific Railway lands, by comparing this period with the two years just passed, when, comparatively speaking, there has not been a dollar spent upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, not a dollar given in aid of provincial indebtedness, not a dollar by way of commutation of lands, or anything of the kind, during which they have spent very little more on the canals per year than we did in the three years immediately preceding their coming into office. If my hon. friend will take what is a period of fair comparison, that is, the period after the Canadian Pacific Railway had been built and the moneys paid, if he will take the period from 1887 to 1896, he will find that the average increase of debt was less than $3,000,000 by over $200,000, and if he will take the more modern period, from 1890 down to 1896, he will find that the Liberal-Conservative Government increased the debt by exactly $2,652,000 per year, and not $6,000,000 per year. I think these periods are fair periods to take for the purposes of comparison. I think that no man has the rights of the case, unless these facts are brought to his mind; therefore, I say, the speech from the hon. Minister of Finance in this respect was rather an ad captandum election speech, than a calm, clear and fair exposition of the financial operations of Canada for the period from 1868, with which he purported to deal.

Now, Sir, let us speak for a moment in reference to the revenue. I notice that my hon. friends opposite applauded very heartily every allusion to the increase in the revenues. I have not forgotten the teaching of these hon. gentlemen, and I think I have it still in my memory, that all and sundry of them used to say: You talk about raising revenues; where do they come from? Do not revenues come from the people; are they not all the contributions of the tax-payers, and the labourers, and the wage-earners of this country. When my hon. friend was saying, that the revenue had increased by $1,200,000, by $2,700,000, by $5,100,000 in successive years, these hon. gentlemen could hardly contain themselves for very ecstasy; they applauded it to the echo, as though à la the Minister of Public Works, they were making money, and, therefore, it was a great thing, if a million or two were added to the revenues of the country. But I think the old-fashioned doctrine is probably the true one, that these revenues do all exactly represent the contributions of the people of this country to the expenditures of the Government. It is so much money, which, if it were not taken out of the money in possession of the individual and collective citizens of this country, would swell their wealth by that much more; so that it is equivalent to a tax on the people, and it is a burden in that respect. Well, Sir, let us look at the revenue for some years back, and here there is no chance for doubt. This is the customs revenue:

|---|--------------|
| 1895-96 .....                                 | $19,833,279 |
| 1896-97 .....                                 | 19,478,247   |
| 1897-98 .....                                 | 21,704,892   |
| Current year, 1898-99 (2 mos. estimated)..... | 25,138,246   |

So much for one branch of taxation by these gentlemen opposite—$5,300,000 more this year than it was in 1895-96.

Then, Sir, when we come to the Inland Revenue—that also I imagine is paid by the people, and here it is:

|   |             |
|---|-------------|
| 1895-96 .....                                 | $7,926,005 |
| Current year, 1898-99 (2 mos. estimated)..... | 9,805,562   |

And, if you add Customs revenue and Inland Revenue together, which we generally call the taxation of the country, it stands in this way: That the Conservative Government in 1895-96 took $27,750,000 of taxation from the people—and we were not lauded; we were denounced by the Liberal party from one end of this country to the other for taking what they called that extraordinary and extravagant amount of taxation from the people, to wit: $27,750,000—but my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) comes down with perfect equanimity, and tells his subservient followers, that this year of grace he is taking out of the people in taxation, not $27,750,000, but $34,900,000.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) looks up at me. Quizzically? No; for my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) knows perfectly well that these figures are correct; he knows that there is that addition to the burdens of the people, and he knows that he himself once said:

The Liberal party, if in power, could reduce the public expenditure and effect other savings to the extent of $5,000,000 per annum without impairing the efficiency of the public service.

In the name of all that is economical, if they could do with $5,000,000 less than we expended, why are they asking for $5,000,000 more than we expended? Why is my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) applauding the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when he reads out these astounding figures? Well, Sir, let us look at the total revenue which, as I said, comes from the people as contributions to the expenditure of the country. It was in 1895-96, $36,618,590, and to-day it is $46,632,398. There is a round $10,000,000 taken from the people in one way or another over and above what was taken from them in 1895-96. Yet, in 1896 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), whose record is behind him—and he would be happy indeed if it were about two years further behind than it is—the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose record is behind him, stands upon the "Hansard" of this House as declaring:

It was an outrageous and monstrous thing that any Government should ask from this country $37,000,000, to be expended upon the public services.

Let us take the matter of excess; because that furnishes an argument that strikes some minds with greater force. The customs increase of 1898-99 over 1895-96 is $5,304,967, and the Inland Revenue increase amounts to $1,879,557; the excess of taxation imposed under these two heads being $7,184,524. Let us take the per capita amounts paid. Each individual in Canada, if you take the average, paid in 1895-96, for customs, $3.94; this year he has the pleasure of paying $4.73, or 79 cents more. There was paid on the average $5.42 for Customs and Inland Revenue taxation in 1895-96, and there is paid by each individual this year of grace $6.57, an increase of $1.15.

The total revenue paid in all ways by the people of Canada was $7.14 per head in 1895-96; it is $8.77 per head to-day, an increase of $1.63 per head.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) say, what he estimates the population of Canada at the present time?

Mr. FOSTER. In the first place, I do not estimate it except this current year. I take the estimate as given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, upon which all the calculations are made, and I add the proportional percentage for this current year, and so get the divisor for the present year; that is as fair as any one can do it.

Mr. CHARLTON. And what is the number?

Mr. FOSTER. About 5,320,000. Now, Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was very jubilant over his buoyant revenue. Hon. gentlemen who sit behind him, forgetting all their pledges, all their promises, repudiating all their engagements, actually tearing up the promissory notes they gave the people and scattering them to the four winds of heaven; these hon. gentlemen applaud the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when he talks about buoyant revenues—five million dollars and more in customs duties alone, or on the whole, ten million dollars more than in 1895-96. Let us ask ourselves: why these buoyant revenues? Well, Sir, a business man would give a different reason from that given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). The Minister of Finance says: The cause of the increased revenues, is the policy of the present Government. A business man looking over this country and studying it would say: The revenues are buoyant, because we have had extra good crops, because we have had extra good prices, because we have had an extraordinary mining development, and when he mentions those three things, he has exhausted the whole repertoire. Why? Because if you take our other sources of wealth, the output has remained stationary or has gone and come—in some cases they are less—the forests and the fisheries and other sources of export are less. But when you come to the products of the farm and the mine, that is where you have your extraordinary development; that is where you have got practically the whole of your extra exportation, and consequently the business man would be perfectly right in saying: Good crops, good prices, and the extraordinary mining development account for the buoyant revenue. And how do they account for it? Because when you have good crops, good prices, a large development at the mines, you have money in hand, and that money in hand immediately calls for the conveniences and the comforts of life. This furnishes the basis for greater expenditures. If a man has no money he cannot expend his own money—he may get credit—but in a country which does not enjoy good crops, well-developed resources, and fair prices, the people have not the money to spend, and they have to deny themselves and cannot buy largely of the comforts and conveniences and necessities of life. That, your business man would tell you, gives you the basis for greater expenditures. And what line did these take? They called for manufactured goods; they called for the products of other countries which add to the comforts of our existence and raise the scale of living. They called for manufactured goods, and the call was met in two ways; it was met by the manufacturers and producers in this country, and it was met by the manufactures and producers in foreign countries; and you had immediately, the business man would tell you, under stimulus a greater output of home products and greater importations of products from abroad. What happened as a direct sequence? The business man will tell you that this needs no legerdemain, no sleight of hand, no writing of a policy; but that the very moment a country has good crops, and finds sale for them, the very moment you get a large development and find sale for the product of that development, as a consequence you begin to call for manufactured goods and importations, and something inevitable happens. What is that? That the whole business of handling and transportation is stimulated, and begins immediately to throb with new life and pulsate with new vigour. Your railroads have more to do than they had before, carrying out and carrying in, and all the vast army of handlers and middlemen have an extraordinary business that they did not have before—a business which will be, as to its extraordinary part, measured exactly by the surplus product; measured in the line of cash paid, and volume presented for transportation and handling. That is what is taking place; but my hon. friend must remember, and the country will remember, that to accomplish these things, you must have the mechanism for handling and transporting these products. How is it my hon. friend can bank with certainty upon the produce of the mines of our country being carried out for export—upon the produce of our farmers being carried out for export—upon the produce and manufactured goods of other countries being carried backwards and forwards through this country? He can bank upon it because, owing to a policy and the results of a policy of 18 or 20 years, this country has been provided with a very net work of transportation facilities.

My hon. friend indulged in a eulogy of the Crow's Nest Pass branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If his party had had its sweet will in 1880 and 1883, there would have been no main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Where then would have been the Crow's Nest Pass portion? It would have been something like that celebrated abortion, the Yukon Railway, beginning nowhere and ending nowhere. It would have been impossible.

But, Sir, what is the great point to a country when a period of good crops, good prices and development comes? The great point to a country consists in its being in a position to take advantage thereof. This country was in a position to take advantage of the good crops and good prices of 1896, 1897 and 1898, because, Sir, in arduous years of struggle, and by the expenditure of large sums of money, the industrial life of this country was put upon a stable foundation, which enabled it to defy all the opposition of the gentlemen who are before me; so that it found itself ready and strong when the good years came in 1896, with a mechanism thoroughly fitted to take hold by manufacture and transportation, and exploit and put to the greatest use this extra product. If my hon. friends opposite were honest in the policy they propounded years ago, and would have carried it out if they been in office—and upon such a proposition I confess to a great deal of doubt, in the light of the events of the last two or three years—you would have had no North-west worthy of the name, you would have had no Canadian Pacific Railway, with its branches running into all the different sections of that country; you would have had no basis of industrial mechanism in this country, ready to take advantage of every line of good times, and, by that very protection itself, holding itself against this line of advance of bad times from other countries, such as this country had experience of from 1890 to 1895. I say, Sir, without cavil or doubt, that no more specific and splendid instance was ever shown of the power of a country, through a wise protective policy and its results in strengthening its resources, to hold itself independent and steady and strong during five years of a period when other countries were passing through the blackest of hard times—carried through, Sir, with hardly a scratch or a scar, in such a way as to challenge the attention of the civilized world as to her capacity to endure that stress and strain. So, I say, these are the reasons for the buoyancy of trade; and no attempt of my hon. friend, however far it may go with unthinking people, of whom I am glad to believe we have not many in this country, no small plea of my hon. friend, standing in his place as an exponent of a Budget, but forgetting his position and becoming a partisan for party ends—no small plea of his, that it is because of his policy that this happens and that this is due, will have any weight with the business or thinking or intelligent people of this country. I have given then one reason why the revenues were buoyant—because Providence favoured us with good crops; because the genius and enterprise and vigour of our own people enabled them to delve down into the earth and find the hidden treasures that are there, and to develop them successfully and with rapid progress; because, Sir, for 18 years this people of Canada, by their expenditures, their energy and their enterprise, have built up a transportation system in this country, under both Governments, without which we would be very poorly off in this day of competition for the world's markets; and because, without cavil or doubt, the policy of 1878 and 1879 resulted in the establishment of industrial and mechanical pursuits in this country, in so stable and thorough a fashion that they have kept themselves strong through all the period of hard times, and are now able, when the good times come, to take full advantage of the changed conditions. Well, Sir, there was another reason, and it is this: That my hon. friend, while making a show of progress, made very moderate progress towards a reduction of taxation on the tariff lines. I am now going to use figures which to me are new, that is to say, in the source from which I obtain them. They are presented to me by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). They come from his department, and whether he supervised them or not, I am quite certain that they are the true figures. I have every confidence in the hon. gentleman and his department, so far as that is concerned. That will account for the slight differences in the figures that I read now and those that I read in an address I made here a little while ago with reference to the percentages. But the differences are small. On page 14 of the Trade and Commerce report for the last year, you will find an elaborate tabulated statement, a part of which consists in giving the exact percentages of duties on goods imported into Canada for home consumption from Great Britain and the United States—dutiable in one column, dutiable and free in another, giving a most complete exposure of the tariff rates from 1868 up to the present. Well, I simply translate the results of those figures and a few of the figures themselves to this House, and I do so in support of this argument, that the Finance Minister, while pretending to have made a great reduction in taxation, has really made a very small reduction in the rate of taxation of the country.

From 1880 to 1887, to go back no further, the average customs rates on dutiable goods in Canada imported for home consumption, was 26·24 per cent. I wish to ask my hon. friend the Finance Minister if he would consider that the old National Policy was in force from 1880 to 1887? I imagine he will do me the grace of making that admission.

Mr. McMILLAN. Not to its full extent. In 1889 it went up.

Mr. FOSTER. If I remember rightly the discussions that took place between 1878 and 1887, in which I believe my hon. friend was a participant, hon. gentlemen opposite held that the National Policy was very much in force in those days. We will take it for granted then that the National Policy was in force from 1880 to 1887, but the rate of duty was then only 26½ per cent upon all dutiable imports. In 1887 my hon. friend beside me (Sir Charles Tupper) added the iron duty, and from 1888, let us say, until 1896 the heightened duties were in force, and during that period the average was 30·82 per cent. I think my hon. friend will admit that the old National Policy was well in force during those years when the duty was 30·82 per cent, so that we had then the National Policy with the principle of protection, which was the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, and unanimously opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite from 1880 to 1886, whether the average duty was 26½ per cent or 30·82 per cent. Either of them was an abomination to all free traders and to hon. gentlemen opposite. What I am aiming to prove is that the National Policy does not depend upon a simple percentage of duty. Well, in 1896, under the National Policy, according to the figures of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the average rate of duty was 29·94 per cent. In 1897, it was 29·96 per cent; in 1898, it was 29·22; and for the eight months of 1899 it was 28·98 per cent; and for the month of February it was 29·58 per cent. Will my hon. friend take the deductions from that? From 1888 to 1896, the average duty was 30·82. In 1896 it was 29·94 per cent, being a reduction of 88-100ths under Liberal-Conservative rule. When we come down to 1898, there is a reduction of only 72-100ths of one per cent only, and yet we are told the National Policy then no longer existed. For the eight months of 1899, there was a reduction comparatively of 96-100ths of one per cent, but the National Policy no longer exists; and for the month of February, 1899, there is an extravagant decrease from 1896 of 36-100ths of one per cent, and the old National Policy has disappeared. Well, a business man, looking at this state of things, would come to the conclusion that the present tariff policy is within 36-100ths of one per cent just as protective in the year of grace 1899 as it was in 1896. He will lose sight of all those fine sprung distinctions of differences of policy and the like and come to the wholesome conclusion that the National Policy and its principle is here firmly imbedded, and according to the dictum of the Finance Minister, likely to stay.

Then again, the device of the preferential cut of 25 per cent was largely deceptive and has been practically inoperative, if we are to judge by the results. But before I leave the point let me refer to one statement of the hon. Finance Minister. After going through his calculation—no, I am not right in saying that—after giving us the results of his calculation, the mode of which he did not lay on the Table and was not able to explain, he came to the conclusion that he had reduced the taxation $1,600,000, and then made the astonishing statement, that such a reduction of taxation was proof positive that the old National Policy no longer exists.

Well, Sir, in 1891 the National Policy tariff rate was 31.38 per cent. I had the pleasure of revising the tariff in 1891, and in 1892 the tariff was not 31.38, but 29.64 per cent, or a reduction of 1.74 per cent. I never imagined that because there was a reduction of 1.74 in the rate of taxation the old National Policy had been done away with, nor did hon. gentlemen opposite who were not of my way of thinking. On the contrary they berated us for not having given any fair measure of reduction and insisted that we had retained the National Policy and its objectionable principle of protection.

I was going on to say that the device of the preferential cut of 25 per cent was a deceptive device. I am not going to say that it was meant to be deceptive, but I do say, and I can prove it, I think, that it was thoroughly deceptive in this country and in foreign countries as well. A man may take the general tariff and say technically it means thus and so, and he may be correct, but the comments on and the interpretation of that tariff, as given by hon. gentlemen opposite here and in the old country, are very different from the technical meaning and working of the tariff. What did happen? Upon certain British manufactures, where the British have the call of this market, my hon. friend before he made this 25 per cent cut, was careful to raise the taxation, so that instead of giving to the English manufacturers one-quarter of a reduction in the duties, he gave them but one-twelfth to one-eighth of a reduction on the old duties and not one-quarter.

On cotton fabrics, printed, dyed and coloured, the old rate of duty, against which hon. gentlemen opposite inveighed so often, was 30 per cent. Before the British manufacturer could be allowed a chance with his 25 per cent preference, the duties were raised to 35 per cent. So the duty the British manufacturer has to pay in the end is 26½ per cent, as against 30 per cent under the old tariff, which is a cut, not of one-fourth, but of barely one-eighth. Cotton clothing was raised in the same way from 32½ per cent to 35 per cent; curtains and fancy goods from 30 per cent to 35 per cent; damask of linen and goods of that class from 25 per cent to 30 per cent. In this last case, the present duty paid by the British manufacturer is 22½ per cent, a reduction of only 2½ per cent as compared with the old tariff, which is not a reduction of one-quarter, but barely of one-twelfth. Linseed oil, formerly 20 per cent, was raised to 25 per cent; woollen worsted fabrics, from 30 per cent to 35 per cent; carpets, Brussels and tapestry, from 30 per cent to 35 per cent. If you examine the Trade and Navigation Returns you find that Britain's strong point as regards exportation to this country lies in these lines of goods almost exclusively; and on these the duty was raised before the mother country was allowed to feel the throb of the generous heart of her Canadian daughter. This was not the case with regard to the cousin to the other side of us. I wonder if my hon. friend, when he stated the other day that one reason why the preference had not been more successful in bringing British goods here was that the British manufacturer was too busy to look after markets, really considered what he was saying. Why, what a boy's reason that was. I wonder if he has read the remark made by Mr. Courtney yesterday in a speech in the British House of Commons. Mr. Courtney, one of the ablest men in the British Parliament and an authority on trade and financial questions, in his place in the House made a most significant declaration, to the effect that a menace to Great Britain greater than any menace of war was the competition of the United States with Great Britain in coal and iron. That is a most significant statement. That does not mean merely that there are two products in which the United States has a chance to get ahead of Great Britain. It goes infinitely wider and deeper than that. For upon the comparative cheapness of coal and iron depends almost inevitably the commercial supremacy of that country. That is why Mr. Courtney used the strong expression he did. Well, Sir, while that competition is going on between the United States and Great Britain in coal and iron and the products which are made with coal and iron, hon. gentlemen were more generous to the United States than they are to Great Britain. Before the mother country could get a taste of our generosity, the dish had to be elevated; but the cousin was given the big cuts. Our cousins on the other side already had the advantage of contiguity; but in products of iron, notably, in which the United States is the great competitor of Great Britain, the still greater benefit was given them of a reduction of duties. And Canadian labourers must contribute to pay the increase of bounties which are meant to compensate—though they never can do it—the home producer for this cut of duty that was made in favour of the United States iron merchants and manufacturers in this market. Contiguity, cheapness of transportation, the quickness with which you can give an order and have it filled—these things give a tremendous advantage to the United States producers over those of Great Britain. Take the mere consideration of the quickness with which you can give an order and have it filled, and this of itself must send many an order to the United States rather than to Great Britain. All these things go to show how deceptive this 25 per cent preference business was. The Finance Minister did not guard himself as well as he should in the impression he conveyed to the country. He gave the impression in this House the other day, and through the newspaper press the idea is being carried to every part of the country, that the 25 per cent reduction to the preferential country—Great Britain, to wit—acted as a second reduction beyond the general tariff reduction which was made. Now, is this the case or is it not? Let me read you some figures which will bear upon that point, and which I think will show that the idea that upon many lines of imports the preferential cut of 25 per cent acts in the least degree as a help to further reduce the tariff—which my hon. friend said he reduced and which he did reduce to a certain extent—is quite illusory. I have here a long list of goods, showing the proportion in which these goods come from Great Britain and from non-preferential countries. These figures will show that in the majority of cases their preference has not the least effect in the line indicated by the Finance Minister.

Of the third column it may be said that in nearly every case it includes no other preferential goods except those from Great Britain, given in the second column. The exceptions are an item of $6,000 in iron and steel, $260,000 in case of sugars, $3,000 in vegetables, $2,000 in woods, and $17,000 in green and ripe fruits.

Mr. FOSTER.

That is simply a list of imports into this country, showing the great disparity between the supply from Great Britain and preferential countries, and the supply from the non-preferential countries, and conclusively proving that, so far as these are concerned, the 25 per cent preference reduction has little or no effect at all upon lowering the prices. Well, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance did something else. He not only had the effect of good crops, good prices, and extra development to make a buoyant revenue, he not only added to that by reducing the taxation as little as possible, but he also, with the other hand, placed on an extraordinary taxation. That has been almost lost sight of by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the country. He did not come down and reduce even his general tariff, by which he says he diminished the taxes by $1,600,000; he did not even attempt to do that without, on the other hand, laying on more than that amount of extra taxation—that is, if he had got what he proposed to get. What additional taxation did he lay on? Customs duty, 15 cents a gallon on liquors; excise duty, 20 cents a gallon on distilled liquors; cigarettes, $1 a thousand; cut tobacco, 5 cents a pound; manufactured tobacco, 10 cents; raw leaf, 10 and 14 cents, according as it was stemmed or unstemmed. But, Sir, the most deceptive portion of all—and here, I think, I have fair ground to find fault with the hon. gentleman—he came to this House with a plenitude of revenue, with his increase of taxation, out of which he proposed to get $1,700,000; he took that, he passed another year, the revenue became buoyant by millions of dollars; then this hon. gentleman came down and played upon the sympathies of the House and of the country—in what way, Sir? By appealing to this country to extend a helping hand to the West India Islands, our sister colonies in the West India Islands. After expressing his sympathy for them, how did he propose to help the people of the West India Islands? He looked over the field, the only way he could do, the one way was by giving them a preferential on their raw sugar; consequently, he proposed that Canada, out of sympathy and good will, should help the West Indian colonies by giving them 25 per cent of a preferential cut on the raw sugars which they might send into this country. He did not impose that for the sake of taxation; I call hon. gentlemen opposite to witness whether he did or not. When I taxed him with the view that he would find, probably, that the West Indies could take but scant advantage of the preference, and, that it would operate to increase the taxation, he admitted that it might do so, but what he did that for was to help the West Indian planter, to extend a helping hand to the West Indian sister colonies. Day before yesterday, in this House and before this country, he acknowledged that it had had absolutely no effect at all. Why had it had absolutely no effect at all? He explained it to us, day before yesterday: Because the effect of the United States tariff was such that it gave a countervailing duty of 25 per cent, or a little more, on West Indian raws; consequently, this was of no use to the West Indian producer, and the statistics show that it has been of no use. Did not the hon. Minister of Finance know, last year, when he proposed that preferential, that on certain sugars the United States tariff allowed a countervailing compensation, equivalent to, or a little more than, the difference he was giving? If he did not know it he should have known it. It was on the statute-book of the United States then as it is on the statute-book of the United States now. Did my hon. friend not know it, and did he attempt to help the West Indians in this generous way out of error? He does know it now; let him cease unletting the taxpayers of this country in $500,000 of extra taxation put upon them under false pretenses—I can use no milder word. This House would have met him in a different spirit if he had come down after adding $1,700,000 of taxation by other means and asked to put another half a million of dollars of taxation on sugars; but, he appealed to the sympathy of the House to aid the West Indian colonists and the country and the House acceded to his plea at a time when he knew—if he did not know it was a most culpable mistake—that the 25 per cent would have absolutely no effect at all in helping the West Indies; but what it would do, would be to saddle $500,000 of extra taxation upon the sugar consumers of this country, and that is what it is doing to-day. These then are some of the reasons, and very good reasons, for the buoyant revenue that the hon. Minister of Finance tells us about. But that it is due to his tariff policy, or his lack of policy, is an argument of a different kind and one which he will find it difficult to affirm.

Well, Sir, we will come now to the increase in trade, a most gratifying increase in the trade of Canada, particularly gratifying in so far as it takes the line of an increase in exports, and an increase of exports, to a very large extent, to the mother country. All of us are gratified by that, but, really are we not honest and fair-minded enough to rather discount the statement, made by the hon. Minister of Finance, that it is only within two years that the producers of this country have turned their attention to the British market? Do we not know that ten, and, yes, twelve years ago, the producers of this country began to turn their attention to the British market, that the Government of this country began to turn its attention towards exploiting the British market, and that when we were refused fair reciprocity with the United States, when we were met by their high tariffs, we immediately said that Canada would seek other markets in the mother country, and Canada has sought other markets. Has my hon. friend discovered cheese amongst his other discoveries? Was cheese not known, at all, until this tremendous policy, three years ago, dawned upon the British world? It seems to me that we exploited the British market for cheese and had absolutely established ourselves there against all comers long before this hon. gentleman came to be Finance Minister, and long before his policy was promulgated in this country. In reference to bacon and hams, I wonder if the pork producers of this country and the farmers did not wait upon the Liberal-Conservative Government long years ago. The Liberal-Conservative Government did two things. In the first place, it raised the tariff against the American producer in order that our producers should have the vantage ground of the home production and the home supply, as far as possible, to assist them on strengthened and broadened lines to reach out for the market in Great Britain, and from that time, Sir, to the present time, there has been a steady increase in the exports of ham, bacon and pork products to the old country. It seems to me that that market was discovered before my hon. friend became Minister of Finance of this country. But he plumes himself upon the tremendous progress in the export trade, and that would have gone perfectly well if he had not made the assertion that it was caused by his policy. Will the House attend to just a few figures; they are very brief. If you take the trade exports of 1898, of home produce, and that is of account, and compare them with those of 1896, where my hon. friend shows a total export of $33,000,000 worth, I will show five articles which mean more than this whole $33,000,000 worth and I am bold to say that when they are read out, not a man in this House, in his heart, will feel that the policy of this Government has had the least to do with any one of them. What has the tariff policy of this Government to do with the extraordinary development in mining in British Columbia, in Ontario and to a certain extent in Nova Scotia? Yet I find that of the mine there has been exported $6,500,000 worth more in 1898 than in 1896, of animals and their products $7,800,000 worth more, of agricultural products $19,000,000 worth more, and manufactures, $1,300,000 more, taking $34,500,000 of an increase in these four products, more than the whole increase in exports, because some other articles of export have fallen off rather than increased. Now, in the name of common sense, what effect has the policy of my hon. friend, the nine-months' policy, as he put it yesterday, giving him the advantage of the whole thing, of a twelve or fifteen months' policy, what presumable, possible, influence has it had on the exports of agricultural products for the years 1897 and 1898? Every seed from which these have grown must have been planted, or, at least, well matured before the policy of the Government had begun to have any effect. What effect has that policy had upon the exportation of animals during these two years to Great Britain, animals which must have been well advanced in years, comparatively speaking, before my hon. friend's nine-months' policy ever saw the light; certainly the animals had the advantage of him in that respect. Eighteen months, or twenty-seven months from this, he might grow up some cattle which might be claimed as the result of his policy; time alone will settle that.

Mr. FOSTER.

But whilst we are glad that our exports are increasing, whilst we hope that they may increase more and more, do not let us lose sight of some other facts:

Lest we forget; lest we forget.

Do not let us lose sight of the fact, that our exports may not always remain so buoyant; that during the eight months of this present year, the products of the mines have decreased in export by $1,400,000; that animals and their products have increased only $700,000, whilst agricultural products have fallen off $8,000,000 and whilst taking the whole exportation for these eight months, there is a falling off of $9,000,000 worth as compared with the eight months of the preceding year. Do not let us forget either, that whilst these exports are falling off, the increase is going on in imports amounting to $16,500,000 in the same time.

What one sees in looking over the four years just past is this: A largely increased export of farm and mine produce, and that is gratifying, but one finds further, a large and increasing tendency to buy more from the United States and to buy less from Great Britain, and to sell more to Great Britain and less to the United States.

If we take the year 1896, the home produce exports to Great Britain we find were $62,700,000; in 1897 they were $69,500,000, and in 1898 they were $93,000,000. But we sold to the United States $43,600,000 in 1897, and only $38,900,000 in 1898.

Our imports from Great Britain in 1896 were $32,900,000, whilst the imports from Great Britain in 1897-98 on an average were only $30,900,000.

But, on the other hand, our imports from the United States were $58,000,000 in 1896, $61,000,000 in 1897, and $78,700,000 in 1898.

Take it in another form. The percentage of the dutiable goods we imported from Great Britain in 1896 was 36.24; in 1897, 30.53, and in 1898 it was only 30.23.

Of free goods, the percentage from Great Britain in 1896 was 22.19; in 1897 it was 22.73, and in 1898 it had gone down to 18.35.

The total percentage of imports from Great Britain in 1896 was 31.15; in 1897, 27.58, and in 1898, 24.78.

Now, that is not gratifying to us as Canadians, and it is not gratifying to the people of Great Britain either. When we go to the United States we find an exactly different operation in process.

The percentage of dutiable goods in 1896 from the United States was 43.28; in 1897, 46.03; in 1898, 51.00.

The percentage of free goods from the United States in 1896 was 64.07; in 1897, 65.69; in 1898, 71.13. The total percentage of imported goods from the United States was, in 1896, 50.30; in 1897, 53.48; and in 1898, 59.24 per cent.

There is one way in which that strikes the observer. For instance, take the last year. We held here, we will say, in our hands, goods, the produce of Canada, which we transferred to Great Britain, and Great Britain put up $93,000,000 as payment for these goods. We took in goods $32,000,000 from Great Britain, and we called upon her to pay cash to the amount of $61,000,000. Now, I am not going to say this is a fine calculation. It is a rough calculation; there are other things which enter into it, but that is a rough and instructive way of looking at it.

Now, let us look at the United States. We held in our hands certain produce which we handed over to the United States, and the United States put up $38,000,000 to hold these goods. But we bought from the United States $78,000,000 of goods. That is, we had to pay in cash over to the United States $40,000,000 more than the United States paid us for our goods. How does it stand? In that rough and ready calculation we are the middlemen standing here, and in last year's transactions we took in balances $61,000,000 of British gold, and handed $40,000,000 of it over to the United States.

You may refine on that calculation as much as you please, but there is the skeleton and basis of a fact which is not very gratifying to either Canadians or to the British people, a fact which deserves study, and which no amount of small and cheap talk about the policy of a preference will ever get away with. What else are we doing? Take our iron manufactures imported from the United States, and we find they are increasing rapidly. What does it mean? It means that when we pay ten or eleven millions of dollars out for hardware and iron, to the United States, we are paying out nearly $10,000,000 for what we might produce in this country ourselves, and it means that we are under this competition with a cheaper producer which menaces Great Britain with worse than war. We are paying out under our low tariff, to the United States, money for manufactured goods, the labour to make up which should be employed in our own country and should live in our own country. That retards our industries; the industries which we as Conservatives are bound to protect; the industries, which gentlemen opposite, have at the long last, undertaken as a settled policy, to protect in this country.

What else are we not doing? We have not opened up a new market to one dollar's worth of goods in the last two years since these gentlemen have been in power. We have had a market closed against us by the higher percentage of duty, in some of the sister colonies in the West Indies, notwithstanding the helping hand we held out to them; and we have practically destroyed our trade in important particulars with Germany where it was growing, and where it promised to be productive and remunerative. These are the results of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They are worth thinking over; at least I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to take them as a sort of a sedative to keep down this extraordinary and too great sparkle, that is apt to be produced by the glittering generalities of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) and his policy. They are worthy of serious consideration.

My hon. friend spoke about preferential trade. Our hon. friends are always merry, when they talk of us as critics. They have three lines. They say: Before we came into power, you declared that we were going to destroy all the industries of the country. Yes, and what was our basis for declaring it? Our inherent faith in the utterances of the public men of Canada; and anybody knows, that, if you were to gather, collate and spread abroad the statements made by the prominent men of the party sitting opposite to me, for five years previous to the election, no thinking man could come to any other conclusion than that, if they came into power, the days of protection were numbered; and, if the days of protection were numbered, then I say, the industries of this country, which count for so much, would have been ruined. That they find a weak point in our criticism in that respect, hon. gentlemen opposite must entirely attribute to their own utter lack of faith and utter lack of honour in keeping the pledges they made to the country—pledges which were borne by the oldest of them for the last fifteen or twenty years of their public life, and which they never recanted until they took office and tasted of its sweets. They say: When we first brought our tariff down, you declared that it would destroy the industries of this country. So we did—why? Because of the tariff which they first brought down. What was that tariff? It was a tariff which made distinctly more cuts in the National Policy than the tariff which they ultimately put through. They changed that tariff in important particulars; they changed it wisely; but Sir, there was appended to that first tariff of theirs, taken in connection with the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite—what? A reciprocal arrangement for all the world; and I stand here to state, that, if in good faith they had carried out that reciprocal arrangement with the world, and had granted it to the United States of America, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed me it was their intention to do, although it was a little longer way round, if they had put the United States and all other countries in the world upon a preference of 25 per cent or more, as against the manufacturers of this country, the industries of this country would have been largely destroyed. I dare say, that hon. gentlemen opposite will be found to be hardy enough to rise in their places and declare, that they never intended any such thing. I have the exact utterance of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have better than that—no, not better than that; but I have another which I think it will be well to read. I do not generally hold my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) responsible for what he says; but in this case, being a matured opinion, and one which he had often given expression to, I venture to quote it—not because it is stronger than that of other hon. gentlemen, but because I do not think I have quoted it before. In that debate, when we said to them: This cannot go into operation, because of certain treaties, and you will not be able to give the preference—when we criticised them on these lines, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made this statement:

Any gentleman who sat here and listened to that resolution as it was explained by the Minister of Finance, knows that it was intended to be an offer of reciprocal trade to any country which would accept the conditions embodied in the resolution. It was not confined to one country more than another.

Well, we found out afterwards, as the hon. gentlemen themselves did, that they were not able to carry out that broad idea of the Liberal, that you should trade with the whole world, if the whole world will trade with you; and I take exception to the statement made by the Minister of Finance yesterday. He said that they had given Great Britain a preference of one-eighth, but that, owing to the action of the British Government, the British people could not enjoy it. The action of the British Government! What action would my hon. friend have the British Government take? The action outlined when he stood up here as the exponent of the fiscal policy, and, in the Parliament of Canada, a loyal colony of Great Britain, proposed to legislate against solemn and binding treaties? Did he mean that that Government should take the same action, and say to the European powers with whom they had made those treaties: Canada has adopted this tariff, and we are going to carry it out; it makes no difference to us whether there is a treaty or not? My hon. friend would have us suppose that the British Government had obstinately interfered. Great Britain did what Great Britain alone could do in honour and good faith. She said: Whilst this may be a privilege to me, I refuse to take it until we can remove the obstacle of these treaties: they must be given their time to run out, and in the meantime the countries which have them must have the reciprocal advantages bargained for in these treaties. That was the action Great Britain took. That was not the action my hon. friend took; but, when he took such action as he did, it would have been far better that he had not talked of the British Government as he did yesterday, saying that it was by their action that they were precluded from getting the preference. It was because there was an insuperable bar that could only be got out of the way by one method, and that the honest method, the British Government took.

We have had these different phases presented by hon. gentlemen opposite; and, when a man presents a certain phase to you, you can only argue with him on that phase. The first phase was that presented by my hon. friend who leads the Government, and was advocated for five or six years in this country—unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and discrimination against Great Britain. We had to criticise them on that point. The country taught them a lesson upon it, and they abandoned it, when they had to. Then Mr. Laurier, as he was at that time, took the ground, before the electorate of this country and prior to the election, that he was in favour of preferential trade—that is, preferential trade as it was known all over this country. He explained the matter clearly in London. He showed what advantage it would be to Canada, if we could only get true preferential trade, and he pledged himself, on his honour as a public man and as the leader of a party, that he believed in that doctrine, and that, when he came into power, he would go to London and try to obtain it. The next phase we had was the Government's proposed policy of reciprocal trade open to all the world, with the idea of travelling around as speedily as possible to the United States of America. After that, we had the policy as modified by the treaties; and for a year or two preference was carried out to almost every nation. Now we have the last phase, and it is the very last phase which hon. gentlemen contemplated. They began business with their settled policy of trading with every country that would trade with us on certain conditions. They went through all these transformations, and at the end what did they want to do? They wanted still to trade with all countries that would trade with us on a reciprocal basis, when Mr. Chamberlain put his foot down and told these hon. gentlemen that, if they wanted to give a preference to Great Britain, the only way they could do it was by discriminating against every other country in favour of Great Britain. This is a phase of the policy which in the end differed entirely from what the hon. gentleman intended, and it was simply the product of compulsion—compulsion and blundering combined. How has it worked out? The results are these, that in dutiable imports of merchandise from Great Britain—and that is what counts—merchandise and its dutiable imports for home consumption, in 1895 and 1896, there was an average of $23,900,000 sent in by Great Britain. After two years of the present Administration that has fallen to $21,300,000, an actual decrease of $2,600,000, on the average of those two years, as compared with the average of the two preceding years. Now, there has been great expansion in trade, and Great Britain should have had her share of that expansion, whether under a preferential tariff or not. But what do we find? We find that Great Britain, instead of sharing in that increase, and with the assistance of the preferential tariff, has actually seen her trade with this country decrease from $24,300,000 in 1896 to $22,500,000 in 1898. Whilst from 1895 to 1896, just as we were getting on the up-grade, Great Britain showed $1,100,000 larger imports to this country. Taking dutiable and free goods—the average in the two years of these gentlemen's administration is $30,700,000 against $31,900,000 in the two previous years, or a decrease of $1,200,000. In the six months of this nine months' old bantling, as was stated in the British House of Commons, commencing August 1st and ending January 31st, being the six months of complete preference so-called, what was the increase? It was 1 per cent exactly, in British goods. In a period of expansion, when the whole world was enjoying a buoyancy in trade and progress in every direction, Great Britain was shorn of her natural increase, and even with this preference, made simply an increase of 1 per cent in that time.

But a worse record is here. Last night there was put in my hands a paper from which I cull this result, that in the three months of January, February and March, just past, the exports from Great Britain to Canada decreased by £72,845 sterling, or 7½ per cent, and that Canada's imports into Great Britain have decreased by £189,187 sterling or 17.59 per cent. This was the state of things during the eight full months of the working of the preferential tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite.

How has that preference acted as regards British Guiana and the British West Indies? With British Guiana, 70 per cent has measured the falling off in trade, and 33 per cent has been the actual falling off in the imports from the British West Indies.

These, then, are the reasons why my hon. friend felt that he had to apologize. True, he said it has not done all that he should have done. But why? Because the Englishman is too busy to bother with Canada. Another reason the hon. gentleman gave was that England did not make what we want. Another reason was that the English merchants would not trade with us unless Canadian merchants went over there and did the trading. But, says the Finance Minister, we have touched the heart of John Bull. It is not the heart of John Bull, Mr. Speaker, that wants touching in trade matters. It is the material essence of trade that he is after. Our Finance Minister says that he still looks for a preference from England, but is not going to get it by bulldozing, but by kindness.

An hon. MEMBER. Sunny ways.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. This is the first example of that preferential treatment which has been accorded in small doses to British Guiana and the British West Indies and Great Britain, and it has not eventuated yet except in a larger percentage of trade with the United States and a smaller percentage with these British countries. I think I did mention Mr. Innes' apple labels. I was disputing in my own mind as to what it was that caught the eye of the British consumer—whether it was the ingenious label that Mr. Innes had devised or the good feeling for which the Minister of Finance takes credit. For this 20 per cent increased immigration I had supposed that the very large expenditures made by the Minister of the Interior might have some credit; but the Minister of Finance is selfish in this respect, and takes away from his colleagues all the benefit of that increase as the result of his labours and attributes it entirely to the tariff policy of the Government.

Now, a word with regard to reciprocity, and I shall be very brief. The first thing my hon. friend did was what Ministers, lay ministers, so to speak, sub-ministers, have in an unhappy fashion of doing with my hon. friend who leads the Government. They undertake to completely snub him and call him down on every occasion. The right hon. leader of the Government made a most astounding statement here a week or two ago in which he declared that he had now come to the conclusion that Canada did not want and practically did not need reciprocity. I noticed a shiver running over the face of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and it speedily communicated itself to the representative of the maritime provinces; and so my hon. friend the Minister of Finance took early occasion to say:

The Prime Minister, in a recent speech, appeared to say that Canada no longer wanted reciprocity. Perhaps that statement was a little stronger than some of my hon. friends would like. There never was a time when reciprocity was not desirable.

I trust that my hon. friend who leads the Government may take the hint, or he may find some kicking on the part of the Finance Minister and some others who have not yet lost their faith in reciprocity, or else desire not to completely abandon the ground they have been taking for the last eighteen years. Well, Sir, the reciprocity negotiations were fatally handicapped by these hon. gentlemen, and in a most unbusiness-like way. If they ever desired to be in a position to go to the United States and negotiate a treaty, they took the very best means possible of defeating their efforts beforehand. From 1896 down to 1895 my right hon. friend and his colleagues went about this country declaring that the salvation of Canada depended upon her entrance into the markets of the United States, and that they were willing to go to the extent of discriminating against England in order to get that privilege. My right hon. friend staked his own word in Boston to his American friends that when his party got into power, their very first effort would be to put the United States on a better footing with Canada in reference to commercial matters. No man who had the hope and was serious in the desire of going to the United States to advocate the negotiation of a treaty would ever have so seriously handicapped himself. These gentlemen, on obtaining office, at once rushed through their tariff and made reductions in favour of the United States on most important articles—the very ones on which the United States desired to have reductions. What could the United States wish more than to have a reduction on than their product of corn, 19,000,000 bushels of which came from that country to this in 1898, a portion to be exported, but a large portion to be consumed in this country. We ventured to warn the right hon. gentleman on that corn business. We ventured to point out that on a very small amount would the distillers pay the duty of 7½ per cent after he admitted corn free for other purposes, but the Minister of Customs said, there will be no difficulty about that. I asked the Finance Minister what he expected to get from the duty on corn for distillation, and he replied, $60,000, at least. What has he got? A little less than $15,000. Some 200,000 bushels paid duty. What better thing can Americans wish to have on the free list than binder twine which they manufacture, than barbed wire and than iron products, in which they are the great competitors with Great Britain in the neutral markets of the world, while their contiguity with us gives them a decided advantage in this market. On these large reductions were made, and the taxpayers of Canada were burdened to make compensation to the iron producers of this country. Thus corn was let in, offering an immense market to United States producers and paying freights to their railways which handle the corn in its transport to this country. Then, having handicapped themselves in so many ways, these gentlemen went down to the people to whom they had given the most of what they wanted, and said: Now, let us sit down and negotiate a treaty. And what has it ended in? In nothing. These hon. gentlemen know as well as they know that they are sitting there that they can make no treaty with the United States of any breadth at all as regards trade, if they persist in keeping the discrimination of preference with the great competitor of the United States, Great Britain, in this market. They have now tied themselves to the British preference, and it is impossible for them to go back upon it. It would be a sorry thing for this country if they should go back upon it in favour of any reciprocity they could get with the United States.

Lastly, there is to be no change in the tariff. Well, Sir, the Napoleon from the west was right, after all. He forced their hand. There was a bit of a row about it; a row in the North-west; a row in British Columbia; a row nearer the seat of Government.

Mr. FOSTER.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) did not take back his utterance; Napoleonic in everything else, he was Napoleonic in his explanation. It was not, he said, that the Liberals had moved forward, but it was that the Liberal-Conservatives had gone back—they had not come to meet us in the line of protection, but we had gone back to meet them on the line of revenue tariff and free trade. And this is the revenue tariff and free trade they have introduced. Well, Sir, we can only come to one conclusion, and that is that the question of protection for the industries of this country is settled and settled for many a year to come. And it is settled in accordance with the long-time conviction and battle-tryed standards of the Liberal-Conservative party. The victory for protection was won from sturdy and doughty opponents who fought toe to toe and point to point every inch of the ground, who did not give up that for which they contended until they were overwhelmed, not by the arguments of the party opposed to them merely, but by the intelligence, the public spirit, the aspirations, the very necessities of this country, which they found to be like a wall of adamant in their way, through which they could not pierce with their doctrines of free trade and tariff for revenue only to the destruction of the life and the hope and the energies of this country. The long tariff battle is settled in favour of protection; and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will stand shoulder to shoulder with hon. gentlemen on the other side to keep the line of protection intact, to make that line still stronger where, to-day, it is not so strong as it ought to be for the benefit of the industries of Canada. This side of the House will not renounce its principles because it is in Opposition. Before it came into power in 1878, it took its political life in its hand, and went to the country declaring the principles to which it committed itself. It triumphed in the country, and when it came back it embodied its principles, it embalmed its pledges in the statute-books of the country. It proposes to work on that line so long as it is a party—true to its principles, true to its traditions, true to what has proved by actual facts, by actual results, to be the stay and hope of progress of this Dominion of Canada.

But what did hon. gentlemen come in to do? They came into curse, and lo, they have blessed. They came to destroy, and lo, they have been compelled to build up in some instances and to destroy as little as possible. But other things they came in to do. They came in to lower taxation; they have raised it $5,300,000. They came in to lower expenditure; they have raised it $10,000,000. They came in to stop an increase of the debt; the debt is going up despite the immense surpluses and buoyant revenue; the debt is going up notwithstanding that, whatever they may say, they are not making larger expenditures on canals and railways than we made during the last five or six years of our term of office. They came in to destroy protection; they have embraced it. They came in to purify and elevate public life; let the promise that Langelier held in his pocket which was signed by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself and by means of which he was dragooned into the voting for what he did not like for two sessions in this House—let that promise testify to the purity that the right hon. gentleman has introduced into public life. And let the fact that when Langelier would stand it no longer and kicked, the right hon. gentleman joined to his extraordinary view as to the way of purifying public life that most deplorable weakness—lack of courage—for either he should have implemented his promise at first or he should have backbone enough to let the man kick and refuse to implement that promise if there was reason for refusing. He was going to purify public life and prevent the virus of bribery from spreading among the electorate, but he sent a letter, signed by himself, to Mr. Migneault, a member of Parliament, and Mr. Migneault read it to the electors, promising to subsidize certain roads that ran through several contested counties. That is the way the right hon. gentleman takes to purify public life. Purify public life! There have been gentlemen sitting behind him put upon his committees to do his bidding, men who knew just as well what their reward would be if they did "right" as though they had that reward already in their hands. They did what they were expected to do, and they have got their reward. I assert what I have asserted before, that no worse poison could be spread abroad in the atmosphere of our public life than for men of the highest position to show the electorate that they do not propose to carry out the promises they make when in Opposition. If you can bribe the whole electorate with the gold of a public man's promise and then when you have got into position refuse to redeem your promise, how far-reaching is corruption like that, as compared with the mere use of money here or there given to a poor elector to pay for his vote. But these things now, under the new philosophy, do not count. The Bourassian philosophy has been introduced the Bourassian method has become current. Now it is to be recognized in Liberal politics that consistency does not mean consistency; that if a man promises to do a thing this very moment and if, two minutes afterwards, he is minded not to do it, or to do another thing, he has been consistent both times, he has worked according to his intention; and the plaudits that that peculiar philosophy received from hon. gentlemen opposite, and the way in which my right hon. friend left the front seat and went back to congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the introduction of that brand new political philosophy of his, showed how greatly it was in accord with his own heart.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much for having listened to me for this length of time. Let me say to you, in conclusion, that the Liberal-Conservative party, if I can speak for them, this whole country through are heartily glad to endorse the statement that we are passing through a period of prosperity in Canada as great, if not greater, than any it has ever enjoyed. Why should it not be so? Canada has been making great sacrifices to become ready to meet favouring opportunities in the development of her most wonderful resources. She has spent her money like water, and without grumbling; she has faced a future often which looked dark indeed, as it did in those times of 1883, and staked her all upon the throw for the future in this country. She has come out of a period of sectional differences, to a large extent, she has welded herself into the condition of a grand and united body. She is just beginning to find out the depth, the extent, the boundless nature of the resources which she possesses. Her men have the moral calibre, they have the mental power, they have the push, and the vigour, and the vivacity, to make of this country what it ought to be. And, thank God! since hon. gentlemen opposite have exchanged the seats of Opposition for the seats of Government, this whole country now is pretty nearly a unit for independent Canadian development. So far as I am concerned, as one member of the Opposition, I willingly forego any of the toils of official life. I would willingly forego many years of the toils of official life, just to bring that large and, at heart, pretty good section of the people of Canada known as old-time Grits and Liberals—just to translate them out of the despondency in which 18 years of Opposition had thrown them, which had brought them to the very verge of a smarting discontent well-nigh akin to treasonable thoughts. Their success at the polls has clothed them in their right minds, made them strong Canadians, willing to buckle on the armour and fight the competitive battle against the United States of America, willing to go out into this broad world of empire building with Canadian pluck, and hope and energy, and fight the battle of the nations, than which no nobler battle can ever be fought. Though we may differ in minor points, though we may differ in party politics, I am bound to hope that now, under the favourable influence of office, hon. gentlemen opposite may speedily take on the consistency of thorough Canadians, may so fortify themselves that even in coming opposition days they will not easily slide again into those cold and frosty regions of discontent, and that we are now approaching that period when both parties in Canada, the Liberal-Conservative party from long conviction, the Liberal party from the comfortable feeling that power always gives them, added to their better impulses, will become strong, loyal and united Canadians.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, the speech to which we have just listened from the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), whom I regret not to see in his place, on the present occasion, was, as might have been expected from that hon. gentleman, well worthy of an exceedingly clever advocate, but, like a good many other speeches which that hon. gentleman has delivered in former times and on similar subjects, while I am quite willing to admit that he spoke as a clever advocate would speak from his brief, I regret to say that, as on former occasions, it was marked with a great lack of knowledge of his subject. Perhaps, in his closing remarks, the hon. gentleman gave as good an illustration as could well be imagined of the exceedingly small attention that he chose to bestow on the subject in hand, in so far as dealing with facts was concerned. The House will recollect that the hon. gentleman took occasion to read us a lecture on the score that we had admitted corn free into this country, and, among other things, the hon. gentleman stated that we had actually admitted last year the enormous amount of 19,000,000 bushels of corn into Canada. He went on to say—I took down his words with care—that the great majority of this vast quantity of corn was consumed in this country. Now, for his first statement the hon. gentleman had good authority; he had consulted the Trade and Navigation Returns, which show that 19,700,000 bushels of corn were entered for consumption in Canada. But, as usual, he had forgotten to turn over a few pages, or he would have learnt that, of the 19,700,000 bushels of corn imported into Canada for consumption, 14,332,000 bushels were exported from Canada. I do not know whether any of the hon. gentleman's friends will champion the hon. gentleman's statement that 5,300,000 is the great majority of 19,700,000. That was one of the new lights that the hon. gentleman has shed on the subject, and had he consulted the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), or had he consulted the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), he would have learnt that the 5,300,000 bushels of corn that remained in Canada were subsequently re-exported in the shape of Canadian beef and Canadian cheese. And he might have learnt or he might have known that all parties, whether they be protectionists or free traders, whom I have ever heard discuss this question, are agreed that, when any article is exported from the country, it is good policy to allow its constituent parts to be imported free, for the simple and self-evident reason that, in this case, you help the Canadian producer of beef and cheese, and the Canadian producer of similar articles, by placing him on a footing of equality with his American competitor in the market of the world, which fixes the price for both. Now, I give that just as an illustration of the carelessness with which the hon. gentleman, himself a Finance Minister of long standing chose to deal with this subject, which, had he taken the trouble to investigate it, he certainly never would have brought the charge against us that it was a matter of grave impolicy on the part of this Government to have permitted the importation of 19,700,000 bushels of corn into this country. As to the hon. gentleman's other argument that we gave away our whole case to the Americans by allowing this huge quantity of 5,300,000 bushels of corn to be imported into Canada, for the benefit of our cattle-raisers, perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that the total production of corn in the United States for the last year for which I have any record, amounted to 2,283,000,000 of bushels. Now, does he or any other hon. gentleman in this House suppose that the American people are likely to be bulldozed by our refusing to admit some 5,000,000 bushels of corn, being exactly one-quarter of 1 per cent of the total quantity produced in that country? The burthen of the hon. gentleman's song appeared to be that the tariff which he had denounced and abused some two years ago, was really after all his own child. After two years he recognizes it, and finding it a thriving and lusty babe, desires to adopt it. Through the whole of the debate on the Address, the air has been filled with charges that we were an extravagant Government, that we were a dishonest Government, that we were an inconsistent Government, that we were a Government of broken pledges and a Government of incompetents. Some of the charges made were very often contradictory and very often absurd; they were sometimes mistaken, and they were always baseless. There may have been occasionally, in respect to some one or two statements made by the hon. gentlemen, some superficial air of truth, but, as I shall presently show, they are utterly and entirely unable to stand investigation.

I desire to inform hon. gentlemen that I am not here for the purpose of apologizing for this Government in any shape or way. It is about the last thing in my mind, now or at any other time. I am here to justify their action. I am here to dispel the slanders that have been levelled at the Government. I am here for the purpose, as far as I know how, of placing the truth before the people, and for the purpose of taking issue at all points with everything said by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I propose, first of all, to deal with a charge which has, perhaps, some little superficial appearance of correctness in itself, and that is the charge that we have been extravagant in the administration of public affairs. I propose to show, Mr. Speaker, that, service for service, we are doing the public work far better and far cheaper than ever it was done before for eighteen years, at least. I propose to show, Sir, that all of the new services which have been inaugurated were well warranted, that they are either fruitful in themselves and return to the public treasury as much money as they take out of it, or that they produce such indirect benefits as to well warrant the Government in making these expenditures. Further, I have to take issue with the hon. gentleman on the question which he raised as to the per capita cost of the administration. I say that, service for service, the cost of our administration per head is much less than under the hon. gentleman himself, and I will also show that the burthens on the people are much less under our administration than they were under his. As to the tariff, I propose to deal with that at a later period, but I may say a word or two now as to the charge of inconsistency which has been freely bandied about from the opposite benches. There is no inconsistency whatever in any hon. gentleman on this side of the House stating that he is not prepared to give to the people now, under the wholly altered condition of things, under wholly new circumstances, the same advice which he would give to them ten or twenty years ago. I admit, Sir, that the advice which I myself would give to a country containing but four millions of people might very well differ from the advice which I would give to a country with something like six millions of people. I admit that the advice I would have to give to a country in which the growth of population had become perfectly stationary over wide areas to a country where there was no real increase of wealth—taking the country all over and taking into account the amount which one section lost in comparison with the amount which another section gained—with the advice which I would give, during a period of rapid growth, when, as our record shows, the income of the people has increased in one single year by about $50,000,000. These are circumstances which warrant and which require, under certain conditions, a different advice and a different policy.

Neither is it true to say that the Liberal party has opposed all outlay. The Liberal party has opposed, and I trust will continue to oppose, all useless outlay; but the Liberal party neither under the administration which I had the honour of being a member twenty years ago, nor under the administration of which I have the honour of being a member now; were ever in principle or in practice opposed to a proper expenditure for proper ends and objects. If the expenditure be demanded by new circumstances, the Liberal party are prepared to grant them. All I ask is, that the House on both sides should judge of each new proposal on its merits. If hon. gentlemen opposite think we are extravagant in any particular vote that we ask for, let these hon. gentlemen rise in their places, let them expose our extravagance, let them divide the House upon it, or let them hold their peace. Sir, there is an underlying absurdity in this whole contention which deserves a word of explanation. There are two ways in which the burdens of any country can be lessened. Which of those two methods are to be adopted depends, as I have said, wholly and entirely on the circumstances in which the country finds itself. One of these methods, if it be possible, is to reduce the expenditure, and that is always desirable when it can be done with advantage to the general weal. That is sometimes necessary, and is especially necessary when a country is in a stationary, or much more, in a retrograde condition. The other mode, and in a new and growing country like this, the better mode, is to apply ourselves, so as to increase the population, so to increase the wealth, so to develop the resources of the country; that we may multiply the number of taxpayers, that we may increase their means, and thereby as effectually reduce the burdens of the people as if we reduced the actual expenditure. It will cost Canada no more if she spends two or three millions additional and has a couple of millions of extra population; on the contrary, it will cost Canada far less than if we were to succeed in reducing the present expenditure by two million dollars, but lose two millions of additional population.

There is a true test of prosperity which ought to be applied in the case of a country like Canada, and it is the only true test of prosperity—as I have said often in Opposition, as well as on this side of the House—the only true test of prosperity in my mind which can be applied to a country in our position. If you want to ascertain whether a country like ours is prosperous, the test is a simple one. You have got to find whether the natives of the country are remaining in it, or whether these foreigners whom you bring to the country continue denizens of it. Apply this test and you have a test which will not deceive you as to whether the country is prospering or not.

Much has been said by these hon. gentlemen opposite as to the marvellous results of the National Policy inaugurated by them. I propose to give this House briefly one or two illustrations of the very remarkable results—applying that particular test—which were evidenced in Canada in the periods from 1871 to 1881, and from 1881 to 1891.

From 1871 to 1881, as every one knows, this country was under a revenue tariff; partly inaugurated by the predecessors of these hon. gentlemen opposite, partly continued by the Liberal party, but to all intents and purposes a revenue tariff. From 1881 to 1891, the people were in full enjoyment of all the blessings of this wonderful National Policy, and I call the attention of the House to the results of those two policies ; applying that test which alone I recognize as the real test in a young country like Canada. I begin with the province of Prince Edward Island, from which my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) beside me comes.

From 1871 to 1881, under a revenue tariff policy, Prince Edward Island increased in population nearly 16 per cent ; from 1881 to 1891, under the beneficent influence of the National Policy, Prince Edward Island did not increase at all. Sixteen per cent to nothing—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) may make out the percentage as he pleases.

In the case of his own province of New Brunswick, from 1871 to 1881, under a revenue policy, the population increased 12½ per cent ; from 1881 to 1891, under the National Policy, it did not increase at all.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, yes ; it did.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I believe I am wrong. It did increase ; it increased 32 persons, and these 32 persons, it may interest the House to know, were wholly represented by the increase of lunatics in the main asylum at St. John, N.B.

In the case of the province of Nova Scotia, from 1871 to 1881, under a revenue tariff, the increase was 13½ per cent ; from 1881 to 1891, under the National Policy, it is said to have increased 2½ per cent, as to which I shall have a word to say later on.

In the province of Quebec, from 1871 to 1881, the increase was 14 per cent ; under the National Policy from 1881 to 1891 it fell to 9½ per cent.

In my own province of Ontario, the increase from 1871 to 1881 was a little over 18 per cent ; from 1881 to 1891, it fell to 9½ per cent, or a little more than half the increase during the previous decade.

Percentages of Increase of Population of the older provinces of the Dominion.

|                        | 1878 to 1881. | 1881 to 1891. |
|------------------------|---------------|---------------|
| Prince Edward Island.. | 15·8          | 0·17          |
| New Brunswick .....    | 12·4          | None.         |
| Nova Scotia .....      | 13·6          | 2·24          |
| Quebec .....           | 14            | 9·53          |
| Ontario .....          | 18            | 9·73          |

If the House want to understand what these figures mean, I will point out to them that the total average of increase in our older provinces was rather less than 8 per cent, while in England and Wales, from 1881 to 1891, the total increase amounted to 11½ per cent—England and Wales increased in population nearly fifty per cent more than Quebec, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. And mark you, all that occurred in spite of the well-known fact, that from England and Wales a great number of immigrants go every year to every country in the world ; while, according to the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, we in the older provinces were receiving a large number of immigrants over and above our own natural growth during that entire period.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

There is another matter connected with that to which I might call the attention of the House while I am about it. I have pointed out the scandalously bad record made by the National Policy from 1881 to 1891 ; I have to add, that there is every reason to believe that bad as that record is, it does not represent the true facts. These hon. gentlemen who were in this House eight or nine years ago, will recollect the exposure made by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), who proved to a demonstration on the floor of this Parliament, that in certain sections of Nova Scotia the very grossest frauds had been committed by counting among the population numbers of people who had not been resident in Nova Scotia for four, five, eight, ten and twelve years. And, I remember right well, when my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) made this statement, when he exposed these frauds ; instead of the Government of the day doing their duty, taking the matter up and investigating it, ascertaining what the real facts were, my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was utterly and entirely refused any further information on the subject. Under these circumstances I am justified in impugning, as I do impugn, the accuracy of the figures recorded, for Nova Scotia at least ; and I believe, if the truth were known, that a very great number of people would have been proved to have been absent from the provinces who were most improperly counted in the census of that time. I speak only of what absolute and unanswerable proof was given of on the floor of this House.

Sir, how stands the case to-day ? It is always difficult to obtain anything like an accurate statement of the increase of population in the periods between the census ; but there is a considerable accumulation of evidence, all of which goes to show that the terrible loss of population which was going on in Canada under the National Policy from 1881 to 1891 is, as the " Mail and Empire " for once truly stated, a thing of the past. Sir, there is reasonably good ground for believing that the people who come to Canada stay here, and that our own native population are remaining here ; and I will give the House presently some incidental proofs of the correctness of that assertion. One important proof of the correctness of our assertion lies in the fact that in the year 1898 the importation of settlers' effects reached the very large sum of $2,828,000, of which about $2,300,000 represented settlers' effects coming through the United States. In the next place, we find, as my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) informs me, that there has been a large and pleasing increase in the number of applications for homesteads, these having risen from about 2,400 in 1896 to about 4,800 in the last year. We are also advised by his agents that without taking into account the number of persons who are known to have settled in the Klondike and elsewhere, the total number of settlers last year amounted to 32,702 souls, of whom we have every reason to believe the enormous majority remained in this country. I have further obtained from the authorities of the Canadian Pacific Railway an interesting statement showing the amount of sales of lands made to actual settlers during the last four or five years, which goes very far to confirm the truth of the assertion which I have made, that population is not only coming here, but is remaining here in vastly greater degree than before. The sales of lands by the Canadian Pacific Railway have been as follows :—

|---------------|---------|
| In 1895 ..... | 55,000  |
| 1896 .....    | 66,000  |
| 1897 .....    | 135,000 |
| 1898 .....    | 242,000 |

Being exactly five times the amount that had been sold in 1895. The Manitoba South-western Colonization Railway records a somewhat similar state of things, the sales from its land grant being as follows :—

|               | Acres.  |
|---------------|---------|
| In 1895 ..... | 5,000   |
| 1896 .....    | 21,000  |
| 1897 .....    | 63,000  |
| 1898 .....    | 106,000 |

Being 21 times as many as they had sold in 1895. Now, Sir, when I add to all that the reports that reach us from almost every quarter of the country tending to show that our people are busy and are remaining here, that they have ceased to emigrate, in any great numbers at any rate, to the United States, I am justified in saying that there is every ground for believing that the growth of population in Canada, since our accession to power, has been at least double or treble what it was in the three or four years previous. As I said, you cannot absolutely estimate these matters until the census is taken; and when it is taken I am aware that we are likely to be handicapped to a very considerable extent by the method in which the census was taken nine or ten years ago. We shall be sufferers from the frauds which my hon. friend exposed; and were it not that, instead of being as extravagant a Government as our hon. friend would indicate, we are desirous, even for our own political advantage, not to expend any public money which we can avoid expending, I would have earnestly desired that a census could have been taken in 1896, so that in 1901 you would have a fair opportunity of judging how the country throve under the respective regimes.

Now, Sir, I come to deal with the main charge preferred by the hon. member for York, that this Government has been guilty of gross extravagance. Sir, I admit that the speech the hon. gentleman made was a very fine specimen of perverted ingenuity, which might be dangerous if not answered; but I do not think anybody who will bestow any serious consideration on the subject can fail to see that I am strictly within my rights when I say that, service for service we are rendering a better and a very considerably cheaper service to the country than our predecessors were able to grant. What is the hon. gentleman's main statement? His main statement is this: We spent, he said, in our last year of office $37,000,000, while you demand $41,500,000, and I think you will probably require more, consequently you are abominably extravagant.

