Now, some gentlemen on the other side take considerable gratification in the fact that there was an election in New Brunswick, and they say that the member for York (Mr. Foster) was able to have only four men returned on his side in that election. Well, Sir, in the first place, that statement is not true. At least nineteen Conservatives were returned out of the forty-six members of the local legislature of New Brunswick. So the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that only four were elected is altogether inaccurate. But the Moncton convention, to my mind—and I am speaking only for myself—struck out a proper line. It was not an original line, it is true; the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) had advocated just such a policy in regard to local politics—that is, that contests should be run on party lines and party issues, the object being the preservation of a measure of purity in the public life of the province, so that a man should not be elected on one side to-day and on the opening of the legislature, walk over to the other side, bound to no party, and having no party's honour as a safeguard for his own. Now, the Moncton convention did what they had a perfect right to do. I do not mean to say that the Conservative party was all represented there, although it was a highly representative convention; but we found it impossible to get all the Conservatives, including many leading men, to agree with us. And so our party was split up, while the Liberal party remained solid. It is no great cause for glorification on the part of any Liberal that a coalition government in the province of New Brunswick was returned by a large majority. It does not prove that the Liberal party is in anything like the same position in that province. I am here to refute the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals in an interview with a certain paper in Montreal—of course, he had a right to his own opinion—that that election boded ill for certain candidates in New Brunswick, mentioning myself with others. It is true that the men I supported in my county in the local elections were defeated. But it is equally true that the men the hon. gentleman supported in his county were defeated. So, if it bodes ill for me, logically it bodes ill for him. The hon. gentleman, with all his power of place and office, went to the county town of his county on nomination day and made one of his powerful speeches in favour of the candidates of his choice ; but on election day they were defeated. I do not bring this up for the purpose of harrowing the irritable feelings of the hon. gentleman, but rather for the purpose of puncturing the bad logic he uses on some occasions. Now, I would call the right hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that his party, while strong in this House may not be so strong in the country. When Sir Robert Peel's Government fell, he declared that the great mistake he made was in trying to carry on a Government with a majority in the House that did not represent a majority in the country. Much has been said in this House and much has been said in the country as to the personality of the two men who lead their respective parties. I have nothing to say against the praise that hon. gentlemen opposite bestow upon their leader, nothing to say against the incense they burn before their idol. He has a charming personality. His sunny ways have done very much for him. But in some cases, his sunny ways are not successful. I have here an extract from a western paper which touches on this point. It begins with a supposed dialogue between the Prime Minister and Mr. Greenway :

Mr. Laurier—My dear Mr. Greenway, I have longed for many days to meet you face to face, in order to smile away the domestic troubles in our land. I pray you by all the love I bear, to bury all the differences which now exist between us, and place your lovely hand in mine.

Mr. Greenway—My own dear Wilfey, your charming smile I can't withstand ; I meet at once ; on bended knee I clasp thy hand ; henceforth we two are one.

After the glowing success of this first attempt, Sir Wilfrid became convinced that as a masher he could wield a master hand, and he immediately aspired to try it on Uncle Sam. So we find him for some months gathering up material with which to clothe himself for this momentous occasion, and ultimately he sets sail for Washington in a pulp-wood canoe dressed in the following peculiar fashion. About his neck a yard of binder twine formed a guard from which the Cobden medal was suspended. In his left hand he had a cane made from corn cobs cemented together with Canadian postage stamps, and decorated at intervals with whirls of Canadian dollar bills. A cotton shirt-front nicely perfumed with Standard coal oil covered his heaving bosom and hid the fondness of his heart. In his right hand he held a nugget of glittering gold from the Yukon mines. Thus appropriately adorned he presents himself to Uncle Sam in the following sunny style :—

Sir Wilfrid (smiling)—My charming Uncle Sam, I present myself before you as a suitor for friendly terms of trade.

Uncle Sam—It is, indeed, in strange and wondrous garb you come. Is this the native costume of your land ? Explain the jewel on your breast.

Sir Wilfrid—Each item of my robe is meant to remind you of a favour I have already graciously bestowed. This twine about my neck speaks of an industry I ruined at home in order to lay its profits at your feet Uncle Sam ; this jewel speaks of the master stroke I made for you in England, in order to give your produce there an equal chance with mine, when I was offered the preference ; the perfume and the cotton shirt recall the boon I gave your bloated monopolists in cotton goods and coal oil. This cane bespeaks free corn for you and leaves the cob alone to me ; these postage stamps and dollar bills I built in Boston to show we patronized you well. Take, I beseech, this golden nugget from the north (as emblem that the Yukon's thine) to seal my faith in what you may bestow.

Uncle Sam—These gifts are lovely, but you see they now are given free. Pray tell me, noble knight, what dowry can you further yield to have and hold my hand ?

Sir Wilfrid—I have already given all I have to yield.

Uncle Sam—My dear Wilfrid. Sentimental marriages are now a thing of the past. A distinct settlement of value is the only ground upon which I can be wooed. John ! Would you kindly show the gentleman out.

Sir Wilfrid's soliloquy on the road home :

Its hard to think that for twenty years I vowed to woo dear Uncle Sam, and then after clothing him in sealskins from our seas, and sprinkling his hair with gold dust from our mines, he should calmly take my clothes and show me empty-handed out. How shall I present myself at home to Jack Canuck ? I guess I'll have to tell Jack to thank God I did not lose my hide.

That is one of the cases in which the charm of the personality and the sunny ways of the leader of the Government did not have their usual effect. On this side of the House we have for a leader a man unanimously elected to that position by the party in this House and in this country, a man whom we all respect, one of those who laid the foundation of this broad Dominion. Sir, he can proudly say, after long years of service, dating from 1857 down to the present time, in the many public offices he has filled and filled so well, that he has done the state some service, and they know it. Now, Sir, he can repel, I think, with some contempt the assaults made on him by hon. gentlemen opposite ; he who withstood the assaults of Howe and Brown and Blake can afford to contemn and despise the assaults made upon him to-day. He can virtually declare with the old Roman, "Contempsit catalinae gladios non tuos pertimescam." The hon. gentleman is yet in the full vigour of his mental attainments, and it can be well said of him that "panting time toils after him in vain." Now, hon. gentlemen opposite having failed in their promises to the people of this country, having failed in the fulfilment of the pledges that they made on every platform, in their conventions and in this Chamber, seek to hide all their misdoings beneath the cover of their recent victories. They boast of their victories, and like Ancient Pistol, swagger in their pretentious triumphs, forgetting that like him they may have to eat their leek. Let them have their triumphs, gained at the expense of their political principles and the degradation of their political honour. They will find that their temporary successes are but dead sea fruit which will turn to ashes on their lips. Nor should they forget that it is much better to deserve than to command success. Let me recall to their minds the warning of one of their leaders, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who read in the overwhelming defeat of the second Cleveland administration, a just retribution on the Democratic party for their broken pledges of 1892. But they should not forget that no man is dubbed a squire who does not win his spurs upon the field of honour. They sometimes jeer us on our defeat of 1896; but I would tell them that history is very partial to men who fall in what they consider a just and patriotic cause. The Napoleon that appeals to me is not that most wonderful character of modern times in the full blaze of his victorious glory, after Wagram, Austerlitz or Jena; but the conquered captain of Waterloo, the uncrowned exile of St. Helena, on whose faults history, like the angel of mercy, drops a tear, desirous of blotting them out for ever. I feel a thrill of pride when I remember that a descendant of refugees from the land of my fathers, could become a marshal of France and the second president of that great republic. But, Sir, the word of McMahon that shall sound clearest and farthest into history is the cry of the smitten leader at Sedan, who, in the forefront of the shattered French line, when venomous death hissed round him in a hundred forms, could boldly exclaim: "Go tell those German kings and princes who fight behind their immense masses of men, that a marshal of France knows how to fight, and, when beaten, knows how to die." The right hon. gentleman himself once said that the Liberal party should stand by its principles or remain for ever out of power. Such brave words, now so sadly and so utterly forgotten, somewhat resembles the doctrine which Edmond Rostand puts in the mouth of a 17th century hero:

What are you saying? That it is no use? I know it; but one does not fight for the sake of winning merely. No, no; it is much finer to fight when it is no use.

And the right hon. gentleman who sits yonder would have left a name much more lastingly illustrious had he, like Cyrano de Bergerac, continued to the end fighting what he once considered his ancient and detestable enemies—lies, compromises, prejudices, base expedients, the horde of ugly things which he has since taken to his bosom; for then, Sir, like Cyrano, in his last great fight against the common enemy of our race, he might proudly boast that he would sweep the welcoming threshold of God's house with an unblemished if not a knightly plume.

Mr. G. GUILLET (Northumberland) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 30th March, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCIES.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Brockville, by the demise of John Fisher Wood, Esquire, and my attention having been called by one of the hon. members for the electoral district of Cape Breton, in his place, to the fact of the demise of Richard Willis Jameson, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Winnipeg, I have, in accordance with section 8 of chap. 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, issued my warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out new writs of the elections for the said electoral districts.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Fisheries for the fiscal year ending 31st December, 1898.—(Sir Louis Davies.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 17) respecting the Ottawa and Gatineau Railway Company.—(Mr. Champagne.)

Bill (No. 18) respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway Company.—(Mr. Bernier.)

Bill (No. 19) to amend the Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters.—(Mr. Britton.)

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he can give us any further information in regard to the Auditor General's report.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have to-day a communication from the Auditor General, and I must say that I was slightly inaccurate the other day in the statement I made on the subject of his report. I am informed by the Auditor General that the Queen's Printer has had the copy in his hands since 23rd February last, that he has been supplied from time to time ever since, and that now, and for some time past, the whole of the report of the Auditor General has been in his hands. I am further informed by the Auditor General that by next Wednesday the whole of his report will be printed and will be in the hands of the members of the House with the exception of that part relating to the Mounted Police and to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES AND THE "STAR."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I also desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to the fact that the Ottawa correspondent of the "Star" informs me that the information, the accuracy of which was questioned by my hon. friend yesterday, was furnished by the Department of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and transmitted exactly as supplied to him by the department.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries denied that he had had any communication with the "Star" reporter, whereas the "Star" reporter, as the House will see, puts into my hon. friend's mouth the whole statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am requested to say that Mr. Holmden understood from the department that the statement he sent had been submitted to the Minister and had received his sanction.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). All I can say is that Mr. Holmden has misunderstood entirely and absolutely. I never saw Mr. Holmden, directly or indirectly, and upon asking my deputy if it was a fact, as the hon. gentleman states it, because Mr. Holmden made the same statement to me, he informed me that it was not.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell, of East Prince, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picou). Mr. Speaker, for some time this House and the country has been accustomed to hear from the leader of the Government what might properly be described as ear-kissing arguments. The right hon. gentleman has obtained a certain amount of strength from the weakness of his arguments, or to put it more directly, from the absence of any evidence of intense conviction. But, Sir, facts are hard things, and although this session marks a very brief period in the time that responsibilities have begun to grow upon the shoulders of the right hon. gentleman, we are to-day face to face with an entire change of character in him. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has endeavoured to become emphatic, and in doing so, I venture to suggest, he has not strengthened the position which he held before this change of character became marked. Samuel Johnson—not Sir William Johnson, whom the right hon. gentleman has conjured up in some extraordinary manner from the history of Nova Scotia, though I never knew that such a gentleman existed or was known to the political arena there—Samuel Johnson has said that he never thought he hit hard unless the hit rebounded. The right hon. gentleman gave us, early in this debate, the very best evidence that he was hit hard, and during the continuance of the debate by those who dared to come out into the open from behind him, those who have ventured to raise their voices from the back benches—since they have spoken, it is all the more apparent that the right hon. gentleman was hit hard. For that reason, perhaps, some excuse may be offered for the extraordinary plunge the right hon. gentleman made into not only a new sphere, but into the very lowest plane of a new sphere.

The right hon. gentleman slept—I hope he slept—over the attack that was made upon him, and upon him primarily, for after all said and done, whether the right hon. gentleman serves under the master of the Administration, or whether he endeavours to shift responsibility upon one shoulder or another on the Treasury benches, he is, under our constitution, himself responsible for all the shortcomings, and all the extravagance and all the recklessness of his colleagues. The right hon. gentleman signaled this session as a new era in his life, and, Sir, I cannot congratulate him upon the new departure. The Prime Minister slept over the arguments of the leader of the Opposition, and therefore there was less excuse for violence of language on his part, and in violence of language he certainly indulged. In the twenty-four hours that elapsed after he had an opportunity of considering the arguments of the leader of the Opposition, when he found he could not answer them in fair debate, he apparently resolved to be violent in abuse. His case being bad, he resorted to the old artifice known to some lawyers, that under the circumstances it was a good thing for the defendant's counsel to abuse the plaintiff's attorney, and he succeeded therefore so far as the abuse is concerned. It struck me as curious to hear from the lips of the Prime Minister such language. He began by charging the leader of the Opposition with being a Bourbon, who had learned nothing and forgotten nothing, and although the right hon. gentleman had ample opportunity to show to the House whatever fallacy he thought might exist in the arguments of the leader of the Opposition, he was forced to ransack his old speeches, to furbish up some old arguments and some old points that the House has grown weary of, and with a very few additions to these the right hon. gentleman sat down. He referred—and to this subject I will allude later—to that old misstatement that has been corrected time and again, as to the offer on the part of the leader of the Opposition of unrestricted reciprocity to the United States; and the right hon. gentleman actually quoted at length, as though it were something new, an article from the Montreal "Gazette," written in 1891. The right hon. gentleman will remember, no doubt, that he has used that argument very frequently in this Chamber, and that it has been completely answered.

But, Sir, speaking generally of the speech of the right hon. gentleman, I would ask the House to turn its mind back to a period in its history which will show conclusively, if evidence is necessary, that history repeats itself. The right hon. gentleman boasts, and frequently boasts, and loudly boasts—indeed, it is his chief argument—that he has behind him a majority; that he has carried the by-elections. Well, Mr. Alex. Mackenzie, in his time between 1874 and 1878, was led into that dangerous spirit to such an extent that he indulged in sneers at the minority and boasted over the triumph of the majority, and when the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald fulminated against the Mackenzie Government—as we are able to do to-day with even greater force and greater justification—serious charges of maladministration, extraordinary and unparalleled incapacity, Mr. Mackenzie was accustomed to answer in temper, and to sneer, and to level personal charges and indulge in personal statements against the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald and his followers. On one occasion Sir John Macdonald very well exemplified the condition of affairs, at a remarkable meeting of his party held in the city of Montreal. That meeting was held in the days when, no doubt, the member of the Administration from one of the Quebec constituencies; the hon. gentleman who has charge of the fast service which for the time has been wrecked; in the days, I say, when that hon. gentleman cheered loudly the sentiments of his leader. Sir John Macdonald, at that meeting exemplified the position by quoting from Hudibras:

The Prince of Cambay's dally food
Is asp, and basilisk, and toad,
Which gives to him so bad a breath,
It nightly stinks the queen to death.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, when the Opposition asks the right hon. gentleman what about his tariff pledges, his only answer is, "The leader of the Opposition is an asp;" when we ask him in regard to the perfidy that has been practiced on good and honest prohibitionists in the country, his answer is, "You are a basilisk;" and when we further charge in solemn debate the failure of that farce, the Washington negotiations, his answer is, "You are a toad." The country will ask for more than that, I think, before they will be satisfied that the answer from the Administration is all that can be desired. Men who have not given thought to the subject have been fond of referring to the right hon. gentleman as the silver-tongued orator of the Treasury benches. Well, if his tongue is silver, what must the tongues of his colleagues be? I have picked out a few choice morsels from the speech of this so-called silver-tongued orator. Time would not permit me, good taste would not permit me, to give you all the adjectives that were used by him; but when this right hon. and gallant gentleman desired to run a tilt against the leader of the Opposition, he indulged in adjectives of which I will give a few samples. He called him prolix, diffuse, redundant; he likened him to the blind old king of Bohemia; he charged him with idling away the time; said that he was conceited; that Ancient Pistol was second to him, that he possessed a gigantic but childish vanity, that he blew his own trumpet, that he sounded his own praises, that he was a blunderer—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And this is the food on which his party exists, as you see, Mr. Speaker. He said that he possessed a sublime egotism, that he was attached to the skirts of Sir John Macdonald, Sir John supplying the brains and Sir Charles the wind—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That again appeals to the intelligence of hon. gentlemen opposite. These are the arguments which these hon. gentlemen most thoroughly appreciate, when they are charged with maladministration of the affairs of this country. Then, the right hon. gentleman used this extraordinary language, which I wish to dwell upon for a moment, because it gives us some idea of the desperate straits to which he is driven. There is not the old, happy-go-lucky style about the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. We do not any longer hear their boasts loud and long; we do not hear them indulge, as they used to do, in that happy confidence in themselves, whereby they could be exceedingly gallant as compared with the vituperation and abuse of the Opposition. The right hon. gentleman used language of this kind in his speech when he was attempting to answer charges made in the debate on the Address: "So help me God," said the hon. gentleman. "I think we shall have that strength in the hearts of the people, but never by such methods as were resorted to by the leader of the Opposition." And again: "I believe upon my word, my memory is better than his." These samples, culled at random from the speech of the right hon. gentleman, entitled us to the belief that the hon. gentleman is in a dire position and is not happy. He is certainly not as happy as his friends would wish him to be. He charged the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition with "equivocating, quibbling and pettifogging to get out of a hole." He charged that he had been taken by the throat by one of his supporters, that he had disgraced Canada at Washington, that he was reckless, extravagant and unreliable.

It is not for me, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for any one in this House, in considering that the Canadian people are intelligent, to review any of these charges, and that is not my purpose in referring to the condition of mind in which this Parliament when it opened found the right hon. gentlemen. He is in a pitiable plight and knows it. He is absolutely destitute of any defence for the extraordinary condition to which he has brought things in this country. We have had international negotiations, and I shall be able later to submit some reasons for the assumption that the hon. gentleman's boastings of old have come to naught, and that he is in his heart absolutely ashamed of the condition to which he has brought the affairs of the country, certainly in the eyes of the United States, let alone the eyes of the people of Canada.

Now, there is a reason for the right hon. gentleman's strong language in regard to promises. In the old days he promised faithfully, on the word of the leader of a great party, he promised as a Canadian, certain things and certain reforms. Those promises have been shown in this debate to have been like pie-crust only made to be broken. That has been demonstrated, and therefore we can understand his reason for using, instead of the old language, such expressions as "God forbid," "so help me God," and "upon my word." We have to ascertain, as history runs on whether those strong expressions will lend any greater credence to the word of the Prime Minister of this country than the good old English style of giving his word without such strong assertions.

The right hon. gentleman, in his abuse of the hon. leader of the Opposition, was, I think, mistaken in the figure of speech he used, when, having in mind no doubt the ship of state, he likened the leader of the Opposition to the wind, and descanted upon that. It brings out in strong contrast, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say so—contravening to some extent, perhaps, the laws of good taste—the position occupied by the leader of the Opposition and the right hon. leader of the Government, respectively, in the history of the country. In the ship of state, I suppose, it is no inconsiderable feature to have a propelling force. He admits that the leader of the Opposition, in the time of Sir John Macdonald, was the propelling force of the ship of state; and I put it to the master of the Administration who is not present to-day, I put it also to his colleagues, what has been the position of the right hon. gentleman in the ship of state since June, 1896? Par excellence, he has been a mere figure-head, the most useless thing about a ship of state. And so we can afford to stand the sneers of the right hon. gentleman—for sneers they were—in regard to the leader of the Conservative party.

The hon. gentleman, if anything, is a historian, a man who prides himself in his knowledge of the history of men and things, not only in the province to which he belongs but in all the provinces that go to make up the Canadian confederation. And I would call your attention, particularly, to the position which the hon. gentleman's temper—for nothing else was displayed in his speech—led him into, when he referred to Nova Scotian history. One of the hon. members for Halifax (Mr. Russell) sits behind the hon. gentleman, and he must have blushed when he heard his leader refer to one of the most famous men in Nova Scotian history as Sir William Johnston. The right hon. gentleman, no doubt, was coached for a night and a morning between the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition and his own, but so inapt a scholar was he, having known nothing of our province, that he failed to remember that there were men who, whether you call them democrats or not, had never been knighted, never covered with honours, and their breasts bedizened with medals, yet, after all, great men, men whose names have come down in history. There never was, I may tell him, a Sir William Johnston known in the province of Nova Scotia. But there was a great man who was not honoured in the way the right hon. gentleman has been honoured by the Queen, who was known as James W. Johnston, and he was the leader of the Conservative party. The right hon. gentleman's temper, his extraordinary rage, so blinded him that he dipped for a moment into Nova Scotian history only to show that he had never read a word of it. But he referred to a man of whom every Nova Scotian is proud, whether as a politician and statesman or as an illustrious judge in Nova Scotia. He referred to him only to sneer again at the leader of the Opposition. And that gives me the excuse, for otherwise, perhaps, I should not have it in a matter almost personal to myself, to enlighten the hon. gentleman and to remind him of the actual facts of Nova Scotian history in this connection. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, it does not rest upon me to defend, and I am not attempting to defend, the leader of the Opposition against the sneers of the leader of the Government. I wish to expose the absolutely crass ignorance of the right hon. gentleman when he travelled so far afield as to the history of that famous province of Nova Scotia. The right hon. gentleman pretended that in that province the leader of the Opposition in this House had been practically attached to the skirts of Mr. Johnston—whom he called Sir Wm. Johnston—as he endeavoured to show that he had been attached to the skirts of Sir John Macdonald in the federal arena. Now, let us turn back to the "Hansard" of Nova Scotia and see if the hon. gentleman reckoned with his host or without him to learn whether he knew what he was talking about or whether he spoke in sheer recklessness. The leader of the Opposition in this House came to public life in Nova Scotia in 1855, having defeated Hon. Joseph Howe. In 1856 Mr. Howe was returned for another constituency and these two gentlemen met on the floor of Parliament. While the fight was fierce and furious between these two hon. gentlemen, Mr. Howe, as all his friends and all his opponents knew, was too big a man, absolutely too big a man, to attempt to sneer at an opponent who was, at any rate, a noted man in his own party. I have only to quote from the language used in that debate on the great constitutional question in 1856 to completely refute that sneer. The leader of the Opposition in this House was then, as Mr. Howe supposed, leading the Opposition in the provincial House, although the titular leader, as Mr. Howe called him, was Mr. Johnston. In that debate the leader of the Opposition in this House used this language, which is pertinent to the present occasion :

Sir, I will not weary the House. The Government should define their policy; else, united on no public question, agreeing on no definite policy, they must take the verdict of the country on the anomalous position they occupy, which is that of a number of individuals combined for their mutual benefit alone, and distributing the spoils of office in such a manner as to subserve, not the good of the country, but their own continuance in power.

That was the prophetic language of the present leader of the Opposition, and as it was applicable in 1856, it is applicable in 1899. The charge he made then was supported, as I believe the charge in the present debate is supported, by the opinion of the people, as it will be expressed when they have an opportunity of passing their verdict upon the conduct of public affairs. But in that debate so similar to this in the particular I have mentioned, let us see how the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition was reckoned with, whether he was sneered at, whether the attempt was made to decry him, to pretend that he was supplying merely the wind for his party, that he was altogether an incapable supporter of the leader in those days, as the right hon. gentleman pretends he was in the days of Sir John Macdonald. Mr. Howe, who, at any rate, was as good a judge of men when face to face with them as the right hon. gentleman in that very debate referred to the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House as follows :—

Now, Sir, let me then turn to the closing speech of the hon. member for Cumberland, the leader of the Opposition.

And again, referring to the fact that Mr. Johnston was then recognized as the nominal leader, he said :

I find the veteran chief, not deposed indeed—for I cannot imagine an act of his party so suicidal as his deposition—but I see him dethroned, possibly by his own voluntary abdication.

Then the reporter, speaking of Mr. Johnston's speech, says :

The hon. gentleman made a statement at the close of his speech, which was listened to with marked attention, to the effect that he considered himself to a great extent absolved from the ties and duties of party—that it was impossible not to feel the infirmities of age creeping on, and the excitement of worldly affairs passing away—that even if the Conservatives, or the party with which he had acted had been returned to power, he should not have accepted a place in the Government of the country, but would hereafter leave the trials and responsibilities of statesmanship in the hands of more youthful and vigorous men.

So I refer with some interest to that period to which the right hon. gentleman has given practically no attention, of which he has had an account at second-hand to show that in regard to these matters of history the right hon. gentleman is as little informed as he is to the great questions that have arisen between the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada, as I shall show later on.

Then he has charged that the only government the leader of the Opposition led in the province of Nova Scotia, was defeated. Sir, no government of which the leader of the Opposition was leader, was ever defeated in the province of Nova Scotia. Will the right hon. gentleman take notice of that? His reference in that particular is as fallacious and misleading as his reference to the hon. gentleman in regard to other matters. Sir, the right hon. gentleman, if he had been properly advised, would have left unsaid these personal attacks upon the leader of the Opposition. He has charged against the leader of the Opposition incapacity, and a notoriety for doing nothing else than speaking, and prating, and supplying wind for his party.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the hon. gentlemen who shout acclaim to that, from temper, and not from reason, will, perhaps, listen while I show to this House what opinion of the right hon. gentleman is entertained by his master. What is on record in regard to himself? First of all, let me cite, if it is worth anything in this House or in this country, the answer to the hon. gentleman's sneers from the lips of his colleagues in regard to the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Opposition amounts to nothing, the leader of the Opposition, forsooth, is to be abused and vilified, sneered at and contemned by the leader of the Government. Well, Mr. Speaker, has he any regard for the opinion of the gentleman who sits near him, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries? Has he any regard for the opinions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Does he think their judgment amounts to anything? If he does, I would ask him to remember that only in 1888 this is the language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to the leader of the Opposition :

He was a capable, resolute man, who had deserved exceedingly well of his party. There can be no doubt that he saved them in 1887.

Again, not content with that eulogium, which is a direct contradiction of these miserable sneers from the right hon. leader of the Government—of which, of course, we understand the purpose—in that same session, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

Though I differ from him in toto cœlo as to his policy, I think he is much the best Minister of Finance that has appeared in my time on that side of the House, or for a long period of years.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce. (Sir Richard Cartwright), however, does not count for much ; I admit that. He has been practically relegated to a back seat, to a department in which he can do nothing except tote up statistics. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, of course, has been relegated to the shades. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) is supposed by many, not merely because he sits side by side, and cheek by jowl, with the right hon. leader of the Government, to supply the information and assistance to the right hon. leader of the Government that the master of the Administration, the Minister of Public Works cannot supply. In 1888 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was forced to say this of the present leader of the Opposition:

He is the real leader to-day, and the master of the policy of the Government.

Later on, in 1891, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was again compelled to say this of him :

The man who, to do him justice, had twice saved them,—

That is, the Conservative party.

—including Sir John A. Macdonald, from ruin.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I will not be misunderstood in referring to these eulogiums. I am not saying they were right ; I am not endeavouring to put the leader of the Opposition on a pedestal above that occupied by the former great leader of our party, Sir John A. Macdonald. But I do say, that the intention of the right hon. gentleman, the miserable, contemptible intention is apparent, when I can show from their lips that, when that great man was alive, they endeavoured to put the present leader of the Opposition on a pedestal higher than his ; and those miserable subterfuges, I contend, will go for naught in this country. Now let us come to what they say of the character of the leader of the Opposition. It is a question of ability ; it is a question of whether a man is a bag of wind, or whether he is a man of brains. The hon. gentleman has given his opinion of the leader of the Opposition. Let me give his own master's opinion of him—his own master, who sits directly behind him, and who has not denied that he controlled him, when charged with it in this very debate ; he is rather flattered and gratified by the recognition of his mastery of the Administration. He has thus referred to the right hon. gentleman :

As a venerated mediocrity, as a man who had neither principles, sound convictions or patriotism.

That is the opinion of the master of the Administration. Now let us see what is the opinion of the great Liberal organ of Canada, the Toronto "Globe." In that memorable debate on the French treaty there was much harsh criticism of Quebec Liberals, who were then, as now, headed by the right hon. gentleman. The "Globe" made this charge against one and all of them :

The present leader of the Government and all the Liberals from the province of Quebec would rush to cover on the French treaty, simply because France was a party to it.

That was the opinion then of the right hon. gentleman's own colleagues and of his own organ concerning himself. I say, it ill-becomes him, under the circumstances, to falsify history, to refer to facts in the province of Nova Scotia of which he is as ignorant as an unborn babe, with the sole object of endeavouring to minimize the ability and the position of his opponent, the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House.

Mr. J. McMULLEN (North Wellington). Good boy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know to whom the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. McMULLEN. I refer to you.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman refers to me. I would be particularly gratified if that hon. gentleman would have the very opposite opinion of me. The right hon. gentleman, however, in that debate, was remarkable, not only for his vituperation, his abuse—I would not say, insolence in this House, because, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, that would be transgressing a little the rules of debate—but the hon. gentleman was remarkable for some other things. The leader of the Opposition—and I do not hesitate to say this, as a member of the Conservative party—took some time, even at the risk of testing the patience of this House to establish every position he took on an occasion when he had the right to do so, and was bound to take the position that it was incumbent upon him to take, in discussing the affairs of this country. The hon. leader of the Opposition having established each of these positions by proof, the right hon. gentleman not only failed to meet any of them, not only failed to contravene the evidence adduced by the leader of the Opposition, but he himself showed, as I will demonstrate, if demonstration be necessary, before I finish, his absolute incapacity, not merely to meet the indictment of the leader of the Opposition, but his absolute incapacity to manage intelligently the affairs of this country. Take, for instance, a reference that he made to a very important subject. I would prefer to refer to the hon. gentleman's incapacity than to refer to an intention to mislead, an intention to falsify, an intention to garble, or an intention to misrepresent. I would prefer to believe that my right hon. friend did not know any better than that when he spoke in this House or out of this House on certain important questions. Let me give him one concrete case. The hon. gentleman went to a meeting in Montreal, as reported by the "Herald" of Montreal, of 4th January, 1899. This was at a time when it would be assumed the right hon. gentleman was well instructed in regard to the occurrences of state since 1896. Now, what do we find him telling the people of Montreal in regard to his opponents? I do not say that he wished to mislead them, but let me call your attention to what the hon. gentleman was induced to say, and what he believed to be the fact, no doubt. He said:—

A singular thing,—on the 31st of July, 1897, Sir Charles Tupper declared solemnly in an interview with the "Daily News" of London—I think I see him with his dictatorial manner—that England would never consent to the denunciation of the treaties. That was on the 31st of July. The next day, the 1st August, the treaties were denounced.

The right hon. gentleman was referring to the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties and was supposed to know the history of that denunciation. The right hon. gentleman, in order to gain a few cheers from the claqueurs who surrounded him, made this statement in regard to the leader of the Opposition, which, I as a member of the Liberal-Conservative party here and now in his presence, challenge the accuracy of. I say that neither he nor any hon. gentleman behind him, from this time out to the end of the debate, will be able to show that that statement made to the people of Canada was correct in any particular. On the other hand I say that it was not correct; I say that the leader of the Opposition never made any such statement to the "Daily News," and the reason for my indignation lies in the fact that the right hon. gentleman could be misled to such an extent is that I hold in my hand the interview published in the London "Daily News," with the leader of the Opposition, not on the 31st of July, for there was no interview on the 31st of July, but on the 30th of July. If the right hon. gentleman wants a copy of it now I will hand it to him, and from the beginning to the end he will not find one single line to justify that statement that was made to prejudice his rival in public life, the leader of the Opposition, to convict him not merely of dictatorial sentiments and statements, but to convict him of having made an egregious blunder and mistake. There is the statement of the right hon. gentleman which I have read; there is the interview, and the right hon. gentleman cannot find one single line or word that will justify the statement that the hon. leader of the Opposition had declared solemnly that England would never consent to the denunciation of the treaties. He took up, forsooth, hap-hazard, one of those miserable reckless misstatements that so distinguish the Liberal press, a clipping out of some newspaper, a garbled report of the interview with the "Daily News"; that and that alone was his vindication, and that and that alone can be found to be his vindication for the statement he made in regard to a solemn question and an important matter of state in the Dominion of Canada.

Let us see how feeble the right hon. gentleman showed himself to be in this important debate. It is not so long ago since we heard the right hon. gentleman, and it is a remarkable thing that not a man who has dared to rise in his place on the other side of the House has been able to vindicate the position taken by the right hon. gentleman when he dared to lock horns with this party and with the leader of this party in this debate. Let us, for instance, test the statement of the right hon. gentleman in regard to the subject of preferential trade. I do not intend to weary the House by going into the arguments pro and con upon this subject; that has been done more ably than I could do it, on this side of the House, but there appears to be the necessity even now of showing how little informed the right hon. gentleman is, not merely in regard to the policy for which he is responsible but in regard to the effect of it. When the hon. leader of the Opposition charged against that side of the House and established his position by the strongest evidence possible, that this so-called preference for England, the preference that they intended to be at our expense, with nothing in return—had been misleading to the British public, that it had been in every sense fallacious, and that, if we may go so far as to refer to a policy as being wholly dishonest, from top to bottom, and when he dwelt upon the statement that the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, taking the six months from the end of July in which this policy was in full operation, involving only a benefit to England, the right hon. gentleman endeavoured to harp back and include a month to which the most extravagant imagination could not apply the so-called preferential policy as having been in operation. He said:

Sir, at all events, I say that a door has been opened, and that trade at this moment is flowing into it. The hon. gentleman minimizes the efforts which we made in that direction.

The excuse he gave us was that whether it was one per cent or six per cent there was an advance, and hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Treasury benches in fairness understand that that was the force of the hon. gentleman's argument. He claimed that as the general result. Time passes, but not too much time has been taken up with this debate, for we are now face to face with a month that followed the six month period, a month that was not present to the mind of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Chamberlain when he stated that in the months ending January 31st, there was this increase. I have the "Canadian Gazette" for March, 1899, and hon. gentleman looking at the heading of British trade with Canada, will find that not only had that one per cent of increase disappeared altogether, but that we are face to face with a decrease. Whether they intended the preference for England or not, we see after the lapse of only a few months that they gave the United States before entering into negotiations with them every concession they could reasonably demand, and we are face to face with the fact that instead of there being a British preference the figures of our trade with Great Britain, compared with those of our trade with the United States, show that the United States has come out on top and that Great Britain has come out at the bottom in regard to this so-called and much-vaunted trade policy. Then, we had another instance of the reckless handling of even the debates of this House, and reckless handling of the history of this country. We had the most audacious attempt I have ever seen undertaken, except at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that was to father upon the Liberal-Conservative party and upon the leader of the Opposition the responsibility of that bastard policy of unrestricted reciprocity. Notwithstanding the fact that we fought until the very last signs of life were beaten out of that policy by this party, we heard from the right hon. gentleman, who pretends to lead the Government, the statement that the leader of the Opposition was responsible for unrestricted reciprocity. What did the right hon. gentleman do; what cheap trick did he resort to?

What palpably weak argument did he resort to in order to father on the Conservative party the responsibility for such a monstrosity as that. I will tell you. He used the argument that he had vainly used in this House before. He sent for "Hansard" and read his old speeches, but did not disclose the conclusive replies that had been made every time these speeches had been uttered. The right hon. gentleman referred back to a remark of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) when he was a Minister, and the right hon. gentleman said, that the leader of the Opposition intended the offer to be unrestricted. And then turning and twisting the language and giving it his own interpretation, he endeavoured to make the leader of the Conservative party (Sir Charles Tupper) responsible for the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. Can the Prime Minister find in "Hansard," or in any speech reported, a syllable, let alone a line, uttered by any Conservative or Liberal-Conservative, that ever gave adhesion to the policy of discrimination against England in favour of the United States. The right hon. gentleman knows right well that the Minister beside him (Sir Richard Cartwright) was honest enough and bold enough to say at the very outset, that the very germ of unrestricted reciprocity lay in discriminating against England and all countries in the world in favour of the United States; and that it was madness to conceive the success of that policy without discriminating in favour of the United States against England and all other countries. When the right hon. gentleman endeavoured to father upon this side of the House the responsibility for that policy, he knew there never had been a whisper, let alone a word or a sentence, in favour of such a policy by any Liberal-Conservative authority.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). We always gave it the strongest opposition.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, as my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) says, we gave it the strongest opposition from the day it was mentioned down to the present day; or, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) would say, we opposed it 'in toto cælo.'

I charged the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with incapacity, and I believe he has displayed the most deplorable incapacity in connection with the administration of the affairs of this country that any Minister was ever guilty of from the days of Alex. Mackenzie down. Let me see now if the right hon. gentleman could have been as incapable and as ignorant as his position would indicate him to have been in connection with that unfair charge—for it is almost a disgraceful charge—which he laid at the doors of the Conservative party. The right hon. gentleman at one time knew better, for at one time his own lips gave testimony in this House that he knew the Conservatives had never done so disgraceful a thing as to be party to a policy that no man in this House would dare to hold himself responsible for to-day. The member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) interrupted me a moment ago; he has shown in regard to the Auditor General's report how it was studied at one time and neglected now, and we have seen how he can change his face—but I appeal even to him when I ask, whether there is a man in this Chamber to-day who would vote for unrestricted reciprocity as defined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Not a man of them. Let us see what the right hon. the leader of the House has himself said in regard to the nature of the opposition that was offered by us to this policy. In the first place to prove my point, in case there is a doubter, I will show how unrestricted reciprocity was defined by

hon. gentlemen opposite. I hold in my hand a most useful publication; it is a volume I am sure the right hon. gentleman himself would be glad to have destroyed; it contains the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the platform from 1871 to 1890. Now, in this book, on page 422, this is the language I find from the lips of the right hon. gentleman in 1888:

The objections made on the subject were crystallized in one sentence by the hon. the Minister of the Interior in reply to the interruption by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island. What I said was that a differential duty against England was disloyal to the mother country and inconsistent with our position.

That is the language used by the late Hon. Thos. White, and the right hon. gentleman continued:

If this objection means anything it simply means that if we find it is to be to our advantage to adopt reciprocal free trade with the United States we should forego that advantage because we are a colony of England. That is the proposition made by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I denounce such a proposition; I repudiate it; I denounce it as unmanly and anti-Canadian, and even anti-British, to pretend, Sir, that our colonial allegiance demands from us that we should be deterred from the spirit of enterprise, that we should refuse to extend our trade and to increase our prosperity according to the best methods which commend themselves to our judgment. To pretend that this is loyalty, I deny; and if I were to characterize the sentiment in the only language in which it ought to be characterized, I would say this is not loyalty, but that it is mere flunkeyism.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are to believe the right hon. gentleman, or if he believes himself, the policy of the present Administration is mere flunkeyism. They have thrown a sop, a pretended sop to the British merchant regardless of how it would affect Canada, and as they tell us, out of gratitude. That is a policy, as the right hon. gentleman said, of mere flunkeyism. On page 432 of this delightful book I find the following remark from the same right hon. gentleman:—

I fully appreciate the objections of our friends on the other side of the House, who say that our course is not generous towards England. My answer is simply this: I only wish that we could offer to England the same propositions that we offer to-day to the American people. England has opened to us her doors. Gentlemen on the other side have closed our doors against England. They have done it, I know, not in any spirit of hostility towards England, but because they thought it was in the interests of this country. They have adopted protection as their deliberate policy.

And the gentleman who was appointed secretary to the international commission at Washington, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), said that the policy of the Liberal party is now protection:

They have adopted protection as their deliberate policy. England has a policy of free trade;
Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

England is 3,000 miles away from us. The policy of the United States is a policy of protection; the same as ours. They are our nearest neighbours. There are our channels of trade. Therefore, the course we take is not a matter of choice—it is the dictate of reason.

England on the one side has given us everything, the United States alone will not give us anything unless we open our doors to them and shut them against England. That is what the right hon. gentleman said. He continued:

Therefore, the course we take is not a matter of a choice—it is a dictate of reason. I fully appreciate, as well, the objection of those who say this is the first of a series of changes which must end in annexation.

The right hon. gentleman spoke at Oakville in 1888, and he spoke there at a time when were published all these documents on which he based this fearful charge against the Conservative party, that they were in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. At page 459 of this delightful book, I quote the following passage from the words of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at Oakville:—

They (referring to the Conservatives) want to have no reciprocity with the United States, the great nation to the south of us, for fear we might be seduced from our allegiance to the mother country. But they are ready, they say, for reciprocity with Great Britain. I have only this to say—I say it openly, I say it on my own responsibility, and I believe I can speak as well for the Liberal party: If reciprocity with Great Britain is practical, I am in favour of it; but Britain is 3,000 miles away, and our American neighbours are just to the south of us.

They keep to the south of us, Mr. Speaker.

They are our neighbours, there is not a natural barrier between us; if Britain were where the United States is, I would go at once for reciprocity with Great Britain, but, Sir, it is very well to be sentimental; but, after all, sentiment is not business.

Now, after unrestricted reciprocity had been so defined, I want to take the offer of the leader of the Opposition, which the hon. gentleman, in his desperation, attempted to show this House, was the offer of a policy such as I have been referring to. In 1888, when the leader of the Opposition was in the House, he read in debate, on April 10th, the offer which the hon. gentleman pretends now was an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, and it was this:

Sir Charles Tupper begged leave to submit a note containing the following proposal from the British plenipotentiaries. That with a view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, in consideration of mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States, Canada and Newfoundland.

These are the 'ipsissima verba.' The hon. leader of the Opposition went on to discuss this offer, and then came this interruption by the present Minister of Justice, then Mr. Mills, the member for Bothwell: "The offer is unrestricted." Then the leader of the Opposition said:

The hon. gentleman says the offer is unrestricted, and I intended it should be so. I intended to give the Government of the United States—

This is the part, however, which the right hon. gentleman did not read to the House, but what should have been read with the actual offer, if it was intended to treat the leader of the Opposition fairly.

I intended to give the Government of the United States the fullest opportunity of stating just how far they were prepared to go in reciprocal trade with Canada. I knew, Sir, that the air was full of theories of commercial union, full of proposals of unrestricted intercourse, and I thought I could not do a better service to Canada, under these circumstances, than to ascertain at the very outset what was the position of the United States as to that question.

Now, hon. gentlemen who have been good enough to follow me in this—and it is after all, but an argument—will, if they do not think my deduction reasonable, pay some attention to the language used by the right hon. gentleman, not when he was in temper, not when he was bereft of all argument, not when he forgot all that was due to this House, and to fair debate in his speeches attacking an Administration; but let us take what the right hon. gentleman said in regard to the meaning of this offer at the time. I take this delectable book again, this collection of speeches, which had better never have been made, even from the hon. gentleman's point of view; and I find, on page 417, this construction of what was done at that time. The right hon. gentleman, speaking of this offer, said:

Was it for an entire settlement of the question upon that line? No; the proposal was simply an arrangement for greater freedom of commercial intercourse. Sir Charles Tupper's proposal to settle the question was—

An offer of unrestricted reciprocity? The hon. gentleman would not admit that when he was interrupted by the leader of the Opposition the other night——by an entire discussion of the trade relations, but the proposition of the British plenipotentiaries was simply for greater freedom for commercial intercourse than now exists.

So that what the hon. gentleman says there, if we can add to the words to make them more clear, though they seem clear enough, is that at no time was any definite offer made. Sir Charles Tupper, in advance of the formal negotiations, simply proposed a discussion of the entire trade relations, but when he came down to pen and ink, the formal offer was more restricted than Sir Charles' formal offer in the correspondence that had previously taken place. So that, out of the hon. gentleman's own mouth, in his speeches in previous debates on this question, I have established that nothing but a most unfair twisting and turning of the records themselves, and even of the speeches made in this House, would justify the hon. gentleman in making that horrible charge which I for one most indignantly repudiate, that any member connected with the Conservative party, at any time in the history of the country, ever looked with even an eye askance at so hideous a proposition as that we should throw in our commercial lot with the United States, and that, in order to obtain trade concessions from them, we should discriminate against every other country on the globe, and particularly against Great Britain. Now, what was the reason the right hon. gentleman used such very strong language as "So help me God," "God forbid," and "Upon my honour"? He has used other expressions not so strong. He has given to the House and the country the old British promise which has been repudiated. Let us take a sample or two, because I think these emphasize the charge we bring against the Government; and let me say here that I, as one member of the Liberal-Conservative party, would like to have it plainly understood that the Liberal-Conservative party would not, if they could, turn out the present Administration because they have repudiated their promises in the most direct manner on the trade question. I would not wish to turn the Government out because they have been protectionists in any sense. I, for one, am ready to support them, and I believe this party in opposition will support them in every possible way in maintaining protection. That is our policy. It does not change simply because of a change of political fortune. But we do charge home to them, as is our duty, that they are a combination of gentlemen who have no political principles of any kind whatever, that they are in that sense a dangerous Government, that there is no certainty about them. Whether one member goes out and preaches free trade or protection, we have proof that all their promises and pledges in regard to trade have been falsified. But I want to mark that, and show to what a depth of degradation the Liberal party have gone in regard to solemn pledges, and what has induced the Prime Minister now to start a new phraseology for political purposes. In the old days the words, "I tell you," were enough for the Liberal party; but with the repudiation of all those promises that begun with "I tell you," the hon. gentleman begins his new promises with "So help me God," and "Upon my honour." Let us see what the promises were, in the old days. Here is one made at Toronto, given at page 568 of this book:

I tell you the Liberal party will never cease the agitation until they triumph and obtain continental free trade.

They have not ceased, Mr. Speaker. There is not a man sitting behind the Prime Minister, who will say, nor will the Prime Minister himself say, that they have ceased to try to obtain continental free trade. There is not an hon. gentleman there who dares to say that to-day. There was the pledge to the electors in 1889. Now, let us take another, at page 564. Of course, there is this distinction between his utterances of this time and what he said in this debate, that he did not say "so help me God" or "upon my honour" or "God forbid," but he said :

I have read it in this way—that every reform has cost the Reformers years of labour, and those years of labour I, for one, am prepared to give; and though the Democrats may be defeated in the United States, though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until that cause is successful.

I will not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared——to remain in the cool shades of Opposition until the cause has triumphed, and you never shall hear a complaint from me. But some think that, though unrestricted unreciprocity is possible, it is not probable. We are on the eve of triumph. The triumph is at our hands, if we only know how to play our cards.

Mark that, Mr. Speaker—

The only excuse that they can make in this case, as in so many other cases, apparently, is that they did not know how to play their cards. Now let me give you the language of the leader of the Government in 1899, in this very debate. I quote the same gentleman who made these pledges and these promises that no accession to power, for instance, would change his mind. He now occupies a seat on the Treasury benches, and he rises in his place, and says :

If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the feeling of Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity.

And then he tells us that that feeling did exist. But how do you suppose he exults over what he thinks is an excuse for repudiating in the most direct manner, not merely his promises but his solemn pledges ?

Thank Heaven those days are passed and over now.

Well, Mr. Speaker, for years the right hon. gentleman endeavoured to instil into the minds of the people of this country the idea that all that prevented this country and the United States from making a fair settlement of all vexed questions was the existence of Tory rule, that the Tories in Canada were distasteful to the good people of the United States—I do not think I misrepresent the burden of the Liberal song as it used to be—but the moment there was an accession of the Liberal party to the Treasury benches, all would be happy and the best relations would follow between this country and the United States, and, indeed, between Great Britain and the United States. And, after spending a long period, upon which I shall not descant further than has already been done by those who have preceded me, he is compelled to come back to this House with one of the most humiliating confessions that ever came from the lips of a man charged with the government of any country in the world, with the announcement of the most extraordinary proposition ever made by a great country to a great country. He tells us that every sense of fairness was eliminated from the American proposition. On its face the proposition was not only unreasonable and such that Canada could not for a moment entertain it, but the very fact of the proposition being made, is to me, as a Canadian, a matter of regret and shame. That any power in this world should tell, not merely the leader of a Canadian Government, but the representative of such a power as Great Britain that they would not arrange an arbitration for the settlement and delimitation of a boundary between their country and another unless all parties would agree that what they had grabbed and what they had squatted upon, what they had taken illegal possession of, should be eliminated from the consideration of that tribunal; that there should be no finality whatever in regard to that tribunal, but that each side should send three representatives, and if one of theirs could not be detached from sympathy and belief in their argument there should be no results in regard to this matter and it should remain a "questio vexata" for an indeterminate time. Sir, it is enough to bring the blush of shame to the face of any man who calls himself a British subject that such a proposition was ventured. But there is an excuse for it. I can understand the United States position; I can understand why they dared to make such a proposition. They made it upon the admission made by the members of the Canadian Government in this House, made by the right hon. gentleman himself who was the accredited agent from Great Britain. They practically said to that hon. gentleman: If you believe what you told the Canadian House of Commons you can find no fault with such a proposition, if you believe what you said in solemn debate, what you never retracted, that proposition should be in no sense offensive to you, but you should consider it reasonable. We discussed this subject last session. I begged, I implored, as "Hansard" will show, that not only the right hon. gentleman but the Minister of the Interior should qualify the statements they made in the heat of debate that in view of these very expected negotiations they should not allow those admissions to remain. But they did not retract, they did not in any sense qualify those admissions, and only in those admissions could there be found the slightest thing to account for such an extraordinary proposition as the United States has made, and which, we are told, has practically ended negotiations between Great Britain and the United States 'quo ad' Canadian questions. They propose an indefinite arrangement regarding the boundary of Alaska, and that United States settlements should be agreed upon in advance of the reference as being in United States territory. I want to call the attention of the House to the reason for that by showing what occurred in the House of Commons last year, which also showed the recklessness of the hon. gentlemen. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) never gave expression to his opinion in the same direction as others, and it is well that they should respect to some extent the Department of Justice in dealing with so important a matter. For instance, take page 407 of the "Hansard" of last year. In the light of the proposition of the United States, let us see what the Minister of the Interior said, what he hurried to put on record, what he insisted upon recording against all expostulations. This is what the Minister of the Interior says :

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

I believe our contention is that Skagway and Dyea are really in Canadian territory, but, as the United States has had undisputed possession of them for some time past, we are precluded from attempting to take possession of that territory.

Now, the Solicitor General knows that there never came from the lips of a lawyer or a client so serious an admission of a case in advance as that. I will give some proof of that before I am through, if any man doubts it. It was practically giving away our case in anticipation, it put the right hon. gentleman in the most ridiculous position—and I do not say this offensively—to come back here and say that the United States, insisting on possession, this fact eliminated our rights from consideration. But, to emphasize my point, after the Minister of the Interior had said that, I myself ventured to say :

May I be excused for saying that I do not think the hon. Minister meant to say "undisputed possession."

Well, the hon. Minister of the Interior exemplified the adage that fools rush in where angels fear to tread, for he at once said :

There have been no protests made. It must be taken as undisputed when there has been no protest made against the occupation of that territory by the United States.

So far as he could give our case away, the hon. gentleman gave it away. If there is any importance to be attached to the utterance of a Minister of the Crown, under the British system, in an international discussion like this, so far as it had any weight whatever, he gave our case away, and he put that weight into the scales of the United States. Then I said :

A claim, I suppose, was made and adhered to.

I endeavoured, as far as possible, to head off the hon. gentleman, and suggested to him that he should qualify that serious admission. But he insisted, and plunged on. He answered :

There is nothing on the records to show that any protest has been made—an unfortunate thing for us, but it is a fact.

Now, let us read something further on that subject. Let us take the Prime Minister's statement, and see what position he puts us in, how he helped our case, whether he assisted Canada, or interfered with the proper consideration of this subject. In the same session he said :

But if we had adopted the route by the Lynn Canal, that is to say, had chosen to build a railway from Dyea by the Chilcoot Pass up to the waters of the Yukon, we would have had to place the ocean terminus of the railway upon what is now American territory.

"American territory"—a considerable admission. Again I challenge the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's statement. It was not only against us, but it was without rhyme or reason, and it is contrary to history. I have no doubt these hon. gentlemen were endeavouring to do their duty, if they did their duty at all, in informing Lord Herschell at Washington, they have endeavoured to disprove every statement they have made in this House to which I referred. But see the humiliating position in which we are put, and in which the British Government is put, by these thoughtless, heedless, reckless statements, made by these gentlemen who, unfortunately, through accident, in 1896, were given responsibilities they were never intended for. Take, for instance, the right hon. gentleman's statement, on page 1277 of "Hansard" :

From time immemorial Dyea was in possession of the Russians,—

I challenge the right hon. gentleman to find one single American author to show that from time immemorial Dyea was in possession of the Russians.

—and in 1867 it passed into the hands of the Americans, and it has been held in their hands ever since. Now, I will not recriminate here ; this is not the time nor the occasion for doing so ; but, so far as I am aware—

"So far as I am aware," mind you, Mr. Speaker ; mark that, not even keeping his counsel and letting the other side prove theirs, but giving the result of his examination.

—so far as I am aware, no protest has ever been entered against the occupation of Dyea by the American authorities ; and when the American authorities are in possession of that strip of territory on the sea which has Dyea as its harbour, succeeding the possession by the Russians from time immemorial,—

Why, no advocate of the United States could argue this more strongly.

—it becomes manifest to everybody that at this moment we cannot dispute their possession, and that before their possession can be disputed, the question must be determined by a settlement of the questions involved in the treaty. Under such circumstances, Dyea was practically in American territory.

And again, on page 1278 :

If we had built the railway by Dyea, when we came to Dyea we would have come to an American port.

On page 1280, in the same speech, the hon. gentleman drove the thing in. He did not merely refer to it, but apparently arguing the case of the United States as hotly as he could, and as strenuously as possible, he continues :

If we do not proceed with this Bill, then there is only one thing to do, and that is to build the line to Dyea on the Lynn Canal. But would that remedy the evil? On the contrary, it would make it ten times worse. There is no possibility of remedy at the Lynn Canal, because there we are altogether dependent on the goodwill of the American authorities. We have no treaty rights there, whereas upon the Stikine River we have. And, if these proved insufficient, there is one alternative for the Canadian Parliament, and that is, at the very earliest possible moment, without the loss of a single day, to have the line extended south, where it will reach Canadian waters.

So, if the hon. gentleman could have given our case away, could have given them justification for an otherwise entirely offensive proposition, he certainly did it. In another place the hon. gentleman said, speaking of this question of possession, that possession was nine points of the law, and he dwelt upon the importance of those possessory rights. That was not the case in the San Juan case between Great Britain and the United States. The United States took the very opposite view. England had possession, had the nine points of the law, and England lost San Juan. But the hon. gentleman would not bring that forward, he would not occupy a ground that was firm under his feet, that this grabbing of territory—and not from time immemorial, forsooth—but that this grabbing of territory, by the mere fact that some American citizens, with men from other parts of the world, have been squatting at those places, would not affect the construction of a treaty, or the delimitation of the boundaries under an expressed treaty. But ignoring the San Juan case and the British arguments where there was ten years of possession by the Hudson Bay Company, ignoring all the facts of the case and going contrary to every principle of law, he affirmed over and over again, in the language I have quoted, that so far as these places were concerned, the Americans had possession of them and practically that was the end of it. Therefore, I say the sting is taken out of the American proposition, otherwise it would have been disgraceful and humiliating, not from the Canadian point of view, but from the British point of view, that they should have dared to make such a proposition, let alone the circumstances that there was good-will between them, and that they had agreed over the council board to settle these matters in a fair and honourable manner. There is the excuse that the United States Government has to-day, they have simply taken the Canadian Government at its word, and relied upon the statements made by responsible Ministers in this House. Then, what fitting qualification had the right hon. gentleman in other respects to represent us at Washington? I gather from the remarks he made in this House that we were in singularly unfortunate hands when the hon. gentleman was the adviser of Lord Herschell in these negotiations. Take, for instance, one view of the case where he endeavoured to lock horns with the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Opposition had stated that there was legislation in the United States Congress last year conceding reciprocal rights to Canadians in mining in Alaska, and the right hon. gentleman endeavoured to cast a reflection upon the leader of the Opposition and his sources of information, and he went on to expose what he supposed to be the ignorance of the leader of the Opposition and to show him that he was mistaken, that the legislation was inoperative and did not meet the case. I hold in my hand the proof that the only answer that the right hon. gentleman gave to the position of the leader of the Opposition is based upon a most disingenuous document from United States sources. The hon. Solicitor General could not have advised him nor could the hon. Minister of Justice have advised him. I say that if good faith had been shown on the part of the United States Government every citizen of Canada would have had the right to obtain a license or a lease of mineral rights in Alaska under that American legislation. The Act is this, and the language is so plain that any one who runs may read. The Act was passed in 1898, and it is upon clause 13 that I would dwell. My object is to show that everything has been bungled and botched because the men who were our representatives at Washington were not informed and did not understand this legislation that existed for the necessities and interests of Canada. Here we have, in a circular from the General Land Office printed at the Government printing office, the Act of 1898, and section 13 of that Act, to which the leader of the Opposition referred, is as follows:—

That native-born citizens of the Dominion of Canada shall be accorded in the said district of Alaska the same mining rights and privileges accorded to citizens of the United States in British Columbia and the North-west Territories by the laws of the Dominion of Canada or the local laws, rules and regulations; but—

I call attention to this language :

—no greater rights shall be thus accorded than citizens of the United States or persons who have declared their intention to become such may enjoy in the said district of Alaska,—

And I call special attention to these words :

—and the Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time promulgate and enforce rules and regulations to carry this provision into effect.

What is the answer of the right hon. gentleman. Forsooth, it is his : The system in the Yukon is a system of license ; the system in Alaska under the United States is a system of sale, therefore, there can be no reciprocity ; the Act was barren of results. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is an entirely erroneous construction ; I say without fear of contradiction that the construction of that Act cannot bear any such interpretation at all, and I think I can point it out. That is the construction that the United States endeavoured to put on it. They knew a thing or two ; they saw that the negotiations were coming on. They found after they had passed that Act that they were going to deal with the representatives of Canada, and they consequently adopted that extraordinary theory and that fallacious reasoning. That is the very reason that the Prime Minister blandly adopts it. It was not a greater right for the Canadians to ask that they should be given a lease or that they should be given the right to work a mine. They said : We cannot claim the right to purchase a mine in Alaska because our Government will not allow that, but under the instruction of the Secretary of the Interior you can provide for a Canadian citizen who comes from a country whose Government allows you to take out a license to work a claim which gives you the practical effect of a lease. Under a lease issued by the Secretary of the Interior under the regulations authorized by the Act you will hold no greater rights than would be accorded to citizens of the United States in Canada, your right being the right to buy land outright. The right hon. Prime Minister gives us some inkling as to why everything failed, as to why everything is now in a worse muddle between the United States and Canada than it was when he says : We cannot expect that they should do anything under that legislation ; they have no concessions because there is no reciprocity in regard to the title of those going into the Yukon and those going into Alaska.

Then the hon. gentleman spoke of the sealing question. Consider for a moment the humiliating position in which he is. How can he individually stand up for any consideration for the rights of the sealers. We have only talk in the papers, it is true ; but, nevertheless, the list of questions which the right hon. gentleman referred to indicates that the question of sealers' rights and the further closure of the fisheries in Behring Sea was a matter under consideration. How was he met?—by the reckless statements made by himself on the floor of this House, statements made without information, statements that could not be supported, it is true, but statements that would embarrass Lord Herschell and the British Government. In 1894, the right hon. gentleman said in this House :

Sir, I call the attention of my hon. friend from the city of Ottawa to this fact, that the effect of that award has been to kill the Canadian sealing industry completely. Canadian sealing is a thing of the past. I know that the British Columbia sealers have offered all their schooners and tackle for sale at auction, saying that their industry was past, and, unless I am greatly mistaken—we shall see by and by—I understand that there is in the hands of the Government a petition from the owners of schooners and tackle employed in the fisheries, asking the Government to compensate them for the great loss they have sustained by the award.

Just consider, Mr. Speaker, the position that our representative was in, when he asked of the United States anything in the nature of compensation for the further exclusion and prohibition of the sealers from Behring Sea or from any part of Pacific waters. That statement, of course, can be shown to be wholly fallacious, for that year happened to be one of the greatest years in the history of the sealing industry, because the largest number of schooners that ever was engaged in sealing in Pacific waters went out in 1894, and one of the largest catches ever made was in that year. We were prejudiced in the fact that we had representing us a gentleman who had proved to his fellow-commissioners that he did not know what he was talking about for he had discussed it on the floor of Parliament.

Now I come to the subject of reciprocity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is present, and I would ask him how much responsibility he has for the total and absolute failure of anything in the direction of reciprocity. In the first place who has not heard that a Tory regime was responsible for the friction that existed between the United States and Canada ? Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that so often that I have no doubt some of them actually believe the statement to be correct. Let us examine that. Here was an occasion last year when, if anything could have moved the United States to friendliness in regard to Canada and Great Britain, it was the incidents transpiring during the Spanish-American war. If any country ever had reason to be grateful, it was the United States ; and yet one of the Canadian plenipotentiaries was forced to confess, on the 13th of February, this year, in Chicago :

It is useless to conceal the fact that at the present time—

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, this was after nearly six months of association of the Liberal representatives of Canada with the representatives of the United States.

It is useless to conceal the fact that at the present time a feeling of bitterness prevails in Canada towards the United States, which is more widely extended than at any previous period.

There we have the confession of one of the plenipotentiaries entrusted with these negotiations, that the feeling in Canada was bitter, and more bitter than ever, against the United States of America. And, Sir, this language was used in the middle of their negotiations. It might, consequently, be a very interesting subject for discussion, as to whether the present Government wished to obtain reciprocity of any kind. I have quoted the speech of the right hon. gentleman in this debate, where he said, that Canadians practically did not want reciprocity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) could have told him how not to get it, for in Halifax, many years ago, that hon. gentleman told the people that the manner in which you could prevent reciprocity with the United States being obtained, was to preach the dependence of Canada upon the United States markets. Let me contrast that language of years ago with the language of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) used in this debate, and I am sure the House will be struck with the changed attitude of that Minister. He said in his speech the other day :

Although it may be quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that we are more independent of the United States than ever before, and better able by far to do without their markets, no man will dispute that the markets of the United States would be of enormous value to us if we could obtain them.

And again :

Let us meet the Americans and beat them in the markets which are open to both, and use all the advantages which will enable us to meet and beat them. Let us show them that if they decline to trade with us, they are only putting the competition off a stage, and not a very distant stage. Let us show them that so far from putting it off, they are creating a very serious competition in agricultural products, which, I am inclined to think, will soon drive them from the markets of England, if not the world. It is a good lesson to point to the United States that immediately after the imposition of what must have been a very hostile policy to Canada in the shape of the McKinley tariff, our trade expanded as it never did before. And it is worth noticing, as I think.

I ask the attention of the House to some language used by the same hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he was not in that easy position which he occupies to-day. Speaking in 1894, he said :

Hon. gentlemen may say what they please ; they may do what they please ; yet withal that we can do with our tariff, the full development of Canada must and will depend on our success in obtaining access, as I said before above all things and before all things to the markets of the great country, our great neighbour to the south of us.

After the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) had stated at Halifax that the way to prevent reciprocity was by saying that we required it, he turned around and preached this dependence on the American market, and for eighteen years he has told the people of Canada that we were absolutely dependent on it. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has gone to Washington, and now he comes back and begins to preach the old Tory doctrine, that if the United States would not deal fairly with us, we could beat them in the markets of the world, and succeed by being, as we are, totally and wholly independent of them and their good-will, and that they require as much from us as we do from them, relatively speaking. Therefore, these hon. gentlemen have been wasting money in trade negotiations, if the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is of any account whatever. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he is on record as saying that outside of unrestricted reciprocity, you cannot dicker with the United States on a trade proposition. Let me call attention, in this connection, to the reckless manner in which the Administration is handling international negotiations at the present time. Could any language be more unfortunate—if these hon. gentlemen are seriously in media res ; if these negotiations have not been finally broken off—could any language be more unfortunate than the sneering language of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) in regard to the boasted institutions of the United States. The hon. gentleman talks about the language on this side of the House being ill-timed, but let us see what he, a gentleman associated with the American commissioners, has ventured to say in regard to the Senate of the United States at a time when, as they claim, the negotiations have not been broken off. Here is the language he used in this debate :

I believe that if this had been a matter with reference to which it would have been possible to reach the great bulk of the people of the United States, a treaty could very easily have been arranged.

Here is a very important suggestion. If these observations amount to anything, there is not a ghost of a chance to accomplish a treaty with the Senate of the United States, for he tells us, if they had anything like a reasonable sort of constitution, or anything like a reasonable Senate—such, perhaps, as our own, and I do not know whether the hon. gentleman would go that far or not—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I said ours was the worst in the world.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is bound to say that. He dared not say anything else, or he would lose even the very slender hold he has on this Administration. His argument is, that on account of the unfortunate institutions possessed by the United States, the Canadian commissioners cannot accomplish a reciprocity treaty. Is the Senate of the United States to be reformed before August 2nd? Is there to be a change in the United States Senate before then? If not, according to the Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), there is to be no further negotiations; at any rate, nothing to be accomplished by this international commission. In this very debate the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) went on to say, on this absurd condition of things, after examining the votes in the Senate:

It is not merely that we must overcome the inherent difficulty of obtaining a two-thirds majority—and let me remind this House that the strongest Government that ever sat in Canada has hardly ever, except in the first years after confederation, possessed a majority of two-thirds of this Chamber—but we must besides be in a position to overcome the inevitable tendency of these various small states to regard their own individual interests without much consideration for the general good.

Well, in this country the hon. gentleman can afford to sneer at our Senate, and he and his friends can afford to make attacks on it, but I tell him that the Senate can afford to be attacked by them, and can justify its existence. But I ask, whether there was much wisdom in this sneer at this particular time, this indictment of the constitution of the United States and the condition of things existing in that country, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had the slightest idea that anything was to come from these negotiations, which have been almost confessed to be abortive. But, coming to our own case, I want again to call attention to the weakness of the Prime Minister in debate, through force of circumstances, and I want his particular attention, if he will be so good as to give it to me, in regard to a challenge which was thrown out by the leader of the Opposition. And so that I may make no mistake, I will turn to the challenge, which had reference to a very important proposition as to the constitution of our own country. The leader of the Opposition, I think, with cause, was very emphatic in regard to this extraordinary and radical proposition; and it is an argument, though not conclusive, that the proposition of the right hon. gentleman quoad the Senate is so radical that there is not in any civilized country on the globe any precedent for it. Now, this is a very formal challenge for the leader of any opposition to put to any government, and this is the language the leader of the Opposition used:

A more mad, a more silly, I do not hesitate to say, a more absurd proposal never emanated from the mouth of man. You may search the civilized world to-day where liberal institutions exist, and I defy you to find a single case in which so monstrous, so absurd, so utterly and so absolutely untenable a proposal was ever made as this proposal to which the hon. gentleman has committed himself in Montreal. He says:

"The reform we propose is this: When there is a conflict between the Senate and the popular House, then there should be a general vote and the majority should carry. That, gentlemen, is the reform which we have to propose to the people of Canada.

Now, how did the right hon. gentleman meet that? I will show you the manner in which the hon. gentleman attempted to parody a very important statement. I do not say that it is necessary to give a precedent for everything; but it is a strong argument to say, after all the experience we have had of British institutions and continental institutions, that there never was such a proposal before. We, on this side, think it a monstrous proposition, and it is reasonable to characterize it as mad and silly; and, in order to prove that and to show that no other man ever propounded such a proposition, we ask the hon. gentleman to name such a case. How does he meet that challenge? Surely, he would not have put it before the people without having given it mature consideration. This is the right hon. gentleman's answer:

Let me again draw attention to the statement of the hon. gentleman that such a reform does not exist in any other country. Well, I shall have great pleasure in quoting to my hon. friend the authority of a gentleman—

And then, he quotes from an almanac containing an article by a gentleman of distinguished position in these matters, a gentleman, I am frank to admit, whose name is associated with the constitution of our country—Sir John Bourinot. But did he ever take the trouble to ascertain whether this cursory observation—for I shall show that it was but a cursory remark of Sir John Bourinot—had any reference to such a proposition as that which the hon. gentleman has propounded? I am going to challenge the right hon. gentleman in fair debate, here and now; and before I finish this subject I will gladly sit down, if he will correct me. I am going to challenge him, as a humble student of constitutional history and the history of governments, to give me, not a cursory observation of Sir John Bourinot that there was such a system to be found, but the name of a single country in the civilized world where such a system has ever been adopted, let alone any country where such a system is in force to-day. I make that challenge seriously, to show that the right hon. gentleman has rushed into this proposition without considering his ground; and, in reply to the challenge of the leader of the Opposition to state where such a system ever obtained or now obtains, he has not given an answer, nor has any hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches, or behind him, been able to give an answer. While I go on, I ask the right hon. gentleman to consider whether he is able to do more than hide behind three lines of a lecture of Sir John Bourinot, found in an almanac; for, after reading the extract, this is what he said:

In some countries there is a union of the two Houses to consider and pass Bills on which one or the other disagrees.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Which country ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. An hon. gentleman asks: In which country? The Canadian people are entitled to know whether the right hon. gentleman ever gave sufficient study to this subject to be able to answer that question, and give the name of a country. Is he only able to say, that Sir John Bourinot said there were some countries where such a system existed? I say, that Sir John Bourinot's language cannot thus be twisted into a support of the hon. gentleman's proposition. Sir John Bourinot, in those words, evidently had in mind the well-known system that exists in the United States and on the continent of Europe, of a conference of the two houses. But, as the leader of the Opposition says, was it ever dreamed in any civilized country on the globe that one house should swamp the other, that you should have a joint vote of both houses, and that the absolute majority of both should govern? I pause for a reply. I say, there is no country where there is, or ever has been, such a system. Conferences obtain between this House and the other House. We consult in regard to our committees and in regard to many other things. The right hon. gentleman knows that; but I challenge him with confidence to name a single country where any such system obtains as he intends to force on the people of this country. He knows he cannot do it; and this reference in the almanac was the only argument he could furnish up to meet a direct and pertinent challenge from the leader of the Opposition. Now, though time presses, I suppose, I feel that the importance of this subject warrants me in giving the hon. gentleman some information from authorities which he ought to regard as of great weight. For instance, the right hon. gentleman feels aggrieved, or pretends to feel aggrieved, on account of the action of the Senate respecting the Yukon Railway Bill. Well, the manly thing to have done, under those circumstances, unless power and place are valued above everything by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, was to take the verdict of the country on that measure. The moment the Senate rejected it, if the right hon. gentleman had gone to the country, in man fashion and fulminated his charges against the Senate and their conduct, and had been returned, I say, the Senate, composed as it is, judging from everything that has happened, and if there was nothing to the contrary, would have passed the Bill. That is the English system, the system under which the Empire has grown great. That is the system under which our constitution has been, in a sense, moulded. In Earl Grey's correspondence, there is a minute of the Reform Cabinet of 1832, as follows:—

It must be admitted that cases may occur in which the House of Lords, continuing to place itself in opposition to the general wishes of the nation, and to the declared sense of the House of Commons, the greatest danger might arise, if no means existed of putting an end to these collisions which such circumstances would produce.

It is with a view to a danger of this nature that the constitution has given to the Crown the power of dissolving, or of making an addition to the House of Lords, by the exercise of the high prerogative of creating peers, which has been vested in the King for this as well as for other important purposes.

Now, turning to Sir William Anson, whose authority no one in this House will dispute, we find in his "Law and Custom of the Constitution," the following:—

And so the relations of the two Houses may thus be stated. In matters which do not greatly interest the electorate the Lords can use a free hand in rejection, amendment or postponement. In matters of widespread interest the House of Lords, by rejecting a measure sent to them by the House of Commons, might force the Queen's Ministers to advise a dissolution in order to ascertain the sense of the country. If the country gives a decided answer, the Lords must, substantially, abide by it, and, as the history of the last twenty-five years has shown, they will abide by it.

And here in Canada who should complain? The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches boast of carrying by-election after by-election. They can bring all the harpies and all the hangers-on and heelers of two or three governments to their rescue. They can resort to the most extraordinary practices, which, later on, I hope will be exposed in this House. If they believe they represent the sentiment of the country on the Yukon deal or any other question where the Senate opposes them, why should not they be asked by reasonable men in Canada, whether Liberals or Conservatives, to try the good old British plan of going to the people as a court of appeal before they try to force by their majority these crude reforms upon the country? That would be the manly and honourable course. They are not yet able to say that the British system has failed in this country or that on any occasion, after the verdict of the people has been pronounced, the Senate remained stubborn or would not recede. These expressions of opinion by the authorities I have read are the result of years of experience which we would do well to consider, as we can benefit greatly by them. These authorities are the result of experience under a system which is diametrically opposed to this proposal of the right hon. gentleman. Prof. Hearn, in his treatise on "The Government of England," also agrees in the general principle laid down by the other authorities, and says expressly as to the House of Lords:

But since the House of Lords cannot be altered by dissolution, it would, unless some other check were provided, have the power of obstructing the executive with absolute impunity. In these circumstances the remedy which the constitution provides is that which I have already endeavoured to explain. It enables the question, if the case should require, to be by means of dissolution ultimately submitted to the decision of the constituent bodies.

Then, take the Right Hon. James Bryce, of whom I need not say anything in this House—a man who is at present giving England the benefit of his knowledge and research in matters of this kind, a member of Mr. Glastone's Government, and of course a Liberal, and the author of "The American Commonwealth." Mr. Bryce says :

Should a difference arise between the House of Lords and a Ministry supported by the House of Commons, and the former persist in rejecting a Bill which the Commons sends up, a dissolution is the usual remedy ; and if the newly elected House of Commons reasserts the view of its predecessor, the Lords, according to the now recognized constitutional practice, yield at once.

Then, in Sir John Bourinot's work—and the Prime Minister has referred to him—we have the benefit of his research coming after and in review of these other great writers on the question, and writing not from a party point of view, but before this subject was mooted. He says :

As things are now in Canada, it is always within the constitutional powers of the Ministry to advise and obtain a dissolution with the avowed object of testing public sentiment on a question in dispute between an elected Commons and the nominated Chamber.

In such a case the Upper House would be constitutionally bound to bow to the popular verdict when clearly expressed.

That is the sum and substance of the constitution as it affects us. Why should the Government endeavour in this country to have a constitutional struggle and crisis on an exceedingly awkward question between provinces and provinces, when they have not exhausted the means provided in our own constitution as interpreted by the British constitution, and have not shown the courage of their convictions by going to the people and getting their direct mandate not to over-rule the Senate, but to induce the Senate to agree to what they and the people desired. They have never tried it, and until they have tried it and the Senate has shown by stubbornness that it is prepared to act contrary to the popular will as directly expressed, I affirm that there is no semblance of reason or argument or justice or right in the scheme the Government has propounded.

Passing from that, the right hon. gentleman, in his speech in this debate endeavoured to quarrel with the leader of the Opposition on the position the Conservative party took concerning our relations with the United States. I think it is unnecessary for me to cite authority to show that the Conservative party, whether under the present leader or any other leader since 1867, has desired to cultivate friendly relations with the United States, but, at the same time, has desired to show its complete independence of the United States commercially. I need not bring evidence to prove that the leader of the Opposition has interpreted public opinion correctly in maintaining the traditional policy of the Conservative party, and saying that we should follow, not a policy of retaliation, but of governing this country and legislating for this country wholly regardless of what might be thought of our policy in the United States, having in view the good of the country and copying where we can the legislation of the United States to our own advantage. I think that the right hon. leader of the Government would have gained favour with his own party and with moderate men throughout the country if he had said he accepted the suggestion and that he would accept support from this side of the House in maintaining that independent, Canadian, national and rational policy. But the right hon. gentleman and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), seemed anxious to pick a quarrel with the leader of the Opposition and to put him in a false position by suggesting that he was endeavouring to use inflammatory language and to provoke the animosity of the United States, and suggest retaliation merely for the sake of retaliation and of punishment. Now, if time permitted, I could give you from the pen of a gentleman closely in the confidence of the right hon. leader of the Government language almost verbatim like that used by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I refer to Mr. Willison in his letters to the "Globe" and articles in the "Globe." They are almost in the line taken by the leader of the Opposition, and they speak the feelings of the people of Canada regardless of politics.

I care not into what province you go to-day, the very fact that the Treasury benches had perforce to adopt the main features of the National Policy, is evidence of it. There is the feeling that while we wish to cultivate friendly relations with our great neighbours to the south, we are absolutely tired of begging favours at their hands, and we wish this House to be in a position at all times to legislate for the Canadian people, to do what is in our interests, whether in relation to the United States, or to any other part of the world. There is a fretting, there is a chafing now in this country, we find ourselves tied up, bound hand and foot, by the negotiations conducted by the Government out of which nothing practical will come, and in consequence of which we find ourselves unable to legislate in any particular in regard to the great interest of the Canadian people. It is not only the young men of this country, but I believe it is also men of all ages of life who are absolutely tired of marking time to see what our neighbours to the south will do. There are things we can do, there are things we ought to do, and there are things that ought to be done this session, and could be done this session if the right hon. gentleman had not, as I say, in this diplomatic manner tied us up by the hands and by the heels. When he talks of the leader of the Opposition using inflammatory language, let me show how entirely unfair he is in charging upon this party or its leader any desire whatever to embarrass the Government or to cause ill-feeling with the United States, when the leader of the Opposition lifts his voice in advocacy of a Canadian policy being promulgated for the benefit of the Canadian people alone. Let me refer to some communications in the "Globe," for instance, of February 24th, 1899, to show that I am speaking by the book when I say that when the right hon. gentleman attempts to rebuke this side of the House, our leader, or the men who sit behind him, he is rebuking the sentiment of the whole country, if Mr. Willison, the able editor of the "Globe" can be taken as an exponent of that sentiment. Both under his own name and in his editorial writings in the "Globe," he happens to have said precisely the same thing as the leader of the Opposition, he happens to have said it before the right hon. gentleman spoke, perhaps he dare not continue the same advocacy now. But when he was free and untrammelled, writing as a Canadian—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I spoke in Toronto on the same subject on the 22nd February.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Yes, this is an important fact to mention. On the 22nd of February he did give voice to the sentiments that we find in the Liberal press, and he spoke not only the sentiments of Liberals in the eastern part of Canada, but of those on the Pacific coast, as well as of the Conservatives there, when he spoke of a Canadian policy, of legislating regardless of any other country. We have in that speech the genuine feeling of the Liberals, untrammelled by discipline and unaffected by the party lash, and with these sentiments the right hon. gentleman, if he attacks our position, must join issue. In the "Globe" of February 24th, we find this :

Our duty is to make the most of our own sources of strength without troubling ourselves about the disposition of our neighbours, and without basing either fear or hope upon their public policy.

Again in the same article :

Our view of the relations we should maintain with the United States is that we should regard them largely as one business concern regards another. We cannot expect favours from that source. Neither do we think that very much is to be gained by the attempt to balance one concession against another. Whatever may be the disposition of Americans toward us, the fact is that their system of government renders the adoption of a treaty involving reciprocal concessions almost as difficult as the passage of a camel through the needle's eye.

Then again—and this is important, and for that reason I dwell upon it, as showing that the hon. gentleman did not understand the ground he was treading when he endeavoured to put upon the shoulders of the leader of the Opposition a mad desire to make party capital against the Government, when in fact he was endeavouring to show this House the real feeling of the country. Take Mr. Willison's own letter from Washington, where he was, I suppose, in close communication with the right hon. gentleman himself, and in which he writes :

Reciprocity in adjectives, but no reciprocity in trade ; rhetorical good-will, but tariff war all along the boundary.

That is the position that confronts him. Then, speaking of the position of the American citizen, Mr. Willison writes :

So let him stand. He has a right to his protectionism, as we have a right to mark out our public policy with a sole regard to our own interests.

Concluding his letter, he says :

In Canada to-day the national spirit is as fervent and as strong even as the United States, and in proportion as we grow in strength, in national dignity and in old-fashioned British confidence in ourselves, we shall grow in the respect of our neighbours to the south, and influence in the Empire to which we belong, and, let us hope, prove no estranging factor in the relations between the old mother country and the mighty republic of the new world.

I believe he there speaks the sentiment of the people of Canada, and he speaks the sentiment which the leader of the Opposition, both before these remarks were made and in this House has expressed. Then, take the "Globe" of March 4th on the same subject. If our advice and suggestions can have no weight with the right hon. gentleman, at least he will consider the advice and suggestions in the same line coming from the great organ of the Liberal party :—

Canadians have at the present moment a rare opportunity of enforcing a new National Policy, a National Policy affecting products which are more truly native than even those of the farm or the orchard. In these we have rivals everywhere, but in white pine, in pulp wood, in nickel, in lead, we have commodities in which we enjoy something of the nature of a complete or partial monopoly. We were quite willing to turn these into the complimentary volume of exchange, but as this has been vetoed—

I call your attention to that, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Willison, the editor of the "Globe," who was at Washington with these gentlemen during the negotiations, does not say that proceedings have been adjourned, but he says the trade proposal has been vetoed, rejected, turned down.

—vetoed through no fault of ours, the next movement must be to make the very most possible out of the advantages that we possess in this respect.

Again :

If the American mill man were cut off from the Canadian forests, the cost of his raw material would go up at once, and the calculated advantage that he now possesses would be cut off at once.

Then, skipping a portion of the article :

The nickel industry is in largely the same position. By the same policy of putting a heavy impost on the refined article, while nickel matte is admitted free, our American friends have made it next to impossible to establish the refining industry here.

Again :

The Federal Government has already power to impose an export duty, and should use that power fearlessly.

Now, nothing but these negotiations in Washington block the way of a useful reform being carried out on the floors of this House, as hon. gentlemen will see. Coming now to a subject of peculiar interest to me, I read this from the "Globe" in the line of making a suggestion that has been so ruthlessly spurned by the right hon. gentleman simply because it came from his opponent. Here is what the "Globe" says :

The condition of silver-lead mining in British Columbia should also be inquired into. The same tariff game is worked there with respect to the lead, so that of the growing production in British Columbia the American smelting companies get an undue proportion. The duty amounts to about $33 per ton on the lead. In 1897 British Columbia miners paid $600,000 for the privilege of having their ores admitted to the United States for treatment, and the amount would probably be $800,000 or $900,000 in 1898.

Of this large sum but little goes into the revenues of the United States, for when the smelter exports the lead to Canada or Great Britain the duty of 1½ cents a pound is remitted and goes into his pocket. All that the miner receives is about $20 a ton for the lead contained in the ore, while if he buys it back from the smelter it costs him from $60 to $80 a ton.

Now, after a few words the "Globe" goes on to say :

It is well worthy of careful inquiry, with the view of seeing if this waste is at all necessary, and whether it could not be corrected by a strong policy. Retaliation would be a foolish policy.

I heard some one say "dispense" from the other side of the House, but after all said and done that interruption pays me a great compliment. Instead of using my own bare argument it has seemed to me far better that I should say acceptable things of the proposition laid down, but instead of the useful advice offered to the right hon. gentleman by the hon. leader of the Opposition being received in a proper way, the right hon. gentleman spurned it, and endeavoured to place him in a false position. I now show, by their own organ, that the leader of the Opposition spoke for the country, represented by the independent spirit in this House, not the unjust and intolerant spirit that is manifested on the other side of the House. But none of these useful things we can now do, none of this advice can be felt this session, because the hon. gentlemen have got affairs in such a jumbled and inextricable position that with the commission adjourned to August 2nd, 1899, probably not to meet again, all that Canada is enabled to do, is to mark time.

There are other affairs to which I would refer. I had intended to perform what I consider a solemn duty. If we are to continue I will go further into a subject that I consider is necessary to be dealt with, lest the country should consider that it is not as serious as it is.

The PRIME MINISTER. Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I refer to the administration of the Yukon territory. There is a chapter in the history of Canada that I would be glad if it had not been written, but there are facts, and facts that are so stubborn that I am surprised, in view of all that has transpired, setting aside altogether the incompetency of the Minister of the Interior, there has not been some action taken by the Government which would have removed, for this session, at any rate, the discussion of such a subject from the arena of debate. The Minister of the Interior resorted to the most extraordinary plan apparently for the purpose of shielding and preventing a searching investigation into these matters. His deputy wrote to me—I suppose he wrote to all the other members of the House—asking me to kindly furnish some officer of his, Mr. Ogilvie, up in the Yukon territory, with such information as I had in regard to the misconduct of officials and the misgovernment of that territory. There never was in the history of government such a remarkable request made to a member of Parliament. I do not know whether the Minister has denied it at all or whether the question has been put to him; at any rate, he puts his request in this way: "I have appointed a man to an important office. He is under me; I have appointed him to inquire into some vague charges that have been made in regard to delinquencies of officials in office. and if you have any information in regard to maladministration in that territory will you send all that information up to my officer?" I do not want to deal with the hon. gentleman's officers, the gentleman I want to deal with is the Minister of the Interior. What would have been the use of my sending to his officer charges and facts so that his officer, his understrapper, a gentleman who got his appointment from him, a gentleman whose position can be affected by him—what would have been the sense of my sending or any other gentleman sending these particulars to him! I was amazed when I considered the position the Government now take compared with the position the Government took in 1896. They had not got into office, the Prime Minister had not kissed hands, when the Minister of the Interior had the audacity to begin an account that has run up to some $18,000 or $19,000, for which the Prime Minister is responsible, by employing Pinkerton detectives and by going to extraordinary expense in order to pin, if possible, upon his political opponents, charges in regard to Dominion elections, which he claimed would have sent them to penitentiary or at any rate give him and Liberal candidates information upon which they could file petitions in the election courts and unseat their opponents. Without information, without specific charges, the Minister of the Interior has, I say, dared, before the Government came into office and before the Government of the present leader of the Opposition went out of office, to begin an account which was paid by the Government of the right hon. gentleman after he got into office in order to ferret out, in order to fish for, evidence upon which he could fasten charges upon his political opponents in Manitoba. But there were no detectives employed when the press, from one end of the country to the other, rang with charges and were filled with interviews of men who had come from the Yukon, when the "Times" of London had such charges as Miss Shaw put in her communications to that paper after having been up in that country, when evidence of that character was all over the country, and the impression was general in the minds of all men, no matter whether they belonged to one side or the other, that there was something wrong in the Yukon, that there had been maladministration in connection with the officials appointed by the Minister of the Interior, there was no money expended, no expense incurred, no Pinkerton detectives employed, to track down these men. When the charges were being made the officials implicated decamped day after day from the Yukon and were succeeded by others. There was no investigation, no charges made by the department itself, but a cool request in an official letter to members of this House, to communicate to Mr. Ogilvie any information which they might have in regard to maladministration in the Yukon and to corruption on the part of the officers of the Government. In the case of the Manitoba prosecution, or persecutions, Mr. Howell was supported by the Minister of the Interior in refusing to disclose the names of informers, but now the hon. gentleman asks us to make specific charges.

Let us see some responsible man who will come forward and attack us in regard to what we have done in the Yukon. The Government say that; knowing very well, as they cannot fail to know, that in many cases where men have been victimized and robbed of the rights that they had every reason to expect would be guaranteed under Canadian laws; they dared not give their names, because these Government officials who had so ruthlessly dealt with them, would rob them afterwards of anything that was left if these outraged citizens dared to make charges which would bring upon these officials disgrace and obloquy. Under these circumstances—while I do not think that in the case of the Manitoba prosecutions there was any justification for Mr. Howell, backed and supported as he was by the Minister of the Interior and the Liberals on the committee, to refuse to divulge all the information upon which that huge account of $18,000 or $19,000 was run up—here was a case if there ever was one, where the Government needed no prompting, and where the Government were in honour bound to have dragged down these officials of the Department of the Interior who had done that which brought disgrace and infamy, not only on the Yukon, but on the name of Canada and on the name of the Canadian Government the world over. I propose to deal at some length with the information which is at hand with regard to this matter. I propose to go into the facts of this case, because while I fully understand that the subject must be definitely dealt with later on, and while the Government cannot refuse to give this House and the country the amplest means that a committee can afford, to probe this thing to the bottom, I believe, Sir, the debate on the Address should not close until some more extended reasons may be spread upon the "Hansard" of the House of Commons, and given to the people of the country.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the maladministration of the Yukon territory. The history of that territory under this Government is a history of failure and disgrace. There have been notoriously bad regulations; there have been imposts, taxes, and royalties, which would make such a personage as Oom Paul blush. Notoriously there have been under this Administration, underpaid, inefficient and corrupt officials, described by Australians and by Englishmen as a pack of licensed thieves—very strong language that. Some of the information that I will give to this House seems to justify the use of that language. There has been favouritism in the issue of liquor permits, a system so extraordinary that to my knowledge, fees have been obtained by Liberal solicitors—or solicitors of Liberal proclivities; that is proclivities of the Liberal political persuasion—to the extent of $500 for merely obtaining from the Interior Department for clients, a permit to sell liquor in the Territories. There has been favouritism in the grants of the lands; there has been favouritism in the contracts let by this Government; there have been notorious blunders in the management of the transportation of Government supplies from any part of Canada up to that territory. There has been an extraordinary exhibition of favouritism towards the United States transportation companies in connection with the transportation of supplies by means of United States steamers from United States ports, carrying our Canadian materials and supplies to the Government posts in Canadian territory. There has been a favouritism shown by this Government, and a marked favouritism, to United States routes for transportation of supplies, against the two principal ports of Victoria and Vancouver in British territory, where private capital was struggling as best it could against the formidable rivalry of foreign capital in the ports of the United States. There has been, beyond and above and surrounding all the troubles and irregularities that have occurred, this extraordinary feature, which to my mind—and as the evidence will show—had a most painful effect, namely, the secrecy of official records. This secrecy of official records has tended to create not only throughout this country, but throughout the centres of intelligence in the Empire, perhaps more than a suspicion that the whole thing was conceived in iniquity. Trace the history of the mining legislation and the legislation in regard to the development of the mineral resources of British Columbia, from its inception to the present day, whether it was under the supervision of the British authority or as afterwards under the supervision of the local authority, and you will find that both the British and the local authorities seemed to pride themselves on having all the official records public, and accessible to the public without fee or charge. That has been the great vindication of the system of gold mining, or of mining generally in the province of British Columbia. But in the Yukon territory, the very fact that these official records were secret, that you could not during the official hours from 10 to 4 by payment of any fee or otherwise obtain a full knowledge of how the record stood; that very fact seems to me to be at the foundation of not merely the impression that had been formed in regard to the bad administration of that country, but it afforded an excuse and an opportunity for all the villainy that has occurred, because advantage was taken of that time and again as will be seen. There has been, after all is said and done, above and over the necessities and desires of individual speculators—of men who endeavour to enrich themselves out of the resources of the country—this crying shame and this crying neglect perpetrated in regard to that portion of the British Empire and of Canada, and it is this, that, whereas huge royalties have been imposed—royalties so large that all the history of Spain, all the history of Australia, all the history of British African government affords not the slightest justification for the huge exactions that have been imposed upon the development of the mineral wealth of the Yukon; yet, withal, there has been an unparalleled and disgraceful neglect of local necessities and local improvements. Why, Mr. Speaker, last session, from this side of the House, out of official records, an appeal was made to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches in regard to the improvement of navigation and improvements in connection with the localities themselves; but, so far as I am able to discover, not a particle of attention has been directed to these important considerations. You have fever raging to an extraordinary extent in the country; you have correspondents of the highest possible standing going into the district of Dawson, whence this Government has derived an enormous revenue, and you have them all coming out with the statement that this Government has not raised its little finger to promote the improvement of local conditions or to prevent contagion of the most dire and disastrous character. You have a condition of things there in regard to health that is almost indescribable, and that is unparalleled in any other part of Canada. There has not before been such a state of neglect, that I am aware of, as exists, and has existed, in Dawson from the time the Government began to reap its revenue from the speculators and people who went in to develop the resources of the country. You have nothing like it in any other part of Canada. And yet it was no new thing. There had been mining districts developed aforetime, long before the time of confederation, in the province of British Columbia; and yet you heard of no scandal and no condition of things like that which exists in the Yukon territory. There has been some defence suggested; I have seen it in the press, and perhaps it has been mentioned in this debate, that, in regard to the development of the North-west Territories and Manitoba, the old Conservative Government had not been able to take time by the forelock and to arrange things to be suitable and pleasant for all the settlers; but that is a proposition to be considered, I submit, on its own merits. It has no similarity whatever to the opening up of a new gold field or a new mineral territory. So far as the Yukon is concerned, we had the advantage of the history of the world: we had the dire consequences of ill-considered legislation in Australia to warn us; and, on the other hand, we had the successful legislation of the Imperial Government in the province of British Columbia, not so far removed from the Yukon territory, where they had been able, from away off in London, to practically open up and administer the rich mineral wealth of that province without scandal or suspicion of any kind whatever. And, after the advantage of all these years of experience, after all you may say in regard to the faults and deficiencies of the previous Governments—for it was an advantage to know where mistakes had been made, so that they might be avoided—we come to a condition of affairs absolutely unparalleled. For the support of that statement I need not refer to any party press or to any party opinion in the Dominion of Canada. The witness to whom I have referred already, is, perhaps, as far removed from the scene of local strife in Canada as we could wish an impartial witness to be—the correspondent of the London "Times"; and hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches know that, on a recent occasion, notwithstanding that an opportunity of months had occurred for reflection and consideration, when an officer of the Public Works Department made the strongest possible appeal for the vindication of what he called the Civil Service of Canada at the hands of Miss Shaw, after she had delivered a lecture in London on her experience in Dawson, Miss Shaw absolutely refused to take back one single word that she had committed to writing months before in regard to the condition of affairs in that territory. Surely, Mr. Speaker, without saying more, these statements or opinions from that source ought to have been sufficient to put the Government on its guard.

Now, before I go into this matter more in detail, I want to refer to what some people in Canada are apt to think a vindication of the Government, or, at any rate, some qualification of the grave charges that have been made against the Government of our country in connection with the Yukon territories. That is, that when on occasion persons representing transportation companies, mining companies, or any other interests, happen to be at the capital, though these self-same individuals may have committed themselves to public print in corroboration of the serious charges to which I have referred, they have been found retracting or qualifying the statements they had previously made, and giving to the Government the pleasant information that, after all, the only people in the Yukon territories who have been dissatisfied, or who are grumbling, are the failures among them—the men who have gone without knowing what the needs of the country were, or what the conditions required of them, and, having made a mess for themselves or the parties they represented, were only too prone to lay the whole blame on the shoulders of the Government; and these men, coming to Ottawa for concessions, privileges and considerations, have rushed into print to vindicate, as far as they could, the character of the Government. That undoubtedly has, rightly or wrongly, created some impression in the minds of those who follow these things favourable to the Government, or, at least, it has caused men to doubt whether the serious state of affairs existed in the Yukon territory that has been charged by a great many individuals. I think that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will not think it extraordinary if I say that when you find a man who, at one time, has charged the Government with neglect and the officers appointed by the Government with corruption, on coming to Ottawa seeking a privilege or concession, appears in print as a vindicator, his evidence may be set aside as not weighing much one way or the other. But I have been informed by men whom I thoroughly believe to be honourable men, subjects of the Queen residing in England—not Australian miners or African miners, but men who have convinced me at any rate that they represent houses, some of them the very first banking houses in England—that they have had experiences in the Yukon which were enough to make a Canadian blush for his country. I have asked whether they would allow me to use their names, to quote their statements, and they have made answer in the negative.

Mr. R. R. DOBELL (Quebec West). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I see that my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) lays stress upon that, as does the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who lays it down at the outset that there should be specific charges.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And hon. gentlemen behind him agree with that. So, they wanted the names of the men who would take the responsibility of making a charge. But what are these charges? The facts that I shall refer to later on will show that they are serious. On the surface this challenge of names and specific charges seems plausible—I admit that frankly. The ordinary man will say that if you cannot make a specific charge or find one who will take the responsibility of making it, your talk is waste, it is idle and there is nothing that the Government need concern itself about. But we are dealing with a unique condition of affairs. I confess that when I asked to be allowed to use the names of the men who made these charges any they declined I was somewhat weakened. But what was their answer? It was this: They were not Canadians, they had lived in England under a system under which such conditions could not possibly exist at the present day. No officer acting directly under the British Government would dare to do the things of which they complained. These men, however, had acquired interests in mineral claims, some for themselves directly and others representing companies—including some strong English companies. We would not dare, they said, to give our names. We went as trustees for people in England and have acquired certain interests under your laws and under the system by which you are governed. If the Government of this country, of which we know nothing, would retain in office the unscrupulous scoundrels with whom we have had to deal, if they would support the men who have robbed us and tyrannized over us, who have acted in every respect dishonourably and corruptly, how can we know but that the Government with its despotic power over the regulation under which we hold our title, would, by Order in Council, embarrass us and rob us finally of all we hold. Is that unreasonable?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. "Hear, hear" comes from the Treasury benches. Let me consider that for a moment. Hon. gentlemen opposite think it is as unreasonable to suppose that there is truth in charges of that character, but when the evidence is brought before the House I think that these "hear, hears" will be fewer.

Mr. McMULLEN. Bring on your evidence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will bring some of it forward before the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) leaves this Chamber, unless he is afraid to hear it. Let us consider what has happened. Where is the original outfit that went to the Yukon under which these infamies occurred? Scattered to the four winds of Heaven. Where is that Poo-hah, Mr. F. C. Wade? Does he hold all these offices—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Wade is in Dawson City, I believe, ready to meet any charges.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does he hold all the offices with which he was clothed at the outset?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, says the Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). What odds, if he is there to answer?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is he to answer?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Anything brought against him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As a matter of fact, Mr. Wade took the trouble to ascertain whether any charges would be brought against him during this session, asking whether I myself intended to say anything against his character, on the ground that if I did he would desire to be on the spot to answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Wait for a moment. Candidly, I answered that I did intend to reflect on the character of Mr. Wade, and that if I were in his position, I would be on the spot. He immediately started for the Yukon, and is now in Dawson City, as the Minister of the Interior tells us.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not know that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will be able to say that long, because I apprehend that Mr. Wade may be back before Parliament is prorogued.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, he will not be taken by surprise. At any rate he is now in Dawson City, and unless the Postmaster General shows more activity about the mail, Mr. Wade will not know what has been said here before the end of the session, for I understand that three tons of mail are detained at Lake Bennett, whether by the intention of the Postmaster General or by accident, I do not know.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Neither by accident or otherwise has a pound of mail gone forward irregularly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When did it get loose? For I have some good ground for believing that it was done.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman has no information whatever. Ever since the ice has enabled the Mounted Police to traverse the lake, the mails have gone forward. I do not believe there has been a pound of mail waiting transportation at Bennett longer than the usual time. The mails have left regularly every two weeks.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite accept that. The usual time means months.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I stated that the mails left Bennett every two weeks, and have gone as far forward as they could, as the state of the ice enabled the police to do the work.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman say that all the mail matter has gone forward regularly?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I say that so far as my information goes there is no foundation whatever for the hon. gentleman's statement. The hon. gentleman ought to know that the Mounted Police are industrious and courageous, and anxious to make a success of the service. They have brought the mails out in about 10 days from Dawson City, and I believe have made equally good despatch in when the condition of the ice enabled them to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would remind the Postmaster General that the "Globe's" correspondent at Dawson City tells an exactly opposite story.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The "Globe's" correspondent makes no such statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). It does make such a statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I happen to be to some extent interested in this question, I happen to have a partner in the city of Dawson, and neither letters from me nor letters from him can be conveyed in one direction nor the other, though he went into that city in November last.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman's charge is not at all correct.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman himself is not able to make a statement that is worth anything on that matter, as he was not there, and it is not possible for him to know anything about it. However, he has endeavoured to divert the current of this discussion a little in regard to the postal facilities. There is not one of his friends on the coast, and there is not one member from British Columbia who will undertake to rise in this House and say that there is an intelligent man in the province of British Columbia having communications with the city of Dawson, who will say that the postal service between Dawson and Vancouver and Victoria has been anything else than an absolute disgrace for months past.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I challenge the hon. gentleman to produce the testimony of any person who is a credible witness, to sustain the accuracy of the statement that he has just made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, I challenge the hon. gentleman's supporters, and I say that the hon. gentleman's supporters in this House sitting behind him, will not get up and say that the postal communication between Victoria, Vancouver and Dawson City has been in a satisfactory condition for months past.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman stated it was a disgrace. I now here challenge the hon. gentleman or any one else to make good his charges, and he shall have, so far as I am concerned, a committee of this House to investigate the mail service this winter—as he is referring to this winter—and the management of the Mounted Police. He shall have the fullest opportunity of making good any charges he may make.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly so.

Mr. G. R. MAXWELL (Burrard). My hon. friend is not the only one on the coast that has communications with Dawson City. I have had letters every month from Dawson City for the last four or five months.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And that is an answer to my statement that the service in general has been absolutely unsatisfactory and disgraceful, and that it is known to the hon. gentleman's constituents. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, is prejudiced a little by his relations with Deadman's Island, which is a matter of interest between him and the Government, and a matter that will bear further investigation.

Mr. MAXWELL. I will be ready for you when you come on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the Minister of Militia and Defence will not be quite as ready as the hon. gentleman. The member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) was ready, no doubt, long ago when he happened to be fortunate enough to induce the Government to perpetrate one of the most extraordinary frauds upon the people of Vancouver that was ever perpetrated on any people in this country—the hon. gentleman was ready to push the Minister of Militia and Defence into that position. But there is not a Minister on the Treasury benches who will now rise up and say they propose to confirm the lease that the member for Burrard induced the Minister of Militia and Defence to grant and to put his name to, that is the lease of Deadman's Island. I am speaking to the Treasury benches. There is not a Minister of the Crown who is at this moment prepared to plunge himself into that position and say he is going to stand by this lease which the member for Burrard happened to induce the Minister of Militia and Defence to put his name to. Of course he comes forward, the only member for British Columbia, to vindicate this rotten post office service, notorious in the province of British Columbia. The Postmaster General must know that his rickety old post office service is a by-word in the province of British Columbia. Take it from Nelson, take it from Rossland, the member representing that district will not rise up and say that the service there is anything but a disgrace. I have had some experience with correspondence between Nelson and the coast not so long ago, and I found that a passenger could go two or three days ahead of a letter from the city of Nelson to the city of Vancouver, and that I myself could go from Nelson to Rossland three or four days ahead of a registered letter. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman is notoriously neglecting and starving the post service for the sake of vindicating "I, William Mulock," in regard to this vaster Empire than has been. That is the position in which he is. The penny postage is his forte and outside of that, when it comes down to the ordinary humdrum business of the service, he does not know much about it. But I think we are digressing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentlemen are quite right. The Minister of the Interior, backed up by the Postmaster General, tried to turn the current of this discussion off into a direction altogether foreign to what I have in mind. However, I have no intention of neglecting any of the points that I have in view. An hon. gentleman has just put into my hands this ugly and formidable fact, that a letter posted at Glenora, December 1st, 1898, arrived at Ottawa on February 29. You can see the postmarks on the letter. The letter was sent to A. Martin, M.P. There is something rotten in the state of Denmark. Now, I was referring to these gentlemen who, when this interest was evoked in regard to the extraordinary state of affairs, suddenly decamped from Dawson City, which, it seems to me, amounts to an admission of corruption—because charges of corruption had been made: specific, perhaps not; with names attached to the charges, perhaps not. But there were charges made in the press all over this country, all over the world, in fact, and the result was the sudden disappearance of all these gentlemen in charge. What became of Mr. Walsh? Let us begin at the beginning. Mr. Howell said:

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). He never got in.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Major Walsh was charged with wrongdoing in several particulars, but instead of standing to his guns and justifying the reputation he had for personal courage in the times of old, in the time of the inauguration of the Mounted Police in the Northwest, suddenly decamped from Dawson, following most of the men against whom charges were made.

But I charge more against the Minister of the Interior, the responsibility for all I am going to say; I do not wish to deal with these understrappers, I do not wish to deal with the creatures of the Minister of the Interior. He cannot in fairness shelter himself behind their misconduct; he stands primarily charged with all the rascality and all the nefarious conduct of these men. We are dealing with the Government, we are not dealing with individuals, and when they undertake to appoint certain men who disgrace the offices in which they are put, who act in the most reckless and dishonourable manner, it is no excuse for the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches to say that, in one way or other, they have caused the disappearance of these men from the public service. I drive home the charge to the Treasury benches; I say that the hon. gentlemen who sit there are individually and collectively responsible for all the maladministration, all the crooked work, and all the disgraceful conduct of their minions out in the territory of the Yukon. It may be well for the correspondent of the "Times," or for the correspondent of any other paper to simply use general language to refer to the condition of things that exists and give expressions of joy and gratification that there seems to be a new era, and that some new men have been appointed, but what the taxpayers of Canada have to consider, what the Canadian voter has to consider, is this: Are the Government in any way responsible for this state of things? Against the Ministers of the Crown, against the Treasury benches I charge to-night that there has been a most serious state of things existing, and that they have not lifted their little fingers to show that they are themselves innocent or that they themselves can be considered as reprobating the facts and as punishing the delinquents. Therefore, they must stand in the criminal box with the men whom we can put in the criminal box.

In regard to this, I want to refer to some general principles before I come to the specific facts. I want to refer to the interesting discussion that took place in the Public Accounts Committee last session, and which was reported by that committee to this House. I hold in my hand the report, and I draw your attention to some evidence in regard to the administration of the criminal law of the country with the object, let hon. gentlemen understand, that I may be able more fully to fasten upon the Treasury benches the responsibility for which I hold them in every sense accountable. I say that in connection with the so-called Manitoba election frauds, this was the evidence on which this Government ventured, without any direct sanction to Parliament, to embark in a huge expenditure, an enormous expenditure of public money. The gentleman known as Mr. Clifford Sifton, now a member of this Government, but not then a member of this House, happened to write to the Prime Minister on July 17th, 1896, that he had reason to believe—to use his own language:

The result of the late elections in some of the constituencies of Manitoba indicated to me that a fraud of some kind—

I dwell upon that——had been perpetrated in the interest of the Government candidates. I at once placed skilled detectives at work, and have now in my possession conclusive evidence—

The examination in the Public Accounts Committee showed that statement in regard to conclusive evidence to be absolutely without warrant, as I will show later on—

—of an organized system of tampering with ballots, which constitutes the most colossal crime against honest electors which I have ever had any knowledge of.

The Minister of the Interior wrote a letter of this character on the 17th of July. He implored the right hon. the Prime Minister to supply him with means of ransacking the province of Manitoba for evidence that would incriminate members of the Conservative party, and those gentlemen who are elected for the different constituencies, and without asking Mr. Clifford Sifton, as he was then, for specific charges, without asking for the names of his informants, without taking any of those precautions that the Treasury benches seemed, in regard to the Yukon territory, to think necessary, the Prime Minister says on the 24th of July, almost on the day on which he should have received the letter of the 17th of July

I feel confident that you will unearth the most odious conspiracy that has taken place for many long years, and we will most willingly furnish the necessary funds for the service, in order to carry on the work in which you are engaged.

This is the introduction of a little bill amounting to some $18,000 or $19,000, for which I suppose this Government is responsible, $10,000 of which has already been paid, and the result was the conviction of one poor creature who confessed at the trial that he was guilty of dishonourable conduct. But we have more in this interesting revelation before the Public Accounts Committee. On page 52 of the report of the Public Accounts Committee we have the testimony of Mr. Howell, who did not say that he was in possession of any such information as Mr. Clifford Sifton stated he had on the 17th of July. I want to be exact. Mr. Howell did not say that he had in his possession conclusive evidence, but Mr. Howell frankly admitted that instead of having what Mr. Sifton said he had in his possession, they started on a fishing inquiry, they employed Pinkerton detectives from the United States, that they might be able to fish up conclusive evidence, and they ransacked the province of Manitoba at the expense of the people of Canada from July to December, 1896, that they might be in a position not only to indict Conservatives for malpractices, but to get an easy and cheap way of unseating Conservatives for irregularities in connection with petitions. In his examination, Mr. Howell, being examined by the Minister of the Interior, says :

Q. You have stated that at one of these interviews I gave you some lengthy instructions in regard to what you were to do ?

And the Minister of the Interior said :

Yes ; I intimated to you that I had received information to the effect that there had been extensive frauds practised in connection with the election ?—A. Yes.

Q. And instructed you to proceed with the investigation of them ?

Not to lay charges or information on the conclusive evidence that he had to convict, not by any means ; but to run up a huge bill at the expense of the people of this country, that he would father on the Prime Minister, to collect the conclusive information.

Q. How did that compare with the action that would be taken in any other criminal case ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

Mark this, Mr. Speaker :

A. I think it was practically the same. I am usually brought into criminal cases at a very early stage, and evidence is gathered very often subject entirely to my direction.

Question by the Minister of the Interior.—The Attorney General, as well as counsel and others may have charge of the prosecution before the case is prepared for trial and before the information is laid. It is usual to employ detectives——and work up the case, as detectives say.

Mark this, Mr. Speaker :

And Mr. Howell replied :

Yes, quite so. I think I have done it under your instructions before.

Now, Mr. Speaker, think of the Minister of the Interior instructing Mr. Howell, or any other counsel, to work up a case against Mr. F. C. Wade, Mr. Clarke, or Mr. Perdue, or whoever these gentlemen were. Said the hon. the Minister of the Interior :

I think so, several times. The Crown does not wait as a rule, according to your experience, until there is evidence enough to convict a man before a jury, before it starts to make inquiries.

And said Mr. Howell, who at this time had drawn about $6,000 as counsel fees :

No, that has not been my experience. When we get a suspicion—

This was in the good old days of Manitoba, and when, of course, the Minister of the Interior was merely Attorney General of that province ; this was not when he had his own dupes and his own appointees out in the district of the Yukon. Mr. Howell said :

When we get a suspicion we start, and I may say it is perhaps different in Manitoba from what it is in other places, certainly different from this province, because there are no county attorneys in Manitoba, as there are here, and the prosecuting counsel in Manitoba has to take a burden that is not taken in Ontario.

Then said the Minister of the Interior :

Sir Charles Tupper seems to think that there was some discredit to be cast upon the proceedings, because it was, as he said, a fishing excursion that you sent out detectives ? Did the proceedings differ in any respect whatever from the ordinary proceedings in any criminal case ?

And said Mr. Howell :

No, I have fished just the same in this case as I did in the Holland murder case under your direction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what would have been the hon. gentleman's bag, if he had employed Mr. Howell and the Pinkerton detectives to fish in the Yukon territory. The proceeds in the way of minerals have been large ; fancy, Mr. Speaker, what a bag there would have been in the ordinary fishing for crime there. Said the Minister of the Interior :

Do you remember, Mr. Howell, the general nature of the instructions I gave you at the time ?

And Mr. Howell said :

I know you told me to hunt it out, and if it required a great deal of expense to find it out and bring the rascals to justice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the expense did not bother the Minister of the Interior. He was the Attorney General of Manitoba, and he was not going to pay the bill himself, and Manitoba was not going to pay the bill, but the Prime Minister of this country, the Government of this country, was going to pay the bill, and the Federal Government did pay the bill. So they went on a fishing excursion on the twaddle, and on the hearsay, and on the information of a drunken reprobate, named Freeborn, to try and fasten on the Conservative party charges of irregularity and misconduct, which, whether it would send a man to prison or not, would get at the public expense evidence to unseat Conservatives, for which they were individually in no sense responsible. I have more to say about this, Mr. Speaker, for it becomes now a pertinent matter. It is a splendid matter of comparison as to how eager Mr. Clifford Sifton was to hunt down the rascals, and to go on fishing excursions, and to obtain by hook or by crook, calling Pinkerton detectives to the rescue, evidence in the matter of an election case in the province of Manitoba at the cost of $18,000 or $19,000 to the exchequer of Canada—to compare that with his present position, and how lordly he sits, when he is Minister of the Interior, and how he demands, when the whole world is ringing with charges of malversation in office, and charges in regard to the corruption of his creatures in the Yukon territory: Produce your specific charges; give me your name; state under your signature, if you dare, what can be said of these men.

Let us go on with this comparison, because I think the country will be interested in knowing how that situation contrasts with the position the Minister of the Interior now takes. We came a little closer to him than during the investigation, in order that I might be able to show that Mr. Howell went into this matter recklessly, that Mr. Howell had not in his possession from the Mr. Clifford Sifton of that time any reasonable evidence which justified him in going into this wild-goose chase. I pressed him for Mr. Howell to produce to the Public Accounts Committee the information he had in his possession, either at the time he saw Mr. Sifton, when Mr. Sifton wrote the evidence that he had this extraordinary proof in his possession, or, as to the evidence he had before he had these very men arrested, and what do you suppose was the condition of affairs that confronted me? Why, forsooth, in that committee they took subterfuge behind the privilege of a prosecuting Crown attorney. They told us that it was against the administration of justice that any public prosecutor should be compelled to tell a committee of Parliament the names of his informants. Why, they said: It would obstruct the course of justice, if the Crown authorities had to divulge the names of their informants. That was to be locked in the breast of the Crown prosecuting authorities, and though our charge was, that this whole business was, on its face, a fraud and intended for the purpose of indirectly obtaining evidence at the public expense to unseat political opponents, and did not justify these abortive criminal proceedings, yet the majority of that committee pulled the Minister of the Interior through, shielded Mr. Howell, and by their votes enabled him not to divulge the names. A little while ago, I heard members from the back benches say, "Hear, hear," when I said, that, in consequence of the unique condition of affairs in the Yukon, we could not obtain the name of many a man to make specific charges, for the obvious reason that he would at once become a target for unfair treatment at the hands of the Government or their minions. Do these gentlemen say, "Hear, hear" now? If they do, where is the difference between the condition that the Minister of the Interior and his supporters imposed on us in probing this affair in Manitoba to the bottom, and the condition to which I have been alluding? Again, let us hear a little more of this evidence. I asked Mr. Howell:

That is to say, technically and professionally, if we may so use the terms, you were acting for the Attorney General of Manitoba and looking to Mr. Sifton for your money?

And Mr. Howell said:

Well, perhaps that was the way.

Q. And you got the money from Mr. Sifton?—
A. Yes.

Q. You got $19,000, you and the other counsel?—
A. More than that.

Q. Well, how much did you get from Mr. Sifton?—A. Well, Sir Hibbert, the total in Exhibit "A" is $19,724.63, and that does not include Richards' and Bradshaw's bill.

And in regard to that, by the way, so eager and hasty were the Minister of the Interior and the Prime Minister, that what do you suppose they did, in order to fasten some charge, if possible, on their political opponents? They dipped their hand into the public treasury of this country, and they took out, in connection with some financial kiting of the Minister of the Interior, $500 odd to pay Mr. Perdue. They paid that sum into the Bank of British North America to relieve the Minister of the Interior from a personal responsibility under which he lay to Mr. Perdue. The Department of Justice, under the authority of Sir Oliver Mowat, cut down that bill to $300 odd. Mr. Perdue got the $500 odd, which the Minister of the Interior declared he got to pay Mr. Perdue; and not one farthing of that money was refunded when the Public Accounts Committee sat to investigate the matter. In other words, they took out of the public treasury of this country.

as straight as any man could take it, over $200 and put it into the hands of the Minister of the Interior, though not a single dollar of the $200 was owed, according to the legal department of this country. But, forsooth, it was to track down like sleuth-hounds their opponents in Manitoba, and to help to fasten on their opponents a criminal charge in connection with the elections in Manitoba. There was money to burn for that; but there was no money to send a detective up into the Yukon—not one single stiver, not one single sixpence—and I will put into the hands of the House, before I am through, information that is far more serious in regard to the misconduct of the Yukon officials. The satraps, and the myrmidons, and the heelers of the Minister of the Interior had no information which they dared to give to the public Accounts Committee respecting any Conservative in the province of Manitoba. They had $18,000 to spend for that, $19,000 for that, but not one farthing or sixpence for the other. But the hon. gentlemen sit there and say: Come on with your specific charges; give us the names of your informants; we ourselves will not give you the names of our informants. When we take the money out of the public treasury to hunt down our political opponents, we will protect ourselves behind the grounds of privilege and secrecy; but, when you attack any man serving under us, you are to give us, not only the specific charge, but the name of the man who dared to make the charge. On page 8 of this official evidence, what do we find? Mark you, Mr. Speaker, these prosecutions were in the province of Manitoba. The Deputy Minister of Justice, on oath, told us:

We have no criminal prosecutions, except in the North-west Territories.

Now, the Yukon is part of the North-west Territories. There is no money, as I have shown, to follow up and track the men who have done the notorious wrongs that have been done to the Yukon and Canada, according to the universal testimony; but there was money to spend in a province, without any statutory authority and without any vote, and though an official of the Department of Justice said that, in regard to criminal prosecutions, the department was confined to the North-west Territories. Now, let me take a further exposure of the position in which this Government stands. I hold in my hand a copy of a most extraordinary letter—a letter from the Minister of Justice, written in this very month of March; and if he had desired to damn this Government, to put it in a most defenceless position in regard to that Manitoba persecution, that attempt to use the public funds against their political opponents for party purposes, and party purposes only, no opponent of the Government could have framed a letter more pertinent to the occasion. He states, in regard to a perjury matter, in reference to a complaint made by some gentleman in the province of Manitoba on March 1st, 1899:

The administration of justice in the province of Manitoba is under the jurisdiction of Manitoba and not under mine. With it I have nothing whatever to do.

Respectfully yours,

DAVID MILLS.

If that department had nothing whatever to do with the administration of justice in Manitoba, when it was appealed to in case of perjury, and if this language of the Minister of Justice was justified, I ask, in the name of common sense, in the name of all that is fair and reasonable, how dare hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches dip their hands into the public till and take out $10,000 odd in cash and hand it round to Mr. F. C. Wade, Mr. Perdue, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Howell, and all those Liberal attorneys in the city of Winnipeg, in connection with a matter which was certainly, if anything, a criminal matter? They pretend to spurn the men who sit behind them, and to condemn the people of the country. Their argument always is: We have carried the by-elections; we are here, you are there; we will spend the money of the country as we like; we have helped these men to carry the elections; we may tamper with the ballot-boxes; but we will sit here quiet and quiescent, if the whole country rings with scandals and charges affecting the administration of the Yukon territory, though it remains under our jurisdiction, while we will use the public funds to take unfair advantage of our political opponents in Manitoba, though it is out of our jurisdiction. That is the position of the Treasury benches.

So much for the light that is afforded to us by an inquiry which is only half finished, but which must be finished. I hope, conclusively, because I am of opinion, from the evidence that has already been taken, that there never was such a torture of authority, or such a bold and audacious handling of the public funds, secretly and without any express sanction of this Parliament, as there was in that connection, with so little justification and with such a poor result. I believe, if we can have the evidence of Sir Oliver Mowat and many other gentlemen referred to in that inquiry, if we can have the documents which were purloined, filched from the public files, and which were refused to be brought to the Public Accounts Committee, though they were before the Auditor General, we will fasten a scandal and a crime, not upon the backs of the Conservatives of Manitoba, but upon the backs of men on the Treasury benches, and we will fasten on the Minister of the Interior a hideous scandal and a hideous crime. There is nothing more contemptible than the action of the Minister of the Interior, as shown in that document, from the first page to the last.

He never dared, as Attorney General of Manitoba, to take up the matter. He did venture, with the protection of confidential communications with the Prime Minister to engage Mr. Howell. He put himself in the position of being under obligation to Mr. Howell, so that that gentleman could have sued him in the courts if he had not kept the kites floating for months with Mr. Howell and ultimately paid him out of the public treasury. The Minister of the Interior, not then a member of the House, not acting as the Attorney General of Manitoba, but as Mr. Clifford Sifton, retained and engaged Mr. Howell and contracted with him to carry on that party warfare. He was not man enough to shoulder the burden to pay party expenses, to pay for the persecution of his opponents in Manitoba, but with confidential letters written to the Prime Minister, he begged and implored the Prime Minister to come to his rescue. He engaged Mr. Howell before the Government of Sir Charles Tupper went out of office, and then, after having got this word from the Prime Minister of this country, he got the money paid. A large portion of it was paid—$10,000 according to the Auditor General—and we shall see whence the balance came. Ten thousand dollars came out of the treasury of this country and not a dollar came from the pockets of the Minister of the Interior. He paid Mr. Perdue something over $500 on his account, and Mr. Perdue's account was taxed down to something over $300, but the liability of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Clifford Sifton), as he was in the eye of the law, was assumed by the Government of this country, and I believe that before this investigation is through it will be shown that the Minister of the Interior has no right to a seat in this House, and that he has infringed the law concerning the independence of Parliament, and is liable to be mulcted in heavy penalties for having done so. Now, this is what this Government can do in regard to the administration of criminal justice, when some one in Manitoba in the secrets of the party whispers that a foul wrong has been done to the party in that province. Let us see what they will do when there is not merely a whisper, but a widespread suspicion, based upon the statements of reputable people, that there is a nefarious condition of affairs in a portion of our country. But before I leave this point, in order that I may not leave my statements unconfirmed, I wish to quote the evidence with regard to this miserable wretch, Freeborn, whom the Public Accounts Committee cannot get hold of, this miserable thing who has decamped from the country and whose whereabouts are not known to any living man, but on whose statement the Minister of the Interior relied, and upon whose statement this whole persecution was based. What kind of man was he? I do not refer to his being an informer, or a man who pretended that he had wormed himself into the secrets of a party in order to divulge them and make money out of his perfidy and treachery—but, according to Mr. Howell, this is the kind of man on whose statement eighteen or nineteen thousand dollars of indebtedness was run up. On page 42 we find the questions asked about this man, and why they were paying him from time to time so much money :

I may have got them from him because I would not give him any money to pay his way, because he would spend it, and I would have to buy his tickets for him.

Q. Was he drinking?—A. Yes; I had to be careful of him, so that there is a charge for railway tickets, $32.50, which may be for him.

The statement of this drunken, miserable informer was the basis of this expenditure of $18,000 or $19,000. I can bring you more serious evidence than that. The Treasury benches have been in possession of more serious evidence in regard to the conduct of things in the Yukon.

Now, we undertook to govern that country, and for that purpose to send up men when expenses of living were abnormally high. And what did this sapient Administration do? Did they give any man from the judge down, a decent living salary? Will the Minister of the Interior say whether there was one single individual in his whole outfit, who, having regard to the cost of living and the expenses in that country, was given a decent ordinary living salary? The Minister of the Interior is dumb. He is in the condition of most of his colleagues. There is the Prime Minister half asleep, there is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) wholly asleep; there is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) absolutely reckless in hilarity; there is the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly) who does not know what we are talking about; there is the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), who is now taking notes, but who will not vouchsafe a word; there is the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), who is looking as happy as only one of the Bytown Coons can; there is the hon. Minister without portfolio (Mr. Dobell) who, I suppose, is only wondering when he will put to sea again, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), for a wonder, is looking happy. I would ask any of these hon. gentlemen—and it is not a discourteous request in fair debate—will they name a single official commissioned under this Government to go to the Yukon who had a decent salary, considering the conditions that prevailed there? They cannot do it. They put these poor wretches in a position of temptation. Why, take the judge of the court. His name was Maguire. He had a high and dignified position, but they must have known, for they had the means of obtaining information, that the humblest miner that came before the judge had a better income or as good as the judge himself. No hon. gentleman will say I am exaggerating.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). Why did they not resign?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) helps me on with my argument. I do not say that captiously; I want to discuss this thing fairly. I say that if any Government ever went to work to put a poor lot of men, or a lot of poor men—I do not wish to reflect on any others than those I charge—in a position of temptation, where they would be subject to dire and disastrous influences, these hon. gentlemen subjected to that treatment these men who went out as the first outfit to the Yukon.

There is not a doubt about it. It was a country in which huge interests were being canvassed and huge interests were at stake; where men talked of hundreds of dollars as we talk of a dollar. That is not exaggeration. When the hon. gentlemen opposite began they gave these men, from the judge down, ordinary eastern salaries in a part of the world where there was no parallel for expense in cost of living. There never was a gold country in Christendom where the cost of living was so enormous—nor in heathendom either, as an hon. gentleman reminds me. I say there never was a country where men were sent to such an extraordinary place to do their duty, whether you have regard to the cost of living or whether you have regard to the climate and all the disadvantages. They sent these gentlemen, as I think the facts will show, into these positions thoroughly unfitted, so far as salary went, to keep them independent, thoroughly unfitted, therefore, in every sense to keep them independent. Is the conclusion to which I am going to come shortly, unreasonable, that the most of these men, if not all of them, succumbed to the conditions and circumstances and brought disgrace and brought infamy upon the administration and Government of this country? Now let us begin at the beginning. Take the wise laws that have been made in regard to the independence of our officers. Take the Postmaster General—he is present. What is the order that he has promulgated in regard to his officials? The Postmaster General will correct me if I am wrong when I say that he has recently recognized the impropriety of his officials being interested in commercial transactions, and has made some order to secure the independence of the officials of the Post Office Department. He was not the pioneer in that respect. The Minister of the Interior had before him the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act. Let him consider the spirit of that Act in connection with all the unfortunate things that have happened:

No person employed in or under the Department of the Interior, including the Geological Survey Branch thereof, shall purchase any Dominion lands, except under authority of an Order in Council, or shall locate military or bounty land warrants or land scrip, or act as agent of any other person in such behalf; nor shall any person so employed disclose to any person except his superior officer any discovery made by him, nor any other information in his possession in relation to Dominion lands, until such discovery or information has been reported to the Minister of the Interior, and his permission for such disclosure has been obtained.

That was a wise provision, the Minister of the Interior did not attempt to repeal it. The principle of that law was good, sound, wholesome and clean. It commends itself to the good sense and judgment of this House, I am sure. If the House will banish from their minds the important point we have in hand, they will see that the law in itself is good, and has never been questioned in this House. Now, it was because the Minister of the Interior did not observe the spirit of that legislation in the Yukon administration, largely because of that—there are other causes no doubt—but it is largely because he ignored the wholesome, healthy spirit of that legislation approved by this House, that all these troubles have occurred in the Yukon territory. He gave these men starvation wages, starvation salaries, and instead of coming in a bold fashion, as the Minister of Public Works, to do him justice, would have done, and asking this House to supplement those salaries by such amounts as would enable these men to live independently in that country, the hon. gentleman, on the sly, behind the backs of this House, behind your back, Mr. Speaker, and our backs, gave, if my information is correct, express direction and sanction that these gentlemen appointed by him, while taking very ordinary salaries, could themselves become directly interested in the affairs which they were to administer and in connection with which they were to be consulted. Does the hon. gentleman deny that? Mr. F. C. Wade is an authority which induces me to make that serious statement, for it is a serious statement. The Minister of the Interior never dared to say to this House that he had told Mr. Wade that when he went out there to administer the Lands Department, when he went out there as Registrar of the Court, when he went out there in three or four different capacities, as Crown Attorney, for instance, with a mere bagatelle of a salary of $2,500, that he could become interested in the mineral lands and in the mineral claims in regard to which he was to advise the registrar of land titles, in regard to which he was to advise the mining recorder, and in regard to which he was to conduct the criminal business of the Crown. No member of the Government ever dared to say that these men were to make up indirectly the salaries that they required and the living expenses they absolutely needed, in order to keep them independent in that country; and it is because such extraordinary instructions were given and such extraordinary license was permitted that these things have occurred. It is because of that, among other reasons, that there has come upon this Government such a condition of affairs the like of which has never been since Canada was Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. Tut, tut.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. Campbell) is mumbling something, but he will not dare to rise up and say that what I have been denouncing was right on the part of the Government; he has not the courage to stand up and say that the Government that asks from this Parliament $2,500 for an officer was justified in telling him on the sly that he could be interested in all these various things. Now, let us see what Mr. Walsh says, his conduct is most extraordinary, because Mr. Walsh figures in a great deal of the information that I have to lay before this House. Mr. Walsh was the Commissioner first appointed, and where is he now? The Minister of the Interior said he was a courageous man, that he was one of the chief organizers of the Mounted Police, who could go into an Indian encampment and take a criminal out of the strongest tribe. He had physical courage. Had he the courage to stand at his post in the Yukon until his character was thoroughly considered and thoroughly weighed? Had he the courage to meet this Parliament as Commissioner of the Yukon and vindicate his character? He has been supplanted, he has disappeared from the district where we are told, forsooth, that the present Commissioner, thousands of miles away, is instructed to hold a commission of inquiry. He is neither there to assist him, nor is he there to answer the charges that might be made against him.

He has reported, and from that report I want to draw the attention of this House to some interesting facts that will assist in the consideration of the manner in which the Government conducted the administration of the Yukon. There are questions on the Order paper in regard to the position of Mr. Wade. How does Major Walsh tell us about this extraordinary gentleman. He refers to him as the Crown Attorney for the district on one page, he refers to him as the Registrar of Lands on another page. He had a survey made of lands and a division of the town of Dawson before the commissioner arrived on the spot. He refers again to Mr. Wade as collecting a large amount of money by private subscriptions, and to a committee being formed for the raising of the balance necessary to discharge the hospital debt, and I may say that I am informed by credible parties that that was a system of blackmail on the part of the Crown Attorney, on the part of the Registrar of Lands and on the part of the gentleman who held all those various offices under the Federal Government. I observe that the Minister of the Interior laughs; this is not a laughing matter; it is a very serious matter.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I was laughing at the hon. gentleman's credulity.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that he was laughing at my credulity. When he hears all the serious statements I have to give him in regard to the goings on of the officials sent up by him into the Yukon territory he will laugh at my moderation; he will be surprised that I speak with such moderation on the subject. I hope I am wrong, but this was told to me by a credible party; I have it on the word of a man who in my opinion stands as high as any member of this House, on the word of an Englishman, an educated man and a gentleman, that Wade obtained these subscriptions for the hospital by a system of blackmail on the saloons. The hon. gentleman smiles again; I am informed that Wade would go into a saloon and ask for a certain subscription for the hospital, and if the saloon-keeper would say that the sum asked was entirely beyond his means, Wade would say: "It either means giving that amount for the hospital or having your license cancelled and the saloon closed up." I was told that by a man of honour who has interests in Dawson City, and in the Yukon, but who being terrorized by the satraps up there fears to give his name, just as Mr. Howell feared to give the names of men who had less to be afraid of. Mr. Howell feared to give the names of those informants who had given him information in regard to alleged crimes committed in Manitoba. The Minister of the Interior protected Mr. Howell, and the committee protected him and concealed those names. If the House of Commons of Canada to-day says: "We will pay no attention to what any hon. gentleman in this House says, unless he gives the name of the man who will dare to attack the Government, unless he will offer his name and his signature, you will make it absolutely impossible to attempt to purify conditions in the Yukon." You will have such a state of things there in future that it will be infinitely worse than it has been in the past. Living in a state of terrorism as these people are, you cannot think them unreasonable for that belief, which they hold, for their logic is sound. They believe that the Government that would put in office the men who have been charged with these offences would not hesitate to introduce changes in the regulations that would drive them out of the country and ruin those who became responsible for accusations against these officials. As a Canadian, I have endeavoured to show them that no Government would dare to adopt that attitude, and that if they would come forward with the information I could guarantee, almost, that no Government would dare to make them victims. There is a public opinion in this country that would prevent the Government doing such a thing. These men do not know the Canadian people; they simply see the kind of men that I will describe to you a little more particularly later on, that have been put in positions of power and influence by the gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Consequently I tell the hon. gentlemen, I assume the responsibility for saying what I have in regard to Mr. Wade, but I do not say it behind Mr. Wade's back entirely. When he asked, indirectly, if I had charges that reflected upon his personal character, I frankly said that information had come to my hands that seriously reflected upon him, and that if I were in his position I would attend the House of Commons during the present session of Parliament. I feel prepared to make these statements, particularly now that the Minister of the Interior, who seems to know all about Wade, says that it is probable that he will be back before the session of the House concludes. I hope he will.

Mr. FOSTER. He will have to come quicker than his letters did.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was referring to Walsh's report, and I will refer further to it. Here is the germ of the trouble; here is the opinion of the commissioner who exercised such wide powers; whether he had a right to in many particulars is a question. I have found no vindication for many of the arbitrary acts of the commissioner in the Yukon. He says:

With regard to the question which has arisen as to the propriety of an official taking up a claim in the Yukon District, I fail to see any reason for not permitting him to do so, nor any way in which the public or the public service can be thereby injured.

Now, here is a man, who is given these wide powers, and who went to that far-off country with views diametrically opposed to the direct order recently made by the Postmaster General of this country, diametrically opposed to the order that I understand since charges have been made, the Minister of the Interior has issued, and therefore some of the statements to which I will refer in a moment will seem to be such as one might expect. Touching Mr. Fawcett, this is what the commissioner says. Mark, Mr. Speaker, that the commissioner is friendly disposed towards Mr. Fawcett. I hope that Mr. Fawcett has been more sinned against than sinning; I believe the Administration are responsible for all the charges laid against Mr. Fawcett. I never knew that gentleman until he came into this position. This is what Major Walsh says:

I do not think any one but a lawyer is qualified to try these cases.

If the present Gold Commissioner had such qualifications, I am inclined to think that complaints against his administration would have been few—if indeed any would have been made.

There is the report of the late commissioner who, not soldierlike in anyway, vacated his post under the fire of the artillery. He was bombarded, he was charged by the newspapers in such a way that unless the charges were true he could have had a remedy. I regret, considering his position, he did not stand to his guns and demand an investigation before tendering his resignation to the Minister of the Interior. I regret particularly, as a member of this House, that the Minister of the Interior accepted his resignation before an investigation, full and complete, was held and before the result of that investigation vindicated him in regard to his responsibility as a public officer. Let me quote from another publication before I come to the evidence to which I refer. Here is an official report published in the bulletin of the Department of Labour, November, 1898, from the Washington Government Printing Office, and in this publication an official makes his report to the Government of the United States. Samuel C. Dunham, an agent of the department, giving an illustration of his personal investigation in the mining district of the Yukon Valley and the adjoining territory—this is a man wholly outside the political arena of Canada reporting to his Government—after dealing with Dawson, says incidentally:

A strip of land on the river bank, 1,500 feet in length, and varying in width from 50 feet down to a point has been appropriated as a Government reservation and leased for $30,000 a year. The lessees charge a ground rent of $8, $10 and $12 per front foot per month; the rent varying according to the depth of the lot. This entire tract has been wholly built up, being occupied by restaurants, small stores, laundries, etc., and yields the lessees a gross income of about $10,000 a month.

Mr. FOSTER. $120,000 a year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. $120,000 a year, as my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) suggests, for a Government rental of $30,000 a year; and thereby hangs a tale, thereby hangs enough to put the Government on the qui vive to institute a most searching inquiry. Mr. J. C. McCook, the United States Consul at Dawson, arrived early in July at his post of duty, and reports to the Government of the United States:

Along the river, ground leased from the authorities brings $10 per front foot per month.

I merely mention these evidences from impartial sources. Standing alone we might not pay much attention to them, but here we have two officials of the United States Government giving their opinion. Let us see what the other information amounts to which would justify the strong statements that I have made in regard to the maladministration of the Yukon. I want this House to understand, Mr. Speaker, that I have a great deal more information than I propose to give to-night. I propose to give the Government, as fast as I can, some information; not that they shall send out a satrap of their own to investigate, not that they shall send it to a connection of the Minister of the Interior to inquire into, but that they shall be forced by public opinion to appoint a commission of the highest judges in the land, some men who are not dependent on this Government for favour or by fear, some men who can and would dare, if commissioned, to go into this matter thoroughly for the sake of Canada—not merely for their own sake—and who would root out the thing from bottom to top, and let the public know how much there is that merits the disgrace that has been passed by the world upon Canada in connection with the government of this Yukon country. I propose to give the Government some samples of information that have reached my hand, and, Mr. Speaker, from what I have already said, you know yourself that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) had shown a thousandth part of the zeal and activity that was shown by Mr. Clifford Sifton, when he was in the Manitoba Government, to fasten upon his political opponents some despicable charges, it would be unnecessary for me to take up the time of this House in referring even to these instances. In no sense am I responsible for the time that is taken up. The Government are responsible, and these facts must be ventilated, and it is only right that on the debate on the Address the Government should have intimation of what evidence there is obtainable, and what charges should be sifted to the very bottom. Here is an article which was sent to the Toronto "Globe," and which the Toronto "Globe" refused to publish. It was sent under the name of a gentleman, and in it he gave as his authority (date, Sept. 9th, 1898), an interview with Mr. M. E. C. Woodford, a member of the M.I.C.E., an English organization, said to be by this correspondent a well-known South African and Australian mining engineer. This correspondent signed his name S.R.D.—at any rate he called on me and handed me this document, which he said he sent to the Toronto "Globe," and the Toronto "Globe" refused to publish it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Is it published anywhere else?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, not published anywhere else. He sent it to the Toronto "Globe" and he told me the Toronto "Globe" refused to publish it, and he said I was welcome to use his name and that of Mr. Woodford, because it was not given to him in confidence. This document says:

In the first place, the mining laws are crude, and not properly carried out. Take, for an example, the Record office, where all claims are presumably to be registered, and a clear record of such claims kept. It is almost impossible, says Mr. Woodford, to find out whether or not claims already staked out have been recorded. Surely that is a serious state of affairs. The miner in every part of the world has a perfect right to know. In other countries it is considered absolutely essential to have those records properly kept. Why not in Dawson City? Simply and solely because there is inadequate "help" in the Government office, and also because insufficient salaries are paid, which fact, no doubt, tends to place a premium on bribery. It usually takes miners two weeks to find out whether certain claims have been recorded. And when the necessary information has been supplied, it frequently takes two weeks—sometimes longer—to record them.

There came in—as will appear from the information which has reached my hands, and which I will give to the House—extraordinary opportunity for fraud and rascality. These men who were given, as Mr. Wade says, the right to become interested in mining claims, because interested in putting off applicants from time to time, so that while the inquiry was supposed to be taking place, they, through their friends, staked the claim, and when the time was up and the applicant came to the office, the answer given him was: The claim was recorded—not, of course, in the name of the officer, but in the name of the officer's friend. The hon. gentleman will see the gravity of that statement, as the evidence collects on this, which certainly calls for the most rigid examination. The rest of this interview relates largely to Mr. Woodford's views of whether the regulations were right or wrong, but I do not propose to go into that now, and I shall deal with the charges of maladministration. Later on he says:

In fact, says my informant, under the present conditions in Dawson City, every impediment is thrown in the miner's path. He has to pay, in one way or another, all the Government's revenues. The Government takes half the ground and 10 per cent of the gross receipts from the miners' claims. Is this fair?

When in both Australia and South Africa mining is free, always excepting the cost of the miners' license.

The saloon, the dive and gambling-house keepers, without license of any kind, make the great part of the money.

I will pass the rest of his statement, as it deals more with the regulations than with serious charges. But on August 25th—the House does not yet know, though the Government does—the miners themselves were stung into such a condition of feeling that they addressed the following document to the Prime Minister; and I fancy this is the document which the Minister of the Interior, through his Deputy, referred to in a letter to me, as, I suppose, to other members of the House of Commons, as containing very vague and general charges; but, nevertheless, out of their good grace they have appointed Mr. Ogilvie to inquire into them:

Dawson, Y.T., Canada, August 25th, 1898.

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, M.P., Premier of Canada.

Sir,—We, the Miners' Committee, duly appointed at a mass meeting of the miners of the Yukon territory, beg leave to submit to your notice the following statement, feeling that the Government of which you are the head, has only to know of the state of things here, appertaining to the administration of the laws and mining regulations, to take immediate steps for their remedy.

Many of the Government officials have forfeited their claims to the people's confidence and respect by their conduct and action in certain matters, thus leading to strained relations, which ought not to exist where the people have every desire to be loyal and law-abiding.

The Gold Commissioner's Office is practically closed—and has been closed for a considerable time—to the miner who has not the means or desire to bribe the clerks in order to obtain knowledge of the records which ought to be public. It is an undisputed fact, that those with money obtain easy access, concessions and valuable information. The Gold Commissioner allowed the clerks to work overtime for those who are willing to pay them for so doing. This naturally led to many evils, which have developed into a scandal, and the system is a great detriment to the camp. Wholesale information with regard to unrecorded ground is conveyed to certain individuals outside the office, who obtain men to stake and record the ground in consideration of an interest in the same, thereby defrauding the miner who cannot obtain correct information by legitimate means.

Also, it is felt to be unfair that those connected with the administration who have opportunities of acquiring special knowledge, should be allowed to compete with the miners in securing desirable ground.

With respect to decisions in claim contests, much dissatisfaction has arisen, particularly owing to the fact that the Crown prosecutor being the only person to whom the Gold Commissioner could look for legal advice, permitted himself to be retained as an advocate by one of the contestants.

The same gentleman, in his capacity as Dominion lands agent, is openly charged with serious breaches of trust and malfeasance in office, in that favouritism has been shown to persons by whom he had been retained as attorney, in the letting of valuable franchises and leasing of Government lands.

Injustice has been, and is, done, and great dissatisfaction thereby occasioned, owing to the incompetency of some of the officials connected with the recorder's office.

The mining inspector's want of experience and conversance with the most ordinary methods of mining cause hardships to many of the claim-owners.

The Crown timber agent has granted such extraordinary concessions and laid down such stringent regulations, that only a few parties have the privilege of supplying the town with cordwood this coming winter.

Grave and serious consequences must result in a country where cordwood is a necessity of life.

The feeling engendered in the country is widespread, deep and bitter; and until the officials are either publicly exonerated or removed, a better feeling cannot exist. The well-being and prosperity of the camp suffers in consequence.

Therefore, we respectfully petition for the appointment of a commission of inquiry, having power to subpoena and protect its witnesses, many of whom have been forced by the attitude of the officials into becoming technical bribe-givers, and who would not come forward, fearing their interests might suffer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

We do so only after long and serious consideration, impelled by the conviction that such is our plain duty.

We have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servants,
(Sgd.) GEORGE J. C. ARMSTRONG,
Chairman, Ireland.

PERCY McDOUGALL,
Secretary, England.
J. KNIGHT SMITH, West Australia.

Now, the hon. Minister of the Interior had that information before him—at any rate, it was in the hands of the Government—when he wrote the letter I have referred to, in which he passed over this as a most general and vague statement; and yet the Committee of Public Accounts, which inquired into the expenditure of that $18,000 or $19,000, never was in possession of information so direct and so certain, as a justification for the expenditure that was made, and the investigation of the Pinkerton detectives. I am told, too, that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) has made a trip into that country and out of it. There are certain questions down on the Order Paper, and I am told that he will not dispute the assertions I have made in regard to the maladministration of affairs there, or the assertions that have been made by the miners' committee.

But I have a great deal more to say on this subject before I propose to stop. Let us take some further information that has reached the hands of the Government. Specific information they want. Now, in every paper in Canada—at any rate, in many papers that came to me—there was a statement made by Captain Cadell. I never met that gentleman; but this statement seemed to be serious, and went through the press, where, in confirmation of the statement of Miss Shaw, the correspondent of the London "Times," he said in an interview:

I went to the post office on three successive days, and waited for periods of from two to four hours. Even then there was no getting near the door. If, on the other hand, you were prepared to pay one of the mounted policemen, or some one personally acquainted with the postmaster and his assistants a sufficient sum of money, your letters would speedily be brought out.

And I can say, of my own personal knowledge, that this was done.

Then in regard to the Gold Commissioner's office, Capt. Cadell says:

I shall give you the names of three miners, with whom I am personally acquainted, who complained to me that they had staked out claims in the Klondike district, notified the Gold Commissioner's Office of their desire to record the same, and were told to come back in two or three days.

And when they did go back, they found that the claims which they had staked had been recorded in the names of other persons. These miners' names are William Huslig, of Christiana, Sweden; Arthur Brown, of Rockford, Illinois; and John Staten, of California.

Now, I am going to take another specific case, that of Dr. Leblanc. The hon. gentleman will see that I am not pretending that the condition of things is that there are no gentlemen who will give their names. I did combat a little while ago the position that it was an answer on the part of the Treasury benches that there had been no serious charges, but that the parties who made them would not take the responsibility of making them.

There are quite a number of men who have taken the responsibility of making serious charges, and for the investigation of these charges, so far as this House is aware, no commission of any kind has been appointed. As I understand it, Mr. Ogilvie has been authorized and commissioned to inquire into the charges I have read from the Miner's Committee and no other. We have no communication on that subject. Take the case of Leblanc, of course, any man who dared to say anything against the administration of the Yukon was branded by every Reform journal in Canada as a slanderer and a blow-hard. But look at what Dr. Leblanc says :

Skoohum Gulch comes into Bonanza at No. 2 above Discovery, and there is, perhaps, the richest spot in the country, or on earth for all that is known. You can see the gold in the gravel in nuggets. I staked a good bench claim on Bonanza, but lost it by not "standing in" with the officials.

And he goes on to support his statement. Then we have certain charges conveyed by means of the press. These that I am reading are from the newspapers. When I refer to information that came to me direct, I make that clear; for instance, the case as sworn to before this shackled, this manacled commission presided over by Mr. Ogilvie, where you have to go and indict Mr. Ogilvie's own superiors. Hon. gentlemen will see what an unwise, what a short-sighted move it was to appoint that gentleman, no matter how honest he may be individually—and I would not wish from anything I may say to be understood as insinuating anything against Mr. Ogilvie. All that I know of him is to his credit, but I say that any man put in a position of responsibility like his would decline, would feel bound to decline to inquire into any matter that directly or indirectly might affect any connection or relative of his. Here is one of the charges made and it is specific enough :

Mrs. Duboise swore before the Gold Commissioner that she staked a claim and applied to the bench claim recorder to record it; this official said it was necessary to wait for a survey; while she waited another person took up the claim, and the official granted it to the newcomer.

J. F. Murdock, the person who secured the claim, confessed that the official was in it to the extent of one-third, for which that officer had never paid a cent.

These are statements that appear in the public press, and I know nothing further of them. They coincide and are corroborative of the very serious information given to me from time to time by gentlemen who for reasons I have mentioned, do not desire to have their names disclosed, but in regard to whose character—I do not know how far hon. gentlemen opposite will be fair to me. I made careful inquiry and satisfied myself they were responsible people before I took down what they told me. I have a statement under my hand which I propose to read. It is from a reputable individual, and it contains facts, which, I believe, would be borne out by an honest and impartial investigation. We could even dispense with Pinkerton detectives. We need not go to any such expense in learning the facts :

In the latter part of the year 1897, and the beginning of 1898, the water front along the Yukon River in Dawson was unoccupied except by a few squatters, who had put up at their own expense small buildings thereon for business purposes. These squatters had applied to the Gold Commissioner for permission to rent the ground space occupied by them. This had in all cases been refused by the Gold Commissioner, but the squatters were assured that should the Government decide to lease the water front, they would be given the first opportunity to lease the same. When Mr. Wade arrived, he held the following official positions:—He was clerk of court, recorder, Dominion land agent, Crown counsel and also a private barrister, and Mr. Wade, Crown counsel, and Mr. Wade, Dominion land agent, and Mr. Wade, clerk of court, and Mr. Wade, recorder—all used their first and best efforts to facilitate the private business of Mr. Wade, barrister.

As we go deeper hon. gentlemen will see that he was clothed with extraordinary powers. Whether he abused his trust or not I am not particularly concerned to inquire. If he did not abuse his trust, but kept within the implied instructions of the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of the Interior abused the trust reposed in him. It is plain that Mr. Wade cannot be justified, for he acted for the Crown on one side and for his private clients on the other in regard to property from which his clients made enormous profits, and to that extent the country lost.

Acting upon this commendable principle, Wade immediately as Dominion land agent, upon the advice of Mr. Wade, Crown counsel, leased the water front without any advertisement and without exhibiting any lease to the public, to Morrison & McDonald for the sum of one dollar per front foot, the rent not to commence to run against the lessees, however, until the ground leased was occupied. Consequently, the lessees incurred no liability whatever in taking the lease. Mr. Wade, at the time of making this lease received a fee of $2,500 from Morrison & McDonald as a retainer to act as their private counsel. He also received a salary as Crown counsel, and, it is presumed, likewise as Dominion land agent, from the Government of Canada. No man can serve two masters, and Mr. Wade had no right to take a fee from the lessees of the water front on the one hand, and from the Government as Crown counsel and Dominion land agent on the other hand. It was well understood in Dawson that Wade and Major Walsh (and it was said Judge Maguire), held a half interest in this lease, and Morrison & McDonald held the other half. It is undeniable that Grötschier & Lingard, the brokers who collected the rent, acted under the orders of Wade, and did nothing except under his direction and with the assistance of the Mounted Police. They put through the deal, and compelled the squatters on the water front to pay $10 per front foot rent without ever exhibiting to the said squatters any authority for collecting this money, although there was a civil court, and the squatters who refused to pay could have been put off by an action in ejectment if the title of Morrison & McDonald had been sufficiently legal to have stood in an honest court of law.

In the fall of 1897, Dominion Creek, below the Lower Discovery, was stampered and staked over two or three times, and there was considerable contention in the staking; consequently, the Gold Commissioner refused to record any claims on Dominion Creek after November, 1897, until the Government should survey the creek, and thereby determine what ground was open to location and what was already occupied. The miners were told by the Gold Commissioner and advised, many of them, by a legal firm to go back to the creek and squat on their property, improving and prospecting it according to law, so that when the same should be surveyed they would have the legal right to record the claim under the proper number and description given it by the survey. Many of the miners did this, erected substantial cabins and sunk two or three holes to bed rock on their claims, and in many instances got rich prospects. After Mr. Wade and Major Walsh arrived, Mr. Fawcett suddenly changed his front and announced that none of the prospectors and locators on Lower Dominion would be allowed to record these claims, which many of them had been in possession of from four to six months, as this property would be reserved for the Government, as the Government needed some property to recoup itself for its great outlay in sending in officials, Mounted police, etc.

These claims were sent out by the Gold Commissioner to be sold in Ottawa supposedly at private auction, and Wade himself said, to my knowledge, that he proposed to get hold of all of the unrecorded claims on Dominion. If the Government decided to do what they had no right to do, to deny these prospectors the right of recording their claims, they should have put the claims up at public auction, first at Dawson so as to allow the men who had developed and improved them a chance to purchase the same, and not sent them to Ottawa, where they could be disposed of at private sale to a syndicate working in the interest of Walsh and Wade at a nominal figure, which, I presume, has been done by this time. Certain it is that none of these claims have been sold in Dawson, where, according to law, if any public sale takes place, they should have been sold.

A woman named Nellie Cashman, an old resident of the Yukon, and hearing a good character for honesty and respectability, now having a small place of business on the water front in Dawson, staked a claim on French Hill, and tried to have it recorded by Capt. Norwood, the deputy recorder at the Forks of Eldorado and Bonanza. Not succeeding, and being put off, she boldly demanded of Norwood what his price was, and asked how much she would have to give up to have her claim recorded, and he laughed and informed her that if she went to Miss Belle Mulrooney, he thought Miss Mulrooney could fix it for her. Miss Mulrooney is the recognized go-between of the officials for property around the Forks of Eldorado. She went to Miss Mulrooney, who informed her that she could get her claim straightened out and recorded if she, Nellie Cashman, would deed her a half-interest in the same. This Nellie Cashman did, and Capt. Norwood promptly recorded her claim for her. A man named Clarence Talmadge, a restaurant keeper in Dawson, staked a hill-side claim off 33 Eldorado. Finding some trouble in recording the same, he was told to go to Gougin & Peabody, brokers. He went there, paid them $10, received a slip of paper from them, which he showed to the policeman on guard at the Gold Commissioner's office, and was admitted at once, and his claim recorded. There were many such instances as this. These are simply a few that came under my personal knowledge.

Andrew Donnelley, of Dawson, staked on June 13, 1897, a claim on Dominion Creek, which he recorded within ten days after it was staked as No. 17, above Lower Discovery. On the 11th day of August, 1897, one N. Swanson Blade recorded the same piece of ground as No. 34 below the Upper Discovery, claiming that he had staked the same on the 12th day of June, 1897. Blade sold the claim to Hansen, Misner & Company for $1,500 and skipped the country. Shortly after buying, Hansen & Company, hearing that 34 below Upper Discovery was the same claim as 17 above Lower, and that Donnelley was in possession of the same place, sold their interest to a Swede named Andy Nelson, who, in his turn, gave a deed to a one-third interest in said claim to his mistress Lucile Elliott, one of the most notorious women in Dawson. This latter transfer to Lucile took place in March, 1898. Lucile then took active measures to assert her right. Up to this time Donnelley and his partners had been in undisturbed possession of the claim, had built a cabin thereon, and taken out a dump on the property, which they estimated was worth at least $5,000. Up to March 31, 1898, Donnelley had received no legal notice of any adverse claim to his property. On that date he received a peremptory letter from the Gold Commissioner, sent at the intercession of Lucile, ordering him to quit possession of his claim, as there were adverse claimants thereto, and concluding with this remarkable sentence: "You are hereby notified that if the claim is not vacated by those working in your behalf immediately, your right to have a hearing in connection with this matter will be cancelled." Dawson is probably the only place on the globe where an official has the power to deny to British citizens, or to those of foreign origin claiming the friendly protection of the Union Jack, the sacred right of trial for property or life. Donnelley was forced to quit possession of his property, although no complaint or summons or notice of any kind other than the above letter was ever served upon him. The case finally came on for trial in June, 1898, Judge Maguire sitting as legal adviser to Mr. Fawcett, before whom the case was tried. The only evidence or proof of staking submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs in the case, Andy Nelson and Lucile Elliott, was the affidavit of N. Swanson Blade, which was filed in the Gold Commissioner's office at the time he got his grant for the property in question, to wit, the 11th day of August, 1897.

I do not vouch for this statement. It is specific enough, it is serious enough. The only absence is the name of my informant, and all I can say in regard to that is that while I do not vouch for his statement, I say I believe that while it is possible he has made mistakes, I do not believe he is a man who would wrongfully misrepresent the facts.

They had no other proof to bring and rested their case. Judge Maguire stated that unless Lucile and Andy could bring positive proof of the staking of the claim, he would advise Mr. Fawcett to non-suit the case; that is to say, dismiss it for want of any proof on behalf of the plaintiff. The case was then adjourned for one week. That night, about 11 o'clock, Lucile Elliott came up to Major Walsh's tent; he had retired; she remained until morning and was sent up the river about 8 o'clock in Major Walsh's canoe, accompanied by his private secretary, and rowed by the Government policemen. Lucile Elliott continued her nightly visits to Major Walsh during the continuance of the trial, which, it is needless to state, was decided in Lucile's favour. Major Walsh, at the time of his notorious liason with Lucile, was the Commissioner of the Yukon, with full power to remove Mr. Fawcett, and to reverse his decisions and acts. And after the case was decided, Donnelley was notified indirectly that if he would not appeal the case he (Major Walsh) would see that he received a grant for a claim down on Lower Dominion Creek.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Who signed this, may I ask?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have told the hon. gentleman that no person signed it, that I can only give my own statement. I may have been deceived, but I take the statements from people whom I believe to be honest. I may have been deceived, but they corroborate the common talk, and it forced the conviction upon me that this is a matter of serious moment, a matter that should be followed up after the fashion in which the hon. gentleman followed up those Manitoba cases without any justification whatever, to clear the good name of this country. Of course, I have argued as well as I can the reason why these names are concealed. The whole case stands on that. If the commissioner you sent into the Yukon was as corrupt and foul, and vile, and dishonest, and tyrannous, as all reports agree, whether from Liberals or from Conservatives down along the coast, I can understand an Englishman, or an Australian, or any man outside of this free country, coming to the conclusion that he would lose all his property if he dared over his name to charge this favourite and this selection of the Government, with high crimes and misdemeanours. I did not sympathise with them, I implored them to divulge their names, and endeavoured to convince them that their rights were safe in this country, even with a Grit Government in power—though I may have counted without my host. I was anxious to give their names, but they would not consent to it. But after reflecting over the situation, seeing that these statements are so fearful and so terrible, when we see the powers that have been exercised by these men, I have concluded to bring these statements before the House. Take Major Walsh's report wherein he refuses to confirm claims unless they are made of certain dimensions, wherein he assumes authority to tell a man how much food he would have to bring with him in order to enter the British Dominions.

You may say that was from necessity, but, after all there were reasons why these strangers to our country and to our habits should fear and tremble when they had rights that they had to buy, when they had to pay bakshish for what they got, and had to submit to misrule and to a corrupt system. They were just as much afraid as our own people would have been to charge officials of the Spanish Government in Cuba with harsh treatment and malversation in office. If hon. gentlemen take the position that because we cannot give them the names of our informants they will do nothing, they take a dangerous position. The country will not justify them. This thing has gone beyond these benches; I am not merely telling the Treasury benches what we have heard on this side of the House. It has gone beyond the bounds of party altogether. Take the case of the correspondent of the London "Times." Take the cases of all the strangers that have entered that country. Hon. gentlemen cannot meet or deny these statements, and if I am right the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison), who made an inspection of the country, will not, as I am informed, contradict these serious statements; but, perhaps, it is better that I should not have referred to him. He has not stated that to me; I have been told it, but whether he saw the things which I have described or not, there are other members from British Columbia, and I am sure they will not say that I am speaking wholly from the Conservative point of view when I say that the air in Victoria and Vancouver is full of these statements and these suspicions, and that they are not confined to one party or the other. That is a statement I make in all seriousness in this debate. I have another statement very similar to the last. They may vary in certain particulars, but that probably strengthens rather than weakens my argument because it shows that they are not made one with the other, but from independent sources. Take this one from a source wholly independent from the last:

The water front along the city of Dawson was, during the fall of 1897 and the winter of 1898, occupied by a few squatters, who put up small buildings thereon, with the general understanding that in the spring they would have to move off, if the Government decided to clear the water front, or pay the Government whatever rent it might see fit to charge them for the amount of space occupied on said water front, it being the general supposition that, if the water front should be leased, the squatters who had erected bona fide improvements thereon, would have the first right to rent, provided they paid the amount fixed by the Government. Shortly after the arrival of Crown Prosecuting Attorney Wade in Dawson, it was announced that the whole of the water front had been leased by him as Dominion land agent, to the firm of Morrison & McDonald. McDonald, however, denied publicly that he was a partner in the lease, stating that he had thrown up his interest therein, and it is the general supposition that Mr. Wade and his associates own one-half of the lease. According to the terms of this lease, the lessees did not have to pay rent to the Government for any of the water front until the same was occupied by their lessees, thus incurring no responsibility whatever. Mr. Wade, at the time of making this lease, was the Crown prosecutor in the pay of the Government, and, as such, received a salary for tending to the Government's interests and advising the Government officials. At the time of this lease he acted also as the pay attorney of Morrison & McDonald, from whom he accepted a large retainer in dispossessing the tenants on the water front. Morrison & McDonald were represented by the firm of local brokers in Dawson, named Grotzcher & Lingard. The police were placed at the disposal of this firm, and all of the business transacted between Morrison & McDonald, the lessees, with their sub-tenants in fixing the amount of the ground rent to be paid by each was done under the personal direction of Mr. Wade. At the time of making this lease, the civil law was in force in Dawson, Judge Maguire being then present. No civil procedure was brought by the lessees of the Government to eject the squatters on the water front. They were given no opportunity to go into court and test the validity of the lease to Morrison & McDonald, but were ejected summarily by the police under the orders of Mr. Wade. Several of the tenants refused to sign a very binding, one-sided and stringent agreement, drawn up by Mr. Wade for the squatters on the water front to sign, but offered to pay their rent. They were told, however, that no rent would be accepted from them unless this agreement was first signed; and in one case, after rent had been accepted by the brokers for Morrison & McDonald and a receipt given therefor, the police ordered the lessee to quit his building within twenty-four hours unless he signed the aforesaid agreement.

Two Swedes, in April, asked Mr. Wade for a license to put a log-boom in the Klondike. Wade asked them, if they didn't want the exclusive privilege, which, he said he could give them for $1,000. The men said they hadn't thought about that, but would let him know the next morning. They consulted together, and informed him that they had decided to take the exclusive privilege and would pay $1,000; whereupon, they were informed that he had raised since the night before, and that they must pay $1,500, if they wanted the exclusive privilege, which, it is asserted, was paid to Mr. Wade by others who later on got the exclusive privilege for maintaining a boom in the Klondike.

THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. May I ask the hon. gentleman is that statement made by a man who was there and who saw that transaction?

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, this was given to me by a gentleman from Dawson.

THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Was he there?

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He says that he was informed of these occurrences.

THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The person who gives the information says that he was informed?

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where he said that he was informed I was careful that he should say so in his statement, and it goes for what it is worth. I do not think that it would be strictly evidence in a court of law, but it is fifty times stronger than the evidence the Minister of the Interior got out of Mr. Howell in regard to the Manitoba prosecutions. The statement proceeds:

A man named Talmage, the owner of a restaurant in Dawson, located a bench claim about July, 1898, on Eldorado. Finding it difficult to get into the commissioner's office, he was informed that the firm of Gougin & Peabody could fix it for him. He went to them, paid them $10, and received a slip of paper, which he showed to the policeman on guard at the commissioner's door, was let into the office, and recorded his claim. This was a common occurrence.

A woman, a well-known character, and an old resident of the Yukon, staked a claim on French Hill. Finding she would have some difficulty in recording it, she went to Captain Norwood, the Government deputy at the Forks, and asked him how much she would have to give up to get her claim straightened out and recorded. He said: "Go and see Miss Mulrooney; she will fix it for you." She went to Miss Mulrooney, who gave her a bill of sale for a half interest in her claim, when she was allowed to record the same, and then she claimed that she didn't get the claim that she had staked. Miss Mulrooney, by common report, was the regular go-between for the officials at the Forks.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). That seems to have been stated of his own knowledge.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A good deal of it he qualifies; in regard to some he says that he was informed.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no qualification in the last passage.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, he says in regard to the Forks that he was speaking of common knowledge. Now, in this case there was a singularly credible man representing, I suppose, one of the largest banking houses in London, a man who has interests in the Yukon. He came to see me, and I never discussed with him whether he was a Liberal or a Conservative in English politics, but he confessed that he knew nothing whatever of Canadian politics, but he knew that I was a member of the Canadian Parliament. He declined, not so much on his own account, as on account of the people he represented in England, to allow me to use his name. He gave me his name, and showed me letters from Lord Strathcona which he had shown to Major

Walsh. He said that when he went to present his letters, Major Walsh, the Commissioner of this Government in the Yukon, was in such a state of inebriation, so drunk and besotted, that he ordered him out of his office and denied that Lord Strathcona had ever given him any such letters as he claimed to have. He told me other things in regard to the Commissioner, Major Walsh, that I would not like to repeat on the floor of this House, but he afterwards committed to writing a statement which I hold in my hands. A large part of it refers to the onerous conditions upon mining transactions in that country, and is quite clear from his statements that he found these transactions most detrimental to the prosecution of his industry. I wish to give to the House, Mr. Speaker, through you, that part of the statement that bears more directly on the serious charges that I am bringing to the notice of the Government, and with regard to which I think they are bound to take some active measures and some course which hitherto they have not indicated they would take. This was taken down by myself from this gentleman :

A grievance with which the entire respectable population of Canada will sympathise is that of the liquor traffic. Up to the present no prospector, miner, claim owner, or investor going into the country is permitted by the law, even though he be going to winter in an Arctic climate, to take into the country with him a gallon of whisky, or any wine. The law does not allow him even to take a bottle of brandy for medicinal purposes. It goes without saying that the law is to a certain extent evaded. Such a law encourages smuggling and petty dishonesty among lower officials. However, that is not the point. While a respectable member of the community going into Alaska is not permitted to take any alcohol, owners of drinking saloons, gambling dens and houses of infamy can get permits to take in any quantity of liquor they like. There are scores of these places in Dawson, and there is enough drink in the town to supply the requirements of a population three times as large as exists in the district. What these parasites of the community have paid the persons who obtained the permits for them should be inquired into. The Minister of the Interior, who is responsible for the system, while he prevents the respectable member of the community taking in alcohol, at the same time granting permits to the saloon keepers and others, has not taken any step to see that the liquor which is sold in the district is of even reasonable quality. The parasite is left free to sell what he likes at his own price, such as from 50 cents to $1 a drink, and $10 a bottle. Most of the stuff sold, it need scarcely be said is very bad. Beyond the duty of $2 a gallon on the liquor taken into the country, these saloon keepers, etc., pay nothing to the Government. The distinction between their treatment in the way of taxation and the treatment of the miner, who is taxed and harassed at every turn, is a curious one for a Christian Government to make.

I do not know whether this gentleman mentions it in the paper, but he gave me a sample of how this system worked. For instance, for fifteen miles away from the Record office, as he explained, you travel up a trail in order to find any land which is possibly open for staking. When you go up there and find a first-rate prospect, you see stakes all about, but you had no knowledge when you started as to the location. You could not get it for love or money, and, as he said, many and many a man who had staked a claim could not maintain his claim there and had to abandon it, but there was no notice of that, and so, you would have to trudge back to the office at Dawson, and when you got back after doing at least your thirty miles—for every claim nearer than fifteen miles from Dawson had been taken up—then you met an official, and when you asked him if he could show you what claims were taken up and what were not, he would refuse you point blank. He would simply tell you : You must tell us the lands you want to take, and we will tell you if you staked property that is open to location. As this gentleman put it : You can imagine how many weary trudges were made between the mining district and that office if you could not get into the good graces of the official. Then I pressed the question to him : But surely men do not do these thirty miles of travel without getting some result. He replied : Oh, no ; they came in the side door. In the Post Office Department, in the mining office, from 10 o'clock until 4, you could not get your work done. Everything was so arranged that it was impossible for the ordinary applicant to get information until after office hours, and after office hours came the fee $10, $20, $30, $40, $50, and up to $100 for the officials. Everything was so arranged and all the official instructions so arranged, that the officer was protected by the rampart that he was not at liberty to give this information. There was no fee for getting the information during office hours between 10 and 4, but you could pay a certain fee to the official and get a map and a sketch of the district which would tell you on your next day's journey just what claim was abandoned and what was not. That information was not open to the public, and yet in British Columbia the reverse of that system has always been the case. In that province you can find out in every mining recorder's office all that information gratuitously, so that there is no opportunity for the officer, whether corrupt or incorrupt, to resort to these subterfuges to implement his salary. This gentleman continued to say :

A great grievance is the fact that the records at the mining office are not open to inspection by the public. It is impossible for anybody to find out what claims are and what claims are not recorded. The whole district is staked, but there is not a doubt that a large number of claims have never been recorded. The people owning them know they are safe, because they hold them in conjunction and connivance with certain officials. This should be put a stop to, and there should be hung up for public inspection in the Gold Commissioner's office a map showing every unrecorded claim in the district. This would give the outsider and the poor miner a chance.

I will stop here if the Minister of the Interior will be so courteous as to answer me a question. I ask him if of late they have not made a regulation in the Department of the Interior which gives the miner or applicant in the Yukon territory, the right to inspect these public records at his own pleasure and to see whether the claim is taken up or abandoned. This question of mine is based on a newspaper rumour.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton. The hon. gentleman is quite correct. There has been such an order made. There has not been an order made that the miner shall be entitled to inspect the official records, but that he shall be enabled to get all the information in the office by paying a proper fee. That order, I may say, Mr. Speaker, was made since it was learned that there was a complaint made on that score.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that while as in the case of Mr. Ogilvie, and as in the case of a gentleman like Mr. Sinclair, from Vancouver, a gentleman who is above suspicion and a worthy member of the Bar of the province; while all these things have been done of late, and while the Government could possibly have escaped all this obloquy if they had only appointed such men at the outset; the charge against them is: That at the outset they were not sapient enough, or else they were so reckless or else they were so corrupt, as to appoint the men they did, and to make these regulations which brought about this sad state of suspicion, and which they now have had to revoke. Take the province of British Columbia, in which I happen to live at the present time. It is a remarkable thing that that province was so much passed over in the appointment of officials in a mining country. British Columbia is par excellence a great mining country and there are men there who have had great experience, from away back in the fifties, with what has been, on the whole, first-class mining legislation—legislation introduced there under Imperial sanction and followed up gradually down to the present time. Is it not an extraordinary thing that when this Administration was casting about for men to administer satisfactorily the mining wealth of the Yukon, they should have cast that province over wholly and absolutely? And only now, when they are attempting to sweep the Augean stables and endeavouring to overcome the force of public opinion, though without trial and investigation, lest unhappily the investigation might bring these charges too near to the ministerial head, they have had at last to resort to the province to which they should have resorted at first, and have taken, as I believe, one of the best officials they have now in the public service in the Yukon, and taken him tardily, from the province of British Columbia; and he was no horse dealer. He is an intelligent and honest man, I believe, though I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance. Now, I draw attention to this gentleman's statement, because he is a most intelligent man and a singularly modest man; and he told me a great deal more that he believed to be true, but that he hesitated to put in any shape or form, as it was not such as he could personally prove or felt warranted in making a positive statement about:

During the past year it has been impossible for ordinary people to get their claims recorded or bills of sale, mortgages and other documents put on record without waiting for days—

Mr. Speaker, we charge a fee, and every man knows a right tidy sum, for recording those documents, and we had the men there ready to do their work. Yet here is a statement which no one can gainsay:

—except by going to the "side door," as it is termed, and bribing Government officials to do the work out of office hours. Whether the work which is paid for in this way is really done out of office hours or not I can give no evidence, but if it is, all I can say is that the volume of business thus irregularly done is so great that Government officials can have little time for sleep or refreshment.

The innuendo there is plain, that that was so much the practice that there was so little done between ten and four, and so much after four, as this gentleman put it, that it is impossible to believe that the whole business was not so contrived that there was a side-door payment, while the work was going on all the time, though ostensibly you could not get it done in office hours.

The arrangements for the delivery of letters has been most defective. After the mail arrives in Dawson several days frequently elapse before it is sorted, and much ingenuity has been displayed by the officials in preventing the people obtaining their letters. The consequence is that persons who cannot afford to waste their time by waiting in a crowd of from 100 to 300 or 400 men at the post office door, trying to get their letters, go to the side door, and by paying the clerk a dollar, arrange to have their mail delivered to them when they call at a certain time after office hours. This system has become a monstrous abuse.

The whole of the water front which was reserved for the Government has been leased to Macdonald & Morrison at $1 per foot frontage for a month. It is understood that the persons' names in the lease are mere figureheads. The whole of this frontage is relet to the public at from $10 to $15 per foot per month. The whole of the main street of Dawson is built upon land covered by this lease. The ground rent for any business premises is $10 per foot per month. Saloons, etc., pay $15 and $18. Such a ground rent as $10 per foot per month is a monstrous imposition upon the ordinary men of business in a place like Dawson. At any rate, if the land is worth such a rental, why was it not kept by the Government, and the money so obtained applied to improvements in the district.

All that profit, of course, has gone to the benefit of these people, who stood in, ac-ording to this evidence, with the agent of the Government.

But I have some more information. A gentleman who has been up in the Yukon, and who has had great experience in England and in the United States, who is an Englishman and who is interested in that country, and for this reason is not prepared to come forward under his own name and fulminate his charges against the Government, gives me this information; and, Mr. Speaker, whether his information be correct or not, I know of no reason whatever to believe for a moment that he would intentionally make a false statement, and I have known him for years. Certainly he feels strongly in regard to the condition of affairs in that country, and he has reason to feel so, if his statement to me be correct in regard to his own particular business. I am not his attorney or solicitor, but I happen to have known him for a long time. This is his statement:

Bad regulations and worse laws, ridiculous imposts upon the mining community, imposts and burdens such as foreign inhabitants of the Transvaal have never known, the appointment of officials and underlings to administer such laws and enforce such imposts, who were notoriously corrupt; favouritism in the sale of dredging and other leases, in the awarding of contracts, gross blunders in the arrangement of transport; the endeavour to force upon the people of Canada a railway contract which was a colossal deal: such are a few of the charges for which, in the next session of Parliament in Ottawa the present Ministry will have to render an account. Primarily responsible for this condition of affairs is the Minister of the Interior.

With regard to the office of Gold Commissioner and Mining Recorder, he says:

His staff was underpaid, inefficient and corrupt, complaints on all sides were constant and well grounded, gross and frequent acts of injustice to the mining communities were perpetrated daily. Admission to the recorder's office could rarely be obtained, except by payment, while further unauthorized and illegal charges were exacted for the recording and transfer of claims, and for general information necessary to the mining community.

