A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

Mr. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned,

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Mathieu, one of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to "the Dominion Controverted Elections Act," a certificate relating to the election petition for the electoral district of St. Anne's Division of Montreal, by which the said petition was dismissed and the sitting member declared duly elected.

I have also the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the said court in the matter of the election appeal for the electoral district of Nicolet, by which the said appeal was allowed and the judgment of the judge of the lower court on the preliminary objections reversed and set aside, and the record of the said appeal transmitted to the proper officer of the lower court in order that the said cause might be proceeded with according to law.

I have further the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received from two of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to "the Dominion Controverted Elections Act," a certificate and report relating to the election for the electoral district of Nicolet, by which the election petition was dismissed and the sitting member declared duly elected.

VACANCIES.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have also the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz. :—

Of James Frederick Lister, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Lambton, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown (a judgeship) ;

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have also the honour to inform the House that during the month of December last the hon. member for Bonaventure forwarded to me, and I duly received a form of resignation of his seat as member for the said electoral district. The resignation was in the words and figures, and in the form following :—

(Translation.)

Dominion of Canada,

Electoral District of Bonaventure.

I, the undersigned, Jean François Guité, Member of Parliament for the Electoral District of Bonaventure, declare that it is my intention to resign my seat and to cease to represent the said Electoral District in the House of Commons of Canada.

In testimony whereof I have signed at Maria, in the Electoral District of Bonaventure, this fifteenth day of December, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight.

J. F. GUITÉ.

Signed by the said Jean François Guité, in presence of Louis Thibodeau and Edmond Thibodeau, farmers, residing at Maria.

LOUIS THIBODEAU.
EDMOND THIBODEAU.

As such regulation was not executed under the seal of the member in strict compliance with subsection 2 of section 5, chapter 13, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, I determined not to issue my warrant for a new writ of election without first receiving the instructions of your honourable House.

This conclusion I communicated to the hon. member by letter dated 29th December, 1898.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In meeting you for the first time since entering upon my duties, as the representative of Her Majesty in this Dominion, it affords me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you on the large degree of prosperity which the people of Canada at present enjoy, as evidenced by the expansion of trade and commerce, the flourishing condition of the public revenues and the increased number of immigrants who have become permanent settlers amongst us. To these evidences may be added another which is even more gratifying—the almost total cessation of the considerable exodus of our population which at one time was a regrettable feature of our affairs.

The negotiations which were set on foot during the recess between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States in reference to the settlement of certain questions in dispute between Canada and the latter country were, I grieve to say, greatly delayed by the illness and subsequent death of two of the most eminent members of the commission appointed for that purpose. Considerable progress had been made on several of the subjects submitted, but a serious disagreement arose between Her Majesty's Commissioners and the Commissioners of the United States on the question of the delimitation of the boundary between Canada and Alaska; the question was referred by the commissioners to their respective Governments, the commission being adjourned to the 2nd day of August next, in the hope that, in the meantime, the difficulty might be overcome.

In compliance with the Act passed last session a plebiscite was held on the question of prohibition; the official figures of the vote will be placed before you.

I observe with pleasure that the mother country, Canada and other British possessions have recently adopted a penny postage letter rate. The satisfaction with which this action has been received by the Canadian people is a further proof of the general desire existing amongst our people for closer relations with the mother country and the rest of the Empire.

I am also glad to be able to state that the satisfactory condition of the finances of the country permitted a reduction, on the 1st of January last, of the Canadian domestic letter rate, from three to two cents and although such reduction involves a temporary loss of revenue, it is nevertheless confidently expected that the cheapened rate will prove of such service in the promotion of trade and in the general interchange of correspondence that, within a reasonable time, the revenue of the Post Office Department will be restored to its former figure.

Much information has been obtained since you last met relative to the extent and value of the deposits of gold and valuable minerals in the Yukon and other parts of Canada. The returns from the Yukon have so far proved sufficient to meet the heavy expenditure it was found necessary to incur for the purpose of preserving law and order, and it has been thought expedient in the public interest to authorize the construction of a line of telegraph for the purpose of maintaining speedy communication with the people of those distant territories.

A measure will be submitted to you for the better arrangement of the electoral districts throughout the Dominion, as also several enactments of less importance.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The public accounts will be laid before you, and also the estimates for the coming year.

They have been prepared with a due regard to efficiency and economy, and the responsibilities arising from the rapid progress of the country.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I am confident that the important subjects I have mentioned to you will receive your serious consideration, and that it will be your earnest endeavour to promote the public interest and prosperity of Canada.

REPORT.

Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.—(Mr. Speaker.)