Now, Sir, in the first place, I repeat what my hon. friend the Finance Minister enlarged upon the other evening, that the accounts for 1896 were cooked if any accounts were ever cooked. They were not honest accounts; they were not accounts that were creditable to the ex-Finance Minister or to the Government of which he was a member. How did the hon. gentleman cut down his expenditure from $38,250,000 in 1895 to $37,000,000 in 1896? Sir, the means he took were, mutatis mutandis, precisely the same as if he had turned off every lighthouse-keeper in the St. Lawrence, and after the people of Canada had lost $10,000,000 from wrecks, he had then claimed credit for economy for having saved $300,000 in the cost of lighthouses. What he did was to lay his hands on the militiamen of Canada and refuse to allow them to drill in 1896. What was the result of that? It happened, owing to the illness of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), that I administered that department for several months, and I found in 1897 that the whole militia of Canada had been reduced to a state of disorganization—that whole regiments had been disorganized and might as well have been disbanded, because, as everybody knows, in the great majority of cases, if you deprive the rural battalions of the opportunity of being brought together and drilled for a period of two or three years, which was the result of the hon. gentleman's proceeding, you render all the rest of the militia expenditure absolutely useless. It might as well have been thrown into the sea. What was his other expedient? He insisted in cutting down the public works of the country to such a point that it was impossible to make the necessary repairs to many important public works, so that grievous injury was done to these works all over the country; and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), whom I am sorry not to see in his place to-night, was obliged and will be obliged to expend hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of repairing the mischief that was then done owing to, I cannot call it the economy or the parsimony of the hon. gentleman, but his attempt to force a false balance in 1896. Sir, in 1895 the hon. gentleman spent $38,132,000. I am not going to take his Estimates for 1897, although I might very fairly do so; but I will take his actual expenditure for 1895, and I will compare it, service for service, with the actual expenditure which my hon. friend proposes; and I think when I have done, that the House will admit that I have made good my position that service for service we are giving a better and a cheaper service than hon. gentlemen opposite were able to do. Sir, it is quite true that my hon. friend the Finance Minister asks for $41,500,000 for the services of the year 1900; but it must be remembered that in that there are included a number of services for which there is no corresponding charge whatever to be found in 1895. Of what is the additional sum of $3,300,000 made up? First of all, there are the charges for the Yukon, amounting to $814,000. What have the hon. gentlemen to correspond to these? And these charges, be it remembered, do not inflict one copper of burthen on the people of Canada, thanks to the administration of my hon. friend. What is spent in the Yukon is provided by the Yukon, and Canada bears no share of that burthen.

Next, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has extended and enlarged the canal system, and has greatly extended the Inter-colonial Railway. These additions will amount, I believe, to something like a million dollars more than in 1895, but bear in mind, that he expects to get from this extension of his railway and his canals a sum which will bring whatever deficit there may be within about the same figure as the deficit which was incurred in 1895, and that large sum will, therefore, involve no additional burden on the people, or, at the outside, a very small burden, probably not exceeding $50,000 or $75,000. Then, there is a third item to which the hon. gentleman paid no attention. In 1895 he had to provide a sinking fund of $2,000,000, but we had to provide a sinking fund of $2,419,000, or an additional sinking fund of $419,000. Those three items amount to $2,225,000 at least, and involve no additional burden whatever on the people. The money that is taken out of one side of the account is put into it on the other, because I presume nobody here would imagine that the money expended on the sinking fund, which goes in reduction of the debt, can be charged, in any shape or form, as an additional burden on the people.

There remains the fourth, and an important item, the item of interest on the capital expended by us (less the cost of our special subsidy to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway) in carrying out those engagements which the hon. gentlemen had entered into for the completion of our canals. I do not blame them for having incurred that expense. We have adopted that policy, but, at the same time, they have no right to charge against us, as an addition for which we are responsible on the burdens of Canada, the $358,000, more or less, which represents the interest on the $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 expended since 1895 in the completion of those canals. Deduct those sums from the $41,500,000 which my hon. friend asks, and you will find that there remains to be accounted for by us something like $700,000. For this we are responsible. I admit the responsibility, and I invite the criticism of hon. gentlemen.

Sir, for the first item of that $700,000, I find a charge from my hon. friend here (Mr. Sifton) of $163,000 above the expenditure of 1895 for immigration purposes. And I believe that in his hands, in a very short space of time, the country will admit that no money was ever better spent. I find that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) requires an additional expenditure of $113,000, mostly to be invested in the development of cold storage and other similar projects. I find that, for small subsidies, largely for the benefit of the maritime provinces, we require an additional sum of about $150,000, required mainly in connection with the development of the winter port service. I find that for militia purposes we require an additional sum of $132,000, mainly at the instance of the Imperial authorities, who have demanded a considerable additional expenditure on our part for the purpose of providing a garrison in Esquimalt. If you add to that the fact, that the government of the North-west Territories involves an expenditure of $50,000 more, and that the additional lighthouses require $40,000, you will see where the extra expenditure comes in. If hon. gentlemen opposite disapprove of the expenditure, if they think that these sums ought not to be voted for those particular services, the remedy is in their own hands. Let them denounce those appropriations, when my hon. friend proposes them, and vote against them on the floor of this House. But if they shun, as I believe they will, voting down the militia expenditure, the expenditure on agriculture, the expenditure on immigration, the subsidies to St. John and Halifax to which I have alluded, it does not lie in their mouths to say, that this Government is extravagant in making them.

Now I come to another point raised by the hon. gentleman. He entered into a long per capita computation, and he produced results which differ materially from those my hon. friend produced. I call attention, first of all, to this point. So far as it is possible for us to ascertain the growth of population in 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894 and the greater part of 1895, it was very slow indeed. During most of these years, the exodus continued: during none of them was any considerable immigration coming into Canada; and, so far as my experience goes—and I have watched the movement of population very carefully—I believe that I am within the mark, when I say, that it is doubtful whether our total population in 1895 amounted to 5,000,000. I do not believe our population, during those four or five years, increased one bit faster than in the preceding five years. But after 1895 the situation changed. There is no doubt whatever that a far greater portion of our own people are remaining in Canada than before.

There is no doubt whatever, putting to one side the vagrant population attracted to such places as the Klondike, that a much larger population is coming in than ever before, and I think, in comparing 1895 and 1900, you will be perfectly justified in assuming that an addition of about 100,000 a year will have been made to our population by the close of 1900. However, I give that calculation for what it is worth. My point is this: Deducting the Yukon charges, the railways and canals, the sinking fund and the interest on the expenditure incurred by those hon. gentlemen, for none of which can we be properly held responsible, and none of which is it fair to include in a per capita valuation, you have this result, that, in 1895, 5,000,000 people expended $38,132,000, averaging per capita, $7.62. In 1900, adding these additional services I have referred to—adding immigration, adding agriculture, adding subsidies, adding militia, adding all these others, the expenditure, apart from the items I have mentioned, amounted to $38,750,000, and the cost per capita, instead of being $7.62, would be $7.04. Now, I call the attention of the House to the exceeding unfairness, when calculating the per capita expenditure, of taking into account such items as those I have referred to—the charges in regard to the development of the Yukon, the charges for the sinking fund and interest—though that formed a small part of the whole. And again I repeat the question and challenge: Do these hon. gentlemen impugn these expenditures? Do they propose to challenge them by their votes in this House?

Now, I make one remark here for the benefit of all concerned. If there has been one thing more noticeable than another since we assumed the reins of office, it has been the steady, persistent efforts with which these hon. gentlemen opposite have resisted every attempt on our part to lessen the expenditure. When we declined to add $30,000 or $40,000 a year, to the charge for civil government, what did these hon. gentlemen do? They fought us, Sir, like tigers, for the purpose of adding a couple of hundred thousand—for it amounted to that in five years—to the annual charge on account of civil government. They have made it a constant reproach to us, that we would not spend $750,000 a year before we knew where we were, on a fast Atlantic service. They urged expenditure upon telegraph lines; they strongly opposed the reduction in the rate of interest in the savings banks proposed by my hon. friend. Aye, and they opposed the abolition of the Franchise Act, under which an expenditure of a couple of hundred thousand dollars was inflicted on this country. Why, Sir, if we had listened to them, my hon. friend would have wanted forty-five millions, instead of forty-one millions and a half. Nevertheless, Sir, the point is good, that, service for service, we have done all these things, and done them better than they did; and that, taking into account the probable increase in the population, the cost per capita is very considerably lessened below what it was in 1895.

And now I desire to return for a few moments to the tariff. And here I may take the liberty of defining the position I hold myself on that subject. I have never pretended, and I do not pretend now, that the present tariff is perfect or that it is a final tariff. But I say, that, as compared with the tariff it superseded, it is an immense improvement. Before proceeding to a consideration of the facts, let me point out two glaring absurdities. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who spoke last devoted a greater part of his speech to prove that the preferential tariff given to England was a sham and mockery. He rises in his place, he, an ex-Finance Minister, and tells this House, that it is a sham that an English manufacturer is allowed to import goods into this country and pay $3, when the manufacturers from every other country are compelled to pay $4. Then, Sir, he assumed, as have so many more, to judge the preferential tariff by the returns to date. As my hon. friend showed again and again, the preferential tariff practically did not come into effect until the 1st August last, and they are not in possession of returns; yet, during the debate on the Address, I heard a number of these gentlemen declaring the preferential tariff to be a failure because it had not shown any great results in 1897 or 1898. Why, Sir, in 1897 it was not in existence at all; and in 1898, only half the preference took effect until the 1st of August, when the whole 25 per cent came into effect. And now I come to deal with the question of percentages, in which my hon. friend the member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) delights. Sir, this is a case where a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. Percentages are valuable things, without doubt, where conditions are similar; but they are worth nothing where conditions differ. I will tell the hon. gentleman, or the hon. gentleman's friends, that, as to this matter of percentages, I could, with a few strokes of my pen, draw a tariff on which the percentages would be extremely low on all the goods imported, and yet be almost absolutely prohibitory. All you have to do, is to make the tariff high enough on the largest classes of goods to exclude them, and make it low on the small remainder. Let me give the House an illustration which, I think, ought to go some way to convince some of these hon. gentlemen opposite that this matter of percentages had better be handled with a little care. If hon. gentlemen will take the Trade and Navigation Returns, and look at the figures showing our trade from Holland, they will find that we imported from that country $374,000 worth, all told, and on that amount we collected $908,000. Now, on the principles laid down by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) and a good many of his friends, I would be justified in saying, that we had an average tax of 300 per cent on every article we imported from Holland. I need not say to my hon. friend, that this arises from the fact that there is one particular article in that importation which is taxed enormously high, and thus disturbs the entire average, from end to end. Now I propose to analyse briefly the facts of this protective tariff. If the hon. member for York would turn to the Trade and Commerce Returns—from which, I observe, he quoted to-day without quite understanding, as I thought, what he was quoting—he will find some noticeable facts, to which I call the attention of the House. He will find, in the first place, that we imported from Great Britain, in the year 1878, $32,139,000 worth of dutiable goods, on which there was a duty paid of $6,445,000. He will find that in 1888, when the National Policy was in full operation, we imported from Great Britain a matter of $30,848,000 worth of dutiable goods, on which the duty was $8,972,000. I will come presently to the operation of the tariff on the goods imported in 1898; but, in the meantime, and for the benefit of all these super-loyal gentlemen on the other side, I want to show in one word the general result of the Mackenzie tariff of 1878 and—what shall I call it?—the mongrel tariff, the semi-Yankee tariff that succeeded it in 1879. Now, in 1878 we imported from Great Britain, of dutiable goods, considerably more than a million dollars more than we imported in 1888. But in 1878 we charged the British importer two and a half millions less than these gentlemen charged on a million dollars less of goods in 1888. That was the way that they encouraged and fostered British trade.

Now I come to, perhaps, a more interesting point; I come to the point as to how far, or to what degree, our present tariff has really affected the importation of British goods into this country, how far it has lowered the standard of duty. And here I beg, as I did just now, to call attention to the fact that if you wish to ascertain the real effect of the tariff, the least you can do is to deduct those articles with which the tariff does not meddle at all. As everybody knows the preferential tariff has nothing to do with the duties on spirits and wines; and I propose to deduct those from the importations of 1898; and I propose, further, to apply the preferential tariff, as it now exists, to the importations, and we will then see what the real and full effect of our preferential tariff is likely to be. Sir, in 1898 we imported, in round numbers, $22,556,000 of dutiable goods from Great Britain, and on these we collected $6,649,000 of duty. In that I include a quantity of spirits amounting to about $600,000, on which there was a duty of $885,000. Deducting those, we find that the dutiable goods imported amounted, as nearly as possible, to $22,000,000, in round numbers, on which there was a duty, of $5,764,000. Now, nobody can deny that to get the true effect of the preferential tariff you must deduct the other 12½ per cent, which would be deducted to-day if these goods were imported, and you will find, if you do that on this $22,000,000 worth of goods, that we would have levied a tax of $4,941,000. Sir, the result of that is, that on the dutiable goods, less spirits and wine, which we imported from England in 1898, our present tariff barely averages 22½ per cent as against the 28 per cent which was levied in 1888, and, I may add, as against the 19 per cent which was levied under my own tariff in 1878. Now, I do not say that we got down, in the matter of British goods, absolutely to a revenue tariff, but we have come exceedingly close to it; and I break no secrets of office when I intimate that the tariff now imposed by us in 1898 on these British goods, is, in its actual results, almost identical with that which I wanted to propose in 1876 myself.

Now, Sir, on this same question of preference, I have a word or two to say further. It is a very misleading thing to state to the House that the whole effect of the reduction of duty is measured by the reduction on these same English goods. The House will recollect that these English goods imported into Canada come into direct competition with the goods imported from all other countries, and chiefly with those from the United States. It will also remember that they come into competition with the goods produced by our own manufacturers here, and if you reduce the duty on that line of goods, largely consumed in Canada as English goods are, you compel the American manufacturer to a certain extent, and compel our own manufacturer, to lower his prices. So the result of our preferential tariff is to benefit those two great classes whom I believe the people of Canada desire to see benefited, the Canadian consumer in the first place, and the Canadian consumer's best customer, that is to say, the English manufacturer and producer, in the second place. As to the effect on the United States, I can only say this: I believe it is true enough that the effect of our preferential tariff has not been largely to reduce the volume of American importations. For that there are many reasons, one of which is that from their peculiar position and contiguity, and from reasons of freight rates and other things, the American goods will bear a considerable higher rate of duty than English goods will bear without putting a stop to their importation. I recollect very well, in discussing this matter with an extremely intelligent American gentleman, what he pointed out to me in that respect. He pointed out that while it was perfectly true that we did not diminish the volume of American importations, we had enormously diminished the amount of American profits on these same importations, enormously diminished them to the benefit of the people of Canada and to the Canadian consumer.

Now, Sir, I turn to another branch of the subject which was not fully dealt with, but which was undoubtedly alluded to by the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster). That hon. gentleman laid a good deal of stress, as the House will recollect, on the enormous quantity of American goods that we imported into Canada, and in particular, on that enormous quantity of American free goods that we imported into Canada. Sir, I want to call the attention of the House and of the country to what these same free importations consist of, and to inquire whether it is wise or practicable, or in our own interest, largely to tax these same free imports. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if we did tax them there would rise up a howl of protest from every manufacturer in Canada. Sir, I will give the House a brief list of what these same free goods, $40,000,000 worth in all, imported in 1898, consist of; and I advise our friends opposite to consider whether they would wish to put a severe tax on most of them. The first item is $2,225,000 of settlers' effects coming into this country. Do my hon. friends advise us to put a heavy tax on settlers' effects coming into Canada free from the United States? The next item is $4,000,000 of coin and bullion. Do they desire to tax $4,000,000 coin and bullion? The third item is $5,000,000 of grain in transit, which comes through our railways, through our canals, by our ships, and which gives employment to our people, and provides freight for our shipping. Do they wish to put an end to the free importation of three or four hundred thousand tons of freight through our railways and canals? And these items amount to $11,225,000 out of the $40,000,000? The next class is a series of items composed of goods we find it to our great convenience to import through American territory. We import about $2,225,000 of hides for the use of our manufacturers. We import $1,000,000 of drugs for the use of our manufacturers, and to enable them to compete with the Americans in our own market. We import of raw rubber and similar articles, $1,725,000 for the same purpose. We import of raw wool a value of $333,000; of fruits, $500,000; of raw furs, $225,000; of raw flax, $225,000; various articles for the use of our fisheries, amounting to $225,000. We import twine, which the hon. gentleman was objecting to, for our farmers' benefit, to the tune of $400,000. We import animals for the improvement of our own stock, to the tune of $400,000; we import a lot of rags, about $200,000 worth, and we import a quantity of bags. Now, most of these goods, the House will note are imported by us for our own convenience through the United States, and in all cases, we believe, for the benefit of our own manufacturers, or of particular classes of our own people. What else do we import? What else would these hon. gentlemen like to tax? Well, there is $4,225,000 worth of cotton wool. Do they desire to tax that? Do they advise that we should tax cotton wool coming into this country? We import $6,225,000 worth of anthracite coal, coal which we cannot get anywhere else. Do they propose to tax that? We import for the benefit of our manufacturers, and for their benefit alone, about $5,000,000 worth of metals of various kinds, chiefly iron, to be used in our manufactories. Do they desire to have this raw material in that shape taxed? If they do, let them say so, and my hon. friend, I dare say, will consider the matter. We import, besides that a matter of $2,500,000 worth of lumber, a large part of which, however, is for the use of our manufactories. And lastly, for the use of our agriculturists and cattle growers to enable them to compete in the English market with the Americans who get their corn free, we import about $2,000,000 of corn, and there you have your $40,000,000. Is it wise or prudent for the people of Canada to refuse to avail themselves of these articles or to impose taxes on articles almost all of which are imported for the benefit of our people and our own manufacturers? If they think it is so, it is in our power to do it, but I doubt very much the assistance they will get from the manufacturers if they propose that measure. The fact of the matter is that we are taxing, at the present moment, all American manufactured articles, and we are taxing them highly; we are taxing them at least $4 for every $3 of taxes that we impose on English manufactures of a similar character. We are importing large quantities of American goods and we are importing them directly for our own benefit and our own profit.

Now, the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), in his speech on the Address took occasion to make some rather invidious remarks in reference to the question of specific duties, in which he charged that we had deceived the people, or, at any rate, that we had failed to carry out our pledges. He alluded slightly to it to-day, though not as fully as he had done before. What the hon. gentleman said in brief, was this—I do not want to misquote the hon. gentleman, so I prefer to give his words. Here is the passage, Sir, which I shall read. The hon. gentleman is referring to specific duties.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not in order in referring to a previous debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, I will quote what the hon. gentleman said, and I will not read it. The hon. gentleman alluded to it to-day, and the hon. gentleman stated the same thing in the House before, that we—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, I am in order. I am dealing with the question of specific duties; I am dealing with the allegation that we have failed in our professions in the matter of specific duties. The hon. gentleman said that there were 175 specific duties in the tariff, and all you have done, he said, is to repeal twenty-eight of them. And he proceeded to argue that this was a miserable abortion, in no wise entitling us to make the statement that we had abolished specific duties. What are the facts? There were 175 specific duties in the old tariff; there are 147 now, and of these 147 117 are on articles of food or drink which nobody that I ever heard of has ever proposed to treat except with specific duties. They have nothing at all to do with the argument brought forward on our side of the House condemnatory of specific duties. We found fifty-eight specific duties, many of them involving a large class of articles, and we have reduced these to twenty-nine or thirty. Of those that remain, fourteen, nearly one-half, are retained in regard to some description of iron manufactures, and in respect to these we reduced them very largely, and in many cases to the extent of one-half. The other duties that are specific are absolutely insignificant. There are two or three specific duties, on coal, coal oil, and its various products; there are three specific duties on stereotypes and some such preparations, three on opium, and three specific duties on various kinds of gunpowder. Under these circumstances, to pretend that we have failed to rid the tariff of specific duties, is simply absurd. We have reduced the specific duties; we have, in point of fact, absolutely abolished specific duties on all important lines except on a small list of iron duties. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) states that ours is a protective tariff. There is an easy way to test whether a tariff is protective or not. Under a protective tariff, if it be a genuine protective tariff, you will find that importations into the country which imposes it, will grow less, and if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look into the operation of the Dingley tariff for the year which has just past, or for the first six months of the present year, he will find that it has in the most marked degree had that effect. There, Sir, they have a protective tariff, and as a result of it their importations were reduced from something like $760,000,000 to something like $600,000,000 in the course of a year under this Dingley tariff. That was the case there, and as stated by the hon. member for York, under our tariff, the imports of all kinds have increased largely in 1897, and still more in 1898. That is the true test of a protective tariff, and by that test I am perfectly willing that the House should judge as between our tariff and the American tariff. If hon. gentlemen will compare our tariff with the American tariff they will see that ours is not a protective tariff, but that in its main point, is approaching, though not already having reached it, but is approaching, the standard of a true revenue tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Now, Sir, as regards the future, I entirely agree with the opinion expressed by my hon. friend that there is occasion for us to be cautious. We must not presume too much on the good times we now have, because they will not last for ever, but I point out that there has been great development of new resources in Canada within the last few years. I point out that new industries of great magnitude are likely to arise which will afford means of profitable employment to a large number of our people; I point out, as the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) also pointed out, and with truth, that there has been a most extraordinary development in many parts of Canada, in our great mining industries. I believe the time has come when we shall be able to turn our magnificent water power to greater advantage than we have hitherto done. Having regard to all these things, I think that while we must and should exercise a due degree of caution, there is reasonable ground also for hoping that our present prosperity may be continued to us for a good while to come.

And here, although I know that comparisons are odious, I cannot forbear one word or two as to the way in which the present Government have dealt with the duties which devolved upon them, in connection with the development of the new regions which are now being opened up. I might remind the older members of this House, that there was a time when a vast territory was placed at the disposal of the people of Canada, and when hon. gentlemen opposite undertook to exploit it; and I might remind them of the promises that were made in connection with it. I might remind them of the $58,000,000 cash, or securities better than cash, that were to flow into the public treasury from the way in which hon. gentlemen opposite would deal with the North-west Territories. I might remind them of the 640,000,000 bushels of grain per annum, which were to be produced, and which were to flood our harbours, our railways, and canals, and every available means of access to the sea, as the result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. And I might remind them also, that the net result of the use the Conservatives made of all that vast territory was, that from the day they got possession of it down to the present moment it has not even paid the expense of survey, and the people of Canada, first and last, are probably something like $200,000,000 worse off, although I have good hopes that even that vast sum will be recouped to them before long—but not owing to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We were called upon under somewhat difficult circumstances to deal with the acquisition of new territory. We were called upon to administer a territory to which there was no means of access, except by a long and perilous journey of months in duration. We were called upon to do so under circumstances in which we might well have been pardoned if we had demanded large sums of money from the people of Canada, and made no return. And how have we administered the charge entrusted to us? Why, Sir, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) made it a reproach to us the other day, that we had taken millions out of that country more than we had put in, and he was good enough to tell us that the people of Canada owed many hundreds of thousands of dollars to the American miners who had gone in to explore the Klondike, and who were kind enough to take away our gold, and allow us 10 per cent in return.

Now, I do not want to weary the House; I do not believe that after such a speech as was delivered by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), it is at all necessary for me to do so. I rose more particularly to deal with certain, as it appeared to me, grave mis-statements and blunders, into which the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) had fallen. I repeat that I am prepared to show, and prove, that service for service—and it is the only way to judge—we are administering the country at less cost per head than these gentlemen opposite were doing five years ago; both relatively and absolutely, certainly relatively, when you take into account the increased population the country now contains. I say that we have very considerably reduced the burdens of the people. I say that we will be able, I hope and trust, to reduce the burdens still more in time; for I, for one, am entirely in accord with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), that even if there be inequalities, even if there be things that should be redressed in the tariff, it is not expedient, it is not wise, to disturb the tariff frequently from time to time. Better endure some little inconveniences than put the whole business community in a ferment without very good cause for disturbing them. I pointed to the fact that there has been a great growth of population in Canada within the last few years, and that there is every reason to believe that that growth will continue. There is every reason to believe that we shall attract many immigrants here; there is every reason to believe we will keep the great bulk of our own people in this country, and there is proof positive that there has been a great increase in the wealth of Canada. I believe that that will be to a very great extent permanent, and although I would be the last man to use that as an excuse for unnecessary extravagance or unnecessary expenditure. I do say it is a justification for a liberal dealing with the urgent wants of the country. Although we may not have moved quite so fast as we would desire in all respects, although we may not have been able to do everything we desired to have done, yet, I do say, and I think the people will agree with me, that never since Canada was confederated down to the present hour, do the people of Canada, or the Government of Canada, or Canada as a whole, stand higher, and more deservedly so, than they do at this present day and hour.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with pleasure, as I always do, to the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), not because his arguments were very strong, but because his style is rather pleasing. I noticed that in the beginning of his speech, he told us he had no desire to apologize for anything that his Government had done, but that he rose rather to justify all they had done. It seemed to me that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) occupied rather an unenviable position. Why is it, that the hon. gentleman, who was so long the financial critic of the Liberal party when in Opposition, is not now the Finance Minister of Canada? That, of course, is known only to the members of the Government themselves, but nevertheless the public outside have a very good idea of the reason, and that reason is: That the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) had made so many speeches denouncing the National Policy, decrying the country, picturing the extravagance of the Conservative party and advocating economy, that the Prime Minister in forming his Government, thought it would be impossible to make the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) his Minister of Finance. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was afraid that the manufacturers of Canada would have been alarmed if the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) was made Finance Minister, and as the Liberals in power were determined to go back upon their pledges when in Opposition, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) was laid aside, and a new man sought to take the important portfolio of finance. I do not envy the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his present plight. He addressed the House to-night, but in doing so, he answered his own speeches rather than the speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). It is all very well for the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) to say that the speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was full of fallacious statements, but hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that that speech was an able one, and that the arguments it contained cannot be controverted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce or by any one else. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) succeeded, I say, in answering his own speeches made on the floor of the House year after year, and to-night, by reason of the company in which he finds himself, he was compelled to eat his own words. The Minister of Trade and Commerce discovered that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) had made a little mistake about corn, and it was surprising to see how hon. gentlemen opposite applauded his discovery of this slight error. It was only a slip of the tongue, and it would not have been noticed by me, had it not been that the moment it was pointed out, there was immense applause from the supporters of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They were so afraid they would not have anything to applaud in what the hon. Minister said, that they made sure they would avail of that small opportunity. But after all, the statement made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was merely bearing out the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in Chicago. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is a member of the commission appointed to negotiate a treaty with the American authorities, and speaking at Chicago he told his audience, that the Liberal party in Canada had made a mistake in admitting corn free of duty, without waiting to make it a matter of bargain for better terms with the American Government. That was the argument made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) in this House, and that is borne out conclusively by the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in Chicago, a gentleman who understands these things thoroughly, and who was on the commission trying to negotiate a treaty, but who felt before going to Washington that the party had given away almost everything they had to give, and therefore were not likely to accomplish anything.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce first of all took up the question of extravagance. He says we are charging them with extravagance. Well, I think he is somewhat mistaken in that. We are not the party who raised the charge of extravagance in this House. We say to hon. gentlemen opposite: The cry of extravagance was the one great cry which you raised all over this country; you talked about it constantly and everywhere, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce was one of the greatest sinners in this respect. In this House, and out of it, that was one of his great cries, and he made the people of his own party, and perhaps some of the Conservative party, believe that we were extravagant. His argument was this: There is an expenditure of $38,000,000; I could cut that down by two or three million dollars; there is no necessity for spending $38,000,000 in a country with only 5,000,000 people. Does the hon. gentleman say that to-day? Not at all. He does not use that argument any longer, and he will not allow us to use it either. He says: If the expenditure can be justified, it is all right. Well, I do not think it is all right. I do not think that is a good argument at all. The point is this—and there was some force in his argument, when in Opposition—that a country of 5,000,000 people should not require such a great expenditure; and, if there is any point in that argument, that is the argument we make to-day. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to say: Let our opponents object to some specific item in the Estimates. That is not the argument at all. We are not responsible for these expenditures, and it is no use for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to try and throw the responsibility upon us. We are not carrying on the affairs of the country; hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible. We do not intend to object to particular expenditures; but we do say, that a gentleman who said that $38,000,000, including supplementary Estimates, was far too great an expenditure, and who stands up to-day and says that $41,000,000 without supplementary Estimates, which would bring the expenditure up to $44,000,000, is not excessive at all, because it is going to be spent for the good of the country, is using a poor argument, which does not answer his own argument. It shows that these gentlemen in power and in office are two different kinds of people altogether, and are using entirely different arguments. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says, that this increased expenditure is justified by the increase of population and the prosperity of the country, and he went on to say, that there was a true test of prosperity. I never heard of this test before, though, no doubt, it is a good one. It is, that the natives are staying in the country, and the immigrants are not going out, but are kept in, too. How does he prove that? He says: Take the two decades, from 1871 to 1881, and from 1881 to 1891. From 1871 to 1881, under a revenue tariff, he says, the people stayed in the country; and from 1881 to 1891 the people were going out of the country. Now, I want to call his attention to the fact, which he has been told many a time, but which he seems to forget—because these hon. gentlemen have very short memories, now that they are in power—that there was a great difference between the way the census was taken in 1881 and the way it was taken in 1891. There is no doubt that the country was growing between 1881 and 1891, and the increase of population between those years was probably just as great as it was between 1871 and 1881. But the hon. gentleman need not have taken as long as he did to prove that the country is prosperous. Why, we all know that the country is prosperous. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce imagines that we ought to use the same kind of arguments that he used, when in Opposition. He seemed to imagine that there was a double of himself standing in front of him, on this side of the House, trying to show that the country was not prosperous, because it never was prosperous until he got into power. It is a remarkable thing, but it is the case, that, in his estimation, the country was never prosperous while he was out of power; but, strange to say, as soon as these gentlemen got into power, the country became prosperous. But I make some allowance for the Minister of Trade and Commerce talking about the exodus, because he is very familiar with that subject. He talked about it year after year in this House, and I think he was largely responsible for it. A great many of his speeches were used by agents in the United States and by people in the old country to show what sort of a country Canada was. I have said before in this House, and I repeat it, that, if I had been an emigrant, contemplating coming to Canada, and had read some of the speeches made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he was in Opposition, I never would come to this country. Blue ruin was his constant cry. I remember him saying, that the black flag was floating over the farmers of Canada. How could we expect people to come to a country like that? If there is any reason for gratification that the hon. gentleman has got into power, it is because he has stopped talking blue ruin and has begun to compliment Canada. I say, I excuse the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce for talking about the exodus. It is said, that he cannot sing the old songs, but this exodus was one of his old songs. He is quite familiar with it, and he has not many opportunities of singing it, and, therefore, I excuse him for singing it a little to-night.

Then, the hon. gentleman went on to make a statement which I do not think he substantiated, and which I do not think he can substantiate. He said, that, taking it all in all, they were giving cheaper service for the amount of money expended. Now, we dispute that statement. The hon. gentleman gave no proof of it. It is very easy to stand up and make such a statement in this House, and it may be believed by some people in the country; but I would not accept it, and I do not think the people at large will accept it, unless it is proved by the figures. But, as I said before, all this was of no account, when the hon. gentleman was in Opposition. These arguments went for nothing then. We used these arguments, when on that side of the House. We said the money was voted for right purposes, and we challenged our opponents to point out where the money should not be spent. They criticised some things in the Estimates, but very often they let them go through without criticism. So that argument had no weight at all, when used then, and it is not entitled to any more weight now.

Now, there is an organ which claims to be independent, and I am very glad that it is, although, as a rule, it leans strongly to one side; that is, the Montreal "Witness." I am going to read from that paper a little extract which is so good that it ought to be placed in "Hansard." It is headed "More Spending," so that it is appropriate to this discussion, and it says:

The Minister of Public Works sends a thrill of expansive exhilaration through every community he visits with his airy schemes of money-spending. In Ontario he sometimes spices his dishes with slighting expressions about the selfish merchants of Montreal, who, he says, are a clique who want everything for themselves. He is the hero who is delivering the country from these old fogies, who are so retrogressive and selfish as not to be able to understand why he has been so determined in his efforts to cripple Montreal harbour. At Toronto, a few days ago, Mr. Tarte declared the necessity of spending $25,000,000 during the next few years on public works.

Now, I call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the next sentence.

Here, one would think, is fit subject for the old jibes of Sir Richard Cartwright against Ministers who went about imploring promoters, contractors and jobbers to join them in a high old time. Is Mr. Tarte so much out of his office because it is haunted by the ghost of Mackenzie, who in his position lay on his arms night and day, not trusting even a deputy, that the country might not be robbed by either his opponents or his own supporters. Had a Conservative Minister made the boast that the Government had made lots of money, and was therefore justified in spending lots of money, how would Sir Richard Cartwright have torn to tatters the idea that a Government can make money or get money in any other way than out of the pockets of the people or at the cost of the capital resources of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. What paper says that?

Mr. CRAIG. The Montreal "Witness."

"The Government is but a fly on the wheel," was Sir Richard's famous and true dictum. "Hands off," was the "Globe" and Sir Richard's old watchword against Governments meddling with industry and commerce.

Then, the Minister of Public Works went on to speak about the Georgian Bay and Toronto Railway, but I will not trouble the House reading the whole article, and will confine myself to just reading the conclusion:

Yet the Minister of Public Works has given the people of Toronto what they talk of as "an assurance that the Government will give $3,000,000 for the building of the air line." We think the Government, before undertaking any further great transportation projects costing millions of dollars, should ascertain what the results of the deepening of the canals are going to be. It is curious, to say the least, that the Minister of Railways and Canals, rather than the Minister of Public Works, was not consulted by the Toronto people in regard to the Georgian Bay and Toronto Railway, as it comes within his department.

Now, I commend that article about spending to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and especially the references to himself. It is certainly absolutely true that if such statements had been made by any Conservative Minister, they would have received, and with reason, most severe criticism at his hands. But I suppose it is too much to expect that he will criticise his colleague the Minister of Public Works, though he may, perhaps, have a private conversation with him.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to say further that we on this side have no right to talk about the extravagance of the Government, because we object to the Government cutting off the statutory increases. No doubt many of us did object, but we did so first of all because these statutory increases do not amount to such a very large sum, and then, because we thought that those who had joined the civil service under the law providing for statutory increases were not being fairly dealt with. But if the Government wish to lay down the principle that those going into the service should not be entitled to such increases, hon. members on this side would make no objection. We do think, however, that the Government are not treating fairly these civil servants who had been led to expect these increases and yet are debarred from receiving them. Besides the Government themselves have not taken away these increases in all cases, and the criticism by this side was that these increases are often given in an arbitrary manner, apparently without very good reason, and may have been made to their own party friends. We do not say that they were, but they may have been, and it will be far better to give them according to the statute and not according to the caprices of Ministers of the Crown. Another criticism of my hon. friends was that we objected to saving money on the fast line. Well, we do, and I think with good reason. We hold that if the contract entered into by the late Government had been carried out, the fast line would have been in operation to-day and it would have been a good thing for the country, whereas now there is apparently no prospect of its ever being completed. What did the Government do? They objected to the subsidy of $750,000 as being too large, and declared that $500,000 was ample. But what has been the result? The result is that to-day the prospect of our having that fast line has completely disappeared. If it is a good thing, and they admit it is by offering $500,000 subsidy, well, the sooner we have it the better. As they say Canada is now enjoying an era of great prosperity, and if we had the fast line that prosperity would be increased; and we, therefore, do object to their saving this $750,000 subsidy on the very line of argument given by my hon. friend, because this money would have been well spent and be amply repaid to the Treasury of the country.

Then, we are charged with objecting to the abolition of the Franchise Act which was going to save a lot of money to the people. I do not know that we do object. A great many members on this side have expressed the opinion that we do not object to its abolition or to its being made simpler in many ways, but what they do object to is the replacing of that Act by one which is such a muddle that it is most unworkable, and the Government themselves do not understand it.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says we opposed their making a saving in the statutory increases and the fast line, and we admit that we did and with good reason, but I would remind him that we are not opposed to saving money but are in favour of doing so in the proper way, and, therefore, we not only opposed these things but also the Yukon scheme, which we thought was giving away far too much for the return we were to receive, and the Drummond County Railway scheme. And by our opposition to that Drummond scheme alone the country will, I believe, save $600,000, and some say $1,000,000. Surely the hon. gentlemen ought to give us credit for what we did in these matters.

The hon. gentleman says that he does not claim that the present tariff is perfect. I imagine that in saying this he is making a bid for the support of the farmers. It is very plausible for the Finance Minister to say: We do not propose to make any changes in the tariff this year and believe that tariff stability is a good thing for the country. In that belief he is in accord with hon. members on this side. I do not believe that tariff tinkering is a good thing, but what does the Minister of Trade and Commerce mean when he says he does not claim the tariff is perfect? Perhaps he does not mean anything, but I think he wants to lead the farmers and those who believe in free trade to believe that at some time or other the Government may make further reductions. He says to them practically: Keep quiet, support us, and some day, perhaps, we may meet your views or perhaps you may come down to ours.

He referred to the preferential tariff. Now, we object to that tariff, but I do not propose going into that question, because I do not feel competent to discuss it, but shall leave that matter to be discussed by my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), who will, no doubt, treat it as he has already done in this House. But I think it will be admitted by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that the duties on many English imports were raised before this preferential rate was given. What I object to in the preferential tariff is that it is one-sided. I notice that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) expressed the hope that some day we might obtain a preference on our breadstuffs from the mother country. The Minister of Finance does not say that it is impossible; he thinks it may come about. But he says it will not come about by our bartering or trading, but is more likely to result from our being benevolent and showing our friendly feeling for the mother country. It seems to me that in business matters, in matters of dollars and cents, such as tariffs, there is not much sentiment. It seems to me that by giving this preferential treatment to Great Britain without getting anything in return, we were taking out of the mouths of the statesmen in England who were favourable to giving us a preference a great argument. What can they say? When they advocate the giving of a preference in the British markets for our goods, their people will naturally ask: What are we going to get for it? They must answer: The Canadians have already given you a preference and they cannot give any more. The people will say: Then, we are better as we are. But if the Government had not given its preference; if we could go and propose a preference, not in a spirit of barter, but in a spirit of good-will to the mother country and say : We are willing to give goods from Great Britain a preference in our market if you will give us a preference in yours—the statesmen in England could show their people that they had something to gain by the change. They would have an argument, a sensible argument, and one that would appeal to the pocket. In these matters it is not the heart that requires to be touched so much as to show that there is actual benefit in it to those with whom we seek to deal. It seems to me that in this matter the Government has been altogether too liberal. They are treating the United States in the same way. They gave them free corn, free binder twine, free barbed wire, and reduced the duties on many articles from the states. And when they ask for something from the Americans, the natural reply of the Americans is : We do not see that we are going to gain anything by giving you what you ask. If we had all these things in our hands again, we could propose to the United States to make a bargain with them. But under present circumstances, I do not see how any United States politician could justify himself in making concessions. He would be justified in reality, but I mean I do not see how he could justify himself to his constituents. His constituents would naturally say to him : You got nothing in return for these concessions, for we already had everything that Canada could give us. This idea of touching the heart of a nation is a far-fetched idea, I think. It seems to me that nations are a good deal like corporations—they have no souls to be touched.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says that the present tariff is not protective. That is rather a startling statement. The hon. Minister says he can prove his statement, and he does so by showing that our imports have not declined and by declaring that under a protective tariff the imports always decline. I think I could prove that the National Policy was not a protective tariff according to that rule. Did the imports decline year by year under the National Policy ? No, they increased. If his tariff is not protective, then neither was ours. And, if this was the case, why did the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) talk so much against the protective policy during the eighteen years when he opposed the late Government ? But we say this is a protective tariff, and we say that the tariff retained by the hon. gentleman is a protective tariff to-day. Not only that, we go further and say that some of the leading manufacturers of this country were given to understand, on the quiet, before the last election took place that their manufacturing industries would not be injured by the tariff if the Liberals got into power, and this was done in order to do away with any opposition they might otherwise offer to the Liberal party.

Well, then, what fault do we find with hon. gentlemen opposite ? For my part, I certainly do not find fault with them for not taking protection out of the tariff. But I should fancy that some people throughout the country who believed them when they said that protection was a great evil would find fault with them for not removing it. But certainly I do not. Why, then do we find fault with them ? We charge that they deceived the people of this country. That may be a light charge in the estimation of some gentlemen ; but it seems to me a grave charge to make against a great political party comprising, no doubt, half the people of the country. We charge them with making a complete change of front. Why, what did they preach when in Opposition ? First of all, they preached economy. The Minister of Finance has tried to get out of the charge that they are not economical and has done it in a very clever way. He says that economy is a different thing at different times, and he thinks that because times are good, economy need not be practised. He is getting lots of money in, and he rather adopts the theory of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) : We are making lots of money and we are going to spend it. But when they were in Opposition they talked about economy from one end of this country to the other. They charged the Conservative party with extravagance year after year ; and I have no doubt they secured a good many votes by preaching economy, not the economy defined by the Finance Minister to-day, but economy as defined, let us say, by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in the old days when we used to hear his voice in this House—he is here, but his voice is silent now. No doubt the hon. gentleman feels cribbed, cabined and confined ; he is out of place in this House, and the Government ought to put him in another House where he may be able to say something. Economy as they preached it when in Opposition meant reduced expenditure, and not as defined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce now—being able to justify your expenditure. You might spend any amount of money in that way, if that was all that was needed to prove economy. In every constituency in this country I could find where hundreds of thousands of dollars could be spent in a way that would benefit the locality and the country. But this would not be spending with economy. Economy consists in living within your income. I understand the Minister of Customs to say just now that we are doing that. I do not think they are, and I do not think they can show the people of the country that they are, considering that they have to go abroad to borrow money and are continually increasing the public debt. Not only did they preach economy as defined by the hon. member for North Wellington, but they preached reduction in the public debt. They used to talk about the great debt resting upon this small population and grinding the people down. I remember that in my county I met an ardent Liberal whose great complaint against me was that I was supporting a party who had helped to pile up the debt, and he wanted a party in who would reduce it. He did not want to have this debt staring him in the face when he read the official returns. I tried to reassure him by saying I thought we would not have to pay the debt, but I could not reassure him. I do not know how he will get along if the gentlemen in power to-day are increasing the debt. I am sure that a great many people in this country, a great many farmers, took the hon. gentlemen at their word when they denounced the debt, and said that if placed in power they would reduce it.

Now, are they reducing the debt? Why, Sir, instead of reducing the debt, they are increasing it constantly. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tried to show by figures that they are not increasing the debt as fast as the Conservatives did. Well, that is a queer argument to come out of his mouth, to justify what he is doing by what the Conservatives did, a party who, according to him, did everything wrong. And yet he stands up in this House and the country, and says: Well, the Conservatives did this, and we are doing no worse. In saying that he admits that the Conservatives did right, or else he is doing wrong and tries to humbug the people by saying that they are no worse than the Conservatives were. I say that they are deceiving the people by not practising the economy which they promised the people, by not reducing the expenditure below what the Conservative party had it. They said they could reduce it, that they would reduce it, and instead of that, they have gone on increasing the debt year after year.

But there was another thing that they preached, preached very loudly, and strongly, and energetically, and that was free trade, a reduction in the tariff. First of all it was free trade. But that was rather too definite, because the people had an idea that they knew what free trade was. I suppose somebody told them it would hardly do to talk about free trade in this country, because it sounded too radical. So they changed that word to freer trade, which did not mean anything, or meant anything you liked. But that was a very good idea. They did talk about freer trade, and I say they deceived the people of this country by making them believe that they were going to cut the tariff down to a very large extent. I would like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell me whether they did not make the people believe that they were going to cut the tariff down at least to 15 per cent. In my canvass I used to make this argument in my own defence. I would say: they cannot do it, they must have a revenue—just what we hear to-day. But that argument did not gain me a single vote, it did not make a bit of difference. The people were going to put a party in power that would reduce the tariff, they were not going to be oppressed—I am talking now about the good, hard-shell Grits—they were not going to be oppressed by this terrible protective tariff, they were going to have a party in power which had promised to cut this tariff down. Now I wonder what those people think?

Mr. BRITTON. They don't feel very bad about it.

Mr. CRAIG. I don't think the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) belongs to the farming class, he belongs to the class that prey on the farmers. I do not think he is able to answer for the farmers. I have many farmers in my constituency, and I must find out what they think about these hon. gentlemen when the next election comes round. I must find out what they think about gentlemen who promised to practise economy, and are increasing the expenditure faster than ever it was increased before, a party who said they would reduce the debt and are piling it up year after year. I want to see what they think about gentlemen who promised to reduce the debt, to cut it down to a revenue tariff, to have free trade, or freer trade, or whatever they chose to call it. Now, Sir, I leave them to answer to their own supporters about these matters. I suppose they feel quite satisfied they can hold their supporters in this House. I have noticed that while some of them kick on the quiet, we never see much of their kicking in this House. They seem to vote straight. I think some of them have hard work to stand up when a vote comes round on some of these questions. They have some small relics of principle left which weigh them down. But they have to make a great effort and stand behind this Government, hoping, perhaps, they will do better some time.

There was one other statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—he has gone out just now. He said the present tariff is about the same as one he wanted to introduce in 1876. I was wondering why he did not introduce it, and I have one reason to give which may be a true one. At that date there was a Premier, his Premier, who had free trade or revenue tariff principles, and who would not, for the sake of staying in power, sacrifice those principles, and so would not allow him to bring in that tariff. That may be one reason. I have heard other reasons too. I have heard about the Hon. Mr. Jones coming from Halifax and making a strong kick about it. I suppose that may be a reason why he did not introduce this tariff. But this tariff, which he now defends, is just about the same as the tariff we have had for the last 18 years. I asked myself why he has been denouncing this tariff ever since 1878—because the present tariff is almost the same as the tariff that the Conservatives have had for 18 years. He was constantly dedenouncing that tariff, and denouncing protection, which is in the tariff to-day—hon. gentlemen opposite cannot deny it. But I ask: Why has he been denouncing this tariff for 18 years? The question also comes to my mind: At what time was the Minister of Trade and Commerce sincere? Was he sincere on the trade question in 1876 when he wished to introduce a tariff of this kind, or was he sincere during the 18 years when he denounced this tariff, practically the same tariff, and said it was a curse to this country? When I ask myself when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was sincere, another interesting question arises: Are any hon. members on the other side sincere? Are any of the members of the Cabinet sincere in the principles they hold on the tariff—I may, perhaps, say on prohibition, too? But I am not discussing that question just now. I would ask if any of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have any settled principles at all. I think it would be interesting if any of those gentlemen who have settled principles would get up one after the other, and state these principles to the House. Let us know what their views are on the trade question. I know the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) says decisively that he is an out and out free trader. But still he supports the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on this tariff, he supports him always, he supports him now, because he says he hardly expects free trade for 40 years. Well, I do not suppose he expects to be in the House at that time, so he is quite safe in putting it off that far. But it would be an interesting sight for hon. gentlemen opposite who have settled principles on the trade question to stand up and tell us what their sincere and settled principles are. I think we would find that there would be a wonderful variety for a united party. I am sure that in the Cabinet itself they do not agree on this trade question. I am satisfied that in the Cabinet itself there are gentlemen who believe in free trade if they could get it. There are some who believe in a revenue tariff, and there is no doubt others believe in a protective tariff. But they won't let us know they hold all these various opinions. Since they cannot agree on any tariff of their own, they have to take the tariff of the Conservative party, and make a few changes in it and call it their tariff. Now, I do not like to think it, but I really believe the people of the country have not very much confidence in these gentlemen on the trade question.

I think there is no doubt of the fact, that when the country learned that the commissioners to Washington had returned without doing anything, the country heaved a great sigh of relief. I know I spoke to one prominent Liberal in Toronto before they came back, and he said: I wish they would come back from there; I wish they would come home. They have been staying down there too long already. Not only one Liberal said that, but many Liberals expressed that idea. That showed that the Liberals, as well as the Conservatives, were afraid these hon. gentlemen might give away something that they should not give away, to the Americans in their great anxiety to obtain a treaty of some kind to bring back with them. I admit, it was disappointing for them to have to come back without a treaty, but I commend them for not making a treaty when they could not get one without too great a sacrifice, and I only hope they will stick to that right through, and I will support them, if they do that. I believe in making a treaty if a fair treaty can be made, but I have my doubts that a fair treaty can be made, and I say again, that it showed me that the people have no very great confidence in hon. gentlemen on the treaty question, because the country, as a whole, heaved a great sigh of relief, when the announcement was made, that they had returned without making a treaty. I believe, too, that the country heaved another sigh of relief, when the announcement was made by the hon. Minister of Finance, that there would be no tariff changes. They were afraid that the hon. gentleman might be tempted to make some changes, and, when he gave the information to the country, that there would be none, the people were very well satisfied. Sir, I hold that these gentlemen have forfeited every claim to the confidence of the people, and I will be surprised, if the country does not show this at the first opportunity that it has. It would be a sad day for Canada, if public men and the leaders of a great party could gain power by making certain pledges, and then failing to carry them out. I will make that statement again; I think it is a statement that will be agreed to by members on both sides of this House, I think it will not be denied by the people of the country, that it will be a sad day for Canada, if public men and the leaders of a great party could gain power by making certain pledges, and then failing to carry them out. I will leave the leaders of the Liberal party to answer this charge of breaking the pledges they made to their supporters throughout the country. I claim that they have broken their pledges. They obtained power by making these declarations and pledges. They said, that after they obtained power, they would practise economy; they said, that $38,000,000 was too much for this country to spend, and that they would reduce the expenditure. They pledged themselves to reduce the debt of this country, whereas, instead of reducing it, they have largely increased it, and the prospects are, that they will go on increasing it. They told the people they would give them freer trade, and gave them the impression that, if they attained power, they would largely reduce the tariff and lighten the burdens, as they used to call them, of the people. There is no doubt of that fact. The people expected they would do that, but they have practically retained the old tariff, the tariff that they denounced so roundly for eighteen years. If the people are satisfied to be ruled by men who have broken every pledge—every important pledge—they have made, then I am greatly mistaken in the people of Canada. I do not think they will be satisfied. I think, if we had a party in power which has the same pledges in Opposition as it has in power, it would be a good thing for the country. That is what we find in the Conservative party. They have the same policy to-day that they had when they were in power. As stated by the hon. member for York, this afternoon, the Conservative party do not propose, because they are in Opposition, to abandon the principles they held while in power. They hold the same principles to-day. They held them when they were in power, because they believed that they were for the best interests of the country. I think they are for the best interests of the country to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is not here to-night. He wants to speak on this question. I do not purpose speaking myself, unless I am forced to do so, at this hour of the night, and I do not intend to speak at any stage of the debate; but I take the liberty of moving the adjournment of the debate on behalf of the hon. leader of the Opposition, if that will be acceptable to the Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If the hon. gentleman does it at the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I do not care to resist the motion; but, if there are any other hon. gentlemen who may wish to follow the example of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), and continue the debate, I think we should proceed. We have been adjourning so early of late that I fear the public will think that we have no business to do. All the important Government business has been delayed at the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and we are asked to consent to a delay once more.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. gentleman insists on sitting until twelve o'clock, I will proceed; but I would prefer not to talk upon this question and allow the hon. leader of the Opposition to make his speech to-morrow.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Does the hon. gentleman say, that the hon. leader of the Opposition wishes to speak?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, Sir.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well; adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. CRAIG.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (A.) No. 88, from the Senate, for the relief of David Stock.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (C.) No. 105, from the Senate, for the preservation of health on public works.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by Mr. McClure:

For leave to introduce Bill (No. 109) to further amend the Canada Temperance Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FLINT. This Bill is simply to provide, in the first place, for alternative penalties; more severe penalties in some instances, or greater latitude in the imposition of penalties for violations of the Act. The Bill, in the second place, provides more perfectly and completely, as experience has shown to be necessary, for the enforcement of those clauses of the Act which relate to search for liquors supposed to be kept for sale in contravention of the Act. On the second reading of the Bill I will explain these points more fully.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), if he will see that the Public Accounts Committee is called together upon Monday next.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I will keep that in mind and endeavour to arrange for a meeting as soon as possible, but Monday is a day upon which we rarely call a meeting of the committee.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that he had better make it some other day ; either Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some preliminary motions; we might have a short meeting on Monday.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will endeavour to arrange for an early meeting.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, I may say at once to the House that in the present condition of my voice and health, I should not attempt to address the House at all at the present moment if it were not that the very able, the very exhaustive, and the very admirable criticism of the Budget speech, or rather, I should say, the Budget essay, delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to this House, has rendered it unnecessary that any large amount of time or consideration should be bestowed upon this subject. Not having been able to return to the House last night, owing to the condition of my health, I requested an hon. member to move the adjournment of the debate at the close of the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), with the idea that perhaps it would be incumbent upon me to review some of the statements which that hon. gentleman might have addressed to the House. But, having got the best information I could as to the speech delivered by that hon. gentleman, I found that it would really not be at all necessary for me, so far as that is concerned, to trouble the House with any remarks whatever, as I find that the hon. gentleman concluded that discretion was the better part of valour: and, instead of attempting to grapple with the unanswerable and overwhelming case put by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), the late Minister of Finance, he endeavoured to get as far away from the subject as was possible. I am not at all surprised at that, because the position of the hon. gentleman himself in regard to this question is one of so vulnerable a character as to make it very difficult for him to attempt to deal with it.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to say—I would not say it even if you had not ruled that it was not parliamentary—that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is a mischievous demagogue. I do not think he is. I think there was a time in the history of this country when that appellation would have been appropriate to the hon. gentleman; when on every occasion, standing on this side of the House, that hon. gentleman availed himself of the position he occupied to assail every measure that was brought forward by the Government, calculated to advance the interests of this country; and not only to assail it, but, in order to discredit the Government, he did not hesitate to use his position in this House on all occasions, so far as his abilities permitted him, to decry and lower the character and estimation of this country in the eyes, not only of the people and Parliament of Canada, but of the people of other countries. Now, Sir, however mischievous a demagogue the hon. gentleman may have been in those days, he has reformed. The position he occupies on the Treasury benches has taken away all the virus which his speeches on those occasions exhibited. Relegated as he is by the Prime Minister to the back seats in the Administration, he has confined himself rather to the promotion of those family interests which are so dear to every person, than to dealing with public questions; and I am able to congratulate the hon. gentleman on having been singularly successful in his new role; and on having been able to pension as many of his relatives on the public treasury of this country as has been the good fortune of any gentleman on either side of the House in past times.

On a former occasion the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ventured to describe the maritime provinces as the rags and tatters of this Dominion.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No, it was not rags and tatters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am corrected. I am speaking from memory. I am told that it was only the shreds and patches of this Dominion; and Sir, I wonder if the hon. gentleman enjoys the position he occupies to-day in having the right hon. gentleman who was called upon to form an Administration, go down and ransack those shreds and patches to patch up an Administration for this country. The hon. gentleman, finding, as I have said before, that his fangs had been drawn and that that mischievous demagoguism for which he was formerly so noted, had been checked by his friends, who, when they went to appeal to the people, came to the conclusion that the only means by which they could ever hope to obtain success in this country was by muzzling the hon. gentleman, confining him to his own district, and preventing him from going out and delivering those philippics which had done such vast injury to the party to which he belongs—I say that, having obtained power in that way, the hon. gentleman was content to accept a back seat on the Treasury benches and to have his place taken by one of those patches which he referred to, in order to provide an Administration for this country. But, Sir, it will not be forgotten that the hon. gentleman was entrusted with some duties. He was entrusted with the Department of Trade and Commerce, and he had one subject confided to his care. That was a subject which the Prime Minister in his place in this House—aye, from both sides of this House, I will do him the credit to say—declared again and again was a most important subject for the people of Canada; that was a fast Atlantic service. The hon. Prime Minister, having committed himself to that project, entrusted a department to the hon. gentleman, who no longer was found acceptable, and for very sufficient reasons, to occupy the position of Finance Minister of this country. The right hon. gentleman who formed this Administration knew that the Liberal party in this country had been held back by the policy and the principles avowed by the hon. the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. As long ago as 1887, when a struggle took place between the two parties in this country, the Hon. Edward Blake, then leading the Opposition in this House, and the head of the Liberal party, having become convinced that his party never could obtain power until they hauled down the flag of free trade, and declared themselves ready to support the National Policy of Canada, in a celebrated speech during that campaign, announced to the people of Canada that a change of Government would practically involve no change in the financial and tariff policy of Canada. Well, Sir, what happened? The House met. I cannot blame the then leader of the Opposition for having failed to get a majority; because it is well known that it is very difficult and dangerous to swop horses in crossing a stream. He was too late in the enunciation of that policy, and the result was the triumph of the National Policy, under the leadership of those who were entitled to claim its paternity. What happened? When the House met, from my place on the Government side, I congratulated the leader of the Opposition. I said: You have at last had the sagacity to remove a great barrier that stands in the way of your party returning to power. The question of the Canadian Pacific Railway has settled itself by the construction of that road and that question has been removed from your path; but the National Policy is dear to the hearts and judgment and intelligence of the people of this country, and you can never reach power without abandoning your hostility to that policy. That hostility, I said to the hon. gentleman, you have abandoned, and I congratulated him on the change, though with some misgivings, because, as I said, I felt that, under the circumstances, the time was not remote when the different parties in this House might change places, as was not undesirable occasionally.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

What then occurred? Why, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce stands responsible to this House and country for having then got up in his place and thrown over his leader, and treated with contempt the position his leader had taken and on which he had accepted my congratulations without a word of protest. But, in response to my congratulations, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce got up, kicked over the traces, and took the most violent and determined free trade attitude he had ever taken in this House. What was the result? The result was that the Hon. Edward Blake ceased to be the leader. From that day Mr. Blake practically gave up the leadership, and soon took the opportunity of abandoning the position altogether, and left the policy of the Liberal party of Canada to be controlled and directed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). What then followed? Then came forth the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, propounded by that gentleman as the means of getting the Liberal party into power. On the floor of this House, on the platform all over this country, the hon. gentleman declaimed upon the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which would involve the making of our tariff in Washington instead of at Ottawa, and discrimination by Canada against the mother country and the rest of the world in favour of the United States. In the most unqualified manner he declared that if it did involve discrimination against England, she must take the consequences. Canada must look to herself, and our only future lay in the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity, of free trade on the continent of North America, and making common cause with the United States against England and everybody else. What was the result? My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with that plastic nature which, unfortunately for Canada, he possesses, yielded to the tempter, surrendered his own judgment, if he had any, to this vile policy, committed himself to it in the most unmistakable manner. With what result? I do not hesitate to say here that had the policy of Mr. Blake been adopted and had the issue been simply a change of men, an ordinary change of Government, in 1891, Mr. Blake and his party would have been then returned to power. Hon. gentlemen opposite have done me the honour of saying that I abandoned my position of High Commissioner—or, rather, held on to it, for I did not resign—to come out to take part in that election, and that my action had a material result in bringing about the majority obtained by us in 1891. I do not say whether they were right or wrong, but nothing would have induced me, holding that high position—which I did not consider a party position at all—to have come out and taken part in the election of 1891 except my conviction that British Institutions were at stake.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do you want proof of that statement? You have either to accept my statement that British institutions were then at stake or discredit the ablest man who ever sat in your ranks, Mr. Edward Blake. When the great electorate was appealed to on that occasion, what did Mr. Blake do? He refused to stand for a constituency, and the day after the elections were over, he published, over his own signature, a letter in the London "Times," declaring that he had abandoned his party because he was not willing to fight under false colours, and because he believed that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was the father, was one that would land this country in commercial subjection to the United States, soon to be followed by political subjection. Those gentlemen had better be careful when they question the soundness of the position I take in this matter.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are on the horns of this dilemma. Either they must discredit the ablest man who ever served in their ranks or who ever led them or accept my statement. That being the issue I took part in the election, and felt that I was placing my position as High Commissioner entirely at stake, because it would be impossible for me to hold that office in the case of a change of Government under the circumstances. But I did not hesitate, when I felt there was at stake so vital an issue as that which the Minister of Trade and Commerce forced upon the country. I am not surprised, therefore, that when the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) became leader of the party he should have discovered that there was but one means by which he could reach power, and that was by giving, as he did give, directly or indirectly—I know indirectly—the positive declaration that if his party should succeed, Sir Richard Cartwright never would be Finance Minister. I say that boldly, and but for the fact that that declaration was circulated broadcast among the great manufacturing industries, among the people carrying on the business of the country, hon. gentlemen opposite would not have obtained power, even under the exceptional circumstances in which they did obtain it.

Now, Sir, that is the position the right hon. gentleman occupies. And, as I say, I am delighted to see him sitting on the Treasury benches. I am delighted that anything should happen to transform one of the most mischievous demagogues that Canada ever had into a loyal subject, a man prepared to stand by and uphold the British constitution and look after the interest of himself and his family. You can see, Sir, that I have no great admiration for the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Nevertheless, he has my sympathy. Why, what was the task imposed upon him; what was the punishment inflicted upon him for his sins? It was to become Minister of Trade and Commerce, and to find himself charged with dealing with the question of the fast Atlantic service, and, like Sinbad of old, to find an Old Man of the Sea on his back, in the person of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). I do not mean to insinuate, notwithstanding his many trans-Atlantic trips, that my hon. friend from Quebec West has been for the greater part of his time, since assuming office, more than half-seas over. But, if ever Sinbad was entitled to the sympathy of people who feel for those who suffer, this modern Sinbad, struggling and staggering about with his Old Man of the Sea upon his shoulders, is entitled to sympathy because of the difficulties with which he was compelled to face this question of a fast Atlantic service. But my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has more than justly punished the sins of this Sinbad of his Cabinet. And, more than that, I think that the right hon. gentleman's constituents in Quebec were entitled to something better at his hands than the treatment he has meted out to them. For, when he was thrust out of his own constituency, where he was known best and understood, he found a refuge in Quebec. Surely, the people of Quebec might look for something better at his hands than to be punished as they have been punished in regard to this fast Atlantic service. Is there any part of this country that is more directly and more vitally interested in that question than is the city of Quebec? What would it have meant for Quebec, if hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of their maladministration in regard to this matter, had obtained this service—as they would have obtained it but for the fatal influence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who refused to implement the contract made before he gained office—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Which was never made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is too late in saying that. I say, that the Messrs. Allan, not only representing the great pioneer service in Atlantic navigation between this and the mother country, but associated with one of the most powerful and wealthy firms to be found in Europe, the Allans of Glasgow, had entered into this contract. The Allans of Glasgow sent out one of its own members, and that contract was negotiated and arranged with myself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce of that time. And not only was the contract negotiated, but all the arrangements were made with Her Majesty's Government and to the satisfaction of that Government, to put that service into full operation two years ago.

And what is the position now? The hon. gentleman has brought in two contracts made with the Messrs. Petersen. I support those contracts. Why? Because I felt that we were bound to give these hon. gentlemen every opportunity to carry out the service that we knew, and that they had admitted, was of such importance to Canada. But I told them, when the first contract came in—and when it broke down and the second contract was made, as the hon. gentlemen know, I told them—that, having given a year to the constant study of the question in consultation with the ablest financiers, shipping men and others engaged in seafaring affairs, their contract was not worth the paper it was written on. A paltry question is now raised about the returning of the deposit of Messrs. Petersen. I do not hesitate to say, that I would be glad to see every penny of that deposit returned to them, because I believe they acted in good faith, because the steps they took were taken in the belief that they could carry out what they had undertaken. But, when they came to grapple with it, as I told the House it would be, they found it to be impracticable and incapable of accomplishment. I take this opportunity of saying, that I would not regret to see that deposit returned; I consider it an utterly insignificant matter, in comparison with the obtaining of this service? And, at the end of two years, where are we now? Is there a fast Atlantic service in sight? No, Sir. The bottle-necked steamer, with the hon. member for Quebec West at the prow and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce at the stern, lies stranded, broken and incapable of doing anything for anybody. And what about the people of Quebec—deluded, deceived by the First Minister, deceived by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, deceived by the member for Quebec West, who has held the promise to the ear and broken it to the hope. I believe I express the sentiments of the people of Quebec, when I say, that they long for the hour when the city of Quebec and its interest shall be represented on the floor of this House as they were represented by Sir Hector Langevin.