To ascertain the title to a claim, merely to discover the name of an owner, sums up to $15 were demanded by the clerical staff "for an abstract of title," whereas all the record books of the recorder's office should have been open to the inspection of the world, as in the adjoining province of British Columbia, where all mining matters are conducted on fair and business principles, and where the mining population is protected and contented.

Although the Government were collecting hundreds of thousands of dollars on miners' licenses, the recording and transfer of claims, taxes on boats, royalties on wood and land, duties on goods indirectly from many other sources, not one penny was spent on the improvement of roads—the streets in Dawson were a disgrace to any civilized back-woods village—the improvement of navigation of the upper Yukon, nor on any means of access to the country. The sole expenditure incurred in the official administration and policing of the country would equally have been necessary had any such community established itself in any other part of Canada, which duties is one of the ordinary responsibilities of Government.

These statements in a sense are general.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It is only a political philippic.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But the philippic is based upon the very statements given by other individuals. It is a little more general; but still, does the hon. gentleman contend, for instance, that they have spent a dollar on local improvements in the Yukon or at Dawson?

Mr. FOSTER. Or one cent for sanitation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. Minister who interrupted me—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I understand the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has given these statements as facts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Anybody in listening to it can see that it is a political diatribe. I can recognize the hon. gentleman's own language in the statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is quite worthy of the Minister of the Interior. He is base enough—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order, order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Why did not the right hon. gentleman call his colleague to order?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). He was in order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He said he could recognize my language in a document which I attributed to another.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Brodeur). I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the expression "base," which he used.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I understood the hon. gentleman took this statement down. Did he not put it into words?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say anything of the kind in regard to this statement. Not an hon. gentleman with any fairness in his composition would say that I had told the House I had taken down a single syllable of this document. There is only one document I referred to as having been taken down by me from the lips of the person making the statement; and when I say by that I mean it was taken by a typewriter under my direction. I did not act as amanuensis. The Minister of the Interior tries to avoid the force of this statement by insinuating that I have written this, that I have invented it. He tries to weaken the force of the statement that he must believe in this House, whether in his heart he believes it or not, that I got this statement from the gentleman I said I did, a gentleman interested in the business of the Yukon who writes from what he knows. It is true I said I could not vouch for the words he used, but I would vouch for this—that it was his statement and that I believe him to be a credible and reliable authority. But the Minister cannot avoid the force of the statement by any such innuendo or pretense. My statement is a fair and understandable one, and it is placed frankly before the House and before the country to show that there is more than a suspicion of wrongdoing. If you have not names signed to solemn declarations in support of specific charges, and there is a reason for their absence in the system of terrorism that prevails. Do hon. members on the Treasury benches pretend to ignore the charge that the Commissioner who preceded Mr. Ogilvie was in every respect totally unworthy of the high position to which he had been called? Do they pretend to deny the serious statements I have given on the authority of men whom I believe to be as worthy of credence as any men on the Treasury benches, and there are friends of mine there, that he was living in open drunkenness and immorality, disgracing the Queen's name and authority? Have not the hon. gentlemen themselves heard of these charges? There are friends of theirs who have gone to the Yukon. Let them consult the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison). I make no unfair charge. It is my duty to tell the Ministers what I believe to be the facts after having sifted as carefully as I can information that came to me at Victoria and at Vancouver from Liberal sources, from men connected with commerce and transportation in the Yukon, men representing great English companies, not one or two only but three. I say that the man who represented Canada was a disgrace to Canada in character and administration. That is the information borne in upon me and I have endeavoured to impress upon them that in cases where they did not have half as much information they could spend thousands in tracking down offenders against the law. Here they have a chance to bring before the bar of public opinion as well as before the bars of our courts, men, who having been placed in responsible positions have disgraced themselves and in disgracing themselves have disgraced Canada. And when I lay before the House this information, explaining that if I do not give the name of the persons from whom I received it. I believe him to be reliable, people in whose character and integrity I have every reason to trust, and the only reason for concealing the names is that which I have already explained, and even then I am frank enough to say to the House that if they knew as much as I do about public opinion in Canada regardless of party they would not be so afraid to give the support of their names to these charges. Their fear was that the charges would come so near the Ministers of the Crown that, instead of ridding the country of the men who had done the wrong, they would have their own interests destroyed in a country in which they had invested so much money. I have more on this head. I have a letter from a member of the bar, a gentleman who voted against the Conservative party in 1896, a gentleman who sent a letter to one of the Toronto papers from the Yukon. He is not afraid of his name being used. His letter is as follows, and it is after Mr. Ogilvie's arrival:—

Mr. Ogilvie has arrived, and is fast making himself the most popular man in the Yukon. Beginning with the post office, he has appointed about eight delivery clerks, and put in 1,000 call and 200 lock-boxes. The lock-boxes rent for $25, and the call-boxes for $8 per annum. The post office will derive about $13,000 per year from box rent, the public will be served, and the public tax of keeping an average of 100 men per day waiting for their mail, while wages were more than $10 per day, will be reduced to a minimum. Putting it moderately, the change in the administration of the Dawson post office ought to be worth $400,000 per annum to the country.

The nightmare administration of the Gold Commissioner's Office has been much improved. A few of the mining officials have taken a leave of absence for the country's good. Many of the swarm of offices that packed into this 18 x 24 foot building have been removed to down-town quarters. Many new clerks have been employed. Abstracts and information are no longer given on the side, but through the Gold Commissioner. The enormous side salaries of the clerks are passing away. But much remains to be done. Fawcett is incompetent, the Government regulations unworkable, and the records frightful. Mr. Ogilvie respects Mr. Fawcett, as we all do. Will he have the nerve to retire him? That remains; but Mr. Ogilvie has done incalculable good, even at the Gold Commissioner's Office, and he may even aid Fawcett to become competent.

Colonel Steele is also here. It is wonderful how much this stern, hard man is beloved by every man under him. He has brought stricter discipline into the already splendid police force, and, doubtless, has aided Mr. Ogilvie greatly in many matters.

J. E. Girouard, ex-M.P., is now registrar, and attempts to practice law, in defiance of sections 21 and 31 of the Land Titles Act, 1894.

I think there is a question in regard to that on the Notice paper, as to whether that is with the sanction of the Minister.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Mr. Girouard is not ex-M.P., but an M.P.P. of Quebec.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER—

The inefficient timber inspector, Willison, has been promoted to be Dominion lands agent.

Philip Sheridan poses as Crown prosecutor. Dubitum est, says Wade's firm, and the local bar have protested against it being called the firm of Girouard & Sheridan, while Girouard holds the office of the clerk of the court. A Mr. Thiell is clerk of the court, but, being without legal training, he is incompetent to take examinations, tax costs and do all that is required of a clerk of court. It will thus be seen that all of Mr. Wade's offices have, with the possible exception of Crown prosecutorship, gone to others; but we understand that he is senior member of the Yukon Council and Attorney General thereof, at a salary of $2,500 per year, and, as his duties in such office will be small, one can see that he will not feel neglected. He is at present outside, but is expected to return. Colonel Evans's men have arrived at Selkirk, via Teslin, and two companies of them are in Dawson. With the most law-abiding people on the globe, there is no one to fight. There may be some use found for them. We have no judge.

That is before Judge Dugas arrived. He was sent up some time after Judge Maguire had left. According to the arrangements of this business Government, there was in interregnum in the Yukon territory, just as, I believe, under this business Government and the administration of the Minister of the Interior, regulations were made in January which were not promulgated in the Yukon territory until the following May. Those regulations, of course, put into frightful confusion all the conditions of property and the matters concerned with the regulations, from January until May. Questions have to be fought out at the expense of private litigants now, in consequence of the crass neglect of the Minister of the Interior—not to say that these regulations should not go into force until such a reasonable time as would give people in that district sufficient notice.

The jail is full of prisoners awaiting their trial. The docket is overlaid with unheard civil cases. Lawyers, unable to have cases tried, escape their clients' anger by avoiding them. There should be two judges in our Territorial Court, one for mining cases, and one for all others. Such a man as Wilson, of British Columbia, an old Caribou miner, now one of the leaders of the British Columbia bar, would fill the first position well. But he is too competent to suit the Laurier Government, and the position is too remote and the salary too small to suit him.

Mine Inspectors Norwood and McGregor have gone. They are reported to have done well here financially. The one need, therefore, go no more on a whaler, and the other need not rely on horse-trading for a living. The present mine inspector Madden, had something to do with Nova Scotia coal mines, and thus can say he has seen a mine before. His predecessors could not. The ever-glorious Major Walsh has gone. "Lucile" has followed him. Bliss has gone. Will the gaps in the old-time list ever be filled? Time will tell.

The Tarte-Sifton principle of making and filling offices for the benefit of the office-holders, and not for the benefit of the country, has borne plentiful fruit here. The gross evils of the system may never recur again, but the system remains in vogue.

Those mining regulations, issued on January 18th, 1898, are a fitting monument to the utter incapacity of the Laurier Government. It is interesting to note that no proviso is made as to when the said regulations were to come in force. They, therefore, came in force on the date thereof, but were communicated to the officials and miners here in May. What about rights acquired in the interim.

As to the ten-claim reservation, let me ask Mr. Sifton: Was it the ten claims above or below Discovery claim that you meant to reserve? Or did you mean to leave open four claims on one side and five on the other? Or did you mean to leave it so uncertain that no man could tell, when he located any creek claim, whether he might not be on Government ground? Thus far as to creek claims, but as to bench claims, where they are often in a block. Take a block of them, seven claims square, and tell me whether you meant to reserve any of these claims to the Government? Increase the block to thirteen claims square—now tell me, Mr. Sifton, what, if any, you meant to reserve? Confess you did not know. It will be better than to say you were "boodle blind." But it is useless to talk to Mr. Sifton. No one here has any confidence in him, except the men who engaged the services of his law-partner, Mr. Philp, when he was in here last spring. Mr. Philp works for them on the halves.

Section 10 is supposed to define the boundaries of a creek claim. It does so, but no one can apply the principle. Any one could tell when the surface of a claim rose 3 feet above a certain point, but no one can tell when the bed-rock rises 3 feet until the claim is worked out, for the aforesaid bed-rock may lie 1 foot or 200 feet below the surface. Many Eldorado claims show this to be no supposition, but a fact. With bed-rock 200 feet below the surface, stop and consider how much it would cost to define the lateral boundaries of an Eldorado claim. Section 39 says a claim must be occupied. Common sense says it ought to be worked, and to a certain amount. This same section puts an awful corrupting power in the hands of the Gold Commissioner. Again, the regulations seem to conceive that every application for a claim would be followed by a grant. Poor, simple Government. What, if five applications are made? Ought not a fee to be charged for filing each application, and, when on file, then the decision might be given and a fee charged for the grant.

What system of registration is the recorder to adopt? The Torrens system, I suppose, under the Land Titles Act, 1894; but the Gold Commissioner has not done so, and no one can be quite sure what the insane Government intend?

The royalty system is a tax on labour. A tax on the net returns, with exemptions, would be partially a tax on capital and not absolutely fitted to shut up the working of every mine, as the present system is. But, far better than any royalty system, would be a direct tax on the assessed value of each claim valued at more, say, than $5,000. Then shutting down or cheating about the output would not evade the tax. Such a tax would stimulate the working of valuable mines. The royalty tax discourages it.

It is useless, however, to discuss mining regulations before merchants and farmers. You may take it for granted, that there is scarcely a redeeming feature in these regulations, and that up to the present time the administration of them has been worse than the regulations.

Mr. Sifton must resign. He must do more, and I think the only way to clean up the Augean stable is to sound the note for the final downfall of the Laurier Government. Events have written of it: "Mene, Mene, Tekel Upharsin." I, who have lived on the frontier for nearly six years, am forced to say that the late Administration was so bad I had to vote against it; but, after two years' experience with their successors, I begin to think former corruption and inefficiency was as nothing, compared with the present.

Dated at Dawson, Yukon, October 4th, A.D., 1898.

C. M. WOODWORTH.

I believe this Mr. Woodworth is a member of the Bar in that country, and he was also, I think, a member of the Bar in the Territories or Manitoba, before he went there.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Where did Mr. Woodworth vote?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the Territories, I suppose.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). His name is rather against him. They are not Liberals.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I think he found occupation at Dawson City by writing to the "Mail."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If Mr. Woodworth, instead of attacking the Administration, was in their confidence, was a heeler and a friend, he could do as a heeler and a friend of theirs was able to do in the city of Victoria, also a member of the Bar, that is, to charge and collect a fee of $500 because he was able, by telegram and by a letter, to obtain from the Minister of the Interior a permit for his client to send liquor into the Yukon. That is my statement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman tell me who the client was that got the permit?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I will not.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will he tell me by whom the permit was got.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I certainly will not. But I will write to that gentleman, who is a member of the Bar, and ask him if I may give his name to the Minister of the Interior and to this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Surely the hon. gentleman will not make a statement without giving the name of the lawyer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, I will. I have been telling hon. gentlemen here all this evening, on these Yukon charges, the reason why some of these names must be withheld.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is no reason in this case.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I may be allowed to state for the information of the hon. gentleman that the statement he has made is absolutely untrue.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not surprised at the Minister of the Interior making such a statement, because it is absolutely impossible at this time for him to know whether it is true or not. Let any hon. gentleman look in the "Hansard" and see the position that the Minister of the Interior occupies now when he tells us that that statement is untrue. It shows the degradation to which he has sunk.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman says that this lawyer got a permit by telegraph. I say that statement is not true.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say anything of the kind.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The right hon. gentleman may say "yes" and may shake their heads, but what I said is down now in "Hansard," and what I said is right by the book. It is that there is not a Liberal, not one of their followers, their supporters, the claqueurs at the present time in British Columbia, who would not believe that this gentleman was able to obtain a fee of $500 for the simple service of telegraphing a request to the Minister of the Interior for a liquor permit.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I say they did not get a permit.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and the hon. gentleman has grown so reckless that he has said that he had no hesitation in saying that the statement was untrue.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I was telegraphed to, but I did not send the permit.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I know that the Minister of the Interior has put himself in a very uncomfortable and disgraceful position. It is impossible for any man sitting on that side of the House, at the present moment, to conscientiously and credibly make the statement that he has made, that my statement was untrue. It may be or it may not be. If I am false to all sense of honour, it may be possible, but the hon. gentleman cannot say that that statement is untrue. He has not in the past, and he does not now possess a position in this House, or in this country, that will make his mere statement more worthy of acceptance than that of another, and least of all when he dares to impugn the honour of any other hon. gentleman in this House. This is a subject upon which his statement will fall flatter than any other. With his reputation such as it is in this House he cannot injure the position of any hon. gentleman here in any way that I know of, and least of all by giving his word against that of another. I tell the hon. gentleman that the statement I made is a statement of fact, and if he wishes to ferret it out he may do it, but at the present moment whether it is a statement of fact or not, he is not able to contradict me.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I contradict the hon. gentleman by saying that the statement he has made is absolutely untrue. I know to what he refers. The hon. gentleman has been taken in and has fallen into a mare's nest in regard to which a boy of ten years old would know better.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You see, Sir, the position in which the Minister of the Interior has placed himself. I gave him a hint which it would have been well for him to have acted upon, but he has been led away by his intolerant zeal, whereas his better course would have been to have remained quiescent. There is not a colleague of his that will justify him in the position he has taken.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am a colleague of the Minister of the Interior, and what I understand the hon. gentleman to imply is that there were some improper relations between somebody in Vancouver and the Minister of the Interior whereby liquor permits could be obtained improperly. But to that the Minister has given a flat contradiction.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And there is a rebuke to the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of the Interior would not have referred to my statement as he did if he were not a far bolder and more desperate man than my hon. friend the Minister of Finance thinks he is.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman says that $500 was paid by a firm of lawyers for telegraphing and getting a liquor permit. I say that statement is untrue, because no liquor permit was ever got by telegraph.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman tries to crawl out of it by saying that it was not obtained by telegraph.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman has been led off on a mare's nest. A large number of people between Vancouver and here, have known for the last two months that the hon. gentleman was going to bring this charge, and if he comes out in the open and gives us the particulars, I will show him to be a man who does not know the least thing about the value of evidence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman should remember that I have brought a good many serious charges against him to-night that he is not able to answer them. The hon. gentleman says that he has known for the last two months that I was going to make this statement about this permit. I only heard of it about ten days ago, yet he has known that I was going to bring it up for the last two months. What a splendid Minister of the Interior we have; he is a mind reader. He can read what is in your mind and what is not in your mind. However, he is now in a most unenviable position. His ignorance upon the Yukon has brought an ineffable disgrace upon the Government. In his own province see how his party is fighting him on account of the mixing and muddling he has made even in his own party matters. Is it to be wondered at that all over the world the same voice goes up. The revolt against the Minister of the Interior is not altogether from the Conservative party; he knows that there is in his own party the same feeling, and if he thinks he is going to drive down or crush the expression of public opinion on this side of the House as he has endeavoured to do to-night, he has counted very little with his host. The hon. gentleman may be intolerant with his own party, but he cannot exercise this or any other power on this side of the House. The facts that I have mentioned to the House can be proved, and the name of the gentleman I will be able to give to the House as well as the facts. I would give it in a moment if I did not think that perhaps it was my duty first to ask the gentleman concerned, and I see no reason why he should not give his name. Traffic in liquor permits! Let us look into that, Mr. Speaker, let us inquire what mysterious visits were made to the coast; let us find out why it was that some that had permits who were not friends of the Minister had their liquor held at the boundary of the Yukon territory until the men who were his friends got their liquor into the Yukon territory. There are lots of things that are interesting and that must be inquired into by this House in connection with the Minister of the Interior and the Yukon territory.

Sir, I know men that want a fiat of justice, and probably will apply for a fiat to this Government, for a petition of right in which they will charge, and are ready to prove the last statement I made. Will the Minister of the Interior, or any Minister on the Treasury benches, undertake now, since the Minister of the Interior is very quick to ask me, will any one of them say they are willing to grant a fiat for a petition of right based on the statement I have made: That the Minister of the Interior did directly stop the entrance into the Yukon territory of liquor under a permit issued, until the liquor that came under a permit issued and given to friends of his should catch up with the other liquor and go in ahead or at the same time.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). That is a statement that is utterly false.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the Minister says that is a statement that is utterly false.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I say it is.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then, if it is utterly false, there is no risk about the fiat; for if it is utterly false the claimant cannot prove it. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) say, or will any of his colleagues who have confidence in him say, that a fiat will be granted if a petition of right is filed and the question tried out as to its falsity in the Exchequer Court ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). We do not grant fiats, on such a statement made by an hon. gentleman in the House of Commons.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) says the statement is utterly false, and although we have his colleagues pretty well arrayed there, even to the Solicitor General acting for the Minister of Justice, not one of them has confidence in him to say that they will grant a fiat. He (Mr. Sifton) has whispered to his Fides Achates, the Minister of Marine. There is not one of them who has sufficient confidence in the Minister of the Interior to say : We will willingly grant a fiat in a case like that, so that the matter can be fought out in the Exchequer Court and the truth and falsity of the charge settled there instead of being glibly tossed across the floor of this House by the Ministers.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds). Answer now.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say it is childish.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am afraid we have no confidence in my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister of Finance is afraid he has no confidence in me. I say they have no confidence in their own colleague, or if they had they would risk granting a fiat. It only allows the man who has given me this information an opportunity to prove his charge, which the Minister of the Interior hedged around with all the protection that his colleagues know so well—says is false—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Why does he not send in his application.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think he will.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then it will be time to consider it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is right ; he is an orderly and methodical man and I congratulate him on it, and he suggests the ordinary course. But I thought, Sir, that this was a good way to give the quietus to this uneasy and restless Minister of the Interior, who has been jumping up ever and anon during this debate, making most extravagant statements, and showing how ill he takes these serious indictments. I thought, Mr. Speaker, it was a good opportunity to puncture the wind bag ; I thought it was a good opportunity to see how much his colleagues believed him. He stated solemnly here that that statement was false. Well, if his colleagues believed a word that he said—and I put it most politely—they would say at once : We will grant a fiat for that petitioner, and we will settle whether or not your information is false. I dare them ; I dare them in this debate, one and all of them, to say they will grant the fiat. There is not one of them who will do it. The Master of the Administration is here and it tickles him ; he is trying to pass it off with a laugh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Mr. Tarte). Yes, I laugh at that.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman knows that we will be advised by the Minister of Justice in these matters.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But the Solicitor General is in this House and surely he will not be passed over.

The PRIME MINISTER. He is not passed over ; it is not in his province.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has gone wrong with the Solicitor General ? Is he to be passed over ? Is he not the Irish Catholic representative in the Cabinet ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not know that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was putting it from a religious point of view.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, but I have a feeling about that department, because, for a few days, I occupied that office, and I do not like any reflection cast on the Solicitor General of Canada. I say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is here and the Ministers can consult with him, especially as the statement of the Minister of the Interior has been so very direct, and if they believe a word of it, there is no risk in giving a fiat. Perhaps they had better go to New York and have a Council meeting there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). You are poaching on the preserves of my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor). Leave that Sunday business to him.

Mr. TAYLOR. You had a conference there on Sunday all right.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. By the way, I do not think I should pass it over, for it is a rather curious coincidence and interesting in the history of this country. When I spoke of the Master of the Administration, it is a remarkable fact—and I do not know that "Hansard" has recorded it—that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works responded. I would like them to settle that question between them as to which is the master. It is awkward, because I have always regarded the Minister of Public Works as the Master, and he did not disavow it in the speech which he made to this House. He has accepted the title. I wish now to refer to something that the correspondent of the London "Times" wrote. I do not believe in the theory as has been suggested by some, that it is the duty of the Opposition to hurl charges against their opponents in the Government. I am arguing to-night from another point of view, and that is that I never had to examine such a mass of testimony, or testimony which called for such a searching inquiry as this testimony in regard to the deplorable condition of affairs in the Yukon. I trust that I may have the attention of the Minister's presence for a moment. I know I cannot convince the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, but still when one is making charges against them it is always pleasant to meet them face to face, and I trust that when they have had their little joke they will give me their attention. I admit, Sir, that I never was in the Yukon, I admit that all my information is hearsay, but I do say it was derived from credible sources, from those whom I believe to be credible and respectable citizens—not a foreigner among the lot of my informants, all of them subjects of the Queen, and all of them men that I believe to be in every sense reliable. Now, what does Miss Shaw say—I believe she is the correspondent of the "Times"—at any rate, this is from the "Times" correspondent, of Sept. 23, and Miss Shaw went through the district. Here is what she says :

To put the position as plainly as it is daily and hourly stated on the mining fields and in the streets of Dawson, there is a widely prevalent conviction not only that the laws are bad, but that the officials through which they are administered are corrupt. Apart from the graver charges, there is much dissatisfaction with imperfections of organization, which are ascribed to inaptitude and inattention to business on the part of the responsible officers. That there are, as yet, no roads, no trustworthy mail arrangement of any kind, and no clear distribution of streets and town lots, in a town of nearly 20,000 inhabitants, are conditions which are held to be wholly unnecessary in view of the amount of the revenue derived from the mines and the fact that the town is now two years old. There can be no question that in these respects "gold fever" has had the effect of diverting energy and attention from all but mining interests. The unsanitary condition of Dawson, situated, as the town is, upon a swamp, and devoid of the most elementary provisions for cleanliness and health, is a standing menace to the community. Typhoid is permanent in the town; the death rate is abnormally high, and there are as yet no signs of any measure to be taken to avert the danger of a serious outbreak of epidemic. That mining districts cannot be surveyed, that claims in many instances cannot be recorded, that necessary information with regard to the districts already staked is not open to the public are facts which have come to be regarded by the public as so many purposely designed channels for individual bribery. A half or a quarter interest is frequently quoted as the price at which good claims can be recorded, and scarcely a day passes in which some fresh story does not become current of the number of dollars which it has cost to obtain letters from a nominally unsorted mail or to make good an entrance on business into one of the public offices.

Then, commenting on this, which is not half so strong, I submit, as the evidence I have given to this House, the "Times" says :

There are serious dangers in the isolation of such a community as that depicted by our correspondent, not the least of them being the weakness of the machinery of government and the opportunities given for the growth of unchecked abuses. Unfortunately, it appears to be only too plain, from the very grave allegations put forward by our correspondent, that the absence of control has permitted administrative irregularities to become rampant in the Klondike. The lack of roads, telegraphs, satisfactory postal arrangements and sanitary precautions in a town like Dawson City, containing nearly 20,000 people, and yielding a great income to the state, is serious enough.

That is some evidence, Mr. Speaker, from a friendly source on the whole, to the Administration of the day. The right hon. gentleman will not say that the London "Times" has not been singularly fair to his Administration from the time that he assumed office to the present day. The "Times" seems to be in regard to the home Government as well as in regard to this Government just now—and there may be some reason in it—singularly fair, and desirous of saying all that can possibly be said on their behalf; and yet the "Times," with that condition of mind and that temper was forced to make the observations to which I have referred. That was in September last. We have learned a great deal since September last. I think, therefore, my language cannot be considered a language of exaggeration when I have charged home the gravity of the condition of affairs, and the necessity, not for the sake of the Government, but for the sake of Canada's honour, of probing this thing to the very bottom. That is what we want, Mr. Speaker. If it hits the Minister of the Interior, let him go. If it hits the Government, of course the Government will go. But unless the Government fear that either the Minister of the Interior will be directly implicated—as his conduct in this debate and his attitude towards me when I was endeavouring fairly to give him the information in my possession leads me to believe to be the case—the Government ought to give us a full, fair and independent investigation. They cannot do that by Mr. Ogilvie. They cannot give us a fair investigation by any creature of this Administration. We want it by a gentleman who is as high as Parliament itself—by a gentleman who cannot be removed except by the votes of both Houses of Parliament. We want it by the highest possible commission, and not for mere party capital, but for the sake of Canada's reputation in the world; so that if there is an impression over the face of the globe to-day that the conduct of the Canadian administration in the Yukon has been more disgraceful than any conduct that ever disgraced Oom Paul or any state in the American union, then let it be said that this Parliament was equal to the occasion, and, on the motion if you like of the Government of the day, created an independent commission and clothed it with such power that it could probe the thing to the bottom, and then allow the law to take its course on the facts that commission might ascertain and divulge. That is the point of my long speech or the long part of my speech. I could not condense that speech. It was impossible to do so more than I have done ; and yet I have attempted condensation. I hold in my hand stacks of similar information to what I have already given. The reply may come, where I have given the information, as I admit I have done in the main, without disclosing the name. "Unless you disclose the name, we will do nothing." But in view of the argument I have made, and the precedent I have quoted, I think the people of this country will not take that as a satisfactory answer, but will demand and insist that there shall be a high-class, independent commission appointed, before which this information can be given and given in safety, and by which the matter may be probed, and probed to the bottom. I may not speak to sympathetic ears so far east from the Klondike ; but if I know the gentlemen in British Columbia who are hot adherents of the Administration, I say this. I am perhaps relying unduly on them ; but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, from what I know of public opinion there, from what I know of captains of vessels, of men who have gone into that country and come out of it, they would not be indifferent to the appeals I have made.

Mr. G. R. MAXWELL (Burrard). It is all tommy-rot.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. and reverend gentleman from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) says it is tommy-rot. I understand that hon. gentleman is somewhat attached to the Administration of late, and I confess candidly that I was not appealing to him when I referred to the good sense of the people of British Columbia, whether they were Liberals or Conservatives. That hon. gentleman is just now landed on Deadman's Island, and on Deadman's Island I believe he will be decently interred ; and that hon. gentleman, at any rate until the Minister of Militia does, what I believe to be, his duty and cancels one of the most disgraceful documents that ever emanated from a Government office or from a town bar-room, is bound to be a subservient supporter of the Administration, and to characterize as tommy-rot anything that comes from this side of the House.

Mr. MAXWELL. No, no.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman himself knows that he has induced the Minister of Militia to put his name to the most ridiculous statement in the English language—that he has made the Queen responsible for the most horrible statements in regard to that lease, and the hon. gentleman, I am glad to say, looks ashamed of it.

Mr. MAXWELL. Not a bit.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is forced to say that he is not ashamed. If he is not, the Minister of Militia is ashamed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. F. W. Borden). No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then if neither is ashamed, I venture to say they ought to be, and I venture to say that when the question in regard to Deadman's Island is put before the House, if the Minister of Militia has the courage to answer each portion of that question, we may be able to appreciate why the hon. and reverend member for Burrard characterizes anything I say as tommy-rot. Now, I have more evidence in regard to this interesting question of the Yukon administration. I have here another document. For reasons I have already mentioned, I shall not give the name of my informant. He is in the service of a responsible body of men, he is not an American, he is a British subject. And, in writing an official letter, not to the press, but for his own purposes, he states as follows :—

It is perfectly certain that nothing but extraordinarily rich ground can begin to pay here until prices shall have adjusted themselves. The Government is enforcing the royalty on the gross output, the cost of getting gold out is at the least 5 per cent, labour is still $15 per day, and packing costs at the rate of from 1½ to 2 cents per pound per mile. It is expected that the royalty will be removed, and it is certain that in the course of time the other charges will be greatly reduced ; but until such time comes it is useless for any one having just an ordinary rich claim to attempt to do more than represent it.

As regards the royalty, too strong language cannot be used. It is without a doubt the last straw in a country where mining is carried on under such enormous disadvantages. Many property owners have determined to do no more than the necessary representation until the tax is removed, or at all events reduced, and although Major Walsh has been heard to say he will force them to work the ground, it is the opinion of many there are not enough policemen in Canada to enforce any arbitrary regulations with public feeling as strong as it is. Major Walsh has not proved a conspicuous success so far, and he is by no means popular. The whole business of the Government wants radical alteration. It is not run on the square in any single department, and all this royalty and alternate claim arrangement appears to be a grand opportunity of which the officials avail themselves with greed.

We had to instruct the notaries to use some small cash inducements amongst the officials, otherwise the transfers would have gone through only in their regular turn, which now means a matter of two months at the least. The Gold Commissioner's office is a disgrace, and is in keeping with every other department of the administration in the country. We are fighting from this end, but we expect and know that one word from influential quarters in London will do more than our arguments will in a week. It is absolutely essential to the success of every individual and company in the country that no time be lost in removing the clauses in the regulations relating to the royalty and alternate claims becoming Government property. Granting that the country is rich, it is not nearly so rich as Ogilvie makes it out to be, and with all the disadvantages under which we are labouring in this remote spot, and which make mining more costly than in any other part of the world, it is unreasonable to suppose that any ground can possibly stand such outrageous taxation as a royalty of 10 per cent on the gross output. The alternate claim is another unheard of thing, and will, no doubt, give opportunities to the Government officials, golden opportunities (both here and at Ottawa) for boodling, of which they are all eager to avail themselves.

With a small royalty we might, perhaps, be able to get along, provided the whole or a reasonable proportion of the revenue is collected be expended upon the improvement of the country. But to-day, as far as I can see, not one cent of the large amount paid into the treasury has come out to make things one bit easier for us. The streets of Dawson are bottomless pits of mire, and the trails are as bad or worse. The post office arrangements only enable the mail to be distributed a week after its arrival, and even then one has to take up his stand in turn and wait from three to four hours to be admitted through the door, unless a policeman can be induced for a consideration of $2 or $3 to take him round by the side door. Of the recorder's office I have already written, and I wish that I could use in an official letter language strong enough to express the public feeling against administration, a feeling which embraces the whole outfit, from Major Walsh downwards.

We are holding a mass meeting, not to protest against these things, but to consider them, on Saturday night, but we look for help from the outside, and we realize that what we say will carry no weight. I can assure you that John Forrest would have been lynched years ago, had he attempted to enforce any legislation of such an extraordinary kind. We know, of course, that any appeals on this matter, unless they point out that the Government is simply killing the goose that lays the golden egg, will be entirely fruitless. The people of Eastern Canada care for nothing, provided taxation for them is reduced, but they can rest assured that, unless a radical alteration is effected at once as regards the royalty, the people will see the futility of coming here, and those who are here will get out at any cost. It is neither a long way nor hard trip to get over the line on to the American side, and there are plenty going there now, but it is nothing to the stampede which will take place unless the Government will give some assurance that these things are to be amended, or, at any rate, that a commission will be sent to inquire into them.

I have written at length on this point, because it is of an importance which cannot be exaggerated. If next year we have to pay out 10 per cent of our gross output, I hold out no very bright hopes of making a brilliant success. If, on the other hand, this penalty is removed, and if the Government will give us roads, trails and something more than the promise of a railway, then with a reasonable rate of wages and reduced cost of all necessaries, we can go in and work with something more than the expectation of merely enriching Eastern Canada in general, and the friends of the Liberal party in particular. I know it is pretty straight talking, but, had you had the opportunity of sizing up the local officials, as I have done during the last month, you would have agreed with a prominent local man, who said: "They are so crooked, they will walk in a circle."

I submit these matters to the consideration of your board, and beg of them to do all they can to give the country and the individuals and companies operating in it a chance to exist.

We are trying to get up an agitation against the barbarous amendments to the mining laws, including especially the 10-per-cent royalty and the alternate and abandoned claims returning to the Government, and I assure you that, though the feeling in the place is as strong as it can be, we are having the greatest difficulty in getting the men, especially the Americans, to participate. They are all in the greatest awe of the fraud, Walsh, who was sent up with powers that no sovereign in the world possesses, and who will not move a finger to help the country or the men in it. I do hope that you at home will kick decidedly against the above shocking regulations, for a kick from you will have more effect from you in London than anything we can do here; but the question is such a burning one and of such vital importance, both to individuals and companies, that we have decided no time must be lost in showing the outside that the feeling is unanimous and that the existing state of things must inevitably kill the country. I heard a man say to-day: "I have mined twelve years in the Transvaal, and thought that the laws there were as bad and worse than they make them; but I now take my hat off to President Kruger. The Transvaal is a fool to this."

Ten per cent on the gross means the difference between a handsome profit and a loss to a good many claims. The uncertain feeling with regard to this has had a most marked effect on property. Claims on Hunker and Sulphur which were selling from $60,000 to $150,000, may now be bought for from $15,000 to $30,000. It is a great chance to pick up cheap property. I anticipate that it will still go lower, and that in sixty days there will be some wonderful bargains to be picked up, that is, assuming that the royalty will ultimately come off. If it doesn't, then mining here is going to be a tough proposition.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). What is the date of that paper?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER, 14th June, 1898. I have already intimated that any one who attempted to enter on the subject that I have taken out this evening had a very difficult duty to perform and one for which he had to ask the patience of members of the House for allowing him to go through a lot of documents as evidence of the character which I have given to-night, which is tedious. I admit to those who have to listen, tedious to Mr. Speaker, and tedious to myself.

I have not given the House all the information that has come to me; I have given the House samples of the information that is unfortunately familiar, the most of it, to those hon. gentlemen who have followed the career of the Minister of the Interior and the history of the Yukon territory since he came into that office. I think I have made out enough to establish that the present system of dealing with these matters is not at all satisfactory; that is to say, that Mr. Ogilvie is not in a position, no matter how good and capable an officer he may prove himself to be—and I believe he will prove himself to be such—I say he is not in a position to make a thorough and clear investigation into these matters that so closely connect the Minister of the Interior and the Government with the most serious charges, charges of such recklessness, such vile conduct on the part of the officials, that it is not reasonable to presume that they dared so to act without believing that there was no danger in their so acting. The conduct was so disgraceful in the administration of the Yukon that while sickness and filth were rampant, the Christian Government of this great country, a country that the Postmaster General boasts of being part of an Empire vaster than has been, while it was drawing out of that region immense revenues and huge royalties, paid out not one dollar for the comfort or for the business of the community. These things, I submit, make out a strong and absolute case for an inquiry, a rigid inquiry; and I believe the people of this country from one end of it to the other will not be satisfied unless that inquiry is made; and unless it be shown, for instance, that I, having taken this responsible position in the debate, have been hoodwinked, have been deceived and have been absolutely deluded, and have taken such a position as not to entitle any statement I make on information hereafter to be of importance. I say that unless such an inquiry is set on foot, the people of Canada will not be satisfied. Their honour is affected, the honour of the Government of this country is involved, and we must have, and I believe that the people of Canada will demand, a full inquiry into this matter. At this hour of the night, Mr. Speaker, I shall not venture to go into some other matters which were noted by me as fairly debatable on the Address; but I will say that while I have trespassed at great length upon the indulgence and patience of the House. I have been singularly and perhaps unduly complimented by the very kind and considerate attention manifested by those hon. gentlemen on both sides who have remained until this hour.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). It is manifestly impossible for me to attempt any reply to the lengthy speech of hearsay, mingled with insinuations which the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has given; and it is necessary, therefore, to content myself to-night with moving the adjournment of the debate. However, before doing so I may make a remark or two. I understand that my hon. friend from Pictou is not going to be in the House when it reassembles. I may be permitted to express my regret that after the language that he has used in reference to myself this evening, he is not going to be present when parliamentary rules will permit me to reply to him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will postpone his reply, I will be back.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman be here on Tuesday?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I cannot congratulate the hon. gentleman on the nature of the speech that he has made, when he was aware of the fact that he was not going to be here when a reply could be made to him. That, however, does not particularly affect the merits of the case, although it may affect the esteem in which the hon. gentleman may be held by members of the House. I desire, further, to say, before moving the adjournment of the debate, that very much of what the hon. gentleman has insinuated, if not stated, I know to be false, I know it to be altogether unfounded. Many of the other things, of course, I have no personal knowledge of, though I shall deal with them to some extent when I have an opportunity of doing so. The insinuations which the hon. gentleman has interlarded throughout his speech, that there was some personal relation between myself and any impropriety of any official in the Yukon district, I characterize as absolutely and entirely and altogether untruthful. I give the hon. gentleman credit for having sense enough to know that they are untrue. I cannot imagine that the hon. gentleman who has been so long in public life, has not sense enough to know that a Minister of the Crown would not be improperly connected with any improper act of any officials in that distant country, if such improper act there was. He will find out before he gets through with this transaction that if he has believed what he has tried to lead this House to believe, and tried to lead this country to believe, if he has entertained that belief, he has been an extremely silly and an extremely foolish man. Now, I only want to add this: We all know that the charges which have been made in regard to the officials of the Yukon district have appertained largely to the officials of the Gold Commissioner's office and to the Gold Commissioner. We know that the charge has been that the Gold Commissioner and his clerk, to use the language of the hon. gentleman, robbed the people who went into that country and attempted to carry on mining operations, that he was dishonest, and possibly guilty of malfeasance of office—that is to say, the Gold Commissioner and his clerk, as nobody else could do it because it was mining property with which they had to deal. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I am not prepared at this late hour to go into the subject fully, I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact, that in the despatches which are before us this evening in the evening papers we have a telegraphic report which comes direct from Dawson City in regard to the operations of the commission which was issued to Mr. Ogilvie for the purpose of investigating these charges, and before moving the adjournment, I will take the liberty of reading it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the telegram come from Dawson direct?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the hon. gentleman were here on Tuesday, he would be still more restless before I get through. I desire to read this report, because it is evident that it was not the patriotic sentiments which the hon. gentleman expressed before he sat down, that induced him to make this statement immediately before Good Friday, deliberately talking 7 hours so as to prevent a reply being made. A child of ten years could see what the hon. gentleman was doing. He desires that his speech shall go to the country without contradiction and that it shall be left uncontradicted for several days. The best contradiction that could be given the wholesale statements of the hon. gentleman is this: We have a telegraphic report. As to whether this is true or not, an authentic report will come along in a short time, and then the hon. gentleman will know whether it is true or not, but I fancy it is. The report is as follows:—

The Royal Commission of Inquiry opened on February 22. Ample notice was given, but only two series of charges were preferred. The first was laid by the miners' committee appointed on August 25th. The second, that of malfeasance in office, was laid by the proprietors of the "Nugget" newspaper against Thomas Fawcett. Both parties requested permission to withdraw the charges on the second day. The alleged reason was that the terms of the commission limited the investigation to charges concerning acts previous to August 25. The complaint of the prosecutors was that the investigation was too narrow on that account. They were permitted to retire, but not to withdraw the charges. Commissioner Ogilvie continues the investigation.

Mr. Fawcett was cleared completely of the malfeasance charge. No clerk in the Gold Commissioner's Office thus far has been incriminated.

One witness testified that he was employed by the Young Conservative Association of Ottawa to gather information for political purposes. The commission continues in session.

I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the motion for the adjournment of the House is carried, I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman to what is perhaps a misunderstanding, but it is certainly a very grave matter so far as it is necessary to carry out the arrangements of the two sides of the House. The hon. Minister of the Interior, who has just taken his seat, has intimated that this was an attempt to speak up to the morning of Good Friday in order that the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) might go to the country without answer. I wish to state to the House that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. What occurred was this: Yesterday afternoon the Government whip, Mr. Sutherland, came over to this side of the House and stated to me that it would be agreeable to the right hon. leader of the House that we should adjourn at six o'clock, and he asked whether I would agree to that arrangement. I told him at once that so far as I was concerned I should like very much to adopt that course as I knew that a large number of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House were anxious to leave by the evening train, but that I was unable, without consultation with my friends to make any arrangement. Before Mr. Speaker took the Chair, and the moment that the right hon. gentleman was in his place, I crossed the floor of the House and told him that I thought we should get promptly into the discussion so that the House could adjourn at six o'clock. He said to me that he did not see any reason why we should not do so, and it was arranged that some little matters that otherwise would have been brought before the House would be disposed of summarily. I understood that the House would adjourn at six o'clock. I mentioned to the member for Pictou, who addressed the House, that that was the understanding, and as six o'clock was being approached and he was about taking up the Yukon question, I said to him: "You cannot go into that because the House will rise at six o'clock." But the right hon. gentleman, after consulting with his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce said: "No, no; you must go on," so that I hold hon. gentlemen responsible for the continuation of this debate to twelve o'clock in violation of what I understood to be the agreement, an agreement which induced me to say to the hon. member for Pictou that he would not be able to go on with his speech. I draw the attention of my right hon. friend to this matter, because I think it is undesirable that we should not be able to place implicit confidence in each other when we make these arrangements.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). All I have to say is that I am sorry that there should have been any misunderstanding between the hon. gentleman and myself. I agree in almost everything that he has said with a few exceptions, however. It is quite true that personally I would have been favourable to adjourning the House at six o'clock. I think it would have been better under the circumstances to have done so, but I think it was made quite plain that we were in the hands of the House. I did not attempt to press my wish upon the House any further, but we thought at six o'clock that we should answer the speech of the hon. member for Pictou. I must say that if I had supposed that the hon. gentleman would have spoken until now, I do not know that I should have taken that course.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 4th April, 1899.

PRAYERS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PETITION OUT OF ORDER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg to state that the petition from the municipal council of the county of Essex, praying that increased pay be granted to non-commissioned officers and men during the time of the annual drill, cannot be received because it asks for the expenditure of public money.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 20) to incorporate the Zenith Mining and Railway Company.—(Mr. Poupore.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the Canadian Railway Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

Bill (No. 22) to incorporate the Ontario and Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

Bill (No. 23) respecting the Alberta Irrigation Company, and to change its name to the Canadian North-west Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Douglas, for Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 24) concerning drainage on and across the property of Railway Companies.—(Mr. Casey.)

THE AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a matter which the hon. leader of the Opposition has already called the attention of himself and the House, that is, the non-reception of the Auditor General's Report. The statute provides that that report shall be presented to Parliament within one week of the beginning of the session, when the session commences after the 31st of January. It is now 19 or 20 days since Parliament was called together, and we have not yet a copy of the Auditor General's Report, which the law says should be presented within seven days.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have only to say to my hon. friend that on the last occasion on which my attention was brought to this matter, I explained from a letter I had received from the Auditor General, that he had commenced to deliver his manuscript to the printer on the 23rd of February, that the printer had been furnished with copy ever since, that he had completed his report, and that the whole of the report would be ready on Thursday of this week, with the exception of the part relating to the Mounted Police, and the part relating to the Department of Trade and Commerce. I understand from the Queen's Printer that he challenges the accuracy of this statement of the Auditor General. So that, so far as I can see, there is now a contradiction as to who is at fault in regard to the delay of the report. But my hon. friend will realize that the Government is in no way to blame for it.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. WALLACE. The statute provides :

Such accounts and reports shall be laid before the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General on or before the thirty-first day of January, in the following year, if Parliament is then sitting, and if not sitting, then within one week after Parliament is next assembled.

That is an Act of Parliament which has been apparently disregarded by the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. The keeping of that Act of Parliament is in the hands of the Auditor General.

THE WRIT FOR WINNIPEG.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the Government if the writ has issued for the City of Winnipeg, and if not, why not ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Because, Mr. Speaker, proceedings have to be taken for the preparation of the lists for the city of Winnipeg. The lists there are more than one year old, and new lists have to be prepared.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). Are they more than three years old ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot say as to that. I know that they are more than one year old, and in such a case new lists have to be issued. The documents are prepared, and I think they will be ready to-morrow.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Is not that the case in Brockville, where an election is now going on ?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is another law.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton), (Brandon). It is not very often, Mr. Speaker, that there is a general consensus of opinion in Canada upon any one subject; but I think that prior to the time when the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made his address on last Thursday evening, there was a very general consensus of opinion throughout Canada that this debate had outlived its usefulness, and that it was time for the House of Commons to get down to business. But that hon. gentleman contrived to bring a subject into the debate and to deal with it in such a way that the continuance of the debate becomes a parliamentary necessity. The debate opened, Mr. Speaker, with a very long and very vigorous speech by the respected and experienced gentleman who leads the Opposition, and he was followed by the right hon. Prime Minister in a speech which I think both the right hon. gentleman's friends and his opponents will concede to be a speech which will live in the annals of parliamentary debate. It has been complained that the right hon. gentleman was too severe with the leader of the Opposition; but, Sir, when it is considered that for the last two years the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has been going through the country denouncing the leader of the Government and his colleagues and all their actions in the most unmeasured way, and with the utmost freedom of language, I think the time had come for the right hon. leader of the Government to administer a rebuke to the hon. gentleman for the utterances which he had been making and which were shown to be altogether unfounded. And, Sir, I may say that when the right hon. gentleman was delivering his address, my sympathies were with him, and not with the leader of the Opposition; but since that time, while the debate has gone on, I must confess that my sympathies have been with the leader of the Opposition; because, Mr. Speaker, when it is remembered that that hon. gentleman has served his party well and faithfully for many long years, when it is remembered that whatever faults he may have had in public life, lack of loyalty or devotion to his party was not one of them, and when it is now seen that the hon. gentleman is castigated in this House by his political opponents, and day after day goes by, and not one man on the Opposition side of the House, not one of his followers, not the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), who sits beside him, will rise in his place to defend him, to say that he was right and that my right hon. friend was wrong, and that days afterwards it is to be left to the hon. gentleman's son to defend him, then I say my sympathies go out to the leader of the Opposition. It had to be left to the hon. gentleman's son to come to his rescue, and therefore I say my sympathy throughout is with the hon. leader of the Opposition. I would say to him, if he will not consider it impertinent, coming from one so much younger and with so much less experience, that he has my hearty sympathy and the sympathy of my colleagues and friends on this side in his unfortunate position. I might suggest to the loyal party—that is, the party which has had loyalty for its stock-in-trade for a great many years—that loyalty to their leader would not be altogether out of place, and that they would retain at least some of the esteem of their political opponents and of the people of the country if they presented, outwardly at least, better indications of loyalty and harmony in their own ranks.

The hon. leader of the Opposition, if I may be pardoned for saying a few words on this subject, with the skill which comes from long experience, attempted, and I suppose, perhaps, succeeded to some extent, in placing some utterances which I have made upon the tariff in an incorrect position. I do not wish to imply that the hon. gentleman in any way misrepresented what I said, in the sense of giving out as my utterances what I did not say; but with that skill which long parliamentary experience has given him, he adverted to my remarks in such a way that a casual reader would naturally imagine that I had placed myself in an illogical position. I wish for just a moment or two to say a few words on that subject. The House will recollect, Sir, that when we brought down our tariff to this House, hon. gentlemen on the front benches of the Opposition denounced it in unmeasured and most vigorous terms. There is no member of this House who will not remember how my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) stood up, and with that dramatic power which he has so successfully cultivated, held up his hand and called heaven to witness that he stood in this House as the champion of Canadian workmen, who, by this improvident and incompetent Government, were going to be turned out of house and home. That is the position he took. He lectured us for hours upon the utter destruction which this radical and revolutionary tariff was going to bring upon this country; and there was not one indication in the position he took, at least at that time, that he in any way approved of the tariff we submitted or of the lines of policy which we had indicated. That was the position of these hon. gentlemen then. But what is their position now? Why, Mr. Speaker, the tariff has gone into effect and has been shown to be a great success. And when I stand before this House, I am in the judgment of every man who hears my voice and of the business men of this country, when I say that the sentiment of the people, the matured opinion of the people, is that the tariff has been a success.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Yes, and these hon. gentlemen have found that out. They have found out that their predictions have not been verified. What did they attempt to do when they were in office? For many years, the cry of high protection, extreme protection, more protection and more taxes, whenever anybody was in trouble, was the policy which these hon. gentlemen followed; but you will remember, Sir, that a few years ago the people began to cry out against that policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite found, when they summoned Parliament together, that they were getting letters from their followers and supporters saying that this policy of protection had gone too far. What was the result? It was that they were compelled to hold an inquiry upon the subject of that tariff and did hold a long and careful inquiry. If I recollect aright, the hon. ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) and the late member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) were the two gentlemen who were sent around the country to make inquiries, and when these hon. gentlemen came back, the late Government brought down a tariff which, according to the despatches from Ottawa, given out by them was going to be reformed upon lines favourable to the consumer. That was the policy which the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was forced to adopt by the attitude of his followers in Parliament and by the inquiries which the gentlemen associated with him in the Government had made. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) came down to Parliament with that policy. He was strong enough with the Government and the House of Commons to carry that policy, and I apprehend that he was even strong enough with the Senate to carry it, but he was not strong enough with the manufacturers, and the result was that he was forced in this House to modify it, item after item, until the mother of that tariff would not have known it at all as it went out of the House. His intentions were good certainly. He intended to revise the tariff upon lines favourable to the consumer, because that was the sentiment of the country, but he found he could not do it, and he failed to do it; and instead of coming down to the House and admitting his failure, he was forced to admit that the tariff he had brought down contained clerical errors. Explanations of that kind, Mr. Speaker, do not deceive anybody. We all make mistakes; we all start out to do things which we find we cannot do as we intended, and the hon. gentleman would have earned more the respect of the community if he had said that the Government was not in a position to make the changes it contemplated. These hon. gentlemen know now that that was the real desire of the people in 1894, and they know that when we came into power, without being tied to the chariot wheels of any manufacturers, we did revise the tariff on those lines. For that, they denounced this Government in Parliament. They said that our tariff was not a success; but it has been a success, as they know. They know that the people have approved of that tariff, and they cannot take issue with us on that ground. What, then, did they do? They turned around and said that we did not change the tariff at all. But did they not know that when we laid it on the Table? I said at Perth—and that is what my hon. friend referred to, and what my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), whom I do not see present, found fault with—I said that the tariff as an issue between the two political parties had arrived at such a stage that it could not be longer considered, and never, in all probability, would be considered an issue in the same sense in which it had been an issue previously; and I said that because hon. gentlemen opposite know that our tariff—a tariff revised upon lines indicating that raw materials would be made more free, and that the consumer would be considered, but in which the reductions would be made in a careful and moderate way so as not to destroy any industry—is in accord with the policy which the people have approved of. They dare not go before the people and attack us on that ground. And, therefore, they intend to come here, and they intend to go before the people of this country to show what? Why, that they did not know what they were talking about when they denounced us, and that we actually have not changed the tariff at all.

Did I mean, Mr. Speaker, that this Government had abandoned the traditional policy of the Liberal party, that we did not intend, as the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson) well said, to attack the citadel of protection? Not at all. I meant that we intended to carry out the policy which we have laid before the people, and which, so far as we have gone, we have carried out carefully, consistently and as thoroughly as it was possible to do, in accordance with the well-understood wishes of the people of Canada, as they are understood by the hon. gentlemen sitting there, as well as by the hon. gentlemen sitting here, that the tariff of Canada should be dealt with upon lines more favourable to the consumer, more favourable to the extension of trade, and in the direction of removing all unjust restrictions from trade. That is the policy which this Government has laid down by the voice of its responsible Finance Minister.

Then, I pointed out also, and I take the liberty of pointing it out again, that there was another point upon which the tariff might be regarded as not being an issue. We introduced a clause providing for giving a preference to Great Britain. That clause has been attacked in a great many ways. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) attacked it the other day. The hon. gentleman will get his answer in due time from the Government benches: he will get it from the gentleman most competent to deal with the subject, and most familiar with the figures, and that answer, I apprehend, will be satisfactory to the people of this country and to the followers of the Government. But what I was pointing out was that we had introduced a clause in the tariff providing for preference to Great Britain. That clause has been denounced by hon. gentlemen' opposite. Now, are they sincere in that denunciation? I do not mean to transgress parliamentary rules by attacking the sincerity of any hon. gentleman in this House; but I think I may attack the sincerity of a party as a whole. Is the Conservative party at this moment sincere or insincere in attacking and denouncing the preferential clause of our tariff? It is an easy matter to settle that. If they were in power to-morrow, would they repeal the preferential clause? That is a simple question. I appeal to the sentiment of every man in this House, when I make this statement, that, notwithstanding all the denunciations of the hon. gentlemen opposite, if they were placed upon the Treasury benches to-morrow with a majority of four to one in this House, they would not, and they could not, repeal that clause. They could not get a House of Commons elected in Canada pledged to, or known to be in favour of repealing that clause. Then, I think, Mr. Speaker, if we have so fully, and so fairly, and so accurately, gauged public opinion upon that important phase of the tariff question as to put upon the Statute-books a provision that no political party in this country would repeal, we may regard that phase of the tariff question as being settled.

I thought that I might trespass upon the attention of the House to set myself right, in view of the remarks which the hon. leader of the Opposition made with the very laudable, and, in political warfare, very proper, intention of creating dissension in our ranks.

My principal occasion for rising to address the House this afternoon is the speech that was made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) on Thursday evening. I need only refer to the fact that that speech was made in such a way—saying nothing further about it—as to consume an unnecessary length of time. I do not think that anybody who listened to the hon. gentleman, would have imagined that he was trying to get through what he had to say in the least possible time. The hon. gentleman laid himself open to the suspicion that, knowing, as he did, that the House was going to adjourn at twelve o'clock, and that there were to be four or five days in which there was to be no debate in this House, his purpose was to prevent any reply being made on this side of the House for some days at least. It was known also, that he would not be here to hear the reply. Now, it must be admitted that the family to which the hon. gentleman belongs, has not had the reputation of lacking courage, and, possibly, there may be some other explanation of the hon. gentleman's course in taking that particular time to make his address. He is not here, unfortunately. But I think I am right in saying, that the fact of his not being here makes no difference to the Government, and that the importance of the question demands that, whether he is here or absent, the matter should be discussed, and discussed now.

It was well known some time ago, that the hon. gentleman would make an address on this question. It has been whispered in the corridors, talked about in the hotel rotundas, and even hinted in the newspapers. It was known also, practically known beyond dispute, that the great Conservative party had been employing detectives, sending them up to Dawson City—lawyer-detectives, I believe, two or three of them—to collect information for the purpose, if possible, of damaging this Government in the eyes of the public. And, after all that had been said, and the anticipations that were raised, I, at least, thought that the hon. gentleman, if he did not have any evidence, would have something that a lawyer might be excused for thinking was evidence, or, at least, taking as evidence. But I venture to say that nobody on either side of the House who heard the hon. gentleman's address would dignify anything he gave us with the name of evidence. It is the privilege of a member of Parliament, Sir, to listen to what an individual may say about anybody connected with public affairs. It is his privilege to come into the House of Commons, on a proper occasion permitted by parliamentary practice to rise in his place, and to tell the House what he has learned, without giving the name of the individual who had told him, without giving the House an opportunity to judge of the credibility of the individual, or what opportunity that individual had had of knowing what he was talking about. That is a privilege that is conferred, presumably, and I think necessarily, for the public good. But it is a privilege that is supposed to be exercised by the men upon whom it is conferred, with judgment, and with discretion, and with care, so that no man may be unduly scandalized and no man's reputation may be unduly imperilled by any anonymous accusation. I say nothing further than this, that I will leave it to this House, to the members who heard the address, or who have read—well, not all that the hon. gentleman said, for no gentleman in the press gallery, so far as I am aware, was courageous enough, or indiscreet enough, to take down the language of the hon. gentleman in everything he said—to the members of the House who know what he said, whether the hon. member for Pictou, a gentleman who was for years a Privy Councillor, who occupied the exalted position of Minister of Justice, has used the high privilege conferred upon him, as a member of this House, with judgment and discretion.

Now, Sir, I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman in the nature of the remarks which he has made; I am not going to denounce, or to insinuate, or to do anything of that kind; neither am I going to attack the hon. gentleman. I am going to recognize, as a responsible member of this Government, responsible to Her Majesty, responsible to my leader, responsible to this House of Commons, to Parliament and to the people—I am going to recognize the fact that a member of Parliament has made a speech attacking the administration of this Government and the administration of the department of which I have charge. I am not going to inquire particularly as to whether the member of Parliament who did that did it in a fair way, a reasonable way, or a decent way; but I am going to put the Government and myself in the judgment of this House and of the people of Canada as to whether we have fairly and honestly discharged our duties. The question is not whether the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has been discreet, or whether he has been justified in doing what he has done; the question is whether this Government has properly discharged its duty. Now, Sir, we are responsible for our mining policy in the Yukon district, we are responsible for our administration of that policy, for our administration of the affairs of that territory. Just here I want to say that I do not propose, in this address, to deal with the question of royalties or the question of the reservation of claims in connection with the mining regulations in that territory. Those are large and important questions of public policy which may well form themselves the subject of a debate, and upon which the members of this Government will be well prepared to meet our hon. friends at any time when they seek to challenge the judgment of this House. But there are other matters, details of administration which the hon. member for Pictou has brought before this House, and which now demand the special attention of the Government; but I am not going to devote, on this occasion, any time to the discussion of our policy in relation to those matters which I have referred to. We are responsible for our administration, we are responsible for exercising reasonable judgment, reasonable promptness, reasonable diligence, reasonable discretion, in anything and everything that we did. And let me say right here, that I am not going to follow a policy which has been suggested many times in the press of this country within the last two weeks; in dealing with these matters I am not going to try to justify this Government by making a comparison with the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite; I am not going to defend myself, or the action of my colleagues in endorsing what I have done, by arguments based upon recrimination. It is perfectly true that if two vices made a virtue, it would be very easy to do it; it is perfectly true that the hon. gentleman who made this attack upon the Government sat as a colleague of a Minister who was proven to have received large bribes; it is perfectly true that it has been proven that a large sum of public money was stolen or lost under the eyes of one of his colleagues, an ex-Minister of Railways; it is perfectly true, Sir, that scandals, gross scandals, disgraced the administration of the western country; that as peaceable a population as ever lived in Canada, upon the banks of the Saskatchewan, were driven into rebellion by the maladministration of hon. gentlemen opposite. That rebellion cost millions of dollars to put down; it cost valuable lives to put down; and, Sir, it is true, and hon. gentlemen cannot deny it, that the officers that were sent up there looted and stole from the people whom they were sent up there to protect. It is perfectly true that the settlement policy, the general administration of that western country where I have lived for the last 20 years, was described, not by a Reform paper, not by a Liberal paper, but by the leading journal of the Conservative party in the city of Winnipeg, the Winnipeg "Times"—was described in a moment of desperation at the actions of the hon. gentlemen opposite, as crass and incomprehensible from beginning to end; and it was stated in that paper, not a Liberal paper, but an organ of the hon. gentlemen, that as a result of their maladministration the trails from Manitoba to Dakota were beaten bare and brown with the wagon wheels of departing settlers. Sir, that is not my language, it is the language of the hon. gentlemen's organ, which declared that by their maladministration they had driven from the North-west—that great country—the magnificent tide of immigration which was flowing into it at that time, and which only needed to have been fostered and cared for to have filled up those western prairies. And that emigration never returned, or at least has only begun in a small degree to return since this Government attained to power. Sir, I do not mention these things for the purpose of justifying anything that I have done, or anything that my colleagues have done. If we could only justify our administration by a comparison with hon. gentlemen opposite, for my part I would be prepared to resign, and I do not think my right hon. friend the leader of the Government would care to remain in office if his Ministers had to defend themselves by comparing their records with those of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, I am going to give you as well as I can—and I must apologize for being necessarily somewhat tedious—the facts relating to the administration of the Yukon district so far as I am able to place them before Parliament. I am not going to claim that this Government is perfect, or that I am perfect. I am not going to claim that I did not forget anything; that every letter was despatched just at the moment it would have been well to have despatched it; that I thought of everything that was going to happen and provided against it; that I had the quality of omniscience, or the ability to see far over the Rocky Mountains from here to Dawson City, to probe the hearts of the men who were sitting in offices there, and to see, not only what they were doing, but to see their motives and what they were thinking about. I am not going even to say that we did not possibly forget some things that might have been provided for—that may be true. But I am going to say that we have exercised care, forethought, diligence, promptness and circumspection from beginning to end, in every possible respect. This statement I make to the members of this House, and when I sit down they will be able to judge whether I have proved my case or not.

Sir, to begin at the beginning, in December, 1896, I took office. I did not get settled to work in my department, practically, until the opening days of 1897. Early in that year, my attention was called to the necessities of the Yukon district. The Yukon was an unknown land at that time, nobody knew anything about it—nobody at least, except, perhaps, Mr. Ogilvie and the officers of the Government who were there. My attention was called—and I want to get this fairly before the House—to several reports or letters which had come to the Surveyor General from Mr. Ogilvie. They were not—and I have reasons for calling the special attention of the House to this fact—they were not the reports that were subsequently printed, although the reports that were subsequently printed included them. The bulk of the reports, which hon. gentlemen will remember as having been printed just after the session of 1897, were not received until the session got fairly on into June, to the best of my recollection; but before that, some letters which I think were printed with those reports had been received. On 5th March, 1897, which would be a couple of months after I had got to work in my office, the Surveyor General, Captain Deville, called my attention to the fact that Mr. Ogilvie had made a report, and the Surveyor General further called my attention to the fact that the Yukon territory had been neglected and had not received the attention that ought to have been given to it. He wrote to me as follows—but, mark you, Mr. Speaker, there was no information in the hands of this Government or in the hands of anybody which would justify the idea that there was going to be anything like an inrush of population. Though the idea of people going into the country was spoken of, it was only spoken of in the sense of a few hundred miners crossing the boundary from Alaska. The Surveyor General, on the 5th of March, 1897, a couple of months after I took office, wrote to me a letter. I will call your attention to the fact that this letter was from an experienced, capable and reliable officer of the Government, not appointed by me, but appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am glad to say further that the appointment was an excellent one and one which I regard as being satisfactory in every way; a better officer I do not believe any Government could have. He wrote to me on March 5th, 1897, as follows:

A perusal of Mr. Ogilvie's report leaves the impression that if prompt steps are not taken for placing the land and mining business of the district under efficient management, it will soon be in an undesirable condition. Mr. Ogilvie's view is that the surveyor of the district should have charge of the business: his arguments appear irrefutable. The present agent——himself admits that he cannot fulfil the duties of the office, and asks to be relieved. Should Mr. Ogilvie's view be adopted, no one is better fitted for the position than Mr. Thomas Fawcett; he is not only a skilled surveyor and a man of great tact, judgment and experience, but he is very fortunate in always maintaining pleasant relations with everybody. In a remote place like the Yukon district, where much must be left to the agent, suavity of manner and a conciliatory spirit are perhaps the most essential qualities.
That was Capt. Constantine.

Mr. Thomas Fawcett was employed in a temporary way on Government surveys from 1874 to 1892. The surveyors were nearly all employed in a temporary way; there are only a few that are permanent officers. I say that simply to indicate that Mr. Fawcett was to all intents and purposes a Government surveyor, although he had only been in the employ of the Government from time to time. In 1892 Mr. Fawcett was permanently appointed in the Surveyor General's branch of the department. He had passed the examination necessary to such appointment and the record of his temporary service was good. In consequence of the report of the Surveyor General made to me on 5th of March, 1897, and followed by another letter on 12th April, I caused Mr. Fawcett to be appointed, and he was sent out in time to get to the Yukon district by the first opening of the water on the Yukon River. There was no delay: he got there just as soon as it was possible for him to have got there.

Now, the members of the House understand and know that I have been accused by the Conservative press throughout this country of finding Mr. Ogilvie in charge of the Yukon district and of removing him. Members of the House know, if they have read the Opposition press, that it has been charged that I found Mr. Ogilvie in charge of the Yukon district, he having been appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite and put in charge of that district, and that I removed him. Mr. Ogilvie never was in charge of the Yukon district, and under the hon. gentlemen opposite he never had anything to do with it. They never recognized Mr. Ogilvie in connection with the Yukon district. They never paid any attention to him, and they never read his reports. Mr. Ogilvie was sent out there as topographical surveyor in connection with the boundary survey and he had no connection with the Yukon district. It was only the ability, fairness and dignity of character of Mr. Ogilvie that caused him to be recognized by the people there as a man to whom they could go and refer any causes of dispute. The other officer in charge of the district was Capt. Constantine, and Capt. Constantine asked to be relieved. Hon. gentlemen may ask: Why did you not appoint Mr. Ogilvie in his place? The answer is that Mr. Ogilvie asked to be allowed to come back on account of ill-health, and he came back on account of ill-health. Now, to dispose of this charge, which is one of a number, I have pointed out that there is nothing whatever in the story that I removed Mr. Ogilvie from his position; I have pointed out that he never had the position in fact, and that he came back at his own request on account of failing health. Then I appointed as Gold Commissioner a surveyor. Why? Because Mr. Ogilvie, who was competent to advise the department, suggested the appointment of a surveyor; and because that suggestion was strongly supported by the Surveyor General who advised that Mr. Thomas Fawcett, a surveyor of his staff, was the sort of man that was wanted. I called upon the Surveyor General of Canada for advice, and on the recommendation of the Surveyor General of Canada I had a surveyor of his own appointed as Gold Commissioner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they say I made mining regulations under which the records were secret. I say that I did nothing of the kind. The Mining regulations in force when Mr. Fawcett went out were the mining regulations promulgated by hon. gentlemen opposite—without change. Who made these regulations? The hon. gentlemen opposite appointed Mr. Pierce, an experienced surveyor, an able man, as able a man in his own line as there is in Canada, to prepare a set of mining regulations. Mr. Pierce was appointed Superintendent of Mines, and it was under the regulations made by him that Mr. Fawcett went to the Yukon district. There were only the slightest changes of form, and nothing as far as administration was concerned. If any change was made it was upon the recommendation of Mr. Ogilvie in regard to certain matters of detail, so as to adapt these regulations to the Yukon district, because the regulations as originally made were adapted to the requirements and conditions of the North-west Territories. In regard to the secrecy of records, whatever the practice was under the late Government, the practice was when Mr. Fawcett went out. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when he left here after the session of 1897, after this House closed, there was no information in the possession of the House which justified the Government in assuming that what was said might happen, would in reality happen. There was some information in the hands of the House and some in my hands. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition undertook last session to show me that we did not have sufficient information, and he took up Mr. Ogilvie's report, which was in my hands when the House prorogued, saying there was going to be, in all probability, an influx of population into this district. I would point out to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), that neither he nor any member of this House can read that report and say that the meaning of it is other than simply this: That Mr. Ogilvie thought there would be an influx of a few hundred miners from the Alaskan side of the boundary. Well, that did not call for any enormous activity on the part of the Government; it did not call for anything I had not done long before in sending Mr. Fawcett and staff to the Yukon district. But immediately afterwards events began to thicken, and it became evident that something more had to be done. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government was in England, and other members of the Government were away, some of them attending the Queen's Jubilee. Other members of the Government were here, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who gave the matter careful attention. And I wish to say here, that I have been most indebted to that hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), in connection with all matters relating to the Yukon, with reference to which I wanted to apply for advice to one of more experience than myself. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was here, we held various council meetings, and we discussed the matter. In the first place, we ordered up an additional number of Mounted Police. We sent the assistant commissioner of the Mounted Police. We did not want the job for a Grit; we might have done that; I am not sure the hon. gentlemen opposite would not have sent one of their political friends had they been in my place; but we sent the assistant commissioner of the Mounted Police as being the proper man for the purpose, and we sent him upon the recommendation of the Controller of the Mounted Police. We sent him to Skagway to forward supplies over the pass. Then, as the season proceeded the idea forced itself upon our minds that there was going to be a greater rush of people than we at first anticipated. We held council meetings, we discussed the matter fully, and the judgment of the members of the Government who were here was that the proper course for us to pursue was to appoint what might be called an emergency staff of officers, that they might go up there, that they might meet the immediate requirements of the situation in the following summer (that would be last summer), and report to us what was necessary in connection with the permanent organization of the district. That was the judgment of the members of the Government at that time, and we followed that plan. Let me say, Sir, it is easy to be wise; it is easy to say what you would not have done if you had known beforehand something you did not know—if we knew what the price of wheat was going to be a month from now we might all be millionaires—but we do not know, and so we have to depend on our judgment as to what is going to happen. When we held these council meetings we knew hardly anything about the Yukon district except what was contained in Mr. Ogilvie's report. This report gave a lot of general information, but immediately a man begins to administer, immediately a man begins to decide, he says: What about this, what about that, what about the other thing. We had nobody to tell us, there was not a man in Canada that knew anything about it; there was not an officer in the Mounted Police who had ever been there. Mr. Ogilvie was at Dawson city under permission to come out—either in Dawson City or on his way out—and we did not have any information whatever, except, as I said, what was contained in that report. It was valuable so far as it went, but there were an enormous number of things that we wanted to know and that we did not know, and that we could not get any information about.

Well, we appointed this staff of officers, and I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that when we took these steps we were generally commended by, not only our friends in the country, and not only our own press, but the press on the other side of politics. Everybody commended the promptness of the steps we had taken to cope with the situation. There were two things to which our attention was specially directed; one was the question of food. Everybody knows here that there was the most dire alarm as to what was going to happen in that district during the winter. Every one knows that there was the greatest apprehension. Why, Sir, I received telegrams from clergymen, telegrams and letters from people all over the country, privately urging me to be sure to leave no stone unturned to prevent anything in the nature of famine or distress in that country. People wrote to me who had relatives, or thought they had relatives in that district, and that was one of the matters to which the attention of the Government was directed.

Again, there was another matter which we had to consider. The population that was going in there was supposed to be a lawless population. It was known to be composed in the proportion of 91 per cent of foreigners, largely of Americans from the Pacific slope, not the class of men who are the most readily amenable to the law or to the restraints of a regularly organized system of government. American newspapers upon the Pacific coast did not hesitate to say that if the Canadian Government undertook to trifle with these men they would run the Canadians out of the country, they would put up the American flag, and we would never see any part of that country again. Well, these statements, of course, were not to be taken too seriously, but hon. gentlemen who know something about the temper of the western miner on the Pacific slope, would do well not to neglect them too much, because things happen sometimes in very short order with gentlemen of that class. We had to consider these things when we appointed our officers, and therefore we appointed officers in consideration of all the circumstances, and in view of the possibilities with which they would have to cope. If there had been no danger of starvation, if there had been no danger of riot, if there had been an express train running a Pullman car to Dawson City, then I think the chances are that instead of the gentlemen I sent I would have got some men with other characteristics, with special knowledge of keeping mining records, and with special knowledge of mining law. My attention would doubtless have been directed to that, and I would have endeavoured to get men whose knowledge was complete on this subject, even if they did not know anything at all about anything else. But, Sir, those were not the men to do the work we had to do in the fall of 1897.

Now, who did we appoint? As the administrator of that country we appointed Major James M. Walsh. James Morrow Walsh first entered the service of the Government on the 25th of September, 1873, when he was appointed Inspector of the North-west Mounted Police. He was promoted to be superintendent on the 1st June, 1874—Superintendent in the Mounted Police is about the same rank as major in the militia. He served on the march of the police from the Red River to the Rocky Mountains in 1874, and afterwards at McLeod, Fort Walsh, Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle. He retired on the 1st of September, 1883, and was granted a gratuity. He left a record of difficult duty well done. On it being rumoured that Major Walsh was to be appointed to the Yukon, the "Mail and Empire," in an article on the 10th August, 1897, said—would hon. gentlemen opposite please take a note of this—the "Mail and Empire" said:

If Major Walsh of Brockville should be appointed administrator as it is rumoured he will be, we may be assured that that capable and experienced officer will show himself the right man for the position.

The Ottawa "Citizen" said—hon. gentlemen opposite will see I am not quoting from Grit papers—the Ottawa "Citizen" of 1st September, 1897, remarked:

American papers are full of the praises of Mr. Ogilvie, the Dominion surveyor in the Yukon district, and of Major Walsh, who is to administer the country. These men are signal examples of a devotion to duty such as Nelson would have admired, and the English people have always been proud of, but they are not exceptional. We have many such men in Canada.

Then, I will quote the "Nor'-Wester," which is the Conservative organ in the city of Winnipeg. This is the newspaper which seems to have regarded it as its special mission to camp on my trail ever since I have been in public life. On the 12th of August, 1897, it remarked of the appointment of Major Walsh, that "there would be no one disposed to quarrel with it," and characterized Major Walsh as "a man of western experience and sound sense." Therefore, when I appointed Major Walsh I appointed a man certified by the general knowledge of the people of Canada for the magnificent record which he had in the public service, and certified specially and particularly by our most rabid political opponents, to be the best man in Canada for the position.

Now as to Mr. Wade. It was necessary to have a lawyer to do legal work. It has been complained that Mr. Wade had too many positions. Well, we did not know what work was to be done up there, or how matters were going to develop, and we did not want to send half a dozen men up to do what would be perhaps one man's work. It was an emergency staff, appointed, as I have said, for the purpose of taking hold of matters as they might develop, and to be supplanted by a permanent staff when the development of the country indicated that such would be required. Now, it has been said that Mr. Wade was a dreadful man. The hon. member for Pictou waxed very eloquent—well, I could not call it eloquent, but he waxed very luxuriant in his language, to use no stronger term, with regard to Mr. Wade. Now, it is generally regarded in law as most conclusive when you can prove your case by your opponent's witness. The hon. member for Pictou has a brother whose name is Mr. William J. Tupper. He is, I think, the youngest son of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He differs from the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Pictou in being acquainted with Mr. Wade; he knows something about him; he has been acquainted with him for years; and, if it is any satisfaction to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, I have no objection to saying to him that Mr. William J. Tupper is a gentleman who is well respected in Winnipeg, and whose opinion is regarded as being of some value. At any rate, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition cannot find fault with him, neither can the hon. member for Pictou, his brother. Well, when Mr. Wade was appointed, Mr. Wade was attacked—I am not going to say why—by a gentleman in his own party. I am not going to bring other names into the discussion, because that has nothing to do with what I am discussing now. The explanation of the attack was that the dispute was of a personal character, and what I am now giving is the opinion of Mr. William J. Tupper of Mr. Wade. In regard to the attack, Mr. William J. Tupper wrote a letter to the editor of the "Nor'-Wester," the Conservative organ in the city of Winnipeg, in which he said:

Mr. SIFTON.

It is nauseating to witness the attempt of the "Tribune" to belittle Mr. Wade's attainments.

He said that "Mr. Wade had made a reputation as a brilliant editorial writer," and that "his success in his profession"—that is, the legal profession—"is so well known that it cannot be questioned." I am not quoting this letter verbatim, because there are references in it to a member of the House which I do not wish to bring before the House; but if any gentleman wishes to read the whole of the letter, it is on file among the papers. I am giving the effect of the letter in regard to the character and qualifications of Mr. Wade; that is the point I am talking about. Mr. William J. Tupper further said:

He has evidently aroused the animosity of one of his party.—

Remark this in comparison with what is said by the hon. member for Pictou, who does not know anything about Mr. Wade:—

—but I believe political opponents will testify that he would scorn to do a mean action, even in the heat of battle.

He says further:

I believe the almost unanimous opinion in this province is that Mr. Wade deserves the best consideration at the hands of his party.

Now, that is the gentleman I appointed as the legal officer of the party who went up to take charge of the administration, as I have said, in an emergency way, simply. I have never heard anybody question Mr. Wade's ability; so I will not devote any attention to that.

Another gentleman whom I sent with this party was Capt. Bliss. Capt. Bliss is one of the horde of political parasites whom, it appears, I turned loose on the country. Captain Bliss was an officer of the Privy Council of some years standing; I do not know the number of years; I have not taken the trouble to get his record. When my hon. friend the Prime Minister took charge of the Privy Council branch, he reorganized that department, and Captain Bliss's services were dispensed with. At the strong request of a number of gentlemen, largely Conservatives, in the city of Ottawa, I found a place for Captain Bliss in my department. He is a Conservative in politics, and always has been, so far as I know. As an officer he had a good record in the Government service; he was found in the Government service when we came here. Captain Bliss was sent up with the party, and with him I sent as assistants two men who were designated as inspectors of mines—James D. McGregor, of Brandon, and Captain Norwood, who comes from somewhere in Nova Scotia. Mr. McGregor I knew myself. He has been denounced in this House in a way I need not refer to now. He was appointed on my own judgment, as a man who lived for many years in the same town that I lived in, and he is a respected citizen of that town, and any person who knew anything about his character and habits of life, would know that a man like him, who had lived in the western country, who had travelled all over it for many years, who had met all classes of people, and who was a shrewd capable, resolute man, was exactly the kind of man to send with the party to the Yukon. On the recommendation of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), Captain Norwood was sent too. He was a man who had been the captain of a northern whaler, had wintered in the northern portion of the Yukon district, knew considerable about the nature and climate of the country, and was familiar with travelling in far northern latitudes. These men were going with the possibility of having to incur great hardships and to meet exceptional difficulties.

These two men I have mentioned were sent particularly on account of their physical qualifications, their experience in rough travelling, and their ability to meet and deal with all the difficulties they would have to deal with in the Yukon district. Their particular duty was to look after the collection of royalty. Hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends said that we never could collect that royalty. I do not know whether they said so in Parliament or not, but their organ certainly declared that we could not get enough policemen and soldiers in Canada to collect that royalty. I know that, when dealing with a rough and ready man, such as a miner, a great deal depends on how he is handled; and if you send people to deal with such men who do not know how to go about the work, you will get into serious trouble. I, therefore, sent men who had the necessary experience and qualifications to deal with this class, and, without a single dispute that I have heard of, they did collect the royalty provided by law and lodged it in the treasury office. These two gentlemen were Liberals, but I do not think they were any the worse for that. I have given you the certificate of character with regard to Major Walsh's appointment, and a certificate from my hon. friend's youngest son with regard to Mr. Wade's character. I have also shown you that Captain Bliss was not an appointee of this Government at all, but a departmental officer, sent on account of two qualifications. He was familiar with the accountant work in my department, and so could keep the accounts, and, in addition to that, he was a military man, and had, therefore, a knowledge of the transportation and handling of men, and would be much more useful, in case of difficulty, than would be an ordinary clerk. These were the reasons why these men were sent, and I am in the judgment of the House as to whether they were not good. The others I do not remember, who went up in connection with the party, but they were simply subordinates.

When the party got to Skagway, it was found that the assistant commissioner of Mounted Police had not got his supplies across. I have been asked, why Major Walsh did not get through by water to Dawson City. I have just given the reason. If the assistant commissioner of Mounted Police had got his supplies across in time—even in five times as long as it took Major Walsh and myself to put them across when we were there—Major Walsh and his party would have gone on to Dawson City before the water froze. But the assistant commissioner had not got his supplies across, and it would have been madness to send this party across the mountains, without any knowledge of where they were going, without a proper amount of supplies, and when the information at our disposal was, that the people in Dawson would be starving, and that it would be little less than a crime to send one additional man there without supplies for himself. So, regardless of expense, we put the supplies across the pass ourselves, and Major Walsh, Mr. Ogilvie and myself went to explore and get some information, and, as quickly as possible, the other party went across. They started down the river, but valuable time had been lost, and the result was, that the ten or fifteen days lost in putting the supplies across by the assistant commissioner was just the time that prevented the party getting into Dawson City before it was frozen in.

I am not sure that that was an unmixed evil. On the contrary, I think it was rather providential, because, as a result, Major Walsh sent off Judge Maguire and Mr. Wade and Mr. McGregor, and the rest of the party and himself waited for some time where they were frozen in, on the banks of the river. Major Walsh then heard that a party purporting to be an American relief expedition was coming in, and from what he heard of the dangers and difficulties regarding encroachments upon the boundary, which he, the chief officer of the Government, would have been held responsible for, he deemed it his duty to go down to the boundary line to find out what was going on, and so he went back to Lake Bennett. From that time to the following spring he devoted himself to getting the supplies down to Lake Lebarge, so that they would get into Dawson City a considerable time before any supplies could get up by the Lower Yukon, via St. Michael. During that time, they put up police posts upon the line of travel, they gave supplies and shelter to the people coming out; and if hon. gentlemen opposite will look back at the press of that day, they will find it was the universal judgment that Major Walsh and his men on that trail saved the lives of hundreds of people who were coming in. Then, when the spring came and the water opened at Lake Lebarge, Major Walsh took the supplies down the river, where they had a transport. At an enormous sacrifice of time and labour and money, these supplies were taken to the foot of Lake Labarge and brought to Dawson City in time to prevent any scarcity there, before any supplies could be got up the river for those people who did not have their supplies with them.

Up to that time there had not been in any way whatever a suggestion that Major Walsh had not performed his duty as a commissioner of this Government in a manner that was altogether above criticism. Let me now describe what happened. Major Walsh got in there on the 21st May, 1897. When you are looking back at these things, it seems a long time. Judging by the number of editorials and interviews we have had on the Yukon district, it might be fifty years ago since Major Walsh got into Dawson City, but it was only the 21st of last May he got there. Let us bear that in mind—only about ten months ago. And he got there after a winter of arduous toil, which, in all probability, has seriously injured his constitution for the rest of his life. I venture to say—and this ought fairly to be taken into consideration, when criticising these men—that there is no one of them who will not bear in his constitution the marks of the hardship of that winter as long as he lives. When I was there meeting prospectors upon the trail, meeting boats containing prospectors passing along the river and along the lake, I inquired of the people where they were going, and what they were going to do. What did they tell me? That was in the fall of 1897, when we went through the pass for the purpose of getting some preliminary information, and when our men were taking supplies through the pass so that Major Walsh and his party could get down the river. We saw those men and talked with a large number of them, and they told us that they were not going to Dawson City. In fact, it was almost impossible to find a man, in all that host of people camped along the trail and getting ready to go down, who said he was going to Dawson. These men had the idea at that time that the Dawson district was very limited, that the good claims near Dawson were all taken up, and they told us they were going to the Pelly, they were going to the White River, they were going to the Hootalinqua, that they were going anywhere and everywhere except to Dawson. And the result was that Mr. Ogilvie and I came back fully assured that there was not going to be any great number of people at Dawson. And so we came to the conclusion that the proper place for the head of the Government was Fort Selkirk, in the middle of the district, because we understood that the people were going to spread over the district and very few were going to Dawson. Mark you, that was not a belief gathered from our imagination. It was gathered by talking with the men themselves. What happened? These men were camped in the passes, and were engaged putting up their shanties along the banks of the lakes and rivers, building their boats and getting ready to go down the stream. In the spring they launched their boats and started. In the meantime, all winter, men had been coming out telling them of the richness of the Dawson district and assuring them that the district was extensive and that there were good claims there to be had. Moreover, these men who were going in found that they could not go off and prospect in the interior of the country the travelling in which was dreadfully difficult, and that if they left the line of travel they would perish. And so they got in their boats, twenty-five or thirty thousand of them, and went down to Dawson City. There were men, practical miners—perhaps a thousand or two thousand of them—who went to different parts of the country and spread themselves over the country prospecting. But the great bulk of the people, certainly not less than thirty thousand, went down to Dawson City. Major Walsh got there on the 21st of May. Inside of three weeks after he got there, there were twenty-five or thirty thousand people in Dawson. I want this House, Mr. Speaker, to imagine that situation—something more than half the population of the city of Ottawa set down on a strip of ground, a mile and third long by a third of a mile wide, bounded on one side by the mountains, from which the melting snow trickled down and made a dreadful mud hole at the bottom, and on the other side, by the river. Imagine, half the population of Ottawa dumped in that mud hole within three weeks—no other word can be used that will express it, they were simply dumped there. There were not houses to give accommodation to more than one-tenth of them. There was no lumber to build houses with. The ground, after you went down eight or ten inches or a foot below the surface was frozen solid, and it was practically impossible to make any drains. These people were dumped on that little strip of territory under these conditions. Were they a class of people to be readily amenable to reason or likely to listen to advice? Were they a class of people who would do just what they were told to do? I have been told that no sanitary regulations were made. Sanitary regulations were made. Mr. Wade and the officers of the Mounted Police did make sanitary regulations. They did everything possible, everything that human beings could do under the circumstances to make the people obey those sanitary regulations. But imagine twenty-five or thirty thousand people dumped in a mud hole without any facility of taking care of them, and you will have some idea of what our little handful of officers had to contend with. And this was a condition of affairs that no human being could possibly have foreseen, because these people had told me—scores of them—and had told Mr. Ogilvie also, that they were not going to Dawson at all. As proof of that, as proof that I am not giving you something that is a mere belief formed after the event, let me point out one thing. I came back to Ottawa and consulted with Mr. Ogilvie before he went to England. We concluded that the most important thing to do in connection with the mining regulations was to provide some means whereby miners who were scattered through the country at considerable distances could register their claims. I brought the matter before Council and devised the plan whereby these men could register their claims. It was like this :

In the event of the claim being more than 100 miles from the recorder's office, and situated where other claims are being located, the free miners, not less than five in number, are authorized to meet and appoint one of their number a "free miners' recorder," who shall act in that capacity until a mining recorder is appointed by the Gold Commissioner.

Then follow the provisions as to the matters of detail. This we did because we were convinced, as I have said, that the great bulk of these people were going to immense distances and would require some method of this kind in order to enable them to record their claims. The people, as I have said, were camped along the passes and the upper portion of the Yukon. These regulations were sent out to the police officers who were travelling along these passes, with instructions to communicate the information to the people, that they might be informed of it before they started prospecting.

Now, what was the next step? A great many stories have been told as to what was done next. Mr. Ogilvie and I had returned together as far as Vancouver, and he came on to Ottawa after I did. Before Mr. Ogilvie went to England I discussed the subject with him, and I informed him that I had it in view to recommend him as administrator of the territory, to take office when Major Walsh's term was up. Major Walsh went to the Yukon district under great pressure from myself, I believing that he was the best possible man for the position. He went very unwillingly and with the understanding that I should not ask him, under any circumstances, to stay longer than a year. Before he started down to Dawson City in the spring of 1897, he wrote back to me and said he did not wish to remain in Dawson City any longer than he could help, and that he would like his successor to be sent in as early as possible. Shortly after getting that, I cabled to Mr. Ogilvie asking him to return as soon as he could, and he did return as soon as his arrangements would permit him. When he got to Ottawa his health was not the best, and it was some days before he could do business. As soon as he was in condition to do business, I consulted him and went over the situation very carefully with him. Then on the 30th June—I will ask the House to mark the date, the 30th June, just 39 days after Major Walsh had got into Dawson City—in pursuance of the understanding with Mr. Ogilvie that he should be appointed administrator in the spring, and in pursuance of the understanding with Major Walsh that I should appoint his successor as soon as possible, I submitted a recommendation to Council asking that Mr. Ogilvie should be appointed administrator of the district.

At that time, it is within the knowledge of the House that no suggestion or complaint in regard to the conduct of Major Walsh had ever been made; and when I am told that I have been negligent, that I have been careless, that I did not appoint Mr. Ogilvie for months, I think some people have said, for years, after I should have done it, I say that I appointed Mr. Ogilvie as soon as it was possible to do so, that there was not the least shadow of delay or negligence in connection with it. The appointment was made just as soon as he came back from England, and he had been urged to come back as soon as possible, he came back as soon as his health permitted, he got away as soon as his health permitted, and he was appointed before a shadow of complaint had been made against Major Walsh or his administration. Mr. Ogilvie was appointed administrator of the district under an Act that was passed last session, providing that there should be a commissioner, and a council to assist and advise him in the government of the district. Now, I recommended to my colleagues the appointment of Mr. Ogilvie as commissioner, of Mr. Wade as legal adviser, and of Mr. Girouard as a member of the council, a gentleman who had been a member of the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec, a lawyer of considerable experience, a man of experience in public life, and consequently a most eligible man, so far as I knew, and so far as I believe at the present time, for the position of a member of the council of the Yukon District, a man whose experience both as a lawyer and a legislator would be most valuable. I also recommended Captain Steele. Who is Captain Steele? Captain Steele was an officer of the Mounted Police, than whom no better officer ever sat in the saddle, and concerning whom no better certificate of character could be required than the reputation which he enjoys throughout that western country. I must say that every information I have goes to show that he is a most valuable and efficient officer, enjoying the respect and esteem of every one, on account both of his ability and character in the position he has occupied. He was also appointed as a member of the council, and was appointed as head of the police administration, that is to say, commandant of police. In addition to these, we appointed a judge of the district. These members compose the council. Now, Sir, in addition to these I appointed, as inspector of mines, Mr. William Madden. Mr. Madden was appointed because of his special knowledge of mining. The two inspectors I had sent up before had no special knowledge of mining; it was not supposed they would require such knowledge. The special work they were sent there to do, and which they did, was work which was not supposed to require a special knowledge of mining. But a man of ordinary shrewdness and capacity does not need to be very long in the Yukon district to know as much about mining as almost anybody else there—I may not be correct in saying as much as anybody else knows, but as much as it is necessary to know of the operations that are being carried on there, because up to this time the operations are rather crude. But we sent Mr. Madden there, giving him the important position of inspector of mines, because he had for some years been the assistant inspector of mines in the province of Nova Scotia, the oldest mining province in the Dominion; he was recommended to me for that position on account of his special knowledge, by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Then, Sir, I asked the Minister of Finance to select for me a financial officer to act as controller of the finances of the district. I recognized that it would be very absurd for Mr. Ogilvie to be charged with any financial responsibility, or any trouble in taking care of the accounts of the district. I saw that an especially competent officer would be required for that purpose. Now, did I appoint a man to that position who knew nothing about finances? Not at all. For that position my hon. friend the Minister of Finance recommended an employee of the late Government. I appointed him, not because I did not think that a Grit might know just as much about finances as a Conservative, because I think that the financial record of the last two years would indicate that the Grits know more about finances than the Conservatives—I am referring to the charge made, that we picked out recklessly political friends of the Government for these positions who knew nothing about the work they were called upon to discharge—I appointed him solely on the ground of fitness. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance selected a specially qualified officer of his own department, a man who has been in the service of the Government for a number of years, and who was supposed to be the best man for the purpose, Mr. Thomas Lithgow, an employee of the late Government, and he was appointed as controller of finances. Those were the appointments which we made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we appointed Mr. Ogilvie, did we appoint the best man for the purpose? Certainly we did not look for a man amongst those who had not been in the service of the Government. Mr. Wm. Ogilvie was first employed on survey work for the Government in 1875. He continued to be so employed until 1892, when he was placed upon a regular annual salary of $1,800. In 1887, he was placed in charge of the topographical division and the exploratory survey of the Yukon district. We can say that in addition to Mr. Ogilvie's other qualifications he is known as one of the most competent surveyors that has ever been connected with the survey branch of the Dominion of Canada, or even of the United States, a man who professionally stands very high. When, last session, I recommended to my colleagues to ask Parliament to vote Mr. Ogilvie a gratuity of $5,000 for his distinguished services, my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) said:

I do not object to this vote of $5,000 to Mr. Ogilvie. I do not fancy there is a man in this House who will object to it. He has been, it seems, an incorruptible and valuable public servant, and I am sure we will all agree with that vote.

Now, that was only a few days before his appointment. He was recommended on the 30th of June, and on the 4th of July, 1898, he was appointed by Order in Council Commissioner of the Yukon territory. The Ottawa "Journal" of August, 1897, made this editorial reference to him:

While all about him on the Klondike, miners are securing fortunes, Mr. William Ogilvie, the Canadian surveyor whose reports on the district furnish almost the only authentic information concerning the Yukon, is quietly preserving order, settling disputes as to claims and boundaries, and making himself of inestimable service to the Government of which he is an employee, and on the salary of a surveyor. He has not located a single claim for himself.

That is in 1897. In the course of an article in the Montreal "Star" of July 2nd, 1898, we read this:

His opportunities to enrich himself were immense, but he availed himself of none of them; but took his small salary and did his duty, and came back no richer than if he had been keeping guard over an ice field.

The same journal, the Montreal "Star"—and the hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that the Montreal "Star" is a friend of ours now, whatever they might have said a while ago—had this to say of Mr. Ogilvie:

The country was pleased with the record of William Ogilvie in that district, no matter what his technical duties may have been.

Again, the "Star" had this to say of him: "The country was pleased with the record of William Ogilvie in that district, no matter what his technical position may have been." And the reference was quoted by the "Mail and Empire" of the 8th of that month, approvingly. The Montreal "Gazette" of the 8th of July, another Conservative newspaper, said:

When a Conservative Ministry sent Mr. Ogilvie up, the miners, though he had no authority over them,—

Because he was not given any authority; he had no official position of any kind except to make a survey.

—respected his decision as to claims, boundaries, and other disputed matters, because he was a just man who would not use his position as agent of the Government to profit himself by a dollar.

When it was rumoured that Mr. Ogilvie was to be appointed commissioner, the Montreal "Gazette" on the 11th of July, 1898, made this reference to him :

It is intimated that Mr. William Ogilvie will soon become the Government's chief commissioner in the Yukon country. It will be a good appointment, and a proper recognition of the services of the man whose work did most to make the Yukon known. It will also put in the most responsible position in the country a man whose character has made him respected by the people he will exercise authority over, and whose presence will be a rebuke to the claim-grabbing speculators who have been given too many positions in the gold district.

The party instinct could not refrain from getting in a crack at a Liberal Government, but at the same time, Conservative as this paper is, it admitted that the appointment of Mr. Ogilvie was a good appointment. The Ottawa "Citizen" has an interesting record on the Yukon question, if it could only be examined. It says in an editorial reference on July 1st, 1898 :

Mr. Sifton, he it observed, when he came into office, found the affairs of the Yukon in charge of Mr. William Ogilvie,—

Well, I did not; the only thing about that is that it is altogether incorrect.

—whose administration of the district under most trying circumstances was, to say the least, such as to reflect credit upon Canada.

Anything he did he did in spite of the Government.

Readers of the "Citizen" will remember the splendid tributes to Mr. Ogilvie's high sense of duty, which were paid him by such anti-Canadian journals as the New York "Sun." He had the opportunity, had he been so minded, of securing mining claims which would have made him many times a millionaire. But he not only refused to profit by the position to the extent of a dollar, but actually declined to accept testimonials which the miners thrust upon him in recognition of his thorough-going impartiality and devotion to duty. Such is the man whom Mr. Sifton found in office.

Such was the man Mr. Sifton did not find in office

It would have been a small mark of appreciation to have confirmed him in his position.

He would have been asked to stay there had he not desired to come out on account of his ill-health. As a matter of fact, it was absolutely necessary for him to come out.

It would have been but a small mark of appreciation to have confirmed him in his position, possessing, as he did, the entire confidence and respect of the mining population; but such a course did not fall in with Mr. Sifton's plans.

I quote that article for the purpose of showing that the Ottawa "Citizen," which displays in the same article its opposition to myself, approves of Mr. Ogilvie's appointment as the best that could be made. The Montreal "Star" of the 11th of July, 1898, says :

The appointment of William Ogilvie to a position of trust in the Yukon district is a step for which the Government will be gladly given credit. It is difficult to see how they could have made a better choice. But they must be careful not to overpower him with colleagues of political claims, and with men on the make.

I have given you the list of men.

William Ogilvie is trusted because he kept his hands free of speculation when chance called upon him to play an impartial part upon that northern stage paved with temptation.

The Ottawa "Journal," on the 11th of July, 1898, starts out an article by saying :

The Dominion Government scores a big point by its nomination of Mr. Ogilvie to the important post of Commissioner of the Yukon territory.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this is the position, so far as the appointment of officials is concerned: First, we appointed Mr. Fawcett. Mr. Fawcett, a surveyor, was appointed because Mr. Ogilvie recommended a surveyor. He was picked out from the surveyors because the Surveyor General said that he was the best surveyor to be had for the post. Major Walsh was sent out because, by the great mass of public opinion in Canada, he was regarded as the best man for the position, and our political opponents admitted that. Before a word had been said, before a syllable had been uttered imputing any failure of duty to Major Walsh, and I am not saying that anything has been said which shows that there was any failure of duty on his part, but before an objection was raised, we appointed Mr. Ogilvie. Mr. Ogilvie's appointment is admitted by the daily papers and by our political opponents, to be the best that could have been made. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asks, why did you not appoint a lawyer as Gold Commissioner? I did not appoint a lawyer because the man who knew the district recommended a surveyor. I appointed the surveyor recommended as specially fitted for the post by the Surveyor General of Canada; and if the appointment of a surveyor did not turn out to be satisfactory in the light of experience—and that is the only way to consider it—if it was a mistake, it must be remembered that it was then more difficult to say that a lawyer was wanted for Gold Commissioner because complications afterwards arose that nobody anticipated, and that have rarely, if ever, arisen in any other mining country, on account of the enormous concourse of people who crowded into one spot. It was not anticipated that there would be that enormous inrush of people, or that many of them would act in the dishonest or unscrupulous way in which they did. When Major Walsh came back and discussed the matter with me, and he pointed out to me that it would be well to have a lawyer for Gold Commissioner, I recommended to my colleagues that a lawyer should be appointed. There was no delay about it. We considered the matter with reasonable promptness. I do not suppose that the moment that Major Walsh got here I dashed off to the Prime Minister and said: "Call a Council meeting to appoint a lawyer." These matters are not put through in that way: they have to be considered. We offered the appointment to Mr. Gordon Hunter, a gentleman who practices, I believe, in Victoria, B.C., and we selected Mr. Gordon Hunter for these reasons: I do not think I ever saw Mr. Hunter and I do not know him, but I knew that there had shortly before been a vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and that Mr. Hunter had been strongly recommended to the Government by many capable and reliable men as the best man in British Columbia to fill the position of judge of the Supreme Court, and I thought that a man who was qualified to sit upon the bench of the Supreme Court would make a most eligible Gold Commissioner under the circumstances existing as they did at that time in Dawson City. Mr. Hunter was obliged for private reasons to decline the appointment, and I then appointed Mr. Senkler, a barrister of Nelson. I do not personally know Mr. Senkler, but he was highly recommended to me. He is well known in eastern Canada, and I took care to write privately to leading members of the bar in the city of Toronto in whose judgment I have the greatest confidence, as to Mr. Senkler's qualifications. The testimony was universally favourable to him, and as he was strongly recommended in British Columbia, I felt that the appointment was the best that could be made. That may be regarded as having settled the question of my discretion and my judgment in appointing Mr. Senkler. That shows, I apprehend, that there was no dereliction or any desire on my part to do anything except to meet the requirements of the district, and that I acted as soon as the information came so as to enable me to do it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Wade had come out—we had no advice that he was coming. He came out, largely, on account of injury to his health on the trip in the year before, and when he got here, he was under medical advice, and could not go back. Consequently, a legal adviser was required for the commissioner, a gentleman who would give such legal advice as counsel as Mr. Oglivie would require in connection with the administration of affairs in the district. I cast about for a gentleman to occupy that position, and I recommended to my colleagues the appointment of Mr. W. H. P. Clement, of Toronto. I do not know a man at the bar of Ontario—and the Ontario bar ranks justly high—I do not know a man at the bar of Ontario whose appointment should be more satisfactory and commendable than that of Mr. Clement. He was picked out as a man specially qualified for the position. He was a lawyer of first-class standing, a man of unblemished character, a man who had given special attention to the study of constitutional questions, and consequently, although he never was in Parliament, he was a man who had his attention attracted to questions that would naturally arise in connection with the administration of the district: he is the author of a work on the constitution of Canada. Mr. Clement is a man of recognized standing, recognized ability, and recognized character, and I have never heard any one suggest that Mr. Clement's appointment was not one of the best that could possibly be made.

These were the men we appointed in the district. As to the few minor officials we sent up, they were only a few in number, with the exception of the class of labouring men and assistants, who would be hired in this country by the day, and who are only sent out because they are difficult to get there. There is more or less difficulty about getting for the minor positions men of good standing in the east to go to the Yukon. Men of good standing and assured positions do not care to give up their business connections and possibly take the chance of wrecking their lives, unless they happen for some reason to be of an adventurous temperament, and that would not be a particularly good qualification, when we came to select such men. Mr. Speaker, we sent men in there of recognized good character. I have not heard it suggested that a single man we sent to the Yukon, down to the lowest labouring man in connection with any party that went to that district, had a single cloud upon his character before he left this country. Then, Sir, if that be the record, I want to put the Government in the judgment of the House and the country upon this point. For the last year—perhaps not for the last year, but certainly for the last six months—I have been charged, and the Government has been charged, with a grave and serious offence in connection with the appointment of officers in the Yukon district. I have been charged with the appointment of a horde of useless political parasites, of debauching and prostituting the public service of this country by the class of men I have appointed, of throwing aside old and tried public servants, and of putting the public service in that district in the hands of men who had no qualification for the position.

Now, I have read you the record of these appointments, and I ask the gentlemen of this House, if it is not so, that never in the history of Canada has a series of appointments been made with more care, and with more universal approbation as to each appointment that had been made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Too many Tories: that is the only trouble.

Mr. FOSTER. That sticks in your nostrils.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not mind being attacked by the press of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it would be desirable that some little faint regard for the facts of the case should be observed, when the discussion of these matters is going on in this House. I have not rushed into newspaper interviews to deny the statements which I have punctured one by one, as I have gone through this statement, but I have waited until I was challenged in the House of Commons to rise in my place and prove that the charges which have been made against me, in connection with the administration of my office, are absolutely without foundation. In dealing with some matters, chronology is everything, because a man may be quite free from blame, if he does a thing in dealing with matters under certain circumstances, when he might be very subject to blame for taking the same action under different circumstances. A man may be free from blame, if he does a thing on the 1st of the month, whereas, if he did the same thing on the 15th of the month, he might be subject to serious blame on account of new information being received by him in the meantime. I, therefore, want to direct the careful attention of the House to these appointments in connection with the dates. I recommended Mr. Ogilvie's appointment on the 30th June. There was no complaint of any kind that I know of against Major Walsh or his administration at that time. I had not the faintest idea that anybody had an idea that Major Walsh was not doing everything that could be done, and doing it in the best possible way, when I appointed Mr. Ogilvie, and urged Mr. Ogilvie to go forward as soon as it was possible for him to go.

It is a large task for a man to undertake the administration of a district like the Yukon. There is no man in this House of Commons to-day—not even my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper)—who has had to organize a new district, organize a government, think of everything that is to be thought of in connection with the government, take a new country and a people with nothing done, and think of everything and provide for everything. There is not a man in this House who has ever had to do it before, not one—not even my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. There never has been a task of that kind before that one man had to take hold of. The North-west Territories had to be administered, but the administration there grew up gradually. It did not have to be made in a minute; it grew up slowly; police were sent out first, and one thing after another was done. Any such avalanche of responsibility as we have had in connection with the Yukon, never was thrust upon a Government in connection with the North-west Territories. Well, I urged Mr. Ogilvie to go quickly. I said there was no complaint against Major Walsh, and that was true. If I recollect aright, there had at that time been an article published, attacking Messrs. Wade and McGregor for having staked claims in the Yukon district, and I mentioned this to Mr. Ogilvie. I do not know exactly the date I mentioned it to him, but I have a strong recollection that I mentioned this to him as one of the reasons why he should go quickly, and I told him, if any ground existed that no Government official should stake a claim, he might report upon it, and deal with it. I insisted on Mr. Ogilvie going up there quickly, and I particularly mentioned the 15th of July as the date before which he should go, if possible. There were a great many things to be done, and a great many consultations to be held with the various departments of the Government. Mr. Ogilvie would come and talk to me for a while, and then he would come down to my house, late at night, having thought of something that nobody else thought of, and he would take advice with regard to these things. They could not be put in the shape of official instructions, because if these things were put in such shape, and circumstances turned out to be different after Mr. Ogilvie got there, he would be bound by his instructions, and could not act otherwise, and so his information was largely taken in the form of consultation with members of the Government. At all events, he did not get away until the 4th of August. Before the 4th of August I had gone westward, and was taking a holiday at Rat Portage. On his way west, Mr. Ogilvie stayed a day or two with me, to go carefully over everything again and to have the last word as to his administrative duties. In the meantime, newspaper articles began to appear, and I said to him: "Now, Mr. Ogilvie the Government reposes complete confidence in you; we look to you to look into those things; I do not give you a commission of investigation, but I expect you to put that service on an effective footing; I expect you to do everything that the honour of the Government of Canada requires in that district, and to do it as soon as possible." That was in conversation at Rat Portage while Mr. Ogilvie was on his way. Then, after he left, while he was on his way to Vancouver, or after he got there, and before he left for the north, thinking these matters over and feeling the responsibility of the whole situation, I feared that he might hesitate, as an officer of the Government, to assume the necessary responsibility; for we all know that an officer of the Government is not like a Minister, who is prepared to meet Parliament and justify his conduct after having done the best he could, but is afraid to take responsibility upon himself. Therefore, I sent a telegram to Mr. Ogilvie, either from Rat Portage or Vancouver, and I want my action in regard to him marked, as shown by my disposition and desire to send this telegram to him at that time. No specific charge had been made against any officer of the Government; there was nothing but these newspaper statements that matters were not in a desirable condition, and I sent to Mr. Ogilvie a telegram—and such authority was never given to any officer in Canada before, in these words :

You have an absolutely free hand in regard to the officials. Do what is necessary to put the service on an effective footing.

What more could I do ? What more could the Government of this country do than we have done ?

Mr. PRIOR. What is the date of that ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have not got the date, but I will look it up and give it to the House. According to my recollection, it was sent after Mr. Ogilvie left my house at Rat Portage, and before he left Vancouver, and I have his acknowledgment, since he went to Dawson City, of the receipt of this message. In making the copy of the telegram, the date has been inadvertently left off.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been alleged that there were irregularities in the post office in Dawson City. It has been alleged that the constables of the Mounted Police—not the commissioned officers—I do not think that has ever been alleged—that the constables who were in charge of the post office at Dawson City took bribes for the delivery of mail matter outside of regular hours. I do not remember whether Major Walsh said anything specifically about that in his official report or not. I do remember that I discussed the matter with him when he came back, that he said he had called in the officers in charge of the post office, that they had tried in every possible way, by the employment of detectives and otherwise, to ascertain if there was any ground at all for this charge ; that although it was rumoured quite commonly that that practice was going on, yet they were utterly unable to fasten it upon anybody ; that they had changed the constables in charge, thinking that might possibly have the effect of doing away with the idea, if it was only an idea, or doing away with the practice, if it was a practice. Major Walsh, as soon as he got back, recommended in his official report, that the post office should be taken out of the control of the Mounted Police, thinking they were not adapted to that kind of work ; and Mr. Ogilvie, taking the same view as that which Major Walsh had arrived at from his experience, has carried out that recommendation, as Major Walsh would have done if he had stayed there. Mr. Ogilvie, when he went back, did take the post office out of the hands of the police, and, so far as I know, no irregularities are charged as having taken place since. Subsequently, the postmaster appointed by my hon. friend the Postmaster General arrived ; and, so far as my information is concerned—and I have not heard any allegation to the contrary—the service in connection with the delivery of mails at Dawson City is perfectly satisfactory.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who was in charge of the post office ? I do not suppose that upon any one point in connection with the administration of the Yukon, this Government has been belaboured, and I have been belaboured and vilified, so much as on account of the post office and the method with which the post office was managed. The impression has been conveyed to the people of the country that I had sent in some more of those political parasites to take charge of the post office, and that those people, sent up there to enrich themselves at the expense of the public, were bleeding everybody. Who was in charge of the post office ? Why, Captain Harper, of the Mounted Police, who was appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, was in charge of it all the time ; and he was sent there on the recommendation of Mr. White, the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, as a competent officer—why ? Because Captain Harper's reputation and record in the Mounted Police was without a flaw and is without a flaw at this moment—because he was a first-class, competent officer. What better could we do than put one of the very best men in the service of the Dominion of Canada in charge of that office ? And if Captain Harper in Dawson City could not find out whether his own men were taking bribes or not, and, if they were, could not stop them, will anybody in the name of common sense tell me how I could stop them here in Ottawa ? I did not know for months afterwards that the charge was even made ; I never heard of it till months afterwards, and yet I am blamed because the man on the ground could not stop these men from taking bribes. Why, Mr. Speaker, the proposition convicts the men who are criticising the administration of the district, of the absolute lack of the most ordinary common sense. If criticism is applied, it ought to be applied with some degree of judgment, and then some attention will be paid to the strictures.

In all this, Mr. Speaker, there is a question of responsibility—a question of how far the Minister is responsible for what his officials do. That is a serious and important question for the House to decide—a question that often has to be decided, and a responsible Minister has always to be ready to answer to it at all times and under all circumstances. He is there to answer or resign. Now, my hon. friend the member for Pictou, on page 775 of "Hansard," defines my responsibility as a member of the Government in the following terms :—

But I charge more against the Minister of the Interior, the responsibility for all I am going to say ; I do not wish to deal with these understrappers, I do not wish to deal with the creatures of the Minister of the Interior.

I have told you who these creatures were. And I venture to say that the expression of opinion given here is not a proper expression of opinion coming for a Privy Council to apply to these well qualified officers in the public service :

I do not wish to deal with these understrappers—I do not wish to deal with the creatures of the Minister of the Interior. He cannot in fairness shelter himself behind their misconduct; he stands primarily charged with all the rascality and all the nefarious conduct of these men.

That is the statement of ministerial responsibility which the ex-Minister of Justice and a privy councillor (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made in this House last Thursday. "Oh that mine enemy would write a book." The hon. gentleman spoke on a similar subject before in this House, time and again, under other and happier circumstances. On page 3035 of the "Hansard" of 1895, the same hon. gentleman is reported as having said this:

Take the criticism of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and the evidence given by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in regard to these details. What do they relate to?

Now, will the hon. gentlemen themselves listen to what is admitted, not charged, by unanimous witnesses, but admitted and proven:

They relate to frauds, to trickery, to deception, to stuffed pay-lists, to all kinds of false pretenses; and, if the case stood there, that the Government knowing of that, had done nothing, the case would be grave indeed against this or any Government. But what information, I ask again, has any hon. gentleman in this House on which to base a case against the Government? Do they pretend that they can make one solitary elector in any part of Canada believe that under a Liberal Government, or under a Conservative Government, under the present Government of thirteen or fifteen men, you could guarantee the people of this country against fraud and iniquity on the part of men employed by the Government?

There is a lot more of the same kind, but that, I apprehend, is quite enough. What did the hon. gentleman say in another place? I refer to this because it has a reference to the English Parliament, and it may be perhaps valuable on that account. The hon. gentleman, on page 3038, says:

And if the Government were to fall on that ground, if the Minister were to lose his standing on that ground, what would be the position of Minister after Minister in the Imperial Government? How about the Ministers who are responsible for the construction of ships, that after having been built are almost as speedily condemned? How about Ministers responsible for supplying the army with bayonets that will not stand the slightest use? How about Ministers whose departments have been investigated time and time again in reference to other matters, and who have sheltered themselves, and sheltered themselves properly, behind the advice of experts. I have heard one of the late leaders of this Government state, without quarrel, in this House, and without any difference of opinion being expressed—I refer to the late Sir John Macdonald—that in reference to matters pertaining to engineering, he went by the advice of the engineer.

I have shown that I have acted upon the best advice in every appointment I have made, and that every appointment I did make has been approved by the hon. gentleman's friend, and not merely by myself. And this hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) stands up in this House and says that these principles laid down in this book will apply to and excuse my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). I am not saying they do not, I am not discussing that at all, but I am pointing out that the hon. gentleman has declared that they will excuse the ex-Minister of Railways for the fraud, deception and stealing that took place in Montreal, two hours' ride by an express train from the city of Ottawa, but that they did not apply to or excuse me for what happened in a month or six weeks at Dawson City, when no human being could know what was going on there.

I have shown why we had Major Walsh as the leading administrator, and Mr. Fawcett as gold commissioner, the latter a gentleman appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite and recommended by the Surveyor General, and Captain Harper in the post office. I did not know a syllable of what was going on, and I have the right to say to this House that these men are responsible for what was done and not myself. I said, when I started, that I proposed placing myself in the judgment of this House, as to whether there had been the least carelessness or negligence; and I leave the case with the House in complete confidence as to what its judgment will be.

My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) strayed into other fields, and I was sorry to find that all through his speech there ran a vein or a tone of insinuation, or trying to create the impression that there was some felony, some wrong-doing, some wickedness on my part or the part of the Government that would not bear the light of day. When a man has anything to say about me, I like him to say it out straight, and I wish to say that whenever I have anything to allege against a political opponent, I will not allege it until I have evidence that convinces me, and when I have evidence that convinces me, it will be evidence that ought to convince the House; and then I will take the responsibility of making a charge as a member of the House. I think I would be justified in not dealing with the hon. gentleman's insinuations, I think I would be justified in throwing them to one side; but I will not do it, but will make use of the knowledge I have to enable me to ferret out what the hon. gentleman pretends might have been taking place, and I will prove that there was not a solitary word of truth in the suspicion which he expressed or in the charges which he insinuated. I shall take up the liquor permit question in the Yukon. The hon. gentleman made some statements with regard to that question. In the first place, he charged that there had been gross, and he intimated, corrupt favouritism in connection with liquor permits for the Yukon district. I have said that there was not, and I shall prove there was not. On page 2434 of last year's "Hansard" will be found a statement which I made to the House at that time of the liquor permits which had been issued up to that time. It will be found, on examination of "Hansard," last year in other places which I need not refer to, that the question came up in this House and was briefly discussed, and I then explained the position to the House. It was this: I had been informed that there was a certain practice in the department, that applications had come in the early part of the year, practically before there was any particular excitement in the Yukon district, and one or two of them, after the excitement arose, and I granted a certain number of permits. They were not granted to my political friends particularly. Of the whole lot, covering altogether perhaps 11,000 gallons, there was only one man to whom a permit was granted that I knew at all, a man from the province of Manitoba with whom I was personally acquainted, and who was a supporter of the Government. All the rest I knew nothing of, except that they were recommended by responsible people and certified to as proper persons to receive permits. I explained that to the House. I say there was not the slightest ground for saying that there was any political favour given whatever. In fact, the return shows that there was no favouritism. On the contrary, those whom I did not know outnumbered those whom I did by ten to one. I saw that applications were coming in rapidly, and that this business had to be stopped altogether, and I stopped it. I said I would not grant any more liquor permits for the Yukon territory, and I did not grant any more. I explained that matter to the House last year, as shown by the "Hansard." When I say that I did not grant any more permits, I mean that I did not grant any more for commercial use. The list that was brought down showing permits granted prior to the time when, as I said, I decided not to grant any more permits, was placed upon "Hansard" at the page referred to. It shows the permits up to August 30th, 1897. It also shows one permit for fifteen gallons of liquor for personal use, given to a man named James H. Brown on the application or recommendation of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), a member of the Opposition. I do not mean that as any imputation upon the hon. gentleman. I do not think there is anything wrong in the hon. gentleman's certifying to a friend of his as a reputable man who desired a permit for fifteen gallons of liquor for his own personal use, going on that long journey. I gave the permit. But this is what I want the House to be seized of: since the 30th August, 1897, the only permits that have been granted by or under my authority in any way, shape or form, directly or indirectly, up to the time when Mr. Ogilvie was appointed commissioner—from which time he is held responsible for dealing with the subject, I not even having returns of what he has done—

are the following: James H. Brown, fifteen gallons of whisky for personal use; Dr. Rimer, a reputable physician of Aylmer, Que., who went to Dawson City and was allowed to take fifty gallons of alcohol as part of his stock of drugs; the clerks of the Bank of British North America, who were granted a permit for twenty-five gallons for the personal use of the members of that staff; the clerks of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, a similar permit for twenty-five gallons; T. Trotter, Antigonish, five gallons of liquor for personal use; total, 105 gallons. That is the list. Now, I think the House will bear me out that I have answered the accusation of favouritism. The hon. gentleman went on to make the statement that—

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman does not wish to leave the House and the country to understand that 105 gallons of liquor is the total quantity for which permits have been issued for the Yukon district between these dates. If the hon. gentleman has not issued these permits, somebody else has issued them. I suppose he will inform the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will give that. I will explain the subject to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) fully and completely. "Nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice." My hon. friend the hon. member for Pictou said this:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If Mr. Woodworth, instead of attacking the Administration, was in their confidence, was a heeler and a friend, he could do as a heeler and a friend of theirs, was able to do in the city of Victoria, a member of the bar, also, that is, to charge and collect a fee of $500 because he was able, by telegram and by a letter, to obtain from the Minister of the Interior a permit for his client, to send liquor into the Yukon. That is my statement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman tell me who the client was that got the permit?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I will not.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will he tell me by whom the permit was got?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I certainly will not. But I will write to that gentleman, who is a member of the bar, and ask him if I may give his name to the Minister of the Interior and to this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Surely the hon. gentleman will not make a statement without giving the name of the lawyer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, I will. I have been telling hon. gentlemen here all this evening, on these Yukon charges, the reason why some of these names must be withheld.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there may be a reason why a man who comes from the Yukon is fool enough to think that he will damage his interest by making an honest statement as to the acts of the Government; but there is certainly no reason why a member of the bar of British Columbia, who does business with the Department of the Interior, should be afraid to have his name known in connection with it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no reason in this case.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I may be allowed to state for the information of the hon. gentleman that the statement he has made is absolutely untrue.

I do not, of course, charge the hon. member for Pictou with insincerity, but, reading this report, it will be evident that the hon. gentleman took the ground that he had not made a positive statement and that, a positive statement not having been made, I could not deny it, there was nothing to deny. That was practically the position he took. Now, here is what he said. Is this a positive statement or is it not? Is it a statement that I could deny if I knew all the facts, or is it not?

If Mr. Woodworth, instead of attacking the Administration, was in their confidence, was a heeler and a friend, he could do as a heeler and a friend of theirs, also a member of the bar, was able to do in the city of Victoria, that is, to charge and collect a fee of $500 because he was able, by telegram and by a letter, to obtain from the Minister of the Interior a permit for his client, to send liquor into the Yukon. That is my statement.

He could do what another man did who was able to get a permit from me—that is his statement. Well, I said then that a member of the bar did not get a permit from me. I said the statement was untrue, and I say it is untrue now, and I will prove it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not intend to say what he did. Perhaps he intended to do what he said afterwards he had done, perhaps he intended to insinuate without saying it, but inadvertently he said it—there is no question about that. Now I have read a list of the permits, and the question I am going to consider before this House is whether a member of the bar of the city of Victoria—I do not care how much he charged, he may have charged whatever he liked—got a permit from me upon a telegram as stated by the hon. member for Pictou. I do not know that it would be a crime if he did. If the law gave me authority to give a permit, if it was part of my official duty to decide whether a permit should be given or not, I would decide it; and if, as a matter of policy I thought it was best to give it, and if I gave it on the solicitation of a member of the bar of British Columbia, I do not know that that would be any dreadful crime. I did give some permits, but not just in that way, and I am prepared to answer for them. I do not know that there would be any crime in doing what the hon. gentleman charged, but what I am prepared to say now is that it is not so, that is all.

Mr. HAGGART. Did not that party get a permit from your office in any way?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I cannot find out who the party was. Tell me who he was, then I will tell you.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps I have not followed the debate very closely. I thought that the name of Mr. Woodworth was mentioned, and the hon. gentleman denied that he had given him a permit. I may be mistaken. Did this man Woodworth get a permit?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I understand my hon. friend was not here the other evening. The name of Mr. Woodworth came in because he was the man who wrote a letter which the hon. member for Pictou was quoting. But Woodworth had nothing to do with the permit, nothing whatever. I gave last year the list of permits which I had granted, and in that list there is no permit that was granted upon a telegram from any lawyer in the city of Victoria, and I have granted no permits since—that is permits for commercial use; so where is the hon. gentleman's statement? In that list there is a permit that was granted upon a telegram from Victoria, and the telegram is here. But it was not granted upon a telegram from a member of the bar or a heeler of the Grit party; it was on a telegram from the Hon. Jas. H. Turner, leader of the Conservative party in British Columbia. If the hon. gentlemen want to look at it, they can look at it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it, read it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I may say in the first place that I had received, I think, three applications, one from a man named Chambers, and another from a man named Menzies, the last permit, I think that was granted—the last permit for liquor for commercial use. First, I received a letter from Chambers, then I got this letter from Mr. Turner, who requested me to give a permit to Sullivan, McLeod and McPhee. I did not know the men, I never saw them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. All Tories.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I suppose they are Tories. In answer to this letter I wrote to Mr. Turner and said that I regretted that I could not give the permit, that I was in great doubt about the advisability of granting any more permits, and had about come to the conclusion that I would not do it. I had also told Chambers that I would not give him a permit. Then I got this telegram from Mr. Turner, dated 21st of August, 1897:

Have had no reply to my telegram—

There must be a mistake of a day or two about the dates of the issue of the permit. They probably refer to dates entered upon the files here.

Have had no reply to my telegram re permit to Sullivan & Co. It is urgently wanted, as last steamer sails in few days. Please wire permit to collector customs.

That would be after my answer to his letter of the 14th of July, but before he had received it. Then he telegraphs later :

Will you wire reply to my letter of 20th July ?

J. H. TURNER.

In response to either one of these telegrams, whichever I got the last. I thought the matter over, discussed it with my deputy, and solely out of consideration for the request of the Prime Minister of British Columbia, I decided to grant that permit. I said to my deputy : Well, I have told these other men—I think two of them, one certainly—that I could not give him a permit ; now I will have to give him the permit. If I give it to one man I must to the other. So I gave permits to both. Then I closed the bill, as I have said, and we have not granted a permit since for liquor for commercial use. Now I must say this, that I do not believe there is a fair-minded man upon either side of the House who will not admit that I am correct in saying that there is no possible palliation for the unfairness of the hon. member for Pictou in attacking me about a telegram alleged to have been sent, and positively refusing to give me the name of the man that sent it or the name of the man it referred to. Why, Mr. Speaker, in my department last year, I am told by my deputy, over 175,000 letters and telegrams have come in and gone out. Would the hon. gentleman expect me to remember a telegram when he won't give me the name ? Now, I will tell you what I have done. The name not being given, my secretary and my deputy have taken the directory of British Columbia, and they have looked up the name of every lawyer in Victoria. They searched the files of the Department of the Interior and they searched my private files. There is not a telegram from a lawyer there in regard to a permit that can be found.

Mr. FOSTER. That is conclusive of nothing.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If a telegram has been sent to me by a lawyer in Victoria, and is not on the file, if I have received a telegram somewhere else, when I have not been in Ottawa, or a telegram which has been lost or mislaid, then I tell the hon. gentleman, that the man who sent that telegram got no permit in reply to it. I am not responsible for telegrams being sent ; I am responsible for the replies. There was a telegram sent from Victoria, from a lawyer—I would not call him a heeler, I would not describe him in that way ; I cannot state what the telegram says, because the information comes to me in a way that I cannot disclose. If the hon. gentleman had given me a name, if he will give it to me now, I will look ; I will meet him on his ground and prove that he does not know what he is talking about ; but I can only look around and see how the story got around. The law partner of the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is the only man that the public or private records of this Government show has ever telegraphed to a member of this Government from the city of Victoria about a liquor permit. He telegraphed to one of my colleagues. My colleague asked me about it. Well, what I told my colleague is best evidenced by the answer that my colleague sent. The answer that my colleague sent was :

Saw Minister of Interior. Regret exceedingly impossible to grant permit.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was dealing with the charges, or statements, of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), with regard to the administration of the Yukon, and I think I disposed of the allegation of the hon. gentleman about the telegram. I desire now to say, with reference to the statement of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), as to a fee of $500 having been paid to a lawyer who was described as a heeler of the Grit party, that it turns out, according to the best information I can get, after searching the public and private files of the members of the Government, that the reference must have been to the partner of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Whatever fee may have been paid to this gentleman is not my business, and it is not the business of the Government, and it is not part of the official duty of a Minister of the Crown to regulate the fee which may be paid to a lawyer in Victoria for any business which he may do with the department. What I am responsible for is what I do, and if a gentleman telegraphs to me, I am not responsible for his telegram ; I am responsible for the answer ; and I have shown absolutely beyond any doubt, that the statement of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is altogether incorrect. No such permit as that to which he refers was ever obtained. The only application that was made for a permit to which he could possibly refer was made in that way, was made by his own partner, and it was properly refused. It surpasses the wit of man to understand what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) could have meant by making such a statement in this House. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made another statement, which I will repeat to the House, and I will let the House decide between the Minister of the Crown and the leading member of the Opposition who made the statement. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) deliberately stated that I had stopped liquor at the boundary of the Yukon so that liquor that was being taken in by friends of mine might catch up. That was his charge. So I understood it after reading the "Hansard" report, and so I understand it now. I do not think there can be the least doubt that what he charged was about what he meant. Sir, I have already stated what my position upon the liquor question was. I have stated that there were not any permits I had granted, that there were no friends who got any permits, or who were taking any liquor up there. The statement of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is, therefore, without any foundation. I will go further, however, and I will make to the House a complete disclosure of all the knowledge I have with regard to the question, with special reference to the question of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster)—who is not now in his place—when he asked me, if 105 gallons for which I gave permits for personal use, and druggist use, and so on, was the only liquor that had gone in. At the end of August, 1897, as I said to the House last year, I made up my mind to prevent, if possible, liquor from being sent in, and that matter was brought up in the House last session and then discussed. That resolution I adhered to up to the time when the local council took charge. Whatever Mr. Ogilvie and his council may have done since, I have no returns from them on the subject; but I have no doubt that I will be able to assume the responsibility for what he and his council have done up to this time, and may do in connection with the question. As to that, however, I have no return up to the present time. It was a matter of discussion in the House last session, that I had had an interview with the members of the North-west Government. The question as to whether they had power to advise the Lieutenant-Governor to issue permits came up, and, without attempting to come to any decision upon the legal aspect of the question, or upon the propriety of the Government undertaking to interfere and by force of its authority over the chief executive officer of the North-west Territories or its relation to him, to prevent the issue of these permits, an understanding was come to. I interviewed in the city of Ottawa the two members of the North-west Territories Government, and I stated to the House last year, if I recollect it aright—I have not seen the books of reference lately—but my recollection, as I stated to the House last session, was, that I had an understanding with the two members of the North-west Government, Mr. Ross and Mr. Haultain, that no permits should be issued for liquor for any commercial purpose. There was something said about issuing permits to persons who might want to go from the Territories to the Yukon district, and merely wanted permits for taking in liquor for personal use, and I said I had no objection in the world to that, and we parted on that understanding. I think I stated that understanding to the House; I certainly stated it to my colleagues. I went on that understanding, and had not the least idea that the understanding was being violated. Now, Sir, I wish to state, with some degree of care, what my position in regard to that matter is, although it is not a question at all that affects my action about giving permits. I was informed, later on, that the North-west Government was issuing permits. I stated to my colleague who privately informed me of that fact, that it could not possibly be so, because I had a positive understanding with them it should not be done. My colleague said he knew it was so, and I, therefore, communicated with one of the members of the North-west Territories Government. I was replied to, to this effect: That, while it was not denied that there had been an understanding of the kind, when I parted with these gentlemen here, yet, practically this was the position taken: That, in view of all the circumstances, and what had transpired since, and the delay in getting the Yukon Government Bill through the House, they did not conceive that the spirit of the understanding required that they should abstain from issuing permits, and consequently they had gone on and issued them. Well, I cannot say that my friends in the Government of the North-west Territories were dishonest in that, but it was certainly altogether a departure from what I understood had been agreed to between us. I simply state that in order that the House may know exactly what took place. I do not accuse these gentlemen of bad faith; I have no idea they acted in bad faith; but I had a clear understanding in one way, and they, while admitting the understanding, conceived they were excused by what subsequently took place. In the month of June, of last year, there was great pressure for permits for liquor, which pressure was resisted by myself and by the Government here; but I was informed by persons coming from the coast, that there was no doubt that attempts would be made to get liquor into the Yukon, other than the liquor—

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) permit me? Before the hon. gentleman goes away from the arrangement made with the North-west Government, may I ask him: Does he contend that the North-west Government admitted that the Department of the Interior had any jurisdiction at that time in regard to permits in the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have not discussed that at all.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, but it is very important.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) wants to bring that question up some other time, I will discuss it. I am now discussing a question of fact, and I am not discussing in any way that legal question. I was informed that undoubtedly an attempt would be made to get quantities of liquor into the Yukon district that were not authorized by any legal permit, and, therefore, I directed that a letter should be written, and a letter was written—a copy of which I hold in my hand—on the 10th of May, 1898, directed “To the Officer Commanding the Dominion Mounted Police in the White Pass, via Victoria.” That was the place through which the liquor would go if it went at all. That officer was Major Wood; and I may say that Major Wood had supervision over not only the White Pass but also the Chilkoot Pass, which afforded access to Lake Bennett, down which any liquor would go. This letter of May 10, was as follows:—

Dear Sir.—I beg to advise you that no authority has been given to an officer of the Government to issue permits for the importation of liquors into the Yukon district, and that no statute governing the issue of permits has been passed.

That referred, of course, to the fact that the Yukon Bill had not yet got through.

The only permits which have been issued, and which can therefore be honoured, are those named in the inclosed list. I desire, therefore, to instruct you that with the exception referred to the law prohibiting the importation or sale of liquor in the district of the Yukon must be absolutely and strictly enforced.

That was strictly in accordance with the position I had taken in the House, and attached to that letter was the list of permits which I had presented to the House during the session. I think the date of presentation was later than the date of this letter. In addition to the permits mentioned in this list, some permits appeared which had been granted by the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, and of which I had been advised. So that this list comprised at that date all the permits I had any knowledge of having been granted, and this list was placed officially in the hands of that officer, so that he might not be imposed upon by any forged permits being taken in. Then I was informed, as I have said, that other permits were being issued by the North-west Government, directly contrary to my wishes and to the well known wishes of the Government here. That is not said, however, with a view of suggesting that the members of the North-west Government, in the exercise of their constitutional functions, are in any way bound to consider the wishes of the Government here. I simply say as a matter of fact that it was done contrary to our wishes. I ascertained that the permits were being issued, and I had the North-west Government communicated with, and a list of the permits that had been issued by them was sent down to the Government here.

Mr. SIFTON.

Upon that I referred to the Minister of Justice the question whether these permits were good and were in force, in view of the position of affairs at that time. The Minister of Justice advised me, in the first place, that the permits were good. He also advised me, by another letter, that he was of opinion that we had power to cancel the permits if we saw fit to do so. I concluded at once that it would not be a fair or an honest thing to cancel the permits, because the people who had got them had gone to the North-west Government, had paid their money, and had invested a large sum of money on a document which was legal at the time; and I thought it would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government to cancel permits obtained under these circumstances. Therefore, at my direction, this letter was sent on the 9th of July:

With further reference to my letter to you of the 10th May last, in the matter of permits for the importation of liquor into the Yukon district, I desire to inform you that the permits enumerated on the annexed schedule have been issued by the Government of the North-west Territories, and, it having been decided that these permits should be recognized, you will therefore allow the persons mentioned in the said schedule to take in the liquor specified opposite their respective names, upon the production of the permits unexpired.

This letter was sent to Commissioner Walsh and to the North-west Mounted Police officers commanding at the following posts:—Stikine River, Chilkat, Chilkoot Pass, White Pass, Lake Bennett, Hootalinqua, Lake Tagish. I did not know where these men would be taking the liquor in, and so far as I could do so I sent the notice, so that they would not be stopped, instead of sending a notice, as the hon. member for Pictou says, so that they would be stopped. Later on, an amended list came from the North-west Government, and another letter was sent to the officer commanding the North-west Mounted Police, correcting the list, and inserting the additional permits, which were sent in the amended list. That is the history of the stopping of liquor at the coast; and hon. members will see what a ridiculous mare's nest the hon. member for Pictou has fallen into. In the first place, I had not issued any permits to my friends, consequently, there was not any liquor being taken up by them to be stopped. In the second place, the requisite permits were written pursuant to my duty as a member of the Government, to see to the proper administration of the law in the district. The House will further see, in answer to the suggestion of the hon. member for York, that the liquor that was taken in for which I was responsible, if it was all taken in—I fancy it did not all get there—amounted to 105 gallons; and the liquor that flooded the district amounted to something like 60,000 or 65,000 gallons—I have not the total. That liquor was taken in in direct opposition to my wishes and without any power on my part to prevent it, under permit of the North-west Government.

On the subject of telegrams, to revert to that interesting subject, if the hon. member for Pictou was not referring to the Prime Minister of British Columbia or to his partner, perhaps he was referring to Mr. Archer Martin, now Mr. Justice Martin. Mr. Archer Martin, then a Liberal lawyer in Victoria, telegraphed to me on the 8th of July :

Pither & Leiser, leading firm liquor merchants here, were granted permit from Regina, May 21st, to import 2,000 gallons into Yukon, and forwarded goods charge responsible employee. Messenger just arrived from north that goods stopped by Major Steele at Lake Bennett under your instructions of May 10th and June 3rd, presumably because of conflict between Governments.

It was not in consequence of any conflict between Governments, because the first letter was written when we had not any information. The letter was written giving the information, and adding to the list as soon as we got the information.

Public here understood this matter had been amicably arranged, and that Regina permits now recognized by you. Parties interested very responsible merchants and good standing. Stoppage working great hardship and heavy loss. Would respectfully urge you wire immediate instructions Steele my care allowing permit recognition, so that messenger return by steamer sailing probably to-morrow, and party proceed without further delay and loss.

ARCHER MARTIN.

I wired this reply :

Archer Martin, Victoria, B.C.

This telegram will be authority to Major Steele to recognize permit to Pither & Leiser issued by North-west Government to take into Yukon 2,000 gallons of liquor.

That permit was not issued by me, but issued against my wishes—issued by the North-west Government for the taking into the Yukon of 2,000 gallons of liquor. That, therefore, is the complete story of the liquor question.

I am going to refer to one other matter which was not mentioned by my hon. friend in express terms, but there was a vague statement, an innuendo, in his remarks which had reference to that or something similar—I do not know exactly what it was. Before becoming a member of this Government, I practiced law in the town of Brandon. A gentleman there named A. E. Philp, was a junior partner in my office. This gentleman, like a great many others, caught the gold fever, the Klondike fever, last year, and went out to the Yukon. Promptly some of the Conservative journals in Canada proceeded to say that Mr. Philp had gone out as my partner—as my partner, mark you, Mr. Speaker—and was speculating on my behalf in Klondike gold mining. If this statement had not been made in the press, I would not have referred to it. I wish to say that while I am dealing with these innuendos of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), that I flatly, positively, emphatically, in the most unqualified manner, contradict any such statement. I defy any man living to bring the slightest evidence of the truth of any such statement. I dissolved partnership with Mr. Philp when I became a member of the Government, and have had no business connection with him directly or indirectly, in any way, shape or form, since that time. If he went to the Klondike, he went on his own responsibility. If he got gold mines he got them the same as anybody else, and I have nothing whatever to do with that. The story was circulated at the coast that I had given Mr. Philp a liquor permit, and that he had taken liquor into the Klondike, and with that charity which covers a multitude of sins, the story was industriously circulated that I was his partner in connection with the taking of liquor into that country. Well, Mr. Speaker, he never had a liquor permit from me or my department, directly, indirectly, or in any way, shape or form, by or under the authority of any member of this Government. I hold Mr. Philp's written statement—which he is prepared to verify by statutory declaration, and which will render him liable to an indictment for perjury if not true—that he never took any liquor into the Klondike in any way, shape or form. Mr. Philp came to me one day in my office and said that Major Walsh had made an order about requiring 600 pounds of provisions for each person going over the pass ; that he intended to go up to the Yukon on a short visit—that he was just going in and out ; and that he wanted me to give him an order authorizing him to go in without the 600 pounds of provisions. I said to him : You do not need any order, the police will not stop you, you are not going as a prospector, and besides the police have not the authority to stop you. The order is, to all intents and purposes, an advisory order. If any one goes in without that amount of provisions, the police cannot prevent him as they have not the legal authority to do so. He, however, said he did not want to have any trouble with the police and asked me to give him a letter, which I did. I wrote this letter :

This will introduce Mr. Philp, who will be permitted to enter the Yukon district with such provisions he may choose to take with him, without regard to the regulations.

When Mr. Philp got to the coast, like the partner of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and a great many other distinguished gentlemen, he desired to become interested in the bringing of liquor into the Yukon. He telegraphed me, asking me to write him that the letter I had given him should include liquor, and his request was promptly declined. I would not refer to this were it not for the evident vein of insinuation about this thing that travelled through the speech of the hon. member for Pictou. It seemed to me to call for an answer. Friends of mine at the coast advised me that this story was going the rounds, and I promptly denied it. I have now shown exactly what the facts are. There is not a syllable of truth in it.

I desire for a moment to advert to the charge made by the hon. member for Pictou that the officials in Dawson had decamped as soon as they heard that charges were being made against them. Well, Major Walsh came home in pursuance of a letter written me that he intended to come as soon as he possibly could. Having done what he thought was necessary on arrival at Dawson, he intended to come up so as to be sure of not getting caught in there for the winter, and he came out in pursuance of that letter. Mr. Bliss, the accountant, came out to close up the accounts with the department, and Mr. McGregor came out with despatches containing official information. Mr. Wade and Mr. Norwood came out before either of them knew that any charges had been made against them. They knew nothing of any such charges until they got home. Messrs. Bliss, McGregor, Wade and Norwood are now in Dawson City, and prepared to meet before Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner, any charges that may be made against them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) spent some time on the question of the secrecy of the records. He charged that under my administration the records of the mining bureau at Dawson were kept secret. I have adverted to the fact that these records were kept under the same regulations and precisely the same instructions as those which had been in vogue under the late Government, and that there is no shadow of ground for the suggestion that anything I have said or done or any authority I had granted was responsible in any way for the mining records being kept secret. The charge is made that information could not be got out of the office, and that in British Columbia information can be readily got. But in British Columbia upon no occasion, if my information is correct, has there ever been anything like the rush of work and the rush for the registration of claims which there was in Dawson City at the time under consideration. There can be no difficulty about getting information when you have a large office with six or seven men coming in during the course of the day to get information, and where the books and everything are in such a shape that the clerk can hand them out upon the counter and stand there while the person seeking information examines them. There is no difficulty about that, but the position in the Yukon was altogether different. From the 1st of May, 1898, to the 31st January, 1899, there were 10,543 claims registered, or an average of about forty for every working day. Remember that these applications could not be taken by everybody.

Mr. SIFTON.

They had to be taken by the clerk who knew what was going on in the office, who was familiar with the work that had been done before, and would not make the mistake of recording a claim for one man that had already been recorded by another. That was done in some cases by mistake, because mistakes cannot always be avoided. When a man came in, moreover, it was not a case of throwing down a paper as in a registry office. He had to come in and tell where his claim was, and then he had to have his affidavit drawn up and then it was sworn to. Then the clerk had to find out what claims had been registered before. And yet they registered an average of forty claims a day, even with the miserable facilities they had. And no officers could have done better.

Then, it is charged that information could not be got by those who desired it as to unrecorded ground. It was proper that it should be given out, but the reason why it was not given out was that the thing was impossible. There were, practically, hardly any of the creeks surveyed. Dominion, Bonanza and El Dorado were surveyed and the men were at work upon others. But a lot of men would stampede to a creek and then rush back to the office to record their claims, expecting the clerks to be able to say off-hand what ground was recorded and what was not. Under the circumstances, this was utterly impossible. The information could only be had as the result of a considerable amount of careful work, after the surveyor had gone upon the creek and actually surveyed and scaled it, so that the clerks could know what they were doing. I sent surveyors there last winter for that purpose. And, last year, when I was taking my estimates through the House for the Surveyor General's branch, I explained that some of the surveyors were needed for the very purpose of surveying the claims and getting them straightened out. And what happened? The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) got up and protested against anything of that kind. I will read his remarks, they are well worth reading in view of the present state of affairs. I read this not so much to make a point about the surveying of claims in particular as to show that rules that apply in one place do not apply in another, that practice that is good in one place may not be good in another; and that if you are going to make a practice for Dawson City, you have to fit it to the circumstances you have to deal with. The hon. gentleman said:

Surely the hon. gentleman is not going to take the public funds of the country to defray the cost of surveying out mining claims in the Yukon. In British Columbia, if I take up a claim, and he takes up a claim, and if there is any clash in respect to the claim, we have got to get that settled by getting a Crown grant, after a survey for a Crown grant. We have to pay our own surveyors, the dispute can only be settled when the surveys are made, and the actual bounds are set out, not by the Government, not at the expense of the Government, but at the expense of the holders of the claims themselves. The same in the province of Ontario. Provincial money does not survey the claims of the claim-holder in Ontario. That is all at the expense of the mine-holders, or the claim-holder himself. In Ontario you have to pay about $2 an acre for a survey; in British Columbia you have to pay some $500 or $600 in order to get a survey made for a Crown grant. Surely the Dominion, in the Yukon, is not going to take the burden of surveying out individual miners' claims.

Later on, he said :

I protest, if the practice has been begun, against public funds being used for surveying claims of individual miners. Let each man pay for the survey of his claims, as is done in every mining country in the world.

If we had followed the practice laid down by the hon. member for York, trying, as the circumstances proved, they would have been worse; they would have been simply unbearable. You could get at some information about these claims if surveys had been made. But when a lot of people rushed out and stampeded an unknown creek concerning which the clerks knew simply nothing—nothing of its geography, nothing of its length, whether it was five or fifty miles, not even where it was; and when they then dash at the office to record their claims, how is the clerk to give them information? And the next day men come in and demand to know what ground is recorded. The records have not been entered up, the plans have not been made—how can you tell anything about them? The people expected that, even under these circumstances, the clerk would do everything, just as it is done in a registry office in the city of Ottawa. It is contrary to all reason, and it could not be done. The Gold Commissioner did not have sufficient accommodation in his office. But that was not his fault, nor was it my fault. I have pointed out to the House that there was no reason to suppose that this enormous rush of people would go to Dawson in the spring. We were not providing for that; we were providing for registration in other places where we thought the people were going. And the Gold Commissioner, living in Dawson City, in the winter of 1897, had no notion of what was going to happen when the water opened in the spring. He did not know until a very short time before the rush came, when some people got in over the ice and warned him. He immediately let a contract for a new building for his office. But you cannot get a new building in Dawson City all in a minute; it was a slow matter. The building was not finished until Major Walsh got there. In the meantime they were having a dreadful time with the accommodation they had. They were trying to meet the requirements of these twenty or thirty thousand people that had come in there, some thousands of whom were recording claims, or attempting to record claims, all at the same time.

Now, I want to call attention to another thing, because I think the House is entitled to know why it is these things have happened. And I must say it passes my comprehension why men ordinarily sensible and reasonable should expect that under the circumstances that existed in Dawson for two or three months—circumstances never equalled in Canada before—everything would be done exactly as it would have been done in one of the departments in the city of Ottawa. But it seems to be held by some of our newspaper critics, and even by some hon. gentlemen in the House of Commons, that this is what ought to have been done. I wish to call attention to the fact that in British Columbia the men who stake out claims are prospectors, men who, almost without exception, are in the habit of prospecting, and I think hon. members of British Columbia will bear me out when I say that in that province a miner's stake is considered sacred, that it is a thing almost unknown for a miner's stake to be pulled up or defaced or destroyed, or for a man to come along and stake the ground that has already been staked. Why? Because the miner understands the miners' laws, and knows perfectly well that no man has any security unless he respects the rights of others. And they practically never have any difficulty in the mining offices in British Columbia. But what happened in Dawson City. We had thousands of people to whom nothing was sacred. I will lay on the Table of the House a report of proceedings which will show that one man deliberately staked ground over another man's stakes. He walked along, put down his stakes and marked his claim when stakes were there already. Then he went back to the office at Dawson City, swore that the ground was vacant, that the land was unrecorded, and got a certificate for it, though it had been staked out by another man who had also got a certificate for it.

It is beyond the possibility of dispute that there were men in Dawson City who constantly went out and staked over land that had been staked before, came in, applied to have the claims recorded, and made affidavit that the land was unrecorded. Men have gone out where claims were staked, clipped the names off the stakes, and put their own names on instead. Now, I want to ask any sensible man how any Gold Commissioner living could have kept his records right, could have got correct information and recorded every man's claim as he applied to have it recorded, under such a condition of circumstances as that. It could not be done. In justification to Mr. Fawcett—an honest man, as I believe him—I believe him to be honest upon his long record of faithful public service in this country. I believe him to be honest until he is proved to be dishonest. I will give him that amount of fair play—I think it is fair to say of him that he laboured under a most unparalleled set of circumstances, that no man ever had such frightful difficulties to cope with, and so little facilities of any kind to enable him to cope with them successfully. They were circumstances that could not be helped. I want to tell the House that there has been a story going which everybody here has read—it has gone the rounds of the press, it has been repeated in conversation, and it is something like this: That a man has gone into the Gold Commissioner's office to record his claim, that he has been told to come back next day, that he came back next day and found the claim recorded in the name of somebody else. That is given as evidence, as a proof, mind you, of the fact that the official has given it illicitly, improperly and dishonestly to somebody else. Now, I say that does not prove anything of the kind. There is not a lawyer living who has the least conception of the value of evidence, who would even suggest that under the conditions that existed there, there was even an implication of anything wrong. Why, Sir, think of the rush that was going on; I wonder that they were able to record anybody's claim immediately upon application; because when a man came in while that rush was going on, it was necessary for the clerk to satisfy himself, before he recorded the claim and gave a certificate, that that claim had not been recorded to anybody else. In a great many cases search had to be made, when the business was going on very fast, the records would naturally not be entered up, and these would have to be entered up, and unless the clerk was perfectly familiar with that particular piece of ground, he would have to scale out the creek, see the amount of ground that was there, and the number of claims that had been recorded, before he gave a certificate. In many cases he would find the record had been given to somebody else, in many cases he would find that the ground did not permit of as many claims as people were applying to be recorded. The result was, no doubt, that men came in and applied to have claims recorded, it could not be done on that day, and they were told to come back the next day, and when they came back and found they had been recorded in somebody else's name, they concluded that there had been illicit and improper dealings in the Commissioner's office, but there is no evidence of that. Now, if a man thought that his claim had been illicitly given to somebody else, his remedy was simple: He had merely to go to the Gold Commissioner and enter a protest. That has been done in plenty of cases. I have tried an appeal myself—I remember at least one case of that kind. All the person aggrieved had to do was to enter a protest, and if it was a simple case, Mr. Fawcett tried it himself; if it was a complicated case, he would call in Judge Maguire. Judge Maguire took the evidence and heard the case, heard the lawyers on both sides, certified his opinion to Mr. Fawcett, and Mr. Fawcett decided in accordance with the opinion of the Judge. When you come to examine these things, these allegations, when you look at them in the light of ordinary business, there is no evidence whatever of any impropriety or crookedness in anything that has occurred.

Mr. SIFTON.

Mr. Speaker, I lived in Manitoba during what was known as the land boom. We had a fine brick post office, with a postmaster and a trained set of officials, a great array of lock boxes and every modern convenience that can be suggested. We had a land registry office specially built for the purpose, a competent registrar, a first-class set of clerks, and books with a proper system of book-keeping in which every letter had been entered up long before the rush took place. There was no survey to be done, no trouble about boundaries, but everything moved like clockwork. Well, in the city of Winnipeg, with a brick post office and a large staff of clerks, with every modern convenience, with telegraphic and express communication with Ottawa so that anything in the nature of additional help could have been had at any time, I have seen men stand twelve hours in line in front of the post office in the city of Winnipeg, in the middle of civilization, and I have seen a man give another man $10 to get his place in the line. I say further, that it was well known at that time in the city of Winnipeg that a man who did not want to stand in line could get his mail by paying a boy to let him in at the side door. I was a clerk in a law office at the time, and I know that was done. Yet did anybody ever hear the Government of that day charged with corruption on that account?

Mr. MCGREGOR. That was in 1882, and I have seen it myself.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no doubt there are many in this House who stood in that line. Did anybody ever hear the Government of the Dominion of Canada charged with corruption on that account? The thing was too absurd. But when the thing happened in Dawson City, where there was no possibility of coping with the difficulty, the Government is charged with corruption. Now, is not that the height of absurdity? When I was a law student at Winnipeg, at the same time, I have waited for two weeks to get an abstract from the registry office.

Mr. MCGREGOR. So have I, often.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The registry was thoroughly equipped with everything that modern knowledge and skill could put in the hands of the registrar, but with everything that could possibly be done to facilitate business, I have had to wait two weeks for a single abstract. But at Dawson City these gentlemen thought that if they had to wait half an hour they were being outraged and somebody was defrauding them. Now, I am only putting this matter to the House as to men of common sense. When these things happened at Winnipeg, did anybody shout about the Government being corrupt? Not at all; everybody there knew the exceptional state of affairs, knew that the officers of the Government, the officers of the land registry office, the officers of the Dominion lands office, the officers in the post office, were all doing their best to keep up with their work, and no fault was found with them in any way, shape or form.

Mr. PRIOR. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? He has stated that he has known in Winnipeg men to give other men $10 for their places in the procession. Did he ever know any man to go in at a side door and give a Government official $10 to get his record in?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have known of a man giving a clerk $5 to go in at the side-door to get his mail. I did not accuse the Dominion Government of corruption on that account. I do not think the postmaster found it out at all; he did not know it.

There is another charge which has been made which I cannot fail to deal with. I have been told, and this is a serious charge, that, under my administration of the department, the law respecting the staking of claims by officials was changed, practically changed, and the hon. member for Pictou undertook to deliver to the House and to myself particularly, a lecture upon the spirit of the law and the spirit in which the law had been administered in former years. He read a clause of the Dominion Lands Act to show what the law was in that respect in regard to the Dominion lands, and he explained the honourable position of the Department of the Interior and the spirit in which the law had been administered by the late Government for years past. I do not object to being lectured once in a while—I do not object to being lectured even by a man who does not know, perhaps, as much about the subject as I do—but when the hon. member for Pictou undertakes to tell me how the public domain in the west has been administered, the only conclusion is, that the hon. gentleman has been asleep for the last eighteen years. Does he mean to tell me that the officials of the late Government have not dealt in that domain for the last eighteen years, that they have not speculated in it? There is a prominent Dominion official in the town in which I lived, who took up a homestead, a valuable property, a few miles distant, and, upon a colourable performance of the duties—there was no settlement, and he was not a farmer—he got his patent under the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I will send the name over to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will bring down the papers on file in my department, if they will move for them; but after they have read them, they will wish they had not moved for them. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say, that the spirit of the law, as they administered it, was that the men making the law, and the men administering the law, should not traffic in the public property? Does the hon. gentleman forget the grants of public land, of public property, that for years were made to the friends and intimates of the Government notoriously? Does the hon. member for Pictou forget that the name of his own brother, Mr. Stuart Tupper, that the name of Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, the son of the late Sir John Macdonald, appeared in connection with these transactions? Does the hon. gentleman forget the grant of lands made in the Prince Albert district, the result of which was the driving of those settlers into rebellion? I think he must have been asleep for the last eighteen years, if he does not know how the public property of this country has been administered, and, if he wants to know how it has been administered, I will give him the statement of one of his own political friends. This gentleman says:

Why should I be singled out for public censure,—

This is Mr. John Charles Rykert.

—when there are dozens of members in the same House who not only have applied for and obtained limits for themselves, but sit there daily voting money into their own pockets, I cannot understand.

That is the spirit of the law, as administered by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now I will get down to particulars to show you what the practice was. I sent to the Yukon the mining regulations of hon. gentlemen opposite. So far as the staking of claims by officials was concerned, there was no change whatever made by me in the regulations, in the letter, or spirit, or practice of these regulations. It has been dinged into the ears of the people of this country for the last six months, that such a thing as Government officials staking a mining claim was never heard of until my batch of Grit officials got to Dawson City. Let us see; records are sometimes inconvenient things. My batch of Grit officials got to Dawson City in February, 1898. Who was the first Government official who staked a claim in the Yukon district? Would hon. gentlemen opposite like to know? I will tell them. The man who first staked a mining claim, as a Government official, was Captain Charles Constantine, the mining recorder appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it was done in January, 1896, six months before this Government took office. It was done under the law, and regulations, and practice which were inaugurated by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Can they understand that? Mr. Constantine was an officer under the late Government. He was acting in pursuance of the instructions he got, and he was within the law, and he was within his rights. The Government had no right to say that he was wrong, because he had never been told not to do it. He staked two claims in January, 1898, and he was the mining recorder himself at that time. I do not think hon. gentlemen can find that Thomas Fawcett or Mr. Senkler, the Gold Commissioner, ever recorded any claims in their own names. More than that, Mr.

Speaker, Captain Constantine recorded something like twenty-two claims in the name of other men in the employ of the Government. The practice of recording mining claims by men in the employ of the Government was in full swing, unchecked and unnoted, before this Government came into office. Mr. Wade, one of the officials whom I sent up there, came to me, when I was standing on the quarter-deck of the "Quadra," on the way to Skagway, and said to me: "I do not think it is likely that I will have any time to stake claims; but if I should desire to do so, is there anything in the law to prevent me doing it?" I thought for a minute, and then said: "You are not an officer connected with the administration of the mining law in any way; you have nothing to do with the registration of mining claims in any way, shape or form, directly or indirectly, and I do not see anything that will prevent you staking claims." This is the only conversation I ever had with Mr. Wade on the subject, and I never had any other conversation with any other officer on the subject at all, and never gave any instructions. When I was speaking, I was speaking upon the regulations. Last winter we had down here from Dawson City, Dr. Wills, surgeon, of the Mounted Police, a political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite. When he was here, the fact was circulated that Dr. Wills had staked claims in the Yukon district. It was a matter of common talk, and it was referred to in the newspapers, but we heard no howl from the Conservative press of this country about the iniquity of Government officials staking claims, not a syllable. There was no harm in it until Mr. Wade, a Liberal official, staked a claim. That is when the enormity arose. I do not stand here to say that it is desirable that Government officials should stake claims; I put my name to a recommendation to Council to say they shall not. I have done that as the result of experience; I am not like the hon. gentleman, I am not too proud to learn by experience. And, Sir, if I am in fault in any way whatever, and if my colleagues are in fault in any way whatever, it is not for deteriorating the public service of this country, but it is for not having foresight enough to remedy the evil which was done by gentlemen on the other side of the House. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has made the charge—the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) vigorously seconding him—that we did nothing in Dawson City for sanitation, that we did nothing to help anybody. Now, I am going to give the hon. gentleman something to look up and I will give him a week to look it up. I want him to find for me and to cite it in this House, a case in the North-west Territories, where there had been no time for the establishment of a local administration, of any town where the Federal Government ever did anything for sanitation. I want him to cite me just one such case if he can. We

I have been opening up new places in Canada for a great many years, and I want him to find just one place where, before the organization of a local governing body, the Federal Government has done anything for sanitation. I will give these hon. gentlemen opposite an illustration of what happened in the town I lived in where the very same thing happened—only the conditions were not nearly so aggravated—as in Dawson. When the town of Brandon was opened up, four thousand or five thousand people suddenly planted themselves on the side of a hill; the ladies stayed in the house and the men walked around in top boots, up to their knees in mud for a considerable length of time. We did not growl about the neglect of the Government; we did not want the Federal Government to put down sidewalks and take sanitary measures, but we met and formed a town committee and with our own money put down sidewalks for ourselves. That is what every place has done under the same circumstances. I would like the hon. gentlemen to hunt up a case where anything else has been done, except in the case of this very Dawson City. Here are the amounts which have been spent, according to our last returns, for assistance of various kinds at Dawson:

|--|---------|
| Paid for work on Bonanza Creek trail.. | $4,000 |
| Donation to hospital .....             | 5,000   |
| Fire engine, Dawson.....               | 2,500   |

Did the hon. gentlemen opposite ever buy a fire engine for any town in the North-west Territories? If they did I would like them to cite the case.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| Donation to the hospital .....  | $2,500 |
| Other donation to hospital.....   | 1,000   |
| do do .....   | 1,000   |
| do do .....   | 2,000   |
| Donation to an individual to enable him to leave the Yukon owing to illness.... | 420     |
| Work on the Bonanza trail.....  | 200     |
| Another hospital grant.....   | 2,000   |
| do do .....   | 2,000   |
| Repairing roads and bridges, Bonanza Creek .....                                | 80      |
| Contribution to the fire brigade.....   | 1,000   |
| Hospital at Grand Forks.....  | 850     |
| Another hospital donation.....  | 183     |
| Treatment of indigent patients.....   | 345     |

When did these hon. gentlemen opposite pay for medical treatment in the North-west Territories?

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| Another advance to an hospital .....  | $3,000 |
| Small amount for relief .....   | 18      |
| Small amount for work in connection with the fire.....                      | 18      |
| Voted by the Council to fit up part of the buildings for an almshouse ..... | 2,000   |
| Another hospital grant.....   | 527     |
| Treatment of indigent patients.....   | 155     |
| Another grant to hospital.....  | 440     |
| Indigent patients .....   | 375     |
| do .....  | 5,000   |
| Care of indigent persons.....   | 940     |
| do do .....   | 50      |
| do do .....   | 7,000   |

Altogether, for relief, for works practically of charity and local help, there has been spent up to the present time, no less a sum than $44,183. Let the hon. gentlemen look up their records and show me where they ever made the faintest pretense of doing anything of the kind, and then it will be time for them to come here and talk to us about neglect. I have no record of the exact amount of relief that was given by the Mounted Police, but the Mounted Police upon the trail practically fed every one who came along and who had not food. That has been apparently a necessity of the situation and I have not felt like giving orders to the contrary. But at the present time I intend, when the spring opens, to give orders that hereafter people will have to feed themselves, and the police will stop giving out provisions, as there is no excuse for people being there, after the first month of spring without being in a condition to take care of themselves; except, of course, in the ordinary case of persons who are destitute. Up to the present time, people have made it a business—and there seems to have been nothing to prevent it—of preying upon the police for supplies, and so in addition to the amounts I have read the police have given a very large amount for relief. I beg to say further, that according to the estimates of Mr. Ogilvie which have been provided for by his council, similar assistance for local improvements and relief for the six months from the 1st of January, 1899, to the 30th June, 1899, will be no less a sum than $83,563, most of which will be provided for out of local revenue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who are the people that we are treating medically, who are the people that we are feeding? Who are the people that we are housing? Are they Canadians; are they our own citizens? Not a bit of it; nine out of ten of them are foreigners,—men who went there when we advised them not to go. I issued an emphatic warning last fall; I pointed out what would be the result of a great many of these people going there. And the Secretary of the Interior of the United States did the same thing. But they went there notwithstanding; every man thinks, of course, that whoever else gets killed or whoever else gets into trouble he will come back all right. However, the people went in and they are there. There are hundreds, I was almost going to say thousands of men who have spent all they had in that country, and who are not able to take care of themselves. We have been feeding and caring for and furnishing hospital accommodation for these men, foreigners who simply went in there because they wanted to carry away Canadian gold, and having no regard for us and having no regard for our institutions. I will venture to say that there has never been a district opened up on this continent where as much has been done by the Government for the people as has been done for the people in the Yukon district by the Federal Government of Canada. We fed these people when they had nothing to eat. We sent police out to hunt for them when they were lost. We did everything for them, except to find for each one a good paying claim, and four-fifths of this row is because we did not do that. Now, I must apologize for speaking so long.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. This explanation has only got to be given once, and it might as well be given first as last while we are at it. The officers of the district have been attacked on account of what is known as the water front transaction. I will give the House the particulars of it. Mr. Wade, after going to Dawson, consulted with Mr. Fawcett, and they came to the conclusion, according to the statement given to me, that the occupation of a certain piece of the water front was inadvisable, for sanitary reasons. The people were camped along on a narrow strip of the water front; and the House will understand, without further explanation, that that was not a desirable state of things. Mr. Wade and Mr. Fawcett called for tenders for a lease of this water front upon certain conditions. There were no newspapers at the time, but they sent out word to the leading men of the town, inviting them to tender. They received the following tenders: W. Burk, yearly rental of $3,000, payable quarterly; M. L. D. Keizer, offered an annual rental of $120 for each 25 feet, and on the same date made an offer of $7,500 yearly; Drunsmore, Spencer & McPhee offered a rental of $25,000 a year, payable monthly, in advance; John Cameron offered a monthly rental of $2,050; Morrison & McDonald offered a rent of $30,000 per annum. Morrison & McDonald's tender being the highest, the land was leased to them. The lease was for one year, with power to the Government or its officer to terminate it on one month's notice. The streets were all permitted to extend through the water front to the river. These are the particulars of that transaction. I do not see anything on the face of the transaction that is improper. It has been intimated to the House that the men who leased this property immediately turned round and leased portions of it for very much larger sums. That is one ground of attack on Mr. Wade and Mr. Fawcett. Another ground is that the men who were on the land ought to have been permitted to have kept it for nothing. So you may pay your money and take your choice. One ground is, that they did not get enough rent for the land; the other is, that the people who were on it ought to have been permitted to occupy it without paying any rent. If they did not get enough rent, that was not their fault, because they called for tenders, and gave the lease to the highest tenderer. When Major Walsh went to the Yukon, he confirmed the transaction. I have no knowledge of anything incorrect or improper about it. There is nothing on the face of it to indicate any impropriety. On the contrary, there is everything on the face of it to indicate that it was eminently proper, and what any reasonable man would do under the circumstances to get some revenue for the Government, and to have this piece of ground placed in the hands of tenants who would keep it in proper order. I have letters here, which I will read at a later date, showing the terms of the lease, and they show that sidewalks were to be erected on the ground and proper sanitary precautions taken. Mr. Wade, I may say, emphatically and positively denies that there was the least shadow of impropriety in any shape or form about the transaction, and he challenges anybody to call him before Mr. Ogilvie and have investigated any charge that may be made against him in connection with it. In one of the statements which was read by the hon. member for Pictou, it was stated that Judge Maguire had an interest in this transaction. Of Judge Maguire I will speak at a later date; but, in the meantime, I may state that after the hon. gentleman had made his speech I telegraphed to Judge Maguire in regard to the matter, and I have his answer, as follows:

West Prince Albert, April 1.

I have never had any interest whatever, directly or indirectly, in water front lease at Dawson.

THOS. H. MAGUIRE.

The House will note, Mr. Speaker, that the lease contained a provision that it should be terminable at one month's notice; and if the officers saw, after the lease had been granted, that what was alleged was actually taking place, that the tenants were getting $120,000 a year, and were only paying $30,000, they could cancel the lease at a month's notice, and they would have promptly done so. The lease came into force on the 9th of April. Mr. Ogilvie arrived back at Dawson, I think, in the latter part of September; and if Mr. Ogilvie, on the ground, thought the lease was not in the public interest, he had the power to cancel it at a month's notice; but up to the present time, he has not advised me that he has cancelled it. So my impression is that Mr. Ogilvie has come to the conclusion that the lease was in the public interest. As to the policy of the matter, whether the lease was advisable or not, no one in this House can tell. I cannot tell, nor can any of my colleagues tell. Only those on the ground can tell.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will put the lease of this water front on the Table of the House?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will it answer the hon. gentleman's purpose if I do so to-morrow when the House meets?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, it would not quite as well.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will do so when I cease speaking to-night. The papers are all here.

Mr. SIFTON.

Now if the House will permit me, I am going to examine a few of the statements made by the hon. member for Pictou's witnesses. First, Major Caddell said: That three men had staked claims, and applied to record them, and were told to come back in two or three days, and when they did go back they found that the claims had been recorded by somebody else. I have already stated that in my judgment that does not afford the slightest evidence that there was any crookedness in connection with the matter. They could readily have gone to the Gold Commissioner and entered a protest, and had their protest tried like anybody else.

Dr. Leblanc is cited as another witness by the hon. member for Pictou. I presume the hon. member is quoting from an interview with Dr. Leblanc, which appeared in a Montreal paper. He stated that he had staked a claim on Bonanza Creek and lost it because he did not stand in with the officials. After Dr. Leblanc came back from the Yukon, he came to my private secretary's office, and sent word by my private secretary to me, not that he wished to see me, but to know if I wanted to see him. I asked my private secretary if he had any business with me, and he told me that Dr. Leblanc said he had no business with me, but wanted to know if I wanted to see him. I instructed my private secretary that if he had no business with me, I did not want to see him. He did not enter any complaint or suggest any complaint; and I desire to know what weight the members of this House attach to a statement of a man who, when he comes back from the Yukon district, says he staked a valuable claim on Bonanza Creek, and lost it because he did not stand in with the officials, and then comes to the office of the Minister who has the power to right the wrong, if there was a wrong, and does not take the trouble to say that there was a wrong, or to lodge a complaint of any sort.

Would any body pay any attention to a statement of that kind. If he lost a claim, why did he not say so? They must be a very extraordinary lot of people who have gone to the Yukon district. I have lived in the west a great many years, and out there, if any body undertook to defraud any one of his property, the one defrauded would very soon make a complaint; and if any man undertakes to defraud another of a homestead in the North-west Territories, what is the result. You will find a pile of papers that high, you will find that officer after officer, clerk after clerk, commissioner after commissioner, Minister after Minister has to invest that homestead matter. That is the history of the Department of the Interior. But here we are told that we should believe the evidence of a man who coolly goes to a newspaper office and says he was beaten out of a valuable claim by the officials and who never stated in the Minister's office that he had lost his claim or made any complaint whatever. Mr. Leblanc said that Mrs. Dubois lost a claim by another person taking it up while she was waiting for a survey, and that one J. S. Murdock got it registered. So far as that is concerned, if that be the case, all that Mrs. Dubois has to do is to walk into Mr. Ogilvie's office and prove those facts and she will get her claim at once. And I have to say that Mrs. Dubois and the rest of the public in Dawson City have been notified to do that very thing, and if she has not done it, it is her own fault, not mine or the fault of the Government. Mr. Ogilvie was sent his commission, and here is a copy of the notice which he issued :

PUBLIC NOTICE.

To All Whom it may Concern :

By Letters Patent under the Great Seal of Canada I have been appointed Her Majesty's Commissioner to investigate and inquire into certain matters and things in such letters patent referred to. The scope of the investigation will appear from the preamble as follows :—

Whereas it appears from a report from Our Minister of the Interior of Canada that he had under consideration a communication dated at Dawson, Yukon Territory, 25th August, 1898, addressed to the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada, signed by G. T. C. Armstrong, as chairman, Percy McDougall, secretary, and a number of other persons professing to have been duly appointed a miners' committee at a mass meeting of the miners of the Yukon Territory, in which communication it is alleged that many of the Government officials have forfeited their claim to the people's confidence and respect by their conduct and action in certain matters. Our said Minister further observes that the committee alleges that the Gold Commissioner's office is practically closed, and has been for a considerable time to the miners who had not the means and desire to bribe the clerks in order to obtain knowledge of the record which ought to be public. It is further charged that wholesale information with regard to unrecorded ground is conveyed to certain individuals outside the office who obtain men to stake and record the ground in consideration of an interest in the same. Our Minister further stated that it is charged that dissatisfaction has arisen with respect to decisions in claim contests, particularly owing to the Crown prosecutor, who, while retained as advocate by one of the contestants, was giving legal advice to the Gold Commissioner. The Dominion Lands agent is openly charged with serious breaches of trust and malfeasance in office, and some of the officials connected with the recorder's office are alleged to be incompetent. Our said Minister further submits that it is stated in the communication that hardships have been caused to many of the claim owners owing to the want of experience of the mining inspectors. The committee further represents that the Crown timber agent has granted such concessions and laid down such stringent regulations that only a few parties have the privilege of supplying cord-wood this coming winter.

I may say, and the House will be surprised to learn, that the complaint about the cord-wood was made because Major Walsh issued an order forbidding the granting of any concessions within six miles of Dawson, and this he did in order that the people in Dawson would have all the timber within six miles of it for their supply. The order was made for their own benefit :

On account of this and other reasons set forth in the communication referred to, a copy of which is hereto attached, the committee ask for the appointment of a commission of inquiry.

And whereas we deem it expedient that inquiry under oath should be made with respect to the truth or untruth of the foregoing charges, statements and complaints.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 6th day of February, 1899, at the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon, I will sit in the Court House in Dawson, for the purpose of fixing a time within which charges coming within the scope of the letters patent are to be laid before me, and let all persons desirous of prosecuting any such charges then appear and they shall be heard either in person or by counsel, as they may prefer.

After the expiration of the time to be fixed for laying charges before me I shall proceed to fix a time and place for the investigation of such charges, of which time and place due and public notice will be given.

Dated at Dawson this 25th day of January, A.D. 1899.

WM. OGILVIE,
Commissioner.

If Mrs. Dubois has lost her claim, as Dr. Leblanc says she has, all she has to do is to walk in to Mr. Ogilvie's court and make her statement, and she will get her claim if she can prove the facts to be true. I do not see that any further action can be required of the Government.

Now, I want to take up another statement made by the hon. member for Pictou, and which I think affected the House in a certain way more than any other statement he made. Upon page 796 of "Hansard," the hon. gentleman quoted from a gentleman whose name, like most of those whom he quoted, was not given, and what I propose to do is this : I propose to take up the allegations of the corrupt acts, where I have any positive means of getting at the truth of them myself from the records in the office, and show the House the reliability of these statements. The first statement I find I have any means of checking at all—the means are not absolute, but I place them before the House as they are—is this with regard to the water front, made by this anonymous witness :

It was well understood in Dawson that Mr. Wade and Major Walsh (and it was said Judge Maguire) held a half interest in this lease.

I shall read Major Walsh's denial before I get through ; I have already read Judge Maguire's denial. Mr. Wade has denied it positively and emphatically, publicly and otherwise, and has gone back to Dawson City to appear before the Commissioner, after handing in his resignation down here. But here is the gem, I was going to say, but it is not—the gem is to come later. This gentleman says :

These claims—

EDITION.

—Referring to the claims upon Dominion Creek—

—were sent out—

The House will note the language this gentleman used and which was quoted by the hon. member for Pictou :

—were sent out by the Gold Commissioner to be sold in Ottawa, supposedly at private auction, and Wade himself said, to my knowledge, that he proposed to get hold of all the unrecorded claims upon Dominion Creek. If the Government proceeded to do what they had no right to do, to deny these prospectors the right of recording their claims, they should have put the claims up at public auction, first at Dawson, so as to allow the men who had developed and improved them a chance to purchase the same, and not send them to Ottawa, where they could be disposed of at private sale to a syndicate working in the interest of Walsh at a nominal figure, which—

Says this veracious gentleman—

—I presume, has been done by this time. Certain it is that none of these claims have been sold in Dawson, where, according to law, if any public sale takes place, they should have been sold.

Now, so far as the rights of prospectors are concerned, the rule I have made, upon the information that has come to me, is this : That any man who is shown to have staked a claim upon Dominion Creek before the order was made closing the creek, will get his claim ; and if, through any cause, two men came into contest for the same claim, then the man who has staked a claim will get one of the reserve claims or one of the fractions. If he has not staked a claim before the order was made closing the creek, he will not get a claim. The order was made by Major Walsh to reserve certain claims and fractions, in pursuance of the policy of the Government, and in accordance with the regulations. So, Major Walsh, instead of doing what was stated here, either sent to me, or brought with him—I think he brought it down—the record of the claims and fractions upon Dominion Creek ; and they were brought here for the purpose of being recorded as Government property, that they might be sold, not for the benefit of Walsh or Wood, but for the benefit of the public exchequer. Mr. Speaker, you can form some idea of what the evidence of a witness is worth, when he makes a statement such as I have read. If a man went into the witness-box and deliberately made statements that he presumed a rascally transaction had been carried out, without the least knowledge as to whether it had been or not—impugning the character of a man without the slightest evidence, what possible importance could be attached to his statements ? Now, I will close this by reading the departmental letter, which shows what was actually done. Major Walsh came back and made his report. In that report, as printed, it will be found that he referred to what was done on Dominion Creek. On the 5th October, 1898, I wrote the following letter to Mr. Ogilvie :—

Mr. SIFTON.