ADJOURNMENT—DECEASED MEMBERS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I beg leave to move, seconded by Sir Charles Tupper:

That when this House adjourns it shall stand adjourned until Monday next at three o'clock in the afternoon.

I need not give any reason for making this motion, the House will understand it by looking at the wreath which we see upon the desk on the other side.

Almost within the last few hours death has removed from among us one of the most respected and influential members of this House in the person of Mr. Wood, the late member for Brockville. Mr. Wood occupied a prominent position in this House, as everybody knows. He had been an important member of the late Administration, and after a conference with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, we think that it would only be paying a fitting tribute to that gentleman, a tribute in which every member of this House will concur, that we should not commence immediately our work, but that the House should stand adjourned for a day or two before undertaking the more serious labours of the session. I need not say, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Wood occupied such a position in this House as makes his loss a personal one to all of us. He was very much respected by his opponents, and he was dearly beloved, I know, by his friends. His judicial mind, his temper, his character, were such that every one of us feels a sense of bereavement at his loss. I am sure also that the sentiments which I have just expressed will be shared by both sides of the House in reference to the loss of another gentleman, lately a member of this House, Dr. Guay of Lévis. Dr. Guay endeared himself to all who knew him, and for those who had the privilege of his intimate friendship, feel a sense of bereavement which it is hard to express. It is perhaps a fruit of the better part of our nature, engaged as we are in daily and sometimes heated conflicts, that unconsciously there arises in our hearts a sense of affection for those even whom it is our duty to oppose every day; and when death removes one of those friends, we feel a personal loss. Perhaps also we may draw the lesson from these circumstances that our respect and our affection for those friends should find expression at an earlier period, and that we should not wait until we have to content ourselves with the expression of vain regrets. I must also associate the name of Mr. Jameson, the late member for Winnipeg, with those already mentioned, whose loss we now have to deplore.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire in the first place to thank the right hon. leader of the House for the very courteous manner in which he met the suggestion that this House should adjourn in consequence of the death of one of my fellow colleagues in the Government of Canada, a gentleman who, as he has properly said, occupied a very high position in this House in the estimation of members upon both sides. As an able lawyer, as a gentleman who brought a profound knowledge of the profession to which he belonged to the consideration of the various questions which came before us, as a member of this House prompt in his attention to public business and to the discharge of his duties, not only to his party but to the country, by giving his most careful and candid consideration to every question that came before us, Mr. Wood, the late member for Brockville, undoubtedly obtained the respect and confidence of hon. gentlemen, whether sitting to the right or to the left of Mr. Speaker. The loss is one which we all deplore, and we deplore it the more because we are just entering upon the duties of a session, and those duties, we feel, will be not so efficiently and so well discharged, certainly from this side of the House, in consequence of his absence from it. I associate myself with every word that the leader of the House has so kindly and warmly uttered in reference to the memory of a gentleman who has occupied, not only a position in the Government of this country, but who has occupied the position of Deputy Speaker of this House, and in both positions he has obtained the confidence and friendship. I may say, of gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House. I also have no hesitation in associating myself with all that the right hon. leader of the House has said with reference to the death of another gentleman, Dr. Guay. Every person who knew that gentleman respected him as one of the most conscientious members that adorned the Parliament of this country. I must also add that there will be but one sentiment in appreciation of the loss which has been sustained by the House owing to the untimely and sudden death of the late member for Winnipeg. Mr. Jameson was an English gentleman who came to this country after occupying a high social position in his own country, bringing to the discharge of his duties in Parliament a highly cultivated mind, and discharging those duties not only with fidelity, but in such a manner as to endear him to the members on both sides. I am certain that I am only expressing the unanimous sentiment of this House when I say that every man desires to extend to the families, and to the relations and near friends of these gentlemen of whom the hand of death has so recently deprived us, the most cordial and sincere sympathy. I feel strongly what the leader of the House has said as to these occurrences being for us grave reminders of how slight and slender is the tenure by which we hold our positions here. I trust that in the deliberations of this House we shall all bring such a conscientious regard to the discharge of the high duties and functions devolving upon us, as will enable us to meet that dread summons when it comes with the conviction that we have at all events endeavoured to do our duty.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 20th March, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the Order for the consideration of the motion for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's speech.

Mr. JOHN H. BELL (Prince East, P.E.I.)
Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. I am sensible of the honour that has been conferred upon me and upon the constituency I have the honour to represent in that I have been chosen for the purpose of performing this important duty. But at the same time, I cannot help the thought that a person to perform this duty properly would require a certain degree of parliamentary experience—that it should be performed by some one who has given at least a small portion of his lifetime to the consideration and study of federal politics. However, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the indulgence of this honourable House—not as a mere matter of form—while I proceed as best I can to execute the task assigned to me, while I venture, as it were, upon an untried and unknown sea.