There was no more important practical question before this country, when these gentlemen took power, than this fast Atlantic service. Every one knows that, with the position nature had given, a position that no other part of the continent could occupy, with regard to the connection between Europe and America, and with a similar line of steamers to that running between England and New York, Canada could deliver letters and all mail matter so speedily as to defy competition. Practically the whole postal communication between North America and Europe would have crossed by our line of steamers. But that is one of the slightest and most inconsiderable features of the case. With a suitable line of steamers, plying to Quebec in summer and to Halifax in winter, and with the Dingley Bill and its vexatious regulations affecting passengers entering at New York, we should have had our steamers crowded with the wealth, and intelligence, and ability of the United States. Every person knows what it is to attract to the borders of a country such as Canada, with its unlimited resources and enormous advantages, people of this class, who can do so much to assist our development. But even that is not the most significant matter connected with this fast line, which, under the contract with Messrs. Allan, would have been in operation two years ago. Under that contract, not only would there have been as fine a fleet of steamers as ever crossed the Atlantic, crossing between the mother country and Canada, but the company would have been bound to provide all the cold storage that the Government demanded. What would that mean for Quebec? What would it mean for Ontario and for every section of this Dominion? It meant an increase in the value of every article of perishable goods raised in Canada, an increase in meat, fruit, poultry, eggs, butter; it meant an increase in its value to every farmer in Canada, and in every part of Canada. While on that subject I may say that I have on previous occasions complimented the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) for having humbly walked in the footsteps of his predecessors in the matter of cold storage. I am sorry to say that I am obliged to take it back. I find that in an address presented by the fruit-growers of the province of Nova Scotia to the Minister of Agriculture, they tell him that his cold storage system has been a complete failure, and they tell him that it is absolutely necessary to grapple with the cold storage question in a different manner from the manner in which he has grappled with it, if it is to be of any good to Canada. They tell him this in an address to that hon. gentleman himself. We find, moreover, that he is only putting $70,000 into the Estimates for this service. There is no service at this moment more vitally important to Canada than a system of cold storage by which the products of the Canadian farmer can be put into the only market that now remains for us, the market of Great Britain, and they must be put into that market in the shortest possible time by a fast Atlantic service, and by a complete system of cold storage, such as is adopted by the Australian provinces who, being 17,000 miles distant against our 3,000 miles, with the Red Sea to overcome, and an equatorial climate with a thermometer at 90, have yet been able, by that system, to take a better position in the markets of England than Canada can take in reference to butter and other perishable articles. But instead of that we find that hon. gentleman making a paltry and utterly insignificant saving of $15,000 this year in the cold storage system, which shows practically that he has abandoned it, and that the great agricultural population of Canada is to get no more benefit from it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) referred among other things, and referred in a tone of exultation, to the Drummond County Railway. Why, Sir, that is the last thing that I should have expected any man in this House to allude to, with the facts patent to the House as they stand now upon the public records. He said that an increase in the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway had resulted in connection with the Drummond County Railway. Did he tell the House the cost at which that has been purchased? Did he tell the House that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) had had the hardihood, the audacity, to bring down to this House a proposal to add $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 to the debt of Canada for the purpose of buying the Drummond Railway from Mr. Greenshields and for other purposes connected with it? He knows, and the Minister of Finance knows, that that increase of traffic has not removed or weakened in the slightest the burthen that the Intercolonial Railway is upon the Government of Canada, under this administration. That increase of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway would have occurred under any circumstances. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company had no Drummond County Railway, neither did the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But look at the receipts during the last two years under the present flourishing condition of things in Canada. Why, they say that they are rolling up by millions increased receipts, and yet all the increase on the Intercolonial Railway, an increase which we share relatively with other great railway lines of communication, is attributed to the Drummond County Railway. The Prime Minister has inflicted upon Quebec a deeper wrong than that which he inflicted upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he saddled him with that Old Man of the Sea who is sitting upon his shoulders with his legs wound round his neck, making his life a burden to him; I say that a deeper wrong than that was inflicted upon the city of Quebec when that Drummond County Railway was undertaken. The city of Quebec is a great historic city, and everybody deplures the thought of grass growing in its streets, and of its trade and commerce being wiped out and disappearing. What has this city been longing for, striving for, for years? It has been to bring the Intercolonial Railway into the city by means of a bridge. Does the First Minister, does the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), believe that the citizens of that ancient city are going to be satisfied with an annual meeting of half a dozen gentlemen who say they are going to form a company and build a bridge, when the only raison d'être, the only grounds upon which Parliament could properly be approached for aid to construct that bridge, would be to bring the Intercolonial Railway and Grand Trunk Railway and other lines into that city which will be of vast importance to it? What would it have cost this country to bring the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal, if that was considered an important question? By the contribution of $1,000,000, and by aid from the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway a bridge could have been put across the river that would bring all these railways into the city of Quebec. Then when we were there we would be in a position to say to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that great line of railway communication between Quebec and Montreal—the Minister of Railways and Canals knows that all that he would have had to say to them, would be: Gentlemen, you want me to take your trains and your traffic from St. John to Halifax and to give you the benefit of our terminal stations there, and I will do it in consideration of your taking the traffic, and cars, and passengers of the Intercolonial Railway from the city of Quebec up to the city of Montreal and giving me the advantage of your terminus there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). That would not have been a very fair trade for the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, the hon. gentleman when he says it would not have been a very fair trade knows perfectly well that it would not have cost the Government anything.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I know it would have cost the Government a great deal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He knows it would not have cost the Government anything, and he knows that all the city of Quebec had a right to look for, with the pledges they had received from both Governments and both parties, all they had a right to demand would have been accomplished. Where are you now? Why, does the hon. gentleman not know that at this moment, after this enormous expenditure in securing the Drummond County Railway, there is a potent demand, one that has to be responded to by the right hon. leader of the Government, for a large subsidy to a south shore line of railway to compete with the Drummond County Railway? That is the present position. But I do not intend, as this question is on the paper, to deal with it at length now. But I tell the Minister of Railways and Canals that he is deluding the people of this country into the belief that he is doing them a service, when he says that he will carry freight over the Intercolonial Railway 250 miles further round to the east side of the harbour of St. John, when the Government were already provided with every facility by a short line of railway, built at an enormous cost, to the west side of the city of St. John. He says he is going to carry that freight 250 miles for nothing in order to get it there, and compete with a company that has been subsidized by the Government under an impression that its rights would be protected. I am not speaking for them, I am speaking for the principle at stake. I say this Government have no right. I care not whether it is the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Grand Trunk Railway, or any other private company in Canada. I say this Government acts dishonestly when, having—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has certainly no right to use a remark of that kind in reference to the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a moment's reflection will satisfy you that I am not using the term improperly. I do not say wilful dishonesty, but I will put my argument, and leave it for you to say, Sir, whether it is honest or dishonest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is speaking to a point of order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not speaking to a point of order. I am going to put my argument, and then I will leave it for hon. gentlemen to say whether it is honest or dishonest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not the slightest doubt, in my own mind, that, to make the unqualified statement that the Government is dishonest, is not according to parliamentary practice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I abide by your decision, but I will undertake to produce fifty cases in which, with you sitting in the Chair, far greater latitude of language has been permitted. I say that distinctly; but, I abide by your decision. I put the case to the judgment, not of every dishonest—I will not say that—but of every honest man in this House, Mr. Speaker included, to say whether this is right or not. I ask the right hon. First Minister, I ask any intelligent man on either side of this House, what term he would use for a Government which, after an appropriation of public money had been made—I care not how large or how small—to induce a company to spend millions of their private capital in performing a certain work, turns around and applies to Parliament for public money to render the expenditure of that capital worthless. I will leave it to every hon. member of this House to say whether the term that I made use of is a proper one, and whether this is a fair and legitimate transaction for the Government of Canada to engage in. That is the position that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals places himself in to-day. When Minister of Railways and Canals, and after an enormous expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, I came down to this House and asked for a vote of a very large sum of public money to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a short line of railway from Montreal to the harbour of St. John.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). So as to compete with the Intercolonial Railway, and depreciate the value that had been imparted to the Intercolonial Railway by the expenditure of public money.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not sorry to allow the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to make an interruption. He never opens his mouth but he puts his foot in it, and he never put his foot into it worse than he did just now. The position was this: I said that the object of Canada is to have a port of its own, and it is not for this great Dominion to be dependent upon a port in the United States for its intercourse with other countries. I said that we had tried it and my experience as Minister of Railways and Canals, and the experience of every man in this country, who has given this subject attention, has proved beyond doubt, that it is impossible for the Intercolonial Railway, either at St. John or Halifax, to compete with a railway running to Portland.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). When did my hon. friend discover that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows as well as I know, when I discovered that. And he knows that when I had discovered it, I came to this House, frankly, and told the House what, in my judgment, it was absolutely necessary to do, and which was based upon the experience of the past, that brings everything to an absolute certainty. We found it impossible to compete, and having found that out, this House voted a large sum of money to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a short line of railway, the shortest that could be obtained, from Montreal to the harbour of St. John.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Through United States territory?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Was that the scheme, to build it from Montreal to St. John? I understood the hon. gentleman to say in Halifax that it was to build it to Halifax.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must have taken me for an idiot, if he supposes that I ever proposed anything so monstrous to this House, or, to this country, as to parallel a line of railway, built by the Government from St. John to Halifax, with a line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say that the hon. gentleman knows that it is perfectly childish; there is nothing in his Budget speech that compares, for childishness, with that statement. I ask you what the people of Quebec have a right to say, what the people of Canada have a right to say when the Minister of Railways and Canals, violating every principle that I hold, binds and controls the action of a Government, when the hon. Minister of Railways, in violation of every principle, comes down with an enormous expenditure and undertakes to ask this House to sustain a proposition, so monstrous, as to carry freight 250 miles further, at the same rate, when he knows, that the cost of the carriage has to be taken out of the taxpayers of this country? It may be that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals wanted to make a sweep in New Brunswick, and to capture the Conservatives of St. John, but it is at too great a cost to Canada when he incurs a debt of $750,000 of public money to furnish railway facilities to the east side of the harbour of St. John, when the people of St. John, by the most munificent efforts on their own part, combined with those of the Canadian Pacific Railway, have furnished all the facilities on the other side of the harbour. I ask the right hon. Prime Minister what he has to say to the people of Quebec, after they are side-tracked, and after they have been led to believe for many years that something would be done to raise that historic city into a position of more commercial importance, and when their hopes are swept aside by this enormous waste of public money that would have given Quebec everything that she had been led to expect by both Governments, and when a debt of, at least, $6,000,000 is put upon the people in order to sidetrack Quebec? The hon. Minister of Finance referred to this Drummond County Railway project as one of the great things that he was so proud of, and I, therefore, had, in passing, just to give this little hint to that hon. gentleman, and to tell him that he must not take the people of Canada for being quite so simple as he seems to imagine them.

To return to the subject under discussion, I must say that we all listened to that interesting essay on the Budget, not exactly with that keen freshness that everybody listened to something that is quite new, but we listened with interest to that carefully prepared essay, though in my experience, this House has never been similarly honoured. It reminded me, Mr. Speaker, of your custom of saying, upon the opening of the House, that for greater accuracy, you have obtained a copy of the Speech, and you give us the benefit of it. In passing, I might remind my hon. friend that his copy was not a very accurate one; at least, the French copy of the Speech from the Throne, was not a very accurate one to be put in the hands of the Speaker. I am finding no fault with the hon. Minister of Finance, but I could have called him to order at any moment, in the discussion, and he could have been prevented from being able to have this charming speech circulated in the country by simply drawing the attention of Mr. Speaker to the fact that the hon. gentleman was doing what no hon. gentleman has any right to do under the rules of this House. You, Mr. Speaker, did not see fit to call him to order, and I would have been very sorry to have done so, because I was listening with intense delight to every word he uttered. Why was I listening with intense delight? To me it was a most delectable sound when I remember that the hon. gentleman had spent years of the prime of his life in endeavouring to break down and destroy confederation—when I knew that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) had gone to the people and with all the force and power and eloquence he could use, had wrought up a demand in Nova Scotia for secession from Canada—when I knew that the policy of that hon. gentleman was to convince the people of Nova Scotia that everything that was vile, everything that was dishonourable, everything that was untrustworthy, was to be found in Canada—when I knew that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) had committed himself, under his leader to the declaration that he would put legislation on the statute-book that would wipe out everything that had the smell of Canada on it—when I remembered that this gentleman (Mr. Fielding) had spent years of his life in a vain, abortive effort to break down and destroy this confederation, that he now vaunts before the people of this country as the most magnificent act of statesmanship ever accomplished.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) mean to say that I vaunt as magnificent the manner in which he carried confederation? Sir, that is what I have denounced before this country, and that is what I shall never cease to denounce whether the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is present or absent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, that is a little too thin. He (Mr. Fielding) could have denounced the man; he could have denounced the mode in which confederation was carried, but he did not do that. If he had done that I would rest content; but, Sir, he denounced confederation itself, and I can produce pages and volumes coming from the lips of the hon. gentleman, and from the press that he controlled, to show that everything was done by him that man could do; not against me, but against confederation itself. He did everything a man could do to hold confederation up to obloquy, to odium, and to hatred, and to induce the people of Nova Scotia to declare that they would not permit themselves to be called Canadians. Who would imagine that it was the same man who spoke for three hours on the floor of this Parliament the other day? I listened to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) happy, never more happy in my life: I listened to his eulogium of everything Canadian, and his arguments to show what a great nation Canada had become. Who can doubt the admiration with which I hung on the words coming from the eloquent lips of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). A greater treat it was impossible to enjoy, and the greatest service my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) can do me, the greatest service he can do his province of Nova Scotia is to put a copy of his speech in the hands of every intelligent Nova Scotian.

But, Mr. Speaker, that speech ought not to have been delivered in the jubilant manner assumed by the hon. gentleman; it ought to have been delivered in that penitential mood that the greatest crimes are atoned for. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) should have had a white sheet around him; he should have had the grace to ask for absolution from his deceived countrymen for the manner in which he had played upon their passions and upon their feelings. When the late Hon. Joseph Howe—and it was the mistake of his lifetime—committed himself in an unfortunate hour to an attack upon confederation, he had no more zealous, no more determined supporter than the present Minister of Finance. But, Sir, when that great man, finding that all he could do would have only the effect of destroying his country; when he turned around and said: Now that I have exhausted all my efforts in conjunction with the Minister of Finance to break up confederation, and now that I have failed, I will do my best to make it a success; what did the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) do in this crisis? When that great man, Joseph Howe—for he was a great man, and his memory will always be revered—when Joseph Howe said that he would change his attitude and support that confederation that he had formerly denounced, he was hounded to death by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and those who were associated with him. They turned upon the Hon. Joseph Howe and the English language could not supply terms for them sufficiently violent and odious to describe the character of the great Nova Scotian, and as I say, they hounded him into an untimely grave. And, why did they do this? They did it because Joseph Howe did exactly what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) stands up hour after hour in this House, in this year of Our Lord 1899, to do, namely, to hold up to the delight and admiration of our people, Canada as one of the greatest nations the sun has ever shone upon.

That was the reason why I listened to the Minister of Finance with such admiration. Why, Sir, I have never seen any exhibitor in any dime museum or place of like distinguished character; I have never seen any dime museum exhibitor parade the three graces with greater delectation, and point out all the charms of form and feature to an admiring audience than did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) dwell on the beauties of these three graces—confederation, the National Policy and the Canadian Pacific Railway. During the three mortal hours that he spoke, he took back the work of years of his life.

Now as to the point raised by the hon. gentleman, as to the mode in which confederation was carried. He cannot escape on that. What did the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) do when a motion was made in the Parliament of old Canada to refer the question to the people? He voted it down. And what did Alex. Mackenzie and George Brown—whom the Finance Minister claims to be a follower of—what did they do? They voted down the principle adopted in the old Parliament of Canada led by that great Rouge leader, Mr. Dorion, who was also hostile to confederation; they voted down the proposal then made to have confederation referred to the people, and they voted it down as being utterly useless and unconstitutional. Therefore, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) is not in a position to attack me, even for the mode in which confederation was carried. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows that notwithstanding his puny attacks, notwithstanding the great advantage which the party had in being led by that most eloquent Nova Scotian Joseph Howe, he knows that when the people of Nova Scotia came to their second sober thought and learned what the position of Canada and the Canadians was, sixteen out of twenty-one members were elected by the people of that province to stand at my back in this House of Commons and to vote down the policy of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding). But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) is like that eminent Yankee stump orator who declared that although the principles he announced were the solemn convictions of a lifetime, and as dear to him as his life-blood, yet if the people did not agree with those principles, he could change them. And so the Minister of Finance, when the time came that he found his future as a public man, required that he should swallow himself and swallow all these bitter diatribes against Canada and Canadians as he rode to the pathway of the Ministership of Finance, then, as the Yankee stump orator said, he discovered that he could change his principles in the twinkling of an eye.

Now, Sir, what about the National Policy? Is it a controversy as to whom the paternity belongs, is it a controversy as to whether it exists in Canada to-day? Well, that can be very easily settled. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) might as well undertake to convince this House that a full-blooded negro could claim the paternity of a white child as that he could claim the paternity of the National Policy which to-day exists in Canada. One is as easy as the other. They are both utterly at variance with nature and common sense and both claims would be repudiated by all.

And what is the National Policy? When the hon. gentleman exhausted his three hours' speech of magnificent eulogium on Canada, we knew that he was compelled to sit down without answering the challenge which I had thrown out on the floor of this House to him or to any other man of the Liberal party, to show that this Government can claim one jot or tittle of credit for the prosperity that Canada now enjoys. He knows that that challenge is unanswered. He closed his three hours' speech without an attempt to show that in one single particular could they lay claim to anything that has contributed to the present prosperity of Canada. I am prepared to show that all they have done in tinkering, with their 'prentice hand, at the National Policy, has been to injure and interfere with the progress and prosperity of the country. Fortunately that child which they attempted to strangle in its cradle, that child which the Minister of Trade and Commerce ventured to visit with his most dire objurgations from the moment of its birth, has grown to such a vigour of manhood, that they are only too glad to take shelter beneath the arm of that National Policy which has made Canada what it is to-day.

Then we come to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Minister of Trade and Commerce laughed at the idea, when we told him that we were going to get a revenue by putting on high taxes. Why, he said, the imports are small enough now, but if you want to extinguish them altogether, put on a high tariff, and you will soon do it. Well, Sir, the fact remains that the revenue of $22,500,000 of that day has, under the fostering protection of that great National Policy, reached over $46,000,000 to-day. That is the answer. What, I ask, would Canada be to-day but for the National Policy? Why, Sir, that king of deficits, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce in those days used to be styled, who, with all the additional taxes he imposed on the people, could not get money enough to enable him to wash one hand with the other, to carry on the ordinary affairs of the country, much less to grapple with such a great enterprise as the Canadian Pacific Railway, knows that that policy has enabled Canadians, with Canadian hands, on Canadian soil, to do the work, and to lift Canada out of that slough of despond into which it fell under the administration of the hon. gentleman. That great enterprise has made Canada the cynosure of all eyes; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the whilom secessionist, the man who hated and endeavoured to inspire hatred of everything Canadian, stands here and spends hours of his time in holding it up as the most magnificent achievement ever accomplished in any country; and he is quite right. Well, I say, what about the Canadian Pacific Railway? As late as 1880 you find a resolution put on the Journals of the House of Commons of Canada, declaring that it was in the interest of Canada that further expenditure in British Columbia in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway should be stopped. What did that mean? $14,000,000 had then been expended in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and $8,000,000 of work was then under contract in British Columbia. That resolution was supported by the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and by every other Liberal who is in this House now and was in the House then. What would that vote have meant had it prevailed? It would have meant striking down—and every man with a head on his shoulders knows it—that great means of making this confederation of Canada practicable—changing it from being a paper confederation into a vital, living, vigorous confederation that makes a nation of Canada. That would all have been stopped had these hon. gentlemen been able in 1880 to carry out their purpose. I do not blame them, Sir. I have no doubt they did what they thought was right. I have no doubt their incapacity to grapple with the first principles of politico-economical science was what troubled them. They had not studied this question. They had no faith in Canada. They said, what, do you mean to tell us that you are going to build, at such enormous cost to the country, a railroad from Lake Nipissing in Ontario, to the shores of the Pacific Ocean, when there is only one village from end to end of the line with 400 people in it, and the whole country through which it passes is a desert inhabited by savages and wild animals? Where is the traffic to come from? You cannot build the road. What was the position of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, able man as he was? When the contract was made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build the line in ten years, he put on record the declaration that the whole resources of the British Empire could not do the work, much less Canada with its less than five millions of people at that time. But, Sir, we believed that, with the inexhaustible resources and enormous natural wealth which Canada possessed, the giving of facilities for traffic would create traffic. Where are those hon. gentlemen now with all their gloomy predictions? With regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway they are just where they are with regard to the National Policy, under which they said we could not get a revenue, when we have shown that it has increased from $22,500,000 to $46,000,000. Why, they said that after the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, you could not operate it; and yet during the last year that railway had a gross revenue of over $28,000,000, a larger revenue than the whole of Canada had when the work was undertaken, and a net revenue of $10,000,000; and you have the common stock of that great enterprise standing to-day above par in the city of London. What does that mean for Canada? Why, Sir, it is a great advertisement. What was one of the greatest drawbacks that Canada suffered from in old times? It was the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway had been built at the expense of English shareholders, 20,000 or 30,000 of whom knew that Canada was the sink-hole in which they had lost all their money. I rejoice to know that that company, under its present able management, bids fair steadily to rise and relieve itself from that position, and to command the confidence of the capitalists. There is not a man in Canada who is not interested in seeing these great commercial enterprises, let them be in whose hands they may, so succeed as to lead people who invest their money in Canada to believe that they have made a good investment. But, Sir, what is the position of these hon. gentlemen? Why, Sir, they are in a position to know that this great work of completing the confederation and opening up our country from sea to sea by a great international line of railway, is not their work, but has been accomplished under the National Policy, in spite of all the efforts one and all of them could make to bring it down. So I tell my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), that I ask no greater favour at his hands than to send broadcast over Canada this evidence that he and all his party utterly failed to comprehend the position of Canada, and that it remained for the Liberal-Conservatives of this country to build up this country until it has become the great nation that attracts the admiration of the world. What were we told of the credit of the country by the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Why, he told us: Engage in this frightful undertaking, commit yourselves to these subsidies for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the credit of our country will be gone. You will not be able to borrow a dollar in the money market of the world for any purpose, however necessary, because you will have ruined our credit irretrievably. Well, just as mistaken in that as in everything else connected with the public affairs of the country, he wakes up and finds that, when all the obligations were incurred, when all the debts were placed on the shoulders of Canada, connected with the construction of that road, I was able to cross the Atlantic and put the first 3 per cent loan on the market ever floated on the English market by any colony in the world. He knows that, when the present Government came into power we handed over office into their hands with the proud conviction that the credit of Canada had attained the highest point it had ever attained in the history of this country, and that there was no country in the world, except the United Kingdom itself, whose debentures demanded so high a price. The hon. gentleman went into a laboured explanation to show why our credit was not as good to-day as it was when they came into power. I am not going into an argument, but I state the fact, that the 3 per cent securities, that were up to 108 when the hon. gentlemen got into power, have, somehow or other, got down to 102, and that the 2½ per cent loan which the hon. gentleman put on the market, is, I believe, to-day below the rate at which it was floated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I have given reasons to the House for the great pleasure with which I listened to the hon. gentleman's speech; but he made a personal reference to me which I must not pass by unnoticed. He wanted to know, in the course of his speech, why, on the eve of a general election, I had told the people that we could govern the country for less than the Liberal party. I did say so, and I will give the hon. gentleman the grounds on which I made that statement, and prove its correctness. I hold in my hand a copy of the Year-book, in which these statistics are given in tabulated form, and offer interesting evidence. I find that, from 1874 to 1878, when the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was Minister of Public Works and had charge of the Intercolonial, the deficit on that road was—I shall only give the larger figures—in 1874, $954,000; in 1875, it was $695,000; in 1876, $387,000; in 1877, $605,000; in 1878, $518,000; which totals up, for the five years during which the Intercolonial was administered by Mr. Mackenzie, $3,151,463.

I had the honour of succeeding Mr. Mackenzie as Minister of Public Works, and had the Department of Railways and Canals under my control, and I shall give the figures and leave hon. gentlemen to decide, as to which was best qualified to carry on the great public works of this country in the most economical manner. In 1880, the deficit was $138,000; in 1881, it was $74,000; in 1882, $71,000; in 1883, $109,000; in 1884, $83,000; in all, $478,145 during the five years of my administration, as against $3,151,463 during the five years of Mr. Mackenzie's administration, or a balance to my credit of only $2,673,318. That is only one illustration of what this country will always find. It will always find that the people who understand political economy are the Liberal-Conservatives.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And the people who do not understand political economy, and who, when they have the opportunity, dip their hands into the treasury of Canada right up to the elbow, are the Liberal party, who are never more liberal than when helping themselves. Let me draw the attention of the House to further evidence on this matter, by contrasting the administration of the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) with the present. Under Mr. Haggart's administration, the deficit on the Intercolonial in 1893 was $26,000; in 1894, it was $47,000; in 1895, $54,000; or, during the three years, the total deficit was $128,310. Then the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) got his hand into the public treasury, and with the usual result. We find, that, in 1897, the deficit under Mr. Blair was $135,000, and in 1898, $263,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The hon. gentleman is entirely astray in his figures. He will have to reinform himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall let this go on "Hansard," and settle the question with my hon. friend; and I am confident, that, if there be any slight inaccuracy, it will be found the other way. It will be found that, against Mr. Haggart's deficits during three years of $128,310, Mr. Blair has managed in two years to make the deficit $409,288, and I believe that this latter figure, when we get a little more daylight into this matter, will be very much increased.

I hope it is not necessary for me to say any more to my hon. friend in support of my contention, that the Conservatives understand political economy, and practise it, and that hon. gentlemen do not know anything about it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Where does the political economy come in, in that calculation?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will tell the hon. gentleman. It comes in in this way, that the man who understands political economic science—and I am inclined to think, if it is not too late in life, that my hon. friend would do well to resort to Queen's College where a chair on that science has been founded in memory of the Rt. Hon. Sir John Macdonald, and follow the lectures there—it comes in in this way, that the man who has any knowledge of political economic science will not pay $2,100,000 for a railway which has been hawked about for $500,000. And now I come to the only point in which, so far as I could follow his speech, the hon. Finance Minister claimed for this Government the credit of having done anything to bring Canada to its present wonderful position. I say it was the only point I noted, although I followed the speech closely, as I usually follow an interesting essay that shows that a good deal of the midnight oil has been consumed in its preparation. The point referred to by the hon. gentleman was the policy of preferential trade. The hon. gentleman ventured to remind me that when that policy was propounded I repudiated it. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He will have to cast his mind back with a little more care and a little more regard for the facts as they have transpired on the floor of this House. When the hon. gentleman proposed his policy of 1896, I did denounce it. What was that policy? Was it a policy to give England a reduction of 12½ per cent in one year and 12½ per cent a year later—a total of 25 per cent? Not at all. Nobody knows better than the right hon.

leader of the Government that that was not the policy. That right hon. gentleman would have had no Cobden medal decorating his breast if that had been his policy. I want to ask the right hon. gentleman whether I am right or wrong when I say that when the Cobden medal was presented to him by Lord Farrer it was with the distinct statement that they would not have been there to confer any such honour upon him if the policy brought down by the Government, of which he was the head, had been a policy of discrimination in favour of England. He declared that neither he nor any other Cobdenite would do honour to a man who would strike at the very foundation of Cobdenism as would be done by discrimination. It was because their policy as propounded was declared to be an offer open to the world that the Cobden medal was presented to him. That policy was not the least like the policy we are all satisfied with to-day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I echo that "hear, hear," from the bottom of my heart. I know perfectly well that the greatest piece of political good fortune could have fallen to the party which I have the honour to lead, would have been to have hon. gentlemen opposite keep their pledges to the country. Had they done so, we should have already have occupied the places that they now occupy. They would have been compelled by the very men behind them to abdicate their positions. But it would have been an equally great misfortune to the country had the National Policy, for which we worked so long and so successfully, been torn down. We felt, as Liberal-Conservatives have always felt, that there is something higher than party success, that the point for the public man to keep his eyes steadily fixed upon is the good of the country. No man is more rejoiced than I am to see the ground cut from under our feet, as literally, it has been, by the adoption of the National Policy by hon. gentlemen opposite. I would rather remain to the left of the Speaker to the end of my life, be it as short as it may, I would rather have my children after me occupy the same position than obtain power at the sacrifice of what I know to be the best interests of my country. Feeling that, we say that the Government of this country, although we criticise them, although we accuse them of having acted disingenuously, we rejoice to see that when they were called upon to grapple with these questions, they thought more of the interests of Canada than they did of their own pledges and promises. There are great questions with which this Government should grapple now and here, questions involving the largest interests of the country. They are assured in advance of my support if they will deal with them in a proper manner. I will surrender the position I occupy, if necessary, to vote with them in maintaining a policy that, in my judgment, will promote the best interests of the country. On this question of preferential trade, the hon. Minister of Finance took a great deal of trouble to show that he had not deceived the English people. A greater delusion never was practiced upon the people of any country than that practiced upon the people of England in the policy propounded by hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, Sir, the right hon. First Minister stated when the policy was brought in that there was only one country in the world that could take advantage of Canada's offer. The hon. gentleman says that the press understood it. I can point him to a long and laboured article, written by a financial gentleman in England and published in a most influential quarterly, pointing out that the policy of the Government in Canada had the effect of extending these tariff concessions only to such countries as received their produce free of any charge whatever. Was that a mistake or not? I hold in my hand a copy of the organ of the Liberal party in England, the "Daily Chronicle," which deals with this tariff after four months' experience:

A DISAPPOINTING TARIFF.—SOME STARTLING FIGURES.

"What is the matter with our new tariff?"

That question is being eagerly discussed just now in Canada and in Canadian circles in this country. The tariff, with its 12½ per cent reduction upon British goods entering Canada, was brought in with a splendid flourish of trumpets.

Does the House remember when I told my hon. friend that he could not do what he proposed? And he said: But I have done it; all over Canada, from Cape North to the Pacific, every custom-house officer has his orders to give the benefit to England, and to-morrow those instructions will be carried out. But the hon. gentleman found out, like a good many others who have not studied politico-economic science, that he did not know what he was talking about.

A new era had dawned in the history of the Empire. For the first time a British colony came forward, and out of the pure gratitude of its heart for the joys of British citizenship, and without asking fee or reward, pulled down its barriers against British trade, and gave the British manufacturer practically the free run of his country from Atlantic to Pacific. This free gift was the talk of the Jubilee celebrations.

I think my right hon. friend will have some recollection of that matter——and it would fill a good-sized volume to reproduce one-half the eulogies which were bestowed upon Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Canadian Government and people because of their large-handed magnanimity.

That is perfectly true; but they found it was a perfect delusion:

Well, more than four months have elapsed since British goods enjoyed this reduced tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

and the result is, to say the least, somewhat startling. It is set out in detail in the "Canadian Gazette," upon the basis of the returns of the English Board of Trade, and will, it is believed, instead of an increased British export trade with Canada, show there is a heavy decline.

Before the year was out, my hon. friend had the candour, before a great meeting in Sheffield to make the confession—which, no doubt, was good for his soul—that there was no preferential tariff. But he stated, "You will have it next year," and next year they got it. I say that no answer can be given to the exposure that my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) made in the House yesterday on that subject. We are now at the eight months of the 25 per cent preference pretended to be given, but it was proved to be a complete delusion, for there is a deficit of 7 per cent in British trade, absolutely less than the trade that came to this country before these gentlemen came to the Treasury benches, in 1896. I ask if it is any wonder that people in England wake up and say: Well, we have been subjected to a perfect delusion; we were led to expect that something marvellous would happen. But that takes me away from my subject.

I think I have a right to ask my hon. friend whether he has returned the Cobden medal. It is not a personal question; it is a matter of public importance. That Cobden medal was hung around the hon. gentleman's neck by Lord Farrer on the distinct statement that if he was going to do what he has since done, and what his Government have done, that is, make a discriminatory tariff in favour of England, they would not give it. Now, does he hold it on false pretenses or not? The ground is cut from under his feet by the very statement upon which that medal was awarded to him. I suppose the hon. gentleman will say: I took it in good faith from Lord Farrer, but from the fact that my Minister of Finance made a pledge as to what Canada would do when the treaties were abolished, I had no alternative. Now the hon. gentleman must say that he is a discriminator, he is not a Cobdenite, he is not a free trader, he has gone in for a National Policy for Canada and for discriminating in favour of one country over others. Now, I was glad to hear, after what had taken place, the declaration made by the right hon. leader of the Government, when addressing the House in an impassioned speech which has been thought worthy of infinite reproduction all over Canada, and which I do not regret. He declared that he had come to the conclusion that Canada did not want reciprocity with the United States. Now, I ask the right hon. gentleman here if that is the conclusion to which he has come after six months of negotiations with the United States what is going to take him back to Washington on the second day of next August to resume those negotiations? Does he want to force upon Canada something that Canada does not want? No doubt, he is wiser than he was when he went down, first to Quebec and then to Washington. I want to know whether the right hon. gentleman intends to go back and endeavour to obtain that which Canada does not want? He has got to settle that question with the Minister of Finance, who has taken it out of his hands. We all listened with profound astonishment to a statement of the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech, repudiating a public declaration of his leader, and the leader of the Canadian delegation entrusted with these international negotiations. Whom are we to believe? Under which King Benzonian? Are we to accept the declaration of the Minister of Finance that he still believes in reciprocity with the United States, or are we to take the straightforward declaration made by the leader of this Government that he has discovered, what a good many people had discovered long ago, that while at one time reciprocity with the United States was of the most vital consequence to the people of Canada, that time has passed away.

Mr. EDWARDS. Not a bit of it

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, the Minister of Finance has got one supporter on that side of the House. I am afraid if the Minister of Finance gets too many supporters, we will have to have a new Premier; because, while I have said that the Minister of Finance is ready to swallow himself, I have not, on this occasion, at all events, said that in regard to the Prime Minister. I think, therefore, we ought to be taken into the confidence of hon. gentlemen opposite on that point. It is a very alarming thing. A house divided against itself cannot stand. It becomes of great importance for us to know, in view of the fact that these hon. gentlemen are to be re-entrusted with the important duty of representing Canada on this great international commission, what are their views, and what are their principles. You cannot deny that we were entitled to know. You have denied us that which you would have been compelled to disclose if you had closed that conference instead of adjourning it, as I hold you were bound to do. You would have been compelled to disclose the protocol of what had taken place on these various negotiations, reciprocity among the rest. But you have tied the hands of Parliament, you have prevented us for a time from taking up and carrying out these great measures that lie at the foundation of the prosperity of this country. I say, therefore, that before you get rid of us and go with a free hand to deal with these great interests, we have a right to have this question settled here and now, before this House rises; we have a right to demand a plain, manly and straightforward declaration of where we are, and what you propose to do with regard to those important interests.

Now, Sir, I may say that I took occasion, in a former speech, to which I must not now refer, to speak highly of the great ability and attainments of a gentleman connected with that commission. I mean the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Well, I want to know what are the views and opinions of this Government in relation to a question upon which that hon. gentleman's views are pretty well known. It is a matter of public importance, because, as I said before, a house divided against itself cannot stand. We have a right to know whether these gentlemen, after six months' experience in these negotiations, agree with each other, and what are the leading principles that will guide them in the future. The hon. member for North Norfolk has stated over his own signature, at all events, he has put on record in an important speech he delivered in the city of Chicago, his opinion on the present position of affairs, after two years and a half of Liberal administration, conducted by these hon. gentlemen who were to bring about a most delightful change with the great republic to the south of us. It would appear from his speech that this Government, after two years and a half of the most bungling mismanagement, have brought the relations between Canada and the United States into a condition that justifies the hon. gentleman in saying that a bitterer feeling exists in Canada to-day than ever before towards the United States of America. Is that true? If it is, I think it demands some attention, some consideration at the hands of a Government who led the infatuated and deluded people of Canada to believe that all that was necessary to secure the most harmonious relations with the United States was to put them in power.

Now, Sir, I have put the question to these hon. gentlemen as to what the enunciation of that policy is; they do not seem to attach any importance to that. They have taken the ground, having gained power, that their policy was of no importance to the country at all, that it could change from day to day and from hour to hour, that they were mere opportunists, having no principles or policy, and, I believe, that is really what is the case. With this utter absence of principle or policy, they expect to hold their friends behind them, together, on the most important questions; and, in a most vital manner, by judgeships and appointments to high offices of various kinds, in the hope of getting some more manageable persons in their places, by whom, again, they will be obliged to use the same means of keeping them together. It reminds me of the position taken by a passenger on a car going through the Rocky Mountains. The passenger wanted to see the country, and he stood on the platform of the rear car. The conductor coming along said, "Sir, you cannot stand here." "Cannot stand here," said the passenger, "I want to see the scenery and the country." "But," replied the conductor, "it is contrary to orders, and I cannot allow you to stand here," "Is not the platform made to stand on," asked the passenger. "No," said the conductor, "this platform is made to get in on." Hon. gentlemen opposite have had a platform, not to stand on but a platform to get in on.

Now, I was a little amused—I do not see the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) in his place—but, I was a little amused at the attempt to whitewash the hon. Postmaster General that the hon. Minister of Finance indulged in during his speech, or, rather his essay. He says that the post office betterment for the year is $538,937. This is a very different story from that which has been told to the people all over the country for the last nine months. We have been told all over the country, that the hon. Postmaster General has reduced a deficit of $750,000, or thereabouts, down to something like $50,000. That does not appear in the Budget speech.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Two different periods are dealt with—1898 and 1897.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, I want to know where this money came from. How is there a betterment shown of $538,937? A betterment, you say, because the receipts of the post office and the expenditures show these figures, and there is a betterment to that extent. But, where is a betterment shown there? I do not hesitate to say that the financial position of the Post Office Department, in any country in the world, was ever improved by the disgraceful manner in which this was done. We have had the hon. Postmaster General held up in this House to the admiration of Canada because of his admirable management of the Post Office Department. Sir, I say, in the presence of this House, that, in my judgment, the evidence is ample to show that the Post Office Department has been carried on with an utter disregard of the just rights of the people on the part of the hon. Postmaster General, such as no country in the world was ever scandalized with before. The hon. Postmaster General undertook to contradict the statement made by the correspondent of the "Globe" newspaper, that the mail service in the Yukon was in a deplorable condition. The hon. Postmaster General gave that statement a flat denial. Despite the denial of the hon. gentleman, the press and people know that in the Yukon, and, aye, in British Columbia, and in many other parts of Canada, the hon. Postmaster General has starved the service in order to show some advantage to himself, some advantage of his management, and he has been guilty of cruelty and injustice, and has ignored the interests of the people in a way that has never been done by any Government before. I have information from right and left, beyond all possible error, in respect to mail routes being curtailed, and a variety of things done in a way that has never been done before. We have come to this that we know how it is that the hon. Postmaster General dared to trifle with the postal service of the Yukon, in the way that he has done. A greater scandal has never been presented in reference to the administration of a public department—tons of mail matter lying strewed along the route, hidden under boats, cached all over the country, in utter disregard of everything right. Men who have been paying over a million of dollars—I care not for the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) which, it appears, will require a little qualification—but there is a million and a half of dollars contributed by these miners, men who have taken their lives in their hands, who have gone out there at great personal peril to themselves, who have gone out to exploit that part of Canada, and from whom the most onerous exactions ever inflicted upon a mining population, in any part of the world, were made—these men had a right to expect that their mail communication with their wives and families, with business men who had hundreds of thousands of dollars, perhaps, invested in these important enterprises, would be kept up, that they would receive the letters sent to them from the outside, and that the people outside would receive the letters sent from them. I say that you may search this country, or any country in the world, in vain to find such an utter disregard to right and justice. There is where it comes in. How did the hon. Postmaster General get this betterment? By compelling the mounted policemen to do the duties of the post office. Did he pay them when he saddled upon the Mounted Police of this country the work that he was bound to provide for, and when he received the money of the country, the people, whose correspondence had to be carried in, expected that he would do the work. Major Walsh in his report complains that the policemen are taken away from their proper duties. No person has a higher opinion of the Mounted Police, with the manner in which they have discharged their duties, than I have. It has been the most creditable to them, and it is only now that they are dragged into disgrace and discredit by having imposed upon them duties which they never contracted to do, and for which they are entirely disqualified. Is that where the betterment of $538,937 comes in? It would have taken every dollar of what has been called the betterment, if the hon. Postmaster General had maintained that service as every humble miner—I care not how humble his position—who was paying his money into the treasury of Canada, an enormous exaction, was entitled to expect. This is a matter that demands attention at the hands of this House, and I give the hon. Postmaster General notice, that when the estimates for the postal service come up, I shall consider it the duty of every hon. member on this side of the House, to aid in getting the information as to why it is that the fair name of Canada, and the administration of the post office of Canada, has been disgraced as it has been under the administration of the hon. Postmaster General. The postal service was handed over to policemen, and it was a duty utterly apart from all their duties, and one which it was impossible they could properly perform. If you read Major-General Hutton's report, you will find that, while the Mounted Police have been performing duties for the Postmaster General, and enabling the Minister of Finance to show this betterment of half a million dollars, the military force of Canada, maintained at a very great cost to the country, has been drawn upon, improperly and unnecessarily, to do duties which should be performed by the Mounted Police. Indeed, in one sense, the permanent force did not discharge the duties of the Mounted Police, for they had no duties to perform, but I suppose, that half a million dollars at least was uselessly extracted from the people by this Government, who seem to have lost every idea of governing the country according to established and well-defined principles. You have only to read Major-General Hutton's report to find, that, on account of the mismanagement by the Government, our very moderate regular force has all been disorganized, and you will find, that the Major-General demands from the Government, that they must either return these 200 men who were sent up to the Yukon without the slightest necessity in the world, or replace them with a similar number. I repeat, there was no necessity for this military expedition to the Yukon, because the Mounted Police were able to maintain for us a reputation for order and propriety such as no country in the world could equal, and yet you have this enormous charge foisted on the revenue of Canada, and you have the military service for which this country pays so much, disorganized, for no other reason than that there may have been two or three officers, or some other persons, to be provided for, and that there may have been transport of men and materials to be jobbed by parties very closely connected with the Government of this country. That, Sir, will demand a rigid and careful investigation. Major Walsh shows that the Mounted Police were utterly incapable of discharging the postal duties with which they were charged, and it also shows that there was not the slightest necessity for the military to be sent there at enormous expense—40 cents a pound for the carriage of supplies as far as Teslin Lake paid over to the Hudson Bay Company; and the transport of materials through the United States handed over by the Department of Militia to some bankrupt people who were not able to perform the duty. I only remark on that, in connection with the attempt of the Finance Minister to use his whitewash brush a little on the Postmaster General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I find a statement made by the Minister of Finance in this connection that altogether contradicts a statement made by the Minister of the Interior. But that is nothing new, for we are accustomed to have the statement of the Minister of the Interior frequently contradicted, either by himself, or by his officials, or by other parties. In the "Globe" of March 11th, 1899, Mr. Sifton is reported as saying, at Stratford:

The Administration had to take proper steps for the government of the Yukon, and the result was a very considerable expense. Last year this came to $647,000, but owing to the policy the Government had pursued in that country, there was a revenue of $1,530,000.

That statement shows, that there was a surplus of $883,000 paid into the treasury of Canada last year by the miners of the Yukon, who are subject to this tyrannical and oppressive tax. And yet the mail service, the most vital matter connected with the family and business of the men exiled there, notwithstanding that surplus in the hands of the Government, was utterly neglected and disorganized. But the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) gave us another account, for he said:

The expenditure in the Yukon for 1897-98-99 is $1,844,613, and the revenue $3,336 less.

These figures are certainly very extraordinary, when compared with the figures given at Stratford by the Minister of the Interior.

Now, Sir, I come to the temporary loan which the Finance Minister dealt with, and I have no exception to take to his argument in reference to that: but I want to draw attention to the fact, that for that temporary loan he paid the Bank of Montreal  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. With that I do not cavil, but I do say, that it was a fortunate thing for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), that, when he had the cruelty to propose to this House to reduce the interest on savings bank deposits to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, the Opposition stood between him and that improvident project. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) fought for it like a tiger, in this House; he fought for the right to strike down the payments to the thrifty depositors in the savings banks from 3 per cent to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and he cannot be too thankful to the Opposition for preventing him doing that. The hon. gentlemen opposite are in office, but in this matter they were not in power. The question was so ventilated by the Opposition, that the Government had to recede from that proposition, and they were compelled to take their hands off the throat of the thrifty depositor in the savings banks, and allow him 3 per cent interest. The effect of that reduction of interest would have been a large withdrawal of money from the savings banks, and there would, of necessity, be a largely increased temporary loan from the Bank of Montreal at a rate of 1 per cent more than it was proposed to pay the savings bank depositors. I trust that fact will make the Finance Minister very careful in his attempt to carry out, as he has threatened, should the opportunity offer, this proposal to reduce the interest on the savings bank deposits.

I was much struck with a little observation which the Finance Minister made in the course of his interesting essay. Mind, Sir, it was not a Budget speech; it was not a speech delivered in Parliament, as that which my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) delivered last night, with the help of only a few notes and with brief time for consideration. The essay of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was carefully prepared with the midnight oil, and every figure and word written down, as it was read to this House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was making a contrast between the position of the late Government and the position of the present Government in regard to the average increase of the public debt. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) said to him: Why, surely, you do not intend to charge that the increased public debt of 1896 was not accidental? "Oh, no," said the Finance Minister, "if my memory serves me right, there was a little sum of $2,400,000 that has to come off that account." Well, Mr. Speaker, the memory of the Finance Minister served him very badly, and it does not look so much like a lapse of memory as it does like an attempt to mislead this House in reference to the very important question of the extent to which the public debt is being rolled up.

Now, Sir, there is one subject which the hon. gentleman did not touch upon in his Budget speech, but which I hope he will deal with before this House rises. I need not say to the House that but for the iron policy adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party and by this House in 1887, in which there was a great change in the iron tariff, there would not be a blow struck in connection with the iron industry in Canada today. The hon. gentleman, not in the interest of the mother country, but in the interest of the United States of America, anxious apparently to take away the very arms which the negotiators were to have when they went to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, cut down everything that was calculated to be advantageous to Canada in dealing with the United States, and among other things, made a heavy reduction in the duties on iron. Now, Sir, I hope the attention of the House was struck by the remark made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), in regard to Mr. Courtney's speech in the House of Commons of England, in which Mr. Courtney, than whom no gentleman is better qualified to speak on such a question, drew attention to the fact that the time had come when England could not compete with the United States of America in coal and in iron. I draw the attention of my hon. friend to that point as one which affords him an opportunity of doing something, the first thing which this Administration could claim as being of immense value to the people of Canada; that is, taking hold of the iron question. Unless they wish this Canada of ours filled as it is with an inexhaustible store of iron ore and coal, and everything calculated to create a great iron industry—unless they wish us to become completely helpless and subservient to the United States of America in regard to the manufacture of iron, this Government, I hold, are bound to take action. I did myself the honour of waiting upon the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Railways and Canals on this subject during the recess, and I pressed upon them the vital importance of so extending the bounty system in accordance with the policy of the late Government, a policy adopted and ratified by the present Government, as to lead to the establishment in Canada promptly of one of the greatest and most important industries, the iron industry, not only in one section of the country, but generally through the country. I will not say more, because I do not believe my hon. friend is not sufficiently impressed with the importance of that subject not to have given it some attention, and I shall look confidently before this House rises for some action to enable Canada, with some little assistance from the Government to take her place in the foremost rank of the countries of the world in the manufacture of iron. I draw the attention of my hon. friend now to that subject as affording an opportunity of establishing one of the greatest industries, and that at no distant day. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), at a meeting of the British Empire League, say that he hoped the time was not remote when we would build iron steamships in Canada. I have discussed the subject with that hon. member, and I am strengthened in the opinion that all we require is vigorous, determined, patriotic action on the part of this Government in relation to the manufacture of iron, not only to make Canada a country where iron will at no distant day be furnished cheaper than it can be in any other part of the world, but to carry out the views of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, so that we shall have Canada taking just as important and prominent a position in connection with iron shipbuilding as she has taken in connection with wooden shipbuilding in times gone by.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to detain the House further than to say that the question of preferential trade I shall not refer to, because there is a notice on the paper of a resolution under which that question will more properly come up. Nor do I intend to refer to the question of the mining laws, the question of alien labour, or the question of export duties on logs, on pulp-wood and on nickel, as I suppose these are subjects that will come up before the commission. When a year ago the Finance Minister asked me behind the Speaker's Chair if I would be prepared to support the placing of power in the hands of the Government to deal with these questions, especially the question of export duties, I told him that I would give such a proposition my most hearty support; and I presume that no action has been taken in that direction, because it would interfere with the negotiations being carried on by the commission. I shall not say more before I sit down than again to express the delight with which I listened to the long, interesting and valuable essay of the Finance Minister, which I am glad to know will be a permanent record of the country, and a grand tribute paid to the National Policy and to the construction of that inter-oceanic line of railway which binds the country together. In my judgment, the question as to who shall claim the paternity of any one of these matters is altogether insignificant compared with the realization of what has been effected by Canada and what may still be effected by Canada by steadily keeping our eye fixed on that polar star of regarding our duty to Canada and Canadians as above all questions of party, and adopting and maintaining the policy that has made Canada great, and so deservedly conspicuous in the eyes of the world, and which, if steadily pursued, will make Canada infinitely greater and infinitely more conspicuous in the future.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will congratulate the hon. baronet on the vigour he has displayed in his remarks. I must confess, however, to a little feeling of disappointment that he has not dealt with the speech of the Finance Minister, which he has attempted to criticise, in such a manner as it was dealt with yesterday by the hon. gentleman who sits beside him (Mr. Foster), and who, while unable to controvert the statements and arguments made in that speech, nevertheless addressed himself somewhat to that task. The hon. leader of the Opposition has contented himself with simply uttering statements and making declarations without at all seeking to establish them.

The hon. gentleman found fault with the hon. Minister of Finance for having referred at some length to manuscript, but I think it must be admitted that any one having to deal with tables and figures to the extent the Minister of Finance necessarily had would have to follow the same course, and we must also admit that such a course is the most satisfactory one to all parties, for it is very desirable that financial statements should be made in such a shape that they can be relied on and not consist merely of assertions made from memory and glittering generalities dealt out broadcast. The hon. gentleman himself has been Finance Minister, and I would just like to ask him if, when he had occasion to deliver a Budget speech in this House, he was not also compelled by the circumstances to confine himself almost exclusively to manuscript and not trust to extemporaneous delivery in dealing with such a mass of facts and figures. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that when he occupied the position of Finance Minister he did precisely what my hon. friend has done, and did it with advantage to the House and the country.

I cannot pretend to follow, nor do I think it would be wise to make the attempt, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition through all the various subjects he touched upon, which were aside altogether from the question before the House. I shall not attempt to follow the hon. gentleman through his references to old Nova Scotia matters and his fierce denunciations of individual members of the Cabinet, but shall instead confine myself to considering the live questions of the day, the questions that are before the House now. I notice, first, that he made an attempt to deal with the question of expenditure under the Conservative regime when he was himself a member of the Government, and he did so because of an allusion personal to himself, made by the Finance Minister, when he stated that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition had declared when in Opposition that the amount of money taken by the Mackenzie Government was in excess of what was really required, and that if he and his party were entrusted with power they would carry on the Government at a much less expenditure. The hon. gentleman acknowledged that statement and attempted to prove it. What were the reasons he gave in its support? He took up just one item, the item of Intercolonial Railway expenditure, and contrasted the expenditure on the railway by the Mackenzie Government with the expenditure by the Government that followed and of which my hon. friend was a member. It does not concern my argument whether his figures were correct or not, but I simply call the attention of the House to the way in which the hon. gentleman evaded the issue by simply confining himself to one item of expenditure and leaving all the others out of the question. But what are the facts? They are in the Public Accounts, and they show that while the expenditure under the Mackenzie Government amounted to $23,500,000, at the end of the five years of the succeeding Government, that expenditure had increased to $28,730,000 in round numbers. Instead of decreasing, as promised by the hon. gentleman, it had gone up $5,000,000 under Conservative régime, and yet the hon. gentleman wants us to believe that the Conservative party is the only one that understands political economy and figures in this country.

My hon. friend then touched upon the public debt, and charged the Finance Minister with omitting to give the late Government credit for an exceptional item of expenditure in the year 1895, when contrasting the increase of the public debt under the present Administration with its increase under their predecessors. Well, Mr. Speaker, if exceptional circumstances are to be taken into consideration on the one side, they must also be taken into consideration on the other. I have no fault to find with hon. gentlemen for attacking the Government if they find the public debt is being increased in a reckless manner, because the Opposition would be lacking in their duty if they did not do so; but when a comparison is challenged, I say it does not lie in the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite to declare that this country is being ruined by extravagance when we are able to point to all the extraordinary works we have been engaged in and all the new projects that have come before us—when we can point to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, opening up a vast mineral region; to the opening up of the Yukon and giving life and property out there the protection enjoyed in older and more settled portions of the country; when we can point to the fact that we have brought the Intercolonial Railway from where it formerly terminated, the small town of Lévis, right up to the great commercial metropolis; when we can point to the millions we are spending in deepening and enlarging our canals, and giving extra tonnage and freight and wealth to the people—when we can point to all we have accomplished within two years on a net increase in the public debt of only about $2,700,000 for each year, I think we have no reason to fear comparison with our predecessors or feel dissatisfied with the result of our efforts. Go to the blue-book and compare the two last years of hon. gentlemen opposite with the two years of this Administration, and what result will you find as regards the increase in the net debt of the country? Why, put their last two years together, and the average is over $6,000,000 added to the debt, while ours was only about $2,700,000, in spite of all the extraordinary expenditures we have had to meet. Then take the whole eighteen years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office and strike an average, and you will find that for every year of these eighteen they added $6,000,000 to the public debt. But they will say: Oh, we granted subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway. True, they did; and so did we. And I would remind the hon. gentleman, who belongs to that party which alone understands political economy, who alone have the genius of government, who alone know how to make calculations and manage the finances of the country, that they made grants to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. POPE. We built it, too.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) says they built it. He was not in the House at the time—

Mr. POPE. But I was in the country.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But does the hon. gentleman know how his present leader induced the Conservative members at that time to vote the money for the railway?

Mr. POPE. He did not have to induce them.

Mr. PATERSON.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will tell the hon. gentleman, if he will listen. If he will turn to "Hansard" he will see what the genius for government, the knowledge of political economy and the ability to make financial calculations in his party are worth. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) got the Conservative members supporting the Government of that day to vote for this expenditure of money by coming down to this House and pledging his financial reputation that if the money were voted it would be nothing more than a loan virtually for by the sale of lands the treasury would be repaid for every dollar by the year 1890, the amount being $58,000,000. And, when the year 1890 came around, these gentlemen, who understand political economy, who alone have the genius of government, who alone possess financial knowledge, found that, instead of having $58,000,000 placed in the treasury of the country, it actually cost more to manage the Dominion lands than the total amount received from them up to that time.

Mr. POPE. We have got the land.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If I adopt what the hon. gentleman says, it is only pouring contempt upon his leader; for his leader said, that we would not have the land, but that they would be sold and the cash would be in the treasury.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think I quote the hon. gentleman correctly. He said he would either have cash in hand—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS—or securities as good as cash—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Better.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did not the hon. gentleman say that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) is mistaken. I read to the House a calculation made in the Department of the Interior. I did not commit myself to it at all. It was not even in my department but it was brought down by the Prime Minister and placed in my hands from the Department of the Interior and I read it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. POPE. Begin again.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I will not begin again; for, while I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, he must not consider that I am casting any doubt upon his word, when I say, that what he said can probably be seen in "Hansard," and we can see who is correct and who is not. But do I understand, that, in a matter of this kind, involving tens of millions of dollars, the hon. gentleman would use, without being prepared to endorse it, a statement of this kind to support an argument intended to convince members of the House? We will see whether he endorsed it or not. If he did not endorse it, will he say he did not give the members supporting him reason to believe that he thought it was a safe calculation? He shelters himself behind a clerk in the Department of the Interior, and says he took from that clerk a statement prepared by him and in a matter involving not merely the well-being, but, it might be said, almost the national life of this country, and, without being prepared to endorse it, he laid it before the House as a reason why members supporting him should vote the money. I commend that to the House and to the country as a sample of a genius for government of the Conservative party, as a sample of their political economy.

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson), if he was a member of the Immigration and Colonization Committee in 1883?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think I was; but I would rather the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) would ask me that question at some other time. I am debating the Budget just now.

Mr. McNEILL. But it has reference to this matter.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have been on a great many committees.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson), and will not ask the question if he does not desire it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) proceeded to point out what he considered a divergence of views between the Minister of Finance and the right hon. leader of the Government. He thought he had discovered a difference of opinion between these gentlemen with reference to the necessity, if I might use that word, of reciprocity at this time, as compared with the need felt for it in times gone by. I did not notice that these gentlemen contradicted one another. I have not noticed that there was any difference of opinion between any members of the Government in reference to that point. But the hon. gentleman professes to see it so clearly that he reminds us of what we are told in Scripture—that a house divided against itself cannot stand. I think we have had proof of the truth of that saying, as it affects governments. Not in the case of the present Government, for no one has yet been able to discover, I think, that there is any division existing among its members. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) can speak feelingly. He knows of a Government that was divided against itself, and, for that reason, was not able to stand. He knows of a Government, some six or seven of whose members turned against their leader, and, without giving him any notice whatever, that they were about to take the stand they did, in open Parliament, did what had never been done before by men who had been honoured by being called to be Privy Councillors—through the mouth of one of their number, as spokesman, they declared, that the leader of the Government was virtually unfit to lead the Government. And in the changes that followed, the present leader of the Opposition came in himself to lead the Government. And what was the result? When again they came back, they had patched the house up, in a measure, so that it would hold together. But—I do not wish to make a personal allusion—I think the indications during last session, and during this session, with the Conservative party on the opposite side of the House, while united in opposition to the Government, would not lead us to believe that they are a united party. We cannot forget how the hon. gentleman who leads that party, who alone have the instinct of government, who alone understand political economy, on one occasion, in the city of Montreal, declared that a certain project was a wise financial operation and in the line of sound political economy, and gave it his endorsement. But we saw him taken to task by members of his own party and made to eat his words with reference to that project. Why, then, we could say that a House divided against itself cannot stand. I can only say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that not only can that saying be applied to the Government, but it can be applied to an Opposition. An Opposition can never be strong if there is among them a lack of faith in the gentleman who leads them, if they are divided into factions, and if one or more of their party seek to occupy positions of commanding influence in the party in opposition to the gentleman who has been entrusted more particularly with the leadership.

I will notice only briefly the hon. gentleman's denunciation of the management of affairs in the Yukon. He alludes to some difficulties that we experienced some months past in the transmission of mails to that country. He speaks of utilizing the Northwest police as something that was not desirable in the interest of that force. He points out that taking vast sums of money, as he says we have taken, from the people up there and not to give them the facilities that they require in postal communication, is to do a grievous wrong to them, and he calls upon every member on the other side of the House, when the post office Estimates are under consideration, to speak out on this subject. I need not dwell upon that in detail, because when the Postmaster General will be in his place and can give us the explanations and answer the attacks that may be made upon him, the subject can be discussed and settled. I have only this remark to make with reference to the management of the Yukon. There was a task imposed upon this Government, such a task as was never before imposed upon a Canadian Government; and I can say here, speaking generally, that the affairs of the Yukon have been managed in the interests of the people in the Yukon as well as in the interests of the people of older Canada. We have this to remember, that the policy of this Government has been, and is, that the Yukon should pay the expenses of the Yukon. Holding that policy, we have seen fit to require that customs duties should be paid on goods going into that country, as into any other portion of Canada; and we have seen fit to declare that we believe that as that gold was the possession of the people of Canada, when aliens in very much larger numbers than native Canadians have gone into that country to take the mineral resources that belong to the people of Canada, it is nothing but right and proper that when these men had taken $5,000 for themselves without paying any share to the Government for the amount they took out over that sum, $10 in every $100 should be given to the people of this country as it belongs to them by right. These hon. gentlemen are condemning this Government because of their expenditure, these hon. gentlemen denounce us because there is a slight increase upon the public debt. If they had their own way, if we may judge by the utterances of their leader in this House, they would allow these foreigners to go into that country and take the gold that belongs to the people of Canada without giving back a particle of toll, or at most a very slight toll, to the people of Canada who have spent hundreds of thousands, a sum that will run into millions of money, in order to open up that country and to give to the people dwelling there the benefits that the people are enjoying in other parts of this Dominion. Sir, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) charged this Government with being extravagant. It was pointed out to them that when this Government attempted to economize hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of seconding their efforts, demand that we should make extra expenditures. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) honestly acknowledged that, and says that we should pay more to the civil service than we are paying now. While they make that demand on the one hand, on the other they denounce the Government because they have increased the expenditure on civil government. Well, Sir, they thought to keep on the statute-book of Canada a law that not only deprived tens of thousands of the young men of Canada, during the last election, of the right to vote, while at the same time giving voice to men who have left the country for good and have moved to other lands—they thought to retain that law on the statute-book, though it involved an expenditure of $250,000 or more every time the list was revised, while that law was only in existence to the detriment and not for the benefit of the people of the country. Their other contention is that the gold in the Yukon is to be given to aliens, and the leader of the Opposition says that they should only pay 2 per cent on what they take out as their share of the royalty, after all the expenditure the people of Canada have made in that country to give to their lives and to their property the same security that are given to life and property in every other part of this Dominion.

Mr. CLANCY. What about the Canadians there?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Canadians there are enjoying the same safety with regard to life and property that Canadians are enjoying here to-day. The hon. gentleman knows that while there may be one Canadian there, if we are to believe the statements we have heard, there are eight or nine, if not more, from other countries; and yet the hon. gentleman, if he is following the leader of his party, wants us to deduct only $2 out of every $100 they take out, after having taken out $5,000 upon which we levy no tax at all.

Mr. CLANCY. Is that the population which the Minister of Trade and Commerce claimed last night?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is exactly what I said, and with emphasis.

Mr. CLANCY. We will see.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is more satisfactory to the hon. gentleman to get an answer direct from the hon. gentleman who spoke than from myself, and he has got it. Now, I wished to touch a little upon a question that the hon. gentleman has alluded to, and which was alluded to at more length by the ex-Minister of Finance, but I will reserve those remarks until after recess: that was with reference to the preference that we have given in the tariff that was enacted, and one or two other subjects which have engaged the attention of the House.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 28) respecting the British Columbia and Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

Bill (No. 11) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Thomas Robertson.—(Mr. Robertson.)

COLUMBIA AND WESTERN RAILWAY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 26) respecting the Columbia and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Costigan.)

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Mr. Chairman, before this clause is adopted, I think it would be well to draw attention to the discussion that took place at the Railway Committee the other day, on an important principle involved in its consideration. The clause asks, as was said on that occasion, for extraordinary bonding powers—powers to bond to the amount of $35,000 a mile, which is considerably in excess of the usual amount allowed to railways. The claim is put forward, on behalf of this railway company, that the road will cost an extraordinary amount, and this claim is supported by evidence that it will cost, for the main line from Robson to Midway, the sum of $39,000 a mile, of which it is proposed to provide $35,000 by the sale of bonds and $4,000 by subsidy from the British Columbia Government. It was agreed, on the part of the members of the committee, that we cannot get railways built except they are paid for, that if a railway is wanted, no matter how much it costs it is to be built and paid for, and that the company is to be allowed to raise the money necessary to build the road by the sale of its bonds. Therefore, there is no objection to the granting of the bonding powers to the extent asked for the main part of the road. But objection is taken to the further request that power be granted to bond all possible branches, built for any possible purpose, to any possible point, at any cost, whether great or small, to the extent of $35,000 per mile. The question was asked, very distinctly, of the railway company, what amount of line would be contained in the branches for which this extraordinary power of bonding was asked. The reply was that the length of the line could not be told, nor could there be any information given as to its cost; therefore, some members of the committee took the ground, that while it was perfectly legitimate to grant the request of the company, in so far as it was substantiated by evidence of actual requirements, it was not sound public policy to grant such a large bonding power for reasons which were not specified and which would practically give the company building this road the right to load it to an unlimited extent with bonds. One special reason why it is considered desirable not to allow excessive bonding privileges is, that this road is for the development of a very important section of the country, which it is hoped at some time may be assisted in its development by the construction of a competing line, and it is believed that by loading up the line now being built—allowing it to be loaded up, practically to an unlimited extent—with bonds, there will be an association of interest created which will be a protection to the company against the introduction of railway competition there. The attempt is being made now at the very beginning of the construction of this road to found the argument that competition into that country is not to be allowed because it would affect vast vested interests which are to be created by this Act to which we are asked to give our sanction at the present time. It is because we believe it to be entirely desirable that there should be no such excessive concentration of interest created; that there should be no such piling up of charges upon this road with the view of preventing competition in the future, that I desire to move:

That all the words after "Midway" in the 14th line of section 1 be struck out.