Ottawa, 5th October, 1898.

Dear Mr. Ogilvie,—

I have spent to-day in consultation with Major Walsh, your predecessor in office, and have gone carefully into the Dominion Creek matter. I am writing you now for the purpose of saying that so far as I can judge I fully approve of his action in reserving the fractions and other claims which have been reserved upon Dominion Creek. These fractions and claims so reserved have been held in lieu of the alternate claims which should have been reserved to the Government, but were not so reserved, owing to difficulties in recording. The claims and fractions reserved will be held for disposal by the Government in such manner as may be deemed advisable. My present idea in regard to the disposal of these claims is, that inasmuch as they are said to be extremely valuable, they should be advertised in London, New York, different cities in Canada, and in Dawson City, and that they should be sold by public tender to be received and opened by yourself in Dawson City some time next spring. I shall be glad to have your views upon this question at your convenience.

For the purpose of checking over the list of the Dominion Creek claims, which Major Walsh brought down, I think it will be desirable for you to send down a plan and certified list of all claims. Major Walsh expressed a fear that there might possibly be a mistake in the papers he brought down.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) CLIFFORD SIFTON

The House will judge. I have given the facts. The statement of the hon. member for Pictou's witness is, that claims were sent down here that they might be boodled in by Major Walsh.

Then, Mr. Speaker, this same veracious witness goes on to make a statement about a woman named Nellie Cashman, and another named Belle Mulrooney. It appears that Miss Cashman had difficulty in getting a claim recorded, and it is alleged that she made some improper arrangement, and that Captain Norwood, an officer of the Government, was a party to it. And a similar statement, not exactly the same, but an allegation of impropriety, is made in connection with the claim of one Talmadge. These two statements are made by the same anonymous witness as the one making the statement which I have just shown to be untrue. I have no means of knowing whether the statements to which I now refer are true or not. But I have this to say : That if the hon. member for Pictou wanted an investigation, all he had to do was to send the letter to Mr. Ogilvie, and we would have had a report showing whether the charge was true or not. I have to say, further, that Captain Norwood is there, so that, as far as he is concerned, the matter can be investigated. Moreover, in view of the statements made about other people by this same anonymous witness, I should not think that there is much probability that it will be found that there is very much in this statement of his. At the same time, I do not say that it is not true. I have no means of knowing. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have what I call the gem of the testimony which the hon. gentleman has offered before this House. Although it is in some respects objectionable, I presume to read it. He goes on to speak of a dispute in regard to a claim between a man named Donnelley, and a man named Nelson, who had for a partner a woman named Lucile Elliott. He gives the particulars of this, which hon. members can read, and then he goes on to say :

They had no other proof to bring, and rested their point. Judge Maguire stated that unless Lucile and Andy could bring positive proof of the staking of the claim, he would advise Mr. Fawcett to non-suit the case—that is to say, dismiss it for want of any proof on behalf of the plaintiff. The case was then adjourned for one week. That night, about 11 o'clock, Lucile Elliott came up to Major Walsh's tent; he had retired; she remained until morning and was sent up the river about 8 o'clock in Major Walsh's canoe, accompanied by his private secretary, and rowed by the Government policemen. Lucile Elliott continued her nightly visits to Major Walsh during the continuance of the trial, which, it is needless to state, was decided in Lucile's favour. Major Walsh, at the time of his notorious liason with Lucile, was the Commissioner of the Yukon, with full powers to remove Mr. Fawcett, and to reverse his decisions and acts. And after the case was decided, Donnelley was notified indirectly that if he would not appeal the case he (Major Walsh) would see that he received a grant for a claim down on Lower Dominion Creek.

So, the statement is, that Major Walsh, as commissioner, had power to reverse the decision of Mr. Fawcett, that Major Walsh influenced Fawcett to give an unrighteous decision in favour of this woman, and that this woman, by her improper relations—that is the plain implication—with Major Walsh, induced Major Walsh to exercise that power. Mr. Speaker, the witness seems to forget that, in the first paragraph, he says the case was tried by Judge Maguire. So, the allegation, when it is sifted, is, that the woman influenced Major Walsh, and that Major Walsh influenced Judge Maguire to give an unrighteous decision in favour of this claim. Now, Judge Maguire would not have been any the worse man, if he had been appointed by this Government. But he was not appointed by this Government, but by the late Government. And I differ from the hon. member for Pictou in regard to the character of Judge Maguire. I think he is a most estimable man, a man of high character. I appeal to this House, I appeal to the members from the North-west Territories, to say the estimation in which Judge Maguire is held in the North-west Territories, and as a judge of the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories. He sits there now, and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, if it is in accordance with the proper practice of this Parliament that a statement of that kind about a Superior Court judge should be read in this House unless the man who reads it is prepared to back it up. What are the facts? To-morrow at three o'clock I will lay the papers in this case upon the Table of this House. The facts are these: There were two certificates issued by Mr. Fawcett for the same ground. Dominion Creek was staked from what they called Lower Discovery, and also from Upper Discovery. The parties came in and applied for certificates; one was granted upon a claim staked one way, and another granted on the same claim staked the other way. The result was that they overlapped. The ground between the two discoveries had been exhausted, they overlapped, and there were two certificates granted for this particular claim. A protest was entered, the matter came before Mr. Fawcett for decision. Mr. Fawcett said it was a complicated case, and he called in Judge Maguire. The case was tried before Judge Maguire in due form of law. He heard the evidence and heard counsel on both sides. Apparently there was no official ring, because Mr. Wade was on the opposite side from this woman, he was for Mr. Donnelley in this case, and he argued it as well as he could. Judge Maguire gave a long and exhaustive written judgment in favour of this woman and her partner. Mr. Fawcett decided the case upon Judge Maguire's judgment, and signed it as Gold Commissioner. They appealed the case. Mr. Donnelley, apparently was in a position to fight for his rights. The case was appealed to me at Ottawa. Mr. Samuel H. Blake was retained to argue the case for Donnelley, and to see that he was not defrauded of his rights. I saw it was an important case, it was the first appeal coming before me, and as there were precedents to be made, and rules to be laid down as to what kind of evidence should be admitted, I called in the Minister of Justice, Hon. David Mills, and the Secretary of State, Hon. Mr. Scott, two lawyers of long experience, both as public men and as administrators. We heard the case in open court in the Railway Committee room upstairs, and the Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State and myself unanimously decided that Judge Maguire's judgment was right. I will lay the papers in this case upon the Table of the House to-morrow, and any hon. gentleman can read them for himself, and decide for himself. I say that no member of this House can conceive of a more outrageous accusation, a more outrageous proceeding than to read any such insinuation as that. Why did not the hon. gentleman write a note to me to ask if there was any ground for supposing that Judge Maguire had given an unrighteous decision? Surely that would not be much trouble for an ex-Minister of Justice, a man who knows his responsibility to Parliament and what is due a judge. Surely, before making such a charge against a judge, it would have been wise for the hon. gentleman to send a clerk to the department to look up the papers, to see what the record was, to know something about it, at least, before making such a statement in the House. But nothing of that kind was done, and he reads an anonymous statement from a man, which bears upon its face, in the mind of any lawyer accustomed to read and analyse statements of facts, the plainest evidence of utter carelessness and recklessness, because any one knowing anything about departmental business would know that the man making that statement could not have known anything about the truth of what he was alleging. Yet the member for Pictou makes that statement without the least analysis or inquiry, and places it before this House, to stand upon "Hansard" against Judge Maguire to the last day of his life. Who can say that the man who reads that statement upon "Hansard" ten years from now, will read my reply at the same time? When you put such an allegation as that upon the "Hansard" of the House of Commons attacking a man's character, you are doing a very serious thing. Then there is another thing.

We are charged with outrageously underpaying our officials, that we sent a lot of men up there and gave them starvation pay, and consequently we could not expect them to be honest. Well, Sir, here is the list, and here are the salaries. I think the salaries are good. Mr. Ogilvie, the Commissioner, gets $5,000. When he was employed by the late Government, he got $1,800. W. H. P. Clement, legal adviser, gets $2,500; Mr. Bliss, clerk of the Commissioner's staff, gets $900, and his salary increases to $1,200. Another clerk has $900, another clerk $1,200. Mr. Senkler, Gold Commissioner, gets $4,000, the salary of a judge in the Court of Queen's Bench for Ontario. Then there are a number of clerks whose salaries run from $900 to $1,200. The registrar gets $2,000; the abstract clerk gets $1,200; the controller, Mr. Lithgow, gets $1,500; I think he only got $1,000 or $1,100 formerly. Mr. Snell, a clerk in the controller's office, gets $1,200. The head land agent gets $1,800, another clerk in his office gets $1,500; timber inspector, $1,200; three clerks in Crown Timber office, $900 each. The cook gets $1,200, and the assistant cook, $720. Now, be it known that the Government furnishes for these men both quarters and provisions. The most of these men were never as well off in their lives before, financially, as they are now. I do not find fault with that; I think they ought to be better off than they were before, because most of them are living away from their families, and endure considerable hardship and privation. We have made them a little better off than they were in the respective positions from which they came. There is no ground whatever for the suggestion that our officials are underpaid. Now I will prove that in this way. The officials there, the heads of the department, have hired a number of clerks in addition to the ones we sent up, and they are all getting about one-third less pay than the men we sent up; so that we are paying at least one-third more than that labour is worth in the open market in Dawson. I think that fact conclusively disposes of the charge that we underpay the officials. My hon. friend the member for Pictou said that we had treated Judge Maguire abominably, that he was dreadfully ill-used. The member for Pictou does not agree with the judge in that respect, because I have in my office a letter from Judge Maguire, thanking me and thanking the Government for the great kindness and consideration which had been shown to him during his period of service in the Yukon district.

Now, I am going to take up another witness of my hon. friend the member for Pictou. It is tedious, but we will go through the whole of them and see what their evidence is worth. I have gone through his statement and I find something specific, something that we can get hold of, something that we can check, and see what his evidence is worth. This is one of the anonymous statements, and, Mr. Speaker, mark this, because one has to follow it closely in order to get at the gravamen of the charge. This man, speaking of the lease of the water front, says:

According to the terms of this lease, the lessees did not have to pay rent to the Government for any of the water front until the same was occupied by their lessees, thus incurring no responsibility whatever.

Of course, if an officer of the Government had made a lease of that kind he would either be a fool or a knave; there is no doubt about that. There could not be the least question about that; he would be either a fool or a knave, because to put himself under contract to somebody else, without payment being provided for until the rent is collected, would not be a business transaction, and he would be either a fool or knave. Perhaps that language is too strong, but it would not be a business-like transaction. But, Mr. Speaker, there is not a word of truth in it. The papers are here; I will lay them on the Table of the House, and the lease is there. The lease is by letter, and there is not a solitary word of truth in the statement. I cannot take all the statements that these men make; of course there are many that are mere flourishes, mere diatribes—"Mail and Empire" editorials and Ottawa "Citizen" editorials; but here and there we come across a statement that we can get hold of. Of course, we cannot check them all; I have not the information, but I have the information to check some of them, and I am bound to say that in regard to any of them in which I have the papers I am in a position to show that they are untrue. This same unnamed gentleman who made that statement which was shown to be untrue, says that he is informed that Mr. Wade received $1,500 for giving somebody—he does not say whom—the exclusive privilege of maintaining a booth in the Klondike. He says that he was so informed. The man who makes this statement is the man who makes the statement that I have shown to be absolutely untrue. Of course we are unable to check his statement that he was informed by somebody else whose name was not given that Mr. Wade was bribed. But I would like to ask my hon. friend who is going to follow me, the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), what importance he would attach to evidence of that kind.

There is another witness, Mr. Woodworth. Mr. Woodworth writes a long letter; he does not deal in specific statements, there is nothing that one can get hold of definitely, but he is very violent in his abuse of me and generally of the policy of the Government. The hon. member for Pictou was not in a position to give any information as to who Mr. Woodworth was, and apparently he had not taken any trouble to inquire. He just brings in Mr. Woodworth's letter and reads it, apparently without making any inquiry as to whether this man was a reliable man or a man of character or repute. I think that when an hon. gentleman comes in and asks Parliament to act upon the statement of somebody, he ought to take some little pains to find out what kind of a man it is whom he cites as his authority. He has given us the statements of a lot of men whose names he has not mentioned, and he wants us to take their statements because he says he made inquiry and found them to be reliable. Now, we have a man here whose name is given, and I am going to give the result of the inquiry which I have made as to whether this man is reliable or not. I find one statement here, and I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this gentleman is a lawyer, and in speaking about a legal matter, he cannot be excused for not telling what is true. We will check up this gentleman; we will check up his reliability on a question of fact, and see what his evidence is worth. The acknowledged method of dealing with a witness is to take his statements one by one and see whether what he tells is true or not. We have not time to check up all this gentleman's statements one by one, but I have them here. Of course, he calls our officials inefficient, but this is a matter of opinion; it is not a question of fact. He says:

A Mr. Thiell—

The name is Snell; he is the clerk of the court, and Thiell is apparently a misprint.

—is clerk of the court, but, being without legal training, he is incompetent to take examinations, tax costs and do all that is required of a clerk of court.

There is a straight statement that a man who is clerk of the court is not efficient. Now, I have here an application from Mr. Snell, who is the same man, to Mr. Ogilvie, that he might be permanently appointed as clerk of the court, a position, according to Mr. Woodworth, he is not fit to fill, and which he is filling. This application to

Mr. Ogilvie has been forwarded to me, and it is accompanied by a copy sent by Mr. Ogilvie to me, of the following certificate:—

We, the undersigned members of the Bar of the Territorial Court of the Yukon Territory, beg to recommend Mr. W. H. Snell for the position of territorial clerk. Mr. Snell has filled this position most acceptably for some months past, and we most heartily and cordially endorse his application.

This is signed by a whole list of the members of the bar from Dawson City, amongst others. Mr. C. W. C. Tabor, a well-known Conservative gentleman, known, no doubt, to some men in the House; and signed amongst others—unfortunately for the member for Pictou—by Mr. Arthur G. Smith, late Deputy Attorney General of British Columbia, and now, I am informed, a partner of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Later on, we have a lengthy indictment of the whole administration of the district, and everything, from first to last, is outrageously wrong, according to this gentleman. The name is not given, but it is said by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that this gentleman writes what is called an official letter in a business way, and that is what is quoted as an abstract from this business letter. I will not bother the House by reading it, but I must say to this House, that if any man in this House will read that letter, he must conclude that the reason why this man wrote that letter was because he was dissatisfied with the royalty. That was the only reason why he wrote it; the letter proves that; it is the burden of his song throughout. This gentleman attacks viciously the administration. Will the House believe that this general diatribe against the administration, in which Major Walsh is denounced as a fraud, was written on the 14th of June, only twenty-three days after Major Walsh got to Dawson City? Of what value can that be as a criticism of the administration of Major Walsh?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do I understand the hon. Minister to say, that Mr. Woodworth's letter was dated in June?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Not Mr. Woodworth's letter; I got through with that. I was speaking of the letter which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) will see quoted in the speech as having been written by a gentleman on official business; the name is not given.

Mr. Borden (Halifax). What page of "Hansard"?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The hon. gentleman will find the date given by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) as the 14th of June, at page 824 of the "Hansard." As I said, that is twenty-three days after Major Walsh got in. He would hardly have had time to recover from the fatigues of his journey and look around the town and see what was going on. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have got through the list of witnesses, if they can be called such, that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has presented to this House. I have not been able to check all the statements that he made, but it will be noticed that one witness repeats much the same thing, as did another in regard to certain things. Then, there are general paragraphs of denunciation, which we cannot check, and which we have no means of finding out anything about, as they are mere statements of opinion. I have gone through these statements, and I have picked out the specific statements where I had any means of checking up the accuracy of the witnesses, and, Sir, I have shown that, in every case where I have had any means of checking the accuracy, the statements are wrong and totally unfounded. I venture now to say, that the oldest member of this House will have difficulty in finding any speech that has ever been placed before the House of Commons of Canada in which statements were placed before the House for the purpose of influencing the House, where so many of the statements have been found to be totally untrue. There are three or four cases which I have no means of knowing anything about: cases in which it is said men or women had to give an interest to officials to get their claims recorded. All I have to say is, that if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had had the least desire to have these matters investigated, to have Parliament informed of the facts—not by mere ex-parte anonymous charges—but if he had the desire that Parliament should know whether these things were true or not, why did he not write a letter to Mr. Ogilvie, when my deputy wrote to him, asking him to send the information, if he had it, so that it might be within our power to investigate it. If he could not trust me, if he could not trust the right hon. the Prime Minister, if he could not trust Mr. Ogilvie, for fear Mr. Ogilvie might suppress it, why did not the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) write to one of the two or three private detectives which he has in Dawson City, and in two or three weeks we would have a report, and we would not be talking about hearsay, on which we can form no opinion as to whether there is any foundation for it or not.

Mr. Speaker, I forgot to mention one matter. Mr. Woodworth wrote a long letter. I hesitate to attack anybody's character, and I am not going to attack Mr. Woodworth's character; but the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has brought to this House a statement signed by Mr. Woodworth, in which Mr. Woodworth makes unqualified attacks upon the character of men who have hitherto had a good character. It was due to this House that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) should have inquired into the character of Mr. Woodworth and his reliability and credibility, before he read the letter, and it was due to the Government, and it was due to our officials, that I should make some inquiries and inform the House as well as I can as to what is known of this gentleman. Well, I have not been able to find out much. I communicated with the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), in whose constituency Mr. Woodworth lived and practised before he left for Dawson. Mr. Bostock telegraphed to Mr. W. Tomlinson, of New Denver, as follows:—

What was C. M. Woodworth's reputation when at Denver?

And the reply came:

3rd April, 1899.

Hewitt Bostock, M.P., Ottawa.

Not good; very ordinary; doubtful material.

WM. TOMLINSON.

Now, of course, we ought to know about Mr. Tomlinson, as to whether his statement is good or not. And this is what is said about him: "Mr. Tomlinson is a man formerly in the British Army, and for some years back a respected citizen of New Denver. Mr. Bostock has known him several years, and will certify to his character; and the message was sent in order that it might be read in Parliament." I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, I am tiring the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Now, Sir, I have detailed the appointments which we made, and I think I have justified the Government in the action they took in making the various appointments. I have shown, I think, to the satisfaction, not only of members on this side of the House, but—if we could look into their hearts—to most of the members on the other side of the House, that there was no dereliction of duty on the part of the Government in making these appointments; and then I attempted to analyse, as well as I could, the evidence which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has placed before the House. Now, when attacks were made on the administration—is the Government blamable because it did not act sooner, or is the Government blamable for not having taken the proper course to have an inquiry made in regard to this matter?

I affirm, Mr. Speaker—and I think hon. members of the House will be with me on the point—that until the return of our commissioner, Major Walsh, who was known to be on the way, and until something in the nature of a specific statement that we could take hold of was made, it would have been extremely unwise on the part of the Government to have attempted to hold an investigation. To attempt to hold an investigation when nobody would make a charge is an extremely unsatisfactory and futile thing; and the investigation at Dawson City promises to be futile, though charges have been made, because the people who have made them have apparently withdrawn them and will not go before the commissioner and attempt to prove them. When we had a commissioner in whom we had perfect confidence, and had not an opportunity to consult him, and when nobody had made anything in the nature of a specific charge, I think the House will say that the Government was certainly not blamable for not having acted sooner.

Miss Shaw's letter in the "Times" came up. It has been said that we ought to have acted instantaneously when that letter appeared. I may be wrong, but I do not take that view. The letter may perhaps have been more injurious to the Government politically because it appeared in the "Times"; but I could see no difference between a statement made by Miss Shaw and sustained by no particular evidence—in fact, by no evidence—and a statement made by any other newspaper correspondent, and backed by no evidence. After the letter of Miss Shaw appeared, the miners' complaint, which the hon. member for Pictou read, came out; and then instantly, as soon as anything in the nature of a complaint was made to the Government, the Government acted. Mr. Ogilvie was notified to proceed with an investigation. A commission was issued to him, and he was notified that the most ample notice must be given to everybody. I have read the notice issued by Mr. Ogilvie, inviting the people of Dawson City and the Yukon district to come forward and make any complaints they had to make. Here is the letter I wrote to Mr. Ogilvie, accompanying the commission, and containing his instructions:

Ottawa, 10th October, 1898.

Dear Sir,—You will receive herewith a commission to investigate charges which have been made by a miners' committee against the administration of Governmental affairs in the Yukon district. This commission has been issued in consequence of the receipt of a formal complaint, a copy of which is attached to the commission. You will at once proceed upon receipt of the commission with the investigation, and you are authorized to notify the persons who have signed the petition, wherever possible, of the time and place and when the inquiry will be opened.

Your legal adviser, Mr. Clement, will give you any professional assistance that may be required in the investigation. You will understand that any person who is charged with malfeasance of office or offence of any kind against the proper administration of the law in any department is entitled, before the hearing of the charges, to due notice of the particulars of the charge, so that he can prepare himself to meet the charge if he so desires.

As to employment of counsel, I will leave you to exercise your own judgment, merely remarking that if the persons preferring the charges desire to appear by counsel I see no objection to such course being followed. In such cases, of course, any accused persons who desire to appear by counsel will have a similar privilege.

It is the desire of the Government that the investigation should be thorough and complete, and that each and every charge that has been made in the miners' petition should be thoroughly investigated, and that you should make a definite report, giving your finding upon the evidence submitted in support of each charge, returning your report along with a copy of the evidence.

It is absolutely necessary that your report should be in my hands before the meeting of Parliament, and I shall therefore expect you to send it out by special messenger, if necessary, as soon as the ice is in condition to permit of travel southward from Dawson City.

That is the course which the Government took in connection with the investigation. I have no report as yet of the result. The newspapers contain some reports more or less reliable. I have a preliminary note from Mr. Ogilvie, saying that the report would be forwarded in a short time, and then I will lay it on the Table, and the House will know as much about it as I.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another matter. I think I shall be within the judgment of the House when I say that the House was extremely pained by the references which were made to Major Walsh in the speech of the hon. member for Pictou. Whether the hon. member conceived that those statements were true or not, the manner in which they were made was certainly most objectionable. I sent word to Major Walsh at once that these statements had been made; I told him that I thought he ought to come to Ottawa and see the official report of the speech made by the hon. member for Pictou. He came at once, and I gave him the report of the speech. He went away and examined it, and then wrote the following letter:—

Ottawa, 3rd April, 1899.

Dear Sir,—I have read Sir Hibbert Tupper's speech, in which he makes charges against the administration of affairs in the Yukon district while I was Government Commissioner.

So far as the personal charges against my character and administration are concerned, I defy Sir Hibbert Tupper to furnish a single particle of reliable evidence in support of any one of them. I further defy him to produce any person who ever saw me under the influence of liquor, either in the Yukon or anywhere else. While in the Yukon I abstained from the use of spirits and also tobacco, and my other habits conformed in every way to this abstemious course. During my stay in Dawson I lived in a tent surrounded by part of the staff and a large number of campers. My time was entirely taken up with public business, either in my office or in my tent. At 9 o'clock in the morning I walked to my office, at noon returned to my tent, at 1.30 p.m. again went to the office, and at 5 p.m. returned to the tent. This was my daily routine, so that I passed through the streets of Dawson four times every day, Sunday excepted. Every day but Sunday I could be seen by any person who had business with me, except that, of course, people had to take their turn in securing interviews. During my stay in Dawson I only left my camp after 6 p.m. three times. While I was in Dawson it was almost continuous daylight, and my tent was under full view of every one. Everybody could see what was going on. My evenings were generally taken up with people calling to obtain information. I defy any one to truthfully say that any improper act ever took place in my camp. I challenge and defy any person to prove me guilty of any improper act in either my public or private life during my period of service in the Yukon, or of dealing in or having any interest in any mines or Government property of any kind.

I engaged with the Government, as you know, to go to the Yukon for one year only, although my commission did not so state. That was my understanding with you. During that time I accomplished all that I expected and hoped to be able to do. I laboured earnestly and conscientiously to the best of my ability to do my duty to the Government, and returned at the end of the time, bringing nothing except the consciousness of having done my best to perform a difficult and trying duty. I close by repeating that I defy Sir Hibbert Tupper, or anybody else, to prove that while I was in the Yukon territory, I was ever under the influence of liquor or was ever guilty of a single act of immorality.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. M. WALSH.

Sir, the newspapers have been filled with interviews condemnatory of the Yukon administration. I am not going to go through and examine them, but I am going to point out one or two things that have happened in that connection which will perhaps indicate to some extent the reason why those interviews were so plentiful and so lurid in their character. One interview of which the most is made was an interview by Captain Constantine, who was formerly in command of the police in the district under the late Government, and for some time under this Government. I think I know Captain Constantine better than any man on the other side. I have known him for seventeen or eighteen years. He is a good officer, who, I do not think, would do anything contrary to law, and am certain he is a reliable, faithful officer. He came out from the Yukon district, and an interview with him was published of a most violent condemnatory kind with regard to the administration, and much was made of that interview. And if it had been a genuine interview, the testimony of Captain Constantine would be testimony to which a great deal of credit should be attached. But Captain Constantine repudiates the whole interview. I will give you another illustration. There were two men in the city the other day named Deville and Mangold. There appeared an interview in a newspaper in which they condemned the administration in the Yukon district; but I have a letter from their solicitor, in which they say that they were never interviewed at all, but that a drunken reporter—a drunken reporter, mark you, Mr. Speaker—followed them on the streets to their solicitor's office and was ejected from the office, and then wrote this interview condemning the Government. This letter is from Mr. Latchford, a respected and well known solicitor in this city.

Mr. SIFTON.

I am not going to take up the time of the House much longer, but I have one more thing to mention. I have a lot of interviews from different people—not the kind that had been so largely circulated by the Opposition press—which explains many things; but as the members of this House have doubtless read them, there is no use in my wasting your time by bringing before you matters that are after all mere matters of opinion. But I am going to read to you from a very important document, an official report which has just been made by Mr. A. N. C. Treadgold, M.A., of Oxford University, who was sent out by the "Mining Journal," of London, as its correspondent for the purpose of making a careful and exhaustive investigation of the district. I saw him when he went out and after he came back. He called at the office in a social way for the purpose of saying a few words and offering information as to what was going on there. He is not an applicant for any concessions from this Government, in any shape or form, directly or indirectly. He is not a man with whom any member of this Government has any connection or over whom any member of this Government has any influence; but he is a man of first-class character and high scientific attainments, who was sent out there on account of special qualifications and for the purpose of making an independent report to the "Mining Journal," of London. All he says is not favourable to the Government, but that is the better evidence that his report is honest and not coloured; and I think it will perhaps give the House the best idea of the state of affairs and explain the different things that have happened in that district better than anything that could possibly be read, because the report is absolutely reliable. This is the part of the report that refers to the Administration. Mr. Treadgold says:

This is not a political pamphlet, but a report of facts observed during my stay in the Yukon, and but for the importance to capital and labour of all questions concerning the administration of the Yukon, I should not dwell on the subject. In general, it is sufficient for miners to know that the Government at Ottawa has shown all willingness to learn all it could about the new and further North-west, that in consequence the administration of the Yukon has steadily improved this summer, in spite of serious necessary difficulties. Any Government which proposed suddenly to impose upon a new country, peopled by mixed immigrants, a full civil organization would need an impossibly excellent set of officials to steer it through its first year or two. How much more is this true of a new country like the Klondike, whose population is split into so many diverse groups with conflicting interests. In one point alone do all men agree in the Klondike—the desire to possess one or many of the great prizes there offered to the individual; and from this desire spring the bitterest differences; for the great prizes are not for all, and A's gain is B's loss, if he chooses so to regard it, even in claim-hunting.

I am going to read the whole so that I cannot be accused of leaving out any part because possibly less favourable to the Administration.

Let us separate some of the groups and interests in order that what I may call the bases of argument may be clearer for future discussion of the Yukon administration. We shall find in the Dawson camp tolerably clearly defined—

1. The old-timers, used in the past to govern themselves, largely Americans, inclined to regard the incoming Canadian civil organization as needless, yet seldom heard on any subject save royalty; on that eloquent as on other "crown reservations."

Even among old-timers it was possible to trace a clear division between such as were able or forced to reside in Dawson (mine owners and saloon owners—the same man is often both) and the miners at work on the creeks, the latter always suspecting the former of getting official knowledge of new finds earlier than themselves, and ready to make a grievance of a mere suspicion.

2. The chechakos or new-comers of this year, all of course chagrined to find that the officials and old-timers had not reserved a claim for each of their 20,000 on the best part of Eldorado or Dominion, but, except for this fact, easy to distinguish into—

(a.) Australians, excellent fellows and good miners, used to laws of their own, and not always liking to have to obey the Canadian laws, complaining for some time because "they had not been told that the Klondike was mostly staked out," but after a time settling down to work, pushing further afield and doing well;

(b.) British Columbians, also accustomed to laws of their own, convinced that the Yukon ought to figure as part of British Columbia, the mining province of the Dominion; yet I never heard one of them suggest that Yukon claims (250 feet) should be reduced to the length of British Columbian claims (100 feet);

(c.) Genuine miners, of whatever nationality, in considerable numbers with genuine grievances, partly remediable, partly not;

(d.) A crowd of professional men and traders and "superior persons," all wanting claims, and expecting from the officials special facilities for acquiring claims. Some of them had been forbidden to practise law or medicine without Canadian diplomas. Many were adepts at "skinning" a new country, and hated to find that concessions from Ottawa barred their way in their quest for timber, firewood, hay, and rights of various kinds, as for telephones, ferries, &c.

(e.) Scum of all classes and trades and nations, ready to do or say anything for dollars, and for the privilege to loaf at Dawson, especially dangerous to the newspaper correspondent, whom they frequently beguiled with their loud-voiced complaint that there was nothing left for the "free miner," and that the officials kept all for themselves, &c., &c., "that the poor men had no chance of getting his letter or his record of a claim," &c., &c.

A perusal of the above will show how plentiful a crop of grievances could be collected by a correspondent with an appetite for the garbage of a mining camp, and without that power of perspective which is so necessary and yet so difficult to exercise in hurried letter-writing. I think that every correspondent who wrote upon "Yukon grievances" and "Yukon scandals" would probably write differently if he were asked to write again on the same subject. For it is beyond question that "grievances" and "scandals" were made on the outside to assume an importance which they never possessed in the Klondike itself. If I review the facts of the situation briefly, it is because I think such a review will be useful for the future; only time and wise deliberation are needed utterly to do away with the genuine grievances of the Klondike.

These are what he says are genuine grievances.

1. Unequal taxation (the miner pays nearly all the taxes).—He was easiest to tax; money was wanted; for the rest of Canada would not consent to the Yukon's Bill, so he was taxed—the trader escapes in most cases.

2. Want of publicity of claim records (every miner) should be able to see what claims have been recorded in the district, and that with as little delay as possible.

3. Want of surveyors (the miner has to wait too long to have his claim surveyed—it is questionable whether the miner ought to have to pay the surveyor his fee, in case of a dispute about boundaries, or whether the recording fee ought not to carry with it the right to an accurate survey free of charge).

The hon. member for York has a clear opinion on that subject.

4. Certain obvious defects in the mining laws (see under "Mining Laws").

All these are matters of policy to be worked up when we have a little better knowledge of the country.

5. Want of roads (see under "The Law of Representation").

6. Want of adequate mail service and service delivery of mail (it is impossible to provide fully for such a vast crowd, but the post office was needlessly slow).

7. Want of recording officials on every creek (this would keep the crowd scattered and forestall the genuine grievance of the stakers who had to trudge so many miles to Dawson from every part of the Klondike to record claims).

This is a formidable list of grievances, and it has been duly insisted upon, and of course exaggerated by most critics. A glance at the list reveals the need of time and of a whole army of trained officials, with an unlimited purse, to do away with these grievances. As yet there has been no time, the rush of adventurers to the north passed the calculations of all those most likely to know; nobody believed that a crowd of 25,000 would make its way to the Yukon by mid-June of 1898; all the season there has been a steady influx of new officials; but it would be idle to suppose that laws or officials can be satisfactory for some time. Canada in general is only just beginning to mine, and she certainly has no trained body of mining officials from which she could have sent a complete and efficient staff to regulate in one season a huge placer mining camp like the Klondike. It is the rapid growth of the camp (from upwards of 5,000 souls in 1897 to upwards of 30,000 in 1898) that passes belief and creates suddenly a volume of business in Dawson City hard for any officials to cope with, especially for such as have to learn their business, to some extent as they go on. Canada as yet has no separate department of mines. She needs a department of mines, in close touch with the Geological Survey Department. The weak spot in the early history of the Klondike is the want at Ottawa of accurate information derived from competent geologists; but I ought, at the same time, to add that Dawson camp is not yet two years old to the outside world. Failing in accurate knowledge of the richness of the Klondike dike deposits, all Government action at Ottawa has been speculative and hampered with the fear that other provinces of Canada might be compelled to and might not care to pay the bill for the development of the Yukon. This season two of the best Canadian geologists were sent to inspect the Klondike, and their reports will furnish new and reliable data for future action of the Government. In the above list of Yukon grievances, two stand out, not as being more important than the rest, but as being easier to remedy quickly.

1. Difficulty of recording claims and of getting to know what claims have been recorded.

2. Difficulty connected with the distribution of the mail.

I just interpolate here that I am satisfied, from my information from Dawson City, that both these difficulties have now been remedied and that there is no grievance in regard to either of them.

These same difficulties must always occur in new placer camps in intensity proportionate to the size of the camp, but the Dawson authorities showed singular inability to improve the record office and the post office. At best they were both very slow indeed, and the miner who consented to accommodate himself to their methods had to put up with great inconvenience and great loss of time. It is not too much to say that the inefficiency of these two offices was to blame for the loud talk on the outside as well as in the Klondike about "official corruption."

Now, will the House mark this :

Such talk is puerile where the character of men like Major Walsh and Mr. Thos. Fawcett is in question. There is not a man living who dare openly suggest that either of them was corrupt. At the same time, undoubted evils went long unreformed at the record office, and the Yukon miner, seeing no sufficient reason for continued inefficiency, began to suspect and even whisper "corruption," which he could never prove, to me at any rate, either in the Klondike or, later on, at Ottawa. Personally I saw but little that cannot very easily be made smooth by a telegraph wire to Ottawa, and a few changes in the mining law; the telegraph wire will do much more for the Klondike than will the incorporation of Dawson City, good though that also may be in due time. For all business purposes the Yukon remains still quite cut off from the central Government at Ottawa, in harmful isolation so far as movement of capital into it is desired. The building of the telegraph line is the first and easiest step by which the Government can foster the mining interests of a country that will amply repay it for all its care.

That is the best and most impartial view of the situation I can give to the House. It is written by a man who knows the ground, who is making a scientific report for the "Mining Journal" and making it under this knowledge—and this should be marked—that if in any respect the accuracy of his report can be impeached, his reputation is gone. Therefore, the House may place absolute confidence in his statement. It is not all favourable, but it shows that exactly what I have said is true. There had been grievances, but they could not be avoided or removed earlier, because it was necessary to have skilled men to deal with the matter, and we could not get them at once. We have sent men in there and we are getting things into shape as fast as we can.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have detained the House so long, but I have a few words to say in conclusion. Let me point out that the work of the Government in connection with the Klondike district commenced in 1897. Practically our work commenced there when our officials got in. The first of them got in about February, 1898. Major Walsh was the only man who had any real authority to do anything, and he got in there on the 21st of May last. All that has happened in regard to which there has been any discussion has practically taken place since the ice went out of the Yukon River last spring, about ten months ago. What have we done in that time? We have taken over a country flooded by men of the most diverse character from all over the western country and the Pacific slope. It has been said that that country has been a by-word for official corruption. They forget to say that country has been a by-word with every man who has ever been in a mining camp for the perfect preservation of law and order under the most trying difficulties. There has been no crime unpunished, there has been no disorder, there has been no rioting. A New York lady who had been there, calling in my office not long since, told me that she felt safer in her tent on the trail any where in the Yukon than she did in her residence in the city of New York.

Sir, is that nothing to say on behalf of the men who have done this work? I think that it is something to the credit of the Dominion of Canada, and to the men who have gone through the arduous labour which they were called upon to do. Our men have gone there, they have struggled hard, they are struggling hard now with the initial difficulties of overcoming all these things which have to be overcome, of learning those matters which have to be learned and properly studied out in order that they may be able to deal with the peculiar circumstances of a peculiar situation. We have established a government there, we have put a local government in operation, of a bureaucratic character, it is true, but of that character because it is the only kind of government applicable to that country until we know more about it, and the population is more settled. That government is at work. I have read you a list of the operations of the Council, showing that they are going into all the details of administration, that they are trying to take care of the people and meet their wants, and administer the affairs of that district in a business-like and a proper way. The affairs of government are on a proper footing. Building accommodation has been found for our police force. From Lake Bennett to Dawson City a man can now go over the ice without spending a night out of doors, a great difference between this and last year.

When Major Walsh and myself were at Lake Bennett there was not a single post between that point and Dawson City. But at present there is a line of posts stretching through the whole district, under Canadian and British authority, so that there is no possibility of any man's life or property being in danger. Now, what have we today? We have permanent public buildings that could not have been expected to be put up last year. There is regular transportation by which proper materials for buildings can be carried in. We have roads to build, and some stretches have been built already of the most immediate necessity. We could not take an appropriation last year for the reason that we did not have information which would enable us to decide where the roads ought to be built. If we had had the money last year we would not have spent it, because we did not know exactly where the roads ought to be made, and for fear of wasting the money we should not have undertaken to expend any. We propose to ask Parliament this year for an appropriation to build a telegraph line; we propose to ask for an appropriation for a road; and I believe that seven or eight months from today, when next season closes, the Yukon district will be under a regular and proper administration of law such as will satisfy the requirements of the people of the district, and such as would serve for any province in the Dominion of Canada. One word more. I ought not to sit down without referring to the fact that throughout the speech of the hon. gentleman there has been a continuous trend of suggestions that there was some improper or corrupt connection between myself or some member or members of the Government with the Klondike district. I want to say that I challenge the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, I challenge the members of his party in this House, I challenge the members of his party outside this House. I challenge the press of his party, to produce their private detectives, to come here upon their responsibility and press their charge; I challenge the member for Pictou or any man in this House, to lay upon the Table of the House the charges that he has to make, and declare his ability to substantiate them by evidence, and he will get his investigation, and I will be able to convince the hon. gentleman who makes that charge that discretion on his part would have been the better part of valour.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I certainly can congratulate the hon. the Minister of the Interior upon the length of his speech, and I can also congratulate him upon the skill with which he has evaded what was the principal part of the attack made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). It is useless for me at this hour of the night to attempt to detain the House with remarks at any length, but I would like to say just one or two words before moving the adjournment of this debate. The hon. gentleman has referred to the absence of the member for Pictou, and that reference has elicited a considerable amount of applause from the gentlemen behind him. I wish to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and the gentlemen on the other side, that the hon. member for Pictou, standing in his place here, proposed to bring his remarks to a conclusion shortly before six o'clock on Thursday night when he had not touched the question of these Yukon scandals at all, and he was reminded by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, after consultation between them, that he was to go on, and he did go on in consequence of the invitation of those hon. gentlemen. We had an explanation from the Prime Minister at the conclusion of the sitting, in which, with charming simplicity, he admitted that there had been an arrangement to adjourn at six, but because it was thought best to answer the member for Pictou, he had concluded not to carry out that arrangement but to go on with the sitting. So I would remind the hon. gentlemen opposite that so far as that question is concerned they do not stand, perhaps, in the most enviable position. I do not know why the Minister of the Interior should think that the member for Pictou would run away from him. Has the hon. gentleman been in the habit of having people run away from him in the past? Perhaps he will inform us who it was that has given him the impression that the member for Pictou was trying to run away from him. I think I know the record of the member for Pictou about as well as any man in this House, and I venture to say that the day will never come when he will be afraid to meet the Minister of the Interior or any member on the other side of the House in fair debate, in this House or elsewhere. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has referred to Conservative detectives, and notwithstanding the fact that he has given some admonition to the member for Pictou as to the caution with which he should make statements in this House, he has himself ventured to state no less than three times that the Conservative party have been sending detectives into the city of Dawson. Now, Sir, I have a statement here which shows that there is no such association now in existence in the city of Ottawa, so far as I understand, as the Young Conservative Association to which the hon. gentleman has referred. The hon. gentleman has been taken in by some one who, to use a somewhat vulgar expression, has been pulling his leg a little about this. I have this further to say, that under his hand the President of the senior Conservative Association of the city of Ottawa has stated to me that no action with respect to obtaining any information in Dawson or elsewhere in the Yukon, was ever taken by the senior Conservative Association in the city of Ottawa. As the hon. gentleman has stated three times in this House that de-detectives have been sent into the city of Dawson, I challenge him now to give me the name of any Conservative who has sent a detective into the city of Dawson. The hon. gentleman does not answer. Last Thursday night we had statements and cries from hon. gentlemen opposite that names should be given. These charges preferred by the hon. member for Pictou were of no value unless names were given. Why does not the Minister of the Interior give these names now?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the hon. gentleman will read the newspapers published to-day, he will see that a man swore before the Gold Commissioner that he was sent up by the Young Conservative Association of Ottawa.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am glad the hon. gentleman has said that. What are we to think of a witness who says that he had been sent up by the Young Conservative Association of Ottawa, when there has been no such association for 15 years? I have repeated to the hon. gentleman the statement of the president of the senior association, that no such person was sent, and that no such action was taken. The hon. gentleman did not use the word "detective"; he used over and over again the word "detectives." Will the hon. gentleman give me the name of the Conservative who sent detectives into Dawson City?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman's partner in Dawson City was one of them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am asking the hon. Minister of the Interior; I am not asking the Liberal whip behind him. But it does not matter whether he gives it to us or not; he will not deny it. I was asking the hon. Minister of the Interior to give me the name of the Conservatives who sent detectives there.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I said that I was informed that the Ottawa Conservatives or members of the Conservative party had sent detectives to Dawson City. I am informed that that is the case, and I believe it to be true. The hon. member does not know anything about it and does not believe it. I do not care whether he believes it or not. I am informed that it is true, and I am perfectly satisfied that it is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The position taken by the hon. Minister of the Interior the other evening and again this evening, was that statements should not be made in this House without proof. The statement the hon. gentleman now makes is that he does not care whether I believe it or not. This is a matter of good taste which I will leave to the judgment of the House. I have asked the hon. gentleman for the names and he is unable to give me them, yet three times in the course of this debate he has ventured to make a statement which now he is unable to substantiate by any data whatever. So much in regard to that. There is another matter in regard to which I would like to say a word or two, the telegram incident which the hon. gentleman desired to drag as a red herring across the trail in order to obscure the real issue in this case. The hon. gentleman has talked about good taste, but he ventured to bring into this House the name, by a direct reference, of a gentleman who is not a member of this House, but who happens to be the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou, without the slightest provocation and with the sneering remark that possibly he would not say that he was a Liberal heeler. It was a most discourteous and uncalled for reference to a gentleman who had nothing whatever to do with these Yukon scandals. That name was brought forward by the hon. Minister of the Interior maliciously and impertinently and without any possible provocation at all, for no purpose whatever, except the purpose of casting some discredit upon that gentleman or upon the hon. member for Pictou. I have known the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou for a good many years, and I can refer the Minister of the Interior to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in regard to him. I can tell him that there are a good many people in this country who believe that the position of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this House and in this country might have been a different one if it had not been for the aid that gentleman afforded to him in times past. I can tell the hon. Minister of the Interior that the reputation of that gentleman will not suffer by anything he can say because the insinuation—and the hon. gentleman has talked glibly about insinuations—the insinuation which the Minister of the Interior desired to be put upon this gentleman, if it meant anything, meant that the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou, was the person referred to as a man who had received $500 for applying for a permit. If it did not mean that it was impertinent and uncalled for, and if it did mean that, I venture to think, that the reputation of the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou, will compare at any time with that of the hon. Minister of the Interior.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who is the law partner; what is his name?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not propose to go into names; I propose simply to deal with the obvious reference which has been made by the hon. Minister of the Interior, an impertinent reference, introducing into this debate the name of a gentleman who has no connection with the subject of this debate. In regard to that telegram incident, the hon. gentleman has not met the point at all. The point of the charge of the hon. member for Pictou was that a Liberal in Victoria or Vancouver had been paid $500 for his influence in getting a liquor permit. The hon. member for Pictou said that that permit had been obtained by letter or by telegram, and the Minister of the Interior harped on the word telegram. Does it make the slightest difference to this House whether a telegram was sent or not, and yet, for half an hour, we heard the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior that no telegram had been received. It matters not a bawbee whether the telegram was received or not; that is not the gravamen of the charge. The gravamen of the charge, which the hon. Minister of the Interior is unable to deny, is that a liquor permit was obtained by a Liberal solicitor in Victoria, and that he received $500. Is the hon. gentleman in a position now to say that the firm that he mentioned, the firm of Martin & Co., did not receive $500 for obtaining a liquor permit? Is he of his own knowledge able to say that, because that is the issue between him and the hon. member for Pictou?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman repeat that?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman will persist in reading newspapers and making me repeat this question again and waste the time of the House, I cannot help it. What I ask the hon. gentleman is this: Whether he is able to say of his own knowledge, because that is the point—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not think it is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax)—that no firm in Victoria received $500 for applying for and obtaining a liquor permit from the hon. gentleman's department?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, he did not say it, but that was the issue with the hon. member for Pictou when the hon. member for Pictou got up in this House and stated that that had taken place, and the hon. Minister of the Interior ventured to say that it was false. That is the issue between the two gentlemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Perhaps I am not hearing the hon. gentleman aright. Is the hon. gentleman saying that a lawyer in Victoria telegraphed to myself and got a permit?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What I was saying was that the issue between the hon. member for Pictou and the Minister of the Interior was this: The hon. member for Pictou said that a legal firm of Victoria had received $500 for applying for and obtaining a permit to sell liquor in the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I say they did not; I say that statement is untrue. Let us get to the issue right now. I say it is untrue. They did not get $500 for applying for and obtaining a permit. They might have applied for it, but they did not get it. That is what I am responsible for. I say that this quibbling is all nonsense. I do not care whether a lawyer gets $500 or not, and I cannot know whether he got it or not.

An hon. MEMBER. Do you believe it?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not care whether a lawyer, or any one else, got $500, and I do not know. I say, nobody got $500, and telegraphed to me, and got a permit. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) understand that?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) still harps upon the word "telegraph".

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Or letter.

An hon. MEMBER. Or in any other way.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Or a letter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) say, that no firm in Victoria ever applied and obtained a liquor permit?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). A law firm?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Applied for, and got, a permit?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). A law firm, for another person.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not understand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). He is very hard of hearing just now.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Shame.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, I will not wait for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) to answer; he can think about that, and answer it after four days. He has been four days preparing his answer now.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I am trying to find out if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is making a quibble to try and catch me in some way I do not know.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I have denied the statement point blank, in every way, shape and form. There is not a syllable of truth in it, in any way, shape or form, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) can quibble, and twist and turn words until he is black in the face, but there is not a single, solitary word of truth in it, and I defy him to prove it, or anybody else. I say this, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I say, that the gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). All right. I say, that a gentleman of the hon. gentleman's standing, receiving a positive point-blank denial, ought to be above quibbling in this House about a thing of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman tells us sometimes—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is not increasing the respect of the House for him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) tells us sometimes on this side of the House, when a civil question is asked of him, that we are getting restless; but, Mr. Speaker, who is getting restless now?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I leave it to the judgment of the House as to who is getting restless now. I put a very direct question to this hon. Minister, and I am not afraid of the judgment of this House as to where the quibbling is. Licenses were granted, both by this Government and the Government of the North-west Territories, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has stated to this House, and the fact is—as I understand it, and he will correct me, if I am wrong—that the licenses issued by the Government of the North-west Territories were not recognized by his officers except by his direction, and I am including both these classes in the question which I put to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton). I ask him again to state, of his own knowledge, that no legal firm in Victoria received $500 for procuring either a license or a consent in respect to a license. I venture to think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) could not, and would not, undertake to say that, because it would be in the knowledge of this House that he could not know these things of his personal knowledge, and that was the issue between the Minister and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). As to whether that sum of money had been paid, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) may tell us that the issue is something else, but those who heard the statement of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and heard what took place the other night, know what the issue was. The issue was exactly what I have stated, and that issue the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has not met, and cannot meet to-night, or at any other time.

Now, Sir, we have had some discussion about the puerile nature of these charges that have been made against the administration of affairs in the Yukon district, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has vouchsafed to us a good deal of information with regard to these matters, but I will give him a little information, if the paper is at hand, with respect to some transactions in that Yukon district. What I propose to read, Mr. Speaker, is, I find, not quite at hand, but I will have it before the conclusion of my remarks. What I was about to say is, that, as I understand it, this very case of Mrs. Dubois which was referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), has already come up before Mr. Senkler, the man recently appointed, and it was distinctly sworn to by Mr. Murdock, a witness, on the stand, that he had an arrangement with one of the officers of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), that that officer for recording that claim should get one-third of the claim, which was a valuable one. That officer registered the claim for Mr. Murdock after it had been staked and recorded by Mrs. Dubois.

Mr. COWAN. What was the name of the officer?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The name of the officer is Mr. Hurdman, and, as I have found the paper I was looking for a moment ago, I shall read the evidence.

An hon. MEMBER. What paper?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It was reported in the "Klondike Nugget" of the 28th January, 1899.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Hon. gentlemen opposite smile. Have we not had a good many references to newspapers by the Minister of the Interior this afternoon? Have we not had a good many laudatory expressions from newspapers respecting the administration of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton)? I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), who, no doubt, has seen the statements of these proceedings in this newspaper, if he will venture to say that they are in any way substantially incorrect. If hon. gentlemen opposite are not able to say that, it is hardly worth while to smile about it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) allow me to ask him a question? Does he know that the officer referred to was promptly suspended by Mr. Ogilvie, on the evidence being given?

An hon. MEMBER. He was.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will ask another question. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) know that this officer has been reinstated?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, I happen to have some information on that point. I do not vouch for the correctness of the information; I may be right or wrong about it; but I have been informed that this officer has been reinstated. Now, here is the evidence. This is not, mark you, a comment of the paper, but it is what purports to be a report of what the evidence was on this trial:

Mrs. Lena M. Dubois was sworn, and said that she had staked the claim in dispute on September 27th at 5 p.m. Upon application to Hurdman, the bench claim recorder, she had been assured that the claim could not be recorded until surveyed, but that he would hold the claim for her until such survey was made. She said further, she lived in a cabin where she could see the claim, and could have seen Murdock if he came there, but she had never seen him in her life. There were men in cabins all about the claim who would look out for her, if a stranger appeared to stake the ground over her. Some time ago two men stopped where she was and asked where the claim was. They looked for the stakes but could not find them.

J. F. Murdock was sworn, and said he staked the said claim on October 8th, and recorded it on the 11th at 5 p.m. He put in four stakes and they had not been seen by him since. He had no witnesses to the operation of staking. Mrs. Dubois' stakes were not there. It was about 5 p.m. in the evening when he staked, and he used regulation sized stakes picked up about claim No. 70 on Bonanza below. Mr. Bard drew out of the unwilling witness that he had an understanding with Mrs. Crane that she was to get a half interest for the information she gave him of the claim. He gave her a third interest. It was at this point that the good work of Mr. Bard showed itself, and Mr. Senkler, as an honest man, insisted on the questions being answered.

I should state that Mr. Bard was the counsel for Mrs. Dubois.

"What became of the other two-thirds?"

"I control them," Murdock answered.

"Have you got that two-thirds yet?"

The witness did not want to answer, and replied that he had sold another third.

"Who to?" asked the inexorable Bard.

The witness again did not want to answer, and Joy, his attorney, tried to shield him from the damning admissions he must make. Again he was compelled to answer, with downcast face, "Hurdman."

"What was the consideration?" asked the unrelenting Bard.

Murdock hesitated, and replied, "I don't think I have to answer that."

"No, you don't," interjected his attorney, appealing to the Gold Commissioner. But he had to answer, nevertheless.

"I sold it to him for $25."

"So you sold him a third interest in a valuable claim for $25?" repeated Bard.

No answer.

"Did you get the money?"

Joy broke in with "I don't think the witness should be made to answer this. This is not an investigation into the acts of officials?" Again the witness was forced to reply.

"No, I did not receive any money from Hurdman, and haven't yet. The witness here shamefacedly admitted he had given a third to Hurdman some ten days after recording, but knew of no reason why he should. He admitted he would rather have retained the third, in fact would liked to have retained the whole claim. He had no understanding with Hurdman about giving him a third. Considered his right, which he had used up, was worth $1,500. Did not answer at first as to why he gave away $500, or one-third of his right. Afterwards the witness admitted, "I thought it a good plan to do so, because I thought we were to do business together again in future."

And I understand, as I said before—I do not vouch for it—that this Mr. Hurdman, although suspended after this investigation, has been reinstated, and is now one of the officers of the Department of the Interior in the Yukon district.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Has the hon. gentleman who addresses the House as a lawyer, acquainted himself with the result of that investigation by the commissioner, and is he able to state whether after that investigation this gentleman was found guilty or innocent? And if he has not ascertained it, has he the assurance to stand here and leave that charge against that officer to go in "Hansard"?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am reading evidence which has been given on oath in a case tried before the Gold Commissioner, Mr. Senkler. It is immaterial to me which way the case was determined. I am reading the evidence of Mr. Murdock himself, the claimant, who was forced to admit, against his own interest, the existence of this corrupt arrangement with that official; and I say that it does not make the slightest difference after that admission, whether the case was determined one way or the other by Mr. Senkler. Mr. Speaker, at this hour of the night, I presume it will be hardly advisable, in the thin condition of the House, to continue to speak, and, therefore, with the permission of the Prime Minister, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 5th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. J. SCRIVER, (Huntingdon) moved:

That the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Thursday, 20th April instant, and the time for presenting Private Bills be extended to Thursday, 27th April instant, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their second report.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 25) to confirm an agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Hull Electric Company.—(Mr. Poupore.)

Bill (No. 26) respecting the Columbia and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 27) respecting the Richelleu and Ontario Navigation Company.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

Bill (No. 28) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate Le Chemin de fer de Colonisation du Nord.—(Mr. Fortin, for Mr. Bourassa.)

Bill (No. 30) respecting the Atlas Loan Company.—(Mr. Ingram.)

Bill (No. 31) to amend the Winding-up Act.—(Mr. Fortin.)

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. BEATTIE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 32) intituled: "An Act to amend the Act respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets."

He said: This Bill has reference particularly to the Detroit and Windsor ferry boats. Under their charter with the Government they are obliged to sell ten tickets for a quarter, but they will sell to parties who cross frequently, and who buy a dollar's worth at a time, tickets at the rate of 1½ cents apiece. On excursions, holidays and other days, ticket scalpers will buy a dollar's worth, and then get boys to stand at the gates of the ferry and sell those tickets to passengers at the rate of two for five cents. By this means, the company lose a great deal of money, and wish to be placed on the same footing as railway companies under the Railway Act, by which Act no one is allowed to handle tickets except authorized agents.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Although it would be somewhat difficult, Mr. Speaker, to answer a five or a five and a half hours speech in any moderate length of time, I shall endeavour, as this debate has been fairly well protracted already, to condense my remarks as much as possible. Before beginning them, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior to the fact that the documents which he laid on the Table last evening do not contain the lease to which he referred, but are only papers containing the negotiations for that lease. And as the hon. gentleman undertook to lay the lease on the Table, we would be very glad indeed if he would do so.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The papers which I put on the Table of the House comprise all the information in the possession of the department, and I believe that the two letters constitute the lease. I do not believe there was any formal lease drawn.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In that case I certainly misunderstood the hon. gentleman, because, from the tone of his remarks last evening, I judged that a formal lease had been drawn up, and it seems a rather remarkable thing that in connection with a contract dealing with a sum of $30,000 a year, no formal lease should have been drawn up. I understood the hon. gentleman last evening to state that a formal lease had been drawn up. I understood him now to correct that, and to say that these documents which have been laid on the Table, constitute the only lease that has been drawn up in respect of this rental of $30,000 a year.

With respect to the defence which has been attempted by the hon. Minister of the Interior, I venture to think that he has not very well met, in some particulars at least, the charges of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Now, what, generally speaking, were the charges made by the hon. member for Pictou and in respect of which he produced at least some evidence, certain specific evidence, made by reputable people, before this House. The charge was, in the first place, that officials had been sent to the Yukon district by the department of the hon. gentleman and that they had been sent there under improper conditions. In the second place, that after charges had been made with respect to the conduct of those officials, any investigation by the department of the hon. gentleman was unduly delayed. In the third place, that no sufficient investigation has been ordered or had up to the present.

How has the hon. gentleman met those charges? He met them, in the first place, by saying that this was an emergency staff which he sent into the Yukon, and I shall quote his own language on that point:

If there had been no danger of starvation, if there had been no danger of riot, if there had been an express train running a Pullman car to Dawson City, then, I think, the chances are that instead of the gentlemen I sent, I would have got some men with other characteristics, with special knowledge of keeping mining records, and of special knowledge of mining laws.

So, it seems that this staff of officials, whose competency has been so successfully attacked by the hon. member for Pictou, is not the staff which the hon. gentleman would have selected if he had had a freer hand. Well, now, I would like to know what a Pullman car or express train has to do with the characteristics of the staff which the hon. gentleman sent into the Yukon. The hon. gentleman did not make that very clear to my mind. He had the whole resources of the Dominion of Canada at his back. He had, as he himself explained, a unique condition of things to deal with. He says that he did not know, in 1897, but he certainly did know in 1898, what he was going to have to deal with there, and I would like to know what there is in the excuse the hon. gentleman has put forward to this House as to the competency of the officials he has sent there. But that is not the worst of it. The hon. gentleman sent these officials into the country under these unique conditions, as he admits, with the express permission to deal in the mining claims which it was their business to administer. And what is the excuse the hon. gentleman pleaded for that? His excuse is that at the time when he came into office there were regulations made by a Tory Government which had preceded him. Why, I should think that if the hon. gentleman is at all candid in what he has stated to the House on previous occasions, that very fact would have made him suspicious of these regulations, and that his first step would have been to look into them. But whether he had just cause of suspicion or not, he knew that these regulations were to be put to a test they never were put to before, owing to the unique conditions under which that country was to be administered. And yet he sent these officials into that country with that permission. Now, what information had the hon. gentleman with regard to mining lands in the Dominion of Canada at this time? He had, in the first place, the regulations of the statute relating to Dominion lands, which statute provides:

No person employed in or under the Department of Interior shall purchase any Dominion lands except under authority of the Governor in Council, or shall locate military or bounty land warrants or land scrip, or act as agent of any other person in such behalf; and no person so employed shall disclose to any person, except his superior officer, any discovery made by him or by any other officer of the Department of the Interior, or any other information in his possession in relation to Dominion lands, until such discovery or information has been reported to the Minister of the Interior, and his permission for such disclosure has been obtained.

And the hon. gentleman ventured as one excuse to this House the fact that he knew that that Land Act had been violated in the past. That was a wonderful excuse to give as a reason why the provisions of the Act should not be applied to the Yukon territory. The hon. gentleman who, I must presume, looked into the matter, turned to the statutes of Ontario, and what did he find? Investigating the matter in such spare moments as he could obtain in the intervals of dealing with the Mackenzie & Mann contract, he found in the Consolidated Statutes of Ontario of 1897, a section which has been in force in that province, I believe, for many years, and which provides that no officer appointed under the Act shall purchase or be or become proprietor of or be interested in Crown lands or mining claims, and any such purchase or interest shall be void; and if any officer violates the provision of the section, he shall forfeit his office and be liable to a penalty of $400, to be recovered by action by any person suing for the same. That is the statute of the province of Ontario, a province that has had to deal with mining regulations and mining rights for years. The hon. gentleman disregarded not only the statute of the Parliament of Canada, but also the statute of Ontario, and sent his staff of emergency officials into that territory with full permission to stake claims. Now, if the hon. gentleman had seen fit to fulfil his duty, he might have looked to the province of Nova Scotia, which is one of the earliest provinces of Canada to pass mining laws and to have mining claims worked successfully. If he had looked at the legislation of that province, he would have found the following in the statute of 1893, chap. 2, sec. 14, a statute which, I may say, I was instrumental in having passed:

From and after the passing of this Act no person holding the office of Provincial Secretary, Attorney General, Commissioner of Public Works and Mines, or any office or employment under the Provincial Government or under any department thereof, the duties of which are usually performed in the building at Halifax known as the Provincial Building, shall, while holding such office or employment, directly or indirectly, apply to the Department of Mines for any mining license or mining lease, or act as agent for any other person in the making of any such application.

And the penalty for the violation of that statute is a fine of $400 and forfeiture of office. Now, I venture to submit to you and to the House that under these circumstances, it was an extraordinary act on the part of the hon. gentleman, in sending this emergency staff of officials into the Yukon district under the unique conditions which he knew would prevail, to give them full rights and liberty, regardless of their duties as officers, to stake claims in competition with the men for whom they were administering the laws of Canada. Now, so much for that point—and I may have to deal with it a little further later on; but, as I said, I will endeavour to condense my remarks as much as possible.

The next point made by the hon. member for Pictou was that the investigation which should have been made into the charges which were heralded all over this country and over two continents months ago should have been made promptly and at once. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) claims in his speech that his department acted with great forethought, diligence, promptness and circumspection. Charges were made, as the hon. gentleman himself admitted, before the 15th day of July, 1898, because he said that he fixed on that date as the date on which Mr. Ogilvie should leave for the Yukon; and he says that before that date it came to his knowledge that charges or complaints had been made against Mr. Wade and against Mr. McGregor. And, Sir, up to the 1st day of February, 1899, no person had been authorized to investigate these charges. That is the position of the hon. gentleman with regard to the delay. How does he answer that? He tells us that after Mr. Ogilvie had been despatched to the Yukon, while that gentleman was on his way there, he sent him a telegram, the words of which he gave, and which were substantially these: "You have a free hand." Now, I ask any lawyer in this House: What would be Mr. Ogilvie's power of investigation under a telegram announcing to him that he would have a free hand? Does the hon. gentleman say that on such a telegram Mr. Ogilvie would have the power to subpoena a single witness or that he would have the power to administer an oath to a single witness?

Does he say that he had power, under that telegram, to hold any investigation whatever, any investigation that would be worthy of the name? The only thing Mr. Ogilvie could do under that telegram would be what any private person could do, ascertain what information he could by inquiry in the Yukon district, and report to the hon. gentleman. Why, Sir, the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches were not so slow as that, when it was a question of issuing a commission to deprive a Tory office-holder of his office. The hon. gentleman says that you cannot run and get a Council meeting at once. Did he have to delay from July until February to get a Council meeting? Council meetings were called pretty promptly for other purposes, but the hon. gentleman, it seems, could not get a Council meeting to deal with this matter between the 15th of July, 1898, and February, 1899. Sir, I say, that under the circumstances, when these charges were ringing over two continents, when they were ringing throughout Canada, when Liberal journals, as well as Tory journals, were speaking of them, there was most criminal and scandalous delay on the part of the hon. gentleman. I say, it was most unfair to the officers themselves, because we have not pretended that all those officers were guilty of any wrongful act; we have not pretended it for a moment; but these charges were allowed to go during all these months without any investigation, and innocent men had attached to them the odium which should properly have fallen, perhaps, on some of the men who were guilty, if they were really guilty, therefore, in justice to the country, in justice to the officials, in justice to the hon. gentleman's Government, and in justice to himself, I say, that the delay during those months was scandalous and shameful.

Now, Sir, what is the next point that the hon. member for Pictou made with regard to this matter? The next point he made was, that no efficient investigation has been ordered, or has been had, up to the present time. And what is the investigation which has been ordered, and which has been had, up to the present time? The investigation which has been ordered, is an investigation by Mr. Ogilvie under letters patent, or a commission issued to him for that purpose, and sent to him in the Yukon district. Now, the hon. gentleman has told us about the ability of some of those gentlemen whom he sent into the Yukon district, and he has specially mentioned the ability of Mr. F. C. Wade his fidus Achates and his political companion in the province of Manitoba. No one on this side of the House has disputed the ability of Mr. F. C. Wade as a lawyer. But when these charges were made against Mr. F. C. Wade, and when the hon. gentleman knew his ability and capacity, does he suppose that this country will be deceived by the investigation which he has proposed into the conduct of that gentleman? He sends a commission to Mr. Ogilvie, and Mr. Ogilvie, under his instructions, sends out a hand-bill, and hand-bills are posted over the Yukon district, and miners are asked to come in. Well, does the hon. gentleman suppose that Mr. F. C. Wade is going to be caught by any such investigation as that, if he has really been guilty of any wrongdoing in the Yukon. There is an old saying about catching a bird by putting salt on its tail. I do not think Mr. Wade could be caught by any salt which Mr. Ogilvie could throw upon him under those conditions. One of those miners, forsooth, is to come in, and without counsel, or at his own expense if he does provide counsel—is to come in before Mr. Ogilvie and challenge the acts and the administration of Mr. Wade and ask for an investigation into those charges. Why, Sir, the miners would have to come in one by one; there could be no investigation worthy of the name under conditions of that kind. And before whom is the investigation to be held? Before Mr. Ogilvie, a man who has had no legal experience or legal training. I have never attacked Mr. Ogilvie in this House, nor has any gentleman on this side of the House ever attacked him, so far as his honesty and integrity are concerned. We have bestowed praise upon him for what he did in the Yukon in the past. The hon. gentleman spent fifteen or twenty minutes here yesterday in defending Mr. Ogilvie from charges which had never been made against him. Now, Sir, what I say with regard to Mr. Ogilvie is this: His executive capacity as administrator in the Yukon remains to be proved, but I trust it will be proved and that he will be able to deal with the conditions up there. Up to the present time he has not shown that he is able to deal with the responsibilities the Minister has thrown upon him. But a man without any legal training, a man with no counsel to assist him, except so far as he may obtain, from time to time, the assistance of Mr. Clement, is instructed to go there and press these charges, with no detectives employed, with no satisfactory efforts made to get at the truth. The investigation which the hon. gentleman has proposed into the acts of these subordinate officials is an investigation which is not worthy of the name. Further than that, what do we observe? We observe that an investigation is to be made into the conduct of an intimate friend and confidant of the Minister of the Interior by the servant and employee of the Minister of the Interior; not only that, but by a gentleman, I believe, who is connected with the Minister of the Interior. Now, under these circumstances, does the hon. gentleman suppose that Mr. F. C. Wade has ever had any very great apprehension of the discovery of any wrong-doing by him, if he has been guilty of any wrong-doing? Does he imagine that Mr. F. C. Wade has been trembling in his shoes during all this time? Why, Sir, to show how Mr. F. C. Wade regarded the matter, it has been charged in a newspaper, conducted by a gentleman who sits behind the hon. the Minister of the Interior, that as late as November last, Mr. F. C. Wade was in the province of Manitoba, writing editorials in praise of the Minister of the Interior, giving an example of how the officers of the present Government refrain from any exhibition of offensive partisanship. Now, that will give to the House an idea of how much Mr. F. C. Wade dreaded any investigation which could be made before Mr. Ogilvie.

Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I need not dwell in greater detail on these points, but I think it is my duty to refer, to some extent, to the charges which have been made and to the evidence which has been given in support of those charges, as disclosed in the speech of the hon. member for Pictou. But, before coming to them, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman, that the charges of the hon. member for Pictou have not been so lightly regarded by some organs of the Government as they seem to be regarded by him and by some hon. gentlemen behind him. I refer to an editorial in the Toronto "Globe" of the 1st instant, in which the following language was used:—

He—

That is, the hon. member for Pictou.

—may, it is true, draw a distinction between Mr. Ogilvie's position as commissioner and his position as investigator, but no one will deny that an inquiry by a man who is admitted to be thoroughly upright and thoroughly acquainted with the country, and with mining, might be extremely useful. We do not say that an inquiry of another kind may not be necessary.

The organ of the hon. gentleman recognizes, if he does not recognize, that the investigation that is now supposed to be going on, is not the investigation which this House calls for and which this country calls for, and in the same article it says:

The Government has already, without any demand from Parliament, and without requiring specific charges, ordered an inquiry by an official whose integrity has passed into a proverb. But we do not say that the matter shall end there. Mr. Ogilvie's work will be of great value, but we are quite willing that if any mistake be made, it shall be made on the side of too much investigation rather than too little.

In dealing with this question I would point out the remarkable statement of the Minister of the Interior that the task of organizing the Yukon district was a task such as no man ever undertook before, or language to that effect, yet he expects Mr. Ogilvie without any previous experience in organization, having only the experience of a surveyor, to undertake that herculean task and also to deal with all these charges which have been sent broadcast through the country. Does not the hon. gentleman think that he is taxing Mr. Ogilvie a little too much? If this task of organizing and administering the Yukon is a task almost herculean in its proportions, how does he expect that Mr. Ogilvie can give the time and attention which are undoubtedly necessary to make any thorough or satisfactory investigation of these charges. Is it a wonder that the hon. gentleman's organ has stated that some other inquiry will be necessary and that the matter should not end there?

Now, the conditions under which this territory was administered by the department of the hon. gentleman were undoubtedly unique in one way. I do not understand that it is a fact that the greatest rush of mining population, that was ever known, was made into this region. I understand that quite as heavy a rush was made into the province of British Columbia in the early mining days, and, I also understand, and the fact has been stated in this House and has not been contradicted, that when the administration of British Columbia was conducted in those days under the direction of the Imperial Government, no such scandal, no such complaints, no such charges were ever heard of in the mining history of that province. The hon. gentleman seems to think that it is impossible to accomplish the administration of this district without the charges and scandals that have arisen. I point the hon. gentleman to the experience of British Columbia in that respect, and I ask him, or any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, why the experience of British Columbia should not have been repeated in the Yukon district? Now, the conditions were unique in this Yukon district. We know, Sir, that in the colonies of the Empire, among strange people, among barbarous people, among people who have very little idea of right and wrong, British law and British practice have been recognized in the past as about the highest type of administration that the world has ever known. We know that British justice and British administration have been proverbial among the silent, sullen people of whom Kipling speaks. We know that the eyes of the whole world were directed to the administration of law in the Yukon district by the discovery of gold there, and that therefore it behooved the hon. gentleman, having regard to the standard which had obtained in the past, under such circumstances, to exercise the utmost care. What was the result? The hon. gentleman knows the result; the whole country knows the result. Canada received an advertisement, it is true, so far as the Yukon district was concerned, but it received an advertisement, in Canada, in the United States and in England, which will be a reproach to this country as long as these words are remembered. Now, I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that this was not necessary, and that for the reasons which I have already given, the hon. gentleman might have administered this district with different results and upon different principles. What are the charges which have been made by the hon. member for Pictou as to what has taken place in the Yukon district? The charges, briefly summarized, may be said to be these:

1. That a notorious system of bribery among Government officials has been rendered necessary by the inability to otherwise procure them to perform their duties.
2. That blackmailing by officials of persons applying to record claims has prevailed.
3. That unfair and fraudulent use has been made by officials of knowledge acquired in the discharge of their duties.
4. That the Gold Commissioner's legal adviser accepted retainers from persons contesting claims before the commissioner.
5. That the Dominion Lands agent has accepted retainers to procure grants issued by himself, and used the police to dispossess squatters of these lands.
6. That the Dominion Lands agent, as well as other officials, was interested in the grant of the water front.
7. That unsanitary conditions have unnecessarily prevailed in the district.
8. That defective postal accommodation and arrangements have prevailed.
9. That there has been an abuse of liquor permits.

The hon. gentleman has endeavoured to deal with some, but not all of these charges, and we were told the other evening by the hon. gentleman that there was a great lack of evidence on our part, that no specific and no sufficient data had been given by the hon. member for Pictou. I wish briefly to run over in the hearing of the House the particulars of the charges which have been made by the hon. member for Pictou, and which have been supported by evidence to which I will refer later on. We have specific charges. Some of them are as follows:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

1. The corrupt leasing of the water front to Morrison & Macdonald by private contract, in disregard of the rights of the squatters, and at a yearly profit of some $80,000 or $90,000 to them.
2. The charge that Mr. F. C. Wade and other Government officials are interested in that grant.
3. The retainer of Mr. Wade by the applicants for that lease and the payment to him of a large retainer.
4. The retainer of Mr. Wade by persons having claims contested before the Gold Commissioner, whose legal adviser he is.
5. The case of the miners William Huslig, Arthur Brown and John Statton.
6. The case of Dr. Leblanc.

The hon. Minister of the Interior endeavoured to deal with that by telling us that Dr. Leblanc visited his office and sent him a note asking whether the Minister desired to see him. The hon. gentleman says that he sent word out asking if Dr. Leblanc had any business with him, and then he says that Dr. Leblanc went away. Well, that seems a rather curious transaction, and it reminds us a little of the misapprehension which prevailed between the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) and Mr. Hamilton Smith last year. It seems certainly, to say the least, a singular thing that Dr. Leblanc should take the trouble to come to Ottawa, go to the hon. gentleman's office and go away without seeing him. However, we are bound in all fairness to accept the statement of the Minister of the Interior in that respect. Then the next thing is the experience of Capt. Caddell, the case of Mrs. Dubois, the case of squatters on Dominion Creek, the case of Nellie Cashman, the case of Lucile Elliott vs. Andrew Donnelley, with which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) dealt last evening; the case of the two Swedes who applied for a license to put a log boom into the Klondike, with which he did not deal, and the case of the miner Talmadge, with which he did not deal. I will not weary the House, Mr. Speaker, by going over these charges and repeating them; they are spread out with distinctness and impartiality in the "Hansard," as given to the House by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper. But I will refer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) to the persons by whom these charges were made, and I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. gentlemen of this House, as to whether they are not supported by sufficient witnesses to have justified an investigation long and long ago. In the first place, they were specifically stated by thirteen representative men appointed by a mass meeting of miners; these gentlemen's names are given and they are attached to the memorial presented to the Government in August last. As I am informed by my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), a mass meeting of about 10,000 people elected these thirteen men. These charges are given fully and distinctly in that memorial, and although they are given fully and distinctly, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has waited from August until February of the present year, before he put it in the power of Mr. Ogilvie to investigate these charges. Further than that, Sir, I will mention now lest I forget it, that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) did send out that commission, he limited Mr. Ogilvie's investigation, as I am informed, to charges made before the 25th August, 1898. That is rather an extraordinary state of affairs. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) knows, and the House knows, that this mining population is a moving population, that men who were there in August and before August, 1898, may have scattered all over Canada and the United States, or Australia or other continents, and yet, instead of sending that commission out with power to investigate all charges past, present or future, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) sent his commission out in such form that Mr. Ogilvie, as advised by Mr. Clement, has decided that he has no power whatever to investigate charges made after that date, and has expressed his surprise and regret that the commission to him should have been limited in that way.

Now, Sir, charges have been made also by the correspondent of the London "Times," in the most specific terms. It is true that the correspondent of the "Times" did not give names and persons and dates, but so far as the charges are concerned, so far as the nature of the charges are concerned, in the months of August and September last, the London "Times" both in the columns of its correspondence and its editorial columns, gave the particulars of these charges. The next witness to whom we can refer and whose testimony is given in the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), is Mr. M. E. C. Woodford, against whom I have not heard the Minister of the Interior make any charge of unfairness or incompetency. The next witness is Captain Caddell, the next witness Dr. Leblanc, and the next witness C. M. Woodworth, as to whom the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has produced a telegram. The hon. gentleman read a telegram with regard to Mr. Woodworth to the House, and he says that the telegram which was received in reply was sent for the purpose of being read in the House. If it were, there is nothing in the telegram as sent and which the hon. gentleman read, to indicate that, but whether it was so sent or not I venture to think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) will require to bring forward something other than a telegram of that kind, before he can do away with the effect of the charges made by these witnesses. In the next place, we have the statement of Mr. McCook, the United States Consul, and of Mr. Dunham, the United States agent, and the statements made by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper on the authority of four gentlemen, whose names it is true he has not given to the House, but whose statements he has read to the House, and whose statements are of the most damaging character, so far as the administration of the Yukon is concerned.

It was said that the statements of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) ought not to be regarded because he did not give the names of those witnesses, but I venture to think that the hon. member for Pictou satisfactorily explained his position in that respect, and I venture to think also that his word to this House, standing in his place as a member of this House, should have had some regard in that view. We know that members of this House have made representations to members of the Government with respect to the conduct of office holders in this country. We know that members of the Government have declared the policy of the Government to be this: That if any statement of fact of that character was made by a member of Parliament to the Government, the Government would act on that, and without giving the accused party any right to reply would dismiss him from office. Well, Sir, if the word of a member of Parliament is useful for a purpose of that kind, I venture to think it is also useful and ought to be regarded when a member of Parliament stands in his place, and makes the statement which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has made. Sir, I have a slight addition to make to the statements concerning the administration of the Yukon, and I would like to ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I read one or two statements which have been sent in since the hon. member for Pictou left Ottawa, and which have been received by other members of this House. The statement which I now propose to read is a statement made by a gentleman whose name will be given, and who can be produced whenever the Government will direct any proper investigation into this case. He says:

What we must have is a thorough investigation before a judge, and the witnesses questioned by a lawyer who thoroughly understands the case. There are a lot of men who will not come forward and volunteer testimony, but if they are put in the box they will tell it as it is. If I am subpoenaed I am not going to swear a lie. Now, take the conduct of Wade. He was Crown prosecutor, registrar, agent and the devil knows what he was not—he has now left. McGregor, his health was not very good, and he got out. McGregor was mine inspector. There was Norwood, collector of royalty; he admits himself that he made those pay that he could scare and squeeze, and others he let go and they never paid. Then McFarlane, assistant timber inspector—he came out—in fact, they are all out. In fact, Wade was there for Wade, Craig for Craig, Boulton for Boulton, and Fortune for himself. These men were all under Wade and Fawcett. These men would get together and induce Fawcett to issue some outrageous order and then, after it was issued and posted, they would tell him that it was all wrong and contrary to the mining law, and then he would cancel it and they would get in their work.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) spent a good deal of his time in defending Mr. Fawcett against alleged charges of dishonesty. I think all the statements read by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), with the exception of one, stated that

Mr. Fawcett was weak and not dishonest. The thing that was complained of was his incapacity, his inability to stand up against those able and clever men whom the hon. Minister of the Interior sent into that district. The witness continues as follows :

Take the case on Dominion Creek. The first man to discover gold on a creek stakes it, and that is called "discovery," and he gets 500 feet, and when claims are staked thereafter they are numbered 1, 2 and 3 above or below discovery, as the case may be. For some reason or other on Dominion Creek there were two "discovery" claims. Consequently Fawcett got all muddled up, and they had to call one "New Discovery" and "Old Discovery." Consequently, a man by the name of Donnelley, who had worked a claim for three months, went to get it recorded and found that Lucila Elliott had recorded the same claim the day before. Fawcett decided that he could not take any cognizance of Donnelley's claim, as Lucila Elliott was the first to record it. This created considerable friction, and so Fawcett shut up the creek and set about to make a new survey. About the first week in July there was posted up on the Gold Commissioner's door a notice saying on the 10th July Dominion Creek will be open to prospectors to locate claims, and parties wishing to locate claims must get a permit from the Gold Commissioner's office, and must work the claim 16 days and find a good prospect of gold before his claim will be recorded. You could not get a permit before, and if you went without a permit you could not stake any claim. The miners objected to this. The regulations say that if you pay $10 you are a free miner and can stake a claim anywhere. In the meantime, Mr. Wade, Mr. Craig, and Mr. Boulton began peddling these permits out in advance for $100 or $50, and pocketed the money. On the 7th, Wade spoke to Fawcett and said they had made a mistake, and called a meeting to discuss the matter. At that meeting Major Walsh, Wade, Fawcett and two or three others attended, and after discussing it for a while, came to the conclusion that it was contrary to the mining regulations, and that they revoke the order; and consequently on the 10th it was legal for anybody to go without a permit or anything else. In the meantime, Lucila Elliott got a permit, and some of the miners got her drunk and got the permit from her. Then the question rose, who issued this permit? It was signed by Fawcett, and he said it was given on the order of Major Walsh. Walsh said Fawcett was a liar, but Fawcett said it was on Walsh's verbal order.

So much for that statement. Then, there is another point. This witness says the soldiers were entirely unnecessary. He says :

Capt. Starnes wrote to the Government, pointing out the difference between the mounted police and the soldiers. The police can take a man without warrant or anything else, but the soldiers cannot do anything unless the Riot Act is read. These soldiers were sent in by the Stikine route, and they made a contract with the Hudson's Bay Company to carry their supplies from Glenora to Teslin Lake at 40 cents a pound, while they could have been taken by the White Pass for 7 cents a pound. 150 of the soldiers are now at Tagish, where there are about 20 poor miserable Indians and one white man. The other 50 have gone to Dawson. This will cost the Government at least $300,000. The miners object to having soldiers. The miners as a rule are a very independent lot of men. They do not object to policemen, but they do to the soldiers. They say that instead of spending this money on soldiers, why did not the Government improve the road from Dawson to Bonanza, Eldorado and other creeks. As it is now, it is simply a marsh. Also do something to improve the navigation in the rivers. Something should be done at the White Horse Rapids, Five Fingers, Rink Rapids and Thirty-Mile River.

Further, he says :

Dr. Leblanc, he is a respectable man. He could give you some information. He has a partner named Metcalfe. They have some claims, and Dr. Leblanc wanted an abstract of title, as he was going to London to sell them. He went to the office to get these abstracts, but he could not get near them, so he came to me and said, "You know these fellows; I want to get out by the next boat; can you get me the abstract? The fee is $2.50, and I have seven claims, or $17.50;" he said, "give them anything they want." His friend went to the side door and saw Boulton, and said, "I will give you $40 for those abstracts," and he got them at once. And the Doctor went out by the boat. $17.50 went to the Government and $22.50 to Boulton. Suppose you land at Dawson and you want to stake a claim. You go up the creek and you will find stakes like a graveyard, with four or five stakes on each claim, and you don't know what is taken and what is not, but a go-between will say to you, "I have a friend in the Gold Commissioner's office; I will get a plan of what is staked and what is not for $25." Then you can go with your eyes shut, stake your claim and get it recorded without any trouble. The officers in the Gold Commissioner's office know whether a claim is a good one or not. When they hear of a good claim, and if there is an unstaked piece near it, they will say, "Give me a half interest and I will put you on to a good thing." Or, if he does not know much about it, he will say, "Give me $15, $20 or $25, and I will tell you where there is a vacant claim." This, of course, goes into the clerk's pocket. There is more money taken in at the side door than at the front. The trouble is the men are underpaid.

That statement is made by a witness who has given his name, and says he is willing to testify, and will come forward and testify, if an investigation is ordered. Now, my hon. friend from the city of Victoria (Mr. Prior) has taken a good deal of interest in matters pertaining to the Yukon district, and he has brought to me, for the purpose of having their statement taken, two men who are now in Ottawa, Mr. Allen and Mr. Semple. These gentlemen are here in connection with the administration of affairs in the Yukon district; and, at the request of my hon. friend, who knew I was accustomed, as a lawyer, to taking statements of this kind, and possibly could do it more efficiently than he could, I took, in his presence, a statement from these men, whose names are known, and who say, that what they state to me has already been stated by them in the public prints in the city of Dawson. After their statement was taken, I read it over to them in the presence of the hon. member for Victoria. Wherever they suggested any change, or were not certain and positive, I corrected the statement; and wherever there was any doubt, I gave the administration in the Yukon the benefit of the doubt. I took the statement from these gentlemen as I would take a statement for the purpose of dealing with a witness in court. I tried to take a fair, accurate and impartial statement from them, and I will read to you what they told me in the presence of the hon. member for Victoria :

The administration of the Gold Commissioner's office has been notoriously corrupt since we have resided in Dawson. We have resided there since 10th June, 1898. We cannot believe it possible that Mr. Fawcett was ignorant of what was going on. There would be three or four hundred men standing in line in front of his office waiting to record their claims. They would wait before the office for days, sometimes as many as ten days. While the men went to their meals, and over night, and on Sundays, their places were retained by checks issued by a policeman. Such a check entitled a man to resume his place on returning. There were two side doors to the office, one marked "Private," the other marked "No Admittance." It was possible to obtain admission to the door marked "Private" by payment of a bribe of $5 or $10, and to obtain admission to the door marked "No Admittance" by payment of a bribe of from $15 upwards.

Twenty-five dollars was the average bribe for this door. The men who obtained admission by this system of bribery got their claims recorded ahead of the men who remained in line before the front door. The $25 door was higher-priced because more expeditious. The man who got his claim recorded first had the registered title.

The hon. gentleman will see the significance of that. The hon. Minister of the Interior told us that some of these miners disregarded the staking, and would go on staking over again and at the same time he told us they were a most law-abiding people because they paid this royalty without any demur. According to his own account, however, they sometimes disregarded the staking. Suppose two men have staked the same lot, one goes and stands in line four or five days, and is the man who actually staked the lot first and who was in line first. He does not know about either of the side doors, or if he does he has not the money to spare to get in. But the man who staked after him knows about the side door, and gets in, has his claim recorded, and gets the registered title, leaving the other man, if he has the legal right, the doubtful advantage in the meantime of a lawsuit. That statement of the facts will show to the House how scandalous it was that such a system as this should have prevailed for any length of time whatever in the Yukon district under the administration of the Department of the Interior.

The money was paid to the guard at the door. The deals to get in in this way were usually made the night before.

I cross-examined these gentlemen about that. I asked them: Do you mean to say that a man would go and get a ticket to enter this door as he would buy tickets for a theatre. Oh, no, was the reply, business was not done in that way. You would not see the men inside in the office, but you would see the guard or some understrapper at a restaurant, and the arrangement would be made to come to the door the next day and pay a certain sum and get in. That is the way it was done. It was kept secret as far as it could be kept secret.

The officials inside the doors were E. D. Boulton, mining recorder, and C. F. Hurdman, bench claims recorder.

Hurdman is the same man concerning whom I read the evidence last evening—the evidence of Mr. Murdock, who swore that he got his claim recorded by giving Mr. Hurdman one-third interest in it, which interest he valued at $1,500. Does any hon. gentleman suppose that Hurdman or Boulton, inside the doors, did not know something about this. Is it not a fair inference from the payment of that money to the guard that the men inside, without whose connivance surely this could not have been done, not only knew of the transaction, but shared, to some extent at least, in the proceeds.

Boulton and Hurdman were still in office when we left Dawson City on the 29th January last.

The hon. Minister of the Interior says that the administration of his department has been characterized by diligence and progress, and yet this sort of thing has been going on since last May. I say that, not on the unsupported statement of the men who used that language to me, but on the statement also of the thirteen miners elected by a mass meeting of ten thousand men and on the authority of the correspondent of the London "Times," whose statements on that subject have been read to this House and were known to the Minister of the Interior in the month of July and August last, and yet the hon. gentleman has the courage—I will not use any stronger term—to stand up in this House and tell us that the administration of his department has been characterized by diligence and progress. The statement continues as follows:—

Dr. J. L. Gibitz can give evidence of having paid money directly to Mr. Boulton for admission through the side door to record a claim.

Dr. Gibitz is now in the Yukon, and his testimony can be procured.

W. C. Wilkins can give evidence of money paid to Hurdman for a similar purpose. John Donnelley paid $4 to get in the side door, after waiting three or four days in line, and found his claim had been recorded to another while he was waiting. John L. Hersey paid $20 to get in the side door to record a claim.

Hon. gentlemen will see that these charges do not lack the quality of being specific, and do not lack names. They are specific, and the names are given, and the names could have been procured by the hon. gentleman months ago. It was not necessary for these two gentlemen to come to the city of Ottawa and come to my room in my hotel and give that statement to me. If the hon. gentleman had wanted to get information on this subject, if his administration had been characterized by the diligence and promptness to which he vainly lays claim, that information could have been in his possession in July, August or September last.

Another man, whose name is withheld at his request, paid $400 to an employee occupying an official position for inside information from the Gold Commissioner's office.

And I am told that this man—and I give it for what it is worth—if a proper tribunal, untrammelled by any of the restrictions I have already mentioned, is appointed, is willing to go before that tribunal and give that information on oath.

Opposite 49 below discovery on Bonanza Creek a miner was cheated out of a rich find by the connivance of officials in the Gold Commissioner's office. The name will be given, and evidence produced, when a proper investigation is ordered.

Mrs. Dubois was deprived of a claim by one Murdock with the connivance of an official, Hurdman, in the Gold Commissioner's office. Hurdman got one-third interest. We understand that Mr. Senkler has restored the claim to Mrs. Dubois.

That is a matter about which I spoke last evening. I read the evidence, as to which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries asked me for some information.

The case of Mrs. Addie Butler, on Gold Hill, at junction of Bonanza and Eldorado creeks, is an extraordinary one. She holds a certificate of record for a full relocated claim 100 feet square, against which there are three additional certificates of record fractionizing the claim, in violation of departmental instructions. This case is complicated, but can be presented fully before a proper tribunal of investigation.

This business of fractionizing is an improper violation of departmental regulations for the purpose of cutting across a person's claim and taking out a particular portion of that claim where the paying streak is supposed to be, after the first person owning that claim has to some extent developed it. I do not pretend to understand the case fully, because I saw it was too complicated for me to explain to this House without diagrams and without going into the matter more fully than the time at my service would permit.

J. F. Riley, clerk for Inspector of Mines Madden, is located at Bonanza Forks, and is an employee of the Government. He staked and recorded on October 10, 1898, a fraction of 24,164½ square feet, the legal staking being 10,000 square feet. He holds a certificate of record for this in direct violation of the regulations. A copy of the abstract of title is in our possession,—

And is in the city of Ottawa——and can be produced. We have in our possession passes in use in the Gold Commissioner's office for admission by the side door. They are stamped with the office stamp "Interior Department, Yukon Territory," and are initialed by officials.

What do hon. gentlemen think of that—passes for admission at the side door which these men say are in their possession, and can be produced? Passes to enable men to go out of line, to go to this side door, and, for a pecuniary consideration, to get admission to that door and record their claims before the men who remain in line and try honestly to get their claims recorded.

Respecting the grant of the water front, the facts as stated by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper in his speech are believed to be correct by the people of Dawson. So strong has the feeling become that the tenants have not paid rent since the commencement of the year. The streets are in a frightful condition in Dawson in the summer. No sanitary arrangements have been provided by the Government, with the exception of three outhouses, which have been in a most disgraceful condition. Typhoid prevailed last summer, and promises to be an epidemic this summer. As to mail and postal accommodation, it is enough to say that from close of navigation, about 1st October, to about the middle of January, no mail matter, except official matter, arrived at Dawson. In other words, the general public during that period received no mail through the Post Office Department.

That is exactly contrary to what the Postmaster General stated the other evening. But I have more evidence with regard to that, which I will produce at a later stage of my remarks, which absolutely supports what these gentlemen have stated.

We have heard that the November and December mail will not come in until navigation opens. During a considerable portion of this time—

That is, between the 1st October and the middle of January—a portion of the time while the lakes and rivers had been closed.

—hardly a day has elapsed that private parties have not arrived at or left Dawson.

Now, it would strike one as peculiar, if private parties could arrive at and leave Dawson, that the mail could not arrive at and leave Dawson. Official mail, as I understand from these gentlemen, and as I have stated, has been transmitted by the Mounted Police, but not the regular mail for the public. It has been transmitted in the manner which is shown in what I am now about to read from the same statement from these two gentlemen:

Hardly a day has elapsed that private parties have not arrived at or left Dawson carrying letters at from 50 cents to $1 each. People are glad to pay this to get their mail carried. We have read over the report of the interview with us in the "Citizen," and it represents correctly our views.

That is a statement with which I will not weary the House. It appeared in the "Citizen" on Monday or Tuesday morning, and it contains general charges, but does not enter into particulars in the way I have dealt with them in this statement. Then the statement concludes, as follows:—

With very trifling exceptions, what we have stated to you has been published in our newspaper, the "Klondike Nugget," and none of the officials charged have taken any action against us.

So, they are not stating behind the back of these men anything they have not already stated in the Yukon before their face.

Now, Sir, I have another document, which has been placed in my hands, and which bears date as late as 1st March, 1899. It is a letter written by a man whose name I will give. His character, respectability and trustworthiness can be vouched for by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). He is Colonel McGregor, late of Glengarry and now of Dawson, president or vice-president of the miners' committee elected at the mass meeting, to which I have already referred. In a letter addressed to the hon. member for Glengarry and dated, as I have said, 1st March, 1899, he makes the following statements. They are statements, I think, which had already been made in the miners' memorial in August, and I read this letter to show, that up to the present time this gentleman has seen nothing which would induce him to change his views:

You have no doubt been informed through the press and otherwise long before now of the overstrained relations that exist between the representatives of the Government and the public in the Yukon territory. For some time during the past summer the situation threatened to be serious. Several mass meetings were held in Dawson to consider what steps could be taken to bring about a better order of things. At one of those meetings, attended by about 10,000 people, representing all enlightened nations, a committee consisting of twelve members entitled "Miners' Committee," was appointed for the purpose of making some effort to relieve the distressed situation. This committee prepared a memorial and mailed it to the Premier under date of August 25, 1898.

There was postal communication up to that time. The letter must have reached the Government, I suppose, about the middle or towards the end of September.

In reply, a commission, named a "Royal Commission," was sent in here to Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner of the Yukon territory, to investigate alleged charges of bribery, corruption and fraud on the part of the officers of the administration of the Yukon, as set forth in our memorial. This commission arrived here five months after our memorial was received at Ottawa, and Mr. Ogilvie acting under instructions from his legal adviser, Mr. Clement, ruled that no matters occurring subsequent to the 25th August, 1898, the date of our memorial, can be investigated by this commission.

I inclose a copy of the "Nugget" newspaper, which will give you more light on the matter. I intended many times to have written you describing the situation, but failed. I hope, however, to be able to keep you better posted in the future. I have been secretary and vice-president of the Miners' Association for some time past. At present I have full charge as president.

Messrs. Armstrong and MacDougall, who are associated with me, are from England. * * * The camp would be a pretty good one if the administration of affairs was what it should be. But it is almost impossible for a man to do anything unless he is in with the official ring of corruption and fraud.

Now, Sir, that gentleman, who is a responsible man, who is vouched for by an hon. member of this House, whose name has been given to this House, gives you his view of the condition of the administration of the Yukon, and that is a condition of affairs which has existed, as I have already pointed out to the House, not for a few days, not for a few weeks, not for a few months, but for many months, for nearly a year; and yet the Minister of the Interior stands up in this House and lauds the energy, the diligence, and the promptness with which he dealt with these matters. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman seems to think that an efficient and business-like way of dealing with a condition of affairs like that, is to send a commission to Mr. Ogilvie, already overburdened by the work of the Yukon, directing Mr. Ogilvie to post hand-bills calling upon the miners to come in and make their charges. Why, I am almost tempted to say that an investigation of that kind before Mr. Ogilvie against Mr. F. C. Wade is very much like an investigation of the hon. Minister of the Interior by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Ogilvie, the servant and employee of the Minister of the Interior, investigates Mr. F. C. Wade, the chosen friend, the political friend, the man in close confidence with the Minister of the Interior, and the country is to expect that from that investigation, taken in that way, carried on by miners at their own expense, any satisfactory result could possibly be obtained, even if the worst possible scandals had been prevalent in the Yukon. The thing seems to me, and I have tried to view it in a reasonable light, to be absurd, to be impossible. You cannot satisfy the country by any investigation of that kind. What the country wants is an investigation which I will describe to the hon. gentleman, an investigation such as that which is referred to in the "Globe" newspaper which I read a while ago. Take the very best man in Canada, the very best judge, if you like, in Canada, the man against whose ability, against whose fearlessness, against whose integrity there cannot be the faintest suspicion—that may be true of Mr. Ogilvie—but a man further who has judicial training and knowledge of law, and the experience which will enable him to do this work; then employ counsel to accompany and assist him as to whose good faith and ability, and experience you have no doubt, and send this gentleman into the Yukon, and have an investigation to clear, if you like, these gentlemen, as I hope that they will be cleared. But until that is done, I venture to say that the country will not be satisfied, and that some gentlemen, at least, on the other side of the House who have some ideas on this subject, will not be very well satisfied. The fortunes of the Minister of the Interior and the fortunes of Mr. F. C. Wade may be of importance to the Minister of the Interior, and even to the Liberal party, but I tell the right hon. the Prime Minister that there is something of more importance to the Liberal party than even the fortunes of the Minister of the Interior or of Mr. F. C. Wade, and that is the honour of the Liberal party, and the honour of this country, and the necessity that charges of this kind made by responsible people, and in responsible journals, and heralded for months throughout the length and breadth of this land, should not be put aside with any such formal investigation as has been suggested by the Minister of the Interior, an investigation, as I have already pointed out, which does not even extend beyond the 25th day of August, 1898. Now, the hon. gentleman told us of the great activity he has displayed in looking up certain information with regard to the permit referred to in the speech of the hon. member for Pictou. He has had the legal directory of British Columbia gone over, and he has had the indexes of the 190,000 letters gone over to obtain information on this subject. If the hon. gentleman had exhibited a little of that diligence, a little of that persistence, and a little of that activity with respect to this investigation, the country would have been a little better satisfied. If the hon. gentleman had even done with regard to this investigation what he did with regard to the alleged election frauds in the province of Manitoba, the country would have been better satisfied. The hon. gentleman made a very skilful speech last evening, and one of the most skilful things with regard to that speech was that he did not attempt to answer the hon. member for Pictou with regard to the comparison that he instituted between the vigour of the hon. gentleman with regard to the prosecutions in Manitoba, and his inaction with regard to these scandals. Not one word from beginning to end did the hon. gentleman give to the House with regard to the challenge made in the most direct manner by the hon. member for Pictou. Did he, I wonder, in the interval, in the four days which elapsed between the speech of the member for Pictou and his speech, make an investigation as to whether Mr. Perdue has paid back that $228. Nevertheless it might have been of some importance to this country that he should have employed some of his clerks to investigate that question, rather than do the work which they did do to enable him to make an impertinent allusion to the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou. What do hon. members on the other side of the House think with regard to that? The facts with regard to Mr. Perdue were stated by the hon. member for Pictou, who read the evidence from the report of the committee substantiating what he said.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. Perdue drew a draft on the hon. Minister of the Interior and that draft fell due, I think, about the 30th June, 1898. On the same day, the Minister of the Interior was hurrying up the Department of Justice to have an Order in Council passed for the purpose of paying out to him the sum of $6,964.41 to enable him to pay advances which he had made to legal gentlemen in the province of Manitoba, in respect to these prosecutions. Among the bills charged up and paid was one of $541.15, being the account of Mr. W. E. Perdue. Now, at this time, Mr. Perdue's account had not been taxed and the hon. gentleman had accepted a bill from Mr. Perdue for the amount of that account as he had retained Mr. Perdue; and he desired to reimburse himself, through the Government of Canada, for the liability which he had so contracted. The draft upon which the hon. gentleman became so liable is to be found at page 147 of the ninth report of the Committee on Public Accounts. It is as follows:—

Three months after date, pay to the order of myself $541.15/100 (five hundred and forty-one 15/100 dollars), and charge to account of

W. E. PERDUE.

Following that:

Accepted payable at the Bank of British North America, Ottawa.

CLIFFORD SIFTON.

This draft fell due on the 30th of June, and on that date a great many messages were sent backward and forward in order to have the Department of Justice hasten this Order in Council. The Order in Council was made and the sum of $6,964.41 was paid out to the Minister of the Interior. The work was done altogether behind the back of the Department of Justice, so far as the officials were concerned, although it was done, I believe, with the knowledge of the late Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, but it was altogether under the direction of the Minister of the Interior, and he assumed personal liability. He paid out this sum of $541.15, and he took up the draft which he had accepted. What happened afterwards? The Minister of Justice insisted upon having these accounts taxed by the Department of Justice; they were taxed by the Department of Justice, and Mr. Perdue's account was taxed down to the sum of $313.15 after he had been paid $541.15. The Minister of Justice approved of that taxation, as stated on oath by his deputy. Now, Sir, although that money was placed in the hands of the hon. Minister of the Interior for the sole purpose of making advances in connection with bills properly chargeable to the Government in connection with this prosecution, I do not find any evidence in this report that Mr. Perdue has ever paid back the balance of $228 to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, and I do not find any evidence that the Minister of the Interior has paid back that sum. The net result of the transaction is that the Minister of the Interior has relieved himself of the payment of a draft, accepted by himself, for the sum of $541.15 for services performed by Mr. Perdue and Mr. Perdue has got that money in his pocket, while the officials of the Department of Justice, with the approval of Sir Oliver Mowat, have decided that Mr. Perdue should have received only $313.13.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). He does not hear that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would it not have been well for the hon. gentleman—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Where is that money?

Mr. McMULLEN. Where is the Onderdonk money?

Mr. BENNETT. Where is your laundry bill?

Mr. COCHRANE. Where are all the principles that you advocated when you were over here?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would it not have been well for the hon. Minister of the Interior to have employed some of his industry, in the days which elapsed after these charges were made, in discovering whether the consolidated revenue fund had received back this $228? Would it not have been well to have set in train some action by the Government which would have led to the restoration of that sum? I only refer to this in passing; it is only an incident, but it is an incident that might better have demanded the attention of the hon. gentleman than the fact that the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou had sent a telegram for a liquor permit. In respect to this matter of the payment to Mr. Perdue, he had been distinctly challenged across the floor of the House and he did not say a word in his five-hour speech in reply to the hon. member for Pictou. But for the purpose of gratuitously drawing in a reference to a gentleman, who, I venture to think, has as good a standing as himself, he sent his clerks searching through his files and triumphantly announced to the House, as an answer to all these scandals, to this disgraceful state of affairs in the Yukon, that the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou had telegraphed to him for a permit to take liquor into the Yukon. What a complete answer it was, and how satisfactory it is to the country. It is almost as satisfactory as the investigation seven months after the charges were made before a subordinate of the hon. gentleman and against an intimate friend and political confidant of the hon. gentleman. One is just about as satisfactory to the country as the other, and I think hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will come to that conclusion before this debate is finished. But this is only an incident. There is an application of these Manitoba prosecutions which may be made and, I think, may be made, not greatly to the advantage of the hon. Minister of the Interior. Seven months elapsed after these charges were made before Mr. Ogilvie was directed to make any investigation in regard to them; three days after the election of 1896 took place the hon. gentleman instructed Mr. Howell, of Winnipeg, to telegraph to the Pinkerton detectives—three days in one case and seven months in the other. The hon. gentleman may congratulate himself in regard to his promptness and diligence in respect to the Manitoba prosecutions, but I think a delay of seven months hardly justifies him in boasting to this House of his promptness and diligence in respect to these Yukon scandals. I put that to the hon. gentleman in all fairness, in all candour and sincerity, and I put it to the Prime Minister of this country who will have to answer for these things to this House and this country. Why, Sir, the comparison is monstrous when you come to look at it. The Minister of Justice in this country has stated, in a letter which was read by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), that this Government has nothing to do with the administration of justice in the province of Manitoba, and that that function properly belongs to the province. No evidence was given to the Government of Canada of anything having taken place improperly in the province of Manitoba, except a vague charge of suspicion by a gentleman who is not a member of this House. And yet the Prime Minister said what? He said:

We will most willingly furnish the necessary funds for the service, in order to carry on the work in which you are engaged.

And the Prime Minister did not wait for a letter; he sent these instructions by telegram on the 24th July,—the Minister of the Interior having already on the 26th day of June, and while the Government of Sir Charles Tupper was still in power undertaken to carry on these prosecutions, and the Prime Minister pledged the Government of Canada under these circumstances to carry them on. And yet, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), employing detectives for that purpose, and on the credit of the Government of Canada—according to the sworn testimony of the man whom he employed—sending out Pinkerton detectives within three days, employing the time from June to December in fishing—I am using exactly the words of Mr. Howell—under these circumstances the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has the hardihood to tell this House, that he was prompt and diligent with respect to these Yukon scandals in sending a commission there seven months after the charges were made known.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I am anxious to get the hon. gentleman's charge. Do I understand him to say that it was seven months after the Minister of the Interior received the miners' complaint that he issued the commission to Mr. Ogilvie?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know when he issued his commission to Mr. Ogilvie.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) said seven months.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will tell you—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am merely asking for information.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And I will give it to you. I stated that the Postmaster General of Canada has said, that during last summer the postal facilities between Dawson and Vancouver were perfectly unimpaired, and there is evidence that when the public mail was not delivered the official mail was delivered. Now, I say that the Minister of the Interior has stated that before the 15th July, 1898, he knew of charges or complaints against Mr. Wade and Mr. McGregor, and, Sir, these charges and complaints which were made public in the journals of this country at the time were infinitely of graver import than anything the Minister (Mr. Sifton) had before him when he directed an inquiry into these Manitoba prosecutions. And I say, that for seven months after that time, this matter remained without investigation. Some of that period undoubtedly would have been taken up in communicating with the Yukon, and in sending a royal commission; no doubt about that; but what I desire to point out to my hon. friend is this, that that period did elapse, and that that period elapsed although the Postmaster General has stated that post office communication was uninterrupted during that period. Suppose, for the gratification of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) I should strike off two months, and say that such time would necessarily have been employed in making any further investigation into the matter and in sending the commission forward, still, I think, I have a pretty liberal margin of allowance when I have three days in the one case and five months in the other; when I have in the one case the Minister of the Interior dealing with a matter as Attorney General of Manitoba, at the cost of the Dominion Government, for the purpose of securing evidence to fight election petitions, and in the other case I have grave scandals brought to his attention before the 15th of July, 1898, and no action, no effective action taken upon these scandals by an investigation until the month of February, 1899. Does the hon. the Minister (Mr. Sifton) think that this country will regard it as a satisfactory answer to that charge, that the law partner of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) telegraphed him for a liquor permit. Sir, I do not think the country will regard that as a satisfactory answer.

Now, Sir, I have dwelt for some considerable time upon these matters in connection with the Manitoba election fund, so-called, but I do not wish to weary the House because the matter has been fully gone into by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in the course of a five hours speech has not given one syllable of an answer to that portion of the charges set forth by the hon. member for Pictou. I repeat again, that I think one of the most skillful things in the reply of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), was his complete ignoring of those charges, skillful for the reason that he had not any answer whatever to them; and for the reason further, that when his activity for the purpose of injuring political opponents in Manitoba, is contrasted with his inactivity when his political friends are in question in the Yukon, the comparison is so striking that no member of this House could fail to be moved by it. I am very sorry that I have been wearying the House for so long.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I know that this debate has been protracted, but I must submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. gentlemen on the other side, that it is a difficult thing to answer a five and a half hours' speech in an hour and a half, and I will just be as short as I possibly can. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) derived a great deal of consolation from some statements which were made by Mr. W. J. Tupper with regard to his friend Mr. Wade, and deservedly so, because any statement made by Mr. W. J. Tupper, or by any other member of the family of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is undoubtedly entitled to great weight.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). However, Sir, I observe that it is only when it suits his purpose that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is inclined to attach that great weight to statements made by members of the family of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper). The circumstances with regard to that particular matter, so far as I understand them are, that when Mr. F. C. Wade was attacked by a member of his own political party, Mr. W. J. Tupper, with that generosity which is not very often found perhaps in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite, came to the rescue of his political foe, Mr. Wade, and wrote a letter in a Manitoba newspaper, endeavouring to save Mr. Wade from Mr. Wade's political friends. And, Sir, that is the thing out of which the Minister of the Interior derives so much consolation. Does the Minister of the Interior suggest to this House, that because Mr. W. J. Tupper, animated by these generous feelings under these circumstances, saw fit to write a letter in defence of a man who is his personal friend; that this is an answer which the country or this House will accept to the charges made against Mr. F. C. Wade in the Yukon. If the hon. gentleman thinks that, he will probably come to a contrary conclusion before this matter has been finally dealt with.

Now, the hon. gentleman derived a great deal of consolation from the very generous suggestion, which he elaborated at some length, that no one on this side of the House had seen fit to stand up in defence of the hon. leader of the Opposition against what the hon. gentleman called the severe handling of the Prime Minister, except the hon. member for Pictou. As a matter of fact, member after member on this side of the House said all that was necessary, and more than was necessary, in defence of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The very first man who spoke on this side of the House, my hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) said all that was necessary, and more than was necessary on that point; and he was followed by at least two men, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler); and other members of this House did the same thing. The hon. gentleman was just about as accurate in that statement as he was in his statements regarding some other matters, as I will point out further on.

The hon. gentleman told us that 20,000 men had been dumped in a mud hole at Dawson, and that his department had a great deal of difficulty on that account; and he tried to induce this House to believe that it was not fully known to his Government before the summer of 1898 that that rush was going there. Why, Sir, all through the session of 1898, it was dinned into our ears as the excuse for the Mackenzie & Mann contract, that this rush was coming—that so enormous a crowd of men were going into that district that they would starve unless that railway was built. The hon. gentleman, whether he saw that they would starve or not, certainly saw that they would not perish from thirst, if the records of the liquor permits count for anything; and he asked this House to pass the Mackenzie & Mann Bill, for what purpose? For two purposes: first, to provide food and sustenance for the enormous crowd going in; and, secondly, for the purpose of dumping there 20,000 more. That is the position the hon. gentleman occupies. He wanted this railway built in order that people might flock in there, and he comes afterwards and tells us that this rush of 20,000 people into the district took him by surprise.

The hon. gentleman also tells us about his sanitary arrangements and his expenditures, and reads us a long column of figures, going down to items of $5, and protracting his speech to five hours and more. But he does not tell this House what he told the Young Liberal Club of Stratford this year, that he had $1,530,000 of revenue from the Yukon and a surplus of about $800,000. Yet he did not do one single thing, so far as the statements of these witnesses show, to improve the roads or the river approaches to that city. And, by the way, the Postmaster General has made a statement in regard to the postal facilities which I will deal with a little further on. He has told us that the mails went in and out with the most astonishing regularity. I will read statements to this House—I have read some already—showing that the reverse is the case. The hon. Minister of the Interior states that it is merely a pleasure trip now to go to Dawson City and to come out. If it is, why were the mails delayed from the 1st of October until the middle of January, and then only letters received, while tons of newspapers remained on the way. If the statement of the hon. gentleman is true, he has placed the Postmaster General of this country in a most embarrassing and humiliating position, because over a route by which it is a mere pleasure trip to go in and out, the hon. gentleman has been able to send no mails except official correspondence for a period of between two and three months.

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior tried to shelter himself with respect to this matter by some language which he read from the "Hansard" of 1895, uttered in this House by the hon. member for Pictou, and I will take the liberty of referring to that language:

If the case stood there, that the Government, knowing all that, had done nothing, the case would be grave indeed against this Government or any government.

The hon. gentleman passed over that language very lightly when he read; but that is the exact language which hon. members on this side of the House are ready to stand or fall by, and the hon. member for Pictou will not take back one word of that, I venture to say, when he returns. In the words of that language, as this Government stood still for seven months and did nothing, the case is grave indeed against this Government.

The hon. gentleman also made the statement that only 105 gallons of liquor had been imported into the Yukon since the 50th of August, 1898, under his permits. Now, I have seen a startling account of 60 tons of liquor which were carried into the Yukon country on the 16th of September, 1898, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, as this was a public matter, whether or not those 60 tons of liquor were smuggled in, in defiance of his permits? Sixty tons would weigh considerably more than 105 gallons, and I think the hon. gentleman will not succeed in his attempt to delude this country with the idea that only 105 gallons of liquor have been imported into the Yukon under permits issued by him since the 30th of August, 1898. It may be that permits covering only that quantity have been issued by the hon. gentleman's Government since that date; but I venture to think that a great deal of liquor has gone in on permits issued previously and on permits sanctioned by the hon. gentleman's Government—on permits which would not have been recognized by his officers except under his direction.

The hon. gentleman told us of the great difficulties under which his administration laboured in the Yukon with respect to the recording of claims; and he said that the average number of claims recorded was forty claims a day for every working day. Well, I must say it did not strike me, notwithstanding the elaborate description of the hon. gentleman of what it was necessary to do to record a claim, that forty claims a day were a very great average. I would have thought that 100, 150 or 200 claims a day might have been recorded, if a proper staff, a competent staff, such as the resources and experience of this country would have enabled him to provide, had been provided. What does the hon. gentleman go on to say? He says there were miserable facilities for dealing with these matters. But why did not the hon. gentleman, out of this $1,530,000, provide proper facilities? Why is he at the head of the Department of the Interior, why were the officers in the Yukon, except for that purpose? He says further there was wretched accommodation, so far as buildings were concerned. Then why did he not provide proper accommodation? Why was not that done at once? I do not see that he advances his position by telling us there were miserable facilities or wretched accommodation. The question still remains: Why did he not provide proper facilities and accommodation? The hon. gentleman also derived a great deal of apparent satisfaction by stating to this House that the Dominion Lands Act had been violated, and that he would hurt some one's feelings on this side very much if we would see fit to move for certain unnamed papers which he would bring down. That strikes me as an extraordinary answer to these charges. He stated in the opening part of his speech that two vices did not make a virtue, and he was not going to justify himself by a reference to the Conservative Administration. Yet, immediately afterwards, he spent twenty minutes by the clock in attempting to make that justification, and afterwards, in the latter part of his speech, he went on to tell us that the Dominion Lands Act had been violated under the Conservative Administration, and that that was to him a complete justification for this shame and humiliation to Canada which has been spread abroad over two continents. He derived also a glow of satisfaction from saying he did not know how many men were lined up at the Winnipeg post office in the days of the boom in that city. An hon. gentleman on this side asked him whether he ever knew of any officers of the Winnipeg post office being bribed, and the hon. gentleman was equal to the occasion. He had seen $5 given. He knew the amount, and as soon as he was asked the question, he replied as I have stated, and an hon. gentleman behind him called out in effect that that was a complete justification. If an official of the Winnipeg post office was bribed in 1882, that, no doubt, in the opinion of hon. gentlemen on the other side, is a most perfect justification for the system of bribery which has been practised in connection with this Yukon business. He even went to the trouble of turning up an old "Hansard" and referring to Mr. J. C. Rykert's speech in this House. Well, I did not have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Rykert, and have only a very vague recollection of what took place with regard to him, but my recollection is he did not remain very long in this House. My recollection is he did not remain seven months in this House after the matter was brought up, and I think that reference to Mr. Rykert was a most unfortunate illustration for the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman told us that he put his name to a recommendation that his officers in the Yukon department shall not be allowed to stake claims. He did not favour this House with any statement as to when his name was put to that recommendation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will do so now, if he is doing me the favour of attending to me.

An hon. MEMBER. Speak louder.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I shall speak as loud as I can. Will the hon. gentleman inform me at what date he placed his name to the recommendation that officers of his department should not be allowed to stake claims. He does not appear even to hear that. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you can make him hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. If you have a deaf man there, let some one stand up and answer for him.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Let the hon. gentleman go on with his speech and he will be answered.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon if he thinks I am out of order.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I want to deal with the hon. Minister fairly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think that the reference to the deafness of the hon. gentleman was out of order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I did not refer to his deafness.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not obliged to answer any question that is put.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I sincerely trust the right hon. Prime Minister will not think I am unfair about this. I was trying to get an answer to what I thought was a legitimate question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, he is generally courteous, and I give him credit for that quality at once, but my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton), he knows, is afflicted with deafness, and cannot, when a question is put, understand its tenor unless he can follow the trend of the speech.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman accept this assurance, that I am the last man in this House who would be willing to make any allusion to any physical infirmity; and I think he will also give me this credit, that when I was speaking to the Minister of the Interior, I raised my voice, which had become somewhat tired, and spoke as loudly as I was capable of doing. I may have been mistaken, but I thought the hon. Minister of the Interior heard me. If he did not hear me, I will withdraw anything that may have offended the susceptibilities of the Prime Minister or the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. FOSTER. At the same time we might have the answer.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). You will have it in the proper time.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The question has been explained, I presume, to the hon. Minister of the Interior, and he does not see fit to give me any satisfaction on that point, so I will venture to make a few comments with regard to it. This recommendation was made either before or since the 1st of January. I select the 1st of January merely as a convenient date. If it was made before the 1st of January, has the hon. gentleman any particular reason for limiting the inquiry by Mr. Ogilvie to matters antecedent to the 25th July, 1898? Does he not know that the cry still goes up in the Yukon that the officials of his department are staking claims, and if this recommendation was made long ago, why is it that the hon. Minister limits this inquiry to the 25th August, 1898? On the other hand, if the recommendation has been only recently sent to Council by the hon. gentleman, why did he delay so long in making it? Does he not know that the responsible correspondent of the London "Times," in the columns of that paper, and the London "Times," in its editorial columns, dealt with the matter? And when the matter was brought to his attention in that way, and also by the memorial of these miners in September last, dated in August last, did he not think it worth while to at least look at these statutes which I have brought to his attention, statutes of Canada, Ontario and Nova Scotia, and put his recommendation at once before Council to stop an iniquity of that kind which was being carried on? The hon. gentleman does not give me any information on the subject, and I leave it to the judgment of the House, under these circumstances, whether he has dealt fairly with the House and with me, who have been trying fairly to follow him with respect to information on that point.

Now, the hon. gentleman produced—and he attached some importance to it—a telegram from Judge Maguire, stating that he was not interested in this water front lease. Well, let us concede that Judge Maguire was not interested in this water front. No man on this side of the House imagines or believes that everything that has been suggested in these charges is true. But what most of us believe is this—that it is impossible that so many charges of so grave a nature could have been made by so many independent persons, unless there was truth in some of them. And the hon. gentleman tells us that Mr. F. C. Wade has denied that he was interested. He has not placed Mr. Wade's telegram—if there was any telegram—on the Table of the House. If Mr. Wade's denial is not of a more conclusive nature than Major Walsh's denial, perhaps it might not avail very much, because those who followed intently and carefully Major Walsh's so-called denial, will recollect that it amounted rather to a challenge to prove, than to a denial of what had been stated. Now, does the hon. gentleman think that a telegram from Mr. F. C. Wade, even if he had laid it on the Table of the House, which he has not done, would satisfy the country with regard to this matter? If he does, or if the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), or any gentleman sitting behind him holds such an opinion, I venture to say that he has reckoned without his host. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) tells us, that the House was very much pained by the reference made by the hon. member for Pictou to Major Walsh. The reference made by the hon. member for Pictou was with respect to certain acts of Major Walsh in connection with a person who had a claim, then being prosecuted before one of the subordinates of Major Walsh, and I do not see any particular reason why the House should have been pained. At all events, hon. gentlemen on the other side, who were shocked and pained at that, were not very much shocked and pained when they greeted with loud applause the—I hardly know how to characterize it; let us say, the attack of a most scandalous character which was made by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), a few nights ago, upon the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). A most insulting insinuation was made by that hon. gentleman against my hon. friend from West Assiniboia, and made for no other purpose than to insult that hon. gentleman, and to attempt to degrade him in the eyes of this House. Were hon. gentlemen opposite pained at that? Was the Minister of the Interior pained? I think not. There were loud hand-clappings, and poundings of desks, and bolsterous applause and laughter. So, with hon. gentlemen opposite, as to this matter of being pained, it seems to depend altogether upon whose ox is gored. If it is on this side of the House, they are all merry; if it is on the other side of the House, they are, every one of them, pained.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has seen fit to attack some of the statements made by the hon. member for Pictou, on the ground that charges stated to him by persons whose names he has not given, contained inaccuracies in respect to the complicated mining regulations which he has promulgated in that region. But I think that I can show inaccuracies and contradictions in the hon. gentleman's own speech, which, if applied in the way he applies this to the statement of the hon. member for Pictou, would render his speech of little value. He has told us, for example, that Judge Maguire tried, and that the Gold Commissioner decided, the case of Elliott vs. Donnelley. Well, now, I have had some experience in the courts of this country for something like twenty years, and this is the first time that I have ever heard of one judge trying a case and another judge giving a decision. What the hon. gentleman meant, no doubt, was, that Judge Maguire sat as legal assessor, assisting the Gold Commissioner. But instead of stating that, he barely informed the House, as the statement will be found at page 896 of "Hansard," that Judge Maguire tried the case and that the Gold Commissioner decided it. The functions of assessor are well known to any child in the law. The assessor does not decide the case. The nautical assessor—and the legal assessor is the same, I think,—sits in an advisory capacity, and the person who gives the final decision may or may not see fit to be guided by his advice. But one man tries the case, and the same man decides. So, the hon. gentleman does not seem able to deal with these mining regulations much more effectively than the persons whose statements he has criticised so severely. There is another curious circumstance, which, perhaps, is capable of some explanation by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), if he proposes to deal with this matter. We are told by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton), that Major Walsh informed him, that he desired to be relieved when his term of office expired. And in his letter, if I caught the contents of it rightly—and if I did not, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) will correct me—he stated, that his term was one year. By reference to "Hansard" of 1898, page 479, I find these questions and answers with regard to Major Walsh. The question is asked:

"What is the date of the appointment of Major Walsh, administrator of the Yukon district?"
"Fifteenth August, 1897."

"For what period is the appointment made?"
"No specified period."

I do not know which is right and which is wrong. I assume that the right hon. Prime Minister who gave that answer, was right, because he looked into the question at the time and came down to the House prepared to answer a question. If so, let the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) not boast very much more during this debate, that he is extremely accurate himself, and let him not think to lecture others.

Now, Sir, I do not know that there is anything further with regard to this particular matter that I am called upon to inflict upon the House; but there are one or two other matters as to which I would like to say a word or two, because I had really intended to speak of them in this debate, and not of the matter which I have taken up at considerable length this afternoon. The Prime Minister and other gentlemen who have spoken in this House, have dealt with the question of Senate reform, and resolutions have been introduced into local legislatures, the legislature of my own province and the legislature of the province of Ontario; and I believe they would have been introduced into the legislature of the province of Quebec, except for some hitch which unfortunately took place. So far as I can understand these resolutions, they seem to me of a somewhat extraordinary character. In effect they amount simply to this: That if a Government measure is introduced into the House of Commons and passes by a greater majority than the majority by which it is defeated in the Senate, the House of Commons is to prevail and the Senate is to count for nothing. That is about the substance of it. I do not think, as has been said by gentlemen on this side of the House, that any precedent can be found for a provision of that kind. In fact the hon. gentleman's attitude with regard to the Senate reminds me to some extent of the account of the American humorist, Artemus Ward, of his attempt to reorganize Betsey Jane, his wife. He explains that having come home on one occasion, after he had been endeavouring to improve the constitution of various persons by drinking their health pretty frequently, he decided that it was necessary to reorganize Betsey Jane. I hope that the right hon. gentleman will not feel annoyed if I mention him in connection with the great American humorist because that humorist was a very clever man and a very good speaker; he used to humbug the people a little, sometimes, it is true, but I know my right hon. friend never does that. I do not suppose that the Senate would be annoyed at being compared to Betsey Jane, because Betsey Jane had not so much to say as Artemus Ward had, but she attended strictly to business. Now, Mr. Ward's record of that event is that he went into Betsey Jane's room, and waved a horsewhip several times over her, and announced to her: "Betsey Jane, it is necessary that you should be reorganized." Then follows a hiatus in the account, and he says, in conclusion: "I dreamed that night that some person had laid that whip over me several times, and in the morning I found that she had done so."

I trust that the attempt of the hon. gentleman to reorganize the Senate may not result in any such disastrous consequences as befell the great humorist to whom I have referred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the fast Atlantic service, which is of great importance to my own constituency, has been adverted to, and I can only say, as other members have said, that I regret very much that the action which the Government took in 1897 has resulted in the failure and disappointment which are now apparent. The Government at that time took upon themselves the responsibility of saying that they were thoroughly satisfied that Peterson & Tate were in a position to carry out this contract so far as financial ability was concerned. They were warned by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that the terms upon which they were making that contract were not such terms as would enable it to be carried out. They took this responsibility upon them after full warning, and they are now in this position, that after waiting two years we have nothing from Messrs. Petersen & Tate except a demand that they should get back the £10,000 which they deposited as security, and be relieved from the guarantee for £10,000 which they delivered to the Government. Now, I am informed that the price of the material for the building of steamships and the cost of labour have very materially advanced in the meantime, that it costs something like 25 per cent more to build a steamship now than it did then. The result is that not only will the Government have to come back to the terms which were suggested in the first instance and which were to have been carried out by the hon. leader of the Opposition, but if this service is to be carried out at all, they will have to give better terms; so that after two years of delay and disappointment with respect to this project, a project so dear to the hearts of all those who desire to promote intercourse between this country and the mother country, we are in a worse position than ever.

I may also say in passing, in answer to the challenge of the Minister of the Interior with respect to the trade policy of this Government, that if we ever have to deal with the preferential tariff, we will endeavour to deal with it in such a way that our imports from the United States will not advance by leaps and bounds while our imports from the United Kingdom remain comparatively stationary. Whatever we do, we will deal with it in such a way that a result exactly opposite shall be attained, when the country sees fit to place us in power, which I trust and believe will be at an early date. Now, with regard to some of the administrative methods of hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition constructed an elevator in the city of Halifax a good many years ago, when he had the honour of filling the position, I think, of Minister of Railways and Canals, and that elevator was an object of great derision to the Liberals of Nova Scotia. In fact, if I am not mistaken, the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am in a non-political and non-partisan speech which the right hon. the Prime Minister delivered in Halifax at the opening of an exhibition, he referred with some degree of scorn to this elevator, and incidentally also, I think, to the effects of the National Policy, although it was not understood that the speech would be of a political nature, and perhaps the hon. gentleman did not intend it to be so. The city of Halifax, on the 4th day of June last, thought this matter of so much importance that they voted $50,000 for the purpose of assisting to rebuild that elevator, which had been destroyed by fire, and I brought it to the attention of this House and of the Government on the 8th of June, 1898. I pointed out to the Government, and a delegation from the city of Halifax pointed out to the Government immediately afterwards, the great importance of having that elevator ready for the ensuing winter's business. Was it not ready for the ensuing winter's business? No, Mr. Speaker, it is not ready yet. I am speaking in the hearing of my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell). I do not know when it will be ready, but this I do know, that I have been informed by men who profess themselves competent to judge and who are friendly to this Administration, that there would not have been the slightest difficulty about having that elevator ready if steps had been taken properly and in time. I do not say whose fault this is; whether it is the fault of the Government or its officers or its contractors, but I put the statement to the right hon. Prime Minister that this is a grave fault, and in contrast with the administrative methods of the late Government when dealing with a similar matter in 1881. I extract the following from the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, volume 15, No. 5, 1882:

The property at Halifax purchased for the new deep-water terminus came into possession of the railway in the month of July, 1881, and the work of preparing it for the winter's business was at once commenced. To connect it with the Inter-colonial system a track was laid on the eastern side of Water Street, from the freight yard near North Street, as far as the wharf formerly known as the Cranite wharf. * * * The necessary sidings were laid, a wharf 800 feet long and 80 feet broad was constructed, and on it a large warehouse 46 feet wide and 400 feet long. The whole was ready by the month of November, and the premises were used last winter for the passenger and freight traffic by the British mail steamers.

Now, I desire to bring that to the attention of the right hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Does that include the elevator?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am informed that it includes work very much more than that involved in the construction of this elevator, and I am so informed by gentlemen who, I think, are as competent to judge in this matter as the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is, that the work is more important than the elevator, and that there could have been no difference in the time; will the hon. gentleman give me the name of the man who says that the elevator could have been constructed in that time?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will not give the hon. gentleman any name, because I did not suppose that I would ever mention the matter again, and I did not ask permission to give the name. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that the information has been given to me by a person whose authority he will not deny, and I venture to think that the hon. gentleman will find it difficult to say that the work, which I have detailed here, is either of less magnitude or less importance than the work of constructing this elevator during the past year.

Now, I did propose to say one or two words about some principles which were laid down by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), in regard to the use of logic in politics and trade, and in regard to consistency and sincerity in public life. The hon. member for Labelle delivered a very charming speech to this House, and I can only say that I would give a good deal if I had the command of language in my native tongue that that hon. gentleman possesses. He expressed himself splendidly in English, and exhibited a remarkable command of language in, what is not to him, his native tongue. But he did advance some extraordinary ideas; he advanced the idea that logic is a bad thing in politics and trade. I know that the hon. member for Labelle has a logical mind, and I cast about me for some reason as to why he should have come to that conclusion, and I am led to believe that it was the result of his visit to Washington as secretary of the commission. It can only be attributed to that. These American people are not devoid of logic; they have logical minds and they knew, when these gentlemen went there, to deal with them, that these same hon. gentlemen, when on this side of the House, had gone to them previously and given promises to make a better trade arrangement with the United States than hon. gentlemen now on this side of the House would consent to. They also knew that the right hon. Prime Minister of this country had made some very generous and off-handed statements immediately after he came into power. They were logical; when they came to negotiate they brought these things up and it was that which gave the hon. member for Labelle his dislike for logic. The hon. gentleman is not in the House; I wish he were here for the purpose of correcting me if I am wrong, but I venture to think that if he were in the House he would corroborate what I have said. The right hon. Prime Minister, very properly, went to that hon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

gentleman and congratulated him immediately upon the conclusion of his speech. I am sure he did this because he well knew what was in the mind of the hon. member for Labelle when he gave voice to these sentiments. The hon. member for Labelle gave rather a curious definition of sincerity, and at the risk of wearying the House I will refer to it. It is really one of the most delicious bits of logic, when you come to apply it, that hon. gentlemen, in this House, ever had the pleasure of listening to. But before coming to that he says:

The people are merry; my Government is safe.

He was no doubt thinking about some of those gentlemen in the Yukon when they thought of this investigation that is going on. These people are merry: "We are safe," they said. Now, the hon. gentleman defines sincerity in this way:

Of course, if sincerity meant a direct and constant relation between intention and words and actions, very few men indeed would be called sincere, and still fewer political parties would be sincere. * * * In my humble judgment sincerity is the direct relation between thought and word, between thought and action at the moment the word is uttered or the action is performed.

How delightfully that will suit all conditions and circumstances. The right hon. Prime Minister, for instance, announces to the people on the 22nd of June, 1896, that he is going to kill protection; on the 24th of June he announces to them that he will cut off a portion of the nail of its little toe. According to the hon. member for Labelle, the right hon. gentleman is sincere and consistent. There is a direct relation between thought and word and action in each case. On the 22nd there is a direct relation between thought and word and action, and on the 24th. It is all perfectly clear. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) introduced a motion into this House declaring that it is improper and wrong and immoral to make appointments from members of this House to judicial or other positions. There is a direct relation between thought and word and action. Then he sits at the Council chamber and draws up Orders in Council appointing a dozen members of this House to such positions. Perfectly consistent, perfectly sincere! There is a direct relation between thought and word and action in each case. What a light this throws upon the policy of the Liberal party. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has the eternal gratitude of the country for making this statement. I have not heard anything approaching in frankness the statement of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) during my short experience in political life, but I hope that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will emulate the frankness of the hon. member for Labelle, and will give us these statements from time to time in such moderate doses as we are able to stand.

But the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) must not press this doctrine too far. Suppose, for example, some one should give him a thousand dollars to hold in trust and pay the interest to some person, and he should engage to do so. There is a direct relation between thought and word and action. He says: I will undertake the trust, and I will pay the interest, and he takes the money. But suppose that after twenty-four hours he comes to the conclusion that he will spend the money himself for his own purpose. He does so. There, also is the direct relation between thought and word and action which my hon. friend's definition requires. However, the difficulty would be, if my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) undertook to apply this doctrine in practical life instead of in practical politics, that he might be visited with some unpleasant consequences at the hands of the courts of justice. Therefore, it is perfectly apparent that the doctrines upon which the Liberal party have proceeded are not doctrines which are in all respects capable of being applied to the every-day transactions of life. Now, with respect to this so-called merriment which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) says exists in this country, I can tell him that in some portions of my own constituency at least, it does not seem to exist to any particularly marked degree.

Mr. DAVIN. It does not exist in the North-west Territories.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have gone amongst some of the fishermen of my constituency, and they have been considering the question of tobacco, upon which this Government increased the duty. The fishermen found the tobacco cost them one or two cents additional for the fig or plug, as they call it, and they were very much dissatisfied with it, but the manufacturers decreased these figs or plugs to a smaller size, giving the fishermen a smaller fig for the same money as the larger one cost before the tariff was raised. Among the fishermen in the province of Nova Scotia these are known as "Fielding figs" or "Laurier plugs." I can tell my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that some of these fishermen are not quite as merry as the constituents in the province of Quebec, when they go in to buy these same figs and plugs.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with a statement made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), that the people are merry. I do not know on what ground the hon. member would suggest that the people are in a more merry condition now than they were some years ago. The only thing that has occurred to me, on thinking over the matter, is, that the taxes which were formerly wrung from the pockets of the people of Canada are now made by the Government. The Minister of Public Works has explained that. He has said: "We have made a large amount of money last year, and we are going to spend more this year, because we are going to make more." This may be a matter of satisfaction to the hon. member for Labelle, and may have caused him and his constituents to indulge in this merry mood. The hon. gentleman described himself as a moderate protectionist, whatever that may be; and the right hon. Prime Minister immediately went over and bestowed on the hon. gentleman his congratulations. So, I suppose we may assume that the right hon. Prime Minister is also a moderate protectionist. Therefore, we, on this side of the House, are able to extend to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) our most hearty congratulations, that he should sit at the feet of this new Gamaliel—that the slayer of protection should sit at the feet of this moderate protectionist. Now, I do not know whether or not all the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House from the province of Quebec were elected as moderate protectionists. I am inclined to think that, possibly, some of them may have been elected as free traders. and in that case I am reminded of a passage in an old French opera which a friend of mine used to recite, or, rather, sing, to me in former years, and which went somewhat in this way, if my friends from the province of Quebec will pardon my very faulty pronunciation :

Barras est roi, Lange est sa reine,
Ce n'était pas la peine, ce n'est la peine,
Ne pas la peine, assurément,
De changer le gouvernement.

If a free translation, such as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce sometimes gives us, were made of that passage, it might be rendered into English in this way :

The manufacturer is king—protection is queen ;
It was hardly worth while to change the Government.

And some of these free traders from the province of Quebec may perhaps sing that strain, although my hon. friend from L'abbé thinks they are very merry. As has been said, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House may congratulate the Government, that they have not had the courage of their principles in Opposition. We are glad that they have adopted the policy of protection, and we intend to support them in it. So far as tariff reform is concerned, the tariff, if it has been reformed at all, has been reformed only in the way described by one hon. gentleman on this side of the House as the attachment of a very slight piece of fringe to the old garment. Now, in speaking of free translations, I am reminded of a free translation which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on one occasion gave. In referring to my own province, he was good enough to speak of it as "arida leonum nutrix—the dry nurse, aye, and the wet nurse of boodlers." I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, what he thinks of this Liberal Government as a dry nurse, or a wet nurse, of boodlers, in view of these scandals in the Yukon. I suppose, the nurse is probably wet enough to suit the hon. gentleman's taste, in view of the number of liquor permits which have been granted by his Government.

Now, I regret very much to have detained the House at such great length ; but I wish to deal with one other matter, which I neglected to deal with in the proper place, that is, the question of mail facilities in the Yukon district during the past year. The Postmaster General, who, I regret to see, is not in his place, made this statement in the House, referring to the Mounted Police. He said :

They have brought the mails out in about ten days from Dawson City, and I believe have made equally good despatch in, when the condition of the ice enabled them to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would remind the hon. Postmaster General that the Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

"Globe" correspondent at Dawson City tells an exactly opposite story.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The "Globe" correspondent makes no such statement.

Let us see who is right, my hon. friend the Postmaster General or the hon. member for Pictou. If the Postmaster General would be good enough to consult the "Globe," of the 6th March, 1899, at page 9, he will find a letter, dated 21st January, 1899, from its correspondent at Dawson City, in which the following statement is made :—

The incoming mail service continues to be marked by its infrequency. With the exception of a small bag of letters, chiefly delayed summer mail, which arrived here on December 6th, and a bag of purely official letters, which came in on January 1st, no mail has reached Dawson City from the outside since September last.

I leave it to the House whether the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) or the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was right as to the facts. This letter was dated 21st January, 1899, and the correspondent of the "Globe"—who I understand is also the private secretary of Mr. Ogilvie—states that, with the exceptions mentioned, no mail had come in since September last.

I would direct the attention of the hon. Postmaster General, if he were here, to a letter bearing date 31st December, 1898, from the "Globe" correspondent at Dawson, which appeared in that paper on the 26th February, 1899—56 days after it was published. This is the mail which goes out regularly every ten days. I would direct his further attention to a letter dated 30th December, 1898, which appeared in the "Globe" on the 1st February, 1899, 50 days after its date ; and if he will examine both those letters, he will find, by referring to the terms in which they were written, that they were mailed at the time each of them was dated. That is not all. If he will refer to the "Summerside Journal," published in the province of Prince Edward Island, of the 29th March, 1899, he will find there a letter dated 15th January, from Mr. Gordon W. Dawson, of Hunker Creek, in the Yukon, to his brother at Augustin Bay, P.E.I., in which Mr. Dawson says that he received on the 1st January, 1899, two letters from his brother in Prince Edward Island, dated respectively 31st May, 1898, and the 1st September, 1898. Now, what do hon. gentlemen think of the postal facilities in the Yukon and of the statement of the hon. Postmaster General that the mail has gone out regularly every two weeks. There was received in this city yesterday a letter from Dawson, signed by Arthur G. Smith, addressed to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper. That letter came out in fairly good time—it was dated 7th March, and it got here yesterday—fairly good time compared with the others. The first sentence of that letter is this, and I draw the attention of the House to it :

I received yesterday—

That is on the 6th March——your letter of October 19th, inclosing a memo. from Mr. Moses Paterson.

That is the way in which the correspondence of business men, between Dawson and Vancouver, is conducted under the administration of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). Will the hon. gentleman venture after these instances, which are only a few out of many, to undertake to say that his administration of the Post Office Department and the postal condition in that country is anything else than a shame and a disgrace to Canada, particularly in view of the statement made in this House by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), on the responsibility of his position as a Minister of the Crown, that it is merely a pleasure trip now to get in and out from Dawson City to Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker, I am reminded in this connection that this disgraceful condition of affairs, so far as postal facilities are concerned, exist under an administration which takes $1,530,000 out of that Yukon district, with a surplus of about $800,000 for the purposes of postal accommodation or any other service to which it might be usefully applied; and with this surplus of $800,000, of which the hon. gentleman boasts, the Government ventures to leave the postal facilities in the Yukon country in that condition. I trust we may be able to hear from the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) before the close of this debate with regard to his view as to the postal facilities, because I understand he was in the Yukon district for some time, and has had some personal experience—what it may be, I do not know—with regard to this matter.

I have just one further matter to refer to before concluding, and it is this. In common with a good many other gentlemen who have spoken in this debate, I have ventured to deplore the attitude which public men in Canada, Liberals in politics,—some of them in this House, some of them not—have taken during the by-elections. I regret that it has been openly put by public men in Canada to constituencies that the question of getting their right, their legitimate and just share of the public revenue of this country is to depend on whether they elect Government supporters or not. I cannot imagine anything more degrading to public life and politics in Canada than some things which have been said by Liberals in Canada during the last three years on that subject. I ventured to make an application some time ago of Liberal ideas, as set forth by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to practical every-day life; and I would like to ask how the ideas of some public men in Canada on this subject would answer, if they were applied to practical every-day life. How would it do, for instance, if the directors of a corporation in this country should go out to the shareholders of that company and say to them: Vote for us as directors, because if we are elected directors, we will not give dividends to those who voted against us. And how would it do, supposing they were elected directors, if they attempted to put that into operation? Would they not render themselves amenable to the public courts of the country? And would any hon. gentlemen on the other side, would the hon. gentleman who follows me—if any should follow me—point out to me how the Government of Canada is anything less the trustee of the money of Canada than the directors of a corporation are the trustees of the money of that corporation. How dare any hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches venture to tell any constituency of Canada that the due of that constituency, that its share of the public revenue and money of Canada is to depend on whether or not it elects a Government supporter to Parliament. They are not responsible to the criminal law or any other law, it may be true. They cannot be made responsible, under the constitution of the country, because they are the executive of the country. What effect should that have upon them? It should make them all the more scrupulous and careful. The fact that they are not under the restraining hand of the law should make them all the more scrupulous and careful, but instead we have had over and over again in this country, during the past two years, such expressions used by Ministers and their supporters as "cold justice" and "warm sympathy." If you elect a member of the Government you will get warm sympathy, but if you elect a member of the Opposition you will get cold justice; and every one knows, who is not a fool, what that particular expression means and what you are to read between the lines. And I say, Sir, that it is degrading to public life in Canada that any such promise, or any such intimidation—for it is used both as a promise and as an intimidation—should be held out to any constituency by any public man. I regret to say that it has been so held out. If we are to believe newspaper reports which have not been contradicted, it has been held out in Canada on more than one occasion within the past two years. Hon. gentlemen will remember that they have some duties with regard to this country and with regard to public life in this country other than those that are directly connected with administration. They will remember that thoughtful men, who have considered these subjects admit that while there is a great deal to hope, there is also something to fear, both in this country and other countries, for democracy and for representative institutions. Representative institutions in this country or any other country can have no solid basis whatever unless they rest upon a fair and honest public opinion; and every time you make a promise like that to a constituency in Canada or elsewhere, you are doing something to degrade public opinion. And, speaking for myself, I think that any Government in Canada or in any of the provinces of Canada might very well consider this—that there is something in politics and in public life in Canada and England and in every colony of England which means more to the Government and to the country than holding power. It may be an honour to a Government to be deprived of power; it can be no honour to any Government to hold power by such means as these. And, so long, Sir, as I have any place in public life, I will uplift my voice against the bribery or intimidation of constituencies by such means as these; and I trust and believe that, in expressing the opinions which I have on this subject to-night, I am not unsupported by some hon. members on the other side of the House.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, we have listened with great pleasure to the closing remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). I cordially agree with him, and so does every hon. member on this side of the House. But it is truly edifying, at this late day, to have a purist like this appear among the Opposition. He came too late to do the greatest honour to his party or himself; and I can tell him that if he perseveres very long in the enunciation of such principles, he will find himself not here; he will find that the genial spirits whom I shall speak of directly in regard to the same matter will make it hot for him, as being one with whom they cannot consort and from whom they cannot receive instructions, and will politely inform him that this side of the House is the proper place for him if he intends to remain in public life.

This debate has been continued for a long time. I find, for example, that the Government supporters have taken 277 columns of "Hansard," while the Opposition have taken 553 columns. That means one of two things—either that it took hon. gentlemen opposite longer to answer the speeches made on the Government side, on account of the matter contained in them, than it did those on the Government side to answer their opponents, or these hon. gentlemen on the other side have begun, like their great ancestors, to think that they shall be heard for their much speaking and hope to induce the country to believe that, after all, they have grievances. It is rather amusing to see how this printers' space is divided. For example, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) began with sixty columns. He was followed by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) with forty-two columns. And it went on with various changes until we came to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who, panting for glory and aspiring to leadership when the present leader of the Opposition is gone, thought he would make his record one better, and so filled sixty-one columns. And now this has been increased by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to 100 columns. The shortest speech made by any hon. member on the other side was that made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who, with the captivating air (to some unthinking people) of neutrality, fairness and non-partisanship, deplored the condition of the House and how some hon. gentlemen occupied the time of the House. But he ended with one of the slyest digs—as these Conservative Independents are apt to do—at the Premier, who, he would have us understand, is the worst sinner of all. And he looked rather as if he really mean it. Like the knight of the rueful countenance, he thought he could lecture others, and he lectured this House upon their duty, and ended, as I have said, by a reference to the Premier. It may be very well for us to understand here and now what the effect of the present change of this debate is. It started in an entirely different way, and not until the hon. member for Pictou spoke did the matter of the Yukon come up. Nobody could sit here last night and view hon. gentlemen opposite without pity. I never saw such a looking lot of objects in my life after the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) had battered, shattered, pounded and pulverized them. Macaulay, speaking of a similar incident among the Tories—and I can surely be pardoned for referring to this from the great historian—tells us: "The jaw of Peel fell, the face of Twisse was as the face of a damned soul, and Herries looked like Judas taking his necktie off for the last operation. Hon. gentlemen opposite felt that their case was gone, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), when he rose, showed himself in an entirely different character from his real nature. He was angry. He attempted, like a school-boy, to scold. He felt, good lawyer as he is, that he must throw up his brief. But he saw what he thought was an opportunity and moved the adjournment of the debate. In the watches of the night he was somewhat strengthened, because the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), who seems to be the Yukon coach for hon. gentlemen opposite, discovered the Yukon "Nugget" men, and brought the hon. gentleman in contact with them. These are men who left their country after making charges which they did not press. Then, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) thought that he would help also, which he did by giving the hon. gentleman a new letter. And we are able to judge how weak the case of the hon. member for Pictou was when we find that the only effective thing in the speech of the hon. member for Halifax were these two letters, one from the editors of the "Nugget" and one from the friend of the hon. member for Glengarry.

Now, what is the character of the charges generally, before I come to them specifically? All the charges of the hon. member for Pictou, and supplemented by the hon. member for Halifax, are vague charges, with few names given, but without that definiteness that would make a charge at all; in other words, they are nameless, largely accusations against officials of dishonesty, or of a breach of the seventh commandment. That is the sum total. Some of the officials took money, and Major Walsh violated the seventh commandment. It may be well for the hon. members to study that commandment; I commend it to their careful consideration, from the leader of the Opposition down to the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, this one fact, that, after all this scurrying to and fro of last summer, the charges have come down to two, which have been answered, and to which I will come directly. It may be, perhaps, a matter of some importance for us just to see how the Conservative party stands, and what their previous record since 1886 shows them to have done. After they were beaten at the elections, their conduct reminds me of the picture drawn by Milton, in his "Paradise Lost," of a certain being looking around and seeking where he might find opportunities of wreaking his vengeance. And so we discover that the hon. gentlemen opposite, being Trinitarians, no doubt, agreed upon a trinity of slander against persons, and upon a trinity of party warfare in order to defeat the Government. And who are the parties they singled out to be specially attacked? The hon. the Minister of Public Works is the first. Of course, they felt that anything they could say about the Minister of Public Works must be true, because he had got his training among themselves, and they felt that a bare statement was all that was necessary to make the world believe that he must be wrong; and I think myself, that if he had followed the training which he had received, he must be wrong. Is there a member in this House, or is there an elector in the Dominion of Canada, who does not see the whole trend of that attack? Is there a child in this country who does not understand their object in speaking of that hon. gentleman as the master of the Premier? They hope to strike at the Premier through him, and in that way they also hope to strike at the Premier's French friends in Quebec by attempting to show that this country is ruled by the French. Is there any other point in saying that the Minister of Public Works is the master of the Premier? Everybody knows that he is not, that he neither assumes it, nor is the Premier the kind of a man to have a master. We all understand that perfectly. But they think that, by attacking the Minister of Public Works in that way, they will at last get some people to think that matters are going wrong. Then, the second man they have singled out is the Minister of Railways and Canals. They have singled him out because he had been associated with Conservatives: he had some Conservative members with him in the New Brunswick Government. From his association with Conservatives, they thought there must be something wrong about him, and ever since that hon. gentleman took office, there has been a continued fire of slander and vilification against him down to the present time. The third gentleman who is made their particular object of hatred is a well-known Liberal, the hon. the Minister of the Interior. Now, they knew very well that it would not do at first to attack a man who had received his training in the Conservative party, or a man who had associated with the Conservatives, and they directed their attack altogether against these two men. Now, they must attack a pure Liberal, and if ever the Conservative party in the west had cause to hate any man, they had cause to hate the Minister of the Interior, for he flogged them and beat them there as no man had ever done in the west before; hence their anger against him. But, after expending alternately their rage and anger upon these men, what do they do? They bring to bear their trinity of party warfare in an attempt to overthrow the Government. The first thing they did was to say: We will capture the provincial Liberal governments of the Dominion of Canada. The leader of the Opposition, with that ability for which he is known, said: I will be the first in the ranks, I will fight first, I will fix Nova Scotia; and he did fix it—for us. He went to the country, and three solitary Conservatives were returned. As a countryman of mine said, in talking about their defeat: "They have not got enough to form fours." And the ex-Minister of Finance thought he would take a hand, while the leader of the Opposition was taking a well-merited rest, enjoying the luxury, the almost heavenly luxury, of a trip to Italy, sailing in gondolas, walking over scenes made immortal by the pen of Byron, looking at the mountains, and enjoying the scenery of Italy, which, I am informed on reliable authority, is the finest country in Europe to visit. What said the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) while his leader was away? Go to now, the leader is away; we will build a party in New Brunswick. During the absence of my leader I will show him that success is not dependent upon him. I will take New Brunswick in hand, I will show that the Conservative party there in local matters can be triumphant, and I will crush Mr. Blair in his own province. And so, a convention was called at Moncton. There was a little murmuring, but I understand that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hale) promised to deliver over his county, and that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) insisted that they should have a party contest at once, because he was going to deliver over Charlotte to them. Other members also made the same promise.

I am informed that the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) was ready to deliver over the goods. Well, they met at Moncton and gave out a short platform. The election was held, and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) did not get on any better in that election than the leader of the Opposition did in Nova Scotia. I think it will be found that he had about the same ratio in opposition in New Brunswick as the leader of the Opposition had in Nova Scotia. They tried it in Ontario, and they failed. There was failure in all the provinces. Previous to that they had tried another scheme. They said: We know what it is to have scandals proved against us, and we were defeated on them. Let us try to raise scandals and not prove them, and perhaps we will affect the Liberal party. The first thing they did was to say, that there was the worst kind of robbery and jobbery about the transaction of the Minister of Railways and Canals to bring a railway into Montreal. They moved that sprightly and agile body beyond to open an inquiry into it. A committee was struck. The chairman was not there on the day that he was required, and I understand the committee never materialized. No meeting was afterwards called; the session closed and the great infamy of the Liberal party was not exposed. Promptly when the House met last session a committee was called for by the Liberals in this House, an investigation demanded, and what was the result? Our young and sprightly friends would not move in the matter at all, and from one end of this country to the other there is not an intelligent man but knows there was nothing in the charge made, and that it does not apply to the hon. Minister of Railways or to the Liberal Government for doing what ought to have been done long ago,—securing a direct connection, from Montreal to the sea, for the Intercolonial Railway and giving to the service of the Intercolonial Railway a reputation that it never had before. Failing in that, what did they do? They said: There must be something in that Yukon business; how can it be otherwise. This is a rich country. And they would reason out in this way: Do you think it possible for them to be honest and not to make something out of it? Did we not do it? There must be something wrong in the Yukon. We will strike at the Minister of the Interior and the Yukon combined. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) said, in one of those moments in which his honesty got the better of his discretion: We on this side of the House do not believe all that is said about the Yukon, but surely when so much is said, there must be some truth in it. Yes, fling dirt and some of it will stick. I am sorry the hon. member for Halifax is not in his place.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, he is there.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is hanging down his head.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I want here and now to understand whether or not I understood the hon. gentleman that he meant to say that, after the Minister of the Interior knew of things being wrong in the Yukon, seven months were allowed to elapse without anything being done.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know what the hon. gentleman understood me to say, but what I said was that the charges, or some of them were known to the Minister of the Interior, according to his own statement before the 15th of July, 1898, and that no power to investigate arrived at Dawson City until some time in February, 1899, as I understand.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Now, I understand that the hon. member for Halifax has the speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior before him, so that I will have to depend upon what I understood him to say. There were some vague charges in the newspapers but there was no statement made to the Minister, or to the Government, until August, last year. August 5th, 1898, is the time at which the miners' petition was dated.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) that I have the speech before me and that I examined it with some care upon this point. He said, charges were made which induced him to hurry Mr. Ogilvie off to the Yukon.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Rumours; but there never was a charge made.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Complaints, he called them.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Complaints in newspapers, and then he took cognizance of them, but I want to say that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) was not as fair as he usually is when he said that he took no action until after the lapse of seven months. Listen to the dates: On the 5th of August, 1898, the miners' petition is dated, and if the hon. gentleman is correct as to the time it requires to come from Dawson City here, he will see how long it took to reach Ottawa. The commission to Mr. Ogilvie was issued on the 7th of October following. Now, where are the seven months? Is the hon. Minister of the Interior to be held responsible for the time at which the hearing is made? The hon. member for Halifax is too good a lawyer to say that you must take the time a case is tried as opposed to the date of the issue of the writ. There are only two days more than one month, after the first statement was made and put in writing in the city of Dawson, until the commission was issued. Is it a fair, is it a legitimate kind of warfare to repeat that seven months elapsed, because it must be remembered that anything said previous to August 5th in regard to the administration is to be found only in the newspapers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the hon gentleman say that the commission was issued to Mr. Ogilvie in October?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). In October.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then it was in Mr. Ogilvie's hand in October.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I did not say that, but I did say that it was issued in October. When a writ is issued you must take that date. It was sent out specially as the Minister of the Interior showed last night. It is not fair warfare, and I ask any intelligent gentleman in this House if, when the first protest of the miners was dated in Dawson City, August 5th, and the commission to investigate was issued on August 7th following, there was any loss of time? Where is all this talk about delay? Is the Minister of the Interior, after issuing a commission, to carry it into Dawson City; is he to be held responsible for the date it reaches there and the time at which the investigation is made in the progress of events, and will it be considered proper and honourable warfare to attempt to say that for seven months he said and did nothing? Surely if the facts are strong enough, it needs no attempt to bolster them up in that way. Could any Minister do more than the hon. Minister of the Interior has done? Is anybody to listen to all kinds of reports that are published in the newspapers? I venture to make the assertion that, if members on both sides of this House had to listen to, and be judged by, what is said in the newspapers of both sides, about themselves and about their party the jails would be full and the gibbets would be ringing with corpses. These newspaper statements are very easily made. Does the hon. member for Halifax think that it is the business of a government, not a Liberal Government, but of any government, to notice all that appears in the papers? I do not care how respectable a paper is. One week after the complaint was received the commission was issued. The hon. member for Halifax is a lawyer, and I venture to say that, excepting cases of arrest when a man is about to leave the country, that he never averages, in issuing his writs in a year, seven days taking one with another, after the client comes to him and gives him the facts about issuing his writ. The commission was sent, and yet most of the time of the hon. member for Halifax was taken up with that one strong point that he thought he had discovered, the weakness of which was exposed by the hon. Minister of the Interior. Listen to the reports in the papers! Listen to what is read here when men are ashamed to give their names! A government is to be blamed because it does not at once issue a royal commission when any understrapper, when any penny-a-liner puts anything into the paper he likes against a member of the Government:

And shall we trust such critics?

No; as soon seek roses in December
Frost in June.

Hope, constancy in wind or corn in chaff,
Believe a Tory or an epitaph.

Or any other thing that's false

Before you trust the Tories out of office, sore.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) feels now, I know how laboured his effort was. I have heard him with much pleasure, when he had a case, present it so clearly to the judges as to receive their approbation and the approbation of all who heard it, but he will pardon me the personal reference when I say, that I never saw him appear to such poor advantage as to-day, when with the brief of all the members on his side of the House but relating to a question beyond his ken, he attempted to defend the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. The Opposition.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am partly correct. He did not attempt to defend the Government, but he succeeded in doing so admirably. Balaam-like he was sent to curse, but he could not help blessing. Now, Sir, one must understand something about the Yukon country before he can rightly appreciate the difficulties in the way of the Government, and in that connection I need not attempt to add to what was said by the Minister of the Interior. That speech of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) will remain not only as his vindication and the vindication of the Government, but it will appear as well as the basis of the history of that country. To listen to hon. gentlemen opposite one would think that everything ought to go as smoothly in the Yukon as it does in Ottawa, or Halifax, or in Montreal. If the commission was issued a week after the complaint was made, and was sent by a special messenger to Mr. Ogilvie at Dawson—and the Government not only gave instructions direct in that commission, but, as I shall show in a moment, gave larger powers, as the Minister said, than ever a commissioner received before, for he was given powers not to deal with charges generally but specifically, and by telegram he was told to deal with officials in the Yukon—surely the hon. gentleman must admit that action was taken in fairly good time. Here was a country 4,000 miles from the base of operations, a country not only without a railway, but without a road and without a telegraph post, and having no means of communication except the primitive manner of carrying the mails on foot. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) censure the Government because they had not, with divine prescience, seen everything beforehand? Is there a business man in Canada who after five or ten years conducting his affairs has not discovered that he made some mistakes, and is that business man to be censured for dishonesty because he had not the gift of seeing things beforehand. I see my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) smile. He is in a smiling condition now, and well might he be after the events of the last week.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is the most sensible remark that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser has made to-night.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Do these hon. gentlemen opposite want to apply the same rules and regulations to the Yukon as they would to an old settled part of the country? What did the Government find when they began to deal with that territory? It was part of the North-west Territories, and they found the law of the territories applying to it, and it is rather extraordinary that hon. gentlemen opposite should find fault with the Government for following the existing law, which they themselves had placed on the Statute-book. What could the Government do but apply the existing law to the Yukon Territory? Was the Government, without knowledge, without experience, and without knowing the existing state of things to change the law which governed that country? What would have been said of the Government if they had changed that law without the knowledge which would have enabled them to pass a new law. If they had done that I think I can hear hon. gentlemen opposite blaming them for not following the law, and blaming them for changing the law without sending men in to inform them of the conditions of the country. Did not the Government do well to say: We will apply the law which we now have relating to that country, and we will learn by experience what changes shall be made. But the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) asks: Why did the Government not look at the law as it existed in Ontario and Nova Scotia; and he read the Dominion Lands Act to sustain his argument, but he forgot to state that there is not a word in that Act, so far as I remember, which relates to minerals. The hon. gentleman referred to the mining law of Nova Scotia, which was changed in 1893, but the hon. gentleman in all fairness should have stated, that that change was made on account of a certain act which occurred in the Halifax office, where an official took advantage of the law as it stood and attempted to take a claim from another man. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) was engaged in that case. Although that law existed in Nova Scotia for a considerable length of time, it was never thought necessary to change it, and it was not changed until from experience they found that it could be violated. The legislature of Nova Scotia did not change that law long before, because it was not known that it could lead to such results, and so, when the violation of the law became apparent, the legislature of Nova Scotia took advantage of their knowledge and acquired experience, and made it a better law. Is the Government of Nova Scotia to be censured because they did not change that law before they knew that it was open to such abuse, and is this Government to be blamed for not changing the law relating to the North-west Territories before they know what the facts were concerning its operation. Sir, this Government took the only proper and sensible course under the circumstances. Mr. Fawcett and Major Walsh were sent to the North-west Territories. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond at present of talking about any expenditure of money because they believe that it will gain them a little popularity in the country, and if this Government had sent a large force into the Yukon, entailing large expense, these hon. gentlemen opposite would doubtless clamour against the Government on that ground. Sir, the Government acted like prudent business men. If a man was going to lumber in that unknown country, would it be wise for him to send at the outset a hundred men with provisions for that number, when all he could employ was twenty men. Would he not be foolish to incur all the expenditure before he obtained knowledge as to what lumber was there and how many men he could use in cutting it. Acting upon their then knowledge the Government appointed the best men as they thought, and as were recommended to them. Let me state here, lest I should forget it, that the hon. member (Mr. Borden) has altogether lost the point of the reference of the Minister of the Interior to Mr. Rykert, for the hon. Minister was not trying to hold that up as an argument why any wrong-doing should be atoned now. Mr. Rykert's whole argument was this: "I have been caught; I was not as smart as the other members were who have escaped; but I want to say that there are many men there who are as guilty as I am; but they are not caught, and they are voting themselves money all the time." That was his defence, and it was a perfectly good defence; and he, being with the Conservative party, I have no doubt his evidence was good on that point—that he must have known whereof he affirmed. But the hon. member forgot to say that in 1896, when the great Liberal-Conservative party buckled on their armour to disperse the Liberal hosts, Mr. Rykert was chosen as the Conservative candidate in Lincoln to run for an election to this House, from which he had been expelled. This shows the close connection that existed between him and his party. If he spoke the truth before, the Conservatives should not have nominated him; but I take it that though he did speak the truth, they decided that after all he was not too bad a fellow for them.

Now, coming particularly to what the hon. gentleman has said, I may perhaps be pardoned if I go backwards. I deplore what he has said about promises; but I want to call his attention to the fact that his moral indignation was excited, and his righteous fury burst upon all and sundry because of what he himself said, if newspapers are to be believed. Would it not have been wiser for the hon. gentleman to say, Mr. A. said so-and-so, and Mr. B., at such a place, said so-and-so? But no; the whole evidence must depend on what some newspaper said. I am bound to say of newspapers that no man in this country respects newspapers more than I do. In my political life, limited as my experience has been, they have done me more than justice. As a matter of fact, they are fair and they want to do the right thing. But there is no party in this world but has in it writers who are anxious, being just politicians of the first water, to make more of what was said than was said, and sometimes to give actual colour, and to represent as having been said what was not said at all. And to say that we are to listen to these, and to say that members of the Government or members on this side said so-and-so, is surely not an argument becoming a House of Parliament. I know that these things have been said; I have heard them said. I might refer to one thing that was said by the leader of the Opposition, who is not now in his place. He went to my county during the last election, and showed the advantageous position in which they would be if I were not returned. He showed that he would be across the island, and his son would be in the next county to me, and claimed that their wish should be his direction, and he ended just as he only could end, by saying to them, "Guysborough has been too long out in the cold." Could any words uttered by man be plainer? I am not going to say that that is a reason why a member of the Government or anybody else should say so now; but I do say that if that is their strong argument, the previous actions of their party ought at least to make hon. gentlemen opposite modest in rising in righteous indignation to attack others. In the county of Guysborough $1,500 was voted for a public work when a strong case was made out, and the late Sir John Thompson saw that the fishermen needed the work so badly. This was all ever voted, while the county sent an opposition member. Go to Moncton, which you find represented by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), and you find there one of the finest buildings, built in a county that sent a man to oppose the Government. Ought the Government to have acted on the same principle as the previous Government? Not at all. It may be said that the building was necessary. I assume that it was, or it would not have been built.

Mr. POWELL. I may say that the contract for the erection of the station at Moncton was entered into before the late Government gave up their offices, and not only was the contract let, but the erection of the building was entered into before the present Government came into power.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am informed to the contrary, but I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) can tell the hon. gentleman that there was no contract; but we need have no words about that. I have known cases where works were begun in a county, and because the county did not send a man to support the Government, the works were never carried out, and have not been yet. In the county I represent, in 1882, the dredge was working at a certain place, and the day after the election, because the county sent a Liberal to Parliament, the dredge was taken away, and it never came back. But I am not, as I said before, making these statements in order to justify similar conduct on the part of this Government; but I am making them to show that on this point at least, hon. gentlemen opposite cannot have very much to say. One of the largest grants ever given for public works in Nova Scotia was actually given to Cape Breton, which is represented by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Everybody knows that by all systems of warfare you ought to weaken the strongest man in the party opposite. The Government were not wise in doing that if they acted on the principle that the hon. gentleman speaks of, for they ought to make the leader of the Opposition as weak as possible, and show to the constituency that that man, though leader of the Opposition, could get nothing. It might be said that they wanted to placate him. I admit that might be said in the case of a weak Government; but with a Government who are dealing with a disorganized and a quickly vanishing party there would be very little sense in doing anything like that. It might also be said that it was done to gain the good-will of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and thus keep him in a place in which, I am informed on credible authority on the opposite side, he is not wanted as much as he once was. Whether that is the case or not, I leave it for hon. gentlemen to settle. But there was no reason except this, that the work was one that ought to be done, and the present Government declared that they would not do violence to the country by neglecting to have necessary public works done in constituencies simply because those constituencies were represented by men opposed to them. I therefore join with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and fully endorse his ethical views; but I suggest to him that when he is giving no names, in the meantime he should devote his missionary efforts to his own friends to cure them of their past and prepare them for a better future.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to defend the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I, in common with all the members of this House, enjoyed that portion of the speech of the hon. member for Halifax as much as any one could. I will leave that hon. member at a fitting time to sustain his thesis and defend it in this House. Nor am I going to speak about Halifax matters nor upon the question of Senate reform. That matter has been spoken to so well by others, and will be voted on so strongly in this House, that it needs not my humble voice to say aught for or against it.

The hon. gentleman, in attempting to break the force of an attack that ought not to have been made in this House, but which was made on Major Walsh by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), asked: What did hon. gentlemen opposite do, when the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) attacked a member of this House? Well, Mr. Speaker, if it was the truth, they did right. But there is this distinction to be drawn between the two cases. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) stood before the man he was attacking. That man, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), was here in his place to defend himself. But Major Walsh is not in this House, and cannot say a word here in his defence; and a member of Parliament who takes advantage of his privilege to attack a man who has not a seat in this House, and cannot answer him here, ought to have a case so strong as to amount to a demonstration. Is the case of the hon. member for Pictou so strong as that? Let us see how Major Walsh is spoken of by one who, to say the least of it, cannot be accused of being in favour of the Government. I hold in my hand a letter from a man who is out there, and I only refer to this to show that the information of the hon. member for Pictou could not possibly be correct and sustained. This letter was written by Mr. Robert Barrow, of the city of Hamilton. I do not know the gentleman or anything about him, but he writes a very good letter, to which he signs his name, and I set this letter against the charges read in this House by a member of Parliament, and which were made by underlings and understrappers. Mr. Barrow says:

Regarding the recent utterances of Sir Hibbert Tupper on the late administration of Major Walsh in the Yukon district in 1898, it is the duty not only of a Christian but of an honest man to throw some truer light on such imputations. In August, 1897, I was appointed on the Yukon party then being sent to Dawson, reaching there October 11, 1897. According to the instructions of the department, I remained with the party till May, 1898, but then left, as I felt relieved of my duties by the personal and mutual animosity existing between myself and the commissioner.

It was, therefore, with very sore and anything but lenient feelings I observed the actions of the Government, and on that account was very much on the alert to seize on any faults. The three months remaining, which I spent in Dawson, included, with the time already in the Government's employ, most of Major Walsh's administration.

That is, the time he was employed out there with Major Walsh covered three months, and embraces Major Walsh's term in the Yukon.

Yet in this time, spent in the most varied employments, which led him into contact with a very wide range of people, there never was an action of the commissioner's which could be regarded other than that of a perfect British gentleman, courteous, but certainly rather reserved. Such was my observation, encamped not 200 yards from him and in full sight. Such was the opinion of all I had occasion to speak to or listen to. This in spite of the natural bitterness arising from the maintenance of the royalty laws.

I am not here giving the testimony of some unknown man who is ashamed to give his name to the world, but that of a citizen of Hamilton, who signs his name and can be called as a witness.

It should be known in the interest of truth and impartiality, my politics are independent, and the information given is absolutely gratuitous, nor does the fear of enmity from any or all the Conservative party, nor the expectation of any reward from the Liberal party, influence the calling of this forth. Sufficient will it be if the cause of truth is maintained.

Then follows a not flattering remark concerning the hon. member for Pictou, which I will not read to you.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Perhaps, it is as well the letter should be read in its entirety and put on record in "Hansard."

At the same time we cannot but express our deep sorrow that such calumnious assertions have been made by Sir Hibbert Tupper, for however false and shallow such slurs are, and worthy, as has been said, of the fights of old tomcats, a stink always remains, as the skunk's, for while many are able to grasp the rubbish floating on the surface, few care to search deeper to find the real pearls.

With much curiosity, then, not only as being a phenomenon, but as being the means of gaining valuable yet hitherto completely unknown knowledge, we wait the presentation of those mysterious yet respectable persons, who have misled so far or tempted to such rashness the hon. member for Pictou.

ROBERT BARROW.

All I have to say is, that this letter, coming from this man, who, I am informed by the hon. member for Hamilton, enjoys a most respectable character in the city of Hamilton, is much stronger than any evidence the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has produced in support of his assertions. The hon. member for Pictou spoke of Major Walsh in the most contemptuous terms. He suggested that Major Walsh kept courtesans and violated every rule of decency, and that he went so far as to use his influence with a judge appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, to obtain from that judge a decision in favour of a woman of the pavé. I submit, that the hon. member for Pictou himself violated all the rules of decency that ought to govern members speaking in this House, when he made assertions of that kind. It was neither dignified on the part of the man who made them, nor respectful to this House, that had to listen to them. We may fight our political battles, we may differ from each other in politics, we may use strong expressions as to other men's conduct, but the man who so far forgets himself as to bring on the floor of this House such charges against a man who is not here to reply, evinces thereby a sense of the weakness of his own case that in itself is sufficient to brand his assertions as slanders of the vilest character. That Major Walsh may have made mistakes, that Mr. Fawcett may have made mistakes, that Mr. Ogilvie may have made mistakes, or that any other man out there may have made mistakes, I do not deny, for I have no evidence to the contrary; but until evidence to the contrary is produced, I, for one, am not going to accept statements or charges against any man until his case is tried. Just fancy the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) rising before a judge and saying: I have read in the "Morning Chronicle," or "Herald," that there are some places open in this city at night that should not be open, or that a citizen of most respectable reputation was found under circumstances that seriously prejudice his moral standing before the community, or that a witness, whose name I will not give, has told me that a most flagrant violation of the criminal law was committed the day before yesterday, or that half a dozen people are stated to have violated the criminal law, not only in its ordinary sense, but in some of its most stringent provisions, and, therefore, I call Your Honour's attention to these facts as evidence that the city officials are not doing their duty, that there is something wrong in the moral tone of the community, or else these men would have been arrested. And I fancy the judge quietly saying: Sir, the courts are open, have him indicted, expose these people. Am I to be expected to listen to the like of this? Why, my dear Sir, I have sometimes to throw down the paper lest I have to read these scandals. You are not going to take up the time of the court and make me feel bad for this. Here is a man sent specially into the Yukon, whose character has been as highly spoken of by hon. gentlemen opposite as it has been from this side, to hear these cases about officials. I want to call the special attention of the House to the telegram to which the hon. Minister of the Interior referred, but of which he did not make as much as he might have done. Not only was the commission issued and given to Mr. Ogilvie, but, lest there should be any mistake, lest any official might plead any right he had, a telegram which went far beyond the commission, was sent to him. The commission was specific. A complaint had been made and the commission was appointed to deal with certain things. It gives Mr. Ogilvie certain power and indicated the scope of his authority. And, for the ground it covered, it was a complete authority. But the Minister of the Interior, about the time the commission reached Mr. Ogilvie, sent him the following telegram. I am informed that this was sent early in August:

You have an absolutely free hand in regard to officials. Do what is necessary to put the service on an effective footing.

Now, an honest man gets that, and he goes out to Dawson City and respectable men come to him with complaints of stealing on the part of officials. He has his authority to deal with such cases—not merely to hear the cases, but to deal with the officials in the interest of the department. Does any one believe that Mr. Ogilvie would not dismiss a man against whom anything had been proven? Let hon. gentlemen opposite take whichever horn of the dilemma they please. If Mr. Ogilvie is honest, the cases can be dealt with satisfactorily, because he has the power. If he is not honest, he has got dishonest since he went out there. Now, I ask in all fairness, what can be said against a Government that gives that full authority to a man to deal with officials wherever there is anything wrong? Is the Minister of the Interior to be spoken of as one who, for seven months did nothing, when we find that in a very few hours he issued this commission and followed it by the telegram to which I have referred. Is there any man in Canada who would believe that there is anything wrong so far as Mr. Ogilvie is concerned? Now, I do not remember exactly when Mr. Ogilvie reached Dawson City. I think, perhaps, he must have reached there some time about the end of September or the 1st of October. Now, when he got there I assume that he went about his work. Mr. Fawcett had been doing some business out there. The Minister of the Interior does not often split hairs as he attempted to do in regard to Judge Maguire. Here is what the Minister of the Interior said:

All the person aggrieved had to do was to enter a protest, and if it was a simple case, Mr. Fawcett tried it himself; if it was a complicated case, he would call in Judge Maguire. Judge Maguire took the evidence and heard the case, heard the lawyers on both sides, certified his opinion to Mr. Fawcett, and Mr. Fawcett decided in accordance with the opinion of the Gold Commissioner.