The first part of my duty is very simple. No man can plead ignorance of the present state of the prosperity of Canada. No one is ignorant of it but the man who wilfully closes his eyes to the light. The first evidence of that prosperity referred to in the Speech from the Throne is in the statement regarding the increasing volume of our trade. By the reports of the year 1896, the volume of our trade is represented by $239,000,000; I look at the returns for the year 1898, and I find it represented by $304,000,000. That is to say, in two short years, we have increased the volume of the trade of Canada to the extent of $65,000,000 annually. And, if comparisons at this stage of the discussion are not altogether odious, I would like to point out that in 1878 the volume of our trade was represented by $172,000,000, while in 1896, as I have said, it was represented by $239,000,000, an increase of $67,000,000 in eighteen years. Hence it is manifest that the Liberal party of Canada have increased the volume of our trade in two years to the same extent substantially that our friends the Conservatives have taken eighteen long years to accomplish. That is a condition of things of which the Liberal party of Canada may well be proud. But that is not all. We have the returns of the last eight months before us, and these indicate that not only have we kept pace with the extraordinary development of the trade of last year, but we have this year, in addition, increased the volume of that trade during the eight months by twelve million dollars more. At the close of the present financial year, therefore, we shall undoubtedly find that the increase in our annual trade at the end of the three years will be represented not by $65,000,000, but by $80,000,000.

Let me, Mr. Speaker, make another comparison. Let me contrast our record with that of the United States. Looking over the trade returns of the United States, I find that during the last ten years the increase in the volume of their trade has been about 30 per cent, while during the same period the increase in Canadian trade has been about 51 per cent. But I wish to point to a more astonishing circumstance still. If we glance at the trade returns of the United States, we find that they increased their trade by $33,000,000 during the fiscal year ending the first of July last. But during the same period our increase of trade is measured by $47,000,000. Supposing that we stood upon the same footing as they, supposing we had equal population and wealth, that showing would be a highly creditable one for Canada. When we come, however, to consider that we have but a fourteenth part of the population of the United States and probably an equal proportion in wealth, then we may begin to realize the tremendous strides in the volume of trade that we have taken during this last year. Then will begin to dawn upon us this great truth, that in so far as the volume of trade is an indication of the prosperity of a country, Canada, during the past year, has enjoyed a commercial prosperity more than twenty times as great as that of the United States. It would be well for us to bear in mind—at least those of us who entertain the impression and hug the delusion that Canada is dependent on the trade of the United States for her prosperity—to ask ourselves the question, how it could be possible, under present conditions, for the United States to communicate to us a much greater degree of prosperity than that which we now enjoy, or the further question: How is it possible for the United States of America to communicate to us a degree of prosperity which they themselves do not possess?