That will not interfere in any way with the requirements of the company, as stated by themselves, in regard to the main portion of the line. It will only interfere with lines to be built, of which the location, the terminals, the number, the length, or the cost are neither specified nor known. I hold that it is not sound public policy to grant such unlimited powers in regard to roads which will be constructed only in the future. It is a sufficient responsibility for this House to legislate with respect to matters which properly come before it. It is unfair, and unjust, and not sound policy, to legislate in regard to matters that will properly come before succeeding Parliaments, or succeeding sessions of this Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). There has been no notice given of this amendment, and consequently it is out of order and we cannot consider it.

Mr. HEWITT BOSTOCK (Yale and Cariboo). There is a very important matter in connection with this Bill. These bonding privileges are very large, and the question of freight rates will come up in connection with this company at some future time. When the Crow's Nest Pass charter was passed, power was given to the Government to deal with this question of freight rates, and it occurs to me we should watch very carefully any power of this kind given to a railway company, for this power must naturally have a considerable amount of influence on the question of freight rates when it has to be decided whether the rates over this line are such as ought be charged in the interest of the people. Any company coming before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in connection with this matter, would naturally expect that the amount of dividends they have to pay on the bonding powers of their road, should be taken into consideration in the matter of deciding the freight rates that should be charged. It is in the interest of the people of the Boundary Creek country, and also of the whole Dominion, that this bonding privilege should be very carefully watched. The privilege that has been asked for under this clause of the Bill, is a very extensive one, and I think larger than has been granted to any other railway in that country. Of course, we all know that the cost of building railways in these mountainous mining districts is very high; yet it is surprising that when they come to survey the line they often find that the cost of building is not at all so much as it was at first supposed to be. I know this was a surprise to myself, as it would be to any other, who travelled over the Crow's Nest Pass line. We are giving this railway company very great powers under this section, in allowing them to have the bonding privilege over these branch lines. Under the provincial charter they have the privilege of building a branch line to any mine in the vicinity of the main line, and although these branch lines are limited to twenty miles from the main line, still, on account of the large number of mines in that part of the country which we hope to see developed, the number of branch lines may be very considerable. I am not altogether disposed to think that the cost of building some of these branch lines will be anything like so heavy as the cost of building some portions of the main line has been. It is of course with the object of covering the cost of the main line of this road, that we are asked to grant this bonding privilege over, not only the main line as far as Midway, but also the branch lines. There are portions of that line that can be built at a very small figure, and I believe we are giving this company too much in the way of bonding privileges, when we allow them to bond not only the main line, but also the branch lines. Of course, if we grant this privilege now, we will create a precedent which other railway companies will demand should be afterwards followed. We hope to see a great many more railways there, or the extension of the present railways, and as they will be built in a country similar to that through which this road passes, the companies will no doubt ask for a similar privilege to be granted as in this case. I hope the committee will take this matter very seriously into consideration, and that hon. gentlemen will, if possible, curtail the privilege granted to this company under this particular clause.

Not very long ago the Canadian Pacific Railway Company saw fit to increase their freight rates on the main line, which caused an outcry on the part of merchants at Kamloops and other points. The company not only increased the rates, but charged what they call an arbitrary. Now, if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have increased their rates on the main line, they might possibly, if it suited their purpose, when the power given to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council under this clause of the Crow's Nest Pass Act is put into force, also increase their rates between points on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and points on this Columbia and Western line; and then we might find that we could not get those rates reduced again to what they ought to be; or we might only get them back to what they were to within the last nine months or a year. Consequently, the power now held by the Government of dealing with this question of freight rates will have to be exercised more than once in order to put the traders on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at places like Kamloops and Vernon, on practically the same footing that they were on 12 months ago. This matter of freight rates is one that considerably exercises the people all through the western country. They have only the one railway to deal with; they have no chance of getting competition in any way, and they find that it is very hard to carry on their business; because, after they had made their calculations on the basis of a rate which has prevailed for two or three years, they find that the railway company has increased the rates, and, in addition to the increase, is charging an arbitrary. If they cannot ship their goods to some central point, where they shall be able to sell them at a profit, they are obliged to keep their goods on hand, and in the case of perishable goods, they probably have to lose their whole crop. The question of freight rates, therefore, is one that affects them in a very serious manner, and they have to watch exceedingly carefully any move of this kind on the part of a railway company that would tend to keep up the rates. Therefore, I desire to ask this committee to consider very carefully what they are doing when they allow a clause such as this to be passed, granting bonding privileges to this company. We all hope that this country is going to be a very great mining country, and that there will be a great development there before long; but we must not lose sight of the fact that the development of the country will depend to a very large extent on the freight rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway, especially in view of the fact that that company has also gone into the smelting business; and will have the mining industry of the country very largely in its own hands. It will be able practically to keep control of the output of the coal mines and the coke product along the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. It will have the power to charge pretty nearly what it likes for carrying coke to the smelters, and thus it will be able practically to control the smelting business. In these remarks I think I have pointed out to the committee the seriousness of this bonding privilege which is proposed to be given to this company, and I trust I shall be able to put this matter in a proper light before the House.

Bill reported.

RESTIGOUCHE BOOM COMPANY.

On Order for second reading of Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Restigouche Boom Company (Mr. McAllister).

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). This is practically a public Bill, affecting public interests very materially; and as I am in daily receipt of petitions and letters in support of and in opposition to it, I am getting a report from my officers. I would, therefore, ask the hon. gentleman not to proceed with this Bill until I am in a position to express an opinion upon it.

Mr. McALISTER. I think any objections to it can be dealt with in committee. I am prepared to give any information the Minister desires at any time, and it has been put back several times already.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Of course, it has not been put back by any desire of mine, but simply because I am receiving communications from parties complaining that it is against the public interest. The House will expect me to be in a position to declare whether the principle of the Bill should be conceded, and I cannot do that before I have received a report from my officials. I am having collected the different memorials and petitions and letters coming in, and must ask some delay before I can consent to the second reading.

Mr. McALISTER. I do not see why it should not get its second reading and be sent to the committee where the whole matter will be discussed. As far as the New Brunswick side is concerned, the Bill does not confer greater power on the company than they already possess. They are only asking permission to make a boom on the other side.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no motion before the House, but simply the question whether the Bill should stand or not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On that question, might I ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether the subjects he mentioned are not really ones that would require to be considered as matters of evidence before the committee. I fail to see any danger in advancing the Bill in the usual course. Public purposes would be served by sending the Bill before the usual committee, and the information the hon. gentleman is expecting should be laid before that committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The point I make is this, that the Bill is practically a public one under the guise of a private Bill, and as I am daily receiving communications from municipal corporations and private individuals concerning it, I cannot be, until I have had a report from the officials in my department, in a position to say whether the Bill should take its second reading or not. Even if the Bill should now get its second reading, I am not in a position to say what committee it should go to.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the difference if it be a public Bill, when it goes before the Railway Committee?

Mr. HAGGART. The usual plan adopted with regard to these Bills is to give them a second reading. There is nothing against the principle of this Bill. This is an ordinary boom company which no doubt interfered, as any other company would, with private rights, and perhaps with public rights. The usual practice is to send such Bills to the committee, and then the Minister, who is on the committee, asks the committee to take no proceedings until he has consulted his colleagues, and if the Bill be of sufficient importance to give a Government opinion upon it, that opinion is given.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would have no objection under ordinary circumstances, but when I am receiving daily communications from municipal corporations and private persons, writing in the public interest, in connection with this Bill, I am placed in a very different position. I am not asking the hon. gentleman to take a course which will delay him very much. He would perhaps be better off by having a private conversation with myself about the Bill than attempting to force it through the House at present. It may be that this Bill ought to go to a special committee. I am getting a report made upon it now which I hope will be ready Monday.

Order allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 98) respecting the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Guillet.)

Bill (No. 100) respecting the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank, and to change its name to the Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Glenora Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Yukon Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 107) respecting the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Just before recess, there was a little difference between the leader of the Opposition and myself with respect to what had occurred in the House fifteen or sixteen years ago. Of course, it is quite possible for any one, after so long a time, to think that a certain version of what occurred is correct, while it may not, in fact, be so. My recollection was, that the leader of the Opposition had read a statement to the House, and had endorsed it, that, by a certain time, he would receive from land sales and other sources in the North-west $58,000,000; that he had argued that the Canadian Pacific Railway would virtually cost the country nothing, because the cash received from these sources would balance the account. When I said, that that had been his statement, I was interrupted by the hon. gentleman, who said, that he had not made that statement, but that he had read to the House a statement prepared by a clerk in the Department of the Interior, but had not endorsed it. I think those were his words. I think the matter of sufficient importance—though I very much dislike reading extracts from “Hansard,” or from anything else, for it is not really debating—to show what was said on that occasion. In the session of 1883, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), speaking with reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—as will be seen at page 975 of “Hansard” of that year—said:

I now turn the attention of the House for a single moment to another point in this connection, and that is the position in which the country stands in relation to the sales of land. I will read a short note which was addressed by Mr. Burgess, the able secretary of the Department of the Interior, to my friend the Speaker of the Senate, who has been giving this subject his constant and careful attention for a length of time. It was not given me for publication, but it expresses the facts of the case so tersely and so much to the point, that I venture to give it to the House.

I consider that an endorsement myself.

Ottawa, 4th May, 1883.

Sir,—Having given the subject my best and fullest consideration, I estimate that the receipts of this department from the sale of agricultural and coal lands, timber dues, rents of grazing lands, and sales of mineral lands other than coal, with the royalties from the minerals, between the 1st January, 1893, and the 31st December, 1891, both inclusive, will amount to not less than $58,000,000.

This note is signed by Mr. Burgess, under whose personal observation and information all these various points come. I give it to the House as an evidence of the soundness of the statement made by my right hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior, when he told the House, three years ago, that he confidently relied upon the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway being accomplished without its costing one dollar to the people of Canada, as the entire amount required to recoup the Government and the country for their expenditure in connection with it would, at no distant date, be returned by the sale of lands and the revenues derived from lands in the North-west. I say that the evidence on that point is very conclusive.

Now, I think my recollection was rather better than that of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper). But he did more than that. I find, in the same speech, turning over the page, the following:—

Mr. PATERSON.

It will be remembered that my right hon. friend made a computation of what would be received in connection with the sale of lands in the North-west.

This referred to the calculation made by Sir John Macdonald in the year 1880, when this project was brought up. I have here the calculation of Sir John. I suppose that the argument will apply equally well to this—for it will be remembered that we were considering the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Conservative party alone had the genius of government, and that they alone understood political economy—for it will not be denied that Sir John Macdonald belonged to that party. Speaking on the 5th April, 1880, he figured up the number of settlers to go in every year and how much would be paid for land within a certain distance of the railways and how much for land at a little distance further away, and he sums up his calculation in this way:

But, besides, there will be all the instalments to come in after 1890, accruing yearly, so that the lands sold in 1890 will be one-tenth paid for nine years afterwards—for each year there will be an instalment of one-tenth paid. The actual value, in 1890, of the pre-emption, of that date, unpaid, will be $16,440,000. The actual value of the railway lands sold up to that date will be $16,272,000, making in all, $32,712,000. If you add to that total, unpaid, the $38,593,000 that will be paid in 1890, you will get a grand total of $71,305,000.

But he was very close in his calculation, because he estimated that there would be some expenses.

Deduct from that the estimated cost of surveys for the ten years, $2,000,000, and of the land officers, $400,000, and you would reduce it by $2,400,000.

Having shown that the estimate of the number of settlers, if the land to be taken up, and if the average price is not excessive, we find we shall have $69,000,000 either of money in hand, or money for which we shall have the best security in the world—the land itself.

That was the calculations submitted by Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the party at that time. It is to that subject that the present leader of the Opposition directed himself three years after, when he had had some experience of the working of it, and when he was even three years nearer the time at which this money was to be recouped to the treasury. He says:

It will be remembered that my right hon. friend made a computation of what would be received in connection with the sale of lands in the North-west; and it will also be recollected that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, not only took great exception to the statement, but pronounced it so absolutely beyond any possible conception, as to entirely discredit, so far as that hon. gentleman was able to discredit, the prediction and the computation which the right hon. gentleman made. We estimated by the time the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was to be completed, under the terms of the contract, we would receive not merely the $53,000,000 we were going to pay in connection with the construction of that work, but that we would receive about $60,000,000, or a considerable amount over and above the entire expenditure we were called upon to make in connection with the construction of the road. In order to show the House how thoroughly reliable and within the mark that calculation is, I will give the calculation made by my right hon. friend, and communicated to the House as our estimate two years ago,—

Linking himself with Sir John A. Macdonald.

—when it was very much discredited by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will also give the result.

I thought it was worth while to make this quotation, seeing that the hon. gentleman was criticising the Budget speech of a Liberal Minister of Finance and his estimate of the receipts and expenditures of the year. I do not think that the hon. gentleman was notably successful in preserving the dignity of leader of one of the great parties in the country, when he endeavoured to belittle, and indeed forgot himself so far as to liken the delivery of the Minister of Finance to some performance that he had seen in a dime museum, a place I should never have supposed that the hon. gentleman frequented if he had not led us to suppose so by that remark. He was criticising a statement made by the Minister of Finance, who, in his calculations, I think, so far as they have been submitted to this House, has this merit, at any rate, that if he has not calculated the receipts and expenditures to the very dollar, he has come very near it, indeed; and where he has erred (and I trust Finance Ministers of this Dominion will ever so err) he has erred upon the safe side. While he estimated that he would have a deficit in the year 1897, that deficit was less than he estimated; and while he estimated that he would have a surplus of revenue over expenditure in the following year, he found his surplus even greater than he had given the House and the country reason to look for at his hands. If the surplus at the end of the year is larger than we were led to expect by the Minister of Finance, it is a result that inures to the advantage of the country. He has ventured this year to estimate for the year uncompleted—for Finance Ministers must estimate ahead, and here is where their ability comes in—he has given an estimate to the House that at the end of the current year, which will be within a very few months now, he will have paid all the consolidated revenue accounts of this Dominion out of the revenue that he shall derive from different sources, and with a greatly reduced rate of taxation so far as customs are concerned; he estimates that he will have paid all his debts and have a surplus of $4,600,000. In the light of the estimate made by this hon. gentleman hitherto, I have great faith that that will take place. And yet we find an hon. gentleman opposite who, at one time, acted as Minister of Finance, and at other times as the colleague of a Minister of Finance, endorsing the statement of the Finance Minister of that day, giving the House and the country to understand that though they were launching out into an expenditure of tens of millions, that it did not mean a burden upon the people, because the money would be returned to this country, that not only the total amount we were giving for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be returned, but that millions over and above such expenditure would come in from the receipts from land, and that the national debt, instead of increasing, would be reduced. But what were the facts? Why, Sir, in 1883, when the hon. gentleman made that statement, the net debt was $158,000,000, speaking in round numbers. Seven years after, when, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, the debt was to be decreased because they would have received more than they had paid out, the debt had increased to $237,000,000. That was as near as the hon. gentleman could come in his estimates of the revenue and expenditure of this country at that time. In 1896, when these gentlemen went out of office, did they leave the net debt—decreased below $158,000,000? No, but the net debt increased by $100,000,000 more than it was when the hon. gentleman made that prediction. Now, Sir, that gives us some idea of the value that can be put upon the calculations of hon. gentlemen opposite. While we do not deprecate the severest and closest criticism of a Minister of Finance's statement, while it is the bounden duty of the Opposition to make such criticism, yet I hold that hon. gentlemen who have erred so widely in their estimates, who have made such fallacious statements of the financial prospects, when they are discharging their duties as critics of the financial statement of my hon. friend, they should at any rate be careful not to draw invidious distinctions in view of their own past achievements in that respect.

Now, I want to say a few words with reference to the reduction of taxation and the preferential tariff. The ex-Minister of Finance, who addressed the House the other night, took the ground that the reduction of taxation was very slight, indeed, that it was less than 1 per cent; I think he made it one-third of 1 per cent. His mode of calculation was not one that I thought would be satisfactory. I think it is one that will not bear examination if looked at from what I think are proper criteria. Upon another occasion the Minister of Finance, as well as myself, applied a rough and ready test, stating at the time that it was not absolutely correct, that you could not hope to get it correct, that circumstances vary, that sometimes you might import more of one article than you would import in another year, and that might bear a different rate of duty, and therefore, it could not be correct. But it was proper to take the rate of taxation of one year and apply it to imports of another, and if it showed a difference, whether great or less in that respect, it would show either an increase of taxation or a decrease of taxation. So we ascertained the rate of taxation upon all goods, dutiable and free, entered for home consumption in the year 1896, and applied that to the total imports, dutiable and free in 1898, and found that the saving was nearly $2,000,000. But I have since had a calculation made in which, item by item, have been taken the imports during the last fiscal year, and applying the rate of 1896 to these, we will get almost at a point where we can be assured of accuracy. There may be a slight inaccuracy in it because the classification of the articles, in some respects, may be different, and, therefore, there may be a little difference in that way, but we ascertain by that statement that the reduction of taxation was equivalent to $1,600,000, a reduction of taxation far greater than the hon. gentleman is willing to admit. Then it will be remembered that, in this year, since the 1st of July, there has been a full 25 per cent taken off goods from countries that were entitled to the preferential rate, and that will mean a very large reduction in the taxation that is levied upon the people of the country during the present year from what it was during the last fiscal year. Now there is another point that I wish to make. They say we have not carried out our pledges; that we pledged ourselves to reduce the burden of taxation that was upon the people of the country. I want the House to remember, and I want the country to remember, that the Government do not make the price of articles that the people buy; that is made by the markets of the world. The Government do not determine the quantity of dutiable articles that a man, or a man's family shall buy; the man or the man's family determines that. Therefore, when you find that your customs revenue has increased some millions, it by no means follows, as the "Mail and Empire" would have the people believe, that because you have some millions more by way of customs revenue, it means increased taxation taken from the people of the country. It means nothing of the kind; if the rate of taxation has been reduced. That, and that alone, the Government controls, and if the Government controls that, the people of this country have a right to see that this Government do reduce it as the Government pledged itself to do. But they did not pledge themselves that extra revenues of millions would not come into the treasury. Because the Government has reduced the rate of taxation it does not mean more taxation taken from the people as the result of the action of the Government. It is the result of the action of those people themselves who, in a period of prosperity, under Liberal Government, find themselves in comparative wealth, while before they were in perhaps comparative poverty, who buy more and are living in greater luxury. In addition to this enhanced means of purchasing, there has been a vast increase in the population of this country, and in that way you have the extra millions of customs pouring into your revenue while you have greatly reduced the rate of taxation. It is the rate of taxation that a Government can be held responsible for, because that alone is what the Government can control.

Now, I have a little statement here in reference to the preferential tariff, and it shows this: If the full 25 per cent preference had been in operation during the last fiscal year, the average rate of duty on goods dutiable and free, exclusive of corn and bullion, entered for consumption from Great Britain would have been 17·85. The average rate on the same goods coming from Great Britain for the fiscal year 1895-96 was 22·42. In other words, in 1895-96 the rate was 22·42 on those goods from Great Britain, while in 1898-99, the rate would have been 17·85, or a reduction of 4·57 per cent. That is 4½ per cent reduction on all goods entered at the previous rate of 22·42 per cent, which means a reduction in taxation on goods from Great Britain of 20 per cent. That is what that shows. Do not make a mistake. Hon. gentlemen, perhaps, think that when we talk of a reduction of 4½ per cent it means a reduction of 4½ per cent, whereas a reduction of 4½ per cent from 22·42, is equal to a reduction of 20 per cent in the rate.

There is another point I want the House to grasp, and that is, what the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Foster) did not seem to have grasped, because in that portion of his speech in which he discussed it, he took the ground that even Great Britain did not get the full benefit of the preference, because in three or four items that he mentioned—he mentioned a great many more lines; he might have mentioned cottons and woollens, but he did not do so—but what he said was, that the preference of 25 per cent in some cases did not mean a reduction of 12 per cent, even to the consumer, and he went on and read another table in which he gave a list of articles imported from Great Britain and imported from the United States and other countries, in which the importations from Great Britain were very much lighter than they were from the other countries. Therefore, he says it is a mistaken idea to give the people of the country; that speaking generally, very little of this 25 per cent reduction will take from the burdens of the people because there is a comparatively small quantity of these goods coming from Great Britain in comparison with other countries. He will not deny that Great Britain gets the benefit of the 25 per cent reduction on all goods coming from that country. During last year $22,556,000 of dutiable goods were entered for consumption from Great Britain; from the United States $38,063,000, and some $14,004,000 from other countries. In this list, which he gave, of goods imported from Great Britain he left out, strange to say, the article of cotton and the article of woollens, of which we get millions worth from Great Britain. I want to point out this fact to him, and I do not give it as an absolute statement, or say that in all cases it will work out, because I recognize the fact that the United States are nearer to us than England, that the rate of freight is perhaps less, that the necessity for a quick order may lead some to go there, that there may possibly be certain lines and certain styles of American goods that take better than English goods—I recognize all that, but I recognize as one grand, broad principle that has not been insisted upon in this House, or in this country, as it should have been, and which I want to insist upon now, (and if any hon. gentleman thinks the statement ought to be challenged he can do it), and it is that Great Britain enters into competition in our markets in many classes and lines of goods our people want. I say that if you take the article of cottons, and the hon. gentleman complained of that—strange that the ex-Finance Minister left it out of his speech, for this is the very thing that we bought largely from Great Britain—we imported from Great Britain cottons to the value of $3,127,120, and from all countries $4,763,362. Now there is no mistake about it. On that $3,127,120 worth of cotton that we imported from Great Britain there was 25 per cent of the rate of taxation, under the general tariff—the Fielding tariff—taken off that amount. But I want to say more; I want to say qualified, as I have already qualified it, but speaking in the main, I venture to say, that great portion of the cottons coming from other countries, has been reduced in price by virtue of the preferential tariff to the consumers of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not in a position to deny that. I have heard them in this House rise up, time and again, and say that it did not matter so much what the rate of duty was on goods coming in from other countries. When we pointed out that in many lines of manufactured goods there was only an infinitesimal quantity of them coming into the country compared with what was produced in the country, their answer was: No matter whether it be a small or a large item of import, that determines the price of all the home-made goods. That was the argument of these gentlemen opposite then.

An English cotton merchant, we will suppose, comes to the city of Ottawa selling his goods, and an American cotton merchant comes to this city at the same time. They are anxious to make sales and they quote their prices on the same line of goods to the local merchant. The local merchant ascertains the prices of the Englishman, and he ascertains the prices of the American; and if the American and the English prices are equal, he will say to the American: My order must go to the Englishman because there is  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent less rate of duty that I will have to pay on the goods coming from England than on the goods coming from the United States; true, there is a little difference in cheaper freight from the United States; true, your goods may come a little quicker; but I am not in a hurry for my goods, and possibly, after all, there may not be much difference in the freight, for ocean rates are very low. But on account of lesser duty, I cannot lay the American goods down as cheaply as I can the English goods. Now, if the American manufacturer takes that order—and the Americans have taken millions of dollars' worth of such orders—I venture to say that in a large proportion of these cases the preferential rate has been secured to the man who buys that cotton, while the revenue of the country gets the benefit out of the Yankee cotton merchant.

And so in reference to woollen goods. We imported from Britain woollen goods to the value of $6,291,762 worth, and we imported from all countries to the value of $8,115,928. Strange, the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) forgot that item amongst the others when he was dealing with fifty thousand dollar figures, and so on, and when this is a matter of $8,000,000 on one item alone. Precisely what I have said with reference to cotton goods will apply to the woollen goods, and so I might run through the list of English articles imported to Canada, but I do not intend to weary the House with them, and I shall not ask again, as I suppose it would be refused, to let them go on "Hansard." Take, for instance, iron and steel and the manufactures of iron and steel. True it is, we got of these manufactures $1,880,326 worth from Great Britain and $13,197,957 from all countries. But, Sir, I venture to say that it was not alone that $1,880,000 that had the benefit of the 25 per cent preferential rate as far as the consumer of these articles is concerned, because the manufacturer in Belgium and the manufacturer in Germany, whence large quantities of these goods come, have just as heavy freight rates against them as the Englishman, and are just as long in filling the orders, so that they would have no advantage. I will venture to say—I do not say to the full extent of the foreign importations—that to an amount which is not readily grasped by the people of the country, not only was that $1,800,000 of English hardware that was imported into Canada reduced by virtue of the preferential tariff to the man who bought the goods, but that a large portion of these goods that came from other countries, was also reduced by virtue of the preferential rate. These are matters into which I might enter into detail, if I cared to weary the House, but I shall not do so, although it is a point I thought worthy of being alluded to.

Let me ask the attention of the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), if he will give it to me for a moment, in order that I may allude to a matter connected with the tariff which is a little personal. It is the first time I have had the opportunity of meeting the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) face to face, under circumstances to which I could refer to this subject. I was very much refreshed yesterday on hearing the high moral tone he took, and the good advice he gave to the House. I shall always appreciate that.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) object to it?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS I do not object to it at all. My only desire is that that high moral tone which the hon. gentleman takes in the House should abide with him when he is on the public platform of the country. Now, I am not about to accuse him that he did not preserve that high moral tone on the public platform, but I will give him the opportunity to make a denial here and now, if he sees fit to make it. My excuse for mentioning the matter is that not only have I been told by those that were present that it is true, but also I read from the Sarnia "Canadian," which is the Conservative paper in the county of Lambton, and would not be likely to do the hon. gentleman an injustice, as follows:—

Mr. Foster next dealt with the Grit methods of tariff reform, and showed how the whole efforts of the Government to root out the National Policy had resulted in lowering the tariff sixty-four-hundredths of one per cent. Mr. Paterson made candy—got rich by making it. The duty on everything that went to make candy had been reduced; but the duty on candy itself had been increased. That was the Grit idea of tariff reform.

Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) say that? I read from another paper, the Sarnia "Post." I fancy it is Conservative also; the report is somewhat on the same lines as in the Sarnia "Canadian." It says:

And the Valleyfield cotton lord still lives, said Mr. Foster, fingering his chin. He entertainingly told about Mr. Paterson, and his sweet biscuit and candy business. Mr. Paterson made candy—got rich by making it. The duty on everything that went to make candy had been reduced, but the duty on candy itself had been increased. That was a Grit idea of tariff reform.

I find that statement in two papers, and I am told by those present that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) said that Mr. Paterson, helping to form the tariff and having a large share in it naturally from the position he occupies in the Government, had lowered the duty upon that which was his raw material, and had increased the duty on his finished product.

Now, all I have to say is: That gentleman (Mr. Foster) spoke in two places after I did. That statement went to the good people of Lambton, and they had no means of having it contradicted unless my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) contradicted it. This is a matter that is personal, and I am much averse to troubling the House with personal matters; but it appears that Liberal members must even have their private business spoken of, and statements made concerning it that are not correct. I have asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) if he made that statement, and he does not deny it. I would like to ask him another question; I ask him whether at the time he made the statement that under the Fielding tariff the duty on candy and sweet biscuit was increased from what it was before, if he did not know then that what he was saying was not correct. I ask him if he did not know that he himself levied the same rate of duty on candy and sweet biscuits that is levied upon them under the Fielding tariff. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that he is correct when he says that the duties on articles going into the manufacture of candy were reduced, but, if they were reduced, I want to tell him that the duty on confectionery was reduced as well, and that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) did not tell the people of Lambton. He did not tell them that there was 25 per cent reduction under the reciprocal tariff, reducing the duty on candy instead of increasing it, and on sweet biscuit reducing it instead of increasing it, for these articles come from Great Britain as well as elsewhere.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How much?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Such as come. I have not the exact figures, but the hon. gentleman will find that these articles come from Great Britain, and they come from the United States, too; but, whatever may come from Great Britain, they have a 25 per cent reduction upon them. And I want to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) who laughs and asks, how much—I want to tell him, further, that, whether the quantity was great or small, more of them came from Great Britain, when the Fielding tariff was enacted, than ever came of the refined sugar out of which they are made, under the reciprocal tariff, for, when that tariff was introduced, sugar was exempted from its operations. I fancy the hon. gentleman has not forgotten, that, when the Fielding tariff was introduced, and until last year, sugar was one of the articles not subject to the preferential rate at all. Therefore, the full duty was paid on the sugar, when imported; there was no cut on it at all; but the goods produced from it were subject to the 25 per cent reduction.

Mr. COWAN. Take it back.

Mr. FOSTER. I have nothing to take back.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Now, Sir, my words will probably reach Lambton, and the people there will know what value to place upon the word of one who will make statements of a personal nature, dealing with a member's business. Even if the statement had been true, there was no necessity for it. The reason I mention it is not to bring a personal matter before the House; but I mention it for the purpose of demonstrating what I want the ex-Finance Minister to lend the weight of his influence to, so that the people on his side of the House will believe him. He says, that by the reduction that was made on articles that go into the manufacture of candy, that article is cheapened to the man that uses it. That he has laid down as a principle; that he cannot depart from. Very well; refined sugar is the principal article that enters into the manufacture of these goods.

Mr. TAYLOR. And a little flour.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Flour does not go into them. It is an honest business.

Mr. TAYLOR. Oh, yes, it does—and a little glucose.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No flour goes into them. The hon. gentleman's statement, that the duties on those articles entering into the manufacture of candy were reduced, has no meaning, except that Paterson bought his sugar cheaper than before by virtue of that reduction; and I grant it. What was the reduction? That is something you do not find by working out percentages of the saving to the people—and why? Because the Fielding tariff found 50 cents per 100 pounds of duty on raw sugar, and $1.14 per 100 pounds on refined sugar. That is, 64 cents per 100 pounds was the difference between the duty on the refiner's raw material and the duty on the refined article. The raw sugar that comes into this country for consumption is very little. Sugar is an article that goes into every household of the land to such an extent that between 50 and 60 pounds per head of the population is consumed. It is consumed, not only by those engaged in the manufacturing business, but by every household in the land; and what did the Fielding tariff do? I have the authority, inferentially, for saying, what I fancy the hon. gentleman will not deny, that the Fielding tariff took 14 cents per 100 lbs. from the sugar, which meant 14 cents per 100 lbs. reduction to everybody who bought the sugar. What was the result? There is about 300,000,000 pounds of sugar imported, the greater part of it unrefined. There is a loss in refining of, say, one-eighth; so that I venture to say, that you will find that there is 250,000,000 pounds of refined sugar produced in this country, on which, under the Fielding tariff, the tax paid by the people who consumed it was 14 cents per 100 pounds less than before. In other words, the people of this country saved, on that one item, $350,000 per annum. And, mark you, that saving was not paid on some other article that was taxed to make it up, for the raw sugar was taxed precisely the same under the Fielding tariff as it was under the Foster tariff, and that tax went into the treasury. So there is a reduction of $350,000; and the ex-Minister of Finance himself, in his remarks at Sarnia, verified the truth of it, because he took the ground that the duties were reduced, and that I was benefited by the reduction. If I was, every household in the country was also benefited by it.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman going on to prove that my statement was incorrect?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I ask the hon. gentleman, whether he denies that he made the statement?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going to say, that the newspaper from which the hon. gentleman quoted, gave exactly what I stated, but I am waiting to hear my hon. friend deny that the duty on the raw material which went into his candy and his confectionery was lowered, and that the duty upon the finished articles was the same or higher.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have stated distinctly, that I accepted your statement, that the duty on the raw material was reduced, and I have based my argument upon it, and have showed, that, while it was reduced to me, it was reduced to everybody in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend attempted to show, that I stated an untruth at Sarnia, and, after he attempted to show that, sundry of his followers asked me to take it back, and I am waiting for him to prove to this House that I did state an untruth.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman stated, that the duties on candies had been increased, and I am showing that that is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not say, that another hon. member has stated what is untrue.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I beg pardon. I am alluding to a platform utterance of a gentleman in Lambton, who made a statement that was not correct.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must understand, that, if a member of the House makes a statement, it should not be characterized in this House as he has characterized it, although the hon. member did not make the statement in the House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman asked me, if I denied what he stated. I asked him, first, if he stated it, and I said, that, if the statement was made by anybody, that the duty on the article that went into the manufacture of those goods was reduced, that was correct, but that, if the statement was, that the duty on the goods themselves was increased, that was not correct.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask, whether the duty on sweetened biscuit is higher or lower than the duty under the former tariff?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is precisely the same, as I understand it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the hon. gentleman understands it quite wrongly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What is it, then?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not here to give information.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In the Fielding tariff, biscuits, sweetened, are found in item 58, and the duty is 27½ per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, will my hon. friend kindly read the duty on sweetened biscuit under the preceding tariff?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes. Item 25, biscuits of all kinds, not sweetened, 25 per cent ad valorem; biscuits of all kinds, sweetened, 27½ per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I will ask my hon. friend to read the tariff—

Mr. COWAN. Oh, sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. FOSTER. Sit down? Do hon. gentlemen want to see their champion triumph without having the facts of the case before him? Will my hon. friend now read the last Foster tariff, if I may call it so, not the preceding one.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Ah! then; did the hon. gentleman know there was a last Foster tariff, that had been in force, and which was the tariff that was repealed by the Fielding tariff, and still quote from a previous one. He does not improve his position.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must be more than willing to misunderstand me. I want him to tell me what was the duty in force for sweetened biscuits when the present Minister of Finance undertook his revision.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. 27½ per cent, the same as it is now in the Fielding tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is quite mistaken. It is 25 per cent.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Here is the tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot help what you have in your hand. My hon. friend will go back to ancient history and persist in his mistake. That is not my fault, and it is certainly not much to his credit.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This is the tariff of 1895, which was in force and was repealed by the Fielding tariff. The rate was 25 per cent on sweetened and unsweetened biscuits in the tariff of 1894. In 1895, the hon. gentleman came down to the House and proposed changes. That was the time, I believe, when he put a duty upon raw sugar of one-half cent a pound, and a higher duty upon refined, and he then increased the duty on sweetened biscuits, into which sugar so largely enters, from 25 per cent to 27½ per cent. That was done in 1895, and that was the tariff in force when the Fielding tariff came in. When Mr. Fielding made his revision, he left the raw sugar at a half cent a pound as before, and he left the sweetened biscuits at 27½ cents just as before, only subject to the 25 per cent reduction when they came from Britain.

Mr. FOSTER. My impression is that the duty upon sweetened and unsweetened biscuits was the same, namely, 25 per cent. If my hon. friend is right in his contention, then I was wrong. I shall look up the statutes themselves, and if I was wrong, I shall certainly say so. I am, however, right in the contention I made in Sarnia and elsewhere, that my hon. friend in his revision did not reduce the duty upon the material which was manufactured, but that he did avail himself of the lowering of the duty on the raw material.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman was reported correctly, he said that the duty upon the manufactured article was increased, and in that he was inaccurate. Besides, the duty is not the same, because biscuits are an article that come from Great Britain subject to the reduction under the preferential rate.

Mr. FOSTER. That would depend on how much came in under the preferential tariff, and that is infinitesimal.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That affects the whole manufactured product. This is the only opportunity I have had of meeting the hon. gentleman's charge, and I have taken advantage of it. I should not suppose that he wanted to injure any man in his business or in a personal matter of that kind, but as this is not a matter which concerns the House or the country, I shall not dwell further upon it. If the hon. gentleman can show me that I am wrong, I will acknowledge my error, but I believe that I am correct. Here, however, is what I wish to point out. I wish to point out that the reduction in the duty reduces the cost to the consumer, not only upon the article imported into the country, but upon the article manufactured in the country. I would point out further that in addition to the lessened taxation by the reduced rate levied on imported goods from England, the preferential tariff also applies in a large, indirect way to the large quantities of goods that are not subject to it, but as to which an abatement must be made in their price by the foreign manufacturer in order to make his commodity as low, other things being considered, as the Englishman's commodity. But, in addition to that, the tens of millions of dollars worth of various kinds of manufactured goods in this country are also, by virtue of that preferential rate, reduced in cost to our people, and, therefore, when we speak about a paltry one or two million dollars as being the saving to the people by the reduced tariff, you do not begin to grasp the saving really effected through the enacting of the Fielding tariff. The proposition I now make is that when duties are reduced on importations, the articles made in the country become cheaper to the consumer. You may take up your list of goods brought from England, and you will find that of the same kind of goods millions of dollars worth are made in this country; and that being the case, according to the logic of the hon. gentleman himself, there is a saving effected to our people of an amount I am not prepared to estimate now. Take these goods that come largely from Great Britain under the preferential rate, take the duties levied on cottons under the preferential rate, and I claim the preferential rate affects the American cottons as well as the English. The same with the woollens. Take the reduction and apply it, not only to the goods you import from England, but to the millions of goods made in the country, and you begin to form an estimate of the reduction made in the burdens of the people.

I want the House and the country to understand that when the ex-Finance Minister says that the preferential tariff is largely deceptive, that the people do not get the benefit, he has not grasped its effect; he has lost sight wholly of the fact that it is a factor, not only as regards the goods from Great Britain, but the goods from other countries as well. He has lost sight entirely of the fact that the reduction of taxation on the articles imported into this country operates to reduce the price to the consumer of the like articles purchased in this country.

My hon. friend beside me has been kind enough to give me the statutes of 1895, and there I find in the tariff that biscuits of all kinds, not sweetened, are charged a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, and sweetened, 27½ per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the case. The published tariff list or customs tariff—the last complete publication—was that of 1894, and in that sweetened and unsweetened biscuits are down as paying 25 per cent. When the change was made in 1895 on sugar, the items of biscuits were put back as they were before, but there was the new complete publication of the tariff, so that one having the last complete publication of the tariff, without the little sheet sent out when the change was made, would not have noticed that, and that is why I fell into the error in that respect. So far as that is concerned, sweetened biscuits were 2½ per cent above the non-sweetened biscuits, just as in the Fielding tariff. While I am on my feet, I may as well make the whole explanation, showing what was right in my statement and what was wrong. I stated that the duty on sweetened biscuits was increased. I was in error, and the reason of that error I have explained. When I said that the raw material that went into confectionery and sweetened biscuits was reduced, I was correct. When I stated that the manufactured products were not lowered, I was perfectly correct. Consequently, my hon. friend had whatever advantage in his business there was in such changes as were made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the hon. gentleman is hardly correct there. His statement was that the duty was increased.

Mr. FOSTER. I said I was in error there.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But he says that it was not decreased. I say it is decreased under the 25 per cent preference.

Mr. FOSTER. As to that, I am quite willing to take my stand and say that the 25 per cent preference, in its practical results, is virtually no decrease at all. I may say further that glucose, which some manufacturers of candy use to a considerable extent, was largely reduced.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But in any case the hon. gentleman argued that the reduction of duty on the article entering into this manufacture had cheapened the manufactured goods to the consumer. That is perfectly right. But if it applies to these goods, it applies to others, and the reduction of duty on every article imported means a reduction of the cost of that article to the consumer in this country—a reduction of the tens of millions on all the goods used. I am glad the hon. gentleman made that statement. Under the preferential tariff there was a reduction of 25 per cent on confectionery, while the duty on sugar of which it is made was not reduced, as it was not subject to the preferential tariff as originally introduced. So he will see he was wrong in that respect. Now the hon. gentleman has confessed that I was right. I would ask him if he does not think it would be well to exercise the greatest care before personal observations of this kind are made, reflecting upon those engaged in any business. The object of these statements is clear. It says here: "Mr. Foster spoke entertainingly about Mr. Pater-son." I am not thin-skinned; I can stand it. I can readily understand that speaking in the way he would, the hon. gentleman could entertain a meeting of his friends. But he would draw a picture of a member of this Government upon whom largely devolved the duty of arranging the tariff, abusing the position he occupies, so far forgetting himself as to use the power of his position for his own benefit; betraying the trust reposed in him and benefiting himself at the expense of the people. In my opinion a gentleman should think carefully before he makes a remark of that kind, especially when his statements are without foundation, as the hon. gentleman now admits that, in part, his statements were without foundation. I confess that, owing to the reduction of duties, the men engaged in this manufacture get their sugar cheaper. But so does every household in this country. They save 14 cents per 100 lbs., which means that $350,000 is left in the pockets of the people over and above anything they save on imports. And applying the same rule, as it may fairly be applied to the many articles the duties on which have been reduced, we see that millions of dollars are saved to the people of the Dominion.

I need not go further. Abounding prosperity on every hand testifies that the people have more money in their pockets for the purchase of goods. That prosperity is manifested by the number of people coming into our country and by the increase of imports as well as by the growing trade of our manufacturers. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in one short sentence wiped out the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that our present policy is the same as theirs was, that the present tariff is the same as the old National Policy. As the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, the object of protection is prohibition—to keep out foreign goods. That is what hon. gentlemen opposite want. But ours is a revenue tariff. What does that mean? Taxing goods only sufficient to give you a revenue to carry on the affairs of the country. Go to a protective country where the principle is carried out more fully than hon. gentlemen opposite ventured to carry it out, and you will find imports decreasing. The tariff excludes more and more goods from other countries. If your tariff is the same as ours, the result will be the same. Is there less importation of foreign goods under the Fielding tariff than there was under the National Policy? No; twenty millions of dollars more. That shows where the difference is between the two policies. But hon. gentlemen opposite declared: If you bring that about, you will close the manufactories of this country; thousands now in employment will be thrown on the streets. The duty on every single article in the tariff, except the eight or nine insignificant ones that I mentioned, is lower under the preferential tariff than under the former tariff. And while our foreign trade and imports are increased, giving us more revenue with a lower rate of taxation, every hon. gentleman knows that never in the history of the Dominion were our foundries, machine shops and factories of all kinds kept so busy as they are to-day. Never were building operations so brisk; never was there as great difficulty of getting men to man the works of various kinds. Old establishments are running night as well as day; new buildings are being rushed up in order that the goods ordered from the manufactories may be put upon the market. And all this with abounding imports and a flourishing revenue. And these hon. gentlemen tell us that our tariff is the same as theirs. Look at the results. Let hon. gentlemen apply any test they choose, and they cannot show their position to be one that should commend itself to the judgment of the people of this country.

I have spoken of increased prosperity and of the additional consumers that we have who help us to keep a buoyant revenue notwithstanding reductions of duties. What do we find with regard to our newer provinces? Last night figures were given showing the immigration into our great North-west. I will not trouble the House by repeating those figures. But to show how Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, a grand portion of the Dominion which gives us solidity and strength that will rank us high among the nations of the earth, have made progress within the last two years, Consider the increase of importations for consumption within the last two years. In the year 1896, the importations for consumption into Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, amounted to $8,349,988; in 1898, two years after, they amounted to $13,505,306. Not quite doubled, but nearly doubled, in two years—I am speaking of importations entered at the custom-houses in these provinces. That does not mean all the goods consumed by those people. The goods consumed by those people, I venture to say, millions of dollars' worth, pay their duty into the public treasury, it may be at Hamilton, or Toronto, or Montreal, wherever they pay duty when they come in. But these are direct importations that have gone up there and paid duty. So I rejoice that not alone in the province of Ontario, not alone in Quebec or in the other older provinces, but throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, from ocean to ocean, there are prosperity and activity, and the revenues, as a consequence, are buoyant, notwithstanding that the taxation has been greatly reduced.

We were told this afternoon by the leader of the Opposition that we had accomplished nothing; he challenged us to say what we have done since we came into power. He said it reminded him of a story that has been told by himself or by a member of his family, more than once, of a man standing upon a platform of a passenger car and being told to go in, and asking the question if that was not a platform to stand upon, he was told it was not one to stand on, but it was one to go in on. The hon. gentleman likened that man to the Liberal party which had attained power on a platform that was designed to go in on but was not to stand on after we had got in. I challenge the hon. gentlemen opposite to read the platform of the Liberal party as made and promulgated by the Liberal party itself—not by two or three men as Conservative platforms have been made in the past, but by the representatives of the great Liberal party from ocean to ocean, who in this city assembled and in a series of resolutions, formulated the platform of this party. Upon that platform this party took its stand. That is the platform of the Government of this country. It is recognized as the platform of the Liberal party and we recognize that we are bound to carry it out.

I ask these hon. gentlemen to examine that platform and they will find that plank after plank of it has been carried through by our legislation in this House until but two or three planks are left and they are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne this year and will go into effect, I believe, before this House rises. That is where this party stands. Why, Sir, they ask what we have done. We secured the repeal of the Belgium and German treaties. Hon. gentlemen opposite talked about that for years and years. They knew these treaties stood in the way of Canada's freedom, but they could do nothing in reference to it. The Prime Minister of this Dominion, the leader of the Liberal party, took charge of the affairs of this country, and a preferential tariff was enacted by this Government when they came into power. The leader of the Liberal party went to England to take part in the Jubilee that the leader of the Opposition alluded to so feelingly this afternoon. Sir, he went there when the preferential tariff had touched the British heart. When they saw that Canada had had the courage to do that, there was a feeling of sympathy created in Britain, and the mother country recognized that under the existing treaties she would either have to forego the advantages this colony were offering to her or repeal those treaties. Then there happened what this Government believed would happen; the Government of Great Britain gave notice of the termination of those treaties, and to-day they are terminated. Canada is free, and she has given to the mother country and to the other British possessions a 25 per cent preference on the admission of their goods into this country, over and above that which is given in favour of any other country. It has established preferential trade with the mother country. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to find fault and say this preferential tariff is a fraud and a deception. Let one of them rise and put a motion before the House to repeal that 25 per cent preference clause. If they dare not do that, what is the use of their standing here and denouncing it? If they are honest when they say they believe it is a fraud and a deception practised upon the English people, are they going to be partners to a fraud and a deception practised upon the mother land? They stand there, they are free representatives in this House, but not one of them makes a motion or dares to challenge a vote of the House. They say: What good have you accomplished with your preferential tariff? You have not secured any advantage to Canada in the English market. The figures are against them. Our expanding exports to that country proclaim that statement is incorrect. What has given the vast impetus in our exports to Great Britain? I grant that Providence has blessed us with abundant crops, I grant that market conditions at certain times are more favourable than at other times. But I say that that preferential tariff, and the effect produced upon the English people by the visit of the Liberal Prime Minister of this Dominion, opened the door of the British market to us wider than it has ever been opened before, and we are reaping the benefit of it to-day. Take the exports that are going there, facilitated by the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) of this country, who recognizes their importance. You will find that the export of butter to that country has almost doubled, you will find that our exports of dairy produce are increasing in that direction. I venture to say that the increase of our products exported to the mother country has been largely the result of the policy of this Government.

We abolished the Franchise Act, we saved the people about $250,000 from that source. That Act was doing no good, and its abolition was one of the planks of our platform. We have secured the construction of the Crow's Nest Railway, opening up and developing a wealthy mineral region. There is a mine of wealth for this whole Dominion in that region of country. That puts me in mind that there are men in this House who concurred in voting for that in Supply, but who so far forgot themselves when they went out, as to endeavour to raise a point against the Government for doing the very thing that they themselves were among the most anxious in this House to accomplish. The Intercolonial Railway has been extended to Montreal. The hon. gentleman who preceded me this afternoon endeavoured to belittle that extension, saying that business men everywhere condemned it. Here was a railway that cost this country over $50,000,000, and the policy of the Minister of Railways and Canals has succeeded in making this railway of greater use to the country, and has put it in a position to pay its own way. Improvements have been made in our maritime harbours, in the harbours of Quebec, the great sea harbours of this country, and these improvements will go on more and more. The Yukon has been opened up and, to a great extent, without any cost to the people of this country. How different this achievement to the opening up of the North-west, that was comparatively so easy, when these hon. gentlemen opposite said they would make the North-west pay not only the cost of opening it up, but pay the subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway, although it did not pay, under their administration, even the cost of the management of the land alone. We have opened up a region near the North Pole, under the Arctic circle, hundreds of miles beyond where white men had seldom trodden, a region almost unknown. Now, thousands of people are dwelling there, dwelling there in safety, owing to the action of this Government, who have, without expense to the people of this country, rendered life and property secure and at the same time have taken means whereby the people of this country shall be recouped out of the minerals of that region for the expenditure we are making. We have succeeded in doing that, contrary to the achievements of hon. gentlemen opposite who were to repay the $53,000,000 that we gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway out of the sales of land when they did not get a cent back.

There has been a large increase in immigration to this country as every one can see. We know that people are pouring into the North-west. Hundreds of settlers we read in the papers are settling in the province of Quebec away down in the Lake St. John region to the number of 1,500, I am told, already. People are coming from all parts of the world, and settling our unoccupied territory, making farms for themselves, and becoming producers of wealth, ready to share in the burdens of taxation, and making us stronger as a nation. Imperial penny postage, carried through by this Government, belittled by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they only belittled that which created a sensation in Great Britain, when it was passed. They recognized it as something of importance, if the hon. gentlemen opposite did not. So did the people of Canada recognize it, and the people of Canada did not take any stock in the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, that, because, by following the introduction of the penny postage rate by another important step, in reducing the home rate to 2 cents, it meant that the Government would have to tax the people in order that they might accomplish it. The people of Canada believe, that, by the wise management of the Post Office Department by the Postmaster General, while for a year or two there may be a discrepancy between revenue and expenditure in that department, they believe, from what has been already accomplished, that in the course of two or three years at the most, after having reduced the postage, an equilibrium will be established in that branch of the service between revenue and expenditure and that they will have the benefit of the lower rate. All these reforms have been accomplished by this Government, in power only for a little over two years. Contrast it with the Administration of those hon. gentlemen, who for eighteen years governed this country. We can say, and say with truth, that the foreign trade of this country has increased more in the two years that this Government has been in power than it did during the whole term of the late Government, and, in addition, the home or domestic trade never had the impetus that it has at the present time. Then, I think we can, one and all, rejoice in the grand and magnificent statement which was given to this House by the hon. Finance Minister, when he presented his Budget, a day or two ago. It gives us Canadians something to be proud of, and I venture to say, that even hon. gentlemen opposite, patriotic, as I believe they are, while they feel it to be their duty to criticise, whenever they think there is a possibility of doing it, must all rejoice, that under Liberal rule this country is prospering now as it never prospered before.

Mr. RUFUS H. POPE (Compton). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great pleasure to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. If I had not seen the hon. gentleman himself, personally, I would not have recognized the speech as coming from him, in comparison with speeches that he has delivered on previous occasions, since I have had the honour to have a seat here. The hon. gentleman said, among many things, that this wonderful Government, of which he is a member, deserves special credit for its 2-cent postage, and he said, that, when it was first declared, there was a shock in Great Britain. Undoubtedly, that is a true statement. When the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) decided to declare, that the Postmaster General of Canada would make 2-cent postage for the British Empire, undoubtedly there was a shock in Great Britain. But, like other things which they have managed to accomplish, they simply stumbled into it in the most awkward manner possible. Such a lack of legislative or administrative ability, we have never seen in the past, and we may never see again, exhibited by any Government, no matter what party may form that Government. As to the reduced postage being a great benefit to the people of Canada, it is simply a transference of taxation, and I know of no more just way of taxing the people of Canada than by postage. It is all very well for business men, like myself and others, who have a large correspondence, to congratulate themselves, that we are able to save a dollar or two a day on postage, but every dollar that we save from our expenditure, must be made up by contributions from some other people, and the men who write but few letters, the farming community, the artisans, and people who have little correspondence, will have to contribute in another form of taxation every dollar that is supposed to be saved by the reduction made by the Postmaster General. I think that it is thoroughly well understood by the mass of the people, and that there will still be a difference of opinion between the great populace of Canada and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in regard to the wisdom of the adoption of 2-cent postage in this country. This is a large country, sparsely populated, and it requires a great deal of service in order to carry the mails from one end of it to the other. I think, considering the revenue, and considering the requirements of this country, and to carry out all the schemes that hon. gentlemen opposite are formulating, we will find before many years—I was going to say, long before hon. gentlemen are out of power, but I shall not say that, because that day may be very near—but before many years it will be discovered, that they have not too much money and they will have to resort to some other system of taxation. It will be discovered, that there is no more legitimate system than the postage stamp.

Reference was also made to the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. That was discussed in this House, a few days ago, by many speakers who took part in that long debate and it is not necessary that I should enter into details in regard to that question. There is a great difference of opinion in reference to it throughout the length and breadth of this country. The Government are subjected to criticism on the part of a large portion of the people, for bringing in a class of immigration which is not worthy of the Canadian people, and making large expenditures in that direction. It seems unjust and unfair to pay $5 a head for immigrants. I care not whether it is $5 a head, or $10 a head, or 50 cents a head—I say, that any young Canadian who leaves this part of Canada and goes to the Northwest to hew out a home for himself, should not be discouraged by finding himself embargoed against because of the fact, that he was born in Canada, by having set down beside him people who are the refuse of some corner hole of Europe. This Government is paying $5 a head for people born outside of this country. I think there is a good deal to be ashamed of, so far as the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is concerned. We noticed in the Speech from the Throne, and we have heard it from hon. gentlemen opposite in dozens of speeches delivered by them, that the exodus has ceased. I have taken special pains, in my section of the country, in the eastern townships, since that statement was made, to find out if it was true or not, because, living near the boundary line of the Eastern States, a large portion of this so-called exodus, from days gone by to the present moment, has come from this section and from the maritime provinces. I wish to state, and I speak within the truth, that there never were more people, and there never were so many people, leaving the province of Quebec and going over the Boston and Maine and Maine and Central railways, from the eastern part of the province of Quebec, as in the year 1899. The railway companies have had to put on special cars and to provide special accommodation for these people going to the United States. If these hon. gentlemen, who were claiming credit for having stopped the exodus would visit the stations of the Boston and Maine, the Maine Central or the Quebec Central, or any of these railway companies which are operating in the eastern part of the province of Quebec, they will discover, that, when they got His Excellency to make that remark in his Speech from the Throne, they had not verified all the facts.

I will not now deal with the question of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, further than to say that I believe in the principle of that extension, but I will have an opportunity later on of dealing more fully with the management of the Intercolonial Railway under the system that is in vogue to-day, and if you like, the system that has been in vogue since the Intercolonial Railway was built. I am opposed to the system under which that road is managed, and judging from the speeches made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) all over the country that the road would be conducted on business principles, I was led to expect better things from his management. When he engaged Mr. Harris, a man of great business ability and a man whom I know for years, I thought we were to have better things on the Intercolonial Railway, but my hopes have been blasted, and the faith that caused me to give the Minister my support, has, I find, not been well merited. I will take the earliest possible occasion of discussing this whole question.

The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) spent some time at the beginning of his speech in playing the funny man. It was a new role for the hon. gentleman, and I do not think he did himself a great deal of credit in it, although I have no doubt he did it as well as he could. The hon. gentleman is not built on those lines; he is something on the lines of the elephant, somewhat clumsy and very strong, and when he undertakes to treat of the comic side of political affairs, he is altogether out of his element. It is not for a young member like me to give the hon. gentleman advice, but in a friendly way I would suggest to him that the next time he tries to be comical, he should not try it in the House of Commons of Canada. He took the opportunity of dwelling at length upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he taunted us for claiming credit for the Conservatives, that we were the governing people. He told us that we boasted of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that the present leader of the Opposition, then Minister of Railways or Finance, made the statement to this House, that the Government lands set apart would recoup to this country every dollar that was required to build that road. This statement of the leader of the Opposition he quoted from "Hansard." I did not bother myself to look over "Hansard" to verify that point, but I would ask him to read from the pages of "Hansard" the speeches made by the Liberals at that date, as to the possibility of that road paying, as to the possibility of settling up that country, and as to the fertility of soil in the great North-west. He can read the "Hansard" for a whole year, and he will find that his Liberal friends took every opportunity to decry the future of Canada. These hon. gentlemen opposite, decried the Canadian Pacific Railway, decried the North-west, told the immigrants all over the world that they were going to a cold, barren country, rather than to fertile plains, and in the face of that, he wants to know why the North-west has not realized our expectations. These speeches came from the back benches and from the front benches of the Liberal Opposition, and when as a young man I read those speeches, nothing more than the disloyalty to Canada of these gentlemen tended to start me into the Conservative way of thinking. It was the contemptible action of the Liberals of that day in fouling their own nest, which induced many a young man like myself to decide on having nothing to do with their party. I trust the time will never be when Conservatives will so far forget their duty to themselves and to their country, as to belittle our resources and the great natural advantages which Canada possesses. Let me remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) that the Conservatives were not the only people who undertook to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Liberals when in power before, had an opportunity of exhibiting their wonderful cleverness in that direction. They proposed to this Parliament to build pieces of railway connecting the water stretches, where you could float in the summer and go on snow shoes in winter. That was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite then, and since they have got into power this time, I have seen no evidence, judging by their Yukon deal, that they have learned any more about constructing railways. And, Sir, why should not the Conservative party of this country be the governing body? Read the history of Canada and look at the legislation of Canada, and you will see that the Conservatives have the genus of government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) recommended me to read the platform of the Liberal party as laid down in 1893. Well, I did read it, and it amazes me to think that an intelligent man like him should state in this House, that the planks in that platform had been carried out, with one or two exceptions, and these were announced in the Speech from the Throne. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) know that there is economy in that red bible of the Liberal convention? Does he know that there is retrenchment in that red bible? Does he know that there is prohibition in that red bible? You gave the people the plebiscite, but every temperance vote there was recorded for prohibition, and nothing short of prohibition, and you appealed to the people of this country in favour of prohibition and nothing else. You deluded the temperance people, and they know it. It is an amazing spectacle to see a member of the Government stand up in the presence of intelligent men in the year 1899, and say that the Liberal party has carried out the pledges to be found in that red bible of 1893. And, Sir, I again ask: Have not the Conservatives been the governing party in this country, and is it not the Conservatives who have made the history of Canada. Read our history. Mark every page that belongs to the Conservative Administration, note the prosperity and development of this country; give the Liberal party full credit for every page of history that is properly theirs, and if you take the Grit pages out of that history, the history of our country will remain perfect and complete without them. They say we are the governing power, and they speak of having opened up the Yukon district. Why, you cannot send a telegram there, there is no railway, and there is no mail unless you pay a price at the door. Imagine what the North-west of Canada would have been under similar circumstances. There is an illustration of an opened-up district, where you can get a letter only six weeks at a time. The hon. gentlemen have not risen above their position of 20 years ago. They are lying idle; they are simply trifling with the affections of the people of Canada. They are simply living on the fruits of the policy of the Conservative party. They remind me of a play I saw the other evening in a theatre. A gentleman got into a great deal of difficulty, and he turned to an old gentleman and asked him, "How am I going to get out of my difficulty?" "I can tell you how to get out of it," he said. "For Heaven's sake, do." "Then, stay right in it." That is the way these hon. gentlemen can get out of their difficulties, by staying right in them. They dare not put a finger on a single article of the National Policy. They can only get out of their difficulty by staying right with that policy. They are resting upon the fruits of our policy, and no matter how little their administrative ability or their experience might be, they could for that reason govern the country and govern it well. We have no fault to find with that, but we have a great deal of fault to find with the lack of administrative ability on the part of these hon. gentlemen. Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke of the population of the Yukon. He said that because they were nearly all Americans who had gone in there, they had no right to common British justice. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. If they had all been Canadians, I suppose the royalty would have been reduced. That was the position he occupied, to my mind, when he made his speech. Is not British justice to be granted to every man who comes to live under the British flag? We have in the Yukon district a violation of British justice, and how can you expect those people to become British citizens if they are treated in that way? Every letter that I have received from that opened-up Yukon district denounces the royalty as being too high, and as a drawback to the development of the country. The other evening an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House gloated over the fact that the population of Canada had been increased in the opened-up Yukon district, and spoke of it as a great consuming population. That is true; and if it is a consuming population, what more do we want? If they will consume the manufactured goods of eastern Canada and buy our flour and meat, what more do we want of them? People who went up to that cold region under the circumstances under which these men went there should have every consideration. I do not agree with the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that we should retard the development and prosperity of that country for the sake of having it pay for itself. Let us apply a business policy to it. Let us invest our capital there, as we would in any business, and be willing to wait for dividends in the future. I am prepared to vote in this House to grant a sum of money for opening up that district, and building a railway through it, not between two icebergs, but from the outside into the district. That is what we ought to do, instead of sitting here with our hands in our pockets, satisfied with the salaries we are drawing. What effort have the Government made to open up that district? They have sent up a few soldiers and mounted police to put down the difficulties that would naturally result from the maladministration of the district. There are no more peaceable body of men in the world than miners, no body of men more easy to govern. These men are used to governing themselves and making laws for themselves; and if they are treated properly, no set of men are more easy to govern. The 250 military men sent there are not sent to capture the United States. They must have been sent to keep the peace; and the letters I have received from there and those published in the newspapers state that when the populace got together and began to talk of the outrageous treatment they received at the hands of the officials in that district, it was with difficulty that the cool heads among them restrained them from tearing down the Government shanties. That statement has come from undoubted sources. And still the hon. gentleman says that is the opened-up Yukon district. Now, Sir, that these gentlemen should have a feeling against the American people in that district, that they should have doubt about the ability of that district to govern itself, that they should have doubt as to the wealth of that district to make a portion of Canada worthy of a large expenditure for its development, I can understand perfectly; because these hon. gentlemen have been decrying the country for 20 years. They have been calling everything black that ought to have been white; and during that period of 20 years they have talked themselves into a lack of confidence in the possibilities of Canada. For instance, in the debates of the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia, in 1886, I find that these words were used by the hon. Minister of Finance:

I have no doubt that in 1864, if those men who advocated confederation had proposed a railroad to the Pacific while there was no railroad in Prince Edward Island, they would have been hooted from every platform in the country. Before confederation we had a low tariff and a prosperous revenue. To-day we have a high tariff, not for the benefit of the lower provinces, but largely for the benefit of the western provinces with which we have little common interest.

This was the training school in which the hon. Finance Minister was trained to come and take charge of the finances of Canada. This is the groove that he was trained in to. He took a narrow conception of things, and being ignorant absolutely himself of the great possibilities of that western country, you can well understand that he could not put confidence in any policy intended to develop it. Further, I find the hon. gentleman says:

But let it be remembered that these resolutions are not proposed with a view to our relations with either political party. While, so long as we remain in the union, I believe that to place Mr. Blake in power would remedy some of the evils of which we complain, nevertheless I feel that some of those evils are deeper down than can be removed by Mr. Blake or Sir John Macdonald.

Evidently he was Grit, though an annexationist.

For myself, it is my honest conviction that this union has not been satisfactory, that it will not make our people happy and prosperous,—

That was his honest conviction. He does not say what these other opinions which he expressed were his honest convictions, but this one he specially indicates as his honest conviction.

—and that it is our duty to place ourselves on record, and then to let the people decide, and to stand or fall on that issue.

When you consider that that is the opinion of the Finance Minister of this country, when you see that he has so little confidence even in the confederacy of Canada and in the future of the western part of Canada, which every man who has studied history cannot fail to see is destined to be the source of the future greatness of Canada, when you see the wide difference that existed in 1886 between the Liberal and the Conservative parties, you cannot look very hopefully to anything being accomplished by the present Administration in the interests of the whole country. I can well understand that the hon. gentleman should sympathize with his friends on the other side of the line. His sympathies run in that direction. During all the period of time when he reigned supreme in Nova Scotia he never permitted the Canadian flag to be hoisted over the public buildings of that province on Dominion Day, he even defeated a Bill which was introduced to give a national holiday on that day to the school children. And when you have as Finance Minister an hon. gentleman inoculated with those views, you may expect to see a lack of confidence in opening the purse-strings of the treasury in order to build a railway to develop a country as yet little known. But that is one of the results of putting into power men who are not trained to govern. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to cast blame on us for being the governing people. Well, we assume responsibility of every result of the administration of the Liberal-Conservative party in the last twenty or thirty years. We are proud of the history which that party has made for itself. We do not shirk any responsibility. There may have been, no doubt there were faults, but there were great events, and all those great events recorded in history we claim as ours. We do not wish to rob hon. gentlemen opposite of their policy as they have endeavoured to rob us of ours. We do not steal anything from them, but we stand by the records of the Conservative Administration during all that period when we were in power.