Let us see what was done in this special case. I have to leave the hon. member for Halifax to decide the question of law between himself and Judge Maguire, who I must assume, was a competent man, seeing that he was sent to the North-west Territories by a Conservative Government. Mr. Maguire gave a judgment in the particular case in question. If he was only called in as you would call in an accountant to say what amount was due, would he give a judgment? It may be said that Mr. Justice Maguire did not understand his duties, but he went into the case like a judge.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) permit me. I understand that he was called in, as an assessor always is, in order that the judge might have the benefit of his opinion. Very often that opinion is in writing. Take, for instance, the case of a nautical assessor called in by a judge in admiralty. His opinion is an advisory opinion and may be followed by the judge or may not. All I said was that Judge Maguire did not try the case, but sat as assessor and gave an opinion.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). But he was there and heard evidence. The great cry of the hon. gentlemen against Mr. Ogilvie was that he was not a lawyer. But he had the advantage of having Judge Maguire to assist him. Is it likely that he would act contrary to the decision of the judge who was called in? Is it not mere playing with words to attempt to show that because he was called in as assessor, the man who was to give the decision was without the benefit of legal knowledge. Is not this the most natural way of doing things in a new country, and is it not proof of the wisdom of the Minister of the Interior in appointing a man there who knew all about the country, because he knew he could get assistance in the interpretation of the law and could get from the judge what would be equivalent to a judgment on the case?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On the contrary I venture to submit to my hon. friend that what he has just stated is not the law. It has been decided by the Court of Appeal in England that the opinion of an assessor cannot be looked at by the Court of Appeal, because it does not form any part of the judgment.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am not attempting to argue this as the hon. gentleman and I would argue it in Nova Scotia. But I say it is playing with words to say that it was not the judgment of Judge Maguire. That judgment did not go to England. Judge Maguire was the judge who heard the evidence and gave the judgment. It surely is not reasonable to say that this man was sitting as an assessor, and therefore his decision is no good. It was so good that Mr. Ogilvie took it, and three lawyers, all of very good reputation, decided that it was right as approved by Mr. Ogilvie. Now, if I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) aright, when he arose, after the disturbing influence of the speech of the Minister of the Interior, and wanted to say something was wrong, because a witness in that particular case said so—if I am wrong the hon. gentleman will correct me.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The witness whom I quoted was not in that case, I think. It was in the case tried before Commissioner Senkler.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Well, all the same I want to be corrected if I am wrong, because, as I said, no man can remember even in that case. If I understand the argument of the hon. gentleman, it was this: A man said so and so there, and the case is not yet decided; the case is subjudice, yet to be heard. A witness swears to a certain thing for one party, and the hon. member thinks he has an argument, and that before the case is heard, and before the testimony of that man could be disproved.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman will permit me—I know he does not want to misstate the matter to the House. The evidence of the witness which I read was evidence of the party who said it, and was given against his own interest, and, therefore, as I submit, to the House is entitled to be relied upon.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Not necessarily. Of course, prima facie, if a man gives evidence against himself, it is good evidence, there is no question about that. But there are two things against the hon. gentleman. First, he has only a newspaper report of it, and he is going to found an argument on a newspaper report of evidence which might have been disproved by respectable witnesses before the trial was over. Let us introduce a bill at once that any evidence given by any man that suits any particular person interested in it, shall be taken as true, notwithstanding the judgment of the judge and jury to the contrary. You cannot build up a case like that, it is unfair to the Government, or to any other person. You cannot claim that any evidence of that kind is entitled to consideration. The hon. gentleman also has something to say about their being no junior Conservative Association in Ottawa, and that the senior Conservative Association did not send any man. Now let us see how that stands. I am ready to believe that there is no junior Conservative Association in Ottawa. There is no junior Conservative Association anywhere now, because they have found that it is not just the best place to be. But the hon. gentleman's evidence amounts to this: A man on oath said he was sent up by a certain association in Ottawa. Now, the hon. gentleman leaves no room for making a mistake as to the name of those that sent him. In his view it is a complete answer to hold that because a newspaper report says that this man swore that he was sent up by a certain association, when, as he says, he is informed there is no such association as was named; therefore, he is a liar. He said it under oath, mind you, he said it against his own interest, he was to get from one paper $225, that he never got, and shielded himself by saying that he was sent up by the junior Conservative Association of the city of Ottawa. Now, does the hon. gentleman think it is an answer to what that man has said, to say that there is no junior association in the city of Ottawa? He never sifted evidence like that before; he never had to, because he never produced evidence like that himself, and he would say that no other man could get such evidence into court, consequently he had to apply different rules altogether. Now I am bound to assume that this man was sent up by somebody, or else he is a perjurer. He is out there now, and there is a judge to try him for perjury. It may be difficult to get evidence, but I am showing how unsubstantial is the evidence that is attempted to be brought. Nor let it be forgotten that so far all the evidence is unimpeached. The hon. member says, and there may be something in the statement, that we should send a judge, the best judge up there. I do not think it ought to be a matter of great difficulty for Mr. Ogilvie, with his experience, if three witnesses come in and stated that they paid Mr. Burton $20 to get in at a side door, and if the other man does not say a word against it, it would not be difficult for Mr. Ogilvie to conclude that he is guilty. I do not think it requires a judge of a national reputation to decide a case, if the evidence is there to prove that a man gave an official money to obtain his rights. Where are the nice distinctions of evidence? Where is the question of pleading? It is simply this: I. A. B. say that B. C., an official of the Government, took money from me, and I will prove it by other witnesses. Does the hon. gentleman seriously say that a Canadian Lord Herschell should be sent out to hear cases of that kind? Does he say that the people of Canada will expect nothing else in consequence of the unsworn and unsubstantiated statements that are made by nameless traducers? I know the country does not think that. I know, as he well knows, that in cases of investigations, for example, the loss of a vessel, a judge is never called in to hear evidence of what happened. A number of men who understand a vessel are called in. Most of us, whether we are lawyers or merchants, have intelligence enough to know how much evidence it requires to show that a man stole money. We do not need all the paraphernalia of a court. You would think that at Dawson they have a court-house and all the splendid equipage laid out ready to receive a judge, and that there were men there skilled in evidence, who can by heart repeat every section of Taylor on Evidence. No such a thing. It is a mining camp where men just tell what they know very quickly. You do not need to go around the bush at all to get the evidence of a miner. If he had to pay money he will say so, and there is an end of it. Mr. Ogilvie is there ready to receive that evidence, if it is forthcoming. Is there any man in Canada who will say knowing the reputation of Mr. Ogilvie, a man who went into that country and worked for the Government honestly, who never took up a foot of land, and who came out just as he went in, with nothing more but his salary—will any one say that he is not a good man to inquire into and give a decision in matters of this kind? No, Mr. Speaker. the charge was begotten of a desire to raise a case not in the interests of the country. I remember when we in our places in Parliament made a statement that such and such a thing was true, and the evidence was heard and the case was proved, we were called traducers of our country, we were called unpatriotic. But hon. gentlemen opposite, take the unsubstantiated newspaper reports of men who have an interest in making accusations, and take them as true, and from one end of Canada to the other attempt to spread the report that there is corruption in the Yukon. Is that patriotism? Would not a man want at least to have the proof given? I was amused at the question of that telegram that came up and the righteous indignation of the member for Halifax that the name of the partner of the member for Pictou should be mentioned. Now, I want to say that I think this is the hugest joke that was ever got off by the Opposition. All that they attempt to fasten upon the Minister of the Interior is in relation to what, as a matter of fact, took place in the North-west Territories, that is where the license was given. But they heard there was something wrong, a lawyer got some money, they said. I heard it when I was out there. I heard that this partner got the permit to sell liquor. When I was out in the west a member of Parliament came to me and said: "Do you know what the Conservatives are saying now?" "I do not," I said, "I do not care very much either." "They are making the charge that you are out here to get your share in a liquor license, and that you are in with a man of another name altogether in that country."

Mr. PRIOR. I understood that it was a chief justiceship that the hon. gentleman was there for.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I did not need to go for that. Of course, you heard it from the same source, and it was not true. So little does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) know about the question that he does not know that there was no vacancy in the office at all, and that the chief justiceship had been filled a year before I was out there. He got some information from an ignorant man who did not know that there was no vacancy in the chief justiceship, and he did not take the trouble to make himself acquainted with the facts. I commend to the people of British Columbia an hon. gentleman who knows so little in reference to his own country. This is a joke on the hon. member. The attempt to fasten this charge upon the Minister of the Interior, I heard in the North-west Territories. The whole transaction came from the North-west Territories. Hon. gentlemen in this House know it, but they are not manly enough to stand up and say that they made a mistake. If the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) will say that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is correct and that he can prove the statements he has made, and I venture to say without having had any communication with the hon. Minister of the Interior, that he will apply for a committee and give him an opportunity of proving them. If the hon. gentleman is wrong in this matter, he should be manly enough to say so, and to admit that there is nothing against the Minister of the Interior. I do not say this because the member for Victoria is bringing this charge—I am talking generally.

Mr. PRIOR. As you usually do.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am not speaking specially about the hon. member for Victoria or giving any information about him, and therefore I talk generally, otherwise I would have nothing to say. Hon. gentlemen see that they are wrong in their statements about the Minister of the Interior, and they should say so. It must not be forgotten that there was nothing wrong in the Minister of the Interior getting that telegram. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) used the word "telegram," but the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) interjected the word "letter"—he wanted to fix up the evidence. The statement of the hon. member for Pictou was that a man was paid $500 by somebody out there for getting, from the Minister of the Interior, a permit to take whisky into the Yukon country.

Mr. PRIOR. I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) did not make the statement that a permit was got from the Minister of the Interior direct, but that after it was got from the North-west a telegram was sent to the Minister of the Interior to allow it to go through.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We must go to the record. I am not dealing with the explanation of the hon. gentleman. I am only mentioning the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) supplementing the statement of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) with the word "letter."

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for Pictou mentioned the word "letter."

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The gravamen of the charge is that $500 was paid by a lawyer in Victoria, and that that was for getting, not a permit issued by the North-west Territories, or coming to Ottawa and asking the Minister of the Interior to allow the liquor to go through, but that the Minister of the Interior directly gave the permit and that $500 was paid to a man in Victoria for getting it. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) attempted to take refuge by saying that it is monstrous that the name of the partner of the hon. member for Pictou should be mentioned. I do not know that there is anything divine about humanity like that. It was not monstrous that the hon. Minister of the Interior should be charged by the hon. member for Pictou that a lawyer, a friend of his in Victoria, had got $500 for getting a permit to sell liquor. Nothing wrong in that; no name mentioned; nothing wrong in that at all! This is Conservative warfare. But it is wrong when the Minister of the Interior searches diligently through the records to find if such a telegram came and finds only a telegram from the partner of the hon. member for Pictou—it is monstrous that he should mention that in this House. Did ever any person witness such a humiliating spectacle as that! The hon. Minister of the Interior must be left under the charge of the hon. member for Pictou upon a simple denial of the fact. When the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) mentioned a letter he showed that the evidence was weak, and he foresaw that while it might be said that the hon. member for Pictou had said that a telegram was sent he did not use the word "letter." It is nothing that these hon. gentlemen should have besmirched a member of the Government by charging him with doing something wrong, but it is monstrous to say that the partner of the hon. member for Pictou sent a telegram.

Mr. PRIOR. He is a good Grit.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Certainly he is a good Grit; at least he was before he associated with bad companions in Victoria, but I am afraid that the truth of the proverb has been verified, that evil communications corrupt good manners. Where was there anything wrong in that? Was that anything that any hon. gentleman should not have done in his own defence, and was it criminal for the partner of the hon. member for Pictou to send that telegram? Is there anything in that telegram asking for a liquor license? Must it be covered with a moral pall for fear that somebody will come forward and ask for it? Is that the reason that the hon. member for Halifax says it is monstrous to mention his name? The fact of the business is this: The hon. member for Halifax sees the weakness of the position in which the hon. gentlemen are placed. The hon. member for Pictou should not have communicated a fact he got from his partner about sending a telegram, to this House. If there is anything wrong in it, it is babbling abroad the fact. The hon. member for Pictou disclosed it here, and the hon. Minister of the Interior is not to be blamed for saying, "Your partner sent me a telegram." Where did the statement come from? The hon. member for Pictou made the statement. In this matter, the Opposition were in such haste to try to get something against the integrity of the Government that they failed to take the necessary precautions to see that their evidence was well sustained. And it would have kept them from the humiliation in which they stand before this country if they had got the hon. member for Halifax to investigate this charge, because if they had, there would have been none of this nonsense before this House. Some one says that the hon. Minister of the Interior gave a permit to his partner. The next man says the same. A lie has no legs and off it goes. The member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) says it is very bad; these are terrible things; such things were not in vogue on so small a scale in my day. The hon. member for Halifax took up the time of the House over a question of a $228 payment in Manitoba, and he waxed warm over the fact that that $228 had been paid out in some way or other. The hon. leader of the Opposition called out "hear, hear," looked around and asked: "Where did that $228 go, if I had not something to do with it?"

Two hundred and forty-eight dollars; just think of it! Two hundred and forty-eight dollars is the measure of the stealing of the friends of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), even according to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden). I tell the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), that if that man came here, and carried it away, and refused to give it, he could not enter the first form of a Conservative kindergarten of politicians and hold his place. As every hon. member of the House knows, and as every hon. member on the other side of the House showed last night, no case has been made out against the Government, and the supplementary evidence obtained by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), last night and this morning, has not added any strength to the contention of gentlemen opposite. And what does that supplementary evidence mean? It simply means, that two foreigners, who have gone into the Yukon, have made a statement to the hon. member, that such and such is wrong. If I remember aright—and, as I have not the paper here, and do not wish to do an injustice, I state I speak from memory—in last Monday's "Citizen" one of these gentlemen gave specific charges, which he said they presented before Mr. Ogilvie. What will be thought of men who make a complaint before Mr. Ogilvie in Dawson City, and come four thousand miles to Ottawa, at the instance of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), to have an interview with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) to try to make out a case. If I were to draw inferences from slander's shadowy reasons, I would say they were sent for, in the first place, by opponents of the Government, and, in the second place, that they could not prove their case in Dawson. I will not say the first, for I know nothing about it; but I will say, that it was a godsend for the hon. member for Halifax that he got even this much information to enable him to attempt an answer to the Minister of the Interior. It was a fortuitous circumstance that brought them here, whoever brought them here, for it gave him (Mr. Borden) the only plea he could advance to-day. I know, Sir, that in a mining country you can get more dissatisfaction and more men who want to almost raise an insurrection against the existing law than you can in any other community. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) told us, that the statement of these men was, that the miners are opposed to the soldiers. Of course, they are. They are opposed to any authority.

Mr. PRIOR. No, sir.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Canadians are not; but what do you expect from 90 per cent of a foreign population? Now, Sir, let me for a few moments follow up what the Minister of the Interior said last night. Sir, the spectacle never was presented in any new gold fields in the world, of forty or fifty thousand men going into a country, without railroads, without telegraph communication, over a trail, and only a single murder was committed in the whole district since the present Government took charge of the administration there. The world has never seen anything like that, and to the soldiers belongs at least some of the credit. I did not go into Dawson, but I saw their work, and I saw the Mounted Police, and a better set of men never were in the employ of any government, or men who were more highly spoken of. I met an American, who told me, that it was a pleasure to cross the supposed American boundary line into Canada, because on British soil he found protection and justice. In view of all that the Government has done in that country, will it be contended that they should be blamed because some other things were not done, and done, mind you, within a year? Such a contention is absurd. These hon. gentlemen opposite want the work of years to be performed in a moment. Speaking reverently, I believe they would complain because the creation occupied six days, and contend that it should have taken less time. In a new country government is gradually evolved. The opinions of the people differ. I venture to say, that not a dozen men who went into that country held similar opinions, and I believe also, that the controlling motives in the hearts of the foreigners was to get all the gold they could any way and every way, and to attain that object, if British rule could be set aside, it might be set aside. The Mounted Police, and the soldiers, and the judge that was in that country, taught them such salutary lessons as the old Chief Justice Begbie taught the same class of men in British Columbia. They were taught that, wherever they set their foot, whether in the beautiful province of British Columbia, near the coast fortifications, where the guns could be brought into play, or whether on the Yukon, 700 miles from the coast, wherever they set foot on British territory, British law and British order reigned supreme, and, Sir, to this Government is due that fact. I do not admit it, but, for the sake of argument, I will admit that some officials have committed acts they ought not to commit, and that is the whole burden of the charges made. I ask men of reason, if, without specific charges and without any method of proving them, the head of the department should be blamed for every act, however suppositious, that may be committed by an official. Sir, the universal testimony I found at Skagway, and from Skagway down to British Columbia—and I met hundreds of miners—and the universal verdict was: Mr. Fawcett is an honest man; Mr. Ogilvie is an honest man. When the Government provided two such men in the best interests of the country, I ask you, where does the blame lie?

Mr. PRIOR. How long has Ogilvie been there?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Fawcett went there in 1897; Mr. Ogilvie is there now.

Mr. PRIOR. Oh, yes.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). These are the two men I said were honest.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Ogilvie had not the power until lately.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, nor you have not the power you had then.

Mr. PRIOR. We will get the power in good time.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I tell the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), that these gentlemen had the power of the law. These gentlemen opposite have not cast even a semblance of suspicion on the honesty of Mr. Ogilvie or Mr. Fawcett. Mr. Ogilvie knows more about the Yukon than any man in Canada. He is honest; he has got the fundamental principle of a judge in his honesty; he has got a qualification above all others that fits him for the position. But, Sir, even in the face of such facts, gentlemen opposite have called men and women into play and quote their statements of various kinds, and on these general and unsubstantiated statements they have attempted to show that the Yukon is badly and immorally governed. I am reminded by an hon. friend, that no charge has been made against the honesty of Major Walsh: not a word has been said against his honesty. Now, Mr. Speaker, that being the state of things, I ask any man if the position of the Government is not impregnable. We must understand that we ought to deal here, not in supposition, but in fact; and if hon. gentlemen opposite think they are conserving the best interests of their party and the country by continuing after so little has been discovered, we can only say to them if that is your method of enlightening the country, and the country is with you, we are quite satisfied and you may continue at it as long as you like, but every day you are losing ground. I say the people of this country are not going day after day to listen to long speeches on this question when no definite charge is made or is attempted to be made. The people of this country are very long-suffering to listen to the speeches that have been made, and they will be long-suffering in listening to mine, although it will not be very long. But they live after the flood, not before. In the days of "Hilpa and Shallum these speeches might be light reading;" but in these days, when things move so quickly, they are nothing but a drug in the intellectual market. When hon. gentlemen come to specify charges, let us have them; but to spread over all these days what hon. gentlemen have said, I conceive does them no benefit whatever. They are the judges, not I. I am sure that when the hon. member for Halifax gives his own opinion, or says that the evidence is the evidence of So-and-so, it will be regarded with the greatest possible respect in the province from which he comes. But I want no better reading to justify the Government than his own speech as the best that was made in an attempt to show that the Government were not acting as they should. Before I leave this branch, I want again specifically to say that when the Government got the first charge, dated the 5th of August, at Dawson, and on the 7th of the following month issued their commission, they acted with the greatest possible haste, and did all that any reasonable man could ask any Government to do. And now the matter is in the hands of Mr. Ogilvie; we shall have his report; and I submit to hon. gentlemen opposite that at least they might lay the foundation of some intelligent discussion by waiting until that report is forthcoming.

In closing, I want to refer to one or two other matters that have occupied our attention during this discussion. I remember when the tariff was brought down. It seems that the whole discussion in the House and the country is that the Liberals have not kept their promises.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Hon. members opposite say "hear, hear." Well, I want to emphasize what the Minister of the Interior said about the way the tariff of the present Government was received when it was brought down. Are hon. gentlemen opposite more intelligent now than they were then? At that time there was a universal chorus that the tariff was going to kill the industries of Canada. Did hon. gentlemen raise that cry with a political purpose or in ignorance? They can take either horn of the dilemma. We were told, for example, that certain industries in the county of Pictou would be closed up; and the mournful tale was told that the iron works in New Glasgow would be closed up. I tell you that the first year of the working of the new tariff, so far as the works in New Glasgow are concerned, was the banner year of their history. In that year they manufactured more goods than in any year before, and this year will be better than the last. One case of that kind is better than a hundred fancies. We laid down our platform, and our platform is our platform still, whatever individual members of the House may say. What did we say in that platform in reference to the tariff? We said that the tariff should be based, not upon a protective principle. We said that the tariff should be changed. We did change the tariff.

Mr. PRIOR. How much?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Enough to show the people of Canada two things—first of all, that we had kept our promise; and second, that we had opened the avenues of trade as they had never been opened before. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) is saying something. Why, Sir, there never was such a year in his county as there is this year. They are actually going to start a hog factory of some kind down in his county to put up pork. We said we would improve farm property; did we do it? There is not a man in Canada but will say we did it. We said we would increase the commerce of the country; did we do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Last year surpassed all previous years in Canada's history.

Mr. PRIOR. You did not do it.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We increased the immigration, so that the Toronto "Mail" had to say that the exodus was a thing of the past. We said we would do it, and we did it. We said we would not discriminate against Great Britain, but would do the very opposite. We did it. There are four things we did. If hon. gentlemen are still not satisfied and unbelieving, we said we would turn them out, and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) knows that we kept our promise.

Mr. PRIOR. The first time in 18 years.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I admit that no Government can make full prosperity in any country. We said so when in Opposition, and we say so now. We said all a Government could do was to lower the tariff, in the interests of the many, and open up the avenues of commerce, so that there would be the fullest possible commerce between this country and the old world, and we did it. We did not say that we were going to give full crops. Hon. gentlemen opposite said they had done so; and when the Colorado beetle came here they said it was Mackenzie's fault, and when it went away, they said they had sent it away. Suppose we had been defeated in 1896, in the state of things that existed under Conservative rule, and they were returned, I think I can hear them saying: "You know how the country was everywhere depressed; a general feeling of insecurity existed; the crops failed; we were in a wretched position, and, gentlemen, what happened? As soon as the country learned by our victory that the incubus of the Liberal party was removed, it sprang into activity; the sunlight glinted on every blade, the rain fell in refreshing showers, and the kindly mother earth opened her bosom and gave us the best crops we ever had." They said it before, and I see no reason to believe that they have changed their methods. Were they honest when they said they did it? I have listened in this House to speeches by the hour, in which it was shown the crops were better than ever, that there was more money in the savings banks and all that sort of thing.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They said the National Policy made the hens lay bigger eggs.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Well I do know that a Conservative, who was filled with the idea of selling eggs in England, did make the suggestion that he could start a lucrative trade in that business. He said he would take hens over with him in the steamer and he would have a spring nest, so that when the hen laid an egg, the egg just touched a spring and went down to the bottom where the hen could not see it, and when the hen saw no egg, it would think it had laid none and would keep on laying. While I lay down the proposition that no Government can make good times in the country, never in the history of Canada or of any other colony, has there been such an advance in trade and commerce as there has been in this country in the last two years. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that things would go to the bad, that our workmen would be thrown out of employment, and that we would become impoverished. But I was delighted to hear my genial and kindly friend, the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) tell us that the last two years were banner years in business in his province. That is the National Policy for you revised. Now, while the Government cannot give us good times, we said we would move in that direction, and let me read to you what our leader said at our convention before our platform was adopted. He said:

I say the policy should be the policy of free trade such as they have in England.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That "hear, hear," came just a little too soon. The hon. gentleman never read the speech.

But I am sorry to say that the circumstances of the country cannot admit that policy at present in its entirety.

Say "hear, hear" now.

But I propose to you from this day henceforth it shall be the goal to which we aspire.

Now, we have made a change in the tariff. Have hon. gentlemen opposite read the history of the mother country? Do they know anything about the free trade movement in England? It took more than twenty years before the protective system was done away with in England and they obtained free trade as it is there now. If hon. gentlemen opposite were students of their own country's history, they would see that the British Parliament acted exactly as we are doing. We are moving in that direction, and each successive revision of the tariff is in that direction.

Mr. PRIOR. Does the hon. gentleman mean that this Government is going to take twenty years to have free trade?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I shall be perfectly happy if in twenty years we have free trade as they have it in England. If we move in this new country as fast as they did in the old country I shall be perfectly satisfied, and I trust that my vigour shall be sustained until that day. When that time comes—and hon. gentlemen opposite think the state of things will be something awful if it will come in twenty years—there is no man opposite me who will not be ashamed that his grandchildren should read his name as that of one who spoke of protection as the principles which should govern any country. We are moving in the direction of free trade, perhaps not as quickly as I would like. I may be too radical, but so long as our progress is forward and in the direction of the goal spoken of by my leader, I am going to follow him.

Mr. MILLS. Are you going to take a step forward this year or simply to mark time?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mark time—no man but a Conservative out of office has the leisure now to mark time, he is so busy in this country. In that direction I say they moved in England until the goal of free trade was reached, and in that direction we are moving here. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told our manufacturers that they must see to it that their houses are put in order. I know there are men who may think that some of us are too radical and want to move forward too quickly, but believing, as I do, that free trade principles, when applied, are productive of prosperity and believing that the changes made in the tariff of Canada during the last couple of years are in the best interests of Canada, I am prepared to move forward in that direction and in that direction only. I would walk backwards or crab-like if I did anything else. If the Liberal party only moved forward at a snail's pace rather than going back to the miserable retrograde policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, the end ultimately would be reached. So long as we are going forward, I shall do all I can to help on that advance. We are advancing materially, and is it not better that we should go on in that direction than in the other? But I want to make the statement emphatically that our pledges have been fulfilled to a certain extent, according to the time at our disposal; and if I should find that the tariff was destined to remain even as it is now, that we have reached a point where we could sit down and say this is a perfect tariff for Canada and in the best interests of the workingmen, I should despair of my country, and leave it to others who would undertake that task to settle with themselves, their consciences and their countrymen, as to whether or not anything we have yet done is a full measure of what this country demands. Let there be no misunderstanding about it. Under the impetus of that movement forward, trade has expanded at an extraordinary rate. The efforts of the Government to give facilities for cold storage, the opening up of the route to Montreal whereby last year's traffic was the largest we have yet had on the Intercolonial, and this year's promises to be larger still, the fact that our canals are deepened, thus enlarging our water ways by which the products of our country can be taken to the ocean more profitably than they can be through the United States—all these are steps forward for which any man, acting in the best interests of his country should feel grateful. On account of all these things, I am with the Government as far as they have gone, and I am with them in the desire to go further as they will, and thus we will progress on the same lines as those on which the mother country has reached such an advance in her commercial career, until such time as we reach the same goal. What have hon. gentlemen opposite to say to the remarkable change in the trade of this country that we have witnessed since this Government took office?

Why, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party in June, 1896, were in such a condition that, if it could live and hold power, one might well despair of this country. They had control of the ship of state—to put it in their own words, for they are always fond of talking about the ship of state. Now, I was born by the sea, I have gone to sleep with the music of its waves, and I know something about shipping. Here is the Conservative ship of state. Six months before they had the old captain, Sir Mackenzie Bowell aboard. The ship was sailing gallantly and the Conservatives everywhere were talking joyfully of the great ship of state. But one day the jolly boat was lowered and seven of the crew got into it. Down they went, down the side of the ship, and away to shore, and as they went they put out their tongues and shook their fingers at the captain, shouting "Imbecile! Imbecile!" And the old man, walking the deck shouted, "Traitors! Traitors!" And away goes the jolly boat towards shore. Down the shore is seen a man coming, and the old captain knows him and shouts, "Weldon, are you an A. B. seaman?" "Yes," "Come aboard." "Skinner, are you a good seaman?" "Yes." "Come aboard." "Billy Smith, of Ontario—

Some hon. MEMBERS. "Blair."

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). No, Blair was not asked. They knew too much for that. I do not know—my recollection is not quite perfect—but I think the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) was one of the jolly boat crew that went ashore. He knows more about that than I do. The old captain was walking up and down with gray, dishevelled locks. And when the hon. member for Victoria and the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), heard that A 1 seamen were ready to go on board, what did they do? They slunk into the jolly boat and rowed back to the old ship of state. And the "old man" took them up. But he did not give them any breakfast that day. He lessened their drinks, and did two or three things to bring them to their senses, and declared, "I would not take you aboard but that the interest of my employer demands that I should go on without trouble." And to this day, I understand, the old captain has not spoken to some of the traitors. Shortly afterwards the old captain is got ashore, I do not know how—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Marooned.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is a good word—he was marooned, and the present leader came on board. There was rejoicing and hope rose high. The captain was going to get good booty, prizes were going to be equally divided, and the crew were to have abundance of provisions and spoil. And now she is moving, moving. And on that fatal day in June, 1896, she is coming on steadily. About five o'clock what do we find? The lead is thrown, and the cry is heard—sixty fathoms of water. Again it is thrown—forty fathoms. A man who knows anything at all about the sea knows that when you come down in a short time from sixty fathoms to forty fathoms there is danger. The captain will not have it, but declares: There is 150 or 200 fathoms under this good ship of state; we are all right. They are still sailing on until about seven o'clock in the evening, and are nearing, nearing the shore. But all seems well, and the hon. member for Victoria, who is a good singer, is singing:

Sailing, sailing, over the bounding main,
For many a stormy gale shall blow ere the Grits get in again!

But suddenly the cry is "We've struck!"
"We're on the rocks!" "We're lost!" The voice lowers and the dying sounds were:

Sailing, sailing, she'll never stand the strain,
And many a year will pass ere we are ever in office again.

And there is the great Conservative ship of state. She is worm-eaten, barnacled, water-logged; the sails are all patched, and they have been attempting to sail with the jib aft.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think I hear the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr.

Mills) speak again. And he is the first man to laugh at what he says—I suppose, nobody else would. Now, what is the effect of this wreck. Every doctor here knows, if there should be one in this Chamber, will say, that I am correct in stating that a fearful shock of that kind produces what is called general paresis, the results of which are very striking—loss of faculties affecting the body and jumbling the speech with the thoughts; extravagant ideas of wealth and influence—they think they are still in power. People afflicted with this disease occasioned by shock, are often seen in the asylum. They think they are kings and queens and have millions of dollars—a fearful disease. They are troubled with physical weakness—some members actually get tired after they have spoken six hours. The most peculiar thing is that it produces a chattering without the sufferer being able to put forth any effort so far as the intellect is concerned. That accounts for much that we have heard in this House. Now, the Liberal party took office. They found three deficits and they met them. They found a country being depopulated. The "Mail and Empire" is authority for the statement that the exodus is a question of the past and that people by the thousand are coming into this country. Much has been said about some of the men coming to settle amongst us. We hear some criticisms about the Galicians and the Doukhobors. All I know is that men who come here to escape the tyranny of Russia and who on their landing present the spectacle witnessed by the people of Halifax must be good citizens. What did the people of Halifax see? A down-trodden race of fine physique and splendid character, who, as they came into the harbour of the city of Halifax, and when they saw the land, although it was not as inviting from an agricultural point of view as the great western prairies, fell upon their knees and thanked their Creator that they were in sight of a land of liberty. Give me men of that stamp and I will trust this country's destiny, for they are men who understand the relation of things. They are coming in large numbers, and next year, it is said, we shall have many coming from the United States. The Liberal party found trade languishing, and trade has gone up by leaps and bounds. To-day the banks tell us there never was anything to compare with the amount of money they handle, and the savings banks tell us the same thing. Trade is everywhere bouyant, and the people are hopeful. The hon. member for Halifax twitted the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) because that hon. gentleman said that when the people were merry the country was easily governed. It is perfectly true. The unfortunate position in which hon. gentlemen opposite found themselves was that, owing to their own interference with trade, trade in 1896 was not as prosperous as the people desired. The men of this country understand themselves. When the farmer who tills the soil, the man who works in the mine, the man who labours in the forest—when these find employment the country is happy. We have learned a great lesson. There are some who think that tall chimneys are the glory of the country.

Give me the farmers having good crops. I care not for anything else, because, when they have good crops and are well paid for them, you need not look much further after them. This country is in that condition. The Liberal party not only did that, but they found the country almost in a state of religious war, so that actually some of the best men in the Conservative party had to leave it, notably—pardon me for making the reference—the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). We found this country in a state that any man who loved it ought to regret. The Liberal party said: We will settle that question, and we did settle it. I want to say here now what I said to my constituents, that there is not a heart in Canada who should not be grateful to Almighty God that that question was nipped, as it was, at its inception. I do not say that because my Catholic friends were on the other side. I would say it, and fight in the same way, if the Presbyterian Church or any other church tried to do the same thing. This Canada is broad enough for all classes and all creeds. All I have to say is, that, when the electorate of Canada, at the last election, settled that question, put it in the power of the Government to settle it, as settle it they did, they conferred upon Canada a lasting favour, and every man that voted for this party against influences so strong, has earned for himself the gratitude of the people of Canada. We now can move on without any more fear of ever having this question thrust upon us.

Then, what more happened? The Premier went to Great Britain, and that visit did more to make Canada known and respected, did more to bring her resources to the attention of the people of Great Britain, did more to commend this country to them as a place for the investment of their wealth, than all the acts and the words of the Conservative party ever effected since its existence. We presented this spectacle, that from the throes of an election in which an attempt had been made to raise the cries of race and creed, we gave an object lesson to Great Britain, we showed that we could send home a Frenchman and a Catholic as our Premier to tell them that we had no narrow views upon those questions in this country. We told them more than that: we told them, that so beneficent were the laws that she had given to this country, and so well administered, that our French brethren were as law-abiding and as loyal towards Great Britain as those of her own blood, as those who had descended from that island, the only island that is named among the nations of the world as being the island of islands. More than that, we presented the spectacle of having a French Premier—I won't call him a French Premier; hon. gentlemen opposite may use the phrase; I call him a Canadian Premier of French extraction—going over to Paris, and what did he say in Paris? He made a speech in Paris that was remarkable. He did not speak in Paris differently from what he spoke in England; he did not speak in Paris differently from what he spoke in Canada. He told the people of Paris, in as pure and perfect Parisian as they ever heard, that the French people had not the genius to form colonies and to govern them like Great Britain. A French paper said: Mr. Laurier is correct; we have to bear it. We have not learned, as Great Britain has learned, to plant our colonies and to conduct them successfully, as she has done. So that, whether at Paris or in London, he stood up as a man who commanded universal attention. Not only was Canada better known in Great Britain through his influence, but the attention of the people of that country was drawn to Canada as never before, and they began to study it as a field for immigration and a field for the investment of capital. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that these two things give the Liberal party in Canada a title to the gratitude of its people. This party has settled racial and creed cries for ever, and we showed that, as a self-governing country, we could send home, as our representative, a man who was the pride of both races. On those lines, and those alone, must we proceed in this country, if we are going to succeed.

But hon. gentlemen opposite say that we spoke against expenditure when we were in opposition. We did. This is the position we took: You spend too much money, because much of it is wasted and defrauded from the country. But we never contended that we should not spend money that we could afford to spend in Canada, if it was spent honestly. That is the position we took. We say now that we have a country of boundless wealth, and a population that cannot be surpassed, and we must see to it that our money is not spent in the interest of political partisans, or to fill the coffers of the political boss, but in the interest of all Canada, in a way that will accrue to the country as a whole. We believe that every avenue of trade open to us in any part of the world should be utilized to the greatest possible advantage of this country, because when we have peaceable caravans of commerce going through the country, or covering the oceans with the sails of our ships, we have that which makes a nation. We have opened up trade with Great Britain, we have given her a preference that is bringing articles from Great Britain, and that will increase such importations to a still greater extent. We have shown a disposition to recognize Great Britain as our friend. Hon. gentlemen opposite were always talking of their loyalty and of their attachment. What did we do? Recognizing that Great Britain had done so much for us, recognizing that a boy born in Canada 200 miles from the centre of civilization, if he happened to be in Africa, or Turkey, or Russia, or in any other country in the world, English guns, the English navy, English soldiers and English money were at his back as much as if he were born in Great Britain. So we said to them: We will give you a preference. You have done much for us, we will show our gratitude by making that preference in your favour, believing that it will bring good results to both countries. We did not talk in empty platitudes about our attachment to the Empire, but we showed by well defined actions what we meant, and what a response came from the mother land! Never in the history of an English colony was there such a universal chorus from the heart of Great Britain in appreciation of what we had done. These are a few of the things that we have done, and these are in the line of other things that we shall do. We shall not, I trust, be deterred by the empty speculations of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the assaults that are made upon the Government by raising cases against the departments where no ground for them exists. We shall answer them as they were answered yesterday in a manner that has never been surpassed in this House. When the Liberal party came to power we found the country depopulated, an exodus ever increasing; we found men in power who had no conception of British principles or of British fair-play, and we gave in return efficient and honest Government. Every day brings further evidence of the gratitude of the people of this country, not in French Quebec, as it is called, but in all British Ontario and elsewhere. These hon. gentlemen opposite are so little heeded; their efforts are so little recognized that an intelligent populace listens to them with laughter, mingled with scorn, and whenever the occasion returns, as it will again return, the people in the interest of an ever-advancing prosperity of this country and good Government, will unite to sustain the present Administration.

Mr. PRIOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I do not wish to press my hon. friend (Mr. Prior), if he desires to move the adjournment of the debate, but as the hour is early I am sure the House will be glad to listen to him. I would like to say this to the hon. gentleman: He is a reasonably old member of Parliament; the debate has been prolonged now for a great many days and it seems to me that as one of the leading gentlemen on the other side of the House, he ought to be able to give us some indication as to when hon. members propose to bring it to a close. If he cannot do it now I think he ought to be prepared to give us some assurance on that subject to-morrow. I will ask the hon. member to say that he will find out something about the matter and inform us of the intention of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition on that subject to-morrow. I have no desire to press him at this moment to go on.

Mr. PRIOR. I am unable to tell the hon. gentleman whether this side of the House will then have got in all their work, but I will see the hon. leader of the Opposition to-morrow and ascertain what information he can give me.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 6th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 33) respecting the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Edmonton and Slave Lake Railway Company.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Bill (No. 36) to amend the Criminal Act, 1892.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Naturalization Act.—(Mr. McInnes.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the attachment of salaries of public officers and employees of the Government.—(Mr. Richardson.)

THE READING ROOM.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Government, and especially of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to the unsatisfactory condition of the reading room with regard to light and ventilation. The reading room is a place where a number of members go to look over the papers, but frequently it is almost impossible to read the print on account of the imperfect lighting, and besides the atmosphere of the room is anything but agreeable owing to defective ventilation. I am sure it is quite sufficient to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this matter in order to have the present condition of the room remedied.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry the hon. Minister of Public Works cannot be in his seat to-day owing to indisposition, but I shall inform him of the remarks of my hon. friend.

THE CLOSING OF THE DEBATE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that the hon. leader of the Opposition is not in his seat, but perhaps the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) is in a position to give some information as to when we may expect the close of this debate.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I must ask my right hon. friend to renew his question before we rise at six o'clock, when the leader of the Opposition will be in his place and can give him the information.

TROUBLE AT SKAGWAY.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to a clipping which is going the round of the newspapers, indicating that serious trouble has arisen near Skagway between the Canadian police and the United States Customs authorities over the refusal of the Canadian police to allow liquor, attended by United States officers as convoys, to pass the summit, and that in retaliation the United States Customs authorities have refused to pass any liquors in bond through from Skagway. Has the hon. Minister any authoritative statement to make with reference to that?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I have heard nothing so far, but I shall make inquiries.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria). On my way up to the House just now, I was overtaken by a friend who asked me whether it was true that I was going to speak this afternoon. I informed him that I was afraid I should have to inflict myself on a suffering House, and he said: Well, I hope you will rise to the Imperial standard. What is the Imperial standard, I asked. He replied: Speak for ten minutes, and say something. I should be very glad, indeed, Mr. Speaker, if

Mr. SPROULE.

I could rise to that standard, but there are so many questions of vital importance to the country, on which I am certain everybody in Canada wishes to hear something from hon. members, and also because I owe it as a duty to my constituents and myself to give my views on certain matters under debate, that I am afraid I shall have to take more than ten minutes, but I assure hon. gentlemen that I shall be as brief as I possibly can.

My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) last night answered the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Borden)—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Tried to.

Mr. PRIOR. I accept most willingly the correction. The hon. gentleman spoke after the hon. member for Halifax and tried to answer a speech that I think has been very seldom equalled within the walls of this House. It was a masterly effort, I consider, from whatever standpoint you take it. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), as we all know, is a gentleman who always makes an amusing speech. He is always good-tempered and people like to listen to him, and he is never more amusing than when he is most vehement and denunciatory. But it seemed to me last night that the hon. gentleman, knowing he had such a weak case, out-Heroded Herod and put more vehemence than ever into his muscular contortions, evidently considering that loud denunciations of the Opposition would satisfy the country just as well as would the making out of a good case for his own side. In the first place, he said, and in this he was very emphatic, that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) had hammered and smashed and pulverized and flattened out the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman evidently, judging by the way he waved his muscular and manly form about, considered he was doing the same thing to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden); but I shall leave it to this House—to this side anyway—whether I am not right when I say that if those two speeches from the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for Halifax are not flattened out more than we have heard already, we have nothing to fear from the verdict of the electorate of Canada.

Sir, this debate began as a debate on the Speech from the Throne, but it seems to me that latterly we have heard very little about anything but the Yukon. I intend saying a few words on that subject, but before doing so, I wish to deal with some others. I am free to declare that it is a great undertaking for a man like myself—only a humble business man, with no legal training—to follow in the wake of four legal lights. That Yukon matter has been discussed pro and con by four able lawyers; and my experience in life has taught me that to tackle one lawyer is a pretty serious matter, but to take part in a scrap with four is considerably more dangerous.

Before I commence on the subject of trade, I would like to mention a little matter referred to by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). I am sorry to say, that during his speech I got a little tired, and I was dozing a little—and so were some hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House. But suddenly I was awakened by my hon. friend on my right, who nudged me and said that something he was saying was intended for me. Well, I woke up and heard the hon. gentleman giving us a most dramatic account of a shipwreck. At first, I thought I must be in a theatre, hearing about the Superba, where the shipwrecked mariner was telling of the frightful hardships and disasters he had undergone. But when I collected my senses, I found the hon. gentleman was trying to explain to the House about a shipwreck of the ship of state that had occurred, and he said that the hon. member for Victoria had jumped into the jolly boat and made for the shore along with the rest. Well, if the hon. gentleman meant my humble self, as the member for Victoria who jumped into the jolly boat, I can only say that at that time the captain of the vessel had never asked me to come under his command, or had only just asked me to do so, but I had not gone on board. I was simply passing my examination to show my qualifications for the position, and I am glad to say that I passed the examination successfully. Now, Sir, I bring this matter up to show that I am not the only man who forgets. I stated that, when he was in Victoria, he was on the lookout for the chief justiceship, and the hon. gentleman said that I was a year out. Well, if I was a year out, that does not make much difference in the fact. He was looking after it and expecting it, anyway.

Mr. FOSTER. Looking after it still.

Mr. PRIOR. Now, I want to say a word or two in regard to the speeches that have been made by some hon. gentlemen on this occasion. I am afraid that, after following such able debaters as the hon. the leader of the Opposition, the ex-Finance Minister, and other gentlemen of equal talent in this House, I cannot say anything new. But I could see with my eyes that the speeches that have been made by members on this side of the House have hit the Government side very hard indeed. Sir, we had a proof of it from the right hon. leader of the Government, we had an exhibition from him that, I think, was unparalleled during the time that I have been in the House. He has always been noted for being suave, polite and sunny, but I must say, that I think the leader of the Opposition hit him in the raw and this you could see by the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite. Although some of their papers are very prone to say that the leader of the Opposition is getting old, and senile, and in his dotage, yet we find that he has still the vigour, and the strength, and the ability to find out the weak spot in the armour of the Government. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who moved the reply to the Address from the Throne, deserves my congratulations for the marked ability he has shown, and, as the leader of the Opposition remarked, I think he is an acquisition to the House. Still, I think that he made some mistakes in his speech. I noticed, for one thing, that he took credit, and the credit is also taken in the Speech, for the total stoppage of the exodus from this country. Well, Sir, it is a very hard thing for anybody, for even a Minister of the Crown, to be able to say whether the exodus has been stopped or not. We can only go by what we hear from the different districts, and especially from the amount of settlers' effects that are passed through the customs by people who declare that they are going out of the country. Now, I find that last year $870,000 worth of settlers' effects went out of the country, a sum very little less than it has been for years and years past. Now I take up the Montreal "Daily Star," and find in it an extract from a paper in Bangor, Maine. This paper stated, the other day :

This is the season for the annual migration of Canadians to the United States, and dozens of them pass through Bangor on every train from the east. Within the last few days the second class travel has been exceedingly heavy, but on Tuesday all records were broken, when 120 men, women and children, from all parts of the lower provinces, arrived here in two cars. Their stay was short on account of the lateness of the train, and they were in Bangor only for the brief time occupied in switching cars from one train to another.

Now that shows that the exodus from the lower provinces, at all events, has not been stopped, and it seems to me most extraordinary that the hon. Minister of the Interior, who must have known this, should have seen fit to place it in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne. Hon. gentlemen opposite have laid great stress upon the fact that at the present time Canada is prospering, that there is great prosperity in Canada from one side of the continent to the other. There is no doubt about that; I do not think that any hon. gentleman on this side of the House will deny that. There is prosperity, I am glad to say, the whole world over—in Great Britain under free trade, in the United States under protection, and in Canada under protection. I think, also, that any gentleman who is unbiassed, of course like myself, will see at once that it is through no action of the present Government, but from causes altogether outside of any governmental policy, that we now enjoy prosperity in Canada. Those hon. gentlemen were fortunate enough to get into power just at the time when Canada and the whole world were on the eve of a period of prosperity. We have had years and years of depression, not owing to any fault of any Government, but owing to national causes; and how they can take credit for the prosperity of this country, except in so far as they maintained the policy of the former Government, I cannot understand. Sir, the present Government undoubtedly gained thousands and thousands of votes over the whole of this Dominion by the promises they made to an unsuspecting electorate, that if they were successful in reaching power, they would give the country free trade, they would economize, they would reduce the national debt, the artisan would have to put his hands into his pockets for money very much less frequently than he had done in years past. They preached this doctrine from every hustings, and from every platform; but, at the same time, they took very good care to go around to the back door and tell the manufacturers that they had nothing to fear, that, although they were going to get into power on a free trade cry, on a promise to cut off every bit of protection, still, they were going to look after their friends, as they called them, the manufacturers. Well, Sir, if those hon. gentlemen had been men enough to stick to their promises and to keep their pledges, do you believe for one moment that we should see what we see now? Should we see the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), all gentlemen having large manufacturing interests in this country, who are undoubtedly satisfied with things as they are at the present time—do you think that we would see these gentlemen now supporting this Government, if hon. gentlemen opposite had kept their pledges? Why, Sir, we know perfectly well that their policy would have been the ruination of the manufacturers. Let us see for a moment what these pledges were. Last night, when I asked the hon. member for Guysborough whether they still intended to take up free trade and have it in twenty years, he said they did, and that they would do very well indeed if they got it in twenty years. My hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) and my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) will have made a pretty good fortune before twenty years are up, and so they have nothing to fear; but I think the electors of Canada will look upon it in a different way. The right hon. Prime Minister, speaking at the Liberal Convention, said:

I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade. * * * I submit to you, therefore, that the system of protection which is maintained by the Government, that is to say of levying tribute upon the people, not for the legitimate expenses of the Government, but for a private and privileged class, should be condemned without qualification. Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection, our ideal is free trade.

Well, Sir, this is their ideal of free trade which they may get to in twenty years. The resolution moved at the convention has been read before but I think it cannot be impressed too strongly upon the minds of the people of Canada and I will read it again:

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Well, Sir, the electors took them at their word; they put them there and I hope they are satisfied, but I very much doubt it. At Newmarket, in 1893, the right hon. Prime Minister said:

I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. Our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection.

Mr. COCHRANE. Who said that?

Mr. PRIOR. The right hon. leader of the Government at the present time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is something new to me.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) says that the tariff has been a great success. I do not doubt it, but I do take issue with him when he says: "We have changed it." Why, Sir, the hon. Minister of the Interior said, at Perth, that the tariff was a question that was settled and was now a dead issue because the Liberals had succeeded in solving this great question, and that the tariff was one that their opponents, if they got a chance, would not change. Why, Sir, why should they change it? It is their own tariff.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). You should be satisfied with it, then.

Mr. PRIOR. The Minister of Finance, speaking on the 5th of April, is reported in "Hansard" to have said:

We wish to guard against frequent changes in the tariff, against tariff tinkering; but let us be careful how we convey the impression to the public, because we do not mean it that we regard the tariff as final. Let it not be supposed that the tariff is settled for ten years, or even for five years. So long as there are high duties there must be demand for tariff changes. Nothing is settled until it is settled in accordance with right, and so long as there are high duties we may expect agitation for reduction. I am afraid there is no rest for the protected manufacturer. I am inclined to think, Sir, that he will find eternal vigilance to be the price of his protection.

Here we have a case where one Minister says the tariff is settled and another Minister says the manufacturers will never have any rest because the tariff will be changed. Who is right? How do they reconcile these two statements? I may say that I am afraid the hon. Minister of the Interior will get the worst of that. If the hon. gentleman was right in saying that they settled the tariff, let us look for one moment at the alterations that they have made. I am willing to take the figures that have been quoted in this House by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and my hon. friend the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) in this House, because, I know that they never quote figures here that they are not perfectly sure of. They stated in this House that the alterations in the duties, that the present Government had made, did not amount to more than one-half of one per cent on the total. This is a magnificent change to make in the tariff by hon. gentlemen who have stumped the country up and down, denouncing the men in power, at that time, as robbers and scoundrels, great and small. We find that the duty on imports for home consumption in 1896 was 30·07 per cent, while in 1898, after these hon. gentlemen had been in power for two years, it was 29·43 per cent, or 64-100 of one per cent less. On dutiable and free goods, because of course they will say, look at the amount of free goods coming in, in 1896 the duty was 18·28 per cent and in 1898 16·95 per cent, which shows but a gain of 1·33-100 of one per cent. I am not going into figures very much, but I would like to say that that shows a very small percentage of alteration to make all this fuss about. Not only have they not lowered the duties very much, in fact they have lowered them very little, but one instance that was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) was cotton goods. If there is an article that hon. gentleman got excited about when they were in Opposition and in regard to which they denounced the Government for assisting the extortion that the cotton manufacturers were putting upon the poor people of this country, it was the article of cotton. What do we find? We find that since these hon. gentlemen got into power they have not lowered the duty on cotton, but that they have increased it from 30 to 35 per cent. There is no doubt about that, and I am afraid that that must be a little by-play of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) who seems to have great influence in these quarters. Some mention has been made about a tollgate and I am inclined to think that there is a tollgate in Canada as my hon. friend here says. We, of course, are not satisfied on this side of the House, but, are the people satisfied? Some hon. gentlemen say "yes." I read the other day an article in a paper, and I must say that it struck me like the voice of one crying from the wilderness.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). In the wilderness?

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, it was in the wilderness; it was the voice of the hon. member for Lisgar, (Mr. Richardson). I do not mean to say that Manitoba is a wilderness, but hon. gentlemen, on that side of the House, when they hear one Minister saying one thing and one another in regard to the tariff, must be lost in the wilderness—in the political wilderness. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson), writes in a most dramatic style, a style, I know that will appeal to the people of the great North-west, and I will read a little of it. He unbosoms himself to the right hon. leader of the Government in the following terms:

You probably know, Sir Wilfrid, that the agriculturists of Canada, and particularly of Manitoba and the North-west were not fully satisfied with the measure of tariff reform granted them in your 1897 revision of the tariff.

You doubtless know that they were justified in expecting great things in this direction from the speeches which you and your lieutenants made throughout the country on the subject during the time you were in opposition. * * * But, all the same, public expectation has not been satisfied.

He goes on to say:

Remember, Sir Wilfrid, your promises; remember the past, and strike blows for your country that will put old Tubal Cain to the blush.

Remember, Sir Wilfrid, that for every monopolist and manufacturer you may offend, you will win a thousand friends among the agriculturists of the Dominion.

Strike for the settlers.

Strike for the agriculturists.

Strike down protection.

That is from an hon. gentleman who sits behind the right hon. leader of the Government and who votes for him straight every time, yet this is in his paper in which he appeals to the right hon. leader of the Government and he wishes the people and the country to hear his voice.

Sir, we were told that we should have less taxes, and I believe it was the present Minister of Justice who said that if the people put the Liberals into power they could do with at least $3,000,000 less expenditure in the year. In view of this we certainly expected that hon. gentlemen opposite would keep at least some of their promises, and certainly that one with regard to economy. During the first session of this Parliament when we spoke about economy, we were met by the cry from the Treasury benches: How can we economize in view of the legacy of debt you have left us, and as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House thought that perhaps there might be some show of truth in that they were not insistent, but as year after year went on, they naturally thought that surely those old debts must have been paid off. What do we find now? Three years have gone by since these gentlemen took power and still the taxes are increasing, still they are putting their hands into the pockets of the people deeper and deeper. The taxes in 1898 were not a few hundred thousand dollars more than when the Conservatives left power in 1896, but they were $2,300,000 more. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that there has been more trade, but that is no argument, for the fact remains that this increased taxation has been taken out of the pockets of the people. Then again, gentlemen opposite, when the Conservatives were in power, told us it was a monstrous thing that Canada should have such a great public debt. Well, in 1896 the net debt was $258,497,000 and in 1898, under the control of these gentlemen, it is $263,956,000 or an increase of $5,459,000. That is a pretty good showing for gentlemen who preached all over the country that they were going to economize. Of course, we do not expect the blush of shame to come to the cheek of gentlemen opposite, but we would think they would at least attempt to offer some excuse for this. One would imagine that the hon. members of the Government and the Liberal members of Parliament who preached all over the country that the debt would be decreased, should now offer some excuse for their extravagance. Sir, the only excuse I have heard, either publicly or privately, is : Well, we are in power and you are out ; what are you going to do about it ? That is about as far as they can get in the shape of an apology. It would seem from the utterances of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) that he hopes by large expenditures to hold the reins of power for a long time. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) admits that the expenditure has been large, but he has also stated : Wait till you see what we shall do next year. His policy is to get as much money as he possibly can and to expend it all. I am informed that at a banquet held last night in the Russell House, Ottawa, the gentleman who was in the seat of honour, spoke eloquently for about fifty minutes and the trend of his remarks was : Sir Wilfrid, Sir Wilfrid, take every dollar you can out of the treasury, and do not leave a cent in it, for the fellows that come after you. That may be all right for the present, but I do not think it will go down with the electorate of this country.

The question of preferential trade will be treated of by gentlemen who are better qualified to speak on the subject than I am ; but I may remark that the preferential trade inaugurated by these hon. gentlemen opposite has not been a success, and has entirely failed to benefit Great Britain as they say it was intended. Although that preferential policy is in full force, we find that of the imports coming into Canada, 72½ per cent still comes from the United States, and only 17¼ per cent from Great Britain. Sir, the right hon. the leader of the Government made a great mistake when he did not get a quid pro quo from Great Britain for his preferential trade. I do not believe that Great Britain would have objected to give it, and

Mr. PRIOR.

I do not believe that anybody in Canada would have hesitated to take it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the plebiscite and the policy of the Government anent that. It appears to me that the action of the Government on this matter has been one of the most heartless cruelty, and I cannot look on it in any other light. The Government had no right to lead the temperance people of this country on as they did, unless they intended to give them fair-play. The prohibitionists, whatever we may think of them individually, are a body of men who are actuated by the purest motives ; men who have this question at heart, and who firmly believe that prohibition would be for the benefit of their country. They are actuated by no selfish motives and their object, in the light they see it, is the welfare of the community. But what have we seen ? These gentlemen put their faith in the Government and they believed the promises made to them time and again, notably by the Premier at Winnipeg, and they went into the contest, believing that if they had a majority in the country, a prohibition law would be enacted. But, Sir, they were stabbed in the back by this Government, some of the members of which stumped the province of Quebec from one end to the other in an effort to defeat prohibition. After the promises made by the Government to the prohibitionists it was an extraordinary spectacle to see several of the Ministers attempting to defeat prohibition in their province. At Winnipeg, the right hon. the leader of the Government stated :

He would pledge his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power in Ottawa they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion, by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

In view of what has since occurred, what does the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) say to that. Can he still retain his seat in the Cabinet as a prohibitionist, and one of the very foremost of them ? How can the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) sit down as he did last night, without saying a word on this subject. Why, Sir, if my memory is correct, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) stood up in this House, his manly proportions filling the Chamber, to second a prohibition resolution, and yet, he concluded his speech without ever referring to the subject, and then he sank into an inert mass.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes ; because the thought struck him at once : If I say a word about this prohibition question it may hurt the feelings of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. Sir, I am astonished at the conduct of the hon. member (Mr. Fraser). I used to look upon him as a magnificent standard-bearer, a man of vast proportions, and a living example of what a magnificent man can be grown without drinking beer. I have been brought up in England, where I was born, to think that a man never could be worth much unless he got plenty of beer when he was young, but there is a magnificent sample of the contrary in the person of the hon. member for Guysborough. I hope before the session is over that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) will see his way to give some explanation of his conduct on the matter of prohibition and will not neglect it as he did last night.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I was trying to make an Imperial speech yesterday ; I could not speak on every subject.

Mr. PRIOR. I hope that we shall hear from him, and that he will show some good reason for being silent last night.

The next matter I wish to say a few words upon is the joint commission that has been sitting in Washington. I am very sorry that the negotiations were not brought to a conclusion before this House met. However, I think it is hardly fair to say much about that matter until we know what has taken place, which the right hon. leader of the Government does not see fit to tell us. The constituency of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives is deeply concerned in the subjects of the Behring Sea sealeries and the Alaskan boundary. Although there were rumours on the coast that our commissioners were going to give away our right to seal on the high seas for a monetary consideration paid to the sealers for their sealing schooners, I cannot believe that is true. I sincerely hope it is not. I am one of the strongest believers in the policy that if the sealers' business is ruined, they should be compensated ; but, Sir, under no circumstances could I agree to the rights of the general Canadian public to fish on the high seas being given up for any consideration whatever. In regard to the Alaskan boundary, that is a question which above all others should be settled. We are bound to have trouble sooner or later unless it is, and I feel sure that the hon. gentlemen who are on that commission will do their best to have it settled. At the same time, I feel that they have to a certain extent given their case away. I remember the right hon. leader of the Government getting up in this House and stating, or words to this effect, that he could not see what claim we could have to Skagway and Dyea, as they had been in the undisputed possession of the Americans for so long a time. The offer of arbitration from the American commissioners was one which no self-respecting man or country could for one moment accept, and I am very glad to see that hon. gentlemen opposite did not accept it. But I do think that the give-and-take policy of the right hon. gentleman made the American commissioners braver than ours. They are great bluffers on all occasions. If this commission meets again, as I hope it will, I sincerely trust that the Alaskan boundary question will be brought to a successful issue for Canada.

I notice an omission from the Speech which I was very sorry to see. There was not a word in it in regard to strengthening the militia of Canada. As we see Great Britain putting forth her best efforts in building ships and strengthening her army, and getting ready for the day which any man, however peaceful his inclinations may be, must see must come sooner or later, I did think that Canada, having, as the right hon. gentleman once said, woke up one morning and found herself a nation, would be willing to assume the responsibilities of a nation ; and no one can deny that one of the responsibilities of a nation is to get her armies in such a condition that she can take care of herself. Canada must do her share ; and I am convinced that the feeling of this Dominion from east to west is in favour of such being done. I am sure it gave great pleasure to every man who belongs to or is interested in the militia of Canada to read the most excellent report of the new Major General, Major General Hutton. I think the country ought to be congratulated on having such an experienced officer to command our forces. From what I can hear of that gentleman, I do not think that a better man could have been selected for the position. We have had good men here before ; but I say, without fear of contradiction, that I believe we have never had a man who combined in such full degree the attributes requisite in a commander of our militia forces. I am glad to believe that the hon. Minister of Militia and the Major General are of one mind on almost all subjects pertaining to the militia, and I feel convinced that if the Minister, in making out his estimates, will call for all the money required to put our militia on a proper footing, this House and the country will back him up. I know that Ministers of Militia, time after time, have brought in estimates far in advance of what has been allowed ; but the time has now come when, I think, the Government should forego some expenditure on other matters and let the militia have a show. I know, from what the hon. leader of the Opposition said yesterday at a meeting, that he is in favour of that, and I am sure that hon. members on this side of the House generally and the country are in favour of it. As I shall have to speak on this matter again when the Estimates come up, I shall say no more upon it at present.

I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is not in his place. I am informed the hon. gentleman is not well to-day. I am very sorry, because I wished to say a few words in regard to an incident which occurred between himself and myself a few nights ago. However, the right hon. leader of the Government is of the same nationality, and he will no doubt pay attention to what I say. The other night the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was twitting the Minister of Public Works about flying the French flag on a yacht he was on when in Quebec waters. The hon. Minister of Public Works said in reply :

The French flag is in nearly every home in the province of Quebec. On more than one occasion I have witnessed the touching sight, in the houses of my French countrymen, the portrait of the Queen wrapped in the French flag. I have expressed elsewhere, and I express here, the earnest desire of a British citizen at the same time, that the two flags of Great Britain and France may always float together in the breeze in friendship and amity.

Mr. PRIOR. No, Sir ; no, Sir.

Mr. Speaker, I did make that remark ; but I said so because I thought he meant that the two flags should be flying in amity and friendship on his yacht.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PRIOR. That is all right. Hon. gentlemen may jeer just as they like.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is too thin.

Mr. PRIOR. I am asked time and again to accept the assertions of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think I have a right to ask that they will accept mine at the present time. That is what I understood the hon. gentleman to mean. Surely no man in his sober senses or at any time would be such a fool as to say he wished to see France and England at war. What I contended and what I still contend is this, that a Minister on an official yacht in the Dominion of Canada should fly the British flag and the British flag only as an official flag. I may say this also, notwithstanding the jeers of hon. gentlemen opposite : Is there any reason why I should not appreciate the French character ? Is it because I am a Britisher ? I have the greatest appreciation of the French and the French Canadians. I have read history, and I know how they have fought with us in the past, and if any trouble arose I believe the two races would again fight together ; but I say that the hon. Minister of Public Works, as an official, has no right to give those two flags the same standing on his yacht. He may have his house covered with French flags, and I would be only too glad to salute them. Any man may fly what flags he likes, but not as an official. I do not know whether he flew the British flag or the French flag at the mast-head. He says that he flew the British flag in the place of honour, and I am bound to accept his statement ; but some of the newspapers supporting him have said he did not, but that he went down to Quebec and flew the French flag and no English flag was to be seen. If that were the case, I say it was wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, especially when the Minister of Public Works is not present, ought not to qualify his acceptance of a personal statement made by the latter. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the hon. Minister of Public Works declared that he flew the British flag in the place of honour, but the hon. gentleman, after accepting that statement, went on to qualify it, which I think he should not do.

Mr. PRIOR. I accept what the Minister of Public Works said, but with regard to what I said I want to set myself right. I do not want to apologize at all, I do not take back one word of what I said, and while I do say that the French flag can be flown by anybody, just as the German or the flag of any other country, no official of the Government has any right, when representing the Government, to float the French flag and not the English. Canada is big enough for two or three countries, but there is room for only one flag in this country. I know that French Canadians are sensitive on the subject, but so are Britishers. The sensitiveness is not all on one side. This is a British country, and in it the British flag should have the foremost place. I know that our French Canadian compatriots think in the same way in their hearts, but we know what the motive of the hon. Minister of Public Works was in flying the French flag. He did it to make a little cheap popularity for himself. He quoted Her Majesty the Queen as having expressed the wish to see the two flags always flying side by side. But I would ask, does she fly the French flag from the Castle of Windsor ; and I would say that, while as a private individual the hon. Minister has the right to fly what flag he likes, as a representative of the Government the case is different.

Mr. BOURASSA. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, when he made the interruption that he has just quoted, he was referring to the general statement made by the hon. Minister of Public Works that a British citizen would like to see the English and French flags floating together, and not to the special statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), that he had both the French and English flags floating on his yacht. The interruption came after this sentence uttered by the Minister of Public Works :

I have expressed elsewhere, and I express here, the earnest desire of a British citizen at the same time, that the two flags of Great Britain and France may always float in the breeze in friendship and amity.

Mr. PRIOR. No, Sir ; no, Sir.

The interruption of the hon. gentleman I have just read was therefore not intended to apply to the special case of the Minister of Public Works, but to the general sentiment to which he gave expression when he quoted this desire that the two flags should always be seen floating together.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that your ruling, Mr. Speaker, ought to be given now on the question whether an hon. gentleman has the right to impugn the statement of my hon. friend as to what he meant to say by the interruption quoted by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. SPEAKER. If any objection were taken, I would have given a ruling.

Mr. FOSTER. None was taken in the other case, because the hon. Minister of Public Works was not present.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member who had the floor (Mr. Prior) gave way to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who made a statement in interruption, which was rather long, but the hon. gentleman gave way to him.

Mr. FOSTER. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, that is not my point, but my point is that when the hon. Minister of Public Works was not in his seat and my hon. friend had the floor, my hon. friend made a certain statement to which you objected, because at some previous time the hon. Minister of Public Works had said it was not so. Now, my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) gets up in his seat and promptly impugns the truth of a statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Prior) a few minutes ago, but you, Mr. Speaker, did not call him to account.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will understand that the gentleman who has the floor said that the Minister of Public Works, who is absent, said a certain thing. I have no recollection of what the Minister of Public Works did say, but accepted as what he did say the statement made by the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. PRIOR. It is in "Hansard."

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman who has the floor said that a certain fact was denied by the Minister of Public Works, and accepted that denial, but then he went on, I thought unfairly, to qualify the denial of the Minister of Public Works. Then the hon. member for Labelle, with the permission of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), interrupted him, and read the quotation from "Hansard," which may be correct or not. The hon. gentleman can say whether it was correct or not. For my part, I do not know.

Mr. FOSTER. I know that my hon. friend is quite able to take care of himself, and that you, Mr. Speaker, are quite able to take care of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in his absence.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am quite sure that is the case, just as I would take care of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) in his absence. I do not wish any insinuations to be made, and will not permit them to be made.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless it is a question of order which the hon. member wishes to raise, he has not the right to address the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. No, it is not.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. PRIOR. I think there is a great deal too much trouble made out of this and I would not have referred to the matter at all, were it not that the French newspapers in Quebec are making a handle of it, and I thought it due to myself that I should explain the matter. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) simply read what I read from "Hansard," but I do not think that any hon. gentleman who was present on the occasion could imagine for a moment that when I made the interruption, which the hon. member for Labelle quoted, I was thinking of anything else but the flying of the French flag from the Government yacht. I do not think any one would be so silly as to imagine that I or any one else would desire to see the two nations at war. I must say that I appreciate the French character as much as any man in this House. I have personal friends among my French compatriots, and esteem them too highly to give utterance to any sentiment that would hurt their susceptibilities, and especially to any such foolish sentiment as the one ascribed to me. I think a great deal too much is made of this thing, and only wish the hon. Minister of Public Works were in his place. I am afraid I have been talking too long, but there is one subject I would like to mention before sitting down, and that is the Yukon trouble.

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a point of order. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to have your ruling upon the point as to whether it is in order for an hon. member of this House to rise in his place and to call in question the truth of a statement made by another hon. member of this House. My hon. friend said that he did not mean—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McNEILL. I think the Speaker will call me to order if I am out of order. The hon. member (Mr. Prior) said that he did not mean a certain thing by a certain interruption he had made. An hon. gentleman from the other side (Mr. Bourassa) then rose and read an extract from "Hansard" to show that my hon. friend did mean that thing which he said he did not mean. I want to know whether that is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not in order to refuse to accept the statement of an hon. member who makes it of his personal knowledge. If the hon. member who has the floor (Mr. Prior) says that he meant some—thing else by the interruption which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) quoted, and if the hon. member for Labelle refuses to accept that explanation, of course he is out of order, but I have not heard that yet. I leave that question entirely to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior).

Mr. PRIOR. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is one other question I wish to bring before the House before I sit down, and that is the Yukon question. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) spoke at great length, and I must say with great ability from his standpoint, on this matter; but it seemed to me that he was making a defence of his conduct to his own party rather than to this House or the country. There is no doubt that hon. gentlemen on that side felt very nervous before the hon. Minister got to the end of his speech. His whole speech seemed to me a piece of special pleading, but there is one thing I did notice in it, that throughout he never once denied that there had been crookedness in the Yukon administration.

He made all sorts of excuses for the men he had sent up there, but he never once said that these men or their subordinates had not been guilty of the grossest negligence, of the grossest bribery and corruption with which they are charged. The son of Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner of the Yukon, is in Ottawa, at least I saw him here a day or so ago. Will the hon. Minister state whether he has brought any information on from his father in regard to any of these charges that have been made?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I saw Mr. Morley Ogilvie for a few minutes only. He had no information whatever as to the investigation. I think I am correct in saying that he left before the investigation opened. I cannot speak positively as to that.

Mr. PRIOR. I am sure that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) will be able to get some valuable information from Mr. Morley Ogilvie, whether he has brought it from his father or not. Now, hon. gentlemen on that side of the House say they want specific charges, that there is no use in saying this or that wrong has been committed—they want specific charges. I think my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) gave them some pretty good specific charges yesterday, and I think I shall be able to give one or two more to-day. After going over that speech, a speech which was a splendid effort, as I said before, I heartily endorse everything he has said. Now, I have lived on the coast for the last 26 years. I have lived among miners since I was 13 years of age. I was on the Alaskan coast many years ago. I am in contact with miners going to and coming from the Yukon day in and day out, from year's end to year's end. I think I am qualified, therefore, to give some information on this question.

Mr. PRIOR.

Sir, we are asked: Why do not miners come forward and make specific charges? Well, anybody who knows the ordinary honest miner knows that he is the last man in the world to desire to get another into trouble; that he would even suffer himself; he would rather be swindled out of a few dollars than make a complaint or go to a lawyer. But there is a general tendency among the whole of them to denounce the action of the officials in the Yukon country. They are not Americans only who make these charges; many of them are British subjects. I feel quite sure of this also—that the charges that have been made have frightened the Government a good deal. Those hon. gentlemen are not feeling so happy as they profess to feel. Why, we see even the "Globe" newspaper, their official journal, getting out thousands of copies of the Minister's speech to distribute to the country newspapers. They know the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), have gone like wildfire all over the country, and have gained great credence too, and they are doing their best now to offset the effect of those speeches as quickly as they possibly can.

The Minister of the Interior says there has never been any such rush as there was into the Klondike, and that, therefore, he ought not to be held responsible for any mismanagement. I do not know that there has ever been quite such a rush, but in the early sixties there was nearly as big a rush to the Cariboo country, a country that was as hard, and, many miners have told me, harder, to get into than the Klondike has been. Were there any scandals in the administration of the Cariboo? I never heard of any. The gentlemen sent up there were men of probity, experience and high standing. They took charge and administered the government of the country amongst thousands and thousands of miners from the States and all over, just as rough, or possibly a rougher crowd than those who went into the Klondike, and I have yet to hear the first charge against officials who went into the country in those days. The hon. Minister also said that the Government had done everything that could be done for the miner, that they have fed indigent and starving people, that they have given large sums of money to hospitals, and many other things of that kind. If they were doing so much for indigent and starving people, one would think that they would be able to feed their own clerks. As a matter of fact, in the fall of 1897, seven clerks, who were sent up from here to Mr. Fawcett's office, when they got there found they could not get food enough, and Mr. Fawcett sent them down to Fort Yukon in American territory, where they were kept the whole of the winter by the American trading companies there. That does not look as if the hon. gentleman had very much to give away to the indigent and starving. He tells us that he spent $44,000 in donations to hospitals and other charitable expenditures. I do not think he can take much credit for that, for every cent of it came from the pockets of the people there, and some $1,456,000 besides, the total amount collected being about $1,500,000. Then, again, the hon. gentleman, I am told, offers to incorporate Dawson. Well, the people do not want any incorporation now. Under the terms offered, I am informed, the Government take all the money that could be collected, they take the licenses and the police fines, which cover nearly everything there is. Of course the people could assess themselves on their real estate and personal property, but they will not do that when this other revenue is taken from them. The hon. gentleman also said there was no secrecy of mining records. I agree with him. I am informed on all hands, and have heard the same thing for months, that there was no secrecy of mining records to the man who went to the side door and paid a good stiff fee, but the honest man who went to the front door and stood in line expecting to get information had no more show to get it than I have of being Premier of Canada.

Now, the charges made by the hon. member for Halifax can be substantiated, I am perfectly certain, if a commission is granted. I will say this—that since the first day of January, 1899, things have been different. Since Mr. Ogilvie took charge, I believe, men can go there and get the information to which they are entitled and can file their records without having to pay an official. While on the subject of Mr. Ogilvie I may say that I have yet to hear from any man of any nationality a single word against the honesty, probity and integrity of Mr. Ogilvie. I also wish to say that I have heard very few complaints—complaints that I thought had any justification—against Mr. Fawcett personally. But there were hundreds of complaints against the officials in his office. And I contend that if a man placed in that position does not see to it that his subordinates carry out their duty in a proper manner, he must be held responsible, just the same as I contend that the Minister of the Interior is responsible for all these scandals, being the head of the department. Sir, it is not a question of what is being done now. These charges have run from one end of the world to the other, and it would be very curious indeed if no alteration were made in the way these things were being conducted. The question is what was done in the past; that is what we want to know. The hon. Minister has sent out a commission to Mr. Ogilvie to inquire, but he has limited his scope to matters arising before the 25th of August, while it is since that time that many of the transactions concerning which charges were made have taken place.

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman also, why, when he was sending officials into that country, he did not think of the experienced men who have lived in British Columbia for many years. If he wanted to get a staff to send there of men who had been in the habit of dealing with miners, mining records, mining claims and mining camps, why did he not send some of his agents into British Columbia, where men are to be found by the dozen who are capable and experienced men, and in every way fitted for these positions. If he had done that, if he had taken men from British Columbia—and I think we had a right to expect he would have taken some of them—there would not have been one word of these scandals; I feel convinced of that. Now, let us see what these officials have been doing. Let us take the record office. The Minister of the Interior says that the officials he sent up there were all of good character. Well, they might be. I have here a statement made by a man who says that if a commission is appointed, such as is asked for, a thoroughly independent commission, a commission of judges, of men who are in no way under the control of the Government, he will come forward and take his affidavit and swear to this information. I will do as other hon. gentlemen have done before: I will not give his name, but I will guarantee—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PRIOR. That is all right. Hon. gentlemen know that is the correct way, that I should not disclose the name now. There are too many men who have come to Ottawa, and preferred charges, and gone away satisfied. I do not intend that should happen in this case. The Minister of the Interior is pretty clever: he knows how to fix them.

An hon. MEMBER. He cannot be very respectable, if he is a man of that kind; but that is what you are depending upon.

Mr. PRIOR. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there are a good many gentlemen on the floor of this House that have been fixed in some way or other.

Mr. FOSTER. A great many more want to be fixed.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to state that the Mr. A. J. Kellum who is mentioned in this statement, is stenographer in Wade, Clark & Wilson's law office. The Mr. Wade mentioned as belonging to this firm, is the Mr. Wade who was the Crown prosecuting attorney. Now, Sir, I will read the statement. If the Minister of the Interior wants specific charges, here is a specific charge, and I will give him my word, that if a commission is appointed, this man will come up and swear to the charge. I am fully aware that it is a cowardly thing for a man to stand up on the floor of this House and make a statement that he cannot substantiate. I am fully aware of the responsibility a man takes, when he makes such a statement, and I am perfectly willing to take that responsibility in regard to this statement:

On August 28, 1898,—

And that, you will observe, is three days after the date on which Mr. Ogilvie has a right to inquire into the charges.

—I went into Wade, Clark & Wilson's law office on Front Street, Dawson City, having been informed that claims could be obtained in that office without the necessity of going and staking upon the creeks at all, full lists of vacant ground on various creeks being then in that office. I saw Mr. Kellum personally, and stated to him that a friend of his and mine had informed me that he could locate me on Dominion Creek. This being in the morning, I was told to return in the evening at 6.30, which I did, and was again postponed till the following morning, and then again until evening, when I called again. During my visit that evening another party was called in by Mr. Kellum, and told in my presence that he, the visitor, must immediately go to Dominion Creek—

Where that trouble was, you will remember.

—and stake a claim, the last one that was left in that creek. The visitor could not go himself, but was to provide a substitute at 7 a.m. next day. After the visitor withdrew, Mr. Kellum said, "You have overheard the conversation we have first had, so that you see I cannot fix you a Dominion, but I can put you on No. 1 below, on Gold Bottom Creek." This I agreed to accept. Having no witness to this conversation, and deal being made, I insisted upon a partner being admitted with me to the transaction. This was agreed to, and I left the office and obtained a friend to come in as partner in the deal. I signed a power of attorney to Mr. Kellum for a half interest in claim No. 1 below, on Gold Bottom, and this power of attorney was witnessed by my partner,—

The name is given here, which I will not read.

—who as my partner signed a separate power of attorney giving the one-half to Kellum, and this was signed by myself as witness.

What the miners call a double cross.

These powers of attorney were carried in by Kellum to Wade, Clark & Wilson's private office, and there filed in our presence. Our instructions were—

And I want hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to this.

—to proceed at once to the claim, which was then owned by another man, but had not been represented, and put upon it false stakes with false names, and the ground becoming vacant September 1st,—

This is dated on the 28th of August.

—and the ground becoming vacant September 1st, we were to go to the gold recorder's office, set our watches by the time there, and at midnight of August 31st change the names on the stakes to our own real names, and come back to Wade, Clark & Wilson's office, and they would do the rest, viz., attending to the recording, and shouldering any expenses that might be incurred in any lawsuit or otherwise.

Now, Sir, that is a specific charge, made by the man who went himself, who took in a partner and signed a power of attorney to the claim which was in Wade, Clark &

Mr. PRIOR.

Wilson's office, and can be got at any moment, when there is a commission appointed. Sir, that is not the only one. If that commission is appointed, there is no doubt about it, there will be dozens and dozens of similar cases.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The statement seems incomplete. Did he carry out this nefarious transaction?

Mr. PRIOR. No, he did not.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that make a difference?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I asked the question because I did not know whether he did. Some conversation took place in the office, and I wanted to see whether it was acted upon, and the hon. gentleman says it was not.

Mr. FOSTER. Would that make a difference in the crime?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Was Kellum a Government official?

Mr. PRIOR. No, he is not. I will just explain to the hon. gentleman—I am glad he asked that question—that Kellum is not a Government official, but he is a stenographer of Mr. Wade, who was Crown prosecuting attorney, who also acts for miners, besides attending to his own business. But any gentleman can see that this man could do nothing, if Wade, Clark & Wilson had not had what they call a pull with the mining recorder.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to ask the hon. gentleman—he knows I do not ask for any improper reason, but just to get the truth—does he know that Mr. Wade was not in Dawson City at that time?

Mr. PRIOR. I do not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He was the only Government official that was connected with the office, I understand?

Mr. PRIOR. I could not tell you; I was not there myself. Certainly, Mr. Wade is at the head of that firm.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If there is anything improper, we want to get at the truth, if there is any semblance of truth in the charge.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, that is the truth. Now, there is another case, about Mr. E. D. Boulton, who is now mining recorder in the Gold Commissioner's office. Here is an affidavit from a man—it is not sworn to, but he is willing to swear to it—who says:

I will take any commission to claim No. 45 above on Bonanza Creek, and show them the staking of E. D. Boulton's name on Hillside claim opposite No. 45, and on the right limit of the creek dated July 9, 1898, and prove by any number of witnesses that E. D. Boulton was never out of the city of Dawson on that date.

Hon. gentlemen who know anything about it know that when a man stakes a claim he must go himself, put his stakes in, put his name on the stakes, and then go to the mining recorder's office and take the oath that he has done so. Here we see, if this is true, that this mining recorder is supposed to have gone there and has taken oath that he was there when he was not. In regard to side doors, I need not go into that now, for enough has been said about it, except that I heard it from dozens and dozens and hundreds of miners, and I believe my colleague from Victoria, who is sitting here, will back me up in saying that it is almost impossible to get anything done unless you bribe the officials. I am informed that Mr. Ogilvie stated to some gentlemen whom I know, and if I am wrong I will apologize, but I believe it fully, because I heard it from some miners, that a man approached him when he was going up there and asked him to give him a position in the mining recorder's office. He said that he would not ask him for any salary; let him get in there and he would make enough without salary.

In regard to the post office, the Postmaster General stated that the mail was carried regularly. Now, I know for a positive fact that it was not. I had in my hands, not many days ago, a letter from a man living in Glenora, who, writing to a friend in Ontario, said that it was outrageous the way that mail was being left at certain places. He said that at Glenora the post office building is two feet deep in letters and papers, that the postmaster keeps a saloon and a store, and that it is utterly impossible, unless you are a miner who spends a good deal of money in his saloon, to get a single letter or paper from him. Here is a clipping I got out of a paper of March 4th, and it is a paper that hon. gentlemen see fit to sneer at—the Klondike "Nugget." It says:

The thousands of people who have been disappointed by the non-receipt of letters which they know have long been on the way to them from the States, will be interested in learning that the accumulated mails of September, October, November and December—or at least a considerable portion of it—has at last been gotten under way, and is now en route to Dawson.

Then it goes on to state how a private individual had to appeal to Mr. Fletcher, the post office inspector, to be allowed to take the mail that the proper postal officials could not or would not take up there. It says:

Hastily securing several sacks of private mail, Mahoney commenced picking up deserted mail at Skagway. An American officer accompanied the party as far as Tagish, to verify the weights of the American mail picked up. At Linderman and Bennett and at Tagish was found enough mail to make a grand total of 2,200 pounds. Some of it had been cached under an old boat on Lake Bennett; some of it was lying at road houses; some of it was at stores, but the bulk was cached away at police stations. All but some 600 pounds was Canadian mail.

So that Mahoney brought it up there when the other men could not do so. There is no doubt about it that mail came out from Dawson by private individuals, or that mail went in by private individuals. This mail could not be got unless by paying $1 a letter, sometimes a little less and sometimes a little more, but, while these private mails were sent out upon all occasions, from the 5th of October to the 15th of January, no public mail whatever by the Postmaster General's route came in except official letters of the Government. I just remember the case now of a man who knew that his relations in England would be writing to him regularly. He went day after day to get his letters at Dawson City, but he was told that there were none for him. At last a chum of his said: "Why don't you pay your dollar like a little man and get your mail." He went up and paid his dollar at the restaurant across the way where some of the demi-monde go. My hon. friend the member for Kings, N.B. (Mr. Domville) shakes his head at that.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I say they never paid a dollar over there.

Mr. PRIOR. He got a letter next day, another one next day, and another one until he got all five letters at $1 a letter. They were not in consecutive order, because they had been lying there for weeks. The failure of letters to come in has been the cause of tremendous hardship to men up there, not only hardship, but tremendous financial loss, because drafts never got in and agents of companies expecting and waiting for instructions from firms in England, were put to thousands of dollars of loss by not having the information that these letters contained. That disposes of the recorder's office and the post office.

Let me also speak in regard to the customs, and I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Customs is paying attention. It was a common occurrence to have men come to my office about goods, because I do a good deal of outfitting there, and say that they could not possibly afford to buy goods from me because they could, as they said, get their American goods cheaper in Seattle. "Yes," but I said, "you have to pay the duty." "Oh, the duty; we will soon fix that." And so they did. It was a common practice—they told me—I do not say it prevails now, for them to get their goods through at a small sum compared with what they should have paid. I will give you one instance—the case of a man called Charles Beam. He went out, and at Log Cabin was stopped by the collector and showed the goods he had that were dutiable. The duty came to $350. This is what I am informed by a man who says he knows the facts of the case.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). About what date would it be?

Mr. PRIOR. I do not have it down here, but this man told it to me. It is within six months, I think. He said the duty came to $350. The collector's name was Thorne; he was the collector or the collector's subordinate, and he says he gave him $5 and a flask of whisky, and that this man passed his goods through for $150. The duty which he should have paid was $350, but by giving a $5 bribe and a flask of whisky, this custom-house officer passes his goods for $150.

Mr. MAXWELL. Would the hon. gentleman kindly give me the name of that man again?

Mr. PRIOR. I was informed that it was a man by the name of Charles Beam.

Mr. MAXWELL. No, but the name of the customs official.

Mr. PRIOR. I am told that his name is Thorne.

Mr. MAXWELL. I do not think that there is a man of that name there.

Mr. PRIOR. I do not know the facts personally. This is one of the cases that have been told me, of thousands that have been drummed into our ears of the same kind.

As to the Mounted Police, there were but 190 of them patrolling 600 miles, and they are doing it efficiently, but even they have fallen into temptation. In passing boats they have to look into them for whisky. I am told that it is nothing to give the police $5 and once you give them that your boat goes through, and I heard of one sergeant who said that he did not want any softer thing than that, that he did not want to go out of the Yukon; he was satisfied.

Let me in conclusion say a word about the military expedition to the Klondike. I may be wrong in my impression, and perhaps some of my colleagues may not agree with me, but I do not believe for one moment that it was ever necessary to send the militia into that country. I am credibly informed that the cost for getting these men into Fort Selkirk and Dawson will amount to at least $1,000,000. We had already there 190 policemen, and any one who knows these miners knows that the best way to keep them in good order is not by putting hundreds and hundreds of soldiers around them. The miner as a rule is the most orderly man in the world when he gets on British territory. If you go to Skagway they are a disorderly lot, shooting and robbing all around, for they imagine they are on American soil—although I contend they are not—but if you take the same men on British territory, you at once see the difference, for there they have not a word to say and do not even want to carry a pistol. In Rossland at the beginning there was as hard a crowd of men as you would come across in any mining community, men who crossed the border from Montana, but when they got into Rossland, one policeman kept 8,000 of them in just as good order as we are sitting in here to-day. It was the fear of British law kept them quiet. As I have stated, our militiamen were sent to the Yukon at the expense of $1,000,000, and barracks were built for them at Fort Selkirk. They did not build their own barracks as the policemen did—so I am informed—but they employed men at $1.50 an hour to do the work. If I am wrong in this I shall be glad to hear it; I was informed $1.50 an hour, but we will say $1 an hour, and I have also been told that these barracks will cost in the neighbourhood of $125,000.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). My hon. friend (Mr. Prior) will be glad to know that the barracks will not cost probably $30,000, although they are worth probably considerably over $100,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the basis of valuation?

Mr. PRIOR. Were they built by the soldiers?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They were.

Mr. PRIOR. I am very glad to hear it, but I was told that the soldiers complained that they had nothing to do. We have 125 soldiers at Dawson and 73 at Selkirk, and I think the Government must have come to the same mind as I have on the subject, because I understand from the newspapers that they are bringing these soldiers out again. With regard to the water front lease in Dawson, I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior, where is that lease, for he certainly did not put it on the Table of the House.

An hon. MEMBER. He said there was nothing but a letter.

Mr. PRIOR. Then if there was nothing but a letter why was there not a lease for such an important transaction as that, because $30,000 a year even in the Klondike is not a bagatelle. It has been proven beyond all doubt that the gentlemen who took the lease sub-let it for at least $120,000 a year, thus making $90,000 on the bargain, and is it not reasonable to ask: Why did not the Government take advantage of the value of the property and get the $90,000 a year in the treasury?

I do not know anything in regard to the liquor permits, except that I know that members on the other side and other supporters of the Government have been hawking them around in British Columbia for a long time, to the highest bidder. There was no trouble in getting a permit as long as you went high enough for it. I do not know whether these permits were issued by the Minister of the Interior or by the North-west Territories authority, but there they were. Sir, I stated before that I knew perfectly well the responsibility I took in making these charges. I do not wish to hurt any man's character, I do not wish to hurt any man who is an official in the Yukon territory, but I think it is high time that it should be proven clearly, either that those officials were negligent and corrupt, or that there is no truth in the charges made against them. And, Sir, for that reason, I cannot see why the Government do not grant such a commission as has been asked for. The hon. gentleman from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) mentioned a case in which he asked for a fiat, and stated he would be responsible that the gentleman who got that fiat would prove his case. You would think that the Government would jump at an offer like that, but they have not done so, and the inference is that there must be some truth in the charge.

Mr. McINNES. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) pardon me for a moment. He said a few minutes ago that some members of this House from British Columbia hawked around permits for liquor to enter the Yukon. If he said so, and I think he did, I would like him to be a little more specific.

Mr. PRIOR. I said they were in possession of liquor permits that were being hawked around in British Columbia.

Mr. McINNES. Pardon me. You said certain hon. members of this House from British Columbia hawked around liquor permits.

Mr. PRIOR. I do not think I did, but if I did, I did not intend to. I intended to say they were in possession of liquor permits that were being hawked around in British Columbia, and I stick to it. They were; I know it for a fact.

Mr. GIBSON. Name.

Mr. PRIOR. Let me say in conclusion that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) thought he made a point last night when he stated that Messrs. Allan and Semple of the Klondike "Nugget" had left Dawson, and had not waited to prove the charges they made against officials to Mr. Ogilvie. I am informed by these gentlemen that they made these charges in November, December and January, and that although they did not leave until the 28th of January, these charges were not taken up then. Some charges that they and others had made were withdrawn for the simple reason that the alleged offences took place after August 25th, and they were precluded from being heard by the terms of the commission. I am aware, as a good many hon. gentlemen here are aware, that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) has been to the Klondike. I have never been there myself, but that hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) has been there, and he is a member of the Government party, and a gentleman of the greatest probity and fairness. I will not ask him to answer me now, but I say, that if that hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) would state in this House, or state privately to the Government, that during his sojourn in the Yukon he did not hear these complaints, or that he heard nothing either from his friend, Mr. Paterson, or anybody else about this corruption that was going on, I shall be quite satisfied to withdraw a good deal of what I have said. I am fully convinced that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) is not in a position to say to the contrary, and if he does say anything he will tell the Government that whether the head officials were corrupt or not, their subordinates were guilty of the grossest and most outrageous corruption that has ever taken place in the history of Canada.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to reply to the remarks which have been addressed to the House by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), because my position in this House prevents me, in a sense, from replying on behalf of one party or the other. It had been my intention to remain silent during this debate, and also during this session, believing that by reason of my youth it would be more becoming that I should remain silent, and listen, and endeavour to digest what I expected I would hear fall from the lips of the oratorical giants on both sides of the House. But, Sir, by reason of the prolongation of this debate it seems to me impossible that I should carry out that intention, and, therefore, I venture to address this hon. body, not without a good deal of fear and not without much trepidation. Sir, before my entry into this House I had thought I was coming to an assemblage of great deliberation, and coming to a place in which I would listen to dignified and relevant debate. In some instances hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have given us food for thought; but, Sir, I was astonished to find, during the course of this debate, that in a great number of the speeches a mud-slinging competition had apparently been entered upon. That was not what I anticipated when I entered this House; and for that reason a considerable amount of the fear I entertained on coming here has vanished. There are some members of this House who do place their country before any party; and if we had more men of that kind, a great deal of useless expense would be saved to the country. While a good many of the speeches delivered upon one side of the House and upon the other have afforded food for thought, on the other hand we have had long-winded orations, which I submit should not be indulged in, if I may be allowed to say so. The fact that so many hon. members' seats have been vacant during the delivery of those speeches proves that they are of very little benefit to this House, and that they can only be delivered for the purpose of being used as campaign literature. I submit, if, as a young member I may do so, that the country would much more highly appreciate the efforts of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House if they confined their remarks to shorter periods, and discussed measures and not men, and allowed the debate to be conducted in a more dignified and relevant way.

Now, Sir, perhaps this House will think that I should not have made these remarks. I make them, not at all for the purpose of reading hon. gentlemen a lecture, which would be most unbecoming in one of my age, but simply for the purpose of stating to this House and the people I represent the impressions made upon my mind in the first days of my parliamentary duties.

The reason why I made up my mind that it was necessary for me to make some remarks on this debate, was the fact that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) the other evening made some reference to the by-election in which I was elected, and to the harbour of Collingwood, which is a part of my constituency, I deemed it only right that I should also state my position to this House and to the country, because I find that my position is being criticised not only in the press of my own province of Ontario, but also elsewhere. I have no fear of fair criticism; but I think it is only right—and this debate is the only occasion on which I shall be enabled fully to do so—that I should place my position before this House and the country, in order that any criticism that may be meted out to me may be fair criticism, based on facts as they exist, which I do not suppose hon. members are possessed of at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal about the conflicts and disputes and difficulties of parties, on both sides of this House during this debate, going back to 1863. We have heard of those difficulties, those blunders, and those disgraces which have, if I may be permitted to say so, perhaps disgraced both parties. But, Sir, in all these discussions it occurred to me that while we do look back to the past, it would perhaps be much more beneficial for the country if we devoted ourselves to the present. It matters not much to us now, what was done or what was not done by Sir John Macdonald, by George Brown, or by Alexander Mackenzie, or who or what clung to their skirts, we see the result of their works, we revere their names as statesmen who spent their lives according to their respective lights for the advancement and welfare of a loved country. But what we have at the present time to deal with is the present welfare and advancement of this country, looking to the future with confidence; and if we all, on both sides of the House, devoted our attention to that end, I submit, with all respect to hon. gentlemen, that it would be for the best interests of this country. It could not be expected of me, perhaps, to appreciate those past issues, for I could not, if I so desired, palm myself off as an antiquated politician. Indeed the main charge which I had to contend with in my constituency last December was that I was too young.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Our chief concern, I say, should be the best interests of this country at the present time. We all know that times are ever changing, and that which was of the greatest advantage to us ten years ago may be of the greatest detriment to-day. This country is growing apace, and with that growth we must keep up. Notwithstanding the great conflict, in which I do not take part, between the parties as to whom is due the credit, we are all united on this one fact, for which thank God, that this country is progressive and prosperous. It is also admitted on both sides of this House that this country has resources of which there is not the equal on the face of the earth, and that we are only on the eve of the discovery of what our absolute resources are. Having that knowledge, I venture to predict that if this country is not choked and throttled by party strife, in this despicable desire to gain office, it will progress and stride forward with unprecedented rapidity.

Now, Sir, owing, as I said before, to the somewhat unique position which I occupy in this House, I may perhaps be allowed, even at the expense of wearying some hon. members, to state the position which I occupied in December last in the by-election, and which I now occupy. The question of the tariff, in fact, almost all possible questions, have been referred to in this debate. Let me, therefore, deal with that question. I appealed to my constituency upon a platform of principles which was formulated and advocated by the late member for North Simcoe, whose seat I now occupy. That platform is known; but I read it in order that there may be no doubt about it:

1. To support such a tariff as will—

(a) Relieve the consumers and especially the agricultural classes from the burdens of taxation which excessive protection imposes.

(b) Effectually and speedily accomplish the downfall of the combinations and trusts which exist among many manufacturers, whereby competition is prohibited and monopolies flourish.

(c) And give the preference, wherever practicable, to the mother land, and also to such countries, and more especially to the United States, as are willing to join in fair trade relations.

That policy was endorsed by the constituency of North Simcoe in 1896, and again in 1898. The forerunner of that policy was a resolution which was moved in this House in 1893 by the hon. member for North Simcoe, the late Mr. McCarthy. That resolution is to be found at page 2341 of the "Hansard" of 1893, and I shall read it in order that there may be no doubt as to its purport:

Moved by Mr. McCarthy, seconded by Mr. Hodgins:

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved:

That since the introduction of the protective system sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as under existing conditions can be successfully carried on in Canada. Moreover, many manufacturers, sheltered behind the rampart thus erected, have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and create and maintain monopolies.

That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure, has proved in many instances oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes, and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits, is unfair and unequal in its incidence, and has been productive of discontent verging on disloyalty among those who suffer from its injustice.

That sufficient reason has been adduced or exists requiring investigation respecting the foregoing facts, which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation, which is imperative.

That, in the opinion of this House, the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated, and also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted duty free, and of those rations which under treaty obligations with Great Britain would be entitled to the same advantages, graduated, however, so as not unnecessarily to prejudice the business of the country nor to do wrong to those who have imported and paid duties in accordance with its provisions.

That is all that is of importance in the resolution to this debate. It came before this House on the 14th of March, 1893, and was debated at length, with the result that it was defeated by a large majority. We found the hon. members who now support the Government supporting that resolution, and those in opposition, the Conservatives, voting against it. What I desire to point out is this, that it formed the foundation of the tariff policy upon which I stand and was at that time supported and endorsed by the Liberals and voted against by the Conservatives. That being so, what position do I find myself in? I told my constituents clearly that that was my platform, that I would vote according to these principles and that policy, I cared not with which party it led me to vote. If it led me to vote with the Government, I would vote with them. If they led me to vote with the Opposition, I would support the Opposition. What is the situation at present? It is somewhat unique, so far as the contentions of the two parties are concerned. The Government say: We have adopted that policy. It was so stated in this House, and in the debate I have referred to, the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) endorsed every clause of that resolution, save and except that part which referred to preferential trade. Then, what do we find? We find the Opposition during this debate shouting "thief" at the head of the Government, and alleging that the Government have stolen their garments. The conclusion to be deduced must be that all parties stand upon common ground. I am not concerned at present with pledges broken or unbroken. I only say that wherever that policy and those principles lead me, there my vote will be cast, irrespective of party. There is no doubt that the Government have, as they say, adopted this policy. There may be, and there seems to be, a doubt in the minds of the Conservatives as to whether the Government has carried out that policy; but I can only say that if the Government have stolen the clothes of hon. gentlemen opposite, they will meet with the same justice as was dealt out to the Conservatives at the last general elections. Can it be considered that the Government of this country would be so foolish as to steal the garments of hon. gentlemen opposite who were deposed because they did not give the country what it wanted. However, my position is that I will oppose any Government or party that does not live up to the principles embodied in that resolution.

Now, Sir, to some gentlemen who have spoken to me with regard to the position which I occupy, and who have given me to understand that it would be entirely wrong on my part to support the Government on any occasion, all I can say is that I do not see why, if the principles which my lamented uncle supported and which I support, are adopted by the Government, I should leave those principles as if they were a plague ship, simply because of that fact. I cannot see the thing in that light, and with all deference to the opinion of those gentlemen who have thus spoken to me, I must maintain the position I took in my constituency and on which I was elected.

The main complaint of the Conservative party, as far as I can gather from this debate, so far as the tariff is concerned, is that the Government have not given this country free trade. But I cannot complain of that. I do not think that at present free trade is feasible, and therefore I do not complain. But what I do say is that we should have an era of freer trade, and it is to that extent that this resolution goes and to that end this policy looks. I have no doubt that this subject will be further discussed during the session, and therefore shall not dwell at further length upon it, but will remain satisfied having stated the position I occupy. Let me, however, say this much further, that so far as preferential trade is concerned, I am ultra in that respect, because I believe that it is of vital importance that the preferential trade should be created and put into effect as soon as possible, for to that it seems to me we must look in order to create some degree of independence, or a greater degree of independence, so that we may be in a position to demand from our neighbours in the south the fair trade relations we have a right to expect from them by reason of this friendliness which exists between them and our mother land. But, above and beyond all, is it not to our interest that we should be more closely joined together to the mother country and be bound by links which should join together all the parts of this great empire and make us still more closely a part and parcel of it?

The next question upon which I took a stand in my constituency, and on which I shall take a stand in this House is :

That I would endeavour to prevent in the establishing of provinces in the territories, the enactment of any organic law which would recognize any racial distinction or privilege, and would oppose any endeavour to create any language other than the British an official language in such newly created provinces.

This has been before the House on several occasions, but I have not heard any reference made to it during this debate. The hon. gentleman who preceded me did speak about the differences between our French Canadian fellow-citizens and those of British origin. The position I take is that we should endeavour to prevent, in the establishing of provinces in the territories, the enactment of any law which would recognize any racial distinction or privilege. I would oppose any endeavour to establish any language other than the British as the official language in such newly created provinces. I desire to say that the hon. gentlemen who first advocated that policy never had any enmity to our French Canadian fellow citizens, nor have I. I have the greatest respect for them. They have the right to speak the French language in this House and in the legislative halls of their own province, but I cannot conceive how any hon. gentleman can argue or maintain that in the creation of new provinces in a British speaking country, any language should be the official language of that newly created province other than the British. That question, as I understand it, does not at present receive much favour in this House, but I predict that the sagacity of the man who first introduced it and his clear foresight are about to be proven.

If that great North-west is to be filled, as we are seeking now to fill it, with thousands of Doukhobors, thousands of Galicians, and a prospective immigration of thousands of Finlanders, together with the populations there now of various nationalities, I ask this House and I ask the people of this country : How can the people in that North-west country be assimilated unless they have one official language? That is either right or wrong. I have no enmity, nor had my late uncle any enmity to the French Canadians. But it is because he saw the requirements of this country for the future, he saw that if this country was to be settled by people such as those now being brought in, it would be necessary that there should be but one language and that language the British. I, therefore, desire to take my stand, irrespective of party, declaring that if any Government or any party that would seek to place upon the Statute-book of this country any enactment creating an official language other than English, I will oppose that party or that Government. I trust that this question will never become a disturbing question in politics : I trust that the better judgment of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will prevail and that the question will be adjusted without difficulty. But my position is taken, it is distinct and plain, and there I will stand should this ever become a disturbing question. Why, Sir, is it not perfectly evident that if one foreign nationality in that country were entitled to their language as the official language, there would be no just ground for refusing the same to other immigrants ; and so we should be asked to create five or six official languages, which would be simply and absolutely impossible.

Then, Sir, the next question upon which I took a stand was that which is commonly known as the Manitoba school question. I shall not have much to say in regard to that. In my platform I declared as follows :

I would oppose any interference by the Government or the Parliament of Canada in the public school law of the province of Manitoba, the constitutionality of which has been conclusively settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

We are told that the question is settled, and, although that does not seem to be universally accepted, I think none can doubt that it is, at least, settled for the present. The doubt seems to be whether it is settled once for all. I hold that the people of this country must feel that to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his Government is due a great deal of praise for the removal of that vexatious question from the arena of politics, where it caused so much friction and strife. Now, it is stated by some members of the Conservative party that the question is not settled, notwithstanding the speeches made by different Ministers to the contrary effect. What does that mean? Let me recall to mind for a moment the position of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House on this question after the last general election. We know that at that time this was a burning question. In the province of Quebec, as I understand it, hon. gentlemen who support the present Government had pledged themselves to vote for the Remedial Bill, but told their constituents that they expected that if their party were returned to power they would be able to settle the question. On the other hand there were Conservative members from Ontario and the west, a great many of them, who were pledged, no matter who was in power, to vote against the Remedial Bill. Had the Conservative party been returned at the last election and had the leader of that party fulfilled the pledges he gave and reintroduced the Remedial Bill in this House, what would have been the condition of affairs? Many hon. gentlemen would have voted against the Government who had been elected to support it generally, while hon. gentlemen elected to oppose it would have been found voting with it. Whether the argument of some hon. gentlemen is right and this question is not settled, or whether the Government is right and it is settled, it certainly is settled for the present, because we find nothing upon the records which would lead one to believe that it is to be reintroduced in this House, and I should think, in view of the direful results of attempting to coerce that province, no political leader of any sagacity would again attempt it. Whether it is settled or not, I wish to state my position clearly and beyond peradventure of a doubt. If remedial legislation is introduced in this House for the purpose of coercing the province of Manitoba, I will be found unalterably opposed to it.

There is another question upon which I took a stand. That question is referred to in the Speech from the Throne—the Redistribution Bill. The platform issued on which I stood declared as follows on that subject :

To require in the readjustment of the constituencies that the distribution of seats shall as far as practicable be based on equality of population, county and city boundaries being taken as the natural limits of electoral districts, with equitable divisions thereof where the population entitles the city or county to two or more representatives.

Now, that is the position I will occupy in this House. It is not necessary to debate the question at this stage. The Minister of Justice, speaking in the Senate, stated that it was the intention of the Government to confine themselves to county lines. That is in accordance with the plank in my platform, and it is the principle I will vote for. be it with the Government or with the Opposition.

These were the principles, this was the policy of the late hon. member for North Simcoe. I fought for those principles and they were dear to me in his lifetime. I need hardly assure hon. gentlemen that they are dearer a thousand times now. I have a certain pride in being an independent, based upon principles upon which I was elected, and I have to thank the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) because he was, to a certain extent, helpful to me in the campaign I fought last December. He came to Toronto and delivered an address which was reported in the "World" on the 29th November, 1898. He said—and I agree with him to the uttermost :

A man might be independent, however, and a party that would veto independent thought was doomed to speedy death. Independence in a party put new life into it, as the blood puts new life into the body.

That was of great assistance to me. The remarks were all the stronger for the experience of the hon. gentleman, because he had a good deal to do with the independent men in the Cabinets that were so frequently formed prior to the last general election.

It was with great pleasure I listened to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the other evening upon the transportation problems which are now agitating this country. It is of vital importance to us that that question be handled promptly and speedily. The hon. gentleman announced that it was his intention to improve our waterways in order to accomplish that which has now been proven capable of accomplishment. Mr. J. R. Booth, who built the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway, has demonstrated to us that we could, through the Georgian Bay, control the trade, not only from the North-west of our own country, but from the North-western States of our neighbours to the south of us. But what hitherto has been the result? The result has been that the trade and commerce of our north-western country has gone by way of Buffalo. I say that we should all unite for the purpose of diverting the course of trade from that port and ourselves secure the benefit of the carrying trade to and from these people who are settling in our western country. Not only should we do that, but we should aid and assist to divert and capture that trade from the Western States, as it has been shown we can do. Now, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) the other night criticised the expenditure on the Collingwood Harbour in these words, speaking of the Minister of Public Works :

When he came down to the House a couple of years ago and stated that a contract was being entered into for $144,000 for that work, I then asked him, and the "Hansard" will bear out my statement, whether that was to complete the work. Why, Sir, what was the result? The $144,000 that had been spent in the Collingwood harbour might as well have been thrown into the sea. And to-day the Minister of Public Works will and must come down to this House, in fulfilment of the pledge that he has made, and ask this House, in order to follow up that work and make it accessible for the boats sailing on the upper lakes, not merely to expend $144,000, but $1,000,000, before that work can be consummated.

Mr. BENNETT. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman reiterates his statement. Now, in the first place, he must know that that statement is incorrect. If any hon. gentleman in this House knows it, he knows it, because, on referring to the "Hansard," he must have found that the contract was not to be completed until the end of the present year. The fact is that that work is not completed, and that $144,000 is not expended, and he goes on and says it will take a million dollars to consummate it. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has been carried away by his jealous feelings. I would submit to him that there will be sufficient trade for all the ports on the Georgian Bay, and we need not be jealous one of the other; but let us work together for the advancement of our country, but being guided by any picayune spirit at all. I think his wild statement can be accounted for by reason of his interest in his own harbour of Midland, which has given him a jaundiced view of the matter. He says it will take a million to consummate it. I say I hope it will take but a small additional expenditure to do it, and that consummated it must be. Sir, the hon. gentleman was a supporter of the Government during the last Parliament, and during previous Parliaments, who had made it their policy to deepen that harbour. This $144,000 that he now criticises as being wasted, was voted and tenders were asked for that work prior to the going out of the late Administration, and the present Minister of Public Works did nothing more than let that contract upon the tenders which were advertised for by the late Administration. I was pleased to see that the present Minister of Public Works had made up his mind to pursue the policy of the previous Government in this regard, and I adopt it most cordially. In another respect also I was pleased to see that the Minister of Public Works had adopted the policy of the late Administration, but I did not hear the hon. gentleman criticise that, and I do not think he will do so; I refer to the Trent Valley Canal. That affects both our constituencies, and I think we will both be pleased to see that work completed in order that this transportation trade may be increased and pass through our own country.

Then, the hon. member for East Simcoe undertook to explain to this House what occurred in the by-election in North Simcoe. That being somewhat personal to myself I desire to make a few explanations. The hon. gentleman told the House that Mr. McMullen had gone up there, which I believe, from the newspaper reports, to be true. He says:

The Conservative party in the riding stood on one side and left the hon. gentleman who represents the riding and the Liberal candidate to fight it out. Notwithstanding that there was no candidate in the field in strong opposition to the Government, notwithstanding that while in the local election a short time before some 5,000 votes had been polled, there were on the same lists a little more than 3,000 votes polled on this occasion.

The hon. gentleman's innuendo would be that the difference between 3,000 and 5,000, or to be more correct, the difference between 5,209, which was the actual number of votes polled in the local election, and the 3,359 cast in my election, would represent the Conservatives of that riding as numbering 1,850, or a minority in the riding of 1,509. Now, I do not think the hon. gentleman's friends in that riding would be flattered, although he has flattered them to a certain extent, because he has claimed twice as many as they polled at the general election in 1896, which was 875 votes. Now, according to these figures, there were 1,805 Conservatives who stood aloof. But I desire to be perfectly fair with the hon. gentleman, and I point out that his innuendo from the figures is all wrong, and the reason for the small vote polled in that constituency was, as he well knows, due to a terrific snowstorm that raged there for eight days, so that the roads and railways were impassable, and voters could not be got out in the townships, while the towns polled a normal vote. But, to be perfectly fair, let us consider the figures he has seen fit to mention. Supposing there were at the local election, as my hon. friend has pointed out, 5,209 votes polled, he might have gone on and told you—but perhaps that did not suit his purpose—that the Conservatives polled out of that number of votes, taking from the ridings of Centre and West Simcoe in the local House the towns and townships in the riding of North Simcoe, 2,503 votes. On that basis the hon. gentleman will see that they stand in a minority of 203. But it is only fair to state that the Conservatives were opposed by Independents and Liberals. The gentleman who ran as a straight Conservative in West Simcoe was opposed entirely by an Independent, and the gentleman who ran in Centre Simcoe was opposed by both a Liberal and Independent, so that the vote, so far as party is concerned, does not give sufficient information to allow one accurately to judge what the result of that vote was as regards party. But why the hon. gentleman saw fit to refer to these matters I know not, unless it was for the purpose of concealing the position which the Conservatives in that riding took in my election. Now, what position did they take? We speak of the Conservatives in that riding as the straight line or the machine Conservatives, who we thought numbered about 875, and that was the exact number that were polled in the last general election for the Conservative candidate, Mr. Lennox. They held a convention at Stayner a short time before my election, and they passed a resolution which I will read, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite who agree with me on certain questions, and who perhaps do not agree with me on the tariff questions, to listen to the position which their friends took in that riding:

That whereas there are now two candidates in the field seeking the support of the electorate of North Simcoe, one of whom, Mr. James Martin, is the nominee of the Reform party at a convention called for that purpose, and the other, Mr. Leighton McCarthy, announces himself as an independent candidate, though having, there is good reason to believe, the support of the Government, and has refused to accept the suggestion that he allow his name to come as a candidate before a convention of Conservatives for this riding, or to be even an independent Conservative candidate; and whereas the present parliamentary contest is a by-election, it is therefore resolved that the Conservatives of North Simcoe, for the reasons stated, do not at this late hour nominate a candidate to contest the riding at said by-election; also, that as neither of the candidates now in the field in any sense represent the views of the Conservative party, this convention does not express any opinion as to how or for whom Conservatives should vote at such election, but declares that each member of the party is at liberty to exercise his franchise on behalf of either of the said candidates or not to vote at all, as to such member shall seem best.

That is the position which the straight line or machine Conservatives took at that convention. Now, the hon. gentleman's friends did vote in that campaign, and they voted as was insinuated in that resolution they should vote—they voted for the Liberal candidate. Their support of that candidate did cause a considerable amount of difficulty, and I would say also that, in that riding, these gentlemen seemed to think that they had—I do not say that it was against me personally, but against the name that I bear—some vindictive desire to satisfy. Then, also, I may remark, that my Roman Catholic fellow-citizens whom I never have harmed in any way, thought that they had some imaginary wrong to right, and they joined in this combination. Hon. members will say: "How in the world were you elected? I reply, by the honest, true, independent men who worked for me, and supported me upon that occasion, and to whom I am truly and deeply indebted. I have stated my position at this length that this country and this House may understand it. I am perfectly willing that the votes which I give in this House shall be criticised, upon the basis which I have stated, I was not elected to represent any party; I received no aid from any party in my election. I represent no party, not even a third party, and I propose to exercise the independent freedom my constituents have bestowed upon me, recognizing that to them I am responsible and to them alone. One other question, Mr. Speaker, calls for my notice, and it is that I see, in an article in the "Mail and Empire," a criticism in regard to the seat which I occupy in this House. As I say, I am responsible only to my constituents. I did not ask or apply for a seat at all, but what would be more fitting than that I should be placed beside my hon. friend (Mr. Stubbs) who was elected upon the same principles and the same platform as myself, and who, being an older parliamentarian than myself, is an hon. gentleman from whom I can seek advice. But, Sir, above and beyond that let me tell this House and this country that the side of this House that was good enough for Dalton McCarthy to sit upon is good enough for me.

Mr. J. ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). So far as I am concerned, this debate might die a natural death if I did not feel it to be a duty to express my appreciation of the great service which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) rendered to this country by his attack on official wrongdoing in the Yukon. It was not my good fortune to hear the reply of the hon. Minister of the Interior, but I have read the speech of that hon. Minister, as reported in the Toronto papers, and also in "Hansard," and I cannot but think that he failed utterly to vindicate his own wisdom or the honesty of the officials chosen by him. In fact, the speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior leaves me very much in the position of the judge who was listening to the lawyers, who were trying to prove, in a celebrated election case, that the respondent had no personal knowledge of the bribery which was used in his behalf. The judge said, "You might as well push a man into Lake Ontario and tell me that he was dry when you pulled him out, as to tell me that this respondent could be in the midst of such a seething mass of corruption and yet have no knowledge of these transactions." The speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior leaves me in the position of that judge in regard to these officials in the Yukon. I cannot for one moment believe that there could be so much smoke without some fire. I may say that I am thoroughly in sympathy with some phases of the Government's Yukon policy; I believe in the principle of the royalty, and also in the theory that the Yukon should pay for the Yukon. For that reason, I opposed last session the attempt that was made to turn the Yukon over to Mackenzie & Mann. The imposition of royalty on the gross output was a sound departure, but still a departure, and the Government should have been careful in its choice of agents. I cannot see that the hon. Minister of the Interior was particularly careful; he seems to have treated the whole Yukon as a wrecked ship to which he fastened all the barnacles to be found in Manitoba politics. I am free to confess that at first I thought the appointment of Major Walsh as administrator was a good one. I admit now that I was possibly mistaken, and yet I hope that Major Walsh will be able to disprove the charges that have been made against him. It would be unjust to expect the hon. Minister of the Interior to make no mistakes in his choice of men; his great mistake was in his settled policy of trying to bludgeon down every complaint that came from the Yukon. I did not agree with the hon. member for Pictou in condemning the activity of the hon. Minister of the Interior in the pursuit of the Manitoba rascals who are charged with stuffing ballot-boxes. I must say that the activity of the hon. Minister of the Interior towards the alleged rascality of his enemies in Manitoba is in marked contrast with his apathy towards the alleged rascality of his friends in the Yukon. The demand for specific charges and the names of complainants should, in my opinion, never have come from the head of a department which is on trial. The men who were branded as cowards, thieves and cut-throats did not go out to the Yukon to purify public affairs; they went out to look after gold, and this Government should not ask them to stop looking for gold in order to prefer charges against evil-doers in the country's service, at their own risk and at their own expense. These men are helpless unless there is a power here at Ottawa which can lay hold of their oppressors. The hon. Minister of the Interior has not helped them very much by his policy of holding a sort of Civil Service examination on every man who complained by looking for proof of good character from every complainant, when he should have been asking proof of good conduct from every accused official. The hon. Minister of the Interior had a chance to disassociate himself from the acts of his officials. He could have said to the country: "Whatever is wrong is going to be made right, and my policy is that no guilty man shall escape." This was not the policy of the hon. Minister of the Interior. The victims of wrong-doing in the Yukon were discouraged rather than encouraged. The hon. Minister of the Interior, he had his chance, but he failed to take it. He might have relieved this Parliament by making an investigation that would have been thorough and searching. The way that hon. gentlemen opposite have received the name of Mr. Woodworth shows the sort of justice that would be dealt out to any of those men that complained.

The present Government through the mistaken policy of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is identified with a corruption which robbed men of their rights and of their money, and with the terrorism, which would have robbed them of their characters if they had dared to make protest. If there has been any unfairness to officials in the Yukon, the blame rests entirely on the shoulders of the Minister of the Interior, for it was his duty to move at the first whisper of wrong-doing. I agree with the hon. gentlemen opposite who think that it is a fearful thing that the innocent should be accused, but, Sir, it is just as deplorable that the guilty should be shielded. I do not think that any gentleman on this side of the House is open to the charge of wilfully accusing the innocent, but I am afraid there are gentlemen on the other side of the House who are excusing the guilty. I am much mistaken if the demand of the country for the truth as to all these proceedings in the Yukon can be suppressed by the tactics of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). An investigation conducted by the friends of that gentleman (Mr. Sifton) under the control of the Minister may suit his followers—I admit that they are not as scarce as I would like to see them—but there is a public opinion which demands more than an inquiry by Wm. Ogilvie, with limited powers. Such an investigation may be very good as far as it goes, but there is great need for an inquiry sufficient to show the whole truth about the proceedings in the Yukon. This inquiry, when it comes, should not stop short of showing how so many members of the Black Horse Cavalry from Manitoba got so very rich in a very short time on very small salaries. I have no more to say, Mr. Speaker, further than to express the hope that this investigation will be proceeded with, and that the Yukon business will not be allowed to rest until the whole truth is fully brought up.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON.

LENGTH OF THE DEBATE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, if he is in a position to give us any information as to when he expects this debate to close?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as I am able to judge from the number of gentlemen whom I know are anxious to speak at some length on the subject, it will not be possible to close the debate this week.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. G. R. MAXWELL (Burrard). Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take any part in this debate, but as the leading representative of the Conservative party in British Columbia has spoken, it would not be courteous, I think, if some member from that province did not reply to his strictures upon the policy of the Government. The speech of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson) delivered before recess, was a speech that may be characterized as one full of wormwood and gall. Short though it was, it was full of bitterness, full of audacious assertions, and it was not difficult for one to interpret the reason thereof, because it was manifest to all, that the speech was inspired by the hon. gentleman's intense dislike to the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). The speech we heard this afternoon from the young member from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was one that was listened to with great pleasure. With his fine voice, with his ideas clearly arranged, and with the eloquent language with which he clothed them, we can congratulate ourselves in having an acquisition in the shape of ability to the debating power of this House. We are proud, I think I may say we are all proud, that the name of "McCarthy" still remains in this Parliament of Canada.

Sir, I wish to discuss very briefly a few points before coming to what may be called the main theme of the debate. There is a good deal of similarity between parts of the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and the speech of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior). Both started out pretty much in the same lines with a condemnation of the policy or the lack of policy on the part of the Government. The hon. member for Pictou began in a very bitter mood; he became more bitter as he proceeded, and he reached the apex of bitterness at the close of that long and dreary address. He was very bitter towards the Prime Minister because of some adjectives which the right hon. gentleman had applied to the leader of the Opposition; he evidently disliked these adjectives and gave what might be called a very smart lecture to the leader of the Government. Now, I have noted in a way, just a few of the flowers of rhetoric indulged in by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in that remarkable speech. Referring to the honoured followers of the Government, he calls them claqueurs. The right hon. the leader of the Government is charged with being incapable and his policy described as one of incapacity. The Liberals are represented as going down into depths of degradation. The servants of the Government are called harpies, hangers-on, heelers, corrupt officials, licensed thieves, understrappers; one is described as a drunken reprobate; another is characterized as a horse stealer—or a horse dealer. I beg your pardon—and he is put in comparison with a lawyer. Now, Sir, I do not know very much about the respective merits of a horse dealer and a lawyer, but it seems to me that a horse dealer is just as likely to be as honest and upright a man as any lawyer in Canada. Referring to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said: "The Minister of the Interior is base enough;" and referring to a particular subject, he says: "It shows the degradation to which he has sunk."

Now, if there was anything wrong in the language employed by the Prime Minister, surely the hon. gentleman does not strengthen his case by employing language more strong, and by gathering together a collection of adjectives expressive of the most contemptible designations which he could apply either to individuals or to a government. It only shows, Sir, how very difficult it is for a man to practice what he preaches.

Mr. POWELL. An open confession is good for the soul.

Mr. MAXWELL. I know hon. gentlemen opposite are not in the habit of preaching, hence they do not realize the difficulty of it. I say, the hon. member for Pictou made a very strong arraignment of the Government for its policy, or lack of policy, and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), in pretty much the same strain, gave expression to his views.

One characteristic keynote ran through all, that was, the broken pledges of the Government. Now, I do not know for what reason hon. gentlemen should dwell so much upon what they call broken promises. The hon. member for Victoria told us that we had made certain promises and that they had not been fulfilled. Now, I think it is patent to every individual who wants to be fair, that a man may make a promise with the very best intentions, and may find it very difficult to fulfil that promise in a day, or in a week, or in a month, or in a year. I can remember a particular promise of which I have read, and which has been pretty much studied by me, made by the Almighty Himself to an individual, and fifty years afterwards that promise was still unfulfilled; but before he died the promise was verified. Now, it is just the same with a party as with an individual. Undoubtedly, we made promises, but I hold that, ever since this Government came into power, it has been earnestly and faithfully attempting to carry out those promises; that a great many of them have been carried out, and, if life is continued to this Government, as I have no doubt it will be, every promise and pledge made to the people of Canada by this Government will ultimately be fulfilled. It seems to me a very senseless way of criticising a government, to make statements that cannot possibly be verified; and when any one says the Government has not kept its promises to the people, the people will realize that that is not a correct statement.

Now, I will just give you a few samples of some of the promises which the Liberal party made to the people, and on which, no doubt, the people returned them to power. There was, for example, the Franchise Act. No hon. gentleman opposite will deny that there was a distinct pledge, or promise, on the part of those now in power, that if they were returned to power, they would abolish the old Act and go back to the franchise of the respective provinces. I will not say, at this particular point, whether that was wise or unwise. Sufficient for me to say that it was a distinct pledge, and that the pledge was carried out in its entirety, and to the satisfaction, I believe, of the people of Canada.

Then, there was the Superannuation Act. Hon. gentlemen who know the record of the Liberal party of this country, know that it felt deep dissatisfaction with the Superannuation Act, as it formerly existed. The question with me at the present time is not so much with regard to what abuses crept into existence, or the amount of money that may have been given away by this Government or by the old Government. Sufficient for me to state that this Government gave a distinct pledge to the people, that if returned to power, the old Act would be abolished, and if the principle of superannuation were maintained, a new state of affairs would be brought into existence. Every man knows that that pledge has been carried out in its entirety and with satisfaction to the people.

Then, again, there was the plebiscite. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that that also was a distinct pledge made by this Government to the people of Canada. The question is not prohibition or no prohibition. Hon. gentlemen know that in a great party there must be room for different ideas and opinions with regard to such a question; and, while it is true we have on this side men who are pledged to prohibition, men who are heart and soul in sympathy with every effort that is being made to remove intemperance from the land, yet the distinct pledge of the Government to the people of Canada was, that they would give them an opportunity to express their mind as to whether they were or were not in favour of the prohibition of the liquor traffic. It is mere quibbling to say that the Government has broken its pledge. I hold, and my statement is warranted and cannot be denied, that, in the plebiscite which has just passed, the Government fulfilled its pledge in its entirety to the people of Canada.

Then, with regard to the commission at Washington. Hon. gentlemen know that that was also a distinct pledge made by this Government to the people of Canada. They said that if they had the opportunity, they would put in motion the machinery by which mutual discussions and arrangements might be had between the two countries for better trade relations. The question here is not whether that commission has been a failure or a success. We have simply to see what was the promise made by the Government, and whether that promise has been carried out or not. Now, you know it has been carried out. We know that the commissioners have been appointed, and that they have been in conference for many weeks, and even months, trying to bring about a better condition of affairs between the two countries; and I cannot help saying that we have something to learn with regard to true Imperial politics. I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) introduce that phrase in his speech this afternoon. You know very well that, when matters affecting the British Empire are under consideration in the British House of Commons, at least so far as its foreign relations are concerned, both sides of the House say to the Government: We will give you a free hand; we will sustain you in every effort you are putting forth for the maintenance of the Empire; we will drop party politics; we will stand right here and stand at your back, and make those with whom you are contending and discussing, realize that they are discussing, not with a party, but with the whole British Empire. I would like well that, so far as this commission is concerned, we would rise above the mere question of party advantages or considerations, and would make the citizens of the United States and the commissioners who represent these citizens, realize that our men are not merely the representatives of a party, but representatives of the whole Dominion, in so far as these negotiations are concerned.

With regard to the Senate, hon. gentlemen know, Mr. Speaker, that with reference to that also there was a distinct pledge made by this Government to the people of Canada. The question is not as to the nature of the change or improvement proposed. It is not a mere question as to how the change proposed may succeed or anything like that, but the question is simply, does the Government intend to carry out the pledge made to the people to reform the Senate in some way. We know that legislation or at least some sort of machinery has to be set in motion this session. What for? To carry out as far as we possibly can the pledge which this party made in the years gone by. Here let me say that I cannot but regret the utterance of the right hon. Prime Minister while I respect his caution and admire and respect his love for the Senate simply because it is an institution of the country at present; for my feelings are in sympathy with all those who want its abolition instead of amending or patching it up. So far as I know the feelings of my people, they are in favour of doing away with it altogether and giving the money spent on that institution at present to something more needful and beneficial to the country than it is to-day. We are told that the Senate is a watchdog, but I will not insult the dog by calling it after the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I must call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not in order to speak disrespectfully of another House.

Mr. MAXWELL. Then I withdraw the expression. I did not think I was doing anything wrong or else I would not have used it. The expression "watchdog" has been often used with regard to the Senate, and I thought it was perfectly in accordance with parliamentary speech. However, we all know that the watchdog is of great service and that his services are respected and honoured, but I do not know that the Senate has performed equal service, according to its opportunities, compared with those which that noble animal performs for those whom he serves and loves.

Now, the question of the tariff has also been brought very conspicuously before us in this debate. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) told us that we promised free trade. I think that is one of those statements that cannot possibly be verified, so far as the party as a whole is concerned. The question of free trade and protection is one of those questions which divide men, and men even in the one party have their different ideas and opinions concerning it. So far as I am personally concerned, brought up as I was a free trader, and in the British Empire, realizing the advantages of free trade, I cannot but believe that under similar conditions the same policy would have the same good effects for Canada as it has had for the British Empire. Of course we know that it took the British Empire a long time to come to the stage of free trade which now exists in that prosperous and mighty Empire, and it is sufficient for me, in harmony with the views of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), if we go forward, no matter how slowly, in that direction and towards that goal which it is our noble ambition to reach. Whenever the fetters that shackle trade will be broken and we shall have the same freedom in trade that we have in thought, we shall have made the same advance in material progress as we have made since that time in spiritual progress, for I cannot but believe that when freedom of thought came to this earth, this earth sprang into new life and has since that period made more progress than perhaps during the whole previous time of its existence. So when the shackles are taken off our material life and when trade has the same open free channels that thought has to-day, I cannot but believe that there will be a commercial renaissance that will be equally beneficial to all concerned, not only in Canada but the wide world over. So far as this tariff is concerned, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) said that he was not very sure as to whether things had been prospering or not. That is to say, he was not very sure as to whether the exodus, for example, had stopped, or as to whether there was a great deal of improvement made as has been stated. Well, the proof of the pudding is the precin o't; and we have the foundation to-day of a growing time, not only in the different parts of Canada, but in British Columbia. Why, if we had to-day a census taken of that province, we would, I think, be entitled to perhaps four more members in this House than we have at present, showing, I think, very clearly a wonderful development and progress—not an exodus of people going out but a crowd of people coming in—and, I think, proving conclusively that at least the changes which have been made in the tariff and the policy of this Government have not been detrimental to the commercial interests of our great province and of our west. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) asked the question: Are we satisfied? I wonder where the man is to be found who is satisfied. Do we realize for a moment what satisfaction means? Why, the man who is satisfied is a dead man. Satisfaction is always an evidence of senility, of decay, of growing old, of not being able to be active and diligent in service. One of the noblest instincts or one of the noblest emotions planted in the human heart or mind or soul is not satisfaction but dissatisfaction, and so long as a man is dissatisfied with what is and ever yearning and looking forward to what will be and what may be, there you have a man that will be progressive, active and diligent, and will bring forward the reforms that are yet to glorify our age and the time which is coming. No, we are not satisfied, we are still living and breathing and looking forward to greater and better things for Canada than she has had yet. Because we are dissatisfied, we shall so act and influence thought and action with regard to the things we see that are needed, not now perhaps, but in the good time coming, that dissatisfaction will be one of the most important factors in promoting change, in developing progress and in making reforms.

Now he says that we made a promise to economize. I wonder what man ever economized that had plenty of money to spend. There is only one man that I know of who economizes, and that is the miser; and no man on earth is more despised than the miser with his money. A young man, for example, starts in life with $40 a month. If he is a wise young man, he will not spend that $40 a month, but will save something out of it and will suit his expenses to his income. When he gets $600 a year, he will spend more, and, perhaps, save more. When he gets a $1000 he will spend more and save more, and when he gets $5000 a year, he will spend more than at any previous time in his life, if he is a growing intelligent man. And, so, when the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) says: The money is coming in, and I am going to spend it, I say he is perfectly right. The people of Canada do not want a miserly Government. There are so many important things to be done. Why, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), I have not the slightest doubt is in sympathy with an effort being made in his own city to press upon the Government a spending of over a million dollars upon the wharf there. And yet he wants this Government to economize. He also made a very intelligent and very appreciative appeal for the militia of this country; he wanted the Minister to spend more money on the militia. And yet he wants the Government to economize. I say that, as long as the prosperity of this country brings money into the national exchequer, so long as there are public works to be built, so long as the public works will be helpful to the commercial life of our nation, just so long do I want our Government to spend every cent that the people of the country are giving them—and to spend it in such things as will be beneficial to the people. There is only one thing that this side of the House does not want the Government to do, and that is to let the money of the country be stolen or plundered. Spend the money fairly and squarely. I am perfectly certain of this—that if the Government spend the money wisely and honestly, the people will pay no attention whatever to the cry of economy or the cry of extravagance. Sufficient for them will be the fact that the money is being spent in the interest, for the betterment and for the true advancement of Canada.

Now, the Government made other promises, and I am very sorry to say that these promises are not as often mentioned, perhaps, as they ought to be. There is a large class of people in this country that, perhaps, we do not take into consideration as much as we ought to do.—I refer to the working classes. I am glad to say that this Government has done something which I know appeals to the sympathy of a large portion of the people of Canada. If there is one thing, Mr. Speaker, that the working classes of this country are opposed to, it is what is called combines. We, more or less, believe in competition. We are supposed to believe, at least, that competition is the great law so far as trade is concerned. Combination is another law, we might say, which has started out to make it evident that there can be no real true competition in trade or business at the present day. Rightly or wrongly, the working classes of this country have got it into their heads that these combines are detrimental to their best interests, that they create another tyrannous horde, and that their tyranny will be used when the time comes for crushing their independence. Now, I am glad that this Government has put it upon record that where these combines are made, the class of goods made by that combine shall be placed upon the free list. Then there is the question of the sweating system. I am sorry that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is not here this evening, that I might speak in his presence a word of commendation for his worthy and noble efforts in connection with his department at least, in which he has provided, there shall be nothing of this system, a system that means the degradation of the labourer, that means poverty that oftentimes results in crimes against the children of the poor labourer. Then, there is the question of day labour. The hon. member for Pictou, last session tried to quibble with the Minister of Public Works on the question of day labour. I believe in day labour, as I believe also in the contract system. Plenty of work in this country can be done well by day labour. Perhaps, there is no question in which the working class are more interested than this question of day labour. I believe day labour is better than any kind of labour, that if men have time to do honest, fair and square work, it will be done better than under the contract system. I commend the Government to the working classes because of their partial adoption at least of the principle of day labour. Then there is the matter of the union label: I think this also passed through the House last session, but, Mr. Speaker, owing to the good offices of these venerable gentlemen a short distance off, this demand made by the Trades and Labour Councils of Canada was balked and defeated. But I know that it will not end there, that the matter will come before us again; and I am glad that this House at least has put itself on record that it is heartily in sympathy with putting these labels upon the products of our labouring man, to be a sign to all men that the workman that produced the goods is honestly paid, and at such a rate as to give him a decent competence in life.

Let me now call your attention for a short time, to the Yukon. Referring to the speech of the hon. member for Pictou, I wish to make just a slight reference to a matter in which I am personally concerned.

Mr. MAXWELL.

The hon. member for Pictou, like Goliath of Gath of old, made some statements that I may call, without offence, swaggering statements, to which I took exception, with regard to mail matters in Dawson. I said:

My hon. friend is not the only one on the coast that has communication with Dawson City. I have had letters every month from Dawson City for the last four or five months.

The hon. member for Pictou then gave me this slap:

And that is an answer to my statement that the service in general has been absolutely unsatisfactory and disgraceful, and that it is known to the hon. gentleman's constituents. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, is prejudiced a little by his relations with Deadman's Island, which is a matter of interest between him and the Government, and a matter that will bear further investigation.

Mr. MAXWELL. I will be ready for you when you come on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the Minister of Militia and Defence will not be quite as ready as the hon. gentleman. The member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) was ready, no doubt, long ago, when he happened to be fortunate enough to induce the Government to perpetrate one of the most extraordinary frauds upon the people of Vancouver that was ever perpetrated on any people in this country—the hon. gentleman was ready to push the Minister of Militia and Defence into that position.

I need not refer to his other statements, perhaps stronger even than this one. I simply call your attention to this because I wish to say in a more gentlemanly way than he has put his statement, that there is not one single word of truth in what the hon. gentleman says in reference to myself or the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) in connection with Deadman's Island.

I want just to say here without discussing the question, that there never was a fairer, there never was a more honest thing put through the Department of Militia than was this leasing of Deadman's Island. I want to say this in a general way, that nothing that the Government of Canada has ever done for the city of Vancouver will be half so advantageous to the commercial prosperity of that city, than the leasing of that island for commercial purposes. I want to say, further, that whenever the hon. gentleman is ready to go on and to substantiate these extraordinary statements, I am quite prepared to show this House, Mr. Speaker, that everything that was done was done above-board, was done in an honest, fair and square way, that I am not ashamed of what I have done; in fact I may say that had I the chance to do it again, I would do it with a perfectly clear conscience that I was acting in the best interests of my constituents.

Now, I think it was evident to all who were present that evening and listened to the speech of the hon. member for Pictou, that it was what may be called a dead set upon the Minister of the Interior. It is not necessary for me to make any measured defence or any special pleading on behalf of that hon. Minister. The brilliant parts which he has displayed in the Government of Manitoba, the magnificent way in which he has handled the Department of the Interior—because I defy any man to point to anything he has done that he has not done well and in the interests of Canada—the magnificent speeches he has delivered in this House, especially the magnificent speech he delivered the other evening, all these things put together are evidences to every honest and unprejudiced mind that in the hon. Minister of the Interior we have a man of great parts, a man of great ability, and one well able to fulfil the task which the Prime Minister has given him to do. Mr. Speaker, it was not difficult, I think, for any one who listened to that speech to see that there was animus in the attack, and the reason of that attack is simply this, that on some previous occasion when something was done in Manitoba that perhaps should not have been done, the Minister did what he possibly could to ferret out those who had been culprits in the matter. Now, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that there is perhaps nothing that we should guard more sacredly and inviolably than the ballot box. I do not care whether one side or the other is concerned, it is a matter in which both parties are interested, it is a matter that concerns the wish and the will of the people; and anything that interferes with the ballot box which contains the mind and the will of the people, interferes with that which should be sacredly guarded and preserved by both parties in this country. I am not going into the question at all as to the rightness or wrongness of that discussion; but I say that if the Minister felt in the first place that a wrong had been done, that the ballot boxes had been stuffed, that the opinion of the people had been stifled, that a great crime had been committed against the people of Manitoba, apart from politics altogether, I say it was his bounden duty, and the bounden duty of all, to join in any effort that might be put forth to find out who those culprits were and to bring them to justice as speedily as possible.

Now, Sir, I will refer to a matter which was mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou in connection with Yukon matters. I have here a letter from the Deputy Minister of the Interior, dated the 2nd of December, 1898. I do not know that it has been placed on the "Hansard," but I think it ought to be. I suppose the letter is similar to the one which the hon. member for Pictou received from the Interior Department:

Sir,—You are no doubt aware that statements have been made very freely in the press for some months past impugning the conduct of officials charged with the administration of the affairs of the Government in the Yukon district. Some time since a statement signed by certain persons claiming to represent a miners' institute or committee, was placed in the hands of the Minister of the Interior, and thereupon a commission was issued to Mr. William Ogilvie, the commissioner of the district, authorizing him to make an investigation into the truth of the statements made in the complaint, and also to inquire into other complaints that may be made respecting maladministration of officers of the Government. It is apprehended that great difficulty will be encountered in making an investigation by reason of the vagueness of the charges which have been made, and the difficulty of getting information as to any specific acts of wrongdoing, should such have taken place. As a public man resident in British Columbia, it is possible that you have been made the recipient of information which would be of value to the department and to Mr. Ogilvie in conducting the said investigation, and I am therefore directed to request that if you are in the possession of any information whatever showing or relating to any specific acts of malfeasance of office on the part of any officer of the Government in the Yukon district during the past two years, such information may be forwarded to the department in order that it may be sent to the commissioner for examination and report.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

JAMES A. SMART,

Deputy Minister of the Interior.

I am informed by the Minister of the Interior that a similar letter was sent to all the members of the House of Commons and of the Senate living in British Columbia. Now, I want to put this fairly and squarely to hon. gentlemen opposite: Why should this question of corruption, or supposed corruption, on the part of officials in the Yukon, be made a party question? Why should a matter affecting the well-being, not merely of a party, not merely of both parties, but affecting the well-being of the people of Canada, be dragged into mere party politics? Why should it be so handled, and bandied about and discussed by us as party men? Why should we strive to make party capital of a matter that it should be the combined interest of all to see thoroughly investigated and thoroughly sifted? Now, it seems to me that if ever there was an honest effort put forth by a Minister to lift a question out of the sphere of party politics, to make men feel that it was not a matter of party politics, such an effort is evidenced in the letter which was sent to all the members of the House of Commons and to all the Senators in British Columbia. I think that is the best evidence which the Minister could possibly have given to us that he was anxious to have these cases examined, that he wanted the co-operation of both parties in British Columbia to get at the truth of those statements, and hence that this evident desire was not merely the glorification of his own party, but the well-being of Canada.

Now, I want to say a few words with regard to the men who went up to the Yukon first. I may say that, living in Vancouver, I had the privilege and the honour of becoming acquainted with every one of these officials; not only that, but I had the privilege of travelling with them from Vancouver to Skagway. I had also the privilege of staying with most of them in Skagway for quite a considerable period. I gave my impression of these men—I am scrry I have not a copy of it here, so that I could have given it as I wrote it at the time—but I gave my impression of these men when in Vancouver, stating what I thought as to their fitness and adaptability for the onerous duties which had been entrusted to them. In so far as Major Walsh is concerned, a charge has been made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), referring to his drunken habits in the Yukon. I will only say that, neither in Vancouver, nor on board the "Quadra," nor at Skagway, where we were brought into the closest possible contact with him, and where, perhaps, if he had been in any way disposed to that crime or sin, or whatever you may call it, we would have known it. I never saw Major Walsh taste one single drop of intoxicating liquor. I think it is generally regretted by all that this charge was made by the hon. member for Pictou. I do not think that, even if Major Walsh were an inefficient officer, it was necessary to drag this painful charge into this debate. For my part, I can only say, that I can hardly imagine and that I can hardly believe that the charge is true. From what little I saw of him, from what little I know of him, and from what I have heard from men who have known the gallant Major for over twenty years, I have the greatest difficulty in accepting or believing this serious charge. But I will say this, Mr. Speaker, in appeal to hon. members opposite, and in appeal to the world outside, that there was once a certain occasion, mentioned in a Book that we all admire and that we all revere, of a particular woman who was brought before the Master of us all, who was hounded into His presence by those who professed to be the purest men of their day. You remember the stinging words that came from the Master of us all, when He said: "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." Or, Mr. Speaker, if you should prefer that I appeal to human judgment, there is one man to whom I am indebted for many a thought and many an inspiration—one who has touched the human heart perhaps more sensitively than any other man that ever lived, and that is Robert Burns. Face to face with such a charge as this, I can only repeat these lines:

Then gently scan your brother Man,
 Still gentler sister Woman;
 Tho' they may gang a kennin wrang,
 To step aside is human;
 One point must still be greatly dark,
 The moving why they do it;
 And just as lamely can ye mark
 How far perhaps they rue it.

Now, there was one man more in connection with that expedition, and that man was Mr. William Ogilvie. I remember, at that time, a great deal was being said in the newspapers about that gentleman. I may say that I lived in the closest intimacy with him, because I found him to be a most congenial companion. During the six or seven weeks of that expedition, I had the best opportunity of knowing his mind, and later on, of entering into his thoughts and aspirations, so far as the Yukon country was concerned. In a letter which I wrote to the newspapers, I gave the following description, which I think to be a true description of Mr. Ogilvie:—

So far as the Yukon country is concerned, there is one man who, more than all others, deserves the thanks of the Canadian people. It was my privilege when in his company during the late expedition for nearly a month, and had, as you can imagine, the best of opportunities for studying his character. Mr William Ogilvie is, as his name would naturally suggest, a Scotchman, or rather, as my friend the new Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia would say, he is an improved Scotchman, having been born in Canada. He is a Canadian from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head. He is full of Canada. He loves it, admires it, and no man can be more enthusiastic over it than he is. There are few men who have seen so much of it—who know so much about it, and therefore he can, with more reason than most men, praise it. He is a wonderful man. It is impossible for one to come in contact with him without being impressed. Though born in Canada, he speaks Scotch even more perfectly than many who have been born in the land of the heather. He has a fund, an inexhaustible fund, of Scotch stories—in fact, all kinds of stories. Wit and humour lurk in his eyes, and are ever flowing from his lips. He is a splendid mimic. Yankee, Scotchman, Irishman, Frenchman—all in turn are faithfully delineated. He is a perfect entertainer. Metaphorically speaking, you could sit at his feet night after night, and he would keep you laughing till the tears run down your cheeks, and till your sides were sore. Nothing pleases him better than to get a few chosen spirits in some quiet corner, and regale them with his side-splitting mimicry. Not that he thrusts these on you; no, no; but when you have once got the "scent of blood" nothing delights you more than to get him to open up his rare wallet. Many a time while sitting at the table in the boat, all at once you would be startled with a loud explosion of laughter. After you had recovered yourself for a moment one would say, "Oh, that is Ogilvie," and true enough it was. A more companionable man one could not imagine, or one more fitted to wile the hours away, and banish dull care could hardly be found. Withal he is most unassuming. He hates to speak about himself. He is cautious—very canny. There is nothing of the blowhard about him. What he has suffered or endured on those lonely travels of his one never gets to know. He never magnifies himself, or what he has done. He has all the simplicity of a good and a great man, and he is just such a man as inspires you. Having known him, you could never doubt his word. You would believe it with all your heart. I have said that he is a Canadian; the future, I believe, will amply testify that he was a great Canadian, an honest Canadian, and I can't help saying that he is one of whom every Canadian should be proud. For over twenty years he has given his splendid services to this country, and that too for a miserable pittance, considering what he has had to do and how he has done it. Sir Charles Tupper, the other day, said no more than what was true when he said that Mr. Ogilvie

"has brought to his duty great intelligence and thorough untiring industry; but his straightforwardness and honesty have given to Canadians the most unbounded confidence in any statements he places before the country." Such is the man, then, who speaks about this country, and to whom we have to look for light and guidance.

Now, I wrote that letter to the press, descriptive of that gentleman, and I can only say that these words are true, and I believe that, in so far as the ground was covered, exactly described his moral and intellectual make-up. I remember well, Sir, the time that that gentleman came back from the Yukon, and when it became known all over Canada that, in the presence of gold, he absolutely refused, as an employee of the Government, to appropriate any of that gold to himself, how all praised him.

I remember that, at a lecture given by Mr. Ogilvie in Victoria, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) spoke and hinted that it was almost a shame that Mr. Ogilvie had not been appointed in the place of Major Walsh, as administrator of the Yukon. Sir, I rejoiced when Mr. Ogilvie was appointed; but no sooner did the Minister of the Interior place him in that onerous and honourable position, than we began to hear the following statements:—

Sifton's appointment of Mr. Ogilvie to the position of administrator of the Yukon has been commended.

It is believed that the new administrator is an honest man.

But Napoleon is again true to the family.

Mr. Ogilvie is like too many of the new office-holders—one of Sifton's relatives.

Is that fair-play? Is it fair to Mr. Ogilvie? Here is a man who was praised up to the very heavens as honest and incorrupt; praised as a model man to all Canadians, wherever they might be; and yet, no sooner was he appointed to that office, than insinuations are sent out, that because he happened to be some fifty-ninth cousin of the Minister of the Interior, it was hardly possible for him to be honest or to discharge his duties, because of that supposed connection. Sir, no matter to whom Mr. Ogilvie is related, I believe he is a man of sterling qualities. He is one of these men—a type, perhaps, not too common at the present time—who, no matter where he may be placed, will do his duty to his country, will render justice between man and man, and will try in every way possible to promote peace and good-will.

It has been charged against the Government, that they should have drawn upon British Columbia laws and regulations for information as to the way in which the Yukon should be administered, and we are told that there was no excuse for the Minister not having provided in advance for the prompt discharge of the mining business in the Yukon, because, it is said, that what was done in British Columbia, should have been done in the Klondike. I have gone to the trouble of making inquiries in regard to mining matters in British Columbia, and I have here a statement of the Minister of Mines for that province. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, from the 1st of May, 1898, to the 31st January, 1899, over 10,500 claims were registered in Dawson City, or about forty for each working day. Now, what does the statement from the Minister of Mines for British Columbia show? It shows that the greatest number of claims entered in any mining recorder's office in British Columbia was recorded in the office at Nelson; but the number was only 1,545 for a year, or an average of five a day. In other words, the work of the busiest mining recorder's office in British Columbia was, when compared with the mining office in Dawson City, as five to forty. Let us look at the other British Columbia offices. At Skeena there were 31 claims recorded in the year, not as many as in one day at Dawson. At Quesnelle 264 were recorded; at Omineca, 119; at Kamloops, 365; at Yale, 119; at Simelkamen, 288; at Vernon, 84; at Osoyoos, 496; at Kettle River, 563; at Grand Forks, 860; at Windermere, 417; at Fort Steele, 682; at Revelstoke, 187; at Lardeau, 407; at Trout Lake, 371; at Slokan, 498; at Slokan City, 356; at Ainsworth, 939; at Goat River, 233; at Arrow Lake, 254; at Trail Creek, 1,045; at Nanaimo, 570 at Alberni, 441; at West Coast, 114; at Clinton and Lillooet, 471; at Victoria, 104, and at New Westminster, 316. In other words, in 28 mining recording offices in British Columbia the total number of claims recorded in twelve months was 12,139, whereas, in nine months in the single recording office of Dawson, the number of claims recorded was 10,543.

Fault has also been found with the Minister of the Interior because, on the suggestion of Mr. Ogilvie, and on the strong recommendation of the Surveyor General of Canada, a surveyor was put in charge of the mining business. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Gold Commissioner and recorder should have been a lawyer, and, in almost the same breath, we are referred to British Columbia for an example of how government mining business should be administered. I have no objection to lawyers. They are just as capable as other men in this community, but I hold that other men are just as capable as lawyers, and I do not see why all the good offices in this country should be given to one particular class more than to another. Although Mr. Ogilvie may not have a legal training, he has that sound common sense which is as good as any training a man can get. It is Heaven's own training, and I believe that Mr. Ogilvie can see the right and the wrong of a question just as well as any lawyer in the Dominion of Canada, and that is not saying anything disrespectful of the lawyers. We are told by these gentlemen opposite, that British Columbia is to be our example, and that we are to do what British Columbia does. But, Sir, there is not a single lawyer employed by the Government of British Columbia in the recording of mining claims. It has also been charged against the Minister (Mr. Sifton), in connection with these charges of maladministration at Dawson, that he sat in his office and did nothing until months had elapsed, and he has again been found fault with, that the orders which were given to Mr. Ogilvie, were not explicit or extensive enough. These gentlemen opposite ask for a commission. I might mention that the date of the miners' complaint is the 25th August, 1898, and that complaint was received and recorded at the Department of the Interior on the 6th of October, 1898. The Order in Council for a commission was passed on the 7th October, 1898, and the commission issued on the 7th October, 1898. You have the commission issued on the 7th of October, the very day after the complaint was received at Ottawa. I would like to know how it was possible for any human being to be more active or diligent with regard to these complaints, with a view to having the thing remedied, if it could be remedied, than was the Minister of the Interior? We are told by these gentlemen on the other side of the House, that administrative authority is not as good as a commission. Well, it is not very difficult to see that a man who has administrative authority has far wider and larger powers than a man who is simply under a commission. A man who has administrative power, has complete charge of all the officials, and if he suspected a man of doing wrong, he could dismiss him; whereas, in the case of a commission, a man might be charged, but if there was no legal evidence to prove his guilt, that man might remain where he was and the commissioner would have no power to remove him, even though he suspected and believed that the man was dishonest. Therefore the Minister gave Mr. Ogilvie both authority under a Royal Commission to investigate, and the most ample administrative power, and I say that the Minister, in giving Mr. Ogilvie such administrative power, gave him complete control, to do what he liked so far as those officials were concerned, and did more for the purity of administration in that country than he could do by appointing any possible commission with simply legal powers given to it. Now, I know Mr. Ogilvie, and I have talked with him in regard to these charges; and I can say this without in any way letting out private conversation, that he went up to that country thoroughly imbued with an honest and earnest intention of removing any official he could suspect of doing anything wrong; and I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen join with us to-day in saying that since he assumed office these charges have practically ceased. We have heard no complaint to speak of since that time, and I believe there will be no complaint so long as he is in that country, because he is just the man to mix with men; he has a deep and profound sympathy with the miner; he knows his troubles, his weaknesses, his hardships, and his discouragements. He can, therefore, enter into the deepest sympathy with the miners, and through his sympathy he can wind those men around his heart, and make them feel that, although he is the administrator, he is a man and a brother to them.

The hon. member for Victoria referred again to British Columbia. What he says about the miners I have not the slightest hesitation in corroborating. The hon. Minister of the Interior referred to the enormous rush which took place to Dawson City, and the hon. member for Victoria gave us the impression that there was also a very great rush into the Cariboo district in the early sixties, or the later fifties. Now, in Bancroft's history of British Columbia, on page 469, I read that in 1858 the population of British Columbia was supposed to be 17,000, in 1859, 8,000; in 1860, 7,000, and in 1861, 5,000. Again, on page 481, it is said:

Exploration in 1862 was nevertheless vigorously prosecuted by an actual mining population estimated at 5,000 in Cariboo district.

Now, you see that while there was an important influx into Cariboo at the end of the fifties and in the beginning of the sixties, yet the number was comparatively insignificant, compared with the tremendous rush into the Yukon district a short time ago. Besides, how much easier was it for the Government of British Columbia, then at New Westminster, to handle those men than it was for the Minister of the Interior to handle the population in the Yukon district from Ottawa, so much farther away, so much more difficult of access, and so much harder to have communication with. We are also told that there was no danger of any particular trouble in Dawson City because in Cariboo, where this great rush was, everything was comparatively placid and peaceable. Now, Bancroft, at page 430, tells us:

The miners of Cariboo did not like Mr. Justice Begbie's methods of construing their mining laws, so they met in mass meeting on the 23rd of June, 1860, and denounced him, after which they felt better, although the Chief Justice still lived.

It has been said that we have no account of any rascalities in Cariboo or British Columbia compared with the reports that have come from Dawson City. But there is a great difference. There were no newspaper men and women running up to Cariboo in those days; there were no political parties in those days sending men to Cariboo to find out the weak spots in the Government's administration of the country, as there are to-day. The whole country was shut in, and practically only miners were there. Hence, while I know there are many rumours and stories of crimes having been committed in those days, yet we have no official knowledge of those things, no newspaper clippings, no correspondence of the "Times." Everything is inclosed in the obscurity of the distant past. But I will tell you that British Columbia is not exactly so pure as the hon. member for Victoria would like us to believe. In the last three years three of the leading officials of the British Columbia Government have been put into the New Westminster penitentiary for the embezzlement of public funds; but no man in British Columbia ever thought of accusing the Government of British Columbia because of the weaknesses of those men. And even if it might be proved that some poor official in the Yukon district, perhaps under pressure of the very man who is squealing now against him, took money and entered into interests with him—I say even if it might be proved that officials in that far distant country did wrong, why should we blame a Government so many thousand miles away from the country? Why should we hold the Government responsible for these things? Why should we not, as sensible men, realize that there will be good men and bad men in every service, and in every branch of industry? And just as it is impossible for the employer of labour to control all his employees, so it is absolutely impossible for any Government to have continual range over the men in its employ.

Now, the hon. member for Victoria says the hon. Minister of the Interior should have gone to British Columbia for his men. Well, I do not see but what it is a mighty good thing he did not go to British Columbia for more men. I do not know that it is any particular advantage to a man to be sent up to the Yukon. A man may be decent down here, like Mr. Fawcett, a man held in the highest respect, esteem and honour by his associates, and no sooner does he go up to Dawson and get into the employ of the Government, than he suddenly becomes transformed, and evil things are charged against him. Why, I think it is a god-send to the people of British Columbia that a great many of them have not been sent to the Yukon, because they have at least their reputations where they are, which I do not think they would have if they had gone to the Yukon. But the Government has not been so neglectful of British Columbia as the hon. member for Victoria suggests. The inspector of customs to-day is from British Columbia; the Gold Commissioner is a British Columbian; two of my own constituents are on the staff of Mr. Ogilvie; and several more I might mention who have been recognized by the hon. Minister of the Interior; and I am glad to say that these men are all doing their duty honestly, faithfully and well, and are a credit both to the province from which they came and to the Government for which they are working.

Now, reference was made to the mail facilities in that country. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) gave us some comments to-day regarding the mail service. I made a statement to the House when the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was speaking with regard to my letters from Dawson City. I have some 300 or 400 of my own constituents in Dawson to-day, and the surrounding district, and have pretty good communication with them. I write often to them, and they to me, and I have this to state with regard to the mail service. The letters received by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) show no deficiency in the mail service. A letter dated Dawson City, August 10th, 1898, was received September 14th, 1898. A letter dated September 14th, 1898, at Dawson City, was received here October 19th, 1898. A letter dated at Dawson City, October 2nd, was received here November 1st. A letter dated at Dawson City January 31st, 1899, was received here March 6th. Letter dated at Dawson, March 7th, 1899, received here April 4th, 1899. Letter dated at Dawson, November 25th, 1898, received here January 2nd, 1899; and I hold in my hand two envelopes that arrived just two or three days ago, the letters taking about the same time to reach here as those others I have mentioned.

The hon. member for Victoria, (Mr. Prior) likewise brought up the question of the customs. I remember that gentleman sending to me—I think it was from the same gentleman he mentioned to-day—a letter complaining that men were getting their goods through the customs there without paying for them. Now, I just happened to have a conversation with an inspector of customs not long ago who had inspected these offices, and he told me that he had made a comparison of the amount of money that had been collected there with the goods that had gone through, and he said he could honestly say that if any had gone through free they must have been very few indeed, and he had perfect confidence in the integrity of the customs officials at all the different points on the borders of the Yukon territory. I think I have gone over pretty much the charges which have been made, so far as the Yukon matter is concerned. I will only say this in conclusion, that it is all very well for us to sit in this House or in our comfortable homes and criticise men who are in these distant parts. We cannot have any idea of the difficulties which these officials, as well as these miners, have had to encounter in these early days in Dawson City. It is very easy for us to sit in this House and criticise the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who besides the great department of which he is in charge, had this work suddenly thrown upon him that demanded the employment of all the powers of his mind and heart in order to meet the demands which that country was making upon him. I do not say that mistakes have not been committed or that even wrongs may not have been committed in Dawson City, but I think we ought to have sufficient confidence in our Government and our own citizens, because these officials are Canadians like ourselves. We ought to have sufficient confidence in our brethren, in our Canadian citizens, to believe that wherever they go they do not go as understrappers, as hirelings, as men who are going to disgrace the provinces from which they come, the countries which they serve or the country of which they form a part; but that it is their aim and the noble ambition of every Canadian, no matter where he may be, to do his part honestly and well. We ought to be thankful that we have had such a young man in this office as the Minister of the Interior. There is no man in this House but who must have noticed the wonderful accuracy of his details and the way in which he had command of this whole intricate and vast subject and the skilful manner in which he handled these details, and I think it must be apparent likewise that he spoke with a single desire to give all the information he had at his command, and that he has acted also with the evident desire to, as far as he possibly could, to probe these matters to the very bottom, so that confidence might be reposed in these men and in the administration of the Yukon district.

Why, Sir, we have two men here now from Dawson City connected with a newspaper. I must admire their self-sacrifice in coming such a distance to tell the Government what is needed up there. It seems to me a piece of great gall—I do not know if that word is parliamentary—for two Americans, who are not citizens of Canada at all, but American citizens, to come here to the capital of Canada in order to dictate to the Government of Canada what ought to be done up on the Yukon. Why, I have listened in this debate to hon. gentlemen talking about the Yankees and the commission, telling us about their cuteness, how they would not give up anything, how they would fool our commissioners, and so on to the end of the chapter. Yet here we have the same men consorting with two Americans, pumping all the information out of them which they possibly can, and what for? For the purpose of damaging their own Government in the eyes of the world. I mean no offence to these American gentlemen, but I would believe a Canadian any day before these Americans. I say again I will stand by my own countrymen before these Americans, and I believe we ought to say to these men: If you have charges to make, go the right way about it. It seems to me a very curious thing that all these charges should have come in the one direction. It is a marvellous thing this day in Canada that all these affidavits should go to the one side of the House. I have gone out to ship after ship that has come from that district; I have gone to hotels to converse with these men; I have tried in every possible way to get an affidavit from any man who came from Dawson, declaring, under his own signature, that he is prepared to state so-and-so with regard to these officials. But not one affidavit could I get from these men. If they are honest in their desire to get these corrupt officials rooted out, root and branch, why, in the name of heaven, did they not, in some way or other, give those members supporting the Government these charges, so that they might put pressure on the Government, if necessary, in order to get at the facts of the case brought to their knowledge. But not one charge has been got. It is remarkable, it is unprecedented, that these gentlemen should come here to clamour for changes. I do not object to their doing that, but why in the name of common sense do they go to the members of the Opposition? If they wanted to be honest and fair and to act at all in the interests of that country, why did they not go like men and put their complaint right into the Government, and before the members of the Government, and say: Gentlemen, do your best for that country. But no, as if they were political partisans, as if they were allied to the party opposite, as if the party opposite could accomplish the reforms they desired, as if the party opposite had the power to do what they want, they go to them. They consult with the hon. member for Victoria and others on that side, and never come near those who are responsible for the government of the country; and anxious to do their best for that country. It is strange, unparalleled, unprecedented, and I shall stand up every time for my Canadian brethren, and I believe there is not a Canadian up there who is not as honest and upright as any American or Australian to be found in that country.

I can only say this in conclusion—that I am sorry in one way that these charges have been made, I am sorry there was any necessity for making them. But hon. gentlemen know very well that they do not need to go to Dawson to get charges against public officials, for that is part of our own common political life. Were we to believe all the stories of political partisans, how many corrupt officials have we in our service, how many members of that service have done things they should not have done, how many of them have interfered in this, that or the other thing. I hope the time is coming when both sides of this House will have confidence in the civil servants of this country, that the time will come that we shall realize we have a body of men who, when they entered the service of this country, entered free from all partisan feelings and with the noble desire to do their best for the country irrespective of which party may govern. I hope the time is coming when a purer thought will possess us, when a broader feeling will possess our hearts, and when, no matter how far Canadians are severed from one another we will have more faith in them than to listen to stories from "Nuggets" or from wandering pilgrims from the ends of the earth; that, though, we may not know these officers, the fact that they are Canadians will be enough to cause us to believe that they will not knowingly do any thing to besmirch the fair name of fair Canada, and so have confidence in them until it has been proved that they have done wrongly.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Mr. Speaker, the debate has been a long one, and I promise the House that I shall not consume very much of its time in referring to a few points that have been discussed by hon. gentlemen from various constituencies sitting on the other side of the House. I shall not consume a great part of that time in referring to what has been said by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). He has given us, in some respects, a charming mixture of poetry and essays, partly his own and partly taken from others. He has expressed his very warm approval, as we would expect him to do, of the Government which he supports. He has entered a warm defence for a gentleman upon whom, so far as I know, no attack has been made in this House. But, outside of these matters, he has contributed, I venture to submit to him, very little to the debate upon the question under consideration. The hon. gentleman began his address to the House by declaring that this Government would keep its promises, and this while the echoes of the statements of the First Minister and his colleagues and supporters had scarcely died away in the Chamber that the Government promises had been kept and that the policy which they outlined to the people had been implemented by legislation in this House. The hon. gentleman stated that one of the promises of the Government was to take a plebiscite upon prohibition; and the hon. gentleman stated, very properly, that that promise had been implemented by the Prime Minister and his colleagues. But the hon. gentleman from Burrard forgot to state that, joined to that promise was another one made definitely and distinctly on every platform where the right hon. Premier proclaimed his policy on prohibition, namely, that he would give an opportunity to the people of Canada to express their opinion, and after they had expressed their opinion, the Government would stand by that opinion, even though it cost the Liberal party power in this country. The hon. gentleman forgot to say to the House, what the House already knows, that according to the statement of the Prime Minister, a private arrangement was entered into by him and his associates in the Liberal convention of 1893, by which it was privately agreed—and the agreement was never published to the electors of Canada—that a majority of all the voters of Canada would be required before the sentiment in favour of prohibition should be formulated in a statute and prohibition granted. I am not here to enter a plea for prohibition. I think it is a very grave and serious question, one which this Parliament if it attempts to deal with it, will have difficulty in handling without interfering a great deal with the finances of the Dominion. But that is neither here or there when we come to the question as to whether the Prime Minister and his colleagues have carried out their promises. I am bound to say, and I believe the hon. member for Burrard will agree with me in the statement, there is not a temperance man in Canada who was given to understand by himself, by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), which is par excellence the representative of the prohibitionists in that Government—I say there is not a temperance man in Canada who was given to understand that his side would be required to poll a majority of the electors upon the lists. I am here too, to say, Sir, that upon an old list, such as that upon which the plebiscite was taken it would be impossible for one party, if parties were at all equally divided, to poll half the votes upon the list. The whole vote would be naturally not more than half upon such a list.

Now, just a word to the hon. gentleman as regards his advice for broader politics and the discussion of larger and greater affairs in this Chamber and against violent attacks of partisanship. It is too bad, in my opinion, that the hon. gentleman did not arrive in Parliament earlier. It is too bad he was not here to give advice to the hon. gentlemen who now sit upon the Treasury benches and their supporters, who, I fancy, will admit for themselves that, during the years and years they occupied places on this side of the Chamber they were as violently partisan as any party ever was or ever will be in Canada. I am here to say, too, that there never was an occasion during which I had the honour of a seat in this House when every possible thing that could be turned to political advantage by the right hon. gentlemen and his followers was not readily taken advantage of in order to injure the Government which I supported, and of which, later, I became a member.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) upon the tariff question gave us some splendid generalities and a lot of the same kind of philosophy which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has so eloquently commended to this House, and also a wealth of beautiful illustration. But all through this wealth of illustration and all through the glittering generalities of this philosophy there shines out the one bald, bold, bare fact—that the hon. member for Burrard is a free trade member supporting one of the strongest protectionist Governments that has ever existed in the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has discussed the question as to whether this Government is an economical Government and has denounced economical Governments as miserly and as Governments which should be banished from the sight of the people altogether. The hon. gentleman need not give any such note of warning to his friends on the Treasury benches.

They will, I venture to say, in the history of this country, never be regarded as a miserly Government, because, if we are to take their couple of short years in office as a guide, they will never economize sufficiently to bring down the wrath, the splendid Liberal wrath, of my hon. friend from Burrard upon their heads in that connection. The hon. gentleman declared that this Government had done a splendid thing in introducing legislation against combinations in trade in this country. Well, Sir, all but the hon. member for Burrard had forgotten that such legislation was introduced. I venture to say that there is scarcely a gentleman behind the Government, except the distinguished member for Burrard, who has thought of that legislation since it passed; I venture to say that through all the industries of Canada and in the business world of Canada, thoroughly was understood the desire of the Government and the aim of the Government in passing that legislation, and it is as inactive, it is as dead and as buried, as any statute that ever was passed in the Parliament of Canada during all its history. Does the hon. member for Burrard tell me that combinations do not exist in trade at the present time? If so, the hon. gentleman is supremely innocent, and at the same time—and I say it with no desire to be offensive—he places himself in a supremely ridiculous position, because, under the sight of the Ministers, under the sight of the members of Parliament, combinations do now exist. I do not say that they are always bad, but combinations do exist in very many portions of Canada, notwithstanding that statute which I have declared is a dead letter, and which the hon. gentleman himself knows to be a dead letter.

The hon. gentleman referred very properly to the difficulty of governing a country so far distant as the Yukon from the seat of Government. There is no hon. gentleman in this Chamber who does not appreciate that difficulty which the Minister and the Government had in that regard, and so far as I have heard, there has been no malicious desire to attack the Government because of those difficulties, to attack the Minister of the Interior because of those difficulties; but the desire has been to ask the Minister of the Interior to give an investigation of the charges that have been widespread in almost every portion of Canada, and which cannot but effect the fair name of the country and the success of Canadian enterprise and Canadian institutions in that new territory. Sir, I have just this remark to make with regard to those charges. First of all, we have the statement, the admirable statement from his standpoint—and I am not going to say that the speech of the Minister of the Interior was not a strong speech from his standpoint—we have the speech of the Minister of the Interior, and his whole ground from start to finish in dealing with this matter, is that the charges are not specific, and in consequence the Government is not authorized to make an investigation in a formal way such as was suggested by the hon. member for Pictou. Now, Sir, I submit to the Minister of the Interior, and I submit to his colleagues as well, that if the charges as made by the hon. member for Pictou were not specific, such cannot be said of those charges reiterated by so distinguished a member as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and by the equally distinguished member the senior member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), who spoke this afternoon upon the floor of this House. I submit in all earnestness to the Minister of the Interior that we have confidence in his statement, we must have confidence in it until we are shown that that confidence is misplaced; we accept the statement which he made in the closing part of his speech that if these charges were made definitely and specifically he would be the first man to ask and to order an investigation in a full and complete manner. I submit that I am well within the judgment of this House, and especially of the lawyers of this House, in saying that these charges as made by the hon. member for Halifax, and as made by the hon. member for Victoria, are specific, whatever may have been the charges made by the hon. member for Pictou when that hon. gentleman brought this matter into the House. Now, Sir, an elaborate defence was made by the hon. member for Burrard of some supposed attack upon Mr. Ogilvie, the Gold Commissioner. I have sat in this House during a great portion of this debate, and I have read those portions of the debate which I did not hear, and I have heard no attack upon the character of Mr. Ogilvie whatever. Hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House have the warmest feeling for Mr. Ogilvie. They know that, uncorrupted and incorruptible, he performed a good work for Canada in placing those magnificent gold fields before the sight of Canada and of the world. But to say that Mr. Ogilvie is an intrepid explorer, to say that he is intrinsically a good and honest man, is not to say that he has those legal attainments, and still more, it is not to say that he has those powers to summon witnesses necessary for an investigation of so grave and serious charges as have been made against the officials of the Department of the Interior in the Yukon territory. That was the fault found with the Minister of the Interior in connection with Mr. Ogilvie, but no attempt whatever was made on this side of the House to cast reproach upon the character or the habits of Mr. Ogilvie in any particular whatever. Some one has suggested, the hon. gentleman says, that he is a relative of the Minister of the Interior. Well, Sir, we are broad enough upon this side of the House to believe that that makes no difference whatever. He was prominent in the service of this Government before the Minister of the Interior became a member of the Government. It is not a question as to who Mr. Ogilvie is related to, but it is a question as to whether he has the legal attainments and the powers under his instructions to investigate properly and fully, as they ought to be investigated, these grave and serious charges upon the fair fame of Canada's rule in that Yukon territory. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman made a reference to the Senate, and the Speaker of the House very generously and very properly sustained the dignity of the House in asking that hon. gentleman to retract the statement which he had made, or the comparison which he had made between the Senate and dogs. Sir, I prefer to take the opinion of some of the hon. gentleman's leaders upon the Senate of this country rather than the opinion that he expressed in that reference to-night; I prefer to take the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who, in the confederation debate, expressed his pride and his pleasure that the framers of that scheme had stuck to British institutions and to British practices, and in this our legislature, the legislature of the new Dominion of Canada, had retained all those safeguards which had been thrown around legislation in the old country, which legislation had protected the rights and the liberties of British subjects through all the years.

Sir, it is necessary to say a word or so upon the criticism, or answer, of that hon. gentleman upon the question of Senate reform, which has been brought to the attention of the country by the right hon. First Minister, and to the attention of the House, by his speech, recently made in this Chamber, in which he dealt with that subject. I desire to say, that the criticisms of some of the opponents of the Senate point to the fact that the Senate is an accident in the institutions of Canada. But, first of all, perhaps I had better say that I am gravely doubtful, as a great many members of this House are gravely doubtful, and I think the vast number of the people of Canada are gravely doubtful, whether the Government are very much in earnest with regard to this proposal or not. It appears to me, Sir, like firing a great many fireworks with the pleasurable hope that it may alarm gentlemen who sit in another Chamber of this Parliament, that they may not come into collision with the majority in the House of Commons upon a Bill—perhaps I had better say, the Bill—which is promised in the Speech from the Throne which His Excellency gave to Parliament at the opening of this session. I read the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister, in answer to the leader of the Opposition, who had mentioned the late Hon. Sir George Cartier, who had been a battler for the rights of his province and for the perpetual protection of those rights, when the discussion of the confederation scheme was under way. I read the speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister, in reply to that, and I learned in that speech that, while the late Sir George Cartier did not say much upon the Senate question, the leader of the Opposition was invited to read the speech of the late Sir A. A. Dorion, who had spoken on the question; and I learned from the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister that the speech of Sir A. A. Dorion, in strength of foresight, in knowledge of what would take place, under the federal constitution as then proposed, exhibited the greatest ability and the keenest foresight and knowledge of the future of any speech that was made upon the question of the Senate during these deliberations. Feeling that I had in it a very well of information, from which I could gather knowledge of this subject, I re-read, as I had read before, the speech of Sir A. A. Dorion upon this question. I concur, of course, in all the kind things that the right hon. gentleman has said of that hon. gentleman; I concur entirely in the compliment he paid him as to the high place he occupied in public life, and as to his high place in the confidence and esteem of the people of Canada. But I am here to say, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government never made a greater mistake in his life than when he selected the speech of Sir A. A. Dorion as a basis upon which the Senate of Canada should be criticised in this debate. Now, I submit that a genuine, honest critic of the system which was about to be introduced, which was about to be carried out as the constitution of Canada, should be looked for at least among the men who had confidence in the general form of the scheme of confederation, and who criticised the details of the scheme from the standpoint of friendship, rather than from the standpoint of hostility. Let us see what Sir A. A. Dorion's position upon the Senate of Canada was, and I am here to say to-night, with Sir A. A. Dorion's speech before me, and with that the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister, that his foresight was the keenest of all in respect to what was about to take place, when the scheme of confederation was adopted—I am obliged to say, in the light of that speech—that not one single thing that was prophesied by that gentleman has ever come to pass in the history of the Canadian confederation. First of all, he was opposed to representation by population, and pictured the evils which would come from that. Next, he was opposed to confederation, from start to finish. He said in 1856: "I had set my face against it;" in 1861: "I still stood against it;" and in the confederation debate to which I have referred, this gentleman, whose judgment is said to be the best upon the scheme of the Canadian constitution, says that:

No word which I have ever written or ever said can be taken to mean that I was in favour of confederation at any stage.