Now, let me refer to the question of revenue. We all know that in the past years we have had deficits. In 1894, the deficit was $1,200,000; in 1895, it was $4,100,000; in 1896, it was $330,000, and in 1897, $519,000. I am aware that, as regards the deficit for 1897, our Liberal friends disclaim responsibility. They claim the deficit of that year was due to the fact that they were compelled to pay off liabilities left to them as a legacy by their predecessors. But, as regards the year 1898, there can be no question of responsibility, nor any question as to which party is entitled to credit. What do we find? Why, that, for the year 1898, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance comes down to this House and presents us—not with a deficit, such as characterized the preceding years—but with a respectable—perhaps I should rather call it a magnificent—surplus of $1,722,000. And, it is only fair that we should bear in mind the circumstances under which this surplus was created. It is easy to create a surplus under some circumstances, as easy, to use a common expression—as rolling off a log. It is easy to create a surplus by increasing the customs duties, by increasing the burden of taxation; but it is not at all an easy task to create a surplus and at the same time effect a substantial reduction in the taxation. What does the record show? It shows that the Liberal party have made a reduction in the burden of taxation, first, by placing such goods as corn and binder twine and barbed wire on the free list; then by making substantial reduction in the duties on articles such as edged tools and farm implements and machinery; but mainly by putting into operation a reduction of 12½ per cent of the duties on all goods imported from the old country. What does the sum total of these reductions amount to? My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has made a calculation, which I have not seen contradicted, and which shows that, had the old tariff remained in force until 1897, it would have resulted in an increase of revenue to the extent of $1,900,000. I am justified therefore in making the statement that, if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had had the old tariff in operation during the past year, if the old condition of things had been allowed to continue, he would have been able to present us with a surplus, not of $1,722,000, but of at least double that amount. That is not all. The returns indicate that for the last eight months we have a surplus—an assured surplus, a surplus in hand—of two and a half millions of dollars; and if matters go on to the close of the financial year as they have begun, that surplus will amount to at least three and a quarter millions. Now, Sir, I think it is but fair while we give credit for the creation of that surplus, to bear in mind the circumstances under which it was created. We find that not only have we continued in effect the reduction of taxes made in 1897, but there have been further reductions in the year 1898. I refer, in the first place, to the other 12½ per cent reduction that went into force on the 1st of July last; I refer to the fact that we have reduced the domestic letter rate from 3c. to 2c.; I refer to the fact that we have reduced the rate of postage on letters going to the mother country from 5c. to 2c.—These considerations establish what I contend for, viz., that whatever credit there may be in the creation of a surplus of two and a half millions of dollars or of a prospective surplus of three and a quarter millions, that credit is enhanced when we come to consider the circumstances under which that result has been accomplished. I might here refer to other matters that are not mentioned in the speech, but which are legitimate subjects for consideration. A short time ago statements used to be made by our hon. friends on the other side with regard to the Liberal party: You are a sort of cannibals; you love to feast and fatten upon and to rejoice over the decay of our national industries; there is nothing that pleases you better than to see a vacant workshop or an idle factory, or one of these “tall chimneys” lying prone and broken upon the earth. Now, in view of the present condition of affairs with respect to our manufactures, in view of the prosperity which obtains among them, I think that the ideas of our Conservative friends must recently have undergone a change tantamount to a revolution. Why what is the story that we hear from all quarters? It is that the mills and factories of this country are all in active operation, some of them running night and day, many of them working overtime. In the effort to fill orders that are coming in fast upon them. I read, only the other day, concerning the Nova Scotia Steel Company, which employs some 700 workmen, that an important order came in from the Intercolonial Railway. They were obliged to say: We cannot fill it. Another order came in and they said: We have more work on hand than we can possibly get through in three months. I have read recently that the Massey Manufacturing Company of Toronto, employing no less than 2,200 workmen, has done such a prosperous business in the last year that they found themselves in a position to give, and did voluntarily of their own motion, give their workmen an increase of 10 per cent in their wages. I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot remember any circumstance of that kind during the eighteen years of the "glorious National Policy." Then, there are other indications of prosperity. We have more money in the savings banks, as well as a large amount deposited in the ordinary banks of the country; larger amounts of money seeking investment, and seeking it at a lower rate of interest. Our investment companies have done a prosperous business this last year, and their reports show that, so far as the lands that were in their hands are concerned they have been able to make ready sales—a proof of the rise in the values of property in Canada. We have also a satisfactory condition of affairs in our retail and wholesale trade; the labouring classes are better circumstanced, failures in this country are less than they were before, both in percentage and in amount; the business of our railways has increased. Why, Sir, since I came to Ottawa there has been placed upon my desk a report of the Canadian Pacific Railway from which I find that the net earnings of the road, which two years ago amounted to about eight millions, during last year amounted to ten and a half millions, an increase of two and a half millions in two years. The same story would be told by the reports of other railways in Canada. In Prince Edward Island there has been a substantial increase in the earnings of the railway during the past year. All these facts show that the prosperity of Canada is not confined to one locality or to one province, but extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

There is one other reference in the Speech from the Throne that demands more than mere passing attention. I refer to our immigration. I was pleased to notice in a report recently issued by the Imperial authorities that during the past year while the emigration to all other countries but Canada had decreased by from 1 to 10 per cent, so far as Canada was concerned the volume of that emigration from Great Britain had been 20 per cent greater than in the previous year. These figures speak volumes. During the past year accounts have appeared in the press showing considerable accretions to our population from the United States. This is notably the case in the province of Quebec, where whole families, you may say settlements, are moving back from the United States. Instead of the exodus, repatriation has set in. The same story is told with respect to certain portions of the North-west Territories. I am glad to notice that the Canadian Pacific Railway returns of sales of land show that in the past year the sales to actual settlers have been two or three times greater than in the previous year. A similar record is shown by the Government figures with regard to homesteads taken up. Then, with respect to British Columbia, we find that there is an immense immigration into that province.