Prosperity—there has been too much said about prosperity. I am not here to decry; nor is it my intention. Take the farming community, take any newspaper you like, take the "Eastern Farmer," and you will find butter quoted at 12 and 15 cents, pork 5 to 5½ cents, hay $3 or $4—go through the whole list, as it appears in the press, and hon. gentlemen will find in those quotations no safe resting-place for any great hopes of extended prosperity.

I took exception to the action of the right hon. First Minister with regard to preferential trade. I told him that in my opinion he had no right to say to England: We will give you a preference in our markets and ask nothing in return. I am with him in any settlement that brings Canada and England closer together, but I say that we will run that sentiment on business lines just the same, and I do not believe that is at all inconsistent or impossible. I think, on the contrary, that if we had given England a positive position in our markets in return for a positive position in hers, the result both for England and Canada would be better. England would have stood in Canada in a preferential position just as we would in England, and every article grown on Canadian soil would have had a preferred price to any other article grown elsewhere on this continent. I have stood up in this House before, and will stand up here over and over again to advocate this policy until I see the day when legislation to this effect will be put in force. The question of immigration will then, of course, solve itself. The British emigration would then all come to us. We would not have to scour all over the world for settlers and bring out the refuse of humanity—people who are not men and women in the sense of intelligent citizenship, but who have to be re-moulded and made fit for self-government, which takes a long time. If we had a preferential policy in both countries, ours would be preferred soil, and to that preferred soil would come the bone and sinew of the mother country—men and women fitted for citizenship and not the raw material that the Government is at present attracting to our shores. I expect some day to see such legislation from which both England and ourselves will reap the benefit. Take free trade as it is in England, and every hon. gentleman who has visited the English country districts knows that it has a tendency to drive the farmers out of business and make it more difficult for Englishmen to live in England. History has shown the great governing power which Englishmen possess; it has shown that they are capable of forming armies that will stand against the whole world; it has shown that the position of England and her achievements are due to the courage and determination of her sons. The free trade policy of England, which is driving these people from the farm must drive them somewhere. Let them come here, and every one who leaves England to settle in this country will strengthen the mother land; and when the time comes when the Empire will require a greater strength than she has at home, she will fall back on her colonies, existing and thriving under preferential conditions, and the hour would then come when we would return to England, not only dollars and cents, but loyalty, patriotism, vigour—men capable of battling against any men formed into armies to attack her shores in any part of the world.

Money makers—you would imagine this Government were money-making people. One would imagine that they were running a mint. It is true they are running a Government mill, and rumour says that they take toll. I do not know how that is; I can only say they have not been partial toward me with any toll. But what do they mean when they stand up in this House and on the hustings and talk about making money as a Government? There is only one way for a Government to make money, and that is to take it from the people of the country. So that when they say they have a surplus of $4,000,000 or $10,000,000, it simply means that they have taken that much money from the pockets of the people. Surely that is no great credit to them. What effort have we seen to reduce taxation in this Budget? The hon. gentleman spent at least two hours in demonstrating to the House what a great boon it had been to the people of Canada to have half of one per cent, or whatever it may be, taken off the tariff. And he spent a good deal more time in extolling the Liberal party for their surplus. If it was a benefit to reduce the tariff, why does not the hon. gentleman go on and reduce it further? But instead of that he boasts of the fact that they have been able to take four or five millions of dollars from the people more than is required—they have taken ten millions. I fancy more than any Government took before. They ask the support of the Canadian people because they have been able to tax the people more than any other men that ever sat on those benches. But that has been dealt with by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), in his exhaustive speech: one that is not second, I believe, to any delivered in this House.

It is not necessary for me to follow the hon. gentleman much further. He does not expect me to enter into these figures of customs receipts, and so on, in detail. That is not in my line, any more than it is in the line of the hon. gentleman to be a funny man. I should look as ridiculous handling these figures as the hon. gentleman looked playing the antelope as he did. There was one part of the policy of the Government that the hon. gentleman was remarkably proud of, and that was that they all agreed to stick together on the Treasury benches. He thought if there was one thing that should win the Government applause in this House it was that the occupants of the Treasury benches were united—and I expect that, as long as the salaries last, they will be united. They make it a point against us that on our side Ministers resigned. Well, Sir, that is true. And we are the only political party in Canada that ever had the credit of having a Minister resign his salary. It is different with the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. You may search through all the provinces and you will never find a Grit going away from his salary. These hon. gentlemen will never have any dissension in that matter. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) may retire. I do not suppose there is any gentleman on that side more genial or better liked or one who is more harmonious with the members of the Government. He may retire. But the moment he lets go of that chair, he will have his hand upon another bench or chair. If he has not, he will not let go of what he has. When you see any of these hon. gentlemen leaving these soft cushioned seats, it is because they know of some other soft seat upon which they are to be placed for life. They deserve a great deal of credit. The hon. Minister said so, and surely an hon. gentleman with the ability of the Minister of Customs would not stand up and devote time to proving it unless it was so. And evidently their followers think it a great point, because they applauded it to the echo, that there were twelve or fifteen men who were willing to sit on the front benches and draw their salaries to the day of judgment. I am delighted to know that harmony prevails among hon. gentlemen opposite. It cannot be that the troubles we hear of in the lobbies and on the streets, the statements we hear on occasions when a man becomes more mellow than he does on other occasions are true. It must be a great relief to the people of this country to have the assurance that they have a stable Government, a Government that will stand to their guns as long as the country will pay their salaries.

Now, in conclusion I would say that hon. gentlemen will find on this side of the House a disposition at all times to discuss public questions fairly. But when a proposition is put forward that is not in accordance with the best interest of the country, they must expect the criticism that is given to men in their position. When these hon. gentlemen go before the people of Canada to receive the recognition of their services, I venture to think they will be astonished to find how the people fail to appreciate their self-sacrifice.

Mr. MCGREGOR. They have not shown that yet.

Mr. POPE. Sir, we have had two or three by-elections in Ontario, and I am bound to say that, so far as the information that has come to my ears is concerned, some of it absolute positive information, there is little credit to these hon. gentlemen in winning those elections. When the courts investigate, some strange facts will come to light. When you can get in a polling division affidavits of men who voted for the Conservative candidate, and when you have more affidavits than you have ballots in the box for that candidate, that reflects no credit upon the manipulation of the electoral machinery. Hon. gentlemen opposite are playing to the smallest prejudices of the people of Canada. They think more of their positions than they do of the welfare of the people. And it is beginning to be known, and as the history of the by-elections in the different provinces becomes public property, the people of Canada will begin to wake up to the fact that they are loaded down by a systematic process of corruption and bribery—even worse than that, because a bribe may be taken and the man who puts it in his pocket may not sell his conscience; but when a man goes up to exercise the highest act of citizenship by depositing his ballot and that ballot is not honestly counted, affairs are getting into a condition in this country that should cause the people to pause and consider very seriously the system that is manipulating the machinery by which their representatives are chosen. Of course the hon. gentleman who leads the Government says: I know nothing about that, and I do not believe it is possible. I would not have believed it possible had I not been told and told upon good authority, that there are many cases in which the affidavits taken show that there must have been some manipulation—as the courts will establish later on.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). It is somewhat amusing to look into the faces of our friends opposite when they are about to close their speeches, and when they tell us what dire disaster is going to overtake us when we once more go back to the people. It strikes me that during the last two years we have had an experience of that during more than once or twice. It is also singular to notice how the memory of our hon.

friends opposite fail them on occasions like this. The hon. gentleman who just sat down says we have had two or three by-elections. It is true. He forgot that we have had over 30 by-elections, and that the Government have been sustained in all but two of them. He also says that corruption has taken place. Now, it is easy to find excuses for the defeats that have overtaken the Conservative party, once the victors in this country. But if corruption has taken place, why do they not prove it in the courts? They must find some sort of excuse, some reason why they have lost the confidence of this country, and they resort to the charge that constituencies have been bought up. Now, we have heard that story so often that we are getting tired of it. If there is any truth in their statements, why don't they go to the courts and punish these men who have corruptly gained their seats? But their declarations in this regard are on a par with others they are accustomed to make in this House until we have ceased to depend on the accuracy of their statements. The hon. gentleman who preceded me finds fault with the penny postage. Now it is easy to understand that an hon. gentleman who can extract consolation from the fact that the Liberal Government have been sustained by over 30 by-elections in this country and have lost only two—I say it is easy to understand that he would find fault with penny postage. I cannot see any consistency in a member of this House taking positions of that kind.

He also finds fault with the preferential tariff as it stands to-day, and says we should not have granted that to Great Britain without some compensating advantage. Well, we have heard that statement repeated time and again in this House until we are fairly tired of it. Now, Sir, one of the things that amuse me is to see the change of front on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. You will have noticed during the speeches, especially of the leaders of the Opposition, what ardent admirers they have become of Providence. It is only recently that they have discovered that Providence has something to do with the welfare and prosperity of the country. We never heard them speak of Providence until within the last two years. I remember a time some 20 years ago when we used to hear a different story, a time when the lean years were upon us. There was then a Government in this country who were carrying on its affairs economically, and discharging their duties faithfully and well. But times were hard not only in Canada but all over the world, to such an extent, indeed, that we heard of whole trains being boarded by tramps in the Western States. But we did not hear Providence blamed for the want of prosperity. Oh, no. Then they only talked about flies on the wheel, we never heard of Providence. Providence is a new creation with them. They do not look to Providence generally for support in their schemes; they generally adopt something more effective to carry out their schemes than anything that Providence would supply. They talk a great deal about what the National Policy has done to bring about the prosperity of this country, they don't call in Providence at all. They shout: Great is the National Policy, great is Diana, and they worship gods of their own creation. They say that the prosperity which this country is enjoying is the consequence of the National Policy. But just now they have got a new device in order to explain the prosperity and comfort that people are enjoying in this country. They say they do not dispute the fact that this country is prosperous, but it is not owing to the policy of the Government at all, it is Providence that is doing the whole job. Now let us see what they really did say about the policy this Government has adopted. I read somewhere, I think it was in Victor Hugo's work, "Les Misérables," that only those should be justified in praising a scheme who have supported it when it was in adversity. The policy of the present Government was criticised by our friends opposite in a hostile manner. They predicted that evil would overtake this country, that the industries of this country would be wiped out. Now, they change front, they admit that the country is prosperous, but they forget what they said about this policy only two years ago. Now, lest some of our hon. friends have forgotten what they said, I will read from a speech delivered some two years ago.

Mr. LANDERKIN. By whom?

Mr. HEYD. I will tell you after I have read it.

Now, what is the result? The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence. While hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wall, the sorrowful wall, of those industries in the Montreal "Gazette," where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada. It would have been bad enough if the hon. gentleman had gone to the country with a frank avowal that they were in favour of what they have declared to be their policy for long years previously; it would have been bad enough if they had been able to get a majority pledged to sweep away those industries and to destroy the policy that had achieved so much for Canada; but to obtain power by the solemn declarations made publicly and privately all over this country that no harm would come to the manufacturing industries, that not a hair of their head should be touched, that in fact their rights would be pro-ted, that their position would be improved, because they were going to have their raw material made free—coal was to be made free—I say that under these circumstances I can understand how indignant the people of this country will feel at the outrage that has been inflicted upon them, not by a fair, open, and manly declaration of policy, but by false pretenses under the guise of solemn declarations that no harm would be done to the industries of this country.

That is a statement made by the leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House only two years ago.

Mr. TAYLOR. When attacking a preferential policy open to the world, as declared then, a 25 per cent rebate.

Mr. HEYD. Now, these hon. gentlemen have forgotten all that. They have forgotten that they predicted the ruin of this country when they see evidence of prosperity on every hand. They cannot convince the people that they are not prosperous; they may try to do it if they can possibly deceive them, but every man knows that his condition is better to-day than it has ever been in Canada before. Another hon. gentleman charges that the Government is extravagant. I listened to a speaker who said, the other night, "We do not blame you for spending this money in the way that you are doing; we do not criticise the manner of your spending it, but we object, because you objected to our having spent it." This is rather a weak kind of reasoning. If we have expended any money improperly, it is in the interest of the country that it should be objected to. Therefore, if our hon. friends on the other side of the House concur in the expenditures that the Government have made, and if they agree that they are necessary for the proper development of the country, there is not much to blame them for. But is it true that this Government is extravagant? I think that this matter has been dealt with before. I am well aware that the people throughout the country have not the same opportunity of hearing and of reading up these matters in the blue-books as we have ourselves. Therefore, I think I will be excused, if I say one or two words more, so that the people will have an opportunity of acquainting themselves with the real facts of the case. They cannot be sure that they have the facts of the case by reading the editorial articles in the Conservative newspapers of the country. What do we find the facts to be? I am not quoting from editorials; I am quoting from our blue-books. I do not want to go back to the time of the deluge for my facts; I will not go back more than five years to compare the expenditure of the present Government with that which took place during the last three years of the late Government. What has been the result? In 1894, the late Government spent on consolidated fund account $37,585,000. Now, we all understand what consolidated fund account means. But I know that throughout the country all the people do not know, and that they are confused by the words, and have not a thorough understanding of what they mean. I say, then, to the ordinary man, in speaking throughout the country, that by consolidated fund we mean the running expenses of the Government, the money that is necessary to carry on the Government from day to day. Now, in 1894, the late Government spent the sum I have named. In 1895, they spent $38,132,000. In 1896, $36,949,000. In 1897, we spent $38,349,000, and in 1898, $38,832,000. We have a right to look over the results and see whether the country is getting full value for the money we spend. You can compare this Government with a mercantile establishment that has its employees and agents going through the country. Have they succeeded in carrying on the business of the country successfully with these expenditures? In 1894, the late Government were $1,210,000 behind in the running expenses of the Government; in 1895, they were $4,153,000 behind; in 1896, they were $330,000 behind, while the Liberal Government, in the first year it assumed office, was $519,000 behind; in 1898, $1,722,000 ahead, and, I understand, that during the year of which we have now passed ten months, the excess will be about $4,600,000; or, in other words, that during the three years that the Liberal Government have been conducting the business of this country we have actually some $6,000,000 to our credit, while during the last three years that the late Government carried on the affairs of the country they had $5,694,000 to their debit. That shows whether they carried on the business of the country successfully or not. We have spent more money than they did, but we have done more business than they did, and in every well regulated establishment, you can hardly expect to do more business unless it cost a little more.

I shall now allude to another fact in connection with this matter, because it has been referred to very often. We have another account with which we are all familiar, namely, capital account. A great many people do not understand what we mean by capital account. It has the same reference to the affairs of the Dominion as when a man is building a barn, as when a man is stumping his land or clearing away some of his bush. It is the same as when a farmer increases the value of his farm. Capital account is money that is expended to add to the resources of the country. Have we been lukewarm in that matter? If we had expended money in this country, have we expended it corruptly? I do not find fault with this Government or the late Government for any sums of money that they have expended on capital account, and the country does not find fault; they do not care how much is spent as long as it is spent in the interest of the people of this country. It is a matter of great importance, not how much is spent, but how has it been spent. Is it being wasted; is it being corruptly spent, or is it really not being spent but invested, because, I regard all that money that we expend on capital as money invested just as much as any farmer could do, to clear another ten acres of land or to build another barn. During the three years that I have spoken of, the late Government spent $17,710,000 on capital account, while we have spent during these three years, or approximately will have at the end of this year, about $20,000,000. We have not neglected the public works of this country. What has been the result of all this? We are accused of extravagance, and it is charged that we are piling up the debt rapidly. While the late Government spent $5,000,000 and a little over per annum on capital account, we have spent $6,000,000. They say that we have increased the expenditure both on consolidated fund account and on capital account, and that we have raised our national debt to an extraordinary degree. Let us briefly look at these three years again, and see whether that statement is true. In 1893, the national debt stood at $241,681,000; after three years of Conservative administration it had increased to $258,497,000, or a total increase of $16,816,000 in these three years, or an average of $5,605,000 a year. What took place during the administration of the present Government? We spent more money on capital account than they did, but we did not increase the national debt at all, the way our friends did. We found the national debt at $258,497,000, and two years afterwards it was only $263,956,000. They added $5,605,000 a year for three years to the national debt, while we spent more money carrying on greater enterprises, and having obligations to meet for which they never had to provide, in this connection, and only increased the national debt by $2,729,000. This is a matter that business men thoroughly understand, and no matter how much it may be said, in the columns of partisan newspapers, that this is an extravagant Government, that it is rapidly increasing the national debt, you have now got the facts of the case which show that this Government is an economical and progressive Government. There are other matters in connection with this which I am sure are exceedingly gratifying to the Government. You know that our Conservative friends opposite pride themselves upon the condition in which they have left the national credit of this country. Well, I do not think it has been impaired by the present Government, because I find that the following state of facts exist. In 1890, the average rate of interest on the gross debt was 3·52 per cent; in 1896, it had diminished to 3·23 per cent, and in 1898, it had diminished to 3·10 per cent.

Average rate of Interest on Gross Debt.

| Year.      | Per cent. |
|------------|-----------|
| 1890 ..... | 3·52      |
| 1896 ..... | 3·23      |
| 1898 ..... | 3·10      |

The interest per cent is smaller to-day upon our gross debt than it was when the Liberal party took office; and if you take the net debt, the interest in 1890 was 3·07, in 1896, 2·80, and in 1898 it had shrunk to 2·66.

Mr. HEYD.

Average rate of Interest on Net Debt.

| Year.      | Per cent. |
|------------|-----------|
| 1890 ..... | 3·07      |
| 1896 ..... | 2·80      |
| 1898 ..... | 2·66      |

The annual interest upon every dollar we owe is less to-day than it was when the Liberals took office. These are very gratifying figures, but there is another aspect of this question which has afforded me a great deal of pleasure. I refer to the trade of the country. The two things are so intimately associated the one with the other, they so react the one upon the other, that it is hard to separate them. It is exceedingly gratifying to me as a supporter of the present Government, not only to find that our financial administration has been good, but also that our trade conditions are better than they have ever seen before. We can congratulate ourselves that the preferential tariff, so maligned in its infancy by the Conservatives, and which has now proven to be such a blessing to Canada, has a great deal to do with the gratifying position of trade affairs now existing. You know, there used to be, in days gone by, "the balance of trade theory" held by our Conservative friends. They pointed with contempt to the condition of affairs as they existed in Canada during the Mackenzie Government of twenty years ago, and they pledged themselves to wipe out that great excess of imports over exports, and, as they said, they were going to keep Canada for the Canadians. We have heard the Conservatives state that on every platform of Canada, and they have almost carried elections on that very issue. Now, I do not need to go back twenty years for my authority; but I can look at the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last few years, and just see how we stand in that respect. I do not wish to weary the House with these figures, but I have some little theory of my own in the background which I wish to bring out. It is, however, of some interest to have these figures recorded in "Hansard," and I have taken them from the Trade and Navigation Returns. I find on page 2 of that blue-book, that in the year 1881 our exports, the produce of Canada, amounted to $83,944,711. Let me remark here, that as a rule the statistical tables used in this House are not such that we can derive much instruction from them. They are generally prepared to include coin and bullion, the produce of other countries re-exported by us, so that we really do not know in looking at those figures, how much of the export Canada has contributed, but we also have in the Trade and Navigation Returns a column devoted exclusively to the export of the produce of our Canadian farms, fisheries and mines.

We had a very large export business as far back as 1881. Our friends on the other side tell us that they made this country prosperous, and that until they got hold of affairs Canada languished for the advent of these Heaven-born legislators who, for the past eighteen years have, in my opinion, been mismanaging the affairs of this country. Now, in 1881, our exports were $83,944,711; in 1890 they were $85,257,000; in 1894 they were $103,851,764; and in 1896, $109,707,349.

| Year.      | Amount of Exports. |
|------------|--------------------|
| 1881 ..... | $ 83,944,711      |
| 1890 ..... | 85,257,586         |
| 1894 ..... | 103,851,764        |
| 1896 ..... | 109,707,349        |

During a period of fifteen years the exports of 1896 exceeded the exports of 1881 by $25,762,638. Now, what has been the result during the past two years? In 1897, we exported $123,632,540, the produce of Canada, and in 1898 we exported $144,333,941, the produce of Canada.

| Year.      | Value of Exports. |
|------------|-------------------|
| 1897 ..... | $123,632,540     |
| 1898 ..... | 144,333,941       |

In other words, during fifteen years of the reign of the National Policy we only increased our exports by an average of $1,700,000 a year, while during the two years the present Government have been in power we have increased our exports at the rate of $17,313,000 per annum. There is another little table which is just as interesting as the one I have read. I refer to our imports, and you will remember what I said a few moments ago with respect to that. Well, Sir, the trade of Canada was not very small some fifteen or twenty years ago. Our trade was not all created since the late Government assumed office; for some little portion of it existed even as far back as 1883, when our imports entered for consumption amounted to $121,000,000. Here again we are slightly led astray by the phrasing used at the head of our blue-book, for while it says "imports entered for consumption," it does not always mean that these imports were consumed in this country, because you will find that while we imported some $7,000,000 worth of corn and entered that for consumption, $5,000,000 worth went out of the country again. We do not consume the majority of the corn imported, as was suggested here the other night. In 1883 our imports entered for consumption were $121,861,496; in 1892 they were down to $115,150,413; in 1894 they were down to $109,070,911, and in 1896 they were down to $105,361,161, or they had shrunk from $121,000,000 to $105,000,000—a shrinkage of $16,000,000 in fifteen years.

Imports entered for Consumption.

| Year.      | Value.        |
|------------|---------------|
| 1883 ..... | $121,861,496 |
| 1892 ..... | 115,150,413   |
| 1894 ..... | 109,070,911   |
| 1896 ..... | 105,361,111   |

Let us look now at the imports entered for consumption during the past two years:

| Year.      | Value.        |
|------------|---------------|
| 1897 ..... | $106,617,828 |
| 1898 ..... | 126,281,684   |

Our imports last year were $5,000,000 greater than they were in 1883, or $16,000,000 greater than when our Conservative friends left office. Now, let me ask did the Conservatives bring back the balance of trade to Canada? I have looked into the matter, and I find that for the eight years ending in 1896 our imports amounted to $877,753,929, and our exports, the produce of Canada, to $775,111,054, or an excess of imports over exports in eight years of $102,642,875, being an average excess of $12,832,859 a year. Now, what has been the result during the past two years—and this must be a matter of extreme gratification to our friends on the other side, holding the views which they profess to hold.

In 1897 and 1898 the imports were $233,907,511 for the two years, and our exports $267,966,286, or in other words, our exports exceeded our imports by $17,029,387 a year. Therefore, while the Conservative Government allowed the imports to exceed the exports by $12,000,000 a year, under the present Government the exports exceeded the imports by over $17,000,000 a year, or a difference of $30,000,000 a year in respect to that particular item. It is a matter of gratification to me to find that the equilibrium of trade is really establishing itself. I myself do not regard it as a matter of great importance whether the balance of trade is against us or for us, for that is a point which I believe will adjust itself in the long run. To me it is a matter of very little importance, and I do not take much stock in the idea that whether the balance of trade is against us or for us, it is a matter for congratulation or otherwise.

But the principal reason why I adduce this table is, to show the trend which trade has taken during the past few years, to see if we could not do something in order to change this current that has been slowly going in a direction that we ourselves do not appreciate. If we divide these exports which I have alluded to, into exports to Great Britain and exports to the United States, we will see how the trade of this country is gradually shifting; and I intend to show that the present Government, realizing that fact, adopted the only method that was within their reach, to make this trade go into different channels. In 1894, we exported the produce of Canada to Great Britain to the value of $60,000,000 ; in 1895, $67,000,000 ; in 1897, $69,000,000, and in 1898, $93,000,000. Now, that is extremely satisfactory. We know, that our trade with Great Britain is growing. Whether it will keep up to the high standard reached last year or not, I am not able to say ; I wish I were sure of it, but I do not think it will. We cannot always have phenomenal crops, nor can we always get good prices. But that our export trade with Great Britain is assured, we can look forward to with a good deal of confidence. Let us look now to the United States. We find, that we exported of the produce of Canada to the United States, in 1894, $32,000,000 ; in 1895, $35,000,000 ; in 1897, $37,000,000, and in 1898, $40,000,000. Our trade in the produce of Canada going to the United States steadily increased, notwithstanding the walls that they have been raising up against us in the form of Dingley Bills and other methods of preventing our goods finding a market there, and it is $8,000,000 higher to-day than it was six years ago. This is a matter of satisfaction. However much we may dislike the way we are being treated by our friends on the other side, we are glad to see that it is impossible for men to interfere entirely with trade. Our trade with Great Britain has steadily increased, while that with the United States has also increased.

But the figures to which I want specially to direct your attention, are the imports from Great Britain and the United States, to show the great change which has taken place during the last few years. As far back as 1875, we received from Great Britain $49,239,000 worth of dutiable goods. These have been steadily shrinking, until we are almost ashamed to say, that we buy so little from the country that buys so much from us. In 1894, they shrank to $27,493,000, a dead loss of $22,000,000 in the purchase of British goods. The amount went steadily down until the year 1897, when we imported only $20,217,000 worth of dutiable goods from Great Britain, or a shrinkage of $29,000,000 since 1875. Now, as loyal Canadians, belonging, as it were, to Great Britain, we are not anxious that trade with the mother country should be entirely wiped out. We are anxious that the people who buy from us, should also sell to us. Can we do nothing to prevent this terrible loss of trade with the mother country ? For $29,000,000 of shrinkage is a very large item to a country of 5,000,000 people.

Let us look at the free goods, and see how they stand. In 1873, we imported as high as $20,553,000 worth of free goods from Great Britain ; in 1893, this was reduced to $10,660,000 worth, and it kept going steadily down. In 1895, it amounted to $7,747,000 worth, and in 1898, to $9,486,000, a loss of $12,000,000 in free goods. This is not gratifying to me, as a Canadian. Let us see how the matter stands with the United States. Hon. gentlemen say, that we have got this tariff so designed as to injure our trade with the people of Great Britain. Now, is that true ? Do the trade returns prove any statement of that kind ? They prove that, in 1884, we imported from the United States, of dutiable goods, $38,652,000, and that, in 1898, we imported $38,063,000. So our imports from the United States have not decreased, like those of Great Britain. But, in the importation of free goods, a most marvellous change has taken place. In 1880, we imported, of free goods from the United States, $8,627,000 ; in 1890, $20,790,000 ; in 1895, $24,383,000, and in 1898, $36,760,000, an actual increase in the importation of free goods from the United States of $28,000,000, while there was a decrease in the importation of free goods from England of $12,000,000. Now, these things are not satisfactory to us, as Canadians. Could we do nothing to restore the trade which Great Britain was losing, and to some extent—I do not say, injure—but lessen the trade which was daily being enlarged with the people of the United States ? I say, something could be done, and something was done, and was done effectually ; and I believe, that, through the means the Government have resorted to, much ultimate good will result.

Now, I know that our friends on the other side of the House find fault with the goods that come to this country from the United States. I can assure you, that they do not come here because we desire particularly to buy from the United States. They come because they are produced there cheaper than they can be anywhere else in the world. It would be impossible, however much we desired, to keep these goods out of the country. All we have to do, is to look at the quality of the goods that come to this country and the competition they are subjected to ; and, comparing our imports from England with those from the United States, we find that, out of $74,000,000 worth which we got from the United States, $64,000,000 worth came into competition with only $9,000,000 worth of British goods. That is a peculiar state of affairs ; but we cannot help that, because the United States produce raw materials and certain semi-manufactured articles and sell them in this country cheaper than we can buy them for anywhere else in the world. Therefore, we cannot prevent this vast trade with the United States, no matter how much we try, and it might not be in our interest to try, however patriotic we may be, or however much we desire the prosperity of Great Britain. The greater product of the islands beyond the sea are of the utmost importance to us ; and, however much we may desire to advance Great Britain's interest, we must not forget to look at the interests of the people who live in this Canada of ours.

This trade has been tending steadily in favour of the United States, and against Great Britain. I have a table showing our importations from Great Britain and from the United States in about 25 articles, with which I do not want to weary the House; but a certain few are interested in them. Of animals and their products, we got $21,073 from Great Britain, and $588,954 worth from the United States. You cannot help that, because in England they do not raise the kind of cattle we require. Of baking powder, we got from Great Britain only $154 worth, while we got from the United States $101,801 worth. Of breadstuffs, we got $163,461 from Great Britain, and $7,732,301 from the United States; and among these imports of breadstuffs is the corn that our friend the ex-Finance Minister alluded to the other night, when he tried, probably unwillingly, to make us believe, that we imported 19,000,000 bushels of the corn and consumed the major portion. Well, we did not; we only imported $6,964,000 worth, and re-exported $5,165,000 worth; or, in other words, $1,800,000 worth of corn was used in this country as an import from the United States. Now, take coal and coke: we imported $125,573 worth from the United States, and $9,293,939 from Great Britain. Of cotton and the manufactures of, we imported $3,284,324 from Great Britain, and $5,481,140 from the United States, of which $4,000,000 is raw material. Of electrical appliances, we imported $8,274 from Great Britain, and $424,644 from the United States. Of fruit, we imported $195,140 from Great Britain, and $1,802,366 from the United States. Of gutta percha and the manufactures thereof, we imported $131,888 from Great Britain, and $1,974,321 from the United States.

The English imports into this country only represent $9,948,047, while the American imports of that same class of goods represent $63,442,547. If it be desirable, in the interests of the country, to prevent that condition of things, it strikes me that the Government acted wisely and patriotically—and the people of Great Britain at any rate appreciate their action—in establishing this preferential rate. Our friends opposite may say what they like about its being hostile to Great Britain and the people of this country. They are talking to intelligent men in this House, and I do not like to say that the men who make that statement are untruthful, but I am satisfied that no constituency in this country is so ignorant as to send a man to this House who really believes that a preference of 25 per cent is not a benefit to the people of Great Britain. I am satisfied that these men do not believe what they say themselves. I know that the dutiable goods imported from Great Britain last year amounted to $22,000,000, and that the duty paid was $6,649,000, and I assume all of it but liquor and tobacco came in under preferential rate. Well, if we had not that preferential rate, the duty would have been just $900,000 more. Now, if a gentleman in Great Britain could sell us $22,000,000 worth of stuff, and if we were to give him a present of $1,000,000 better than we gave to anybody else, he would naturally think that that was a certain benefit to him; and it is the sheerest folly for intelligent men to get up and make the statement that these hon. gentlemen opposite did to other men who can at least do a little thinking for themselves.

I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, of speaking at any length and shall not detain the House any longer. But I like to tackle any intricate problem of figures myself, and I thought this question of the tariff is rather interesting. But before concluding I might say a word regarding the great credit which our friends opposite take to themselves for their good character. They are exceedingly anxious to read extracts from political newspapers in order to throw some discredit upon the leaders and some of the members of this party. Well, if they could only see themselves as others see them—not people who are hostile to them politically—but just as the country sees them, a discredited and disorganized mob, they would realize really where they stand. As individuals, they are very nice men. I see some before me whom personally I am very glad to call my friends, but politically, since I have been in this House, I have found more trickery among my hon. friends opposite than I have seen anywhere else. But just as a parting shot, to show our friends on the other side, who are so exceedingly anxious to read comments reflecting on this Government, how other people view them, let me read an article that does not come from a hostile source either:

The constituency of Brockville, that for over twenty years was true to Conservative principles, has gone over to the Reform ranks by a handsome majority, and the Conservative who refuses to accept the true meaning of that loss is simply not worth arguing with.

It means that the great bulk of Conservatives outside the members of the Mutual Admiration Society, who are laying claim to be its leaders, would rather see the party out of power than that it should be officered by the same men who played the traitor act in the most crucial hours of its history.

It means that so long as it is officered by Foster, Haggart, Montague & Co., it will remain where it is now, and though I have the highest respect for the pluck and indefatigable energy of Sir Charles Tupper, not even he, with all his ability, has a ghost of a chance to succeed so long as his lieutenants are the men who knifed their former leader, and whose base treachery had as much to do with the Conservative defeat at the general election as the Manitoba School Bill itself.

When Sir Charles journeys through the country he is surrounded at the places he stops at by those who have an object in making him believe that all is serene, but those who travel through the country know that there is an absolute lack of confidence in the very men who are pushing themselves forward to again lead the party. The late meeting of Conservatives in this city was a farce pure and simple, the resolutions were all cut and dried, and the men who moved and seconded them were told beforehand just what they had to do. An organization started in that manner will be about as efficient in arousing enthusiasm as a corpse at a wedding feast.

Mr. George E. Foster, the chief conspirator of the crew, showed himself in Centre Toronto, and hundreds of Conservatives refused to vote. He journeyed to Lambton County, and the majority against his party was much larger than before. He undertook to redeem his own province of New Brunswick, and he got wiped out so thoroughly that he hadn't enough Conservatives elected to fill a four-wheeled trap. Verily the way of the political traitor is a hard road to travel, men may admire ability, but when it is not allied to ordinary manliness and fair-play, it will not go down with the people. The Conservative party is out of power, and there it will remain through all the years that the traitors undertake to rule it.

This is written, I believe, by a Mr. King Dodd, the editor of the Canadian "Sportsman," a loyal Conservative, very clever, and I should judge from what he has written, very truthful. I am sure that on this side we entertain no such feelings for the men who lead the Government. We look forward to a long era of prosperity for this country, and it will be prosperous as long as the men who are controlling its affairs to-day continue to rule its destiny. Looking over what has taken place during the past two or three years, there is nothing to inspire our friends opposite with any degree of hope or to make us feel in the slightest degree discouraged. Throughout the length and breadth of the country there is a feeling of security, prosperity, confidence—a feeling of Canadianism, such as we never have had before, and as long as the people are happy and prosperous they will not want any change of Government. Our friends opposite, if they want to obtain office, will have to take another course. They will have to try and be truthful on the public platform, and not try to stab a man in his private life in order to advance their political fortunes. They will have to fall back on the old methods, for no matter how corrupt a man may be himself he likes to follow a man who is honest. They will have to be honest to their leaders. Until they change their methods, they will have no chance before the people, and need not hug themselves with the idea that when they go back to the country they will have the slightest chance of being elected to anywhere else than where they are now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. As the motion I made has served its purpose, and the debate now ended, I beg to withdraw the motion.

Motion that the House do go into committee of Ways and Means withdrawn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 5th May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 110) respecting the Hudson Bay and Yukon Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 111) to further amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—(Mr. McInnes.)

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). In reference to a return laid on the Table to-day by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), relating to the enforcement of the coasting laws, I would call the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to the fact that when the papers were moved for, it was mentioned that some of the correspondence was with the Department of the Interior. I would be very glad if the Minister would see whether there are some papers in his department in that connection which might be brought down.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the Government whether they have any further information with respect to the regulations of the Newfoundland Government prohibiting the purchase or taking of bait by Canadian fishermen?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is nothing further; but the Government have forwarded representations to the Government of Newfoundland asking for definite and expllicit information with respect to the complaints made, and we are in daily expectation of receiving an answer to our representations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the House if it is intended to proceed with the Drummond County Railway resolutions to-morrow, because some papers have been moved for which are absolutely necessary to the discussion. Information has been asked as to the results of the working of the Drummond County Railway, the expenses and receipts, and it will be absolutely impossible to proceed intelligently with that subject unless the hon. Minister of Railways furnishes the House with full information with regard to the whole question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I do not know what my hon. friend means by full information with regard to the whole question. I will furnish him with information, as I was asked to do the other day, with respect to the earnings and expenditures of the whole road, from the end of the late fiscal year down to the last moment at which the returns are available. If that covers the ground which the hon. gentleman has in his mind. I will do that, and I will do it before the debate is entered upon.

Mr. HAGGART. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to mean by the whole road, the road from Halifax to Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Quite so—the whole Intercolonial road.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. MORRISON. I would beg to ask the right hon. First Minister if he has received any communication from the Government of British Columbia with respect to the Pacific Cable?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Communication has been received from the Government of British Columbia, of which the public has already had notice, to the effect that the British Columbia Government offered to contribute one-ninth towards the cable.

Mr. MORRISON. Has any communication of a similar nature been received from the Government of any of the other provinces?

The PRIME MINISTER. None.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 14) respecting the Quebec Steamship Company.—(Mr. Malouin.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the Canadian Railway Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 13) respecting the Home Life Association of Canada.—(Mr. Macdonald, Huron.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Restigouche Boom Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 103) to incorporate the Klondike Mines Railway Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 106) to incorporate the Canadian Birkbeck Investment and Savings Company.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 108) respecting the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pontiac, and to change its name to "The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pembroke."—(Mr. Poupore.)

Bill (No. 88, Letter A of the Senate) for the relief of David Stock.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

DEFAULT IN SENDING IN VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What officers and for what electoral districts were in default in sending in the revised voters' lists to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at the proper time as defined in the Franchise Act? Has the Government taken any action, and if so, what in regard to them?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No voters' lists for the following named electoral districts were received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, under section 10 of the Dominion Franchise Act, for the year 1898, viz: Province of Ontario, Cornwall and Stormont, Dundas, Glengarry, Grenville, south riding, Leeds, south riding. Province of Quebec: Beauce, Bellechasse, Missisquoi, Montcalm, the five divisions of Montreal. Province of Nova Scotia: Cape Breton and Cumberland. Province of New Brunswick: Albert, Carleton, Charlotte, Gloucester, Kent, King's, Northumberland, Restigouche, Sunbury and Queen's, Victoria and Westmoreland. No action has yet been taken to have these lists sent in.

GABARUS—PIER OR BREAKWATER.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Public Works since last session of Parliament visited Gabarus, in the county of Cape Breton?

2. If so, has he examined into the necessity for a pier or breakwater at that place, as urged upon the Department of Public Works by petition and otherwise?

3. Is it the intention of the Minister to recommend a grant during the present session?

4. Will the same be provided for in the supplementary Estimates?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Department of Public Works furnish the following answers: 1 and 2. No, but it is on record that under the former Administration requests have been made for the construction of a breakwater at Gabarus, and were never acted upon by them. As the supplementary Estimates are not yet prepared, a definite answer to questions 3 and 4 cannot be given.

FREDERICTON MILITARY SCHOOL AND FRANCIS MCKENZIE.

Mr. McDougall asked :

Why was Francis McKenzie, of Christmas Island, refused instructions in the Military School at Fredericton, 1897 ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I have sent the inquiry to Fredericton to get the information desired ; but I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) to allow the question to stand, as I have not yet received an answer.

CANADA SERVICE MEDAL.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. McDougall) asked :

Has the Canada service medal authorized by the Imperial authorities, and for the issue of which the Parliament of Canada has provided funds, been received by the Canadian Government ?

2. If the medals have been received, when will they be issued to those entitled to receive them ?

3. If the medals have not been received by the Canadian Government, what is the cause of the delay ?

4. Who compose the board of claims appointed by the Canadian Government to adjudicate upon applications for the Canada service medal ?

5. How many meetings of the board of claims have been held ?

6. What remuneration has been paid to each member of the board for each meeting he attended ?

7. How much money has been paid to date to members of the board ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. No. 2. No. 3. The cause of delay is unknown. The medals are being struck off at the Royal Mint. 4. President: The Adjutant General ; members, Lieut.-Col. Cotton, A.A.G.A., Lieut.-Col. Vidal, A.A.G., Major Rivers, Royal Canadian Artillery, Captain Wurtele, Reserve of Officers. 5. Daily (Sundays and holidays excepted) since the formation of the board. 6. No extra remuneration is paid to the board. 7. Captain Wurtele has received from 1st of October to 31st of March past, inclusive : 182 days' pay at $2.82 per day, $513.24 ; 182 days' subsistence, at $2.50 per day, $455 ; total, $968.

U. S. BOATS REGISTERED AT DAWSON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Can the hon. Minister of Customs, without inconvenience, state the names and tonnage of United States boats built which have been given Canadian registry by the collector of customs at Dawson from July 1st, 1898, to latest date known at Ottawa, the duty paid, the amount of valuation of each vessel and by whom such valuation was made, and the names of British owners of the same ; and will a complete return as above, down to date, be laid upon the Table at an early day ?

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). I regret that I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information just now. I think it will be well if he will make a motion for a return. The information is now being collected ; but it will be some time before it can be ready.

STEAMER "JOHN C. BARR."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Has the Department of Customs any report as to the value of the S.S. "John C. Barr," recently admitted to Canadian registry at Dawson? If so, what was the valuation for customs purposes ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). The steamer "John C. Barr" was entered for duty at Dawson, 6th October, 1898, on application for Canadian registry, upon a valuation of $10,000.

RAMA INDIANS AND STATUTE LABOUR.

Mr. McCORMACK (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Are the Indians of Rama Reserve, Ontario, exempt from statute labour taxes ?

2. Are they exempt from taxes on their land to the municipality of Rama ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to contribute to the municipality of Rama a sum equal to a fair statute labour and land tax on the property of the Indians towards the maintenance of roads and bridges ?

4. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. There is no present intention of making any such contribution. 4. Because it has never been the policy of the department to make such contribution, and sufficient reasons for changing the policy have not been advanced.

TIMBER ON DUCEIS RESERVE.

Mr. McCORMACK (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Has the Government sent an agent or commissioned any one to offer the Indians of Ducelis (Dukas) Reserve, viz., those on the big island or reserve in the French River, near Lake Nipissing, a sum of money per head per annum for life on condition that they relinquish their claims to the timber on the land, or to both ?

2. What sum per head per annum was offered the Indians each ?

3. With what person or persons has the Government been negotiating for the sale of such timber ?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to dispose of the timber on said island ?

5. Has the timber already been sold ? If so, to whom, and on what terms ?

6. Where are the Indians to be placed if removed from the reserve ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No. 2. No sum. 3. No one. 4. Not at present. 5. No. 6. The question of the removal of the Indians has not been considered.

EDMONTON VOLUNTEER COMPANY.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

1. Has the Government received an application from or on behalf of members of the Edmonton Volunteer Company for scrip and medals in recognition of services rendered in the North-west rebellion of 1885 ?

2. If so, what are the intentions of the Government in regard to this application ?

3. Has the Government received an application from or on behalf of James Mowat for recognition of services as special courier in the North-west rebellion of 1885 ?

4. If so, what are the intentions of the Government in regard to this application ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. The department has answered the applicants that the volunteers in question were not raised by authority within the meaning of the statute of 1886, and therefore their request could not be entertained. 3. Yes. 4. The department replied that as Mr. Mowat's services were not those of a scout, his claim could not be entertained.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ANNAPOLIS ROYAL

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Have tenders been asked for painting the public building at Annapolis Royal ? If so, who are the parties asked to tender ?

2. Is the Government aware that Mr. Allan Bishop, of Annapolis Royal, is by trade a painter with a long and successful experience ? That said Bishop is ready and willing to tender for the painting of said public building ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. No tenders have been asked for, but an estimate has been made and the amount thereof noted in the Estimates. 2. Mr. Allan Bishop is not known in this department, except by a letter written by the hon. member a few days ago.

MILLER'S LANDING, FRASER RIVER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. How much did it cost to make the canal or cut through the gravel bar at Miller's Landing, Fraser River, British Columbia, last year ?

(a) What has been the result of the expenditure to the country or locality ?

(b) Has the cut or canal been filled up by the high water so that the expenditure has been wasted or thrown away ?

(c) Were any Conservatives engaged in this work or was it a 'sine qua non' that all employees should be Liberals in Canadian politics ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The amount expended last year is $7,420.71. (a.) The expenditure in question was undertaken in order to restore to its former position, prior to 1876, the main channel of the Fraser River, considerable erosion having taken place during that period by which 150 acres of valuable improved land had been carried off. Previous to 1894 attempts had been made to stop this erosion by building a wing dam, but unsuccessfully, hence the work of excavation done last year. (b.) There is no report to that effect in the department. (c.) The department does not know anything of the kind and has given no orders to that effect ; but it is very natural that, all things being equal as regards ability, &c., friends should be employed in preference to opponents.

EXPORTS OF WHEAT AND FLOUR.

Mr. WALLACE (by Mr. McDougall) asked :

How many bushels of wheat and barrels of flour respectively, being the products of Canada, have been exported from the ports of Montreal, St. John, N.B., Fort William and Winnipeg ?

What are the quantities from each port : (1st) for the year ending 30th June, 1898 ; (2nd) for the six months to 1st January, 1899 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). Wheat exported during fiscal year ending 30th June, 1898 :

| From—              | Bushels.   |
|--------------------|------------|

POSTMASTER OF BERTHIER (EN HAUT).

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. What is the salary of the postmaster of Berthier (en haut) ?

2. What is the salary of any and every other person attached to the office or occupying the said building ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). There is an allowance for forward duty of $20, and also a percentage of the revenue of the post office to the postmaster, he supplying whatever assistance he requires for carrying on the office. Last year he received in all $470. The caretaker employed by the Department of Public Works and occupying the building, receives no salary.

WORKS AT BERTHIER (EN HAUT).

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Whether the Government caused certain works to be executed during the winter of 1896-1897, in the St. Lawrence River, in front of Berthier (en haut), under the supervision of one Victor Forneret ?

2. What was the nature and object of the said works ?

3. How many men worked with the said Forneret at the works in question ?

4. What prices were paid to the said V. Forneret ?

5. What prices were paid to the men working under the said V. Forneret ?

6. How long did the said V. Forneret and the said men work ?

7. Were the said works continued during the year following, and under what engineer ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. No works were executed, but a survey under local charge of Mr. Victor Forneret, C.E., was made. 2. A survey of the Berthier (en haut) channel to determine the position and extent of dredging for eight-foot navigation. 3. Eight. 4. $4 per day. 5. One assistant at $3, one at $1.25, and six at $1 per day. 6. Mr. Forneret from January to May; one assistant from January to April; seven men from January to March, inclusive. 7. No.

ORDINANCES BY YUKON COMMISSIONER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

How many copies of ordinances made by the Commissioner of the Yukon territory in Council have been received by the Governor in Council under the provisions of 61 Victoria, chapter 6, section 7 ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Twenty-three ordinances passed by the above-named council have been received.

KINSHIP OF MR. W. OGILVIE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Is Mr. W. Ogilvie, who was appointed to inquire into certain complaints preferred by the miners' committee in Dawson, a connection by marriage with the hon. the Minister of the Interior ?

Mr. CASGRAIN.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I have already stated in the House that Mr. Ogilvie is no relative of mine. If the hon. gentleman wishes to make any more extended or minute researches into my genealogy, he will have to rely upon his own efforts.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS, 1866.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON (by Mr. Beattie) asked :

Will the Canadian volunteers organized in Chicago in May, 1866, and who arrived in Toronto on 4th June, 1866, and volunteered for service at the front during the Fenian raid of that year, be entitled to medals similar to those to be presented to the volunteers of Canada in connection with the same service ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Yes, if they come under the regulations promulgated with reference to the granting of the medal in question.

REPORT OF MAJOR WALSH.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Is the printed report of Major Walsh, commissioner of the Yukon territory, in the form in which it was presented, or was it altered in certain paragraphs with the consent of Major Walsh ? (a) If it was altered, will the hon. the Minister of the Interior explain what the alterations were ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The printed report of Major Walsh is in the form in which it was presented.

LIQUOR PERMITS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. When did the hon. the Minister of the Interior become aware that Major Walsh issued the liquor permits referred to in "Hansard" of 1899, page 2559 ?

2. Is there any report upon this subject, and if so, what is its date ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. The first intimation which the department had of the issue of the liquor permits referred to was given by a statement, which was dated, at Bennett, on the 1st of April, 1898, from Major Walsh, and which was received here upon the 15th of that month. 2. No report except the above-mentioned statement; a similar statement mailed by Major Walsh from Bennett upon the 25th April, 1898, and a reference to the same permits in the paragraph headed "Liquor" in Major Walsh's report of the 15th August, 1898.

WEIGHT MARKS ON FOOD PACKAGES.

Mr. ELLIS asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation at this session requiring hermetically sealed packages of goods sold in Canada for food, to have their weight marked upon them in a legible manner?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce such legislation this session. In 1884 an amendment was made to the Weights and Measures Act (47 Vic., chap. 36, sec. 4) enacting that all hermetically sealed packages should have marked upon them the weight of their contents. It was found unworkable, and that section was repealed in the following year by the Act 48-49 Vic., chap. 63, sec. 5.

MAIL SERVICE IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) moved :

Copies of all reports, letters, telegrams and communications in writing from the post office inspector having jurisdiction over the Yukon district or territory, or from any other post office inspector, or from any other agent, officer or servant of the Post Office Department respecting the mail service in the Yukon district during the years 1898 and 1899, or respecting the carriage of the mails into or out of the said district during the said years or either of them, and respecting the inefficiency or efficiency of such service, or the failure of any contractor to perform his contract with respect to the carriage of the mails aforesaid, or respecting any other matter or thing connected with the administration of the Post Office Department or of the mail service in the said territory or district during the years aforesaid.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) would allow the words, in the fourth line, after "department"—"or other person" to be added, I have no objection to the order.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

YUKON TERRITORY—CONTRACTS FOR MAIL SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all contracts or agreements entered into by or with the Postmaster General or the Post Office Department or Her Majesty or the Government of Canada for the carriage of the mails into or out of the Yukon territory or district or any part thereof; and also copies of all advertisements for tenders for the carriage as aforesaid of such mails, and all tenders received by the Postmaster General, the Post Office Department or the Government of Canada or Her Majesty the Queen, for the carriage of mails into or out of the Yukon territory or district, also copies of all reports, letters or communications in writing from the post office inspector at Victoria, or any other post office inspector, or any other officer of the Post Office Department with respect to such tenders or advertisements or with respect to the acceptance or rejection of any of the said tenders.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I have no objection to this motion passing, under the same conditions as the other. I do not know what may be in these reports of the inspectors, and I take it, that it is understood by the House, that, if there is anything confidential in the reports of the inspectors, they are privileged.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. According to the ordinary rule.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know what may be in them.

Mr. SPEAKER. I fancy that is in the discretion of the Minister.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is a rule in regard to that.

Motion agreed to.

SITTING ON FRIDAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before we take up the motions, I would like to ask my hon. friend the First Minister, whether it is intended, as there is a holiday on Thursday, that the House shall meet on Friday?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes.

A MILITARY PENSION SYSTEM.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, a pension system should be established for officers and men of the Canadian permanent corps and of the headquarters and district staff who are not under the Civil Service Act.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in moving this motion, I feel that the task on the present occasion is rather an easy one. Some years ago, when a motion, that the officers of the permanent corps should receive a pension, was before this House, there was considerable antagonism to it among the members. I am very pleased to be able to state—and I think the debate will bear me out—that thus far I have not met one single member of the House of Commons who is not in favour of this motion. Many of the members of this House, when I have consulted them in regard to the motion, have expressed astonishment at the fact, that the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of our permanent corps were not already in a position to receive a pension on their retirement. Indeed, Sir, the astonishment of a number of the members of the House has been very great that Canada should for so long have failed in her duty to the men who give their time, and, in case of necessity, are prepared to offer up their lives in the service of their country. The motion which I have made does not go into the details of the subject at all. All I am desirous of doing here is to enunciate the principle, and to leave the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), with his very excellent staff of officers, to work out the details of the scheme.

While I am discussing this subject, I may be permitted, in view of the circumstances that have transpired somewhat recently, to offer a word in behalf of the old soldier. There seems to be an opinion—which finds expression among very few people, I am happy to say—that the old soldier is not a desirable citizen; but I stand here to prove, by going into details, if necessary, that no finer class of citizen has ever found a home in the Dominion of Canada than the old soldier. The mere fact, that many of our most prominent men are either old soldiers themselves or the sons of old soldiers, is in itself sufficient to answer that. The late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald was a son of an old soldier. The late Hon. Senator John Macdonald, noted as a business man, a statesman, a philanthropist and a merchant, was himself born and brought up in the ranks of one of Her Majesty's regiments. The late Colonel A. M. Smith, of Toronto, was also an old soldier. Sir David Macpherson was another old soldier; and, Sir, I could go on with a list of the prominent men of Canada, and I venture to say, that the great majority of them have been either old soldiers or the sons of old soldiers. There is no better type of man than the old soldier. The discipline he receives makes him a law-abiding citizen: and, wherever you find a colony of old soldiers, there you find law and order maintained to the very highest degree. Wherever you find the old soldier, you find a spirit of loyalty diffused, not only among themselves, but among those with whom they come in contact. Thrift and honesty predominate wherever the old soldier is found, and morality furnishes no higher example. On this subject, I may be permitted to quote an authority which, I am sure, will find ready acceptance in this House. Major-General Miles, in answering the question: "Does military service make a man better fitted for the duties of civil life than he would be without it?" says:

Beyond all question. It teaches him to concentrate his mind on what he is doing. He carries with him into business and professional life the idea that there is a right way to do a thing, and that it is always the best way to do it. It does not make the citizen less original, but it makes him quicker in his actions, more decisive in his speech. It polishes him as nothing else on earth possibly could do. The German government takes the raw citizen and makes of him a man with not only a military but a social training. It makes him bathe. It makes him comb and brush his hair. It teaches him to keep his clothing clean. It requires a certain amount of athletic exercise, and improves his physical condition. It requires him to walk erect. But, above all, it teaches him discipline. The German system makes men—it does more, it makes gentlemen. It makes good citizens, with respect for authority.

All that General Miles has said in reference to the German soldier, I am free to state, can be said, and with even greater force, with respect to the British soldier.

Mr. HUGHES.

Now, Sir, if we review the custom among the nations of the earth, we shall find, that Canada, alone of all the countries pretending to have a permanent corps, fails to recognize the services of her officers, non-commissioned officers and men by granting them a pension. The United States Government pay their officers and men on active service a much larger sum than does the Canadian Government. The British pay, while it is not as great per man in the home corps, yet abroad, in India, in China, or in Africa, is greater than the Canadian soldier receives. In any event, the pay of the British officer is infinitely greater than the pay of the Canadian officer. I shall not go into the figures; they have been presented to the House on former occasions, and they do not come within the scope of my motion. Suffice it to say, that the pay of the Canadian officer of senior rank is not one-third that of the American officer, and is only about one-half that of the British officer, under similar circumstances.

The pay of our soldiers is lower than that received by our labouring men, and the pay of our officers is lower than that of clerks in dry goods or grocery stores or any branch of the civil service. When one comes to make an analysis, he finds that the senior officer in a permanent corps ranks, as regards pay, about the same as a second-class clerk in one of the Government departments. I purpose in a very few words later on giving a little summary of what is required of one of these officers, and while I do not wish to make any comparison, yet there can be no doubt that the duties devolving upon these officers and the expenditure they have to incur exceed those imposed upon the officials of any other branch of the public service. I do not condemn this Government any more than its predecessors, but the whole matter is one that should bring a blush to members on both sides, especially those who have the honour to be privy councillors.

I shall ask permission to read a letter which I received from Fredericton, N.B., a few days ago, and which is merely one among scores of others:

Dear Sir,—In 1878 I was appointed caretaker of Red Head Battery, St. John. I was transferred to Fredericton in 1881 to look after the Government property there. In 1884 I joined the permanent corps, and filled the position of hospital sergeant for fifteen years. My time expired on the 7th of January last, and I could not be re-enlisted as I was over age. I am fifty-three years of age (but was still able to do my work). I was in the Government service the best of my life, and then they turned me out without a recompense of any kind. I think when the Government give commissioned officers something (when their time expired) they should have given the non-commissioned officers something also. I was out in the Fenian raid.

I am, yours respectfully,

ROBERT COCHRANE,
Late Hospital Sergeant, R.R.C.I.

This is merely one of many letters of a similar nature. Turning to the officers, what do we find? I might, but shall not do so, give the names of officers who have been in the service of the Dominion as district officers commanding, or, in former days, as deputy adjutant generals, who, when the age limit was attained, were turned out without a dollar and subjected to public charity. These facts are well known. We find to-day some of these officers filling some of the most menial positions in the public service in order to eke out a livelihood.

I shall take the opportunity of mentioning two officers, whose names are honoured wherever the name of Canada is known. The first is Col. Henry Smith, late District Officer Commanding at London, Ont., who has lately been retired on a gratuity. He is not finding any fault with the treatment accorded to him in pursuance of the custom that has prevailed, but what are the facts? Those who know Col. Smith know that from his youth, his life services have been at the service of his country. He, a barrister, gave the best years of his manhood to that service. He was out in the Fenian raid of 1866, and on every other occasion when the troops were called on. In 1885 he went at the head of the Royal Regiment Canadian Infantry from the city of Toronto and took an active part in the engagements in the North-west, risking his life for his country, and since then he has been constantly engaged in the military service of the Dominion. On attaining the age of 60—I regret to say that the limit was changed from 63 to 60—he was retired on a gratuity, though still in the prime of life and vigour, and I am satisfied that there is not a member of this House who will not admit that he is entitled to infinitely better treatment than he has received.

I would also take the liberty of mentioning another officer who is on the borderland of retirement. I refer to Col. Otter, of Toronto. Col. Otter's reputation is well known. As adjutant of the Queen's Own, he served at Ridgeway in 1866; was afterwards appointed its colonel, led his forces in the North-west in 1885, and later on was given the office of District Officer Commanding in Toronto. His influence and example to the young men of that city and the country are alone worth his weight in gold, but he is now verging on the age of 60, and in another year or so will be retired on a gratuity which will not be at all commensurate with his services or the dignity of the position he has filled.

I think I am correct in saying that it is a rule of the British House of Commons that once a member of that Parliament has occupied the position of Minister of the Crown, he may, on making the request, receive a large income annually for the rest of his life, the principle being that a person who has occupied the distinguished position of a Minister of the Crown should never be permitted to fall into want. I submit that the man who occupies a distinguished position of district officer commanding or the head of one of our permanent corps should never be allowed by a proud and wealthy country such as this is to fall into a position of want. I know where the heart of the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) is in these matters, and I am satisfied both sides of the House will give him the right support, if he will take the matter boldly up. I trust the hon. Minister will not only regard matters for the future but take the cases of deserving officers still alive and who have been superannuated or retired and deal fairly and squarely by them, and I am confident there is not a man of standing on either side of the House who will not endorse the Minister's action.

Once in a while, in dealing with military matters, one does come across some poor, bilious, carping, destructive critic. You will find that creature saying: Why cannot these fellows save up some of their money; look at the poor farmer and mechanic, how they have to work; let these fellows just save up their money.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES. I am very sorry to hear any man in the House say "hear, hear" to any such sentiment. In the first place, the officers of the permanent corps in the Dominion have to spend large sums in acquiring the education necessary to fit them for the position of district officer commanding or like offices. This involves a large outlay in dollars and cents, if you look at it merely from that standpoint. Then they are required, and rightly, to spend large sums for their uniform and other necessary items in connection with the mess and keeping up the establishments of their regiments. The lowest estimate that is made or can be made of the annual outlay of an officer in such matters is 25 per cent of his total income. More than that, Sir, these officers have calls made upon them in connection with entertainments and public functions. There is not a public entertainment of any importance, no public function such as the opening and closing of this House, but the officers have to turn out. And the very men who say that these officers should save their money and not squander it would be the first to criticise them if they did not turn out in proper military costume and in proper order. Again, an officer from an outlying district, or a member of Parliament from some constituency from a distance, happens to visit London, Toronto, Ottawa, Kingston, or any of these centres where these permanent corps are stationed; let one of these members of Parliament, these gentlemen with defective livers, meet an officer occupying such a position as I refer to and not receive courteous treatment in the way of a lunch or some little notice that involves the expenditure of dollars and cents, and he will be prepared to say that the officer is niggardly in his treatment of public men and not fit for his position.

However, Sir, I know that I am merely setting up men of straw and knocking them down, because I feel that in this House and in this country no serious objection is raised to the granting of a pension for the permanent officers, non-commissioned officers and men of our force. Municipalities pension their officers, school boards do the same; boards of police commissioners pension their policemen; banking institutions their clerks, and business houses their old and trusted servants. The Dominion of Canada makes an exception of her soldiers, and the Dominion of Canada is alone among the countries of the earth in refusing pensions to the officers and men of her permanent corps. It will be observed that I do not ask the House to declare that any particular method should be followed; I only propose that a pension should be granted. My opinion in drafting the motion was that, so far as the details of the scheme are concerned, the Minister of Militia is able to conceive them and the officers of his department to work them out.

However, I take the liberty of suggesting that, for the officers, a gratuity and insurance might meet the difficulty, a gratuity on retirement without a pension, or a smaller gratuity with a pension for life. And when I speak of insurance, I mean that the officer, non-commissioned officer or man should have insurance commensurate with his rank and period of service, to provide something for his family in case of his death. I do not suggest that only a straight pension should be given officers, non-commissioned officers and men. I believe that a straight pension would be found a most acceptable mode with the rank and file. I have consulted many of them, and the universal opinion among the rank and file of the permanent corps is in favour of a pension for them; while a gratuity, or gratuity and pension is favoured among the officers. Another suggestion I would make is, that if any officer, non-commissioned officer or man chooses to become a settler in the North-west, or anywhere else where we have public lands, he should be given enough land for a farm with a sufficient outfit to begin life as a settler. So I summarize my suggestions thus: A life insurance, so that the families of all soldiers, be they officers or men, should be provided for, payable at the death of the soldier; second, a gratuity or gratuity with pension, or grant of a farm and outfit, equivalent to a gratuity.

It is needless to say that were these inducements held out to the force, we should have a better force. Admit that the men in the permanent corps to-day are good men; there is a possibility that these men would be better or that better men might be brought into the force if better inducements were given. I am satisfied that good men would remain longer in the service. From 1892 to 1897, the average total of the force was 792; and on this average number in this time there were 847 desertions. Given something to look forward to whereby their wives and families might be supported, I am satisfied that these men would not have deserted, but would have remained longer in the service. Again, better qualified officers would be obtained. What is the fact? The young officer passes the Royal Military College. Under the laws of our country he is eligible for the permanent corps. But will he accept service in the permanent corps? No. These graduates prefer to go engineering, they prefer to go farming, to take service in the Imperial army, to go anywhere to gain a livelihood—even to go, I am sorry to say, to the United States—rather than to take service in our permanent corps, because of the beggarly salaries offered and the niggardly treatment meted out to the soldiers on retirement. I am satisfied that were the proposal I make carried out, there would be a better force all round. Besides, the example to the young men of the country would be better, if this change were made and the permanent corps would better fill the bill as schools of instruction.

My object in bringing the motion before the House is merely to declare the principle, not to go into details of rates of pay or to calculate the cost. These are matters of detail that can better be settled by officers of the department. I am pleased to find that members of this House, one and all, seem favourable to the proposal—in fact, I have yet to meet a member of this House who is opposed to the granting of pensions, while many of them have expressed surprise to me when they found that no pensions were given to members of the permanent corps.

Before resuming my seat, I may explain that, as the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior) had taken the matter up with the officers some years ago, I would have given the matter into his hands but that, as hon. members know, the hon. gentleman was not here at the opening of the session when I put the notice on the Order paper. Nor would I have taken the matter up had I known that the department had the case under consideration. I have been informed that for upwards of a year this matter has been engaging the attention of the officers of the department. However, no harm will be done by discussing it in the House and have the Minister's hands strengthened by the expressions of opinions by hon. members on both sides.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Before the Minister is called on to say anything in regard to this motion, it would perhaps be interesting for him to hear from a few gentlemen on both sides of the House in regard to it. I am glad the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) has brought this matter before the House. It seems to me that too little attention has been paid to perfecting our necessarily small Canadian force of regulars. It is necessarily a small force, because we cannot afford to keep up a large one. But if they are few, that is all the more reason why they should be fit; and I believe that some action in the line suggested by my hon. friend would add to the fitness of that force. There has been a strong disposition in this House to object to superannuation or pensions in the case of a public officer or servant: in the case of a civil servant, we have, in fact, decreed that from henceforth they shall not exist. But there are special circumstances in the case of a soldier which do not exist in that of a civil servant. He is not highly paid, as the hon. member has pointed out; he is unable, therefore, to carry any considerable insurance, even if it be carried by the Government on the basis of a reduction from his salary; his profession, besides, disqualifies him for obtaining insurance, as it is necessarily a risky one. Finally, of all persons in the world, a soldier who has served a considerable time in that capacity, is least fitted to take up any ordinary form of business. The reasons, then, I think are vastly stronger for urging a pension in the case of our permanent force than in the case of an ordinary official or civil servant.