He was in favour, it is true, of a union of Upper and Lower Canada in the form of confederation; but then, mark you, he was not in favour of the confederation as we have it now, but with the amplitude of power with the local legislatures, and that there should be merely delegated powers to the central Government—a sentiment which there is not a member of this House will subscribe to upon the present occasion. Then, Sir A. A. Dorion made another statement in that debate :

I am opposed to a confederation in which the control of the militia, the appointment of judges and the administration of justice will be under a central government.

Does the right hon. gentleman subscribe to that doctrine? Does he say that it was an unwise policy to have the militia under the control of the central federal Government? Does he say that it was unwise to have the appointment of judges taken out of the hands of the provinces and put into those of the stronger federal Government? Yet, with that keen foresight and knowledge of what was about to happen, he quoted Sir A. A. Dorion to us, though he was opposed to the principle of confederation under the proposed constitution. Then, he was opposed to the Intercolonial Railway. Does my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) subscribe to Sir A. A. Dorion's feelings upon that occasion? He said that the Intercolonial Railway was merely an attempt to grab by the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada large sums from the public Treasury of this country. When he had discussed the Intercolonial Railway upon that basis, he declared that this confederation scheme was one of the worst schemes ever brought before the House and that, if it should be adopted, without the sanction of the people, the country would never cease to regret it. That was the opinion of a gentleman whose opinion the right hon. Prime Minister desires to have followed, in regard to confederation, and we are asked to accept his opinions in regard to some of the details of that scheme.

How far was the hon. gentleman to whom he referred, correct in his vision of the future? He tells us, during the confederation debate, that the extension of Canada westward, so beautifully pictured by the then Richard John Cartwright, so beautifully pictured by the Hon. George Brown, and so beautifully pictured by Sir John Macdonald, was a farce, an absurd dream, that men then living would never hear of again.

Sir, it was not a farce, it was not a dream, and Mr. Dorion, I am glad to say, lived not only to see that the appointment of judges by the federal authority was a good thing, but sat here as a Minister of Justice to appoint those judges, and afterwards occupied a high and distinguished place upon the bench of his native province—lived long enough, too, to see the very last westward province enter the Canadian confederation, forming a solid dominion from sea to sea. Knowing that these were his opinions, let us see what that gentleman said with regard to the Senate of Canada, because it is his opinions given there that the right hon. the Prime Minister asks us to so seriously consider. First of all, Mr. Dorion declared in that debate that race and creed would not be respected in the selection of senators, no matter who made a statement to the contrary; and I am here to-night to ask Catholics and Protestants from the province of Quebec, and I am here to ask English-speaking members and French-speaking members, to deny if they can the statement that I make, that in all the years since that confederation was adopted, sacredly always has been regarded that convention of the constitution and the promise of the fathers of confederation, that race and creed should be respected in the selection of members to the Upper House of the Canadian Parliament. Then, Mr. Dorion says once more :

I venture to say that before a very short time has elapsed, a dead-lock will arise, and such an excitement will be created as never was created in this country before.

Sir, I now ask the members of the Government whether that excitement has arisen? I ask the Minister of Finance whether that excitement prevails? I ask the right hon. the First Minister—and I am sorry he is not here—whether he can to-night honestly say to this Chamber and to the people of Canada, that the man whose foresight and whose wonderful knowledge of events that were about to happen was correct when he said that within a very few years such excitement would be raised between the Senate and the House of Commons as never was raised in this country before.

There have been differences of opinion between the Senate and the House of Commons, and those differences have existed under Conservative rule, as they have existed under Liberal rule. They have existed upon serious questions when Conservatives were in power. There are men here who remember, only a few years ago, when Sir John Macdonald sat in his place as Prime Minister of this country, that a Bill which he regarded as the most important part of the policy of the Government of Canada was defeated by a majority in the Senate, and Sir John Macdonald accepted the position, and we heard from him no murmurings and no mutterings such as these gentlemen opposite make against the Senate that opposes them. The Senate has opposed hon. gentlemen opposite since they have been in power this time, and how? First, they had the opposition of the Senate upon the Drummond Counties Railway. Now, after all, is it not true, throwing aside all charges of dishonesty, throwing aside all charges of incorrect conduct, are we not compelled to admit, and are not the members of the Government compelled to admit, that by reason of the blocking of that first deal and the making of a better deal, at least half a million dollars was saved to the people of Canada.

Then, we had a difference between the Senate and the Government upon the Yukon matter, and the First Minister, with his hand upon his heart, has said in this Chamber, that no greater crime was ever committed against the liberties and the property of the people of this country than the defeat of that Bill by the Senate of Canada. Sir, if I were allowed to say so, I would say that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is a magnificently dramatic actor, for I am here to-night to state that the Government of Canada did not have exceeding grief at the defeat of that Bill, and I am here to say that whatever may be their grief, still less is the grief of hon. gentlemen behind them. When that Bill went to the Senate of Canada the majority of that body was divided between two loves; first, their love for the Conservative party of Canada, and next their love for the interests of Canada. I am here to-night to say that the Senate stood by the interests of Canada; I am here to say that they committed no crime against the country, and I am here to say still further that the Senate did the worst possible thing for the Conservative party of Canada, because the Conservative party would ask no better thing upon which to go to the electors than the accomplishment of that Yukon policy of the Liberal Government. Well, the Liberals were in power between 1873 and 1878, and the Senate was in conflict with them then. They were in conflict with them upon the Nanaimo Railway scheme, and is there a gentleman in this House from British Columbia who will stand up now and say that the Senate were not right on that occasion. The Senate was also in conflict with the Liberal Government on the Bill which they passed to make an exception of Prince Edward Island. While that Government accepted for the Dominion elections the franchises of all the provinces as that upon which the members were elected to the legislative assemblies, in the case of the province of Prince Edward Island—for a purpose best known to themselves—they passed an Act in this House declaring that in that province the franchise to be adopted in the election of Dominion members should be the franchise used in the election of members to the legislative council, and the Senate of Canada rejected that Bill, and they properly rejected it.

The Senate rejected another Bill in those days; they rejected the Bill introduced by Mr. Cameron, the late hon. member for Huron. There was a township of very strong Reform proclivities which had already done its service in the general elections in another constituency, and this was a Bill which removed that township into the riding of Mr. Cameron where a by-election was about to take place, in order that this strong Liberal township might again do its duty for the Liberal party. That Bill was known as the Tucker-Smith Bill, and the Senate of Canada rejected it, and properly rejected it. The Senate of Canada was right. There was an appeal to the people—an appeal upon these questions as well as upon other questions which had been in discussion between the two parties—and when the Senate of Canada and the Liberal governing power of Canada stood before the electors, the country declared by a large majority, that the Liberal Government was wrong, and that the Senate was right. But let us apply Mr. Dorrion's prediction, that a deadlock and such excitement as the country has never seen will ensue; let us apply that prediction to the present time. Where is the excitement? It is around the Council Chamber in this country. It is in the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite; it has filtered to some of the local legislatures by order of the master of the ship; it has gone out to some of the Liberal associations, by reason of the good things that are in view; but I submit to hon. gentlemen in this House and to the Government especially, that no real excitement against the Senate exists to-day in Canada. In his address the other night, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) declared that 95 per cent of the electors of his province were against that second chamber. I admit the ability of the Minister of Public Works; I admire his pluck in climbing to that high and commanding position which he occupies among his people in the province of Quebec; but in the midst of all that admiration, I may be permitted to question whether, upon the floor of this House he is entitled to speak for 95 per cent of the people of the province of Quebec. If he is, it is remarkable that the people of the province of Quebec do not pursue that policy nearer home, when it is within the bounds of their power, by destroying the Legislative Council which exists in that province?

Well, Sir, from time to time we have heard certain objections to the Senate. In 1875 the present Minister of Justice moved a resolution that in the opinion of this House the Senate should be reformed; and what was the opinion expressed by one of the fathers of confederation upon that resolution in the great Liberal organ of this country? The "Globe" of March 30th, 1875—and I commend this to the members of the Government—says:

His act is midsummer madness, and some of our representatives ought to be warned against constitution mongering.

Resolutions have from time to time been passed in some of our provincial legislatures on this subject. In 1894, I think, a resolution was passed in the Legislature of Manitoba, and I want to show you where that resolution pointed. It did not point in the direction of the scheme which is to be submitted by the Prime Minister of this country. It pointed against life membership and against the system of appointing senators.

In 1888 the Legislature of Ontario passed a resolution which did not point in the direction which has been discovered by the Prime Minister, a direction which no man ever discovered or thought of before; but it made the suggestion that one-half of the senators should be elected by the Legislatures of the various provinces. Now, Sir, what is the scheme of the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government? In the campaign songs this was sung:

Let every Liberal be brave,
And true to duty's call:
The useless Senate we will send
For ever to the wall.

Is the right hon. gentleman sending the Senate for ever to the wall? I am prepared, Sir, to show that if his scheme is carried by the Imperial Parliament, he will be for ever sending the Senate of Canada to the wall. What was the objection to the Senate made on the platform by hon. gentlemen? The objection was to the cost. What is this proposal? This proposal is to retain the cost, but to abolish the power. This scheme of the right hon. gentleman continues the cost of the Senate, and still give the patronage of Senatorial appointments to the Government of Canada, but clips the powers of the Senate, so that it might as well be abolished. Sir, one of the gentlemen on the other side of the House made this statement:

I do not feel like supporting a change such as is proposed, unless it is a step in the total abolition and destruction of that body.

The hon. gentleman need not worry or trouble himself; for once this scheme is adopted there never will be any trouble about the Senate expressing its opinions or exercising its powers, because powers it will have none, as I shall be able to show. What is the scheme? The scheme is that if there is a dispute between the two Houses upon a Bill, there shall be a joint vote of the two Houses; and if the Senate is defeated on that joint vote, the Senate must give up its contention, and the contention of this House must prevail. Well, Sir, is the opposite to be true? If the Senate is defeated and must give up its position, what about the House of Commons being defeated and giving up its position? Will the hon. gentlemen, if defeated by a combined vote of the House of Commons and the Senate, resign their positions or appeal to the country? "Not at all," says Mr. Mills in an interview; "that would be an entirely different thing." In other words, that would be a defeat of the Liberal Government, which these gentlemen would not care to have brought about. Their schemes is to clip the wings of the Senate and destroy its power; but when the Senate is too strong for them, they will not permit the Senate to retaliate on them in the same way. Well, Sir, why have we not the scheme which the Minister of Justice brought forward a few years ago for the appointment of senators by provincial legislatures? I fancy that has been discussed, and how it would operate. Ah, they say, there is the province of Manitoba; give its legislature power to elect senators, and there is the grave and impending danger that Hugh John Macdonald may be in control of the province of Manitoba very shortly. In the province of British Columbia, a coalition Government exists, with the Hon. Joseph Martin as the leader of the Liberal contingent; and fancy the Minister of the Interior entrusting the appointment of senators to him. There is the North-west Territories, but there is a government there elected in spite of the opposition of this Government. In the province of New-Brunswick there is a coalition Government. After all the boasting of the hon. gentlemen opposite of the defeat of the Conservative party in that province, in the recent campaign, I am told that there is a House there supporting the coalition government, the members of which House, quite a majority of them are members of the Conservative party of this country. Then, Sir, in the province of Ontario there is a Liberal Government which from day to day does not know what may happen, and which dreads the voice of the people of the province. What is the only example to which the right hon. Prime Minister has gone for a defence of this proposition for a joint vote? He goes to the new constitution adopted by the Australian Confederation, where he says they are going to have a joint vote of the two Houses. It is quite true that under Clause 57 of the Australian constitution, provision is made for a joint vote of the two Houses; but the positions are entirely different. In Australia the second chamber is elected directly by the people; and not only that, but it is arranged in that constitution that when there is a difference between the popular assembly and the second chamber, there shall be an appeal to the people; and if after that appeal to the people, the difference still exists between the two Houses, there shall then be a joint vote of the two Houses, and a decision on the question. So that hon. gentlemen will see that there is no comparison at all to be made between the proposal of the right hon. gentleman and the clause in the Australian constitution to which I have referred.

Well, Sir, I can fancy hon. gentlemen going to the Imperial Parliament and asking for this change to be made. What will their case be in England? It will be this: We made arrangements at confederation; we entered into a solemn compact at confederation, and we now desire to break that compact and those arrangements. It was said that race and creed would be regarded in the selection of senators, and we are bound to admit that that was done.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Some one says "no," but I do not think that he voices the opinion of hon. members on that side when he makes that statement. Our opponents, they will say, were in power for 26 years out of the 32, and they have placed their adherents and supporters in the second Chamber, and therefore we want it changed. I submit that that would not be a very strong argument upon which to go to the Imperial House, but would rather be a condemnation of these hon. gentlemen who, during 32 years, have only been able to secure the confidence of the electors of this country for six years of that time. They will say to the Imperial House: The Senate opposed us when we were in power from 1873 to 1878, and the Imperial House will ask them: What was the result when you appealed to the country? And they will then have to reply that the result was unfavourable to Liberal contentions. And when they say there is a difference now, if I judge the sentiment rightly of those men who gave us the constitution of Canada, the Imperial statesman will say to these gentlemen: You had better wait and see what the people say on this question before you come and ask us to decide so important a question in the political life and history of your country.

Now, I come to speak, for a moment or so, upon a matter which was raised by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and by other hon. gentlemen in this House. They said that the Government made a pledge to abolish the Franchise Act and that they have carried that pledge out. Sir, we admit they have, we know that they have. But I cannot congratulate them upon the result of their work, and I venture to say that these hon. gentlemen do not feel like congratulating themselves. For if ever there was a Franchise Act placed upon the Statute-book of Canada regarding which the people do not know where they are at, it is the Franchise Act of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why is there not an election in the city of Winnipeg to fill the vacancy caused by the lamented death of our late colleague, Mr. Jameson? Winnipeg is an important city in the life of this country, and why has not this vacancy been filled? Because under the blundering Franchise Act of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is impossible to hold an election there. Sir, I submit that under the Franchise Act, which was placed upon the Statute-book of this country by the Conservative party, whatever its faults may have been, there never was a time when an election could not have been held to fill a vacancy in any constituency. We are told that there has been some discussion as to a general election. Hon. gentlemen who sit in the Cabinet will know whether that is true and whether it was discovered that no election could be held because of that wonderful Franchise Act which hon. gentlemen to-night have taken the pains to claim credit for having placed on the Statute-book. We are told by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), and in the Speech from the Throne—and it is the only measure which has been promised in that speech—that a redistribution Bill—not a gerrymander, mind you, but a fair-minded Distribution Bill, which any one can accept and which any one can favour—will be submitted to the House this session. Hon. gentlemen opposite want us to accept in advance the conclusion that it will be a fair-minded, generous, impartial Bill. Sir, we have seen these hon. gentleman at work before. We saw what they did in the Tucker-Smith Bill and what they did in the province of Ontario. And I am here to say to-night that right in the midst of a discussion on the best contrived political gerrymander that was ever placed upon the Statute-book of any province or of the Dominion, we had the members of a Liberal government declaring that it was an honest, fair-minded, impartial measure, so I submit that we ought to take the statements and confessions of hon. gentlemen opposite with a very large grain of salt indeed. And what do we find? We find it said in the press of British Columbia that the hon. Minister of Justice, Mr. Mills, has been addressing circulars to Liberal associations in the province of British Columbia. What for? Is it because he has not quite all the data upon which to go? What data, pray? The boundaries of the constituents? These are contained in a very excellent atlas prepared at the expense of this country. The population, do you say? This is to be found in the census and in this atlas as well. What other data then is required? I am afraid, Sir, that it may be political data; and if it is political data, I respectfully submit to this House that the sources from which it is required will be sufficiently biased to prevent, if it is acted upon, as fair-minded and impartial a measure being submitted such as we should like to see on this side of the House.

Now, I come to deal for a moment or so, with some of the contentions which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite regarding their expenditure. I am not going to criticise the size of their expenditure. I said in this House years ago, as I have said always upon the platform, that as this country grows, its expenditure is bound to increase, though I never dreamed it was going to increase, as it has recently under hon. gentlemen opposite. But I am here to say this, that when hon. gentlemen opposite now say that they are keeping the expenditure within the closest possible bounds, they are declaring in the strongest possible tone that they were either saying what they did not mean, or talking about what they did not know when they said that the expenditure under the Liberal-Conservative regime was exceedingly too large and ought to be reduced. Why, I need not repeat the story. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Somerville), all of whom did splendid, vigorous work for their party, used to shed tears as big as marbles over the wasteful extravagance of the Conservative Government of this country.

An hon. MEMBER. Crocodile tears.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, I am not going to say they were crocodile tears, because that would be imputing dishonest motives, which I do not desire to do; but if they were not crocodile tears, they belong to the same general family and answer practically the same purpose. But what are we told by these hon. gentlemen? They ask us: What are you finding fault with our expenditure for? We are deepening the canals of this country and we want you to understand that. And the naïveté and the innocence of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was admirable and beautiful to behold when he stood up in this House, the other night, and said to us: We are deepening the canals of this country, and I want you to say whether you are opposed to it or not. Bless his innocent heart, the canals of this country were being deepened and completed long before he, in his wildest dreams, ever thought of being Minister of Public Works. What are the facts? The Sault Ste. Marie Canal was completed, the Welland Canal was completed, and three-quarters of the St. Lawrence canals were completed, and the Minister of Railways and Canals in that Administration (Mr. Haggart) tells me that contracts were let for nearly all the balance when the Conservative Administration went out of power in 1896. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite say to us: We have evolved a new policy from the mass of corruption and inability to deal with public questions which you exhibited; we are deepening the canals of this country. The Minister says: "Would you stop this work and turn our trade over to Boston and New York?" No! Nor to this side of the House does there belong a gentleman who once declared at an American banquet and to Americans, "Our policy, the Liberal policy, will give you the trade of half a continent." Not only did hon. gentlemen opposite find a good deal of fault with the expenditures of money in connection with the canals, but they opposed in toto the building of some of the most important links in that canal system. I happened to have a seat in this House in 1887, and I remember when that most important link was proposed by the present leader of the Opposition, I mean the Sault Canal, which gave us a waterway independent of the United States, as we had a railway independent of the United States, the completion of which work enabled us to snap our fingers later when the threat of non-intercourse was held out, and I remember hearing the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), the hon. member for North Norfolk

Mr. MONTAGUE.

(Mr. Charlton), the present Judge Lister, then a member of this House, declaring that this was useless expenditure. And I have lived, though still a young man, to see these hon. gentlemen base their pride of Government upon the fact that we have a magnificent canal system, and that toward the conclusion of the work they have been permitted to do something for the completion of the system. What is the speech of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in answer to all these charges. He says: We have received a deputation asking for millions here, we have received a deputation asking for millions there; we have had this scheme laid before us and we have had that scheme laid before us. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen will they oppose them. We are not here making the financial policy of this country; hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for that; it is for them to say what expenditures it is wise to make. But I am here to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the warning issued by the Toronto "Sun," and published commendably in his newspaper by a member on the other side of the House is a warning that the members of this Government ought to take to themselves, and especially ought the Minister of Public Works to do so:

The promoters of the schemes are in many instances rich and wealthy men, with ample resources at their command, but are their own capital and resources to be put into these profitable enterprises? Not for a moment is such a thing to be thought of. The country must furnish the money required for these schemes. And so it comes to pass that the air is filled with clamorous demands for grants from the Treasury and as brazen-faced a force of buccaneers as ever pillaged a country is now moving on Ottawa. Sir Wilfrid Laurier will have to fight a harder battle than did Alexander Mackenzie if he keeps the Treasury intact.

Sir, that is by an independent writer in the press and appears in the Toronto "Sun," and is copied commendably by the member who sits on the back benches among hon. gentlemen opposite and who publishes the Liberal organ in the city of Winnipeg. I submit that it is no wonder, in view of these schemes and in view of the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works that the hon. member for North Norfolk not later than last session stood up in his place and said in effect: I confess I stand somewhat appalled by the magnitude of the increases that have taken place.

Well, Sir, we recently had a very pleasant visit from the Minister of Finance to the city of Toronto. We are delighted to have him go to Toronto, delighted to have him go to the various provinces of this Dominion. The oftener he goes and the further he goes, the surer will he be that he was wrong in a certain policy that he advocated in the province of Nova Scotia by the sea. We had that hon. gentleman discussing financial questions. And what was the boast he made? Amidst the cheers of the Young Liberals who treated him well, and I am glad they did, he used the words upon the postage stamps of this country, transforming them for his own purpose, and declared: We are going to give the people of this country a larger surplus than has been.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Vaster.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The word is a little more comprehensive, and I accept the correction with great pleasure. How does he do it? We do not forget the debate of last session when these gentlemen brought down their Estimates showing items which, from time immemorial had been charged to consolidated revenue, now charged to capital account. Thousands upon thousands, and thousands upon thousands of dollars covering items the like of which had never been charged to capital account before, by a stroke of the pen had been turned over to capital account column in order to relieve the consolidated revenue account, and the hon. gentleman as result has "a vaster surplus than has been." We told the hon. gentleman at that time, that, for all time he was destroying the figures of the public accounts for purposes of comparison. And he told us then: Nobody would take advantage of a thing like that. He forgot, and unintentionally I am sure, he declared upon the increased capital charges and declared consolidated revenue charges, that he had a vaster surplus than had been in the Dominion of Canada. What more did he do? In order to strengthen his position a little more he dragged in what he called the Supplementary Estimates of the late Government of 1896. And then, to show himself to be eminently fair he made a certain reduction. All over the country these Supplementary Estimates have been talked about. I want to say to-night that the Conservative Government of 1896, and I am speaking in the hearing of the leader of that Government (Sir Charles Tupper) never for one moment considered a supplementary estimate around the Council Board of the Government of Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I make that statement. There were a good many men around that board, and I fancy that every one of them will bear me out. I will tell hon. gentlemen what we did do. The Minister of Public Works in that Administration had various applications from different portions of the country for the expenditure of public money.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And I think that in that regard hon. gentlemen opposite have had no reason to feel slighted. It does not need any particular approval for that statement from any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. The Minister of Public Works of that day made this statement publicly, and if he were permitted he would make it again to-day, that he made a list of every one of these requests, in order that they might be considered by his colleagues, but made no recommendation with regard to a single one. That is the list which the Finance Minister of Canada has declared to the Young Liberals of Toronto was the Supplementary Estimates of the Conservative Government in 1896.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did I not give the reasons.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend says he gave the reasons. I understand, that he read a letter from the present leader of the Opposition, in which he stated to some gentleman in the country, that he sent him a copy of the Estimates, or something of that kind, and that the expenditure he asked for was in that copy. I do not know what the present leader of the Opposition had in view with regard to that particular item; the Minister of Public Works may have decided that that item was an item which should be passed; but I am here to say, that those Supplementary Estimates were never considered in Council, that not a single item, so far as I ever remember or know about, was considered by Council, and, consequently, they have no right to pronounce them the Supplementary Estimates of the Conservative Government for 1896.

Well, Sir, I want now to speak a word or two upon another point. The Speech from the Throne is an exceedingly peculiar Speech; it is the most peculiar Speech that has ever been made, I think, from the Throne in this country. I analysed that Speech for a few moments. It contains five lines of the usual reference to the Estimates, it contains five lines of the usual expression of the pleasure of His Excellency in meeting the members of Parliament; it contains seven lines of promised legislation for the benefit of the people of Canada, and it contains sixty-seven lines of congratulation to hon. gentlemen opposite for the manner in which they have created and built up this great Dominion of Canada. The address of the Prime Minister was along the same line: about five lines of promises of what he was going to do; about seventy-five lines, or in that proportion, of the grand things that he and his smiling colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, had done for the Dominion of Canada. Among some of the things which he claimed credit for, he said: We have brought about a splendid system of cold storage for Canada. Well, Sir, the Prime Minister does not seem to keep a very good record of agricultural matters. A few months ago, the Department of Agriculture, by arrangement with the Department of Agriculture of the United States, removed the quarantine between the two countries, as regards the removal backwards and forwards of cattle, and immediately the Prime Minister rushed off into a by-election, and declared that they had obtained free trade in cattle between the United States and Canada. Now, Sir, notwithstanding the fact that every member in this House who has kept a record of the Agricultural Department, knows that the Conservative party introduced the cold storage, we have seen the right hon. the First Minister standing up in his place and bravely saying to the farmers of Canada, in answer to the challenge of the leader of the Opposition: We have brought about the system of cold storage for Canada. Now, Sir, I am here to-night to say, that Canada owes a debt of gratitude to Professor Robertson. Professor Robertson is one of the most valuable employees that Canada has ever had. Professor Robertson, years ago, discussed this matter before the Committee on Agriculture, and I see before me members from the other side of the House who took an interest in that question of cold storage, and discussed it in the Agricultural Committee; and after it was discussed before the committee, it was adopted by the Department of Agriculture. The next thing we shall hear will be the Government of Canada declaring that they started the dairy industry in this country. I am sure that I can appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to say that we bad Tories did something for the dairy industry of Canada. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries nods his head, as I knew he would, for I have the figures under my hand, showing that, under the guidance of the Department of Agriculture in this country, first, under Sir John Carling, next, under Mr. Angers, next, under Mr. Ouimet, acting in his place, and then under myself, this is what was done in the little province from which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries comes. In 1892, there was one dairy station in Prince Edward Island. That was built by some people at New Perth, and the Government of Canada loaned them the machinery. In 1893, Mr. Robertson, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, took hold of the promotion of the dairy interests in the province of Prince Edward Island, at the request of our friends from that province, and at the end of the year we had eleven dairy stations managed by the Dominion Agricultural Commissioner. In 1894, we had 16 cheese factories and 2 creameries; in 1895, we had 28 cheese factories and 2 creameries; and the province, which in 1892 had not exported a single pound of cheese, was able, as the result of our efforts in that province, to send out to the markets of the world no less than $50,000 worth of the best cheese that was ever sent from the shores of Canada. Following these experiments in dairying work, came the cold storage. We made arrangements for cold storage in 1895, when that system began. We had cold storage arrangements on the main lines running into Montreal on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, the people paying the ordinary freight and we bearing the expense of cold storage. We had arrangements made with the Montreal Freezing and Cold Storage Company for chilling products at the port of Montreal; we had refrigerator departments in steamships running from Montreal to Avonmouth, Liverpool and Glasgow. In 1896 my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance, for me, as Minister, and arranged by me, made a contract, signed in my absence by himself, for increased cold storage facilities in 1896, under which it was provided that butter should be carried across the continent for ten shillings per ton, in addition to the ordinary freight, and that cheese should be carried for five shillings, and we made arrangements in that year for three steamships to be fitted up with 2,000 cubic feet of cold storage space in each. But then we were only beginning; we were only laying broad and deep the foundations of our policy. In 1894, only 32,000 packages of butter went from Montreal. In 1895, our cold storage began to have its effect, and there were 69,664 packages exported, and in 1896, from the port of Montreal, no less than 157,321 packages of butter went in cold storage across the water to Great Britain; or in three years, under the late Government, there was an increase of 500 per cent in shipments of butter from the port of Montreal. Extension was our policy in every direction, and we had these two things closely connected, namely, a fast steamship line and the cold storage arrangements. Sir, where is our fast steamship line to-day? Less than three years ago a contract was signed and arrangements were made with the most responsible parties, by which, giving them $750,000 a year as a bonus, they should put on a first-class fast line of steamships between this country and Great Britain, with cold storage facilities. Hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, and what is the result? It was too costly; they did better, they said; they had a contract arranged with Petersen & Tate, and I am told that Petersen & Tate never had the financial strength to carry this thing through. What did the right hon. Prime Minister say in 1897? On the 13th of April, the Prime Minister said this, speaking from his place in this House:

A strong board has been organized; the capital has been underwritten. We have reason to believe that the vessels will be under construction by July 1st, 1897.

July 1st, 1897, has gone; July 1st, 1898, has gone; July 1st, 1899, has nearly come, and we have the right hon. gentleman speaking in his place in this House only a few days ago, making this statement, and I submit it to the hon. gentlemen who think that there is something in the fast line policy of the Government:

We intend to take it up at sometime, sooner or later, and rather sooner than later.

Sooner than later! I do not see my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) present. We do not know whether he is upon this side of the ocean, or whether he is upon the other side. But I submit, Sir, that it is cruel to have his pet scheme of bottle-necked slips bottled up in a heartless statement such as that made by the right hon. Prime Minister of this country.

Now, just for a moment, a word or two further, and then I shall be done, in regard to a statement which was made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), whose candour was admired, as was the beauty of his English and the splendid nature of his diction when he spoke to this House. I must express my pleasure at listening to a Frenchman delivering a speech in faultless English in the House of Commons as that hon. gentleman did only a few days ago. But while I admired the beauty of his diction I did not admire the cruel and heartless stab that he gave to the Government when he said, in drawing a picture of the anxiety and terror and fear that filled the minds of Canadian business men, between that eventful 23rd of June, 1896, and the day when they brought down their trade policy, he said, Sir, that when their policy came down the people of Canada "breathed a deep and happy inspiration of hope and relief." A deep and happy inspiration of hope and relief! The feeling that ran through from man to man and town to town and province to province, was that in the Parliament of Canada no truer words were ever spoken of the feelings of Canadians when that policy came down, under the directing hand of the hon. Minister of Finance. In English what do they mean? They mean that there was a happiness widespread and universal when it was known that hon. gentlemen had refused to do what they said they would do. Robbed of the beautiful diction of the hon. member for Labelle this was his statement in plain, cold, ordinary English words. Well, Sir, the hon. member for Labelle, I fancy, said more than he intended to say. "He builded better than he knew." I fancy that he went just a little further in his condemnation of hon. gentlemen than he had intended to do, and I will tell you what the hon. gentleman did. He gave a reason for the prosperity of the present, and he gave a reason, and a true reason, for the retardment of prosperity in the past. During eighteen years we had the hon. gentlemen, then on this side of the House, attempting to destroy the fabric of industrial protection, and I am here to say that the Canadian people never will know how much the progress of Canada was retarded, how many industries were kept out of this country, how many millions of dollars were refused to be invested by reason of the fact that these hon. gentlemen might possibly some day get into power and carry out their promises. So I say that the hon. gentleman builded better than he knew, and said more than he intended to say, when he declared that from the Atlantic to the Pacific, when it was known that these hon. gentlemen had refused to carry out their promises, there was an inspiration of relief and hope, breathed by the people. Sir, we are glad that that hon. gentleman was enabled to say that. There is not a member on this side of the House who regrets that hon. gentlemen went back upon their promises. We know that if they had kept them it would have meant immediate defeat for them and victory for us, and that the destruction of that policy would have set the country away back in the list of nations, but for the sake of the country hon. gentlemen sitting upon this side of the House are glad that they refused to carry out their promises, and I am here to say, still further, that if they have made a mistake in taking down a duty where they ought not to have taken it down, we will support them in putting it up again; we will support them in closing every hole and putting up every fence rail that has fallen, if it is necessary, for the protection of Canadian industries and for the upbuilding of the industrial life of the country. Well, Sir, I may tell my hon. friend for Labelle that there was another deep inspiration of relief and hope that filled the hearts of the people of this country and it was when these hon. gentlemen came back from Washington without making a treaty destructive of the interests of Canadian confederation. During all the time they were at Washington there was a fear, a deepening and strengthening fear, that the old man of the sea who had ridden on their backs in the election campaign and whose cry for the destruction of protection rang throughout the country might cling to some of his delusions as the measure of the privileges to be conceded and go in for a policy that might be destructive of Canadian interests. There was a deep inspiration of relief and hope when they came back from Washington without making such a treaty as the one to which I have referred. It is natural, Sir, that there should be some wriggling on this question, but let us drop it. The fact is that hon. gentlemen opposite promised to destroy protection; there is no use in denying that. The fact is that they have retained protection and that that is the policy of the party at the present day. It is true that we have had the spectacle of the right hon. Prime Minister declaring that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity came from this side of the House and from the Conservative party in this country. There never was a more ridiculous statement made in Parliament or in the politics of Canada, except, perhaps, it be the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior, which justifies his pronouncement at Perth that the trade question had become a dead question, because he said the Conservative party had gone over to them and their contention on that question. And where is the Goliath who once declared that come what might, so long as it should be necessary to labour, he, for one, would nail his colours to the mast and would stand for ever for unrestricted reciprocity? Meekly he comes down now to the House of Commons of Canada and says: After all—and I am quoting from the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—after all there is not nearly so much feeling in this country for reciprocity as there was twelve years ago. But that twelve years was an unfortunate slip, because years ago they were not advocating reciprocity. Twelve years ago they were under the leadership of Mr. Blake, who sent that celebrated circular to the manufacturers: that they need not be afraid, that there was a consonance between himself and the hon. member for South Oxford, and that free trade was absolutely impossible in Canada. But after that, and up to the very verge of the election we had the Minister of Trade and Commerce advocating the destruction of protection, and advocating the policy of reciprocity with the United States as the only thing which would preserve the industrial life in Canada.

We have had some variety of opinions from these gentlemen opposite. We have had Mr. Bourassa declare that he was for moderate protection, and I was amused to hear how beautifully the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) said "hear, hear," to that, and smiled all over. It was a revelation worth travelling across this continent to see the genial smile of that gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), who declared in 1894 that the next fight in this country would be between free trade and protection, and he had nailed his colours to the mast and would stand by free trade. Then we had the congratulations of the leader of the Government to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who had announced that he was a moderate protectionist, while we still heard in this Chamber the echoes of the Prime Minister when he sat in Opposition, that his labours would be for ever, if necessary, to uproot the last vestige of protection. And all this time the Goliath from the Trade and Commerce Department was sitting, vainly endeavouring to read a book—it looked to me like Dean Swift's description of the Academy at Legado, where the professor taught his pupils to extract sunbeams from cucumbers—and the hon. gentleman who is Minister of Trade and Commerce seemed to be endeavouring to extract from the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa), which to him was a cold cucumber of disappointment, some of the sunbeams of satisfaction which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Prime Minister seemed to enjoy. Then, we had the mover of the Address declare that there were some men who still hugged their delusion as to the value of reciprocity with the United States, and we had our warrior friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), with happiness and with smiles upon his face, who, with the ability for which he is well known, and with his splendid voice and his splendid strength went from end to end of this Dominion, from the Atlantic coast upon the east to the Pacific coast on the west, telling how gloriously he was in favour of free trade. But what did he tell us last night? He said: After all we have got the platform; we have not got free trade, but we have the platform the Liberals laid down in 1894. Glorious possession! The hope of their ever getting free trade is gone, but the platform remains, and tells what the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) spoke upon, and what he advocated in the various provinces of confederation. But still there is hope, for the hon. member (Mr. Fraser) said: We are coming to it even at a snail's pace—and that satisfied him. The gentleman who took the pains to travel clear to British Columbia to help hoist the protectionist Government, meekly smiles his approval, that at a snail's pace we are coming to it. And a snail's pace it is. The duty was about 30 per cent when the Conservatives went out of office; in three years hon. gentlemen opposite have reduced it by one-half of 1 per cent. I figure out that that snail's pace will take 120 years to bring us free trade. Long before that my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) and myself will be resting where the wicked cease from troubling, where the pursuit of free trade and protection and the desire for public office and emolument do not exist; and where the weary will be for ever at rest.

Another thing, Sir, we have had boasts upon the other side of the House that there is prosperity. I am glad to be able to say that there is prosperity, and my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) to-day, instead of expressing wonder that there was prosperity, happily put it when he said: the wonder would be if there was not prosperity. We are in the midst of prosperity upon every side. Surrounding countries are prosperous, and why should not Canada be prosperous? There was a time, Sir, when these conditions were reversed. The mover of the Address drew a beautiful picture of the United States before this Government came in, as a ship in the stream of progress, going with fearful force down that stream, while Canada was a little barque lying in the eddies, instead of being carried by the current swiftly and forcibly. That simile tells of another condition and of another time. In 1893, in the United States of America, her industries, her financial life, her commerce, were in the stream of destruction, so to speak. And during that year Canada stood prosperous and happy, with her financial institutions solid, with her people prosperous. The reason she did stand so was told by the financial journals of the great republic to the south, and it was that Canada had protected her interests, and stood by herself, looking after her trade and her people. In that direful year for other countries, where would Canada have been if we had followed the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and of the Prime Minister of this Government, and joined hands with the people of the United States, whose ship of commerce and prosperity was being dashed mercilessly against the rocks of destruction, while Canada's barque of prosperity was quietly moving along the course which her statesmen had charted out for her.

Well, Sir, what have hon. gentlemen opposite done for prosperity? I ask the Minister of Marine what have they done to give Canada prosperity? Is it the increase of our trade with the United States—imports instead of exports? Is it the decrease of a half per cent in the tariff that has given us our great prosperity? Is it because we have increased expenditure? Is it because we have gold discoveries in the Yukon—these discoveries are not the results of the Government's action. The mover of the Address said they were an accident, but they were not an accident even. They are the result of the policy of the Conservative Government in establishing a Geological Survey, which sent men out to discover these rich mineral-bearing areas within the borders of our land.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that many a time we were under fire by reason of the expenditures we were making in connection with that same geological survey. Now, I am here to say, as was said by the hon. member for Victoria today, that the only thing the Government have done to bring about prosperity in this country is their wise refusal to undo what the Conservative party did while in power; and I want to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to stand up now, if he will, in the face of Parliament, and say that one-half of that prosperity would be existing if we had free trade as the hon. gentleman advocated it before the election of 1896. The hon. member for Labelle, with that candour which he exhibited in this House, agrees with me entirely; for he says that since the policy of the Liberals has been established, that is, the policy of adopting our policy, there has been full confidence that whatever party may be in power, the trade and industries of this country are safe; and I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that there never before was a time in our history, from 1878 to 1896, when the people of this country did feel that their trade and their industries were safe, no matter which party was in power.

Now, Sir, I have detained the House much longer than I expected or intended to do. I do not intend to detain it a moment longer. I am sorry I have spoken thus long, and I trust that hon. gentlemen will pardon me for taking up so much of their time. The interest of the subject, however, and the broad field which the expression of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite presented must be taken as my excuse.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent, Ont.) Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every member of the House will be pleased with the address which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montagu), it is so different from the addresses of other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House to which we have been compelled to listen. The hon. gentleman has not used such strong language as was indulged in by other hon. gentlemen on that side. His adjectives have been very moderate. He has confined himself to the question he undertook to discuss; and, although his views on these questions do not commend themselves to my judgment, yet I think no fault can be found with the manner in which he has discussed them. He has, of course, travelled over a good deal of ground that has been travelled over by other gentlemen in the last few weeks. We have had the changes rung on the old cry that we have not carried out our pledges. We have been told that we promised a reduction in the expenditure of this country, and that we have increased the expenditure. First, let me call attention to the fact that we denounced the extravagant expenditure of the Conservative Government. We not only did that, but we proved to the satisfaction of the people of this country and the members of this House that it was a most extravagant and corrupt administration. We did not deal in generalities, as hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing. For instance, we pointed to the Curran Bridge in Montreal, where hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money was stolen right under the eyes of the Minister of Railways. We pointed to the scandals at Quebec, where over $1,000,000 of the people's money was wasted. We pointed to the Tay Canal, where $500,000 was wasted, with a return of only $126 a year of revenue. We pointed to the scandals in connection with the St. Charles Rapids, the Galops Rapids, and the Langevin Block in the city of Ottawa, where $450,000 of the people's money was stolen. We pointed to all these things, and said: This Government is unworthy of the confidence of the people of this country; they are not conducting the affairs of the country as they should be conducted, and the amounts they are spending are being stolen and wasted, instead of being expended in the interest of the country." I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to point to one single expenditure in the interest of the people of this country which the Liberal party ever opposed or censured. We pointed to these cases in which the public money was being wasted in hundreds of thousands of dollars, and we said that it was an extravagant Government, and that the expenditure was too large. In the case of the Langevin Block, a contract was let for the work, and it should have been completed for $450,000, but over $800,000 was wasted on that work. The Curran Bridge in Montreal, within a few hours railway ride from Ottawa, and with telegraph and telephone connection, cost this country several hundred thousand dollars more than it should have cost. Therefore, I think we were justified in making the assertion that the late Government was spending too much money. Now, the charge has been made that this Government is spending too much money; but hon. gentlemen have not been able to point to one single case in which fraud or corruption has taken place under this Government. As the hon. member for Haldimand very properly said, as the country grows and increases in population, and the resources of the country are developed, the expenditure will naturally go up, and we must continue to expend larger sums of money than we have been expending in the past; but what the people demand is that every single dollar of that money shall be expended justly and honestly, and in the public interest. They do not find fault with the Government for constructing a public work if that work is required and is going to benefit the people. The people of the Dominion demand that the Government shall be up to the times. So I say that in all the public undertakings of this Government, in the construction of public works which the interest of Canada requires to be constructed, although the money expended may be large, if it is spent wisely and in such a way that it will return four-fold to the people, they will approve of the expenditure.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), in his closing remarks, wanted to know, if in one single thing this Government had done anything to increase the prosperity of the people of Canada. Well, I think I will be able to show that their whole administration, from the very time they took possession of the Government benches until this day, has been one that will commend itself to the people, that has restored confidence to the people of this country, that has given them life and encouragement, and has had the effect of expanding the imports and trade of this country as they never were expanded before. Why, the very moment this Government took office, the people knew that we had business men at the head of business departments; they knew that order would be restored where chaos reigned before. They knew that the Administration was one which would conduct the different departments of Government in the best interests of the country, which would give encouragement to the people; and then, as time rolled on, and the acts of the Administration were brought to public view, this confidence increased to an extent hitherto unknown.

The very first measure which the Government brought down commended itself to the people of this country; it commended itself to them in such a way that their opponents, although they discussed and tried to make light of it, never dared to move a motion of want of confidence in the Government. I refer to the settlement of the Manitoba school question. Although our opponents haggled and wriggled at it, and tried to create a false impression concerning it, yet not one man among them dared to rise and move a vote of want of confidence in the Government for the course they pursued. The settlement of that question alone gave confidence to the people of this country. It removed a brand of discord that for five years was a burning question, dividing the people into two hostile camps, and which, if it had not been checked, would have brought about the destruction of this great confederation. But, thanks to the administrative ability of the right hon. First Minister and his able colleagues, that question was settled in such a way as to command the support of the people.

Then, in the revision of the tariff, which, when brought down, was denounced as ruinous to our manufacturers and workmen, proved, as time rolled on, to be in the best interest of the country, and so gained the support of the people as to induce hon. gentlemen opposite to change their tone and say to us: Oh, you have stolen our clothes. Stolen their clothes, forsooth, Mr. Speaker. Why, the old ragged garments, patched and mended, crawling with vermin, not a rag man within forty miles would touch, they were so old and dirty, unless they were first fumigated. Now, Mr. Speaker, the tariff has been changed, and changed to the great benefit of the people of this country.

The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) censured the Government for the manner in which they have dealt with the iron duties. Why, if there was one feature about the tariff that ought to commend itself to the support of the people, it was the change in the duties on iron and steel. These raw materials, iron and steel, are the natural raw materials of every manufacture in this Dominion. Every mechanic's tool, every machine that the agriculturists use, every implement that enters into the life and industry of every business establishment throughout the country, has for its raw material iron and steel; and will you believe it, that under the old tariff the duty on these raw materials, so necessary to the life and prosperity of business, was nearly 50 per cent? Is it any wonder, then, that our great manufacturing establishments were almost paralyzed? Why, I was talking, the other day, to a manufacturer in the city of Toronto, who manufactures radiators, and he told me that since the introduction of this tariff, since the duties on these raw materials were so largely reduced, he was able to expand and swell his exports, so that even in far-off Russia the public buildings are now being heated by radiators made in the city of Toronto. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) made the argument, that because we imported a little more iron and steel from the United States than from England, we were favouring the United States by our reduction of the duties on those particular articles; but he did not tell the House, although the duties were reduced on iron and steel coming from the United States, they were still further reduced on iron and steel coming from England. And where the duty on pig-iron was reduced from $4 to $2.50 a ton coming from the United States, it was also reduced, under the preferential tariff on iron and steel coming from England, to $1.75 a ton, or thereabouts. So that, instead of giving a preference to the United States, we have not done that at all, but have given instead a preference to England. We reduced the duty because the reduction was in the interests of our people, as it would have the effect of building up the manufacturing interests of the country and of giving to every agriculturist cheaper ploughs, hoes and cultivators, and cheaper tools to our mechanics. And so, Sir, as you go all through the different lines of manufacture, you will find that the reduction of the duty on iron and steel has been one of the greatest factors in increasing the prosperity of the people. Take the great Massey-Harris Company, in Toronto. They have expended this last year no less than $269,000 in enlarging their establishment, and the other day they raised the wages of the 1,500 men they employ in the city of Toronto 10 per cent all round, and they are now so crowded with orders that they almost have to refuse them. They are sending their machines to all parts of the world. This establishment has been largely aided and increased by the business-like way in which the Government has reduced the duties on iron and steel. But the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), pointing to England, said: You have taken cotton fabrics, printed, dyed, &c., which we import in large quantities from England and in very small quantities from the United States, and you have raised the duty from 30 per cent to 35 per cent. Is that so? True, the duty was raised to 35 per cent; but England got a reduction, under the preferential rate, of 25 per cent, and the English goods only pay now 26½ per cent, while the American goods pay 35 per cent. We have, therefore, increased the duty against the Americans and reduced it in favour of the English exporters; and, instead of the old duty of 30 per cent on goods from England, the duty is now only 22½ per cent. Take all the other lines we import from England. Under this tariff we have cut down the duty from 35 per cent to 26½ per cent, and from 30 per cent to 22½ per cent.

This preference to England is another thing that has contributed to the prosperity of the country. There is also the fact that we have revised that tariff so as to reduce the duty on many articles, which has had the effect of encouraging and helping the manufacturers and also of giving cheaper goods to the consumers. And I hold that it was the business-like way in which the Government went to work to revise the tariff that contributed in such a marked degree to the prosperity of the people. The hon. member for Haldimand referred to the deepening of the canals and said that before the Conservatives went out of office the Welland Canal was finished and the St. Lawrence canals were about three-quarters done. I admit that the Welland Canal was completed and we had the St. Lawrence canals with a depth of 9 or 12 feet, and work for deepening them to 14 feet had been begun. But how was the work being carried on at the rate they were going, it would be ten years before it would be completed. What a stupid, silly policy that was. You might have a canal 100 miles long, but until you have it completed no part of it would be of use. This Government saw at once that there was no use fiddling along that way, that it would cost no more to deepen the canal in two or three years than to take up ten years in the work.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Not so much.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not so much, quite true. And so, like business men they let the contracts for the completion of the work in the shortest possible time. And, anticipating the completion of these canals, trade is being naturally diverted, and this also has contributed to the prosperity of the country.

But referring back to the revision of the tariff and the preference to Great Britain, I venture to say that is one of the greatest things that ever occurred in the history of this or any other British province, and has contributed in a larger degree than anything else to increase our prosperity. I can give an instance of its beneficial effects in my own business. I have been all my life in the milling business, shipping a good deal of flour to the old country. Canadian flour was not very well known in England, and that was true of Canadian goods generally. Parties to whom we shipped always demanded that we should brand our sacks "Made in America." They said that Canadian flour was not known. But after our honoured Premier went there, and after this tariff was brought down, there came flashing under the ocean to us: "Brand your sacks no longer 'Made in America,' but brand them henceforth 'Made in Canada.'"

Mr. BEATTIE. You might have given the name of the firm.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You would not know them. The firm is Farquhar Brothers, of Glasgow. For the last few weeks a good many statements have been made in this House without giving any names. I think I shall be able to give authority for anything I say. I have given this one instance that came under my own observation. I know the facts, because I received the cablegram myself. It indicates the good feeling that we know arose in England when the preference was given by Canada. Manufacturers in other lines have told me of similar experiences. Canada was never known in England as it has been since that preference was given. Canada had opened the door; Canada had started the ball rolling, and was the first colony to give a preference to England. The sympathetic announcement of this went like magic throughout the British Empire and Canadian goods were bought and given the preference. And if we can get the preference in such a market that is an enormous thing. That is the reason why our exports have sold so well in Great Britain; that is why there has been such a demand for Canadian goods. And this has all been brought about, I believe, by the preference given by this Government.

Reference has been made to some things that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) said, for instance, that he was following the Government though the Government were going slowly. I need not deal with these matters, for the hon. member for Guysborough is able to take his own part. I wish to refer to a few things that the Government has done, and, in my opinion, done wisely. A good deal has been said about the Franchise Bill. The hon. member for Haldimand said we never had such a voters' list as we have to-day, and he pointed to the city of Winnipeg where we could not hold an election because of what he would have us believe to be the outrageous, terrible Franchise Bill. Well, the Franchise Bill simply provides that the voters' list shall be the voters' list of the municipalities and if the list is more than a year old, then there must be a revision before an election can be held. The old Government would have held an election in Winnipeg on a list ten years old. If we had the old Franchise Bill to-day it would be a monstrous shame and a disgrace to hold an election in Winnipeg on a list three or four years old. So, all that is necessary is to revise the list which you would have to do, or, rather which you ought to do even under the old Franchise Bill. The writ, I believe, has been issued, and the election will be held, and the new Liberal member will come down and take his seat before this session closes. Then, in reference to the Redistribution Bill, the hon. member for Haldimand was very sensitive. The very thought of it is like flaunting a red flag in the face of an angry bull. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew what they did, how outrageously and scandalously the constituencies in the province of Ontario were cut up. They judge us by themselves. I think we had better leave the Redistribution Bill alone until it is laid on the Table of the House. I believe it will be a fair and honest Bill, I do not want to see anything else; I think that in reference to the constituencies of this country there will be no undue advantage taken. I am satisfied that we should set an example to our friends on the other side as to how these things should be done. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned I believe there never was in this country or any other country a Government that, in the short time they have been in power, have made such a grand record for themselves; there never was a Cabinet called to office, many of them new in their positions, many of them taking charge of great departments involving an enormous amount of work and details,—there never was a Cabinet that have been called upon to face such enormous and difficult questions as this Cabinet have had to face since they came into power. The opening up of the Yukon territory, the development of the Kootenay district, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, the deepening of the canals, the negotiations in reference to cold storage—all these undertakings have taxed the ability, the ingenuity and the skill of Ministers, and would require their whole time, whereas some of them have been called away for months negotiating treaties, and consequently may have left their business somewhat neglected. Another thing. I think that great credit must be given to the hon. Postmaster General for reducing the domestic rate and giving us penny postage. Why, Sir, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office they were always flaunting their loyalty, but they used to charge ten cents an ounce to carry a letter from here to England, whereas if they sent it from here to San Francisco, it would go for three cents. They were charging for sending a letter from Toronto to Liverpool ten cents an ounce, whereas the same letter would go to San Francisco for three cents. When this Government came into power they saw that was an injustice, and the Postmaster General has succeeded in establishing penny postage between Canada and England and nearly all her colonies, thus cementing and binding more closely together the mother land and her colonies. It is one of the most important events that has ever taken place in the direction of increasing the fellowship and good will between England and her colonies. Reducing the domestic rate from three to two cents, cutting off at once  $33\frac{1}{3}$  per cent of the cost of postage, has been an enormous undertaking, a work that will receive the support of the people of this country, although the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) denounced it and said the people would condemn it. I venture to say that neither he nor any other gentleman on that side will dare to get up and move a vote of censure on the Postmaster General for what he has done. These are things that have given a high sounding name to Canada, and have brought Canada into great favour in the British Empire; they have brought the people of Canada into closer touch with England and with all her colonies, and have contributed in a great degree to build up a British sentiment that we all hope will grow stronger and stronger. I say, Sir, that in the two or three years that this Government have been in power, they have effected more solid, wholesome and satisfactory achievements for the benefit of the people of Canada, than any other Government have ever done, and the result of the by-elections all over the country show that the people appreciate these things. Wherever you go the people are satisfied, they have confidence in this Government, they know that this Government is an honest straightforward Government, that they are conducting the affairs of the country in an honest and straightforward way.

All these fireworks we have been hearing about for the last few days as to the maladministration of the Yukon, why, Sir, I am astonished that men of common sense, men of good judgment, would think for a moment of making the charges that we have heard made regarding the Yukon. What did the Government do? They are suddenly called upon to administer law and order in a country 4,000 miles away, where it was almost impossible to get in, without railways, without telegraph or postal routes where it took months to reach, a country that we did not know anything about, that no living man knew anything about except, perhaps, Mr. Ogilvie; the Government are suddenly called upon to administer law and order there while a rush of miners were going in and locating claims. It is natural that some confusion, some disorder, probably some irregularities, might occur under such circumstances. But what does the Government do? The Minister of the Interior, as soon as the first note came to him that there were irregularities going on, issues a commission to Mr. Ogilvie, a man in whom everybody in this country has confidence, a man who stands at the highest pinnacle of fame, a man who is, no doubt, one of the ablest men that could be sent in there; the Minister of the Interior gives this man a commission to investigate every charge and to punish and remove any official that may be found guilty of corrupt acts. Then he asks every one who has any charges to make against the officials of the Yukon for crimes or irregularities, to communicate with him. Could any Government do more than that? Is it possible to conceive of a course more likely to receive the sanction and commendation of the people? It has been pointed out that Mr. Ogilvie is not a lawyer. What of that? Mr. Ogilvie is a man of good common sense, and I would rather have a man of good common sense than half the lawyers in this country. It is not a difficult task for a man of good common sense and good judgment to go up there and find out whether an official has been guilty of taking money for letting people in at the side door, or giving out information which he should not have given. It does not require a lawyer to ascertain whether such a charge is proven or not. Mr. Ogilvie is there to investigate all these charges, and if irregularities have been committed, I am sure the offenders will be brought to punishment. So I think that so far as the Yukon territory is concerned, the Government deserves great commendation. It is a fact that in that far-off region, although miners are going in there by the thousands, although there is a rush from all parts of the world, although there are scarcely any means of getting into or out of that country except over one very difficult pass, yet I am told that in Dawson City law and order are as well maintained, and life and property are just as safe, as they are in the main streets of the city of Ottawa to-day. Is not that something to be proud of? Is it not something that the people of this country ought to be proud of that we have been able in so short a time to establish a government there under which law and order have been maintained, claims have been registered, hospitals have been erected? The Government have contributed $44,000 to maintain hospitals and charitable institutions, and to open up roads. Next year, I believe, there will be more money spent, and the local machinery of government will be very greatly improved.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am satisfied that, if there is anything that ought to receive the commendation and will receive the commendation of this country, it is this: You may talk as long as you like, until you are black in the face, but you cannot make the people believe that while you indulge in vague charges, in hearsay, in the evidence that comes from some Yankee skedaddler who comes down here with a cock-and-bull story, that there is any foundation for these accusations. Why did not this man go before the commissioner in Dawson City and make his claims known. If he has got any evidence that crimes have been committed, why does he not go before the commissioner and tell his story?

Mr. COWAN. He ran away from him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He ran away, and he has come down here to consult the Tory Opposition. He wanted to give them a little ammunition, and goodness knows they need some ammunition. I never saw a party so bereft as they are of ammunition. If it was not for the complaints that these skedaddlers from Dawson City brought down here, hon. gentlemen would not have anything to talk about. It has been a Godsend to them that these complaints have come to them. Statements of that kind, I think you will admit, are not worthy of much credence. If these men were sincere and honestly anxious to prevent corruption, if corruption has been practiced, if they wanted to put a stop to crime, they would go to the commissioner who has authority to hear their complaints, or if having come here they had gone to the Minister of the Interior and laid their charges before him, so I am convinced that the Minister would have taken prompt action.

Mr. HENDERSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 7th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PETITION OUT OF ORDER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg to state that the petition from the municipal council of the county of Dufferin that 25 cents per day per man be granted to the non-commissioned officers and men during the time of the annual drill, cannot be received because it involves the direct expenditure of public money.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. JAS. SOMERVILLE (North Wentworth and Brant) presented the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House during the present session, as follows:—

Your Committee recommend:

1. That Mr. Albert Horton, one of the members of the present staff, be promoted to the position of chief reporter.

2. That the services of Mr. J. A. Pelland as translator of the official report of the Debates be dispensed with, and that he be paid the amount which he, similar to the other members of the staff of translators, is entitled to receive for services up to the 13th instant.

Mr. SOMERVILLE moved:

That the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the Debates of this House during the present session be now concurred in.

Mr. C. BEAUSOLEIL (Berthier). I object to this report being taken up to-day. I want the ordinary notice to be given.

Mr. SPEAKER. It cannot be taken up to-day, objection having been raised.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Before the matter is disposed of, I would remark to my hon. friend and other members in the committee to whom has been entrusted the task of supervising the report of our debates, that it appears to me that very great and unnecessary delay has occurred in the publication of the revised edition. Now, our rule, as I understand it, is that if hon. gentlemen do not choose to return their revises within twenty-four hours, the Debates Committee will proceed to publish the revised edition of the day's "Hansard"—a very wholesome and a proper rule, and one that, I think, the committee ought to comply with. I applied for a revised copy of my own speech and was told that the revised edition had not been published, because some hon. gentlemen had not handed in their revises. I think that that is unreasonable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I understand the hon. gentleman to mean twenty-four hours after the copy for correction is in the hands of the Speaker.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Of course, that is only reasonable. It appears to me that after the copy for correction has been twenty-four hours in the hands of the hon. gentleman who has delivered the speech, if it is not convenient for him to hand in his corrections, the committee ought to proceed with the printing of the revised edition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It ought not to block the "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes. I would call this matter to the attention of the committee.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That point was under discussion in the committee this morning, and it was decided to change the notice at the head of the unrevised edition so as to say that the revised edition "shall" instead of "may" be printed without further delay. The delay in the revised edition has been caused by the fact that members of the House who have delivered speeches have retained the proofs, and, of course, the printer cannot go on until he has the proofs returned. Some members not only received the first proofs, but called for the revised afterwards. As I say, the committee after discussing the matter, have decided to make it an imperative rule that every speech must be revised and sent to the "Hansard" office within twenty-four hours after the proofs are in the hands of the members; and, if it is not sent him, then the editor of "Hansard" has the instructions of the committee to immediately send his proofs to the printer with instructions to print the revised edition from the unrevised copy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would call the attention of the committee to a point in connection with this that I think requires some notice. The copy of the unrevised report is sent to the member who makes the speech. I must say, so far as I am able to judge, the report is a remarkably accurate one. But I find that in the revised edition a large number of mistakes occur—owing, I suppose, to the neglect of the proof-readers—that are not in the first copy at all. One naturally only thinks of getting the corrections made that he makes in his speech, and does not expect that in the reprinted copy changes will appear that he has not marked. I think attention should be called to the matter so that these changes should not be made in the "Hansard" as first published.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I can corroborate what my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) says. I have an illustration under my hand. I find that one very important sentence, which was correctly rendered in the unrevised edition of my speech is omitted in the revised edition.

Mr. THOS. S. SPROULE (East Grey). To any one who has looked over the "Hansard," it must be apparent that many of the corrections we make do not appear in the revised edition. I do not wonder that some hon. members wish a second opportunity to make corrections, seeing that, through carelessness or haste on the part of the printer or proof-reader, corrections made in the first place do not appear.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). If the House will bear with me for a moment, I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that the translation of the "Hansard" in French is very far behind. The speech made by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is only partly translated. This speech was delivered fifteen days ago, and, of course, all the subsequent speeches are not translated at all. We really require this French edition of "Hansard," and I think we should have it earlier.

Motion (Mr. Somerville) withdrawn.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 39) to provide for the issuing of railway passes to members of the Senate and House of Commons.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 40) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, with respect to combinations in restraint of trade.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 41) in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act.—(Mr. Bertram.)

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to call the attention of the Government to the following papers, production of which was ordered last session, and which have not yet been brought down; Papers relating to the dismissal of one Napoleon Alain; papers, statements of account, &c., in connection with Roberval pier; correspondence, bills, &c., between the Government and Mr. Chas. Russell, London, and statements of account rendered by Mr. Chas. Russell. These were ordered on the 31st of March last. Then, correspondence relating to postponement of the Queen vs. Coulombe; papers, statements of account, &c., in connection with building of wharfs at St. Méthode and Mistassini, which were ordered on the 18th of April last session. I would ask that these papers be brought down as soon as possible this session. I might give a list of the subjects to my hon. friend.

SCHEDULES TO THE FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmorland). Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to section 36 of the Franchise Act passed last year, a clause of which reads as follows:—

It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to prepare as schedules to this Act the oaths in the form required to be taken by voters at elections held under the authority of this Act.

The Act as published has no schedules. I would ask the hon. gentleman if schedules have been prepared in accordance with the Act, and if the Government is prepared to have them given to the country in time for the elections that are coming on?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry I cannot give at this moment any information to my hon. friend. I will take note of his question, and I will endeavour to have the answer at the next sitting of the House.

ALASKAN BOUNDARY—MODUS VIVENDI.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to a statement which appeared in a number of papers in Washington, D. C., on March 29th:

The modus vivendi to be recognized in the Alaskan boundary and proposed by the United States, has been referred to the Canadian authorities as well as to the British Foreign Office, and until word comes from both quarters it will not be known whether a modus vivendi is to be established. The impression prevails, however, that as soon as Canada has expressed approval the British Foreign Office will speedily give assent.

I would ask if there is any foundation for the statement that a modus vivendi is being considered, and that there is a prospect of its being shortly arranged?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No, there is not the slightest foundation for the statement. There is no modus vivendi now pending or being discussed between the two Governments.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. None been proposed?

The PRIME MINISTER. Nothing has been proposed, nothing has been done since two years ago when we agreed upon a provisional boundary on the summit of Dyea and Skagway, that is to say, between the end of the Lynn Canal and Lake Bennett. That was recognized as the provisional boundary two years ago. Then certain arrangements have been made with regard to bonding privileges to be mutually given by the two countries. Since that time there has been no modus vivendi, or any proposition to that effect, so far as I have been informed.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. D. HENDERSON (Halton). It is not my intention at the present time to continue the discussion of the question raised a few days ago by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), which was so ably supported by him in a speech of great length, and answered by a laboured effort on the part of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), whose arguments were in return combatted by the able, logical and conclusive reasoning and evidence produced by my hon. friends from Halifax (Mr. Borden), from Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior), from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) and others. It is not my intention at the present time to deal further with that matter, but to await the decision of the Minister of the Interior who has promised to make those on this side of the House who have referred to this question, feel sorry that they have done so. I wish to wait and see whether his promise in that relation will be any better kept than many of the promises of the Liberal party in the past. Neither do I propose wasting the time of the House in endeavouring to reply to the remarks of my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell), who spoke briefly last evening. He seemed to be very well satisfied indeed with the Government of the day; in lauding the Government he said that never had any Government presented such a record. Well, Sir, if he is satisfied with the record of extravagant expenditures, broken pledges, railway deals and Yukon scandals that have been referred to in this House during the past ten days, then I am prepared to leave the matter with him, feeling sure that his constituents will call him to account for his statement in that regard. My purpose this afternoon, without detaining the House at any great length, is to refer more especially to the resolution which is more directly before the House, the resolution for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne. The Speech, I may say, in itself is alike brief in volume as in matter. However, brief as it is, we find in it something in which I dare say we can all agree. The Speech refers in opening to the large degree of prosperity which prevails in this country. We are indeed glad to join His Excellency in congratulations in regard to the large degree of prosperity that prevails in the country. Were we on this side of the House to adopt the arguments and the tactics of hon. gentlemen on your right, when they were sitting on this side of the House, we must show that the country was not prosperous, but we who are sitting on this side of the House now do not adopt nor ever have adopted, the plan of running down the country by calling out blue ruin and belittling Canada in the eyes of the people of the world. It was a favourite argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, especially of hon. members from Western Ontario, to quote largely from the statistics of the Ontario Bureau of Industries to show that because farm values, farm lands, farming implements and farm stock had decreased in value from year to year, the country was all going to ruin, and that the farmers were year after year becoming worse off. Were I to adopt that plan and quote from the same statistics I might show that instead of prosperity prevailing throughout this country, blue ruin indeed prevailed, because I have information that since hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, farm values have decreased to the extent of no less than $5,000,000. However, I do not put that forward as an argument that the farmers of western Ontario are not better off, or as well off, at any rate, as they were before. I think the argument is very largely a fallacious one, as the whole thing depends upon the whim of the assessor, who goes through the country valuing the land, as to whether he gives it its actual value or gives it a depreciated value in order to reduce the taxes asked. The right hon. First Minister has been good enough to say, in his address, in reply to that of the hon. leader of the Opposition:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

What is the use of trying to show the cause of prosperity? The prosperity is here.

We admit it. We are glad to admit it, and we join in the congratulations of His Excellency. The right hon. First Minister says further:

Whether the policy was inaugurated at one time or another, certainly the policy which exists to-day must be held, in some measure, to account for the present condition of affairs.

Well, Sir, I am glad indeed that the right hon. First Minister has been frank enough to make that statement. The policy which exists to-day is the policy that, in 1878, was inaugurated by the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, was endorsed by the people of this country in 1882, was re-affirmed by the people in 1886, and again in 1891, and I may say further endorsed by the people in 1896, because the Government at present in power have no mandate from the people to change that policy. When they secured the Treasury benches in June, 1896, they did not attain to power by reason of a desire on the part of the people that the great trade policy of the country should be changed. They attained power entirely on another question; hence I say that they have no mandate from the people to change that policy. So that the policy which must be credited with this prosperity, as admitted by the right hon. Prime Minister, is simply the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, and which has been the policy of that party for the past twenty years. The Speech from the Throne speaks of the various evidences that this prosperity does exist. It gives us as an evidence the expansion of trade. What political party, in this country, has done more than the Liberal-Conservative party to expand trade ; not only foreign trade, but the great inter-provincial trade which we are apt, too much, to overlook. The Liberal-Conservative party in power built the great Canadian Pacific Railway, connected the Atlantic with the Pacific by an iron road and the working of that company has been extended far beyond the regions of Canada, has gone out to China and Japan, and, if all reports are true, very shortly we may see a fast Atlantic line of steamers under the control of the same company, organized and set afloat by the great Liberal-Conservative party of this country. Hence, I say, we have ample evidence that whatever expansion of trade we have, is largely due to the working of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. The increased revenues of the country are given as another evidence of prosperity. Well, Sir, the same policy that expanded the trade of this country, the interprovincial as well as the foreign trade, has had to do with these increased revenues. We can well understand why from 1893 to 1896 the revenues of the country were not as large as they might otherwise have been. During these years the Liberal party were aggressive ; they were declaring from one end of the country to the other that if they ever succeeded in obtaining power, a great change was to take place in the fiscal policy of the country, that instead of the protective system, a system of free trade was to prevail. What was the result ? Capital was withdrawn from active work, men were afraid to invest their capital ; it was placed in the banks where it remained dormant, and this country, to a certain extent, became stagnant during these years, but, when the Liberal party did attain power, and when, in 1897, they brought down their new tariff, and showed that they dared not carry out the promises that they had made to them, but that they were bound to observe the mandate of the people, that they were forced to continue the protective system, confidence was restored, capital was set loose, and the revenues of the country were proportionately swelled. We are told also that another evidence of the prosperity of the country is the cessation of the exodus. We admit that from 1873 to 1878 there was an exodus of the people to the country to the south of us. But in 1878 a new policy was inaugurated, a policy which was destined to give employment to the labour of this country, and from that time forward the train of migration set in the other way. Once you get emigration to start in a certain channel, it is a very difficult matter to bring about a change, but that change having commenced with the introduction of the National Policy, has continued from year to year, and I am glad indeed that now the gentlemen who had advocated free trade, and who were opposed to the National Policy are admitting that the exodus has almost entirely ceased, and that so much credit for that is due to the Liberal-Conservative party.

In regard to the joint high commission, I have little to say, because so little has been made known to the people of what took place at Washington. We must await the result and deal with the matter when it comes before us. Hon. gentlemen tell us that some progress has been made. I simply desire to say that if there is one thing that gave relief to the people of this country, more than another, it was that the fact was disclosed that the commission at Washington had absolutely and utterly failed to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States. A feeling of relief from one end of this Dominion to the other went abroad and I have no doubt that that in itself will be sufficient to add something more to the prosperity of the country.

In regard to the reduction of postage, I have nothing to complain of. Personally, I am satisfied that the measure was a very good one. However, I can scarcely join with the Government in the statement put into the mouth of His Excellency, when they say that this change was made to the satisfaction of all the people of Canada. I conceived that that change was hardly satisfactory to one large class of the people, because the agricultural classes of this country derive almost no benefit from the reduced postage, while they in turn will be called upon to pay their share of the deficiency of the postal service.

With regard to the Bill promised in the Speech from the Throne, with reference to the re-arrangement of the electoral districts, I am prepared to leave that question alone for the present, and to wait until the Bill is brought down. Personally, I do not feel so much concerned about it, because I have the honour of representing a county which I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to gerrymander. Were they to take one township from it, they would destroy its symmetry, and were they to add one township, the result would likewise be symmetrical destruction. I have the honour of representing the most compact little county in the Dominion of Canada, and therefore I feel assured, that, whatever hon. gentlemen may do under this Bill, I do not think that, at any rate, they can touch me. The right hon. the First Minister has given us a very solemn promise indeed, that this Redistribution Bill shall be equally fair to the Opposition as to the Government. I am glad he has made that promise ; indeed it is more than a promise. Had it simply been one of those promises that these hon. gentlemen opposite from time to time gave the people, I should have placed very little confidence in it ; but, Sir, the right hon. gentleman closed that promise with a solemn "So help me God," and in doing so he raised his right hand in that form which Presbyterians know is the most solemn oath that a man can take. It is, therefore, more than a promise, on the part of the Prime Minister; it is a solemn oath, and therefore I believe the right hon. gentleman will carry it out.

The Speech from the Throne may be described as being more remarkable in the main for what it does not contain than for what it does contain. In fact, it discloses what we might call a negative policy—a policy of dead issues; and I propose for a short time to review some of those dead issues. As the Government did not give us a policy, it may be well for us to examine into what they did not give us. The first of these dead issues that I desire to refer to is that of the tariff. The Minister of the Interior—who I am sorry is not in his place to-day—disclosed to the people at Perth a short time ago that the tariff now was a dead issue. Sir, to my mind, it is a very lively issue, and so long as there is a Conservative party in this country, it will be a lively issue. Protection has been the policy of the Conservative party; it is the policy of the Conservative party still. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has endeavoured to explain away his statement by saying that the Conservative party had come over to the way of thinking of the Liberals on the tariff, and in that respect it was a dead issue. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) that he is very far mistaken indeed, and therefore I will pass from that issue and deal with some of the other issues which seem to be dead to the Liberal party in this country. Reciprocity is another dead issue with the Liberals, and, as an evidence of that fact, I read in the recent speech of the Prime Minister the following words:—

If we know the hearts and the minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the feeling of Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity.

I am glad indeed he has come to that conclusion, and am sure the people of this country are glad that the right hon. gentleman has made that announcement, because, as I have said, a sigh of relief came over the people of Canada when the commissioners returned from Washington and acknowledged that the United States would not grant them reciprocity.

Preferential trade for Canada is another of the dead issues of the Liberal party. Only a few years ago, when the right hon. gentleman was seeking power at the hands of the electors of this country, preferential trade was a fairly lively issue, and the right hon. gentleman—then Mr. Wilfrid Laurier—addressed the electors in London, Ont., and promised that when he reached England, preferential trade for Canada would be one of the very first demands he would make. But, Sir, no sooner had he landed on the shores of England, than he forgot his promise. There was held before him the glittering Cobden Club medal, and he knew, if he got a preference for Canada in the markets of Great Britain, that medal could not be worn on his manly breast. The Prime Minister had a choice between Canada and the Cobden Club medal; the Prime Minister chose the medal, and the people of Canada have to suffer to-day in consequence of it. It is now a dead issue, so far as hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are concerned, and I presume it will remain a dead issue until they are supplanted by hon. members on this side of the House, when that question shall again become a very lively one.

Another of the dead issues is, I am glad to say, free trade. It has died hard, but it has died surely. We have it announced by members supporting the Government in this House, that even the principle of free trade is no longer an issue with the Liberal party. The other day the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) declared himself as a moderate protectionist, and that, whilst it might be well to talk about free trade, it was not at the present day a practical question. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Préfontaine), discussing this question—not in the House, but at a banquet in Montreal—stated that he never had been a free trader, or at least never in practice. Neither in practice nor in principle are many of the hon. members on the other side of the House free traders now. Moderate protection is the policy best suited for this country; moderate protection is the policy of the Conservative members in this House, and I am glad to know that moderate protection is so rapidly becoming the policy of the Liberal members. The hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) speaks with no uncertain sound on this subject. I quote from his speech the following:—

I say, Sir, that the only actual possible policy for this country, and I am not ashamed to say it, is a policy of moderate protection.

The Conservative party in this country never held any other policy than that of moderate protection. There are no extreme protectionists in Canada. We did not ask for a 50 per cent tariff to protect the interests of this country; a 30 per cent tariff has been found admirable, and I say, therefore, we have no such thing in this country as extreme protectionists—moderate protection being the principle advocated by the Liberal-Conservative party. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) further said.

What I state here frankly is, that I ran in my county as a moderate protectionist, or rather I said to my electors, that I did not believe in any theories in matters of trade, but I believe in facts, I believe in figures, and I believe in any Government that would give to my country the policy that was required for the moment, and not the policy that might be required fifty years hence.

Well, Sir, if this policy of free trade is not to show itself again for fifty years, it is a matter of gratification indeed to the people of this country. He adds further:

Let the men of the future explain the proper policy for the future of Canada. I have hope enough in my countrymen of any race and of any language to feel sure that when fifty years will have passed upon this country, they will know how to deal with the tariff of that future day.

I am glad indeed, Sir, to hear words like these spoken, because nothing will tend more to advance the interests of this country, to stimulate its trade, and to encourage men to invest capital here, than to know that the hydra-headed policy of free trade is not to be heard of again for the next fifty years.

Well, Sir, we have a few more of these dead issues. Free trade as it is in England is not now spoken of by one single member of the House. We hear not a word about it. Neither do we hear about commercial union, nor about continental free trade, nor about unrestricted reciprocity. These have all been buried, and I hope they will remain long for a resurrection.

Another of these dead issues, issues which were formerly the stock-in-trade of the Liberal party of this country when in opposition, is the independence of Parliament. I believe the hon. Postmaster General introduced a Bill into this House on the 26th of February, 1896, making it illegal for a member of the House to accept a Government office until a certain period had elapsed since he had ceased to be a member of the House, and in supporting this measure, used the following strong language:—

If the Government of the day can dangle public offices before their followers, and induce a few, and perhaps an increasing number, to aspire to those positions, they become mere parasites upon the Administration.

Well, Sir, when we look at the formidable list of parasites, we wonder if this is really a dead issue. Let us see where a number of these parasites have gone. Some of them have been elevated to the Senate. We find such honoured names as Mr. King, of Sunbury, and the late Mr. Béchard, made senators; Mr. Forbes transferred to a judgeship; Mr. Devlin given an immigration agency; Mr. Lavergne given a judgeship; Mr. Langelier given another judgeship; Mr. Fiset elevated to the Senate; the late Mr. M. C. Cameron made a governor—we find no fault with that; Mr. Lister made a judge; Mr. Choquette made a judge; Mr. Yeo made a senator; Senator McClelan given a governorship; Senator McInnes given a governorship, and Sir Oliver Mowat, the oldest parasite of the lot, transferred to Government House in the province of Ontario. The independence of Parliament an issue with the Liberal party to-day! It is as dead as a door nail. How many more parasites there are on that side of the House it is difficult for us to tell. I presume, as the session goes on, the policy of still more effectually destroying this old principle of the Liberal party will make its appearance, because I understand there are at the present time some valuable positions, such as the Montreal postmastership and others to be filled. Who the lucky parasites are to be is yet in the dark, so far as we are concerned.

Then, Sir, we come to another of these dead issues—something that has been entirely forgotten by the Liberal party, something that they seem never to think about—the purity of administration. Oh, how they used to howl about purity of administration! You never hear it spoken of now; it is not in their vocabulary. It is a dead issue, as dead as can be. I remember reading a speech of the Hon. Mr. Laurier, delivered in Lindsay in 1896, when he certainly used very strong language. He charged the Government of the day with gross and corrupt acts. He said:

One of the lawyers in the Cabinet was Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, drawing a salary of $7,000 a year. Sir Hibbert has an assistant at $4,000 a year. Then we had until the other day a Solicitor General at $5,000 a year. Sir, they pay over $100,000 a year in extra legal fees. This expenditure is corrupt and indefensible.

If it was corrupt and indefensible at that time, is it less corrupt and less indefensible at the present time? If this expenditure was uncalled for in 1896, how are hon. gentlemen going to justify it in 1897? Because in 1897, in the Administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we find that an increased amount was paid for lawyers' fees over that which was paid in 1896 by the previous Government, notwithstanding the fact that we still had a Minister of Justice drawing $7,000 a year, a Deputy Minister drawing $4,000 a year, and a Solicitor General drawing $5,000 a year; and, Sir, if the Auditor General's Report, which has been kept back now for three months beyond the time when it ought to be laid on the Table of the House, was before us, we would know what the amount is for 1898. But until that is disclosed by the Government placing that report upon the Table, God only knows what the amount is.

Let me draw attention to one or more of the recent acts of purity of administration that have been enacted by the Government. Only a short time ago an election was held in the county of Huron, in western Ontario. At that time it was suddenly discovered that a very large expenditure was required on the Goderich harbour, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) found his way there to see what amount would be required for the completion of that harbour. A short time ago a writ was issued for an election in the riding of Brockville, and all at once it was discovered by the Minister of Public Works that a new drill hall was required there; and the Minister will doubtless be on hand to tell the people of Brockville how much money he is prepared to spend on a new drill hall in that town, on condition that a supporter of the Government is returned for that riding. I need not refer to the Yukon scandal and other acts of what these hon. gentlemen call purity of administration. I think I have given you sufficient to show that this issue is as dead as it possibly can be.

Then we have another dead issue—the abolition of the superannuation system. That was a phrase fondly used in former days by hon. gentlemen opposite, but it seems that the batteries of Wellington have been silenced, as we hear not a word in defence of the Government, notwithstanding the fact that there were placed on the superannuation list last year not less than 96 names, entailing an expense of $31,438 yearly on the taxpayers of this country. That assuredly is another dead issue.

Still another dead issue to which I will refer is economy. We scarcely hear the word now from hon. gentlemen opposite. It was their stock-in-trade in by-elections, in general elections, and at all times, in season and out of season. At the convention held in 1893, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) gave this plank a place in the platform of the Liberal party. He said :

We trust that the platform of a revenue tariff, accompanied by the promise of economy, will enable us to send you a substantial delegation to the next Parliament of Canada.

Well, Sir, on the promise of economy the people took these gentlemen at their word. They did send an increased delegation. But what was the result? Has economy been practised by the present Government? Is there any evidence of it whatever? Let us examine the records of 1896 and 1898. We find that, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in bygone years, told the people that an expenditure of $38,000,000 was altogether too large in a country like this, whilst the expenditure on revenue account for 1896, under Conservative rule, was $36,949,142, in 1898 it suddenly reached the large sum of $38,832,000, an increase of upwards of $2,000,000 in two years. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), speaking in his place a few nights ago, challenged hon. gentlemen on this side to say what items of expenditure we did not approve of. My reply is, that we on this side are not responsible for the expenditure of the country. But if the hon. gentleman wants us to name one item, I shall name one. The Conservative Government made an agreement before they went out of power, for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway for a bonus of $1,650,000. The present Government disregarded that agreement, and made one by which they engaged to pay $3,630,000 for the same work. Not only that, but they agreed to throw in a quarter million square miles of coal lands for the benefit of the "Globe" newspaper.

Let us for a few moments look a little more particularly into this matter of economy. The hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), in Toronto the other night, spoke of the large surplus which he claimed to have during the past fiscal year. The total expenditure on consolidated fund account for 1898, as I said before, was $38,832,000. But the hon. gentleman very carefully kept out of sight the fact that, in addition to that, he had expended on capital account the large sum of $4,143,000, making a total expenditure on consolidated fund account and capital account of $42,975,000. The total revenue from consolidated funds amounted to $40,555,000, showing, therefore, a deficit of $2,420,000. In other words, all the revenues of this country during the last fiscal year were expended by the Government, and they besides have borrowed money and expended, in addition to all the revenues of the country, the large sum of $2,420,000. Now, if this plan of dealing with figures is adopted, it is simply a matter of book-keeping as to how large a surplus the hon. Minister of Finance may have. Had he charged $5,143,000 to capital account, instead of $4,134,000, he would have had a surplus of $2,723,000, instead of $1,723,000. Had he added $10,000,000 more to his charges of capital account, making the expenditure on that account $14,142,000, he would simply have had a surplus of $10,000,000 more than that claimed by him. His figures are, therefore, entirely misleading, and it is well the people should study those accounts and ascertain for themselves the question as to whether a surplus did or did not exist.

Another dead issue of the Liberal party was a reduction of the annual expenditure. I desire to refer to the fact that, with regard to the expenditures of bygone years, we were told that $38,000,000, or $36,000,000, whatever it might be, was far too much, and that, when the Liberals came into power, that expenditure would be reduced by $1,000,000, or $2,000,000, or even $4,000,000, as set forth by the present hon. Minister of Justice. Instead of that, however, the expenditure has been increased from $36,449,000 in 1896 to $38,432,000 in 1898 on consolidated revenue account, showing an increase in two years of $1,883,000. This issue in the platform of the Liberal party is, therefore, as dead as many of the others.

Another dead issue is the reduction of taxation. When the Liberals obtained power, taxation was to be reduced; but, like all their other pledges, it has gone the other way. In 1896 the revenue derived from customs and excise was $27,759,285, but in 1898 it had reached $29,576,455, or an increase of $1,717,170. Their customs taxation alone—and perhaps this is a better way of illustrating the matter—shows the same record of broken pledges. In 1894 the customs tax per head of the population of this country was $3.86; in 1895 it was $3.52; in 1896 it was $3.94, and in 1897, $3.82. But in 1898 it rose to the sum of $4.22, notwithstanding the pledges of hon. gentlemen to your right, Mr. Speaker, that the taxation should be reduced. The taxation of 1898 over that of 1894 was 36 cents per head of the population of this country, equal to $1.80 per family of five. The taxation of 1898 over that of 1895 was 70 cents per head, or $3.50 per family of five. The taxation of 1898 over 1896 was 28 cents per head, $1.40 for every family of five. The taxation of 1898 over 1897 was 39 cents per head, or equal to $1.95 for every family in the Dominion. And yet, Sir, these are the apostles of reduced taxation.

Another dead issue is that of reducing the national debt. We hear no more now of the national debt of this country being reduced, though formerly that was one of the great planks in the Liberal platform. That was one of the issues put before the people at every hustings and at every meeting where politics were discussed, and when the platform of the Liberal party was framed in 1893, they said: "We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt." Well, what are the facts? In 1896 the gross debt of the Dominion was $325,717,537, but in 1898 that had risen to $338,375,000, or an increase in the gross debt in two years of $12,658,447, and an increase in the net debt of $5,459,000. Where this increase has been expended is a matter now to be inquired into, and we are not aware that that large increase has been expended on public works in this country. The Liberal-Conservative party, when in power, were able to show that they spent larger sums on public works than were included in the increase of the national debt, and that, therefore, they not only had expended the increase of the national debt, but a very considerable amount taken from revenue account, on public works and railways. The present Government has failed to show how this large sum, nearly $5,500,000, has been expended, notwithstanding their promised reduction of the national debt.

And another dead issue, and one that, I presume, will remain dead for some considerable time, is the reduction of the number of Cabinet Ministers. We count them over. We find that the number is as large as ever, in fact I might almost say, that it is a vaster number than has been. However, "vaster" is the policy of the Liberal party, and they intend to continue in it, whether in providing office for their friends or in providing penny postage.

Another dead issue, Sir, is one that was a live issue years ago amongst the Liberals of this country. Oh, how they hated the title of a knight! Refusal of knighthood was one of the issues that was a live issue with the Liberal party. When they were formulating their policy, one of the speakers at the Liberal convention was good enough to say—and he won applause by saying it—that the holders of titles were a be(k)nighted lot. Another gentleman afterwards wrote a pamphlet on "Loyalty." And he made a statement that "Canadians are sensible enough to place small value upon the Downing Street titles and decorations which are offered to our public men." I find no fault with these gentlemen for accepting any honour that Her Majesty Queen Victoria chooses to offer them. But what I do find fault with is that they should denounce others from one end of the continent to the other, and, when they have an opportunity turn round and accept the same honour themselves. I congratulate the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I congratulate Sir Louis Davies, I congratulate you, Sir James Edgar, on receiving these titles. I am pleased to see you wear them with such honour. But it has never been a part of our policy to say that such titles should not be given to public men in this country.

Well, Sir, we come to another dead issue, and probably of all the issues that were alive with the Liberal party during the last two or three years, this is the deadest of the lot—if one thing can possibly be deader than another. This is buried beyond all possibility of resurrection, for the right hon. First Minister in his speech to the House the other day declared, that now, henceforth and for ever it never should have a place in the ranks of the Liberal party. I refer to the question of prohibition. But, Sir, I must say that the Liberal party treated this dead issue with very much more respect than they did many others of their cast-off issues, for they gave it a most respectable funeral, at a cost of a quarter of a million dollars to this country. Sir, I propose to devote a little time to this question, and to see where the Liberal party stands with regard to it at the present time. I desire to refer you to a motion that was made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who, by the way, whenever prohibition is mentioned, seems to be absent from his place in this House. The hon. gentleman, in 1893, when the platform of the Liberal party was framed, proposed this motion. He said:

I propose to read the resolution which will bring about this result, and which pledges the Liberal party, if returned to power, to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views upon this question, and the Government in power must necessarily carry out the expressed will of the people. There is no doubt that this is what the Liberal party would do, for we know their pledges can be trusted.

They knew it then. We know now that their pledges cannot be trusted. A deputation at Winnipeg waited upon Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1894, and he replied as follows:

He would pledge his honour that, as soon as the Liberals came into power in Ottawa, they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion, by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

This was the strong language the hon. gentleman then put forth. He was endeavouring then to win the votes of the people. He won the votes of the people, and he tells them now that he is not prepared to carry out his promises. To a deputation representing the general conference of the Methodist Church, March 4th, 1898, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in reference to the proposed plebiscite, said :

If the plebiscite meets with the support of the majority of the people, those who find themselves in the minority will have to concur in the verdict of the majority.

What stronger pledges could be given to the people than were embodied in these declarations and resolutions? Yet, Sir, what is the result? We are told that because only 23 per cent of the electorate of this country voted in favour of prohibition, the Government cannot undertake to supplement it by prohibitory legislation. I am not here to say what the policy of the Government on that question should be. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are alone responsible for the action that will be taken in this House on that question. We on this side of the House are powerless to deal with that question. We are fewer in numbers, and it has been declared by the hon. First Minister, on his side of the House, that that question shall now, henceforth and for ever have no place in the ranks of the Liberal party. Well, Sir, he has told us that because 50 per cent of the electorate did not vote for prohibition, he cannot introduce a prohibitory liquor law. I would like to know whoever thought that 50 per cent of the electorate could be obtained for any measure. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who polled 50 per cent of the electorate in his county? I will take the Ministers of the Crown, who are strong in their constituencies, who usually run in constituencies that are politically strong in their favour. Was there one of them who obtained 50 per cent of the electorate? Not one. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louls Davies) came the nearest to it; he polled 44½ per cent of the electorate in his county. The First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with a majority of over 2,000, only polled 44 per cent of the electorate of his constituency. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) polled 44 per cent; the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) polled 43 per cent; the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), backed up by the temperance sentiment of his county, which he now casts to the winds, polled 44 per cent; the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) 40 per cent; the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) 40 per cent; the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) 40 per cent; the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) 40 per cent; the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) 36 per cent; the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) 37 per cent; and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), in the general election of 1896, 36 per cent. Not one of these men, strong men as they were, running in counties largely Liberal hives, counties that were almost sure to elect Liberals, reached the figure of 50 per cent. And yet these hon. gentlemen, sitting securely in their seats and holding their positions to-day and holding power by virtue of 28 per cent of the electorate of this country, say they are not going to grant prohibition to the temperance people of this country simply because they did not succeed in polling 50 per cent of the electorate of the country.

They say that 23 per cent is too little. Well, does 23 per cent represent the temperance sentiment of this country? We are told that in Quebec three-fourths of the province is under prohibition, or under an option law, notwithstanding the fact that the vote was very largely against prohibition in that province. Then we are told that in many other parts of the country Liberals voted against prohibition in order that the Government might not be put in a hole. Sometimes they charge the Conservatives with having voted for it to put the Government in a hole. I do not know to what extent the latter was the case, but I have reason to believe that many temperance Liberals throughout the country voted against prohibition because they wished to save the Government from the embarrassment of passing a prohibitory liquor law. I know some voters came to me and asked my opinion about it. I told them they need not concern themselves about putting Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a hole, because, from my personal knowledge of that gentleman, he was capable of crawling out of any hole the people could put him in, and he has succeeded in doing so. But I wish more particularly to draw the attention of the House to the secret arrangement which was made to defeat the will of the people of this country. I will give it in the right hon. gentleman's own language, so that I may not misrepresent him. Speaking from his place in the House only a short time ago, the Prime Minister said :

What is the history of the plebiscite? We did not make a pledge to the prohibitionists as a class, as a body, as an association. We made a pledge to the Liberal party. We made that pledge in 1893. * * * Of course, it was attended by Liberals who were prohibitionists, as it was by Liberals who were not prohibitionists. * * * When we put that plank into our platform, there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it should be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand,—

And mark this more particularly. Here is an agreement that was made on behalf of the prohibitionists, on behalf of gentlemen like the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and leading prohibitionists on that side of the House, who were bound by the solemn agreement that was made by their leader in that convention.

—On the other hand, there was an engagement—

Not implied.

—on the part of those who believed in prohibition, that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party.

Now, henceforth and for ever, the question of prohibition has been removed from the ranks of the Liberal party, and it is not a matter of surprise that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), who spoke, as he always does, with great fluency and energy the other night, never referred to the question of prohibition.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Well the hon. gentleman allow me to say that I did not think it necessary to refer to every question. He shall hear from me on that question.

Mr. HENDERSON. No doubt the hon. gentleman's constituents will answer him on that question. He is one of those hon. gentlemen who put party before prohibition. He leaves the question of prohibition to be discussed some later time, and the question of free trade must always have precedence with him. And from the leader of the prohibition party on that side of the House, the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), we have not heard a word. Have we heard a single gentleman on that side of the House say a word on this question, on behalf of that large section of the people throughout this country who, year by year, have been demanding prohibitory legislation? I remember in bygone years, when those gentlemen were sitting on this side of the House, they brought down a resolution and declared that the country was ripe for prohibition. Mr. Speaker, it just depends upon whose ox is being gored. They thought then they could hurt the Government of the day and embarrass it by the resolution which they introduced year after year, but now when the question comes home to them they abandon it and declare through their leader, that now, henceforth and for ever, that question shall never again have place in the ranks of the Liberal party. "A dead issue," sure enough. As I said before, it is so dead that the Liberal party have declared that it shall have no resurrection. So much then for the dead issues. I propose now to deal with some of the great achievements of the Liberal party, and in doing so I shall refer to the words of the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government. In answer to the leader of the Opposition, he said:

First, let me tell the hon. gentleman that we have reformed the tariff.

This was the great achievement of the Liberal party. Not only does he say they have reformed the tariff, but he says:

We have reformed the tariff to the great satisfaction of the majority, both of the producers and consumers.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. I admit that he speaks with great influence, knowing the number of followers that he has behind him, and that he may make a declaration without considering whether it is right or wrong. But I do not believe that that is the sentiment of the people of this country; I do not believe that the people of this country ever said or ever will say, consumers and producers, that the changes made in the tariff were to the satisfaction of all parties. Let us look for a moment at the tariff on agricultural products, and the agricultural industry is one of vast importance indeed. Taking into consideration only the seven months preceding the 31st of January, 1899, we find there was an increase of $170,000 worth of breadstuffs imported into this country over the seven months of the preceding year; we find there were $100,000 worth of provisions, including meats, imported into this country during the same seven months over the importation of the seven months of the previous year. During the same period there was an increase of $2,850,000 in the importations of Indian corn, an article which is grown largely in this country. In 1897 there were twenty-four million bushels of corn produced in the province of Ontario alone, having a value of $10,000,000. Notwithstanding this fact, we find that the hon. gentlemen on your right have introduced a policy by which they have invaded the market of that $10,000,000 worth by an increased importation of $2,850,000. Is it in the interest of the people of this country that $3,120,000 worth of agricultural products produced in this country should be forced out of a market where a preference is given to Canadian products into a market where no preference is given or even sought for?

Let us look for a moment at some of the manufactures of the country. Take, for example, cotton. I hold that whatever policy reduces the labour of this country and deprives the workingmen of their day's work and of their day's wage, is not in the interest of the people. During the year ending June 1st, 1897, there was imported into this country $4,051,000 worth of cotton goods. During the year ending June 31st, 1898, cotton importations had increased to $4,691,000, or an increase in one year under the new policy, the reformed policy, the deformed policy, as I would call it, of $640,000. During the seven months preceding the 31st of January, 1898, there were imported of cotton goods $2,646,000 worth, while for the same period, ending January, 1899, there were imported of cotton goods $3,385,000 worth, or an increase of $739,000 in seven months alone. In the month of January, 1898, there were imported into this country of cotton goods $642,000 worth, and in the same month of 1899 $726,000 worth, an increase, in one month, of $84,000. Eighty-four thousand dollars in one month would be more than $1,000,000 for the whole year. Let us look for a moment at the effect upon raw cotton. During the seven months ending January 31st, 1898, there was imported in raw cotton $2,716,000, and in the same seven months ending January 31st, 1899, there was imported in raw cotton $1,692,000, or a decrease of $1,024,000 worth. What does this mean? It simply means that the artisans of this country were deprived of the labour and of the wages that would accrue therefrom in the manufacture of $1,000,000 worth of cotton goods inside of twelve months. It means that the artisans of this country, the men who are working for a day's wage, and who are depending upon their day's wage to support their families, have been deprived by this deformed policy of the Government of the manufacture of $1,000,000 worth of raw cotton into the manufactured article during these seven months. Is that a policy that can be said to be satisfactory to the people of this country? I trow not. If men are to be deprived of their day's work and of their day's wage where does the satisfaction come in? Let hon. gentlemen, if they dare to appeal to the great electorate of this country, make this question plain to the people, and I believe that the day is not far distant when an answer will be given that will tell the right hon. Prime Minister that his reformed tariff is neither satisfactory to the consumer nor to the producer. Provided the consumer obtains his goods at any less price it might be said that there is some satisfaction in it. I take issue there; I say, and I speak with some knowledge of what I say, that a man cannot buy one yard of print in this country, Canadian-made print, or the best print we have in the country, one fraction of a cent less than what he paid for it a year ago. The consumer, the person who uses these cotton goods does not get a reduction in price. It is not sufficient, but yet it is sufficient to deprive the workmen of the labour of manufacturing these goods and the wages that accrue from that labour. The same thing applies to the importation of hides and skins. I take a special interest in that industry because, in the county I have the honour to represent, there is one of the largest tanneries in the Dominion of Canada. I do not mean to say that they do less work there than before, but I am speaking of the whole country. There were $78,000 worth of hides and skins brought into the country during the seven months to which I have referred, less than were brought in during the seven months of the previous year. The workmen in these tanneries who have to convert these hides and skins into leather have less labour and less money and less in the wages that would accrue to that labour. I know that they have not only less labour, but I have personal knowledge that they have lost part of their wages. A few months after the

Mr. HENDERSON.

Liberal party assumed power, I know of one large firm that took advantage of the cry of the Liberal party that duties were to be reduced, and that they were going step by step towards free trade, to tell their workmen that they must submit to a reduction of 15 cents per day, or $50 per year. That state of affairs exists to-day. The employer of labour, although the duty on that class of leather was not reduced, has reaped the benefit of what he did in 1896. The workmen have to suffer severely from the loss which was brought about, mainly by the declaration of the Liberal party, that they were approaching free trade, and that it would be the policy of this country. The same things applies to other articles. Thirty thousand dollars worth of bicycles were imported during the seven months ending January 31st, 1899, over the same seven months of previous year. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars worth of earthenware, $352,000 worth of glassware, and I commend that item to the attention of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). In musical instruments we imported $34,000 worth, paints and colours $60,000 worth, paper and envelopes $100,000 worth, carpets $150,000 worth, manufactures of leather $56,000. I speak more particularly of these two items of leather and manufactures of paper, because I have the honour to represent a county in which there is a factory turning out a large amount of paper, another one turning out large quantities of leather manufactures, and still another one turning out large quantities of yarn in which there was an increased importation during the seven months of $56,000. I feel keenly the effect of the policy of the Government on these various products, because it affects directly the constituents that I here represent, and I hold it to be my duty to speak on behalf of workingmen in that county who are suffering by a large depletion of their wages simply because of the abominable policy introduced by the present Government or the change that was made by the present Government. The right hon. First Minister said that the cordage business is now prosperous. I presume the hon. gentleman got his information from Mr. Hobbs, of London. It was prosperous for him, but was it prosperous for the farmers of Ontario? We found that during the harvest men were going here and there trying to get 50 pounds of twine or any quantity, and wondering why they could not get the cordage to bind their grain. The fact of it was, that the insane policy of the Government which had taken the duty off twine, closed up large factories in this country, brought about too small an output—not more than half sufficient to bind the crop of this country—created a corner in twine so that the price went up rapidly from day to day; in the course of a few weeks its price of 7½ cents had reached the sum of 15 cents per pound, and the farmers of Ontario were compelled, many of them, to pay the larger price in order to obtain sufficient twine to bind their grain. Fortunately, the foresight of many farmers in Ontario had enabled them to provide for themselves. Many of them had remnants carried over from the previous year—probably fifty or seventy-five pounds—and others again had placed their orders early in the season, and had obtained a sufficient supply to enable them to tide over the difficulties. But others were found wanting, and were compelled to submit to the extortion of such friends of the Government as Mr. Hobbs, of London, and pay the extreme price of 14 cents or 15 cents or 16 cents a pound, for an article which under the Conservative Government could be bought without any difficulty, year after year, for 7½ cents a pound. Let us see what the full effect of this Liberal policy would have been had it not been for the foresight of the farmers in providing twine, some of it the previous year or some of it very early in the season. Let us suppose that these men had been able to corner the twine a little sooner and taking advantage of the policy of the Government had forced the farmers to pay the larger price of 14 or 15 cents per pound for their entire requirements. That would have resulted in a clear loss of over half a million dollars to the farmers of Ontario. With an average of 4,000,000 to cut and bind at two pounds of twine to the acre, 7 cents per pound of an increase would have drawn from the pockets of the farmers of Ontario no less a sum than $560,000.

Another of the achievements which the Government claim is that they have established cold storage. The right hon. Premier says:

We have established a complete system of cold storage for the transportation of perishable goods, and in this alone we have rendered to the people of Canada the most signal service.

Well, Sir, let me say a word about this establishing of cold storage. In the city of Toronto we have an industrial exhibition, a very large institution indeed. People come from the United States and all over Canada, and I dare say from other countries, to visit that exhibition, which is well worth seeing. A directorate, capable of managing a large industrial exposition, has charge of it. They furnish all the requisites, everything is prepared to open the exhibition, and the directors, in order to give it a good start, invite some gentlemen to come and declare the exhibition open. Sometimes His Excellency the Governor General, sometimes the lieutenant-governor of the province, sometimes I dare say the leader of the Government at Ottawa, or some other prominent gentleman is invited to open the exhibition. And when he comes there, after having been suitably entertained, he is put upon the platform and he is told to touch a button that will put the whole machinery of the exhibition in operation. Now, that is just what Mr. Fisher did, when he became Minister of Agriculture. All he had to do was to touch the button, everything was ready for him, the previous Government had worked out all the details and had put the whole system into operation. But because Mr. Fisher only touched the button when he came into power, he says: We did it, and the leader of the Government claims for the Government that they have established a system of cold storage. Why, they are entitled to no more credit for that than I am.

Another achievement of the Government is that they have extended the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. Whether or not that is an achievement that the country will endorse, I am not prepared to say. I am not sure but that the country will yet say, that there was no need for extending the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, and that there was no advantage, especially no advantage at all in keeping with the expenditure accruing from that enterprise. When we decide upon a system of Government management for railways it seems to me—and now I am only speaking for myself—that then it is time enough to consider such projects. If there is an argument at all in favour of extending the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal, the same argument ought to impel the Government to extend that railway to Toronto, because Toronto is becoming the great centre of commerce in this country. And if the policy is right that the Intercolonial Railway should be extended to Montreal, to Toronto, why not to Winnipeg, why not to Vancouver. Where are you going to end? Let me ask: Was the Intercolonial extended to Montreal in the interests of the country or in the interests of the friends of the Government? I fear it is not the interests of the electorate of this country that were consulted. In fact the electorate of this country never was consulted, and the Government have no mandate from the people to extend that railway from Lévis to Montreal. But, Sir, instead of considering the interests of the people of this country, they placed first and foremost the interest of their friends in Montreal and elsewhere, who were interested in a broken-down road, known as the Drummond County Railway.

Now, Sir, I shall conclude by dealing for a few moments with the question of Senate reform. This issue is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and very wisely so, no doubt. I dare say it was left out because the right hon. gentleman knew that if he did put a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne approving of a reform of the Senate along the lines which he has pointed out, then the Address in reply which we are now considering would not receive the sanction of the Upper Chamber. Sir, why have we a Senate at all? Did the fathers of confederation make a mistake? Were they not as wise as the men of the present generation? I think they were. In those days we had men of ability, men whose judgment we could rely on, and time has shown that these men were equal to the task they undertook. They were men of foresight and they gave us two Chambers in the Parliament of Canada to administer the Government of this country. It was then contended that the smaller provinces would not be justified in going into confederation unless they had their rights and privileges guaranteed by an independent body outside of the House of Commons. That principle was conceded by men like the Hon. George Brown, by men on both political sides. It was not a question on which the fathers of confederation were at issue, they agreed upon it and gave us the Senate to protect the smaller provinces. Now, Sir, we are a confederation of only a little over a quarter of a century old. In another quarter of a century the great North-west will be filled up by millions of people, I have no doubt, and then the province of Ontario will be one of the smaller provinces. On behalf of the province of Ontario, I protest against the destruction of the power of the Senate, or its abolition. In the interests of the province of Ontario I ask that the Senate with all its present powers, should be preserved, not only to conserve the interests of the smaller provinces now, but to conserve the interests of the larger provinces of the present day, which may in the course of 25 or 30 years be amongst the smaller provinces of this Dominion.

The question of what the Senate has done to deserve being abolished, or being beheaded, or having its powers destroyed, has been referred to in this House from time to time. I do not purpose to make any extended reference to it; but I think the Senate of Canada has shown its usefulness in more ways than one. It did, no doubt, during the past thirty years, throw out some sixty-five Government Bills. For which of these Bills is it to-day to be destroyed? Is it to be destroyed for the good it has done, or for the harm it has done? And for which of these Bills is it to be destroyed? The right hon. First Minister, speaking a short time ago in this House, said the greatest crime that was ever committed against Canadian interests was the rejection of the Yukon Bill; and for the rejection of that Bill the Senate is to be destroyed. I believe I speak the sentiments of the large majority of the people of Canada, when I say, that one of the greatest services the Senate ever performed to the people of this country was when it rejected that Bill. Sir, the question of a Senate for the Dominion of Canada reminds me of a speech delivered a few nights ago in this House by one of the members for Toronto, in which he stated that, had we had in the province of Ontario since confederation a second Chamber that province would be in a very much better condition than it is to-day. That is my opinion. I hold to that opinion honestly and conscientiously. I believe that, had we had a second Chamber in the province of Ontario, to check hasty, extravagant, reckless legislation, that province to-day would be a richer province and one with better laws—laws that would not require the judges to be called in every time you wanted to read two or three lines, to tell you what they meant. The province of Ontario at confederation had a full purse provided by the Dominion of Canada, with large subsidies and large trust funds, bearing interest, and sufficient to enable the province to carry on its own affairs. During the first years of confederation that province was able to save large sums of money, which were invested at interest in order to provide for the time when the capital of the province, in the shape of its timber, would be sold off, and the revenue somewhat depleted, and thus stave off the day of direct taxation. But we have no Senate, and the government of the day was rampant with the revenues and resources of the province; and to-day, with the province loaded up with a debt of $5,000,000, the government is driven to the terrible necessity of putting through a Tax Bill to tax the widows and orphans of workingmen to pay the interest on the borrowed money. I challenge any hon. gentleman to deny it. That is the record of the Government of Ontario; but that government, for its acts, will have to answer the people of Ontario. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. G. W. GANONG (Charlotte). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to cover all the ground that has been covered by the hon. gentleman who has preceded me; but I purpose touching upon two or three points that were brought out, particularly by the right hon. First Minister who, I presume, represents the opinions of the Liberal party in this House. Sir, since the election in 1896 this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, has been looking, and, I regret to say, looking in vain, for some evidence of those brilliant parts that have been attributed to the right hon. leader of the Government that are of some practical value to the country. I do not dispute that the right hon. gentleman has brilliant parts, and that he frequently gives us a display of them. I do not think any gentleman in this House will deny the brilliancy of a certain character exhibited by the right hon. gentleman on the floor of this House, whether that brilliancy has been of any practical advantage to this country or not. I do not, however, purpose to demean myself by taking the same position which the right hon. gentleman took in his brilliant exhibition of vituperation against the hon. leader of the Opposition. Certainly, Sir, if the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government can afford to send such material forth to the public, the hon. leader of the Opposition can well afford to allow him to give this exhibition of a brilliant failure to meet the logical facts and arguments which were presented to the House by him and the gentlemen who followed him. I say, I do not purpose questioning, but rather affirming, that the hon. leader of this House has many brilliant parts. He can produce a brilliant rhetorical effect, more particularly if he is given time in which to prepare for it. He has a brilliancy of imposing postures, and a brilliancy of graceful, emphatic and studied gestures, all of which are used to the best effect, but whether with any advantage to the country, I leave to the judgment of this House. They are, Sir, very much of the sky-rocket style—graceful, soaring, of brilliant colours, which fade away into nothingness, of no value, and having no effect whatever for the purpose for which they are intended. The people of this country have about tired of these exhibitions of sky-rocket gymnastics by political acrobats. It is about time we had a change, and the people are demanding it. They want the right hon. leader of this House to deal with the varied industries of this country on a more practical basis—on the basis on which he appealed to the country before 1896, and on which he obtained power; and not to shirk the issues and responsibilities that he is called upon to represent after having attained power. This class of performances we have had ever since the show began in 1896; but the people of this country have the right to demand, at least, one thing, that the performance should be as advertised prior to 1896. Since the curtain rose in that year, we have had a succession of three or four acts. The first act in the show was certainly very disappointing, and the successive acts of 1897 and 1898 were no improvement. But, Sir, the display of 1899 has proved a greater farce than all those that have preceded it, and the people of the country are praying that it may be the last act in the farce. They have been simply playing as opportunist actors who have travelled and tramped this country for years, regular travelling troupes, crying death to the protective policy which the Conservative party introduced into this country. During all these years they were declaring that, when they came into power, they would destroy that policy, root and branch, but when they did obtain office, they did not dare to touch the principles they had decried for so many years.

We had a little talk from our hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) the other night, who expressed the hope that free trade would eventually come. Well, at the rate it is coming to-day in this country, the hon. gentleman will live to the age of Methuselah, and even outlive that age, ere he will see the first vestige of what he is hoping for.

Hon. gentlemen in this House and the people of this country have heard the Liberal party in their tramp through this country bewailing the extravagance of the late Government. But, Sir, they had hardly reached power before they forgot all their wailings and forgetting their pledges to reduce expenditure from $1,000,000 even to $4,000,000, they found that they had made a mistake in their figuring, and instead of decreasing it they have succeeded in increasing our expenditure from $1,000,000 to $4.

000,000, and the end is not yet, if we are to believe the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). We heard these gentlemen, while out of office, crying out for purity of government, but we have found them, since they got into office, doing their very utmost to cripple perhaps the only two powers that have any control over them, namely, the Auditor General and the Senate—the only two powers that will probably prevent these opportunists from despoiling the treasury and perpetrating such frauds as were intended by the Drummond and Yukon deals.

They went about crying out for independence of Parliament, year after year, yet the very moment they came into office, they forgot their pledge. Have they been independent? Why, they do not know the significance of the word. For on the seats even now at the back of these hon. gentlemen are supporters of theirs who hold promises of emolument from this Government. And I notice there are ten or twelve faces missing on the opposite side of the House of former members who have secured comfortable positions. There is, for instance, the present Judge Lister; there is also Judge Lavergne; another one is Judge Langelier; another one, who could not float his little scheme down in Quebec for the establishment of an abattoir, has become Judge Choquette, and others have succeeded in being translated to seats in the Senate. There are others who hold promises of places and emoluments now supporting hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, and yet these are the hon. gentlemen who talked incessantly about the independence of Parliament. But we do not hear much from them on that subject now.

These hon. gentlemen also went from one end of this country to the other decrying the Conservative party for trifling with the great question of prohibition, which has been agitating this country for years. The party to which they belong, on that warm summer's day in July, in this city, referred to, I think, by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, passed a resolution by which they determined to put themselves on record. And it is worthy of note to see how these gentlemen are shirking that issue to-day. They claim that it is not a party question. Why, then, in the name of heaven, did they put it in their party platform? To-day they are shirking that issue in every way they possibly can, in order to avoid what they know will be the ultimate result, their defeat by the temperance party of this country. They gave out at that convention, and in speeches subsequent to it, every assurance that one honourable should require of another, that if the majority voted in favour of prohibition, a prohibitory law would be enacted. But having hoodwinked the temperance people to vote for them and place them in power, they now turn round, and from this brilliant actor, the right hon.

gentleman who leads them, the prince of the realm of farce, the temperance workers of this country are told that the Government were simply fooling them, that there was an implied understanding or agreement among the Liberals that even if the people polled on this question as large a majority as placed the Government in power, that even if they polled a vote of 616,252, they would not give prohibition at all. There is nothing in any of their statements to show that they had any intention of giving prohibition, even if 75 per cent of the enrolled votes were polled for it. Their plebiscite was simply a subterfuge in order to catch the temperance vote. And just in connection with this, I would ask permission to read a little item from a newspaper that cannot be considered other than a Liberal organ. Evidently this implied understanding or agreement was not kept a secret exactly, for if we are to believe the suggestions given by this item, there are other parties in the country who received the tip as well. Let me quote from the Montreal "Witness" of March 30th, 1899:

We have, however, from other sources, ground for surmise that some other Ministers understood the conditions of the plebiscite contest to be impossible ones. The Roman Catholic clergy of this province had been universally informed from some source, which they regarded as definite, that no legislation would follow. The Archbishop of Montreal, when asked for his support to the prohibition cause, commenced his reply by saying "There will be no law." That was practically his answer, and he treated any further discussion of the question of prohibition as purely academic.

We also have the fact that of the seven Ministers of the Crown from the province of Quebec, at least two or three of these hon. gentlemen either spoke or worked against prohibition previous to the vote on the plebiscite, and the very Minister whom the temperance people in this country expected to take a stand as a man should take it on this particular question, who had been advocating prohibition almost from his childhood up, and who spoke in its favour once or twice, I believe, in this House, was boosted off, if I am not mistaken, to Europe, in case he should stick his feet into the mud as the right hon. leader of the Government did in his speech the other day. The other gentlemen who advocated that great cause, being, however, a little more wary, were allowed to remain at home, and do what good they could by helping the Government to defeat the prohibitionists. There are in this country 278,478 voters, representing the most intelligent classes in this country, progressive, law-abiding citizens—yes, and I believe there are many thousands more belonging to the same great army. Personally, I would like this House to dissolve and appeal to the country on that question, and I believe that the prohibitionists would return so large a representation to this House that no Government would dare to do otherwise than pass a prohibitory law. I believe that nothing has done so much to weld together the better classes of the people, the people who desire to obtain the highest standard of morality, than this conduct of the present Government. These people, representing this great moral force, will in the future demand their rights and demand them in an unmistakable manner. They do not represent simply 278,478 citizens, but, in this great fight for the interests of Canada, they represent the masses of the women and children of this country. They represent not only 248,748 voters, but four and a half millions of Canadian citizens. If this Government or any other Government think they can ignore that class, they make a mistake, the biggest they ever made in their lives. These people demand that their homes shall be protected. The mass of the people are fighting for principle, whether a few politicians are or not. This Government has been playing fast and loose with the temperance people ever since 1893, and none except those who are in the ring know how many there are that are guilty of this villainy. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not the class of performance the country has been looking for. But hon. gentlemen opposite will claim, just the same, that they have been carrying out their pledges, while all the time they have simply been dodging issues and repudiating pledges, never attempting to meet any argument on the floor of this House.

I do not purpose going into the details of the extravagance and mismanagement of this Government that have so worried the Prime Minister and the gentlemen sitting behind him. They worried the Prime Minister so that it took all his energy to get up that sunny smile on an average of once a day—he could not keep it all the time. I simply propose to refer to two or three points in this brilliant apology for things left undone. The right hon. leader of the Government said, in referring to the defeat of the Yukon Bill, that it was the greatest crime ever committed against Canadian interests. Mr. Speaker, in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the people do not look upon that as the right hon. gentleman does. They think that if it were a crime, the citizens of Canada are prepared to shoulder it, and will regard it, and history will record that in that year, 1898, such crimes were but an evidence of the highest virtue. The hon. gentleman had his redress. If he is not guilty of the crime, he is guilty of being an accessory after the fact. He has had over a year to repair that crime, and has he ever made a move? If he felt that it was a crime to defeat the Bill—there was hardly a man behind him thought so—why did not he appeal to the country, get the voice of the people on it and come back here and determine whether it was a crime or a virtue? Why has not the hon. gentleman ever asked for a tender since that time? Tenders have gone out of style. I know, with the Government; but they have not gone out of style with the people of this country. The hon. gentleman has had a year, and in that time we have not heard a word of the requirements of this Teslin Lake Railway or tramway of 150 miles. Why did he not bring it up in the caucus of his party. There is not a doubt that if he had he could not have got twelve members behind him who would dare to appeal to the country on that issue. While the sigh of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) was long and loud over the defeat of his pet scheme, gentlemen who went into the Senate Chamber when it was determined that crime should not be committed, know that the sighs of relief from other hon. gentlemen on the same side drowned those of the Minister of the Interior. Why, Sir, if a business man came to you and made such a statement as the right hon. First Minister made in this House, knowing the facts of the case, which have been published to the country, while your innate courtesy might prevent you from saying, Thou fool, you would have no difficulty in determining what class of people the man belonged to, just the same. Why were there no tenders for this important tramway? Well, there are two reasons, I think. One reason is that the hon. the First Minister has a Napoleon in his Cabinet, and that Napoleon has recently taken to issuing atlases. We saw a sample of one of them; how many more there are we do not know. But the Prime Minister would naturally be careful until he knew whether a new atlas giving away the Yukon country had been issued. The Minister of the Interior was willing to give away our claims on the coast, and the First Minister did not know until the atlas was out, whether we owned anything there or whether the Minister of the Interior had given it away. But there is probably another reason why this infamous Bill was not resurrected, and one much more likely. Some people do, after a considerable length of time, learn wisdom. These gentlemen have been learning a little within the last few years, but it took them eighteen years before they learned their A B C. They learned some wisdom from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair); they learned that a Drummond County Railway Bill was presented, that a revision of that Bill saved this country $500,000. Of course, that is a crime in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, but if you appeal to the great electorate of this country, I think it will be considered one of the highest virtues. And, Sir, I believe that the people of this country to-day are behind the Opposition and behind the sentiments that defeated that infamous Bill for the Yukon Railway. The hon. First Minister, taking his cue from the Minister of Railways and Canals, concluded that he would not take any chances of having a railway built for a million acres of land for which he was willing to give 4,500,000 acres. In his eyes this may seem a crime, but it would be more in accordance with his pretensions of honest administration if he had called openly for tenders, so as to determine what amount this railway was worth.

Now, there is another point in the speech of the First Minister that I wish to refer to, and it deals more particularly with the plebiscite. With your permission, I will read one paragraph of the speech:

That is the problem now before us; and I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, speaking here with the authority which I hold from my position, and as I hope with the confidence of my party behind me,—

Do you suppose the right hon. gentleman ever made a speech in this House when he did not know he had the party behind him.

—that the voice of the electorate which has been pronounced in favour of prohibition is not such as to warrant the Government in introducing a prohibitory measure. Moreover, there was not a man living who expected, at the time the plebiscite was taken, that the duty would be imposed on the Government of introducing a prohibitory measure unless at least one-half of the electorate recorded their votes in favour of that policy. Sir, was there any other view expressed? Was the view expressed, before the plebiscite was taken, that the question should be decided upon a comparison of the votes recorded on one side with those recorded on the other? If such a view was expressed, I never heard it, and I do not believe it was expressed.

Well, now, I wish, before I pass along, to quote a supporter of the First Minister when the plebiscite Bill was before this House. In replying to the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the Minister of Railways and Canals made these, which I think quite important statements. In regard to the question of voting, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said:

I think that if my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill were here, he would point out to the hon. member for Haldimand that it would be more in accordance with the fitness of things that the same constituency which has the right to choose the representatives of the people in this House should also pass upon the question of prohibition.

And, notwithstanding the fact that there are a majority of members in this House to-day who are elected by constituencies that voted for prohibition, still the hon. gentleman refused to pay any attention to the prohibition vote.

Then the Minister of Railways and Canals further states:

After all, the potential voice is the voice which is expressed by the representatives here, when we finally come to deal with this question.

The potential voice does not amount to anything on the prohibition question, but the potential voice is all-important when it gives these hon. gentlemen office. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman must have been out of town during all this time. He says here "not a man living." Why, is it possible the First Minister consulted every man in Canada? If he was not satisfied when he made that speech, he has been satisfied since that there are good live men in this country who do not agree with him, and he will be better satisfied after another general election. What a history it will be to write of this innocent, both abroad and at home, so ignorant of the conditions in this country. Then he says:

These are some of the opinions which I claim are entitled to some respect.

They would be for gentlemen who had supported him at this convention. He selected three or four Ministers, I believe, and one hon. member of this House, to prove that every man in Canada agreed with his contention. He goes on to say:

I know that there are some people who believe that, notwithstanding all this, there should be a prohibitory law.

This is an absolute denial of the former statement in the same speech. Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman has any doubt that there are some people still alive who do believe that, here is another minister who does not agree with the right hon. gentleman. He is not a minister of the Crown but a minister of the Gospel, I believe. The Reverend G. C. Huxtable, of the Methodist Church, in a letter to the Montreal "Witness," says:

The plebiscite was a mockery pure and simple, a political dodge, and a fraud of the worst magnitude. I have been a Reformer all my life. I gave my vote in the last election for Sir Wilfrid; but I will regard it henceforth as a duty I owe to my conscience, my country and my God, to withhold from him my support.

Then there are others. I hold in my hand a resolution of the Dominion Alliance which I will put on the "Hansard" in order that hon. gentlemen may have it for future reference. This resolution was adopted by the Executive Committee of the Dominion Alliance on March 14, 1899, and I believe this was one of the societies that had some influence, apparently, in inducing the First Minister to take up this plebiscite, fancying that if he could merely hoodwink them, he could carry the temperance vote in the country, which no doubt he did. This is the resolution:

Whereas the Dominion Parliament has at different times declared that prohibition is the right and only effective remedy for the evils of intemperance, and that Parliament is ready to enact such legislation when public opinion is prepared to sustain it, and

Whereas the Dominion Government and Parliament ordered a plebiscite to ascertain whether or not the people are in favour of prohibitory legislation, and

Whereas the electors of Canada were led to believe that the Government and Parliament of Canada intended to be governed in their legislative action by the mandate of the people thus invited, the Premier and other members of the Government having definitely declared that the Government would give effect to the will of the people as expressed in the proposed plebiscite, and

Whereas the plebiscite so ordered resulted in a substantial majority in favour of prohibition of all the votes cast in the whole Dominion, including an overwhelming majority of the votes polled in all the provinces but one, and a large proportion of all the possible votes in these provinces, and

Whereas the Prime Minister of Canada has stated on behalf of the Government that in the opinion of the Government, the expression of public opinion recorded did not represent such a proportion of the electorate as would justify the introduction by the Government of a prohibitory measure, therefore

Resolved, that this meeting desires to express its strong dissatisfaction at the refusal of the Government to carry out the promise to take such steps as would give effect to the expressed will of the people, and earnestly calls upon the representatives of the people in Parliament to accept the mandate of the electorate, and carry it out by enacting such prohibitory legislation as will fairly embody the will of the people as expressed at the poll.

That a copy of the foregoing resolution be sent to every member of the Dominion Parliament, along with a statement to be prepared by the President and Secretary of this Alliance, calling attention to the magnitude and character of the prohibition vote, and the duty it imposes upon the Parliament and Government.

The hon. gentleman, no doubt, has a copy of that, and by this time he probably has some idea that the temperance people of this country did not expect to have to poll more than one-half the enrolled vote in order to get a prohibitory law enacted. All the information, apparently, so far as any evidence has been produced, or so far as we can find from members of the Government, was given to some inside ring, we do not know whether there were ten, or twenty, or thirty, and in addition was given to the Catholic clergy of the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman will remember, however, in the debate on the Plebiscite Bill, when pressed by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), for a more definite reply in regard to the majority that would be required, how exceedingly evasive he was. While at that time it might seem desirable as party politics, in the light of his more recent statements, we certainly can now understand how evasive his answers were. During the campaign when I gave what little assistance I could in my county to one of the most prominent Liberals and one of the greatest temperance workers in this country, I was proud to be able to quote the right hon. the First Minister, and when even some of his own party would come to me and say it was a fraud, I would show them his statement on this question, and I read from the "Hansard" to prove it; not only did I read his statements but those of the Minister of Agriculture as well. The people in my constituency voted in good faith, believing in the honesty of the statements made by the leader of the Liberal party and by his colleagues. I quote the hon. gentleman's words which I will give to this House:

I have often said, and I can only repeat, that when the will of the people has been affirmed, as it will be affirmed, one way or the other, then the Government, every Government, must be prepared to abide by the consequences.

I had still some faith in the honour of the leader of the Government, and in his honour as a man, although he had repudiated every pledge in the platform of 1893. I could excuse the hon. gentleman for having done that, for having repudiated the pledges by which he got into power, for we know well enough that behind him there is a crying horde who are constantly after him. On one side there are the protectionists, the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Livingston), the member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), and the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—or is he a new convert?—the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), and last but not least, the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Public Works. There was some excuse for him going back on his pledges of tariff reform, and fighting shy of his free trade speeches. There was also some excuse for him going back on the question of the independence of Parliament of which we have evidence in the appointment of Judges Lister, Langelier, Choquette, Lavergne, and others. These gentlemen have simply gone to their rewards, and there is some reason because we know there are hon. gentlemen over there who are simply waiting to be translated. There may also be some excuse allowed to the hon. gentleman for his twistings and turnings and backslidings upon a great many other questions, under pressure from his followers. But when it came to the great moral question of prohibition the people had a right to expect that that hon. gentleman would treat them in a fair and candid manner. We had a right to expect that honour would assert itself outside of the knightly honour that is presumed to go with what some hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party have called the honour that goes with tinsel titles. But, Mr. Speaker, I propose again to refer to this prohibition vote. The hon. gentleman plainly stated that if the vote was against prohibition that he would end it. Why did not the hon. gentleman just as frankly state that it did not make any difference what vote the people gave, that that ended it any way? He should have told the people that all over the country just as plainly, that was the whole purpose of it. He knew at the time the compact was made that unless 616,925 people voted for prohibition he would not touch it at all. If the hon. gentleman would be frank enough he would go further and say that by this impossible condition it was implied that the Government would never touch the question, and the people would forgive him perhaps for a few of his faults. When this question came up in the House, when the Bill was brought in the first time, one of the followers of that hon. gentleman, I believe it was the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) opposed it, although I am inclined to think that he did not vote on it at all, but he opposed it because it was foreign to the traditions of the British nation. Well, Sir, it is foreign without any doubt, but the right hon. First Minister knew that when he introduced the Bill, and he knew further that in all those countries where the plebiscite system prevails, such as Belgium, Switzerland and France, under no circumstances was any question submitted to a plebiscite vote in which half of the electorate ever voted on that question. He knew from the start that the conditions were absolutely impossible of fulfilment. The Montreal "Witness," which is a friend of the Government, says further in regard to this vote:

A majority of all the voters upon the list on one side of any question is an unheard-of thing. To get a majority for prohibition would require not only that the vote on an abstract question should be as full as in the best contested personal elections, say seven-tenths of the registered electorate, a thing utterly beyond precedent in votes of the kind, but it would require that of the vote so polled the prohibitionists should get over five-sevenths, or seventy-two per cent.

The hon. gentleman has said that if there was a negative vote that ended it, but according to his plan submitted to this country and to the implied agreement among his own followers, any vote that would be cast would be a negative vote. But are we through with this question yet? It is wearying to the Government, but you will find that we are not through with it. We shall see ere long another foreign invasion to let themselves down easy. Before long there will be some good supporter of the Government say: "Let us have a referendum," and I should not be surprised if they were to resort to that as an easy attempt to get the Government out of a corner. "Let us have a referendum; let us pass a law under which the several provinces can determine for themselves whether they want prohibition or not, let us pass a law allowing them to adopt it." That is probably the plan our friends will adopt to get out of it. I do not know, I am sure, what the opinion of other temperance men may be, but so far as I am concerned I should oppose it from the start. A referendum giving such powers to each province would be nothing more or less than an enlarged local option law: a referendum would put the several provinces in this country in about the same position that the state of Maine is in to-day, a state to which hon. gentlemen refer when they wish to give the prohibitionists a slap. I would oppose a referendum that would place us in the same position as the state of Maine. The effect would be to place the several provinces in a relation to the Federal Government similar to that occupied by the state of Maine in regard to the Federal Government of the United States. For a fee of $25 any man in the state of Maine can obtain a license from the Federal Government to sell intoxicating liquors. That is in absolute conflict with the law in Maine, and when these two laws come into conflict the result is to bring the prohibition law into disrepute. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has a great facility for obtaining taxation, and it would not be very long with such a condition of affairs as would exist under a referendum to introduce a similar condition into this country. It is only a few years ago that the great temperance bodies of St. John met together and framed a law in regard to licenses. They carried this law to the Government, then led by the hon. Minister of Railways, and what did he do? Passed a law in conformity with the request of the people of St. John? No, Sir. He had never discovered before the license system that they had in St. John gave so large an income, and the result was that he framed a law to suit himself so that the local government could obtain from St. John about $20,000 of their license money. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) knows that as well as I do. So that there would be no difficulty in soon bringing these two laws into conflict were the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals still allowed to have a seat in this House. What a history of duplicity there has been in regard to these statements. In the light of these recent statements I would like to quote a little further. In introducing the Bill the right hon. Prime Minister said:

Sir, this Bill has been brought down in this form for good and obvious and certain reasons.

Can any hon. gentleman in this House now doubt that the good and obvious and certain reasons were to relieve the Government of their responsibility and to defeat the purposes of the temperance party?

At last we are taking a practical step—the first serious step that is to be taken if prohibition is to become law. At present the only thing we want is to have the honest expression of the people—

Did he want to have an honest expression of the people?

—on this question; and we have provided for obtaining this expression by disentangling the question from every other consideration, and by asking every man who comes to the poll to say whether he is in favour of a prohibitory law. The hon. gentleman stated that there would be a certain majority in other provinces. All that remains to be seen. I do not know what that vote will be—

And then his frankness came out:

I do not care.

And it is quite evident, from the action of the right hon. the Prime Minister and his Government since the plebiscite vote was taken, that none of them cared what the vote might be.

I simply claim this for the Government, that they have honestly—

Mr. GANONG.

I wonder if there is an encyclopædia within reach of this House, that it might be sent over to the First Minister to let him know what that expression means.

I simply claim this for the Government, that they have honestly redeemed the pledge they made to the people, that they would endeavour to obtain—

How obtain?

—without favour to anybody—

The record shows that they have favoured somebody, and favoured a large proportion of the people.

—and without fear of any consequences,—

That is all right; they had no reason to fear the consequences.

—obtain an honest expression of the opinion of the people on this important question.

They had no cause to fear any consequences, for they put up a job on the prohibition people in this country. Then, the right hon. gentleman said further:

But, Sir, I place myself and the Government in the judgment of the people—

And, Sir, they are in the judgment of the people to-day:

I place myself and the Government in the judgment of the people of this country, those who are in favour of prohibition and those who are not in favour of prohibition, and I ask them if the Government had not acted in this matter as sincerely and as honestly as it was possible for them to act.

The Lord help the possibilities of their being honest and sincere. Why, Sir, in every hamlet and town, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, they are hearing of the judgment of the people on their acts. Every temperance organization knows they have been betrayed. Allow me to quote from the temperance organ in Nova Scotia, the organ, I believe, of the Sons of Temperance. Referring to the Prime Minister's recent announcement on the plebiscite, it says:

And so, after Sir Wilfrid has given us the plebiscite, and has put the country to the cost of a quarter of million of dollars, and the people have given a very decided answer to the question that was put before them, he coolly tells us that a prohibition measure will not be introduced by the Government into the Dominion Parliament. The man who is supposed to be guided by the expressed will of the people, and to lead a responsible Government, has declared that the expression of public opinion recorded at the polls in favour of prohibition did not represent such a proportion of the electorate as would justify the introduction by the Government of a prohibitory measure. And yet those who are opposed to prohibition are in much less proportion to the entire electorate than those who are in favour of prohibition. Has it come to this, that bribery, rum, &c., are going to govern this country, and that majorities consisting of the intelligence, moral excellence and truest patriotism are to be coolly ignored?

I believe the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is getting the judgment of the people, and getting it, as the street Arab would say, right in the teeth. Mr. Speaker, the prohibition party in Canada have had some reason to doubt the First Minister, because three, at least, of his Ministers worked in the province of Quebec against prohibition. But there was one, one little saint, with a halo almost grown, that the prohibitionists thought they could trust. But, Sir, the halo is not in sight any longer, nor is the Minister in this House who was presumed to wear it. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and it was the Minister of Agriculture in whom the temperance party in this country had some little faith. Why, did he (Mr. Fisher) not tell us that in the Liberal convention of 1893: that it was the glory of his life that he had that plank put in the Liberal platform? Was it not he who, on the second reading of the Plebiscite Bill, said:

I feel keenly the honour and responsibility resting on me in having full charge of this Bill, because for many years I have been earnestly active in the work of the prohibition cause in this country, and I feel, in the progress of the cause, the introduction of this Bill marks a very decided step in advance.

Well, Sir, it will take longer for him to make the temperance people of this country believe that that was a step in advance, than it will for the hon. member for Guysborough to get free trade. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) said further:

It was in 1878 that the Canada Temperance Act was adopted by this Parliament, and it is worthy of note that the gentleman with whose name this Act has always been connected, the Hon. Senator Scott, is again to-day a member of the Government which is responsible for the introduction of this Bill.

And still they are shirking the responsibility, and they now claim that the Government is not responsible for it, although it is a plank in their platform. Again, he (Mr. Fisher) states:

During the years from 1878 to the present time the question of prohibition has been frequently before this House, being brought to the attention of hon. members usually in the form of a general resolution in favour of the total prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in Canada.

By whom, I would like to ask, was that resolution brought forward in this House. It antedates the time I had the honour of a seat in Parliament, but I believe it was brought forward by a prominent Liberal from the maritime provinces, a gentleman who represents that constituency down at the southern end of Nova Scotia, called Yarmouth. It was by him that this resolution had been brought to the attention of this House from year to year, and in the same form, and by the same party, and for the same purpose. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) is not dead. He still has the honour of a seat in this House, and he has not yet been translated, but I have no doubt that a judgeship will be found for him, and that very readily, if he attempts to bring in any similar resolution this session. Why, Sir, he is still as young as he ever was, and feeling as young, if one can judge by these youthful gyrations he has been attempting to make during the last year or so. The fact of the matter is, that a great many of these gentlemen opposite who are longing for office, are so happy under the Liberal rule that it makes them dance. Last year, at a meeting of the Alliance, it was suggested to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) that it was desirable that he should bring forward this resolution; but he would not touch it. Oh, no, he said; the Government have a Bill of their own now, and it might interfere with that. He did not want to do anything to frustrate what the Government might be disposed to do with regard to prohibition, for they had put it as a plank in their platform. This year he need not fear that trouble: everything has gone overboard, down to the bottom of the sea, and he has an excellent chance for exercising the rights he formerly assumed. But, Sir, I fear that this gentleman (Mr. Flint) wobbles—and I use that word advisedly, because it was used by a gentleman from the province of Nova Scotia, and who is a great temperance worker. At the Dominion Alliance a short time since, I think the gentleman applied the word to the Prime Minister; and, although I may be incorrect in that, he at all events said that either the First Minister or the Government had wobbled on this question.

The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) was the author of what I believe was known as the Flint resolution, which has occupied, every year, I believe, as much of the time of this Parliament as those other great questions that were brought forward—the amendment to the Criminal Code and the Sabbath Observance Bill, which we have heard so much of, but which the hon. First Minister himself quietly sat down on last year. Now, I had the pleasure of attending a meeting of the Dominion Alliance about ten or twelve days ago, at which the question of the plebiscite was discussed from the Alliance standpoint. The hon. member for Yarmouth gave expression to his views, and I wish to give them to the House, as I think they should be placed on "Hansard" for future reference. I will read from the report, which is substantially correct, as I believe the hon. gentleman himself will acknowledge:

T. B. Flint, M.P., said that he had been disappointed in the result of the plebiscite. He had expected a larger vote in its favour. Members of Parliament were only influenced by the vote of their own constituents. They cared nothing for the feelings of people a thousand miles away. He would have been gratified if the Government had brought in a prohibitory measure, and had appealed to the country on that basis.

It was not a question of principle at all with the hon. gentleman that afternoon; it was a question of what would suit his Yarmouth constituency. Now, Sir, I am not prepared to say that the hon. gentleman was a member of that great aggregation in 1893 of the talents of the whole country, such as they existed in the Liberal party, but of which this country has not a very high opinion today; but I think he must have been, and I will give you the reason. If not, it looks as if he must have had a straight tip on the question. I notice that he did not speak on the plebiscite Bill until it was almost running away from him. He allowed it to pass its first reading and its second reading without speaking; but, just as it was about going to its third reading, the hon. gentleman got on his feet, and I ask you to look at the wording of his remarks, which show where the hon. gentleman stood at that time:

It may be possible that a majority of the whole electors will express their views in favour of a prohibitory law as asked in the plebiscite question, and at the same time it is quite possible, and in my opinion highly probable, that the majority of Parliament may dissent from the view of the majority of the electors.

I do not wish to do an injustice to the hon. gentleman, who has, so far as the public know, stood for temperance principles for many years, and whom we have always regarded as a true friend of the temperance movement; but I will ask you to parallel this statement with that of the First Minister in regard to the majority, and you will note a family resemblance that is unmistakable.

I have, Sir, referred to the Alliance meeting of last week, and wish for a few moments to do so again. As a prohibitionist on principle, not because my constituents demanded it of me, I attended that meeting, as I try to keep in touch with the movement. We had some spirited addresses there; but, by the way, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was conspicuous by his absence, as he was last year. A majority of the members of the House who attended that convention, owing to the preponderance of Liberals in this House, were Liberals, and I purpose giving you their names as reported: Senator Yeo, G. R. Maxwell, A. J. S. Copp, P. Macdonald, J. G. Rutherford, W. B. McInnes, Thomas Bain, J. Scriver, H. J. Logan, W. S. Calvert, Thos. O. Davis, Bell, T. B. Flint, T. Christie, J. C. Campbell, F. K. Erb, Robert Beith, John McMullen, Robt. Holmes, Frank Oliver, R. L. Richardson, J. L. Bethune, John Tolmie, Leonard Burnett, Firman McClure, Jas. B. Brown, McIsaac, James Sutherland; in all, 28 members of the Liberal party were represented at that meeting. We had some speeches there. Mr. Spence, the secretary of the Alliance, moved a resolution which read as follows:

That in the opinion of this meeting the results of the recent plebiscite are such as to call for the enactment of prohibitory legislation.

That resolution, I believe, was seconded by a member of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie). This naturally brought out a good deal of discussion, and we heard, I think, from the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). We also heard from a Conservative, who was more frank than some of the Liberals. He stated that he was very glad indeed to see this resolution brought forward, for it placed the temperance party and the Government in their proper light. I read from the report:

A. Broder, M.P., said that to ask Liberal members to vote for such a resolution was to ask them to declare their want of confidence in the Government. He thought that was a good idea. It would show who among them were willing to sacrifice their party for principle. The proper thing to do was to place the responsibility where it belonged, upon the Executive of the country.

Well, it looked different after that; and, Sir, there was scarcely time enough to write a resolution before we had an amendment to it. The resolution looked like a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and those 28 gentlemen did not feel like voting want of confidence in the Government—not at all. I want to give Mr. Spence credit, for I have heard him maligned to some extent by people outside, and I do not think a gentleman who would write a resolution like that and put it before the Alliance can be accused of very much duplicity. But we had some amendments to the resolution, brought forward by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) and seconded by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). These were the amendments:

Whereas,—

I always like to have a lawyer make a resolution, he can get so many 'whereases' into it.

Whereas, in the opinion of this meeting, the vote polled by the electors of Canada in favour of prohibition at the recent plebiscite was so large and influential that Parliament should not ignore the demand thereby made for prohibitory legislation;—

Very much milder than the original, you see.

—and whereas, the Government has declined to introduce and become responsible for such legislation; therefore be it

Resolved,—

What?

That a committee of seven be appointed by this meeting to decide upon a plan of action whereby the views of those in favour of prohibition may be brought directly before Parliament at this session.

The chairman ruled that those entitled to vote on the resolutions were members of the committee who had been appointed by the Alliance, and all members of Parliament who were prohibitionists. The amendment was then put and carried by a show of hands, 29 to 11, and so far as I could see, the members who voted for that, every one of them, were Liberals. Now, Sir, everything up to that time was going as smoothly as possible. They had avoided the question of a vote of want of confidence in the Government. They had slid off into a committee of seven, but the music then began to play and the whip of the Liberal party put in his voice. What did he say? He said he had come to see what was going on and he took a hand in the affair. The report says:

Mr. James Sutherland said that neither the resolution nor the vote was an honest expression of opinion. The whole proceedings were farcical. The same kind of thing had been going on year after year, and he was tired of it.

How much that hon. gentleman has ever done for the cause of prohibition or how much he has had the weight of it on his shoulders, I am sure I do not know, but I can assure the hon. gentleman one thing, it is not prohibition that makes a man tired, but the want of it that gives one that tired feeling.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

Mr. GANONG. When the House rose after recess, I was referring to the presence of the whip of the Liberal party, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and his statements before the Temperance Alliance. I say, Sir, that considering the fact that the hon. gentleman representing North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has never been known as an ardent prohibitionist, and considering that the meeting was called more especially for those members of Parliament who were prohibitionists, his presence at that meeting was a great surprise. But his presence for the purpose he avowed was a piece of the most brazen effrontery. What was his purpose as stated? Nothing more or less than to indicate to the Liberal members who were there that the whip of the Liberal party had his eye on them and they had better be careful what they did. Now, Sir, that was not the only case in which the whip of the Liberal party has used his power. During the speech of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) the other evening, when he was pressing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) with some questions, the whip of the party, dreading lest the Minister of Agriculture should get on his feet and make some mistakes from a party standpoint, as the leader had done, slid into the chair beside him and advised him to keep quiet and take his gruel—which he did. Where, Mr. Speaker, oh, where, are these ardent prohibitionists that were assembled in that little room upstairs the other day? I cannot give any definite reason why they are not here, but from appearances and from the action of the whip of the party the apparent reason is that they are looking after the loaves and fishes that have been promised by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) rather than after temperance questions to which formerly they seemed so attached. The fear lest they may lose some public grant or some promised offices under this Government has kept them very quiet indeed. Why, the fact is that this debate would have passed without a word from an individual member of the Liberal party attending that Alliance had it not been that the Opposition party felt it their duty to the country to place the facts more fully than they had previously been placed before the country. It is true the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) has spoken; but he fought shy of the prohibition question. He never mentioned it in the course of his abusive speech directed against the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). We did have a few words from the hon. member from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) the other night, to which I will probably refer a little further later on. But they have all been fighting shy of this question. I would like to know why the hon. member for Saskatchewan did not mention it. Was it that he, like his leader, knew that the Bill that was conceived in 1893 was stillborn. Certainly that was the fact of the case. Then we had a speech from the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure). If any two gentlemen on the Government benches ever put in an uneasy half hour, they were the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) during the early part of that speech, when the hon. member for Colchester dealt with the temperance question. The two Ministers never winked or blinked, they kept their eyes so steadily on the member (Mr. McClure). But soon their anxious moments were over for eventually the hon. member turned and whitewashed the whole party. But I can tell the hon. member that the class of whitewashing used will not stand before the storm of protests coming up from every part of this country. The hon. member for Burrard did the same old job. And where are the rest of them after the flagellation they had received from the whip of the party. Are they like sheep waiting for the Minister of Agriculture, who plays bell-wether to the party, to jump the fence first. If they are, in my opinion they will wait until the millenium. Why, Sir, that hon. gentleman has been conspicuous by his absence ever since this matter came up. Does he suppose for a moment that his followers on the temperance question propose to put themselves on record, when the one member of the Ministry who should have been the first man on his feet in this House to defend his position, the Minister of Agriculture, is silent? Now, Sir, if you hear any more speeches, I will call your attention to the fact and hope you will note it particularly, if they touch on the temperance question, it will be the same old pail, the same old brush and the same paint used by the hon. member for Colchester. Now, the Minister of Agriculture made a few statements in this House to which I would like to call your attention. He was referring to a time that antedated the introduction of the Plebiscite Bill, and he said :

But at no time has the House of Commons deliberately and definitely declared that prohibition should come in force in the Dominion of Canada.

What is the inference from that? That the time had come now when this House will take up this question of prohibition. And when, I ask? Let me reply to that question with the words of the Minister himself. He said :

When the vote has been given to the people of the country, and they have declared their will in respect to this question, it will come back again to the floor of Parliament, and will have to be dealt with again by the representatives of the people.

And I would like to call your attention again for a moment to the similarity between that and the words of the First Minister previously quoted :

I have often said, and can only here repeat, that when the will of the people has been affirmed, and it will be affirmed one way or the other, then the Government, every Government, must be prepared to abide by the consequences.

Mr. GANONG.

If these were not concocted in the same head, they were at least concocted in the same room, the two heads being there together. Now, I can tell the hon. Minister of Agriculture that this question is back on the floor of this House. He has not been here enough to know whether it is here or not, but it is. I would like to ask him if he is prepared to stand up and be true to the temperance party that he claims he has been true to for so many years, or will he get up and repudiate his leader? Let us see what action this hon. gentleman will take. Why, in my opinion, he will sit with the same sickly smile of despair that he wore the other evening when questioned by the hon. member for East Grey. Does he dare to stand up in this House before hon. gentlemen representing Dominion constituencies, and say that we, as a political party, by implied agreement, robbed you as no highway robber would do, of your highest right of a citizen, which is your right of franchise? What difference is there between robbing a man of his right to the franchise and his right to enjoy the results of his franchise? If the temperance party in this country has been betrayed, as they believe themselves to be, judging by their resolutions passed throughout the country, there, sitting in the seat of the Minister of Agriculture, is their betrayer, as truly a betrayer as was Judas of old.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is going a little too far when he compares a member of this House to Judas of old, and unfavourably to Judas.

Mr. GANONG. There is some difference, it is true, in regard to the conditions, for in the one case it was for a few pieces of silver.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will be kind enough to withdraw the expression, and not qualify it.

Mr. GANONG. I submit to your ruling. But, Sir, I must say in regard to the Minister of Agriculture, that at least he has taken a very unusual stand on this question. He has placed himself in opposition, at least so far as we can judge, to the temperance party in this country. I am disposed to leave the question to the bar of the people to decide whether he has been just and true to the temperance party, or whether he has been true to the party who have given him a position and a salary of $8,000 a year. Now, the First Minister, in referring to some trade relations with the United States, made some remarks that I wish to refer to. He said :

I have no right to speak of what took place in the commission, but I have a right to refer to what is now in the minds of the Canadian people—and if we know the hearts and the minds of the people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the feeling of Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity.

Who is this "we" that the right hon. First Minister talks about? Is it the delegation that went to Washington to negotiate a treaty, or is it the Liberal party of Canada? I prefer to think it is the party of howlers who have been over the country for the last 18 or 20 years, and who have just awakened to the fact that this country of ours was not in accord with them during all that time. This party of "we" have just found out that Canada does not care anything about reciprocity. Well, if the Canadian people do not care anything about reciprocity with the United States, they necessarily care for just what we have been doing, that is, protecting the industries of Canada, protecting them from the one country from which we have reason to fear competition, the country that is producing goods of a similar nature to those produced by our Canadian factories, our Canadian farmers and our Canadian fishermen. Now, I wonder if the First Minister will follow the example of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and rise up in this House and say: I too am a protectionist. Why, I admire the pluck of the hon. member for Labelle. He has youth on his side, he has intelligence, and when he comes into contact with the industries of the country, he is frank enough to say that we have a country that we should protect, and that we should look after its interests instead of the interests of the country to the south of us. I only wish we had more hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who would be half as frank as the hon. member for Labelle. He has less of that prejudice, he is less guilty of those sins that I referred to a while ago, he is less guilty of the crime of trying to ruin the fair name and the credit of Canada, than some of the Ministers who visited Washington on this delegation. Why, these Ministers are remarkably young, they are mere children, apparently, in a business way, and it is surprising what a long time it has taken this business Government to learn what the business brains of this country have known for the last 20 years, but they have only found out within the last few months. They are like children who have been playing for years with an air bubble; at last it has burst and they find that there is nothing in it. For years their sole aim has been to discredit this country, and more particularly to discredit everything that was done by the late Conservative Government, not desisting when they knew that by so doing they were injuring the credit of the country. For 18 or 20 years they have been flying in the face of public opinion, and have only awakened to a knowledge of the truth within the last few months. There is an old adage which says that "curses like chickens come home to roost." The Government roost, since they returned from Washington, is full, especially is it full since the return of the delegate who went abroad to obtain bottle-necked ships. Now, I will read a couple of clippings in order to give some backbone to the hon. gentlemen opposite and keep them up to the point assumed by the First Minister when he spoke. Here are two opinions given by two daily papers in the United States with regard to this question of reciprocity, two New England papers, which one might naturally expect would favour reciprocity, as they have all along been looking for the advent of a Liberal Government to power who would make Boston the great city of the northern part of this continent. The Portland "Advertiser," referring to the possibility of reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, says:

But what if Canada does not want it? Premier Laurier, speaking in the Parliament House at Ottawa, a few days ago, threw upon the reciprocity idea some particularly cold water. He said Canada did not now greatly desire reciprocal trade; that the time had passed when she depended upon the American market and would have given anything for it, and that the cold storage system had given them a new market in England. If we are to regard him as speaking sincerely, and as voicing the present feeling of the Dominion, there seems little hope in that direction.

Commenting on this, the Boston "Herald," another prominent New England paper, says:

We imagine the Canadian Premier felt disheartened when he returned to Ottawa, after the adjournment of the Joint High Commission. If he did not entertain feelings of this character, he was more sanguine and optimistic than were, we fancy, his American associates on the commission. To have confessed that an effort which he had made a part of his policy, even before his party was successful in the last national election, had proved a failure, would have been politically indiscreet, and, more than this, would have been distinctly premature, for the reason that the Joint High Commission had simply postponed its session, with the intention of coming together again next August. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was compelled, by the decision reached at the time of adjournment, to consider the entire question in suspense, as, indeed, it is, and yet with such a cloud of doubt hanging over it as to make it expedient for him as Premier to prepare the way for an admitted failure of the effort.

Such is the opinion of some of the American papers in this connection. Before 1896 the Conservative party, finding that it was utterly impossible to establish any reasonable trade relations with the country to the south of us, planned and worked out the plan, to make this country more independent of the United States. The late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) went to the West India Islands. How the Grit papers did complain of the expenditure, but the fishermen along the shore of the Atlantic seaboard know that no act of the late Government ever did them more good than the visit of the late Finance Minister to the West Indies with the result of opening up markets to their products. They also established a plan for the development of the farming industries in regard to cold storage, which, however, the Liberals claim as their pet scheme. The Liberal-Conservative party have some business men amongst them, which I regret the Liberal party do not seem to possess. They knew that certain lines of goods required to be placed in cold storage to be carried across the Atlantic, and that the less the time that they were in cold storage, the greater advantage would result to the shipper in consequence of the better state in which these products would reach the market in the old country. Keeping that consideration well in mind they made an arrangement in connection with the fast Atlantic line project for cold storage sufficient to have taken care of all the products of this country for years. But the very moment that the Liberal party came into power they cancelled that contract, as is well known to this country, and made invalid all the work of the Conservative party with the result that though to-day we have some cold storage—the same old plan instituted by the late Government—it takes from two to five days longer, with just that much more loss to the shipper, by the reason of the fact of the goods arriving in a worse condition. That is but one sample of the mistakes made by this Government. There was a time some few years ago, about 1896, I believe, when the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), refused to ride in the same carriage with the right hon. Prime Minister; at least it was so reported. I believe that when that hon. gentleman arrived here the other day, to confess his failure to establish a fast Atlantic line, it was in the heart of the right hon. Prime Minister to wish that he never had agreed to ride in the same carriage. He has discredited this country; he has discredited the Government, and he has discredited his own ability as a business man by his failure to accomplish what he attempted. In my constituency where fishing is a very large industry and where that business, directly and indirectly, involves an annual amount of $1,500,000, the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister, giving the death knell to the possibility of obtaining a reciprocity treaty, will be received, I am sure, with very great sorrow, or very great surprise, at least. The people there will, however, have gotten over a certain illusion, that they had for years, that the Liberal party was their friend, that the Liberal party was the party for free trade and the only party which could possibly obtain reciprocity in the products of their fisheries. Now, Sir, the conditions along the Atlantic seaboard are such that there is a large percentage of the electorate in many constituencies who are fishermen, and nearly all these fishing stations are represented in this House by Liberals, such, for instance, as the county of Yarmouth, the county of Guysborough, the county of Shelburne, the county of Digby and others. Why? Simply because they have been misled by the leaders of the Liberal party, during the last fifteen or twenty years, into believing that they were the only party by which the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty could be accomplished, and that the Liberal party was the proper party for this country. All will admit, Sir, in that section that a fair reciprocity treaty, by which the products of our fisheries would be admitted into the United States market, on the same conditions as products of United States fisheries in our markets, that the fishing business could be prosecuted in Canadian waters by American fishermen, on equitable terms would be satisfactory to them and would be an advantage but they have been misled, as I say, by the party leaders and the party press. Among the hon. gentlemen who have been over the maritime provinces, talking of reciprocity and of free trade, there is not any one sinner greater than that one from the maritime provinces who occupies a portfolio in this Government; I refer to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). This may have been an expensive lesson to our fishermen, but I think it will be a good one. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has come here from Washington, imbued with the same idea that the right hon. leader of the Government has expressed, it will be a profitable thing for Canada. He has been an expensive member for the country at large, and it will be a great thing if he will only stay at home and attend to business as he should attend to it and look after the interests of the fisheries. Now, Sir, as this farce is over that they have been attempting, and now that they admit that no free trade is in sight, for a hundred or two hundred years, at least, that no reciprocity treaty is possible with the United States, these sturdy sons of toil will demand an accounting from these hon. gentlemen who have been misleading them for the past years. These are not the men who change their politics, as some people do, for the loaves and fishes; they are the men who change their politics on principle, and when they find that they have been misled they will know better than to trust the same old party that has misled them, the second time. Well, Sir, a Liberal Government is in power; that is a fact. We have heard the right hon. First Minister say: "We are here and you are there." It covers every argument that the hon. gentleman has produced in three years in this House. But what have we? We have no reciprocity treaty for the fishermen; we have no reciprocity for the farmers if they desire it, which I doubt very much; we have no enlarged market for the produce of the fisheries in the east, but we have a lessened market, since they came into power, on account of the absorption of Porto Rico into the Union. We may well say, where are they at? No free trade after three years, and none for one hundred or two hundred years to come; no appreciable reduction in the average duties after three years, but a higher per capita of customs and excise taxation than under the Conservative Government of 1896, for in 1896 the per capita of customs and excise taxation was $3.91 per head, and in 1898, $4.22. Again, there is a much higher duty than under the Conservative Government on some of the greatest staples used by the fishermen. What has happened? Have the heavens fallen, or is it simply that the gods of the Liberals have become deaf and dumb—perhaps they may have gone to sea in those bottle-necked ships. Before June, 1896, "free trade as in England" was proclaimed by the Liberals in every maritime province constituency. I had one gentleman come into my county, and he is a great talker—I presume that is the reason the Minister of Railways paid him so well when he sent him out as a commissioner. I presume he was in the secrets of the Government, and everything that could be given him from headquarters was given, for he came down to the county, and he said: We will give you free trade as it is in England. Look, you are getting 12 pounds of sugar for $1; we will give you 50 pounds for $1. Have the fishermen seen 50 pounds of sugar for $1? Are they getting the same amount of sugar for $1 as they did under the Conservative tariff? Well, I rather guess not. That gentleman's statement should have been correct. He was sent out by the Liberal party to preach Liberal doctrine, he got into some difficulties about his statements either with his party or with the Minister. Now, Sir, what are the facts? The facts are, that there is scarcely a staple used by the fishing industries of the maritime provinces that is any lower to-day than it was under the Conservative Government; and in the case of sugar, that was going to be as free as it is in England, these gentlemen opposite have raised the duty 26 per cent. Tobacco is an article which is largely used by the fishermen of the maritime provinces—though they are a very temperate class of people, as shown by the plebiscite vote—and the duty on tobacco has been advanced 56 per cent under Liberal rule. Have they reduced the duty on other fishermen's supplies? No, Sir. Rubber boots, oil clothing, condensed milk, baking powder, furniture, and nearly all the unenumerated class of goods which formerly came in at 20 per cent, have the same old rate of duty. The actual facts are, that the fisherman of to-day, under a Liberal protective tariff, is paying more than he did under a Conservative protective tariff. But what about oil? The oil duty, according to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) was the greatest curse. He (Sir Louis Davies) is not in the House to-night, but it would make no difference, if he were. He would smile just as blandly as he did when the question of reducing the oil duty came up last year. You can watch him from year to year, and he has the same bland smile. These gentlemen reduced the duty on oil by a cent a gallon; true, but the oil is dearer now than it was before. I suppose that is all right under a Liberal Government, where business is business. They made it possible for a giant monopoly to come in, and notwithstanding that monopoly clause which they passed at the second session of this Parliament, and which was, as they said, to frighten all these bloated manufacturers so that they would not dare to combine to raise prices, notwithstanding that, the monopoly has control of the oil market of this country, and has advanced the price from 1 cent to 2 cents per gallon more than it was under the tariff of the Conservative party. Why, Sir, in the United States they talk of toll-gates at which are collected fees from the greatest monopoly in the world. I trust that no hon. gentleman in this House will receive very much toll from that monopoly; but if they do not operate the monopoly clause, and that very soon, they will have some difficulty in making the electors of Canada believe that some one's fingers are not being greased. We have in the maritime provinces to-day a protective tariff that is making the cost of living higher than it was under the Conservative Government, and yet these gentlemen have not given us a single new market. They are more liberal in robbing the fishermen than ever the Conservative Government was. Where to-day is the patron saint whose agonies for the poor people of the maritime provinces were so frequently heard of in 1896? Why, Sir, his lamentations were deplorable then, but no longer do we hear his wailing and howling along the Atlantic seaboard. Then it sounded—well, I do not know; perhaps I should not compare it to what I purposed doing—but, Sir, it seemed to one who was accustomed to it, like the howling we sometimes hear from a hound who is baying at the moon. The hound has no idea that he will obtain the moon, but he is looking for his bone, and, when he gets the bone, he is satisfied. It is very much so with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He did not get the moon, as every one knows, but he did get a star, and whether that has succeeded, in connection with the bone of $8,000 a year, in satisfying him so that he will not say anything more in connection with the tariff in the maritime provinces, I know not; but if it has, it will be a happy thing for the country. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) if, since he has succeeded in disabusing his mind of the idea that reciprocity was in sight, he is prepared to protect the fishermen of the maritime provinces and not issue any more licenses to American fishermen to steal our fish, as they have done in the past. I endeavoured to get some information from the Minister last year, but it seems he knows less about that than he does about some matters outside of his department. I asked him, on what general principles the licenses for weirs were issued in the maritime provinces. I endeavoured in every way possible to obtain the information, but he either did not know or he was not disposed to give it. I now ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) to answer to the House and to the country. Why, I have received a letter to-day stating that American citizens have come in and taken from Canadian citizens the right to build weirs along the shores of the Atlantic seaboard. I have here the names of four or five weirs along the shore of the county of Charlotte which are said to be in Canadian waters, but which are owned and controlled by American citizens, who have no right to take up the weirs of Canadian fishermen and deprive them of the possibility of earning a living for their families. The product of these weirs goes directly to the cities of Eastport and Lubec, in the United States, and if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) would condescend to visit these waters and look matters over, so that he could intelligently deal with the question, it would be a great advantage to a very large Liberal clientele who voted for the Government down there last time—whether they ever will again, I do not know. I refer to the weir owned by Miller & Pike; another by Miller & John Tucker; another owned by Brown & Pike & Kennedy, and another one by Lampson, Pike & Houghton; and I want to put those names on record, so that the Minister may look the matter up. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) and his colleagues would use a little better judgment in the expenditure of public money, if they would make some endeavour to afford a little better protection to the fishermen in the maritime provinces, whose whole dependence is on the fisheries, and whose wealth consists of their fishing boats and their fishing gear, and induce these people to stay at home and enlarge their business, instead of frittering away the public money on Doukhobors, Galicians and Finns, it would be a great deal better for this country. Hon. gentlemen spend money in bringing to this country a class of citizens whose scale of living is so low that they are of very little advantage to the country, while on the Atlantic seaboard we have a class of citizens than whom there is no higher class in the Dominion of Canada—a class of men of good habits, who buy the best of everything, and will have it, who are hardworking and frugal, but who live well, because they work well. If hon. gentlemen would give a little more attention to the citizens we have, and to the development of our interests along the Atlantic seaboard, instead of sending one man to Ireland to get rid of him, and another to another portion of the country to get him out of the way, it would be a great deal better for the general interests of this country. So passeth away, Sir, the hopes of these poor hard-working fishermen into the glory of a star. I do not accept the statement attributed to the right hon. the First Minister, that a Liberal is born. I do not believe that a Liberal is born, any more than I believe that a Conservative is born a Conservative. I note a little contribution on this point, which, with your permission, I will give to the House:

To poets being born one hardly can object,
In fact it rather seems 'bout what we might expect.
But Sir Wilfrid now asserts (an anomaly if true),
He says a Liberal's born, a Liberal through and through.
What are we now to think 'bout Cartwright,
Blair and Tarte?
They were not Liberals born, but had a change of heart.
They cannot claim the Grits as their dear kith and kin,
As, like the Ethiopians, they cannot change their skin;
But if not Liberals born, they've travelled long that road.
It may be, after all, like Topsy, they just grewed.

Sir, I believe that when the electors shall have been called upon, the good sense of the farmers, the manufacturers, the mechanics, and those engaged in the fishing industries, will show the right hon. First Minister that a Liberal is not always a Liberal born; but that gentlemen who have been long with the Liberal party, and have been endeavouring to find some excuse for staying in it, will, after the present session of Parliament, realize that the progress of our country has been with the Conservative party, that all the hopes of the future of our country lie in the genius of that party for constructive legislation, and that it is the only political party in Canada to-day on whose promises they can rely.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker, the debate that is before the House has dragged to a considerable length. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) undertook to count the number of pages of "Hansard" that embraced the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, and instituted a comparison between them and the number of pages comprising the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I do not know, Sir, that that was a very useful occupation for a man of his pretensions to engage in; but, Sir, it was certainly a pleasant one, and I might say of my hon. friend as Longinus, the celebrated rhetorician, said: "A man of genius, employed in the accomplishment of little things, is like the sun in his evening declination: he preserves his energy, but retains his magnitude, and pleases more, though he dazzles less." There was one flight of that hon. gentleman's oratory to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman professes to be a nautical man, and with that technical knowledge characteristic of a gentleman who has spent much of his time upon the sea, he depicted the ship of state, as she was managed and navigated by the late Conservative Government. After he had followed her voyage, he was horror-stricken to see the ship of state waterlogged and sunk. Well, Sir, if the ship of state is to-day floating quiescent upon the surface of the waters, well, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that his party's buoyancy is the buoyancy of putrefaction, and its levitation is the levitation of rottenness. The hon. gentleman might have gone further in his comparison. He said that the crew had deserted the ship—they had taken to the long boat. I think, if the hon. gentleman's power had been equal to the full truth, he would have said that when the crew had deserted her, the ship of state had fallen a victim to pirates and buccanners. The hon. leader of the Government, in a speech which he delivered at the very opening of this debate, devoted his attention very largely to apologetics. Outside of his apologetics, he took credit to his Government for three or four acts of administration. In the first place, Sir, he took credit for Imperial penny postage and for the reduction of the domestic rate of postage. In the second place, he took great credit for preferential trade. In the third place, he took credit for the agreement entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the lowering of the tariff on freight from the west. But his main purpose seemed to be a very congenial employment with him—a denunciation of the leader of the Opposition, clothed in terms of invective which were not characteristic of the right hon. gentleman, as I have been led to form an opinion of his character. I think the invective was unworthy of him. It was unprovoked, idle and puerile. In singling out objects of attack in the long lifetime of the hon. leader of the Opposition, he might, at least, have had the courage to tell exactly what is consonant with history, instead of drawing upon his imagination for his facts.

Leaving the leader of the Opposition, I will direct my attention for a few moments to these various claims which hon. members on the Treasury benches urge for the support of the country, and for a certain meed of credit.

Well, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, if there is a department of administration in the Government of this country or of any country that should not be put forward as one to which any honour or credit should attach, it is certainly that having the administration of the postal affairs of this Dominion. From the first time when the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) took hold of this department, from the time when he violated the amenities of gentlemanly life by publishing to the county the volume of the private and confidential letters which he found in the archives of his office, down to the time when he made himself ridiculous in the eyes of Europe and the whole world by promulgating a decree which he had not the slightest jurisdiction to issue, nothing but blundering and mismanagement have characterized the administration of his department by that hon. gentleman. With respect to the postal service of this country, the right hon. leader of the Government took a great deal of credit for its administration and for the reduction in postage. I make bold to say, Mr. Speaker, that this claim put forth by the hon. Postmaster General, and backed by the authority of the right hon. leader of the Government, is a purely fictitious one. On being examined, it dissolves into thin air. The contention is this, that the hon. Postmaster General, by judicious management, by economical administration, succeeded in reducing the deficit from $699,000 in 1896 to the small deficit of $47,000 in 1898. But if we examine the records, what do we find? We find that if that hon. gentleman had done nothing, if he had allowed matters to remain as he found them, if he had not undertaken a single reform, the revenues of the country would have left, not a deficit of $47,502, but a deficit of some $18,600 only, or the deficit would have been smaller by $28,000 than it actually is to-day. How does this come about? Why, it has been pointed out again and again to these hon. gentlemen that the deficit was decreased by the abnormal increase of the revenues of that department through the issue of Jubilee stamps; and in proof of that contention, we need only refer to the statistics of the department during the present year. Since the 1st of July, 1898, to the 1st of July, 1899, the revenue of that department fell off no less a sum than $130,000 below what it was last year. And during January past, 1899, it fell off in no less an amount than $40,000, compared with January last year. And during February last it fell off to the amount of $69,362 below the receipts of February, 1898. When we take these facts into consideration, and look forward, allowing the decrease of revenue for the whole year at the present rate, the deficit, instead of being, as the right hon. leader of the Government affirms, less than it was during the last year of the Conservative Administration, must be to the amount of $200,000 or $300,000 more.

Not only is this the record of that department, but I claim that the hon. Postmaster General has starved the postal service of the country, and in proving that contention I have simply to take a summary of the years from 1891 down to the present. I shall not weary the House with the details of the figures, but shall simply say that the Conservative Administration, during those seven years, added post offices to the services of the country to the amount of 173 on the average annually, while during the past two years that hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power, counting to the end of the last fiscal year, their average increase of offices has only been about half as much, or ninety post offices per year. In order that we may look at this a little more carefully, I shall take the province of Ontario as a typical instance. The increase in that province of post offices in 1894 was forty-four; in 1895, thirty-six ; in 1896, forty-seven. These gentlemen came into power. Now, look at the method by which they reduced the deficit. They did not increase postal facilities proportionately to the increase of population. In 1897 they only increased the post offices of Ontario thirteen, and in 1898 fifteen, or about one-third the annual increase under the preceding Government. I might go through the different provinces and show the same result, but these facts are sufficient to explode the claim put forward by the hon. gentleman as to the judicious and economic management of his department. The deficit during the present year must amount to at least the sum of $800,000.

Now, the hon. leader of the Government claims that the Government is entitled to a great deal of credit for having reduced the postage of the country from 3 to 2 cents. How credit can be fairly claimed for this fact, I fail to see. Why, if there is a great virtue in doing that, there would have been double the virtue had it been reduced from 3 cents to 1. But I find fault with this reduction. Were I asked what special taxation would bear most equitably on the people, I would select this postage tax. How do I make that out? Well, I took the trouble in my own constituency to have an individual go to the different merchants and firms in the parish in which I reside, and take from their cash accounts the exact amount for postage that they paid out last year. Taking that as a fair criterion of the whole Dominion, I find that this relief of taxation, amounting to $800,000 annually, would place in the hands of about 3,000 people—merchants and persons whom I may call artificial persons, such as corporations—fully one-half of the amount of that reduction. That is, the Postmaster General has taken $400,000 from our taxes, and put that amount into the pockets of 3,000 people, and that deficiency resulting is made up by a tax on tobacco, which falls upon the shoulders of the people of this country, rich and poor, dollar for dollar.

The second fact which the hon. gentleman assumed to be a subject for congratulation was the fact that they had established preferential trade. Now, there is no such thing in Canada as preferential trade. The Canadian merchant has not preferential trade, the English market has, but the Canadian has not. But it is claimed the preference granted to England has proved a great boon, and the right hon. leader of the Government, in his anxiety to show how favourably this had affected the interests of the merchants or manufacturers of Great Britain, adduced certain statistics and claimed that those of the hon. leader of the Opposition were wrong, by which he supported his contention that England had not benefited. The language of the leader of the Government, however, was not as strong as we might have expected.

Mr. POWELL.

"We know," he says, "how difficult it is to change the channels of trade, how difficult it is to get people to go into new operations. Sir, at all events, I say that the door has been opened, and that trade at this moment is flowing into it."

Well, this declaration of the right hon. gentleman is calculated to astound any man who has examined the facts. Either the right hon. leader of the Government understood the force of what he was saying or he did not. If he did, he was stating deliberately to the House what was not a correct representation of the facts. If he did not, then in his position of leader of the Government, he was venturing upon an assertion having attached to it all the weight attaching to utterances of the First Minister, while he was utterly regardless as to whether that statement was true or not. What are the facts? So far from the hon. gentleman's statement being true, the fact is that at the very moment the hon. gentleman was making that declaration the contrary was the trend of events. The latest statistics upon which I have been able to place my fingers are found in the "Canadian Gazette," which contains an abstract of the trade returns of Great Britain. They show that in February, 1899, there was a decrease of imports from England to Canada amounting to £46,091, or 13·98 per cent as compared with the imports for the same month of the previous year. And our exports to England for the month of January show a decrease from £310,000 to £240,000, a decrease of 22·56 per cent. Taking the two months of January and February of the present year, we find that our English imports compared with our English imports of the same two months last year show a shrinkage from £651,000 to £611,000, or 16·07 per cent. The exports of Canada to Great Britain show a shrinkage from £637,000 to £469,000, or 26·33 per cent. So far as this preferential tariff is concerned, a comparison showing the effect upon the trade of Great Britain and other countries will be interesting. If you will take the last trade returns, ending 30th June, 1898, you will find that the duty on British imports, all told, was 20 per cent. On goods from Australia, the percentage is 6·3 per cent ; but for the British empire generally the percentage of duties is 20 per cent ; whereas in the case of our neighbours to the south of us, who are not supposed to be favoured by this tariff, the percentage on total imports is only 12·6 per cent. And so, instead of favouring the manufactories of the mother country above those of other nations, we find that even the Turk, the Japanese and the Chinese have greater favours extended to them than have the merchants and manufacturers of Great Britain.

Again, by a process of jugglery, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) so increased the duties on articles coming from England that when the subtraction was made on account of the differential duty of 25 per cent, the goods come in substantially at the same duty as before. In this connection I refer to the table of figures so carefully prepared by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). That hon. gentleman has made an elaborate calculation on this point and finds that, leaving out of account the article of tobacco, the decrease in duties on articles covered by preference would, on the basis of the last year of Conservative rule, be $679,357, while the increase of duties during the same time would amount to $795,591, making a net increase of $116,000. But, how has this affected the trade of the country? The increase has borne severely upon the man in moderate or humble circumstances. In the readjustment of the tariff, according to the hon. gentleman's calculation, which I have no doubt is correct, for I have tested it in many particulars, 80 per cent of the total increase or $630,000 was imposed upon 20 staple articles of consumption—I am leaving out entirely the article of tobacco.

The next point for which the hon. gentleman claimed credit for at the hands of the House and the country was the Canadian Pacific Railway agreement. The hon. gentleman ventured the assertion that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had decreased their tariff in order to favour the western farmers, to an amount equal to 25 per cent. Now, Sir, that hon. gentleman, from the high position he holds, from his long training in political matters, from the discussion of financial matters, on the floor of this House, should have known better than to venture upon such an argument. If there is one fact that is known to the economist of to-day, if there is a fact known to the merest tyro in railway matters, it is that on the long haul from the west to the east, there has been, during the last ten or fifteen years, a most marvellous reduction of tariff. Without regard to the contract at all, even supposing that in other respects it was not objectionable, I claim that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in its own interest, would have made that reduction; and, I have no doubt, that that reduction was made in its own interest and in its own interest alone, without regard to and independent of any contract with the Government. I have here a late work on the subject "The economy of rates under private and Government control," by Kirkman, who is quite an authority on this matter. It contains a table setting forth the through rates for freight on what we may call the great trunk railways of the continent. The traffic of the grain region of the west is brought to the Atlantic slope largely by the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, the West Shore, the Pennsylvania system and the Baltimore and Ohio, the Erie and the New York Central. If hon. gentlemen will look at the rates of these companies they will find that there has been a remarkable decrease within a very short time. Let me give some of the figures showing some of the reductions made. Here are the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They fell, between 1884 and 1892, no less than 34 per cent, or from 1.45 cents per ton per mile to 0.86 cents per ton per mile. Why, Sir, if that absolute decrease had been maintained down to the present time, instead of having a reduction of 25 per cent, there would have been a reduction of almost 50 per cent. I may say, that in the railway returns published by Canada, these statistics are not given, and were the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) present, I would call his attention to the great desirability of adding this feature of tonnage mile rate to the statistical tables in the annual railway report, so as to base figures that will enable the public to judge to some extent the earnings of our roads on each ton of freight transported over our railways. We are limited at present to figures that will enable us to learn the earnings per train mile. What the people want to know is the earnings per ton per mile for transportation. But to continue the discussion of the reduction of rates—take, for instance, the New York Central line. This line has reduced the rates between 1892 and 1897 no less than 7 per cent.