Villages and towns are springing up in the mining districts and along the lines of railway recently constructed. I have not the least doubt that in the year 1901 when the next census returns are received, we will find that British Columbia has changed her relationship to the other provinces of the Dominion, and that she has taken her place next after the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. We shall then find that she will occupy the third place in the galaxy of the provinces, the third in population and in wealth. There is another matter also that I was pleased to notice. During the past year we have had not an export as has characterized the administration of former years, but an import of $2,225,000 of settlers' effects into Canada. These figures speak more forcibly and more eloquently than any words I could utter to indicate that immigration is now setting into this country in full force. During the days of the National Policy, we used to have to complain of an exodus. Why, Sir, we used to spend millions of money to bring people into this country. After we got them here we found that they made of Canada only a temporary resting place, and then, like the Arabs they folded their tents and silently stole away. They went somewhere else, usually to the United States of America. Such was the deplorable condition of affairs at that time. We found after the census returns came in—those cold, unfeeling and heartless census returns—that at the end of the ten years we had lost not only all the immigrants that came into Canada, but one-half of the increase of our population besides. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to be able to say, and to rejoice with the people of Canada, that the exodus from this country to the United States has ceased, and, I trust has ceased for ever. There was a time when the prosperity of North America was likened unto a great stream flowing majestically onward. The United States—so they boasted—were in the centre of the stream where the current was deepest, and strongest, and swiftest. Canada occupied a position in an eddy of the current, riding around at anchor, or perchance moving slowly along the shore. I am glad that to-day the position of this country has changed. Canada does not now occupy a position in the eddy of the current, or creeping tardily along the shore; her place is in the centre of the stream where the current is strongest, and deepest and swiftest. She is now moving proudly onward upon the wave of an ever-increasing prosperity. What part of the credit of all this is due to the Liberal party of Canada, I shall not attempt to analyse. I am aware that some portion of our prosperity is due to the discovery, perhaps, accidental discovery, of gold in the Yukon. Certainly some portion of it is due to that beneficent Providence that has given us a favourable springtime and an abundant harvest. But for the rest, I take my stand with the ordinary elector of Canada, of average intelligence, who says, who thinks and who is confident that some portion of this credit—a substantial measure of this credit—is due to the wise policy and to the economical and efficient administration of my right hon. friend who leads the Government.

The next paragraph in the Speech refers to the International Commission. Before dealing with that, let me say a word with respect to two of the more prominent members of that Commission who were stricken by the hand of death before their labours were consummated, I refer to Senator Dingley and to Lord Herschell. When Senator Dingley died, we could not but notice that the sorrow for his death was as widespread and just as heartfelt in England and in Canada as in the United States. And when Lord Herschell died we could not but notice, also, that the sorrow and sympathy expressed in the United States were even greater and deeper than for their own illustrious statesman. That shows that the dividing line between us all is a narrow one; in fact, may hardly be said to exist. It shows that we are all members of one brotherhood, of one common Anglo-Saxon family. Let me make another remark. It was said of the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald that before he died he expressed the wish that he might die at the post of duty. I believe that wish was gratified. And, so far as Lord Herschell is concerned, it may be said of him also that he died in harness—died in the performance of a labour of love that he had undertaken on behalf of the people of Canada—died in the performance of a duty that he owed to the Sovereign and to the Empire—died, too, in performing or in the attempt to perform, one of the noblest tasks that can be undertaken by mortality, the task, in the first place, of smoothing away the differences and of settling permanently the disputes between Canada and the United States, and the still higher and nobler task of endeavouring to bring into greater harmony and co-operation the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race.

We have to regret, Mr. Speaker, that we are not in possession of all the facts which would enable us to fairly judge of the work and result of the commission. We have to remember that the mouths of the commissioners are sealed, and that the door of the commission chamber was closed. But, Sir, there are some things of which we may say we are fairly cognizant. We know that the commission sat for six months, or nearly so, and that our commissioners made an honest and earnest, and, I may add, a persistent effort to settle the various causes of differences existing between the two nations. In making that effort, they have met with the approbation of our whole people without regard to party. Another statement I may fairly make is, that our commissioners laid down the policy that we want to settle all the existing differences, that we want, for the purpose of settlement, to pool these differences. That I think was a wise course to pursue, because to leave one subject unsettled, or one cause of irritation unremoved, would be nearly as bad as to leave all outstanding questions in their present condition. I think I am justified in drawing this further conclusion. When the commissioners adjourned, they stated that there was one cause of difference between them, namely, that with regard to the Alaska boundary. It is a fair inference to draw, that upon all the questions under consideration, there was either an agreement, or there was such an interchange of views between the different members of that commission, as that they knew they could come to an ultimate agreement—a fair compromise—that they could settle for instance, the question of the North-east Atlantic fisheries, the question of the Alien Labour Law, the question of the Alaska seal fishery, and also that they could arrive at a reasonable reciprocity treaty between the two countries. Before we can either give credit or impute blame, it is necessary that we should know exactly where the disagreement between the American and Canadian commissioners arose. The statement made by them to the public was—and we are bound to assume it correct—that they differed on the question of the Alaska boundary, that they could not come to any understanding regarding the terms of the old treaty between England and Russia, that they could not agree upon the commencement of the line of delimitation, or upon its location. Especially, they could not agree as to whether that line of delimitation ran across the Lynn Canal or round the head of it. Then the question of arbitration arose. The United States commissioners consented to submit the matter to arbitration but only upon terms which it was impossible for the British and Canadian commissioners to agree to. The first divergence was this: The Americans said: We will submit this matter to arbitration; but, so far as Dyea and Skagway are concerned, as well as the territories now occupied therewith, whatever the result of the arbitration—whether it shall be ascertained that these towns are within British territory or not—nevertheless, they shall be deemed to be American territory. That was on the principle of "Tails I win; heads you lose." That was a proposition that could not possibly be accepted, in reason, by the Canadian commissioners, our representatives could not withdraw from the arbitration, what seems to me to be the very essence of the dispute. Our commissioners were not willing to give up, and they refused to give up, any portion of British territory or British territorial right, and, in taking that stand, they vindicated the honour and independence of Canada.