To be sure, the case of officers differs somewhat from that of soldiers. The officers are, for the most part, reasonably permanent. Soldiers enter for short terms, and it is rather in the public interest that they should only engage for short terms, say two or three years, just about long enough to teach them the drill thoroughly, and to make them efficient soldiers. It should be one of the objects of the permanent force not only to act as instructors of the volunteer officers, but to train from year to year a certain number of men who would afterwards, though in civil life all the time, form the nucleus of an emergency force when called upon. So, I think it is rather desirable that the privates in our permanent corps should not be engaged for long terms, but that as many as possible should be run through in a given time, consistently with giving them a thorough knowledge of their duties, so that they might, in case of necessity, become good non-commissioned officers. The case of a man enlisted and drilled for two or three years, is very different from that of an officer who has given the best part of his life to the service. I do not say that the case for a pension to the private soldier is at all as strong as the case of the officer. For the former, undoubtedly the Minister could find some form of reward, in addition to the small pay which is given, to create an inducement for good young men to join the force.

Coming to the case of the officers, the arguments the hon. gentleman advanced seem to me to be almost sufficient to induce the House to agree to his proposal that they should have a pension. I shall not go into particular cases as my hon. friend has done; some of these are known to almost all of us. But I do urge that the position of an officer in our permanent force should be made, and recognized as, a professional position, one to which a man could look as forming not only a means of livelihood while he is active and strong, but a means of provision for his old age after his active period of life is over. Although our army is small, and has not seen a great deal of service—and we hope won't see much service—the army should be a profession in this country if it is going to be of any use to us at all. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that if a pension were given, if the army were made a regular profession, a better class of men might join it. I do not wish to say better class, because I do not wish to cast any reflection on those who are now in the force; but looking to the future, the force could be made more attractive to a certain class of young men than it is now.

My hon. friend has referred to the cadets of the Royal Military College. I shall, perhaps, be within the scope of the motion in saying that I think it would be highly desirable to attract those young men to the permanent corps, and, in fact, to officer the permanent corps exclusively from the graduates of that college. We are paying out a very large annual sum for it; we are giving a considerable number of young men an excellent education, military and civil, and we hope to educate a larger number there in the immediate future. Where is the outlet for them? It is not to be found in the civil service, for they are given no preference there; it is not to be found in the permanent corps, for they have not been given any preference there, although that has been promised them by regulations of the department in years gone by. They must necessarily go into the civil walks of life, or into foreign countries to obtain a livelihood. Now, I look upon the money spent upon the Royal Military College as wasted unless we utilize these young men. The first and most proper opening I can see for them is to officer the permanent corps exclusively from these young men, for whose training we have paid so highly, and who have done so much credit to that institution when they have appeared elsewhere before the public eye. To look to the very latest instance, young Girouard, son of the judge, formerly a member of this House; he was one of the most noted personages in the late Soudan campaign, and was mentioned by all who have referred to that campaign as a notable example of British pluck combined with colonial smartness. He has taken charge of a large administrative department there, running the whole railway system of the campaign, and has done the highest credit not only to the British army, but to Canada, to the Military College, and to the race from which he has sprung. If we had inducements to keep such young men as that in the country, I am sure our small army would be vastly better officered in future than we can hope to see it if we neglect such opportunities.

In the case of both officers and soldiers, however, I should think that a man serving a long term, whether he be in the ranks or an officer, should have a pension. It is necessary to retain a certain number of those who have enlisted as privates, who have proven themselves, and who have become non-commissioned officers, in order to keep up the tone of the service. Those who remain long terms and the non-commissioned officers, should have a pension, in my opinion; and those who only serve a short term might receive some reward of a less lasting nature, something that would still be an inducement to them. I do not pretend to pronounce upon the different forms of pension or reward which the hon. member has referred to. I think, doubtless, the Minister, with his military advisers, could come to some correct decision on that point. But I have much pleasure in adding my voice to that of the hon. member in urging upon the House and upon the Minister and the Government, the absolute necessity of devising some plan such as that suggested, to make our permanent corps more attractive, more efficient and more worth what it costs us.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Mr. Speaker, it was with the greatest pleasure that I noticed the motion that the hon. and gallant member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), had placed on the Order paper at the beginning of this session. It is a matter that I have taken a great deal of interest in. In 1893 I brought forward a motion upon the same lines as that of the hon. gentleman. I might say here that my hon. and gallant friend, the mover of this motion, was rather mistaken when he said that my motion only applied to officers. I think if you will read it, Mr. Speaker, you will find that it applies to all ranks. It was as follows:—

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that a scheme should be devised by the Government whereby the permanent corps of the Canadian militia, the headquarters and district staffs, should, after a certain number of years' service, become entitled to receive from the Government pensions, so as to place them on a similar footing with similar organizations in other countries and with the civil service of Canada.

Now, Sir, I brought that matter before the House in 1893, and again I moved a similar motion in 1894, but I am sorry to say, that I did not find the support that I certainly was bound to expect in a matter of this kind. It seemed to me that a gross injustice was being done to a splendid body of men in this country. They are really the flower of the country, and why they should be treated any worse than other men of the same standing, in any other country, I cannot imagine. In the speeches that I made in those two years, I went very fully into the details, more than I need do to-day, and I did not then apologize to the House for bringing this matter to its attention; I do not do so now, but I will not repeat all the figures I gave then, because the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) has gone into it very fully. I would suggest that if any hon. gentleman who takes an interest in the matter now, greater than he did in the past, would look up those speeches he would find a great deal of information that he may not have at the present time. Canada is now better able to pay her soldiers than she was in the past. I do not think the Government of that day did the right thing in not supporting this matter any more than the Government of the present day will be right if they do not support it, but I believe they will, because the feeling is different in the country, as well as in the House, from what it was in those days. I think it will be well to show the House the difference in the pay received by our Canadian soldiers and that received in the British Islands and in the United States. Take a lieutenant-colonel, after twelve years of service in Great Britain, he receives $133.25 per month and can retire with a pension of $101.25 per month. In the United States service, after twelve years, a lieutenant-colonel gets $225 a month, and can retire with $120 a month. In Canada a lieutenant-colonel, after twelve years' service, gets $120 a month, and no pension to retire on. After twenty years' service in Great Britain a lieutenant-colonel gets $133.25 a month, and can retire on $121.50. In the United States a lieutenant-colonel, after twenty years' service, gets $333.33, and can retire on $250 a month, whereas, a lieutenant-colonel who serves twenty years in Canada, gets no more than after he serves twelve years, namely, $120 a month and no pension to look forward to. A major, after twelve years in the British service, gets $117 a month, and has a retiring gratuity of $5,832; an American major gets $200 a month, and can retire on $187.50 a month, while a Canadian major after twelve years' service, gets $105 a month and has nothing to look forward to after he retires. It is the same in regard to captains. In the British service a captain gets $84.60 a month; the American, $180 a month, and the Canadian $105 a month. These figures refer to infantry officers. Artillerymen and engineers get more in the English service and in the American service. I quite agree with the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), that, to a certain extent, short service is a good thing. In the case of a man who goes into the permanent corps for three years, it does not do him much harm if he has to earn his livelihood afterwards. But a man who has put in twelve or fifteen years, and it takes all of that time to make a good non-commissioned officer nowadays, especially in the artillery and engineering branches, in which the requirements are different from what they were ten or fifteen years ago, has nothing to retire upon, at the present time. I think there is an idea amongst certain people in this country that a soldier's life is an idle one. Let those who think so try it and see for themselves. It is early and late, and they have a great deal of hard work to do. They have a good time sometimes, it is true, but so have other people, but the pay that a soldier gets is lamentably small, in my opinion. In Canada, a soldier gets 40 cents a day with a certain amount of uniform, but there are a number of things that he must buy for himself if he is to be comfortable at all: shoes, underclothing and all sorts of things, and if he smokes and takes a glass of grog, which, I suppose, some hon. gentlemen in this House think he should not do, but which a great many of them do, I am glad to say, he has to pay for these things out of his 40 cents. If his name is not in the defaulters' book he may get 47 cents a day, so that from 40 cents to 47 cents a day is all that he has to live on year in and year out. A man cannot get into much mischief on that, and where is he going to save? I notice that there is now the same spirit as there previously was amongst certain hon. gentlemen who seem to think that soldiers are well paid and that they ought to save out of their pay. As the hon. member for West Elgin has said, it is harder on the officers than on the men because they certainly do not go out after putting in three years' of service; they stay there year in and year out and they have to continue studying hard to qualify themselves for promotion. It is scarcely necessary that I should reiterate the expense that an officer is put to. Anybody, who has gone around barracks or amongst soldiers, knows very well that the expenses of an officer are legion, and no one would have it altered to any great extent. Certainly, some regiments are more extravagant than others, although commanding officers are getting pretty strict in seeing that subalterns do not overstep the amount to which they might go. But the officers have a certain amount of entertaining to do, and a certain position to keep up, and I think Canada is strong enough financially to see that the men who serve her in that capacity are treated as well as men of similar standing in any other country. Take the staff officers, whose case, I think, presents a most glaring injustice. Take the Assistant Adjutant General stationed at Halifax or Esquimalt in the Imperial service. He gets $3,500 a year, and he can look forward to a pension, according to the age at which he retires and the rank he holds on retiring. Men who are doing the same work for Canada, the deputy-adjutants general, now the district officers commanding, only get $1,750 a year.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). They get about $2,200, including allowances.

Mr. PRIOR. That is with allowances, and all?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. PRIOR. The English assistant adjutant general gets exactly the same allowance as our officer does; but our officer cannot look forward to any pension. It may be different now, but some of the Canadian officers are not even getting the allowance that they used to get. Brigade-majors in England receive $3,000 a year, and they then look forward to a good pension, while our brigade-majors get only $1,200 at present, with certain allowances, which, however, makes no difference in the comparison, as the English brigade-majors have an allowance also. As has been remarked, the uniforms, especially for some branches of the service, are very expensive, and the officer on such small pay has a difficult job to make both ends meet at the end of the year. When I brought this matter up on a previous occasion, I had the hearty support of Sir Adolphe Caron, who was for so many years Minister of Militia, and I have no fear at all, that my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) the mover of the motion will have the hearty support of the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has a knowledge of these things, not from hearsay, but from having been through the mill himself; and he has been in every-day intercourse with the gentlemen holding these positions. I know that his heart must go out to them in this matter, and I feel that now, at any rate, they will get justice from that department—whether the Minister can get his colleagues to support him, is another question. It is sometimes said, that the soldier has not a hard life. But, Sir, what is to be said of those officers and men who have been sent to the Yukon, and who, I know, are having a pretty hard time of it. Any one of these men on the permanent corps may be sent on similar service to-morrow, and, surely, men who are ready to fight, and bleed, and die for their country, are worth while paying well for their services. It is a shame, that, after they have given the best years of their life and service to the country, they should be allowed to drift into pauperism, and, through no fault of their own, be a disgrace to the country. If both officers and men could look forward to the country showing a little thankfulness to them in a financial way, you could get the very best class of men to enter the service. The men you are getting now are good men, but every year makes it more imperative that first-class men should be obtained. It is getting harder and harder every year, for officers especially, to pass the qualifying examinations for the positions they hold. Our civil servants have been superannuated in the past, and I hope they will continue to be so. The Mounted Police are as fine a body of men as you will find the world over.

It was the general opinion expressed about the few Mounted Police who attended the Queen's Jubilee, that they were as fine a body of men as any military force in the world could supply. They have been under the Pension Act for some years past, and it is chiefly for that reason that you can get such a fine class of men to enter the service. The Mounted Police have hard work, and they have to undergo a good deal of privation in bad weather, but, if they get pensions, why not the men of the permanent corps? I know there is a feeling among certain people in Canada, that we should not have a standing army, and, if you like, we do not want a standing army, but we must have a permanent corps, to teach the officers and men who enter the active militia, and be a nucleus for that force. The permanent force are supposed to teach the forty or fifty thousand men of the active militia, who are ready to come to the aid of the country in times of trouble. You must have competent men in the permanent corps to do this teaching and training, or else the money you spend on them is simply thrown away. I do hope the gentlemen who, perhaps, are apathetic on this subject, would look into it thoroughly, and study the speeches that have been delivered in this House by former Ministers of Militia and by hon. members on both sides of politics. I do believe, that the mover of this resolution is asking nothing but what is just and fair for a very deserving class of the community, and I trust that the matter will not be shelved, as it has been in the past. I have great pleasure in seconding the motion.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the three speeches which have been made on this very interesting and important motion, and I am bound to say, that, from my point of view, I agree almost entirely with everything that has been said. It seems to me, that, if the state is to give pensions or superannuations at all, there are none who so richly deserve state aid of this kind as are the men who give their lives to the service of their country. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), in considering this question, called attention to the fact, that the three years term of service in Canada is a very short one, and suggested, I think, very properly, that there should be a discrimination between men who serve only three years, or perhaps a little over, and those who really make soldiering their life work and remain in the service until they can stay no longer by reason of their age. A man may go to one of the depots and serve three years; he may retire a very much better man in every respect than he was when he entered, and be quite fit to engage in the ordinary duties of life. That I concede at once; but, if he remains in the service twenty or twenty-five years, or to the full age limit, I certainly think every one will agree, that he has become unfitted for business life, and unable, largely, to earn a living for himself. And how has he become unfitted for civil employment? He has become thus unfitted by reason of his services to the country and the sacrifices he has made in the interests of the state. Therefore, in my opinion, he has the strongest possible claim to the consideration of the state, when that period of his life has been attained. Another point made by my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) has considerable force in it. I refer to his remarks as to the large number of desertions, and his statement, that, if the men who entered the permanent force knew there was to be some means provided for them later in life, it would be an inducement to them to serve more heartily, more honestly, to look forward for promotion, and to stick to the service, and give it the benefit of their best efforts. I believe there is no question whatever about that. The hon. gentleman from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior) referred to the fact, that the North-west Mounted Police receive pensions. We have on the Statute-books a special Act by which the men of that force receive pensions, and we also have a provision by which the officers of the Mounted Police are taken care of under the Superannuation Act, they being put on the same footing as the members of the civil service. My hon. friend (Mr. Prior) asked, why a distinction should be drawn between the officers and men of the North-west Mounted Police and the officers and men of the permanent force. I am bound to admit, frankly, that I cannot tell him why any such distinction should be drawn, and I may add, that, in my opinion, I do not think there should be any distinction. My hon. friend (Mr. Prior) also referred to the fact, that some people said, we did not require a standing army in Canada. Well, we have no standing army in Canada. We have 800 men or so, who constitute a teaching body, the military schools of this country. These men are there as instructors and through them military instruction is conveyed to the militia of Canada, and without this organization our active militia would be of very little use indeed. It is absolutely necessary to have a corps of instructors, and to have a corps of instructors, we must have a permanent force.

My hon. friend who introduced the motion referred to the age limit, by which officers reaching the age of 60 years are compelled to leave the service. I did not understand him to find fault with our regulations. What he did find fault with was that there was no adequate provision, as he claimed, by which those men who had given their time and their lives to the service of the country for many years were enabled to have sufficient money to live upon decently and comfortably for the rest of their lives. The present system, which was not explained by the mover, is this. When an officer, say an officer commanding a district, is retired, he receives, not a pension, but a gratuity, equal to one-tenth of his annual salary for every year that he has served. For example, an officer who has served ten years will, at the time of his retirement, receive a gratuity equal to one full year's salary. If a man is in receipt of $2,500 a year at the time he goes out of the service, and has served twenty years, he will receive a gratuity equal to $5,000, which is, I think, the amount of gratuity on the average which has been paid to the different officers who have been retired. The question may be asked, why do you not allow men to go on indefinitely, to the age of 70, or even to a greater age? Well, it has been found that 60 is about the limit of age at which on the average a man is found to be useful in military life, and that is why that age limit has been fixed. It has been considered not to be in the public interest to keep a man in command of a district after he has reached the age of 60, and I think it is decidedly in the public interest that the age limit which we have prescribed should be adhered to. But I think that makes it all the more important that we should provide some adequate means by which these men should have something to depend upon after they retire from the service. My hon. friend the mover of the resolution has pointed out the necessary expenses which pertain to a man in military life. Men are apt to say that an officer receiving $2,000 or $2,500, or even more, with allowances, ought to be able to lay by something every year to provide for his living comfortably after his retirement from the service. But I can assure hon. members, from a pretty intimate knowledge of the facts, that the sum we pay is utterly inadequate to enable an officer living in accordance with the rules and in the way in which this country would desire its officers to live, to put away any portion of his salary to provide for his old age, and I think it is important that this matter should be carefully looked into. I may say that during the short time I have been in the Militia Department, I have met with some exceedingly sad cases. Over and over again, I have had applications from men who have been sergeants, or have held other positions in the militia, and have served the country faithfully, and by reason of age have been obliged to leave the service—men who have been able, owing to the small amount of money they received, to save little or nothing, and have been obliged to go out again to the cold world to seek a livelihood. These men have come to me to ask me to give them a position somewhere; and I may say that I have been very glad to be able on several occasions, in connection with the care of our rifle ranges and drill-sheds, to do something for these unfortunate men. But I can assure hon. members that many of these men are to-day in a condition of want, for whom it is impossible for us to provide; but I do think it is time the matter was seriously considered. I may say that I have already given the matter some consideration, but I am not able to say that I have solved the problem. There might, perhaps, be found a way, by asking for a small contribution from each one of these officers, somewhat similar to the plan under the Superannuation Act, by which, with a very slight charge, indeed, upon the treasury of the country, the means would be provided of affording a pension to these men. I thank the mover for the hints he has given as to the means by which this end might be attained. I am not able, as I have said, to offer any opinion at this moment as to which one should be adopted. The matter is engaging my attention, however, and I hope before long to have matured some views on the subject to bring to the notice of my colleagues in the Government. Of course, what I have said here I have said simply speaking for myself as the head of the department, and not having proposed any scheme to my colleagues. But I shall endeavour to formulate some scheme to propose to them, and I hope to be able at the next session of Parliament to bring it to the notice of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the discussion which has just taken place is a very interesting one, and I do not intend to detain the House after the very full manner in which both the mover and the seconder of this resolution have put the case before the House, which has also received the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden). But I think the time has come when it is recognized by everybody in Canada that measures of a more determined character must be taken in order to put the defensive forces of the country upon a thoroughly efficient footing; and it appears to me that the Government have wisely in the past determined that one of the absolute essentials to the attainment of that object is to have a small permanent force, whose entire time and attention would be devoted to the work of forming a nucleus—you may call it a standing army or not, as you like; it practically is that—a small permanent force, whose training is constant and whose entire time is devoted to acquiring that knowledge of military duty which it is absolutely necessary that a military force shall have, and for the purpose of having that small force in such a position that you may make it the centre around which you may rally the entire military force of the country in case of any emergency, and impart to them the more quickly all the advantages of training which the smaller force has acquired. The position of Canada is a very exceptional one, entirely different from that of the great island continent of Australasia. That continent is entirely surrounded by the sea, whereas we are here, five and a half millions, or thereabouts, of Canadians, bordering on a foreign country with a very large population. I am inclined to think that the Imperial authorities have not considered sufficiently the different position in which Canada stands as regards the question of defensive operations compared with that of almost any other portion of the Empire. Under the circumstances in which we are placed, it appears absolutely necessary, in order to inspire that confidence among our own people and that respect among our neighbours which it is desirable both should possess, to show that we are alive to the necessity of taking such means and measures as are necessary to provide for an efficient protective force in case of need.

After listening to the hon. gentlemen on this side who have so fully dealt with the subject and also to hon. gentlemen on the other side, especially the Minister of Militia, who says the subject has his careful attention, I am inclined to think we will all come to the conclusion that it will be found absolutely necessary to adopt some such means as all other countries which have a valuable defensive force have been compelled to adopt in order to induce men of good character and intelligence to enter the force and remain there. Whether that is to be done by a system of pensions or by other means, it certainly will have to be accomplished. The suggestion that we should utilize a portion of our great territorial domain for that purpose is, I think, a very valuable one. I do not see why a man who has spent a certain number of years in our military service—whether as an officer or in the ranks—should not be entitled to a grant of land of a valuable character, and thus be given the means of earning an honest livelihood after he has left the service. That would still give us the further advantage of spreading through our outlying territories and provinces men whose knowledge and training in the military service will make of them not only valuable settlers, but a nucleus from which military training and education may be disseminated through the great mass of our population. I do not intend to prolong the discussion, but shall conclude by saying that I am very glad the Government are giving this important question their attention.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Perhaps my hon. friend will now consider that he has done all he could accomplish at present, and will withdraw his motion.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope that I will accomplish more than was achieved by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior), whose motion was adopted a few years ago by the House and then shelved, I presume.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). When was that?

Mr. HUGHES. In 1893. I was, unfortunately, absent when that motion was brought up or I would have given it my most hearty support and encouragement. I would venture to suggest to the hon. Minister, in reply to his suggestion to assess each officer and man a small sum in order to constitute a pension fund, that that would still further reduce the very small income these men now receive. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior), the pay of our officers is infinitely less than that of similar men in any other nation on the face of the globe, and I would respectfully suggest the advisability of increasing the pay, especially of the rank above second lieutenant. The smallness of the pay is really a shame. No good man will enter the service unless he is an ardent, enthusiastic soldier, or has private means, and remain there, the pay is so small. With regard to the pension for men of only three years' service, of course in the British army no man receives a pension unless he has served twelve years, and I would suggest a like term. However, I do not propose to go into these details, because I know the officers of the department are thoroughly conversant with the matter; and inasmuch as the Minister of Militia has given my remarks his hearty endorsement as well as the hon. leader of the Opposition, and inasmuch as I can tell by the pleased expression of the right hon. First Minister that he is at heart in favour of this resolution, I accede to the wish of the hon. Minister and ask leave to withdraw my motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Motion withdrawn.

APPOINTMENTS BY A RETIRING GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton) moved for:

Copies of all cablegrams, papers, correspondence and despatches or other writing upon which the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada based the statement in the House of Commons on the 10th June, 1898, as follows:—"I have the authority of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to state that he approves of the principles on which the Governor General acted, as based on the facts set forth in the letter of His Excellency to Sir Charles Tupper."

He said: I hope it will not be necessary for me to occupy very much of the time of the House on this resolution, although its subject is one that I consider very important. The House will remember that one of the fundamental principles of government in Canada, recognized from the commencement of confederation down to the present, is that we enjoy here the English parliamentary system, and it is perfectly understood that when a Canadian precedent is wanting, we fall back upon those of the mother country, and are guided and controlled by them in our administration. I may say that with regard to all matter connected with changes of government, from the establishment of confederation down to 1896, the practice of all Governors General and of all Governments were to recognize the thoroughly well understood British precedent that a party called upon to form an Administration and which did form a Government was entitled to all the rights and immunities and privileges that have ever been attached to that responsible position, in Great Britain, at all events, ever since parliamentary government has been understood and carried out in that country; and I think the House will agree with me that there is no country in the world in which parliamentary government has been better understood than in that great country to which we owe our fealty. When the late Sir John Macdonald felt that he had not such a majority in this House as would warrant his continuance in power, he tendered, in 1873, the resignation of himself and his Government into the hands of the then Governor General.

The Marquis of Dufferin, who, I think, it will be admitted by every hon. gentleman in this House, was one of the most experienced and one of the ablest men who ever controlled the administration of public affairs in the Dominion of Canada, was then Governor General. On that occasion, following the practice invariably pursued in Great Britain, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, from the time he tendered his resignation down to the time his successors were sworn into office and assumed the responsibilities of office, discharged all the duties of Government, just as they are discharged in England, filled the various offices that remained to be filled, and performed all the duties in as full and complete a manner as he would have done, if he had not tendered his resignation. And the position that the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald took on that occasion, and the sanction he received, was respected in the fullest manner by the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who felt, that the leader of the previous Government had only exercised the rights to which the position he held entitled him. When, at a subsequent date, the Government of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, of which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was a member, was defeated—and I think my right hon. friend will admit, defeated by one of the most overwhelming majorities in the representative branch of the legislature that every Government of power—and resigned, in the interim between the time the Government was defeated and the time Sir John A. Macdonald again acceded to power, they exercised all the functions of government, just as they are always exercised in England, and just as they had been exercised by Sir John Macdonald after resigning in 1873. Some 133 appointments and promotions that Mr. Mackenzie made after his defeat and before his successors assumed office, were allowed to stand. I think there were only three cases in which any exception was taken to them. Of course, there is no doubt, there is nothing to prevent the exercise by the incoming Government of their judgment in reference to any particular case. But there were only two or three cases—only one of material importance—to which any exception was taken by the incoming Government. But, so far as the Governor General was concerned, my right hon. friend will remember, he accepted every appointment and approved of every act proposed to him by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie after his defeat just as he had accepted the proposals and appointments made by Mr. Mackenzie's predecessor, when he had resigned after defeat on a previous occasion.

Now, I may be told, that the case was somewhat different, because Sir John Macdonald, not only was the actual Minister, but had been in power for some time, and that the same was true of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. But that contention will be found to have no bearing and no weight, when you take the British precedents into consideration. The fact of a party having been called upon to form an Administration, and having formed an Administration and undertaken the duties of Government has been taken, any time since parliamentary institutions were established in England, as giving all the authority and all the rights of Government. I may remind the House, that, when called upon to join the Administration of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, I was charged with the duty of leading the Government party in this House, and that I had the support, the constant, steady support, as leader of the House, throughout the session—a very extraordinary one—of a large majority of members. On the occasion of the great struggle that took place, as my right hon. friend will remember, he was deserted by a large portion of the rank and file of his supporters in this House, and on the issue particularly joined between us, I numbered among those who supported me a large number of the right hon. gentleman's own friends, as well as the actual Conservative majority on that occasion. The right hon. gentleman knows that the circumstances were very peculiar. The question was subsequently raised by the Governor General, that we were not able to obtain supplies. Well, my right hon. friend knows, that, had that been an ordinary session, we should not only have obtained supplies, but should have carried the measure we had in hand, and gone to the country with this question settled. But the fact, that the life of Parliament terminated on a certain day, prevented the Government, although it had an overwhelming majority at its back, from discharging any of the functions of Government, owing to the factious and extraordinary course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. Under these circumstances, I think, that, when we failed to obtain a majority in the country, we were entitled to precisely the same consideration that Sir John Macdonald obtained when he resigned in 1873, and that Mr. Mackenzie obtained after his overwhelming defeat of 1878. Now, the House is well aware of the fact, that, while we had a dissolution at the earliest possible moment in our power, and while we called Parliament together at the earliest possible period, so that only a comparatively few days elapsed between the resignation of my Government and the meeting of Parliament, the extraordinary course was taken by the Governor General of depriving the existing Government of its rights and privileges under the British constitutional system and the precedents established in Canada on two previous occasions, thus adopting a course directly in contravention of the British system, which prevails in the mother country. I will not go into the question of the character of the appointments that were proposed on one occasion or the other, further than to say, that there is not one appointment too high—even that of judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, or judge of the Superior Courts in various provinces, existing judges being superannuated to make way for the new appointments—to have been filled by a defeated Government. All these acts were performed by the late Alexander Mackenzie after his resignation, and accepted without challenge by the Governor General, and never disturbed by the Government that succeeded him. This is a matter so well known to hon. gentlemen on both sides of that House that I need not take up time in referring to it. The moment that His Excellency, the late Governor General, took the ground that he would not allow the Government to discharge their duties in the way in which Lord Dufferin had permitted Sir John A. Macdonald to do on a similar occasion, and the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie on a later occasion—the moment that His Excellency took that ground, we at once tendered our resignations and asked him to relieve us from office at the earliest possible moment. Now I do not rise on this occasion as feeling for a single moment the slightest personal interest in it. I may say that so far as recommendations are concerned, I think, if I remember correctly, that the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie had made 133 recommendations and promotions in the discharge of what he conceived to be his duty; and while they were all accepted by Lord Dufferin, the Governor General, as his right, and although Mr. Mackenzie's Government had sustained the most overwhelming defeat, a majority of between 80 and 90 having been elected to oppose him, he was able to carry out and discharge all those functions just as he had done at any other period of his administration.

Now, Sir, I draw attention to the fact that the late Governor General did not absolutely refuse to admit any of the appointments, but he undertook to say that appointments could only be made that came within a certain class, and a certain category. He undertook to do that which no Governor General, which the Queen of England has never undertaken to do in the history of her long and brilliant reign, which no British sovereign of later times has undertaken, which no Governor General of Canada ever undertook, and that was to dictate to his Government the restrictions that he himself was disposed to impose in regard to appointments and recommendations for appointments to office. There were 92 recommendations, and he signed an Order in Council which virtually conferred offices upon about 47 and rejected about 45. He imposed certain restrictions, and it remained for the hon. gentlemen opposite to decide as to the character of those restrictions; because we having retired from office and they having taken our places, the question was submitted to their consideration as to what class of those restrictions they should admit, restrictions improperly, as I hold, and unconstitutionally, as I hold, imposed by the then Governor General. What did these gentlemen do? Why, Sir, they decided that 45 of these nominations should be rejected, but they decided that the Governor General had absolutely appointed the other 47. My right hon. friend, if I am not very much mistaken in my recollection of the facts, stated on the floor of this House, when he laid the resolutions upon the Table, the conclusion at which his Government had arrived, after the selection had fallen upon them; he stated that these appointments were recognized as having been duly made by the Governor General and that they would stand. Now I am going, perhaps, a little outside of that question, but it is right that I should do so in view of the extraordinary course pursued by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. Of these 47 appointments that they themselves decided had been duly made and sanctioned by the Governor General by Order in Council, and which they declared to this House should stand, what does this House suppose became of them? Why, Sir, they brought down a return here which I hold in my hand, dated 13th April, 1898, showing that in respect to the whole of these 47 which they admitted to have been properly appointed, which the Governor General had sanctioned, and which they themselves had assured the House would be treated the same as officials appointed under any other circumstances, they reconsidered their judgment, they went back upon their decision. I draw the attention of the House to these things, because they show what a dangerous thing it is for any person charged with the high duties of a Governor General to place himself in a position in which he is deprived of the support of either one of the parties in the House or in the country. The hon. gentlemen confirmed 77 of these appointments, including promotions from one position to another, and they cancelled every one of the 47 other appointments, with the exception of two, refused to carry out the promise made by the right hon. gentleman, as is shown by the return which is brought down. It would be impossible to give a more striking illustration of the misfortune that must follow when a Governor General takes a course that is calculated to deprive him of that complete support and co-operation which he ought to enjoy, of both the great parties in the House. Now, Sir, the object of this motion is stated in the motion itself, it is a demand from the right hon. gentleman that that despatch should be laid upon the Table. I say I am within my right when I make that demand; I say it is of the greatest importance to the people of this country that that demand should be complied with. I may tell the House that in that great authority which we all respect in this House, that of Sir John Bourinot, the following statement will be found:—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a Minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House and founds upon it an argument or assertion, the document, if called for, ought to be produced.

I say this ruling is completely sustained by the highest constitutional authorities in England, and I do not believe any person will be found in this House to deny that I am in a position to make an absolute demand that that despatch which has been referred to should be laid upon the Table of the House. I will refer for a moment to the opinion of a distinguished gentleman in the English House of Commons on the same subject, Mr. Bentinck, which will be found in the "Hansard," volume 203, page 1115 (1870). That gentleman moved:

That in the opinion of this House, it is not competent for a Minister to allege or read in debate in defence of his policy any document which is not upon the Table, and which he is not prepared to communicate to the House.

Mr. Bentinck said:

The matter he had to lay before the House involved a question of privilege, for it was clear that unless a distinct rule was laid down as to which documents, after having been used in debate, should be produced and which should be kept back by the Minister, a serious injury would be inflicted upon the rights of independent members, which had been encroached upon too much already by the present Government.

Sir Erskine May, in his text-book on this subject:

Laid it down that the proceedings of that House ought to be conducted similarly to the proceedings of a court of law, and that no person had a right to produce evidence without giving those affected by it a full opportunity of examining, and, if possible, disproving it. The precedents on this subject were also very numerous in 1857, and in the debate on the China war, Lord Halifax, then Sir Charles Wood, stated a certain position, and said that he had in his possession a letter from Sir Michael Seymour which bore out his view. Mr. Roebuck asked if Sir Charles Wood had any objection to produce the letter. Sir Charles Wood replied that it was a private letter, but that he was willing to bring it down to the House and show it to any hon. gentleman. Upon that the right hon. gentleman, the member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) said it was monstrous that a minister should rise in his place and make a statement upon an important matter founded on a document which had not been produced, and he went on to say that neither a public nor a private letter ought to have been used that could not be laid on the Table. This was a principle that had ever been accepted in that House, and which he hoped would ever be their guide in such matters. The next case was in 1862, when the right hon. baronet, the member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), then Chief Secretary for Ireland, stated that the Longford election was a mockery, and in proof of the assertion referred to a certain document in his possession. The Irish members demanded that the document should be laid on the Table, and Lord Palmerston expressed himself thus:

"It may, no doubt, be the true doctrine, that when a Minister of the Crown reads a document in the House and founds upon it an argument or an assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced."—(3 "Hansard," CLXVI., 2129.)

The last instance he would refer to occurred two years afterwards, when, in the Leeds bankruptcy case, the hon. and learned member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) read his answer from a written statement which he had before him, and Mr. Ferrard moved that the paper be laid upon the Table. The Speaker, being appealed to, said that public despatches, documents, and papers relating to public affairs, when read or quoted by a Minister, ought to be laid on the Table.

Mr. DISRAELI. One of the great securities for fair discussion in that House was that a Minister should not be permitted to refer to documents, public or private, if he was not prepared to communicate them to the House. He did not say that there might not be special reasons why the particular document now in question should not be placed in the usual category in that respect, but at the same time it was not in the interest of the House to encourage any laxity in regard to the rule on that subject. It was one of the guarantees for sufficient discussion that a debate should not be allowed to be unwarrantably influenced by speakers appealing, in order to sustain their views, to documents which were not in possession of the House. That was a principle of which the House should be most jealous.

Mr. GLADSTONE said he thought that it would be a pity if it should go forth to the world that there existed any serious difference of opinion with respect to the rule of the House on that subject, as might perhaps be inferred from what has just fallen from the right hon. gentleman. The rule was intended to prevent undue advantage being taken by official members in order to influence the judgment of the House.

The rule of the House would be made more safe by avoiding any attempt to stretch it. They should keep within the definition which the Speaker had given of it on a former occasion, and which made it apply to public despatches.

I will now quote the authority of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The right hon. gentleman, in the House of Commons, "Hansard," page 1791, 28th April, 1892, said:

There can be no doubt that he violated the very principles upon which parliamentary government rests in all British countries. I quote from May, the edition of 1883, page 378:

"Another rule or principle of debate may be here added. A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read 'a quo' from a despatch or other state papers, not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay them on the Table. This is simllar to that rule of evidence, in the courts of law, which prevents counsel stating documents which are not produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; when the objection has been made, in time it has been thoroughly acquiesced in."

Now, Sir, it seems to me that the very authority which is here quoted comes very appropriately on the present occasion. The very authority which is here quoted is founded upon that rule of evidence and of common sense, I may say, that no man is at liberty to use a public document for the purpose of conveying an argument or stating a fact unless he is prepared to give to his opponents the substance of the authority which he urges. Otherwise there would be no safety in debate, there would be no safety in courts of justice, there would be no safety in public affairs.

I need not do any more to show, that according to every principle that is recognized as governing debate in this House, the Prime Minister is bound, without question, to lay upon the Table of this House the despatch to which he has referred. I do not believe—I will not believe—if the right hon. gentleman does not lay that despatch on the Table of the House, I will refuse to believe that so distinguished a man as the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, with a fair and full statement of the whole case before him, has given any definite declaration, any statement as to the propriety of the course that the then Governor General pursued. Although on that question and others of the kind, I have avoided the slightest communication, direct or indirect with him since the change of Government occurred, I know the difficulties that surround a Colonial Minister. I know how important it is that he should act, so far as possible, with the parliamentary majority of the day, and I would be the last person who would wish to embarrass a Colonial Minister or any person on this subject, but I cannot permit that the constitution of the country shall be changed without our knowing the authority for it. If it be true that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has given his approval to an entire change in parliamentary practice, in the Government of Canada, and that we are not to enjoy those rights and immunities in this country that are enjoyed by every person charged with the formation of a government in England, we should be informed of it. There are a score of cases in which the formation of a government in England has been entrusted to a gentleman in the House of Commons, or in the House of Lords, who had not a parliamentary majority at his back, at the time, who formed his government, who went to the country and was defeated at a general election, who came back and met the House and was again defeated by a majority of the House, yet, down to the hour of his defeat and the acceptance of that defeat in the House of Commons, and the succession to office of this party or the other, every function of government was discharged by him. The highest offices, as high as that of Governor General of India, the highest positions in the gift of the Crown, have been given by defeated governments after they had sustained their defeat in the House of Commons, and so on a number of other occasions, appointments of the very highest and most important description have been made without any challenge by the House of Commons subsequently as to the propriety of the act. I only refer to that in passing, and I say in all seriousness, that the Secretary of State for the Colonies is bound, in the high position he occupies, to lay that paper on the Table of the House, to lay before us a full statement of the reference made to the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the decision which he gave, because, as we all know, the Governor General in Canada is responsible to the Imperial Government. If the statements be true, as to the action that has been taken by the Colonial Secretary, then the constitution of Canada is changed, and I say the time has come when we are bound to know whether such a course has been pursued in regard to this great and important question, a question that has been illustrated for ages, I may say, in the House of Commons, and in the Government of Great Britain. If the course pursued by the late Governor General is held to be a sound and proper course, then I accept it, until reversed, but I say it must not apply to the Conservative party when they go out of power; it must apply to the Liberal party as well, and they must be constrained to feel that they have lost, by their own action, lost by the course that they have sustained, and to which they have committed themselves, that position to which every government is entitled to, down to the period that its successors take office. They must be content to know, that from the first hour there is a verdict in the country against them, they are functus officio; and they are totally incapable of performing any act, except under the judgment of the Governor General of Canada, whoever he may be for the time being. I intended to have illustrated the manner in which I regard this question, and if the House will permit me to take two or three minutes in order to conclude my observations, I shall avail of it to show the great importance, in my judgment, of this step.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

What is it that gives to England such a prominence among the nations of the world; what is it that enables British institutions to present such an overwhelmingly favourable contrast, when compared with republican institutions? Why, it is the fact that under the British constitutional parliamentary system—which has been handed down to us and recognized by men of all parties for many long years in the administration of the government of this great Empire—the sovereign on the Throne is the impartial umpire, the great executive head to which all parties and all classes alike can look with reverence. Thus, in the bitterest and keenest party struggles that take place, all British subjects can rally around their sovereign and support her. So, I say, under the British constitutional system as handed down to us, and which we enjoyed until 1896—and which Lord Dufferin with all his keen ability and knowledge of these questions consecrated by his own act on two important occasions—the Governor General of Canada, as representative of Her Majesty, stands in precisely the same position as Her Majesty does in Great Britain. It is the greatest misfortune that could happen to the people of this country, if in the time to come the Governor General of Canada will be regarded, not as an independent, impartial and unbiassed representative of Her Majesty, carrying out the administration of public affairs faithfully and fairly, and under the light of the constitutional example set by the mother country; but shall come to be regarded as the head of a political party, and not as an impartial arbitrator, as is the Crown in England. The Governor General of Canada must become the head of a political party in Canada, if he deprives those whom he has entrusted with the duty of forming a Government, of one jot or tittle of those constitutional rights which are conferred on Ministers of the Crown in England. It is because I believe that this is a matter of great moment in the interest of public affairs, that I venture at this period to say a single word on the subject. But, Sir, such examples as these are very dangerous. What have we seen in British Columbia? You saw the Attorney General of British Columbia justifying one of the greatest outrages upon responsible government that ever was perpetrated in any British country.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think there is a motion on the Order paper on this subject, and my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) should not discuss it in anticipation of that motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not aware of that, but there is no motion on the paper about the Newfoundland case, and what did you see done there? You saw a more flagrant outrage than has even occurred in British Columbia. You saw the Governor of that colony actually dismissing a Minister of the Crown, one of his Cabinet, by a note from his private secretary. Does my right hon. friend think that is a practice that should be pursued?

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not called upon to pass judgment upon them in Newfoundland.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Governor Murray, who perpetrated that monstrous invasion of responsible government in Newfoundland, has gone home, and his successor, after a full consideration of the subject, has reinstated the Hon. Mr. Morine in his position in the Ministry, and published a despatch exonerating him from the charges brought against him by Governor Murray. I refer to these things in Newfoundland—and if Mr.

Speaker had permitted me I would have referred to the British Columbia case—as the effects of the bad example set in Canada, and as the commencement of that faciliis decensus, because the moment you depart from a great constitutional precedent as illustrated in Great Britain, and as I am proud to say was followed in Canada down to the case to which I am referring, you do a thing the consequences of which may lead to a very serious state of affairs. I claim that that despatch must be laid upon the Table of this House, these authorities having been used by hon. gentlemen opposite to strengthen the position of the late Governor General. That despatch, I say, must be laid upon the Table of this House, and if it proves to support the statement which has been intimated to this House, then, Sir, I shall accept it. I shall feel that the right hon. the Colonial Secretary has done the deepest wrong to Canada; the deepest wrong to British institutions, that it is possible for him to have committed himself to; but I will accept it as we are bound to accept it, and shall hold hon. gentlemen opposite at no distant date to the same stern account that I was held by the late Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER. I said to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that I thought a motion with reference to the British Columbia crisis was on the Order paper. It was, but it has been moved, and as it is now in the shape of a past debate, my ruling would be of course the same as if that motion were on the Order paper.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, this motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition once more calls the attention of the House to a subject which has been debated several times already in previous sessions. The last time it was brought before the House was last session, when the hon. gentleman once more asserted that Lord Aberdeen, after the elections of 1896, in which the previous Government had been defeated, had acted unconstitutionally. I proceeded to show that the action of the Governor General had been submitted to the Colonial Office, and that the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Chamberlain, has expressed his entire approval of the conduct of Lord Aberdeen on that occasion. The object of the motion now before the House is to have the Government bring down the papers upon which I founded the assertion which I then made before the House. Of course, to this motion there can be no objection. It will be complied with, in so far as the well-understood rules of the Colonial Office will allow. But in stating frankly, as I do, that the papers will be brought down and the whole correspondence laid on the Table, in so far as it can be laid down, I do not mean in any way to assent to many, and perhaps to none, of the doctrines which were laid down this afternoon by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman claimed to have acted constitutionally on that occasion. He has asserted once more that Lord Aberdeen, the late Governor General, had trespassed beyond his powers, and had shocked the well-understood rules of constitutional and responsible government. My contention is the contrary—and I believe that in this contention I am supported by the public opinion of this country—that the conduct of the late Governor General on the occasion in question was absolutely constitutional; that the one who acted unconstitutionally was the hon. gentleman himself; and that if the advice which the hon. gentleman tendered to the Governor General of that day had been followed it would have been a clear and manifest and violent invasion of the will of the people which had just been expressed at the polls. The hon. gentleman chose to go as far back as the session of 1896; and, amongst other assertions, he stated that upon the main question which had engaged the attention of Parliament in the session of 1896, I had been deserted by a large number of my followers. I do not at all see how that question can have anything to do with the motion which is now before you, and it is not necessary for me to refer to it in any way. I simply call the attention of the House to the matter to show once more that the hon. gentleman is ever reckless in his assertions. It is true, on that occasion a certain number of my friends did not follow me—not a large number; five all told; whereas the hon. gentleman might have said, though he did not say, that on that question he had been deserted by about twelve of his own followers. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not germane to the issue, and can have no relation to the question now in hand. Upon the question which was the main question submitted to the electors in 1896, the people pronounced, and they pronounced against the hon. gentleman. The result of the election showed that the Government which had brought that policy before the people had lost the confidence of the people. The hon. gentleman was quite aware of that; no man could ignore it. Indeed, he unbosomed his sentiments two days afterwards to several reporters, stating in so many words that as soon as he had cleared away the purely routine business which was before the Government he would at once tender his resignation. Such was his intention two days after the polling; but, as time went on, evidently under pressure brought upon him by his followers, who were going to lose office, the hon. gentleman forgot the pledge which he had just given to the public, that he would refuse to act as the official head of the Government, and would simply discharge routine business, and he presumed not only to discharge the routine business which was before the Government at the time, but to attend to some of the most important duties which devolved on the Government, and even to advise His Excellency to fill certain vacancies which existed at that time in the Senate, two of which vacancies had been created by the resignation of two of the hon. gentleman's own colleagues, who had left that elevated sphere in order to contest constituencies, and who had been rejected by the people. The Governor General then laid down the rule that he would accept the advice of the hon. gentleman upon everything which pertained to the routine business of the Government, but that upon everything which went beyond that he would not accept his advice, but would leave the matter in abeyance for such action to be taken afterwards as the event and the justice of the case and the law and constitutional practice should require. The hon. gentleman, who at that time was still at the head of the Government, still presumed to act as the adviser of the Crown, though he had no right at all to do so, because, as is well known, as the hon. gentleman himself claimed this afterwards, no one has the right under our system to advise the Crown unless at the same time he possesses the confidence of the people. The hon. gentleman had lost the confidence of the people; therefore, he had no right to advise the Crown, and the Governor General would not take his advice. To the issue thus raised between the Governor General and the Prime Minister of that day, the attention of the Colonial Office was called, and the whole matter was referred to the Colonial Secretary, and I am in a position to say now, though I did not say it at the time, in the session of 1896, when the question was debated, that the conduct of His Excellency was fully approved by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Chamberlain. The question came up again several times. The hon. gentleman, with the persistency which characterizes him, and which is not abated even by evidences ever so numerous that he is in the wrong, brought it again and again before the House. The last time it came before the House was on the 10th of June, 1898, and on that occasion I used the following words, which are quoted in the motion now in your hands:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

I have the authority of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to state that he approves of the principles on which the Governor General acted, as based on the facts set forth in the letter of His Excellency to Sir Charles Tupper.

As I stated a moment ago, the controversy between Sir Charles Tupper, the Prime Minister of that day, and the representative of the Crown in this country, was at that time naturally referred, as it was the duty of the Government to refer it, to the Colonial Office. On the 18th of August, 1896, Mr. Chamberlain sent a despatch to Lord Aberdeen on the subject which had been laid before him. In the month of June, 1898, Lord Aberdeen asked permission from Mr. Chamberlain to have the despatch which had been sent to him by Mr. Chamberlain laid on the Table of the Canadian Parliament, and I will read the answer which was received by Lord Aberdeen from Mr. Chamberlain on the 9th of June, 1898, the day previous to the day I spoke in the House. Lord Aberdeen received from Mr. Chamberlain the following telegram:—

Your telegram of 8th June—

The word "received" I put on the copy placed in my hands; but on referring to the original I find that the word "received" is not there, owing probably to a misprint or an omission. At all events, I wish to give the despatch just in the words in which it was received and is among the records of the Governor General's office:

Your telegram of 8th June received; cannot agree to the publication of any part of my secret despatch of August, 1896;—

The hon. gentleman knows very well that secret despatches are not for the public, and Mr. Chamberlain would not depart from that rule, but went on to say:

—but, if necessary, your Minister may state purport of third paragraph.

Well, the purport of the third paragraph is as follows:—

In a despatch of the 18th August, 1896, Mr. Chamberlain expressed in the third paragraph his approval of the principles stated in Lord Aberdeen's memo. of the 8th July, as those upon which his action in the matter was based, but in expressing his approval of those principles, he observed that their application is a matter for the discretion of the Governor General, whose duty it should be to decline to act on any recommendations which, in his opinion, did not comply with the principles so laid down.

Nothing could be clearer. Lord Aberdeen stated the principles upon which he declined to receive the advice of my hon. friend when still Prime Minister. Mr. Chamberlain approved of those principles, and stated further that it was in the discretion of the Governor General to determine whether or not the advice tendered him was in compliance with or contrary to those principles. It seems to me, Sir, that controversy is at an end. The hon. gentleman stated this afternoon that he would be much surprised indeed to learn that such an authority as Mr. Chamberlain had sanctioned the action of the late Governor General. Why, I am surprised at the surprise of my hon. friend. If my hon. friend will reflect, he will know that upon the occasion on which he presumed to tender advice to the late Governor General, it was he who was altogether at variance with the well understood principles of responsible government. He knows as well as I do, it is a matter which runs in the street, that under the British system no Minister of the Crown has the power to tender advice to the Crown unless that Minister has the confidence of the people. The hon. gentleman had lost the confidence of the people, and, therefore, had no right to tender any advice to His Excellency. But the hon. gentleman replied that the Governor General could not know that his advisers had been defeated until there was a vote of Parliament, and that he should wait until Parliament decided by its vote whether the hon. gentleman had lost or kept the confidence of the people. But that would have been supposing that the Governor General had not the information which the hon. gentleman himself possessed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question, as I have not the right to reply?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the right to reply.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman then had lost the confidence of the people. As he himself knows, two days after the elections, he stated to a reporter of the "Star" newspaper, that he acknowledged his defeat, and that as soon as he complied with certain routine business, he would tender his resignation to His Excellency. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, having acknowledged defeat, having acknowledged publicly that he had lost the confidence of the country, he had no right to tender advice to the Governor General; and the Governor General was even generous towards him when he afterwards accepted even a part of the advice he tendered to him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). The hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has evaded the entire argument. I ask him whether the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and the Government of which he was a member had the confidence of the people and were in a position to advise the Governor General to appoint a judge to the Supreme Court. The hon. gentleman says that the Governor General had the information that I had lost the confidence of the people. Had not Lord Dufferin the information that Mr. Mackenzie had lost the confidence of the people, when Mr. Mackenzie, as the right hon. gentleman knows, had told His Excellency that the country had overwhelmingly defeated him. That Government was defeated by a majority of 85 in a House of 215 members, and yet they claimed the right to make an appointment to a judgeship of the Supreme Court, one of the highest positions in the gift of the Crown in Canada, and to appoint three or four judges to the Superior Courts in Quebec and the other provinces. Moreover, the hon. gentleman has lost sight of the fact that the true British constitutional principle is this: that when a person is called upon to form an Administration, whether he has a majority in the House of Commons or not, the moment he is charged with the duties of the Administration, and has accepted the trust, from that moment he has all the powers and privileges of Government. Lord Derby formed an Administration in 1852, being then in a minority in the House of Commons. He dissolved the House and went to the country, but was defeated. Yet he remained in office and met Parliament, discharging, meantime, all the functions of Government, and continuing to do so down to the time his successors took office. For the right hon. gentleman to tell me that Lord Aberdeen acted in accordance with the constitutional precedent because he had learned I had lost the confidence of the country is to ignore the whole argument I made. Lord Beaconsfield has put on record the fact that he consulted two of the most eminent authorities in the Parliament of England, one upon the one side and one upon the other, upon that question; and they both told him that not only had he the right to exercise the functions of Minister as if he had the majority at his back, but it was his absolute duty to do so. Why, the hon. gentleman knows, that a British Minister, after his defeat, gave away three Garters, three of the highest gifts at the disposal of the Crown. The hon. gentleman speaks of the appointment of Senators. Why, Sir, the disparity between the parties in the Senate of Canada was not greater than was the disparity in the House of Lords; and yet, notwithstanding that, not merely did the outgoing Tory Ministry exercise the right of appointing their friends to peerages, but, where there was no time to complete the appointment, they left a memorandum which their successors, coming into power, carried out. I was not present when the right hon. gentleman rose, and would therefore ask: Does he intend to lay the despatch of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain on the Table of the House?

The PRIME MINISTER. So far as I can—yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, unless he does, the right hon. gentleman stands condemned in the presence of this House and of the country of having violated that which I have proved by the highest authorities, English and Canadian, to be one of the fundamental principles of debate. I refuse to accept what the hon. gentleman has offered, as a fulfilment of his duty in this matter. I want, not only that despatch, but what led to it. I want the communication from Lord Aberdeen which elicited that secret despatch and elicited subsequently the permission to refer to a passage in it. In refusing this the right hon. gentleman violates the precedent both in England and in this country that makes it imperative that a document quoted from shall be laid upon the Table. The right hon. Colonial Secretary cannot give the authority to violate the principles of parliamentary rule. I have given the authorities to prove that the right hon. Secretary of State for the

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Colonies would not be permitted to do on the floor of the British House of Commons what the leader of this House says the Secretary of State for the Colonies authorizes him to do here. He would not be permitted to quote from a despatch without laying that despatch on the Table. All the authorities agree in favour of that view and there is no authority on the other side. And yet the leader of the Government falls back on the absolutely senseless platitudes that because Lord Aberdeen knew that the elections had gone against us, we were not entitled to make any appointments. I would like to ask him why the Mackenzie Government, of which he was a member, approached Lord Dufferin when they were defeated and asked him to make over one hundred appointments? Why did they dare to approach Lord Dufferin under the circumstances? The ground upon which my right hon. friend ventures to take a stand in defence of Lord Aberdeen, that he knew that we were defeated; and yet after they had admitted defeat and said they would wind up the business as promptly as they could and tender their resignation, they asked him to assent to over one hundred appointments. And Lord Dufferin, not lowering himself to the position of a partisan, but maintaining the true dignity of his position as Governor General, as a representative of Her Majesty, maintained the precedents recognized by every statesman in England. How dare the right hon. gentleman, having previously enjoyed the benefit of a defeated Minister, of having over one hundred appointments accepted by the Governor General, lend his countenance to the refusal of a similar right to another. How dare he stand before the people of this intelligent country and say that that which was right and just on the part of Lord Dufferin to him was not right and just when demanded by me from Lord Aberdeen. The right hon. gentleman lost the idea of the true constitutional position, and that is that Canada enjoys—or, rather, I should have said that Canada enjoyed—the great distinction, the proud privilege of feeling that we had as exemplar and guide in all our conduct as parliamentarians, the precedents set in the most illustrious Empire the world has ever seen. All that we asked, all that I claimed at the hands of Lord Aberdeen, I was entitled to claim in virtue of the constitution that Canada enjoyed, under which she possessed all these rights and privileges just as completely under the representative of Her Majesty as a British Minister would claim them at the hands of the sovereign. I have shown to the House that the statesmen of England, Liberals and Conservatives, when defeated, have exercised invariably the very highest functions that a Minister of the Crown, backed by all the support of the largest majority in Parliament can possess; I have shown that the highest gifts in the possession of the Crown, peerages, Governor Generalships of India, all the highest gifts in the possession of the sovereign, were freely accorded by Her Majesty in view of the fact that she knew no partisanship. In view of these facts we felt that the lustre of the British Crown depended upon maintaining that great principle of adopting the British parliamentary precedents established in England. When we asked to apply that principle, when we showed Lord Aberdeen that we had the precedents established by Lord Dufferin on two occasions, and notably on the occasion when the right hon. gentleman himself was a member of the defeated Government, and when that defeated Government was permitted to make 100 appointments, many of them most important, of a life-long character that no Government coming after could touch, the hon. gentleman then falls back upon the miserable and exploded story that we had lost the confidence of the country. Why, then, when the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had lost the confidence of the country, did they go to the Governor General and ask permission to make appointments by the score, to some of the most important positions in the Government? Sir, I tell the hon. gentleman that he is bound by every principle of honour, bound by every principle of constitutional precedence, to lay upon the Table of this House the despatch of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, sustaining Lord Aberdeen in his act; and he is also bound to lay upon the Table of the House along with it the communication that went from Lord Aberdeen as head of this Government at the time to Mr. Chamberlain upon which that despatch was based. If, as I said before, it proves that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has lent himself to deprive from this great Dominion that constitutional right, that parliamentary right, that we enjoyed down to that time; if it proves that such is the case, why, Sir, we must submit, until that improper act, that unconstitutional act, on the part of the Secretary of State for the Colonies is reversed. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying now, since this question has reached its present stage, that if Mr. Chamberlain, great and powerful Minister as he is, if he has, in view of all the facts, lent himself to trample down the constitution of Canada upon which we had a right to rest. I say if that be proved to be the case, I will not rest until this agitation shall reach a higher and a more potent assemblage than that I have now the honour to address, and we will then learn whether the Parliament of England will take away from this great Dominion that inestimable right that we have previously enjoyed, of being able to mould our parliamentary institutions and governmental institutions upon that great model which all parties, Liberals and Conservatives alike, have established and placed beyond any question.

Before sitting down I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to allow me to make another reference to what I cannot but believe was an inadvertence in a ruling you made just before you left the Chair at six o'clock. It is a matter of great importance, it touches the very foundation of debate in this House, and I cannot believe that, after careful deliberation, you will rule that a motion put upon the Orders asking for papers, but eliciting no discussion, or even if it did elicit discussion, should be treated as a past debate. Why, Sir, the debate has not yet commenced on that question. The papers have only been moved for as a preliminary, as a foundation for debate; therefore, I cannot believe that you will maintain the position. I prefer to think that you made that ruling in a hasty moment, and that you will not maintain the position that a motion for papers would be treated as a past debate, and, therefore, would preclude discussion at a future stage. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that upon reflection you will take so unusual a position as that.

Mr. SPEAKER. In reference to the point just raised by the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper), he will recollect that when I called his attention to what I thought was the fact, that this motion with reference to the British Columbia Government was on the paper, it was with reference to it that I suggested to him that he could not discuss the matter by anticipation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not referring to that; it was at a subsequent stage.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then a moment or two afterwards, just before six o'clock, I ascertained from the hon. member who made the motion that he had moved it. I did not stop the discussion, I only mentioned incidentally that there having been a previous debate, it would preclude a discussion. But I fancy the hon. member is quite right that there was no debate at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER. Therefore, that was not ruled upon by me to any extent whatever. I am very glad the hon. member mentioned it.

Motion agreed to.

ARREST AND IMPRISONMENT OF THOS. MEAGHER.

Mr. MAHLON K. COWAN (South Essex) moved for:

Copies of all papers, including affidavits, and of all correspondence between the Government and the Government or public officials of the United States or other parties, concerning the case of Thomas Meagher, who was arrested by United States Customs officers in Canadian waters, in the River St. Clair, on 19th August, 1898; was held in custody and grossly ill-treated by said officials for some time and afterwards imprisoned, and who was finally discharged without trial by order of the United States Government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw your attention, and through you, the attention of the Government, to the arrest of Thomas Meagher, of Chatham township, Kent County, who was arrested on the 19th August, 1898, by United States Deputy Collector of Customs, Henry Avery, within the precincts of the customs range of Port Huron. On the 19th of August, Thomas Meagher, a Canadian citizen, was navigating the St. Clair River in a small steam launch; his launch was boarded by Henry Avery, a customs officer of the United States, while in Canadian waters; he was eventually arrested on the Canadian shore, and was taken over to the American side of the river, handcuffed, locked up in the Riverside Hotel, where he was detained for twenty-four hours; was afterwards taken to Port Huron, where he was incarcerated in the jail there, remained in jail until the 26th of August, when he was bailed out, he appeared for a preliminary hearing, on the 7th of September was committed to stand trial at the approaching criminal court. Subsequently, on application by the hon. Minister of Justice of Canada to the United States authorities, he was released. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to draw your attention and the attention of the Government to the gross insult, to the wanton and uncalled-for conduct of the American customs-house officer, to the cruel and brutal treatment meted out to Meagher, in order that the Canadian Government may ask compensation from the American authorities for the wrongful arrest of Meagher. In that connection, I desire, without taking up the time of the House, to place upon record statements made by Meagher and eye-witnesses of the arrest and assault:

State of Michigan,
County of Wayne.

Thomas Meagher (commonly spelled Maher), being duly sworn, deposes and says that he resides in the township of Chatham, county of Kent, Ontario, where he has resided for the past fourteen years, his residence being about three and one-half miles from the village of Port Lambton, Ontario. Deponent is twenty-five years of age, unmarried, and lives with his father and mother at the place aforesaid. Deponent and his father together constructed, about five years ago, a small steam launch, which deponent was navigating in the River St. Clair on the morning of August 19th, A.D. 1898. When deponent's boat was about three or four hundred feet below the Marshland club house, near the American shore, and was just turning his boat around to go up stream when he was approached by Mr. Henry Avery, who resides, as deponent understands it, a part of the year at Port Huron and part of the year at his summer residence on the north channel of the St. Clair River, so called. Avery was in a row-boat with a man by the name of Louis Benoir. Avery asked deponent if "he had any eggs." Deponent said: "None to sell." He then asked deponent if he would tow him up the stream as far as Joe Bedore's and deponent consented, took the line of the boat and started up stream and across the river. After going a short distance, Avery asked leave to get on the launch, and deponent gave him leave. He drew alongside and got into the launch. He stood near the engine for a time, and asked how it worked; then he went forward, and he observed a box of eggs, which lay in full view. He then exclaimed in substance to deponent, "You're a damned liar; you have got eggs." Deponent said: "I told you I had no eggs to sell." At this time deponent's boat was about in the middle of the channel, going up stream and towards the Canadian shore. Deponent was taking the Canadian side because there was less current than on the American side, and a shorter distance. Then Avery asked deponent to take the American side. Deponent said: "No, he was going up the Canadian side." Avery then demanded that he himself should steer, which deponent declined. Avery then grabbed one tiller rope, and in the struggle for possession of the same between deponent and Avery the steering apparatus was thrown out of gear. The boat had been headed partially towards the Canadian shore, and by the accident to the steering gear the boat headed full towards the Canadian side, and in a few moments ran aground on the Canadian shore nearly opposite the Marshland club. It was, as near as may be, directly opposite the summer residence of Samuel D. Craig, of Detroit, Michigan. Before striking ground, Avery pulled a revolver and pointing it at deponent shouted: "If you don't stop the engine while I am counting 'three' I will shoot you," accompanying it with other vile language. Deponent made no reply, and did not stop the engine. As the boat struck the shore, deponent jumped out on the land, where there was about six inches of water. Avery grabbed deponent as he jumped over the side, and he called to Benoir to hand-cuff deponent. Deponent struggled to free himself, and avoid being hand-cuffed, and Avery shouted to Benoir to "slug him with the hand-cuffs." Benoir struck at deponent with the hand-cuffs but did not hit him, and deponent freed one hand and struck Benoir in the face. Deponent did not hit nor injure Avery in any way. They finally overpowered deponent, dragged him into their boat, handcuffed him. They then rowed across to the Riverside hotel. Avery then took deponent upstairs in the hotel, into a small bedroom, and handcuffed him to the bed-post. One cuff was around deponent's left wrist, and the other around the bed-post, and all done in such a way that deponent could neither lie down nor stand up, but was obliged to sit on the side of the bed. All of the foregoing transpired between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, Detroit city time, August 19th, 1898. Within an hour after deponent was confined in the bed-room Avery brought from eight to ten different ladies, opened the bedroom door and showed deponent to them; some of them refused to step inside of the bedroom. Deponent hear Avery say on such occasions: "Come and have a look at him." About two hours after deponent was first put in the bedroom, Mr. Samuel D. Craig and Mr. Alexander Weber talked to deponent through the transom over the door of the bedroom. Deponent was given his dinner and supper by employees of the hotel. At bed-time Avery came to the room and changed the hand-cuffs in such a way that deponent could lie down, but he was still handcuffed all night. In the morning deponent was changed back to the original position, and he was kept hand-cuffed in that position until about eleven o'clock, when Avery and said Craig came together to the room and the hand-cuffs were removed and deponent was permitted to wash his hands and face. He was again hand-cuffed, and was taken down by Craig and Avery to the bar-room of the hotel, where the hand-cuffs were removed. Craig pleaded with Avery to remove the hand-cuffs, and finally prevailed upon Avery to do so. All three had a glass of wine together. Soon the regular steamer for Port Huron approached the dock, and Avery again started to put the hand-cuffs on deponent, but on the intervention of Mr. Craig and assurances from this deponent that he would not seek to get away, Avery consented to leave off the hand-cuffs. He took deponent on the steamer to Port Huron, where deponent was put in the county jail, in the same ward with seven other prisoners, confined for different offences. Deponent was confined in the said county jail continuously from Saturday, August 20th, about five o'clock in the afternoon, until six o'clock in the evening of August 26th, 1898, when he was released on bail. In the meantime deponent had been twice before Commissioner E. H. Harris. Deponent further says that he was never before arrested in his life, nor charged with any offence. Deponent understands that he was charged before the commissioner with smuggling one box or crate of eggs and one half-bushel of red ripe cherries, and it is charged in the complaint that this smuggling took place on the 7th day of July, A.D. 1898. Deponent further says that at the time of his arrest, abduction and imprisonment aforesaid at the Riverside Hotel, Avery had no warrant for deponent, and he did not make known in any way to deponent why he was arrested, nor did he claim to have any authority to do so except that at the Riverside hotel he said he was a United States officer, but he did not claim that he had any warrant against deponent, or that any complaint had been made against him.