The Erie railroad, another great trunk line which bears the grain of the west to the seaports for shipment on the Atlantic coast, shows a reduction a great deal more than that. Take the Baltimore and Ohio from 1892 down to 1897. During the five years their rates decreased from .65 of a cent to .54 of a cent per ton per mile, while the Pennsylvania Railway, from 1892 to 1897, reduced their rate from .65 of a cent per ton mile to .47 of a cent per ton mile. These are greater reductions in fact than the Canadian Pacific Railway made under this agreement for which they were given some two or three millions more than was necessary under the contract that was entered into by the old Government. Now, I have taken particular roads. In order to be perfectly fair I will give you a summary of the facts which are contained in a report of the Inter-State Commerce Commission of the United States. We will take the North-west system. From 1890 down to 1896 the general rates over all that system decreased from .70 of a cent to .61 of a cent per ton mile; on the Northern system, which would embrace such lines as the Delaware and Hudson, the New York Central, the West Shore, the South Shore, and other lines, they decreased their rates during that time from .83 to .67 of a cent per ton mile. Reduction is the universal feature of railway rates. This, I should think, effectually disposes of the claim that is made by the First Minister. I recognize the fact that if the Government have been instrumental in bringing about this great reduction they have conferred a boon upon the western country, a great boon indeed. When we recall the fact that in the year 1874 the great state of North Dakota did not export a solitary bushel of grain for consumption, and within the first five years, after the opening of the railways, it put into the markets of the world tens of millions of bushels of grain, then we will have some idea of the benefit this Government would have conferred upon the people if they had procured this reduction of rates. But these rates reduce naturally and from commercial causes. It is the interest of the railways to make them as light as possible consistent with making a profit. The net income of a railway does not depend so much upon high rates as it depends upon the amount of traffic passing over the line, and the interest of the Canadian Pacific in having their lands settled, in having increased revenue, in meeting competition, will call for and secure reductions of rates in the future as they have in the past.

The next point to which the leader of the Government directed his attention was the plebiscite vote. I think if there is one particular phase of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite which is worthy of strong denunciation, it is their policy with respect to the plebiscite. When the leader of the Government, from his place in Parliament, informed this House, and through the Press Gallery informed the country, that if there was a majority of the electorate of Canada in favour of prohibition he would give them prohibition, that promise was interpreted as the language is interpreted under ordinary circumstances. Now, what do we mean by a majority of the electorate of the country? We mean a majority of the polled votes of the country. That is the understanding in every country with representative institutions. But the hon. gentleman bases his claim chiefly upon the fact that the majority was not sufficiently large. Now this is a matter of policy which it was well to have announced to the prohibitionists of the country before he brought down his policy and agreed to submit the plebiscite to the people. The hon. gentleman is, to my mind, very evasive in his arguments. The submission of the question of prohibition which was to be answered categorically, yes or no, calls for consideration of the significance to be attached to the answer. The prohibition of intoxicants may mean one of two things in this country. In the first place, since liquor is an article upon which we impose a customs duty, the prohibition of the liquor traffic would mean an interference and a very serious interference with our fiscal system. The answer may be significant from this standpoint. But prohibition is not only an interference with our fiscal policy, but it is an interference with individual liberty. A man in voting nay to that question, might be voting that he was opposed to an interference with individual liberty; by voting nay he might also mean only, as I have intimated, that he was opposed to so radical an interference with the fiscal system of the country, or he might mean both. Now when the right hon. gentleman says that the province of Quebec voted almost unanimously against interference with personal liberty, I tell the hon. gentleman that he is wrong, that the statistics do not bear him out, that he is making a very grave reflection upon that province. This vote is susceptible, as I say, of either one of the two constructions I have suggested to the House. Now when we look at the province of Quebec, what do we find? I take the statistics given by the Minister of Agriculture, who I notice during this debate does not seem to frequent the House very much. I notice a remarkable synchronism between the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and the disciple of Esculapius who seems to be in the Government to care for the physical ills of its members. I was informed the other day that the absence of these two gentlemen together from the House was the result of a violent dislocation of the backbone of the Minister of Agriculture owing to the remarkable contortions he had gone through on the temperance question. Well, Sir, I will take the figures given by the Minister of Agriculture. He said that these figures were perfectly reliable, and I have no doubt they are. In the province of Quebec there are 923 municipalities outside the cities and larger towns. They have in that province a local option law, the municipalities have power to prevent the issuing of licenses. Now as a matter of fact this province, which the right hon. leader of the Government would have us believe is entirely opposed to prohibition, is so favourable to prohibition that out of the 923 municipalities in that province, in 603 the sale of liquor is entirely prohibited. Then when you take into consideration the further fact that in the cities which only contain 400,000 out of 1,600,000 of the province's population, there was a large minority vote polled for prohibition, these two facts show that the province of Quebec in respect of that phase of prohibition which interferes with the personal liberty of the subject, is more favourable to prohibition than any province in the whole Dominion. Then if this Government was looking for enlightenment as to the feelings of the electorate on the grave question of interference with personal liberty, they had a conclusive answer from the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman cannot shield himself behind the vote as polled. Let us see: they ask for over 50 per cent of the registered voters. Does not the hon. gentleman know the course of history. At a time when the democracy of Canada, or at least a portion of Canada was heaved, as it never was heaved since, when the little province of Nova Scotia, fired by the electric eloquence of Joseph Howe, was ready almost for rebellion, an election came on and the polled vote was only 73 per cent of the registered vote; and yet this hon. gentleman asks the temperance people to give him a majority of over 50 per cent of the registered vote. Then, again, I find that, in the election of 1891, the total popular vote was only 64 per cent of the total registered votes of Canada. The leader of the Government has called on the temperance people to perform what is an absolute impossibility—I care not how favourable the country may be to prohibition. I shall not weary you with going further into the different elections, but about 65 per cent would be a fair average, taking by-elections and general elections, of the percentage of voters recorded who exercise the franchise on election day. I remember, on one occasion the Liberals claimed that the Conservatives were exercising the functions of government and conducting the administration of affairs with a numerical minority of the electorate at their backs. Whether that was true or not, I do not know, but I remember the contention being made; yet no one suggested they resign. A greater interference with the fiscal laws of this country than prohibition would involve was introduced by the Government with a very much less percentage of the registered vote than 50 per cent. In 1878, when a radical change was made in the fiscal policy of the country, when we were departing entirely from the old policy of the late Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright), and adopting a stringent protective policy, had the Government of the day 50 per cent of the electorate at its back? No, Sir. During the session when changes were made in the late protective tariff by the present Government—I admit that they were not very serious changes—had the Government a mandate of 50 per cent of the recorded electorate to make these changes? They had not. Therefore, Sir, in whichever way we look at it, the contention of the hon. gentleman, the First Minister, is little better than a subterfuge. If we are told it is an interference with the fiscal system, the hon. gentleman is simply talking what is constitutional rubbish. And he rests his objection on the province of Quebec having spoken against interference with personal liberty. The facts I have given show him to be in error in his premises.

Another matter that the hon. gentleman referred to was the matter of Senate reform. I shall not dilate upon this question to any great extent, for the simple reason that when the Bill comes before the House, I presume most of the hon. gentlemen in the House, including myself, will express their opinion upon it. But when I heard the leader of the Opposition, of whom his followers boast as a man possessed of an immense range of knowledge, I am rather astonished to find how the right hon. gentleman defends the contemplated Act in respect to the Senate. He says: "We want to make the Senate a responsible body." A gentleman who claims that every institution should be amenable to the people, and should have the people as its direct and immediate control, is simply putting forward a contention that is opposed to the existing systems of every country possessing constitutional government on this globe. It may be news to some hon. gentlemen in this House but it is not new to legal gentlemen in this House, that, above this Parliament and above every local legislature in Canada, controlling them, saying that their most solemn enactments may be a nullity, and rendering them a nullity in their judgment, saying to local legislatures, as it has unquestionably the right to: You have no right to do what every lawyer knows they have right to do—sits the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Higher than Parliament, higher than the people of this country, higher than the local governments of this land, than the local legislatures, standing in the supreme position of responsibility to nobody, is the Privy Council of the British Empire. This Parliament may pass an Act which may be perfectly within its jurisdiction; it may be carried across the water and a perverse judgment can be given, and there is no way to punish the men guilty of this outrage: they are responsible legally to nobody except to their God and their conscience. The check upon them is the moral check of intelligent popular opinion. And now, having referred you to the case of the Privy Council, let us look to the republic to the south of us. Is the Supreme Court of the United States responsible? Has it ever been suggested by the most democratic of states that this court should be responsible legally to anybody. The great strength of that republic, the permanency and the stability of the relations between the affiliated governments and the federal power is due to the irresponsibility of the Supreme Court of the United States. And if hon. gentlemen point out to me, that that court was constituted and that that policy was adopted at a time when the principles of responsible government were not as fully acted upon as to-day, when the principles of democracy were not as widespread and as universally acted upon, I reply, that the federal system could not exist without it. Again, take the case of the state of Massachusetts. Some fifteen years ago, if I recollect the date correctly, that state desired to control the railways of the country—that is not exactly in point, but the illustration is used simply to show the force of popular opinion acting morally and not legally. They constituted a railway commission, and that commission had power to summon before it every railway president, every railway official, every railway employee, operating within the commonwealth of Massachusetts. But the commission had no power given to enforce their decision. Their was no executive power reposed in it whatever. It simply investigated complaints and proclaimed to the people what, in their opinion, was a correct course to pursue. What was the effect? I have mentioned this to show that it is not direct responsibility to the democracy, or the electorate, that is the great safeguard of liberty; it is responsibility, not to them as voting machines, not as political powers; it is responsibility, to the enlightened popular opinion, and that opinion was so strong in the commonwealth of Massachusetts and controlled so effectually the railways of the commonwealth, that you may search over the railways on the continent of America, or Europe, or Asia, or Africa, if you will, or the far-distant colony of Australia, for a better system of railways, for one that is more sensitive to popular sentiment, and you will search in vain. Now, what is urged? Although ours is a written constitution and is a statutory constitution, so far as it fails, whatever constitutional principles prevail in England prevail here. What should these hon. gentlemen do? The Senate will be responsible to popular opinion, and no Senate that exists in the United States, or in any other country, can for one moment resist popular opinion. And if these hon. gentlemen opposite had a show at all of sincerity, if they meant what they said, if they were honest in their views, if they were guided by a high spirit of patriotism, and not by a spirit of party, instead of denouncing on the floors of this House and on the hustings of this country a body of gentlemen as mere partisans and party claqueurs, they should appeal to the voice of the people in respect to these questions. They should utilize the constitution that we have, conforming to that which they as sworn Privy Councillors are bound by their oaths to conform to, and Canada would hear a great deal less of that anarchical cry which may be a very serious plaything in its effect upon a democratic country. As I have said, what further remarks I have to make upon that question, I shall reserve for another time. I am pleased to see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has not joined in this appeal. I do not know what he will do hereafter, but up to this particular stage he has not taken any part in it. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has fallen from grace so remarkably in respect to the principles of free trade, that I "hae ma doots" about him in the future. I imagine that that hon. gentleman is not entirely at home in the seat he occupies—I do not mean that he wants another seat in the Government—but in the position in which he is placed by the action of his colleagues. I believe that he is sitting somewhat disgruntled, and that he feels like the Grecian warrior, that the time will come, although now muttering in his tent, when he will destroy the Trojan ships. That hon. gentleman must feel that his present position is out of harmony and inconsistent with the position he previously occupied. To those other hon. gentlemen in the Government I would not appeal. They have had their ethics proclaimed by the hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), not to mention the author of that peculiar theological and moral dissertation we had yesterday, the hon. gentleman from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), who may be the spiritual adviser of the Government. But there was a time in the history of this country when the voice of Sir Richard was the voice of wisdom and of power. It was paramount through the whole region of Gritdom, and influential also throughout a considerable portion of Torydom as well. It commanded that respect that attached to Poor Richard, celebrated in the early literature of the United States. But, Sir, that day has gone by. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is now shorn of his glorious locks. I do not mean that he is the victim of some modern Delilah, but, Sir, he is in this position that his friends throughout the country in the Conservative ranks, that the staunch Liberals throughout the country who are men of principle, say of him for sitting quietly in a position which smothers his principles: "But yesterday and Sir Richard might have stood against the world, now sits he there with none so poor as do him reverence."

The next particular point, Sir, to which the leader of the Government directed himself was a somewhat violent attack upon the present leader of the Opposition, Sir Charles Tupper. So far as his vituperation is concerned, I shall say little, but here is a fair specimen of it in the last speech which the right hon. gentleman delivered:

Sir Charles Tupper has shown himself once more, and perhaps more than ever, that he is as reckless, extravagant, unreliable, ever ready to pander to passion and prejudice, ever ready to gamble away the most sacred interests of his country for the chance of a party advantage.

Sir, I would have said nothing on this score were it not for the remarks of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who told us that there was no one of those gentlemen who sat behind Sir Charles Tupper who dared utter a word in his defence, or who felt like incurring, as the Minister of the Interior supposed, the odium attached to a defence of the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Government in referring to the leader of the Opposition, claimed that upon two occasions had he wrecked Governments. He said that in his early history Sir Charles Tupper had become a member of the Government of Mr. Johnstone—I shall not refer to the historical slip in calling him Sir William Johnstone. I am astonished that the leader of the Government should make such an assertion, but he made it, and it is far from the truth. Let us look for one moment into the history of the leader of the Opposition, because these attacks upon him render it necessary that some one upon this side of the House should lay the facts before new members who are not acquainted with his history. In 1855, Sir Charles Tupper, then Dr. Tupper, was returned for the county of Cumberland, and it was no ordinary contest that was then waged in that county. It was a contest as historic in the province of Nova Scotia, as was the Clare election in the history of Ireland. Sir Charles Tupper was opposed to no mean antagonist; he was confronted with no vulgar foe, for the gentleman whom he met eye to eye and point to point was no less a warrior than the Hon. Joseph Howe. They clinched in battle, and the gentleman who rose victor from the fight was Sir Charles Tupper. He then went into the House, where he found that his party was a very small minority indeed. By his energy, by his statesman-like breadth, by his tactical skill, in a short space of two years he drove from power the idol of the Nova Scotia people, and he and his leader, Mr. Johnstone, were installed as directors of the affairs of that province. For the space of two years that government existed. On the completion of the parliamentary term the Johnstone Government was obliged to go to the country and was defeated by a majority of two through the anti-Catholic cry. Mr. Howe came in, taking advantage of sectarian prejudices—taking advantage of one of those tornadoes of passion that are roused by religious demagogues. But in 1863 the people regretted their action. Dr. Tupper was triumphantly returned to power, and defeated for ever the great tribune of the people. He retained power until he left the local for the federal arena in 1867; his government was never defeated. The right hon. gentleman is wrong; no government Sir Charles Tupper ever led in Nova Scotia was defeated. In 1867, the present leader of the Opposition came to the arena of federal politics, and I shall speak a moment later in respect to his career here. After he came to Dominion politics, what was his influence in Nova Scotia? There is no man knows as well as the senior member from Halifax (Mr. Russell) the truth of what I am saying. It is a remarkable fact that of all the names that are glorious names on the honour roll of Nova Scotia, there is scarcely one who was his political enemy when he entered public life that to-day is—or at least before his death—was not his strong political supporter. Who comprise this cloud of witnesses I shall summon up? The first one is 'nomen venerabile' in Nova Scotia, the Hon. William Young, once chief justice of the province. Then follow the Hon. Sir Edward Kenny, the Hon. Sir Adams Archibald, the Hon. Jonathan McCully, the Hon. Joseph Howe, the Hon. A. W. McLellan, the Hon. James McNabb, the Hon. Samuel Chipman, the Hon. Samuel Creelman, the Hon. Benjamin Weir, the Hon. Michael Tobin, the Hon. Mr. McKinnon, the Hon. Hiram Blanchard, the Hon. Joseph Fulton, James Fullerton, and George Hibbert, every one of them with the exception of two members of governments that had been opposed to Sir Charles Tupper. By his acknowledged statesmanship, by his great administrative ability, he so commanded the respect of the electorate of his native province, that these men boldly stepped out of the ranks of Opposition and came to his support, and lived or died his supporters. But since he came to this arena what is the right hon. gentleman's record? I make bold to say that when the history of this Dominion is written, when, free from the haze and disturbing medium of party prejudice, the unbiassed historian of the future records the development of this Dominion, as he looks back over the long list of honoured names who have been the fathers and benefactors of our country, and thinks upon those men who have done acts that will remain, not through party puffery, but because they have left their deep impress upon the country, the man who, next to our honoured chieftain, and who more even than our late honoured chieftain, so far as practical work is concerned, shall stand above them all, I have no hesitation in saying shall be the man who bears the name of Charles Tupper. I was astonished that the leader of the Government should have made this attack. Hon. gentlemen behind him may indulge in elaborate panegyrics upon him; they may get off essays worthy of graduating school girls, full of rhetorical flowers, and thus seek to elevate their chieftain in the eyes of the country. But I ask them—I ask the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) and other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House—to put their finger upon a solitary enactment of Parliament to which is appended the name of Wilfrid Laurier, from 1874, when he came into Parliament, to the present day. Did I say there was not a solitary act? I am mistaken; there was one. The hon. gentleman brought an Act into the Parliament of Canada to define what a barrel was. That, Sir, is his sole triumph in the arena of legislation. Outside of that, has the hon. gentleman ever put forward a policy that he carried through? Has he ever nailed his flag to a spar without cutting down both the 'spar and the flag? And these hon. gentlemen talk about the leader of the Opposition being sterile! I am perfectly astonished that any such charge should be made by a man who is himself a sterile æsthete, dandling in his lap, Sir, the posthumous child of a Conservative Government, and counterfeiting the very joys of paternity itself. Slander is a policy which has delighted hon. gentlemen opposite. It would be better if they would come out and fight in the open. Since 1855 down to the present day has Sir Charles Tupper been before this country. That is a long period—44 years. During that time he has been slandered by cowards; he has been abused by hirelings in the press. I ask, Sir, was there ever one of those who rushed from their kennels to bark at his heels who dared to face him in fair, manly fight? Was there ever a slanderer who dared append to his slanders his signature? Was there ever a newspaper that charged him with an act of corruption but sneaked into its cell with the most abject apologies when threatened with prosecution in the courts of the country? This is the man they abuse, and I am astonished at a gentleman like the right hon. leader of the Government imitating the tactics of these people. Why, Sir, on what shall that hon. gentleman's fame rest? What shall be his monument? What is his political record? What is he as a political personality? Why, Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Government—examine him well—is a mere phosphorescent glow hanging over the resting places of decaying policies and putrescent promises. I was rather surprised at the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) standing in his place here the other evening and comparing the present political situation to the renaissance. Well, Sir, the renaissance, as I understand it, indicates a period of European history in which there was a revival of religion, art, poetry and letters; and if this is a re-renaissance, then, Sir, all I have to say to the hon. gentleman is that if we are to judge it by the principles laid down by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), it is not an advance on lines of political morality, while, if we are to judge it by the statement of the hon. member for Burrard, it is not an advance on the line of religion. Why, Sir, the hon. member for Labelle—and I join in the pæan of praise as respects his mastery of a tongue that is not his vernacular. I was very pleased to hear it. I wish some of us English-speaking people could obtain the same mastery of the beautiful language that is his mother tongue. But while I praise his language I have not respect unto his ethics. What does he say? He says that in modern politics there is no place for logic, no place for consistency, that this is a great danger to public life.

Mr. BOURASSA. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I make no restriction of time. I say the politics of all time.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman says he was referring to politics of all time. The suggestion was as to the politics of the present time. He says there is no place in politics for sincerity, and sincerity is a menace to the state. But the high-water mark was reached when the hon. member for Burrard rose in his place—I was almost going to say with a temerity that has been unequalled from the days of Celsus down to Robert Ingersoll—and said: "You cannot hold this Government to its promises, because Jehovah did not keep His. He promised a man something, and the man died 50 years afterwards, and the Lord did not keep His promise even at that time." Now, Sir, what would these hon. gentlemen have us to do? We must overlook the inconsistencies of the Government, we must overlook their breaches of faith. Everything we prize as pure, as heroic, as noble in politics, is to be put aside as out of place. And in the spirit of this Grit renaissance we are worshipping the gods of insincerity, of inconsistency and of untruth. Mr. Maxwell justifies mendacity and asks this House and the country to admire the splendid personality of the leader of the Government. Let us trust the country will prize his virtues as they conform to the old traditions, and not to the vagaries which gentlemen claim, however truthfully in this case, to be the dominating characteristics of the Liberal party. I am not going to dwell upon this matter. I shall not take the stand taken by the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and lecture the House. The House requires no lecturing. If these hon. gentlemen opposite have settled down to this view of political ethics, I cannot hope to enlighten them.

Convince a man against his will,
And he will hold the same opinion still.

Leaving this subject, I do in this House protest and before this country will protest against introducing into public life in this country a low ideal of politics which will debase our public men, our political parties, and our common country. We should have high ideals. I will tell the hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I will tell the hon. gentleman from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), we have higher traditional ideals in this country. We are the people who have, so far as the French are concerned, the high ideals of old France, and so far as the English, Irish and Scotch elements are concerned, the high ideals which lead us to venerate men like Burke, and Peel, and Chatham, and Washington, and Lincoln. And what are we asked to do by these gentlemen opposite from Labelle and Burrard? We are asked to discard for ever these high ideals and set up as objects of worship, as our political gods, the ethical deformities of Mr. Tarte and the back-boneless lubricity of the leader of the Government. I shall now direct my attention for a moment to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries whom I see taking his seat.

Mr. BERGERON. He came in a little too early.

Mr. POWELL. I had thought that if there was one man in this Dominion who would have respect unto his high calling, it would have been that gentleman who, such a short time ago, received at the hands of a person on behalf of his sovereign to be placed upon his breast the emblem of honour and chivalry. I can tell him, Sir, that the word of a knight, down through the ages, was most sacred. But what about this gentleman. Why, Sir, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) while an election was on in the maritime provinces, with that volume of speech which characterises him, with that vehemence of utterance which always marks his periods, took the platform and made the welkin ring, from one end of the maritime provinces to the other, with a denunciation of the Tory party and their protective policy, and he called upon them to turn their faces to the south and enter upon a commercial policy that was to enrich his fellow-citizens of Prince Edward Island and the sister provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That gentleman pointed out the glories that existed under the old reciprocity treaty. He told the people: You never obtained such high prices for your oats and potatoes and other agricultural products as you did during that time. I congratulate the hon. gentleman that our commissioners failed in obtaining reciprocity. I do that from the bottom of my heart. I do not take protection by halves, I do not complain of a tariff being too high, I do not care how high it is, that tariff is never too high in this country, providing its result is to create manufacturing industries in the country and give employment to labour and wealth to our citizens. So long as it does that, I do not care whether it is 25 or 50 per cent, or whether it amounts to an embargo such as was placed on British goods in the first history of the United States. This was the first measure that drew them to turn their attention to the policy of creating manufacturing industries and laid the foundations of the greatest industrial Empire of time.

It has leaked out concerning this commission that during the session at Quebec, when mutual concessions were being talked about, that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) rose in his place in that commission, so thoroughly imbued with the important subjects that were before him, so thoroughly saturated with the magnificent desirability of bringing peace and harmony to two Empires. So appreciative of the great destinies which hung upon his judgment, so thoroughly inspired by lofty Imperial ideas, that he startled with his last conceptions the American Commissioners. Standing up with his overwhelming sense of responsibility, he did not say: I refuse to interfere with the integrity of the British Empire—I refuse for Imperial considerations to cancel our gratuity to Mother England or to impair her interests, in any way, but in the great comprehensiveness of his intellect, in the acumen of his thought, in the breadth of his sympathies, his knightly form trumpeted forth: I cannot make this concession as we may lose three constituencies.

Mr. DAVIN. He added that he would lose his own.

Mr. POWELL. Yes, but he has lost that any way. Turning our attention to reciprocity, since the right hon. leader of the Government stands up in his place in this House and says that Canada is no longer in favour of it, that there is no party that any longer desires it, to discuss it might be discussing matters of somewhat antiquarian interest. But I will direct my attention to that hon. gentleman's favourite fetish. In the province of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island away back in 1865, there is no question but reciprocity was a great boon to the farmers of those provinces. Why was it a great boon? At that time the magnificent railroad system of the United States had not developed its through lines, in freight traffic these railways had not more than pierced the barriers of the Alleghanies, they had not reached the immense grain growing areas of the west, and those immense products of western industrial energy were not brought into competition in the markets of the east with the products of the east. We had cheap transportation—water transportation—the cheapest of all, and the western countries were actually debarred from entering into competition with us at all. At that particular time, the most skilled and productive labour of the United States was withdrawn from the farm, and the young men were upon the field of battle. Then we competed and competed successfully in the eastern markets of the United States. But since that time, things have changed. Bessemer, with his steel rails, and the improvements of steam engines, and the consolidation of railway systems have had the effect of so lessening the cost of transportation that the west is brought into competition with the east, and we have no longer any opportunity of controlling the eastern markets. The hon. gentleman was enamoured of the glorious market of sixty millions to the south of us. Mr. Speaker, that sixty-million market is a perfect myth. I challenge the hon. gentleman who sits in his seat to mention a single great staple agricultural product of which the United States do not only produce more than they require for their own consumption, but of which they do not have surplus which they place in the English market, and there compete successfully with the products of the rest of the world. I may take one of the greatest products of his own province, oats. The United States send fifteen times as much oats to the English market as we do. Of wheat they send more than we do. Of beef and pork they send more than we do. Under the wise policy of the late Government in respect to bacon and hams, in shutting out the corn from the great republic to the south, which had the effect of deteriorating the quality of pork, we built up a magnificent trade, which I am afraid, if the reports that I see in English journals are correct, will soon be destroyed, owing to the fact that corn-fed pork is now getting access from Canada to English markets and destroying our reputation as producers in that line.

Mr. MCGREGOR. You do not know what you are talking about. Corn-fed pork is the best.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. COPP. That is right; it is the best.

Mr. POWELL. I am not going to discuss the question with the hon. gentleman, who says I know nothing about it. I recognize that under the brow of Apollo opposite there resides all the wisdom of this House ; there is everything that human power and ingenuity can pack within the cranium which incloses his brain. I think it would be advisable for the hon. gentleman who bears the name of Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), who is a disciple of Esculapius, Hippocrates or Galen, to exercise his scalpel and relieve the pressure upon this hon. gentleman's cerebellum.

Now, so far as reciprocity is concerned, the time may come—one cannot predict what can take place in a decade or two—when, with the filling up of the west, we shall find a market in the United States. But that will be when they have a population to consume all their agricultural products, and, like England in the beginning of this century, commence to import food stuffs from foreign countries. But during the decades between now and then, the hope of this country is in the great market across the water, the English market. And, Sir, it is greatly to be regretted that at an important crisis of the history of this country, at a time when English opinion had responded to the appeals of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the late Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and others, when Mr. Chamberlain was willing to have a conference upon this matter and had declared: We must make mutual concession; when the feeling was growing in England that against her were set up the hostile tariffs of the world, and that, if she was to run her commercial course with the same success in the future as in the past, she must make common cause with her colonies—I say, it is to be regretted that on that occasion the leader of the Government went into that conference, and, to the astonishment of Mr. Chamberlain, to the dumbfounding of his Canadian constituents, the right hon. leader of the Government, with the echoes of his own pre-election declarations ringing in his ears, that he was as good a friend of preferential trade with Great Britain as the present leader of the Opposition, threw away an opportunity and let go a chance which may never recur. For, in these modern times, the world moves rapidly, channels of trade are being opened and appropriated, and once the current has set in one direction, as the leader of the Government himself has said, it is not such an easy thing to divert it. It is greatly to be regretted that, on that important occasion, much as I respect the leader of the Government, and worthy as I think him to represent this great Dominion in the most magnificent pageant of modern or ancient times, greatly as his personal and æsthetic qualities fitted him for the position—it is to be regretted, I say, that there was not at that time at the helm of affairs of Canada a man with a wide grasp of commercial facts, a man with a full appreciation of the commercial wants of the country, to establish relations which would inspire our farmers to greater efforts and bring riches to the farmer's home—and every student of economics knows that, if you enrich the farmers, you stimulate every industry in the country—it is deeply to be regretted that at such a time our late great leader, Sir John Macdonald, or that other eminent man, Sir George Cartier, was not alive and in control of our affairs. Many of us sighed “for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still.” These men not being available, it was a regrettable thing that the leader of the Opposition was not in possession of the reins of power. Had he been in control, there would have opened up a career of commercial prosperity, to last some decades, which would be a real boon to the people of the Dominion, and we would not be asked to content ourselves with the fantastic and auroral policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. J. McALISTER (Restigouche). Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist upon that motion, because, if he does, the Government will be obliged, under the circumstances stated by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), not to assent to it. That hon. gentleman stated that there were many members on his side of the House who desired to express their views upon the important questions which have been before the House, and he hoped the amplest opportunity would be given. The Government desire that. It is still early, not yet half-past ten, and I do hope the hon. gentleman will be ready to go on.

Mr. WALLACE. There is such a thin House, and it is usual on Friday night to adjourn at an early hour. I think we should adjourn.

Mr. McALISTER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively during this debate to the charges made by the leader of the Opposition and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House against the Government. I have also listened to the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite and the answers they gave to these charges, and, so far, I have failed to hear one satisfactory argument or answer made to the charges brought against the Administration. It is true, that several lines of defence were resorted to. One of the hon. gentlemen opposite took one line, and another took a different line. Though it was difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile these, there was one thing they all agreed upon, and that was, that the Government have kept their pledges. Well, Sir, if the Government have kept their pledges, I think hon. gentlemen on this side, as well as on the other side, have learned within the last few days something which they failed to learn during the last three years. One hon.

gentleman on the other side would get up and state that he was a free trader, and yet the policy of the Government was suitable to him, because the Government turned their face in the direction of free trade, and consequently they kept their pledges. Another gentleman states that he was a protectionist, that the policy of the Government was perfectly satisfactory to him, and therefore the Government kept their pledges. Sir, the pledges that were made by the hon. gentlemen when in Opposition were very numerous indeed. They made promises and pledges from every platform in this country, as well as on the floor of this House. They made promises and pledges which were recorded in that memorable convention held by the Liberal party in 1893. Why, Sir, that platform was built up with pledges. Let me mention a few of the pledges that they made, and show how they have kept them. One pledge was purity of administration. They condemned corruption in every shape and form. A short time after they came into power we find the leader of the Government up in Brant at a by-election. The Government was very much afraid, there was danger of losing that constituency, as they had lost it at the general election. The leader of the Government speaking there, advised the electors to return a Government candidate, as it would be better for them to do so; if they did not return the Government candidate, they need expect nothing from the Government but cold justice. And still this was not corruption, this was only purity of Administration. An election was held a short time ago in Lévis, and we see the Minister of Public Works making promises in every direction. Those who supported his candidate were to be rewarded by getting public works and public improvements in the town or county—not for the purpose of corrupting the electorate at all, but only to purify the Administration. Later on there was an election in Nicolet. The leader of the Government and the Minister of Public Works both appeared on the scene and made promises. Railway subsidies were promised and other public improvements. A little later there was an election in West Huron. The Minister of Public Works found it necessary to go up there, and other members of the Government found it necessary to go up there. Promises were made, harbour improvements and other public works were started in the county of Huron. This had to be done to save the country, yet this was purity of Administration. An election was held in Wright County a year or so after the Government came into power, when it was found convenient to get men from the county of Wright to work on the Western Block. The workmen of the city of Ottawa had no vote over in Wright, and consequently it was necessary to get men from that side to work in Ottawa on the Western Block. In fact, so many men were seen working there for a few days before the election that it was said they had been crowding each other out of the way. But on the day of the election these men all disappeared, and they were not seen there any more. Local elections were held in the province of Ontario in 1898. The leader of the Government, speaking at a public meeting held in the Russell Theatre, told the electors in the city of Ottawa that it was necessary to support the Liberal Government in Ontario because if it was defeated the Government on the hill would lose its right arm. The last week of the campaign this House had to be adjourned in order to give the Ontario supporters of the local government an opportunity to go up there and save the right arm of the right hon. gentleman. While that election was going on, the civil servants were warned that it was necessary for them to support the local government, otherwise it would be worse for them. Threats were made, and still this was purity of administration. Wellington Street down here being under the control of the Dominion Government, was the scene of great activity on the day before the election. Men were employed there in every direction, more men than were ever seen on the street before. It was even necessary that men should go into the square below the Parliament Buildings here the night before polling, and move snow from one place to another. Now, there is a vacancy in the constituency of Brockville. The hon. Minister of Public Works discovered all at once that it was necessary to put up a drill shed there. The people of Brockville were given to understand that they needed a drill shed, and the drill shed would be erected. Still hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition condemned corruption in every shape and form and advocated purity of administration. At this convention a demand was made for the strictest economy. The increase of the public debt was alarming to them. But we find to-day that the gross debt of the Dominion of Canada, instead of being reduced, has increased between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000 during the two first years of their Administration, and we find the net debt increased between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. To-day they are not alarmed at seeing the increase of the debt, and from what we can learn, there is no likelihood of any decrease in the expenditure or in the public debt. The Minister of Public Works, speaking at Valleyfield a short time ago, said: It is true the Government spent a good deal of money last year, but wait and see us next year. We shall have made more money, and we shall have spent more. This declaration came from a member of the party that were very much alarmed at the increase of the public debt and of the public expenditure during the Conservative Administration. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), speaking last night, said that the Liberals while in power did not condemn expenditure, not at all; what they condemned was extravagance. They did not condemn beneficial expenditure or expenditure where it was necessary; that was all right. Well, Sir, let me read the words of the resolution passed at this convention:

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase in the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the Governments that have been continuously in power since 1878; and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the Government of the country.

There is nothing said here in favour of beneficial expenditure. They condemn large expenditures in toto without discriminating between extravagance and necessary expenditure.

Another pledge made by hon. gentlemen while in Opposition was that lands should be for the settlers alone and not for the speculator. Last year we had an attempt at the most gigantic speculation and the most gigantic swindle that was ever sought to be perpetrated upon any country. Hon. gentlemen opposite went back on that pledge, as they have gone back on every other pledge that they have made. It was all very well, so long as the personal or political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite should get a good contract and be benefited by it. These gentlemen were going to get 4,000,000 acres of land to build a small piece of tramway 160 miles long from Glenora to Teslin Lake. It was not shown, to this House or to the country, that this tramway was going to be of any practical utility at all; it was not shown even that the route was practicable. The only provision made in the contract was that when this piece of tramway was built, the contractors, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, were to get 4,000,000 acres of the richest mineral lands in the whole Dominion. How were these gentlemen to select these lands? Were they to take the lands as they came? No. They had the privilege or option of selecting them in blocks, three miles square, at any time they should see fit within three or six years from the time of the completion of the contract. Hon. gentlemen say that they could not get the land until the road was built. No, they might not, but they had the right to pre-empt any part or the whole as soon as the contract was entered into. I am told, by a reliable authority, that these gentlemen had an offer of $10 an acre for the whole 4,000,000 acres, which, at $10 an acre, would make $40,000,000, yet hon. gentlemen opposite maintained, while in Opposition, that they were going to introduce purity of administration, and that land would only be given to the settler, not to the speculator. I was sorry to hear the right hon. First Minister condemn the Senate for rejecting this Bill. He said it was a crime on the part of the Senate to reject it. I do not think the right hon. leader of the Government would appear upon any platform, before any intelligent audience in this country and say that the action of the Senate was a crime.

Another pledge made by hon. gentlemen opposite was that they would introduce free trade. Well, I do not know whether we have free trade or not yet. Some hon. gentlemen say we have; others say we have not and I do not know whom to believe. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) said that this tariff was the handiwork of this Government. If it is the handiwork of the present Government, I suppose it is complete. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) says that he is a free trader, but as the Government turned their face towards free trade he was satisfied. The hon. Minister of the Interior says that the tariff is a dead issue, but he found that that remark gave offence to a certain portion of his constituents and therefore it was necessary for him to qualify it in some way. He said, afterwards, that what he meant was that it was a dead issue between the two parties, and that the Conservative party had come over to the Liberal side. "But," he said, "the citadel of protection must be stormed; we are going to destroy that citadel. We have been attacking it with pop-guns heretofore, but we are going to attack it, later on, with heavy artillery and destroy it completely." The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) speaking down in New Brunswick, a short time ago, said that free trade was the goal at which the Government hoped to arrive before very long. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), about the same time, speaking at Valleyfield, said that the tariff was settled. He told the manufacturers not to be alarmed at the threats made by the Liberal party to destroy protection. He said: "Trust me and you are all right." He said that the manufacturers did trust him, and he saw a great increase in the manufactures of that place. While the right hon. leader of the Government, himself, was preaching free trade, was denouncing the National Policy in all its moods and tenses, was characterising it as slavery and robbery, he felt that it was necessary to keep the manufacturers in line, and whatever he said in public against protection, yet it was prudent to have some secret understanding with the manufacturers that they were not to be afraid that the National Policy would be disturbed. We find that a short time after the present Government came into power, in fact almost immediately after, a firm in Toronto, Messrs. Gunn Bros & Co., writing to the right hon. leader of the Government, congratulating him upon his victory, as follows:

Dear Sir,—Allow us to congratulate you on your great victory. We will require a new version for the old statement, "A prophet is not without honour in his own country." In the last two elections we supported Conservative candidates on account of their trade policy. Pre-vous to that we had been Liberals. During this campaign you were good enough to say that if your party was elected the trade policy would not be materially interfered with. We accepted this statement, and gave the Liberal candidates our support. We know there were many Liberals who left the ranks in former elections on the tariff issue, but returned to their "first love" on your assurance that there would not be much change made in the tariff.

You have a large field of good men to select your Cabinet from, and we believe your good judgment will enable you to secure the best without fear or favour.

Wishing you good health and every success in your endeavour to make Canada a great nation,

We are,
Yours truly,
D. GUNN BROS & CO.

That was a letter of congratulation sent to the right hon. leader of the Government upon his accession to power, and the tenor of that letter shows clearly what promise or encouragement the right hon. gentleman had given these parties before they supported the Liberal candidates. They said they supported formerly candidates representing protective principles, but they were assured that protection would not be interfered with, and, therefore, they supported the Liberal candidates. Yet in the face of all this hon. gentlemen tell us that they have kept their promises.

Another pre-election pledge made by hon. gentlemen opposite, while in Opposition, was that when they came to power, public contracts would only be let by public tender. They condemned the letting of public contracts without public tender. But, Sir, we find that, last year, when military supplies were required to the amount of some $32,000 for the Yukon, a contract was given to the political and personal friends of the Government, without any public tender at all. But that was all right; times changed, everything changed, and what was a fault in the late Government is a virtue in the present Government. We find, also, that a dredging contract was given to Mr. Gauthier, at Coteau Landing, in the St. Lawrence River, involving an expenditure of $21,000, without any public tender. Mr. Gauthier was not a public contractor at all; he was not a man who had any experience in doing work of this kind; he had no dredge, no appliances of any kind, but he got the work, simply because he was the friend or a near connection of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and it was discovered that it was necessary to give him this contract without public tender for fear that some others might tender below him. This gentleman never did any of this work. He farmed it out and he found that in a few months he had made sufficient profit out of the contract to enable him to take a trip to Europe, and to take with him the son of his benefactor. Another contract involving the expenditure of about $20,000 or $30,000—I think the whole expenditure made in Goderich harbour last season was about $60,000—went to a gentleman up there who is a newspaper man, who has no experience in work of this kind either. This gentleman, Dan McGillicuddy, is the editor of a newspaper. While in Opposition he was a true patriot; he devoted his whole time and attention to public affairs, to looking after the interests of the country, not his own interests, for he condemned corruption and maladministration on the part of the late Government. When a change of Government took place this gentleman discovered that, perhaps, it would be in the interest of the country that he should have some office from the Government. I do not know, that at that time he looked for any public contract, but he thought perhaps that an office from the Government to him would be in the best interests of the country. A postmastership in Goderich became vacant a short time after that, and he expressed his willingness to accept it.

However, he did not get it, and the fact of his not getting it gave such a shock to his patriotic constitution that he took kicking fits. He kicked so hard some times that the hon. member for that county, the late Mr. Cameron, who happened to come in his way got two or three hard kicks. Still, there was no danger apprehended while the Government was safe, although he did come in contact with the member for the county. Finally, this poor man's complaint got worse, and he began to give the Government some hard kicks, and therefore, it was deemed necessary that something should be done for him. A specialist in that complaint had to be sent to see him. The Minister of Public Works was sent up. The remedy he applied, namely, a fat contract, turned out to be effectual, and in a short time after this gentleman got completely over his kicking fits. There are numbers of other similar cases to which I may refer, but I will not weary the House by repeating them now.

Another promise that was made by the leader of the Government and by several other gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition was with regard to the plebiscite. That was a plank put in their platform at that memorable Liberal convention of 1893. Some hon. gentleman on the Liberal side of this House, particularly the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint)—whom I am glad to see now in his seat—were very ardent prohibitionists while the Conservative party was in power. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) moved a resolution, year after year, to the effect that the country was ripe for prohibition. But when the Liberal party came into power, we never heard a resolution moved by that hon. gentleman in this House, and so far as I remember we have never since heard his voice raised in this Parliament in favour of prohibition. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) told us last night, that the Government had fulfilled their plebiscite pledge. He said that the Prime Minister promised a plebiscite, but never promised prohibition, and therefore, when the plebiscite was taken his promise was fulfilled. But the circumstances surrounding the promise of the Prime Minister are somewhat mysterious. After this plebiscite plank was put in the platform of the Liberal party, prohibitionists throughout the country were delighted. Delegation after delegation called upon the then leader of the Opposition, and congratulated him upon his courage, and upon his honesty, and manliness in putting this plank in his party platform. They said to him: Now, when you come into power we expect to get prohibition; and the right hon. gentleman would tell them always, that if he came into power a plebiscite would be taken, and if the people were in favour of prohibition they would get it. He told them that if it was found upon a plebiscite being taken, that the people were in favour of prohibition, this promise would be immediately implemented by legislation. Well, the Liberal party came into power in 1896. A session was held a short time after their Government was formed, but there was nothing said about the plebiscite, the excuse being that it was a short session and there was not time to introduce a Bill. The session of 1897 came on and the prohibitionists were getting restless; they expected from the Government that this promise would be carried out, and the Bill would be introduced. But the right hon. the leader of the Government at that time had to go to England to the Diamond Jubilee, and the excuse then given for further delay was that no plebiscite Bill could be introduced in the absence of the Premier. In 1898, the third session after they came into power, when every excuse was exhausted and no other possible excuse could be given for any longer delay, the long promised Plebiscite Bill had to be introduced.

That Plebiscite Bill was framed, and I am told that it was revised and re-revised. That Bill gave some hon. gentlemen opposite many a restless night and many a restless hour. But finally they did agree upon a skeleton of a Bill, which was presented to this House. That Bill simply provided for the taking of a plebiscite. It was silent as to what would follow in the event of a majority vote being cast in favour of prohibition. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and the leader of the Government were questioned time and time again by the leader of the Opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance, as to what the Government proposed to do, if, upon taking a plebiscite, it was found that a majority vote was cast in favour of prohibition. They were just as vague and indefinite in their replies as they were in everything else. They said the will of the people would be carried out; but there was nothing said as to what was to constitute the will of the people. Well, Sir, after the vote was taken, prohibitionists felt that they were going to have prohibition. They felt that, a substantial majority having voted in favour of prohibition, a prohibitory Act would be introduced. At the time the vote on the plebiscite was about to be taken it was said by a great many individuals, some of whom were favourable to prohibition and some opposed to prohibition, that it was not the intention of the leader of the Government to introduce a prohibitory Act, no matter what the vote was, but that his whole intention was to deceive the temperance people, and, therefore, that their labour was all in vain. A gentleman belonging to Montreal, or to the Eastern Townships, Major Bond, an active prohibitionist, prepared a circular, which he distributed among the people during the campaign, a copy of which I hold in my hand. I propose to read a few selections from it to show how Major Bond regarded these statements, and how little attention he paid to them. It showed the confidence he had in the leader of the Government. In one part of his circular Major Bond says:

It is claimed that, even if the plebiscite be carried, the present Administration has no intention of giving effect to the vote by parliamentary action. It is difficult to conceive any greater insult to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Let us examine the facts.

The Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Liberal party, who were then out of power, preparing for a general election, recognized among the electors an important body known as prohibitionists, and placed among the political measures upon which he was to appeal to the electors, the following proposition:—

Then, after reciting the prohibition resolution that was passed here at the Liberal convention of 1893, he goes on:

Furthermore, Sir Wilfrid Laurier has given, in connection with this proposed policy, repeated assurances, of which the following is the most notable:—In reply to a deputation of Winnipeg prohibitionists, Mr. Laurier is reported to have said: "He would pledge his honour that, as soon as the Liberals came into power at Ottawa, they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion, by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party."

The Liberal party was duly elected, and the Hon. Mr. Laurier made Premier. Up to the present he has literally fulfilled his promises, and the plebiscite unhampered is before the people. If the electors of Canada now show that they want prohibition, is it even decent to assert that this gentleman of untarnished reputation would stoop to the position of a petty-fogging politician and virtually say:

"It is true I promised an Act, it is true I had an estimate of $250,000 passed, and have expended the same on the plebiscite, but it was only to hoodwink you—I have changed my mind; I think we had better go on as we are."

Does any sane man think this possible of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? Does any one believe that, assuming such a position were possible, the Hon. Sydney Fisher would remain in the Cabinet one day after such a decision had been announced?

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gallant Major is of the same opinion to-day as he was at the time he prepared this circular, I think he will have great difficulty in finding many sane people in the Dominion of Canada.

The right hon. leader of the Government stated in this House, in his reply to the leader of the Opposition, that there was an implied agreement between the prohibitionists and those against prohibition, at the time this plank was put in the platform. that, unless a majority of the electorate of the Dominion declared themselves in favour of prohibition, no prohibitory Act would be introduced. This was the first intimation this House or the country had of any such agreement. A short time after the plebiscite was taken—I think it was about the first week in November—a delegation of prohibitionists called upon the leader of the Government, and asked him, if he intended now to implement his promise with legislation, say that a substantial majority had declared themselves in favour of prohibition. What did the hon. gentleman tell that delegation? He told them that he was very much impressed indeed with the manner in which they presented their case, that he would lay the matter before his Council, and that he would communicate their decision later on to Mr. Spence, the secretary. Now, Sir, if there was an implied agreement, as the Prime Minister stated, why did he not say to those prohibitionists at that time: "Gentlemen, I regret very much that I am unable to give you any prohibitory law, because there is an implied agreement between the prohibitionists and the anti-prohibitionists who attended the convention, that, unless a majority of the electorate of the Dominion declared by their vote in favour of prohibition, no prohibitory law would be enacted." If the right hon. gentleman had treated them courteously, or with common fairness, his duty was to have told those people that he could not give them a prohibitory law. But, Sir, instead of that, he wanted to humbug them a little more. He wanted to gain still further time. It seems perfectly clear, that the hon. gentleman had his mind made up at that time as to what he would do; but it is equally clear, that he had not decided what course he would adopt, and, therefore, that time was necessary for him to consider what further means he could devise to hoodwink them most effectually.

Now, if this agreement did exist, I think that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is placed in a very unpleasant position indeed, and I am sorry to see he is not in his seat to-night. I do not wish to reflect upon his conduct or impute improper motives to him at all, but I think that the facts of the case, the action of the Minister of Agriculture towards the prohibitionists in this question have been such as to require some satisfactory explanation at his hands. Why, if this agreement did take place, was it not his duty to have told the prohibitionists at the time the plebiscite was being taken: "It is not sufficient for you to get a majority of the votes cast, but you must get a majority of the total registered vote of the Dominion." He did not do this. He got honest men and women involved into a contest, involving expense, loss of time and worry; a contest which he must have been satisfied would result in no benefit to the cause of prohibition. You know very well, Sir, that a contest of any kind is not conducive to good feeling between the opposing parties, but on the contrary is calculated to create friction and hostilities between them. Well, the hon. gentleman took the stump, he took a very active part in the prohibition campaign, he canvassed apparently with great sincerity, but notwithstanding all that, if he knew of this agreement and kept it in the dark, he was treating prohibitionists with great injustice. But it was not the prohibitionists alone who were put to this trouble and expense. Those opposing prohibition also entered into the contest, too, and spent money and time to no purpose, they, too, were deceived. The whole country was deceived. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the people's money was spent for the purpose of deceiving prohibitionists, and for that alone. On the other hand, if there were no agreement, then what opinion must the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) have of his leader, who stated on the floor of this House that such an agreement did exist. I think that the prohibitionists throughout the country will require a more satisfactory explanation from the leader of the Government and from the Minister of Agriculture as well than has yet been given, before they will be satisfied with the course of the Government as to their honesty and sincerity in this matter. The right hon. leader of the Government, in announcing his decision, said that he could not give prohibition because the majority of the vote was too small. The total vote cast for prohibition being something less than 23 per cent. Well, if we are to accept that argument, why the present Government themselves are not properly holding power in this country. They did not get a majority of the votes on the electoral lists. Not only that, Sir, but they did not get a majority of the vote cast. They are holding power to-day, by not only a minority of the electors on the lists, but a minority of the vote cast. Prohibitionists, after the election was over, naturally expected that a prohibitory law would be introduced. They relied upon this because under our system of Government, municipal, local, Dominion or otherwise, a majority of the vote cast decides the question at issue; a majority of the total vote on the registered list is not required, and, therefore, they would naturally expect that if a majority of the vote cast was in favour of prohibition, that such was sufficient to entitle them to a prohibitory law, that is in the absence of any expressed declaration to the contrary.

Another promise made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition was that they would give this country reciprocity with the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite declared from their seats in this House, time and again, and also from the public platform, that the only salvation of the country was reciprocity with the United States. They charged the late Government with gross negligence in not obtaining such. Why, they said: "Let us into power, and we will obtain reciprocity. It is not only not possible, but quite easy. We have the promise of the Government of the United States that when we come into power reciprocity will be granted. This promise was made, time and again, by some hon. gentlemen opposite. We find that in 1890, I think the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and the right hon. leader of the Government were down in St. John, N.B., and there spoke of reciprocity. They told the people that it was easy to get reciprocity. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is reported in the St. John "Telegraph"—the leading Liberal organ in the province of New Brunswick, as having said:

Mr. Davies said Mr. Foster had stated that the time had come when we might cease to hope for trade concessions in the United States; and if there were a fool in this audience who was prepared to accept such a statement, Mr. Davies said it was useless for him to listen longer to what he was saying. On the other side, the Liberal party said: There was no such thing as despair.

I think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and some other gentlemen opposite have discovered that there is such a word as "despair" in their vocabulary, and I think they frequently used that word, with other strange words when the blizzard struck them on their return from Washington. Some time after this meeting in St. John the Conservative Government, then in power, sent delegates to Washington to endeavour to get a treaty with the United States. They failed. But when we look at the difficulties they had to contend with we cannot wonder that they failed. The feeling between the two countries at that time was of a most unfriendly character. The American Government treated our delegates by times with scant courtesy. In addition to that, every time an effort was being made by the Conservative Government to obtain a trade treaty with the United States, it was found convenient for some hon. gentleman opposite to make speeches both in the United States and in this country which tended to mar the success of negotiations then being carried on. I had one or two extracts from such speeches which, I am sorry to say, I have mislaid. But I can give the substance of them. At this meeting in St. John the Minister of Marine and Fisheries reflected very severely upon the conduct of Canada and England towards the United States during the late war. The right hon. leader of the Government, speaking in Boston, used much stronger language. He said there that the conduct of England towards the United States during the civil war was unfriendly and unfair, and he, as a British subject, condemned that action. We find the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) on one of these occasions speaking on unrestricted reciprocity, said: "If we discriminate against Great Britain we have the right to discriminate; we owe Great Britain nothing but charity for her atrocious blundering against our interests; there never was a time when Canada could not have bettered her position by joining the United States." And the leader of the Government, speaking at Valleyfield a short time before the general election of 1896, said:

We will get a treaty with the United States if we can, and if England objects we will consider her objection. Let Lord Salisbury take care of the interests of England and we will take care of the interests of Canada.

These were the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite when an honest effort was being made by the late Government to get a reciprocity treaty with the United States. In the face of all this, is it any wonder I ask that the late Government failed to obtain reciprocity with the United States? We find that hon. gentlemen opposite failed at a time when the prospects of obtaining reciprocity never were so good in the history of the two countries. When the delegates of the Conservative Government returned from Washington and met Parliament after the negotiations of 1892, they laid everything before the House with a report of all proceedings. They did not obtain an adjournment in order to give them an opportunity to keep their mouths closed or to conceal anything that took place. But what did we find? Some hon. gentlemen then in Opposition, but now in power, condemned their action, and accused them of insincerity in their efforts to obtain a reciprocity treaty. Why, Sir, one gentleman said they were in the hands of the manufacturers, their masters, these scoundrels great and scoundrels small, controlled the Government, that the Government dared not do anything that was contrary to their interests. After the delegates returned, when the discussion took place in the House, some hon. gentlemen even accused them of falsifying the record and making false statements as to what had taken place at that convention. At the risk of wearying the House I will read a statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I do not imagine that it will be edifying to the House, as hon. gentlemen have heard it before. But it seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite since they have gained places on the Treasury benches, are sorely afflicted with loss of memory, and I wish to remind them of their utterances while in Opposition :

Does any one suppose that our natural products alone could be a basis of an interchange between us and the United States? The thing is ridiculous. If we are honest and sincere in the desire to renew our trade relations with the United States we must give and take. We must certainly include manufactures in any such treaty, as everybody is aware except the hon. gentleman, although I believe he wilfully misrepresents the policy of unrestricted reciprocity when he stated that the revenue we would lose offered an insuperable obstacle to its adoption. This result can be obtained by those whose hearts are in the business. We do not talk in regard to this matter without some knowledge of the views of the gentlemen across the line. Their conversations have not been limited to those which they have had with hon. gentlemen who have gone to Washington. We have the opinions expressed by their statesmen in Congress, we have their opinions expressed in the press, and many of us have had the privilege of conversing with many of their leading men.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. I suppose by the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite, that is considered a crime, and that those hon. gentlemen would not discuss any of these questions with leading men in the United States if they met them. I have discussed these questions with them, and I have not found one of them who is not amenable to reason. I have found a disposition on their part to negotiate with us on fair and honest lines. I have not found that any of those objections that the Finance Minister considers insuperable have come from them. They certainly did not come from Mr. Blaine, but they were suggested by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues with the desire to damn this policy in this country and to make it impossible to be carried out. In fact, the hon. gentleman was not there in the interests of the people of Canada, but was there in the interests of his masters, the manufacturers. He durst not attempt to negotiate a treaty which was contrary to their interests, but he might have stated to Mr. Blaine: We are representing, primarily, the manufacturing industries, we will subordinate to them, as we have in Canada the farming, mining and fishing industries, and if we cannot negotiate a treaty in favour of the manufacturing industries, we cannot negotiate one at all. If he had done that, no doubt he would have failed, as he has done, in negotiating a treaty, but he would have saved his consistency, and he would have saved us the humiliating spectacle that Canada has presented, of Ministers going to Washington in March and coming back after a few minutes' interview, and going again in October, and coming back with their thumbs in their mouths and saying that no treaty could be negotiated with the United States. I say that the spectacle presented is the most humiliating that could be exhibited in this or any other colony. I warn this House that there never has been an act of the Government of Canada so calculated to promote disloyal sentiments in this country as the step which the hon. gentleman has taken. If he satisfies the people of this country that his statement is true, if he convinces the people of the maritime provinces that the door is closed, and that while they retain their political autonomy they need never hope again to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States by which their products can go into that country, he will have done more to promote an annexation sentiment in this country than anything which has before taken place. But, Sir, I thank God, that in my belief, at least, his statement is not true. I believe that this dishonest negotiation which has gone through with, was understood by Mr. Blaine as well as it was understood by the people of this House. Sir, the record of the hon. gentleman and his party was known at Washington before he ever left Ottawa. It was known that he did not intend to negotiate a treaty upon a basis that would be accepted by the Washington Government, and that he had proclaimed the fact from his place in the House time and time again. It was known that he held power by virtue of a compact with the manufacturers, that he was to protect their interests, that those interests must be paramount, and that no treaty should be negotiated with a man holding that position. Sir, we do not hold that the door is closed. We have good reason to know better, not only from the official statements made in Congress, not only from the articles in the newspapers, not only from the constant flow of our people back and forth from the United States, but by conversations which we, individually, have had, and, I speak for myself, which I, individually, have had with a large number of leading statesmen from the United States, all which facts cause me to believe that it is quite possible for an honest man, who goes there with a sincere desire to promote a fair treaty, to negotiate one in a very short time.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also spoke on the question at the same time, and, in the course of his remarks, he said, speaking of the ex-Minister of Finance :

The hon. gentleman and his friends knew perfectly well that the United States would insist, and they have a perfect right to insist, that if they extend the hand of good-fellowship to us, if they give us this great privilege, as a great privilege it would be, we on our part should have sufficient decency and self-respect not to turn Canada into a smuggling base to the detriment of the United States. Now, Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman that, for my part, I think he has misunderstood and seriously misinterpreted what has passed. Possibly we may be in a position to judge of that before we are much older. I have no doubt that the United States Government, or their representatives, would insist on the two things I have enumerated: first of all, that the reciprocity should be genuine, one under which they would obtain advantages as well as give them; and, secondly, that we should take care that Canada should not be a smuggling base. Beyond that, for my part, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman, I have very grave fear that he most seriously misrepresented the whole nature of the conference. And I have no doubt at all about this, Sir, that any Canadian delegation that goes down there with a clearer and more honourable record than these hon. gentlemen are able to bring, any Canadian delegation that are able to say to the United States: "While we desire to retain our own autonomy, we are honestly and sincerely desirous of living on friendly terms with you and giving you something in exchange for what you give us," will not find any insuperable difficulty in obtaining reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. Farrer, for instance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt that he would make an infinitely better negotiator than any or all of the gentlemen who went there. Now, Sir, I am glad for one that the hon. gentlemen have shown their hand at last. All through this controversy we have been hampered and entangled by the assertions made by their followers, if not by themselves, that they were most earnestly desirous of negotiating a reciprocity treaty. Sir, no man now can pretend that they either desire or hope to obtain reciprocity with the United States. It is perfectly plain and clear, that so far as these men are concerned, all hope has departed. They cannot, they will not—I do not believe, Sir, that they ever had the desire or the power to negotiate a reciprocity treaty on any terms that would be acceptable—because, Sir, I know who stands behind the throne, I know who control this Government.

Mr. Speaker, I say, that with such statements before the United States Government and people, it would have been very difficult indeed for the late Government, if not absolutely impossible, to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States, no matter what the feeling between the two countries may have been. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have had an opportunity to see what honest men, men who sincerely desired to obtain a reciprocity treaty, could do. They went away to the United States with a great flourish of trumpets; they went away buoyed up with high hopes of success; they went away with the expectation of returning with a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and of being able to say to the Conservative party: "See what we have" obtained, and see what you failed to do. Is it any wonder, then, that when a reference was made by the leader of the Opposition to the failure of the joint high commission, he touched hon. gentlemen in a tender spot? Is it any wonder that they were humiliated, and that they returned from the United States to Canada, to use the expression of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, "with their thumbs in their mouths"?

The right hon. First Minister says that they find now Canada does not want reciprocity; they find that Canada can get along now without the United States; that we have cold storage, and that we are in a better position to get along without any trade relations with the United States than ever we were before. The credit for having introduced this cold storage is claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite, but, as the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) said last night, this system of cold storage was introduced by the late Government, and the gentleman who deserves the most credit for it is Professor Robertson, who holds the same position today that he did then, and whatever success has attended cold storage, has been largely due to that gentleman. I remember that, when the cold storage system was mentioned in this House by the late Government before it was introduced, it was sneered at by hon. gentlemen opposite, as they sneered at every progressive measure introduced by the late Government. While the right hon. leader of the Government says that he has discovered now that the country does not want reciprocity, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) admits that reciprocity with the United States would be of great benefit to this country. At the outset he lays the blame of the failure largely upon the Conservative party. He says that it was their fault that the joint high commission did not succeed, but he did not tell the House, or the country, in what way the Conservative party were to blame for it. Later on, he lays the whole blame of the failure upon the form of Government in the United States. He says that, if the United States had the same form of government as we have in Canada, it would not only be possible, but easy, to obtain some satisfactory treaty with the United States. He says that this abominable Senate of the United States requires two-thirds majority vote before any treaty, agreed upon between the respective delegates and submitted to the Senate, can be passed, and he lays the whole blame for the failure upon the iniquitous form of government which exists in the United States. Well, Sir, I think, judging from this, that we may expect that the negotiations for a treaty are at an end. If the form of government in the United States is the real cause of this failure, there is no prospect whatever of a change of government taking place in the United States, at least in the near future. We have not heard of the state legislatures in the United States passing or introducing any legislation for Senate reform since our commissioners returned; we have no evidence that the President of the United States has expressed any dissatisfaction with the constitution of the Senate of the United States; and, this being the case, I think we may consider all negotiations for reciprocity with the United States at an end. The adjournment may have been very convenient for hon. gentlemen opposite. It gave them an opportunity of keeping their mouths closed, because, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says: "The matter is sub judice, and we returned to Canada with our mouths closed." It may be very convenient indeed for these hon. gentlemen to keep their mouths closed. Possibly, they intend to keep them closed until an appeal is made to the country, and another election held. Then they will be compelled to open their mouths and tell us what took place at that conference, just as the right hon. First Minister was obliged, in the end, to state to the temperance body what the decision of the Government was on the prohibition question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have frequently reminded us of the prosperity that prevails throughout the length and breadth of Canada. We on this side are as much rejoiced at the prosperity of Canada as they are, and I hope that prosperity will long continue, whether gentlemen opposite are in power or not. But, Sir, there were times before when the country was as prosperous as it is now, but then the Liberals sang a different song. There were periods of prosperity between 1878 and 1896, but the Liberals would not see it. On the contrary, they said the country was going to ruin, that farm property was depreciating from ten to sixty per cent in value, and that nothing but bankruptcy stared us in the face. They decried the country in this way, even though at the opening of every session of the local legislatures, controlled for the most part by their political party, the Speech from the Throne referred to the prosperity prevailing. The Liberal press throughout Canada told the people that the Conservative party were driving the country into bankruptcy, that our taxes were getting higher, that our people were leaving the country. Blue ruin was preached from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Sir, there are periods of depression in the history of every country as well as periods of prosperity, and we know that the greatest depression that ever visited Canada was between the years 1874 and 1878 when the Liberals were in power. Strange to say, they then disclaimed all responsibility for the depression, and when those representing the industries of the country waited on the Government controlled by the same hon. gentlemen asking for some measure to relieve the want that prevailed, would tell them that the Government were but flies on the wheel and could do nothing to relieve the want. Now, Sir, they have another cry, they claim credit for the prosperity which exists. When in Opposition they denounced the National Policy as a curse to the country, but that same National Policy is in force to-day, and hon. gentlemen opposite claim that the prosperity is due to them. They brought prosperity with a magic wand. Let me tell them that one cause of our present prosperity is that there is no longer an Opposition in this country to decry it and preach blue ruin. Why, Sir, from 1878 to 1896 you could not take up a Liberal newspaper that did not display in black headlines: "The country going to ruin." "Our young men leaving for the United States." These hon. gentlemen and their press declared that the United States was a better country to live in than Canada, and no one could cross the border on business or pleasure but he was not set down as leaving the country. I remember on one occasion the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) taking up the greater part of a day in trying to prove that the American farmer was more prosperous than the Canadian farmer, and yet this very hon. gentleman was one of the delegation selected as one of the joint High Commission. Surely the Government must have known that the United States Government would treasure up all the utterances of these very gentlemen while in Opposition, and that when they asked for a fair measure of reciprocity they would be confronted with their own statements. They knew that the United States representatives naturally would ask the Canadian commissioners if they were honest in their statements, then if they were, then it was no benefit to them to trade with a country that was so poor as Canada was described to be; and on the contrary, if they were dishonest in their statements, then the Americans had no guarantee that they would be honest in any treaty they made with them. Why, Sir, when in 1893 a great wave of depression swept over the United States and other countries, it was the wonder of the world that Canada was making progress, felt so little depression, the depression then existing. When any hon. member of the Conservative party referred then to the depression existing in other countries, they were chastised by the hon. gentlemen opposite for daring to say that other countries were not as prosperous as Canada, and when they referred to the prosperity of Canada, they were equally denounced. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was in these days not satisfied with preaching blue ruin in Canada, but he felt obliged to carry his unpatriotic crusade abroad by writing letters to the press of Great Britain. There is no doubt that when depression does exist in a country it creates dissatisfaction, and the people naturally look for the cause of it. When they see the Government blamed day after day for this depression they doubtless would think that the Government was responsible to a certain extent, and believe that a change of Government was necessary. Writing to the London "Economist" in 1892, at a period when every one knew the country was prosperous, the Minister of Trade and Commerce wrote as follows, and for fear of wearying the House, I shall content myself with merely giving extracts from that article. He wrote:

But it is not quite equally well known on your side of the Atlantic that it has become painfully apparent for some time back, to every one who has taken pains to examine the evidence which has accumulated upon the subject, that, even in that comparatively short space of time, this most ill-advised policy has resulted in a tremendous exodus of the very choicest portion of the population of Canada, and in a very grave depreciation in the selling values of farm lands and of town and village property throughout all the older sections of the Dominion, including Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

This has been accompanied, as is usual in such cases, by an immense increase in the aggregate indebtedness of the Dominion in the shape of large additions to its federal, provincial and municipal debts, and also the mortgage debts incurred for the construction of railroads—by far incurred by private individuals and liabilities the greater part of all which obligations are held abroad.

Briefly, in these thirteen years there has been a great displacement in wealth, caused mainly by artificial legislation, but (as regards the older provinces) absolutely no increase at all of the collective wealth of the community. Two or three cities, and perhaps a score of towns, have increased considerably, and a few hundred individuals (who have been privileged to tax their fellows for their private advantage) have grown rich by this system of legalized robbery; but the great mass of the population, and notably the agricultural class, are distinctly poorer and less prosperous than they were twelve years ago.

As to the amount of taxation, the agricultural class have been simply bled white.

It would be well if this were all, but unfortunately, the economic results of the protective system adopted by Canada in 1879, grievous as they are, fade almost into insignificance compared with the moral and political pollution it has brought in its train.

In the second place, by making it the direct personal interest of a considerable number of active business men, many of whom are wealthy and all of whom have the control of large sums of money, to support a Government which gives them a free hand to tax the rest of the community for their special benefit, you lay broad and deep the foundations of a colossal system of organized corruption, in the face of which honest Government becomes an impossibility.

In such a case bribery becomes a pure matter of business routine.

The Government gives the protected manufacturers the power to tax the people for business purposes of their own, and the protected manufacturers in turn, whenever called upon, assess themselves in whatever amounts the Government require in order to enable it to carry on the elections.

The thing is done openly and shamelessly by both parties to the transaction. Prior to the general elections of 1882, 1887, and 1891, Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues deliberately called the protected manufacturers together, and demanded and obtained from them such sums as they deemed necessary for the purpose of debauching the electorate, pledging themselves in return not to alter the tariff to the detriment of the said contributors, which contract was faithfully carried out and impudently avowed.

Still further on, he says :

But, in truth, the question between the two Canadian parties is in reality an economic one, and in the long run resolves into this : Shall Canada be governed for the people of Canada, or for the profit of a few hundred protected manufacturers, backed by a subsidized press and a purchased majority in the legislature ?

To talk of loyalty in such a connection is little short of political blasphemy, and I can only express my surprise that such a shallow subterfuge should have obtained even a momentary credence in the mind of any Englishman of even average intelligence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what object could the hon. gentleman have in having such a letter as this published abroad ? Was it not to injure this country in the eyes of the world, and particularly in the eyes of financiers in England ? He knew well that about that time a loan was likely to be applied for. Was that letter published in the interest of the taxpayers of this country ? Was it published in the interest of the agriculturists, who he said were bled white ? No ! If loans could not be floated on favourable terms, if our credit were depreciated in the money markets of England, I am very much afraid that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the spirit of mind in which he was at that time, would not have been very much disappointed. And yet in face of all this, that hon. gentleman has the audacity to stand up in this House and accuse the leader of the Opposition of having violated his oath as a Privy Councillor. I say if the hon. gentleman did not violate his oath as a Privy Councillor when he wrote that letter, we have yet to learn the proper definition of that term.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just one remark more and I am done. We have heard a good deal said by hon. gentlemen opposite, time and again, about race and creed prejudices and passions. I am very sorry indeed to hear such subjects mentioned in this House and in the country. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), in speaking the other night, referred to the Manitoba school question, and accused the Opposition when in power of endeavouring to raise religious cries throughout the country ? I fail to see, Mr. Speaker, how they did it in connection with the Manitoba school question ; and I observe that when that question is mentioned by an hon. gentleman in this House, it gives hon. gentlemen opposite great pain. When the hon. member for Guysborough the other night referred to it in a way which I say was not honest, hon. gentlemen opposite applauded. The right hon. leader of the Government himself refers very often to race and creed prejudices and passions. He expresses great regret that such should be raised ; but he never mentions the persons who do it. I say that "La Patrie," the organ of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has done more to stir up religious strife in this country than any other organ in the whole Dominion ; and, so far as I have seen, the right hon. leader of the Government has neither condemned nor disapproved of such utterances. The Minister of Public Works the other night, in the course of his remarks, said that certain Conservative newspapers had declared that Sir Wilfrid Laurier should not be Premier of Canada because he is a Frenchman and a Catholic. All I can say is that I never saw or heard of it before. I would be very sorry to think that such was the case. I would be very sorry that any person in the whole Dominion would give expression to such sentiments or hold such views. This great Dominion is composed of people of all creeds and nationalities, who enjoy equal rights and privileges. No man can claim the highest or any position in the gift of the country simply because he happens to belong to a certain creed or a certain nationality. Neither does the fact of his belonging to such stand in the way of his attaining to such a position. Sir, it is the duty of every citizen of Canada to frown upon anything that may arouse religious strife in the country. It is their duty to do all that in them lies, not only to stamp out anything and everything which may tend to turn race against race and creed against creed, but to promote that unity, that harmony, and fraternal spirit which should characterize a free people.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson) moved the adjournment of the debate.

REPORTS.

Report of the Department of Marine for the year ending 30th June, 1898.—The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies).

Partial Report of the Auditor General for the year ending 30th June, 1898.—The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend what proportion that is of the whole report?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The document has just been handed to me, and I know that my hon. friend's desire is so great to see it that I have not had an opportunity to examine it. But there is a very goodly supply there.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend will convey the information gently to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) as soon as possible.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.10 (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 10th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 42) respecting the Portage du Fort and Bristol Branch Railway Company.—(Mr. Poupore.)

Bill (No. 43) respecting the Canada Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Ingram.)

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Alaska and North-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 45) to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Arthabaska Railway Company.—(Mr. Lavergne.)

Bill (No. 47) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 48) to impose certain restrictions on immigration.—(Mr. McInnes.)

Bill (No. 49) to amend the Chinese Immigration Act.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

DISTRIBUTION OF POLITICAL SPEECHES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, seeing the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) in his place, I would like to say that I am informed that large parcels of speeches, rather, I should say, of the speech delivered by the right hon. the First Minister, are being sent to the postmasters with instructions to deliver them where they think they will do the most good. I may just say that I have no objection to that speech being circulated as widely as possible, but I do not think the postmasters are the proper people to perform that work.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that the postmasters are not the proper persons to distribute political speeches. I am not aware of any speeches being sent to them with any such instructions. I am quite satisfied that no such circumstance has happened as my hon. friend has referred to.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The old things have passed away.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to call the attention of the House, and particularly that of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) to a question which he brought the other day to the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman called the attention of the Government to a paragraph which was then largely circulated in the press to the effect that the American authorities had asked for a provisional delimitation of the boundary between Alaska and Canada. I now must qualify the statement that I made at that time; I must say to the House and to the hon. gentleman that a proposition has been made in that direction and an answer given, but unfortunately the negotiations are not so far advanced that I can lay the papers before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very much obliged to the right hon. leader of the House for the information he has given, and I would like to call his attention, at this moment—because it may at a later period not be practicable—to the question as to whether, pending the delimitation that would take place, a fixed regulation should not be made that would ensure the greatest possible facilities in bonding across the country, either inward or outward. I merely draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman to this matter because it is possible that a suggestion of that kind may be open now, when it could not be done later.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. J. DOMVILLE (King's, N. B.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw your attention to the following paragraph, published in the "Mail and Empire" on Friday, the 7th of April, as follows:—

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper told Parliament of the charges made against Major Walsh, and the major has replied to them strongly and forcibly, as he had the right to do. But it must not be supposed that Sir Hibbert was the first member of Parliament to mention these accusations, which the major pronounces unwarranted. The first assailant of Major Walsh, the originator of the accusations, was Lieutenant-Colonel Domville, M.P., Mr. Sifton's supporter from King's, N.B. Lieutenant-Colonel Domville was at Dawson last fall, and while there was interviewed. It was through this interview, given to a Seattle paper, that the attack upon Major Walsh was made. If Mr. Domville has a charge to prefer against Major Walsh, why does he not, as a member of Parliament, make it in Parliament, instead of spreading it before the country in newspaper interviews?

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that any interviews purporting to come from me I officially denied when I arrived from Dawson. I made no charges against Major Walsh; all I said, in the newspapers, was that if there were any accusations, it would be time enough to pronounce an opinion upon them, after an investigation might be held, if these charges were found correct. I now take the opportunity of saying that whoever charged Major Walsh with being drunk or with drinking was a base slanderer.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention, in rising to address the House upon this occasion, to go over all the points that have been discussed, but I shall confine myself, more particularly, to just one subject. I recognize the fact that many, if not all of the subjects, that have been touched upon, will be up for consideration at what I may term a more convenient season, that is when they will be specially and individually before the House and will be discussed upon their merits. I therefore will not attempt to deal with the criticisms of those gentlemen who alluded to the finances of the country. We hope to have the pleasure, before many days, of hearing the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) state clearly, correctly and concisely the healthy state in which the finances of this country are. I have no doubt that members of this House will be able to possess their souls in patience for a few days before they learn what, I have no doubt, many of them know already, perhaps all of them know already, that never perhaps in the history of Canada was its financial position in such a condition as it is to-day. That will, no doubt, be pleasing to hon. gentlemen opposite, who have thought that this Government have been somewhat reckless in its expenditure, and that they have not decreased the taxation as they should have done. I repeat, that it will, no doubt, be pleasing to them, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will be able to assure them, that he has met all the liabilities incurred on consolidated fund account during the past year, and has had about one and three-quarters millions dollars of a surplus. I suppose it will be still more interesting to hon. gentlemen opposite, when the Minister of Finance points out, as he perhaps may, that there is a possibility, if not a probability, that he may have double that amount of surplus next year.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, allude to the question of the Yukon administration which has been brought into this debate. We have heard the charges made, and we have heard the answer of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) whose department was more particularly attacked. So far as that is concerned, the people have taken cognizance of it, and I judge from the newspapers, that the further attention of the House is to be specially drawn to that subject, so that, consequently, I need not deal with it now. So with reference to the plebiscite, so with reference to the Redistribution Bill, so with reference to the Senate, all of which have been discussed in this debate; measures will be introduced, these subjects will be brought up separately, and they will receive the attention of members of the House then. I do not know that I would have spoken at all at this time, were it not for the fact that my attention has been called to an article written with reference to the speech of the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), an article which appeared in a Toronto paper. That article was copied into one of the Ottawa city papers from the Toronto "Telegram," of which the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson) is the editor and proprietor, I believe. That gentleman is an independent member of this House; he is not one of those who are tied to the Tory chariot wheels—at least, he tells us he is not—and so I find, from this article, that he is fully convinced that the speech referred to has proven that the Government were guilty of a fraud, not merely upon the people of Canada, but also upon the people of England. The language used by the newspaper of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson) is:

One of the strong points in the record of the Laurier Government is its so-called preferential tariff in favour of British goods. The Government was pretty nearly deprived of this strength by the unanswered speech of N. Clark Wallace. Silence was the Government's only answer to Mr. Wallace's contention, that the whole Fielding tariff was a juggle, which could not but work out to the disadvantage of British products and to the advantage of United States products. Facts and figures supported Mr. Wallace at every point where he insisted that the Fielding tariff had raised the old National Policy duty on British products, so that the preferential reduction of 25 per cent brought the rates down very little or not at all below the level of the old National Policy tariff on British goods. And Mr. Wallace showed that every change in the Fielding tariff affecting United States products gave a real advantage to our neighbours across the line. Altogether Mr. Wallace's was the most damaging attack which has yet been made on the supposedly strong point in the Laurier tariff policy, and the country can only infer that Mr. Wallace's exposure of the preference as a hollow sham was unanswered because it was unanswerable.

That is the opinion, expressed through his newspaper, of an hon. member of this House who claims to be an independent member. It would not have surprised me, if I had found those sentiments written in one of the avowedly Tory organs, but I must confess, that until I read that article, I had not supposed that those who had examined the matter in the light of facts—as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Robertson) informs us he did—would have considered that speech at all unanswerable, but would rather have thought, as it struck me at the time—and as it struck, I think, every hon. member of this House who gave it consideration—would rather have thought, that the deductions drawn by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) from the figures, were not deductions that could fairly be drawn, and that the proper conclusion to be derived lay in the very opposite direction. Sir, I intend to confine myself exclusively to discussing this tariff question, and I am bound to say it is difficult to argue and debate the subject with our Conservative friends opposite. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that you, sitting in the Chair, taking no part in the debate, and listening to the arguments that are being advanced, as you see gentleman after gentleman on the other side of the House rise and make their speeches on the tariff—I feel, Sir, that you must be struck with amazement at the contradictory positions these gentlemen assume—I do not say, contradictory one from the other, but contradictory in the very utterances of the gentleman who for the time being has the floor. It cannot have failed to have occurred to you, Sir, that, from the leader of the Opposition down, these gentlemen opposite have invariably contradicted themselves in the most flagrant manner. Their attention has been called to the prosperity which is upon the country now—that prosperity of which the leader of the Government spoke, while he was yet leader of the Opposition, when he ventured to suggest, if not to prophesy, in the city of Toronto, that while it might be necessary for the Conservatives at that time to endeavour to prove prosperity by the use of figures; when he came into power with the Liberal party, there would be no necessity for that, because prosperity would be so abundant on every hand, that every man would see it for himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is true, and the hon. gentlemen opposite know it. The hon. gentleman admits it; I knew he would. But even while the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) admits it, he says at the same time: Oh, yes, but do you deserve any credit for it? What is the cause of prosperity we see in the country now? Why, it is apparent that the cause is, that you are continuing the very same trade policy that the Conservatives inaugurated and maintained. These hon. gentlemen opposite all say this, but before they are finished with their speeches, they turn around and say: This Tariff Act of the Liberal Government is one of the vilest products of the brain that was ever conceived; it is a fraud upon the English people; it is a juggling; it is an attempt to deceive, mislead and bamboozle the English people, and the Canadian people as well, and that, in attempting it, the Liberals have done something unworthy of men charged with the administration of the affairs of the country. What a description for these gentlemen opposite to give of their policy, if it is their policy we are pursuing. Sir, I do not need figures to prove that there is prosperity in Canada to-day. The Trade and Navigation Returns, which are within the reach of all, show that, in the two short years this Government have had the management of affairs, there has been an increase of $60,000,000 and over in the foreign trade of this country—an increase of over 25 per cent in two short years above the trade that prevailed when the Conservatives were in power. They say we have broken every pledge. Well, Sir, it does not look to me that this is in the direction of a broken pledge. The Liberal party pledged themselves to reduce the burdens upon the people and to give freer trade to the people of Canada, and people who look and see that there has been more than $60,000,000 increase in the foreign trade of Canada in less than two years, will admit that, at any rate, the Government have not dammed up this trade, but that they have afforded it a freer course than it had before. But hon. gentlemen opposite tell us—and they did tell us in the days gone by—that if we increase our foreign trade, we will do it at the expense of the labouring men and artisans of this country, and that, for every additional dollar's worth of imports we bring into Canada, it means so much work taken from Canadian workmen. Well, Sir, I have pointed to an increased foreign trade of $60,000,000; I cannot give you the figures for the increase in the domestic or home trade of Canada, but I can ask hon. gentlemen opposite to look around them, to look into the factories and the workshops of this Dominion; to go into the mercantile institutions, to examine the bank returns; and I venture to say, they will find that, vast as has been the increase in the foreign trade of this country, concurrent with it has been as vast an increase in the domestic trade of Canada. Why, Sir, you may go throughout the length and breadth of this land, and you will find that the factories, which these gentlemen predicted would be closed with the advent of the Liberal party to power, are working as they never worked before; increasing the number of hands employed, and working both night and day in order to keep up to the requirements of the country. Therefore, I do not need to point out that we have prosperity in this country; it is abundant on every hand.

But now I want to examine the charge—for it would be a serious one indeed if it were established as true—that in the preparation of this tariff we had juggled with it designedly, in order that we might deceive the British public and mislead the Canadian public as well. Let me, however, before doing that, just reply to the question which was asked by my hon. friend the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), which might, perhaps, have been asked by somebody else, but which I was rather astonished to find asked by a gentleman occupying his position. Regarding the heading of "Reciprocal Tariff," in the Trade and Navigation Returns, where the duties levied under that are specified as distinct from those levied under the general tariff, the hon. gentleman asked me, with an air of superiority, as if he were still controlling things, by what authority the Minister of Customs ventured to put that heading there; because, he said, we had no reciprocal tariff, and it was a great mistake on my part. Well, I recognize the hon. gentleman, of course, as one who may ask a question, and it is my duty to answer him, though I supposed he should know. I will tell him my authority for having done so, and I think it will be an authority which he will have to bow to, though it may be unwillingly. My authority was an Act of Parliament passed in this House when the hon. gentleman was in the House—Chapter 16 of 60-61 Victoria—where he will find in section 17 a reference to "the reduced rates of duty provided in the "Reciprocal Tariff" set forth in Schedule D, to this Act;" and on turning to Schedule D, we find it headed "Reciprocal Tariff," and stating:

On all the products of countries entitled to the benefits of this reciprocal tariff, under the provisions of section 17, the duties mentioned in Schedule "A" shall be reduced as follows:—

On and after the 23rd of April, 1897, until the 30th day of June, 1898, inclusive, the reductions shall in every case be one-eighth of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A," and the duty to be levied, collected and paid shall be seven-eighths of the duty mentioned in Schedule "A."

In the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year 1897-98, to which the hon. gentleman referred, you have under the head of "Reciprocal Tariff" the duties entered that were collected on articles that came in under that schedule.

Now, Sir, passing on, I would just notice the charge made by the hon. gentleman with reference to the tariff, and on which he bases his argument. He says:

Therefore, I say this tariff, which professes to give a great preference to Great Britain, does not carry out its professions, but is framed to deceive the English people and to deceive the Canadian people as well.

The hon. gentleman, after alluding to another argument, goes on to say:

That bears out what I have proved in another way as to the effects of that tariff, that we are not studying the interests of Canada or of Great Britain, which these gentlemen in their new-found love for the mother country are so proud of extolling to-day, but that we have framed a tariff pro-American in its whole tendency and effect.

Through the whole of his speech, that is the burden of his song, that the tariff which is in force to-day is a fraud upon the English people, and a fraud upon the Canadian people as well. He endeavours to prove that by giving some figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns. He has two lines of argument. He says that on certain lines of goods the larger portion of which in the past came from the United States, we have lowered the duties, while on other lines of goods which in days gone by came in larger part from Great Britain, we have raised the duties; and by these two statements—giving instances, about all the instances there are in the tariff of advances—he seeks to establish his charge. Let us examine, first, his charge as to the reduction of duties, not being in favour of the people of Canada, but for the purpose of favouring the people of the United States. The first article he touches upon is coal oil, which he says we get from the United States almost wholly, and not from Great Britain; and he says that when we reduced the duty on coal oil from 6 cents to 5 cents a gallon, we practised a fraud on the people of Great Britain and on the people of Canada, and did it in the interest of the people of the United States. All I have to say to the hon. gentleman is this: If I understand that argument at all, he is against the reduction of the duty on coal oil. As for the reduction having been made to benefit the American people, no one believes that for a moment; it was done for the purpose of lightening the burden of taxation on that article to the Canadian people; and there are people on the hon. gentleman's own side who do not think we went far enough in that direction, if we may judge from the notices on the Order paper. On that article alone, by our reduction of duty, we saved $80,000 to the people of Canada last year, not for the benefit of the Americans, but for the benefit of the Canadian people; and what does that mean? It is equivalent to an absolute free introduction into this country of about 1,500,000 gallons of coal oil. The hon. gentleman gives another strange illustration. He speaks with the view of making the farmer believe that he had been terribly hurt because we had reduced the duties on some of the products of the farm.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me, before he leaves the question of oil, to say that I did not make the statement he refers to with regard to coal oil, but I made it with regard to linseed oil, which is imported from England, on which he added 25 per cent to the duty, whereas he took 17 per cent from the duty on coal oil, which comes from the United States. I put the two statements together. The hon. gentleman conveniently ignores the one and misrepresents the other.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do not let my hon. friend get at all anxious on that point. I mentioned that there were two divisions or two lines of argument which he took—that we lowered duties on certain articles which in times past came largely from the United States, while on articles that came from Great Britain, the larger part of them, we advanced the duties; and I think I said I would take first the list of articles on which he said we had reduced the duty in favour of the United States. Then, I will take up, if he will wait until the time comes, the articles on which he says we advanced the duties. But if the hon. gentleman wants me to do that now, I will do it. That we raised it to 25 per cent and that we then took off 25 per cent, thus bringing it back to what it was before, and he called that juggling.

Mr. WALLACE. No, I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that that was not the plain inference to be derived from his words?

Mr. WALLACE. Nothing of the kind. I said that 25 per cent was the duty, and that 25 per cent of that was struck off under the preferential tariff. Any one who understands figures will understand that that brings the duty down to 18½ per cent on the imports from England.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has had light brought in on him now, but he had not at the time he made his speech.

Mr. WALLACE. I just want the hon. Minister not to misconstrue my statement, but let him read it out of "Hansard," and contradict if he can.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS :

The duty on linseed oil was ad valorem; it amounted to about 6½ cents per gallon. What did they do? They increased—if I may borrow an expression of the Minister of Customs—they increased the duty on linseed oil 25 per cent. Of the linseed oil brought into Canada, seven-eighths of it is from Great Britain and one-eighth from other countries. They add 25 per cent to the duty, then they give Great Britain a preferential tariff and take 25 per cent off. Was not that an admirable concession to Great Britain?

If what I have said was not his intention, if that was not in his mind when he used the figures he did, let me give the other figures to show the evident intent. But he has been enlightened since. Let us follow his argument out. The interruption has taken me out of the regular course of my argument, but in speaking of linseed oil, he said that the change made in the duty was a fraud practised upon the Englishman and also a fraud practised upon the Canadian. Why? Because we raised the duty and then let the article in under the preferential tariff. Let us see how a fraud can thus have been practised upon the Englishman. Under the hon. gentleman's tariff, when it was in force, linseed oil, coming in from Great Britain, paid 20 per cent and from the United States 26 per cent. A broker went with two invoices of linseed oil to the custom-house—one an American and the other an English invoice—and he made his entry. Each invoice amounted to $100, on which $20 duty had to be paid. But under our preferential rate, which the hon. gentleman says is an imposition on the Englishman and the Canadian, how is the entry made to-day? That same broker goes with the two invoices of $100 each; the American is charged $25 duty and the American pays it, but the Englishman pays 25 per cent duty less the 25 per cent preferential rate, or $18.75.

Mr. McDUGALL. But none comes from the United States.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman who interrupts me says that hardly any of it comes from the United States, and he is right. That has been the case in the past and largely in the present, but though it comes almost wholly from England, it pays $1.25 less now than it did in days gone by.

Mr. SPEAKER. Hon. members will please understand that without the consent of the member who has the floor, interruptions will not be allowed.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend allow me to put a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not want to be led into a discussion at this time, because when my hon. colleague the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) makes his statement, the tariff will probably be discussed in detail. But as these figures were given by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace)—and I suppose prominence is attached to what he says owing to the fact of his having been the head of the Customs Department under the late Government and largely charged with the formation of the tariff in existence before the present one—I found a moment to deal with them.

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask my hon. friend a question? Was the reduction to which he has referred, the same reduction that was promised by him and other members of the present Cabinet when they said they were going to reduce the duties in favour of English goods to the extent of 25 per cent? Was there a reduction to that extent in favour of England on linseed oil as compared with the duty in 1896?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This is a reduction in the new tariff of 25 per cent on the general duty charged.

Mr. McNEILL. But in 1897 my hon. friend told us they were going to make a reduction of 25 per cent this year.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will cover all the points in the hon. gentleman's mind before I get through, if he will do me the honour of listening to my statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let me ask the hon. gentleman who has the floor, when any interruption occurs, either distinctly to say he consents to the interruption and then sit down or make his refusal clear, because when he keeps standing it is impossible for me to decide whether he is consenting to the interruption or not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, for breaking that obvious rule. I thought the interruption was just for a moment and that I would hardly have time to take my seat and rise again, but the hon. gentleman's interruption was rather an argument than an interruption. I was proceeding in the direction of the reduction he was pointing to. I was referring to coal oil, and I was pointing out that the reduction was not made with the view of working a deception on the English or Canadian oil men but as a relief to the people of Canada of a part of their burden of taxation on that article, and I have shown that it was a very considerable relief. The next point the hon. gentleman took exception to was the reductions we made in the duties on flour and wheat, which he said worked injuriously to Great Britain because these products came mostly from the United States. He said:

These gentlemen have reduced the duties on flour and wheat, and of course all our imports of these articles come from the United States, and none from Great Britain. They reduced the duty on flour from 75 to 60 cents a barrel, and the result was an importation of 35,500 barrels at a cost of $148,000, and our imports of wheat, the duty on which they reduced from 15 to 12 cents, amounted to 58,000 bushels, valued at $42,000. So that in all these matters where they made changes in the duties, this Government has made them very largely in the interest of the people of the United States.

This is a very extraordinary argument and on a par with that which he made in the case of coal oil. His statement that the Canadian was injured and the American benefited, is hardly borne out by the facts. He said, referring to the reduction of the duty on flour to 15 cents a barrel in the interests of the Canadian producer, that the result of our doing was that we flooded this country with 35,780 barrels from the United States. But, under his tariff in 1896, before that reduction was made at all, the Americans got in over 41,000. It seems to have worked wrong that time. Again, take wheat. He says that we reduced the duty from 15 to 12 cents per bushel, his intention being to make our farmers believe they were being ruined by this reduction. The result, he said, was that we brought in over 58,000 bushels of wheat from the United States last year. But when the duty was three cents higher, under his tariff, we brought in 142,000 bushels.

Mr. WALLACE. That was to help the manufacturers of biscuits.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Now, the hon. gentleman sees fit to interject a word—"biscuits." He wants to be a little personal. The hon. gentleman went into a long list of iron goods on which, he said, we had reduced the duty. Now, I want to say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that we did reduce the duty on pig iron, bar iron, and many kinds of steel, and manufactures of iron not produced in this country, but which are component parts of other manufactures. And one of the greatest triumphs of the alteration made in the tariff was the changes we made in the iron duties. We gave increased impetus to the iron industries that employ tens of thousands of men in this country, and not only that, we gave to the consumers, particularly to the farmers, all that they buy at much lower prices. The hon. gentleman says: You have done a vast injury to England; you have practised a fraud on England. The hon. gentleman is not the first to say that; the leader of the Opposition made use of the same argument last year. Here are his words:

Take iron or steel scrap. The old duty was $4 per ton, the new duty was $1. They have reduced the duty on that. There were $75,000 of imports from Great Britain, and $485,000 of imports from other countries.

And therefore, because we have reduced the duty on scrap iron from $4 to $1, we have done a vast injustice to Great Britain and benefited the Americans—because in times past the Americans sent in more.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me or misquote me.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am quoting your very words.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the hon. gentleman does not intend to misquote me. He has done so repeatedly within the last five minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw that expression.

Mr. WALLACE. What expression, Mr. Speaker?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be permitted—I rise to a question of order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no violation of order when an hon. gentleman calls the attention of another hon. gentleman to the fact that he has misquoted him. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has said that the hon. Minister (Mr. Paterson) has purposely misquoted him, the question of order would arise. But, in my humble judgment, if you rule, Mr. Speaker, that an hon. member should not call the attention of another to the fact that he is not quoting him correctly, you will do away with the privileges of debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. In one point of view there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says. I would not—of course, no one could think of such a thing—rule that the hon. gentleman had not the right to call the attention of another to an incorrect quotation. But everything is in the implication and in the way it is done. I considered that the implication was not what the hon. gentleman should make with regard to another member of this House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I will read the quotation, and you will find that it is just as I gave it to you.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) permit me to say that I would ask him when he quotes me, to quote me correctly. He stated, not once only, but three times, that I said that this was done to the vast injury of Great Britain. I made no such statement, as I was—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I did not say that.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman said it three times. What I said was, it was of no benefit to Great Britain.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I read the hon. gentleman's words, and I went on to make my own deductions from his speech, and my deductions are right. This is what he said:

Take iron or steel scrap. The old duty was $4 per ton, the new duty was $1. They have reduced the duty on that. There were $75,000 of imports from Great Britain, and $453,000 of imports from other countries. They have reduced the duty very largely, but not for the benefit of Great Britain, because she supplies less than one-seventh of what is imported into Canada.

Then I proceeded to deduce from that the position taken by the hon. gentleman, in connection with his declaration:

Therefore, I say this tariff, which professes to give a great preference to Great Britain, does not carry out its profession, but is framed to deceive the English people and to deceive the Canadian people as well.

I think my inference is a perfectly fair one. I proceeded to say that the hon. gentleman argued that in time past we had brought more scrap iron from the United States than from England, therefore, because we had reduced the duty from $4 to $1, it was not for the benefit of Great Britain, but, as he says, "this tariff is framed to deceive the English people and to deceive the Canadian people as well." I desire, in connection with that, to point out that we reduced this duty in the interests of the Canadian people. But, what is the position to-day as compared with what it was? In the old days a customs broker would have an invoice of 100 tons of scrap iron from the United States, and a similar invoice from England, and would attend at the customs-house to pass the entry. He would pay exactly the same duty, $400, on each entry. But to-day, in case of a similar transaction, he would pay $100 on the American goods, but he would pay only $75 on the English goods. Now, let us proceed, and take the hon. gentleman's statement item by item:

Then take the duty on pig iron. The old duty was $4, the new duty is $2.50. We imported from all other countries $330,000 worth, and from Great Britain $50,000 worth; that is, you have more than 6½ times as much from the other countries, chiefly from the United States—altogether I might say, and they give the United States the benefit of a reduction, if we use the figures of the Minister of Customs, of 62½ cents in the duty.

Now, I read the hon. gentleman's exact words. As he will not allow me to abbreviate or summarize, of course I am obliged to take a little longer. The duty is reduced from $4 to $2.50, which, he says, according to the report, is 62½ cents. I take it what he means is 62½ per cent, according to "the figures of the Minister of Customs." I have no objection to the hon. gentleman charging me with using percentages, for I think that is fair, but I do not want him to commit me to his calculations. That reduction, instead of being 62½ per cent, is 37½ per cent, as the hon. gentleman will see if he will go into the calculation again. I will again remind the House that the hon. gentleman declares this tariff to have been framed to deceive the English and framed to deceive the Canadian people as well. Let us see how these English people are deceived in regard to pig iron. Under the general tariff of 1896 a broker goes to the customs-house to pass an entry of 100 tons of pig iron invoiced from an English merchant.

He has an invoice also of 100 tons of American, he makes his entry, the duty is figured out, the Englishman pays $400, the American pays $400 under the old tariff. How is it now? That customs broker goes to the customs-house now and makes his entry. He has 100 tons of English and 100 tons from an American manufacturer. The invoice is made out—100 tons, the duty upon which is $2.50 per ton or $250. That is made out on the American invoice and he pays his $250. The Englishman's invoice is made out in the same way, for they are made out under the general tariff, and it is then reduced by 25 per cent; and so while the American pays the $250, the English iron pays only $187.50. Yet the hon. gentleman says this tariff is framed in order to deceive the English people and the Canadian people as well. Then he comes down to other articles:

Then take the article of rolled iron or steel angles, tees, beams and channels. I may say that the old duty on that is 35 per cent, or less than $10 per ton. The new duty is specific, $7 per ton, or a reduction, according to the Minister of Customs, of 42 6-7ths per cent.

Again I beg to disclaim the figures of the hon. gentleman. When you take $3 off a ton of $10, I do not make that reduction of 42 6-7th per cent. I make it a reduction of 30 per cent.

Take another item, rolled iron or steel sheets or plates. The imports are $71,000 from the United States, and $698 from Great Britain. The old duty was $10; the new duty is $7—or a preference for the United States of 42 6-7ths per cent.

Wrong in his calculation again. Three dollars taken off $10 is not a reduction of 42 6-7ths per cent, it is a reduction of 30 per cent. But let that pass. Now, then, where is the injury that is done to the British manufacturer, or where are the Canadian people misled? Let us again go to the customs-house. The tariff is a matter that is practical, it is a matter of business, it is business men that have to do with it every day in the year. Business men understand these things, and I am speaking now where my words will reach the ears of business men. Under the old tariff as the hon. gentlemen opposite framed it, when a man brought in 100 tons of these iron products he had to pay on every ton $10; the Englishman paid the same as the American paid, $10 a ton. But to-day the duty is $7 a ton. It is made out now at $7 for the Englishman as well, but at the bottom of the entry is written "less 25 per cent," and $1.75 is taken off, and the Englishman pays $5.25 for what the American pays $7. Yet the hon. gentleman brings this forward and says that in this arrangement we are deceiving and misleading the British people.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, but hardly any comes from England.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have read exactly what the hon. gentleman says, and the figures of what comes from England. But when the hon. gentleman says none came from England, let me ask: When the Englishman had to pay $10 the same as the American, is he in any worse position coming in here now when he only pays $5.25 and the American pays $7? In the old days the Englishman paid $10 and the American paid $10. Is the Englishman in a worse position now when the American pays only $7, and he can come in at $5.25? Why, Sir, I thought that even the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) would not have dared to ask that question, that it must be apparent to him, as it must be to every one.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I dare say the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of touching upon this point when the financial statement is made. Of course, I feared the rule of not alluding to a previous debate might perhaps shut me off from dealing with these figures in extenso, as I wanted to take them up one by one and close them out, but I have been allowed to go on, and I do not think I will raise an objection to the hon. gentleman if he does allude to a previous debate and corrects me in any place where I may be wrong, for I have no desire to mislead the House. Possibly I may be wrong in my calculations, or in some of my deductions, as hon. gentlemen sometimes are, but I am giving my deductions and my illustrations as they occur to me at the present time. Then the hon. gentleman goes on:

In the matter of railway fish-plates, the old duty was $10 a ton, the new duty $8 a ton; and we imported $11,000 from the United States and $3,864 from Great Britain, a reduction of 20 per cent.

Now, how does that work against the Englishman? How does that deceive the British people, and what harm does it do them? Under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite the Englishman paid $10 a ton on his fish-plates and the American paid $10 a ton. Now under our new duty the American pays only $8 a ton, but while he pays $8 the Englishman pays $6 a ton, and if he had to contend in the old days with $8 a ton duty against himself and the American only paid $8, and if the American brought in a somewhat larger quantity than he did, surely the Englishman, instead of being in a worse position, is in a better position now when the American has to pay $8 and the Englishman is let in at $6? So I go on:

On cast-iron piping of every description, the old duty was $10, and the new duty is $8, and from the United States we imported $32,000 worth, and from Great Britain $5,600, showing an enormous advantage to the United States and very little to Great Britain. On tubes of rolled steel, the old duty was 15 per cent, and the new 10 per cent, a difference according to the calculations I have referred to of 33½ reduction, and we imported from the United States $118,000 worth, and from Great Britain $9,000.

Well, Sir, it would be tedious to illustrate the practical working out of this tariff as it takes place almost every day up to this time, perhaps many hundred times a day repeated. No matter what article it may be, except articles that are limited in the schedule, it matters not how low we have placed the duty in the general tariff under which American and foreign goods come in, it is 25 per cent lower to the British manufacturer and to the British exporter. I think the hon. gentleman will see that there is not much in the argument that he has made use of. Now I think I have come to the list of the articles upon which we have lowered the duty and upon which he founds an argument that because we lowered the duty, and because in time past a larger quantity had come from the United States than from England, we had done a grievous wrong to the English people by our preferential tariff, and had injured them in that way. Of course, being interrupted, I had to take one item out of its course. But precisely the same illustration applies now, because the argument of the hon. gentleman was that when we put a 25 per cent duty on linseed oil and brought it under the preferential tariff, we were doing an injury to the British manufacturer. But an hon. gentleman opposite did me the kindness to emphasize the fact that that article came almost wholly from Great Britain in the past, as it will do in the future, and while it is 5 per cent higher under the general tariff the Canadian consumer of that article is getting it at 1½ per cent less than he did under the hon. gentleman's tariff. Now before passing from that to take up the advances that we put upon goods in the past coming more largely from Great Britain. I want to emphasize the fact that we did reduce these duties on iron, and we claim credit for having done that. The increased activity, the new manufactories that are springing up, the additional artisans that are being employed, the chimneys out of which smoke is now pouring, that in the time of hon. gentlemen had no fire under them, is proof of the wisdom of what we did in reference to that duty. This Government have been true to their pledges, true to the platform that was laid down by the great Liberal convention, the platform upon which this Government and the Liberal party in this House stand, and are carrying out. We were pledged to reduce taxation, and we were pledged to do it in such a way that no injustice should be done to any existing interest—we recognized the fact that the great consuming population of this country, largely and notably the agricultural population, had a right to a reduction of taxation upon many of the articles that they had to use in their daily occupation, that were excessive in our understanding, and we determined that we would reduce the duties upon these articles and we did that to a large extent, and did it without destroying but benefiting existing manufacturing industries by the plan we adopted in dealing with these iron duties. I have only to point out to the hon. gentlemen of this House, at the risk of wearying them, some samples of reduction of duty on articles that go every day into the hands of the agriculturist, to be used by him in his daily occupation, in order, that the agriculturist may see that when this reduction of duty on iron was made, it was not to benefit the people of the United States, nor yet was it to benefit the people of England, but it was to benefit the people of Canada, yet, while we did that we said: We will give an additional benefit in this revision to Great Britain over every other nation. What is the result? I want to read you a list of articles into which iron, on which the duty has been reduced, entered as a raw material, the reductions upon which enabled the manufacturers of these articles to sell them to the consumers at greatly reduced prices. I want hon. gentlemen to understand that when you speak of a reduction of 5 per cent, or a reduction of 10 per cent, in the rate of duty, you are speaking of a very large reduction as any business man knows. Ask a business man what a 5 per cent reduction is on the value of goods and he will tell you that it means a great deal to him. If you asked him for a 10 per cent reduction he would tell you that you were asking for a very great reduction indeed. Let me give you a list of some of the articles, and it will be only some of them, on which the duties have been lowered. What I propose to give you are the duties levied under the tariff of 1896 under hon. gentlemen opposite and the general tariff of this Government, not the preferential tariff. To show you the reductions that have been made I will give you first the old duty and follow it with the general rate, not the preferential rate, under the new tariff:

Cut nails, used wherever a building is being erected, were ¼ of a cent per pound under the old tariff; under our general tariff now they are  $\frac{1}{2}$  a cent per pound. Wire nails were one cent per pound under the old tariff; they are only  $\frac{3}{8}$  of a cent per pound under our general tariff. Wood screws were 45 per cent under the old tariff; they are 35 per cent under the new tariff, and are subject to the preferential rate of 25 per cent off that:

I have given you these reductions under the general tariff. In all these articles, some of which must come in in large quantities from the old country—a few of them do come in in large quantities—these reductions have been made for the benefit of the users, but in addition to the figures I have given of reductions under the general tariff, the users of these articles in this country will get the further benefit of the 25 per cent reduction under the preferential tariff. Now then, we come to consider what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) said in reference to advances we made on goods coming from England. He said that the larger part of the other list I gave you came from the United States, but now he turns his attention to things the larger number of which came from Great Britain in the past, and he says: You advanced the duty on them. The first of these was the article of linseed oil, with which I have dealt. The next was the article of linen. Now, he said we advanced the general tariff on linen. It is true that the duty on linen goods was advanced under the general tariff. I take the articles the hon. gentleman mentioned. Damask of linen that he mentioned was increased from 25 per cent to 30 per cent. Now, the article of linen is a fair article to regard as a revenue producer. Linens are not made in this country at all, at least not to any extent, I might almost say, not at all, and therefore the whole duty levied upon them will enter the treasury. Therefore, it was considered as a fair article upon which to raise a revenue. The lines that the hon. gentleman mentioned were diaper napkins, handkerchiefs, towels, linen brown or bleached; braids, bracelets, cards, fringes, tassels, and cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured. Under the general tariff, the rate was advanced, in some cases, 5 per cent, perhaps in all the items he mentions, and, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, these are articles that come largely, not wholly, but largely from Great Britain. These goods come—and here is where the consumers of this country are interested as to whether their taxes have been advanced or not—these goods come, in some cases, almost wholly from the old country; and what you have to consider is, what the preferential rate is upon these articles, and see whether the consumer of Canada is not now enjoying a less rate of taxation upon them than he did in times past, even though under a general tariff they have been advanced 5 per cent. What are the facts? Take the articles that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) mentioned and here is the truth in relation to them.

|   | Old Tariff. | Preferential rate. |
|---|-------------|--------------------|
|   | p.c.        | p.c.               |
| Damask or linen diaper napkins              | 25          | 22 $\frac{1}{2}$   |
| Handkerchiefs                               | 30          | 26 $\frac{1}{2}$   |
| Towels                                      | 25          | 22 $\frac{1}{2}$   |
| Linens, brown or bleached.                  | 20          | 18 $\frac{3}{8}$   |
| Braids, bracelets, cords, fringes, tassels. | 30          | 26 $\frac{1}{2}$   |
| Cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured   | 30          | 26 $\frac{1}{2}$   |

So that, in these lines that are mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), while it is true that 5 per cent is added to them in the general tariff, and while the great bulk of them comes from Great Britain, yet the preferential rate applies in every instance, and with the preferential rate the duty is several per cent lower than it was in the old tariff of the Conservative Government. So it is with reference to cottons. I have here a list of cottons, subdivided into far more items than you will find in the tariff. There are some forty-one of them, but as I do not want to weary the house, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is willing, I will put them on "Hansard" without reading them.

Mr. BERGERON. No, no.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I know it is contrary to the rule, but I thought it would please the hon. gentlemen opposite to have these figures so that they could check them.

Mr. BERGERON. We cannot do that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, I am tiring myself, and I am afraid I would still more be tiring the House if I attempt to read them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No; this might have been of some use to hon. gentlemen opposite, and it might have afforded them more ground for criticising my speech. It would have given them just so many more articles on which they could examine to see if, peradventure, I have made a mistake. I will content myself, under the rules, by saying this: I have taken every one of the cotton items that are in the tariff, and subdivided these imports of cotton as we have them classified for statistical purposes into far more divisions than they appear in the tariff items, but specifying them under their different individual heads until I have forty-one of them, I say I do not know of one single item of cotton goods which these hon. gentlemen talk of, upon which the duty under the preferential tariff is as high as was the duty under the tariff of the Conservative Government. That I believe and will believe until I am shown to the contrary. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) cited several instances, and drew deductions from which he arrived at the general conclusion that this tariff was so framed that it was in the interests of the Americans, was calculated to deceive the British people, and was of no benefit to the people of Canada. I propose to deal with that question now, and I think it is well for us to apply a test. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to follow me in this calculation, because if it be weak he will have an opportunity of pointing out its weakness. I take first the value of goods, dutiable and free, entered for consumption from the United States in the years 1896 and 1898, and I ascertain the average percentage of duty upon them in these two periods, and then I find what reduction has taken place. In 1896 the value of the goods entered for consumption, dutiable and free, from the United States was $58,574,024; from that I deduct coin and bullion, because they are not articles of merchandise and do not properly come within the calculation. The coin and bullion amounted to $5,044,634. Deducting that from the total value of the goods, it leaves $53,529,390 as the total value of goods entered for consumption, less coin and bullion. On that there was collected a duty of $7,767,992.63, or a percentage of duty of 14.51. In 1898, the value of goods entered for consumption, dutiable and free, from the United States, was $78,705,590, the coin and bullion amounted to $3,880,667, which deducted from the total leaves as the value of goods entered for consumption, less coin and bullion, $74,824,923, on which a duty was collected of $9,941,624.48, or a percentage of duty of 13.28.

Now in 1896 the percentage of duty collected on imports from the United States was 14.51, and in 1898 it was 13.28, so that there has been a reduction of 1.23 per cent on the total imports from the United States in 1898 as compared with 1896. When gentlemen opposite calculate what a deduction of 1.23 per cent is upon the volume of imports, they will find what a large reduction is made in the taxation upon the people of this country. Let us take the imports from Great Britain, and follow the same rule as I have applied to the imports from the United States:

|---|--------------|
| Total value of goods, dutiable and free, entered for consumption from Great Britain ..... | $32,979,742 |

| Percentage of duty—22.42.  |              |

1898.

|   |              |
|---|--------------|

| Less coin and bullion.....  | 457,456      |
|   | <hr/>        |

|   |                |

|   | <hr/>          |

|   |                |
|---|----------------|
| Duty collected as near as can be approximated ..... | $6,549,428 60 |
| Percentage of duty—20.44 per cent.                  |                |

Therefore, the average duty on goods from Great Britain in 1896 was 22.42 per cent, and in 1898 it was 20.44 per cent, or a difference of 1.98 in the duty that was levied on the total imports, dutiable and free, from Great Britain as compared with 1896, and in the case of imports from the United States, dutiable and free, a reduction of 1.23 per cent in 1898 as compared with

R

1896. Therefore, while there has been a reduction of nearly 1½ per cent of duty on all goods, dutiable and free, from the United States—to this extent easing the burdens of the people of Canada—there was at the same time a reduction of 1·98, or nearly 2 per cent, in the percentage of duties levied upon British goods, and to this extent also lessening the burdens of the Canadian people in 1898 as compared with 1896. So that, while there has been a reduction to the people of Canada on the total imports from the United States, there has been on the total imports from England a larger reduction. While a percentage of reduction takes place on goods from both countries, there is fully three fourths of 1 per cent greater reduction upon English goods than upon American goods. This, I think, is proof positive that, when the hon. gentleman states that this tariff, when framed, was framed on a pro-American basis, and was calculated to mislead the British people and also the Canadian people, he states what is not correct.

Mr. McNEILL. Are those dutiable goods?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Dutiable and free; and the hon. gentleman will see that the reason why the percentage of taxation on the American goods is lower than it is on British goods is owing to circumstances which we avail ourselves of for our own benefit, which existed under the old tariff, as it does under the present tariff, that the large majority of free goods are brought, in our own interest, from the United States.

Mr. McNEILL. What about the percentage of reduction in that case?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have just given the percentage of reduction. I must take it as an indication of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, that if they find fault with this admission of free goods from the United States and from other countries, their policy must be that these goods shall not be free under them, which means enhanced cost to the manufacturers for their raw material, as well as enhanced cost to the consumers for the goods they consume. This is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite—a return to the old burdens of taxation from which we have freed the people.

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a point of order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman, when he finds fault with the duty on coal oil—

Mr. SPEAKER (Mr. Flint). The hon. member for North Bruce rises to a question of order.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to know from you, whether I have a right to correct an hon. gentleman, if he is misrepresenting?

The SPEAKER (Mr. Flint). The hon. gentleman has not, unless he gets the floor from the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct a misstatement?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certainly, if I misrepresented the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend said I was objecting to the introduction of free goods. I have no objection to the introduction of free goods. I was referring to the fact, when the hon. gentleman was giving the percentage of reduction of duties, comparing the reduction on United States goods with that on goods from the mother country, that we imported an enormously larger quantity of free goods from the United States, and, therefore, his percentage did not apply to the goods on which the reduction had been made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am very sorry, if I misrepresented the hon. gentleman. He knows the high esteem in which I hold him; and I certainly would not wish to misrepresent him. I really do not see where I misrepresented him. But we will talk it out privately.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to tell my hon. friend that I did not object to the introduction of free goods, as he said I did.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, if that is so. I do not think I made the statement that the hon. gentleman said so; but I pointed out the deduction to be drawn from the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. When they laugh and think they have made a point because the larger proportion of free goods come from the United States, I say, if they scorn that, if that is wrong on our part, if they think we have too many free goods coming from the United States, it must be inferred that, if they had the administration of affairs, they would put a duty on these free goods; and if that is done, it means enhanced cost, not only on the goods coming from abroad, but also on the goods made in this country. If the hon. gentleman agrees that we have done what is wise, in admitting goods free in our own interest, we are at one on that point; but his laugh would be very ill-timed under these circumstances.

Now, I want to give another table, at the risk of wearying the House. The tariff items, as introduced by the Finance Minister, numbered 477 in the dutiable list, and 188 in the free list; but, for the purposes of statistical classification in the department, these are subdivided into more individual articles than appear in the original list. We do not specify each individual article by itself, for that would make a volume so bulky that it would not meet with favour. I am sure, at the hands of the members of the House. But you will find in the Trade and Navigation Returns that these dutiable items, which number only 447 in the tariff, number 968 in the statistical classification, and the 188 items in the tariff free list number 481 items in the statistical classification, and even then you have not all the different articles, which, if given separately, would run up into the thousands. In this subdivided classification I want to read all the items I have been able to find on which the preferential rate is higher than the old tariff rate under hon. gentlemen opposite. I have four or five here, and I take the first item—rice, uncleaned, or paddy. That was three-tenths of a cent per pound under the old tariff. Under the preferential tariff it is three-eighths of a cent per pound. That is an increase in duty; but I need only point out to you that that means a reduction of the protection that was upon the cleaned rice. The people of Canada do not consume uncleaned rice or paddy. But it comes in uncleaned and the men engaged in that business clean and refine it, and the refined rice is what goes into consumption. Therefore the duty levied is as low upon what goes into consumption as it was before; and while nominally the duty is higher, that is a thing which does not concern the people of Canada.

Buckram hat shapes, 30 per cent under the old tariff and 22½ per cent under the preferential rate. The quantity, however, cannot be ascertained, and I cannot give you any calculation as to the amount of extra duty, but you will agree it must be very small. The reason it cannot be ascertained will be readily understood. In the classification we have made, there being some of the old classification, or some of the items now enumerated not having been enumerated before, we cannot exactly say what imports came from Great Britain and what imports from other countries. But the items involved are so small, they are not worth mentioning.

Fans of wood, 25 per cent in the old tariff and 26½ per cent under the preferential rate. I cannot ascertain what the importations of those were, they not being separately classified, but any hon. gentleman will readily understand that they were small in quantity.

Quilts and like articles of linen, 20 per cent under the old tariff and 22½ per cent under the preferential rate. Neither can their quantity be ascertained, because they were classified with other articles before, but no doubt the imports were very small.

Sole leather, undressed, 10 per cent under the old tariff and 11½ per cent under the preferential tariff. None came from Great Britain in 1896, and, therefore, the rate does not bear on the question at all.

But there are nine items upon which there were importations from Great Britain in 1896, on which the duty under the preferential rate is higher than it was under the old tariff.

Buttons, n.e.s., 20 per cent under the old tariff and 26 per cent under the preferential rate. Of these we imported from Great Britain in 1896 $28,968 worth. The imports in 1898 cannot be ascertained, but I am figuring the amount of extra duty upon the amount imported in 1886, and that gives $1,810.50 of extra taxation under that head.

Sheets and sheeting of linen was 20 per cent under the old tariff and is 22½ per cent under the preferential rate. Eight hundred and sixty-four dollars worth was imported from Great Britain in 1896 on which the extra duty under our preferential rate amounts to $21.60.

Advertising pamphlets, price lists, catalogues, &c., 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent, equal to 44 per cent ad valorem under the old tariff, and under the preferential rate the duty is 11.25 cents per pound, or equal to 4.5 per cent, being an increase of 1 per cent. The imports from Great Britain in 1896 amounted to $18,827, so that the extra duty paid would be $188.27.

Other articles made by seamstresses from linen fabrics, 20 per cent under the old tariff and 26½ per cent under the preferential rate. The quantity imported from Great Britain in 1896 cannot be ascertained, but in 1898 it was $1,374, on which the extra taxation amounts to $85.88.

Guns, rifles, pistols and revolvers, 20 per cent under the old tariff and 22½ per cent under the preferential rate. From Great Britain we imported $24,839 in 1896, and the extra duty under the preferential rate would amount to $620.98.

Marble rough, not chiselled, free under the old tariff. Under the preferential rate we charge it 11½ per cent. There were $638 worth imported in 1896 from Great Britain, on which the duty would be $71.75.

Putty, 15 per cent under the old tariff, and also under the preferential rate.

Grindstones, not mounted and not less than twelve inches in diameter, 12½ per cent under the old tariff and 18½ per cent under the preferential rate. We imported from Great Britain in 1896, $3,051 worth, on which the extra duty would amount to $190.69.

Veneers of wood, n.e.s., not over one-sixteenth of an inch in thickness, 5 per cent under the old tariff and 5½ per cent under the preferential rate. We imported from Great Britain in 1896 $1,425 worth, on which the extra duty would amount to $8.91.

On all those, Mr. Speaker, there was imported into Canada, as far as I can ascertain from the figures we have, $78,760 worth, upon which, owing to our preferential rate being higher than the old tariff rate, the increase of duty would amount to $2,998.61.

Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that in making these up, I am using the classification, not as we have it in our tariff, for the items number only 447, but the classification prepared for statistical purposes, as we have it in the Trade and Navigation Returns, in which these items number 968, and out of these 968 there are only those nine articles that I have been able to discover which are paying a higher duty. In other words, with the exception of these nine articles, the whole of the 968 items pay lower duties, under the preferential tariff, than under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. My figures are before the House, there is time to examine them, and if any one can discover more than these nine items as paying a higher duty, I shall gladly stand corrected.

But what do these nine items out of the total 968 represent? Why, the total imports of these nine from Great Britain in 1896 was only $78,760, and the extra amount of duty is less than $3,000, or $2,998, while under our preferential tariff on nearly $20,000,000 worth of imports from Great Britain, the rates of duty have been lowered. I think that is a sufficient answer to give to any one. I have not taken out an item here and there, but have looked at the burdens upon the people in the gross on all they use.

Let me point out to you, Sir, what we have done for Great Britain, under this preferential tariff. Again, let me say, I give these figures subject to the corrections of hon. gentleman opposite. Far from claiming infallibility, I leave myself quite open to correction, for surely when these hon. gentlemen were not infallible, I cannot claim that quality. I am speaking now of the case as it is under the reciprocal tariff and I am speaking of the year 1897-98. Let me see if this was a fraud upon the British people, whether there was no benefit in it to English trade and whether it was intended to mislead the Canadian people. By referring to page 610 of the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1897-98, hon. gentlemen will see that the total duty paid on dutiable importations from Great Britain was $5,102,260.55. One-seventh of that amount represents the reduction under the reciprocal tariff, and any hon. gentleman who will make the calculation will find that this represents $728,894.36. Over and above that, it is estimated by my accountant with the best means he has of ascertaining, that $100,000 has been paid by way of rebates. How does that come? In this way: You can understand that when this tariff first went into operation it took some time for people in Great Britain and elsewhere to understand the requirements of the department in order to avail themselves of the reciprocal reduction, and, therefore, invoices would come out without the declaration we require before the preference is allowed, to the effect that the goods are British and, therefore, entitled to the preference under the law. Of course, consignees wanted their goods and did not want to wait until they had sent back to England to have a certificate of order made. We then told them to enter their goods at the general rate and pay the duty at that rate, with the understanding that when they furnished the department with the necessary certificate the excess of duty would be refunded. As I have said, the officers of my department estimate that the amount paid under the rebates within the year 1897-98 was $100,000, which, added to the saving under the preference already given, made a total of $828,894.36.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) permit me to ask him a question? He has stated what the duty was on these goods coming in under the reciprocal tariff last year. Would he tell us what the duty would have been under the tariff which prevailed under the tariff of 1896, so that we can see whether there was a saving or not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think that the next table I have to give will give the hon. gentleman the figures he is asking for. I wish to point out, meanwhile, that the figures I have given are for the year 1897-98, so that the reduction is under a preference of one-eighth, or 12½ per cent. Allow me to emphasize that.

Mr. PRIOR. We understand.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But let me emphasize it, because, sometimes you do not understand as clearly as I would like you to. If that was the saving effected under a 12½ per cent reduction, what would be the saving under a 25 per cent reduction in the current year, which commenced on the 1st July last?

Mr. WALLACE. You have not yet demonstrated that there has been any saving.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It would not be very far wrong to say that if you have effected this saving with a reduction of one-eighth, you will double it if you double the reduction and make it one-quarter. That reduction is a manifest reduction, under the reciprocal tariff, to the English merchant and manufacturer. Hon. gentlemen may attempt to juggle with figures, but that does not affect the fact that there is that reduction under the reciprocal tariff upon British goods. To say anything else would be to make oneself look ridiculous in the eyes of every business man in the country, for every business man in the country knows that when he goes to the custom-house to make his entry, that entry is made in the general way and the figures are so extended, and then if the goods are from Great Britain, the collector takes his pen and writes under the total, "less 25 per cent," and the duty reduced by this amount is the duty that is paid on the goods. Anybody can see that, and to put it in any other light, as I say, would be to make oneself look ridiculous.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has asked a question, and I think that question will be answered in considering the point I now propose to deal with. I have here a calculation which, I think, will enable the people of this country to see that when this party pledged themselves to reduce the burden of taxation they realized what they were doing, and that, as a matter of fact, they have reduced that burden in a very material degree. The test I propose to apply is not an infallible test, one that will work out to the cent or the dollar, or, perhaps, even some hundreds of dollars, for the reason that you do not have precisely the same quantity of each class of goods coming in year by year. But, as a rule, as an average you may fairly take the total imports of one year and compare them with the total imports of another year. And though the calculation will not work out exactly, it is as likely to err on one side as on the other, it is as likely to tell against me as in my favour. I propose to take the total value of goods, dutiable and free, entered for consumption during the year 1896, less the amount of coin and bullion—which is not an article of merchandise and does not come fairly into the calculation—ascertain what was the percentage of duty, and then take similar figures for the year 1898, and the duty paid I will regard either as an increase or a decrease in the taxation of the people, as the result may show. The total value of goods, dutiable and free, entered for consumption in 1896, was $110,587,480. Deducting the coin and bullion, amounting to $5,226,319, we find that the net value of goods was $105,361,161, upon which the total duty was $20,219,037.32.

I have worked it out, it is open for other gentlemen to work it out also. I take it that the percentage of duty which is levied upon these goods was 19-19. In 1898, by the Trade and Navigation Returns, the value of goods entered for consumption, dutiable and free, was $130,698,006, less coin and bullion $4,390,844, leaving as the value of goods entered for consumption $126,307,162. The percentage of duty in 1896, under the old tariff was 19-19. Apply that to the imports, dutiable and free, of 1898, and it would have given you a revenue of $24,238,344.38; that is to say, the people of Canada would have to pay $24,238,344.38, whereas they actually have paid only $22,157,788.49. There is a difference, then, which is money left in the pockets of the people of Canada by virtue of the reduction of taxation, through this tariff, of $2,080,555.89. That, I think, is a pretty fair measure of reduction.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Minister give us the percentage for 1898?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The percentage for 1898 was 17-54. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that these figures are taken from the trade returns of 1898 and you will bear in mind that the reciprocal tariff was only in force then at the rate only of 12½ per cent reduction, while during the current year it will be 25 per cent off British goods. I venture the suggestion here that you will find next year, at the end of this current financial year, which closes on the 30th of June, not that you will have double that saving to the people of Canada—because you will not effect a reduction on the goods from other countries, though if more comes in you will—but I estimate you will effect an additional saving by the other ½ of the 12½ per cent reduction on British goods since the 1st of July last, which will be between $800,000 and $1,000,000. My calculation, then, is that the end of the next fiscal year during which the full preferential tariff will have been in operation, when the results of the current fiscal year are ascertained, taking the percentage of 1896, which I hold is fair, and applying it to the imports for this current year, I believe we will be able to show a saving in the taxation to the people of this country of very nearly $3,000,000. That I give to the people of this country in proof of the fulfilment of the pledge this Government made, and that the Reform party made to the people in the platform which they laid down, when they promised that there should be a reduction of the burdens of the people. I think I have demonstrated beyond peradventure that that reduction has taken place, and taken place to a greater extent than hon. gentlemen opposite appear to have realized.

Now, Sir, a word or two more before I close. I did not think it would have taken me so long to get through, but I have had to divide the time with hon. gentlemen opposite, so that it will not be all charged to me. I have noticed in the course of this debate that it has been charged time and again, and the charge seems to flow glibly from the tongues of hon. gentlemen opposite, that this Government, that the Liberal party, have broken every pledge that they made to the people of Canada. Now, this is a very serious charge. Let me ask the hon. gentlemen what opinion they have formed of the people of Canada when they venture to make such statements, and to repeat them in the House. The people of Canada are intelligent, the people of Canada know what the Liberal party promised them, the people of Canada know what the platform was that was adopted in 1893. They know and they require that their representatives in this Government shall stand upon that platform and give effect to it. Well, Sir, this Government has been in power two years or more. There have been appeals made to the people, not in one province, not in two provinces, but in more provinces. I do not allude to the by-elections with a view to taunt hon. gentlemen opposite that the battle has gone against them there. I am willing to concede what they have claimed, that in the matter of by-elections it may be said that the Government in power have perhaps somewhat of an advantage. I therefore mention the by-elections that have taken place, not in one province, or in two provinces, but in more; not in one case, not in two cases, not in three cases—I know not in how many by-elections we have had since this Government came into power—

An hon. MEMBER. About thirty-nine.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, at any rate, more than a score throughout the length and breadth of this country. What has been the result? Why, it is an insult to the people of this country, an insult to the constituents living in the various constituencies who have been asked to pronounce upon the policy of this Government, to say that this Government has broken every pledge they ever made to the people. Why, Sir, if they have done that, they should be driven from power, and would have been driven from power by the Canadian people.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And they will be.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why have they not been, if what you say is true? The result of the by-elections shows that the people of this country do not agree with hon. gentlemen opposite, that the people who have had an opportunity of pronouncing a verdict, believe that we have kept our pledges. If the Government have not kept their pledges do you think that the intelligent electors in these various counties would send man after man to this House to support the Government, that they would send them here, not with reduced majorities, but with such a majority as they did in Lambton, where hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the Liberals being disgusted, the very seat of the old Liberalism, the county of George Brown, the county of Alexander Mackenzie, the county that is known everywhere in Canada as the seat of old Liberalism—sending a representative here by a majority about double what it used to do in the old days? Why, Sir, these facts have only to be mentioned to the people of this country for them to recognize that it is an insult to them for hon. gentlemen opposite to make this charge. What kind of a figure do they cut in the eyes of the British merchants who will see such statements as that made in this House that the preferential tariff that we have placed upon the statute-book is not what they thought it was at all, but that in effect it is a snare and a delusion, that it was purposely framed to deceive them? I will read it again:

Therefore, I say that this tariff, which professes to give a great preference to Great Britain, does not carry out its profession. It is framed to deceive the English people, and to deceive the Canadian people as well.

What will they think of these men? Why, a gentleman, speaking here the other night, when asked: What do you attribute our prosperity to? Do you take credit to your Government for it? When a gentleman replied from this side of the House: Yes, in a measure at least. And, I say also, we may do that, because when this Government were put in power, and the old Government were displaced, it was recognized in the country that there was a Government in power that would carry out its pledges, and thereby confidence was restored to the country. The people recognized that they now had a business Government. I venture to say, that when Canadian merchants, when British merchants, read statements made by leading men on the other side of the House as to the effect of the preferential tariff, alleging that it is not a preference at all, that it is a deception and a fraud, they will say that, if hon. gentlemen opposite are not able to recognize commercial conditions any more correctly than that, no wonder the trade of the country got into a depressed condition. When the English merchant knows that, when he sends his goods to this country, when he sends out his invoice for those goods to his broker, when the duties on those goods are worth in money $1,000 or $500, or whatever it may be, when he knows, when his entry is made, that opposite every item the general rate is placed, when he knows that when an American, a German, or Belgian invoice, or an invoice from any other country, except Great Britain, is received and entered, it is for the full amount of this $1,000, when he knows that the collector writes opposite to his entry: "Less 25 per cent," and takes off $250, and that $750 lets in as much from Great Britain as $1,000 from any other country, he will say, that no wonder the commercial interests of this country suffered, when there was a Government in power that knew so little of business principles as hon. gentlemen opposite. I will close with a word or two. This preferential tariff that is denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite, I think is pretty well understood in the country generally, whatever it may be by hon. gentlemen present, to have had a beneficial effect upon trade and commerce. I have conversed with those who have been in Great Britain, not once or twice, but often, since this policy was adopted in 1897, and I venture to say that there is not an hon. gentleman in this House, who has conversed with the business men who have been in the old country, that would not tell me, honestly speaking, that since the introduction of the preferential tariff by this Government, Canadian interests have stood higher in Great Britain than they ever stood before. They will tell you that one of the factors in producing an increased market, which has been marvellous in its growth, for Canadian products, the products of our farms, is the inauguration of this preferential policy, which touched the heart of the Englishman, the Irishman and the Scotchman, who, while compelled by no law to give preference to Canadian products, of his own free will goes into the markets and says: "I want Canadian goods; I have heard of Canada; I know what she has done for us; I want to give them a preference." And we are reaping the benefit. To-day, the agriculturists of this country, all classes in this community, are reaping material benefits, so vast, so grand, that no one has ever accurately computed them, by the fact of enacting this preferential tariff, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite why, when we see the effect of the preferential tariff on the trade and commerce of the country and the benefit it has conferred upon our farmers, why do you want to spread abroad statements that are unfounded, that are not true—speaking of statements that may be made outside of this House—statements that are unfounded, in reference to this land—what little weight they may have—to destroy the best interests of this country, which are promoted by the enacting of that preferential tariff. Sir, if patriotism will not stop their mouths, the fear of looking ridiculous in the eyes of British and Canadian commercial men should cause hon. gentlemen opposite from this time out to cease from denouncing this preferential tariff, which is an advantage and a boon to the Briton and a boon to the Canadian, because it has reduced the taxation that was imposed upon the Canadian, and, in the course of trade, has, in the distinction made between nations, placed the mother land in a more favourable position than that enjoyed by any other nation. I do not think their fulminations will have the least effect in England, but I ask them, if they are the possessors of patriotic souls, and when they know that the statements they are making are not borne out by the facts, whether they will not cease from these statements that are without foundation in fact, and which may do harm, though I believe the good sense of the people of Canada and of Great Britain will prevent them having the bad result that might follow, were credence placed in the statements that the hon. gentlemen have made.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Mr. Speaker, although I would be very glad to be agreeable to my hon. friends opposite and not prolong this debate, I cannot resist the temptation of answering, as briefly as possible, the speech of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). We find ourselves in the presence of an extraordinary spectacle, and if some people are surprised that this debate has been carried on so long, I believe the more they will study out the arguments brought forward in this debate, the more they will understand how important it is to the people of this country, and they will see what has been going on since the opening of Parliament. We have noticed, that ever since the arraignment made by the hon. leader of the Opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), we have heard the young men on the other side of the House, those who have been here since 1896, answering the arguments put forward by this side of the House. I have been looking in vain for some of the old warriors on the other side of the House; I thought that I might hear the voice of my old friend the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), for instance. I expected to hear a great speech from my hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and we have been looking for one of those good, sound speeches from our old friend from South Wentworth (Mr. Bain). I expected also to hear from my energetic and honest friend from Wentworth and Brant (Mr. Somerville). Why did we not hear from these hon. gentlemen? On the part of the Government, we have heard from the right hon. Prime Minister; of course, we have heard from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has not much to do, I imagine, and now, to-day, we have had the pleasure of hearing the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). It is unjust, Sir, that the gentlemen on the Treasury benches should entrust the defence of the Administration to a Minister who is paid $2,000 a year less than the others. I have followed the speech of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) with a good deal of attention, and I was greatly surprised to find how easy it is to satisfy him with the Government of the day. He told us at the outset of his remarks, that he did not want to answer the criticisms of the members of the Opposition, but he did not tell us why. Sir, the reason was, that in spite of all his eloquence and notwithstanding his tremendous array of figures he could not answer the criticism from this side of the House. We admit with him that the finances of Canada are in a good state, but we say frankly, and the people of the country believe us, I am sure, that the fortunate fact is not due to the Government in power. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) professed to be surprised at what he was pleased to call the contradictions of gentlemen on this side of the House, but did it not occur to him that people in glass houses should not throw stones, and that if he looked around at his own party and his own Government's policy, he would find a mountain of contradictions. Sir, there is no contradiction in the policy of the Conservative party, nor have we had in the cold shades of Opposition an opportunity for contradictions, because the very same policy which was inaugurated in 1879, is to-day maintained in principle. It is because of the contradictions in the policy of the Liberal Government that certain gentlemen whose names I have mentioned have not been heard in this debate, and no wonder. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) ventured to refer to the Liberal platform announced in 1893, and he had the temerity to speak in the same breath of contradictions. Why, Sir, the policy of the Liberal party in power as compared with their platform of 1893 is a contradiction from beginning to end, and were not the occasion so solemn, I would be inclined to say that the Government are something like the patent medicine advertisements which show the portrait of a gentleman "before taking" and "after taking." The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) says that the Liberals were lucky. Well, I admit that. They were brought into power by a lucky wave, and they have been kept there until now by good luck, and it is lucky for them that the country is prosperous, because if they had to steer the ship of state in bad weather, they would have been wrecked long since. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) told us, that he had a number of figures in detail with reference to the duties on cotton, and were it not against the rules I would have been glad to have had him place them on "Hansard," but whatever the details may be, I ask him, is it not the fact, speaking in general, that cottons to-day are higher than they were in 1896? I ask him also, is it not true that coal oil is dearer in price to-day than it was in 1896? The right hon. the Prime Minister came to my constituency in 1896, and before the people of St. Louis de Gonzague he shed a few tears over the fact that they were paying 16½ cents a gallon for coal oil, and he told them that if he came into power he would pull down those miserable tariff barriers between the United States and Canada, so that the people would get oil at a great deal cheaper rate. Has he fulfilled that promise to the people? No, Sir; they are paying 18½ cents per gallon for oil to-day, or two cents more than when the Conservatives were in power. Why did not the Minister of Customs tell us the reason for that? The hon. gentleman spoke at length about preferential trade, and as he is a man of common sense, I put him this question and hope for an intelligent answer: If it be true that this Government has given preferential trade to England, what is the value of the figures read by him which show a reduction of 1.23 for the States and 1.98 for England? There is no necessity whatever for going through all the figures and ascertaining that percentage, but let us take the result. If it is true that there is a preference in favour of Great Britain, how is it, as stated by the leader of the Opposition the other day on the floor of Parliament—and it has not been contradicted by any gentleman on the other side of the House—how is it, I ask, that from the 1st of August, 1898, since the preferential tariff was in force down to the 31st January, 1899, there was but one per cent increase in the total importations from Great Britain as compared with an immensely larger increase in importations from the United States? When the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) spoke, there was an increase of only one per cent from Great Britain, but if you take the returns to-day including the month of February you find that paltry one per cent increase entirely swept away. The electors of the country will not wade through all the figures given by the Minister of Customs, but they will reasonably and naturally ask: How is it, if the Government has given a preference to England that the importations from that country have not increased, while on the contrary, importations from the United States have largely increased? Sir, the tariff has been shaped in such a way that American goods have been enabled to enter Canada easier than before, and in the face of such a state of things, the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues went to Washington, expecting a treaty of reciprocity from the United States; yes, begging for a treaty of reciprocity. I believe, that later on when we can remove the seal from the lips of the Premier and his colleagues, we will then know that if they did not get reciprocity it was not because they did not do everything in their power to obtain it. They failed because the United States did not want reciprocity, and, Sir, why should they want reciprocity with Canada when we gave them beforehand everything we had to give them. To say the least it was very poor statesmanship on the part of the Government.

My hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) concluded his two hours' speech—to which I listened with pleasure, as I always listen to his speeches—with a dissertation on the pledges of the Liberal Government, and their fulfilment. I always had a great deal of esteem for the hon. gentleman, and I was sorry to hear him argue such a bad case. I would not be surprised to hear such remarks coming from a member who entered the House for the first time during this Parliament, but for a serious man, a Minister of the Crown—who is just as good a Minister as those they pay more salary to—for him to tell the House that the Liberal Government have carried out their pledges to the people of this country, is somewhat of a surprise. Surely the hon. gentleman was not serious, and I think before I conclude I shall be able to show him that instead of the Liberal Government carrying out their pledges, they have done exactly the reverse of what they promised. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) spoke about bye-elections, and his references in that regard were such as one would not expect to hear from a gentleman who has been twenty-five years in this House. The hon. gentleman must know about the fighting brigade in Ontario, and he must know that the very same organization exists in Quebec, regulated and controlled by the very same engineer. He knows that in Ontario the Liberal party could not carry even the bye-elections, if they did not drag the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) up there with all his machinery.

The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) went to speak in the county of Huron. I am going to say what I have been told, and my hon. friend can say whether I am right or not. When the chief of the Opposition went to Goderich, the hall in which he spoke was so packed that an overflow meeting had to be held, at which four or five hundred people were addressed by other gentlemen. The next day the Minister of Public Works, and I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), went and spoke in the same place, and there was not more than four hundred or five hundred people to hear them. And yet a day or two afterwards, when the election was held, the people of Goderich gave a majority to the Government candidate. The people of Goderich will not be proud of that. In the same election, however, the farmers of the county of Huron voted against the Government of the day. It was in the town of Goderich that the majority was got; and there the dredging contract had been given by the Minister of Public Works a few weeks before to a gentleman who was more used to working with his pen than with a dredge. My hon. friend is proud because he has carried bye-elections like that. He knows the instruments the Minister of Public Works has at his hands, and he knows how to use them. In Lévis, the other day, there was a bye-election, and we did not even have a candidate; and I can say to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec, that if any of them hold any of these bye-elections in their pockets, we do not want them. They can have all they want of them; we do not want any bye-elections; we will wait for the general elections. The very day the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Demers) was introduced in this House, there were already five heelers on the steps of the lobby looking for patronage. My hon. friend knows human nature. We will fight him on that ground, but we will wait until we have a proper opportunity, and I hope it will be soon, when the whole of them will go before the electors, and answer to them for the pledges they made and have not carried out. Now, Sir, what were those promises? I have been here for some years. For 18 years I sat on that side of the House, and listened to great orations, some from hon. friends whom I see opposite to me, and some from others who have disappeared. They have not gone above, though some may have done so, one or two. But the majority of them have gone away to occupy fine positions, which they would not grant to their opponents when they were in power. Those who spoke the loudest against protection, against the increase of the debt and the increase in the expenditure, have gone away, and these walls will never hear their sweet voices again. But my hon. friend from Huron has not gone. My hon. friend, whom I have heard sometimes for two hours, and have always listened to with a great deal of pleasure, has not gone yet.

An hon. MEMBER. He is going.

Mr. BERGERON. No, I think not, unless he goes to the Senate; but they are now speaking of reforming the Senate. My hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) and my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville), very often rose in their places and denounced the Government of the day for having protection, the curse of the country. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) could not find any adjective in the dictionary strong enough to apply to the manufacturers—the bloated monopolists, who were living at the expense of the poor taxpayers of this country. Anything but protection—that was their cry for 18 years; but it was not always to the same tune. There is no doubt they have always opposed protection; but what did they offer in return? From 1878 to 1882 they could not offer anything. They were completely without a policy. They had received such a blow on the 17th of September, 1878, that it took them four years to think of something to offer to the country. In 1882, they came out with commercial union. My right hon. friend made some fine speeches about commercial union.

The PRIME MINISTER. Never made one. My hon. friend is altogether astray. We never heard of that until 1888.

Mr. BERGERON. It does not make much difference. My hon. friend made beautiful speeches on protection, too, in 1871. I am not making any reproach against him; I recognize his great talents. From 1882 until 1887, it was commercial union. From 1887 to 1891 it was continental free trade. My hon. friend did not speak on that either, I suppose. I have many speeches of my hon. friend, but I do not wish to take up the time of the House in quoting them. He might say he never delivered them, and the Speaker would say that I am bound to accept his denial. Down to 1891, it was unrestricted reciprocity that was offered to the people of Canada by the Liberal party. They went so far on that line that Mr. Blake, a gentleman whom they always esteemed and respected, and who has always had the respect of this side of the House, left them in 1891, because, as he said in a letter published after the elections on the 5th of March, in his opinion that policy was driving Canadians politically into the hands of the United States. They did not carry that policy of unrestricted reciprocity in 1891, and then they kept on talking of a tariff for revenue and free trade. In fact, they had many policies to offer. They had not always the same policy, and that is why we must not be too harsh upon them to-day if they have not all the same policy when in power. They have always been like that. In 1891 or 1892 they began to smell the Manitoba school question, which they thought would be a good trump card, and they used it. But I want to come down to the conference of 1893, and the platform then adopted. This red book containing that platform is well worth reading; I find a great deal of pleasure in examining it. I find a good deal of philosophy in it; I can tell the character of a man by what I read there. My hon. friend at that conference made two or three speeches. He spoke in French and in English. He did not say quite the same thing in the two languages; but there is not much difference. There was one feature of that conference, however, to which I call the attention of the hon. Minister of Customs. Everyone who spoke there said that protection must go—that was the common enemy. They did not quite agree on other things ; they let them go like the school question. My hon. friend said on that question : " Don't ask me what I intend to do ; the question is in the hands of the Government ; it is before the courts just now. Some people have written to me asking my opinion on that question, but I cannot say anything about my opinion ; I want to see what the Government will do." He said the same thing on the prohibition question. He said, when written to, " If you want to get my answer, there it is," and he says nothing at all. The platform of 1893 is a very broad platform ; everybody can go on it. I was a witness of the great reception that was made to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). That hon. gentleman was baptized that day by my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin), who paid him what he no doubt considered a great compliment—though I doubt very much whether the House will view it in that light. He said that the hon. Minister had been very bad before but that since he joined the Liberal party they would try and make a good man out of him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And so we did.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. Minister of Public Works, at any rate, was perfectly satisfied with his regeneration, which shows perhaps that in some respects he is not difficult to please. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin) took us all into his confidence on that occasion. He said to his audience : The people of the county of Grey have been sending men to the House of Commons to represent them for many years, and I have always asked myself why they did so, because I could really never find out the reason.

An hon. MEMBER. Nor anybody else.

Mr. BERGERON. Nor anybody else. But I wish to call the attention of my hon. friends to the platform formed by the Liberal party at the convention of 1893. They then made certain pledges to the country and to this House. They promised to the country that they would kill protection, that they would obtain reciprocity, that they would, if elected to office, give the people a pure administration, that they would reduce the expenditure, and above all things that they would not increase the public debt. These promises were published in a speech—a very short speech made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who does not talk much, but is probably more of a thinker, and who submitted the whole resolution.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I much regret that I cannot return the compliment.

Mr. BERGERON. Of course, there is compensation in everything, and my hon. friend can take what consolation he chooses from his remark, but it is possible that he may be both a thinker and a speaker. I am afraid I must have touched the hon.

Mr. BERGERON.

gentleman on the raw, because he is usually not so irritable, but rather even-tempered. At that conference and in that platform, the Liberal party pledged themselves to observe the independence of Parliament. They also promised to keep our public lands for bona fide settlers. Then they made some promises to themselves. They promised to destroy the Dominion Franchise Act, as it then existed, and to redistribute the electoral colleges throughout the Dominion, and particularly in Ontario. On referring to my notes I see that I have made a mistake, because I have got this promise of redistribution down as a gerrymander ; but we are told it is not to be a gerrymander at all, but a pure and simple redistribution of seats. They also promised Senate reform. Then, there was a little disagreement between the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and the right hon. First Minister on the question of prohibition. These two gentlemen could not agree on that point, although they did on nearly everything else. But their little difficulty they settled among themselves. They made a promise, not to the country, but to each other, that if ever they came into power, they would appeal to the people and find out whether the right hon. First Minister or the hon. Minister of Agriculture was right. The First Minister said that the people did not want prohibition, but the Minister of Agriculture insisted that they did, and they agreed to have their disagreement settled when they came into power. They did settle it at a cost to the people of $250,000, and now they are in a position to discuss the question amicably with one another, because they have just had that appeal which they promised each other they would obtain. They came into power in 1896 under this platform of 1893. Did they obtain office on the merits of their own policy ? Did they attain power under the promise of free trade as they have it in England, under their pledges of not increasing the public debt and the public expenditures, of giving the people pure administration, and of upholding the independence of Parliament ? No, for if they did, people have been sadly disappointed. My impression is that what brought them into power was not their platform of 1893, but a sentimental cry in the province of Quebec in favour of my right hon. friend, backed by the skilful manner in which they managed to shelve the Manitoba school question ; and I must congratulate my right hon. friend on the exceedingly adroit way in which he managed to evade the difficulty and delude the people of the province of Quebec on that question.

The Conservative party had suffered many losses. I may be told that I am not speaking politics, but I may be allowed, as a matter of history, to say that the Conservative party had gone through very serious difficulties. The Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, who had been our First Minister for many years, and who is to-day recognized, even by hon. gentlemen opposite, now that he is dead and gone, as a great statesman, was taken from us in the month of June, 1891. He was replaced by the late Sir John Abbott, who we all know, after a short regime of a year, was also called to his final account. Sir John Abbott was replaced by the lamented Sir John Thompson, whom everybody recognized as a tower of strength, but who, unfortunately, when on a visit to his Queen on the other side of the Atlantic, was cut down in his prime by that grim destiny whose scythe is always in waiting to mow down each one of us. The party had therefore suffered most serious misfortune, and this the great mass of the people will understand probably better than any one of us here. Then, following these great losses came the Manitoba school question. I heard the other day the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who I am sorry is not here, for I should be very glad to tell him how very much impressed I was by the way he spoke and how I think he is an acquisition to this House. For a young gentleman, he spoke very well indeed, and seemed to have a very keen relish for the debates of this House, and I am sure will take great interest in our discussions: but of course I would not be telling the truth were I to say that I have the same appreciation as he has himself of what fell from his lips. Were he present I would tell him that he may be right in what he said of the hon. members of this House, and that we cannot fail to attach importance to what a young man, who took his seat here about a month ago, has to say with regard to how the hon. members of this House ought to conduct themselves. There are other great minds besides that of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who, I hope, will not get angry at this remark of mine. There are great minds, among which I place that of my hon. friend, but he has the experience, which the hon. member for North Simcoe lacks, and had the hon. member for North Simcoe listened to all that has been said here, not only upon the fiscal, but upon the school question, he might not perhaps have been quite so free with his well-meant advice to the House. I may be pardoned if I take the liberty of replying to some of these young men and recalling to the memory of the people outside of Parliament things that they might otherwise forget. But before venturing on an explanation of the way in which this Manitoba school business was made use of by the Government, I would like to find out what the Government, since they came into power in 1896, have done in other matters. Have they carried out their pledge to do away with protection? The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will no doubt allow me to address him in particular on this subject. Even with all the figures which my hon. friend read a moment ago, and the skillful argument he made, I doubt whether he can make anybody believe, in or out of this House, still less the people of England, in spite of the Cobden medal which my right hon. friend wears so well on his breast, that we have done away with protection in Canada, and have inaugurated free trade as they have it in England. The National Policy may have been reformed to some slight extent, it may have been touched in some particulars, but in principle the policy of this Government is the same old policy that we had under the late Liberal-Conservative Administration. So, when they say they have carried out their promises, I say: No; they have not killed protection. It is true, they have bothered the manufacturers a great deal. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has worried them a great deal and has warned them always to keep one eye open. That may be, in another form, an invitation to these manufacturers when there is a by-election—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is the old way.

Mr. BERGERON. No. I was eighteen years on that side and I never saw it, and I do not believe it. It is true, hon. gentlemen opposite have worried the manufacturers, but only the other day my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Madore) read a letter from a hardware manufacturer in Montreal. I asked the signature, because I thought it was sent by Mr. McMaster, who is a good Conservative, and a good friend of ours. He writes a very nice letter. The day after the present tariff came out, I was told, my friend Mr. Gault sent a telegram to the Minister of Finance also to congratulate him. What conclusion can we draw from that? Simply this—that these men expected to be choked by the new tariff: they expected to be put in such a position that they would be obliged to close their factories, because they supposed the party in power would stick to their pledges and promises. But when these men, like Mr. McMaster, saw they were not to be killed, when they saw that cotton, instead of going down had actually gone up and—a little later on I will have something to say about cotton in New Brunswick, where they have carried the industry very far, so that it is useful not only in by-elections, but in general elections to the local House—when they saw that instead of having to close their mills and turn out their workpeople, they could keep their mills running and their people employed, they were satisfied, and they wrote the letter that my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Madore) read the other day. Does all this mean that the party in power have kept their pledges? If they had kept their pledges these mills would have been shut down, the employees would be scattered, and the proprietors would not have written letters of congratulation.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). When the House rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was trying to show that when the Minister of Customs said that the Liberal party had been faithful to the promises made in their platform in 1893, and that the present Government had carried out their pledges, what he said and the facts of the case were not alike. I had shown that they promised to kill protection but that, while they had worried the manufacturers a great deal and warned them to keep one eye open, had, in fact, given them every chance to come down handsomely for the election fund, they had left them a great deal of protection. I instanced the case of cotton, the protection on which was increased. A moment ago, when looking at the newspapers, I saw Dun, Wiman's report to the effect that cottons had increased 7½ per cent within the last few days. I also showed that coal oil was selling dearer to-day than it was three years ago, when my hon. friend the Prime Minister promised my electors in Beauharnois that when he came into power coal oil would sell at half the price it did then.

Now, they also promised in 1893 that they would give us reciprocity with the United States. Did they get reciprocity as promised? They may answer at once that if they have not done it, it is not their fault, that they have tried to do it. I admit that I have always been a constant reader of the speeches delivered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). There is a great deal in his speeches. It is true, he does not always talk about the same thing, but whatever he talks about, he does it well. In a speech at Ingersoll in 1889, he heaped accusation upon the then Government for not securing reciprocity with the United States. He declared that it was the fault of the Conservatives, that they had not done anything towards securing reciprocity, that they had not been nice enough to our cousins to the south of us, that they had not gone there and done everything to secure reciprocity. And he said:

Here let me say that I doubt if all, even of our own friends, have fully comprehended the great importance of the direct results which arise from the adoption of the policy of the Liberal party—

Liberal policy. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this afternoon said he had never said a word in favour of commercial union. Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in 1889:

—the adoption of the policy of the Liberal party in favour of continental free trade or unrestricted reciprocity—call it what you will.

He goes on to show that if his party came into power it would be easy to obtain reciprocity for these reasons:

On this point I will say nothing now, only pause—
Mr. BERGERON.

ing to observe that recent events seem to have pretty clearly established these four facts:

First, that unrestricted reciprocity will profit us greatly

Secondly, that there is every reasonable ground to believe that any Canadian Government—

Note that—"any Canadian Government."— —which can convince the people of the United States that they are honestly desirous of trading with them, and are willing to negotiate on fair terms, have a very good chance of securing it.

He gives four reasons in all, which come to about the same result as what I have given. A little further on he says, speaking of the then Government:

So you have these worthies declaring, in the teeth of the plainest evidence to the contrary, that the Yankees will not treat with us at any price.—

The Conservatives at that time argued that the Liberals had sent George Brown to Washington in 1877, and he had not been able to treat with the American government, also that some of our friends had gone to Washington in 1887 and 1888 and had not been able to obtain anything from the Americans.

—and to make assurance sure, we have the Government twice over in two successive years, deliberately refusing to make the smallest advance or even to attempt to open negotiations with the United States. Pray, what do they expect the people of the United States to do? Manifestly this thing is of more importance to us than to them, and yet our legislative Solons will not even ask for it.

Suppose, now, that the American commissioners had read this famous speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, knowing that he could not help going down on his knees to obtain reciprocity for Canada. It is not surprising that they would not come to terms, nor deal at all with our own commissioners. He says:

They first shut the door in the face of our neighbours, then they complain that they won't come in.

Well, now, I do not want to worry the House by reading extracts from his speech, but I would ask the hon. gentlemen opposite to read them; they are very interesting; they would be very useful in their campaign speeches when they go to the country, because this gentleman is one of their best men. Now, these gentlemen went to Washington and had their conference, and how much did it cost the people of this country? But before I go further on that subject, I want to show the House what a Quebec paper, the organ of the Government, said, when it was proposed holding the conference in Quebec, and I do this in order that members from other provinces may see how the official press in Quebec is accustomed to delude our people. The "Soleil," of Quebec, after Parliament had voted $50,000 to defray the expenses of the conference, came out and said: What a glorious day for Quebec; over a million dollars will be spent in the city of Quebec, because all these commissioners will come down here with their pockets full of money. What a grand thing for the city of Quebec. The population below Quebec read in that paper that it was not in the interests of Canada that the conference was to be held, and that the money had been voted by Parliament, but it was to please the people of the city of Quebec—those who were to make money out of the strangers. But that is not all. I have something better here. After the fiasco of the conference in Quebec, in the month of August, 1898, and after our commissioners had gone down to Washington to try again—I was going to say, had gone a-begging; but that will come later, because when we have a report of what took place in Washington, we will be better able to appreciate the situation. But I have information on that point from the "Globe," an extract of which was read the other day by the hon. member for Picton, to the effect, that if the Canadian commissioners did not get reciprocity, it was not our fault, because they did everything they could to obtain it for us, but the Americans would not grant it. Well, when we heard that the conference was adjourned to Quebec, the "Soleil" came out with this heading: "Good news for Quebec." This is the way our people in Quebec are educated by the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite:

The population of Quebec will read with real delight the despatch from Washington, which we publish in another column. It will be seen that the Quebec conference adjourned yesterday at Washington to take up its stay in Quebec in August next. There is no longer any doubt that the treaty will be signed here.

The "Soleil" tells the people of Quebec district that the question is decided.

It is the name of our historic city that will be attached to this precious document, this 'entente cordiale' between the two greatest nations of the world, England and the United States. The name of Quebec will awaken more and more the attention of European and American diplomacy. It must also be said that there are gigantic interests at stake.

Here the "Soleil" pompously recites the eight clauses covering the protocol, and continues:

Apart from these considerations of a superior order, the fact must not be forgotten that there will be another quarter of a million dollars spent in Quebec during a couple of months. We also see in the adjournment a manifest desire on the part of the representatives of the two countries to come to an understanding, for if it were otherwise, it would be a comedy unworthy of such distinguished statesmen. We also recognize in this act,— Now, note this. If the conference is going to sit in Quebec in the month of August, it is because it is too hot in Washington, I suppose:

We also recognize in this act the firm, energetic and sympathetic hand of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the devoted member for Quebec East. He never forgets his own even when abroad.

So much for the "Soleil," Mr. Pacaud's paper, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I only mention this in passing to show how the population of our province are educated by the organs of the Government. Probably, we will have more to say upon this question of the conference, so I will not continue on that subject at present.

I pass now to another subject; the promises which these hon. gentlemen made. They promised us a pure administration. Have they carried that out? I say, no. On the contrary, I believe that they have invited spoilsmen from all over the country by giving contracts without tender. That is another of their promises which has not been carried out. They promised to give the public lands to bona fide settlers. Have they carried that out? I am sorry my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is not here. He has forgotten some things which I would like to recall to his memory—or, if he has not forgotten them, he was wrong this afternoon, when he pretended that the Government had fulfilled all their promises. They have not given the public lands to bona fide settlers. They were ready to give over 4,000,000 acres of the best mineral lands of the Yukon territory for a tramway 150 miles in length. If they did not do this, it was because the Senate of Canada would not allow them to do it. Sir, their Yukon scheme must have been a bad one, because some of their own members voted against it, members who knew, probably, more than anybody else the nature of the scheme the Government were trying to put through Parliament. Another article of their programme was, that they were going to preserve the independence of Parliament. The new members, those who were not here before 1896, do not know how much these hon. gentlemen used to preach about the independence of Parliament before the last general election.* The new members do not know that the present Postmaster General made great speeches on that question. From the seat I occupy he even proposed a Bill to prevent any member of Parliament from obtaining a position under the Crown for at least two years after the expiry of his term in Parliament. Have the Government carried out that pledge? Why, Sir, they have appointed, since they came to power in July, 1896, more members of Parliament to public positions than the Conservative party did during the eighteen years they were in power. Does anybody doubt it? Where is Mr. Forbes, who represented the county of Shelburne? He is on the bench, and his seat is occupied by the Minister of Finance. Where is Mr. King, who represented the county of Sunbury? He is up in the Senate, and his seat here is occupied by the Minister of Railways and Canals. Where is my old friend, Mr. Béchard?

An hon. MEMBER. He is dead.

Mr. BERGEDON. I knew the hon. gentleman would say that. That is very good.

Mr. Béchard was shelved in the Senate after being elected to Parliament, and his seat is occupied by the Minister of Public Works. If he died afterwards that is not the fault of the Government nor the fault of the Opposition. Where is Mr. Devlin, who, from this side, spoke in favour of the Remedial Bill? Probably he could not swallow the arrangement made by the Minister of Public Works in Manitoba, and threatened to oppose the Government. He was sent back to Ireland, the country of his forefathers. What is he doing there? I do not know. We do not see much result from his work, because there is not a large immigration coming from Ireland now. Where is Mr. Langelier, who sat here for two years, as we saw one day in the "Witness" of Montreal, with the promise of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government of a position on the bench, in his pocket? Where is Mr. Lavergne? Where is Mr. Lister, who only last year was at the head of a committee of investigation to whitewash the hon. Minister of Public Works in the Drummond County deal? Where is he?—on the bench. Where is my hon. friend the Postmaster General? Away. Where is Mr. Cameron? Why does not somebody shout that he is dead; but before he died what happened to him? He was sent to the North-west Territories as Lieutenant-Governor. During his term of office he sat in Parliament with the nomination in his pocket, and he left the House of Commons to go into the gubernatorial chair in the North-west. Where is Mr. Fiset? In the Senate. Appointed by whom? By the present Government. Where is Mr. Choquette? Where is Senator McClelan? Where is Sir Oliver Mowat? Where is Mr. Yeo? Where is Senator McInnes? Fourteen of them have been appointed to positions since this Government came into power. Now, it was all very well for our hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), a few nights ago, to talk about philosophy and say that in politics that it is an uncertainty, but if there is one place more than another where honesty should be displayed, it is in public life. I am not surprised to hear my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Angers) laughing. Why, he voted for the Remedial Bill, and he swallowed the settlement of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and a man who could do that must laugh at people who talk about honesty. Where is the hon. Postmaster General? The Postmaster General stood up here and said that it was immoral for the Conservative Government to appoint men to office who were sitting in Parliament, yet he and his colleagues have sat around that table, in the Council chamber, and signed the nominations of fourteen members of Parliament during their term of office to public positions. You may talk philosophy, but you will not make the honest electorate believe that you are honest men when you say in Opposition one thing and do the contrary when you reach power. Mr. Speaker, I am told that there are even now hon. gentlemen sitting in the House with their nominations in their pockets.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Impossible.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not want to be offensive, but the other day in the House my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) told the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) that he holds in his pocket the position of postmaster of Sherbrooke.

Mr. STENSON. I did not understand the hon. member for Montmorency to say that I had it in my pocket, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have not got it in my pocket, that I never asked for it, and that it has not been promised to me.

Mr. BERGERON. I am very glad that my hon. friend speaks like that, although he does not ask it, if it is given to him, he will take it. I like that better than the other day when the hon. gentleman answered my hon. friend. The explanation he now gives is that he did not hear the statement of the hon. member for Montmorency. I am told there is another gentleman, sitting in this House, who has the position of postmaster of Montreal in his pocket.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Impossible.

Mr. BERGERON. It is current rumour that another hon. gentleman sitting not far from the right hon. Prime Minister has, in his pocket, the position of doctor of the quarantine in Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Surely not.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not doubt it since they have been able to appoint fourteen members in three years; I do not see why they did not appoint more. And to hon. gentlemen opposite, who have this penchant and their friends in the country, I would give the advice that they get their positions as soon as possible because the Government will not have a long time to fulfil their promises to their followers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as this part of their programme has not been carried out, let us look at the debt. I have heard my hon. friend talk very often on the hustings, and we have heard him here also, declaring that the debt was increasing too rapidly, and that the country was being driven to ruin by the then Government. This meant, if it meant anything, that when he came into power he would diminish the debt, at least, he would see that it was not increased. Has he done so? The debt, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, in 1896, was $258,497,432. What was it according to the last figures we have?—$264,287,106.16. Besides that our hon. friend the Minister of Finance, before this session borrowed $2,500,000, but in all probability the right hon. gentleman has forgotten some of these increases. Not only have hon. gentlemen forgotten their promises in regard to the debt, but they have also forgotten them in regard to taxation. Taxation has been a great theme with the right hon. leader of the Government, and has helped his eloquence a great deal before the electorate. Why, the way the people were taxed by those miserable Conservatives! What was the taxation in 1896, taken from customs and excise, the two sources from which the Government derive their revenue? In 1896 the taxation amounted to $27,759,285. In 1897, a year after hon. gentlemen were in power, it amounted to $28,645,628. In 1898, according to the last figures which we have, it was $29,576,456. That is to say, that the present Government of my right hon. friend has collected 28c. per head or $1.40 per family more than its predecessors in office. And these hon. gentlemen talked about the taxation which weighed upon the poor taxpayers of the country. In 1893, my right hon. friend, in that famous conference, delivered a speech in French in which he said—showing these buildings here: "Why, you see that these people spend $36,000,000 a year for the ordinary expenses of Canada. We should save $3,000,000 a year," and Mr. Mills, now the Minister of Justice in the Upper House, said that "we should save $4,000,000 a year." That was in 1893. What has happened since? In 1898 the right hon. gentleman and his Government had voted by this Parliament $44,000,000, where the Conservative Government of 1893 took $36,000,000 and the Conservative Government in 1896 took $38,000,000. That was $6,000,000 more a year, only for what is computed under the head of ordinary expenditures, because hon. gentlemen will remember that last year we voted here in Parliament over $50,000,000. This is so true that the "Gleaner," a paper published in Huntingdon, a Liberal and Radical paper, says that the right hon. gentleman and his Government may not boast, but that they should blush to boast of having a surplus of $1,500,000 when they had already increased the public debt over $5,000,000. That was said in this Liberal paper.

As a matter of fact has the tariff been diminished since my right hon. friend obtained power? No, Sir. It has not been decreased by one per cent on the whole. That has been stated on the floor of Parliament by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), and not a single member of the Government has dared to deny it, nor can they deny it because it is absolutely true. Listen to this. In the year 1898, the revenue of Canada was $28,649,192. Now remark what follows and you will see that the revenues have increased immensely during the past year. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) was proud of it this afternoon, and we admit it, but we contend it is not due to the Government. In 1899, the revenue was $33,058,841, or an increase for 1899 over 1898 of $4,409,-

649. The people of this country may congratulate themselves on having a surplus of nearly four and a half millions as compared with the revenue of the previous year, but let us look at the expenditure. There, Mr. Speaker, is where this Liberal Government shines. The expenditure for 1898 was $26,614,189, and the expenditure for 1899 was $32,054,210, or an increase in one year of $5,440,021. In spite of the Government the revenue increased by over $4,000,000, and by the will of the Government the expenditure has increased over $5,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another promise of the Liberals was, that they would settle the Manitoba school question. I have already stated that the right hon. gentleman was not returned to power on his policy or on his platform—probably on that account he is less guilty for not having carried out the Liberal platform of 1893. Well, Sir, the right hon. gentleman obtained power through an accident; he obtained power through a sentimental cry in the province of Quebec; he obtained power through the school question. Sir, is it not a wonderful spectacle to see the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) now sitting beside the very man (Mr. Sifton) who was one of the provoking causes of the school trouble in Manitoba. I did not intend to speak upon the school question. Last year I said there was no use in talking about it any more, for I believe that with the present Government in power it is impossible to settle that question as it should have been settled. I doubt now that it ever could be settled, as it should have been, had we not had the obstruction of my right hon. friend in 1896. The right hon. gentleman was glad when I made the announcement last session that I would not again refer to the school question, and he said he was happy to hear me say so. But, Sir, who spoke about the school question this year; who was the first to mention it in this House. It was the right hon. the Prime Minister himself. Who refer to the school question everywhere on the hustings? It is the friends of the Administration. The Liberals talk about it; what is the use of our talking about it? They have some reason to talk about it; perhaps it may be remorse. Sir, how was the school question settled by the Liberal Government? It was settled to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who told us the other night that he was perfectly satisfied with it. It was settled to the satisfaction of the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, and need I remind the right hon. gentleman of the love Mr. McCarthy had for his, the Prime Minister's, race and his creed. It was settled to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who carried out the iniquitous school law of 1890 in Manitoba. It was settled to the satisfaction of Mr. Greenway. But, Mr. Speaker, is that settlement satisfactory to the minority in Manitoba? My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has in his pocket a letter from His Grace the Archbishop of Manitoba. I know he received a letter from the Archbishop a few days before the opening of Parliament. It is not marked "confidential," and will the Premier read it in Parliament and put it before the country, so that we will understand whether the school question is settled in a satisfactory manner to all parties interested. We have in this House the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who is perfectly satisfied with the school question, and we know that he speaks according to the ideas of his late uncle. How can we have sitting on the same benches and in the same party with him, a man like my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil, who voted with the Conservative Government on the Remedial Bill? How can my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Angers), who voted with us on the Remedial Bill, be as perfectly satisfied with that settlement as is the member for Simcoe? How can my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), who voted for the Remedial Bill, sit quietly by and be as well satisfied with the settlement as is the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)? Sir, we have only to mention the fact to show the absurdity of it. No, the school question is not finished, and the other day the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself declared so. The right hon. the Prime Minister says it is settled, and he declares that he has taken it away from this arena and sent it back to the provincial arena whence it should never have been removed. But, the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), in a speech delivered in West Huron the other day, stated that the school question was not settled, and "La Patrie," the organ of the Minister of Public Works, wrote about three weeks before the opening of Parliament, that something had been done towards the settlement, but it was not all finished yet. Who tells the truth amongst all these contradictions? My own impression is that there is trouble brewing, and that that trouble, will be due to the action of the Prime Minister. I am sorry to have to say so, but there can be no doubt at all, that history will hold him responsible for the mischief that will yet come from that unfortunate matter. We on this side of the House will not do as hon. gentlemen did. We are not going to talk about this question any more. There has been too much of that done by hon. gentlemen opposite, but we will wait until we hear from the minority. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows what I mean. He knows that he has obtained in certain quarters a delay, but he cannot pass over that delay. There will be a time of reckoning come when some high personage will say to him: "You said that in two or three years you would settle the question; you have not done it." The question will come up again, and, unfortunately, I suppose by that time, our party will be in power and we will once more have the trouble of that question upon our shoulders. Anyhow, we have had a very good experience in the past, and whenever the Liberals go on the hustings in our province or anywhere else and talk about the school question, we shall be able to bring them face to face with their speeches since they have been in power. Who started the school question originally? It seems idle to speak about it now, but on the other hand it would appear as if some people had forgotten. The school trouble was started at Brandon, Manitoba, on the 11th of April, 1889, by Mr. Dalton McCarthy. He raised the cry of race and religion; it was taken up by Mr. Greenway and carried into effect by a law which was introduced into the legislature by Mr. Martin, and afterwards, if I am not mistaken, carried out by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). The Conservatives had nothing to gain by doing anything with that question. The Conservatives had nothing to gain in Quebec by arousing fanaticism on that question; they had nothing to gain in Ontario or in the maritime provinces. Who had anything to gain? The Liberals, and they did it. My right hon. friend in Quebec always had a string, and you could not catch him; but the Minister of Public Works was not so guarded, and all the others stirred up fanaticism on the question for whatever it was worth against the Conservative party for not granting the minority in Manitoba everything they desired. In Ontario Mr. McCarthy found friends on both sides of politics, and there he appealed to feelings the reverse of what were appealed to in Quebec. That is the history of the school question agitation as it was carried on by hon. gentlemen opposite, while the Conservative party were trying to the best of their power to settle that question in a constitutional way, and in a way that would last for ever.

While on this subject, I want to call the attention of the House to a few remarks made the other night by the hon. Minister of Public Works. The organ of that hon. gentleman in Quebec at the very time we are speaking, is again stirring up race and religious fanaticism on the school question against the Conservatives of Ontario, whom it calls the Tories of Ontario, saying that they are the enemies of the French Canadians and the Roman Catholics of Quebec. That is done every day in "La Patrie." Why not say the truth? Who stood by the Remedial Bill in 1896 here? In the name of those who were really interested in having the minority in the province of Manitoba granted their constitutional rights, I desire to say here in Parliament, before the whole country, that the English Conservatives of the different provinces of Canada stood by the constitution and by the rights of the minority; it will go down to history that the Conservative party stood manfully by the minority which had grievances, whether that minority was Protestant or Catholic. Except the few I named a few moments ago. I ask you to name some of the Liberals of Ontario who voted with us in 1896, and then the hon. Minister of Public Works will be entitled to speak or write in the way he does. But I will come to that subject later on. I mention this only to show how unjust the Minister of Public Works is in pursuing to-day the same tactics which he pursued when he desired the party of hon. gentlemen opposite to come into power. I cannot forget the speech made in this House by Mr. Fairbairn, the member for South Victoria. I am sure my right hon. friend will remember it. Mr. Fairbairn, addressing the committee over which I had the honour to preside at the time, said he had been an Orangeman for years and years, and that he had learned in the Orange lodges to stand by the oppressed, whether they were of one creed or the other, and he thought it was his duty as an Orangeman to stand by the minority of Manitoba. He knew he would never come back to this House, but he did it because he knew how to fall for an honourable cause. And he said in that speech, which is in "Hansard" of 1896, that he regretted to see the right hon. gentleman in the position he then occupied, and that the right hon. gentleman would in the years to come have occasion to regret sincerely the position he had taken on that question. Now, Mr. Speaker, what have they done? Besides increasing the debt and increasing the expenditure, they have done something for themselves. The increase of the debt and the expenditure was for the country, but for themselves they have got rid of the Franchise Act. They had promised that, not to the country, for we had a better Act than we have to-day; but they had promised it to themselves, and they stuck to their promise and did it. What kind of a law have we to-day? I leave it to the judgment of the right hon. gentleman. He cannot hold an election in the city of Winnipeg to-day. Under the old franchise law an election could have been held at any time. The other day I wrote to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to ascertain if the lists for my county were there, as they should be, according to the Act passed last session; but they are not in yet, although there was an election held in the county of Beauharnois in December last. We do not know where we stand. And yet this is the law the hon. gentleman passed, because, forsooth, he had promised the Liberals in the country that he would get rid of that bad law which had been passed by the Conservatives. I do not want to increase the sorrows of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), but this new electoral law worked in a queer way in the province of Quebec on the 29th of September last in the vote on the plebiscite. I would be glad to see an investigation of that vote. I think some people standing very high in the country have asked for an investigation. Why, I saw it stated in "Le Soleil" that people in Quebec were voting about a week after the elections were over. As a matter of fact, on the 30th of September we read in the papers that the majority against prohibition in Quebec was about 40,000, whereas, according to the last report, it is over 80,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Over 90,000.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) I suppose the hon. gentleman wants to show that in the province of Quebec the ballot boxes have been tampered with, as the vote has apparently increased. Let the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him whether he has compared the majorities officially reported in Ontario and some other English-speaking provinces with the majorities as first reported by the newspapers?