There was another cause of difference, and that was, that the American commissioners proposed that there should be three arbitrators on each side, but no umpire. Our commissioners took the grounds that this was virtually no arbitration at all, as it did not provide for a finality. The probability would be that the Canadian representatives would take one side and the United States representatives another; then the matter would be left ultimately worse than before. Under these conditions, our commissioners refused to accept the arbitration. There seems however, to have been a suggestion on the part of the Americans to agree to an umpire, provided that umpire came from certain countries of Central or South America. The British and Canadian commissioners said: We cannot agree to a proposition of that kind, because, under your Monroe doctrine, all the countries of Central and South America are under the protection and, consequently under the influence of the United States; so that no arbitrator chosen from these countries could possibly have the requisite independence and impartiality to commend him for acceptance to England or Canada. Therefore, when we realize the position taken by our commissioners, we must come to the conclusion that they properly and fairly represented the sentiments of our people, especially when they refused to give up territorial rights, and repudiated a dishonourable arbitration.

I am aware that there are some—some even in this House—who entertain different views. There are some who say, with reference to the conduct of the Canadian commissioners: "You have tarried too long at the wine; you should have come home sooner, and when you did come, you ought to have taken up your hats in high dudgeon and slammed the door in the faces of the American commissioners."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think conduct like that would neither have been consistent with the dignity of the Canadian representatives, nor would it have had any effect whatever in promoting those objects that we all desire so much to see accomplished. So far as the American people are concerned, I am aware that it is said of them, and, perhaps, with truth, that they are a selfish and a grasping people, and drive a hard bargain. Nevertheless, they are an honourable and a proud nation. The way to reach them is not by attempting, as it were, to bulldoze them. The way to reach them is by appealing to the honour, and pride, and gratitude of the nation which lie behind that selfishness, and which will ultimately bring it under control. I believe the commission will ultimately be successful in settling all differences. I base my belief upon the fact that the Government of the United States is just as anxious as we to have these differences finally and permanently settled. I base my opinion upon the fact that the press of the United States to-day recognize, and, in most cases approve of, the honourable and straightforward conduct of our Canadian commissioners. I base my opinion upon Senator Fairbanks's letter, wherein he says, in substance, to the press of the United States and Canada, "I warn you not to publish anything with regard to the failure of the International Commission—it has not failed." I base my hope upon the fact that we have now better relations with the United States than ever before. To-day America has her schemes of commercial conquest in the far east. She requires the assistance of England more than England does the assistance of America. I know, too, that the Americans are proud. They have been placed recently under a debt of obligation to England—a debt which I am satisfied no people would lie under without attempting at the earliest moment to repay. This is the first opportunity they have had of expressing their appreciation of the magnanimity of Great Britain—the first opportunity they have had of repaying, to a certain extent, their debt of gratitude. I am, therefore, confident that when the people of the United States come to themselves, when the higher and better elements of their nature assert the mastery, they will then meet us half way, in an honourable and determined effort to smooth away all difficulties that exist between the two nationalities.