Samuel D. Craig, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he resides at Detroit, Michigan, and he has a summer cottage near the Marshland Club, St. Clair Flats, Harsen's Island, St. Clair County, Michigan. That he is also a member of the said Marshland Club. That deponent is fifty-three years of age, that he has been a justice of the peace for the city of Detroit for four years, that he has been deputy county clerk of Wayne County, registrar of Probate Court for said county, under sheriff of Wayne county, clerk of the Police Court of the city of Detroit, and for five years and upwards he held the position of tally clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress. Deponent knows Henry Avery and Thomas Meagher, both of whom are referred to and mentioned in the affidavit of Thomas Meagher, hereunto annexed. Deponent has read the affidavit of Thomas Meagher, hereunto annexed, and knows its contents. Deponent was close to said parties when Avery first accosted Meagher and when Meagher took his boat in tow, and deponent saw the entire occurrence between the parties up to the time that Meagher was taken into the Riverside Hotel, and deponent knows of his own knowledge that the facts set out in said Meagher's affidavit, detailing said transaction, arrest, abduction and confinement in the Riverside Hotel are true. Deponent further says that the river is quite narrow opposite the Marshland Club, that he distinctly saw the entire transaction, including the pointing of the revolver at the head of Meagher, heard the shouts of Avery in which he threatened to shoot Meagher, saw the struggle between the parties and its precise location, and deponent swears that said struggle and arrest took place in Canada, on the Canadian shore of the St. Clair River, almost directly opposite deponent's summer cottage aforesaid. Deponent saw that Meagher had control of his launch until nearly the time that it struck the ground, and that he had entire control of the engine until that time. After Meagher was confined in the Riverside Hotel, deponent requested Avery to permit deponent to see Meagher, which he absolutely refused. The proprietor of the hotel also refused a similar request made to him by the deponent after Avery had left the hotel and gone up the river. Deponent told Avery in conversation that he had gone outside of his jurisdiction and authority entirely in making the capture of Meagher in Canada. Avery said "that he knew his business." Deponent requested Avery to take Meagher to Port Huron and have him arraigned. Avery declared that "he knew his business, and that he would keep him there as long as he damned pleased." Deponent further says that Meagher was kept confined in the Riverside Hotel about twenty-four hours. Two regular passenger boats touched at Riverside after the arrest, on the same day he was arrested. Deponent further says that the arrest was made between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon of said day. After the refusal of Avery and the hotel proprietor to allow deponent to see Meagher, and about two hours after he was first confined, deponent was permitted by the wife of the proprietor to talk through the transom above the bedroom door to Meagher. Mr. Alexander Weber was with deponent at this time. They both could see him through the transom by standing on chairs. Meagher was hand-cuffed to the bed-post in such a manner that he was compelled to sit on the side of the bed. He was in the same position on the next day between ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon, when deponent went to the room with Avery, and then occurred what is described in Meagher's affidavit. Between August 26th and 26th, deponent saw Meagher twice in the county jail at Port Huron.

And further deponent says not.

Alexander Weber, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a resident of Detroit, Michigan, and is forty-five years of age, that he owns a summer cottage on Harsen's Island, St. Clair County, Michigan, next door to that of Samuel D. Craig, and about one hundred feet distant. That in the forenoon of August 19th, A.D. 1898, deponent was on his own premises aforesaid, and he saw what transpired between Henry Avery, deputy collector of customs, and Thomas Meagher, as detailed in the affidavits of Thomas Meagher and Samuel D. Craig, hereunto attached, and which this deponent has read. When Avery approached Meagher deponent was near enough to hear the conversation between them, and the entire occurrence took place in plain view of deponent. Deponent says that the account of said transaction given by Thomas Meagher and Samuel D. Craig in said affidavits is accurate and correct. Deponent is thoroughly familiar with the neighbourhood in question, having dwelt there in summers for about fifteen years, and he says that said struggle and arrest took place on the Canadian shore of said St. Clair River. This deponent saw Meagher overpowered and taken into the boat of Avery by Avery and Benoir, and carried across to and confined in the Riverside Hotel. Deponent saw Meagher in the bedroom hand-cuffed to the bed-post. This deponent saw by standing on a chair and looking through a transom. Deponent has known Meagher for three or four years past, from seeing him pass up and down in his steam launch. Deponent says that the arrest of Meagher took place, as near as he can fix the hour, between eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon of said day. Deponent says that he should think that in the neighbourhood of one hundred people saw the transaction.

And further deponent says not.

Although, Mr. Speaker, Meagher was arrested on the 19th day of August, presumably on a charge of smuggling on that particular date; yet, when he was arraigned, on the 7th September, the charge laid against him was, that on the 7th day of July previously—exactly two months before his arraignment and a month and a half prior to his arrest—the charge was, that on the 7th day of July previously he was guilty of smuggling cherries and eggs. In the evidence taken before the commissioner, E. H. Harris, in the city of Port Huron, it appears, that, although Avery was present on that day, although he was talking to Meagher upon the 7th of July, the day on which he alleges the offence was committed, on being cross-examined by Meagher's counsel, as to why he had not made the arrest on the 7th July, his answer was, that he had other business to attend to. In order that there may be no mistake about it, although no defence was put in on the preliminary hearing, and although Meagher, upon the request of the Canadian Department of Justice, was subsequently released, I desire to place upon the records of the House a short extract from the evidence of Avery himself, so that you, Mr. Speaker, and this Government may see just the position which Avery takes, and the manner in which he endeavoured to squirm out of the responsibility for the illegal arrest, when the matter was being forced to an issue. On page 7 of the evidence I read as follows:—

Q. Would the boy in the boat hear those words?—A. He ought to, he was right in the same boat.

Q. How long did it take you to get the handcuffs on him?—A. It took about fifteen minutes.

Q. Did you know at the time you rowed alongside of his boat that he was smuggling that particular day?—A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. Did you know that he had any goods in the boat that he had been smuggling that day?—A. No, sir.

Q. You do not know where he got those goods that day?—A. No, sir.

Q. Under whose authority were you acting when you got into the man's boat?—A. Deputy collector and clerk.

Mr. COWAN.

Q. At what point are you stationed there?—A. Anywhere along St. Clair River.

Q. What are your duties?—A. Looking after smuggling.

Q. What authority did you have to arrest him at that time?—A. For smuggling on the 7th of July. I saw him on the 7th of July. He came out of the Sayacarte River. He had on a load of goods.

Q. What time did he deliver those goods?—A. At noon at Marshland.

Q. Do you know that those particular goods that your wife purchased from him that day were brought out of Canada?—A. Yes, I saw them in his boat.

Q. What did you see there?—A. Eggs and cherries.

Q. Did you know whether he got them in Canada or on the American side?—A. I saw him bring them out of Canada.

Q. How far were you away when he came out of the Sayacarte?—A. Fifteen or twenty rods.

Q. Do you say you could see what he had in the boat at that distance?—A. The only stop he made was at Maple Leaf, and he then had a basket with eggs.

Q. Who paid him for the eggs this day?—A. My wife.

Q. Did you swear positively that your wife paid him for eggs that day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why did you not arrest him that day?—A. I had other business to look after.

Q. Did you have a revolver in the struggle in the boat?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You threatened to shoot him?—A. No.

Q. Did you raise the revolver and say "One, two, three"?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, I suppose you don't call that a threat?—A. Well, if you want to call it that.

These are the facts of the case, and they need no argument from me. The facts briefly are: that Thomas Meagher, a Canadian citizen, who has made his living for the past number of years along the banks of the St. Clair River, in selling provisions to a large number of summer residents in the cottages there, while in Canadian waters, and while attempting no violation of either Canadian or American law, was brutally treated and arrested, dragged from his boat, taken from Canadian waters over to the American shore, that he was chained up to a bed for twenty-four hours; that two boats passed up and down the St. Clair River which could have taken him to the county jail, in which he was subsequently lodged; that he subsequently remained in that jail six days; that his boat has been in the possession of the American authorities until a short time ago; that it was not until the Minister of Justice made representations to the American Government for the release of Meagher that he was released on the admitted facts as they appear from the documents filed in the courts of record of the United States.

The best ground on which they can stand is that he was first under arrest in American waters, that the boat subsequently passed into Canadian waters, and that they laid violent hands on his person while in Canadian waters, and dragged him from Canada into the jurisdiction of the United States. I say, to the credit of the Minister of Justice and the Department of Justice, when their attention was drawn to the matter they immediately demanded Meagher's release. My object in moving for the papers, if the papers justify it, is that the Department of Justice should go further than they have gone, and demand remuneration and reparation from the American authorities, who have had in their employment an officer who is such an inhuman hell-hound as to mete out the treatment meted out to Thomas Meagher, a Canadian citizen. While I have no desire to say anything against the American Government, at the same time I say that while they keep in their employ a drunken loafer, who in the performance of his duty metes out treatment of that description, they should be held responsible the same as any other common employer. I think I am quite within the purview of this House, and state a well known principle of international law when I say that a citizen of one country has no right to use compulsive force on a citizen of another country in the home or jurisdiction of the later citizen for the purpose of dragging him back into the country in which it is claimed the law has been violated, more especially customs law.

For instance, let me refer to the case of Peter Martin, whose case will be found reported in the volume on foreign relations between the United States and Great Britain for 1877 at pages 266 to 271. It there appeared that a man by the name of Peter Martin had been tried and found guilty of a charge at Laketon, Cassiar, in the province of British Columbia; that he had been sentenced for a term of fifteen months in the jail at Victoria; that on the way from Laketon to Victoria he had to pass through United States territory in the charge of three Canadian constables; that a struggle took place in the United States territory for his freedom; that he failed to get beyond the control of the constables who had him in charge; and that he was brought down to Victoria and placed on trial for assaulting an officer in the discharge of his duty. In the correspondence which arose for the release of Martin, the position which the American Government took was: that Martin could not be held liable while being conveyed from the scene of the crime and scene of the trial, to the jail in which he was to serve his term of imprisonment; that having made an assault upon the officers in American territory during the time he was being conveyed from the place of trial to the jail, no charge could be maintained in a Canadian court for such assault made on Canadian officers in American territory. In the discussion, the American authorities went one step further, and practically said that wherever a Canadian criminal was being conveyed from one point in Canada to a jail in Canada after he had been sentenced, and it became necessary to pass through American territory, without the express consent of the American Government, the moment he entered American territory, even in the charge of Canadian officers, he was entitled to his freedom. The volume which I have previously mentioned, on page 266, sets out these facts. This document, No. 128, is from Mr. Hamilton Fish, who, I presume, was at that time Secretary of State of the United States, to Sir Edward Thornton, who was British Ambassador at Washington. It states:

It appears that one Peter Martin, who is said to be a naturalized citizen of the United States, and formerly a resident of Washington Territory, was on the 6th of September last tried before the Court of Assize, held at Laketon, Cassiar, province of British Columbia, upon true bills found by the grand jury, alleging assault upon an officer in the execution of his duty, prison breach, and escape from custody; he was found guilty and sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment in the jail at Victoria. The prisoner was in the custody of constables, and the route travelled through Alaska was by canoe, via the Stikine River.

On the 12th of September they made a landing at a point on that river, only a few miles from its mouth, within the territory of Alaska, for the purpose of cooking food. While thus engaged, the prisoner, although manacled, by some means obtained possession of a loaded shot-gun and made a deadly assault upon Francis Beegan, one of the constables, at whose hands, it is alleged, the prisoner had suffered indignities. He was, however, overpowered, and at once conveyed to Wrangel Harbour where he was placed on board the British steamer "Grappler," and taken to Victoria.

These are the facts of the arrest and trial and the assault on the road to the jail. Subsequently, when he arrived at Victoria, a further charge was made against him of assaulting an officer in the discharge of his duty. In that connection, document No. 131, from Hamilton Fish to Sir Edward Thornton says:

The facts were laid before you, and while no unnecessary prominence was given to the violation of the sovereignty of the United States which had taken place, it was confidently hoped that before Martin was placed on trial for the new charge, or before any proceedings had been taken to continue his imprisonment on the former one, the facts would have been carefully examined by the Colonial authorities and a conclusion reached as to what course should properly be taken in view of the rights of Martin and of the sovereignty of the United States.

On page 269, he says further:

I have the honour, therefore, to ask again your attention to the subject, and to remark that if, as appears admittedly to be the fact, the Colonial officers in transporting Martin from the place at which he was convicted to his place of imprisonment, via the Stikine River, did conduct him within and through what is the unquestioned territory of the United States, a violation of the sovereignty of the United States has been committed, and the recapture and removal of the prisoner from the jurisdiction of the United States to British soil, was an illegal, violent and forcible act, which cannot justify the subsequent proceedings whereby he has been, is or may be restrained of his liberty.

I have, therefore, to express the hope that if Her Majesty's authorities find the fact to be as it is represented, that Martin was conducted by the officers having him in custody into and through the territory of Alaska, being part of and within the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the United States, he be set at liberty.

This document is dated January 10th, 1877. The conviction of Martin at Laketon, Cassiar, B.C., was on September 6th, and he was sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment. I find on page 271 the following document:—

(Received September 26.)

Washington, September 25, 1877.

Sir,—With reference to the note which Sir Edward Thornton addressed to Mr. Fish on the 11th of last January, I have the honour to inform you that I have just learned from the Deputy Governor of Canada that the Dominion Government has concluded the inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and has decided upon setting Peter Martin at liberty without further delay.

I have the honour, &c.,
F. R. PLUNKETT.

I again desire to draw attention to the decision of the American Government at that time. It was not a question as to whether or not a crime had been committed within the jurisdiction of the United States. It was not a question even of a crime having been committed in Canada and the perpetrator being pursued in the United States and subsequently brought back to Canada, but it was the case simply of a man having been tried and convicted in Canada for a crime committed there, and having, on his way to jail, to pass through a portion of territory the ownership of which was disputed at that time. The claim was made, that he had passed into the United States, and that, once on American soil, the jurisdiction of the Canadian constable had absolutely ceased, and the American Government demanded his release, which was subsequently granted. I, therefore, ask that this Government should make a demand upon the American Government for atonement for what I consider the greatest outrage ever perpetrated by any officer of any government upon the citizens of a foreign land. I ask, not only that this Government should demand reparation of that injustice at the hands of the Americans, but that they should go further and draw the attention of the Attorney General of Ontario to the matter, in order that he may ask for his extradition, because it seems to me if ever there was a case which lies clearly within the section of our Criminal Code respecting kidnapping, it is this. I hope, therefore, that the matter will be taken up and justice done in the case.

Mr. ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Kent). I am very glad my hon friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) has brought this matter to the attention of the Government and the House. He has stated the case so fairly and clearly that nothing remains to be said regarding it, but I must insist, that it is one which calls for the most serious and careful attention of this Government. As my hon. friend has said, there was no possible justification for this arrest. This man was arrested in Canadian waters. The American officer who arrested him, knew that he was doing so in Canadian waters, and both the arrest and his subsequent conduct deserves the most severe punishment. This man was taken from his bed, conveyed to a hotel on the American side, brutally handcuffed to a bedpost, kept there for a number of days, and exhibited to the public, as a wild animal in a Barnum show. Such conduct ought not to be tolerated at all. He was arrested in Canadian waters, admittedly without cause, but, as subsequently stated, on a trumped up charge concerning something which occurred a considerable time previously. There can be no possible justification for such treatment, and it is the bounden duty of this Government to follow the example set by the mother country with respect to just such cases, for we all know, that, no matter in what clime a British subject may be, if he be arrested falsely or badly treated by any nation or people, the exercise of the whole power of England's army and navy is at once threatened and put forth in his defence. Are we, in Canada, to allow our citizens to be arrested in this bold, open and illegal manner and brutally treated, as this man was, without calling on the Government of the United States for reparation to this Government and compensation to the individual as well? If the Government demand, as they should, from the United States, that some recompense be made to this man, that would be a lesson to them for the future. I have no doubt, that the American Government could not have been fully informed on the whole course of this prosecution, and I am sure, that, if their attention be called to it, there is sufficient honour and justice in that nation to make them give a proper recompense to the man who has suffered so much by the illegal and brutal conduct of one of their officers. I earnestly hope, that our Government will press this matter upon the attention of the American authorities, and see that full reparation is made in every possible way. This matter has been so ably and clearly presented by my hon. friend from Essex that I need not say anything further, but will simply add, that, as the occurrence took place very close to my county, and as I am conversant with the facts and know that public opinion in that section has been deeply aroused and a great deal of discussion and ill-feeling excited. I must strongly urge the Government to see that justice is done.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). All the papers will be brought down, and I think that, when my hon. friends see the correspondence interchanged between the Home Government and the authorities of the United States, they will be satisfied, that even the United States authorities have come to the conclusion that this arrest and all the attending circumstances were wholly unjustifiable.

Mr. CLANCY. I expected that the hon. Solicitor General would have had something more to say about this matter, because it is a very serious one. If, instead of being a poor man, Meagher had been a powerful and wealthy citizen of this country, his case would have been treated very differently. I regret, that, while the Solicitor General states there was no doubt about the illegality of the arrest and the cruel treatment to this Canadian citizen, he is not in a position to say, that no strong effort was made to obtain reparation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How can the hon. gentleman know what effort was made until the papers are brought down?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman might have stated to the House what was done; he might have stated, certainly, what the purport of the papers was.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The papers will speak for themselves.

Mr. CLANCY. I repeat, that every Canadian citizen, every British subject, should stand upon the same ground, whether he be high or low, rich or poor. Every British subject has the same right to protection in this country. But, judging from what has fallen from the hon. gentleman's lips, this case was very lightly dealt with indeed. Let me suppose, that some other Canadian should be seized on in the same way to-morrow, what would be the position of Canadian citizens in this country, if we are to allow them to be treated as Meagher was treated? His treatment was simply an outrage. He is a poor man, who earns his livelihood in the manner stated by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan), and is one of the most inoffensive men I know. I believe that the hon. member for South Essex took up his case. It is much to his credit, that he has taken up that case and that he has pressed it. But I repeat what I said a moment ago—that I fear the Government of Canada have been lax in this case, and that the necessary effort has not been made to have reparation made by the United States to a man who has been dragged illegally before courts, and has been ill-treated, treatment being meted out to him that would hardly be given one of the lower order of animals. If this is permitted, without proper steps being taken, we have no security for Canadian citizens. They may be dragged into the dungeon at any moment, and our people in Canada will sit idle and look on, without a protest against such conduct. I hope the hon. gentleman will not only bring down the papers, which is a bare, empty form, but will go further and demand reparation for the arrest and ill-treatment of a Canadian citizen.

Mr. COWAN. I am satisfied that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) desired to be absolutely fair, and I can only, therefore, assume that he is speaking without that knowledge of the facts which I should like to see him possess. Meagher was arrested, as I said, on the 19th August. As soon as he was released—

Mr. HUGHES. When was he released?

Mr. COWAN. On the 26th August. He was kept in jail some six days. Even before he was released, the facts were brought to my attention by his attorneys in Detroit. I immediately wired the Minister of Justice, and the Minister wired back that the matter would receive his immediate attention, and advised me to communicate with the Attorney General of Ontario. I telegraphed the Attorney General, but he replied that he thought it was the business of the Department of Justice to ask for Meagher's release. In fairness to the Department of Justice, I must say that there was no delay on their part. They took not only active steps but immediate steps to demand this man's release. The hon. member for Bothwell must know that in dealings between two nations, between two Governments, everything cannot be done in a day. But I must say I was agreeably surprised at the despatch shown by the Department of Justice in communicating, as they did, to the authorities in Washington. Meagher was bound over to stand his trial in the county of Wayne, city of Detroit, and before the court was reached, the district attorney of Wayne County was ordered to make a report of the facts. The facts were reported to the Department at Washington and were transmitted to the Department of Justice here. Meagher's attorneys had received a communication asking if there was anything they wanted to say in order to strengthen the hands of the Department of Justice and asking them to give any facts they might have to assist in demanding Meagher's release. And not only was Meagher released, but the custom-house officer was dismissed. My object in making this motion is to have the papers brought to this House in order that reparation may be asked from the American Government.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLANCY. What I wanted to find out was whether the Government had demanded reparation. We knew that Meagher had been released.

Mr. COWAN. Then the hon. gentleman must know that reparation could not very well be demanded by this Government until Meagher had made a demand for it. And this is why I want these papers brought down, in order that the demand may be made upon the United States Government. But no demand should be made until the House and the country are in possession of all the facts. No demand has been made, because Meagher has not asked the Government to make a demand. Until a demand is made by the wronged individual, the Department of Justice or any other department would far exceed its jurisdiction, would go beyond the limits within which this country would support it, if they demanded reparation until the individual most affected claims damages for the wrong he has suffered.

Motion agreed to.

LONG SPEECHES IN THE HOUSE.

Mr. J. CHARLTON (North Norfolk) moved :

1. That the prevailing practice of delivering in the Canadian House of Commons, speeches of great length, embracing voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, has introduced a discursive and diffuse, rather than a concise and incisive style of public speaking ; is destructive of pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of Parliament ; is in marked contrast to the practice that prevails with regard to debate in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of Parliament.

2. That it is expedient that rules be adopted limiting the length of speeches, and regulating the general conduct of debate in that regard.

3. That a special committee should be formed to consider the question of parliamentary debate, length of speeches, general conduct of debate, and proper methods for securing the greatest promptitude in the despatch of business consistent with the parliamentary rights of the minority, and the general interests of the public ; and report its recommendations to this House.

He said : Whatever pertains to the dignity of this House ; whatever is calculated to affect its efficiency as a legislative body or promote its good standing in the eyes of the country at large or to secure for it the respect of its constituents, is a matter that should be one of importance to every member of this House. The question that I wish to say a few words about to-night is one that cannot be very well treated as a party question ; it is one in which every member of the House is equally interested. We have fallen into a habit with regard to the proceedings of the House, which, I believe, almost every member of the House deplures. We have fallen into the habit of making speeches of inordinate length—and I will not say that the individual who is now addressing you has been, in times past, entirely free from blame in this regard. For this reason it is less invidious on my part to stand before you in discussing this matter than it might possibly be if I were entirely free from blame. So far as any blame may attach to myself, I freely and openly make confession, profess my intention to do better in future, and affirm that it is my desire to see that steps may be taken to increase the efficiency and respectability of this great body of the representatives of half the continent of North America. We have a great variety of duties to perform in this House ; we have jurisdiction over a vast extent of country ; we are the custodians of interests of great magnitude and great variety. Great as are these interests, vast as are our responsibilities, this country is still in its infancy, and these interests will be vastly augmented in importance in the near future. Therefore, if we waste time now, it behooves us to retrace our steps and place this Canadian House of Commons in a position, under amended rules, that shall increase its efficiency as a legislative body and put it more in accord with its duty and give it the ability to perform its work in the future, when the duties devolving upon us shall be greatly increased, when the interests we shall have to take charge of will be of greater magnitude and when, in place of having a vast unsettled country, we shall be a nation of scores of millions of people with economy of time. It is in this sense, Sir, that I approach the discussion of this question—in the sense of laying the foundations for the future, of correcting any errors into which we have fallen, errors which have had no serious consequences so far, but which may prove seriously detrimental in the interests of the country in the future.

The habit of making three, four, five hour speeches, I think I may safely venture to assert, Mr. Speaker, is not a commendable one. Long speeches are not necessarily, by virtue of their length, powerful speeches ; on the contrary, the length of a speech may very seriously detract from its power, may very seriously detract from its force ; and the man who spends time in concentrating his thoughts, in getting rid of superfluous language, in putting his speech in logical form, in saving the time of the hearer by giving him the substance of what he has to present without verbiage, that man, Mr. Speaker, will produce a greater effect than he who elaborates his ideas, and, going over a great amount of ground, pours upon his audience a great volume of sound, a great volume of words, when his ideas might be concentrated into a much smaller scope.

I remember that perhaps the most effective speech ever made in this hall which has resounded with eloquence in past years, was a speech made by the Hon. Edward Blake one Saturday night when he took the floor at ten minutes to twelve and spoke for ten minutes. It was at the close of the debate on the Franchise Bill that had continued from Thursday afternoon at three o'clock to Saturday at midnight ; and the closing speech of ten minutes made by the Hon. Edward Blake upon that occasion, without preparation, purely extempore, flashing with the force of his feelings, was the most effective speech, the most convincing speech, of all the speeches made upon that memorable occasion. Now, Sir, the long speech, I am sure, does not command the attention of this House, does not convince the intellects of this House as readily and as thoroughly as a shorter speech, presenting the same facts in a more epigrammatic and concentrated form.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. member has spoken twelve minutes already.

Mr. CHARLTON Well, I am entitled to an hour. The long speech not only fails to produce the effect upon this House which a carefully prepared, epigrammatic, thoroughly rounded, condensed speech will do, but it fails to command the attention of the country. The average reader cannot take time to wade through a five-hour speech, or a four-hour speech, or a three-hour speech. He wants his political pabulum given to him in a concentrated form, and while he might read a half-hour speech, possibly an hour's speech, he will shrink from the task of reading a speech filling column after column, that has occupied in its delivery in this House, hour after hour. And so we entomb in our "Hansard" speeches of great length that fall upon the ear of this House without effect, that elicit no response in the country, that command no attention in the country, and are as thoroughly buried in the "Hansard" as a mummy in the catacombs of Egypt. Perhaps at some future time some political student of public affairs may wade through the "Hansard." But what reader seeking for public information will take these ponderous volumes, and read these speeches carefully that fill column after column. They fail of their purpose, they are thrown away, they are not pertinent debate, they are not effective debate, they are useless in a general sense, useless in commanding the attention of the country or convincing the House of Commons.

I have marked a great contrast between the public speaking in this House to-day and that of the first and second Parliaments of this Dominion, from 1868 to 1872, and from 1873 down to 1878, and later down to 1874 we had no "Hansard." The speaker was reported in the press of the day, the ideas he presented were fairly reproduced, but no newspaper would attempt to give a five-hours speech. It was absolutely necessary for the speaker to present his views tersely, in a condensed form. And so we had in those days true parliamentary debating, we had speeches of a high order, not because of their length, but because of their quality.

Mr. HUGHES. Far-off hills look green.

Mr. CHARLTON Very true; still, a person who has mingled in the affairs of two periods may be able to draw a contrast tolerably correct between one and the other. I think my estimate in regard to this matter is a fairly correct one, and that the style of parliamentary speaking in this House from 1868 down to at least 1878, and for some years later, was of a higher order, of a more thoroughly parliamentary order, than the style of speaking that is in vogue here at the present time. At that time the speaker addressed himself to the House, he addressed himself to the country, he sought to impress his views upon his fellow-members, upon his constituents and the country. Sometimes he does this still, sometimes he does not, sometimes he is talking to the "Hansard." His remarks will go into the "Hansard" faithfully, they will be reproduced there, and from the "Hansard" he can circulate his speech among his constituents. And so the member may talk to the "Hansard," and through the "Hansard" to his constituents through the edition of the speech that he will reproduce in the Printing Bureau. That may be the object he has in view, and not the purpose of impressing his fellow-members with the weight of his arguments, or attempting to produce an impression upon the public sentiment of the country.

Now, this is a feature of our parliamentary proceedings which cannot be justified, it is a method that wastes a great amount of time, and it is a species of public speaking which excites a good deal of criticism and a good deal of opposition on the part of, perhaps, a majority of the members of this House, who do not waste time, who do not make long speeches, who come here for business purposes, and desire to see the legitimate legislative work of this Parliament dispatched properly and speedily, and who look with ill-concealed disgust upon what they consider a waste of time which is prolonging the session beyond reasonable limits, and keeping them here against their will. The result may possibly be, Mr. Speaker, that some fine morning some member of this House will move to abolish the "Hansard," and the motion may carry. That is by no means beyond the limit of probability. It would be a great calamity, in some senses, to have the official record of our proceedings abolished, but if the privilege of having our speeches recorded is abused, that catastrophe may come, it is not at all unlikely that it will; and in our own interests and in the interests of this House, we ought to reform, so far as possible, our system of procedure.

Now, I am by no means in favour of closure, I am by no means in favour of curtailing debate, or curtailing the privilege of a member to express his views freely upon all occasions as he may desire; but I do say that it is quite possible to adopt rules that will lessen the length of our speeches, that will facilitate the progress of our business, that will elevate the tone of parliamentary speaking, and will increase the efficiency of parliamentary action in this House of Commons. This system of talking to "Hansard" led, in the United States Congress, to the consideration of one or two alternatives—either the abolition of the “Congressional Record,” owing to the waste of time in talking to it, or the granting to each member the privilege of supplying his speech, in manuscript, to the “Record” editor to be inserted in the “Record” without being delivered in the House. The latter alternative was adopted, and if a member of the American House of Representatives desires to put his speech upon the “Record,” to be published and circulated among his constituents, as a speech delivered by him in the House of Representatives, it simply goes into the “Record” as if delivered. It is put into the Government printing office as delivered; it goes to his constituents as delivered, when it has never been heard in the House of Representatives. That is a remedy we might adopt. But I think it would hardly be consonant with the usage of this House or the principles prevailing in British Parliaments, to adopt that course. If we do not adopt this course, we must remedy this crying evil, in some way or other, by amending the rules applying to debate. The British conduct of debate is in marked contrast with our own. Long speeches, as a rule, are not delivered in the British House of Commons. Of course, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer presents his Budget, or when some Government measure is presented, speeches of two hours in length are sometimes made, and even of greater length, but, as a rule, speeches in the British House of Commons are brief, pertinent and to the point, and a speech of twenty or thirty minutes is thought to be a long speech there. It is pure, legitimate debate, and their proceedings command the attention of the country. Their proceedings are practical; they are not made up of long, beautiful essays, carefully prepared, delivered without commanding the attention of the House and going into “Hansard,” but of live debates on practical questions which create interest in the country, and it is debating of that kind that we should seek to secure in this House. Our own method of procedure would not be tolerated in the British House of Commons. It could not be tolerated in a House managing the affairs of the vast British Empire. It would be impossible to get through with their business, and, as I said a moment ago, our own territory is so vast, our own resources are so great, that when this country becomes more largely peopled, when its resources become more fully developed, when Canada becomes, what she is sure to become, in the near future, we will be unable to transact the business of this country by the method that we are pursuing.

Mr. CLANCY. Would that not be time enough?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the best time to remedy an evil is when you perceive that it exists, because it is much easier to do it then. The United States House of Representatives have limited the length of speeches to one hour, at any time the previous question may be called and the debate closed, the House may at any time fix the hour when the vote shall be taken, or, at any time it may decide that from that moment only five-minute speeches shall be permitted. During the progress of the debate, if an amendment is offered, five minutes are allowed to the presenter of the amendment and five minutes to the member who opposes it, or ten minutes in all. If a motion is made to amend the rules, the rules of the House provide that the debate on that motion must be concluded in forty minutes. Expedients have been adopted in the matter of legislation by which two-thirds of the work that we dispose of in Committee of the Whole, is attended to by various committees of the House of Representatives, which are thirty or forty in number. These expedients have been rendered necessary in consequence of the great volume of business that devolves upon Congress. I have briefly presented these points for the purpose of presenting to the House not that any particular method shall be adopted. I propose that the question shall be referred to a committee in the language of the resolution to:

Consider of the question of parliamentary debate, length of speeches, general conduct of debates and proper methods for securing the greatest promptitude in the despatch of business consistent with the parliamentary rights of the minority and the general interests of the public; and report its recommendations to this House.

This committee, if it is struck, of course, can do no harm. It can take this matter into consideration, and, after mature consideration of the question, it may, if it choose, make recommendations to the House of Commons. These recommendations, after being duly presented, if considered by the House of Commons, will receive such consideration as the House of Commons may deem them to be entitled. The House may reject them entirely, or may accept them in whole or in part. I believe no harm can be done by a reference of this question to a committee to be struck, in the sense of the resolution, and I therefore move the resolution.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with the motion of the hon. member for North Oxford.

An hon. MEMBER. North Norfolk.

Mr. BRITTON. I was thinking so much of what I was going to say in reference to the question that I forgot the riding that the hon. gentleman represents. I think it would be parliamentary to address the hon. gentleman, or to speak of him, as, I think, he is entitled to be spoken of, because of the position he holds, as His Excellency. I think that is the proper title for a member of the Joint High Commission; that is the title that he is entitled to receive, and I suppose it would be parliamentary to speak of him in that capacity. I am in accord with the motion he has made. It is a fact that any man who has come to this House, as recently as I did, must be fully aware that there are some—shall I say of us—hon. members who have an irrepressible desire to speak on every possible occasion and to speak on every possible subject. I must say, that in my opinion, speaking merely for the sake of having words embalmed in "Hansard," speaking to constituents and having "Hansard" distributed, at the expense of the Government, to constituents is in some cases, in many cases, an abuse of the privilege of Parliament. I would be glad if something could be done to prevent an extension of that abuse. It certainly has grown to very great proportions. So far as I have had conversations on the subject with members of the House, they seem to agree in the opinion that, while some hon. gentlemen cannot make an effective speech under any circumstances, if a man can make an effective speech on any subject which is entitled to the consideration of this House, in the great majority of cases, he can make it effective in, at least about half an hour. When necessity compels a longer time than that, I would be glad if this committee could see some way of permitting a speech to be dispensed with, and if it has to be recorded in "Hansard," it might, as is done in the United States Congress, be submitted to the House, taken as read, and printed for distribution. In expressing my approval of this committee, I have one word to say. It certainly is a useless expenditure to have a great majority of the speeches printed, and while the expense of printing is in itself a very considerable item, yet it is comparatively trifling compared with the other expense entailed, because it is on account of these long speeches, such as we have had this session and other sessions, that the session of Parliament is extended to such a length that attendance is burdensome to a great many members. It is because of that, and because I think the debates would be more interesting and more effective in every way if the speeches are limited, that I heartily approve of the motion.

Mr. T. DIXON CRAIG (East Durham). I have some right to speak on this question Mr. Speaker, as I only make short speeches, and I do not know that the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), who brought this matter before this House, can make the same claim that I can in this respect. I suppose he is going to repent now, but I certainly remember him making very long speeches in the old days.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not very long.

Mr. CRAIG. I remember that in the last session of the last Parliament, some hon. gentlemen opposite made very long speeches, and sometimes speeches not very much to the point. I approve heartily of something being done to make the speeches shorter if possible. I do not mean to say that there are not occasions on which long speeches are not justifiable, but those cases are exceptional, and in the great majority of cases a member could say all that is necessary to be said from his side, and all that is profitable for any one else to know, in a very short time. One great trouble of long speeches is, that hon. members who hear them imagine that they must make long speeches too. In the last Parliament, one member on the other side of the House made a speech of seven hours duration, and another member thought he had to go him one better, and spoke for eight hours. These long speeches are perfectly absurd. I used to think it was a sign of great ability to make a long speech, but I have changed my mind on that point. I find it is the easiest thing in the world to make a long speech. All a man has to do—well, I will not explain it, because I fear somebody might take advantage of it; although I have learned it myself, I do not practice it, and I do not wish that any one else should. I made a little calculation some few years ago about this matter, and I figured out, that if each of the 213 members spoke for two hours during the session, and counting the sittings at six hours a day, it would take fourteen weeks to do nothing but talk all the time. If each member spoke for seven hours, and that does not seem very much for a member to speak during the whole session, then the session of Parliament would last all the year through. That shows the importance of limiting the speeches in some way or other. Now, I have something to say to the newspapers on this question, for I think they are very much to blame for these long speeches. I have come to the conclusion, from my own experience, that the newspapers are responsible. I find that members who make long speeches of three or four hours, get a long report, and often a good report; but sometimes when I have spoken—I do not know whether I said much of interest or not, but I think I was talking to the point for perhaps half an hour—I noticed in the newspapers the next day, that the report was "Mr. Craig made a few remarks," or something of that sort; and so I began to think, that if I wanted to be reported I had better talk for three hours. I give this hint to the newspapers. Let them encourage short speeches by giving a good report when a man speaks twenty minutes, or so, and a short report when a man speaks four hours. That, I think, would cure the evil. I admit that this is a difficult question to solve. I suppose that really the cure would be, in appealing to the good sense of members of the House. I do not know that there is any other cure. It is very difficult to make rules, and to say that a member shall not speak for more than an hour, but we live in a free country and we pride ourselves on our liberty, and some may not wish to be bound by any rule of the kind. I do think that the very fact of this matter being brought to the attention of the House, may to some extent result in the cure of this evil of exceedingly long speeches. I am not finding fault that long speeches are sometimes made, but I think we have reason to find fault that so many long speeches are made, and often made on subjects that are not of very great importance.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron).
Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD. I suppose that I am one of the sinners who are said to speak too long when I address the House upon public questions, but I am certainly not a sinner as to the number of times I speak. I was rather amused when I heard the hon. member (Mr. Craig) wishing to curtail the length of speeches. Now, I would wager a fifty-pound note with him, that if he looks over the "Hansard" of last session, he will find that he has occupied three columns to every one that a good many of those who make long speeches occupy. I do not know that it makes much difference whether, when you are on your feet and in the humour, you may make a good, long speech, or, if you are jumping on your feet every hour of the day to make a speech.

Mr. CRAIG. This motion seems to encourage debate and prevent long speeches.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am under the impression that last session my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) spoke day in and day out for a number of days, and I have no doubt before this session is over, he will equal his record. I must say, too, that my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) is rather guilty of speaking frequently. I have only been on my feet once before this, during this session of six weeks. I am sure that either of the two gentlemen (Mr. Britton and Mr. Craig) have been on their feet a dozen times. People hardly see their own errors and faults. I think it is better to make a good, long speech, embodying all important subjects at once, and then hold your tongue afterwards, than be jumping on your feet on almost every question that comes up. I think that if those gentlemen who are so very fond of short speeches would hold a meeting amongst themselves, they would conclude that a number of speeches are just as bad, if not worse, than one long speech. I would say, too, and I say with intent, that a large number of the members of this House speak too frequently altogether, and judging from their remarks they very often speak without consideration of the subject. Hardly a question comes up, whether on law, or physics, or political science, or any other subject, but they appear to be thoroughly posted upon it. They wish to give their constituents and the people in the country to understand, that they know everything, and they wish to have their names in "Hansard" and in the newspapers as having spoken on every conceivable question. Many of us are more modest, and feel, that we can only speak probably on one line of subjects, such as the trade question, or the expenditure, or the debt. By putting our ideas on all these together we make a tolerably long speech, and in the end we have given our constituents our opinions on the various questions passing in review. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not of the opinion at all, that we are so full of vanity that there is a single hon. gentleman in this House speaks for the purpose of having his speech put in "Hansard." I do not think there is anything in that at all. I know it is not so. We are accused of spreading our speeches among our constituents at the expense of the Government. I do not know what my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) does, but I do not know any other member of this House who does that at all. We do get copies of our speeches at the Printing Bureau; but we pay for them, and they become our own property; and we send these around to our own constituents to let them know our opinion on various questions, and they are necessary, because our speeches are reported to a very limited extent in the newspapers. I think, if we only exercise common sense, we can control ourselves, both in making less numerous speeches and in making shorter ones.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). I think this question is a practical one, and it presents serious practical difficulties. So far as the debate has gone, there seems to be a preponderance of opinion in favour of shorter speeches, but I notice, that none of the gentlemen who have addressed themselves to the subject so far, have cited any precedents to show any lines upon which it is practicable for us to agree to rectify the evil, if evil it is. The only two Houses that have been referred to—and they are the most distinguished, probably, beyond this one, in the world—are the House of Representatives in the United States and the Imperial House of Commons. In the Congress of the United States there is a very marked difference in the method of dealing with important subjects from what prevails in this House. There these subjects are not dealt with by the Government, as the Government are not responsible to Congress for them; but they are dealt with by committees of the House, which meet outside of the House and discuss these questions as long as they please. The British constitutional rule is, that the Government is responsible to the people, and that they must give their reasons in open debate, so that they shall be presented to the country; and the minority, that is, the Opposition, are not to be hampered in any way in presenting the grievances of the people, which they can only fully do by challenging and compelling discussion, when supplies are brought down. There is the great difficulty and the great danger. I do not care which party may be in power, it must be in a considerable majority to control the affairs of the country.

The only precedent we have, that of the Imperial Parliament, is against the hon. gentleman's motion. That Parliament is older, and more important, and abler, and more experienced than ours; and it has been in existence many centuries before ours was thought of. So, in the very inception of the question, it becomes almost hopeless to attempt, by restrictive and compulsory rules, to limit the necessity which may arise for the exercise of free speech, and which is more likely to arise when the minority is a small one. That is the great practical difficulty. If you attempt to lessen or to control too much discussion by the minority, there may be danger to our institutions. I would say this, and I say it candidly and frankly, to the hon. gentleman who has made this motion, that he never thought of making it when he was on this side of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I introduced a resolution of this kind, when I was in Opposition, in 1886, and on another occasion also.

Mr. FISDALE. The hon. gentleman goes back further than I do. I have only been here twelve years. But I have discussed this question at times with the late lamented leader of this House, and the greatest man, in my opinion, which this country ever produced, Sir John Macdonald, and he never could see any practical way of getting over the difficulty to which I have alluded. When I was younger in Parliament than I am, I thought many matters were easy which greater experience shows to be difficult. The discussion of the question may be useful. If both sides of the House took the matter up and talked it over among themselves, we might be able to reduce the evil, if it is an evil. I am quite willing to agree, that, in some cases and on both sides of the House, there are an unnecessary number of long speeches. I do not think I have been a great sinner in that regard myself, though, possibly it may be said that, if I had the ability, I might speak as long as some other gentlemen. It is difficult to adopt a uniform rule for men of different minds and different habits. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who seldom speaks more than a few words during the session, except upon some one special occasion, thinks that it is better to make one speech on general affairs. I do not agree with him. My idea of parliamentary discussion is, to have a debate consisting of short speeches, which may be numerous, but which are not tiresome. They are useful, as elucidating a subject, and they would not tire out gentlemen on either side of the House. Short, pertinent speeches on the different questions coming up would be instructive, and would tend, in my opinion, to raise the tone of Parliament and to increase its importance and capacity, irrespective of party questions. At the same time, I cannot see how it would be practicable to get a consensus of opinion on both sides of the House in favour of a time limit. The British Parliament has adopted a different plan, which, under their system, seems to have worked fairly well. From my experience here of both parties, I do not think, that the system of cloture would be satisfactory. I think the pressure that might be brought upon the Government at times would be dangerous, even to the Government itself, and particularly to the effectiveness with which we desire to see Parliament carrying out the high duties with which it is charged. My own view is very strong, that we had better try and see if we cannot induce hon. members on both sides to be a little more forbearing, instead of attempting to exercise drastic measures.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure that all those who have seen the motion on the Order paper for some time looked forward with some interest to hearing some strong reasons urged by the hon. member who moved that motion in its favour. But he took nearly half an hour to tell us a very short story, and still left us somewhat in the dark. He says that he drew the attention of the House to this matter in 1886. That only shows how little value we can attach to his sincerity, because from my experience in this House and my constant reading of the newspapers before I came here, that same hon. gentleman has ever since 1886 been one of the worst offenders.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has the hon. gentleman any instance to state of my having transgressed the rule I seek to lay down.

Mr. CLANCY. I think we not only had a long speech from the hon. gentleman in the session of 1896, but that on that occasion he polluted the Scriptures by reading them in the House of Commons. He was pumped out for matter, and had to lay hands on a book intended for better and other purposes. No doubt, there is, and always must be, in a deliberative body the abuse of long speeches, and I am sorry to say that the hon. gentleman, when looking for a model, went where he always goes for his models. He went to the other side of the line, where there is neither parliamentary nor responsible government. Why was he not able to point to the British House of Commons? True, the cloture has been introduced in that House, but not for the reasons pointed out by the hon. gentleman, but because of obstruction. The remedy for the evil lies, not in arbitrary rules, but in the sense of the fitness of things that prevails in the House itself. If any hon. member speaks too often and too long, he will soon find himself the worst sufferer, because the House will mark its disapproval by refusing to listen to his speeches, and in that I think we must seek the only corrective. While, no doubt, the infliction of long speeches is an abuse, at the same time I am unable to see how you can find a remedy for that abuse in any cast-iron rule. The hon. gentleman himself has been a sinner on this very occasion, because he took, by the clock, nearly half an hour to say what could have been said in a very few minutes. Perhaps I have offended myself at times.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." There was a time when, I think, he himself was not an insignificant offender, but he sits now silent in a comfortable place behind his masters, and has no longer any incentive to err in this respect. I think it would be a reflection upon this House to appoint a committee to lay down a rule fixing a limit on the length of our speeches, and that we had better leave the good sense of this House to exert its beneficent influence on those who are inclined to take up too much of our time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There seems to be a pretty general consensus of opinion on both sides that long speeches are a great evil in this Canadian Parliament. I agree in that sentiment, but I doubt if the evil can be remedied by law, or, at any rate, by any other law than that of taste and good sense. I have been of the opinion for a long time—and the experience of this session has rather confirmed me in that opinion—that long speeches do more harm to those who make them than to those against whom they are delivered. There is generally more effect in a short, concise and pithy speech than in an hour of oratory. It is not for me to judge of the manner in which the Opposition should fight their battles, but I give them my own opinion that in this session they have many times thrown away their chances and failed to produce an effect on the country which they might have produced by shorter and more forcible speeches, instead of the long orations to which they have treated us. But at all events, they are within their right, and supposing they do abuse the patience of hon. members on this side, we had still better trust to the old sound rule of the British Parliament, and put no obstacle in the way of the liberty of any man on the floor of this House or elsewhere. That rule has been in existence from the origin of parliamentary government. True, the British House of Commons has departed from that rule, by introducing in recent years the cloture, but that, as my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Clancy) has stated, was introduced on account of the obstruction which prevented public business being carried on. I hope the day will never come here when we will have to resort to the cloture and abridge the liberty of any man to express his views and even to make silly speeches. I would even go the length of saying that if a man wants to make a silly speech, he is within his rights, and should be let do as he pleases, though he certainly will not improve his own case. My hon. friend who introduced this motion (Mr. Charlton) cited to us the American example. I need hardly tell the House that I was in Washington some time during the past winter, and I must say that the more I saw of the working of the American system, the less I thought of it and the more of ours. I do not think at all that it has conduced to what ought to be the parliamentary system of government, that is to say, debate. You have essays on the floor of Congress and essays in the Senate, delivered one day and answered several days or the following week, by other essays, consigned to the Congressional Record, but that is not debate. Debate ought to be instantaneous—arguments advanced and answered on the moment, and, for my part, I think we should endeavour to get back to that, although we have, at times, departed widely from it. The long speeches we have heard tend to create what is undoubtedly an evil and at this moment a growing evil. Still, I do not, for my own part, favour the law my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) proposes. I trust to the common sense of this House. These long speeches will not continue after an expression on both sides of this House that they are to be condemned and not to be tolerated. The courtesy we owe to each other has been no obstacle to long speeches; but, if they are persisted in, no doubt there will grow such expressions of impatience that speeches will hereafter be restrained as to length. There may be, perhaps, something to say with regard to "Hansard." I do not, for my part, wish to abolish "Hansard." We adopted it long ago. It is not, perhaps, an unmixed blessing, but, on the whole, it serves a good purpose. There is no doubt that if the Debates Committee would find a rule to shorten the reports of the long speeches which are delivered at certain hours of the night and by which, I think, the public is not at all instructed, a good deal of the discussion we have on the floor of this House could be very well omitted from the pages of "Hansard." I offer no definite suggestion as to that at this moment; but I would invite the consideration of the Debates Committee to this question, to see whether it is not a possible thing in some way to reduce the size of the volume which generally constitutes the largest part of the literature of the session. Perhaps, with some ingenuity, they might find a rule which would be acceptable to both sides of the House. But I desire to say to my hon. friend from North Norfolk that, while I occupy the position I do, I do not wish to put any restraints upon the privileges of the Opposition. There are not many of them now, so we can afford to be generous to them. Perhaps they hope to make up by speeches what they lack in numbers. They are free to do so, as far as I am concerned, and I do not wish to curtail their liberty. So, I hope my hon. friend, having called the attention of the House to this subject, which, undoubtedly, is one requiring attention, will be satisfied with the advantage he has obtained and will not press his motion further.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picou). The right hon. gentleman in his observations, with which, in large part, I agree, animadverted upon the time the Opposition have taken and the length of speeches made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. But, I suppose, in his desire to give an example of brevity in the debate, he had not time to even suggest the very reasonable excuse for many of these long speeches. I suppose no Opposition, either in this House or in the English House of Commons, was ever confronted with such a series of broken promises of the Government as this Opposition has to consider. I regret to say that, industrious as the Opposition has been, and long as the speeches have been on that subject of broken pledges, the subject has been by no means exhausted; and it will be necessary, I fear, if our privileges last a little longer, to go into these "Hansards"—which are awkward records at times—and in performing that duty on our side of the House, I am afraid we shall be obliged to err, if it is erring, by referring to these numerous and badly broken pledges. Even the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who has charge of this resolution, I think, must have felt a little guilty and conscience-stricken in regard to the subject of by-gone speeches. Whether long or short, certainly he has no desire to have these speeches quoted to show what he said about unrestricted reciprocity, the terrible growth of the public debt and other subjects of that kind. Again, while the hon. gentleman who has charge of the resolution, seems now to think that debates should be shortened and speeches reduced, he did not touch another question in connection with which he has had a rather remarkable and really, apparently, successful career. If the hon. gentleman has not offended in the length of speeches he has made, he has certainly shown wonderful pertinacity in making the same old speech, session after session, on the subject, for instance, of the criminal law. And though he has seen his bantling Bills voted down session after session, when the Conservatives were in power, just as he has since the Liberals obtained office, strange to say, by his pertinacity, he has, I will not say smuggled, that would not be right, but put his Bill through so far that it now stands for third reading. I call that to the attention of the Government, by the way. I wish to add my feeble voice to the support of the position taken by the leader of the House in regard to this proposition. There is a suggestion in the motion under consideration that we could certainly not be expected to pronounce upon since the discussion has taken place. The hon. gentleman himself has not given us ground to resolve "that it is exceeding expedient that rules be adopted limiting the length of speeches" and so on, because he is coming very dangerously near to one of the objections that, in the debates in the English House have proved fatal to any proposition like this. There is a speech made by Peel when a proposition such as the hon. gentleman now brings here was voted down by an overwhelming majority. In that speech, in addition to taking the ground the right hon. Prime Minister takes, he pointed out a practical difficulty in connection with such a rule in the carrying on of a Parliament such as the English Parliament or ours. Suppose you limit the speeches to an hour, and an hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches who is most noted for brevity and terseness, has to explain some great questions—say the result of the negotiations in Washington—he cannot explain the position and expound the policy of the Government completely and satisfactorily in an hour. Then, you are face to face with this difficulty—that if the Ministers cannot be bound down it would be absurd to bind down certain members in the Opposition or in the House generally. All must be bound or none. And Sir Robert Peel, while hoping that the good sense and judgment of the House would bring about a change, pointed out the practical difficulties of working out our system of Government and maintaining our free Parliament under such drastic rules. Then, I may mention that in Sir John Bourinot's work, where he refers to that debate in the British House when the subject was thrashed out and the proposition overwhelmingly voted down, he tells us also of similar attempts made in the old parliaments of Canada. Rules were passed in the direction here proposed, but they would not work and had to be repealed. It was found impossible to work free institutions like ours or a parliamentary system like ours under such rules. I trust that the hon. mover of the resolution will accept the advice of the Prime Minister, and leave the subject in the position in which it now stands, with the expression of opinions from members of the House that they would like hon. gentlemen to be as brief as possible in their remarks.

Mr. J. CHARLTON (North Norfolk). I suppose I may be permitted a word in reply to some of the remarks made. Of course, the expressed desire of the leader of the House will be my law in this matter. I shall not consider the debate entirely fruitless, although the object I had in view of having the matter referred to a committee is not obtained. I think the debate will have good results, and the expression of opinion from both sides of the House warrant me in that expectation.

There has been a treatment of this question, Mr. Speaker, that, in my opinion, is hardly justified by the character of the resolution. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken adversely to this resolution have considered it as if they were combatting rules that were proposed. Now no rule was proposed. For instance, my hon. friend who spoke last, asserted that an hour was too short a time for the leader of the Government on any great question, for the Minister of Finance in making his Budget speech, or for the leader of the Government in discussing the negotiations at Washington. I have proposed no hour limitation, I proposed no limitation whatever. The resolution proposed that a committee shall consider this question and make recommendations. If I were consulted about this matter, I never would recommend a limitation to one hour, or even to two hours, in the presentation of a subject by a member of the Government or by the leader of the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman failed to catch my point. I am afraid, in my desire to speak briefly, I did not put the subject as plainly as I should have done. The point was that it led to discrimination which the good sense and fairness of members would not stand for a long time. For instance, he proposed that a member of the Government should be allowed a long time, while other members of Parliament were to be cut short. That was the point of Sir Robert Peel's remark, that when you made discrimination, you were threatened with grave difficulty.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman makes a pure assumption. What does he know, or what do I know, what recommendation a committee might make under this resolution? He is assuming that discrimination would be made, that the limitations of debate would be oppressive, and so forth. No such assumption is warranted. All that this resolution asks for is that this question be referred to a special committee to consider the matter, and, if so disposed, to make a recommendation. If the committee had been struck and if that recommendation had been made, after deliberation, and if that recommendation were before this House for discussion, then the line of argument adopted by my hon. friend would have been pertinent to the case. But no such circumstances exist, no recommendations are before the House, but only the bald proposition that this matter with reference to the conduct of debate should be referred to a special committee who would be directed by the House to take the matter under consideration and report, if they choose, a recommendation to the House. They would not even be compelled to make a recommendation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Clause 2 says: "That it is expedient that rules be adopted limiting the length of speeches."

Mr. CHARLTON. Very true, and when the committee is struck it may make such recommendations to the House. But the committee has no instructions from the House as to the character of the recommendations it shall make, it has no instructions to make any recommendations at all as to what the rules shall be. No doubt it would be an easy thing, even from the standpoint of my hon. friend, for the committee to make recommendations, for instance, with regard to the matter the Premier alluded to, about loading up the "Hansard" with irrelevant matter late at night, or at other times. That is a matter that would properly come under the special consideration of the House, more properly than under the consideration of the "Hansard" Committee, because this special committee would be specially delegated by the House to consider these questions, and would have referred to it the consideration of matters, this among others, which would properly come under its jurisdiction, and which do not properly come under the jurisdiction of the "Hansard" Committee. Of course I bow to the desire of the Premier without hesitation, and without regret, I may say, because I think the discussion has done good.

I have just one word, however, to say to my hon. friend who spoke last, about the ill-course I have pursued, the bad taste I have evinced in my persistence in advocating certain measures. Well, Sir, I would never call upon a committee of this House to forbid any member of this House from advocating from year to year, to the utmost of his ability, any measure that he believes essential to the welfare of his fellow-beings; and if I have advocated in this House an amendment to the Criminal Code, and have been guilty of the audacity of getting an amendment to that Code smuggled through so far as to have it stand for its third reading, I have no apology to make to the hon. gentleman, or to any member of this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I complimented the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHARLTON. A Bill was first introduced amid odium and obloquy, but by pursuing a persistent course from year to year, finally a law has been put upon the Statute-book, and if my hon. friend will pursue that same course persistently in Opposition, and will confine himself assiduously and conscientiously to the truth and to the dictates of his own conscience, as I did, he probably will make some progress. But he needs to be careful about the truth and the conscientious motives that actuate him, for I am afraid that sometimes they may not possibly occupy a paramount and uppermost place in his mind in his treatment of public questions.

Mr. HUGHES. He must cultivate self-righteousness.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, self-righteousness is not a necessary quality; a strong sense of duty does not necessarily involve a charge that a man is self-righteous. We are all sinners, very great sinners on both sides of this House. It is not necessary to claim that we are righteous above our fellow-men; but if a man has strong convictions, he is a coward if he does not press those convictions upon his fellow-citizens and his fellow-members of the House, whether he is self-righteous or not. If he has convictions, and believes that a certain line of legislation, or a certain line of conduct is in the interest of his fellow-men, and if he promotes them on that line in the face of obloquy, sneers and innuendos, such as my hon. friend throws across the floor of this House, he has the courage of his convictions, and is worthy of something better than innuendos and slurs, Mr. Speaker, in conformity with the desire of the Premier. I beg to withdraw the resolution that stands in my name.

Motion withdrawn.

A CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar) moved:

That it is conceded that the settlement and development of the region west of Lake Superior are essential to the prosperity and well-being of Canada, and

That the best facilities of communication and transportation, and more especially the lowest feasible scale of railway transportation charges are indispensable to the success of the western settlers, and

That, in recognition of these facts, the Parliament of Canada has provided aid in cash, land, constructed railway, and in other forms, to a very large amount, in order that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company might be able to furnish transportation to the western settlers at rates which need be calculated to produce little beyond the cost of operation and maintenance, and

That the following provision is embodied in the Act incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway Company:—(20) The limit to the reduction of tolls by the Parliament of Canada provided for by the eleventh subsection of the seventeenth section of "The Consolidated Railway Act, 1879," respecting tolls, is hereby extended, so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than ten per cent per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, instead of not less than fifteen per cent per annum profit, as provided by the said subsection: and so also, that such reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the company ascertained as described in said subsection shall have exceeded ten per cent per annum, instead of fifteen per cent per annum, as provided by the said subsection. And the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing the tolls of the company as provided by the tenth subsection of the said section seventeen is hereby limited to the same extent with relation to the profit of the company and to its net revenue, as that to which the power of Parliament to reduce tolls is limited by said subsection eleven as hereby amended, and

That there seems to be no well-defined understanding as to whether the gifts and grants aforementioned were not to be considered as a part of the "capital expended on the construction of the road," and

That there seems not to have been any method or process provided or indicated by the Charter Act for determining the actual amount of the "capital expended in the construction of the road," and

That there is reason to believe that the present tolls levied by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on its western traffic at least are excessive, and

That there is reason to believe that the present revenues of the company from its main line traffic, and from that of its western branches in Canada, do now, after deducting all proper charges, pay much in excess of ten per cent on the amount of the "capital actually expended in the construction of the railway;"

That this House, for the reasons set forth in the foregoing paragraphs, do appoint a commission for the purpose of inquiring into and determining:

(a) The cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's main line and the equipment thereof;

(b) The cost of all branch lines constructed and at present owned and operated by the company in Canada;

(c) The cost of all lines acquired by purchase and at present owned and operated by the company in Canada;

(d) The cost of all lines at present owned and operated by the company in the United States of America;

(e) The rentals or other consideration paid for all lines leased and operated by the company in Canada;

(f) The rental or other consideration paid by the company for all lines operated by it or operated subject to its control in the United States of America;

(g) The revenues and expenditures of each of these railways as aforementioned, in separate form in so far as such separation of accounts is feasible; the percentage of the profit and net income of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in each year of its operation of the road, to the "capital actually expended in construction," as set forth in section 20 of Schedule A, in chap. 1, 44 Vict.

That this commission be given power to examine witnesses under oath, to demand production of books of account or correspondence, and of all documents relating to the subject matter of this resolution.

He said: After listening to the debate which has just concluded, I would not like to be guilty of the bad taste of detaining the House at any great length in connection with this motion. A few days ago when the question of the appointment of a railway commission was before the House, I took the ground that such a commission would fail very largely of its object because of the existence of a clause in the Act incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway which would exclude such a commission from any control of the rates on that road. That clause, as you know, provides that until the company has earned 10 per cent upon the capital actually expended in the railway it will be impossible for the Government to attempt any control of the rates. You, Sir, probably are aware that the Government does exercise, or is supposed to exercise, or at least has power under the statute to exercise, control of the rates of all railway lines in the Dominion. I am not prepared to say that up to the present time the Government has exercised to any extent that control; I am disposed to think that the railway companies charge pretty much what rates they choose. But until we get rid of that clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter, it seems to me that the appointment of a railway commission will be largely futile as without control of Canadian Pacific Railway rates there would be little public advantage in controlling the rates upon the other lines.

Now, it might be presumed, that, in presenting a motion of this kind, I may be actuated by malice or hostility towards the Canadian Pacific Railway. I wish to distinctly disclaim any such feeling. I have the warmest admiration for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for the manner in which it is managed. I have the greatest admiration for the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They conduct that great trans-continental road in accordance with the very best methods, and in a manner which reflects credit both upon themselves and upon the Dominion of Canada. At the outset, I wish to make that statement, in order that the action which I am taking may not be misunderstood. It seems to me, that representatives of the country have a clear duty to perform to the people they represent regardless of the interests of railway companies. In connection with this matter I find it is necessary to make a statement as to the facts of the position that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company occupies, in order that hon. members may realize the importance of the movement which I propose.

The Canadian Pacific Syndicate was formed in 1880. It obtained from the Dominion Government a contract to build, equip and operate a railway westward from Callander on the east side of Lake Nipissing, about 350 miles west of Montreal. The route traversed by this line is 2,500 miles long, through a country presenting in many places stupendous engineering difficulties. The cost of the construction of this line was put, according to the company's own estimate, at $83,500,000, and the equipment $8,000,000; in all, $91,500,000. This may seem a somewhat astonishing undertaking for a company with a nominal capital of $5,000,000. But our astonishment is sensibly diminished, or rather, is turned in another direction, when we examine the provisions of the contract of the syndicate with the Government. The Government gave to the company: 1. Completed railway to the value of $35,000,000; 2. $25,000,000 in cash; 3. 25,000,000 acres of selected lands in Manitoba and the North-west; 4. The privilege of importing rails and other supplies free of duty; 5. Exemption from taxation for an indefinite period, but not less than twenty years; 6. A monopoly of the traffic of the North-west, the Government to bind itself not to permit the construction of railways from the Canadian Pacific Railway southward to the boundary.

Mr. RICHARDSON.

The Canadian Pacific Syndicate, therefore, received in hard cash and its equivalent $60,000,000, besides the 25,000,000 acres of land. Now, the value of these lands may be gathered from the record of the actual proceeds of the sales thereof. When asking the Canadian Government for a loan of $30,000,000 in January, 1884, Mr. Stephen—now Lord Mount Stephen—said: "The value of the land subsidy may be exemplified by the result of the realization of the portion already sold, which has produced a net return of $2.36 per acre." At that time about 4,000,000 acres had been sold. This figure, $2.36 per acre, was the lowest average price at which any of the lands were sold. The average price obtained kept steadily increasing. In his report of 1892, President Van Horne says, that the sales of Canadian Pacific Railway lands in 1891 realized an average price per acre of $4.05, as against $3.76 in 1890. It would be very reasonable to assume that the value of the land grant would be at least $3 per acre. The total subsidy given by Canada for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would, on this very moderate basis of calculation, therefore be:

|                                    |               |
|------------------------------------|---------------|
| Constructed railway .....          | $35,000,000  |
| Cash .....                         | 25,000,000    |
| Land grant (25,000,000 acres)..... | 75,000,000    |
|                                    | $135,000,000 |

This for a railway whose construction and equipment was estimated to cost $91,500,000. But, besides these enormous direct gifts, the Government also gave the company power to raise further sums by the issue of stock and bonds. Let us see how this power was used, and how it resulted for the people. The first issue of stock was $20,000,000. This was all allotted to, or taken up by, the promoters, at 25 per cent of its par value, and realized $5,000,000. All of this first issue of stock was issued to members of the Canadian Pacific Syndicate, prominent among whom were Mr. George Stephen—now Lord Mount Stephen—and Mr. Donald Smith—now Lord Strathcona. This is on record in the Sessional Papers of the Canadian Parliament, No. 31, vol. 9, 1884. The proceeds of this issue of stock was used by the allottees mainly to pay themselves dividends at the rate of 6 per cent on the stock they already held. Whilst nearly all this money went back into the pockets of the patriotic promoters, and little or none of it into the railway, the road was saddled with an additional debt to these gentlemen of $20,000,000. There was another issue of stock to the amount of $30,000,000 in 1883, which realized $15,281,754. Thus, out of $50,000,000 worth of stock which stands as a liability against the railway, only $20,281,754 actually was realized. This stock was held mainly by the promoters, and they paid themselves dividends at the rate of 6 per cent on its par value before the road was completed or was earning expenses. They paid these dividends out of capital, and, as a matter of fact, within five years the holders of this stock had received in dividends, which the road had never earned, 20 per cent more than they had ever put into the undertaking. Besides this, the stock which they had bought at 25 cents on the dollar, was selling at 90 at the end of five years, and it has now passed the par mark, because of the high dividends that had been already paid out of capital, and the reservation of $24,500,000 raised by the issue of guaranteed bonds, for the purpose of guaranteeing future dividends. This $24,500,000, it is needless to say, should have gone into the road itself. Thus, the funds raised from the issue of stock were devoted principally to paying back dividends to the holders of that stock and not to building the railway, which, as a matter of fact, was all built out of the subsidies and largesse of the Canadian public. This system of financial manipulation served a double purpose for the syndicate. It enabled them to repay themselves all that they had put into the enterprise, with a handsome profit added, and it further increased the value of the stock which they thus held at a cost of nothing at all to them, to a figure so high that it is not surprising that many of them are millionaires and some of them peers. Thus, it comes about that the proceeds of over $60,000,000 of stock, which stands as a present liability of the railway, never went into its construction at all, but was manipulated for stock-jobbing purposes by the syndicate to enrich themselves before the road was completed.