Mr. BERGERON. I am only repeating what I saw in "Le Soleil." I admit what my hon. friend says about the other provinces; but it only shows how badly the law of the right hon. gentleman has worked. If the same thing can be carried on in other elections as was done in the plebiscite election, it will be a very dangerous state of things.

The PRIME MINISTER. What things have we carried on?

Mr. BERGERON. If it is true that the vote has increased day by day, and that the people have been voting after the 29th of September—

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman will make that declaration, he can have a committee whenever he wants it.

Mr. BERGERON. If my hon. friend will hold an investigation, in three days he will have everything.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have said time and again that if a proper demand came for an investigation, it would be granted; but nothing has come yet.

Mr. BERGERON. If the right hon. gentleman really wants, for the honour of Canada, to have that matter threshed out thoroughly, I can put into his hands documents which will put him in a position to have it thoroughly investigated. Let me say to my right hon. friend, that I have every reason to believe that the Dominion Alliance in Montreal have in their possession facts which are probably not ignored by my right hon. friend, and that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) met those people, and that those people wanted to get an investigation themselves. The Minister of Agriculture asked them to let him have the investigation held, and they replied: We do not want a political investigation, but a thorough investigation. The matter stands there, but if the right hon. First Minister will declare that he is ready to have an investigation—not a political, but a thorough one—I repeat again, that in less than three days he will have everything he desires necessary for an investigation.

Another thing which these gentlemen promised to themselves, and which they intend to carry out, is the redistribution of the counties. In other words—if I may be allowed to say so—a gerrymander of the different counties of this Dominion. This they promised to themselves, and it is the only thing we find in the Speech from the Throne. That Speech evidently was prepared in a great hurry, because there are some irregularities in it. There is something put into the mouth of His Excellency which certainly should be investigated. His Excellency says :

The almost total cessation of the considerable exodus of our population which, at one time, was a regrettable feature of our affairs.

But, Mr. Speaker, every day we read in the papers that the exodus is just as large as it was before ; yet, despite this, these gentlemen have made His Excellency declare that it has ceased.

Now, there is something else of which I do not know whether my right hon. friend is aware or not. There is a discrepancy between the French and the English version of that Speech.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is it

Mr. BERGERON. The English version reads—and I am very glad my hon. friend is here, because he is in a position to judge of the discrepancy very well :

Considerable progress has been made on several of the subjects submitted, but a serious disagreement arose between Her Majesty's commissioners and the commissioners of the United States on the question of the delimitation of the boundary between Canada and Alaska.

But the French version reads :

On en était arrivé à une entente sur plusieurs de points en litige, lorsqu'une divergence de vues se produisit entre les commissaires de Sa Majesté et ceux des Etats-Unis sur la question de la délimitation de la frontière entre le Canada et l'Alaska.

My hon. friend sees the difference.

The PRIME MINISTER. I notice that there is a shade of difference.

Mr. BERGERON. More than that.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, there is a shade. The word "almost" is not in the French version ; but I must say to the House that this is the first time my attention has been drawn to this divergence. When the Speech from the Throne was prepared, it was treated in the manner in which Speeches from the Throne are always treated. It was sent to Mr. De Celles, the Librarian, for translation. He did not translate it himself, but had it translated by Mr. Sylvain, the assistant librarian. It was sent by Mr. Sylvain to the Secretary of State, and by the Secretary of State to His Excellency, and in the meantime was not seen at all by myself.

Mr. BERGERON. My right hon. friend will understand that I am not making any charge against him personally. What I said was, that this Speech from the Throne seemed to have been prepared in a hasty manner and without care, and he certainly will admit that the difference is a marked one. Whilst the English version is, that considerable progress had been made on several of the subjects submitted to the Washington commission, the French version is, that on several of the points in dispute the commissioners had come to an agreement.

At any rate, leaving that aside, the only thing in the Speech from the Throne on which we can rely, is the promise by the Government to gerrymander the counties of this Dominion. That they promised to one another at the conference of 1893, and that promise which they made to each other, is the only thing they intend to carry out.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Not a gerrymander.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend opposite says, not a gerrymander.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. To undo a gerrymander.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend is too kind. We know what his party has done in Ontario, the map of which, under their Gerrymander Act, is the greatest piece of patch-work we have ever seen. We had it before us in 1892, and nobody who did not see it, could have believed that such a piece of patch-work could have been devised by any government. It cannot be wondered at, then, that we do not doubt for a moment that if this Government find it to their interest to do a similar piece of work, they will have any scruples about doing it. I have no doubt that their promised redistribution will be the greatest piece of gerrymander we have ever heard of.

The PRIME MINISTER. You had better wait till you see it.

Mr. BERGERON. That is why I do not intend talking about it at greater length tonight. But they put that promise into their platform of 1893 for their own party benefit, and that promise they intend to carry out. They promised also, that they would reform the Senate, but they did not put that pledge into the Speech from the Throne, probably because they anticipated some criticism on the part of the other House. They say, however, in their speeches, that they are going to reform the Senate. Why? Reform it! My impression is, that the right hon. gentleman, when he spoke of Senate reform for the first time in Montreal, had never given the subject a thought. He was in a great hurry ; he had gone down to that city to prevent the Liberal clubs there from eating up his Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and he simply said to his Minister: What shall I say to them, when I go in; because I cannot go there with nothing but a whip in my hands to thrash them into line? And his Minister said to him: Talk about Senate reform. What does Senate reform mean? Will the Senate then cost less than it does to-day? No, Sir; it will cost the same price. But it simply amounts to this, that if the Senate should think it in the interests of the country to throw out any measure sent to them by the House of Commons, they will be brought down into this House, and their majority drowned by the majority here. I believe, Mr. Speaker, in an Upper House; I believe that the fathers of confederation were wise in their generation, and, in framing the Act of Confederation, did everything that could have been expected of them under the circumstances; but I say here, without consulting any one of my friends, that I would rather see the Senate abolished entirely than reformed in the way proposed.

Mr. BERGERON. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite are divided on that question, as they are on everything else. The hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet), the other day, said that he was in favour of the abolition of the Senate, but the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Madore) said that he was not, but wanted reform. Let us examine and see how ridiculous is the position taken by my right hon. friend. Supposing he should bring the Senate down to meet in a congress of the two Houses. He has sixty votes of a majority to-day in this House. Let him put through this House the Drummond or the Yukon deal, and then let either measure be thrown out in the Senate by thirty of a majority. He will then bring the Senate down into this House, and, by combining the two Houses, he will carry the scheme by thirty of a majority. But take the reverse case. Let us imagine that my right hon. friend is preparing a ground to fall upon. He sends up a measure to the Senate, which the Senate refuses to pass. He then dissolves Parliament, and calls upon the people to say whether they want to rule this country, or allow it to be ruled by a lot of irresponsible men. Suppose he should carry the country by twenty of a majority, and the next year bring down a scheme, which he carries through this House by means of that majority, but which is rejected by the Senate by thirty of a majority. Will he ask the Senate to meet in conference with the House of Commons? What would be the object? His majority of twenty would be overcome by the Senate majority of thirty. I only mention this to show the absurdity of the scheme. But why are we asked to get rid of the Senate? Because it refused to sanction the Drummond deal. That is the reason. For my right hon. friend knows that this is a fad and the Liberals have got the name for having fads. When they were in opposition they had the fad of having the patrons of industry to fight the Conservative party. They had the fad of prohibitionists to fight the Conservative party. They had to make some show of keeping that up when they got into power, because it is their habit. But do they intend to reform the Senate? Are they serious when they talk of such a thing? Let me remind my hon. friend what occurred in Quebec. Mr. Mercier proposed to abolish the Legislative Council. Did he do it? He declared throughout the province of Quebec that it was too costly, and that if he came into power he would abolish it. When he came into power he tried to get some of the councillors to resign, appointing their sons in their places and doing other things which were not commendable. And when he got the majority in the Council, far from abolishing it, he increased the indemnity of the councillors. My right hon. friend will do the same thing here. If the Senate gives him a majority, it will be found that that is all the change in the constitution in that body that he wants. He is not serious. When the Drummond County Bill was rejected in the Senate, my right hon. friend knows very well, he had his remedy. Why did he not go to the country; why did he not appeal to the electorate and say: Here is a measure which we, the majority in the House of Commons, believe to be in the interest of the country; we have passed it by a majority of 50; the Senate has refused to pass it; it is for the people to say which is right and which is wrong. If he had carried the country on such an appeal, he knows that he would only have had to put the Bill through this House and the Senate would have had to pass it. The same thing is true of the Yukon Bill. But let it be known, to the honour of the Senate of Canada, that by refusing sanction to the Drummond County Bill they saved over half a million dollars to the country, for the offers which were made by the same company to lease the road were for half a million less than my right hon. friend was willing to give to the Drummond County Railway with the sanction of this House. And now, comes an utterance from the right hon. gentleman which requires attention. In his speech the other day he said that he washes his hands of the Drummond scheme. He says that the measure will be sent to the other House. We know what that means. It will go back to the Senate, and he virtually says: Whether they accept it or not I have nothing more to do with it. Why? The object of the Drummond County Bill is accomplished, as I will show in a few moments when I speak on another subject. The company have had 42½ miles of railway built, with a subsidy of $6,400 a mile from this Government; they have had new rails over the whole road, and now they have a beautiful railway. So if the Government of Canada does not lease it or buy it the company will have a railway a hundred per cent better than it was before. We must turn our eyes now in another direction. I believe I know something more about that question than some of our friends in this House. We must turn our eyes toward the Atlantic Lake Superior, and South Shore road. The South Shore is the line on which the Intercolonial Railway should have come into Montreal. If we understood this matter fully, we should know why there was something wrong about the resignation of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Guité). He had an object in view when he resigned. Those with whom he is acting are very skilful men. They told him to resign, that it would carry something. There was an example of an hon. gentleman resigning last session, and he carried what he wanted. I refer to the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau). And the hon. member for Bonaventure did the same thing. He made his resignation in such a way—that is those who were at the bottom of the scheme did—that it could not be operative. And when it was decided to grant certain subsidies, as we shall see, to the Atlantic Lake Superior, and South Shore Railway, to please my hon. friends from Yamaska (Mr. Mignault) and Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau). Then the hon. member for Bonaventure came back to this House and now he is in the employment of all the privileges of a member of the House of Commons. Now, are they a happy family with all that? I do not think so. We have had too many resignations since the commencement of this Parliament. We never used to hear of them before. I do not believe that hon. members that have been here for 20 years have heard of as many resignations being sent to the Speaker as they have heard since this Government came into power. How many resignations may have been sent to the Prime Minister, we do not know; we shall never know. But I may be asked: What was the result of bringing the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal? It seems to me I can almost hear still the echoes of the speeches of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in which they declared that if the Intercolonial Railway were brought to Montreal the deficit of this great railway would be wiped out. But what is the result? The latest figures we have are in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals. That report shows a deficit in the Intercolonial Railway operation of $209,978.76, that is to say, it is $80,000 more than it was last year, besides the $70,000 which we have paid for the four months lease of the Drummond County Railway down to January of this year. That is to say, the deficit of the Intercolonial Railway since this beautiful scheme of the Government is $150,000 more than it was last year.

Mr. BERGERON.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Is the hon. gentleman giving now the result of the operation for the year 1898? He ought to know, in that case, that the Intercolonial Railway has been running to Montreal but two months.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Four months.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Two or three months, it does not make much difference. Everybody knows that when a railway begins to be operated, more particularly for the first two or three months, it is not expected to give very satisfactory financial results.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend (Mr. Rinfret) has not seen the report of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. RINFRET. Yes, I have seen it.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, I will refer him to one page in this book so that he will not make any mistake. If he will look at page 22 of this report—and I am glad he has drawn my attention to the matter—he will find, that under Conservative rule, the Intercolonial Railway has had surpluses. Here is a list of the surpluses:

|             |           |
|-------------|-----------|
| 1880-1..... | $ 542 65 |
| 1881-2..... | 9,605 18  |
| 1882-3..... | 10,547 83 |
| 1883-4..... | 6,981 30  |
| 1892-3..... | 20,181 59 |
| 1893-4..... | 5,838 29  |
| 1894-5..... | 3,815 21  |

These were surpluses under Conservative administration. Now, in 1895-96 the deficit was $55,187.52. In 1896-97, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the deficit was $59,940.65, and in 1897-98, it is just what I have quoted, $209,978.66.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I may perhaps be allowed to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the result of the operations of the Intercolonial Railway, since its extension to Montreal, cannot be accurately known before the year 1898-99. That railway has really been in operation only during the present year. Therefore, the argument brought forward by the hon. gentleman does not apply, in so far as the extension of that railway line to Montreal is concerned, because the result of the operations of the new scheme will only be fully known when the figures for the year ending on the 30th of June next are at hand.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend is entirely wrong. Without mentioning the $70,000 for the lease of the Drummond road, during the month of September, October, November and December, the deficit is $139,978.66; and the Deputy Minister explains in his report, at page 11, that this does not comprise the $70,000 given for the lease, which brings the deficit to $209,978.66. I would advise my hon. friend to read the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and he will learn something that he has not yet learned.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I have read the report of the Minister of Railways as carefully as the hon. gentleman himself did, and I think I am just as able as he is, to form an opinion of the state of affairs. I maintain that it is only by referring to the figures of the financial year ending June 30th that we will be enabled to judge of the real results, and I venture to say that, instead of a deficit, there will be a surplus.

Mr. BERGERON. Let the hon. gentleman tell that to his electors. The hon. gentleman acknowledges there is a deficit of $209,000, but he says: Wait until June, 1899, and you will see a surplus. If rumour is true, when that report is made my hon. friend will not be here. Now, Mr. Speaker, who has the Drummond deal benefited? I read in the Montreal "Gazette" of last Saturday that it had not benefited the country, but that it had benefited Mr. Greenshields, of Montreal, and I will add, the Minister of Public Works in this House. The "Gazette" is a responsible paper published in my province, and I accept its statement. Now, what was the Yukon deal? As I said a little while ago, the hon. gentleman who had promised that the public lands of this Dominion should be given to bona fide settlers were ready to give 4,000,000 acres of our best mineral lands in the Yukon territory to build 150 miles of railway, and I said then that the scheme was so bad that some of their own friends voted against it. Who were they who voted against it? The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. McInnes), the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Erb) voted against it, all gentlemen who support the Administration, but they could not support it in this nefarious scheme. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) could not support it, and went out of the House, although one of the most faithful supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did anybody on the other side vote for it?

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think anybody voted for it on this side.

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. BERGERON. Well, I am very glad the right hon. gentleman has the consolation of having the support of one of our friends on this side of the House. But not only did their friends vote against it, but the press of the country at that time said that the public of this country breathed freely when the Senate had destroyed that scheme. Now, I am told, I do not know if it is true, the Minister of the Interior could tell us if it is true—I am told that there is now a railway connection through the White Pass with the Klondike route which has not cost a cent of money to this country, nor an acre of land in subsidy. I see that in the papers, I would be glad to know whether it is true, and until it is denied, we must take it for granted. Now, these are some of the reasons why the right hon. gentleman wants to destroy the Senate. I say "destroy," he calls it "reform"; but it is in fact the destruction of the Senate. I will go further. The right hon. gentleman has a few friends in the Senate, and he has appointed some since he came to power; but my impression is that if that scheme of his goes through, there is not a man that would retain his seat in the Senate. It would be a dishonour to retain a position as Senator if the scheme of the right hon. gentleman is carried. The members of that House would then become merely voting machines. I include his friends as well as ours, because I assume that he has chosen men of honour in the appointments he has made to the Senate. Now, my right hon. friend has spoken loudly on the hustings as well as in the House, about provincial autonomy. He would not coerce Manitoba to render justice to a minority, but he wanted to force Quebec to pass resolutions in favour of his Senate scheme. Mr. Speaker, when the day arrives that this Parliament shall rule all the local legislatures in the Dominion of Canada, we might as well tear to pieces the British North America Act and have legislative union; it would be cheaper. What did my right hon. friend do? He left here in company with the master of the Administration, and went down to Quebec. The papers announced next morning that the Minister of Public Works had arrived in his private car, accompanied by the Premier of Canada. They went there at the end of the session—to do what? To force Mr. Marchand, the Premier of Quebec, to pass a resolution in favour of the abolition of the Senate, or, as he calls it, the reform of the Senate. And that in a province which has a legislative council to-day, based upon the very same principles as the Senate of Canada. Mr. Marchand would not do it, he would not be coerced. But Mr. Marchand had passed a law providing for the appointment of three more judges in the province of Quebec, and there is a rumour that the Prime Minister of Canada was not very well pleased at the prospect of introducing that little elephant into the House of Commons here. And the Prime Minister is not as bold as the Minister of Public Works, far from it. He was not taken greatly with the scheme. It seems that the Prime Minister of Quebec asked the hon. Minister of Public Works: "Will you appoint three judges in conformity with my law if I do something for the reform of the Senate," and it seems, if the rumour is true, that the hon. Minister of Public Works said: "Yes, if you do something, we will see about the appointment of the judges." If this is true or false, temptations have been offered any way. Is it not time that we should know whether we have provincial autonomy in this country or not? Mr. Marchand had a member get up in the House, the hon. member for the St. James Division of Montreal, and ask the Prime Minister of Quebec a question, and the Prime Minister said: "Yes," that he thought under the circumstances the Senate might be reformed. And after that satisfaction was given, the private car came back with the Minister of Public Works, accompanied by the Prime Minister of Canada. They went to Nova Scotia. Well, now, my hon. friend from Nova Scotia (Mr. Fielding) knows that they have a Legislative Council in his province. Why do they not get rid of their Legislative Council, when they have that immense majority, before they commence to ask for the demolition of the Senate of Canada? It shows that it is not the work of statesmen, but that it is the work of men who have not been accustomed to rule, and who will not rule for a very long time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Does my hon. friend know the facts about Nova Scotia?

Mr. BERGERON. Has the hon. gentleman anything to say about them?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Government of Nova Scotia did attempt to get rid of the Legislative Council of that province; a petition was sent to Her Majesty's Government, and the Government did everything they could to bring about that result. That is the answer to the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not know that it is true, but will the hon. gentleman, since he is so kind as to discuss the matter with me, tell me that he did not appoint somebody pledged to vote against the abolition of the Council?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, a number of gentlemen who promised to vote for abolition failed to do so, and a number of gentlemen who were appointed by the Conservative Government under exactly the same conditions, did the same thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition say "hear, hear?"

Mr. BERGERON. I think all this goes to show the absurdity of the thing. We have one or two provinces; we have the same thing in Quebec, and we have the very same thing in Nova Scotia. It shows to my right hon. friend that whoever has given him the scheme has deceived him, and did not explain the whole thing to him. My hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Madore) does not believe, like my hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), that it would be better for the country to abolish the Senate altogether. The hon. member for Hochelaga said, no. We saw he said, in France, not long ago, a great conference between the House of Representatives and the members of the Senate to choose a President of France. There is no parallel in this. We have here a conference between the Senate and the House of Commons in the proper way as they have in England, and the only guarantee of the usefulness of the Senate is to keep it as it is to-day. Of course there may be some details. My right hon. friend might say to me: "But have you always paid a great deal of attention to appointments to the Senate?" There may have been appointments to the Senate of gentlemen who were not qualified to go into that House. That is the idea we had of it. I side immediately with my hon. friend in a statement of that kind. I remember one year he spoke of a gentleman, in the Senate, as being entirely too old to do any work. He made an appointment not long ago of a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of esteem, but who is over 80 years of age.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). About the same age as your leader.

Mr. BERGERON. My leader carried a county any way; my leader has been elected, and my leader can meet my hon. friend on any hustings in Nova Scotia.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). So can the other gentleman.

Mr. BERGERON. What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). All I have to say is, that so can the gentleman who has been appointed to the Senate, meet any hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia just as ably as the leader of the Opposition, but the leader of the Opposition was in the position that he had a hived constituency and he was returned.

Mr. BERGERON. I am ready to accept what the hon. gentleman has said about the hon. senator, against whom I have nothing to say, but I was simply answering what the right hon. leader of the Government has said speaking about the age of senators. I say that you are not in power two years until you appoint an older man than ever the Conservatives appointed. I am very glad to hear that the hon. senator is such a power on the hustings, because the right hon. gentleman will need him in his next election in Nova Scotia. Now, take up another of the promises of the hon. gentlemen. It is most extraordinary how they made promises to the country which they failed to fulfil while they stuck to the promises which they made to themselves. In regard to the promises of the plebiscite my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) said in Valleyfield at a public meeting, speaking as a member of the Government, that this subject was brought into the convention when the people were tired, when they were all going away, and that some crank got up and said: "We must have something about prohibition, because there is an element in favour of prohibition and we must get that element in the elections." The right hon. leader of the Government says: "We did not promise that to the country; we promised it to the Liberal party." There was a discussion; some said that it would be better to have prohibition; the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said it would be better to have prohibition; the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) would have been in favour of prohibition, but my right hon. friend was not, and I congratulate him on that. These hon. gentlemen said: "Yes, as soon as we are in power we shall have a plebiscite," although there is nothing in the whole history of England to show that there ever was a referendum of that sort. It is due to the so-called Liberal Government of Canada to-day, a thing which is un-British, to unload from their shoulders their responsibility, to hide themselves behind the fence, and say to the people: "There is $250,000; fight among yourselves," not intending to be honest with the people of the country or to grant them whatever they would choose. The honest prohibitionists of this country—I use the word "honest," because there are a great many who would put party before their convictions—the right hon. gentleman had no reason to give them a plebiscite because he had them any way, but the honest prohibitionists who believed sincerely in prohibition, will resent the position in which the hon. gentleman has placed them. Until the time of the vote, I had the impression—I may be right, and I am going to say it any way, hon. gentlemen will know whether it is true or not—that they were going to have an election before the vote, that they never intended to have a day set apart for the plebiscite vote, but that they had it in their mind to have a general election that would have been a great boon to carry the prohibitionists of this country. However, something happened, I do not know what; they had to have a day set apart, and the 29th of September was named, and when it was decided there was great trouble in the camp. Some people said: Prohibition will carry, and they were right; while friends of the Government said: We will do our best to prevent it from being carried. And so, my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) went through the province of Quebec doing everything they could against prohibition, and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) went to his county and used all his force and influence to get his people to vote against it. At that time in Montreal, anti-prohibition literature was distributed, and in some of the wine store windows, pictures were exhibited showing how the farmer would be taxed under prohibition. I was told that this literature and these pictures came from Ottawa, so that it looked as if an election fund was at the back of it.

Well, the majority voted in favour of prohibition and the answer of the Prime Minister to them now is, that the vote is too small. I repeat that my right hon. friend will not get out of it that way; the sincere prohibitionists of Canada will reckon with him when he appeals to the electorate.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, of what this Government has not done for the country, and it might be well for a moment to review what they have done. The scheme of the Postmaster General has been carried out, and we have the penny postage. But we have at the same time an inefficient mail service, and we also have petitions from the letter carriers all over Canada complaining that they are underpaid. I believe in the political economy that has the expenditure compensated by revenue, and that is a theory also held by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on many occasions. But, after all, what great benefit is it to give to the merchants and the wealthy classes who write letters, the privilege of paying only 2 cents, when the farmers and workingmen who hardly write a dozen letters a year each, will have to pay up the deficit which will accrue in the Post Office Department. It is all very well for the Postmaster General to say that he has diminished the post office deficit of former years; but how has he done it? He has done it by starving the mail carriers, and if you take the report of the department it would astonish you to see for what small sums the mails are carried. From a political point of view I do not complain of that, because it will be so many votes against the Government; but as a matter of political economy, the principle is bad, and I cannot offer my congratulations to the Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). They are not obliged to carry the mails; they are all doing it voluntarily.

Mr. BERGERON. They are not obliged to, and if the statement of the hon. gentleman for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) be correct, they certainly are not obliged to, because the mails are not carried at all in the North-west. Another thing which the Liberal Government have done for the country is to pass an alien labour law, but there they rested, and they have resolved not to enforce that law. The law is on the Statute-book all right, but it is a dead-letter, although there are gentlemen throughout the country in all the large cities having salaries from $500 upwards and their travelling expenses, to enforce a law which they actually are not allowed to enforce. There are American workingmen in Montreal in reference to whom Mr. Keyes, acting for the Department of Justice, has reported, and the department has not acted upon his report. On the other hand, there are Canadian workingmen in Montreal to-day who cannot earn a cent, while American citizens are earning a living there. Some of these men employed by the Government came here and said to the Minister of Justice : What is the use of having a law if you do not enforce it, and the Minister of Justice replied : Never mind ; the law is there and it serves to frighten the American labourers. Well, the Minister of Justice is mistaken about that, for the American labourers know that the law will not be operated, and they are perfectly satisfied. The Prime Minister has told us that another great thing he has done for the country is to give us cold storage. Well, as the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) explained the other night, cold storage was there when the Liberals came into power and they simply continued it. When these hon. gentlemen opposite were in Opposition we heard them thundering against the granting of subsidies to railways. Have they put a stop to that policy ? In 1896, they were fresh from the people, they had some sense of the responsibility of carrying out their pledges and they did stop the subsidies, but they soon forgot their virtue, and in 1897, they granted subsidies to 32 roads which had been promised subsidies by the previous Administration, and which these very gentlemen condemned when in Opposition. They tell us as an excuse, that they were obliged to carry out the promises of the previous Government, they are strong in that argument ; but, Sir, not only did they carry out the promises of the previous Administration in that respect, but they actually granted to eight new railroads, subsidies to the tune of over $2,000,000. So it is with the public works of the country. They claim they had to carry out the works of the previous Government, but as a matter of fact most of the contracts were let and seven-eighths of them were finished when they came into power. Again, let me ask : Why is this Government so fond of giving out work and sending contracts to the United States. Why are they getting railway cars built in the United States instead of having them built in Canada by Canadian workmen ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Because the Canadian car shops are busy and have all the work they can do.

Mr. BERGERON. That was stated in the newspapers last fall and denied on the best authority. There are plenty of workmen in Canada to build those cars, but there is an object in sending the work to the United States, and that object will come out some day. There is an object in view in sending to the United States over $200,000 for cars which could be built by Canadian workmen in Canada, and the Canadian workmen will remember this when the Government goes before the country. Why did the Government send to Chicago to have the map of the North-west made ? Was there nobody in Canada who could do that work ? And why in that map, did the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) allow the United States all the Alaskan territory which they claimed ? How is it that the old rifles were sold into the United States, and sold without tender ?

Mr. BERGERON.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, probably my right hon. friend does not know it, but I repeat again, and I will prove it, that these rifles were sold in the United States without tender. If that had been done by a Conservative Administration, would we not have heard the voice of my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), and the voice of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) ringing out in denunciation. How these walls would have trembled at the sound of their voices, if they had found out that 3,450 Enfield rifles were sold at 25 cents each ; that 1,572 Peabody rifles were sold at 25 cents each ; that 70 Spencer rifles were sold at 25 cents ; and that 219 Winchester rifles were sold at $1.50. These have been sold without tender to the United States, and this is what I find in the Auditor General's Report. Mr. McDougall writes to the Department of Militia and Defence as follows :—

Audit Office, Ottawa, June 28, 1898.

Sir,—On the February return of the Director of Stores, there is entered a sale of rifles to Hartiey & Graham, of New York, as follows :—

He then gives the figures I have read, and goes on :

No vouchers in connection with this sale have been furnished. Please forward them. In the meantime, I have to inquire if these rifles were examined and condemned by a board of examiners, and if the sale was advertised and held by auction, or by tender.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. L. McDUGALL, A.G.

The Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

An hon. MEMBER. Is there an answer ?

Mr. BERGERON. There is an answer.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it.

Mr. BERGERON :

Department of Militia and Defence,

Ottawa, July 7, 1899.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 28th ult., re sale of condemned stores, I have the honour to inform you that the rifles referred to were obsolete and condemned as unfit for service by the annual boards of survey from year to year. They were altogether unfit for the present requirements of the militia. The sale was not by auction, but by private tender, by order of the Hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence. There are no vouchers in the case.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

B. SULTE,

Acting D. M. of M. & D.

The Auditor General.

Now, Sir, how is this ? Is there not a concurrence of desire on the part of the Department of Railways and Canals, the Department of the Interior and the Department of Militia and Defence to have dealings with the United States ? There is something under that ; it is not natural. I suppose that before the session is over we shall know more about it.

Now, Sir, we have had immigration, and what kind of immigration have we had? I remember, when my friends from the province of Quebec were in Opposition, the great speeches they used to make in that province against the Government of the country spending money to bring in strangers instead of inviting our compatriots in the United States to come to Canada. Well, Sir, they are in power now, and what kind of immigrants do they bring into the country? Doukhobors, Galicians—people who sell their wives, as I saw the other day in the newspapers. And, Sir, where are the Canadians who have been brought into this country by the present Administration? We have an army of agents in Europe, and what are they doing? I do not see any immigration from the civilized countries of Europe.

Mr. SPROULE. They are drawing their salaries.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that the reason why they have been appointed? If it is, it is very good for the Government, but it will be a bad thing for the people of this country. I see in a paper of Wednesday—I think this was read in the House the other day.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it again.

Mr. BERGERON. I will. The hon. gentleman need not be so anxious—he will get a great deal more than that:

This is the season for the annual migration of Canadians to the United States, and dozens of them pass through Bangor on every train from the east. Within the last few days the second-class travel has been exceedingly heavy, but on Tuesday all records were broken, when 120 men, women and children, from all parts of the lower provinces, arrived here in two cars. Their stay was short on account of the lateness of the train, and they were in Bangor only for the brief time occupied in switching the cars from one train to the other.

Yet hon. gentlemen opposite have put it in the mouth of the Governor General of Canada to boast that the exodus has ceased. While they are bringing into the country at great expense Doukhobors and Galicians, they are not only doing nothing for our compatriots on the other side of the line, but they are doing nothing to bring a good immigration from England, Ireland and Scotland.

We lack something else; we have no fast line. How is that? I heard my right hon. friend the other day saying that we have no fast line, but that he hopes we may. If the hon. gentleman had accepted the scheme which the chief of the present Opposition had left in his hands when he took power, we would to-day be enjoying the benefits of a fast line. Look at what all Canada has lost in three years by not having a fast line of steamers. Great Britain is our natural market, and the sooner we make arrangements for sending our products to our natural market, the better off this country will be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another matter which I will only touch upon in passing, because it has been discussed thoroughly by other speakers; that is, the accusations made against the Yukon officials. I will not say more about that, because it has been thoroughly discussed; but I ask the Government—and it seems to me that I am putting a question which the electors of this country would put if they were here—how it is that they have allowed these accusations to be thrown in their faces in Parliament, and have persisted in refusing an investigation by a royal commission? Not only have these accusations been brought into this House, but they have been heard on the streets of Montreal for the last three months—the same accusations which have been made in the speeches of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior). And yet the Government of Canada sit there shielding those officials, and saying in a way that does not command respect: "Bring your accusations, and we will act." They have had accusations enough if they are serious, and if they do not give what the Opposition has been asking for in the name of this country, they will be accused of shielding the faults of the officials.

The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) finished his speech this afternoon by referring to the by-elections. He said: "What is the use of talking?—this Government has the sanction of the electorate, because they carry every by-election." I said this afternoon that they had to bring the Minister of Public Works even to Ontario to carry the by-elections. Why do they do it? Because the Minister of Public Works, when he goes into a county, will in the least time possible find out where the bad element in that county is, and he will work that element for all it is worth; and there is a bad element in almost every county except my own, because the hon. gentleman came there in December last and tried to beat my colleague for the local House, but he could not. The Minister of Public Works has the fighting brigades in Ontario and Quebec. I am told that the brigade is already acting in Brockville, although the nomination is not yet made. Besides that, they make continually in the province from which I come, their appeals to prejudices. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has been doing that all his life, as I shall show before I take my seat, and he has taught that practice to those with whom he works in the province of Quebec. They appeal to the electorate in Quebec to support the right hon. First Minister because he is a French-speaking gentleman. They appeal to that electorate to keep in power at any cost a man from that province. Our people, Mr. Speaker, are of French descent, and apt to be carried by sentiment, and those who work that cry amongst them are aware of that fact very well, and play upon that sentiment to their best advantage. What did they do in 1896? I see some gentlemen in this House to-night who addressed from the hustings the electorate of that province, and what would you believe was the cry they resorted to? They told the people that the leader of the then Government had bought $3,000,000 worth of rifles, which he was going to put into the hands of Canadians, and send them off to South Africa, there to defend the British Empire. Men of intelligence, professional men, who made such dishonest sectional appeals on the hustings in order to excite those people against the Liberal-Conservative Government; they said to their compatriots: If you keep in power an English Protestant, your sons will have to go under the hot sun of Africa and there defend the British Empire; but if you put in the French Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, he will not allow your sons to be sent away to fight for England, because he is a French Canadian. How can you expect to fight a fair political fight in a province where such appeals gain credence? Has that policy been changed? Why, the other day, my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) spoke of a controversy we had in Montreal concerning the Bagot election. I have something to say about that election. My hon. friend read a letter which he wrote to the Montreal "Gazette," contradicting a report which appeared in that paper, of the speeches at the nomination at Bagot. At that nomination, where I had the honour of meeting my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson), and where there were about ten or twelve members of Parliament present, I replied to the hon. member for Gaspé, and I wish to read to the House the "Gazette" report, because I know that if the hon. member for Gaspé were here, and I were to say that he used such and such language, he would deny having used it, and you, Mr. Speaker, would ask me to take it back. I have been too long in that Chair, Sir, to expose myself to that result, but I will take another means of getting at the truth. I shall read the report in the "Gazette," and leave the House to judge for themselves. That report is as follows:—

Mr. Lemieux, M.P., made a very eloquent oration. He claimed for Sir Wilfrid Laurier that he had settled the Manitoba school question to the satisfaction of the Pope and the bishops. He also spoke of Sir Charles Tupper being a Protestant, and asked his hearers if they would vote for him against Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a French Canadian, who had made so imposing a figure at the London Jubilee proceedings, and who was now at Washington winning the admiration of all.

That is not what my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) has told this House he did say.

An hon. MEMBER. What date was that?

Mr. BERGERON.

Mr. BERGERON. The 8th of December last. I followed Mr. Lemieux on that occasion, and I shall read to the House what I did say, and leave the House to judge from what I said, whether the hon. member for Gaspé used the language attributed to him, or not.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member must accept the statement made by the hon. member for Gaspé, and not contradict it, directly or indirectly, whether by reading the reports of newspapers, or in any other way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to a question of order, Mr. Speaker. I think, on reflection, you will find it is impossible to carry on legitimate, fair discussion in this House, if an hon. gentleman is not allowed to read a report by a reporter of a public meeting, and let it go for whatever it may be worth. The hon. member may say that that report is inaccurate, but, in my judgment, no fair debate can be carried on in this House, if you, Sir, undertake to prevent the report of a public meeting by an independent journalist being read, and the hon. gentleman who has the floor is simply now proceeding to read what he himself said. It will then be left to the hon. gentleman concerned, or anybody else, to explain that the report is inaccurate; but to rule that the facts cannot be submitted to the House is to take a position which I am sure you, Sir, will not, on reflection, insist on adopting.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I may be mistaken, but the position I take is this, and I think it is one which is in accord with the rules of the House—that when a member of this House has made a statement from his place, as I believe the hon. member for Gaspé did, no other hon. gentleman has the right to dispute or contradict it by reading newspaper reports or otherwise.

Mr. TISDALE. May I be allowed to suggest that the contradiction was made on another occasion altogether. The hon. member for Gaspé has not made the contradiction in this discussion, and he can only do so by referring to it when he is present at some future time. The rule only applies to the present discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, because the hon. member for Gaspé did, in this debate, declare positively that he never made the statement attributed to him, and I think it is only fair that we should, under the rules of the House, accept his denial.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If you will allow me, Sir, that will not preclude the hon. gentleman who has the floor, from reading a report of what he himself has said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I assume that the hon. gentleman accepts the statement made by the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. BERGERON. I said, a moment ago, that I would not tell the House myself what I heard the hon. member for Gaspé say, because I know he has already denied it, and would do so again, and I would be obliged to accept his denial. I am simply reading a report in a newspaper, from which the House can draw its own inference as to whether the hon. gentleman did say what was attributed to him or not. Besides, I am not reading what was said by the hon. member for Gaspé, but what I said myself, and, until I contradict myself, I should be allowed to go on reading what I did say. The report reads thus:

Mr. Bergeron, M.P., who followed Mr. Lemieux, referred to the latter's appeal for votes for Sir Wilfrid Laurier on account of his being a French Canadian, an appeal that had also been made by less important speakers in other parts of the constituency. Would Mr. Lemieux, a member of Parliament, he asked, dare to use such language in the maritime provinces? Such appeals were to be condemned. Mr. Bergeron also spoke of the Manitoba school question.

I read this, because the day before I had met, in a parish called St. Nazaire, at a meeting there, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, together with some nice, respectable young fellows from Montreal, and there heard similar appeals. When I say, young men, I mean men who are not members of Parliament, but who are old enough to be in the House. These men made most fervent appeals to the electors to vote for the Prime Minister on account of his creed and nationality, but not on any political ground. I then said to myself: These men are not responsible; and I never thought for a moment that the people would accept their statements seriously. But the case was different when a member of Parliament spoke, for he would feel the responsibility of his position, and the people would be more disposed to accept his statements as accurate. Therefore, the following day, when I heard the hon. member for Gaspé use similar language, I asked him, how he dared repeat appeals made by irresponsible young men; and I leave it to the House to judge whether the hon. gentleman spoke the truth, when he disclaimed having made any such appeal.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not the right to go so far. He should accept the statement of the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. BERGERON. I am doing that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. But the hon. gentleman is proceeding to make some remarks which would leave the House to infer that he does not accept the declaration made by the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. BERGERON. I desire to be well understood. I accept the statement of my hon. friend from Gaspé, because I am obliged to do so, but I have read the report to the House, and the House and the public can judge which version is correct. Now, the other day—and I shall finish very soon—the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) spoke, and declared that if there was an election in Quebec to-morrow not ten Conservatives would be returned. That is very important.

An hon. MEMBER. Five.

Mr. BERGERON. I think the hon. member for Bellechasse said ten. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), speaking in West Huron the other day, said if there was an election in Quebec there would not be five of us returned. I do not know who are the five fortunate ones who would come back. I am glad that the hon. member for Bellechasse is more generous to us. It is true they are carrying by-elections in Quebec, but they are carrying them by appeal to national prejudice. And, if they carry on the general election as they carried on the plebiscite in Quebec in September last, I can see that there would be danger for a great many of us. You, Mr. Speaker, will remember, though some members of the House do not, that there has been ballot stuffing in Quebec before. The ballot system was invented by the Liberals, and they were the first to learn how to work it. In 1878, in the county of Jacques Cartier, represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), in the parish of St. Anne, the Hon. Mr. Laflamme, then the Minister of Justice—would you believe it? the Minister of Justice!—had a poll where the returning officer, clerks and other employees about the poll, appointed by the Government of which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was a member, were combined to rob the Conservative party of that election. This, I believe, affords us an explanation of what the hon. Minister of Public Works has said: If they have recourse to the same tricks there is no doubt they can carry Quebec. If the hon. leader of the Opposition comes into Quebec, as he has said he would, we shall every one feel honoured to accompany him from county to county—I have confidence in my compatriots that they will choose honestly between what is good for the country and what is bad for the country. The hon. Minister of Public Works told us the other day, in his speech, which I had not the pleasure of hearing, but which I have read, that if the leader of the Opposition would come into Quebec he would be listened to with all courtesy that is due to a man in his position. Yes, but the hon. Minister of Public Works will not meet the leader of the Opposition on the public platform any more than he will meet us. He will not meet us face to face upon the hustings and defend the position of his Government. In December last he spoke in Beauharnois, about three acres away from where we were holding a meeting, but he would not come to our meeting. I can tell the hon. leader of the Opposition that the hon. Minister will not meet him.

If he should come, however, it might be dangerous, if he used the instruments that he used once, when the workmen of the Intercolonial were assembled with crowbars to defeat and kill their opponents at Ste. Hénédine in 1886. But I repeat that if the electorate of Quebec are left free to decide, the predictions of the Minister of Public Works will not be realized. Now, I must bring my remarks to a close. In closing let me say that the party of my right hon. friend never had any policy, and they have not been in the past and they are not now sincere in what they call their policy; and they have shown, since they obtained power a lack of patriotism which could not be expected of them from their official declarations when in Opposition. My right hon. friend wanted power. That is a legitimate ambition for a man who has been in politics for a long time. But, Sir, if you wish to be well received in a house, always come in by the front door. My hon. friend had tried different ways of getting into power, and had favoured various policies, but he had not succeeded. He used the school question to obtain power. He was dragged into that, I am sure, by the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works has been the fatal man, and will be yet. I want to prove what I say, that my right hon. friend is not the master; and I am going to give two examples. I am sorry that the case is as it is, for in private life I have great esteem for the right hon. gentleman. But this is politics. Last session we saw the Prime Minister in a most humiliating position for a man occupying so high a place. He came to the House and laid upon the Table a telegram from the High Commissioner. At the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition, who asked: Where is the despatch which has provoked that answer? The Prime Minister said: I have not it here, but I will bring it to the hon. gentleman tomorrow. Next day when he came into the House and was asked where the despatch was, he rose and said it was a confidential despatch. Did he know that before? Or did he not? My impression is that he did not know. Because I cannot reconcile knowledge on his part with the promise he made. What I believe to be true is that he had never seen the despatch, but it had been sent by some of his colleagues without his knowledge. That was a humiliating position for the right hon. gentleman. But what took place the other night? When the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper) was speaking and it was understood, as it was explained by the end of the sitting, that the whips had come to an agreement to adjourn at six o'clock, and the right hon. gentleman said that the leader of the Opposition was right in saying they had come to an agreement themselves, that probably at six o'clock the House would adjourn; but he said, in these matters "we are in the hands of the House." In the hands of whom? Of two or three gentlemen near him, who shouted, "Go on! go on!" The Prime Minister said, and he could hardly help laughing: If I had known the hon. member for Pictou would speak up to 12 o'clock, I would have proposed to adjourn at six. Is he the master of his party or not? Does he rule the House or does he not? He does not. Who is the master? The Minister of Public Works. Why, the Minister of Public Works does not deny it. The other day when the hon. member for Pictou was calling upon the matter of the Administration to speak, the Minister of Public Works answered immediately. It is very true he did it by surprise, but it was done. In Valleyfield, at a dinner he gave himself there—it was attended by about 250 men from Montreal and thirty-five from Beauharnois—he told the manufacturers that they should have protection. "I promise you that you shall have protection," he said. "I." It was stated in "La Patrie" that the hon. Minister of Public Works was in Montreal and had been conferring with the Grand Trunk Railway regarding some railway deals. "I" had done so and so—not the Minister of Railways and Canals, but the Minister of Public Works. He is the doctor of the Administration; he is the magician. When anything goes wrong, the Prime Minister puts the case in the hands of the master, and the master diagnoses the case. Now, let us take some of his cases. Was it not a most extraordinary operation to make the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) swallow the protection policy? Well, he would not do it in 1896—he would not listen to it. And the Prime Minister put the case into the hands of the master. The Minister of Public Works, who does not lack talent, found out where the weakness of the Minister of Trade and Commerce was.

What happened? Of course we were not present at the operation, but the other day an hon. gentleman showed that about 10 members of the Cartwright family are drawing money out of the public chest, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has swallowed the protective policy. There is no doubt that my hon. friend the Postmaster General could not view with equanimity the appointment of all these members of Parliament to positions under the Crown. I have always taken the Postmaster General for an honest man. Well, there was an operation performed there. He was put into the hands of the doctor of the Administration. The doctor knew where the weakness was. So his colleagues told him: You can go on and do anything you like with the post offices of the country; if you succeed in obtaining a medal or something like that, we will be content. But don't bother us about the rest. And so he swallowed the protective policy, and the appointments of all the members of Parliament since 1897. It would take me too long to try the case of every one of the Ministers. But my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) spoke the other day about the Minister of Public Works. Mr. Speaker, it is very unpleasant for me to say what I have to say now; I would rather somebody else did it, but as no one else will undertake it, I must take up the task. After all, the Minister of Public Works has not been very kind to our friends in the past. He showed no kindness to the man who was his friend and protector, Sir Hector Langevin. He showed no kindness to the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, whom he sent first to jail and then to his grave. I am sorry to have to say these things, but the chickens of the hon. Minister of Public Works are coming home to roost. What is his career? My hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) said he had contaminated everybody by his touch. My hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) took occasion to warn the right hon. Premier of what he might expect in the future. But my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) does not know everybody. He forgot to speak about Sir Adolphe Chapleau, who also became contaminated, and died from it. More than that, there was a man who joined the Minister of Public Works in his office as notary. He had the reputation of being an honest man, but he became a thief, and has gone over to the States, he became contaminated. Now the things I am going to say have been published in book form. I mention the fact, because it would take me too long to quote them all to the House.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the book worth?

Mr. BERGERON. They sold very well at the time. The Minister of Public Works, when he lived in Quebec, was protected by Sir Hector Langevin—he will not deny that. I am going to say something now to which I draw the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The Minister of Inland Revenue was Premier of Quebec in 1878. We have heard the Minister of Public Works talk about exciting racial and religious animosities. Sir, there has never been a man in this country so able to handle those questions as he has done. In 1878 when the present Minister of Inland Revenue was Prime Minister of the province of Quebec—we all know that he is a Protestant—some of the most violent articles were written against him by the Minister of Public Works in the "Canadien" at that time, because he was a Protestant. To such an extent did the Minister of Public Works carry his attacks, that when Sir Adolphe Chapleau became Premier of Quebec, in 1879, the present Minister of Public Works expected to be taken into the Government, but Sir Adolphe Chapleau could not take him into the Government, because he knew well that if he did so he could not carry a Protestant seat in the whole province of Quebec. These things have been forgotten, but they are all consigned in the "Canadien" of 1878, and which can be found in the Library, and any hon. gentleman who wants to read them will be edified by doing so, because they are well written. Well, later on the Minister of Public Works got angry at Mr. Chapleau because Mr. Chapleau would not take him into his Government. I am giving only one of the reasons, but there were many others. No Conservative Prime Minister would ever think of taking the Minister of Public Works into his Government, he had to wait for a Liberal Administration to do that. He got angry at Mr. Chapleau, and he wrote Sir Hector Langevin four very nice letters in which he assured him of his great devotion and calls him an honest man. Sir Hector Langevin, he says, is an honest man, but Mr. Chapleau is losing himself with the Liberals, he is becoming a terrible Liberal. There are four letters like that. Did Sir Hector Langevin believe in the sincerity of the man? I do not know, we could ask him, because he is still alive. But in 1882, when Mr. Chapleau was legislating to sell the North Shore Railway in the local House, the Minister of Public Works was sitting on the floor of the House. He had not offered for re-election, and was then there in his capacity of journalist. He was writing at that time against Mr. Chapleau and his government with all his strength. Mr. Chapleau, in a memorable speech delivered on that occasion, pointing his finger at the Minister of Public Works, spoke of him as a journalist, an ex-member of the House, who had been a perjurer to his mandate. Now I mention these things to show how it is that later on, in 1897, a letter was lost which showed poor Sir Adolphe Chapleau in very bad colours. It was a sequel of what had taken place in 1882. It shows that the Minister of Public Works does not forget. Well, that was in 1882. How long did it last? Mr. Senecal took the Minister of Public Works to Europe in the fall of 1882, and brought him back here as blue as ever he had been before. I was present at the arrival of the party and saw Mr. Chapleau and Mr. Senecal shake hands. When Mr. Chapleau heard of the arrival of the Minister of Public Works, he said to Mr. Senecal: "Did you bring that viper here?" And Senecal answered: "Go on, go on. He has certain talents, let us use him." The Minister of Public Works went on until 1885, when he came on to the Champ Mars and spoke against the hanging of Riel. How long did that last? Three days. He and Sir Adolphe Caron took a promenade down to Charlesbourg. What happened? I do not know, but one of the two was converted; it was not Sir Adolphe Caron, but it was the other. There are ugly rumours about that; I will not mention them at present, in case I may have provocation to do so at another time. Then came the elections of 1887; after that, took place in 1891, the elections, accompanied by all the corruption of which we have heard so much. Who was at the bottom of it? The Minister of Public Works. That hon. gentleman was up to his elbows in that heap of corruption that we heard of afterwards before an investigating committee, along with Mr. Thomas McGreevy, and probably Mr. Connolly, whose name was mentioned afterwards in the investigation of those who were accused. But the Minister of Public Works was at the bottom of it.

He was at the bottom of it, and he was their accuser. He was fed by Mr. McGreevy. It is written in this book. I am only repeating what I have read here. We all know this; it is the history of this House. He brought him before a committee, had him chased from the House, jailed him, and afterwards brought him to his grave. Now, I do not know, but it seems to me, that the Minister of Public Works must have dreams sometimes when he thinks of the past. He has become rich: I think at one time he was worth about $100,000, which, for a poor man, is pretty good. How long did it last? This the hon. gentleman obtained from cleverness in politics and in municipal affairs. It did not last long; it was all lost. Then he came here. I remember hearing the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) say once, upon the hustings, and I do not know but that he said it here, that he had to choose one day between going to the penitentiary and coming here, and he chose to come here, and he came here. In 1892, the Minister who is now the ruler of the great Liberal party in Canada wanted to come back to us. Judge Oulmet, who was then the Minister of Public Works, told us—a good many of our friends said—"you should take him back; a man is a man." But Mr. Ouimet said: "No, I would rather have him go to the other side; it costs too much to keep him." The hon. gentleman went to the conference upon the other side, and said in that conference a great many things which have been making my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) grow enthusiastic. There was a case in Montreal in which the Minister of Public Works declared that in 1896 he was a bankrupt. He was in spite of that statement, taken into the Government, and became the master of the Liberal party. I do not think anything like that could be done in England, and yet my right hon. friend always insists on being a Liberal of the English school. The hon. gentleman became the Minister of Public Works; the department where Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, who was known to be an honest man, said that he had to rest upon his arms to prevent his own friends from getting into the coffers. To-day nobody need apply. The Minister of Public Works can do the work himself. Sir, he betrayed Mr. Chapleau, afterwards, so that there might be no one exempted. Sir Adolphe Chapleau, unfortunately, through sickness, was not the same man that he had been in former days, and his premature death showed that he was already very sick when he fell into the hands of the Minister of Public Works, whom he despised. I knew Sir Adolphe Chapleau very well: he was not a man to hate; he could not hate, but he could despise, and I do not think he ever despised a man as much as he did that hon. gentleman. He fell into his hands and he died of it. Then we had the Drummond deal. The Minister of Public Works bought "La Patrie," and has got it to-day. I venture to say nobody would get "La Patrie" for less than $100,000. The Minister of Public Works has made contracts without tender right along. The papers announced in Montreal the other day that he had bought a house worth about $8,000 or $9,000. He is fanning the flame of race and religion. The other day his paper asked the people to take the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) into consideration. This is what his paper, his organ, says:

Mr. Monk, the member for Jacques Cartier, an Englishman, who represents a county where the majority is French Canadian, wanted to furnish an element of fanaticism of which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has become the interpreter.

In this way the hon. gentleman makes an appeal to fanaticism. Speaking thus of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, an Englishman. Why did he do that? Because it is in the nature of the hon. gentleman and he cannot do otherwise. We know that in 1876, here in this book again you will find it, that the hon. Minister of Public Works had a controversy with the Archbishop of Quebec because of one of his priests who was becoming too Liberal. After the exchange of a number of letters, the Archbishop, through his secretary, declined to continue the discussion with the hon. gentleman. What did he do? He wrote to Rome at that time, twenty-three years ago, addressing himself to Cardinal Franchi, against the Archbishop of Quebec, saying that the Archbishop was becoming too Liberal, and that it was a shame to have Mr. Langelier, who was then a teacher in Laval University, teaching Liberal ideas to the young men who were attending that institution. I said in my remarks before that he had done more than anybody else to inflame Quebec against the Conservative party and against the Orangemen of Ontario, as he calls them on the school question. Afterwards, when he went to make his famous settlement with Manitoba, the man who had written against the Archbishop of Quebec for having become too Liberal declared himself a Catholic "by accident" at Winnipeg. In his speech the other day the Minister of Public Works, who—it is reprehensible, but he cannot help it, it is in his nature—said:

I say that in no part of the British Empire, nor at any time, was such an attempt made at religious coercion, as the one which was made in the province of Quebec in 1896, on behalf, in the interest, and with the knowledge and consent of the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends.

He knows that is not true? Why mention that? Is he going to keep up this race and religious question, which we should abolish as much as possible, for the welfare of this country? He says that the French habitant stood up to the mark like a man; he was not coerced. Imagine the French habitant, as he calls him, being coerced. Ask any habitant in Quebec if he had been coerced; the man would smile. It was not tried upon him, and he would not allow it.

He was not coerced, but felt that he was a free citizen, and that he had the right to vote just as he pleased, and he voted just as it pleased him to do.

We know that. What is the meaning of this? It would take too long a time to speak of all the deeds and misdeeds of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am afraid that already I may have wearied the House; but I feel it a duty confided to me, as a representative of the people, to state my opinion of the master of the Administration, and to tell the reason why our national affairs are going to the bad. The right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada will, of course, be betrayed some day in the same way as the others have been, and then he will reflect; but in the meantime, if he is not able to carry out the platform of the 1893 convention, nor the promises nor pledges given by his own Government, he can, at least, dissolve this Parliament, he can go to the electors, and give them an opportunity to drive from power the gentlemen who have covered themselves and this country with ridicule. How ridiculous it is for the head of a protectionist Government to wear a Cobden medal. Have not these gentlemen opposite covered themselves with ridicule by going on their knees before the people of the United States to ask a measure of reciprocity which the Prime Minister declared, the other day, the people of Canada did not want any longer? The Prime Minister can appeal to the electorate, and in this way he can stay this country in its headlong descent towards financial ruin, and save us from that national and political dishonour of which we are on the verge.

Mr. ODILON DESMARAIS (St. James, Montreal). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate, which has already been protracted too long, but, I feel constrained to do so, owing to the plentifulness of the speeches we have been treated to, especially by the hon. gentlemen opposite. It seems that this is a year of plentifulness; it is agreed on all hands that we are marching upon the wave of an ever increasing prosperity and that the country is overflowing with money. Now, I presume that our opponents who are well aware of these circumstances, have come to the conclusion that they could well avail themselves of this opportunity to indulge in a somewhat superfluous rhetorical display. The revenue of the country is so flourishing that the hon.

gentlemen did not hesitate to protract the debate for weeks and weeks without taking into consideration the large expenditure entailed by every day of the session. Under the circumstances, I also come to the conclusion that one more speech or one less would make very little difference, and so I made up my mind to take the liberty of offering a few remarks to the House.

I am well aware that there is no novel argument that I could contribute to the debate after three weeks spent in debating the Address, and that it would be a real feat of strength on my part to pretend to offer arguments which have not already been furnished up by the hon. gentleman who spoke before me. Let me, however, reply to a few remarks fallen from the hon. gentlemen opposite during this debate.

I must say, Sir, that it was with some feeling of regret that I listened to some of the remarks fallen from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron), at the conclusion of his speech. The hon. gentleman professes to entertain personally a profound esteem and respect for the Prime Minister and said that if he had attacked him, it was because he felt constrained to do so on political grounds.

I am fully aware that, in politics, one has to go through many an unpleasant ordeal, but that politics could be so construed as to cause one to forget what a gentleman owes to another gentleman is certainly news to me. It has been my misfortune for some twenty-five years to have been entangled in the politics of my native province; but to this very day I had not yet been told that to be a politician, one had to stoop to such meanness. I can easily understand by what motives the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is actuated and why he has no affection to waste upon the hon. member for St. John and Iberville, who occupies the post of Minister of Public Works. I know that from the day when the hon. gentleman was brought within a hair's breadth of his political ruin by the hon. Minister, he never could help dreading his power. From that day out, fear has been preying upon the hon. member for Beauharnois, and that is the explanation of the unfair attacks he keeps directing against the hon. Minister, whenever opportunity offers. But there is no novel feature in the old stock arguments trotted out by the hon. gentleman; all those attacks have been rehashed on almost every hustling throughout the province of Quebec and elsewhere. There are people who, for having committed themselves to statements like those hurled by the hon. gentleman across the floor of this House have been sentenced to jail, but the hon. gentleman, availing himself of his parliamentary immunity, considered it his privilege to override the rules. I would like you to understand, Mr. Speaker, that while protesting against these attacks, I disclaim any intention of coming to the rescue of the hon. Minister of Public Works, who is quite able to take care of himself; but I deemed it my duty to denounce the course of the hon. gentleman, so that he may understand how easily one can venture to tread on such ground and how dangerous it may prove to bring forward accusations of that kind.

The hon. member for Beauharnois told us he was undertaking to enlighten those hon. gentlemen who were sitting here for the first time, and with that object in view, he began by declaring that the hon. Minister of Public Works was the master of the Administration. I may tell him, to use a word borrowed from the English language, that such a threadbare argument is a chestnut. In the eyes of all those who know the men now forming the Cabinet, such an idea is preposterous. To pretend that the Minister of Public Works, despite his well-known ability, is the master of the Administration is, I repeat it, preposterous, more particularly if we bear in mind that the Government boasts of such a leader as the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who has chosen as his colleagues men like the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), and others: men who have played a conspicuous part in politics, who have even been at the head of public affairs in their respective provinces. I repeat it again, for an hon. gentleman to rise in his seat and assert on the floor of the House that the Minister of Public Works is the master of the Administration is such a ridiculous, a preposterous idea that I am at my wit's end to understand how the hon. gentleman could have repeated it on the floor of this House.

I could understand such an assertion being made in some out of the way corner of the country, but that an hon. gentleman should take the liberty to utter such nonsense before a deliberative body like ours, is, to my mind, going beyond all bounds.

The hon. gentleman further told us that the hon. Minister of Public Works had offered himself a dinner, in Valleyfield. Well, I may tell him, that if the hon. Minister offered himself a dinner, his family was quite large, as we were at least several hundred guests around the festive board, and I may also inform him that the Minister was given a warm welcome. I am well aware that the hon. gentleman does not appreciate the visits paid by the Minister of Public Works to his constituency; he is afraid, on good ground too, lest the Minister should spring a mine which might prove fatal to the hon. gentleman from Beauharnois.

Among other regrettable statements fallen from the hon. gentleman, let me briefly refer to the following:—He said that the hon. Minister of Public Works had betrayed everybody; that he had betrayed Sir Hector Langevin, his protector; that he had betrayed poor McGreevy, whom he first sent to jail and then brought to a premature grave. He went so far as to say that the Minister of Public Works had been denounced by Chapleau as a man he held in the utmost contempt. Well, I shall not enter into any lengthened details in this connection. It is unfortunately but too true that party warfare in this country has often been characterized in the past by its violence and its bitterness. But, I ask, is it fair for the people, to withdraw, on that account, their confidence from public men? It may perhaps be pertinent to refer to an instance taken from the history of the party on the other side of the House. I was reading, a few days ago, the long and eloquent speeches of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), when I reached that passage in one of his speeches where he pays such high compliments to our High Commissioner in Great Britain (Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal). While listening, a little while ago, to the remarks of the hon. member for Beauharnois, it occurred to me that history always repeats itself, as the very man whom the leader of the Opposition is now extolling to the skies, was then, in the own words of the leader of the Opposition—if any reliance may be placed on the "Hansard" of 1878, when Lord Strathcona was but plain Mr. Smith—but "a mean treacherous coward." And Sir John A. Macdonald at the same sitting of the House said: "That fellow Smith is the biggest liar I ever met." That did not prevent the same Mr. Smith, a few years later, from coming back to this House and playing an important part in it. That did not prevent him from being appointed High Commissioner to Great Britain and receiving from the Queen the title of Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal.

Supposing that some of our political men had occasionally used offensive language. I do not believe it likely for them to have gone beyond what was said upon the occasion I have just referred to. As to McGreevy, I am at a loss to account for that outburst of sympathy and that display of emotion we have just witnessed on the part of the hon. member for Beauharnois. I do not see how one can sympathise with a man who has plundered the public chest for years, and who was sentenced to jail by the courts of this country, while one can in the meantime behold with tearless eyes a poor father sentenced to jail for stealing a four-pound loaf to prevent his children from starving. I do not see how the hon. Minister of Public Works can fairly be accused of having brought him to a premature grave. I am rather inclined to think that a spark of honesty still lingered in poor McGreevy and that he went down to his grave through the remorse which preyed upon his soul. He had committed a crime in the eyes of the law, and the hon. Minister of Public Works did nothing else but denounce those gigantic frauds. The hon. member for Beauharnois said a moment ago that the hon. Minister of Public Works had once to choose between going to jail or coming here. It is not fair, Sir, for an hon. member thus to travesty and distort facts. What are the facts, Sir? The hon. Minister of Public Works was arrested and prosecuted before the tribunals of the province of Quebec on a charge of conspiracy, for having dared to tell the truth respecting McGreevy and his associates. What the hon. Minister of Public Works did say on the floor of this House was this: "I was returned to this House in order that I might repeat and prove before the Parliament of Canada the charges which I have made, and so as not to allow my cowardly accusers to have me condemned as a slanderer, when I was simply telling the truth." I was astonished that the name of the late Sir Adolphe Chapleau was mentioned in this debate. I was very far from believing that they would drag him from his grave, which has hardly been closed, to impute to him feelings which he never expressed while he was living, as shown by the letter which he wrote to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). What has just been said, compared with the contents of those letters, is surely not calculated to do credit to Mr. Chapleau's memory. If, from his grave, he could have heard the words uttered to-night on the floor of this House by his beloved child, by his dear protégé, well might he have exclaimed: "Alas! ungrateful child! have you also turned a traitor? Why do you thus strike me on the floor of Parliament?"

The hon. member for Beauharnois has viciously attacked the Minister of Public Works and asked how he had grown rich, adding that a few weeks ago the hon. Minister had bought a house in Montreal, for which he had paid $10,000. I shall not undertake to enter here into the private business of the hon. Minister of Public Works; that is no concern of mine, nor does it concern any hon. member of this House. But a charge like that would carry weight with it only in so far as it was brought down in a legal and regular way and not in the cowardly way it was made to-night by the hon. gentleman. I say it with regret, those innuendos forcibly bring back to our memory what was formerly said about Mr. Chapleau, and if I take the liberty to refer here to the matter, it is only to repel those unfair attacks and to show how easy it is to resort to such means. How came it to pass that, after having entered public life a poor man, Mr. Chapleau left at his death a fortune of $300,000, the origin of which is unknown? I am sorry to have been forced to refer to such matters, but when you are dragged along in the mud, no wonder you should bespatter your opponents, when defending yourself.

An attempt has been made to connect the conduct of an unhappy youth with certain acts of the Minister of Public Works, and it was stated that that young man would have been sentenced to jail, had he remained in Canada, instead of crossing over the boundary line. Now, what took place during the electoral contest in Beauharnois a few weeks ago? Were I as unscrupulous as those who, in order to injure the character of the Minister of Public Works, do not hesitate to drag into this debate the name of that young man who went over to the United States, I could refer to the acts of a certain McCaffrey, the very same man who, not so very long ago, boasted in the city of Quebec, of having brought about the defeat of the Liberal candidate in Beauharnois. Was not that very same man brought before the criminal court, under a most serious charge? It is true that he was acquitted; but, I ask, if that man laid himself open to suspicion to the point of being prosecuted before the criminal court, is not such conduct by far more serious than the conduct of the young man who had to go over to the United States, although no direct charge had been brought against him? Did not the hon. gentlemen opposite stump the country and make electioneering speeches, arm in arm with Cornellier and Leblanc, who had also to appear before the criminal court and against whom the grand jury brought in a "true bill"? I agree that those gentlemen were later on acquitted; and if I refer to those matters, it is only to show how dangerous it is to resort to mere suspicions, to injure the character of the Minister of Public Works.

I deeply regret to be compelled to follow the hon. member for Beauharnois on such ground. He said, a moment ago, when referring to the Prime Minister, that it was as a political man that he criticised him, though he entertained esteem for him personally. I may say the same of the hon. member for Beauharnois. We were friends in our youth. Some twenty-five years ago, we used to attend the same college. We made our first political campaign together, and even later on, I might add, that we fought side by side on the hustings of the province of Quebec. It was not I who changed. I might repeat here the words of the man who, at the issue of a trial, where he had been summoned as a witness, remarked to his adversary, when leaving the court-house: "A perjury has certainly been committed by one of us: I do not say it was you that swore against the truth, but surely it was not I." Later on, I shall refer again to this matter of change in political opinions.

As to what was stated by the hon. gentleman, with regard to Sir Hector Langevin, I may say that the Minister of Public Works was not the only one who denounced him, but that others also denounced him, and among the rest, "La Presse," the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite in the province of Quebec, which strongly indicted him. That paper did even publish—Mr. Blanehart was then its editor—a pamphlet which my hon. friend has no doubt in his library, entitled "Le Métier de Ministre," wherein are fully related all the acts of rascality perpetrated by Sir Hector Langevin. That paper is now under the direction of the gentleman who has been entrusted with the organization of the Conservative forces in the province of Quebec.

I think I have said enough on the matter, and I now turn my attention to the Riel question referred to by the hon. gentleman, who said that the Minister of Public Works had changed his mind after a few days. Well, the hon. Minister has been more hasty than the hon. member for Beauharnois, who persevered in his views for several months and even after the elections of 1887. He had full time to reflect. Up to the general elections of 1887, he was under the leadership of the hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who he now says is leading the country to ruin. He ran in Beauharnois for the House of Commons, his opponent being Mr. Philippe Pelletier, now first clerk in the Department of the Secretary of State. In 1887, he was opposed by the Conservative party. His election was contested and it was during that contestation, which was settled, that he changed his views.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him? What he states is of no importance, as it concerns me.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh! oh!

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Of course, if it concerned another gentleman, I would not interfere. Would the hon. gentleman tell me what position I took in 1887? The hon. Prime Minister is in his seat, and he knows the attitude I then took. Could the hon. gentleman tell me whether a single one of his political friends ever came down to work in the interest of my candidature either directly or indirectly during that electoral contest? I only ask the hon. gentleman to give me fair-play.

Mr. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) I cannot say whether the Liberal party did lend their help to the hon. gentleman or not, but I may answer him by putting another question. Could he tell me from which committee came the money which he used in Beauharnois, during that electoral campaign?

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) It costs a candidate but very little money to be elected in my constituency.

Mr. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) I am happy for the sake of the Liberal party to know that it costs them very little money to secure the election of the hon. gentleman. Without going into any further details, let me rapidly review some further issues of general interest in this debate. As I said a moment ago, there was but very little of a novel character that I could find, outside of three or four speeches delivered by gentlemen on both sides of the House. We are all agreed that prosperity prevails throughout Canada. No wonder, as it can no more be denied than the light of the noon-day sun. But the hon. gentlemen say that the Liberal party can take no credit for it, and that we have nothing to do with the measures that have brought about the present prosperous condition of the country. The hon. member for Beauharnois stated that the hon. Prime Minister was a lucky man. If it may be truly asserted that the Prime Minister was born under a lucky star, it may be said that the hon. gentlemen opposite are ill-starred, because during the four last years they were in power, a wave of deep commercial depression swept over the country. That was what induced the electorate who had reason to complain of that condition of affairs, to ask for a change of government.

Up to the time when the hon. Prime Minister came into power, the country was in a state of great depression, and the people, anxious as they were for the return of such prosperity as we are now enjoying, endorsed the policy of the Liberal party, and from that time forward, the electorate have had the change they had been clamouring for.

The hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing perfectly that it would be a thankless task for them to deny the vast improvement that has taken place under the Liberal régime, now undertake to deny the happy position attained by Canada being due to the change of Government. That reminds me of those inventors of machines who can never succeed in setting them in motion, as some piece of mechanism is ever wanting. But another inventor comes up and after adding a wheel to the machine, behold, the machine is set in motion and everything goes well. So it was with Canada, when the Liberal party got into power. Upon coming into office, the Government made such changes as were required by the circumstances, and behold! the machinery is now working so well that, do what you will, nothing henceforth can stop it. The hon. gentlemen would rather the people were unhappy, so that they could come back to power. It is their selfish interests they are seeking to promote rather than the greatness and the happiness of our common country. So long as their ambition is satisfied, they care not what becomes of the country and willingly would they cry out: "Down with prosperity, and let the country go to the dogs! What we want first and last, is to climb back to power."

The hon. gentlemen say they are anxious to go to the country. We are looking forward to that time, they say; and we are awaiting you firmly. We take no interest in by-elections; it is a pitched battle we want." They did venture to engage the contest in some constituencies, but they have been defeated. They have been beaten even in a constituency which, ever since confederation, they had looked upon as one of their strongholds. The Liberal party succeeded in sweeping their majority out of existence in that county, and in seizing upon that Conservative stronghold, and the people gave their verdict in favour of the Government policy. The reason why the hon. gentlemen did not carry that constituency, is that they could no longer buy the electorate with the money supplied by Sir Hugh Allan, McGreevy, etc. It was through those tactics that they formerly used to carry the country.

But they raise the bribery cry. Where is the proof that we bribed the electorate? No, Sir, those elections have been carried without any bribery, and well we may afford to laugh at those braggarts who challenge us to meet them before the people, at the general elections. The elections, as I said, were carried without our having had to resort to bribery and we may fairly come to the conclusion that the people of this country fully endorse the Liberal policy and are thoroughly satisfied with the existing state of affairs.

But they cry out in stentorian tones that we have broken our pledges. A little while ago, I saw the hon. member for Beauharnois holding in his hand a red pamphlet containing the Liberal programme of 1893 and crying out: "I find a great deal of philosophy in this little red book." I agree with him, but the hon. gentleman has not carefully gone through all the contents of that book; or he would not have spoken as he did on the floor of the House. I find in that book, page 33, a fresh indication of the position taken by the Government as to their tariff policy, the hon. Prime Minister, the then leader of the Opposition, in his opening speech at the convention, referring to the Conservative party, said:

They want to reform the tariff and still to retain the principle of protection. I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade. Sir, my loyalty, as I stated, does not ooze from the pores of my body, but I do want to go for an example to the Mother Country, and not to the United States, much as I respect and love the people on the other side of the line. I say the policy should be a policy of free trade, such as they have in England, but I am sorry to say that the circumstances of the country cannot admit, at present, of that policy in its entirety. But I propose to you that from this day henceforward it should be the goal to which we aspire. I propose to you from this day, although we cannot adopt the policy itself, to adopt the principles which regulates it; that is to say, that though it should be your misfortune for many years to come to have to raise a revenue by custom duties, these duties should be levied only in so far as is necessary to carry on the business of the government.

And further down, at the bottom of the page, occur those words:

Their immediate object is protection; ours a tariff for revenue only. Upon this issue we engage the battle from this moment forward and I ask you once more never to desist until we have achieved victory, until we have freed this country from the incubus which has been weighing it down for fifteen long years. Nothing is more difficult—that is one of the evils of protection—than to wipe away protection, because under it interests have been established which every man who has at heart the interest of all classes must take into consideration. It is always easy to increase the tariff, because by so doing you increase the private fortunes of certain individuals, but whenever you decrease the tariff it has always to be done with careful consideration, and I am sure that when the Liberals are in power they will not be indifferent to this primary truth.

Now, what did the leader of the Opposition at that time say? He said that the goal to which we ought to aspire was free trade as it existed in Great Britain; but that it was easier to raise than to cut down the tariff rates; because in raising the tariff rates, you increase the private wealth of certain men, whilst, whenever you cut down the rates, it must be done with careful consideration, so as not to jeopardize the interests of the country.

We have been told that among the Liberals are to be found two parties: one in favour of a moderate protection, and the other in favour of free trade. True, there are in our party men who want to go too fast, while others are too slow. For my part, Sir, I am a free-trader by principle. Such is the conclusion I have come to, from practical experience and from all that has been said on the matter. But it is not to be taken as granted that the views which the hon. leader of the Opposition now entertains and which he expressed on the floor of this House square exactly with the views formerly endorsed by him. The hon. member for Beauharnois told us that he was aiming at enlightening the members who were returned for the first time to the House in 1896. I was anxious also to be enlightened and well informed on the matter and I did not content myself with what he told us here. Allow me to look up the records, with a view to finding what was formerly the policy of the Conservative party. Here is what I find in a speech delivered by Sir George Etienne Cartier, on the 29th of April, 1869:

The policy of extreme protection adopted by the United States resulted in destroying their merchant shipping and their foreign trade as well; but experience will no doubt teach them wisdom. They will do away with the shackles which prevent them from throwing wide open the doors of their country to all foreign nations.

Such were the views entertained by Sir George Etienne Cartier, and, in his opinion, the protective policy could not but prove disastrous to the United States.

While I was in England, I had one day the pleasure of meeting Mr. Bright, one of the champions of free trade, and I informed him as well as other distinguished gentlemen that in Canada we had fewer tariff restrictions than they had in Great Britain.

Which comes to say that Canada was more of a free-trade country than Great Britain itself.

I was enabled to show that with a population of 4,000,000 inhabitants, the Canadian Minister of Finance would be quite satisfied if he could raise $8,000,000 of customs duties, whilst in Great Britain, with a population of 30,000,000 inhabitants, they are raising on commodities 23,000,000 sterling pounds of customs duties in their ports, that is to say, nearly twice as much as Canada, with due proportion.

Thus spoke Sir George Etienne Cartier, and the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot disown those utterances, for, if there is to-day a remnant of the Conservative party, it is because he founded one. That statesman went still further and emphasized his views, at a banquet given on the 23rd of December, 1869 :

The manufacturers often want to be protected beyond measure. Such a proposition is just as preposterous as extreme views on free trade.

Many a time has his statement been quoted :

Under the latter system you are forced to pay to the Government by way of taxation the same duties as before. With unlimited protection, you deal a deadly blow to foreign trade. Go and ask the Americans what they think of it. Let us not commit such a blunder. We have decided to impose a revenue duty which provides at the same time for a sufficient protection, while reserving to ourselves the right of altering those duties as required by circumstances.

Such was the policy of Sir George Etienne Cartier, and to such a policy we wish to return. We share in his views, and we are of the opinion that in matters of political economy, as stated by distinguished writers, logic is not absolutely necessary, and that we ought to be guided by the exigencies and requirements of the times.

In 1874, the Liberal party was brought into power under circumstances which I need not detail here. Then as now, our opponents pretended to be the only men who could bring about the prosperity of the country : because it is understood that when they are at the head of public affairs, the people are bound to be prosperous. Strange to say, what was then looked upon as a political crime has now become a public necessity. We all know under what circumstances they were hurled from power : it was not from not having plundered the public chest and having perpetrated all the offences they lay at the door of their opponents. They lacked honesty.

In the fall of 1873, the Conservative party fell from power, and at the session of 1874, under the Liberal régime, the tariff, which was but a 15 per cent tariff under the Conservative Administration, was raised 2½ per cent by the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright), now the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But perhaps you will hardly believe me, Sir, when I tell you that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who is now an out and out protectionist, who pretends that the country cannot enjoy prosperity outside of the Conservative pale, then maintained that absolute protection was a folly. He then held that the policy announced by the hon. Minister was a protective policy and that the economical system we then had ought not to be disturbed, except on good grounds. He then told the hon. member for Hamilton, Mr. Gordon, that he was perfectly right when he expressed the hope that in the following year, the Government would be able to drive the wedge of protection still deeper. The Minister of Finance, he said, began by telling us that we have a deficit, and the hon. gentleman may rest perfectly satisfied now that he will get all the protection he wants. Here are his very words :

Mr. DESMARAIS.

The honourable member for Hamilton was right when he expressed his gratitude to the free-trade premier for his 2½ per cent protection, and he was perfectly right when he said that next year, with this Government, he would be able to drive the wedge of protection still deeper. The hon. gentleman might rest perfectly satisfied now that he would get all the protection he wanted, since the protectionist Finance Minister had, to secure protection, affirmed that we had a deficit which neither he nor any one else could prove as existing.

But I need not dwell at any greater length upon this matter. As I said, this question has been pretty well threshed out, and I had to look up the records of the hon. gentlemen, so as to go out of the beaten track. Still, I thought it pertinent to show their utter lack of sincerity and that they have been far more inconsistent than their opponents have ever been.

They also tell us : "When you pledged yourselves to the granting of a plebiscite, you thereby led us to believe that you would introduce a Bill and have it carried by the House and that in case it were ratified by the people you would prohibit the manufacture, the importation and the sale of liquor. Those who spoke before me have already dealt with this objection : but, in this connection, I find in the pamphlet of 1893 which hon. gentlemen opposite flourish in the face of this House without ever peeping into its contents an answer to that objection. The hon. Mr. Anglin, speaking in the name of those who were opposed to that measure did not want the resolution under the consideration of the convention to be adopted. That resolution reads as follows :—

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

It was merely the intention to ascertain what was the sense of the country, and nothing else. But I wish more particularly to draw the attention of the House to the statement made by Mr. McKeown, of St. John, N.B. He said :

All the committee asks of the convention here assembled is to declare in favour of the will of the people being expressed upon this subject, and the Liberal party will have lost its liberalism if it is not willing to give the people what they want.

Further on, he says :

But it will certainly be an advancement along the line of liberal ideas to say to the people : We are willing to allow you to express your opinion. And then, if we do not take the matter up a new party will have to be formed.

That was all. All he wanted was to allow the people to express their opinion. Now, from the result of the vote on the plebiscite, can it be assumed that the Government are bound to introduce such a measure ? I say without any hesitation that they are not bound by that vote, but we might adopt the system enforced in the United States, and whenever one of the provinces has voted in favour of prohibition let us grant her such a privilege, without, however, imposing it upon those provinces which do not ask for it.

The hon. gentlemen opposite charge us with having broken our pledges. No, Mr. Speaker, we have not falsified our promises, but we merely suit our policy to the circumstances and to the needs of the people, from an economical standpoint. But is it true, as asserted by the hon. gentlemen, that we have broken our pledges? Is it necessary, I ask, in order to fulfil those pledges, for the Government to disturb the economy of the state to such a degree as to make it impossible for them to extricate themselves from the difficulties resulting from such disturbances? All the Liberal party pledged themselves to do, as I said, was to have a plebiscite taken on prohibition, so as to allow the people to express their opinion on the matter.

Reference was also made to the majority given by the electorate in the province of Quebec. As a representative of one of the most important electoral divisions in Canada, that of St. James, in Montreal I may be allowed to say a word or two on that question. I do not know of any meetings having been held in that electoral division, prior to the day preceding the vote. On that day a popular meeting was held with a view to explaining to the electors the meaning of the proposed law and what the results of the vote would be. That was all the agitation that took place in the city of Montreal, at least in my division; other meetings may have been held in other divisions, but I am free to say that no organization work was carried out in the province, though the prohibitionists bestirred themselves, doing a great deal of missionary work among the people, and the ladies busied themselves with distributing pamphlets broadcast throughout the city of Montreal and through the country. Despite all that, a majority of the people voted down prohibition. Had they not resorted to undue influences in order to induce the people to vote for prohibition; had they not advised the people to vote in favour of that measure, reluctant as they were to give that vote; had they dealt with the question at issue instead of making political capital against the Government, I have no doubt but that a much larger majority would have been registered against it. Is it fair to ask the province of Quebec to accept a law of that kind, after giving an adverse majority of over 80,000, without any attempt at organization having been made? I could name parishes where one-half of the electors did not go the poll, although they were opposed to prohibition, because they were under the impression that by voting against that measure, which apparently had been initiated by the Government they would embarrass the latter. Had the question been debated at public meetings, on the hustings throughout the province, and had there been some attempt made at organization, the majority, as I said, would have been 150,000 instead of 80,000. In face of such a state of things, how do they dare talk of imposing such a legislation upon the electorate of the province of Quebec? By what right, Sir, could they pretend to forbid you drinking tea at your breakfast or sweetening it, if such be your taste? By what manner of right could they forbid me taking a glass of wine, which I have done from my very childhood, and on what plea could they deprive me of a stimulant needed to restore bodily strength? Such a law would be unfair; and let it be known that we no longer live in the times when Mahomet, imposing his doctrine at the point of the bayonet, could say: "Believe or die."

I do not pretend to question the evils which are the outcome of intemperance; but I may say that, speaking from my experience our people, so far as temperance habits are concerned can very well compare with any other people. I believe that the catalogue of crimes attributed to drunkenness is certainly exaggerated. In the discharge of my professional duties, as a defender of prisoners, and as a representative of the Crown, a post which I have the honour of now occupying, I found myself in daily contact with the criminal tribunals, and I may state that nine out of ten of those who are charged with criminal offences, are guilty of falsehood when they state they were under the influence of liquor when they committed those crimes, thus trying to make drunkenness answerable for their guilt. That the abuse of intoxicating liquors is responsible for the increase of crimes I do not pretend to deny at all. I am even ready to vote in favour of a stringent legislation and its strict enforcement, and I am quite willing that the guilty parties and their accomplices be severely dealt with. But at the same time I think it but fair to ask that our liberty be respected.

I now come to another subject which has been pretty well threshed out on the floor of the House, the Senate reform. Should a resolution concerning the Senate be introduced here, we shall then have an opportunity of dealing with that institution according to its merits. I do not require to dilate very long upon that subject. As I remarked a moment ago with respect to free trade and protection, there are some people who want to go further than others. For my part, I would rather the Senate were done away with than reformed; but, if insurmountable obstacles stand in the way of its destruction, let us all at least reform it; although, in my opinion, the Senate has no raison d'être. Although I pay due deference to those who hold opinions contrary to mine, I must say that for many years I have been a student of public questions from an historical and democratical standpoint, and I am impressed with the idea that the world belongs to democracy, now that the sovereignty of the people is a recognized principle throughout the civilized world, and in my opinion, upper chambers are but a remnant of tyranny and feudalism. If you want a Senate elected by the people, just as the House of Commons, you will have two bodies with the same origin, between which a conflict may arise. If you hold that the Senators are to be appointed by the Crown, then they become the creatures and the tools of the Government. How in the world can you expect that these gentlemen, crippled and impotent as they are, after meeting with repeated defeats at the hands of the electorate, will muster strength and courage enough to resist the will of those who appointed them? No, Sir, overflowing with gratitude as their hearts are, they cannot help yielding to their masters. We are told that the Senate is an antique institution handed down to us by Great Britain; that we ought to respect British institutions, the Senate having been copied from the House of Lords. Such a comparison is to say the least, preposterous. In Great Britain, as we all know, the House of Lords is contemporary with the nation itself. It is closely connected with the very life of the Anglo-Saxon race, and it was only degree by degree as popular freedom was being evolved, that the people succeeded in shaking off their shackles and claiming back that freedom which is now the proud boast of the British people. The House of Lords is identified with the rise of the English people; it represents those great land owners, those mighty barons of old who were seen on all the battlefields of Europe, of Asia and Africa, battling with their vassals; it represents therefore an idea and a historical period. And yet, in Great Britain, from a political standpoint they have the means wherewith to prevent that powerful body from wielding its fatal influence, and that is by increasing the number of its members. This threatening provision of the constitution hanging over the heads of the Lords has always proved most efficacious.

I shall probably deal at greater length with this subject later on, should the question come up before the House. Allow me, however, to draw your attention to an article of the London "Daily Chronicle" of March last, which reads as follows:—

When the party of "rest" is in office, the House of Lords is a recording machine; when the party of progress is in power it is a permanent bar.

That is exactly what takes place here.

Then it is that it is active. Its legal power of veto hangs over every bill, even before it is brought to birth. Well might Mr. Labouchère invite the Tories to think how they would enjoy it if the situation were reversed, and the "Upper House" composed of shoemakers from Northampton.

We see here reproduced in our Senate the part pledged by the House of Lords. Let me give another opinion of an English journal "The Westminster Gazette," of the same date:

There is only one way to meet the situation, and that is for liberal leaders to decline office except on terms that they shall in the last resort be armed with the power of dealing with the House of Lords. This should be understood at the beginning as the condition on which they form Government. Mr. Balfour admits it to be a constitutional principle that the Lords shall not hold out after a dissolution ad hoc; we must now seek to make it a constitutional principle that their power shall be exhausted with one veto.

Such is exactly the state of mind prevailing here, and those two extracts square perfectly with the condition of affairs. Mr. Gladstone and other English statesmen were of the opinion that the power of the House of Lords should be restricted, and I fail to see how it may be contended, in the face of such an opinion, that the Senate ought to be held sacred, like the Hebrew Sanhedrim of the Hebrews. The Senate is nothing but an anomaly in our system of Government. They ask us, the representatives of the people, to yield and submit to the will of the Upper House! When the Government introduces a Bill, and declares before Parliament that it is a measure of public policy, and when they are backed by a majority, the hon. gentlemen want the Senate to resist and kill such a legislation! But, the hon. gentlemen will say: "Go to the country, and if your policy is endorsed at the polls, the Senate will yield. But why squander the people's money in order to allow the Senate freely to display their devotion, not to say their debasement before the hon. leader of the Opposition. If, then, as I have shown, the Senate does not offer us any constitutional guarantee as is the case with the House of Lords, and if they only make use of the rights provided by the constitution to thwart the measures of the Government, I think I may safely come to the conclusion that the pretensions of the hon. gentlemen are altogether ungrounded. It is not my intention to enter into any lengthy details, as there is another point I wish to touch, before bringing my remarks to a close. I refer to the International Conference. I have heard many extraordinary statements, but what the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has just stated, caps the climax. He dared to tell us that the Prime Minister had been a discredit to his country in England. I had heard quite the reverse; I had heard it stated that the hon. Premier had been most cordially received by the American people and in the metropolis of Great Britain, and it was no mean surprise to me to hear the hon. member say that the Prime Minister had been a discredit to Canada in England. I was under the impression, from the reports that had reached us, that, amidst all those who attended the receptions given in Great Britain to the representatives of the colonies, our Prime Minister had occupied a most distinguished position. From what I had read in the newspapers about the feasts given in honour of the colonial representatives, those children of the British Empire who had come from all the quarters of the globe and laid down at the feet of their august sovereign the homage of their devotion, I had been led into the belief that among those acclaimed by the British people the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had been very conspicuous in the first rank, having been marched at the head of the great procession which took place during the festivities. I was also under the impression that in the capital of the United States, the Prime Minister had been a credit to the Canadian name. Go where you like in the States and you will find that the American press sounded everywhere the praises of the Prime Minister and of his colleagues. And now we are told by the hon. member for Beauharnois that those facts were a discredit to Canada. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the actual results can not yet be fully appreciated, from a strictly political and parliamentary standpoint; but I consider that from a national and social standpoint, never before had Canada made such progress politically as was done, since the coming into power of the present Government. In Great Britain, of course, they were already a little acquainted with our statesmen and they knew something about them, but they knew almost nothing about the Canadian people. Since the Premier has paid a visit to Great Britain, a great change has taken place in the public opinion of that country, and undoubtedly the country will largely benefit by it. So again with the United States. The Americans used to look down upon us and treat us with contempt, as was the case when the hon. leader of the Opposition went to Washington, in order to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. They would look over the map and try to discover a country contiguous to this, called Canada, but with a very small population. But, now, they know that our country deserves consideration at their hands, thanks to the visit of the Prime Minister and of his colleagues, which, if it has not yet produced any practical fruit, will, before long, result favourably to the country.

While I am on my feet, Sir, I wish to say a few words about our poor province of Quebec. We are a people exclusively governed by prejudices. We are impulsive and generous, no doubt; but all the same we are governed by our prejudices. Such was the statement of which the hon. member for Beauharnois, as well as several other gentlemen opposite, delivered themselves on the floor of this House. Now, Sir, if those prejudices really exist, it was by the hon. gentlemen opposite that they were raised and fostered and fed. As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, for many long years, the Liberals in Quebec could neither vote as free men upon public measures nor freely give expression to their political views. We Liberals were held up to reprobation not only by the clergy of the province, but also by the Conservative speakers as so many enemies of the church, bent upon destroying the Throne and the Altar, and the clergy of the province, for many years, shared that view. Stunned by the outcries raised against us by those bawlers, the clergy prevented us from taking part in public affairs, and many people who had no leisure to study at a time when there were but very few papers to help educating the masses, gave implicit credence to those statements; but when, later on, public education had progressed, when we found it possible to reach the ear of the people and to denounce the misdoings of our opponents, then, I say, prejudices were swept away and the eyes of the people were at last open. Three years ago, certain attempts at stirring up the same prejudices were made in the province of Quebec. The people replied by giving us a majority as we now have in this House, in support of the Government. No, Sir, there are no prejudices to be found among our people. They impute to us as a crime the fact that we are proud of the Prime Minister; but, I ask, is it any fault of ours if the most distinguished man in Canada is one of our race? Has it ever entered our heads to impute as a crime to the hon. gentlemen opposite their admiration for Sir Charles Tupper? A few days ago, an hon. gentleman, when reviewing in laudatory language the political career of the leader of the Opposition, was heard to say that the province of Nova Scotia was justly proud to claim him as one of her children. I congratulate Nova Scotia upon having produced a man like Howe and other great statesmen, and we also congratulate the province of Quebec upon having given birth to Cartier, and the province of Ontario, upon having among her statesmen a man like Mowat.

Are we to be told that because Sir Wilfrid Laurier belongs to our race, we are to be forbidden mentioning his name and claiming him as one of ours? No British statesman, however distinguished he may have been, was ever given a more hearty welcome than Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister of Canada. Upon all hands, the Canadian people were congratulated upon having at the head of their Government such an able and distinguished man. It would be most unfair on our part not to recognize his great talents.

I wish to reply to another insinuation made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). Referring the other day to prejudices as also to the charges brought in that connection against the Minister of Public Works, the hon. gentleman said:

We know the French Canadian people are loyal. It is true that in 1837 a few of them stood in rebellion, but, Sir, there were Englishmen in rebellion also in those days. There were renegade Englishmen in Ontario and Quebec, just as there were renegade Frenchmen.

I thought it my duty not to pass over in silence that historical error, without protesting against such an unfair statement. The men of 1837, Sir, were no renegades; they fought in favour of the rights of a majority dominated by a minority. They had the courage of withstanding tyranny. Never did it enter their minds to rebel against the British Crown, and later on, the British Government did nobly acknowledge it. How dare they call renegades the men of 1837? When I heard that statement, I could not but exclaim: "How ignorant those men are of the history of their country!" On reaching Parliament Hill, among the monuments which embellished the grounds around these buildings, is the statue of George Etienne Cartier. That man was made a baronet, after playing a great part in our public affairs: he was even the guest of Her Majesty at the Windsor Castle, and welcomed by her as a devoted and dutiful son. But, I ask, was he not once among those renegades referred to by the hon. gentleman? I want no better proof of this than the following statement taken from one of the speeches delivered by Sir George Etienne Cartier himself at St. Denis, that historical parish 'par excellence', which forms part of the constituency I had the honour of representing in the Quebec legislature:

We have no longer to fear a repetition of the events of 1837, which were caused by the manœuvres of a minority who wanted to dominate the majority and run the Government in their own interests. What the people were aiming at was making it impossible for that minority to oppress the majority, rather than bringing about a separation from the mother country. But, fortunately, we may hope to be given fair-play, since we were granted responsible Government, which obliges the head of the executive to surround himself with advisers who enjoy the confidence of the majority.

Electors of St. Denis, you have shown that you were brave men, when on the 22nd of November, 1837, armed with a few poor muskets, with lances, forks and sticks, you drove away the troops of Colonel Gore. I was then one of yours, and I do not think I lacked courage.

Thus spoke the leader of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the man whose statue they daily contemplate with veneration: he declares that he was one of the rebels of 1837. Despite all that, he was placed at the head of public affairs in this country, and he became a famous statesman and a great Canadian.

I am afraid I have overtaxed the indulgence of the House. In reviewing at such length matters with which my hon. friends are perhaps more familiar than I am: but I thought it my duty to register a solemn protest. As I said, from the standpoint of prejudices, and of loyalty, one cannot but hope that the day will come when we, Canadians—for nowadays we are classified as French Canadians and English Canadians, though we never forget that we are British subjects—will form one single and indivisible nation. Still, one cannot but remember the blood of his ancestors which flows in his veins. One cannot forget that in the church-yards around our old churches several generations of ancestors with French blood in their veins are sleeping the eternal sleep. Is it to be inferred from this that we do not respect other races? Does that mean that we are not loyal to the flag under the shadow of which we enjoy freedom and protection? No, Sir. Those are sentiments in the inmost recess of the heart, which all intelligent men respect and which cannot be productive of evil. Just as the English remember the glories of proud Albion, and the Irish remember Erin and O'Connell, we also remember that we have sworn allegiance to Great Britain, and we shall remain faithful to her, so long as circumstances will require it, so long as events shall not have called upon us to join the concert of nations, and to play an important part, which we must all have at heart to play, if not for our own sake, at least for the sake of our children.

Bill (No. 50) to amend the Civil Service Act.—(Mr. Monk.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the long debate we have had on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I will claim the privilege of making a few remarks before the debate closes, and in doing so, Sir, I will just refer for a moment to some of the remarks that fell from my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). In the course of his speech he referred, like many of the other hon. gentlemen who preceded him, to the great prosperity of this country under Liberal rule. He also referred to the immense increase in the foreign trade of this country. With respect to that, Sir, I would just say that I wonder where the prosperity of this country would be to-day, I wonder where the trade would be to-day. If it were not for the continuance of the National Policy inaugurated by the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite. With respect to the foreign trade of this country it is my opinion, at least, that the great increase in this trade is largely due to the good crops that have prevailed throughout the country and to the continuance of the National Policy that has enabled our factories to continue their operations. Now, while I agree, in the main, that there has been prosperity owing to these two causes, there are parts of this Dominion where neither one nor the other of these causes exists. What do we find? We find that in the maritime provinces we have not good crops, we have not the manufactories, and, therefore, we have not the prosperous times that exist in other parts of this Dominion. In the province from which I come we have no manufactories, and I regret to say that our crops have been, to a very great extent, a failure. If I am to judge the other maritime provinces by the state of the province from which I come, I think I have no cause to congratulate the Government on the prosperity of the country. The hon. Minister of Customs has told us that the factories of this country are working now as they never worked before. I would ask that hon. gentleman where would these factories be to-day if they had not continued the policy of their predecessors by continuing the protection that enabled these factories to start under the National Policy? On the other hand where would the wealth and money of this country be going to if it were not for these factories that were nurtured and brought into existence by the National Policy? They would be going to the people to the south of us, very largely. We have, thanks to the National Policy, become independent of those outside of us to a large extent; we can depend on our own factories for the production of our own goods, our own cottons, our own boots and shoes, our own clothing, our own hats and caps, and in fact everything that the general run of people, or the farmers require to carry them over from year's end to year's end. If it were not for the National Policy we would be sending our money out of this country to pay foreigners and to pay for what we are now able to do at home. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks, referred also to the reciprocal tariff, in referring, I presume, to the preferential tariff. Now, a tariff to my mind, to be reciprocal, must be beneficial to both parties. In the matter of preferential trade between us and England, Canada has to give largely to England without any advantage to the people of Canada. Therefore, I deny that there is any reciprocity in that tariff. It is one-sided, it is preferential only in so far as England is concerned and is of no advantage whatever to Canada. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) told us that the Government had a surplus, and whether Grit or Tory rules we are all glad to hear that. But, Sir, when these hon. gentlemen have a surplus is it not time for them to think about reducing the taxes upon the people. They have preached in that line for a good many years, but I fear that when the Budget comes down, it will give evidence of another broken pledge in this direction. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches claim that there is great prosperity in Canada. It is perhaps worth our while to inquire as to what they have done to bring about the prosperity which they say exists. Well, it does not take very much study to discover that their policy has not tended in the direction of producing prosperity, because they have increased the taxation, and nobody will contend that that is conducive to the welfare of the people. When the Conservative Government went out of power the taxation per head of the people was about $3.77, but these hon. gentlemen opposite have succeeded in increasing the taxation until at present it mounts up to $4.22 per head. My hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Bell) delivered a very good speech in moving this Address, and I congratulate him upon it, but I fear he was completely at sea when he said that the prosperity of the country was largely due to the economical administration of this Government. We have yet to wait, and I fear we will wait a long time for any evidence of economy on the part of the hon. gentlemen now in power. They came into power claiming that protection was the ruin of Canada, "that it was bleeding the people white," and yet when they attained power they continued this very same policy of protection. True, they have made some small pretence towards making alterations in the tariff in order that they might endeavour to hoodwink the electors into the belief that they kept some of their promises. But the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), speaking as a member of the Government, says: "That the tariff is now a dead issue and is finally settled," and it is worth while for us to inquire how they have settled it. It is not many years since my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) said, that a protective tariff was "a thing accursed of God and man," and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in those days of old told us: "That protection and corruption were Siamese twins, that never were separated in this world and that he did not think would be separated in the next." Yet, we find these hon. gentlemen, now that they are in power, swallowing their free trade principles, and perpetuating this protection and corruption. Let us inquire for a moment in what respect they have altered the protective tariff which they found in operation when they came into power. The total number of items in the tariff as it stood under the Conservative Government was 486, and of this number the Liberals changed 144 and left 342 unchanged. Let us see what they did with these 144 items. They reduced the tariff on eighty of them, causing by such reduction a loss of revenue—calculated on the imports of 1896—of $680,000; not much of a reduction, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me, after all their outcry against protection and their statement that it was “bleeding the people white.” But the Liberal Government did not rest there with the tariff. They took 61 items and increased the tariff on these, adding by this increase—exclusive of cigars and tobacco—$795,000 to the revenue, and, consequently, increasing the measure of protection to that extent. Now, Sir, 42 out of these 61 items included goods manufactured in Canada, and we have therefore the right to conclude that the present Government added additional protection, to that protection which under Liberal-Conservative rule they said was “bleeding the people white.” What an exhibition of inconsistency on the part of these hon. gentlemen, and how gleefully they have swallowed all their promises to the people. Among the principal items they changed in their tariff were binder twine, coal oil and corn. They removed the duty from binder twine, and their statesmanship in that line has resulted in compelling the people to pay more for that article to-day than they did when the Conservative Government was in power. But there is more to be said in connection with this binder twine matter. The Government was running a binder twine factory in the penitentiary at Kingston, and as they had not to pay for the labour they turned out the twine at a very low rate. I am informed that last year they sold over 1,000 tons of this binder twine, practically without tenders being called, because the thing was so manipulated that it got into the hands of one of their own friends at a rate much lower than the market price. The result was that this gentleman at once combined with the American producers, and put the price up to such an enormous pitch that the consumers were forced to pay three times the price they would have paid if they could have bought it direct from the Government, and if the Government had chosen to give the farmers the benefit of the low price of penitentiary made twine. The American Government, having, through the policy of this Government, killed off the binder twine factories in the Dominion of Canada, are now adding insult to injury by offering us a free market for binder twine in their country. The result of the action of the Government is, that the farmers of this country are now obliged to buy their binder twine from the American combines and pay exorbitant prices therefor. The Government also lowered the duty on coal oil, and granted other concessions to a foreign monopoly, whose effects are felt, not only in Canada and the United States, but in Europe, with the result that this huge monopoly has been enabled to gobble up all the oil refineries in Canada, and with the further result, that the price of oil has gone up about 2 cents a gallon. They also, Sir, in tinkering with our tariff, took the duty off corn. What is the result? The result is, that a vast amount of American corn is brought into Canada, displacing a like amount of coarse grains that are grown by the people of this country.

Having said this much on that subject, I will turn my attention for a few moments to another matter that is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I refer to the plebiscite. It appears, Sir, that that measure has cost the people of this country $250,000—for what? To tickle the votes of the temperance people of Canada, in the interest of what? Not of temperance, for hon. gentlemen opposite say there is no intention of following the result of the vote with prohibitory legislation. Therefore, I think I am right in saying that a large amount of the people's money has been spent to humbug and deceive sincere advocates of temperance. It has cost this country directly $250,000 to bring this result about. It has cost the temperance people of this country, I dare say, fully as much more, if not more, for the expenses of printing, hall hire, payment of public speakers, time given by the people of Canada to the discussions, providing and paying representatives at the polls, and loss of time of half a million voters. Now, Sir, I do not think I am drawing an unfair inference, when I say that the temperance vote, on account of the promise made by the Liberal party, and by the leader of that party, that prohibitory legislation would follow a majority vote on the plebiscite, “even if it should cost his party power for ever”—that it was that vote which placed the Government on the Treasury benches. You must remember that the leader of the Government promised that if the people gave a majority for the plebiscite, it meant prohibition. The vote, Sir, was a large and substantial one. The vote in my province showed 37½ per cent for prohibition, and 4½ per cent against prohibition. Now, Sir, we find that there is a disposition on the part of the leader of the Government to back out of his promise, which was squarely given, as well as implied. At the Liberal convention in 1893, when this matter came up, there was one gentleman with whom, although he was a political opponent of mine, I was always on the most friendly terms in this House in former days. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Anglin. At that convention, speaking of the temperance plank in the Liberal platform, he said:

Is it not that we desire to know what the opinion of the people is on this question, that we desire to ascertain their opinion in a particular way, and that we will do all in our power to give effect to their decision as thus ascertained. Should a majority be obtained at the polls when this question is submitted, the friends of prohibition will be in a position to call upon the Liberal party to back up their resolution logically by assisting in the passage and enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law.

This was said, Sir, in the presence of the leader of the Liberal party and most of the present Cabinet, if not all. There was not one dissenting voice, so far as we know. It was believed that to pass the resolution meant just what Mr. Anglin said. Think, Mr. Speaker, for a moment of the vast number of independent and sincere men, electors of this country, who polled their votes for the present Government on the strength of the promise of the leader of the party, as expressed in their convention in 1893, and the many utterances of their leader since that date. Yet, Sir, in the face of all these promises, in the face of this plank in the Liberal platform, we find that they let the first session and the second session of this Parliament pass, and it was not until the third session that they brought down an Act to provide for the plebiscite. After passing that Act, what did they do? They brought on the election, but before doing so, they appointed a committee of the Privy Council—a committee of the Cabinet to fight the agitation. If there was nothing else to condemn the Government for, so far as the temperance vote of this country is concerned, that should be sufficient. For what reason did they send this committee of the Privy Council to carry on an agitation in the province of Quebec against prohibition? They found that they were getting into a pretty tight place, they found that the majority of the electorate were going in favour of prohibition, and that they would be held to their pledges to the temperance people, and they said to this committee: Save us or we perish. I shall not refer to the means adopted in the province of Quebec, and which have been referred to by several gentlemen already, but these means were not creditable to this or any other Government. I would ask permission, however, to read the opinion of the secretary of one of the temperance organizations in Montreal or the eastern townships—I refer to Major Bond. This is what he has said with reference to the conduct of the plebiscite by the Government, and, Mr. Speaker, Major Bond is not a Conservative, but a Liberal. But he is a sincere temperance man, and not afraid to give expression to his opinion:

A large majority against prohibition in the province of Quebec was gained, not only by undue influence and appeals to race and party prejudice, but by flagrantly corrupt methods.

However, when the Government came to sum up the whole thing, they found that the majority was in favour of prohibition. It will be worth our while to pause a moment to ask ourselves what constitutes a majority. My contention is that a majority is that portion of any body of men which rules; and we find in every public gathering, from a country school-house meeting to a meeting on the floor of Parliament, that it is the majority that rules. Whether it be a Government or a small country meeting, the majority carries the day. Why, then, should this case of prohibition be made an exception of by the Government for its own purpose? Although there was a very large majority in my own county in favour of prohibition, what did the Government tell us? They said: Oh, it is the minority that rules, the majority does not rule at all, and the majority must submit. That is about where the matter stands just now. While referring to the methods that were used to carry the election in the province of Quebec, it is only fair that I should say a word with respect to the position of that province on the temperance question. What is its position? The general impression is that the province of Quebec is not temperate. This, however, is a common fallacy and an error, because we find that the 932 rural municipalities, outside the cities and large towns in the province of Quebec, have a local option law. We find that all these municipalities have the power to prevent the issuing of licenses, and out of the 932, there are 603 in which the sale of liquor is entirely prohibited. I am indebted to my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) for these figures, and I think they are well worth submitting to the House, so as to place the province of Quebec in its proper light before the country on this question. In my opinion, that is one more reason why the Government should have granted prohibition, after the result of the plebiscite, knowing as they did, that the province of Quebec is largely temperate, although not strictly in favour of prohibition. But, Sir, the Government said to their friends in that province and elsewhere: If you assist to carry through prohibition you will destroy the Government. You can see what an immense motive power that was to induce people to vote against prohibition; but nevertheless, in the face of such a powerful appeal, there was a large majority in its favour. The people seemed to have forgotten that the right hon. leader of the Government had said that "the Government would go into Opposition rather than defeat the will of the majority, as expressed by the plebiscite," and further, in my opinion, the Government is to-day holding office by reason of the promise of its leader that prohibition would be carried out, "even if it cost the Liberal party power forever." Were it not for the temperance vote thus obtained, these hon. gentlemen would not now be sitting on the Treasury benches. Sir, the temperance people in my province are sincere, earnest men, and their opinion may be summed up by the expression of a leading temperance man, when asked: What do you think the Government will do, now that a majority has voted in favour of prohibition? Oh, he said, "they are honourable men and will give us prohibition." And "what will you do, if they do not?" Oh, he replied, "I will change my politics and vote against them." I believe that the expression of that gentleman was sincere and that a very large number—not all, because some will swallow their principles and stick to their party—of the earnest and respectable advocates of temperance in the Liberal party will poll their votes against the Government which made such promises and failed to fulfil them. Now, in the face of all the direct promises of the Government and of the right hon. First Minister, in the face of the prohibition plank in the Liberal platform, on the strength of which the Government obtained the temperance vote, in the face of the pledge of the whole Liberal party that "even if it cost them power forever" they would give us prohibition, we find an apostle of temperance in the person of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) having the temerity to assert "that prohibition was never promised." What does this all amount to? It amounts to just about this, that we are told by the right hon. leader of the Government: Oh, I did not mean what I said; I was only playing with you; I was poking fun at you; there was an implied agreement. With whom, pray? It was not with the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), as far as we know. It was not with the Minister of Agriculture, so far as we know. It would seem that it must have been with a ghost; but, if so, that ghost will arise in the person of the independent and insulted electorate of this country in the next election and call the Government to account. Where is the hon. Minister of Agriculture now?

An hon. MEMBER. In cold storage.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) One gentleman suggests that he has been put in cold storage to keep until this blows over. I hardly think that. Where are the temperance supporters of the Government? We used to find them very pugnacious when a question of this kind came up in the House. We do not hear a word from their lips now, except when they make excuses for the failure of the Government to carry out their pledges with respect to prohibition. Surely they do not expect an outraged electorate to overlook such political depravity as this. At the risk of wearying the House, I must read an extract from the newspaper organ of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), in which is contained a report of the Prince Edward Island branch of the Dominion Alliance meeting. The following resolutions were carried:—

Whereas the Alliance has learned with regret that the privilege of a private bonded warehouse has been granted to—

I leave out the name—

—a violator of the Canada Temperance Act;

Therefore resolved that we hereby express our strongest disapprobation of such action on the part of the Government, and urge the Government to immediately rescind its action in this matter; and that we further disapprove of the principle of allowing private bonded warehouses for the exclusive storage of intoxicants in places where the Canada Temperance Act is in force.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's).

Now, I just wish to say with respect to this that within a few days after the plebiscite on prohibition was taken, it was rumoured that the first reply of the Government to the vote of the people in my county that was so strongly in favour of temperance, was to grant a bonded warehouse to this gentleman. I can remember that many years ago it was the practice of almost every business establishment in the country to sell liquor as well as other articles of trade, and during all that time it was never found necessary to have a bonded warehouse to enable the people to store liquor. But now that we have the Canada Temperance Act in force, now that we are shown by the plebiscite that the people were 37½ per cent against the sale of liquor to 4½ per cent for it, the first act of the Government was to grant a bonded warehouse. This was adding insult to injury, to say the least of it.

That the Prince Edward Island Branch of the Dominion Temperance Alliance view with profound regret the attitude of the Federal Government upon the question of prohibition, taking, as they now do, a stand diametrically opposed to the will of the people expressed in the plebiscite of September last.

I would just say here that I think that it is the plain duty of the Government to follow up the vote that was polled in favour of prohibition with a prohibitory law. Now, I quote further from the "Guardian" of 13th April, respecting this bonded warehouse:

It is impossible that aroused public indignation can be quieted while the nuisance remains unabated. We have proceeded so far on the assumption that the Minister of Customs and the Government of which he is a member were misled by the local adviser in King's County, and were not aware of the nature of what had been done. But that excuse no longer remains valid. The public interest could not possibly be subserved by placing a bonded warehouse in a country cellar owned by a notorious violator of the law of the land.

We have made it clear that the transaction as it stands is a public scandal which no decent section of public opinion in this island will defend or apologize for. It stands condemned by the press, by the general public and by the Temperance Alliance.

Well, Sir, the granting of the bonded warehouse is the reply that the Government has given to the temperance people after the vote on the plebiscite. The "Guardian" further says:

The friends of temperance and social order are just now in no mood to be trifled with. They are sore over the refusal of prohibition, and will resent in the strongest way special and unusual privileges granted by the central Government to notorious violators of the Temperance Act.

These are the expressions, not of a Conservative journal, but of a journal supporting the Government. I do not blame this gentleman for having a bonded warehouse nearly as much as I blame the Government for granting it.

Now, just a word with respect to the conference. It seems to me that the Government have allowed the Americans to tie their hands for another year. By adjourning the conference to the 1st of August they have gained time and prevented the Government from passing legislation in the interest of Canada that they might otherwise have passed. The policy of the Government up to this time, it seems to me, has been largely to pass legislation favourable to the United States. They have given them the advantage of supplying us largely with coal oil, binder twine and corn. Should they take any further steps in this direction, it would be very hard to say where they can stop. One reason why this conference has been a failure is that the Government party of this country in the past has been in the habit of proclaiming themselves the friends of the Americans. They have declared that if they were placed in power they would get reciprocity without fail, that we had only to elect them and reciprocity would follow forthwith. But after reaching power by means, as I contend, largely of promises made to the temperance people of this country, they turn around at once and abandon reciprocity.

They say, Sir, that they cannot find out that it is necessary for the prosperity of this country. Well, I am not surprised at the Americans not granting them reciprocity of any kind, after getting them to make the concessions that they did with respect to some of the principal articles that they put on the free list of this country; for instance, binder twine and other things. After the members of this Government had proclaimed themselves so anxious to obtain access to this market of 60,000,000, saying time and again that it was a necessity to Canada, it would be absurd for the Americans, under those circumstances, to grant them reciprocity, or anything else. Now, on the question of the Alaska boundary, we find that the American commissioners said :

We will submit to arbitration ; but so far as Dyea and Skagway are concerned, as well as the territories now occupied by the Americans, whatever be the result of the arbitration, whether it be found that these towns are within British territory or not, yet, nevertheless, they should be deemed to be a portion of American territory.

Is it any wonder, after the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) admitting on the floor of this House last session :

Our contention is that Skagway and Dyea are in the United States territory, and they have been in undisputed possession. * * * There is nothing in the record to show that objection has been made to such occupation.

He further stated :

From time immemorial Dyea has been in the possession of the Russians. No protest has been made against their occupation. At this moment we cannot dispute it.

Under these circumstances, is it any wonder that the Americans should lay down such rules as they did with respect to the arbitration they were willing to grant under certain circumstances ?

Now we come to the question of redistribution. What do the Government want redistribution for ? Are they afraid of the people who elected them ? It looks very much like it, Mr. Speaker. I think myself that they have good reasons to be afraid of them ; so far as broken pledges go, they have every reason to be afraid of the people. Do they want so to rearrange the constituencies that they may be in a position to take the electors by the throat and say : Stand and deliver ? It seems to me, that the only object they can have in rearranging the constituencies that have given them power, is, to make their positions more secure, because they are afraid that they will not be able to retain the votes that they secured at the last election. My hon. friend from East Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Bell), in the course of his speech, said there were thousands " who hugged the delusion that Canada is dependent on the United States for prosperity." Who are they ? The only ones I know are the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. These gentlemen have stated that the moment the Liberals attained power, they would obtain reciprocity. The Liberals have also said all along : " The United States is our natural market ; we cannot live without it." These were the only gentlemen who pretended that reciprocity was a necessity. Of course, on proper terms, every one would favour a reciprocal arrangement between ourselves and the people to the south of us. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

Hon. gentlemen may say what they like, they may do what they like ; the welfare of Canada above all things depends on the markets of the people to the south of us.

Wrong again, Mr. Speaker. It seems they have found out now that it was all a mistake and a delusion. They find out now that, owing to the policy of the late Government in building up trade with Great Britain and in catering to that market, we are becoming so independent of our American neighbours that it does not matter very much to the people of this country whether we get into their market or not. We are told in the Speech from the Throne :

Much information has been obtained relative to the deposits of gold, &c., in the Yukon.

No doubt, this is very interesting ; but, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it would be much more interesting to know all the particulars respecting the doings of the inner circle in Dawson, and respecting the unlawful exactions of the appointees of the Government. In fact, if rumour is true, there have been a great many immoral practices on the part of the people appointed by the Minister of the Interior and the minor officials out there. It seems that the Government has been trying to exact the last cent out of those poor miners who have gone there to toil late and early in order, perhaps, to obtain the means to procure subsistence for their needy families that they have left behind them. I think I have understood from the Government that a very large sum has been collected in Dawson and in the Yukon from the people who have gone out there. Now, I would venture to offer a little advice to the Government, and that is, that they could not better spend a portion of that money which they have received from the miners in the Yukon, than in establishing an independent tribunal, or a commission, by which there could be a thorough investigation made into the doings of the Government officials in that country. If half the reports we hear are true, it is a duty they owe, not only to themselves, but to the country at large, which has hitherto borne a good character in respect to administration. Now I will quote a short extract from a letter of Miss Shaw to the London "Times" with respect to the doings out there. I will not inflict the whole of it upon you, because you have heard it before; however, it is necessary for my purpose that I should read a portion of it. She said:

It is impossible to talk for five minutes on business with any one on the mines or in the streets without some allusion occurring to the subject, and it is a painful experience for Englishmen, proud of the purity of the British system of government, to be compelled to listen to the plain-spoken comments of Americans and foreigners.

Apart from the graver charges, there is much dissatisfaction with imperfections of organization, which are ascribed to inaptitude and inattention to business on the part of the responsible officers. * * * That mining districts cannot be surveyed, that claims in many instances cannot be recorded, that necessary information with regard to districts already staked is not open to the public, are facts which have come to be regarded by the public as so many purposely designed channels for individual bribery. A half or a quarter interest is frequently quoted as the price at which good claims can be recorded, and scarcely a day passes in which some fresh story does not become current of the number of dollars which it has cost to obtain letters from a nominally unsorted mail or to make good an entrance on business into one of the public offices.

When there is given to us such an article as that, written by the correspondent of the London "Times," I think it should be sufficient to warrant the Government in having a thorough investigation in order that they may show to the world that the Government of Canada were not a party to any such work as that which has been going on there. I also make a short quotation from the Yukon "Nugget." It says:

Admittance to the door marked "private" could be obtained for $5, while that containing the sign "No Admission" could be entered by paying $10 to $25. The latter was very largely patronized, to the personal benefit of the Government officials and the detriment of honest miners whose claims were ignored in the absence of tips.

"Mr. Fawcett," said Mr. Semple, "was the most incompetent man ever placed in charge of an executive position. While we do not charge him with personal dishonesty it is a well known fact that his employees were too crooked to lay in bed. Of the seventeen clerks under him there were several over whom he had no control whatever."

Now, Sir, we find also that there is a gentleman who visited Dawson City who was connected with a paper that was published not very far from Ottawa, the Pembroke "Observer," a strong Liberal paper, and, therefore, this gentleman was a strong Liberal. But strong Liberal as he was, when he visited Dawson he could not swallow what he saw and he reported as follows on the situation there. He said that he had to listen to:

—violent railings at the Government and at the officials at Dawson, who were both charged with the most vile and deliberate corruption.

He further says:

I have seen enough to convince myself that it is worse even than the mind of an honest man can conceive.

Under these circumstances I must press upon the Government the necessity, in the interests of this country, of having all these matters brought before an independent tribunal and thoroughly thrashed out so that wrong-doing, if any, shall be put on the proper shoulders, and, if there is none, the Government will stand better in the eyes of the country than it does under the present circumstances.

Now, a word or two in respect to cold storage. We who were in the previous Parliament know that the then Government and my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) took up the matter of cold storage. We had it at that time before the Committee on Agriculture. It was talked over and approved, and an amount was placed in the estimates of the then Government to facilitate cold storage, but through the opposition of the Liberal party that estimate was prevented from going through Parliament. We know that when they got into power they went around and told the people that, "We are the boys; we brought in cold storage; we are going to give the farmers a chance to take their cheese, their butter, their bacon, their mutton, their beef and all that sort of thing to market in cold storage," and that they inaugurated cold storage. Why, Sir, they are becoming so used to wearing the garments of the Opposition that they hardly know themselves. However, there is no gain-saying the fact, that we have to thank the late Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), and the late Government for inaugurating that policy. And, Sir, in this connection, I may say that the cold storage that the present Government have given us is only partial cold storage, and that if the present Government had only carried out what the late Government inaugurated and concluded a contract for a fast mail service across the Atlantic we would, by this time, have a proper cold storage system and a fast mail service, instead of which we find that three years have been fritted away and nothing accomplished. Not only that, Sir, but they started out with the intention of saving a little money, as they thought, by getting a cheaper service, but we find that the price of steel and iron products of all kinds has gone up, and the chances are that what they could have got possibly for $750,000 or $800,000 two or three years ago will now, in all probability, cost them $1,000,000.

I think, Sir, I have gone over the different items that are referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and that it is not necessary that I should weary the House by continuing my remarks at any greater length. But, Sir, we find that the present Government are accused, and I think very properly accused, of having forgotten their pledges to the people of this country. They came into power pledged against protection, and they have continued protection. Mr. Speaker, do you suppose, for one moment, that they would have obtained power if they had come out as they now do in favour of protection? They came out at the election in favour of reciprocity with the United States and obtained the votes of the electors who were in favour of that measure. Do you suppose that they would have reached power if they had come out flat-footed as they do now against reciprocity? They came out, Sir, as I have heard year in and year out within the walls of this Parliament, denouncing the Conservative party for interfering with the independence of Parliament by granting offices to their supporters. We have heard the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), in fact all of the supporters of the Liberal party, while on this side of the House, denouncing the Conservative party for appointing their friends from Parliament to office, but no sooner do they get into office themselves than they adopt these very tactics. We find that they have already appointed, from this Parliament, as many as over a dozen of their supporters to offices of emolument, and, rumour says, that the hon. member for St. James, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais), who spoke so volubly last night, is to get a judgeship.

Is that the price of his eloquence; it is hard to say, time will tell. We also found that the Liberals rather denounced the fast Atlantic service when it was proposed by the Conservative Government, but as soon as they got into power they commenced tinkering and tampering with it, the result being that we have no fast Atlantic service contracted for yet, and the chances are that before they procure such a service as the Conservative Government contemplated they will have to pay a good deal more money than was offered in the first place. More than that, we will have to do without the service for several years to come. These gentlemen came into power condemning corruption and scandals. I do hope that in the interests of this country they will take the earliest opportunity to appoint an independent tribunal before which the Yukon scandals may be thoroughly threshed out, and the truth of the charges proved, or the officials and the Government vindicated. I would further say to the Government that they owe a duty to themselves and they owe a duty to the temperance people of Canada to carry out their promises and their pledges by bringing in a Plebiscite Bill. I shall not detain the House longer. I thought it in the interests of my constituents to put these matters before the Parliament of Canada in the best way I possibly could, and I do trust that I have done so in a manner which will commend itself to my electors and to the hon. members of this House.

Mr. P. MACDONALD (East Huron). I must apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, as well as to the hon. members on both sides of the House for prolonging this discussion which has now lasted for about three weeks. I had made up my mind not to take any part in this debate, but speeches have been made and events have occurred which have caused me to alter my intention, and I therefore crave the indulgence of hon. gentlemen while I pass in review some of the questions which have been engaging our attention. I may say at the outset that there are some matters to which I intend to give but a passing notice. We have had two great speeches on the Yukon question, and they, to my mind, settled that controversy. The one was that very able, bold and explicit statement made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), in which he accused the Government of almost every crime, and with being responsible for everything bad that was committed in the Yukon. I listened with great attention to all the charges which he, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper made, in order to satisfy myself if the reports might be true, and after listening to the seven-hours' speech of that hon. gentleman, I was anxious to know what could be said in rebuttal. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) was in a position to answer that speech better than any hon. member in this House, for he was in possession of facts and figures which were not under the control of private members, and therefore, I attached a good deal of importance to the answer that would be given by the Minister. After listening to that hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) for six hours or thereabouts, I was forced to come to the conclusion that the Government did all that human creatures could do to carry out law and order in that far-off, distant country. True, there may have been some things we would not like to see transacted, but is it possible for us to imagine that the conditions in that almost inaccessible region would be similar to those we would expect to see in an older and better regulated community? We know that thousands of people, many rough men, miners all their lives, were arriving and elbowing to the right and to the left to get to the gold land, striving still more strenuously to get their claims recorded, and are we as reasonable people to suppose that under these conditions there would not be some irregularities? But, Sir, who can for one moment reasonably accuse the Government for these irregularities, small as they were. To hold the Government responsible for them appears to me absolutely absurd, and so far as the Yukon question goes it will cut a very narrow swath when we come to give an account of our stewardship to the electors. I might for a moment refer to the policy of the Government last session in providing for a line of railway into the Teslin Lake, and a line of steamers thence down the Yukon. The Senate in its wisdom, thought it well to veto that Bill, but after a year of further experience I believe the country regrets very deeply the action of the Senate in that regard. Had the Bill been carried into effect, we would now have a line of communication with the Yukon, along which a large proportion of our trade would go, and our eastern manufacturers and our western food producers would be largely benefited over and above what is possible under present conditions. In consequence of the rejection of that Bill by the Senate, the Yukon trade has been largely diverted through the United States channels to the advantage of the American manufacturers, so that the Canadian manufacturers are aggrieved, and the country generally feels aggrieved by the action of the Senate in rejecting that Bill. The question of Senate reform will ere long come before this House, upon its merits, and then I shall have an opportunity of expressing my opinion upon the policy formulated by the Government.

There is another question upon which I will reserve my remarks until later on in the session, when a special opportunity may be given for discussing it. A large number of the members of the Opposition appear to be deeply imbued with temperance principles just now—I never knew before that so many of them had the temperance cause so much at heart. I have been in this House for about twelve years, and I do not know that I see any gentleman opposite me who is remarkably well known in the community, or in the House, for having at heart the great temperance cause of the country. Nevertheless, these gentlemen are now making a great ado about prohibition, but you will notice, Sir, that they always speak about what the Liberals did not do, and forget altogether to tell what they themselves would do. When a man honestly differs with my opinions I like to hear him say what he would do, and I like to hear him tell in a straightforward manner what his action would be in the interests of the country, or in the interests of any class of the community. We have respect and esteem for persons who will candidly state their opinions, but I have no respect for persons who throw out opinions for the sole and only purpose of putting an obstacle in the way of another person, or of another political party.

Now, Sir, I suppose that most of the members of this House know that I am a prohibitionist, as I have been for forty years. I have taken part in the discussion of the plebiscite question, and I am sorry indeed that when the opportunity was given the temperance people and the Christian people of this country to express their opinion and their sentiment on this question, they did not do so more largely than they did; and, although I am in favour of prohibition, I feel this obstacle in the way, that under present conditions, as indicated by the recent vote, the people are not strong enough in sentiment to stand behind a prohibitory liquor law. If a prohibitory liquor law were placed on the statute-book at this time, with the sentiment which exists in the country behind it, I am afraid that in less than five years that law would be repealed by an overwhelming majority against it, and then the end of temperance would be worse than the beginning. Therefore, in the interest of temperance, I think the Government would not be justified, upon the basis of the vote that has been given, in introducing a prohibitory liquor law at the present moment. That is sufficient to show you, Mr. Speaker, where I stand.

There is another question to which I wish to refer before I proceed to the main question which I wish to discuss; that is, the question of reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen accuse us on this side of the House of being opposed to a reciprocity treaty. I wonder where these hon. gentlemen got their information. Did we ever as a party express ourselves as opposed to reciprocity? Did we ever formulate a resolution against reciprocity? No, not one. We are in favour of reciprocity if we can get a reciprocity treaty based upon principles that are equitable and just between the two nations concerned; but we have repeatedly asserted on the platform and in Parliament that we were not and never would be willing to sacrifice one jot or tittle of the interests or the honour of Canada to secure a reciprocity treaty from any nation. That is the position we have always taken and the position we occupy to-day; that is the position the Liberal party will occupy for all time to come. But the hon. leader of the Government said the other day that he did not think the country was very much in favour of a reciprocity treaty at this moment; and that remark has been taken up by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they have charged us with having broken our promises. Now, if those hon. gentlemen who think they understand the trade question very well, will just think for a moment, they will see that present conditions are far different from the conditions of seven or eight years ago. We do not stand in need of a reciprocity treaty now as much as we did then. The reason of that is that our markets have largely changed. The products that used to go to the United States market now find a market in Great Britain. Take, for instance, the article of barley. We formerly raised 14,000,000 or 15,000,000 bushels of barley, because it was in demand in the United States to make pale beer; but when the McKinley Bill threw our barley out of the United States market, our farmers stopped growing barley, and they do not grow it now to any great extent. Where they had formerly a million acres under barley in Ontario, to-day they have not over 200,000 acres. The changed conditions drove the American brewers to adopt other things, such as corn and rice, in the making of pale beer. Suppose we had reciprocity to-morrow, we could not re-establish the market we had seven or eight years ago, and the changed conditions have done away with the necessity for reciprocity in that article. Then, take another article. Eight or ten years ago, I am sorry to say, the Canadian farmers were exporting a large number of their lean cattle to the American market, for which they received, of course, a reasonably good price; but the McKinley Bill to a large extent shut out the cattle of Canada; and probably it was a good thing for our farmers, because it made them commence to finish and fatten the animal in this country ready for the butcher. In that way they were both benefiting themselves and were able to dispense with the American market; so that if we had reciprocity to-day it would not benefit us so much, because our methods have changed. Our fat cattle go to England instead of our lean cattle to the United States. Therefore, when the right hon. leader of the Government said that the people of this country did not require reciprocity at the present time as they did seven or eight years ago, he was only expressing the general opinion of the people of Canada to-day. Several years ago the United States market was the market par excellence for the eggs of the province of Ontario and other provinces. It took the egg producers of this country one or two years to establish a successful market for eggs in Great Britain; but it has been established, and now the whole egg trade has been diverted to that market from the United States. Therefore, we do not require reciprocity in eggs as we did before. I might go on and give many other examples of the same kind. Do you not see that the conditions have changed, and we must change with the conditions? You must remember that politics is not an exact science like mathematics, in which you always come to the same conclusion. The premises are always changing in politics; as we grow older, new conditions arise, and when we argue on the basis of these new conditions, we must arrive at a different result from what we did before. We have not changed our opinions, but the conditions have changed; and, as the Liberal party is always a progressive party, we must adapt ourselves to the conditions that surround us. That is the principle on which we are conducting the Government to-day. We must also remember that politics is largely a matter of compromise. We have seven provinces to govern, and each of these provinces has special interests of its own. We cannot do everything which we think would benefit one province. We must consider what would benefit the whole, otherwise the Frenchman would be on one line, the Ontarian on another, and the Nova Scotian and the British Columbian would be looking for something that would benefit themselves in particular. We must compromise, and find a policy suitable not only to the various provinces in their particular conditions, but to the various interests in the different provinces themselves. Now, there may be a policy which, while quite in accord with the interests of the farmers, may not be in accord with the interests of the manufacturers. There may be a policy that is wholly in the interest of the miners, and not in the interest of the lumberers. And, therefore, the wisdom of the party and the wisdom of any Government must be found in determining a middle way, whereby the greatest possible good will be meted out to the greatest possible number.

I was really astonished at the argument which my hon. friend used, and I am confident, from my knowledge of his intelligence, that he did not really mean what he said. I cannot bring myself to believe that my hon. friend from King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Macdonald) is of the opinion that the reduction of the duty on coal oil from 6 to 5 cents caused the Standard Oil Company to come in and monopolize the entire oil products of this country. If he did not mean that, why did he make the statement he did, for evidently he wished the people to draw that inference. But I do not think either the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member could possibly draw the inference that this reduction in duty is responsible for the present condition of the oil interests in Ontario. How is it possible that by a reduction of one cent in the oil duty, the Standard Oil Company are placed in a better position than they were formerly? If 5 cents duty enabled the Standard Oil Company to control the Canadian market, 6 cents duty would enable the company to put the oil one cent higher to the consumer. The same argument was used with regard to binder twine. Surely my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Macdonald) does not mean that by putting binder twine on the free list was the cause of increasing the price last year, yet that evidently was the inference he wished us to draw. That could have nothing to do with the increased price of raw material in a country devastated by war last year, and in which on that account the raw material could not be cultivated. Yet with the broad facts of history before him, the hon. gentleman ventured to state that the increase in price of binder twine was due to its having been placed on the free list.

Mr. TAYLOR. What did this Government sell the output of the Kingston Penitentiary for ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That has nothing to do with the price of binder twine. The whip of the Conservative party is imbued with the peculiar idea that everything, no matter what, that happens, which is not a subject for congratulation, must be due to the policy of the Government. What had the sale of binder twine in the Kingston Penitentiary to do with the price of that article in all countries where it is sold ?

Mr. TAYLOR. The Government should have sold it direct to the farmers and not have allowed a combine to exist and control the market.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Another question which was referred to on the public platform in Ottawa last night, or the night before, is our promise to bring down a redistribution Bill, but which my hon. friends opposite are pleased to call a gerrymander Bill. They seem really to be of the opinion that because they could not act honestly in the framing of a redistribution Bill themselves, we are bound to follow their example, and they actually accuse us in advance, before they can possibly tell what we are going to do. Let me just tell them that we intend to act honestly in the redistribution of the seats, and that is what they did not do. One of their leaders, a few years ago, said that their whole Bill was conceived in sin, and certainly it was brought forth in iniquity, because it was one of the most iniquitous Bills ever placed on the statute-books of Canada. It had the effect of legislating into this House a large number of Conservative members who would never have obtained a seat here were it not for that measure. Let me give some evidence to prove my statement, and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will do me the courtesy of listening to the figures I shall give ; and if in any way they can answer those statements and figures I shall be most happy to hear their reply. The election of 1887 showed that in the province of Ontario the Conservatives had polled 186,000 votes and the Liberals 182,000 votes. Or, in other words, the majority in favour of the Conservatives during that election was 4,000 votes. Now, any one can see that if each party had had the same advantages at the polls—and why should they not—the members elected on either side would have been nearly equal. The Liberals would have had about forty-five seats and the Conservatives forty-six. But was that the case ? Let me give the figures. In the Parliament of 1887 the parties were divided as follows :—The Liberals had 33 members from the province of Ontario and the Conservatives 59. How was it possible that 26 members were elected on a majority vote of only 4,000 in the whole province ? The only explanation that can be given is that by the gerrymander Act of 1882, the Grits were so hived, they were so crowded into constituencies where their votes could not count, that it was impossible for them to obtain the representation in this House to which they were entitled by their number. They were, in fact, actually legislated out of their seats by that iniquitous gerrymander Act. Let me show this in another way. For every 3,150 votes polled in the election of 1887, a Conservative came into this House, but it required 5,550 votes to elect a Liberal. I challenge any hon. member on the opposite side to show that such a result could have occurred under any other condition than a gerrymander, by means of which the Liberals were hived into certain sections of the country where they could not possibly make their power felt.

Now, we are charged by hon. gentlemen opposite with having increased largely the expenditure under the consolidated fund of this country. But just here conditions come in—as conditions sometimes come in during the year in every one's affairs—which called for certain extraordinary payments that could not have been anticipated. We find that in 1895, the year before the Conservative party was routed at the polls, their expenditure was a great deal higher than it was during the last year of their administration. It was then $38,152,000. But just before they appealed to the country, being desirous of making a good showing, they contrived to show a decrease in expenditure by holding over large payments, which they should have made in 1896, until after the elections, and these liabilities consequently fell on the shoulders of the new Government. Consequently, when the new Government came in, they were faced with large demands that should have been met and paid by the out-going Government. The out-going Government had cut down the expenditure to $36,949,000 in 1896. But when the Liberal Government came in, they had not only to make arrangement for the payments accruing after they came into office, but to pay sums left over from the foregoing year. I will give you an instance. The late Government bought arms for the militia. That was all right, for I believe in an efficient militia. But they did not pay for these arms, and a large sum had to be paid by the in-coming Government. It was all right that the amounts should be paid, but to cite such an expenditure as an argument to support the contention that the Liberal Government had increased the public burdens unjustly, is unreasonable. Then, the new Government had to make many payments because of new circumstances arising after they took office. We paid, last year, $720,000 for the administration of affairs in the Yukon, while the late Government paid nothing on that account. The Government had to take up this matter and make provision for the protection of life and property; they had to send out a large body of policemen for that purpose, thus incurring the large expenditure I have just given. Now, does any hon. gentleman suppose, that if he went upon a public platform and told the simple electors—and by that word I mean the honest electors, men who are willing to hear the truth—that the Liberal Government had increased the expenditure, would they not naturally ask, what the items of increase were? And, the items being given, if the expenditures were shown to be proper expenditures in the interest of Canada, would not the people naturally say that it would be wrong to criticise the Government on that account? I see a gentleman in front of me, who, I suppose, from the close attention he is paying to what I say, intends to follow me. I would be glad if he would tell me, if ever upon a public platform he has told the electors that the Liberal Government were compelled to pay these extraordinary sums to which I have referred. Then, again, we paid $141,000 more last year on account of immigration than the former Government paid. Will any member of this House rise on the public platform and tell the people how any part of that $141,000 could have been saved, or that it was unwise to incur such an expenditure for the purpose of inducing people to come here and fill up our unsettled country? Then, again, we spent on agriculture—and I will deal with that expenditure further—$34,000 more than the late Government had spent. We also made larger expenditures on the militia, and I will give another reason why the expenditures on this service were increased. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that, when they were in power, they neglected the militia greatly, that General Herbert, who was at the head of it, declared that the militia service was in a disastrous condition. The annual drill of the soldiers was not provided for, causing a great deal of dissatisfaction in the ranks of militia in this country. We believed that, if we had a militia, it should be on an efficient footing, and that the annual drill should be provided for; and, when we came into office, we provided for it. Of course, it cost money, the in-coming Government spending $350,000 more than was spent in the year preceding. Is there any hon. gentleman opposite who will stand upon the public platform, where his utterances are published, and where people can hear him, and hold him responsible for what he says, and say that this $350,000 should not have been spent? If he cannot say this money was extravagantly or corruptly spent, he should acknowledge to the people that the Liberal Government were bound, in the interests of the people and of the militia, to make this expenditure.

Mr. HUGHES. Will you add another million to it? We will back you.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) misunderstands me; but I will explain my position, as I am sure he is honest in asking the question. I was not speaking of the whole expenditure upon the militia, but of what was spent over and above what was spent in the last year of the late Government.

Mr. HUGHES. But will you add another million this year?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Probably, the hon. gentleman, being a major in one of the battalions—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Colonel.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I beg the Colonel's pardon. The hon. gentleman, being colonel of one of the battalions, takes a deep interest in this matter, and, no doubt, believes that a million additional expenditure upon the militia would be in the interests of the country. I am not going to argue that question with him. There are several other items, which I will not take time to go over, but I will say that these, added to the others I have given, give us a total of $2,030,000 spent by this Government over and above what was spent by the late Government.

Mr. McNEILL. Does not my hon. friend think that these extra expenditures, which he alleges to have been necessary, should have been taken into consideration before the promise was made to reduce the expenditure?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). These hon. gentlemen do not seem to see beyond the points of their own noses. How is it possible for one to ascertain what will be necessary three to five years hence? We stated, years and years ago, that the militia should be put on an efficient basis, and we were willing to spend what money was necessary to effect that result. But the late Government did not do this, and, when we came into power, we found, according to the testimony of General Herbert, that the militia was in a very bad condition as to efficiency. So, we had at once to increase the expenditure—

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend allow me—

An hon. MEMBER. This is not a point of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am quite willing to hear what the hon. gentleman has to say.

Mr. McNEILL. I was going to say, that the hon. gentleman hardly understood the point I was presenting to him. As I understand his argument, he is excusing the additional expenditure of this Government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Not at all.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Of course, if he has no excuse—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am not excusing a single cent spent by this Government. All I want to do is, to place before the people the facts regarding the expenditure by this Government, for I feel confident that, when the people understand the reason for these expenditures, every item will be vindicated by the people.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend still fails to understand my point. We say that hon. gentlemen opposite said they were going to reduce the expenditure very largely. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), as I understand him, has been explaining why the expenditure has not been reduced, and I say to him, that before they made that promise of reduction, they ought to have been sure that they could carry it into effect.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How would it have been possible for us to make the world stand still and preserve the same conditions as we had five years ago? Under similar conditions as those we had five years ago, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, we could save large sums. But, as the world moves, and as new conditions rise in politics, we have to deal with those new conditions, and, if additional expenditures are required to maintain the efficiency of the public service, we are perfectly willing to make those expenditures, and we believe that the country will sustain us.

Mr. MILLS. What are the new conditions?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I gave one to the hon. gentleman a few moments ago, but he must have been asleep. I said one of the new conditions was this, that the Yukon was not in question at all until we were called upon to make an expenditure of $720,000. Now, I am not going to go over the various new conditions; there is one for him, and when he has settled that he can take another.

There were a number of charges made, all of which I will not attempt to answer. One was that we had promised to this country free trade as it is in England. Now, I saw several members on that side take a little red-covered book out of their desk which they call the Liberal bible, from which they appeared to gather almost everything that they wanted to make the basis of their arguments. Now, Mr. Speaker, I challenge, I repeat the word, I challenge, any hon. gentleman on that side of the House to point out one written or printed expression made by any leader of the Liberal party authorized to speak for the Liberal party, to show that if we came into power we would give free trade as it is in England. Now, do not hold your tongues, but speak up. This is the time that we want to meet such things. Speak now, or for ever hold your tongues. Remember, I am not responsible for what the rank and file may say, I am responsible for the party who met in 1893 and formulated a policy upon which we have proceeded ever since. Let me read what the leader of the party said at that great convention:

I say the policy should be a policy of free trade such as they have in England, but I am sorry to say that the circumstances of the country cannot admit, at present, of that policy in its entirety. * * * I submit to you, therefore, that the system of protection which is maintained by the Government, that is to say, of levying tribute upon the people, not for the legitimate expenses of the Government, but for a private and privileged class, should be condemned without qualification.

Now, does any hon. gentleman say that we have there promised free trade as it is in England? When these gentlemen go on the stump in the various constituencies they just read this first clause:

I say that the policy shall be a policy of free trade such as they have in England.

They garble the sentence, and leave out what follows, and in that way they have given each other the impression that we have promised free trade as it is in England. Sir, how was it possible that intelligent men could promise free trade as it is in England? No gentleman on the opposite side thinks that the Liberal party is made up of a lot of fools. We have to raise a revenue under our present system, a system which has prevailed since we became a self-governing country, a system of raising revenues by customs duties, which must of necessity give an incidental protection to all the industries of this country. Unless we change that system and adopt another, one of direct taxation or some other system, would it be possible for us under our present conditions, under the present national liabilities and financial necessities of the country, to establish free trade as it is in England? They must have taken the ground that the people in the country do not understand these questions when they tell them that the great Liberal party of this country offered such a foolish thing at the present time. True, every Liberal looks forward to a higher ideal, for we all have ideals. The ideal of the Liberal party is free trade as it is in England. Now we always come short of our ideals. It is always well to have high ideals.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I cannot see any basis for that "hear, hear." The hon. gentleman has an ideal in life; he probably looks forward to some position that he aspires to, he makes everything subservient to the accomplishment of the end which he has in view. But he finds, probably he has already found, that he comes far short of his ideal. So it is in every phase of life. We have an ideal before us, and it is a good thing that we have; we press onward towards it, and make everything subservient to the attainment of the end that we have in view, however far short we may come of it. So it is with tariff matters. Our ideal is free trade. We have clipped the wings of protection, certainly, to a very large extent, so much so that protection can never fly again in this country. Its wings are clipped so close that it will never rise above the earth again. We are also told that the Liberal party promised a very deep cut in the protective duties of the country. Did they do that? I do not think they did. I do not think there is one line on record which shows that the Liberal party promised to cut down the so-called protective duties very rapidly. Here is what the leader of the Government said in that connection, and in it you will find the exact policy that we are pursuing to-day:

It is always easy to increase the tariff, because by so doing you increased the private fortunes of certain individuals; but whenever you decrease the tariff it has always to be done with careful consideration; and I am sure that when the Liberals are in power they will not be indifferent to this primary truth.

Now, what does that mean? It means exactly what we did. We readjusted the tariff here and there, relieving one class at the expense of another class better able to bear it. In that way we have dealt with the tariff, and as new circumstances may require, we will probably still continue the readjustment, because no one readjustment, no one set of conditions will continue, however much we may desire. No single readjustment will continue to meet the new conditions that are constantly arising.

Now I come to another subject. The right hon. leader of the Opposition paid us, a few months ago, a complimentary visit to West Huron, and he delivered a very vigorous, energetic and very capable speech, as he always does, from his own standpoint, in the town hall of Clinton. During that speech he made a challenge, which I will read:

I am here to-night to claim that you cannot lay your finger upon a single Act upon the statute-books of Canada, or upon a great public enterprise of a national character, you cannot point to anything that has contributed to make Canada a great, important and influential nation; you cannot name one single act that it is not in my power to claim as the result of the efforts of the Liberal-Conservative party. I challenge our opponents to put their fingers upon one single thing that they have done to make Canada a nation, and to put their fingers upon one single act of policy or anything else, to point to one single Act upon the statute-books showing that this country owes them the slightest gratitude in return for anything that they have accomplished.

Well, that was done with premeditation, but he repeated it here very nearly in the same words in that very able and eloquent speech that he delivered at the beginning of this debate, when he said:

I stand here to-day in the presence of this intelligent House, I stand here to-day in the presence of a people as intelligent as any to be found on the face of the globe, and I challenge these gentlemen here and now to put their finger on a single act of theirs that has contributed by jot or tittle to the progress of the country. * * * But when they say they have contributed aught in any respect to the progress and prosperity of the country, I deny it, and challenge them to the proof.

Mr. Speaker, with great diffidence and modesty, I accept the challenge. I need not spend too much time, nor will I, in showing what the Liberal party did all through the lines of Canadian history. That would take too long. I need not refer that hon. gentleman, who is an expert, I suppose, in Canadian history, to the question of responsible government in this country, and to what the Liberal party did at that time. I need not refer him either to the granting of municipal institutions in this country, when the Tories of that day said that these municipal institutions were "sucking republics." I need not refer him to the secularization of the Clergy Reserves, when the Tory party of that day took sides with the clergy, and did not wish these lands to be secularized and divided, but the result is that we have to-day no established religion; every religion has to stand upon its own basis, and this money has been divided amongst the municipalities of our country. I need not remind the hon. gentleman, because he knows, that we are enjoying a principle here, especially from the Ontario standpoint, won by the Liberals, which is representation by population, nor need I remind him of the time when the late Hon. George Brown used to speak so repeatedly and eloquently on the old question of representation by population, which was finally incorporated in the Act of Confederation, passed in 1867. I need not refer the hon. gentleman to the question of confederation, for he knows that the statements I am about to make are perfectly true. He cannot claim to be the father of confederation or of the idea of confederation; neither can the late Sir John Macdonald claim the credit of being the instigator of that great movement. The late Hon. George Brown was the man who instigated that movement. That hon. gentleman stood upon the floor of this House and moved that a committee of twenty hon. members, upon both sides of the House, be constituted to take the question into consideration, and they reported back to the House, as, no doubt, the hon. gentleman will remember. Seventeen of these twenty reported in favour of confederation as we have it to-day; three out of the twenty put in a minority report opposing confeder-tion as we have it to-day. Now, it would be interesting to tell the House who the seventeen were, but I do not remember them all. I do, however, remember the three. One of these three that signed the minority report was Sir John A. Macdonald; the other was John Sandfield Macdonald, and the other was a Mr. Scoble, who then represented one of the Elgins, perhaps he was the predecessor of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey). Does not that show that these gentlemen were not in favour of confederating the provinces at that time? How did it come around? Let me give you the rest of the history of that movement. On the following day the Hon. William Macdougall, who is still living, I believe, in Ottawa, moved a vote of censure upon the Government for granting $100,000 to the city of Montreal, in the interim of the session, without receiving the consent of Parliament. The Government was defeated upon that resolution. Then George Brown went to Mr. Macdonald and said: "You are being defeated; we cannot have a majority on our side, but if by a coalition confederation can be carried through, I am with you." Then a coalition Government was formed; Mr. Brown went into that coalition Government, and from that date on Mr. Macdonald took an active and vigorous part in consummating what the Liberal party had begun. Now they claim all the credit of this portion of the history of Canada. Now, what have our present Government done? They have not been in power very long; they have been in power less than two and a-half years. It would be interesting for hon. gentlemen opposite to know whether they have done anything to deserve the gratitude of the people of Canada. I think they have. When the right hon. leader of the Government was called upon to form a Government there is one thing he did that deserves the gratitude of the people of Canada. He gathered around him men of renown, men of the highest type of character in this country, men against whom not one single scintilla of objection, moral or political, can be made; he selected men of experience, men whose characters are not only above suspicion but beyond question, and it gave a certain degree of confidence to the people when they knew the character of the men with whom the hon. leader had surrounded himself. For twenty years the people had lost confidence almost altogether in every politician; there was such scandals, such extravagance and such immorality prevailing amongst members of the Government and others, that the people of this country cried aloud against politicians of every stripe, but when they saw that the right hon. leader of the Government, whose character is so high in the estimation, not only of his own political friends, but among people of every party, no matter how strongly they might oppose him on political grounds, gathered around him men of known character, there was confidence established in the hearts of the people of this country, as the hon. gentleman who said the people have no confidence in the Government will see whenever the opportunity comes of going to the country. That is one of the great reasons of the prosperity of the country. You can understand it in your private business. If you have confidence in any one discharging important duties for you, you will be more prosperous on that account because you will be able to pay attention to a hundred things, whereas otherwise you would require to be looking after the man who is serving you in business. That is not the only thing for which the country is grateful, and the country will express that gratitude whenever it gets an opportunity. There is another thing for which the country is grateful. The present Liberal Government settled a very important question, a question which I at one time felt was almost going to lead to civil war in this country, a question that tore the two great classes of religious thought directly and diametrically asunder. It was the question in regard to the dispute that arose in reference to the schools in Manitoba. Hon. gentlemen remember the acrimonious debates that took place two and a-half years ago, and they know how many nights and days were given to the consideration of the subject of the autonomy of Manitoba and their right to pass a law which the highest court in England pronounced to be within the jurisdiction of that province. There is no doubt that there was a grievance, but many of us felt that this was not the proper place in which to settle it. I think that, if the Liberal party is deserving of any gratitude from any section of the country, it is deserving of gratitude in that it took the only plausible and feasible way in which to settle that question for all time to come, and that was by relegating it to the province where it had its inception. What would be thought if the Coercion Bill were now upon the statute-book? Is there a single hon. gentleman sitting on the opposite benches who will get up and say that he believes it would be in the interest of the country to have Manitoba coerced into adopting a school system directly opposite to her wishes? Is there a single hon. gentleman who voted to sustain the Government upon that occasion who now, with the facts before him, and in the light of the two or three years that have elapsed, will get up and say that the Liberal party was wrong and not justified in taking the stand it did? Had that Bill been passed the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba would not have the same privileges as they now have, for there would have been a feeling of irritation and a feeling of dissension that would have led to disastrous results. But what did our noble leader do? Himself a Catholic, he stood above the storm of religious feeling, and his great aim was to settle this question as amicably as it was possible to settle it. He told this Parliament, and he told the country, that he believed that before he was six months in power he would settle that troublesome question reasonably satisfactory to all the parties concerned. That question has been settled, it has been removed from this arena, and if the Catholics in that province have not already had their privileges conceded, they will obtain their privileges from the generous Protestant majority.

Mr. HUGHES. Tell the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) it is settled.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Better speak louder if you speak at all, or if not be quiet.

Mr. HUGHES. I suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) that he should tell the Solicitor General that the school question is settled.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). This Government has done something else which redounds to their credit and confers lasting benefit on an important class of this community. When they attained power, the farmers were suffering severely, and although the farmers had represented their sad condition to the Conservative Government, that Government took no action to relieve them. I refer to the burdensome quarantine regulations which the unfriendliness of the United States raised against the live stock trade of Canada. You know that when the Conservative Government was in power, Canadians who exported lambs, hogs or cattle to the United States had to keep them two months in quarantine, thus rendering it impossible for our farmers to receive a reasonable price for their live stock. In view of this condition of things, what did the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) do? Immediately that he took office he interviewed the United States authorities, and after a friendly talk new arrangements were made under which Canadian cattle were allowed to pass freely into the United States on the certificates of veterinarians appointed by the Government. What was the result? Every farmer in this House, be he Conservative or Liberal, knows that within three days the price of Canadian cattle was enhanced 30 per cent, and there came into the pockets of the farmers of Ontario, not thousands of dollars but tens of thousands of dollars, which they would not have received but for the activity and energy of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). Does the leader of the Opposition think that the Canadian farmers will believe him when he says that the Liberal Government has done nothing to merit the gratitude of the people of this country.

I now come to deal with something else which the Liberal Government has done to benefit the people. I will call it the transportation policy of the Liberal Government and I will say here from my place and upon my responsibility as a member of Parliament, that time will prove that this is the policy for Canada and not the tariff. Sir, this is the policy of the present day, and in the future we will find that in discussing great questions before the people, the solution of the transportation problem is what the farmers, the manufacturers, the labourers and the artisans of Canada demand that the Government shall give their attention to. Under the heading of this transportation question, there are several subdivisions. First, there is cold storage. When the Liberal Government came into power they instituted cold storage.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think I hear some hon. gentleman laugh, and he laughs, I presume, because he thinks that the Conservative Government established the cold storage system. Let me show him where he is in error. In 1895, the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) did establish a certain limited system of cold storage consisting simply of insulated chambers filled with ice, on steamers, but that proved a complete failure, and the shipments made under it were delivered in the English market in a very damaged condition. We had a reputation to establish for our goods in the English market, and it was necessary that that cold storage system, on which the Conservative Government in 1895 spent $13,000, should be completely changed. The present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) saw that something better had to be provided and he established what is called mechanical cold storage refrigerating compartments, by means of which the heat is extracted by certain mechanical arrangements. He, therefore, established a system which has proved efficient in every shipment that has been made from that time to the present. Every article that has been shipped in this cold storage has arrived in the English market as pure and as fresh as the day it left the place of production. That was an encouragement to the Government to broaden out this transportation system of theirs, and they agreed to pay to all parties having creameries in the different sections of the country, a bonus of $50 for the first year, and $25 for two succeeding years, provided they established in connection with their factories a cold storage compartment. The Government paid $10,975 to assist the dairymen of Canada in accomplishing this useful end. Then the Government turned their attention to the railways of the country. If they were to have cold storage upon the steamers and cold storage in the factories, they found it was necessary to have the cold storage system on the railways which conveyed the products to Montreal, St. John and Halifax. They entered into an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the Grand Trunk Railway, with the Intercolonial Railway, with the Lake St. John Railway, and with several others, and agreed to pay them two-thirds of car-load rates, they charging the shippers at less than car-load rates, and whatever the railways collected was to be credited to the amount guaranteed by the Government, and if it covered the amount guaranteed, the Government was not responsible; but if the collection from the shippers was not equal to the guarantee, then the Government had to pay the balance. In 1896, there was $2,800 paid to the railways in the interests of the farmers of Canada—and I wish to convey these facts to the farmers of the country—in order to make up the balance of that guarantee which the Government had promised the railways. In 1897, there was $2,020 paid to the railways for the same purpose. You will notice there was a reduction of about $800, and the reason of that was, that the trade grew on certain lines of railways to such an extent that the local traffic covered the guarantee, and the result was that the business about paid for itself, and therefore the amount guaranteed by the Government was reduced. In 1898 that business spread, until now they have nine branches on the Canadian Pacific Railway, eight branches on the Grand Trunk Railway and Intercolonial Railway, and several other railways fitted out with these cold storage compartments, so as to give the producers an opportunity of sending their goods fresh and clean to the markets of the world.

Now, what is that going to accomplish? I want hon. members to remember that this will enable the producer to send his products across the ocean almost continuously in cold storage compartments, and, therefore, to compete in the British markets with other countries much nearer. I will give you a fact bearing on this point. In 1896, when our butter was sent to the British market and sold side by side with Danish butter, it did not realize within 18 shillings per cwt., that is, 112 pounds, the price of Danish butter; but last year butter of a superior quality and flavour, and in a better condition, sent in cold storage compartments, averaged only 8 shillings per cwt. less than Danish butter. So that 10 shillings per cwt. was made by the farmers of this country by the action of the Government. Multiply the number of pounds of butter we sent to the English market last year by 10 shillings per cwt., and we have $250,000 more that was realized for the Canadian producer than could have been realized under the policy of the party opposite. Do you really suppose, Mr. Speaker, for one moment that, in view of these facts, the farmers of this country will not be grateful, and will think that we have not added one jot or tittle to their prosperity? Moreover, this cold storage system has increased the output of the country. For many years we have been sending large quantities of cheese to the English market; we have got our cheese to a very high point of excellence, and we command that market far beyond any other country. But for many years previous to the advent to power of this Government, our butter stood very low in the English market; but by cultivation our butter now occupies a very much higher position. Now, I want to give you a figure or two to show the increased quantity we produce under the new conditions; and when this is a result of the cold storage system, how can it be said by hon. gentlemen opposite, or by any reasonable man, that a Government cannot by legislation increase trade? I sometimes wonder how these people have spent their lives, when they do not understand the principles that govern trade. In 1896 we sent 107,000 packages of butter to the British market; but the products of butter went on increasing in this country, until in 1898 we sent 263,000 packages. The first, which was of an inferior quality, only brought within 18 or 20 shillings of the price of Danish butter, while the last, which was of a high quality, brought within 8 shillings of the price of Danish butter in the British market. That is an increase in export in 1898 over 1896 of 164 per cent. Will any hon. gentleman tell me that that increase has not been owing to regulations made and a policy established by the present Government in order to facilitate the transportation of these articles from the point of manufacture to the door of the consumer? And if they can do it in this one instance, they can do it in a hundred instances. So that we can say that the expansion and enlargement of trade between this country and foreign countries is largely due to the wisdom and policy, and energy of the party that is governing the country for the time being.

Now, there is another question in the line of transportation that I want to bring to your attention; that is, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to the city of Montreal. For years we had urged upon the old Government the advisability of taking some steps to put that railway on a business footing. We urged that the Intercolonial should earn more money than it did; that there should not be a deficit of nearly $500,000 every year; and that, if it were properly managed, its earnings should fully, if not more than cover the expenses. In fact, Mr. Speaker, that road, instead of being an asset, as it was represented in various public documents, was really a liability, because, instead of bringing us in something, it was just as if we were paying $500,000 a year interest on borrowed money; and, when the present Government inaugurated this policy, I regarded it as a policy of progression by which they took advantage of the city of Montreal as one of the greatest receiving and distributing centres on this continent, where trade gathers from the west, and south, and north, to compete for a large portion of that trade. I remember the late Finance Minister saying, that our country was now too far advanced to start business on a back street—that if we wished to do business, we would have to come to the front street; that we must not be contented with the old square windows, but would have to put in plate-glass windows, and decorate them, to attract customers. That is the very thing we are doing. We found the Intercolonial Railway terminating at Lévis, a small village, would not attract trade or traffic, and must continue to be run at a loss for all time to come. As is well known, when we rented the Drummond County Railway, hon. gentlemen opposite made a great ado about it, and demanded a committee to investigate the transaction. Senators also investigated it; the walls resounded with denunciations of the Liberal party for some supposed scandal in connection with the matter; but what did it all amount to? The Government granted a committee, knowing that they were innocent of the charges; that committee sat upstairs; witnesses were brought and gave their evidence under oath; and two of these hon. gentlemen opposite, the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), in my own hearing, said, after the evidence was in: "We never charged any corruption against the Liberal party." Such was their acknowledgment; there was no corruption at all, as shown by the investigation of the whole matter from beginning to end. Now the Intercolonial Railway is at Montreal, and its agents can go west, and solicit business for the railway at any point, and the Grand Trunk Railway is compelled to hand that traffic over to the Intercolonial, when it arrives in Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT. Would the hon. gentleman allow a question?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman state, under what arrangement the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as he states, is forced to deliver all freight at Montreal to the Intercolonial?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman must understand that, when an agent goes west for the purpose of soliciting traffic or trade for the Intercolonial, the agreement is, that he will ship it through by the Intercolonial; and, when that shipment comes to Montreal, it must, as a matter of agreement, pass on to the Intercolonial Railway. I am sorry the hon. gentleman could not see through that very simple transaction.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would ask him another question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I hope it will be wiser than the last one.

Mr. BENNETT. Will he state how many miles it is from Montreal to St. John, the ocean shipping point by the Intercolonial, and how far it is by the Grand Trunk Railway from Montreal to Portland.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not see that it is pertinent to my argument, and I shall refuse to be drawn out of the course of my argument by any irrelative questions that may be put to me by my irrelative friend.

Mr. BENNETT. Abuse is not argument.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My point is this, that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal, a growing trade centre, was largely in the interests of the country, and furnishes the means of gathering up a great deal more traffic than it was formerly possible to secure. I propose to show the hon. gentleman that under the wise direction of our present Government, the Intercolonial Railway has earned more money than it ever did before. Let me read to the hon. gentleman some few figures, which will prove to him that the last year's operation of this road has been more successful than ever, and that the result is largely due to this policy. The gross earnings of this road in 1898 were $170,360 more than in 1896. Its passenger traffic in 1898 was $56,556 more than in 1896. Let me put this argument. Supposing an agent of the Intercolonial were in my town and some party was going down to Halifax, and the agent was empowered to solicit this gentleman to take passage by the Intercolonial. The agent would say: I will sell you a ticket by the Intercolonial from Montreal. That gentleman bought the ticket and went to Montreal, and there got off the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway and took the Intercolonial Railway for the balance of the route. If that can be done in the case of a passenger, it could also be done in the case of traffic, and I wonder that the hon. gentleman does not see it.

Mr. BENNETT. What are the mileages, please?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman must not forget either that the rates on the long route are the same as on the short route. That is always the case on competing lines, and you will not expect the Intercolonial Railway to charge an extra rate because of the longer route. Consequently, when the rates are the same, it is only a matter of a few hours difference in getting freight through by one route over and above the other. We have sent by the Intercolonial this year 165,311 barrels of flour more than we did in 1896, and this flour comes from Ontario. That was a traffic obtained, not in Montreal, but away up in the western sections of the country where flour is manufactured to a very large extent. Probably my hon. friend who sits on my left (Mr. Campbell) has shipped flour over the Intercolonial, which he might not have done under other conditions. No doubt an agent of the Intercolonial solicited him for that traffic and got it, and that is one of the advantages of this contract which the Government have entered into. Take grain that comes largely from the west to the east. Last year the Intercolonial carried 486,987 bushels of wheat more than in 1896, and that again is solicited traffic. Of lumber no less than 127,000,000 feet, board measure, was carried by the Intercolonial in 1898 over 1896. Live stock, principally from western Ontario and the North-west Territories, was also shipped over the Intercolonial last year to the extent of 25,240 head more than in 1896. Fresh fish, 2,000 tons more were carried over our railway in 1898 than in 1896, and refined sugar, 6,000 tons. I give those figures to show that under the wise and judicious transportation policy of this Government, they succeeded in enlarging the trade of that railway to the great benefit of all interests of the country, and the revenue thus obtained is considerably more than the rent which the Government agreed to pay.

Let me now say a few words about the enlargement of the canals, which is a part of the transportation policy of the Government. The Opposition claim that it is they who enlarged the canals. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, they were enlarging them at the time they were defeated, but they were doing so very slowly that the country was tired waiting for the consummation of their policy. When this Government came into power, however, they grasped this matter with an iron hand and resolved to meet the great growing trade of the west and draw a large portion of that trade to the city of Montreal. What did they do? They set to work to enlarge the canals. They put on large forces of men, and this work has been going on promptly and rapidly for the last two years, so that this next season we will have fourteen feet of water on the mitre sills instead of nine, as before.

But, cry out the Opposition, you have increased the debt. Certainly we have, but that is not a bad thing at times.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes, let my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Prior) bear this in mind. Would he consider it, in his business, a bad investment for him to go into debt in order to accomplish something from which he was satisfied he would realize a large income. If he borrowed $1,000 for a particular purpose in connection with his business at 3 per cent, amounting to an annual expenditure of $30, and knew, from his business experience, that this investment would return him an income of $50 per year, would he not consider that in thus increasing his debt he had done a wise thing? The business of the country is only an aggregation of the various kinds of business of the people, and if it would pay an individual to borrow money and invest it in such a way as to realize an income greater than the annual interest on the amount borrowed, surely the same principle would apply to the increasing of the public debt. Let hon. gen-

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

lemen remember that we have increased the debt very little comparatively. To hear these hon. gentlemen speaking, you would almost suppose that they never increased the debt at all, and that we had hardly any public debt until the Liberal party came into power. They go on declaiming against our increase in the public debt by $5,000,000, but they will never admit that the increase was expended on public works in the interest of every class in the country. Just to give you an idea of how these hon. gentlemen did increase the public debt, let me read to you some figures. Let us consider only a few years. There were not any great public works going on in 1894. It is true that some works were being carried on that should not have been carried on. Works, the expenditure on which, according to proof produced before a committee, were carried on corruptly and extravagantly. If these hon. gentlemen opposite think that the Liberal party is just as guilty as they were and spent this money recklessly or extravagantly, let them come forward, as we did, and make a charge and place the matter before the committee, and show that we are increasing the debt contrary to the interest of the country. But when we can show clearly that the moneys that we have spent have been spent for the purpose of enlarging the capacity of our canals, improving our means of transportation and otherwise for the benefit of the manufacturers, artisans and agriculturists of the country, how is it possible to make a point against the Liberal Government for such expenditure? We never said they would not increase the debt. How could we say so? Did we suppose that the country would stand still? Is not the country developing year by year, and, as it develops, does it not require public works to meet that development and help it on? And how is the money to be obtained unless we borrow and increase the debt? Will any hon. gentleman opposite answer that argument? With no great public improvements going on in 1894, hon. gentlemen opposite increased the debt by about four and a half millions. In 1895 they increased the debt nearly seven millions—$6,891,000. And, in 1896, the very year before we took office, the year in which there were no great works going on at all, they increased the debt $5,427,000. When we began the improvement of the canals, with the energy, push and perseverance characteristic of a Liberal Government, we increased the debt about three millions, and the next year we increased it by about two and a half millions. So we find that the Liberal-Conservative party increased the debt more in the last year they were in power than we did the first two years we were in power, notwithstanding the amount of work we did for the benefit of the country. And in the face of this we are told that we should be ousted from power, forthwith, because we have increased the debt, when we have simply laid out so much money in improvements which will bring back good return upon the capital invested.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was discussing the enlarging of the canals and the policy of the Liberal party in reference to the transportation question. I was showing that the Government had spent several millions for the purpose of deepening the canals to 14 feet, to enable larger vessels to navigate them and bring down larger cargoes on the way to Montreal. This we deemed a wise policy, owing to the keen competition of the line of transportation via Buffalo and New York. If we expect to secure a reasonable portion of that trade we must reduce the obstacles to transportation. If we would overcome that competition, we must facilitate transportation so as to make the rates as low as possible. Unless we do that, we cannot compete with the other line, which, at present, is taking away a large proportion of the trade which we, under this policy, would command. Last season there passed through Buffalo no less than 263,000,000 bushels of grain and its equivalent of flour. Now, Montreal only controlled between thirty and forty million bushels of wheat. We believe, and I think reasonably, that when we deepen the canals we can more than compete with the New York route, and, if so, then the trade will be diverted largely from that route to the route via Montreal. Certain things must be considered. In the first place, what difficulties have we to overcome? What is the difference in the price now to carry freight from Chicago to New York and to Montreal respectively. I went over the report of the Chicago Board of Trade, and there found the rates given at the end of each week during the season of 1897. Boiling these figures down, I came to this result—that the average cost of shipping wheat from Chicago by Buffalo to the port of New York, was 5·68 cents per bushel. I find that during the same season the charge from Chicago to Montreal was 5·93 cents per bushel, so that the charge by way of Montreal was one-quarter cent higher than by way of Buffalo. On corn, during the same season, I found that the price of transportation via Buffalo to New York was 4·43 cents per bushel, and via Montreal, 4·94 cents per bushel, leaving the Buffalo rate half a cent lower than the rate by Montreal. Now, the reason I give you these figures is to show what we have to overcome in order to control a portion of that traffic. With the deep canals in operation and with steamships put upon the lower lakes drawing 14 feet of water and carrying a large cargo—about 75,000 bushels of wheat—we can reduce the rates to such an extent that they will be considerably lower than the rates via Buffalo and the Erie Canal. There is another point, and I think it would be wise on the part of the Government to improve the port of Montreal and make it a first-class national port. Unless we consider it as a national port, I think we are making a mistake. Montreal requires sufficient room in her harbour for the largest vessel that ploughs the sea. She requires sufficient room on the wharfs to handle all the traffic that may offer. She will require the largest elevators that we can construct. In addition to all this, she requires store-houses, sheds and hundred and one things to make Montreal a first-class national port. And I think it should be the determination of the Government to accomplish this object, even at the expense of more money. There is another point I wish to bring out here in reference to the port of Montreal. The traffic is burdened, under present conditions, by harbour dues upon the wheat and other products that go to the city of Montreal.

The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. I understand, have borrowed money and made large improvements during past years on the port of Montreal, and in order to be able to pay the interest on that money, they had to levy harbour dues upon the traffic passing through the port of Montreal. That amounts on grain to half a cent a bushel, which is quite an embargo when we are in competition with another route that imposes no harbour dues. I think it would be advisable, at least that is my opinion, that the Government should take such steps as they think best in the interests of the country to have that embargo removed, so that one-half cent per bushel might be saved. This would induce traffic to go in that direction. I think that the enlargement of the canals, with a proper fitting out of the port of Montreal at the expense of the Government, making it a national port, would put it in such a position that it would command a great deal of the trade which we are not now getting. One advantage that the port of New York has over the port of Montreal is that there are no harbour dues in the former. It is considered to be a national port, it is improved by federal funds, it is looked upon as a port not belonging to the city of New York nor to the state, but as belonging to the nation, as a port through which the great traffic from the west passes. Now, we want the city of Montreal to be placed in a similar position, so that it may have all these facilities which I have proposed to you to-night. There are other things which the Government embrace in their transportation policy, and which I am sure will be supported by every gentleman who has an interest in the development of the Canadian transportation business, and one of these things is to facilitate the approach to Montreal of the very largest vessels that plough the main. True, the River St. Lawrence from the city of Montreal down is in fairly good condition; but there are points, if I am informed correctly, where the river channel is a little narrow and a little shallow, so that large vessels coming up run considerable risk of damage, and therefore have to insure themselves against that damage. Now, if that channel was improved, there would be another shade of reduction, which would tend to lessen the rates in that direction. There is one point that I want to impress upon the Government, if they can do anything at all in the matter, and that is to use their influence towards the establishment of a Canadian merchant marine. That is what we need very much. In looking over the statistics and information in regard to this matter, I find that nearly all the trade that comes through the Sault Canal, comes in American bottoms, only 3 per cent last year came through in Canadian bottoms. I would urge, if my voice and influence are of any good whatever—I would urge rich Canadians, Canadians who have their millions, and who are trying to find investments in loan companies, in banks, in insurance companies, and in a hundred other ways, that they should invest a portion of their money in establishing in this country a Canadian merchant marine. By so doing, they will contribute very largely to the advantage of the whole country, much more than by the investments they make in the ways that I have referred to.