The next matter referred to in the Speech is that with respect to postal reform. As I glance over the Public Accounts, I find that in the year 1896 there was a deficit in the Post Office Department of $781,000, and that in the year 1898 that deficit had been reduced to $47,000—almost wiped out of existence. I point to this for the purpose of indicating that if it had not been for good management of the Post Office Department the reforms in the postal service referred to in the Speech from the Throne could never possibly have been carried into effect. If, for instance, the deficit in the year 1896, of $781,000 had remained until now, I am satisfied that it would have been impossible to have made the reduction from 3 cents to 2 cents in the domestic rate, or to have brought into effect the Imperial penny postage. I know that these changes involve a present loss of revenue; but from the increased business that will result, it will be found that the deficit in the Post Office Department will not in the future be one-half of what it was under the former Administration. In the next few years, even that deficit will be wiped out of existence. With respect to the two-cent domestic rate of postage, that is a matter with which we are all familiar, and it does not require at my hands any extended remarks. It was a reform that was carried into effect on the 1st of January. It was an appropriate New Year's gift to the people of Canada. It was a substantial lightening of the burdens of the people. It was a gift to almost every man, woman and child in this Dominion. It was such a gift as the people of Canada duly appreciate, and will not soon forget. With reference to the reduction of the rate of Imperial postage, that was a matter which was a dream for many years, ever since the days of Rowland Hill. And it remained a dream until the Canadian Government took the matter up in a practical way, and ultimately succeeded in forcing its adoption. With regard to the part

Canada had in that reform, I am not sufficiently conversant with all the details to speak with authority; but I am justified in saying that it was a part of the predetermined policy of the Liberal party in Canada to bring about better social, political and sentimental relations with the Empire. As I understand the matter, it was announced by the Canadian Government to the Imperial authorities that it was their fixed intention to carry into effect at once a reduction in the domestic rate of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, and that it was also their fixed intention to reduce the rate of postage upon letters sent across the Atlantic; but that they would wait the action of the Imperial authorities in calling a convention to take this matter into consideration, and, if possible, arrange a penny postage throughout the Empire. That convention met in London in June last, considered the whole question, and carried a motion, moved by my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) for the adoption of Imperial penny postage. Thus the dream of an Imperial penny postage became a reality. I need not say much with regard to its material benefits. If we reflect that in Canada to-day one out of every ten of the population has been born in the mother country and has relatives and friends across the Atlantic, we will begin to understand what a potent factor this increased facility of communication will be in swelling the tide of immigration now happily setting in towards this country. I saw a few days ago a statement that some of our merchants and manufacturers had recently established agencies in England for the purpose of extending their business. Such a movement would have been rendered impossible if the old five-cent rate had continued in force. It is chiefly, however, along another line that a great change has been effected by this reform. By means of the free interchange of letters between the different parts of the British Empire and the different colonies, there will of course be a much greater interchange of thought and sentiment. What more natural result than that there should arise out of this free interchange of thought and patriotic sentiment the loftier idea that the colonies and the mother country—not separated but joined by the seas—compose one empire, and that our duty and aim and ultimate destiny is to weld into a harmonious whole the varied elements of that great Empire.

Last year I read with pleasure the efforts of this Government in the direction of giving the people of England a preference in our markets. That preference was given to the extent of a rebate of 25 per cent in the customs duties on goods brought into Canada from the mother country. I refer to this, not for the purpose of showing the effect it had upon the material prosperity of either country, but for the purpose of indicating the change of sentiment it brought about. Some would call this a free gift on the part of the people of Canada. It was rather an expression of the love and devotion which Canadians have for the mother land. It was rather an expression of the gratitude that Canadians feel for the protection we have received from the mother country ever since we became a colony. Whatever it was, it seemed to have gone straight home to the heart of the English people and to have taken them by storm. The effect of the penny postage will be along the same line. Both these measures will have the anticipated effect of bringing about closer relations, both in sentiment and in reality, between Canada and the rest of the Empire.

As a Canadian, Mr. Speaker, I rejoice in the change of sentiment that I see being manifested on both sides of the Atlantic. At one time the impression of the English people, as regards the colonies, was that the colonies were as the fruit of the tree. When the fruit ripened, it naturally separated from the parent stem. When the colony matured it was bound to fall away and become independent. There was a time when, in the opinion of the people of England, the colonies were a source of weakness and expense to the Empire. Let the colonies go. That opinion, I am glad to say, no longer exists. I rejoice to see the colonizing and Imperial spirit of England again predominant—that spirit which has been manifesting itself of late in carrying the flag into the heart of darkest Africa and planting it in triumph where it floats to the breeze to-day above the fortress of Omdurman. I rejoice also to see a change of sentiment on this side of the Atlantic. There was a time in this country when a number of our people favoured annexation to the United States. But where will you find any indication of that sentiment to-day? There was a time (and my hon. friends opposite will doubtless agree with me) when there was a desire for commercial union with the United States. Where will you find any such feeling to-day? There was a time when with many of us the impression prevailed that the hour had come for us to cut loose from the leading strings of the mother country, that we were old enough and rich enough and strong enough to become independent. These sentiments, I am thankful to say, have been relegated to the past, never again, I hope, to be resurrected. We are proud of Canada and of being Canadians—we shall never cease to be that—but our sentiments are rapidly taking a wider range and a loftier flight. We are prouder still of being citizens of an Empire—the freest, the strongest and the greatest upon which the sun shines to-day. It is because the 25 per cent reduction on the duty on British goods and the establishment and operation of the Imperial penny postage create and foster sentiments like these that all Canadians irrespective of party give to these measures their unqualified approval.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I find that the time