Mr. HUGHES. Would the hon. gentleman tell us what that is taken from ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. In order to prove that statement, Mr Speaker, will you allow me to quote from a table which appears in the Sessional Papers, Returns, September 9th, 1884, showing what these people actually realized.

Mr. HUGHES. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him—

Mr. RICHARDSON. This statement shows the number of shares allotted, the face value of these shares, the amount paid by the persons to whom these shares were allotted, and the amount realized by them as dividends in five years. The statement is as follows :—

| Name.                     | Number of Shares. | Face Value. | Amount paid for Stock. | Aggregate Dividends in Five Years. |
|---------------------------|-------------------|-------------|------------------------|------------------------------------|

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read that table—

Mr. HUGHES. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have read the table—

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Hughes) rises to a point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. Have I the right to ask the hon. member (Mr. Richardson) a question. He has the right to deny it, but I have the right to ask the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) what paper he was quoting from.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. HAGGART. He says it is from a return

Mr. HUGHES. I did not hear that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I quoted that table from the sessional papers, being a return made to this House to show the House exactly the amount of money these people made out of this stock. The company, as you know, is stocked for $65,000,000, and not more than probably one-fourth at the most of that money was actually raised, and most of it was retained for the purpose of paying these enormous dividends to the stockholders. The object I have in view is to have a commission of experts appointed who shall go into the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the very outset, ascertain exactly the amount of money that was expended in the construction of this railway, and let the country know it, in order that it may be determined whether the Government can secure control of the rates on that road, for if the earnings can be shown to pay ten per cent upon the amount which the company actually expended on its own account, irrespective of public subsidies, and enhanced cost, then the

Mr. RICHARDSON.

Government has power to control the rates. As I have stated, there is a clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter which says that until this company has earned 10 per cent on the capital actually expended in construction, the Government shall not exercise any control over their tolls. As I have pointed out, the country has given the Canadian Pacific Railway, in cash, completed railway and lands, an amount aggregating some $135,000,000, and I think it will be within the judgment of reasonable men that at least that amount should be deducted from the cost of the railway. The House probably knows that the cost was enormously enhanced by the adoption of methods very well known in the United States—the formation of a construction company. In the west, the syndicate formed what is known as the North American Construction Company, and they let to themselves contracts for the construction of that railroad, and in that manner the cost that is represented to the country is very much greater than we believe the actual cost should be. The object I have in view is that a commission of experts shall be appointed to ascertain the actual cost of that railway, not the nominal cost which is represented by the company to be $41,000,000 approximately, so that we may know, dollar for dollar, what that road cost. When you take into consideration the fact that the net earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway last year exceeded $10,000,000, I believe that if we deduct the amount the country gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway in subsidies, and the amount over and above the actual cost, it will be found to pay infinitely more than 10 per cent on the actual cost, and then the Government would have control of these rates, and thus a railway commission might be of some real service to this country. In order that the House may not be asked to take my word for this matter, I want to read two or three brief extracts from a speech delivered by—probably after the right hon. leader of the House, one of the noblest Liberals that has existed in Canada since confederation; I refer to the Hon. Edward Blake. I do not think that any one in Canada, at least will deny his ability. When the company was applying to Parliament for a loan of some $30,000,000, the Hon. Edward Blake made a speech to this House on June 17th, 1885, and I would commend a perusal of that speech to every member of this House. It is one of the most exhaustive, one of the ablest and clearest speeches ever delivered in the Canadian Parliament. It would be well worth the while of every member to read that speech, and to ascertain for himself exactly what favours we conferred upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Hon. Mr. Blake said :

With the great aids that we gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the enormous advantages which we gave it, had prudence marked the course of hon. gentlemen opposite and the course of the company, its capital account ought to have been insignificant to-day, it ought to have been able to transact business at the lowest rates by far of any company at all similarly circumstanced geographically and climatically, and it ought to have transacted it more profitably, because, its capital account being so small, a very small margin of profit for handling would have realized a very large dividend. But, at present, you have an enormously inflated capital account, you have a road built so fast that even the centre is not developed so as to sustain itself, so fast that the ends must depend wholly on the weak centre—for it is weak to-day—for their sustenance, and thus the great prospects which, had prudence reigned in the management of this business, would have been assured to the company, have been marred, those bright skies have been obscured, and we are face to face with a condition of things very different indeed from what we might once have hoped.

A few pages further on Mr. Blake spoke as follows :—

No road in the United States, not one of the Pacific roads, was given a money gift ; not a single Pacific road was given a money subsidy. Two of these roads were loaned bonds ; the bonds were not given to them ; it was a loan of the credit of the country to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific, and it aggregated somewhere about $60,000,000 of bonds, for which a first mortgage was afterwards made a second mortgage to ease the financial operations of the company. So that I say no road was given a present of money. Our road has been given a present of money and of works, which were built by the Government, and are therefore equivalent to money, according to my calculation, amounting to something like $58,500,000.

That, I think, is exclusive of the land grant. Later on Mr. Blake spoke as follows :—

The Government builds and hands over to them 641 miles of the main line, besides the Pembina branch, the probable cost of which I estimated, before the hon. acting Minister of Railways made his statement, at $30,000,000. He says now $29,500,000. I dare say we shall entirely agree by next session, but I will leave it now at $30,000,000, because, I am sorry to say, half a million more or less in the figures I am about to deal with is of very little consequence. The Government surveys cost $3,500,000 about, really, I believe, $3,440,000. The Government subsidy in cash was $25,000,000. The Government provision of lands and powers has already realized to the company about $11,000,000 in cash, under the operation of the land grant bonds system, the sale of town sites, and so on. That makes a total of cash or its equivalent of $69,- 500,000, besides which there are 20,000,000 acres of land, because I throw off acres, 1,400,000 of which, with the $2,060,000 now due for land sales, to meet the outstanding $3,600,000 of land grant bonds in the hands of the public. Throwing this off, the proceeds of land sales yet to be collected, and this fourteen hundred thousand acres of land to which I refer, give you a net 20,000,000 acres of free lands. So there were $69,500,000 in cash aids, and 20,000,000 acres of land. If you value that at a dollar, you get the public aids, not loans, but gifts, of $89,500,000. If you value that at two dollars, which hon. gentlemen opposite and the company in their report of the day before yesterday value it at, you get public aids of $109,500,000. There is the condition of things. Remember these are not loans, these are gifts. Besides that, there were those monopolies, those exemptions, and those privileges to which I have referred more than once, which are of enormous value to the country are still of greater disadvantage to the country. The sternness with which they are clung to shows their value to the country, and shows their injury to the country. Throw them in at what you please, you find the aids in cash or its equivalent and in land, according as you value the latter at $1 or $2 an acre, amount to either $89,500,000 or $109,500,000 given by the company. Now, add the loan of 1884. They amount to $29,810,000. Then you have gifts, as before, $69,500,000 ; loans, $29,810,000, or a total of cash aids of $99,310,000. Then add the 20,000,000 of acres, and if you value the lands at $1, you have $119,310,000, or if you value them at $2, it gives you a total of gifts and loans, a total of aids of $139,310,000. And the cost of the whole line, the Government and the company's sections, according to their own estimate, was $83,500,000, and the equipment $3,000,000, making a total of $91,500,000 ; and it is to be the property of the company, and the company and the Government both declare that it is going to pay from the day it is opened. * * * So the prospects of the company as a paying road are of the brightest description, and, as I have shown, we have given them the means, and far more than the means, to build that paying road. Well, then, the hon. First Minister gave a reason for the faith that was in him the other day, for he told us the road could carry freight at one-fourth the cost of other roads, and a road that can do that will certainly be a highly paying road.

So you see, we had, according to Mr. Blake, the declaration of the First Minister, who, I presume was at that time Sir John Macdonald, that the road would be able to pay and charge tolls about one-fourth the rates charged by other railway companies. Now, let us see what kind of rates it has been charging. I have some quotations with regard to these rates, and, if you will permit me, I will just give you one brief extract. Such an agitation was raised in the west with regard to the excessive rates which the company charged, that the late Government felt bound to appoint a commission to inquire into the rates in order to allay the agitation. That was some years ago, and here is a brief epitome of the case that was presented to that commission by the Manitoba Government and the Winnipeg Board of Trade. The Winnipeg Board of Trade, of course, is a non-political body, and it merely presented the figures as it found them. This statement was issued by the Board of Trade and reproduced by Mr. Willison, the editor of the "Globe," in a pamphlet on the transportation question. Of course, I may say that the rates have been considerably reduced since that time—it would not be fair for me to give the statement without making that explanation to the House, but it proves my case as to the utter fallacy of Sir John Macdonald's contention that the Canadian Pacific Railway should and would, owing to the enormous subsidies received, carry freights for one-fourth the tolls charged by other roads. The statement is as follows:—

Through grain rate, all rail, from Winnipeg to Toronto, per C.P.R., 1,288 miles, per 100 miles, in car lots, 45 cents, per bushel 27 cents; from Sarnia to Fredericton, N.B., per G.T.R., 1,218 miles, per 100 lbs., in car lots, 26½ cents, per bushel, 15 9-10 cents. By C.P.R. from Pilot Mound to Montreal, 1,548 miles, 47 cents per 100 lbs., and 28½ cents a bushel; Brandon to Montreal, 1,556 miles, and Minnedosa to Montreal, 1,557 miles, same rate; Chicago to Fredericton, by G.T.R., Intercolonial and Canada Eastern, 1,548 miles, 35 cents per 100 lbs., and 21 cents a bushel. By C.P.R., from Boissevain to Montreal, 1,605 miles, the rate was 48 cents per 100 lbs., and 28½ cents per bushel. From Melita to Montreal, 1,613 miles, 49 cents per 100 lbs., and 29½ cents per bushel. By the Sault line, C.P.R., and New York Central, from Minneapolis to New York, 1,600 miles, 35 cents per 100 lbs., and 21 cents per bushel. From Winnipeg to Halifax, by C.P.R., 62½ cents per 100 lbs., and 37½ cents per bushel; from St. Paul to Halifax, via Chicago, 45 cents per 100 lbs., and 27 cents a bushel. By C.P.R., from Calgary to Port Arthur, 1,264 miles, 29 cents per 100 lbs., and 17½ cents per bushel; from Winnipeg to Toronto, 1,288 miles, 45 cents per 100 lbs., and 27 cents per bushel. The low grain rate from Calgary was attributed to the fact that little or no grain is shipped from that point. From Virden to Fort William, less than half the distance, the charge was 21 cents per 100 lbs. Freight rates on "through" merchandise, all rail, from Fort William to Winnipeg, by C.P.R., 427 miles, on the five classes of freight, were 92, 79, 65, 65 and 47 cents per 100 lbs. From Chicago to Stratford, by Chicago and Grand Trunk, 416 miles, 42½, 37½, 27½, 20 and 17½ cents per 100 lbs. From Fort William to Carman or Portage la Prairie, by C.P.R., 481 and 480 miles, the rates were $1.25, $1.05, 85, 69 and 59 cents per 100 lbs.; from Chicago to Hamilton, by Chicago and Grand Trunk, 472 miles, 42½, 37½, 27½, 20 and 17½ cents per 100 lbs. From Fort William to Boissevain, Virden and Birtle, by C.P.R., 604 to 617 miles, the rates were $1.51, $1.27, $1.02, 81 and 69 cents per 100 lbs.; from Chicago to Kingston, by Chicago and Grand Trunk, 668 miles, 72, 62½, 48, 33½ and 29 cents per 100 lbs. The rates from Fort William to Medicine Hat, by C.P.R., 1,084 miles, were $2.42, $2.01, $1.61, $1.21 and $1.10; from Toronto to Halifax, by C.P.R. (Ontario Division), and G.T.R., 1,094 miles, 86, 75, 65, 54 and 43 cents per 100 lbs. Freight rates on "through" merchandise by lake and rail from Montreal to Fort William, 466 miles, by C.P.R. to Owen Sound, and 800 miles by lake, were 51, 44, 38, 31 and 25 cents per 100 lbs.; from Fort William to Winnipeg, 427 miles, by rail, 92, 79, 65, 56 and 47 cents per 100 lbs. The rate between New York and Fort William, by Brockville or Prescott, 758 miles by rail to Owen Sound, and 800 by water, was the same as that between Montreal and Fort William on classes 1 and 2, and lower on classes 3, 4 and 5.

Mr. RICHARDSON.

So that you will see we did not receive the inestimable boom of low freight rates, which was promised by the late Sir John Macdonald, when Prime Minister, when he told us the rates ought not to be more than one quarter the charges on other railways. I have explained to the House that those are the rates which prevailed some years ago when there was such an agitation going on. Let me now quote the rates that prevail at present, or at least that did two or three months ago, when I secured the respective tariffs from which I quote. The Canadian Pacific Railway, while bonused to a very large extent by the Dominion, has constructed a line south of Lake Superior through Michigan and Minnesota, known as the Soo route, and they carry freights for the American people at rates just one-half what they charge Canadians, notwithstanding the fact that the people of Canada gave them practically sufficient assistance to build the entire road. The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg is the same as that from New York to Minneapolis, and here is the latest Canadian Pacific Railway tariff for these respective hauls:

|                | Montreal toWinnipegvia C. P. R. | Minneapolis toNew Yorkvia M., St.P. & Ste. M.and N. Y.Central. |
|----------------|---|--|
| 1st class..... | $1.98                                  | $1.05   |
| 2nd class..... | 1.70                                    | .91  |
| 3rd class..... | 1.35                                    | .70  |
| 4th class..... | 1.05                                    | .49  |
| 5th class..... | .88                                     | .42  |

When the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was passing through the North-west a few months ago, he made a speech in which he referred to the great debt of gratitude that the people of Canada owe the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think, Sir, that the figures I have quoted will abundantly satisfy this House and country as to the real nature of the "debt" we owe to this "national highway."

Let me speak for a moment with regard to the land gift to that company. According to its charter, that is exempt from taxation for twenty years, and how do you suppose they act? Although they select their lands, they do not ask the Government for a patent until they have made a sale of them to intending settlers, and in that way pay no taxes whatever on their land grant, which, of course, becomes enormously benefited by the industry of the settlers in the surrounding country. The exemption from taxation is therefore perpetual. As you know, vacant lands are greatly increased in value by the improvements made by settlers on the adjoining properties, and in that way these unsettled lands are a great burden on the municipalities of the west, and it is my belief that some action should be taken by the Government to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to pay taxes on its land grant.

I shall not detain the House any longer at this hour, but would urge, in conclusion, the appointment of this commission. In my belief, no more important question has been discussed during the present session. The transportation question is one which cannot fall to force itself upon the attention of the Government and the country. It is more important to the people to have cheap freight rates than a low tariff, and that is why I urge on the Government the appointment of a commission to ascertain the exact cost of this railway. Surely it is a reasonable proposition. If the country has presented such enormous gifts to this company, as it has, surely it is only fair that the company should deal fairly by the country. I am not here to say that any other set of men would have acted differently from those who control the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the responsibility rests with the Parliament and the Government, and the appointment of this commission would, I believe, lead to the amelioration of the position of the people of this country and especially the settlers of the west, and to a much better understanding between the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Government and the country generally.

Mr. F. OLIVER (Alberta). I would be very willing to see the scope of the proposed commission extended so as to authorize it to inquire into the working of all the railroads in the country. It is no longer believed to be the railway companies who pay the interest on the cost of their construction or on the bonds issued by them. It is known to be the producers of this country who do so by means of the freight rates imposed upon them. The country may have been a good while coming to that conclusion, but I think it has reached it now; and having reached that conclusion, there has arisen a general inquiry as to what the railways really did cost and what amount of tribute they are entitled to levy on the people. That question is now exciting the public mind, and it is that which has caused the agitation for the establishment of a railway commission to regulate the rates; but unless we empower that commission to take into consideration, in the first place, the question of the cost of each road, we will be beginning at the wrong end and will achieve no satisfactory result. The first thing to find out is how much of the alleged cost of the railways or how much of the capital represented by them is the country required, by either legal or moral obligation, to pay the interest on. When that is decided, then we shall have the ground clear for an effective railway commission and an effective control of railway rates, but until that is decided we shall be working in the dark and unable to come to any definite or successful conclusion. We want to know what the railroads did cost, even though we cannot control the rates according to the actual cost; because if we cannot exercise this control in regard to railroads already constructed, we can exercise it in regard to railroads to be constructed. This country is not finished yet. There is a great deal of room in Canada for development and for railroad building; and if there has been any mistake or oversight in regard to railroad construction in this country in the past, it is our business, as representatives of the people, to do our part to prevent such mistakes in the future, to use the experience we have and all the information we can obtain to prevent like errors being made in the future. If we cannot save what is gone, at least we can provide for what is to come.

The motion rectifies its purpose very fully, and the idea applies, as I say, not only to the Canadian Pacific Railway but to every railway that is and that is to be. I cannot impress upon the House too strongly the importance of this railroad question in relation to the future development of Canada. I notice that it is held by many people in this part of the country to be a question that concerns only the west, or to be essentially a western question. I am ready to admit that the nearer you are to the seaboard the less the question of railway transportation interests you, and the further you get from the seaboard, the more it interests you. On the Atlantic coast, that which is hardly a matter of interesting conversation, becomes in the province of Ontario quite an important subject, and in the western territories a vital question. It is vital to the western part of the country in that, if they do not get a reasonable rate on their exports, that part of the country cannot flourish. But the eastern part of Canada is interested in western railroad rates in this way—if western Canada cannot flourish, eastern Canada cannot be built up as it would be built up by the growth of the western country. If western Canada cannot profitably export her products of grain and cattle, she cannot furnish a market for the commercial houses and manufactories of eastern Canada, which is the only hope of expansion in eastern Canada. At the present time, the railroad rates cripple western Canada in the exportation of her products, and also cripple eastern Canada in reaching western Canada with her manufactures and articles of merchandise. The distance between the manufacturing cities of eastern Canada and the western plains and British Columbia is greater than the distance from certain manufacturing centres in the United States. As was said a few moments ago by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), the people of the United States get better rates into and out of and through Canada over our own railroad, as we might call it, than Canadians do. Therefore, the manufacturers of Chicago and St. Paul are in a position to reach the market of the Canadian North-west at a greater advantage than those of Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal; and to-day, as a matter of fact, not by any means so much by the superiority of their manufactures as by advantage of freight rates, they are, in spite of the protective or revenue tariff duties that may be levied, taking trade in the North-west that would belong to eastern Canada if eastern Canada had a lower freight rate between the manufacturing centres here and the prairies there.

It will be said that the people of Canada are not entitled to as good rates on the railroads as the people of the United States, as they have not so much traffic over their roads. But to balance that, the people of Canada built these roads, whereas the people of the United States did not spend a dollar towards them, but are given better rates over them. We claim that our contributions towards the construction of these railroads were made for the very purpose of balancing lack of traffic so that we should get a cheap rate of freight necessary for the development of both eastern and western Canada.

It cannot be too strongly impressed on the great mass of the people of this country, who control the great bulk of the representation in this House, that this is not alone a western matter but an eastern matter. If our fields cannot be made productive by reason of the heavy railroad rates, neither can the volume of trade of the manufactories and wholesale houses of the east be increased, by reason of those rates. You are cut out by reason of the proximity of the manufacturing centres of the United States. This is a matter of vital importance to the manufacturers of eastern Canada as it is to the farmers and stock raisers of the western prairies.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of too much importance to be discussed in the absence of the Minister of Railways and Canals. I therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

J. Leslie, of Leslie, Hart & Co., Halifax, N.S.—(Mr. Pope.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 9th May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 112) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Lemieux.)

88½

Bill (No. 113) to incorporate the Canada Mining and Metallurgical Company, Limited.—(Mr. Copp.)

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

Mr. BRITTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 114) to amend the Act respecting Joint Stock Companies. He said: The Bill shortly is this: The tendency of present legislation is to enlarge somewhat the power of incorporated companies to invest their money in the stock of other companies. During last session, a good many Acts were passed which very much enlarged the power of incorporated companies, and a good many Bills are now before the House having that object in view. But there is a large number of companies incorporated in the Dominion under the Joint Stock Companies Act, by letters patent. Hon. gentlemen are aware that by a clause in what is called the Companies Clauses Act, any company is prohibited from investing any money in the stock of any other company unless it is authorized by special Act to do so. Now, it is known that there is a very large extension in the growth of transportation companies. That is commanding the attention of the public at present, and nearly all the transportation companies are incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act. This Bill simply proposes to amend section 41 of that Act by allowing any transportation company or dock company to take stock in an elevator company, provided they do not issue bonds or go in debt for the purpose, and provided that the shareholders of the company that proposes to invest in that way, shall confirm the by-law the directors may pass for that purpose. They may confirm by a majority in number and two-thirds in value of the shareholders at any special general meeting of the shareholders called for the purpose. It will be seen that this is the only way that can be done unless the transportation company comes to this House and gets incorporation by special Act. I venture to say that if they were applying to this House for incorporation by special Act, the power now asked would not be refused, and it seems to me better to deal with the matter by an amendment of the general Act where it is so well safeguarded as it is by the section I wish to introduce. It is better to do it in that way than to go through the form of coming to this House and asking for special incorporation. It is confined to dock and transportation companies on the one side and to elevator companies on the other, many of which are at present doing business on the lakes and rivers.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADJOURNMENT FOR ASCENSION DAY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday next, it stand adjourned till Friday next.

Mr. TISDALE. Why not adjourn until Monday, if I may be allowed to make the suggestion? There will be very few members here.

The PRIME MINISTER. There will be members enough, I hope, to advance the business of the session, and to move towards prorogation.

Motion agreed to.

I. C. R. ACCOUNTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) whether he has furnished the House with a specific statement of the amount of receipts and expenditures on what is called the railway extension from Chaudière to Montreal? It appears to me that it would be quite impossible to discuss the question contained in the resolution of my hon. friend, unless we have that data.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have not furnished the House with the statement that the hon. gentleman has referred to, for the very good reason that no such statement can be procured which will be of the slightest value to the House in the discussion. I have conferred with the general manager and with the Deputy Minister upon that subject. I wanted that information for my own purposes before there was an intimation that any hon. gentleman in the House desired it. But I have the assurance of both those officials that it is practically impossible to furnish any statement which will be of any value with respect to the running and operation of any section of the Intercolonial Railway. We do not keep our accounts in sections or divisions, we keep our accounts as a whole; and any statement which I might procure from the officers of the department would be largely a matter of conjecture and estimate, and that is of little value in a discussion of this description.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that this, though operated as part of the Intercolonial Railway, is, at present, a leased road, and, therefore, is in a position, as it appears to me, to make it absolutely necessary to keep the accounts in such a form as to enable one to tell, very closely, at all events, what the expenses are.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The distinction between this railway as a leased road and the rest of the Intercolonial Railway is, that we have to pay the rental when it comes due. Beyond that, there is no other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my hon. friend if the accounts of the Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Baie des Chaleurs road, operated by the Intercolonial Railway, were not kept separately? Is it not the practice of the department to keep such accounts so as to be able to show exactly what the position is?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Baie des Chaleurs Railway was not run in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, or as part of the Intercolonial Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was run by the Intercolonial Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But it was not run as part of it. It was purely an experimental project, and little business was done; and it was a very simple matter to keep accounts of what we received and what we paid out on account of it. But that has not been done in the other cases, and I am advised by the officers of the department, who, I suppose, ought to know, that it is not practicable to do it. It is for that reason that the information is not furnished.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider a certain resolution declaring:

1st. That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to purchase from the Drummond County Railway Company, and to authorize the said company to sell and convey to Her Majesty the whole of the railway and undertaking of the said company, including its main and branch lines of railway, and all buildings, fixtures and appurtenances appertaining thereto, and upon such purchase being effected the said railway and its branch lines shall become and form part of the Intercolonial Railway, and may be operated as such.

2nd. That the purchase is to include all running powers and other rights, privileges and concessions acquired by the said company from any other railway company or companies, and all its franchises and property of whatsoever kind, excepting only the rolling stock and station furniture of the company and the tools of the section men.

3rd. That the said railway and undertaking is to be conveyed to Her Majesty free and clear from all charges, liens or encumbrances affecting the same under or by virtue or in respect of any mortgage, bonds, debentures or preference stocks or other securities, or otherwise howsoever, and the said company shall release Her Majesty of and from all claims and demands under a certain lease and agreement bearing date the twenty-fifth day of February, 1898, and made between the said company of the first part and Her Majesty of the second part.

4th. That there may be paid for the said railway and undertaking and other property, as aforesaid, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund the sum of one million six hundred thousand dollars, less any sum paid the company as authorized by the Act, chapter 4, statutes of 1897, to be granted to the said company as a subsidy for forty-two and a half miles from Moose Park to Chaudière River.—(Mr. Blair.)

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) starts his speech, will he lay on the Table of the House the new arrangement with the Drummond County road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The new arrangement?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I had not any information from my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) that he desired that. But I will send for it. I cannot furnish it before I make my statement. However, it is in the possession of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Where?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman has a copy of the report of the Drummond County investigating committee, I fancy he will find it there. It was furnished to that committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that it is there only in part. I think it is absolutely due to the House that, before the hon. Minister proceeds with the discussion, that agreement should be in our hands.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will send for it at once, and before I shall have made much progress in the discussion, it will be here.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will allow me. This is not at all the way to treat the House—even the members on his own side. We are to enter upon the discussion of a question involving a very large financial undertaking. This is to be done on the basis of an agreement which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has made. But, though he asks us to discuss that matter, he has not laid the agreement on the Table of the House. It ought to be printed and in the hands of hon. members before the discussion begins.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I must confess that it appears to me that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is making pretense of a desire for information of which he is in full and complete possession already. I venture to say that there is not a gentleman in this House who has not seen the old agreement, and I think that hon. members have been assured over and over again, in the discussion that took place, that the only difference between the new agreement and the old is that the new contains an option clause entitling the Government to purchase for $1,600,000, and the other does not. All that we are asking Parliament to authorize us to do is to buy that road at the price that is mentioned there, less certain exceptions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a matter of vital importance.

Mr. SPEAKER. I appreciate that, but, at the same time, the discussion is growing very irregular. The motion before the House now is that I do now leave the Chair. I do not like hon. gentlemen on either side to feel that on that motion they can speak a number of times.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to speak a number of times. but think that on a motion that you do leave the Chair for the purpose of considering a proposition involving an enormous amount of public money, it is absolutely due to the House that the documents should be before us. It is impossible that the House can enter on the discussion or that we can take this subject up at all until the agreement by which the hon. gentleman, by virtue of his position as Minister of Railways and Canals, has entered into on behalf of the Government and which he is going to ask this House to sanction, is before us. I do not think that in the history of this House such a thing has ever occurred as a Minister proposing to ask the approval of the House to an agreement which has not been in the hands of every hon. member. I would suggest to the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that, under the circumstances, the usual course should be pursued—that the matter should be postponed until a future day, and until the members of this House have that to which they are entitled, and that which they must have if they are to discuss the subject intelligently—the agreement which the hon. gentleman has made and which he is going to ask this House to sanction. We should have that agreement formally laid on the Table and copies placed in the hands of hon. members.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think we can come to an understanding and agreement. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) has a statement to make to the House on a resolution to which he has given notice. He may have a view of the question which is not shared by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and those who support him. But the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) can make the statement he has to make with the information which he wants to give to the House and which he thinks the House should be in possession of. If, after the statement has been made, my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), and the hon. members who support him, think they are not in a position to debate that proposal, they will be afforded an opportunity to do so at a later stage. The hon. leader of the Opposition knows that the resolutions cannot be concurred in to-day; and, therefore, another opportunity for debate will be afforded. If the hon. gentleman has not the information that he wants in order to debate the question, he can reserve his remarks to a later stage. But, in the meantime, the House, I believe, will be glad to have the views of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals on this subject. It will facilitate the debate which is to take place on this question, to proceed with the statement to-day, whether hon. gentlemen on the other side are ready to debate it to-day or prefer to wait for a later stage.

Mr. WALLACE. The proposition of the Prime Minister is simply that the Minister of Railways and Canals shall have an opportunity to present the case without any opportunity of reply for several days. I think the proposition is the most preposterous one I have ever heard in this House. Here we are in the fifty-fifth day of the session, face to face with the question that has engaged the attention of Ministers for years past. They have made a new arrangement, and they say: You can learn what the new arrangement is by taking the old arrangement and putting on it certain patches. We want the agreement, we want the papers brought down so that we can examine them intelligently before the discussion begins. Yet the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and the Prime Minister tell us: It is not necessary; we will state our case, and it will be convenient then to leave the matter over. I protest against such an important matter, involving the expenditure of such an enormous amount of money, being proceeded with until the papers are before us. I presume that what we have here is a summary of the agreement with the Drummond County railroad. But there is another agreement that is necessary in order to make this one in any way effective, and that is the agreement with the Grand Trunk railroad. These two should be considered together. Now, we are entitled to have the whole case presented to us at once and to have an opportunity for consideration. When we have had the opportunity, let the hon. Minister bring forward his resolution for discussion in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that the question before the House is that I do now leave the Chair. I have allowed this preliminary talk to go on somewhat irregularly; but any hon. member speaking now I must hold to have spoken on the resolution before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will be in order, I suppose, to move the adjournment at this stage.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes. But that should have been done before, if at all, I think.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, I rise with great reluctance to support this motion. It ought not, in my judgment, to have been necessary that it should have been made. The objection taken by the Opposition, in the House, is an objection that ought to receive the support of hon. members on the Government side of the House without exception, because it is a reasonable objection. With a question involving an enormous addition to the public debt of this country, a question involving the imposition of several millions to the public debt of Canada, a head of a department bringing forward a motion of such gravity is bound to furnish all the necessary information, when asking the House to accept the agreement which he has entered into on behalf of the Crown with certain parties entitled the Drummond County Railway Company, and with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. No invitation, no requisition, no statement by any hon. member of this House ought to have been required in order to have secured this information. Unless he was shrinking from that public investigation when he professed such great satisfaction with a public investigation, no suggestion ought to have been required by any hon. member of this House, for the purpose of inducing him to do that which every Minister of the Crown is bound to do, which every Minister of the Crown in the world does when submitting an important question for the consideration of the House. I say it is unheard of in this Parliament or any place where parliamentary institutions exist. When the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has ceased his conversation with another hon. gentleman who, I see, is on his feet at the same time as I am, I will proceed with my remarks. I am not surprised that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals wants to turn a deaf ear, that he wants to draw away attention from the remarks which I feel it to be my duty to make to this House. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stands in a very exceptional position. He evidently thinks that he can best secure the support of hon. gentlemen behind him by hiding, as long as possible, from them and from this House and from the people of this country, what he proposes to do. I may remind the hon. gentleman that this is not the first time that we have had to take him sharply to account in reference to this subject. It is not forgotten, Sir, that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals presented a motion to this House, two years ago, in reference to this Drummond County deal, and those who will take the trouble to turn back to the debates that took place on that occasion will find that the hon. gentleman was obliged to admit his ignorance of everything connected with the subject, that he ought to have known when he brought that project forward. He brought forward a project which was to involve an addition of at least $6,000,000 of public money to the debt of Canada; he brought forward a project of that tremendous nature, and for what purpose? For the purpose of promoting the interests and position, as he stated, of the Intercolonial Railway. Well, Sir, when he was asked what the distance was of the line that he proposed to fasten upon the shoulders of the taxpayers of Canada and how it would compare with other existing lines with which he proposed to compete, the hon. gentleman admitted his entire ignorance of the subject. He said that he had never looked at it from that standpoint at all, but that he had looked at it from the standpoint that he wanted to bring the Intercolonial into Montreal, and he found that a warm and devoted friend of the Government and of the party was willing to sell, for $2,100,000, to the hon. gentleman that which he had been hawking about the country, and was willing to sell for $500,000. He brought that project forward and asked this House to deal with it just in the same manner that he is trying to do now, hiding the facts and deliberately withholding from Parliament that knowledge which is absolutely essential to any fair consideration of the question at all. Did any business man in Canada, or in any country in the world, ever hear of such a thing as proposing to construct a competitive line of railway without taking into consideration the length of the line with which you are going to compete, or the length of your own line by which you propose to compete? The hon. gentleman exhibited a degree of ignorance that, in my opinion, ought to have taught him that he must not, in future, try to trifle with the intelligence of this House. Hon. gentleman behind him may be willing to accept the position of the Minister in reference to these matters, which on the face of them are, to say the least, of a most suspicious character. I do not hesitate to say that when a Minister of the Crown makes an arrangement with a great party friend to spend $2,100,000 of public money to obtain possession of a property that that party has been trying to sell for $500,000, is, to say the least of it, clouded with suspicion, and it is due to the House, to the hon. gentleman's own supporters, and to every intelligent man who is called upon to deal with public questions, that full and accurate information should be had upon this question. What else was disclosed on that occasion? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said he had submitted the question to his chief engineer, the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, and that he had his authority, and he referred to a portion of that authority, but he was obliged to admit that he had suppressed that important part of the report of the chief engineer and Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals in which it was recommended to him that before launching into this wild and monstrous proposition, he should have the road examined. The hon. Minister was compelled to admit that he had turned a deaf ear and a blind eye to the sensible advice of the Deputy Minister and chief engineer, and had plunged into this monstrous bargain in the face of it and without getting any information whatever. He said that he had enough information, but it appeared that the information he had was obtained from an engineer sent out on a flying trip after the contract was made and signed. I tell the hon. gentleman that, after the manner in which he exhibited himself in this House, two years ago, when he first attempted to launch this monstrous proposition upon the House, he must not presume to ignore the rights of any hon. member sitting on this side of the House, however subservient he may find hon. gentlemen sitting behind him. Under these circumstances, I am astonished that the right hon. First Minister should lend, for a single moment, his countenance to that which he knows is unprecedented. Was ever such a spectacle exhibited? Before we are called upon to discuss a contract made by the Crown involving an expenditure of millions of public money, we are entitled, at all events, to have that contract laid upon the Table of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

When I had the honour of submitting the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway to this House, suppose I had invited the House to go into the question without first laying on the Table this private contract made by the Crown with a certain number of individuals; suppose I had insulted the intelligence of the Liberal members, then in Opposition, by asking them to discuss the question without laying the contract before them; why, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows, that every one of his friends would have risen in the strongest remonstrance against such a proposal. The right hon. gentleman and his friends would have done that which is within their right, that which is warranted by common sense, and business, and parliamentary precedent, they would have refused to entertain a discussion of the matter. This Drummond County Railway contract was made long ago; it should have been printed and placed in the hands of every hon. gentleman on both sides, and for the Government to hesitate one moment to postpone the discussion until the contract is brought down, seems to me to be an insult to the intelligence of the House. We ask, in the most respectful and business-like manner, that, before we are called upon to enter into this discussion, we should have the papers to show what we are going to discuss. The question is not a new one: last session, the proposal of the Government with reference to this railroad led to an indignant remonstrance, not only from the Conservative party in this House, but a remonstrance that was echoed and re-echoed all over the country, and which proved to the Government, that they could not for a moment get the people of Canada to assent to such a monstrous proposition. The Government was able to force their proposition through this House by the power of their majority, and that proposition was rejected in another place. If hon. gentlemen opposite had felt that this was a matter of public importance, and that they had the confidence of the people of Canada in regard to it, they would at once have taught the gentlemen in another place, that they must not stand against the will of the people of Canada, as expressed by the Government of the day. But no: the Government knew, that the Senate of Canada represented the people, and that the majority in this House did not, and they knew, that they would sound their death knell, if, under the circumstances, they ventured to appeal to the people on that question. They could very soon have settled the question by an appeal. They could not only have settled it, but they could have settled a great many other questions, if, feeling they were right, and feeling that they, and not the Senate, represented the sentiment of the electorate, they made an appeal to the electorate. They knew, that, under British parliamentary precedent, which is as much recognized in Canada as in England, that, if on appeal a majority were sent back to this House to re-enact that legislation, the Senate would have accepted it without a word of qualification. That is the true responsible doctrine. But the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not do it, because the right hon. gentlemen knew right well, that, when the people of Canada learned what a monstrous proposition the Minister of Railways had forced through this House by the power of a mechanical majority, they would have terminated the existence of this Government, and would return men in their places who knew how to conduct the public business with some respect for the interests of the country. When this subject was brought up in the first instance, and when the Minister (Mr. Blair) was asked a number of questions of a most pertinent character, questions that every business man in Canada would say were absolutely necessary to be dealt with in the preliminary stage, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) showed, that he had plunged into this matter in wild haste. If I understand aright, there were some elections coming off in the province of Quebec, so that the matter would brook no delay, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) must rush into this, to say the least of it, most suspicious transaction with a great friend of the Government and a great friend of the Liberal party. The Minister of Railways must endeavour, 'coûte que coûte,' to force it through, while he confessed, on the floor of the House, that he had not taken the trouble to learn the first elementary principle that bore on the question. The proposition of the Government was, to take six or seven million dollars out of the treasury of Canada, to be fastened as a charge around the necks of the taxpayers of Canada for all time to come, and for the Minister of a responsible Government to undertake to do that, without first going to the trouble of mastering the initial elements of the proposition, was a spectacle never before witnessed in the history of the Canadian Parliament. Take also the contract made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in this connection, and what did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) do? Why, he made a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company that would practically enable that great corporation to make all its terminal improvements and all its additional tracks and sidings necessary to carry on its great business, at the expense of Canada, pure and simple. When that proposition was sent to the Upper Chamber, the ablest man the gentlemen opposite ever sent to the Senate no sooner saw the clause, than he said: It is impossible that we can adopt such a proposition; it must be amended. The proposition was so monstrous that that gentleman, as a business man, saw, that nothing so improvident was ever proposed in a civilized country. The proposition was, Sir, that this railway company should be allowed to spend whatever money they liked in the construction of certain works for their own benefit, and then that Canada should pay 5 per cent on half the cost of these works. That was the proposition that the ablest man the Liberals ever sent to the Senate objected to. If we pay five per cent on one-half the expenditure, whatever it was, it practically meant paying the entire expense. Well, Sir, that has all been changed, and greatly to the advantage of the country; because, instead of making the contract which assumed that the mileage that Canada would have would be equivalent to the whole mileage of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Senate, by its action, prevented this frightful bargain from being ratified. The hon. gentleman was compelled to change all that, and to bring in a contract under which Canada was to pay in proportion to her mileage, which would reduce the expense of that little transaction to one-tenth of what it was under the contract which the hon. gentleman undertook to force, and did force through this House. But, fortunately for Canada, there was another Chamber where the hon. gentleman had not a body of as pliant supporters as he was able to find in this House, and the result has been that an immense change has been made in this contract. I have got that changed contract under my hand, printed and circulated, as the hon. gentleman was bound to do—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am giving my hon. friend the First Minister the evidence from his own Minister that he knew what was right and what this House had a right to demand. If with regard to the minor part of this contract he thought it necessary to print it, bring it down and put it into our hands, why did he not do the same with regard to the major part—the arrangement with Mr. Greenshields? What is there in this arrangement which the hon. gentleman is ashamed of? What is there in it that he wants to hide? I do not believe his own friends in this House have seen it. What possible justification can any Minister of the Crown have under such circumstances for treating this Parliament with the indignity—because it is nothing else—of asking a body of gentlemen elected by the independent electorate of this country to come here and do the public business—asking them to take up questions of such magnitude as this in the absence of any information whatever? To listen to the hon. gentleman's own story, and after that to adjourn the debate, is the proposal of the First Minister; then, he says, we can have this information furnished. Well, Sir, that information has been for months, I suppose for a year, in the hands of the hon. gentleman. Was not that long enough to have it printed and circulated and laid on the Table of this House? We shall get it, I suppose, some time next week, and then we shall find that it is a year old; and yet it has been hid away. Why hid? I ask the question. Is it because, as I said before, this transaction from its inception has been surrounded with a cloud of suspicion, which I tell the hon. gentleman and his colleagues it would be as well to have dissipated as soon as possible. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman is doing himself no credit by adopting a course which a czar of Russia might be expected to adopt, but which no Minister could be expected to pursue towards a responsible Parliament—to ask them to take up such a question and hear his elucidation and description of it, without having the document which he has had many long months in a pigeon-hole in his desk, brought out here in the light of day and placed where hon. members on both sides of this House can see it. I am not surprised at this action on the part of the Minister of Railways and Canals, a man who had the audacity to bring that measure as he brought it, and stand up and confess that he was ignorant of the whole subject from top to bottom—that he had taken no trouble to learn anything about it except that his friend Mr. Greenshields would kindly accept $2,100,000 of our money for a road which it was afterwards proved they had been endeavouring to get $500,000 for, and in vain. The parties in whose hands it was placed had thrown it up after examining it, concluding that it would not warrant any such expenditure as $500,000. It was only two years ago when the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals presented the most helpless spectacle of want of information ever exhibited by a Minister, by standing in this House and confessing his absolute ignorance of the length of the two lines which were going to compete with each other, and when he got finally to the bottom of that question, we found that it was a very curious bottom. I think that bottom will fall out—and the hon. gentleman must take care that some other bottom does not fall out. What did we find, Sir? Why, Sir, after then endeavouring to force through this House and hang about the neck of the people of Canada for all time that expenditure on such monstrous terms, he now admits that what he proposes to do is one of the most gigantic feats, I suppose, that any man who ever undertook railway management ventured to propose in the world; that is, to compete with a road 250 miles shorter and under the management of the ablest man who, I suppose, has ever handled a railway in Canada, and the ablest company that ever dealt with railway questions in Canada. And he proposes to compete with them, after subsidizing them with $1,800,000 out of the treasury of Canada to enable them to carry the freight which he proposes to take away from them. After we have spent $1,800,000 in inducing them to spend millions of capital to carry the freight to the west side of the harbour of St. John, he proposes to take that freight away from them and carry it 250 miles further around to the east side of the harbour of St. John. That may be a capital scheme to promote the influence and power of the Minister of Railways in the province of New Brunswick, and I am inclined to think this is only the opening of the ball. I am inclined to think that before we get through with this matter we shall find that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has got up his sleeve a number of similar transactions for the purpose of cooperating and misleading the electorate of the province of New Brunswick. I see an hon. member (Mr. Gibson) on the other side laughing, at all events, my old friend is exhibiting a very audible smile. He is a railway man; and I will ask him, as a railway contractor—and he is a great one, a man who has established a great reputation as such—whether if it had been proposed to him to put his hand into his own pocket and find the money to build a railway to compete with another which is 250 miles shorter, he would be likely to take his hard cash and his well-acquired earnings and spend them in a transaction of that kind. He would laugh more loudly in the face of the man who made such a proposition to him than he is laughing to-day, or else my hon. friend is not the astute railway contractor I take him for.

Everybody knows, that what has been the difficulty with the Intercolonial is the difficulty to get sufficient freight on the products carried to pay the expenses of operating the road. I have shown, that, while the late Mr. Mackenzie was endeavouring to perform that task, in the five years of his administration, between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 of public money disappeared to pay the deficit between the cost of carriage and the receipts, but that, under Conservative management, of course, that was greatly improved, and we were able, the next five years, to show, instead of a deficit of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, only about half a million dollars. But there was still a deficit, and, although during a few years when I was Minister of Railways, and a few when my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) was Minister of Railways, there was a small surplus, every one knows, that, if you put the Intercolonial under the ablest management possible, the people will have, year after year, to put their hands into their pockets to add to the amount of capital expenditure, and to take out of the revenues of the country a further sum to meet the deficit between the earnings and receipts. That is known to everybody, and how is it proposed to remedy that? Why, by the gigantic, wonderful scheme, the greatest stroke of genius that, I suppose, ever was attempted by a railway magnate in the world, namely, to carry that same freight, which we cannot carry now at a price which will pay the cost of carriage, 250 miles further for nothing. Does the hon. gentleman suppose, that there is such a lack of intelligence in this House as to enable him to convince any one, that he can make bricks without straw, or something out of nothing, and a great deal worse than nothing? There is not an intelligent man in this House who knows anything of railway undertakings—not even my hon. friend who is so amused at this gigantic stroke of genius—who does not know that the other portions of Canada will have to pay their share into the public treasury to meet the deficit which will be entailed by carrying that freight 250 miles further in order to compete with a road to which we have given $1,800,000 in order to obtain a short line for the purpose of doing that work. That is an unanswerable position. Every man who has not some design in carrying out such a project, knows, that, when this subject is looked at in the light of day, its absurdity will be manifest. The hon. Minister of Railways rushed into it for purposes of his own that he has never disclosed to this House, because it is too monstrous a proposition, as a business one, to suppose it had any business basis at all. He will have to carry this freight 250 miles further for nothing, because otherwise he will not get it at all. The mode in which he proposes to shrivel up Sir William Van Horne and Mr. Shaughnessy, and all these Canadian Pacific magnates, who were induced to spend millions of their money in building this line to the west of the city of St. John, where these admirable facilities have all been provided for doing the business, is to take the traffic from them and carry it for nothing. That may enable the Minister of Railways to amuse this House with his wonderful stroke of genius, but it will not put money into the pockets of the people.

That is not all. When he gets round to the east side of the harbour of St. John,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

what then? There will then be a beautiful little opportunity of spending $750,000 more of the people's money, taken out of the consolidated revenues of the country, and this money will be spent to do that on the east side of the harbour of St. John, which the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the aid of the munificent action of the people of that city, have already accomplished on the west side. I believe, however, that that stroke of genius did its work. I believe, that probably it largely realized the object which the hon. gentleman had in view. I believe, that he owes to that sort of manipulating of the public money of the people of Canada; the success that attended his efforts on a recent occasion in the province of New Brunswick. Any intelligent man who knows anything of the city of St. John, or any other place in the Dominion of Canada, knows, that there is no great aversion on the part of the outlying towns and cities throughout Canada to have a generous Government present them with a large expenditure of public money in their midst; and that people were found to succumb to the temptation, I was not very much surprised. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on one occasion referred to the maritime provinces as "a nest of boodlers."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I did not refer to New Brunswick particularly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not particularly to New Brunswick, but I think the illustration went a little beyond Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman made the statement, which was then a slander, but to-day it is only a scandal, for a patent incubator, in the form of the Laurier Government, has been sitting on the eggs, and has managed to hatch out just about as splendid a nest of boodlers as ever disgraced any country in the world. The time has come when it will be absolutely necessary for this Parliament to address itself to the great question, whether corruption is to go unchecked and untrammelled, and be allowed to spread all over Canada, like a virus. Is province after province to be bought up by the most open corrupt appeals to the cupidity of the electors that ever disgraced any country in the world? I say, that that magnificent nest of boodlers which the Laurier incubator has brought into existence, bids fair to reduce this Canada of ours to that deplorable and unhappy condition.

If I were to go a little further afield. I would go down to the province to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce specially referred, and what did we see there? Why, we saw the Finance Minister of this Government do that which no Finance Minister in Canada ever did before. What did he do? Why, on the eve of a Budget speech, he disclosed to interested parties what sort of contract he was ready to make with them with regard to what the duty on coal should be. And, when he had done that, we witnessed a wonderful change. The hon. gentleman knew, that the Prime Minister had declared, that, when he got into power, coal would be made free. That declaration has never been withdrawn. The Finance Minister, however, treated him just as he did the other night, when he threw over his views of reciprocity and advanced his own, as those which were to govern. He threw over the Prime Minister, and said to these people: If you will come to my terms, I think I can manage to protect coal in this country, and he did.

Mr. SPEAKER. While I do not wish to interrupt, I would just point out to the hon. gentleman that he is exceeding, certainly, the scope of the motion to adjourn. I just wish to point out that this is beyond the scope of a motion for adjournment. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) beside him says that on a motion to adjourn the House can do anything. That is an error. A motion to adjourn the House made in the middle of a debate gives an hon. member an opportunity to make another speech, if necessary, on the subject of the debate; and the subject the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper) is discussing is, of course, the motion that I leave the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You know, Mr. Speaker, with what pleasure I always obey your ruling, and never with more pleasure than on this occasion. But I may be permitted to call your attention to the fact that there is no debate—that the debate has not commenced.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will understand that I put the question from the Chair. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), by moving it, has exhausted his right to speak on the main motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If you will allow me a single moment, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that what has taken place, as I understand it—and you will correct me if I am wrong—is this: The Orders of the Day were called; you put the motion from the Chair, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) did not rise to speak and has not risen and has not said one word in that debate. All that he has said has been in reference to what should precede the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. My explanation was not on that point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I am in error.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will allow me. Subsequent to that irregular conversation, which, perhaps, I should not have allowed to go so far, I said that we must confine the debate to the subject before the House, and then

I put the motion formally. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, of course, assented to my putting it, and by doing so, the hon. member has made his speech on this Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that you will rule that a single speech has been made in this House on that question. We have discussed what was necessary as a preliminary. Otherwise, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals cannot say anything more on this subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to misunderstand me. On this motion to adjourn, the hon. member or any other hon. member of the House except the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who moved it, and the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper), who is now speaking, can speak on the subject of the main motion. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, by assenting to this motion, is precluded from speaking on the main motion, just as the hon. member for Leeds is precluded, by having moved the adjournment of the House, from speaking on the main motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, I think we may come to a conclusion, because, if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is not going to be permitted to speak on the main motion, I think my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will admit that the sooner we take up the Estimates or some business that we can deal with the better—and have these papers brought down before the debate goes on. In that case, I am prepared at once to bow to the decision. But I had only commenced my remarks, I may say. I desire to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that I am not going afield in dealing with what was done in New Brunswick, nor shall I be in speaking, as I propose to do, of what was done in Nova Scotia—as these things are consequent upon these great schemes of using public money for purposes that may more pertain to electoral matters than public business. It is from that point of view that I use the illustration. As I was saying, the hon. gentleman found a Prime Minister—a very estimable, worthy man for whom I have great regard—who at once accepted his doctrine; and I had the pleasure of seeing the province of Nova Scotia carried on a policy that I had fought for for twenty-five years, and that the hon. gentleman had fought against. More than that—the House will remember that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was formerly Premier of Nova Scotia. As Premier, he put forward with vigour certain claims on the treasury of Canada. The Conservative Government in the Dominion, though always anxious to do everything in the most liberal manner consistent with justice, were obliged to refuse to entertain these claims.

That claim of $1,200,000 put forward by the present Minister of Finance, was hawked about through the province of Nova Scotia—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Order. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is not speaking to the question according to the ruling of the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I use this as an illustration, and I have explained to you, Mr. Speaker, the ground on which I use it. This Drummond County proposition is of an astounding character. Of course, it may be changed under the new contract made by the hon. gentleman. But, until we get that, we have to look at it in the light of the facts as we know them. I am in order, then, in giving my reasons for feeling alarmed and for thinking that the time has come when these gigantic schemes for the use of public money should be looked at closely. The Premier of Nova Scotia put forward as his great claim to the confidence of the electorate this coal deal entered into by the present Finance Minister in defiance of all the rules that govern gentlemen in the position he occupied. But he put forward also the fact that when the present Finance Minister was Premier of Nova Scotia he had put forward a claim of $1,200,000, and said that if the people wanted that money, now was their time to get it. If they would support his party they would show that they wanted it; and they had the man who had made the claim in a position to pay it. Therefore, the province of Nova Scotia shared the fate that, under similar influences, befell the province of New Brunswick. There was another illustration. An election occurred in the province of Ontario. And one fine morning the people were startled by finding that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) had—it was merely a strange coincidence that it happened at the time of the election, of course—had made a contract of the most gigantic character that ever startled any Parliament in the world. It was to secure the construction of 150 miles of tramway at a cost of 3,750,000 acres of land, now held at an upset price of $10 an acre, with all the gold that lies under it, subject to a royalty of 1 per cent, as against 10 per cent charged to every competitor of that company. If the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) had not prepared the public mind, and if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had followed it up by expenditures of public money in order to exercise a corrupt influence, the whole country would have been startled with amazement. I forget how many people it takes to save a city, but certainly in this case there were found five gentlemen on the other side of the House who could not swallow the action of the Government. Does any person want stronger evidence of a monstrous act of corruption than the fact that the proposal brought down by this Ministry was one that five men sitting behind them could not swallow? One other gentleman, I believe, walked out of the House rather than support anything so monstrous. Well, it so happened that this proposal to spend something like £10,000,000 sterling at the very least in building 150 miles of tramway by this Government, was made just on the eve of a general election in the province of Ontario. Now, I ask the members of this House whether I am right in saying that in view of the acts of this Government, committed one after the other, we are not entitled at all events to information to show what you propose to ask us to do, that we are not entitled to have it before us. Hon. gentlemen, I know, have great power in forcing measures through this House, a power which they have exercised to the extent of forcing a great number of gentlemen out of this House and upon the bench, and into many other high and important positions, before they could get these acts through. I am not surprised, in view of the record of this Government in connection with propositions of this kind, that they want a new franchise law, that they want a new distribution, that they want a great overhauling of the old constituencies before they will venture their precious necks in the hands of the electors of this country. That one transaction of the Drummond Railway struck a fatal blow at the confidence of the honest and independent electors of Canada in this Government. They know that down to this hour no proper and sufficient defence has ever been shown for that monstrous proposition, and that sentiment will be intensified when they find that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) is now endeavouring to put a new contract through without allowing us to see it, and he is able to induce his followers behind him to give their support. I say that if ever there was a time when it became the absolute duty of an Opposition to withstand these attempts to override everything like parliamentary government and an honest discussion of public business, it is on the present occasion. I must say that I am not only surprised but I regret deeply to find that when a moderate and sensible proposition was made from this side of the House, the Government did not see fit to accept it. They could not have better evidence of our desire to promote the public business than when we terminated the debate on the remarkable Budget speech of the Minister of Finance in a couple of days. We gave them then the best possible evidence of our anxiety to facilitate the business of the House. I look to the right hon. gentleman, the leader of this House, to say at once to the Minister of Railways and Canals: It is impossible that you can move this resolution, which you have long had in your hands, and which ought to have been laid on the Table long ago. I am sorry to have had to say a single word upon this subject myself, because I was in hopes that we would have accomplished a great deal of business to-day. I must say to my right hon. friend that this is not the way to secure that object. I tell him frankly that the Opposition are most anxious to do everything in their power to forward the public business of this House and to relieve ourselves from its duties and obligations as early as we can. But we would fail altogether in our duty if, in our anxiety to meet the wishes of the Government and to promote public business, we lost sight of everything like parliamentary practice and parliamentary precedents, and allow the Government to force down our throats, without information, measures of such an important character as that we are called upon to deal with.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I quite acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules of Parliament it is not open to me to enter upon any full discussion of the subject-matter of the resolution which stands in my name to-day, until you have left the Chair and the House has resolved itself into committee. It is not my purpose to make any observations in explanation of the resolution until that stage is reached, and, therefore, I quite acquiesce in the ruling you have made. But, Sir, I have been entirely at a loss to appreciate the purpose which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has in view in presenting himself to this House in the sorry light in which, I regret to say, he appears to-day. I do not know what is the actual feeling of the hon. gentlemen who surround him; I think, if I can at all judge of their feelings, it ought to be a feeling of sorrow and pity to see a gentleman who has filled so large a place in public life, rise in this House and make an occasion for delivering a vituperative address such as he has delivered here to-day, without any rhyme or reason. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the spectacle can only beget feelings of profound sorrow in the breasts of those gentlemen who are associated with him. I have no reason to have any such feeling towards the hon. gentleman. He never rises that he does not take occasion to assail me in the most violent and vituperative manner. And yet I have that feeling, and I do regret that at his time of life, and after his career in public affairs, he should have so degenerated as to become little better than a common scold in the Parliament of this Dominion. Now, what is the position? My hon. friend makes it the occasion of this address that the House has not been furnished with the requisite information in order to a proper discussion of the question. What basis is there for such a statement as that made by my hon. friend? No one knows better than the hon. gentleman that it was the desire of this Government that no time should be lost, that the earliest opportunity should be seized to advance the business of Parliament, this being one of the measures that we were to take up and discuss weeks ago, and, at the request of the hon. gentleman himself, this debate was adjourned, not once, but several times. Sir, is there anything due to Parliament, by that hon. gentleman, I want to know? Are all the obligations resting upon my shoulders, and is there nothing due from him, not simply as the leader of the great party in this House, but as a member of Parliament filling the place of an honourable man, of an honest man, which he is supposed to be filling? Was there nothing due to me when the hon. gentleman desired that this debate should be adjourned on a previous occasion, instead of waiting until the last moment; when he finds that there is no other excuse that can be made, he jumps up and says that the debate should be adjourned in order to put before him documents that have been thrown broadcast about the country and which contain all the material facts in reference to this question, which is in the possession of almost every one who takes any interest in public affairs. It was due by the hon. gentleman, if he had any appreciation of his duty as a public man, or of his duty to this House, that he should have notified, either the leader of the Government or myself, before the moment that this debate came on, that he desired to have these papers in his hands. It is true that he could go to the Votes and Proceedings of two years ago, in which he would find the later agreement published; it is true he could go to the report of the committee of this House which sat last session, and before which these papers were presented. But, still, I would not have asked him to do that if he had asked me when I gave notice of this motion; if he had said that we should have all these old agreements before us, I would have brought them all down. It is simply childish; the hon. gentleman is simply making a burlesque of himself when he says that there is anything in this matter that either I, or the Government, desire to conceal. We have nothing to conceal in this question. The question occurred to me as to what might be the reason of all this indignation of the hon. gentleman. I think I have it; I think the hon. gentleman is holding a brief for the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that he is fulfilling one of the directions which is sometimes given in other cases. He has nothing to say, and, therefore, he can only abuse counsel on the other side. We have never heard the hon. gentleman get up to refer to this question without becoming indignant at the treatment that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has received. We will discuss that question. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been used improperly in this transaction, in reference to any rights which Parliament has not regarded, or that the Government is disposed to disregard, we will deal with that question, but it is not necessary that the hon. gentleman should resort to fierce, violent and vituperative language, or that he should talk like a common scold. The hon. gentleman has one half the information he asked for in his possession, and he admitted that. The hon. gentleman can get the other half by going to the office of the clerk of the Investigating Committee, where that committee has these papers on file; but I have sent, since this discussion commenced, for the papers that he wants.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if Parliament is not entitled to that information?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Unquestionably. Ask me something easier, my friend. I will furnish my hon. friend with these papers the moment he desires them, but the hon. gentleman does not require them because this present resolution has nothing to do with that agreement. He has repeated, over and over again, that it is for the confirmation of the agreement under which we are now running the Drummond County Railway. It has nothing to do with it. We are simply putting a plain proposition before Parliament, not to confirm an agreement, but to authorize the Government to purchase this road out and out. What has that to do with the terms of the agreement under which we are running the road now, except in so far as Parliament might think that this proposed purchase out and out might not be more favourable than the conditions under which we are now operating the road. I suppose that whatever has been the object of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), it has been fully satisfied by this hour and a half debate, and that we may proceed to the consideration of the resolution we have before us.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N. B.) The question is not a difficult or abstruse one; it is a mere question of common sense and constitutional usage. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) intimated that we should nose around and hunt up a bit here and a bit there, and get such information as we choose, and quite sufficient for us. He says: If you had only dropped a note to me, this information could have been brought down. So far as I am concerned, the Opposition is not on this side of the House to drop notes to Ministers to ask them to bring down the information that is necessary. We do not propose to do that; it has never been done in this Parliament before, and I do not think that it will be done. My hon. friend may just as well learn, first as last, that when he brings his measures down to this House, he brings them down to an intelligent set of men and that these men propose to have a basis upon which to discuss the proposition before the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Why did you not ask for the papers and I would have sent them to you; why did you not get up in your place and say you wanted them?

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. FOSTER. Within the last ten days, over and over again, on this side of the House, the hon. Minister has been warned that before this discussion came on these papers and the fullest information would be expected to be on the Table of this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. gentleman say that he intimated or suggested that he would like to be furnished with the facts of the previous agreements?

Mr. FOSTER. I will undertake to affirm that I have stated, I think twice, if not three times, to the hon. gentleman, that the fullest information was necessary before we commenced this question. Why should the hon. gentleman wait to be asked? Does he not know what a Minister's duty is in this Parliament? I was going on to say that I have had a seat in this House since 1882, and I never yet knew an instance, until my hon. friend came into this House, of a Minister coming down with an important measure like this, involving large sums of public money, and refusing to lay the papers upon the Table of the House before we discussed the matter. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals knows that we cannot trust his memory, because he knows that his memory is defective. We had a signal instance of the defectiveness of his memory two years ago on this matter, when, in reference to the terms of the contract, being asked for information, he made a positive statement to this House, a statement which struck some members of this House as being not in accordance with the facts. When it was challenged, and several hours afterwards, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had to bring down the contract and to say to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), that he was mistaken in his statement. The hon. Minister should not trust his memory. He brought this very measure we are discussing to-day without giving us the contract, and, after we had discussed it for some hours, in this House, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) had to rise in his place and say that we had a perfect right to have the actually signed contract. When it was brought down the memory of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was proved to be defective. I do not propose to discuss this question on a statement of the papers which he has in his pockets, and on information which he may choose to give us. I think I have a right, as a member of Parliament, to have these papers before me, and that is a right that every hon. member of this Parliament has. Why has my hon. friend not brought these down? There is another important point. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) says: If you look into this book you will find the contract. You will find where Mr. Blair was in evidence and where he was sworn; but we look at that book and we find that he gives us just three clauses of what he says is a new agreement. That is all with reference to it within the covers of this book. Are we to be content with two or three extracts from that agreement, given in the evidence of Mr. Blair?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The agreement was produced.

Mr. FOSTER. But the agreement in full is not within the pages of this book.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not regulate the printing.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) is guilty, from his own confession. He says: we can have the information we are asking for within the pages of this book; and now, when we show him the information is not there, he tries to slide out of it by saying: he is not responsible for the printing. I cannot tell who is responsible for the printing; it makes no difference; but I know my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) is responsible for laying on the Table of this House the full contracts he has entered into, and upon which he bases the action he proposes to take. Hon. gentlemen know, that this is an important matter. They know, that the Minister (Mr. Blair) got into a very considerable pitfall, in his freshness, in his desire to help his friends, in his desire to make a great name for himself; and he fell into such a pitfall as would have involved this country in a little over $500,000 of useless expense, if friends in another part of this Parliament had not been kind enough to hang his project up to dry until this freshness had considerably worn off. And, after they had held this up, after this had had occasion to dry for some months, after the public got on to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) was after, my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) makes another agreement, which, by his own confession, is some $500,000 better financially for the Dominion than the first one. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) knows that this is the case. Now, what is the reason, that, if we have seen the first of these contracts, we cannot see the second? I do not know what is in that contract. I find, in my hon. friend's evidence, that he says, the agreement is optional; that the Government may either pay the $1,600,000, or it may make the payments in the shape in which they were to be made first. Is it optional in that new agreement or not? That is what the extract seems to lead me to suppose, such as I find it in his report. That makes a very great difference. First, we took exception to that bargain on account of the evidently unbusinesslike aspect which it presented to us. Here, for instance, the Minister of Railways, who has access to the public chest, and is able to pay cash for what he gets, with the Government having large surpluses; comes to the conclusion that that road is worth $1,600,000, and then, for the sake of a friend, or for some other reason, he agrees to pay $2,100,000 in hard cash. That is what my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) proposed to do at first. Now, in his evidence before