But in order to put our transportation policy on a proper footing, there are other ports that must be deepened. There are the ports of Kingston, Toronto and Hamilton, which should be deepened at least to fourteen feet, the depth of the canals, so that ships passing through the canals could enter these ports. Another thing I would suggest is this—I do not know if my suggestions will be taken, but I think they are in the proper direction. The ports on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay should be deepened to the extent of twenty feet. Why do I make a difference between the ports on the upper and on the lower lakes? Because the ships plying on the lower lakes require ports only of equal depth with the canals through which they have to pass; but ships on the upper lakes require a depth in those ports as great as the depth of the Sault Canal through which they pass, or twenty feet. You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that the cheapness of our traffic largely depends upon the size of the vessel which takes the trade from the north to the south. Nearly all the vessels that are building upon the lakes for the United States marine are exceedingly large, some of them carry 7,000 tons in weight. Ours are all small, only carrying from 2,000 to, probably, 1,000 tons, and they are yearly being shoved out of the service by the large vessels. Now, why are large vessels better fitted to carry goods cheaply? Just because they can take more at a time. They can go quickly and unload, and come back quickly to the point where they receive the goods which constitute their cargo, and in that way they can carry goods more cheaply than small craft. Let me illustrate that fact in this way. Supposing that a craft carrying 75,000 bushels came down, and another carrying three times that quantity came down alongside, the cost of bringing the large one down would not be three times as much as the cost of bringing the other down, not even twice as much. The difference between the cost of running these two vessels from the upper ports to the lower ports would thus be the saving in the transportation rates, which would naturally go into the pockets of the producer. I think it is wisdom to make preparations for what is coming. The late Government did not do that. The trade on the upper lakes is expanding by leaps and bounds. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in 1887 9,000 vessels passed through the Sault Canal, a number that appeared extraordinary to us; and those 9,000 vessels carried a tonnage of 5,495,000 tons, the value of which was $79,000,000. Those figures indicate an extraordinary amount of traffic done on Lake Superior, gathered in from the various towns and cities on its shores. But when I tell you that ten years after that no less than 17,000 vessels passed through the Sault Canal, nearly double as many as passed through it ten years ago, and when I tell you that they carried 18,900,000 tons, and that the goods thus carried were valued at $218,000,000, you will see how rapidly the trade on the upper lakes has expanded. If we are wise, if we wish to get a large portion of this trade, we must be up and doing, we must put our ports in order, we must prepare to receive a portion of that trade, and take steps to bring it through our country to recompense us for the money we are spending, and have spent already. There is another point that has been taken up and forms a link in the transportation policy of the Government, and that is the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The object of the construction of that road is probably well known to most of us. There has been a large influx of population into southern British Columbia, owing to the discovery of gold, copper, silver and tin in that section of the country. Although that section of the country belongs to Canada, up to that time its trade belonged to the United States, and it was just the same, so far as eastern and central Canada was concerned, as if we did not own it. The goose that laid the golden egg certainly was ours, but whenever the golden egg was laid it rolled into the lap of the United States. Our Government saw that they must do something to counteract the taking away of the trade and traffic of that section of our people and they secured the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway on conditions which, I think, will be acceptable to any one not guided by partisan feelings. We made a bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway for building the road, and we agreed to pay them $11,000 a mile. Now if you place that to the debit of our country you will see that we pay them about $100,000 a year interest to meet the $3,360,000 which we have promised to pay them altogether. Our annual output for the advantages we receive is about $100,000. Now, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to look upon the other side of the ledger. What have we accomplished by that investment of about $100,000 a year? We have secured the construction of the road; we have secured a market for the food products of the Northwest Territories; we have secured a market largely for the eastern manufacturers and others, enabling them to send their manufactured goods in to supply about from 40,000 to 50,000 people, living in the Kootenay country, in southern British Columbia; we have secured the coal so that now the smelters of that region which had formerly to take much of their coal and coke across the ocean from Wales at a cost of from $14 to $16 a ton for coke, and $10 to $12 a ton for coal, are now able to obtain that coke and coal in British Columbia at less than half the price at which they obtained it before the construction of that road. That enables them to deal with a lower grade of ore so that what were formerly large dumps of waste material can now be handled and the wealth of the country extracted from them. Then again 40,000 people require supplies, in food and clothing, worth at least $10,000,000 a year. Now the eastern manufacturers in Canada can send forward a large portion of the goods supplied to these people, and in this way one section of our country is becoming a complement to the other instead of being separated as it was formerly, and we are building up and helping each other, buying what we do not raise ourselves, and selling that which we produce. That is not all that we must put to the credit of the Dominion. We have secured in fee simple not less than 50,000 acres of one of the very best coking coals to be found in the world. By securing these coal areas the Government are enabled to control the price of coal in the country. Suppose that we did not have this in our hands, suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or any other company, having a lease of that coal, sold it at any price that pleased them, and in this way formed a combination which would press heavily upon the users of coal in the Kootenay; suppose that the Government have a quantity of coal lands, they can lease these coal lands to companies so that there would be keen competition and by that means the price can be kept down to a reasonable figure. There was another very wise thing that the Government did and that was in taking to themselves the privilege, under the lease, of giving any other company that wishes running powers over the line, and also providing that the rates should be wholly under the control of the Government, thus securing in every step the interest of the people. Outside of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway we have something else to place to the credit of the Dominion, obtained by the right hon. gentleman who so ably leads the Liberal party. Hon. gentlemen know that the Canadian Pacific Railway have been charging very high rates to and from the west; so high in some respects were these rates that they were almost prohibitory. Certainly they were largely prohibitory in sending fruits to that country, a country where they cannot grow fruits of their own, and those farmers, out on the western prairies, anxious to obtain fruits from Ontario, could not obtain them on account of the extraordinary rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Let me give you a single instance, and I think the two parties to the contract are present in the House. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) sold a car-load of apples to the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), and they were shipped at Seaford, the town near which the hon. member for South Huron resides, to Prince Albert, where the hon. member for Saskatchewan is living. When those apples arrived in that town, the rate charged upon the car-load was $518. The result was that the party purchasing the apples lost a large sum of money because he could not sell them for sufficient to cover the expense. On a car-load of apples, by the arrangement made by the Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on account of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, $170 would have been saved. This $170 would have been saved on a car-load, making it possible for the people of the west to use Canadian apples and possible for the farmers of Ontario to find a market for their apples in that country. Other articles might be mentioned, but this is sufficient to illustrate what the Government have accomplished in their bargain for the building of this road. Another point to be placed at the credit of the Dominion was that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have to carry wheat and flour at 3 cents per 100 pounds less than before. Now I am told upon good authority that the reduction will amount to $500,000 or $600,000 in favour of those who send their wheat and flour out this way, and these are the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Surely they will be willing to contribute a part of the $100,000 a year to pay the interest upon the amount of money we have promised and which puts into their pockets over half a million dollars. This is not increasing the debt; this is an investment of great value which brings back to the people of this country far more in return than if you put the money in the Bank of Montreal at large rate of usury. There is another advantage, and I want to put this fairly before the House and before the country, in order that I may be able to answer, as far as possible, the challenge which the hon.

leader of the Opposition has thrown out. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have agreed under this contract to carry goods from the east to the west at lower rates, ranging from 10 to 33 per cent, and on several articles at very much reduced rates, so as to enable consumers in the west to get what is most largely used as cheaply as possible from the east, and that is a trade which, when started, will grow to greater dimensions in years to come. In this way I feel that when hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House say that no arrangement or law can increase the trade of this country, they are expressing something that I am sure they do not believe themselves, because the Government have power in arranging and readjusting and setting this and that in order, to facilitate the trade and commerce of the country, and in doing so, they will increase its extent and bring prosperity in its train. There are two more links in the transportation policy of this country to which I will refer very briefly. Another link in the transportation policy is the establishing of the Pacific cable. We believe, and I think the country believes, that the time has come when we should put ourselves in direct communication with the colonies with which we wish to build up a trade. We have sought to build up a trade with one of those colonies for many years, actually having sent commissioners there for the purpose of ascertaining what products we could send there profitably; and I think it would be wisdom on the part of the Canadian Government and the Canadian people, irrespective of politics, to establish a cable between the western portion of our territory and New Zealand and Australasia.

There is another point which I wish to mention, because it has reference to a project which I opposed a few years ago, and against which I think I made a speech in this House. It just shows how a person's opinion changes. That is, the fast steamship line. At that time, I believed it was not in the interest of the province of Ontario to subsidize a fast steamship line. But since the Government has entered upon this large policy of transportation, I feel compelled to withdraw my objection to a fast steamship line, which constitutes a part of the great system of transportation which the Government has taken in hand, and which, if they remain in power—and I am sure they will—they will carry to completion from ocean to ocean. Now, this may cost, and undoubtedly will cost, a good deal of money; for we shall have to put our ports in order, such as Montreal, Halifax, St. John, Que., Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton, Goderich, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Midland, Parry Sound, and some others. We can never control the trade until this is all accomplished. The hon. leader of the Opposition wanted to know what we had done. Although I cannot tell him that we have accomplished all this, I can say that we have entered with vigour and energy and determination upon the carrying out of this policy, believing it to be not only in the interest of the Liberal party, but in the interest of the farmers, the manufacturers, the artisans and every other class in the country. It is the great National Policy of the Liberal party.

Now, I will pass to the consideration of another and very important subject. Mr. Speaker, I believe that one of the most important things to obtain for this country, where we have so much vacant land, is population; and I am glad to see that the Government has taken energetic action towards securing as many people from abroad to come to this country as possible. The last Government did very little in that direction. The hon. leader of the Opposition the other night accused us in very strong language of having driven people away by our policy of 1874-78, under the Mackenzie Government. Speaking of the policy of that Government, the hon. leader of the Opposition expressed himself in these words:

Under their policy, Boston and New York were made the commercial capitals of Canada; under their policy, money went out of Canada to a foreign country for the products that our people required; under their policy, people finding no employment in this country were obliged to follow their money, and population was depleted, poverty was rife, and the only industry that these gentlemen were reluctantly compelled to recognize was that of soup kitchens for the poor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the palmiest days of the National Policy there were more people leaving this country than under the regime of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I can prove that by the record, and I challenge any hon. gentleman of the Opposition to disprove it. It was stated that no less than 23,000 a year had left this country during the Mackenzie regime. That is true, for during that time we had one of the greatest depressions that ever came over this country—not by the fault of Mr. Mackenzie at all; for that depression was world-wide, and was found in countries that had free trade as well as in the countries that had high protection, showing that no policy could have prevented it at that particular time. The hon. leader of the Opposition charged that the Government of that day had sent people away from the country, and then he said we had to send our money abroad for the purpose of bringing articles in to feed the people. Now, any person who lived during 1877 knows that there was a failure of the crops of this country in that year, and that they were not sufficient to maintain the population; therefore, we had to import wheat in that year to feed the people. Notwithstanding that, and what Sir John Macdonald called the insane policy or want of policy of the Liberal party, only 23,000 people per year on the average left the country. But the present leader of the Opposition said:

When we have established our National Policy, these people will be coming back; the people we will bring from abroad will stay with us, and our population will go on increasing by leaps and bounds to a far greater extent than ever before.

Now, let us look at the facts. The census of 1881 gave Canada a population of 4,125,000; the population of 1891 gave us a population of 4,833,000, or an increase during the ten years of 508,000 in round numbers. Now, let us see how many people were brought in under the policy of the Government during those ten years at an expenditure of $3,000,000. According to their own blue books—and any person who wishes to correct my figures can verify them on reference to the report of the Minister of Agriculture, who had charge of the immigration department at that time—between 1881 and 1891, there were 866,000 immigrants who expressed their intention of remaining in Canada and becoming Canadian citizens. The natural increase during the decade from 1871 to 1881 was 17 per cent, or 1.7 per cent per year, and I would be justified in using that as the increase that might be expected from 1881 to 1891. But I will be more lenient to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will take the natural increase in the United States from 1880 to 1890—these being years covering the decade for which the census was taken in the United States. That natural increase was 14 per cent for the decade, or 1.4 per year. If you take the population that we had in 1881, and take 14 per cent as the natural increase, you will find that we should have had a natural increase of 605,000, at the lowest calculation. Add the 605,000 natural increase to the 866,000 people which, the Government blue-books stated, came to the country, and you will have 1,471,000 people that we should have had in Canada in 1891, over and above the population of 1881. As a matter of fact, how many had we? We had actually 508,000, and, subtracting that 508,000 from the 1,471,000 which we should have had, it leaves 963,000 unaccounted for. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to try and point out why these 963,000 were not in Canada. That shows an exodus of 96,300 every year under the National Policy, as compared with 23,000 under the policy of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. What have we done since we have come into power? The exodus, to a very, very large extent, has ceased, and, in fact, the Toronto "Mail" was forced to say, a few months ago, that the exodus was a thing of the past. I saw in a newspaper, a day or two ago, that some of the Lower Canadians were going to the United States at the present time; but that is explained by the fact that a comparatively large number of French Canadians go to the Eastern States every spring to work during the summer months, but return in the fall of the year; so that, such a temporary emigration cannot be counted as permanent.

Under the policy of this party, we have succeeded in bringing about a great influx of population from foreign countries. Last year we brought in 31,702 immigrants, the largest number which came into our country for many, many years, and what is remarkable about it is, that the effect of our policy has been to re-establish confidence in the people who left this country for the United States in times past, and who are now returning, since they know that the Liberal party is in power. A large number of Canadians who left us under the National Policy, are now coming back to enjoy the prosperity of Canada under the régime of the Liberal party. We have brought in from the United States this last year no fewer than 9,986 persons. A large number of these were formerly Canadians, but now that they are assured that the old National Policy is as dead as it possibly can be, and that a more liberal policy has succeeded it, they are flocking into the North-west and taking up homesteads in greater numbers than ever these homesteads were taken up before. As I have said, we spent $261,000 last year for immigration purposes. But, Sir, when we put that on the one side, and consider the amount of wealth and material which these immigrants brought with them, we will find that this money has been very profitably spent. These immigrants last year brought with them $2,828,675 worth of settlers' effects, and bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that not less than $2,324,457 of settlers' effects came from the United States. Our country to-day is that much richer than it was before. By expending $261,000 we have got 32,000 inhabitants into Canada to add their strength, and vigour, and intelligence to our country, and these immigrants have brought with them nearly $2,500,000 worth of property. We have, therefore, made a very good investment indeed on the money we spent for immigration purposes. Does not that policy of the Liberal party prove to the leader of the Opposition that this Government has added more than "a jot or tittle" to the well-being of the country? Sir, the electors of this country will be grateful for that, when we ask of them a renewal of their confidence and support. Another pleasing fact with regard to the North-west Territories is, that the number of homesteads taken up last year was the largest of any previous year since the North-west was established. True, in 1882 there were 7,483 homesteads, and in 1883, 6,063 homesteads; but it must be remembered, that in the year 1882 there were 3,492 homesteads cancelled. That means more than simply the cancellation: it means that so many people went in there and took up these lands, but they became so disgusted with the maladministration of affairs, that they left their homesteads. Now, last year there were 4,848 homesteads taken up, and only 155 cancelled, which gave a net of 4,715, against 4,230, the highest ever taken up during any previous year. Does any person believe that this has come about by chance? Does any person believe that it would have occurred, were it not for the vigorous immigration policy of the present Government? Sir, this proves the wisdom of the immigration policy which has been established by our friends in power.

There has been another worthy achievement since we came into power, an achievement which was a benefit to all parties concerned, and I do not think that any member of the House will, in his inmost heart, deny that this act of the Liberal Government was beneficial. There may be some difference of opinion as to the excellency of the substitution we made, but there is no difference of opinion in regard to the necessity for abolishing the old Franchise Act. It was cumbersome and expensive to all parties concerned. I frequently heard leading Conservatives say that the old Franchise Act was just as odious to them as it could be to the Liberal party, because frequently they had to put their hands in their pockets and pay out large sums of money to have the voters' lists prepared. That Franchise Act cost $1,156,000 in cold cash to the people of this country, and yet we had only four revisions. It placed the making out of the lists in the hands of partisans, and if we had been dishonest enough to take advantage of the Act and place the revision of the list in the hands of our friends, we could have secured a victory through the instrumentality of the Act alone. But when we came into power, knowing the partisan character of the Act, knowing it was contrary to the interests of the country, we, notwithstanding our power to utilize it to our own advantage, swept it from the statute-books, and replaced it by an Act fair and impartial to all concerned.

We have accomplished other things. We have brought about manhood suffrage in the province of Ontario. We believe that every young man should, when he reaches the age of majority, have the right to vote if there is nothing against him which would in law prevent him from voting. The Liberal party was the first to regard manhood as the basis of franchise. The Conservative party took property as the basis. A few hundred dollars' worth of property, $150 in the country, $300 income, so much assessment, so much tenancy, entitled a man to vote, but we give him the right, irrespective of his property. We look to the man himself and not to the property he owns.

We also have secured in the province of Ontario, for which we are greatly indebted to the Government, the recognition of the principle of one man one vote. It has always been our contention that no man should have but one vote. Any one can see the injustice of the opposite principle. One man might have $500 worth of property in five adjoining constituencies, and could poll his vote in the one day at each polling subdivision, whereas another man might have $100,000 invested in one section, and would only have one vote. We, however, have established the principle of one man one vote in the province of Ontario.

Another reform, and a very important one, which we secured, is that of residential voting, and by this reform we have excluded the influence of railway corruption which carried voters 2,000 or 3,000 miles to vote at an election on behalf of the one political party or the other and gave them free passage. It was astonishing how many people wanted to go home at election time to see their parents and obtain a free passage, through the instrumentality of the railways, and invariably these people gave their votes in favour of the party whom the railway supported. The party opposed to these railways had therefore, in order to meet these kind of tactics, to impose on themselves a heavy burden in order to bring people from a distance to vote.

There are one or two more points with which I have to deal before I pass on to the large question, the question of the tariff. But let me first draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock) has not only reduced the expenditure in the Post Office Department and succeeded in diminishing the large deficit which prevailed when he came into office of about $700,000 to less than $50,000, but he has besides cancelled contracts which were given by his predecessors at very extravagant prices, and re-let those contracts at reasonable rates without at all impairing the efficiency of the service, thus saving to the country about $180,000 more. Further than that, he has secured for us Imperial penny postage. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that we do not feel the advantage of that boon very much, but they must admit that the thousands of immigrants who are scattered broadcast over the prairies can appreciate thoroughly the benefit of paying only 2 cents on an ounce letter to England, instead of 10 cents, as they did formerly. Under the late Government an ounce letter to England and back cost 20 cents, but under the present Administration it only costs 4 cents, being a discrimination in favour of the settlers of 300 per cent, and every one knows that the letters from these immigrants praising the country are far more effective than any amount of speeches by immigration agents, for if an immigrant likes the country and tells his friends at home across the Atlantic that this is a land flowing with milk and honey, a land of freedom, a land governed justly and well, and advises them to come out, such advice has a more potent influence than any pamphlet that could be published or any speeches that could be made. Then there is the reduction in the postage on Canadian letters. It has been said that in this we are simply taking the burden off one shoulder and putting it on the other. That remains to be seen. I believe that there will be an increase in the letters sent throughout this country that will go far to counterbalance the loss of revenue. I believe that this reform will largely lead to the disuse of postal cards, because it has always appeared to me very mean on the part of business men to send postal cards in which any private business is referred to, and no doubt the reduced rate will cause business men to send their letters, like gentlemen, inclosed in envelopes at the reduced rate of postage, rather than use the postal cards. Therefore, I am confident that the increased returns of revenue will, in a very few years, more than counterbalance the loss of revenue at the outset.

I come now to one more question, and that is the tariff. I do not propose to deal with it in detail, but neither do I propose to let it alone. I want to meet this tariff question just upon its merits. That is a question which in the last few years has been more prominently before the public than it probably will ever be again. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we have stole their clothes. But I hardly think they would now wear again the clothes themselves which they say we have stolen, and certainly we would be in a very sorry plight if we had to adopt them. I am satisfied that the readjustment we have made in the tariff is largely satisfactory to the people, because it must always be borne in mind that all tariff arrangements must necessarily be in the nature of a compromise. We have to make compromises between conflicting interests. You cannot base a tariff on mathematical principles, for when you impose duties on one article you affect one person prejudicially while benefiting another. Therefore, in a readjustment of the tariff you have to consider the whole situation. We have not only readjusted the tariff and shifted the burden on to shoulders better able to bear it, but we have reduced the tariff to a very considerable extent. We have reduced it on over 100 articles, and in addition to that reduction in the general tariff, we have made a further reduction in the duties of 25 per cent. I know the objection is raised that this 25 per cent applies only to articles coming from Great Britain, and that very few articles of some kinds come from Great Britain. Well, we cannot help that. We have thrown out to Great Britain the offer that any article she manufactures, in any line whatever, for export to this country, will come in at a reduction of 25 per cent on the duties levied on similar articles from other countries. Then, I believe that in a year or two the English manufacturers will so modify their plant and their methods as to establish a larger business with Canada. We all know that it is impossible for large manufacturing industries in the old country in a short time to turn to the supply of a new market. But, as they find that it is an advantage to them—and they must find it so—they will prepare to supply the demand in Canada. And what will be the results? In the first place, we give a new market to the British manufacturer; and, in the second place, we secure the article cheaper for the Canadian consumer, for these goods must come into competition with others, and the manufacturers of this country, as well as exporters from the United States will have to reduce their prices.

Now, it is said that we have benefited the farmers very little. I would like, as much as anybody, to see the farmers benefited, for I represent a farmers' district. But I believe that the farmers realize that they have been benefited by the readjustment and reduction of the tariff. I would like to read a short list of articles in respect to which the farmers have benefited. This list shows the extent to which duties have been reduced:

Now, I might give you many more, but you have there a sample of articles used by the farmers. You will find that on these there has been quite a large reduction. Hon. gentlemen opposite ask, why we did not make greater reductions. I see that one hon. gentleman looks as if he intended to follow me. I would like him to tell this House, and tell the country, this: If his friends came into power at the next general election, would they reimpose the duties we have taken off? If they would not, they cannot say that our policy was taken from theirs; moreover, the fact that they would not reimpose these duties shows that the reductions are in the interest of the people at large. It cannot be said that the preference to England was taken from the Conservative policy. We offered that policy to the Conservative party in 1892, in a motion presented by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Sir Louis Davies). The Conservatives objected, every one of them voting against it. We told the people, that if we came into power, we would give a preference to Great Britain in the Canadian market. That policy we have carried out, and with good results—with the result of the expansion of trade, the denunciation of the treaties with Belgium and Germany, and greater freedom in the manipulation of our own finances and customs.

Now, I think I have pretty well answered the hon. gentleman. He asked me, what we had done since we came into power, and I think I have given a great range of things the Liberal party has done, both during its present term of office and when it was in office before. I am going to ask the hon. gentleman to consider the results of what the Government has done. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, that all these good things have come about by some means for which no credit is due to the Government. Some hon. gentlemen say it is the result of good crops and high prices. I would ask the hon. gentleman who is to follow me, to say if it is not true, that we have had better crops than we had in 1898. In 1895 we had better crops in Manitoba, as well as better prices. In 1884, and again in 1886, were good harvests, and surely we had higher prices. Why did not this great prosperity come then? Had not we a famine in India, a few years ago, because they did not raise enough wheat to feed the famishing people there? Had we then the same results that we have now? The hon. leader of the Opposition says that our present prosperity is a reflection from the National Policy. But will any hon. gentleman undertake to establish that contentions? Inquire of any of our financial institutions, and you will find that there is universal confidence and business is good. Let me give a few figures showing the expansion which we have made. It will be interesting even to those who may not agree with me, to know the facts in connection with our country. I am sure it would be interesting to the hon. member for St. Ann's, Montreal (Mr. Quinn) to know what that city has been doing in the last year or two. In 1895-96 we had a total trade of $232,000,000. Under the Liberal policy in 1897-98 it rose to $304,000,000. I remember the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) declaring that the expansion of trade is the result of the National Policy. We find an increase of 31 per cent of trade in less than three years. And we find that for the first seven months of the current year trade goes on in the same expansive way. The total trade for those months was $196,000,000. If it continues in the same ratio to the end of the year, this year we shall have a total trade of $336,000,000, an increase, as compared with 1896, of 50 per cent. Then, again, look at the expansion of trade in the farmers' products. There has been an increase of 23 per cent in the export of cattle; 82 per cent in the exports of ham and bacon; 94 per cent in the exports of butter; 25 per cent in cheese; 430 per cent in poultry and game; 55 per cent in eggs; 200 per cent in wheat; 655 per cent in flour; 1,010 per cent in oats; 52 per cent in oatmeal, and 39 per cent in pease. There is another thing. We are told that we have not brought into this country from other countries a greater trade than we had before. I find that last year we brought in 23,234 tons weight of cargoes into Canada more than came in the year before. In 1896, 8,132 vessels came into Canada in ballast, they could not find a cargo to bring into Canada. That number has been reduced last year by no less than 659. In 1896, vessels entered inward to the ports of Canada, carrying 2,619,831 tons weight; in 1898, two years after, vessels entered inward bearing a total of 3,569,469 tons weight, or a total increase of 949,648 tons, an increase in those two years of 36 per cent. Now there entered outward to Great Britain from Canada, in 1896, 1,010,908 tons; in 1898, 1,710,642 tons, or an increase of 690,734 tons, an increase of 69 per cent. Now I will speak of the city of Montreal, which may be taken as a test of other cities. There passed outwards to sea from the city of Montreal, in 1896, 699,102 tons weight of freight; in 1898 the quantity had risen to no less than 1,390,718 tons, or an increase of 691,616 tons exported from Montreal, or at the rate of 100 per cent increase. Now that is largely owing to the efforts of the Government in securing a through route to the city of Montreal.

Mr. TAYLOR. What through route to Montreal?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). A large proportion of this increase of trade took place at the city of Montreal.

Mr. TAYLOR. What additional through route is furnished for trade?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There was a greatly increased trade in butter, cheese and perishable articles that were carried in the cold storage which was established by the present Government, and which largely passed through Montreal. Other articles might be mentioned, which I have not the time to mention; but there is a sample for you to think over. Now take the city of Halifax. In 1896 there went out from that city 229,653 tons ; in 1898 that number had increased by 55,770 tons, or an increase of 25 per cent. In St. John the increase of trade was 60 per cent. Now, let us take another view of Canada's prosperity. I have just been speaking of the trade on the ocean, I will now speak of the coasting trade that is taking place upon the lakes and the rivers between the United States and Canada. That has increased from 2,244,211 tons in 1896 to 2,432,084 tons in 1898, an increase of 188,873 tons. There were 1,078 more vessels engaged in the coasting trade in 1898 than in 1896.

There is another point I want to bring before you. Canada never had such a growing time before. Is it any wonder? We are told that the growing time began when the party of protection came into power. I cannot understand that at all. Can any hon. gentleman opposite tell me why the growing time did not commence in 1894, in 1895, in 1896, or in 1882, or in 1884, or in any other year previous to 1896? Why was the growing time delayed until the Liberal party came in? I heard a cruel Liberal say on a public platform a year and a half ago, that it was a providential act that the gold in the Yukon was not discovered when the Tory party was in power. He believed that Providence had kept that country under snow and frost until the Liberal party came into power that they might utilize it for the benefit of the people. Let me give you some more evidence of a growing time. Our friends opposite used to quote a good deal from the condition of the banks. I find in looking over bank stocks that the highest average price paid for stocks in 1896, in 11 banks, was 173½. These 11 banks were: Montreal, Toronto, Merchants, Commerce, Dominion, Hamilton, Standard, Imperial, Molsons', British North America and Ontario. Now you all know that the value of the stocks in any institution is an indication of the prosperity of that institution. As banks deal largely with the people in handling their money, in business and trade, the value of the stocks indicate not only the prosperity of the banks, but it indicates also the prosperity of the people. In 1898 the average price of stocks in those banks was 193½, or 20 higher than it was in 1896. Take another indication of the growing time, also from the banks. In 1896 there were $29,429,000 worth of bank notes in circulation in Canada. That would indicate the amount that was required to do the business that was carried on at that time. In 1898, the circulation rose to $36,917,000, or about $8,000,000 more of bank notes in circulation in 1898 than in 1896, showing an increased activity in all branches of trade. Let me give you still another indication of a growing time. We will go back a little to a period under the National Policy. Take the five years from 1883 to 1887, inclusive. We find that there were on an average $100,000,000 deposited in the banks of Canada. In 1898, on the 30th of September, there were deposited in the banks of Canada $239,000,000. There was an increase of 139 per cent in the deposits in the banks of Canada under the present policy more than under the palmiest days of the National Policy. Let me give you another indication of the prosperity of Canada under the regime of the Liberal party. In January, 1898, there were $79,196,000 deposited in banks payable on demand.

In January, 1899, the amount payable on demand deposited in the banks was $86,878,000, so that there was $7,682,000 placed on deposit payable on demand in the banks of Canada more in 1899 than in 1898. Can any hon. gentleman say that this is owing to the reflection of the old, discredited, worn out, threadbare, tattered National Policy that did so much harm to the people of this country? Now, let me give you another bank evidence of the prosperity of the country. The bank clearings of Canada always give an indication of prosperity of the country. The bank clearings in 1897 amounted to the large sum of $1,174,710,345, while the bank clearings in 1898 amounted to $1,390,019,344, showing an increase of $215,308,999, comparing 1898 with 1897. The increase at Montreal was $130,180,000, Toronto, $77,732,000, Winnipeg, $6,318,000. Where was there ever such an exposition made under the National Policy as we can make to-day: was there ever such a general prosperity pervading every class under the National Policy as under the policy of to-day? I will give another evidence of prosperity, the evidence showing the prosperity of the various institutions established in this country and doing business here. I will take ten companies, as follows: The Bell Telephone Company, the Montreal Street Railway Company, the Toronto Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Dominion Cotton Company, the Montreal Cotton Company, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, the Montreal Telegraph Company, the Coloured Cotton Company and the Dominion Telegraph Company. The value of the stock of these ten companies, doing business for the people of this country, naturally points to their prosperity. The highest average obtained for their stock in 1896 was 111, whereas the highest average obtained in 1898 was 140. That indicates general prosperity, not alone among the banks, but among the companies and institutions which I have enumerated. That is one more illustration of the growing times. I will take the loan companies, and I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite particularly to the loan companies. The loan companies make their money largely from loaning money, and as you all know the farmers of the country a few years ago borrowed largely and placed mortgages upon their properties, so much so that at one period there were no less than $275,000,000 in mortgages upon the farms of Ontario, but these mortgages are being reduced under the prosperous times we now have. The farming community are not obliged to borrow now as they were formerly, and the result is that the companies from which they were borrowing moneys formerly, instead of enjoying the prosperity of these other companies, have suffered a decrease in the value of their stock. I will take the following companies: The Canada Permanent Loan Company, the Freehold, Western Canada, Canada Landed Credit Company, Imperial Savings Company, London and Canadian, Dominion Savings, London and Ontario, Hamilton Provident, Huron and Erie and Manitoba. Here I have eleven companies, selected from the various companies doing business in the country, that used to make large profits by loaning money to parties who were hard-up, the farming community particularly, and how does their stock stand? The highest average price that all these companies got in 1896 was 117; the highest average price obtained in 1898 was 99½. Now, these statements prove the general prosperity of the people, not only of one section but of every section, for I have touched upon them all, and for the Liberal-Conservative party to say that this wave of prosperity has come to every section of the country through their discredited policy is to pay a poor compliment to the intelligence of the people of this country. If it be true that this policy has brought this prosperity, at the present time, are they not guilty of neglect in not bringing this prosperity in with that old discredited policy long before it came. Failures generally show the condition of the merchants of the country. In 1896, there were 2,179 failures in Canada, representing $16,208,000; in 1898, there were 1,427 failures representing only $9,644,000, or a reduction in failures of 752 in number, $6,556,000 in amount, and 40 per cent in percentage. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will bring my remarks to a conclusion. I think I have sufficiently answered the challenge that was thrown out by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I think I have shown him that we have done a great deal within two years and a half, and I think that no other Government in that length of time has ever done so much. I have shown you that we have settled the school question which was an irritating question; I have shown you that we removed the embargo upon live stock from this country, bringing hundreds of thousands of dollars into the pockets of the farmers; I have shown you that we have established a cold storage system which will largely increase the wealth of the farming community, as well as increase the profits of those engaged in the trade. I think I have shown you that we have a progressive transportation policy involving the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, the deepening of the canals, the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and the reduction of railway rates to which I have referred. We propose to do in the future more than we have attempted to do in the past; we propose to establish upon the Atlantic a fast steamship service; we propose, I hope, within the next five years, to establish a Pacific cable from the west to New Zealand and Australasia; we propose to extend our trade to the Orient as soon as we can accomplish it. And, Sir, I would ask what are the parts of the policy of the hon. gentlemen that we have stolen? Have we stolen the transportation policy from the Liberal-Conservative party; have we stolen the wise immigration policy, which we have been pursuing, from the Liberal-Conservative party? Even if it were as they have said, that we stole the whole tariff policy from them, it is only a bagatelle when we compare it with the great policy upon which we have entered, upon which we intend to go to the country, and for which the country will stand, not to increase the debt but to invest their moneys in public works, that will bring in a return for the investment, and when we go to the country I am sure we will come back here with an increased majority over that which we possess to-day.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) with a great deal of pleasure because his speech was so different from the kind of speeches he used to make when he occupied a seat on this side of the House. It was blue ruin then from the beginning to the finish. Did you ever hear him defend the development of the country as he defended it to-night? I tell you it is worth something to allow these hon. gentlemen to get into office, because it makes them loyal and patriotic, and as a good Canadian I do not grudge them the office for the sake of the improvement it makes in them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) wants to know why we are prospering under the policy pursued by the Liberal Government. The answer is easy; it is because the Liberals are carrying out the same old National Policy. They reduced the National Policy tariff about 1 per cent, they declare they have made a great change, and on the strength of that 1 per cent reduction, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) says the Liberals have carried out their pledges, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), when he was in West Huron, claimed that they had fulfilled all their pledges except the reform of the Senate—and they were at that. The Postmaster General must have made a great effort to stretch his imagination when he made such a statement, because no intelligent man has an idea that the Government has made even an honest attempt to begin to fulfil their promises. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) could not let the old Franchise Bill alone, although it is dead and buried and his friends have given us a new one in its place. He told us that the reason the Liberals were opposed to it was because it gave an unfair advantage to one side. I have always disputed that contention, and I have never seen the slightest evidence in its favour, because we all know that as a rule the county court judges were the revising barristers, and they were fair men. I know two county court judges who were the revising barristers for Frontenac, Lennox, Addington and the city of Kingston; they were both Liberals, but I have yet to hear one single complaint about anything they have ever done, other than perhaps they might have made a few mistakes which no person could avoid. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. Macdonald), has in very strong language, justified the Intercolonial Railway extension to Montreal. I have known the hon. gentleman since he first entered Parliament in 1887, and I wonder if any one who knows him as I do, believes that if he were in Opposition and a Conservative Government had extended the Intercolonial Railway, he would have approved of it. Not at all. He would have seen the matter through very different glasses, and instead of approving that scheme—which I do not believe is beneficial and which he did not use to believe would be beneficial—he would have vigorously denounced it. Why, Sir, the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway shows that the extension is not in the interests of the country. Indeed, there was not business enough for all the railways that previously existed between Montreal and Quebec. The deficit on the Intercolonial Railway, as shown by Mr. Pottinger, was $139,979.66 for the last year, but Mr. Pottinger does not take into account the rent that was paid on the Drummond County road and the Grand Trunk Railway, which Mr. Schreiber does take into account, and which makes the deficit actually $209,976.66. Well, Sir, the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway under the administration of the Liberal Government, the year before the Drummond County extension was $59,940.65, and in the year 1896, the last year of the Conservative Government the deficit was $55,187.52. Still, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) seems to think that the Liberal Government has accomplished wonderful things in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. These gentlemen, when in Opposition, used to contend that all of the road which was completed should be maintained out of current expenses, and not out of capital account. Had that been done under this Government, instead of the deficit being the sum I have mentioned, it would have been $462,735. Still, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) rejoices over the great success of the Liberal administration of the Intercolonial Railway. I could give the hon. gentleman an answer with regard to the extravagance of the Government out of the mouth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce if I choose to take the time to read it, and I could also answer him from the columns of the Huntingdon "Gleaner," a good Liberal newspaper, which generally views things from a business standpoint, and not from a party point of view. As a rule, the criticisms of the Huntingdon "Gleaner" are fair and honest, and although I do not always agree with them, yet in this particular case, the "Gleaner" has struck the nail on the head. Perhaps before I conclude I shall give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) a little of that kind of criticism on the Liberal Government to demonstrate what his political friends think of the extravagance which now reigns supreme. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) tried to enumerate the different things the Liberal Government had to spend money on, and which the Conservative Government did not have to spend money on, but he failed to account for anything near the increased expenditure, which amounts to $1,500,000. And, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) could not account for the actual increased expenditure, what does he say about the promises of the Liberals out of power to reduce the Conservative expenditure by three or four million dollars a year. It does seem to me that honest men, men who have respect for their word and their character, if they have not kept their word, ought to be able to give a good reason why. If these gentlemen opposite would rise in this House, and give a good reason why they could not keep their word, then the people would think more of them; but they sit there guilty of open violation of their pre-election pledges, and the people will hold them responsible for it when the proper time comes.

There was one subject which has cropped up many times in this debate, and which my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) skimmed very lightly over. He told us he has been a prohibitionist for forty years, that he is in favour of prohibition now, but he did not think the plebiscite vote in favour of prohibition was strong enough to justify a prohibitory law, and he looked over on this side of the House, and he wondered where all the temperance men here had come from lately. Well, Sir, I was at a meeting of the Alliance upstairs not long ago, and I wondered to see some Liberal members of Parliament who had been prohibitionists all their lives, wobble on the question, and I wondered how readily their politics came in. It occurred to me when I looked at them, that there were more politicians than temperance men, and that is the trouble with the prohibition question at the present time. It is not at all because the country is not ripe for it, that these gentlemen are not now advocating prohibition. So far as I am concerned, I have always been a prohibitionist whether in this House or out of it. Every vote I have given whether on local option or on the larger question has always been in favour of prohibition.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You are working at it now.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, and I believe you are not. There is another gentleman who used to take a very great interest in prohibition, and who is drawing a very good salary from the country at the present time, but I notice he is conspicuous by his absence nearly all the time during this debate. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who has been a prominent prohibitionist ever since I knew him. Long before I was in Parliament I recollect being in the city of Ottawa one day when Mr. Foster moved a resolution with reference to prohibition, and Mr. Fisher, then member for Brome, seconded it. I remember, too, the beautiful basket of flowers presented to him by the temperance people of Canada. I wonder if the temperance people will send him a basket of flowers now.

Mr. BENNETT. No, they will send him onions.

Mr. WILSON. Now, Sir, I have got a few facts here with reference to the temperance question, and these facts may be interesting to the House. I have here a report of a temperance convention held in the city of Montreal in 1888, when the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was first vice-president of that association. He was also a member of the committee on legislation and on political action, and I want to read to this House a resolution that was passed—remember this is nearly eleven years ago—declaring that the temperance people then felt that the country was ripe for prohibition. And yet my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who has been a prohibitionist for forty years, eleven years later feels that we are not quite ready for prohibition yet. The resolution reads:

That an emphatic demand be made for the immediate enactment of a well-devised law for the whole Dominion, prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors. That such steps be taken as will organize and unify the temperance electors to secure the nomination and election for every public position of a representative who is a known and avowed prohibitionist, and who can be relied on to do all in his power to obtain the enactment and enforcement of prohibitory legislation; and also to oppose every candidate who is not in favour of this important measure of moral reform.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) will have his hands full next election, because he will have to oppose all his colleagues. I fear, if he carries out the policy of this resolution. There was another resolution proposed at the same meeting, in opposition to the compensation of the liquor men for any loss they might sustain in consequence of their business being prohibited. The hon. Minister of Agriculture was a pretty good temperance man then, but he was not drawing $7,000 a year as a member of the Government. He was simply a member of the House of Commons, and he made a speech on that occasion, of which the following is a short synopsis:

Mr. Fisher, M.P., supported the resolution in a vigorous speech, in which he explained his conduct in Parliament, and strongly justified opposition to the compensation theory. The prohibition for which we are working, concluded the member for Brome, is prohibition without compensation, and those temperance people who are not with us in this very important feature had better get out of our ranks.

Well, Sir, I am a prohibitionist, and I am in favour of compensation, because I think it is right. I do not think much of temperance men who are only temperance men because they do not drink whisky. I think a temperance man should be such in all the walks of life; and if the United States had followed the example of England, and bought her slaves, instead of having a rebellion, she would have been much better off. I think the temperance men of this country will do a great deal more for their country, and make prohibition a success, by paying the liquor men, if they are honest, and letting them know that they oppose their business because they think it is wrong. Now, I want to quote from what has been called the Liberal bible. This book is so scarce, I am told, that you cannot get one now for love or money.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Where did you get that book?

Mr. WILSON. I got it from an honest man; you can guess that I did not get it from some people. Now, I want to read the resolution that was proposed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I believe he was honest at that time, and desired to have his party committed to prohibition, if possible. That is my honest opinion of Mr. Fisher. I do not say, he is not honest yet; I only say, he is acting very curiously. This is the resolution:

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I cannot see any sense in taking a plebiscite, unless you intend to act on it, if the vote is favourable. As a matter of course, if the vote had been against prohibition, that would have ended it for a long time. There was a gentleman at that convention, who was not a prohibitionist, but who, I believe, told the convention the truth on this question. He told them, that if they went to the country on the plebiscite, and there was a majority in favour of prohibition, it would be their bounden duty to insist, in every way they possibly could, to carry a prohibitory law. Now, I will just read what the Hon. T. W. Anglin said:

It may be said, indeed, that this resolution only asks for a plebiscite. But what do we mean when we ask for a plebiscite if we are in earnest? Is it not that we desire to know what the opinion of the people is on this question; that we desire to ascertain their opinion in a particular way, and that we will do all in our power to give effect to their decision as thus ascertained? It may be that not one-half of the adult male population will vote. Nevertheless, should a majority be obtained at the polls when this question is submitted, the friends of prohibition will be in a position to call upon the Liberal party to follow up their resolution logically by assisting in the passage and enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law.

It does seem to me, that was a reasonable conclusion for any honest man to come to—that if they were going to submit a question to the people, they ought to act upon the opinion of the people. A little further on, he says:

I have simply come forward to protest, as one member of the Liberal party, against this resolution being adopted as a plank of the Liberal platform, because it would bind us to a plebiscite, and, if a majority in favour of prohibition were obtained by any means whatever, to become advocates of a prohibitory liquor law.

That is the position the Liberal party are in to-day. They caused $250,000 to be placed in the Estimates last year to take a plebiscite; the vote was polled, and a respectable majority was given for prohibition; and still the answer of the Prime Minister to the prohibitionists is, that the vote was too small. Well, Sir, I have learned from the Toronto "Globe," that the hon. Minister of Agriculture attended another convention, where he was, apparently, the chairman of a committee on political action. He read to the convention the following report, and if he lives up to it, I am afraid he will have a quarrel with some of the hon. gentlemen who sit around the Council board with him, because it is so strong that, when it comes to be a tug of war between his politics and his temperance principles, he will have to hold to his temperance principles, and give up his politics:

(1) That this convention stands firmly by the position that in political matters they will support only known avowed and reliable prohibitionists.

He cannot support the members of the present Cabinet—

(2) That the members of this convention hereby agree that, upon returning to their homes, they will forthwith place themselves in communication with other prohibitionists in their respective localities, for the purpose of securing the nomination, in harmony with this view, of candidates for the next Dominion and provincial elections.

(3) That to aid in securing the nomination and election of such candidates, our friends everywhere are urged to organize prohibition clubs, which will take advantage of every opportunity to plan and work for the carrying out of the objects above set out.

(4) It is recommended that the provincial branches of the Dominion Alliance, or other workers, take active steps to organize the temperance forces in every constituency, with the view to political action.

(5) It is recommended that, in order to secure the nomination of prohibition candidates, our friends take a more active part in political organization, so as to secure the nomination by all parties, of men who can be depended upon to support the prohibition cause, and giving it to be understood distinctly that any other candidate will have our active opposition.

(6) It is also recommended that where such prohibition candidates cannot be nominated by any of the political parties, our friends nominate independent candidates, and make special efforts to secure their election.

Now, Sir, I do not know whether my hon. friend who presented this report to the convention took any action there to form clubs in the different counties, or whether he tried to bring out independent candidates to support the temperance cause. But if he did, he evidently did not succeed very well, for so far as I can see, the people from his part of the province, with the exception of two or three, are all against prohibition. The result is that though he may have been honest in his efforts he certainly was not successful. Well, Sir, the Liberals succeeded at the polls, and on the 4th of September, 1896, a very large meeting assembled in the Railway Committee Room of this House and arranged that three persons should address the Government. These were Mr. McLaren, Q.C., Mrs. Alexander, and Mr. Dougall, of the Montreal "Witness." Of course the right hon. gentleman with the sunny ways met them, as he always meets deputations, very courteously, and told them that he was a very strong temperance man himself. I shall just read a few words of what he said:

He agreed with Senator Vidal and Mrs. Alexander that the cause of temperance was one of the greatest questions in the civilized world, and he was pleased, as an ardent advocate of temperance, to note the great progress which the cause had made within the last twenty-five years. And after a few more pleasant words he got through. Then we had the Minister of Agriculture, who has everywhere in the past preached temperance, and whose life, so far as I know, has been in accord with his professions:

Mr. Fisher said that he felt he had been selected for a seat in the Cabinet largely as the representative of the temperance sentiment; but he assured his hearers that the temperance cause had many other friends in the Council chamber.

They do not seem to be so plentiful now.

The Government had no intention of putting off the plebiscite until the next general election.

Then came a few words from Sir Oliver Mowat, and the deputation went home feeling that, as a matter of course, they would have a fair test, unencumbered with other questions, as prohibition ought to be, but so far as the Minister of Agriculture is concerned, I do not know that he made any great effort in the Cabinet to have such a test applied. On the 13th May, 1897, a deputation of the liquor men waited on the Government, which of course received them—and very properly so—as courteously as they did the others. The liquor men asked the Government that an absolute majority of all the electors of the entire Dominion and territories should be required before the Government took any step towards introducing a measure of prohibition. Whether it was with these gentlemen the right hon. First Minister made the promise that 50 per cent of the voters on the list should vote for prohibition before it could be had or not, I do not know, nor does it seem to come out in that interview. The first objection which the right hon. gentleman raised was the financial one, he said the Government would lose $8,000,000 of revenue, and he did not know how to raise it unless by direct taxation, and he was afraid the people would not favour that, although the temperance men are so enthusiastic over this matter that they declare that it is a perfectly right and proper way to raise the deficiency. The hon. gentleman did not seem yet to have made up his mind on that point, although four years had elapsed from the time the resolution was passed by the Liberal convention, because he said to the liquor men he was not prepared to say whether one-half or more or less of the people would be considered a conclusive majority. Even staunch prohibitionists, he said, were prepared to admit that a prohibitory law in any country could not be carried out unless backed up by the will of the people, and the Liberal party desire to stand by the will of the people. That does not seem to be their desire now. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was present on that occasion, and it seems to me, on reading what he said, that he had in his mind the debt of gratitude he owed to the right hon. First Minister for having on one occasion, when the hon. gentleman was in a very tight place in the riding of South Oxford, written to him a letter endorsing him as the candidate of the Reform party, and my hon. friend on this occasion, after saying a few words to the deputation, said that whatever Sir Wilfrid Laurier promised he guaranteed would be carried out.

Another deputation then waited on the Government before the vote was taken on the plebiscite—a deputation representing the general conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, on 28th March, 1898. The right hon. Prime Minister then said :

If the plebiscite meets with the support of the majority of the people, those who find themselves in a minority will have to concur in the verdict of the majority.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that a majority of the people could only mean a majority as expressed at the polls, because no one can tell what those who did not go to the polls would do. I have found a feeling of doubt in the sincerity of the Government to prevail in my own riding from my intercourse with the people. When I came to Ottawa I was told that it was hardly worth while to go to the polls and vote because the people had no confidence in the Government carrying out its pledge. I met a man in Ottawa who said to me : I was away from home and it would have cost me $7 or $8 to go home and vote, but I would have gone had I thought the Government would honestly carry out its pledge. Not having any faith in their promises I did not spend the money. If there is any gentleman on the Treasury benches who can tell us with whom this compact was made, that 50 per cent of the voters on the list would be required at the polls in favour of prohibition before it could be carried, we ought to know it. I am sorry the right hon. First Minister is not here, but whoever is leading the House ought to be able to tell us whether there was such an understanding or not, and with whom it was made. If that understanding was arrived at with any of the temperance leaders, and these leaders did not make it known to the temperance people, we ought to know it, because in that case they have not been honest with the rank and file and their usefulness is gone. The Alliance people from Montreal certainly said that they knew nothing about it and passed a resolution to that effect. To show how absurd it was to expect that, by any possibility, 50 per cent of the voters on the voters' lists could be had in favour of prohibition. Mr. Huxtable makes the following statement:—

I will give one definite illustration of the statements I have just made. In one polling subdivision of this city of Montreal there were 175 names on the list. It was situated in my own district. I sent a scrutineer to that poll, duly and legally authorized. The deputy returning officer peremptorily refused him admission to the poll. After the election was over I got a few gentlemen to examine the list. They went over it name by name. They made careful search. The result : Fifty of the men whose names were on the list were either dead, or had removed from Montreal. And yet, forsooth, Sir Wilfrid asks that we shall have a majority of all the names on the list.

I do not hesitate to characterize that demand as being the most unreasonable, and the most unfair that I ever heard or read of in all my life.

Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would like to know who Mr. Huxtable is. He tells us, in a letter written by him to the Montreal "Witness," which no doubt some hon. gentlemen opposite have seen, because that paper supports them pretty generally.

I have been a Reformer all my life. I gave my vote in the late election for Sir Wilfrid, but I will regard it henceforth as a duty I owe to my conscience, my country and my God to withhold from him my support. From all the information I can gather, such is the resolute determination of numbers of temperance men who have hitherto been his supporters.

Then, Sir, to show the unfairness of the action of the Government in this matter—in the maritime provinces, 71,000 votes were cast in favour of prohibition, and only 16,000 against. Will hon. gentlemen opposite say that these 16,000 must be heard, and the 71,000 must be ignored? I say that that is unfair treatment to the temperance people of this country, and I feel sure that, when the proper time comes, hon. gentlemen opposite will hear of it. But the hon. Prime Minister says he never made a pledge of prohibition to the temperance people. He claims that the pledge made at the convention was made to the Liberal party. I think that everybody knows that will not work. I think that, when any party issues a platform, it is to the whole people, and it is so drafted as to catch as many of the people as possible. That is its intention, as everybody knows. So, when he says he never made a pledge to the temperance people as a body, I think that is going a little out of the way, because the Liberal platform, contained in what somebody has called the Grit bible, is addressed to the whole people. Another surprising thing is, that the Prime Minister says :

Therefore, there was not a man living who expected that at the time the plebiscite was taken the duty would be imposed on the Government of introducing a prohibitory measure, unless at least one-half the electorate recorded their votes in favour of prohibition.

Well, Sir, I say that that is most unfair, that it is not treating the temperance people in this country in anything like a fair spirit. I notice that, when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) came forward in the convention to propose this resolution, he boasted about the high character of the Liberal party, how high morally, socially and intellectually they were, how their good character and desire to do good was drawing the young men of the country to them. I am afraid they have backslidden since that time, and that their word is not as good as it used to be. I do not intend to read these protests from several churches that I have here ; I will just read one from the Alliance, to show what their sentiment is. On March 14th, 1899, the following resolution was passed by the executive committee :—

Resolved that this meeting desires to express its strong dissatisfaction at the refusal of the Government to carry out the promise to take such steps as would give effect to the expressed will of the people, and earnestly calls upon the representatives of the people in Parliament to accept the mandate of the electorate, and carry it out by enacting such prohibitory legislation as will fairly embody the will of the people as expressed at the poll.

Now, the committee of the Methodist Conference met in Toronto, and they endorsed that, and went one or two better. They felt mortified that the Government should make such a promise, and when the vote was taken, should say : We will pay no attention to the majority, but will listen to the minority. It is pointed out by a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they came into office in 1896 with only 45 per cent of the vote ; yet they assumed the whole duties of Government, and nobody objected, because they had a majority of the constituents behind them. But they say now, that they cannot trust the people, even with a good majority of votes in favour of a reform like prohibition. Let me quote a few words from some prominent supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Rev. W. H. Kettlewell says :

I am so disgusted with the action of the Government in submitting a plebiscite and then fooling the voters that, given the opportunity, I would put it out of power, though I helped to place it there.

The Rev. A. D. Morton speaks as follows :—

I am now satisfied that the authorities have played a game of "bluff," and that the advocates of prohibition have allowed themselves to be duped. To me it would have been a thousand times more satisfactory if Sir Wilfrid, following the example of his predecessors, had manfully said, "I do not believe in prohibition, and will give no assurance in the matter."

That refers to Sir John Thompson. I happened to be in the Railway Committee Room, which was crowded at the time, when Sir John Thompson had the manliness to say he was not in favour of prohibition, and would not support it. But these gentlemen take the other tack. They were not in favour of prohibition, but they said : We will fool the people, and get their votes, and thus obtain power. I have here another resolution, which was passed by the Sons of Temperance. I will not read the resolution, but I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that it was moved by one of the strongest supporters of the present Government, Mr. W. H. Orr. I have met him in the Alliance, and I judge he is one of the dyed-in-the-wool Liberals. But the whisky in the Government's policy has taken the dye pretty well out of him.

I wish to show the vote by which this Bill was carried. It will be good reading, perhaps, in the future. The first fact in this connection is, that the prohibitionists secured a majority of nearly 14,000 of the votes cast throughout the Dominion. The second fact is, that prohibition was favoured by a majority in every province, except Quebec. But that is the only place, I suppose, that counts. It was the vote of Quebec that brought these people into power in the first place, and I suppose they must do what Quebec tells them. The following are the figures, showing the majorities for prohibition in the several provinces :—

|-----------------------------|--------|
| Ontario .....               | 39,224 |
| Nova Scotia.....            | 29,244 |
| New Brunswick .....         | 17,335 |
| Prince Edward Island .....  | 8,315  |
| Manitoba .....              | 9,441  |
| British Columbia.....       | 975    |
| North-west Territories..... | 3,414  |

The third fact is, that a majority for prohibition was secured in 138 constituencies, out of 186. The fourth fact is, that, outside of Quebec, four out of five of the constituencies went in favour of prohibition. The fifth fact is, that the majority for prohibition, outside of Quebec, was 107,948. Let me read a table giving the percentages for and against in the various provinces :

|---|----|
| Percentage of total vote polled for prohibition in Dominion .....       | 23 |
| Percentage of total vote outside of Quebec polled for prohibition ..... | 28 |
| Percentage against prohibition outside of Quebec .....                  | 16 |

The votes in the provinces stand as follows :—

Nova Scotia—

34 per cent for prohibition, and 5 per cent against.

New Brunswick—

30 per cent for prohibition, and 10½ per cent against.

Prince Edward Island—

37½ per cent for prohibition, and 4½ per cent against.

Manitoba—

25 per cent for prohibition, and 6 per cent against.

North-west Territories—

27 per cent for prohibition, and 12 per cent against.

Ontario—

27 per cent for prohibition, and 20 per cent against.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the opposition made to the plebiscite, that is a very large vote. In the first place, on the temperance side there was no personal interest in a monetary sense whatever. The temperance voter was not going to get any pay for his vote, or for the work that he did. Whatever contribution he made to the cause, was a loss sustained by himself. On the other hand, the men in the liquor business had an interest, their business was at stake. They made a legitimate opposition to the plebiscite, and nobody complained of their endeavouring to defeat it. In view of the fact that there was no excitement, no issue other than the simple question : Will you have prohibition or not, the vote that was polled in favour of prohibition, I think, is a very strong reason why we should have it. More especially should we have it when we know that in the province of Quebec a large number of Liberal members stumped their ridings against prohibition, and at least three Ministers of the Crown went out and spoke against it. Now, Sir, I think that is most unfair. Let me read what an hon. gentleman said at a dinner that the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) said last night the Minister of Public Works gave to himself. The hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion), the Minister without portfolio, speaking at that banquet, on the 20th September, just nine days before the vote took place, said :

He would have the citizens of Valleyfield remember that the plebiscite was not prohibition. The plebiscite had been granted by the Government simply to redeem a promise which it had made in a moment of weakness. He spoke only as a member of the party, not as a Cabinet Minister ; but in his opinion the granting of the plebiscite was the one mistake that the Government had made. Prohibition, said Mr. Geoffrion, was the antithesis of Liberalism ; it was opposed to the very essence of Liberal principles. Personally he had voted for the plebiscite because the party had pledged itself to grant the vote. The same reason had influenced many of the others. The prohibitionists would have their plebiscite, but they would have no prohibition.

Now, was that a fair thing for a Minister of the Crown to do, eight or nine days before the vote was taken ? To my mind that was most unfair. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is not present, because I would like to have asked him some questions in reference to this matter. There is another thing that I think ought to be very strongly put before the Government in connection with the prohibition question. It has been boldly stated on the floor of this House by an hon. member from the province of Quebec, that he knew there had been ballot stuffing, that frauds had been perpetrated in that election. It seems to me that charge should be investigated by the Government, and if it is true, the fact would afford another strong reason why we should have prohibition. There is no reason why the Government should sit idly by and see the people who honestly believe in prohibition, beaten out of it by the election being stolen from them.

An hon. MEMBER. They had an investigation in Manitoba.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, but there were political interests at stake, there they had something to gain ; but in this case they would have some political influence to lose.

Now, Sir, I would like to say a few words on reciprocity. That has been one of the strong points of the Liberal party ever since I knew anything about them. They have been willing to have reciprocity in almost any form, unrestricted, commercial union, continental free trade, or any other kind of trade that they could get. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) made no bones about saying that he wanted to get a fair reciprocity treaty with the United States, and in order to get it he was prepared to discriminate against Great Britain. I am glad to say that the Conservative party never went that far ; if they had, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, I should have had nothing to do with them. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has always been a great advocate of reciprocity with the United States. In 1890 he said :

The figures prove conclusively that we must trade with the United States, that we will trade with the United States, that even tariff walls cannot prevent us from seeking our natural custom. In spite of all the restrictions placed on our trade, we export more to the United States, and import more from the United States ; than any other country in the world, even Great Britain herself.

That was his statement in 1890. I have heard the hon. gentleman on the floor of this House a good many times, and I always thought it was a pity that he was not on the floor of the United States Congress, because I thought he would have found its atmosphere more congenial. But I notice that in a speech that he delivered in Chicago he has changed his mind. I propose using some figures in that speech to show that reciprocity according to the hon. member for North Norfolk was not exactly what he thought it was in the old days. That hon. gentleman was chosen to move the resolution on reciprocity at the Liberal convention in 1893, on which occasion he spoke as follows:—

I conclude—for my time is nearly up—by saying that reciprocity with the United States is not only desirable, but it is essential to the prosperity of Canada. I contend that this is a question of the utmost importance. It is an arrangement that the Liberal party can make, and it is an arrangement that the Conservative party never have honestly sought to secure. They have trifled with the people of this country; they have deceived the people; they have sent bogus missions to Washington proposing impossible terms for the express purpose of not getting reciprocity, for they did not want it, and would not have taken it upon any obtainable terms. They went down with a proposal foreordained to failure—that of reciprocity in natural products alone, because for twenty years American statesmen have declared that such a proposal never would be entertained. They have insulted your intelligence, they have trifled with your interests, and now if you desire reciprocity place your confidence in a party that will make honest efforts to secure it, and, I stake my reputation, will secure it if they are given the opportunity.

The hon. gentlemen have been given an opportunity; they have been in office for three years, they have not got us reciprocity yet. Did these hon. gentlemen ever want it; they have not wanted it during all these three years. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us time and again that it was our natural market. They went down there and spent six months, and the "Globe" said about the time they were coming back that they could see from the beginning that there was no chance of getting reciprocity; that the American people were protectionists and intended to stand by it. Well, Sir, they came into my county in the election in 1891 with reciprocity, and they beat me on it, or rather they beat me because I did not attend to the voters' lists. Here is a little sample of the kind of documents that were circulated in Lennox:

To the individual farmer, reciprocity would give 30 cents additional value on every bushel of barley, 40 cents on every bushel of peas, 40 cents on every bushel of potatoes, $4 a ton on hay, $30 on every horse worth less than $150, $10 on every head of cattle more than a year old, $1.50 on every sheep a year old, 75 cents on every lamb, and a similar increase upon every character of farm produce. Total amount that will be taken from the pockets of the Canadian farmers in one year, $5,820,000.

Now, Sir, this pamphlet pointed out that there was a way to get rid of that:

If the farmers desire the removal of the enormous barriers that have been placed between them and their natural market by the above schedule of duties, they have the remedy in their own hands—by supporting the Liberal party, the leaders of which have shown their earnestness in advocating a broad measure of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, the desired change can be effected.

Now, Sir, I contend that the United States has never treated us fairly, and the reason I take this matter up is that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) took it up, and I just took occasion to look it up a little further back. The old province of Canada was very anxious to have a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and in 1847 they made this change: The rate of duty at that time on American goods was 12½ per cent, and the old province of Canada reduced it to 7½ per cent. The rate of duty on goods coming in from Great Britain was 5 per cent and they raised it to 7½ per cent, the object being to place them both upon an equal footing in order that they would have a good opportunity of getting a reciprocity treaty from the United States. But in spite of that the Americans would have nothing to do with it. The old province of Canada made an offer in 1849, but to no purpose. Sir Francis Hincks visited Washington in 1850 to get a reciprocity treaty, but failed. They did get a reciprocity treaty in 1854, which I think was mutually beneficial to the United States and to Canada, but as soon as the time expired they gave the necessary notice, and the treaty was terminated in 1866. In the first session after confederation Canada offered to enter into reciprocal relations with the United States, but they refused, and again in 1869 an offer was refused. I do not think it will be worth while for me to go through the whole schedule, but there are perhaps a few items that I might call attention to. There is something that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has just discovered, and which the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has been looking for during a long time, and so far as I know, has not yet discovered. It is the home market. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in his Chicago speech, said:

Canada was not relying upon the American market for the disposal of her farm products, the development of manufacturing interests in Canada furnished a local market of an extensive character.

Mr. Charlton, in his Chicago speech, told the Chicago people that their tariff since 1867 had always been two or three times as high as ours. He also showed them that the balance of trade was against Canada to the tune of over $45,000,000 in 1898, and that since 1872 the balance of trade against Canada has been $333,372,000. Still the American people want to live by themselves, and I do not know, from what the right hon. Prime Minister said the other day, but what he is disposed to let them. In 1893 they took in animals and their products from Canada $4,192,920, while to other countries we shipped $4,301,470. Of agricultural products the United States took from us in 1898, $1,135,307 worth, while we sent to all other countries $33,215,188 worth. So that we sold to the United States of agricultural products and animals and their products $5,327,227 worth, and to the rest of the world $77,516,658; or, in other words, we sold to the United States of these classes of products 6½ per cent, while Canada's export to Great Britain was 90 per cent. It does seem to me that our natural market is not quite so strong in the United States as hon. gentlemen have represented it to be. Our total exports to Great Britain last year amounted to $104,781,787, and the balance of trade as against Great Britain and in favour of us was $71,960,000. They talk about our natural market, but you would think to hear these hon. gentlemen speak when they were in Opposition, when they occupied seats on this side of the House, that Canada lived for the United States. I have always contended that our natural market is the country which buys our goods, the consumer, and that if we only ship our goods to the United States, and they ship them to Great Britain they get the middleman's profit, whereas we are just as able to do that business ourselves and take our profit. That is the true policy for the Canadian people, and that is what I am favourable to and what my vote will be given for. The hon. member for North Norfolk went on to say that, notwithstanding the 12½ per cent preference that England got last year from Canada, the increase of imports from that country was smaller than from the United States as is shown by the following statement:—The total imports from Great Britain in 1897 amounted to $29,539,576 while during 1898 they were $32,827,043, an increase of $3,287,467, or an increased per cent of 11·12. From the United States in 1897, we imported $70,766,000 worth, and in 1898, $86,587,000, an increase of $15,821,000, or a percentage of increase of 22·35. Notwithstanding that last year we gave 12½ per cent preferential rate to Great Britain, they paid 29·06 per cent duty on their goods coming into Canada, while the United States only paid 25·04 duty, showing that notwithstanding the preferential tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite claim they have given to the mother country, still the manufacturers of Great Britain had to pay last year 4 per cent more for getting her goods into the Canadian market than did our neighbours to the south. I believe that was all arranged by the Government, because I believe that when the tariff was fixed it was fixed with the view, that while they pretended to give this great advantage to the mother country, they would lose but little in the way of revenue. There is another point about this tariff which is very singular to my mind. 72½ per cent of the goods on the free list are American goods, while 17·07 are British goods, and 9·08 per cent of goods on the free list come from the rest of the world. That shows whether these hon. gentlemen opposite have been as loyal and patriotic to the mother country as they pretend; my own judgment is the very opposite. I may conclude by quoting the words of Mr. McKinley when he introduced his tariff Bill into the House of Representatives of the United States. He said:

This Bill is an American Bill; it is made for the American people and American interests. We are not legislating for any nation but our own, for our people and for no other people are we charged with the duty of legislation. We say to our foreign brethren: We will not interfere with your domestic legislation; we admonish you to keep your hands off of ours.

Sir, I commend to the hon. gentlemen opposite the words of Mr. McKinley. It is the policy for Canada to pursue hereafter, and if we legislate in our own interests, instead of looking after these markets that there is nothing in for us, we will be better off. I did intend to refer to the inconsistencies of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I will dispense with it now, further than to say, that there seems to be a wide difference of opinion between the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). Once in a while the hon. member for Centre Toronto makes a speech and he talks like a Tory, and then the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) writes in his paper that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bertram) is a Tory in disguise, that it is strange he is supporting the Liberal party, and the hon. member for Lisgar winds up by demanding that the Government should carry out their pre-election pledges and give us free trade. Then the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) comes to the rescue of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) and he tells the people that the tariff is a dead issue, that it is settled, and that the Liberals will stand by it; and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) answers: We have elected you to carry out your pledges, we want you to stand by them, and the tariff issue is not dead by any means. It appears to me, Sir, that these hon. gentlemen ought to settle their little differences amongst themselves, before they say that their tariff policy has conferred any greater benefit upon the country than did the tariff policy of the Conservative party.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU. (Temiscouata). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, while I do not pretend to constitute myself on the floor of Parliament the champion of the French language, and opposed as I am to stirring up in this House or outside of it race and creed prejudices, still, I may be allowed to point out the fact that a good many French-speaking members have used their mother-tongue in addressing the House this year, and it is to be hoped that such a good habit will be persevered in, more particularly after the words just fallen from the young and eloquent member from North Simcoe. The French language has imprescriptible rights here, under the constitution of this country, and I deem it good policy from time to time to remind the House of that fact. We have, it is true, the Speech from the Throne, delivered yearly at the opening of each session by the representative of Her Majesty, proposed and seconded in the same way in the House of Commons, but that seems to me a little too platonical and I do not think I lay myself open to the reproach of jingoism when I say that, from the standpoint of a higher and uncontrovertable interest, we should go still further and walk in the footsteps of the hon. gentlemen who have during this debate addressed the House in French. I am well aware, as remarked by the hon. member for Gaspé, (Mr. Lemieux) that, in order to take an efficient part in the debates of the House, one must be able to speak, if not classically, at least fluently, the English language; but I may remark, Sir, that among those who have preceded us here, several have taken an active part in the debates of the House, in the French language. A name now recurs to my mind, among others, that of a man who often addressed the House, a man who was esteemed by everybody and who had no enemies; a man who through a railway accident was snatched from the affections of his friends and the admiration of those who were acquainted with him; a man, of whom, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said, upon a memorable occasion: that he was one of the most able, one of the most esteemed and one of the most conscientious members that ever sat on the floor of this House, and that no one could know him without admiring his strong, yet at the same time genial qualities.

I refer to our former colleague, my fellow-member as a notary, the regretted Mr. Dupont, member for Parliament for the county of Bagot. Every session, he used to stand up and address the House in French, a language he could wield with such mastery, either in defending his friends in power or later on in attacking the policy of his opponents, when a majority of the electorate of this country decided, in their wisdom, that it was time for a change of administration. Now, Mr. Speaker, although I do not possess the attainments nor the influence of our departed friend, I intend, however, to speak my mother-tongue so long as circumstances will allow, that is to say, so long as the electors of the county of Témiscouata, whom I represent here,—notwithstanding all the hon. member for Beauharnois may think and say—will continue to favour me with the confidence they have placed in me on the 6th of November, 1897; and were I to remain alone, I shall still say with the great poet, Victor Hugo:

“If there was but one, I would be that one.”
But I shall not remain alone; others will follow that example. And the day is perhaps not far distant when a representative of the English-speaking element of this country will be seen rising in his seat and addressing the House in the French language, amidst the plaudits of all Canadians, irrespective of race and religion.

The French language is the language of diplomacy, and it expresses warm feelings of the heart just as well as the cold arguments of reason; and it affords me a real pleasure to tell the country what I think of the policy of the Liberal party in the language familiar to those who sent me here to voice their feelings and their expectations. I listened with satisfaction to some of the words fallen from the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), and I applauded his courage and his pluck, when he stood up and told the House that the province of Quebec does not feel the want of a prohibition law, because her population is as sober and as moral as that of any other province of Canada and because they have at their disposal a local option law, the operation of which is all that can be desired. The hon. gentleman could bring no stronger proof that the people of Quebec are a sober and moral people than this fact, that, out of the nine hundred municipalities of which the province of Quebec is composed, there are seven hundred which, in their wisdom, through the organ of their councils, had deemed it fit not to grant any licenses within the limits of their jurisdiction. Take the county of Témiscouata, one of the most progressive counties of the province, and one justly noted for the morality of its population, and out of twenty-four municipalities, you will find that only one municipality, that of Fraserville, has thought it desirable to grant licenses. Not only is the province of Quebec justly remarkable for the morality of her population, but the people are just as loyal there as in any other province of confederation, and in that regard, her past record is a guarantee for the future. After what we have heard from the hon. Minister of Public Works, who has borne witness in clear and unmistakable tones to the loyalty of the Quebec population to the British Crown, French and Canadian though her people still remain at heart, I hope we shall hear no more about that question. But, Sir, if I have applauded some statements of the hon. member for Montmorency, I can not say the same of the speech pronounced by the member for Compton (Mr. Pope), which was nothing but a gratuitous insult offered to our province. While I am forbidden by the rules of the House to give the lie to the hon. gentleman, still I think it my duty to protest most emphatically against the charges he has levelled at the province of Quebec, when he stated that the majority, after the close of the polls, had been swelled by some occult means, and the ballot-boxes tampered with. Fortunately, prohibition is now a dead issue, so far as any future action of the Dominion Government is concerned, the vote on the plebiscite having dealt it a deadly blow, and I am glad to think that we have heard the last of that question and that it will never come up again for debate before this House. The contest was carried on quite peacefully throughout our rural constituencies; there was no agitation and the position taken by the clergy was a noble and unbiassed one. Those clergymen who thought it their duty to refer to the question, confined themselves to general explanations about the proposed legislation, while others kept silent on the matter, thus showing how much they relied upon the intelligence of the people, and how sure they felt that education,—which by the way is fast spreading throughout the province—and sound advice would turn the scale in the right direction.

Now, how did our opponents behave during the campaign which preceded the plebiscite vote on prohibition? I do not know what took place in other constituencies, but I may say that in Témiscouata, I had an opportunity of judging of the tactics of our opponents during one of my stumping tours through my constituency last summer, where I reviewed before the people the question of prohibition and the policy of the Liberal party. Now, what did our opponents say? They would tell the electors: "Vote for prohibition, so as to embarrass the Government. Should a majority in the country declare in favour of prohibition, the Government would have to redeem their pledges, and owing to a decreased revenue, they would be forced to impose direct taxation in order to face the deficit; and with direct taxation imposed by this Government, our coming into power would only be a question of time." This is what the Conservatives were heard to say throughout the county of Témiscouata. I entertain not the least doubt that, if an agitation had been carried on on a larger scale in Quebec, that province would have given a still larger vote against prohibition.

I think I would be remiss in my duty towards the electors of the province of Quebec and towards the strictly French Canadian electorate of the county of Témiscouata, if I did not now protest against the accusations brought down on the floor of this House in connection with the stuffing of the ballot-boxes and the supposed swelling of the vote against prohibition, after the close of the polls. That is a groundless accusation, because, were it well grounded, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) would not have failed to place upon the Orders of the Day an advice of motion for an investigation on the matter and undoubtedly the Government would have acceded to that request, confident as we are that such an investigation would result in vindicating our honour, and in bringing to confusion and to shame the slanders of our province. The hon.

member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and his friends told us that in 1896, during the electoral contest, appeals had been made to religious and racial prejudices. Now, Sir, in view of the record and well-known traditions of the Conservative party, I think the hon. gentlemen were ill-advised in making such statements. No doubt, the contest was a very bitter one, and the blows dealt on both sides, were keenly felt. But, I ask, had we not the right to tell our fellow-countrymen how glorious and creditable it would be to our people, were a French Canadian Prime Minister put at the head of public affairs in the Dominion? Besides, Sir, the Conservatives did not scruple to tell the people in 1896, and I speak with knowledge, as those words were spoken within my hearing, that "it was better to vote for a fanatical Protestant who was well disposed towards us, than for an unscrupulous Catholic who refused to mete out justice to our people." Now, granting, as I have said, that there were abuses, what do those abuses amount to, compared with the insults and charges almost daily directed by the Tory press against the province of Quebec? They said that we were a backward province, where education was at a low ebb; they have outraged us in our feelings; they have scoffed at us, they have called us an ignorant people, drunkards, &c. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I am not ready to receive an insult without wincing, and despite the evangelical counsel, when I am slapped on one cheek, I am not ready to offer the other cheek to the blows of my opponents. I expected that the hon. member for Montmorency would stand up like a man on the floor of the House and hurl back that insult at our traducers: but, instead of that, he thought it better to throw the responsibility upon the Liberal party, for having brought the prohibition issue before the people. Although I disclaim any intention of stirring up race prejudices, Sir, I make bold to say that when we are so brutally slapped in the face, we have a right to tell our fellow-countrymen that they must scorn these insults, just as we have a right to boast of the fact that a French Canadian is at the head of affairs and is ruling the country so as to deserve the applause of all, irrespective of race and religion, and so as to compare favourably with any English-speaking statesman who has ever ruled the country, since and prior to confederation. They have even dared on the floor of the House to impute as a crime to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the fact of having floated a French flag, on one mast, on board a Government boat, while the English flag was flying from the other mast of the boat.

Now, Sir, when we hear those reproaches, which are so little calculated to improve the union and the good entente which ought to prevail among the different races in this free country of ours; when we hear such language, which should never have found a responsive echo within these parliamentary halls, it is but the seed of dissensions, which ought to be uprooted from our soil. I no longer wonder that certain fanatical journals talk of reconquering the province of Quebec. Let them remember that the province of Quebec was never conquered but transferred to Great Britain; and although the horizon of our political history may have been sometimes more or less cloudy, we have had, so far, no ground to complain of the sovereignty of Great Britain. But I take comfort in the thought that those papers do not represent the opinion of the right-thinking men in Ontario. Two very significant facts, which speak volumes by themselves are that a French Canadian now presides over the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, while another French Canadian has been recognized and acclaimed by the Liberals as the leader of this House.

I now approach the Manitoba school question. I was under the impression that the question had been definitely settled and that it was a dead issue, so far as the future action of the Dominion Parliament was concerned. I reckoned that it had been removed from the federal arena to the local arena where it should have always remained for the good of the country; but he that reckons without his host, must reckon twice, and I reckoned without those politicians who think it necessary, so to say, to resuscitate, to galvanize this dead issue; not that they wish to secure a fuller measure of justice for our fellow-countrymen, but because they wish to retain what is slipping through their fingers. I mean to say, the vote of their constituents who begin to realize that it is high time to put a stop to those political struggles which are checking the development of the country and prevent it winging its flight towards the serene regions of peace, of mutual good feeling, where we might all co-operate to the aggrandizement and development of our common country, a country which has hardly shaken off its colonial shackles and is aspiring to become an independent nation, living under the shadow of the flag of Great Britain, one of the most civilized nations in the world.

I hope that our past experience will teach our hon. friends opposite a lesson. They have tried double-dealing in that Manitoba school question, before the electorate of the province of Quebec. Let me call the attention of my hon. friends to the following article that appeared in the journal "La Vérité" during the electoral campaign of 1896. "Double-dealing," such is the heading of the article. By the way, I may say that this journal is more Conservative than Liberal:

Many Catholics will say: Since Sir Charles Tupper himself declares that Mr. Laurier will go further in the direction of justice, let us vote for Laurier.

What can you expect from a political party, so narrow-minded, and with such illiberal ideas?

The Conservative party to-day, seems to aspire to but one thing: to remain at the head of affairs, at any cost, and they seem to dread but one thing: the coming of the opposite party into power. All the rest is of secondary importance to them.

And further on it said:

In the other provinces, the Conservative leaders oppose Mr. Laurier on the ground that he is too favourable to the claims of the Manitoba minority, and as hostile to the Dicky-bill, because that Bill does not go far enough in favour of the Catholic minority.

But we warn the Conservative party that this mode of warfare, this "double-dealing" does them no credit; and though it may not be wanting in cleverness, it will do Mr. Laurier more good than harm.

They were taught the lesson by way of a crushing defeat. Let us hope that it bear fruit in the future. At all events, I hope that the discussion raised by the Opposition on that question are the dying echoes of a past struggle. If there are still any grievances somewhere, let the authorized voice of authority speak out, and we will do what can be done; or, let them offer us a still more satisfactory settlement than the one which has been accepted, and the matter will be taken into consideration. As that settlement does not seem to give satisfaction to the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), who seems to have adopted as his line of business to deal with the Manitoba school question, he might perhaps move a vote of want of confidence, seconded by his colleague the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clark Wallace). As to the Senate reform, I must confess to my incompetency to deal with it, according to its merits; still, I may be allowed to tell those gentlemen who stated in the public prints or before the House that, if there were a vote taken on that question, 95 per cent of the electors in the Quebec province would declare in favour of the abolition of the Upper Chamber, that they have proclaimed aloud a truth which is everywhere said in a whisper. But, in that matter of reform, I am not in favour of extreme measures and, accordingly, I believe that the scheme of joint meeting of the two Houses in case of a conflict would certainly result advantageously to Canada. The sooner this reform is carried out, the better it will prove for the peace of the country in general and the stability of affairs in particular.

The most grievous charge brought against the Government is that of not having fulfilled the pledges given to the electorate. But, Mr. Speaker, have we not erased from the Statute-book that iniquitous Act which they had styled the Electoral Franchise Act, which was a direct infringement of the right of the provinces had to control their own election lists, without any cost to the public treasury? The repeal of that Act was hailed with delight by the people and by no action of theirs, the Government have won more sympathies from the people than by the redemption of the pledge given to the electorate, in connection with the control of their own franchise, even had the Government during their three years of power done nothing else but redeemed that promise which has saved the public treasury thousands of dollars, they would have deserved well of the country. But they have done more. Are we to reckon as of no value to the country the preferential tariff, the denunciation, so-called impossible, of the treaties with Belgium and Germany, the tax imposed upon the newspapers having a wide circulation, the decentralization of the dead letters' office, whereby a prompt delivery was secured; the domestic letter rate postage reduced by one-third; the establishment on a practical basis of the cold storage system; the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, which before long will become an accomplished fact; the civil and administrative organization of the Yukon territories? And what shall we say of the influx of immigrants into the country? Under the Conservative régime, under their system of extreme protection, the exodus of our population to the United States was the curse of the country; we have lost hundreds of thousands of our countrymen, those poor children of the soil who were forced into exile, by a so-called National Policy, under which they were starved in their own country. Never shall I forget that portion of the speech delivered by the young and eloquent member for Drummond and Arthabaska before the Quebec Legislative Assembly, where, at the melancholy sight of so many fellow-countrymen forced to expatriate themselves and go to the United States, in the face of the guilty carelessness of the Conservative Government of the time, who, with folded arms, saw them departing without doing anything to help them, he pictured vividly those troops of emigrants marching off in file before the Ministers, and like the Romans of old crying out: Cæsar, the men who are going to die greet you." What a change from those times, Sir. Now, under a Liberal régime, under the tariff reform system, with new and clever business men at the head of affairs, our exports are increasing and our credit is on a sounder basis; the failures are on the decrease. Not only do we keep our own population at home, but, owing to a numerous and effective body of agents stationed in the United States by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), our exiled compatriots are being repatriated, and were it given us to see them passing before the Ministers instead of saluting Cæsar, before dying on a foreign land, we would hear them thanking the Government for having, through their beneficent policy, been brought back to their native land. While I am on my feet, I would like to tell the House that the visit paid by the Canadian Ministers to Washington was an event of considerable historical importance.

and one that will go on record as one of the brightest pages of our history. We hope that the conference held at Washington will result most advantageously to the country. Moreover, when I recall to mind the beneficent results of the presence of our Prime Minister at the Jubilee celebration in London in 1897, I think I may say that fortune smiles upon him and that he succeeds in all. No wonder, then, that the Hon. Mr. Ross, the eloquent Minister of Public Instruction for the province of Ontario, after the occasion of the inauguration of the Laurier Club in Toronto, uttered the following words on the record and traditions of the Liberal party. I thought it well to read them to the House, as they express, under a lofty style, a great truth:—

The history of our party in England as in Canada, is the history of progress, and there is not one reform there and here which was not conceived, advocated and supported by the Liberals. Laurier is the Gambetta of his race and all his province is with him. The French Canadians love him for his magnetism, for his public virtues, for his lofty eloquence, for his indisputable talent and because he combines in himself Carriér's firmness, Papineau's ardour and valour, with Lafontaine's tact and cleverness. Mr. Laurier has such an ascendancy over the whole Canadian people that in Ontario as well as in Quebec and the maritime provinces the English are as sincerely devoted to him as they were to Brown, to Mackenzie and to Blake.

With such men now at the head of our affairs, our country is not likely to go backward, but on the contrary we go forward towards the most serene heights, which is the supreme ambition of nations and individuals alike, who wish to have a history of their own.

Mr. J. H. LEGRIS (Maskinongé). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take the time of the House at any great length; I only wish to contribute a few words. Since this debate is on, we have often heard some very interesting contributions to the discussion. Floods of eloquence have flowed from the lips of a number of hon. gentlemen who have participated in this debate. But, I think the House will agree with me that the constant repetition of the same trite arguments constitutes in this case the dark side of the picture. From the very outset of the debate on the Speech from the Throne, it often occurred to me that we might perhaps take example by the other countries and adopt some means of restricting within its proper bounds the duration of the debate, thus damming up that torrent of words, and too often useless words, which has deluged the House, from the opening of the session. I know that in some countries, governed by a constitution similar to ours, means have been resorted to in order to curtail the debate. Such proceedings, however, are undoubtedly attended with drawbacks. Extreme remedies always have grave inconveniences, and that is why it is perhaps better, in this case for us to submit to the annoyances resulting from the abuse of the liberty of speech, rather than lay ourselves open to the reproach of resorting to drastic means in order to abridge the debate. At all events, I do not wish to fall into the sin I have just pointed out, I will endeavour to make my remarks as brief as possible.

It would be idle to repeat here that the Government since their coming into power, have done a great deal for the good of the country. As we all know, they have put a stop to the feuds that had been raging for years among the different religious denominations in Canada. They have also brought back peace and harmony among the various elements of our population. They have done away with these abuses which had crept up in the management of public affairs, more particularly during the last years of the late Government, abuses which constitute a black spot in the records of this country. We have seen confidence restored to the trade and industries of the country. This is evidenced by the large volume of our trade which has increased by $50,000,000. No better evidence could be found of the progress realized by the country. Our opponents do not question this fact, but claim the credit for it. We are quite willing to let them enjoy this little bit of comfort, provided they show their good will by allowing the Government to administer public affairs for the greatest good of the country. Through the wise policy of the Government under the skilful leadership of the Prime Minister, Canada has been placed in a most enviable position, and is enjoying a credit it had never reached before.

Canada has also largely benefited by the presence of the Prime Minister in London during the celebrations of the Queen's Jubilee, as also by the honours paid him in Paris and in the capital of the United States. A new era of prosperity and of progress unheard of before has in consequence dawned upon Canada. As a representative of an essentially agricultural constituency, I wish to draw the attention of the House in a particular manner to what has been done by the Government to promote the progress of the farming community. We all know the great advantages that have accrued to the farmers from the reorganization of the cold storage system. We all know what an impetus has been given to the exportation of our agricultural products by the system of refrigerators; and how largely the farming community has benefited by it. That fact having been so often referred to and proclaimed on the floor of the House since the opening of the session, I do not think it necessary to dilate any longer upon that subject.

There is another question which was referred to by some hon. gentlemen who spoke before me, and one which has greatly contributed to the progress and improvement of our agricultural interests: I refer to what has been secured by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, by the abrogation of the quarantine regulations in the United States. We all know, and more particularly those who have travelled through the rural constituencies know, in what a large measure our cattle trade has benefited by that action of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The cattle trade, to-day, is a paying trade and is giving us very large returns, for which we are indebted to the efforts and the ability displayed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who has succeeded in having cancelled the quarantined regulations which proved so injurious to the export of our cattle to the United States. The better to illustrate my meaning, let me give some figures. For a period of four years, during which our cattle trade was under the quarantine regulations of the United States, we exported only 6,000 head of cattle, representing a value of $50,000, while since the quarantine regulations were cancelled, we have exported, within two years, 167,000 head of cattle, representing a value of $2,100,000. These statistics give us a fair idea of the importance of that trade and of the advantages that have accrued to the cattle breeders through the efforts and the energy displayed by the Government in securing from the United States the abrogation of the quarantine regulations. The farming community in Canada, as I said, has largely benefited thereby. The people are also greatly indebted to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) for the efforts and for the energy he has put forth in another direction, in connection with the growing of Canadian tobacco. We all know that tobacco can be grown here, but it had been so much neglected that it was almost unknown in Canada. As soon as the new tariff was adopted, a measure which was well calculated to encourage the growing of native leaf by our farmers, most satisfactory steps were taken, with the result that, last year, the crop was four times larger than it was before, and ten new tobacco factories were started with a view to turning to use the native leaf tobacco. Such results are assuredly well calculated to foster our home industry and the population in the tobacco-growing districts owe certainly a debt of gratitude to the Government on that score. But I do not think the Government ought to rest satisfied with these measures, for which they may justly claim credit, and they ought not to consider their task as at an end; and therefore, I hope that, should they see their way to modify anew the tariff, they will not fail to alter the regulations concerning the tobacco manufactures, so that those regulations instead of retarding the growth of that industry, may, on the contrary give it a new impetus. I hope that they will foster the cultivation of tobacco, by remodelling the existing regulations, which have been framed since the tariff reform was enforced. The changes which ought to be carried out in this connection should be made with a view to making it still more stringent upon the manufacturers to turn to use the native leaf tobacco. There are millions and millions of dollars to be realized in the growing of our native leaf tobacco and so far, those millions have found their way into the pockets of tobacco-growers in foreign countries, who have exported here their output. I see no reason why we should not keep that capital in the country, instead of sending it abroad in order to bring raw material which we can produce here.

There is another question I would like to deal with, and I am glad to see that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is in his seat, as I wish particularly to draw his attention to the matter. A little while ago, Mr. John Northwood, of Chatham, Ontario, addressed to the members of this House a letter, informing us that some capitalists were disposed to invest the necessary capital in the building of beet-root sugar manufactures. As all the hon. gentlemen, I presume, have received the same communication, and, as the matter will come under the consideration of the Government and of the Minister of Agriculture, I take the liberty to draw the attention of the Minister to that industry which keeps in store for our agricultural interests a future replete with prosperity.

Did it ever occur to any hon. gentleman here to calculate the revenues which this beet-root sugar industry might yield to the farming community? I do not know, but I will take the liberty to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to a few statistics now before me. We yearly expend a sum of $7,500,000 in round numbers, for the sugar which we import from abroad. The commission, freight and insurance charges on that import, estimated at 20 per cent represents a further sum of a million and a half. That gives us the enormous sum of about $9,000,000 which we yearly expend abroad in purchasing sugar for home uses. The country having a presumed population of five million inhabitants and the quantity of sugar consumed, according to statistics, being 70 pounds per head of the population. This gives us an average of 150,000 tons imported each year into the country. I have not the least doubt that the soil and climate of Canada are admirably adapted to the growing of beet-root sugar. In order to supply the country with the required quantity of sugar, every year, we should have at least from forty to fifty well equipped manufactures. Each one of those manufactures, with the necessary machinery, would cost in the neighbourhood of from $350,000 and $400,000. It will be readily seen what an enormous amount of capital would have to be invested and expended in the construction of those manufactures alone, a capital which would be distributed between the labour and the various building materials, such as stone, iron, lime, &c. The building of those manufactures would then represent a capital of from fifteen to sixteen million dollars. The feeding of each manufacture would require about three thousand acres of land under cultivation. The produce of each acre of land is estimated at from $40 to $50. That would give a yearly revenue of about $140,000, to be distributed between the farmers of each locality, and by which about 600 families would benefit.

Now, if we turn our attention to the improvement which would accrue from those crops to the generally exhausted lands in our older provinces, it seems to me that the Government cannot hesitate to encourage this industry, in the same way as they encourage every other infant industry which is being implanted here. In order to produce the quantity of sugar adequate to the needs of the consumers in the country, it would be necessary to have 120,000 acres under cultivation. Those crops would of necessity improve those lands and a large number of families, say 24,000 or 25,000 would benefit by the advantages resulting from this new farming industry. The farmers, surely deserve consideration at our hands. It is also well known that the production of beet-root sugar gives an immense quantity of pulp which could be advantageously turned to use in the feeding of cattle. That would give a new impetus to the dairy industry and to stock-breeding for the meat market. As it is an uncontrovertable fact that one industry invites another industry, it cannot be questioned that this industry being unquestionably of such considerable importance, a concatenation of several other industries would follow close behind the former. Therefore, it is to be hoped that the hon. Minister of Agriculture will take under his serious consideration this scheme and will urge upon the Government the desirability of granting a bonus so as to secure the implanting of this industry in the country, should a favourable opportunity offer.

One of the subjects which have engrossed our attention during this debate is that of the exodus to the United States and it was stated on the floor of the House that a stop had been put to that exodus. Reference has also been made to foreign immigrants who are pouring into the country, to swell the number of our population. I regret to say that I cannot share the opinion of those who rejoice at the fact that the exodus to the United States has stopped. I have often seen and I see every day Canadian families leaving the country; though, as I am told by one of my hon. friends, the number of those who leave may possibly be not quite so large as it was formerly—but, at all event, Sir, those families deserve consideration at our hands, and I can see no better way of putting a stop to that exodus than by offering to the farming community the advantages that would be secured by the implanting of a new agricultural industry. This would provide for our farmers a means of earning a livelihood, and it would be a powerful inducement for them to remain in the country. While I am dealing with the matter of immigration, I may be allowed to offer a suggestion: As already remarked by some hon. gentleman, instead of spending large sums of money to bring into the country foreigners, would it not be better to take some measures, in order to induce our own fellow-countrymen to remain here? Those fellow-countrymen who go over to the United States have rights here, they have contributed their share to the large sums expended by the Government for the development of the country; they have also supported the charges of the enormous public debt that has been piling up for years, and, therefore, I say, they have vested rights here. Let the Government make fresh efforts; let them continue the work they have so well begun, and I have not the least doubt that they will succeed, not only in keeping our people at home, but that if they would consent to take a portion of the moneys voted for promoting foreign immigration into the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and apply it to the repatriation and settling down in the same territories of those who were forced into exile, they would deserve well from the country.

A great deal has been said, during this debate, about the Senate reform. We are informed that the Government propose to introduce a measure in that direction. I have but a few words to say on the matter. We all know that the Senate was intended, by the framers of our constitution, to be a bulwark for the rights of minorities. Now, Sir, has the Catholic minority in New Brunswick ever received protection at the hands of the Senate? Has the Senate proved a bulwark for the protection of the Catholic minority in Manitoba? That the Senate was to be composed of non-partisan members is clearly shown from the debates on confederation. It was to be devoid of all partisanship, such was to be its distinguishing features. Now, I ask, what more flagrant contradiction can there be found than this? Do we require any further proof, to be satisfied that the Senate is more partisan than the House of Commons?

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Do we need any further evidence that the Senate never did protect the minorities, and that they never extended their protection to any one but to the party by which it was, so to say, brought to life? I regret to say that we have seen more partisanship in the Senate than there is in this House. How could things be otherwise? The former Government invariably appointed to the Senate blind partisans who had earned their promotion to that post by their services to the party. They always selected their candidates to senatorships among those who had done yeoman service for the party. Now, is it reasonable to suppose that a senator, from the moment that he enters that body is going to put off the old man, to become a new man, and that he will forget the men to whom he is indebted for his position? I do not believe it. That is not a possible thing. The Conservative Governments are responsible for the present state of things, and I do not believe it to be possible for any Government—be it the Government of the day, or be it any of the succeeding Governments—to remedy the evil. No, were they even willing to do it. I do not think they could do so. As soon as vacancies will occur in the Senate, they will be filled up by faithful partisans, so as to keep in check the Conservative phalanx on the other side of the House.

There might be some comfort to us in thinking that perhaps—the Senate might represent the views of the people. But, we ought to bear in mind that we are living at a time when the people rules through their mandatories, and it is more and more to the representatives elected by the people that go the responsibilities nowadays. Now, the Senate is a mere mockery of the rights of the people, and the better to illustrate my meaning, let me refer to what happened a few years ago. The hon. gentlemen who sat here during the last Parliament, will no doubt remember what happened in Montreal, in December, 1895, upon the occasion of a by-election in Montreal Centre. Dr. Hingston, the present senator for the Rougement division, was running for the House of Commons against Mr. McShane. The people, after comparing the merits of the two candidates, rendered their verdict in favour of Mr. McShane. In the month of January, 1896, the Government then in power, outraged the population of Montreal Centre, by taking by the hand the man who had been spurned by the electors of that division and defeated as a candidate to the House of Commons, and appointing him to the Senate, there to revise the acts of the man they had chosen to represent them on the floor of this House. This is not a solitary instance. Moreover, every senator believes he is Almighty. But some of those senators who believed themselves all-powerful, once ran for this House of Commons; they went to the country, and appealed to the electorate, under the impression that the electors would entrust them with a mandate. But we know how sad was their defeat and deep their humiliation. In virtue of the constitutional principles now in vogue, the men who hold the reins of power must be the mandatories of the people. The Senate is an irresponsible body and is not accountable to the people for its conduct. For my part, I am opposed to irresponsibility, wherever it may happen to be found. I know that several good reasons are alleged in favour of the maintenance of the Senate, and I would not question the value of those arguments, if only the Senate was what it ought to be ; but, in view of the position of the senators, in view of the party spirit prevailing among them, and of the fact that they are appointed for life ; considering, moreover, that a too large number of senators are impotent invalids, I cannot but come to the conclusion that it is apparently impossible to remedy these inconveniences. For my part, I would like to see the Government, rather than trying to reform the Upper Chamber—unless that be a first step towards the complete abolition of the Senate—propose to us the suppression of the Senate. Our opponents charge that we want to abolish the Senate, because that House has thrown out some Bills passed by a large majority of this House. No, Sir, such is not the motive that prompts our action in this instance ; and that is a further evidence of the inconsistency of our opponents. On the other hand, we are quite aware that the Liberal party in 1893, pledged themselves to the reform of the Senate ; and therefore, no such consideration as they attribute to us can control our present action. But, as I said, owing to the fact that it is well nigh impossible to make the Upper Chamber a useful body, I would prefer to see it abolished. I shall not dilate any further on that subject, but, before resuming my seat, I am happy to say that the hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches, who had my support and the support of the people at the last elections, are not open to the reproach of having broken their pledges. The Government have done quite enough. I am perfectly satisfied with what they have done so far ; and it is enough to entitle them to the confidence of the people of this country. Our opponents say that the Government have not redeemed the pledges given by them, when they sat on the other side. I think the hon. gentlemen opposite would like the Government to achieve reforms which would bring down on them the condemnation of the electorate. The city of Paris was not built in one day, and the Ministers, if they have not yet fulfilled all their pledges, will redeem them without unnecessary delay, and when favourable opportunities offer.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. Speaker, as the hour is late, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot possibly finish my remarks to-night.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I have an agreement with my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) that the House will sit until 12 o'clock.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is now within a few minutes to twelve.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If it is the intention of my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) to occupy the House for any length of time I would not ask him to go on now.
Mr. LEGRIS.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT.

The Report of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1898 (Mr. Fisher).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 12th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Canadian Inland Transportation Company.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

Bill (No. 53) to authorize the Bank of Nova Scotia to issue sterling notes for circulation in the Island of Jamaica.—(Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

Bill (No. 54) respecting the Eastern Trust Company.—(Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

Bill (No. 55) to further amend the Inspection Act.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 56) to define the size of small fruit packages.—(Mr. Penny.)

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate my right hon. friend who leads the Government and the House upon the announcement that has been made in regard to the arrangement for the construction of the Pacific cable. I regard that as a most important matter, and I think the Government and the country are very much to be congratulated upon it being finally, and, as I hope, satisfactorily arranged. I have long satisfied myself that the construction of that cable will involve no obligation whatever upon the Government. In fact, the time is not distant when it will be a source of revenue to the country.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may be allowed to take the opportunity of expressing to my hon. friend the gratitude with which I receive his announcement. I can gracefully accept it, because I know what his views have been on that subject for some time past. I hope that in the future, when we bring as good measures, we shall receive the same support from my hon. friend.

DEADMAN'S ISLAND.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to an item headed "Deadman's Island," which appears in the "Daily Witness" of 8th April, as follows:—

Ottawa, April 8.—Mr. Theodore Ludgate, lessee of Deadman's Island, Vancouver Harbour, has returned the lease to the department, stating that if the occupation of the island is to prove injurious to the city of Vancouver, or detrimental to the interest of the country, he does not desire to retain it.

I would ask the Government whether such is the case or not—whether Mr. Ludgate has returned his lease?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give any answer to my hon. friend. I do not know what the facts may be. If my hon. friend will pass me the paper which he has in his hands, I will lay it before the Minister of Militia, who has the matter in charge.

FRIENDLY BENEFIT ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister in regard to an announcement made last year in the course of a debate upon a Bill asking for the incorporation of the Soss of England. It was then announced, I think, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), speaking for the Government, that the Government had under consideration the question of preparing and submitting to this House a general Bill under which all these friendly insurance and assessment societies would be regulated. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the consideration of that subject has been completed, and whether any Bill will be introduced this session? As the right hon. gentleman knows, there are thousands of people interested in this question in every province of the Dominion, particularly in the province of Ontario, and a great deal of curiosity has been excited as to whether the Government intends to introduce such a Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to-day to give any answer to my hon. friend. If he will renew his question in a few days, perhaps I may be able then to give him the information.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like, with the permission of the House, to say one word in the way of personal explanation. Yesterday, when my hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) was speaking, I made a remark which was capable of misapprehension. I should be very sorry if it were misapprehended. In what I said I did not wish for a moment to call in question the necessity for increased expenditure on the militia. I have read the report of the General, who is a practical soldier and a very experienced and able soldier, and I certainly think it would be an impertinence on my part if I said I agreed with his report. But I should like to say that the Government will have my most hearty support, whatever that may be worth, in any expenditure they may make in order to give effect to the General's recommendations, whether that expenditure may be $130,000, as referred to, or five times that amount.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is entering on an argument.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not think this country can afford to pay a million and a half for an inefficient force.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. H. F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, I regret that my want of knowledge of the French language made it impossible for me last evening to follow the remarks addressed to the House by the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Légris) and the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau). I listened for some time to the remarks addressed to the House by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and, from what I gathered from those remarks, I come to the conclusion that the best thing I can do is to refer the hon. members of this House and the people of this country to the speeches made by that hon. gentleman when he occupied a seat on this side of the House some four or five years ago. I believe a perfectly complete answer to the remarks addressed to the House last night by that hon. gentleman will be found in his own statements to the House four or five years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD (East Huron). You had better quote some of the remarks I made.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will therefore spare the House the necessity of listening to anything from me at present regarding the statements of that hon. gentleman. Before proceeding to other matters, I beg to call the attention of the House to the statement made by the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), a few days ago, when, dealing with the question of the tariff and the changes made by the present Administration in that tariff, more especially the changes effected by the preference to England, that hon. gentleman laboured to show this House and the country the great advantages which had accrued from the preferential tariff with England, and quoted figures showing the importations from England under that tariff, and the difference in the duties paid by the people of this country on those importations, as compared with the duties paid on the importations under the former tariff. The fact that the present Government, before granting that preferential tariff, raised the duties on a great many articles from England, has already been referred to at great length, and I consider, therefore, it will not be necessary for me to refer to them again. But I will just beg leave to refer hon. gentlemen to certain articles to which the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) should have directed our attention, when dealing with the imports, when he argued that the people of Canada, and especially the people of the mother country, gained an advantage under the preferential clause.

In dealing with scrap-iron, and referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that the hon. gentleman omitted to give the figures with respect to the importation of scrap-iron into this country since the preferential rate came into force. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), at the time, called the attention of my hon. friend to those figures, but he refused to give them any attention or to give the request of my hon. friend any attention whatever. I find that the importation of scrap-iron from Great Britain, under that preferential tariff, only amounted to 71 tons and paid a duty of $153.63. But I find that the importation from the United States of scrap-iron amounted to 1,378 tons, on which the Canadian manufacturers paid a duty of $3,445.24. The hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) refused to give this information himself to the House, and waxed eloquent upon the great advantages derived by our people from the change in the duties on this important raw material. He told us that there were numerous chimneys from which smoke was issuing now, which would not be in operation, had the changes in the tariff not been made. I would like to know how much smoke we can expect to issue from chimneys from the importation of 71 tons of scrap-iron from the old country under the preferential tariff. Coming to the article of cotton, the hon. gentleman quoted some articles in the cotton line which were imported with some advantage to Canada; but I find that a very important article in that line, largely used by the Canadian people, and particularly by the Canadian farmers—the article of cotton bags, seamless bags—we imported from Great Britain to the extent of 4,678 pounds and paid a duty, under the preferential tariff, of $151.68. But our people imported from the United States, not 4,000 pounds, but 66,040 pounds, on which they paid a duty of $1,942.24. I would like the hon. gentleman to show us where the advantage is to the people of Canada in that importation. I find, with respect to other cotton manufactures, such as jeans, coutilles, sateens, imported by corset and dress-stay makers for use in factories, we imported from Great Britain 9,704 yards, on which we paid duty, $312.07; but we imported from the United States, not 9,000, but 1,015,721 yards, on which we paid $17,056.41 duty. Where does the advantage come in from the preferential tariff in that case? Take batts, batting, wadding, not bleached, dyed or coloured. We imported from Great Britain only 1,783 pounds, on which the duty amounted to $40.35; but from the United States we imported 77,347 pounds, on which we paid a duty of $1,895.25. I cannot see any advantage from the preferential tariff in that respect. I find that knitted yarn, hosiery yarn, cotton yarn, &c., we imported from Great Britain 15,926 pounds, on which we paid a duty of $552.13; but we had to import from the United States 115,558 pounds, on which we were obliged to pay $4,257.75. There is no advantage in that respect. I now come to another very important item, one in which our farmers and contractors are largely interested. I find that we got only one wheelbarrow from Great Britain, on which we paid, under the preferential rate, $2.10; but we got from the United States 8,126, on which we paid a duty of $7,382.40. Clothes wringers, which is an article a large class of the people require, and a class that cannot afford high prices, were imported from Great Britain, under the preferential rate, to the extent of one, on which we paid $3.85 duty; but we had to import from the United States 8,880, on which we paid a duty of $4,880.05. Clocks, an article used by everybody, we imported from Great Britain to the value of $7,144, on which we paid a duty of $1,679.50. That appears to be a large item; but when we compare it with the amount imported from the United States, it does not appear so large. I find that we imported from the United States to the value of $129,266, on which we paid a duty of $32,316.87. In that respect I cannot see any advantage from the preferential tariff. Bicycles and tricycles, we imported from Great Britain 61, and paid a duty of $737.41; but we imported from the United States, not 61, but 595,006 bicycles and tricycles, on which we paid a duty of $178,521.69. Children's carriages, we imported twelve from Great Britain, and paid a duty of $26.95; but from the United States we imported 7,751, and paid $1,868.61.

I cannot see any benefit under those heads ; and the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) was very careful to omit mentioning them in the statement he made. Buggies and carriages, we imported from Great Britain 37 altogether, at a duty of $189.62 ; but from the United States we imported 572 at a duty of $8,533.25. The tariff arrangements in this respect may have been changed with the view to the interests of the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost). The hon. gentleman may be able to explain how it is the change was made in such a way as to be of little advantage to the Canadian people and the English people, and of so much advantage to the people of the United States and the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost).

Then, there is the item of farm wagons. These articles are so widely used that the duty upon them is a matter of general interest. Under the preferential tariff we only imported one from Great Britain, on which we paid a duty of $6.56 ; but we imported from the United States 1,882 wagons, upon which we paid a duty of $19,884. Of tallow candles we imported from Great Britain only 73 pounds, the duty on which was $3.29, while from the United States we imported 66,729 pounds, the duty on which was $1,103. Our imports of paraffine wax candles from Great Britain were 4,778 pounds, the duty on which was $162.90, while from the United States we imported 69,312 pounds, the duty on which was $1,491.80. It is not necessary to go through the whole list. If it were necessary, I could occupy a long time in enumerating the articles which we are unable to get and do not get from Great Britain under the preferential tariff, but in regard to which the preferential tariff gives an advantage to the United States, the people of Canada being, in fact, compelled to pay a duty which, according to the argument of the hon. gentlemen, they are not required to pay under the preferential tariff. Now, proceeding to the consideration of the Speech from the Throne—I have had the privilege of occupying a seat in this House for fifteen years, during which time it has been my privilege to be present at the consideration of sixteen Speeches from the Throne, opening as many sessions of this federal Parliament. Among all the Speeches, not one do I remember that contained so little as that which we are now called upon to consider. And I cannot help being reminded—and I think it quite proper that I should speak of this to hon. gentlemen opposite—of the speeches that were made by these hon. gentlemen in former sessions, when the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was being debated. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the Speech with which the session of 1891 was opened. In that Speech it will be found that announcement was made of an arrangement which it was proposed to negotiate between the United States and Canada with respect to trade relations. Announcement was also made of the fact that the Government would ask the permission of Parliament to extend the modus vivendi with the United States in respect to the Atlantic fisheries. Also, measures were promised providing for the safety of sea-going ships ; with regard to the Admiralty Court ; with regard to the criminal law ; with regard to the foreshores of the Dominion ; to provide against obstructions in navigable waters ; with regard to the North-west Territories ; with regard to the Exchequer Court ; with regard to trade marks, and a number of others. Yet the right hon. the present Prime Minister, in criticising this Speech, used these words :

In the Speech we should have been told not only that the Government is about to send a commission to Washington, but the basis on which they are going to treat with our neighbours. Will it be the unrestricted reciprocity ? Will it be restricted reciprocity, or reciprocity at all, or will the negotiations be confined only to the fishery question whether in Behring Sea or the Atlantic ? We have heard the Finance Minister upon the floor of this House declare that the only policy of the Government was the National Policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had negotiations with Washington since the last meeting of this Parliament, and we have not been told what took place. If we are to be governed by the principles laid down in the speech I have just quoted, we should have all the facts, not only as to the discussions between the representatives of the two countries in the commission, but the points they met to discuss and the ideas with which our commission started for Washington. The right hon. gentleman complained, further, of : No reason given for dissolution of the late Parliament ; no reason for repeal of franchise ; no promise of election law ; no reference to the conveyance of mails to Europe. No reference is made now to the conveyance of mails to Europe, about which we have heard so much. I propose to deal with that point later on. I would here remind the House of what the right hon. Prime Minister said on a similar subject on the occasion to which I have referred :

Mails sent from a country bristling with sentiments of loyalty to the mother land through the United States via the port of New York. The Postmaster General is a traitor whom I denounce to the indignation of loyal men and true who stand around him.

The true reason of dissolution was that the policy of the Opposition was gaining ground and the Government took fright.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we should have some information with regard to the fast line and the reductions of mails via New York to the mother country. Further on, the right hon. gentleman said :

It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen deserve great credit for the manner in which they contrived to build upon such slender material. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman to admit, as I am sure—if he has not lost all sense of right—he must admit, that this verbose document, known as the Speech from the Throne, upon the present occasion, is a very dry skeleton. The right hon. gentleman on a former occasion characterized the Speech from the Throne as shining in omissions. I think if there ever was a speech which shone by omissions it is the present one. It is really bristling with omissions.

Would not that be a very perfect criticism of the Speech with which the present session opened? That Speech is not even a skeleton; it is a mere shadow. The only item of legislation promised in it for the consideration of the House is that in reference to redistribution. And, Sir, no person can show any reason for redistribution at the present moment; no person can show any justification for it or any authority for it. In 1890 the First Minister dealt with the Speech with which the Parliament was opened, in the following language:—

They have gallantly struggled to put flesh and blood, nerve and sinew, into the dry bones which the advisers of His Excellency put in his hands yesterday as the programme of the session.

Now, what did that Speech contain? It contained a reference to the royal commission on the labour question, it contained a promise of banking laws, it contained a promise of a measure for the administration of the North-west Territories, a measure on bills of exchange and promissory notes, a measure on patents of invention, a measure in respect of the adulteration of food, a measure in regard to the inland revenue laws, a measure in respect to the geological and natural history of Canada, a measure for the establishment of a national printing bureau, and so on. Yet this is the language in which the hon. the First Minister treated that speech. Now, I would like to hear him characterize the speech which he himself put into the mouth of His Excellency, which contains only one measure for which there is not any reason or justification. We are called together at a time of the year when it is most inconvenient for hon. members of this House to be taken away from their home engagements to attend to public business here, and it cannot be expected that the business of the country will receive at their hands as perfect and complete attention as it would receive if Parliament had been called together at a time of the year when it would be more convenient for members to spend their time here in dealing with the public measures which are to come before the House. There was a time when the right hon. the First Minister charged a previous Administration with having called hon. gentlemen to meet in this Parliament at an improper and inconvenient season of the year, and these are the remarks that he addressed to the House:

It has been the unwritten law of Canada for a great many years past, that Parliament should be summoned at an early period in the year, at the latest, towards the end of January. The reason is obvious. In this country we have no privileged class. All the members of this House, with scarcely an exception, are engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, and it is an object of paramount necessity that, having discharged their duties to the country, they should be able to go back to their ordinary business pursuits about the opening of the business season. * * * They waited, and waited, and waited, until the opening of the business season was in sight, before summoning Parliament, and to this hour, and as to this, not a word of explanation has been offered.

This was the language in which the right hon. gentleman charged the Administration in 1894 with having called Parliament together too late in the year. But not a word of explanation is given to us this year for calling Parliament together at so late a period.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. leader of the Opposition defied the right hon. gentleman or his colleagues to put their finger on any act of legislation which they had given to this country in the line of the promises that they made to the people before they came to power, the First Minister accepted that challenge, and this is what he said:

We have established a complete system of cold storage for the transportation of perishable goods, and in this alone we have rendered to the people of Canada a most signal service. This trade with Great Britain last year in eggs alone reached almost the sum of $2,000,000, and it is only in its infancy.

The matter of cold storage has been treated so fully by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, that it is unnecessary for me to touch upon that question beyond a mere statement of the facts. I think the facts will show that whatever credit is due for the establishment of the cold storage system, it is due to the Government that preceded the present Government. That system was inaugurated by them. The people of the country were called upon to provide the money to bring that great undertaking into operation, and that money was provided. What could be expected of hon. gentlemen opposite when they took charge of the Government but to carry out the mandate which was given to their predecessors, and to expend the money which was provided by the people of this country with a view to carry out that great undertaking? The right hon. gentleman told us that the shipment of eggs had reached nearly $2,000,000, and claimed credit for that result, which he attributed to the inauguration of the cold storage system by his Government. Now, Mr. Speaker, anybody who knows or remembers anything about the history of this country for the last seven or eight years must know that the egg trade between Canada and Great Britain is due in a large measure to the McKinley tariff. Hon. gentlemen remember very well that previous to the passing of the McKinley tariff against the products of the Canadian hen, we had very little trade with Great Britain in eggs. We shipped our eggs to the United States, we shipped little or none to Great Britain. But a change took place with the imposition of a duty of 5 cents per dozen on Canadian eggs going to the United States some years ago—I think it was in 1894 that the McKinley tariff imposed that duty on Canadian eggs. Now, the right hon. gentleman was not correct in saying that the shipments of eggs from Canada to Great Britain had reached nearly $2,000,000; they do not reach any such figures. The export of eggs from Canada to Great Britain last year was of the value of only $1,244,051, but little more than half the figures the right hon. gentleman quoted to the House. The total export of eggs from Canada, in 1898, was $1,255,304. In 1896, when the hon. gentleman opposite assumed office, our export of eggs to Great Britain amounted to $524,577, and our export to the United States to $275,828. In 1894, our exports to Great Britain was $503,533, and to the United States $199,636. In 1891, previous to the imposition of the McKinley duties, our total exports to Great Britain only amounted to $83,589; whereas our total exports to the United States amounted to $1,160,359, or very near the total amount of our export to Great Britain to-day. In 1889, our total export of eggs to Great Britain only amounted to $18, but our total export to the United States that year amounted to $2,156,725. So it is plain now that the present Government cannot claim any credit whatever for the increase of the egg trade to Great Britain; and if the First Minister has nothing better to give us as an evidence of their legislation in the interests of this country than our egg trade, there is nothing in his claim, and I do not think the people of this country will see anything in it. He goes on further:

We have extended the Intercolonial Railway to the great centre of trade in the great city of Montreal. I do not know yet whether we can say that we have done it permanently or not, but there is the attempt, there is the policy, and the Senate will have an occasion to pass upon it by and by. Whether it passes affirmatively or negatively, whether the Intercolonial is to remain with its terminus in a field or come to the great city of Montreal, is not a matter of our own responsibility now, but will rest upon other shoulders than ours.

The right hon. gentleman is not correct in saying that they have extended the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. They have not. The Intercolonial trains, under certain conditions, have been extended to Montreal, but they have not done any such thing as to extend the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. It would be far better if they had done it, but the reason we have to deal with the Intercolonial Railway is due to the fact that the Senate of Canada have taken a stand in the interest of the public for which the public feels grateful to-day, and from which it receives great benefit. Further on, the right hon. gentleman says:

Then, Sir, we have obtained another most material reform. We have obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway a reduction of their freight rates, and in so doing we have given the greatest boon to the producers in the prairies of the North-west. We have obtained a reduction of 3 cents per 100 pounds on wheat; we have obtained a reduction on a specified list of articles of merchandise, a reduction varying from 10 to 33 per cent, and I understand that in these matters alone we have given to the people of the North-west Territories an advantage of at least $600,000 a year.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. First Minister is not correct in that contention. Some hon. members, who spoke after the right hon. gentleman, have gone into that question, and I think it, therefore, unnecessary for me to deal with it, but everybody who knows anything about the railway history of this country, knows it to be the case that all the railways in this country within a number of years have reduced their freight rates and their traffic rates. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company almost every year from the time of the construction of that great work have been reducing their freight rates on some of their lines. They had to reduce their freight rates for more than one reason. They reduced them as the extent of that great railway increased, and they had also to reduce them because of the fact that they had keen competition from other railways. It was not any influence of this Government or of any previous Government that compelled that company to reduce their freight rates; it was the circumstances and conditions under which they were operating the railway. So that in these items, to which the right hon. First Minister referred, in accepting the challenge of the leader of the Opposition, there is not even the shadow of a case for the right hon. gentleman. The right hon. Prime Minister dealt with another subject which I propose to leave for the present. I will now call the attention of the House to some remarks of hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches at the time they were criticising the Government which preceded them, and if we had reason to expect any business to be conducted at this session of the present Parliament, we had reason to expect an intimation in the Speech from the Throne on the lines of the arguments that were presented to the House by these hon. gentlemen while in Opposition, and when they were in a position to criticise the Government that preceded them. Sir, the people of this country were led to believe that great changes in the fiscal policy of the country would take place on the coming into power of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches. They had good reason to expect, for they had listened year after year for a period of eighteen years to the statements of the hon. gentlemen on different lines of policy upon which they held out hopes to the people, that when they came into power the country would be governed on these lines. On the question of commercial union with the United States, which hon. gentlemen had before this country in 1888, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), introduced the following resolution in this House.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It will be carried.

That it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries, should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or internal revenue alone excepted).

How this was regarded in the country will be seen from the file of the Halifax "Chronicle," which I take the liberty of quoting :

The despatch from Ottawa giving an account of the determination of the first Liberal caucus---

An hon. MEMBER. Dispense.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would like to dispense with all these disagreeable things, but he will have to listen to them. The hon. gentleman would like to look for a job and let these things be put aside.

—at Ottawa is the most important piece of political intelligence which has reached this country for some time. It is the most important movement made upon the political chess-board since confederation, and is likely to revolutionize political controversy in this country. This is the first time that commercial union has been adopted by either of the great political parties. Henceforward it becomes the burning question of the day.

Now, where is commercial union? The right hon. First Minister, on that question, said :

The policy which we advocate, which we still continue to advocate, is the removal of all commercial barriers between this country and the great kindred nation to the south. The Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until the cause is successful. I do not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of Opposition until this cause has triumphed.

Where is that question to-day? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

I say that the greatest service we can render to the British Empire is to form an alliance with the people of the United States.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said :

The application of the principle between Canada and the United States, would require that the two countries should have the same excise rates and the same tariff upon imports from all other countries, that the revenue thus collected in both countries should be divided upon conditions hereafter to be arranged, that the customs line between the two countries from ocean to ocean should be removed, and that trade between Canada and the States should in every respect be as free and as untrammelled as trade between the different states of the American Union was at the present moment.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

And the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) said :

Under commercial union, trade would flow freely between this country and the United States, while as against the rest of the world there would be a uniform tariff to be mutually agreed upon by the two countries comprised in the union.

Mr. Speaker, how would it do to put that sentence side by side with the remarks of these hon. gentlemen on the present occasion in respect to their preferential tariff? How would they read side by side?

Now, there is the question of continental free trade, and this is what the right hon. First Minister told us in 1889 on that question :

The Liberal party will never cease the agitation until they have finally triumphed and obtained continental freedom of trade. We will not be drawn away by this issue or that issue, and keeping our eyes upon the goal will work till we accomplish our end. If the Reformers of these days can accomplish what they have in view—they will have done to their country and to the British race a service of which they will have reason to be proud.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said on that occasion :

I desire to see free trade all over this continent.

Mr. Charlton declared :

We want unrestricted and free access to the whole of North America for our produce and a great increase of wealth would follow,—we wanted to pull down all customs barriers, to enjoy absolute free trade, to establish a mighty theatre of commerce extending over a vast continent from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic Ocean.

What has the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) done in that connection? Through the mouth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they told us in regard to the question of unrestricted reciprocity :

This policy was initiated in 1889, when, in the House of Commons, on March 5th, Sir Richard Cartwright moved the following resolution :—

"That in the present condition of affairs, and in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States, it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith."

And the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said :

When the Liberal party comes into power it will send commissioners to Washington to propose a mutual agreement by which there will be free trade along the whole line, doing away with restrictions and removing the custom-houses, that go so far to cause friction between the two countries.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) told us on that occasion :

Sir, we tender the people a flag of which we are not ashamed; a flag upon which is inscribed "unrestricted trade with the United States."

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), speaking at Chatham, in 1891, said :

But what is of even more immediate consequence, we propose to obtain for you the power of trade freely with the rest of this continent—to have leave to make the best use you can of your great natural advantages, which can only be done by full, free and unrestricted reciprocity with our kinsmen in the United States.

Again, he said at Chatham :

But let us always bear in mind that the geographical position of the bulk of Canada is such that, at the very best, all and every foreign market is but a makeshift, and can in no way ever really replace for you the market of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, let us compare these remarks with the remarks now made by these hon. gentlemen when they are lauding themselves for what they have done for this country by giving a preferential tariff to England. I could quote many other similar utterances in days gone by from the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches, but I shall not detain the House further than to give this extract from a speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister delivered in 1892 :

It becomes the duty of all patriots to seek for some kind of reform? What is that reform to be? That is the question, and, much as we differ on one side of the House or the other, I am sure that we all agree in this, that the reform which Canada requires at this moment is a more extended market for its products. Canada is in the position to-day of a young giant, shackled and manacled, not free in his movement, and the only thing he wants is to be set free from his shackles, and to have the opportunity of extending his energies abroad.

Mr. Speaker, what have they done to remove these shackles from the young giant? Why, Sir, up to the present, the shackles have been removed to the extent of a reduction of only 1 per cent on the tariff of the Conservative Government. He (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) continued :

This is the policy we have been pursuing for years, and although the policy has not yet been accepted on the other side of the House,—

Nor, Mr. Speaker, has it been accepted by these hon. gentlemen themselves since they came into power. We did not accept their policy, and when they got the opportunity, they did not accept it themselves :

—I am aware that many other hon. gentlemen on the other side have in their hearts, have been compelled to admit that the policy that must be adopted is to find markets for our products. Somewhere, on the other hand, there are many of our colleagues on the other side, who not many days or weeks or months ago indulged in the hope that Great Britain would alter its policy in regard to trade, and that we would find a larger market than we possess. That Great Britain would depart from the principle of freedom of trade, and would discriminate in favour of British products. That question has been settled on the floor of the British Parliament the other day, when the answer was given that no such hopes could be indulged in, that Britain would depart from her policy of freedom of trade, so that all the hopes which have been indulged in by some of our colleagues on the other side of the House, have passed away and can no longer be entertained.

It, therefore, becomes the duty of these men, who believe in their hearts that the situation could be amended in that respect, to turn over a new leaf on the book and seek for markets somewhere else. It is manifest, after what was said the other day on the floor of the Imperial Parliament, that Britain will not depart from her policy, freedom of trade.

Well, the right hon. gentleman acted on these lines and he accomplished pretty much what he meant on that occasion, for he succeeded in giving an advantage in trade to the people of the United States as against the people of the mother country. The advantage which his Government gave, or attempted to give to the mother country, was given at the expense of a great many of our Canadian industries, and was given without receiving any quid pro quo. The right hon. the leader of the Government, at the opening of this debate, accepted the challenge of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in these words :

I accept the challenge of the hon. gentleman. He asks us to say what we have done for the good of the country. I will try to tell him. In doing so, I shall be obliged to tell the blunders that he has made—well, no, not all the blunders he has made, but only some of them. For, if I were to undertake to tell all the blunders made by my hon. friend in his official life, I should be obliged to speak at least as long as he spoke yesterday, which—God forbid—I do not intend to do. When the hon. gentleman came back from England to take charge of his party, which had not been led as it should have been led, according to his opinion, when he came back to lead his party to victory, as he hoped, and gave them new life, there was a question that had been long before the country, a most dangerous question, which had brought this country almost to the very throes of civil strife. He tried to solve this question very much according to the method of one I need not name, "loud in tone, void in reality." In the measure he proposed, conceived in violence, there was enough to vex, to irritate and madden the majority, but there was in it no substantial aid to the minority. And this is the gentleman who tells us that we have shown our incapacity. We dealt with that question. We removed it from the federal arena to the provincial arena, where it belongs, and where it should have been left, there to be dealt with by the citizens of the province in a spirit of mutually honourable concession. I will not show here the character of the hon. gentleman's blunder in this case. It is there before his eyes. He sees it night and day, and he regrets it night and day.

The right hon. gentleman refers here to the school question and I take it that in doing so, and in referring to this matter as the very first question in his reply, he, I have no doubt, did so with a view of inviting discussion, although the Address to which the Prime Minister was replying did not contain any references to that important question. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) therefore invited discussion on the Manitoba school question, although we have been accustomed to hear from him and his supporters in the past, that that question was forced on this Parliament by the Conservative party. Sir, such a statement is not true.

That question was forced on this Parliament by the conduct of the right hon. First Minister and his supporters, in Parliament and out of Parliament. We are now told by the right hon. First Minister that the question is settled. If the question is settled, we are without any knowledge as to the settlement of it. I do not bring it before this House on the present occasion with the view of discussing it on the lines on which hon. gentlemen opposite addressed themselves to it on previous occasions. I bring it before the House because of the manner in which the right hon. First Minister referred to it in accepting the challenge of the hon. leader of the Opposition; and, in doing so, I take the liberty of referring hon. gentlemen to the position the right hon. First Minister occupied on the question on previous occasions. In former sessions, when the previous Government were dealing with that question, the right hon. First Minister charged the late Administration with failing to act. He told the House and the country that the minority were suffering an injustice, an outrageous injustice, at the hands of the Government, because of their not acting and giving them redress. He said: "The Government should act at once; the Act of 1890 should be disallowed; delay was insufferable; the Government was censurable." He attacked the Government for insincerity. "Why go to the courts?" he asked. "It was merely a pretext for doing nothing. The question is one of fact, not of law. The Government is cowardly. It dares not act; it shelters itself behind the tribunals. Meanwhile injustice remains, and confederation is imperilled." I hope the right hon. First Minister will not leave the House until I am through with this question. In the session of 1895 he attacked the Government for not bringing in a Bill. "You have the decision of the courts," he said; "your powers are known; the grievance is affirmed. Where is your Bill? You dare not bring it; you are still insincere; what is more cowardly?" In the autumn of 1895 he demanded a commission of inquiry. "We do not know the facts," he declared; "we are ignorant. Full five years have shed their light on the question, still our knowledge is inadequate. Give them a commission and let them inquire into the facts. True, I have always been against delay; true, the commission will cause more delay. No matter; I will eat my words, but now I plant myself squarely on the platform of further delay and a commission." In the beginning of the session of 1896 he wants the Bill. "Where is the Bill?" he demands. "We don't want Estimates; we don't want general business; we want the Bill. Is the Government still cowardly and insincere? If not, let us have the Bill." That was during the session of 1896. Now he wants neither the Bill nor the commission. The right hon. First Minister rose to speak upon it, and, behold! the right hon. gentleman, who had for years denounced the Government for delay, cowardice, insincerity, who had demanded justice, a commission and the Bill, suddenly turned round, repudiated a commission, and proposed to kill the Bill by moving the six months' hoist. Could any man more completely swallow himself? Speaking at Jacques Cartier, in the province of Quebec, the right hon. First Minister said:

Because of these principles of mine, which are well known, I have more power than my opponents to settle the Manitoba school question. They have appealed to prejudice, but I have always declined to do so. I have greater strength than they have to appeal to Ontario for justice. I have always striven to have equal justice for all.

And further on:

He claimed that he was in the right when he held that the question should be investigated. Some people blamed him for holding this view; but while Catholics knew what these separate schools were, there were many Protestants who did not. Even if all Catholics in the Dominion were to unite on this question, they would still form a minority. It was, therefore, evident that if they wished to secure separate schools for the minority, they must have the support of a portion of the Protestant population. As a Catholic he was in a position to go to the Protestants of the other provinces and ask for justice. He could do so all the more, especially in Ontario, where it was well known that the Liberal party had always been the champions of separate schools, and more especially his friend Sir Oliver Mowat.

Well, the right hon. gentleman went to the province of Ontario, and he brought down Sir Oliver Mowat, and put him into his Cabinet; and what has he done? He says he settled the question. He does not seem to have anything to show us on the line of that settlement, and we hear the same complaint from the minority of Manitoba that we have been accustomed to hear during the last five or six years. In regard to what the right hon. gentleman said, as to his influence with the Protestants of the province of Ontario, those of us who desired a settlement of that question on the lines on which we considered it should have been settled at the time—that is, on the lines which would restore to the people of Manitoba what the Manitoba measure took from them—have nothing to complain of with regard to the Protestants of this country; we have nothing to complain of with regard to the Protestants in this House; but what we do complain of is, that the right hon. First Minister and his Catholic friends are responsible for the non-settlement of that great issue. As evidence of that, and as evidence to show that in my own province we have had no reason to complain of any stand that the Protestant people, as a body, took against the lines on which it was desired to have that question settled, I wish to quote from the Presbyterian "Witness," which says:

There ought to be no ground for complaint, no injustice or seeming lack of generous treatment. The more the matter is thought over the more we cherish the hope that Manitoba will find a way to remove any just cause of complaint on the part of the minority, a way that shall be strictly within the lines of the constitution. The law, the old law, is certainly not a good law; but if there is moral obligation for its restoration in some practicable form, we trust the majority will make the necessary change. There are in Manitoba eminent jurists, laymen of the greatest prudence and common sense, clergymen who are familiar with the history, the public life and the aspirations of all our provinces, and of Canada as a whole. We have the fullest confidence that these men are equal to the occasion, and that, without any pressure, or in spite of any pressure, from outside, they will do their whole duty—following the way of righteousness and good neighbourhood.

That is the way in which the chief organ of the Presbyterian body in Nova Scotia treated that question in April, 1895, and that goes to show that the Catholic minority of Manitoba would have had no cause for complaint as far as that body is concerned. A few days ago we read in the press that a question had been asked in the province of Manitoba of Mr. Greenway, the First Minister of that province, as to whether the reports were true that certain concessions had been granted the minority of Manitoba, as a sort of grace at the hands of the Government of that province, and which they were not entitled to under the laws of that province. Mr. Greenway replied as follows:

There were people who at the present time were making it their business to cast insinuations at the Government's attitude on the matter of public schools. These people did not hesitate to say that the Government had weakened in the position it had all along adopted, and of these he wished to say that they never made a greater mistake. It was impossible for the Government to keep officials watching at the door of every school, but one thing the Government would and could do, was to see to it that if the regulations governing the management of these schools were violated, the Government grant would be withheld. The Government stood to-day where it has always stood since the passing of the Public School Act. Its aim was to make the people of this province one in education, and one in helping to develop the country, and it would brook no interference in carrying out its policy along these lines.

That statement does not indicate that there has been any kind of a settlement of that question. I am informed that as a result of its non-settlement that at Brandon there was a convent where about 100 pupils were taught by the Sisters of "The Faithful Companion of Jesus," a body incorporated under the laws of the province, about half the pupils were Protestants. The school has been closed since, and the sisters had to leave and open a school in Rat Portage, in the province of Ontario, the abandoned school property at Brandon being owned by the Church. Separate schools that existed in Portage la Prairie, in Selkirk, and in several other places where the majority are Protestants, have had to be closed since the law has been passed. Teachers who are teaching under the Catholic trustees are obliged to make a declaration at the close of every half year, to the effect that no religious instruction was given by them. At Winnipeg, about 800 children are taught in the Catholic schools under the Marist Brothers, from Ohio, for the boys, and under the Sisters of the Holy Name of Jesus and Mary, from Montreal, for the girls. These four schools receive no aid either from the Government nor from the ratepayers. They are supported by subscriptions from Roman Catholics, who are also compelled to pay school taxes for the support of the public schools, which are of no use to them, and aid also from outside provinces. Their school-houses, and even their furniture, and all school property held by them, is taxed to the extent of $400 for the support of public schools. The right hon. First Minister claims that the question is settled. If so, let him produce the evidence that it is. In any other line of business, when there is a dispute or controversy between two parties as to whether a certain matter has been settled or not, the party who claims that it has been settled has to produce his receipt; and if the right hon. gentleman's claim be a correct one, where is his receipt? Where is the evidence? Is there a word of acknowledgment from the people with whom he had to deal to show that this question is settled. Every hon. gentleman in this House knows that the right hon. First Minister obtained the position he now holds on the strength of his promise to settle satisfactorily that question, and knows also that the greater number of those who are seated behind him owe their seats to the argument that the accession to power of the right hon. gentleman would immediately result in a satisfactory settlement to the minority of Manitoba. To-day we are told boldly that the question is settled, but we are without any evidence. The question, I say, Mr. Speaker, is not settled. And my purpose now is to ascertain from the right hon. First Minister if he can inform this House of any single act of his on the lines of a settlement of that question. It is reported in parts of this country that he adopted certain measures with a view to a sort of temporary settlement, and it is due to this House and to the people—especially those interested more particularly in that matter and in the removal of it from this Parliament—to know whether the rumour is based on facts or not. We are aware that the right hon. gentleman made promises to the people of Manitoba, that he made private promises to them, that he made promises to those representing the interests of the minority in Manitoba, and made these promises both in and out of this country. From time to time the right hon. gentleman has sued for grace because of his delay in fulfilling these promises, and I am informed, as no doubt some other hon. gentlemen also in this House are, that on being called upon not many months ago that the time was opportune for him to implement those promises and give some form of redress to the minority of Manitoba, the right hon. gentleman had a money contribution forwarded to the people of that province in order to support those schools which should have been supported on the lines on which the people of Manitoba sought redress. This issue is a creation of the right hon. the First Minister and his supporters. His friends in Manitoba could have removed this question from the arena of politics without it being brought before this House. The right hon. gentleman is the father of the illegitimate issue known as the school question, which has given so much trouble, so much annoyance to the people of this country and which has cost so much money. Now, we are told, but I hope the right hon. gentleman can deny it, that he has adopted a new means of keeping this question quiet for the time being and this is by sending money—hush money. Mr. Speaker—to the people of Manitoba. The object is to perpetuate the existence of the illegitimate issue of which he, as the head of the party he leads, is the father. As a Catholic, as a member of this House, as a citizen of this country, I protest, in the name of the people of this country, against that mode of dealing with the question. Will he tell us what amount of money he forwarded to Manitoba to maintain for the people the separate schools and hush the complaints of the people for the time being and so secure for himself time to sue for grace for the settlement of this question and the implementing of his promises. It is due to the House that the right hon. gentleman should deny, if he can, that he sent that money. Will he deny it now? If not, I want him to tell this House what his contribution was. Was it a thousand dollars, or two, or three, or five thousand dollars, or $10,000? This House has a right to know that. Aye, and this House has a right to know more—to know where that money came from. Was that a personal contribution on the part of the right hon. gentleman? If so, could there be any stronger condemnation of the position he has taken? I take it that it was not a personal contribution. I know that a great many citizens did make personal contributions in aid of these schools which were unjustly deprived of the aid of the state. He had an opportunity to make his contribution as other citizens did. But I take it that he has not done so. He was in a different position from other citizens. He had promised to make a settlement satisfactory to the people, and now he has failed to make it and is suing for further time and further grace; and he can only secure it by sending money for the support of the schools in the meantime—hush money, as I say. It is important for us to know where that money came from, for the right hon. First Minister fails to deny that he did pay money. It is due to this House and to the country to make it known where that money came from. Did it come from the revenue of the toll-gate keeper, the Aguiñaldo of the Administration? I feel satisfied that his revenue is a little less to-day by reason of the fact that that money went to Manitoba and that some poor contractor will have to suffer for it, if not the Dominion exchequer. I repeat that it is due to this country that the right hon. the Prime Minister should explain to the people how this money has been sent by him, and what amount it was. To whom was the money sent? In answer to what demand was it sent? My hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), a few evenings ago, referred to a communication coming from His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, demanding from the Prime Minister the implementing of his promise. Was it in response to that demand that the Prime Minister sent so much of the revenue of the toll-gate keeper of the Administration? We have a right to know that; and the right hon. the First Minister in failing to give an explanation to the House now lays himself open to a charge of keeping from us information to which we have a right. If he desires to give an explanation to the House now, I will give him the floor and listen to what he has to say.

Mr. WOOD. Go on.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The right hon. gentleman is unwilling to take advantage of the opportunity. We will take it for granted, then, that the money has been sent. It is important for us to know the facts in order that we may judge how long it is likely to keep peace with the people of Manitoba. When will the right hon. gentleman be likely to be called upon for another contribution? Will it be before the Greenway elections that are now coming on, or will it be after? Mr. Greenway says that nothing has been done towards the settlement of the question of the modification of the Act passed by the Manitoba legislature some years ago in reference to the schools. It is important that we should know what demands are to be made upon us, or upon our Prime Minister, in respect of this question, in the future.

I will ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I read an extract in reference to the administration of the Yukon. That question has been very fully discussed in this House, and therefore I am relieved of the necessity of going into it at any length. Hon. gentlemen on this side undertook to examine into the measure which the Government of the day brought before Parliament last year to provide for the building of the Stikine railway. A great deal of criticism was indulged in by hon. members on this side. If those criticisms were not correct and the position taken by these hon. gentlemen was not sound, we might reasonably expect that the Government would have good grounds for believing that their course was the proper one and that they would come before Parliament this year with a similar measure. However, from what I have been able to learn about what is taking place in that country and the experience of the people who have attempted to go there, I feel satisfied that the line taken by hon. gentlemen on this side in opposing that measure was correct. I believe that not a single thing has transpired since that measure was before the House to weaken in any respect the opinion expressed on this side and by the majority in the Senate with regard to that measure. I have here a letter written by Mr. J. D. Cochrane, formerly of Nova Scotia, who writes an interesting account of his experience in attempting to get into the Yukon. His letter is dated November 19th, 1898 :

Aboard the tourist cars were hundreds. Not standing room for the passengers. Nearly all going to Klondike. Every man had a copy of Ogilvie's report on the Yukon. Oh, what a rich harvest of cash he must have made out of that erroneous sheet. A hearsay pamphlet written and endorsed by the Dominion Government.

ALL-CANADIAN ROUTE.

On his arrival at Wrangel, he says :

"We were booked and bonded for Glenora, a Canadian port on the Stikine. We were paying $46 per ton right through, $40 each for horses, find your own feed and attend the horses yourself, $40 each man or passenger, and board yourself on the flat-bottom, Stikine River boat, a distance of 160 miles to Glenora. Our goods were stored by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in a warehouse. We were bonded through to our destination. Some said we would have to give bonds for our goods from Wrangel to the territory line, 30 miles up the Stikine, but Canada asserted itself, and said : 'No, we are bonded through to a Canadian point.' 'Yes,' said the customs officer, 'but you are in Wrangel, Alaska, now, so if no entry is made, you cannot leave the wharf with your goods, and you will pay extra wharfage for one week more, even if you do enter to-morrow, as no Canadian Pacific Railway river boat leaves here before then.' The Canadian Pacific Railway agent at Wrangel said : 'Make your entry or you cannot get your goods,' and pointed to a few wagons and horses which some refractory Englishman owned, and had been kept on account of no bonds and entry being made. So I concluded precaution was the best part of valour. The customs broker's charges was $5 for one single entry, say one horse, one bill of goods, and an increase in the amount according to the value. Also 50 cents for Canadian clearance—$85.50 the very least. But as I had been an advocate of the all-Canadian route, and did not enter with the others, as I thought it unnecessary, and was bonded through, they charged me double at the broker's, and double at the custom-house. The boat left at 4 a.m. next morning, so I had no recourse but to pay $12 per day to a Wrangel official to accompany my goods to the boundary line, which would be $25. Some who had confidence in the all-Canadian route bonding scheme had to pay for their confidence, I amongst the rest, but for the rest of the trip I did not advocate the so-called all-Canadian route ; it was too expensive."

Next morning we steamed away from the wharf, and a sigh of relief escaped from many a lip as we rounded a bend in the river and left the town far behind. The official who was placed on board to accompany us to the boundary line, told us some terrible tales of robbery and theft committed in the gambling hells and other places in the town just left. The Stikine is a good river, some places 300 yards wide, other places only about 150 yards. We passed glaciers—miles in depth from the river, and of great length—the pure white ice glistening in the sun, and the mountains are well timbered on this river. The flats have a growth of cotton-wood. Then we passed tents after tents, little groups of tent villages—camped in the bottoms and islands along the river—victims of Ogilvie's report on the red-golden Klondike—and Yukon. Victims of the all-Canadian route who had rushed through with horses and sleds after landing at Wrangel, trying to make Glenora before the ice broke up in March. They dare not stay at Wrangel. It cost $25 for leave to put a tent on a vacant piece of ground. They got up some distance, through snow and snow till their horses became exhausted, and many died, also oxen. They then endeavoured to pull through with hand sleds, but the ice gave way, and they were stranded on the shores and islands by the way. Many had lost their all—horses and provisions by breaking through the ice—barely escaping with their own lives. Kelly Bros., of Chatham, N.B., lost $1,200 in one day, their teams and goods going through the rapids with a current of from eight to twenty miles. It was impossible to save anything except their lives. After a trip of three days we arrived in Glenora.

Every one was prepared to rest for a few days, and then pull out on the wagon road to Teslin Lake—reported in the House of Commons at Ottawa as finished by March 1—the delusion, the snare, the misrepresentation. There was not even a pack-trail of 18 inches wide. No person knew anything about the trail further than Telegraph Creek, 12 miles further up over canyons and hills, which were almost impassable even to those on foot. Some yet believing in Ogilvie's report of gold on the Stikine river mining from $9 to $12 a day, went to work. After a hard day's work some of them had gathered in a few colours, perhaps 10 cents worth. Dease Lake, in the Cassie R. Reservation, 80 miles distant, was reported rich in gold, called Cassie R. on account of a company obtaining a charter to build a railroad from Glenora to Dease Lake, receiving 700,000 acres of land, they made a reservation of a portion of this land in that part of the country. However, the Cassie R. reservation was granted by the British Columbia Government—the road to be finished in ten years. The road will never be built, as the company have had a party of experienced miners prospecting for gold and found none. The best quartz they had assayed $2 to the ton, so the charter will be abandoned. The same misfortune happened to those who came up the Stikine to go over the all-Canadian route to the Yukon. They all returned foot-sore and ragged. Still a gleam of hope in the golden Klondike existed. Some abandoned wagons and horses, and hastily constructed pack-saddles for their team, and thus endeavoured to make for Teslin Lake. Others sold their provisions and outfit for half of what it cost and went back down the Stikine to Wrangel and took boat to Skagway and Lake Bennett. Fortunate were those who did so, although at the cost of nearly all they had. I and others looked around for the great transportation teams which were to be on this complete wagon-road, but none could be found, neither road nor teams. There was neither, but there was an Indian footpath, used in summer through these massive swamps from one lake to another. The Hudson's Bay Company, who had the Dominion Government contract to forward the 400 tons of freight for the militia soon got all the pack trains employed at 40c. per pound to make this transportation through mud and mire. The hardships and loss of life on this trip were terrible. Mules with packs went out of sight in the mud—thirty at a time out of a train of sixty. Stores were destroyed by getting wet in the mud, but what did it matter? Take the 200 military and 400 tons of supplies over the 190 miles of footpath at a cost of four times as much as would have laid them down at Fort Selkirk. The all-Canadian route to the Yukon must be boomed at all hazards and great expense. The poor Klondiker must be induced to pass over the all-Canadian route. The transport of the military and stores over it would be the greatest inducement, and, true, it was, for it proved effective. I returned to Vancouver from Glenora for the purchase of horses to bring back to transport my goods through this dreaded route. As all had been shipped to Glenora at a cost of $46.50 a ton. On my return trip I was more unfortunate at Wrangel, Alaska, U.S., than I had been previously. I came on another line of steamers, and was landed at a private wharf—McKinnon's wharf. When I was ready to leave next morning, I found my goods under lock and key, and $5 stage dues to pay on five pack-saddles and a half ton of baled hay. My horses were transhipped from the steamer to the flat Stikine river-boat, not landed on the wharf at all—50c. each, a great favour that it was not $1. I said: "I am bonded to Glenora through here." "Never mind, you are in Wrangel, Alaska, U.S.; go and get your bonds made out, or you cannot go by this boat." I did so. Ten dollars to the customs broker and 50c. to the custom-house. I said: "I went to the custom-house at Vancouver and they told me to pay nothing, that I was bonded to Glenora." With a pleasant smile, he said: "You are in Alaska, U.S." "Yes," I said, "and if ever you catch me here again, or on the all-Canadian Yukon route, you can imprison me for the balance of my natural life." And I, and hundreds more, will stick to the same resolution.

After leaving Wrangel on my second trip up the Stikine River the water had risen considerably, and as we went up the river on a flat boat drawing, when loaded, three feet of water, we passed groups of tents entirely surrounded by water and a few cattle and horses, which had survived the winter by being fed cotton-wood trees and what hay and oats the owners had with them at the time of the breaking up of the ice—were now cut off on other parts of the islands, the water rushing between at a velocity of 20 miles per hour. Many gave signals for help to be taken aboard, but succour could not be given—our boat was loaded. You could see signs of intense distress as these signals were disregarded. Amongst those thus stranded were women. The captain of the boat said, "Why does not the Government charter a boat and take those poor creatures to a place of safety?" The swift and angry current swept our boat to the bank, where some were camped. Six men came aboard and paid every cent they had to get up to Glenora, and told me that they had not eaten anything for twenty-four hours, and the last they had was flour. I reported the fact to the principal owner, who was on board. He said it was a pity, but did not make an effort to give them anything. * * * The broker in Alaska, U.S., had my last dollar while travelling over the all-Canadian route to the Yukon.

Mr. McDUGALL.

After coming down to a light and wholesome diet of crackers and cheese, Mr. Cochrane reached Glenora, and he and his partner started on the pack-trail, which they found a "massive line of bog." He gives a lively picture of the hardships of the trail. He quotes Mr. Sifton's reply to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper: "Mr. Mann is here; I met him at the Rideau Club, and he says the wagon-road is finished." There was not a blow struck on it at the time; that is what fooled the poor fellows to come this route.

Speaking of Mackenzie & Mann's wagon-road, he says: "It is entirely useless, as a great portion of the corduroy bridging is all burnt up—in fact, while the men were at one end of the work the other end would be on fire. The ground is a moss bog about one foot deep. When this gets on fire it burns for weeks, even after a snowfall. In this way it is impossible to keep corduroy work on it. The entire country has been burnt through."

"The horrors of the trail will," he says, "throw a gloom over the all-Canadian route for some time to come. Dying men, women and children, dying and dead horses." He stakes his reputation "that gold will never be found from Glenora to Teslin Lake, though some 30,000 licenses will be granted."

Now this is the experience of a Nova Scotian, who undertook to go into that country on the strength of statements which the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches made to this country and to this House, when Parliament was in session last year. It has proved a serious matter, not only to this gentleman, who suffered so much in attempting to get into that country, but to a great many others who had a similar experience. It is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister (Mr. Sifton) who has charge of the administration of that country, did not take any other steps to deal with that very important branch of his department. It seems to me the most serious blunder that the Government of the day could possibly make, is to show the lack of interest they have shown in not giving that country a better administration than they have. It seems to me a strange matter, that nearly every Minister in the Cabinet could take a trip to England, or anywhere else, except a trip to that country. Now, what could the hon. Minister of the Interior have done better, with more benefit to that country or with greater credit to himself, than to have taken a trip into that country so as to gain information that would assist him in putting the administration of that country upon a better footing than it has been. We would not have had these charges, at least we would have had very few, laid against the Government of the day for the manner in which they have dealt with the administration of that country. The people who have gone into that country would have had better treatment, and the people who would like to go in there, would be encouraged to go, and in that way our own people would derive greater benefit from the great wealth that is being discovered in that country. I do hope that the day is not far distant when the hon. Minister of the Interior will make up his mind to visit that country himself and see to the better government of affairs there for which his department is responsible.

I do not propose to delay the House at any greater length on this question; but I will say one word, Mr. Speaker, on the question of the only measure which is promised to us in the Speech from the Throne. I remember when a measure of that kind was promised to us by the former Government, and that when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) undertook to deal with that measure at the time, he used very severe language against the Administration of the day for having proposed a measure of redistribution. I thought I had his language here, but I find I have not. I remember it was very strong. He charged the Administration of the day with bringing that measure forward with a view of securing the return of that Administration at the polls at the forthcoming elections. Now, reading over that charge of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I consider that his words would be a perfect answer in the present instance. At the time when the former Government dealt with redistribution, they did so because they were called upon to do so by the constitution, by the result of a census that had been taken previously. Now there is no such reason, and there can only be the one reason, and that is, that the Government are proposing this rearrangement, or gerrymander, of the constituencies with a view of making it easier for hon. gentlemen to be returned to power when they next appeal to the country. Now, they have adopted other means, since they came into power, for making it easier for them to get returned to power. The Government have been reminded of a great many promises they made of important measures on their accession to power, and that there would be a day when they would be face to face with the people to whom they more directly made these promises. They can listen to these charges and give no reply, but when they go before the electors of this country, they will be compelled to give a reply, and the electorate will answer them in a manner which they will not at all like. These gentlemen, who criticised the policy of the previous Administration, and who have failed to implement their promises to the people, must know that the day of reckoning will come, and that, when it does come, the people will be no longer fooled by them as a Government.

These hon. gentlemen, however, have done one thing. If they did not provide for the welfare of the people, they are fast providing for their own welfare. Already no less than fourteen of the Liberal members of this Parliament have gone to their reward. The names of these gentlemen will bear repeating. There is Mr. Choquette, appointed a judge; Mr. Langeller, appointed a judge; the late Mr. Cameron, appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories; and Mr. Lister, appointed a judge. Sir Oliver Mowat, it is true, was not returned to the House but he undertook an important Cabinet position under certain conditions which were intimated to the people of this country before he was taken into the Government, and which conditions he never fulfilled. Sir Oliver has been made Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. Mr. Lavergne was appointed a judge. Mr. Devlin was made immigration agent in Ireland, and we know what promises Mr. Devlin made to the people of this country before the last election. Mr. Fiset was appointed to the Senate, and Mr. Bechard got a similar appointment. Mr. Forbes, of Nova Scotia, was appointed a judge to make place for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). Senator McInnes was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia. Mr. King was given a senatorship to make room for the Minister of Railways. Mr. Yeo was made a Senator, and Senator McLellan was made Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick. Within the short space of three years we have had fourteen prominent members of this Parliament appointed to important positions, put out of sight of the electors, and these gentlemen have nothing more to say with regard to the welfare of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. We hear rumours from day to day of positions being promised to hon. members of this House. We see reports in the press of positions being promised to and positions being sought by hon. members of Parliament, and I propose to give some of them to the House. I find on the slate the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), who, I am informed, has been promised the Montreal post office, and he wants the scalp of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) thrown in. Then there is the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Beith), who is not looking for anything for himself, because he secured the appointment of his brother as collector of customs at Bowmanville. There is the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier), who, it is said, has been promised a senatorship. There is the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), who does not want anything because he is satisfied with the increased duties on his manufactures. There is the hon. member for Victoria, N.S. (Mr. Bethune)—I do not know on which side of the House to find him, but I am told he eloped with the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. BENNETT. He had his arms full.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes, and I am told further that he (Mr. Bethune) is seeking for the patronage of the county of Victoria, which is now held by the Premier of Nova Scotia. I hope he will get it. There is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), who is well provided for, but I understand he is expecting the leadership of the party, which no doubt he is entitled to. He has already provided for his son with Mr. Haney on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, a very lucrative position, and the young man is now on a trip to Montana. There is no doubt but that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has done a good deal since he has occupied the important position he was given. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) claims to have extended the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, and the right hon. the First Minister endorsed his claim. But the Prime Minister should have told us a little more of what the Minister of Railways has accomplished since he has taken charge of that department. He should have told us that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has established a great industry. Any one who will go to an Intercolonial Railway station between Montreal and Cape Breton cannot fail to see the industry which the hon. gentleman has brought into existence. It is the gum industry, Mr. Speaker, and I am surprised there is no mention of it in the Speech from the Throne. You cannot buy a ticket through a wicket in any Intercolonial Railway station to-day without looking at the Minister of Railways' new industry of Tutti-Frutti, as it is called—put a cent in the slot and take your gum. That is a peculiar business.

Mr. BENNETT. What commission did he get?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not know, but I am informed that the Intercolonial Railway station agents are busily employed at times counting the cents dropped in the slot, and that they very often find a large number of counterfeit cents; lead cents, for instance. That is the business they are engaged in on the Intercolonial Railway to-day. Now, Sir, as to the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), he has accomplished a great deal in his department since he came in, and in return for it he secured the appointment of a cousin at a salary of $2,400 a year to the position of accountant in the Militia Department. I come now to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). That hon. gentleman secured the honour of an important position on the commission to Washington, but we have not seen the bills yet. We will likely have an important statement when we get the Auditor General's Report, showing the amount that the trip of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) cost to the country. As to the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), the Ontario papers report that he is slated for a judgeship. The hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) withdrew his resignation—for a consideration, I suppose. The hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell), I understand, is pressing for a continuation of the duty on flour, and for the sake of that has given up any claim to a senatorship. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) is slated for a judgeship. He spoke here the other night, and that accounts for it. I come now to a very important person, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). I remember how the walls of this building used to resound with his indignation at the benefits that were given to the Tupper family. Oh, what great things the Tupper family used to receive from the country! But now the country knows what great things the Cartwright family receives. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is drawing $8,000 a year for himself. His brother, the Rev. C. Cartwright, has been made chaplain of the Kingston Penitentiary. Robert Cartwright, his son, is Assistant Attorney General. Frank Cartwright, another son, is inspector of the North-west Mounted Police. Harry Cartwright, another son, is in the Ontario civil service. James Cartwright, a cousin, is in a position in Osgoode Hall; and John Cartwright, a cousin, is Deputy Attorney General at Toronto. F. C. T. O'Hara, a second cousin, is private secretary, and with the commission.

Mr. BENNETT. Are all the returns in?

Mr. McDOUGALL. No. Straubenzie Cartwright, a second cousin, is appointed to the Military School. Mr. O'Hara, married to a cousin, is Master in Chancery at Chatham, Ontario—a Government appointment. I would like the Minister of Trade and Commerce now to get up and repeat one of his speeches against the Tupper family; would we not enjoy listening to it? Now, I come to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). That hon. gentleman, I am told, is prepared to take anything that is handy. He is disappointed at not having got the position of Deputy Minister of Agriculture; but now that he is such a faithful follower of the First Minister, he is satisfied with anything that is handy. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) got on a commission to Washington, with four months' board and a title to come.

Mr. EDWARDS. What?

Mr. McDOUGALL. A title to come. I will not forget you. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie), I am told, is likely to get the position of Prohibition Inspector. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) will be satisfied with a junior judgeship; he is slated for it. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has not forgotten himself, nor his family either. He secured a lighthouse for his brother, and he is fixing up the position of Lieutenant-Governor for another brother; it is on the slate.

The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), I am told, is pressing for a whisky permit for the Yukon, and it is said he had one with Pete O'Brien last year. The hon. gentleman can deny that if it is not correct. The hon. member for St. James, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais), who spoke so eloquently the other night, although I could not understand what he said, is slated for a judgeship. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), I am told, is pressing for the establishment of a permanent department of bottle-necks, and the construction of a deal yard in London. The hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville), I understand, is to be issuer of liquor permits for the Yukon. Now I come to my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards), who was so uneasy a few moments ago. I understand that he is slated for a knighthood. The hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), I am informed, has secured a position for his father in the Langevin Block. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston), I am given to understand, is promised the position of Inspector of Quarantine. The hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Fitzpatrick), I am informed, is to be Minister of Justice in the next Government. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), is to be judge of the county court. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) is not hard to please. He is to have a judgeship, and he is willing to take it anywhere.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What is the salary?

Mr. McDOUGALL. We know how deserving of consideration that hon. gentleman is. He was not well treated in the past, I must say. Coming, as I do, from the same province, I would like to see him receive better treatment at the hands of the Administration than he has. The hon. gentleman has had to swallow a great deal, and everybody knows his capacity for swallowing. According to the Parliamentary Companion, he is one of the only two free traders in this House. He and the hon. member for Argenteuil are the only two members of this House who venture to put themselves down there as free traders.

Mr. EDWARDS. That is very great injustice.

Mr. IVES. Are you not satisfied with your knighthood?

Mr. EDWARDS. If the hon. gentleman is referring to me, I do not come from Argenteuil.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not referring to the hon. member, but to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie). I do not think that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) puts himself down in the "Parliamentary Companion" as a free trader. The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) wants an increase of duty on agricultural implements, and we are to hear from him, I understand, this afternoon. The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), I am told, will be satisfied with Mr. Tarte's scalp. He has been after it for some time, and the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson) is to get a senatorship and harbour grants and contracts for his constituency. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) is backed for a senatorship. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Guité) withdrew his resignation, I suppose, for a consideration. We will hear more of him. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Haley), I am told, is booked for the Senate, and the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood) is also booked for a senatorship. The hon. member for the west riding of Huron (Mr. Holmes) has, I am told, secured a position in the immigration service for his brother in the North-west Territories at St. Paul.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. Holmes. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Hutchison), it is said, is to be appointed postmaster. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is to be made a Senator; and if he does not get the senatorship, he will take anything that is going, because he has secured a position for his son-in-law in the Government Lands Office at Dawson City, and also a position for another son in the Toronto post office, so that he cannot press very hard his claim to a seat in the Senate. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) is not pressing for much, but will be satisfied if there are no further laws passed with regard to smuggling. All the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) wants is ample means to enable him to get back. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) who spoke last night so eloquently and forcibly, with the inside of his former speeches turned out, is slated for a senatorship, and secured a position for his son-in-law, Dr. Horsey, to go across the continent on a trip with Li Hung Chang.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to state that I never secured a position for my son-in-law, Dr. Horsey, to go across the continent or anywhere else. Nor did I ever approach the Government, directly or indirectly for that purpose, nor did I ever mention his name to the Government in that connection or any other.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Did he get the job?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He went across the continent, but at his own expense, and did not receive a cent for the time he put in. These are the facts, and I hope the hon. gentleman will keep them in mind for future reference. The only thing I ever got from the Government was the appointment of my son as surgeon on board the "Diana." He served his time as anybody else would, and got his pay at $100 a month. Anything else contained in the statement of my hon. friend is absolutely false.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. I say that his son secured the position, and no doubt secured it through being the son of the father.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is perfectly right, my son secured the position through his father.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to tell hon. members that he did not ask the position for his son-in-law at the hands of the Government. We all know that was not necessary. The son-in-law asked for it, and they knew who he was. I was going to refer to the appointment of his own son to a position, but my hon. friend has admitted that. Then the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) is slated for the Truro post office. The hon. member for the north riding of Essex (Mr. McGregor) is, I understand, to be an Inland Revenue inspector.

Mr. McGREGOR. There is nothing in it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He was disappointed in not getting the position of Windsor postmaster, and I hope he will get the inspectorship, for he deserves it. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) is, I understand, seeking superannuation for his brother, who is a judge in that county, with the view of getting the place himself. I must say that I was one of those who recommended the appointment of the present judge of the county of Antigonish, and I have never been sorry that I did so, but have always been proud of that gentleman and his popularity as judge in that district. I must say I would be sorry, however, to recommend his brother. I could not do it on the same ground.

Mr. McISAAC. That is the first I ever heard of it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. member has heard enough of it in his own county.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). And the hon. gentleman never heard of it anywhere.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I did, dozens of times, in the county of Antigonish, from the electors of that county.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Name.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is not necessary. We remember the case of the former hon. member for Queen's, who was appointed to the position of judge, to make room for my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. We remember that that appointment was denied when it was on the slate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It never was on the slate, and consequently could never have been denied.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am told that the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), who secured the advantage of the removal of the duty on corn, is very likely, whether he is slated for it or not, to get another advantage at the hands of the present party, and that is a commission for lecturing on agriculture.

An hon. MEMBER. He has that already.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Well, he has only one from the local government, but he will retire from his present position, because he cannot go back to the electors and tell the story he did before, and will, therefore, get this commission which will give him an opportunity of lecturing them instead on agriculture. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I am told, is to have the position of Minister of Agriculture or a senatorship, but as the vacancy is likely to take place by the resignation of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) on account of his position on the plebiscite, the hon. member for North Wellington is to take his place. I do not know what truth there is in that, but it is rumoured. However, he secured a position for his brother-in-law—or perhaps his brother-in-law secured it, I will not trouble him to deny it—in the Kingston Penitentiary. Now we come to the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell)—and we cannot forget his speech in the House the other night. I am told, and I think the authority on which it comes to me is good, that the hon. gentleman is to get the position of chaplain in a penitentiary on Deadman's Island. Then there is the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). We have heard so much about penny postage and about the price that the people of Canada will have to pay for that measure that we do not wonder that it should be reported that the Postmaster General is to be knighted in consideration of his achievements in that line. Next, the hon. member for North Grey, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). The hon. gentleman has not been well treated, as he gets $2,000 less than his colleagues—and he speaks just as loud as any of them, and sometimes louder. But if he is still allowed to have the protective duty on biscuits and candy, he will continue to taffy all the other members of the Government. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), I am told that he is slated for a Cabinet position, and he must have Tarte's scalp into the bargain. Then there is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), whom I see in his place. The height of his ambition is to get the scalp of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and he will get it. He also wants the Prime Minister to "hitch his chariot to a star." Then we come to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret). I am informed that he is to be appointed to the quarantine inspectorship at Grosse Isle. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) is not pressing very hard—will be satisfied with another trunk. I was passing through the lobby yesterday and saw the hon. gentleman with his eye on the bags of mail matter piled up there. I am not surprised, as hon. gentlemen will remember that I showed a few moments ago the increase duty that the Canadian people had to pay on bags from the United States. These bags will come in very handy when they are empty. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), I understand, is picked for a judgeship. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Savard) wants lots of public works. That is all that he is after. If he gets them, he can get back. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver)—who I will not venture to say he has not earned a senatorship. He ought to get it, and get it he will. Then we come to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). It is said he is running a race with the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) for the leadership. But, in the meantime, he has secured a position for his brother in the Department of Justice who drew the other day $1,700 from the exchequer; while a cousin is a clerk at $1,500, I understand. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson)—well, now, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will deny that he is looking for the postmastership, but the post office is looking for him now. He is slated for the postmastership of Sherbrooke. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). Well, he wants still to hold the position of toll-gate keeper, no matter what his friends in Montreal may say. He has already, through holding that position, been able to secure dredging contracts for his son's father-in-law, and a number of other friends. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood)—last, but not least. He should not be forgotten. He is down for a senatorship. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to apologize to any hon. gentleman who may feel in the frame of mind shown by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards), when he thought I had skipped his name. If I have skipped any of these hon. gentlemen I would like to be forgiven. But the statements will be important information for the people of Canada, and of great assistance to them, I am sure, in judging of the calibre of the men that will come before them when the dissolution of this Parliament takes place. They will find that they have to deal with new men. When hon. gentlemen opposite came before the people last, they secured the confidence of the electors on the promise of change in the fiscal policy of this country, other important measures of legislation and of great reforms in the administration of the Government of the country. But the Government and its supporters will come before them in the next election as the party that throws the interests of the country aside and wishes to stick to office for their own interest and the benefit of their friends and relations. That is an important plank in their platform, and it is worthy the consideration of the people of this country. I think that this plank will not receive the warmest commendation at the hands of the electors. I am sorry I have occupied so much time, though I could go on much longer and deal with nothing but important matters. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, for the attention with which you have listened to me.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that what the hon. gentleman has stated with regard to myself is without any foundation; in fact, it is simply untrue.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I accept the statement with a great deal of pleasure. It is another evidence that we are not to have any legislation as a result of the plebiscite.

Mr. F. F. FROST (Leeds and Grenville). It is a good thing for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to have had their fortunes so thoroughly told as has been done by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall). I think we must consider him to have received some commission or to have received power in some way or other through apostolic succession from the witch of Endor, because he comes and prognosticates for every member on this side of the House his past, present and future. As he has described us so well and shown where we are to stand in the future, I think we can safely call him the chief prophet and wizard of Cape Breton—if that is a parliamentary phrase. I think if he were to put out his card as a wizard, fortune teller and prophet, no doubt he would reap a rich harvest. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to attempt to reply to my hon. friend from Cape Breton. We have been listening carefully for some weeks in this discussion to hear what our friends in Opposition had to say as to the policy of this Government during the past three years. Any observer who chooses to take a reasonable view of what has been said by them cannot come to any other conclusion than that in the eyes of our hon. friends opposite the policy of the Government has been a complete failure. I have been waiting to hear some concrete charges made. We have listened to rumours and newspaper reports, we have listened to statements that have been bandied about from mouth to mouth, outside of this House and in the country. We have heard very long speeches containing serious charges against the Government, but so far no man on that side of the House comes forward with a single definite charge against the Government, asking for a committee and promising to prove it before a committee. Until this House and this country hear something of this kind, we may safely conclude that the Government policy during the past three years has commended itself to the good judgment of the people of this country.

Now, in the first paragraph of the Address, His Excellency congratulates the House on the country's prosperity, on the expansion of trade and commerce, the flourishing condition of the revenue, the rapidly increasing immigration, and the cessation of the exodus. It is principally upon these points in the Address that I propose for a few moments to take up the time of the House. I find everywhere throughout this country a new, throbbing and pulsating life. We find business increasing rapidly everywhere; we find money more plentiful than it has ever been before; we find that farmers are no longer complaining as they were three or four years ago; we find a most remarkable expansion in trade and commerce. When this Government came into power in 1896, the trade and commerce of this country amounted to $232,000,000; in 1897 it had increased by $25,098,000; in 1898, it had increased by $47,000,000, and this year, judging from the seven months that have already elapsed, the increase will be in the neighbourhood of $32,000,000, making a total increase in the trade and commerce of this country in the past three years of over $103,000,000. Surely that is something we have to be proud of, that is something most remarkable in its character, and we may well stop to consider what has brought it about. We know that in 1896, when this Government came into power, times were very dull, business was stagnant, failures were numerous. Well, the very first thing the Government did was to place the business interests of the country upon a foundation that would be lasting. During those three years that policy has been carried out, and as a consequence of it we have a great expansion of trade, we have better times, we have a cessation of failures, we have, as I have already remarked, a great increase of business; in fact, during these three years an almost complete transformation has taken place throughout the Dominion of Canada. We recall a promise of the present Premier of Canada made prior to the elections, when our friends now in Opposition tried to show from statistics that the country was prosperous. The right hon. gentleman stated in one of his speeches that when the Liberal party came into power the people would require no statistics to show that they were prosperous, all they would have to do would be to put their hands into their pockets and they would know it. Well, Sir, that is what has actually taken place.

Since this Government came into power they have been able to bring this country to the notice of the nations of the world to an extent that has never been done before. The visit of the Prime Minister to Great Britain contributed in a large measure to that result. We know that since that time the people of Great Britain have been constantly looking towards this country as a place to emigrate to. We know that today we are receiving a greater immigration than ever before. We also realize the fact that our Ministers have been bringing this country before the notice of the nations. Belgium has reason to remember the Dominion of Canada, Germany has reasons to remember the Dominion of Canada, through the action of the Premier of this country. The United States has never before taken so much interest in the affairs of this country as they do at the present moment. As a consequence of the international conference, in which our Ministers took part, the statesmen of the United States are paying more attention to Canadian affairs than ever before. We now read of them going to visit Alaska and the far North-west to examine the boundary question, to ascertain data upon which to work. We know that our own Ministers have this data, we know that they have understood this question all along, but the difficulty has been to get the people of the United States to realize the extent of this country and its importance upon the North American continent. Therefore, we look forward with hope and confidence to the work that is now carried on by the high commissioners at Washington.

The Government have also taken up the great question of transportation, which is, after all, one of the greatest questions that was ever brought before this Parliament. We have had other questions of importance, but nothing has occurred in the history of this country which will match in importance this great question of transportation; and one of the first acts of the Government has been to bring the Intercolonial up to Montreal.

We have heard a great deal of opposition to that scheme, but we have not heard anything yet which can produce upon the minds of the people of this country anything as against the importance of that great object. We can read, at the present time, in the report of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) of the great value which it has been to this country, to bring the Intercolonial Railway into the heart and centre of the commercial interests of the Dominion. We have again in the far west the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. We saw, when that project was carried through this House, not one single member on the opposite side of the House opposing it; in fact, no division was taken and it was not until after it was well under way that we heard one word in opposition to it. Now, we hear of what is known as the Crow's Nest deal. It is a very easy matter to say "deal," but it is not an easy matter to show that the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is not of the greatest benefit to the country, and is not a necessity, if we intend to open up the southern British Columbia region. It is now carrying there immense quantities of products from Alberta and from the North-west Territories, and our farmers up there are getting very large prices for their butter, their cattle and other products, when, otherwise, they would have been obliged to have taken short prices if they had had to send them east and ship them to Europe. Then again, in this great scheme of transportation, is the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals, and that, of itself, is a work of great importance. Hitherto we have only been able to send vessels, loaded with 25,000 bushels of wheat, through the St. Lawrence canals: now, when this work is completed, we will be able to forward vessels loaded with 100,000 bushels of wheat, and the importance of this great work to the farmers of the country is of the very highest. We realize the fact that every cent that can possibly be gained, in the transportation charges on the products of the country, adds just so much to the prices of those articles to the farmers of Canada, and we know that, as you enrich the farmers, you enrich all other people who are engaged in business, merchants, manufacturers and all other classes. Therefore, the work that is now going on in the way of increasing the transportation facilities, the facilities for getting the products of this great country into the markets of Europe, is one of the greatest moments, and one which can occupy our time to the very greatest advantage.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

Mr. F. T. FROST (Leeds and Grenville). Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was referring to the great question of the development of this country by means of intercommunication, so that the products of Canada might be sent to the markets of the world in the best manner and at the cheapest rates. Every Canadian, no matter in what part of the Dominion he may reside, looks forward with hope to the time when Canada will be the home of many millions of people. We realize that we have a wonderful heritage, and if we are to make progress along the lines of prosperity and expansion of trade, we must equip ourselves in such a way so as to develop to the fullest extent the resources which Providence has placed at our disposal. When this Government came into power, we found our transportation facilities very imperfect. Part of the canal system had been constructed, but part remained to be constructed before the whole value of the expenditure would be of any real worth to the country. We found also, that many millions of dollars had been paid for railway communication connecting the eastern and western provinces, but that railway system had been built without any restrictions whatever, and so the people of the west were greatly discontented as to the charges and the freight rates. We found also, that unhappily throughout the length and breadth of the land there was one burning question which prevented the people from calmly considering the proper realization of the great possibilities and potentialities of Canada. That question has been referred to on several occasions since the House opened, and I do not promise to speak of it further than to say, that through the very wise statesmanship of the present Government it was settled and settled for all time to come. While race and creed cries prevailed throughout the land, it was not possible for our people to thoughtfully consider the best means for promoting our material prosperity. Once in a while we now hear the race cry raised, but it no longer has any potency; it is dead, and he who today raises that cry is merely laughed at for his pains. Sir, the people of Canada are united without respect of race or creed. They are united in the one great desire to make this a nation worthy of a vigorous and intelligent people, and they are united too in the desire that Canada shall be an independent British nation on this half of the North American continent. The Government, after taking this school question entirely out of federal politics, devoted themselves to the task of equipping this country so as to make it, as it ought to be, independent of any other nation in the transportation of our products to the markets of the world. We had been for years, to a very large extent under the thumb of the United States—perhaps that is not a very happy expression but it will convey what I mean. A very large portion of our products was sent to market through the United States. It is true we had contributed generously to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the development of our water system, but at the same time, we were contributing to the wealth of the carrying companies of the United States, and to the building up of the seaports and cities of that country. This Government, when it came into power, at once set to work to remedy this unfortunate condition of affairs, and they lent their energies to placing Canada in a position of independence, so that Canadian products grown upon Canadian soil should be carried over Canadian railways and waterways and exported through Canadian ports. That is a policy worthy of this Government, worthy of any Government, and worthy of any country.

Now, Sir, one of the first things to be done by the Liberal Government was the deepening of the canals. We are charged by hon. gentlemen opposite with having increased the debt; but it must be apparent to them, that had they remained in power, the same amount of money would have to be expended; because what use was the Sault Ste. Marie lock or the Welland Canal, if the canals on the St. Lawrence below Prescott could not be utilized for the same sized vessels as passed through the Sault Ste. Marie lock and the Welland Canal. The Liberal Government found that vessels going through the lower part of our canal system were only able to draw nine feet of water, and to carry 25,000 bushels of wheat, while larger steamers running from Duluth and Fort William could discharge their cargoes of 100,000 bushels, and in some cases 200,000 bushels, at Buffalo, where a great city has grown up, and where there were 57 elevators ready to receive the grain and to tranship it immediately to barges going through the Erie Canal down to New York. Consequently, the amount of traffic which we got through to Montreal was not more than one-tenth of all the traffic that came down from our Canadian North-west. The Government saw this, and immediately commenced the deepening of the canals. For this work some four or five million dollars has been expended. Will any hon. gentleman in the Opposition stand up here and say that that is not a wise expenditure? What is going to be the result of it? That by next fall we shall be sending down vessels containing 100,000 bushels of wheat. This will reduce the cost to the consumer, and will be the means of adding to the price of grain, not only in the North-west, but all over Canada. It will also be the means of securing an additional traffic from the north-western states, which, all things being equal, will go by way of the St. Lawrence as the natural route to the sea. But we have been handicapped by the want of facilities at Montreal. While we had excellent products, the best of every kind, our farmers were not getting the full value of their products. Even at the present time cattle bring 1 cent a pound more in Chicago than they do on our side; and all the way through we have been, to a certain extent, discriminated against in the matter of prices, simply for the want of proper facilities for getting these products to the best markets. The Government took this matter up in a business-like way, and they have applied themselves energetically to the problem during the three years that they have been in power, until to-day we have before us, as I have said, almost a transformation scene. Although the deepening of the canals has not yet been completed, we know that in the west, as a result of the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the farmers of Alberta have been getting from 15 to 20 cents per pound for their butter. We know that through the energy of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), in establishing creameries in that section of the country, reopening old ones that had been closed and adding many new ones, the farmers there have been making a large amount of money, and large numbers of cattle have been going out of that country to the Kootenay mining section in British Columbia. Again, we find that the Intercolonial Railway has been, through the energy of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), lifted out of the rut into which it had got, and is now being placed on a paying basis. The first link in that chain was, to take over the Drummond County Railway and to make a contract with the Grand Trunk by which the Intercolonial Railway should come to the city of Montreal, where it competes with the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway. What was the condition of that railway prior to 1896? One end of it was opposite the city of Quebec, where it connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, and could only take such freight as the Grand Trunk chose to give it. The Grand Trunk had another line running to Portland, where it had splendid harbour and freight facilities, and where it would pay that railway to deliver freight rather than to send it over the Intercolonial to Halifax and St. John. But, further than that, we found that the late Government had leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway the best paying portion of the Intercolonial, that portion running between Halifax and St. John, so that the Government were handicapped because they were not able to take any freight on that line, and their passenger traffic was emasculated in such a way that it all went direct to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now all this has been reversed. The Minister of Railways and Canals, immediately on his entry into this Government, gave notice to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of the termination of that contract, and he immediately set to work to get the Drummond County Railway brought into the city of Montreal. All this has been accomplished, and to-day we find traffic on the line increasing very rapidly. We find the balance coming on the right side of the ledger; we find a competition that is benefiting the farmers of Canada; and we find that business is springing up all over that line. Now, no one can deny that this, as part of the grand equipment which will enable this country to carry and dispose of the products of this country, was a wise scheme. Then, in connection with that, we have the Montreal harbour improvements. We know that in the city of Mont-