I had intended to occupy has gone by. I shall therefore not refer to the other matters mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I must apologize to this House for having taken up so much of its valuable time, and shall conclude by simply making the usual motion for the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. P. R. L. MARTINEAU (Montmagny). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, when asked by the leader of the House to second the motion which my hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Bell) has just introduced in such able and eloquent terms, I felt that a compliment was being paid to my constituency, and at the same time that I was also entitled to crave the indulgence and the kind attention which all members on both sides of the House are wont to bestow on a new member speaking under such circumstances.

Although merely a representative of the French-speaking minority, still I stand here to-day as the mouth-piece of the majority of the electorate of this country, whose feelings and political creed I am voicing; while at the same time, I am justly proud to be the mouth-piece of a province wherein loyalty to the British Crown displays itself in deeds still more than in words. And although the most humble of the members of this House be a French Canadian, I cannot forget that one of the most illustrious members of Parliament, the leader of this House, claims the same origin, and notwithstanding that, his name, throughout the length and breadth of the land, and among all classes of the community, is a rallying-word and but another name for victory. In him are to be found the distinguishing characteristics of his race, and of his people who are justly proud of him. And he is a living illustration of this fact, namely, that if the rights of the French Canadians are now recognized and respected in this country, it is owing to their having known how to use them in the public interest with firmness, tempered with discretion and tact, for the greatest good of the state. We contribute, Sir, our own quota of labour; we contribute our own share of energy towards the wealth and welfare of the country in the spheres of trade, of industry, of agriculture, as also in the realm of the fine arts; but also, I am glad to say, nobody ever bargains with us about our share of credit. Therefore, Sir, I confidently, on behalf of the French-speaking minority, offer these few remarks in seconding the address in reply to the Speech from the representative of our Gracious Sovereign.

Let me say, at the outset, that within the year that has just passed, two very important events have transpired: we have parted with one representative of Her Majesty and have received the nobleman who recently arrived amongst us as the representative of Her Majesty in the Dominion. It is no flattery, but the sober truth to say that the Imperial Government, in the present incumbent of this high office could not have made a more judicious selection, and one best calculated to attenuate the universal regret experienced by our population at the departure of Lord Aberdeen. In this fortunate selection the mother country could not give us a more tactful illustration of the watchful interest she ever takes in our welfare. From the very first moment of their arrival in our midst, it was our privilege to admire the graceful urbanity displayed by their Excellencies in the discharge of their august role as representatives of Her Imperial Majesty in this wide Dominion. Still, we cannot pass under silence the fact that it was under the high administration of Lord Aberdeen and also during the beneficent sojourn of Lady Aberdeen in our midst that Canada did, thanks to the enlightened policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of his colleagues, enter upon a new era of progress and unheard of prosperity. But, on the other hand, the return of Lord Minto has been hailed with enthusiasm by the Canadian people, so much the more as he has brought back a just appreciation of the advantages and resources of Canada already acquired in his previous sojourn in this Dominion, and an accurate knowledge of the needs of our country, which is a token of still greater success and perhaps also the happy omen of the ratification of a new Washington treaty.

As this is the first time that I address this House, I avail myself of the opportunity to loudly proclaim in the name of my constituents the confidence which we repose in the men who now preside over the destinies of this Dominion.

Already, in the course of the previous sessions of this Parliament, since the electorate of this country has endorsed the Liberal policy, the present Administration have through their conciliating methods, achieved truly astonishing results. Scarcely does one remember now that but a few years ago the school question was threatening to kindle a creed and racial war. What costly law suits and imprudent appeals to religious and national prejudices failed to accomplish for years, this Administration achieved at the end of a few months through conciliation and by appeals to the sense of justice, without provincial autonomy being in the least sacrificed. It is also within the recollection of this House that a tariff war, carried to its extreme limits, was threatening our national prosperity and overburdening our people. Here again progressive reforms and clever negotiations with the mother country have given a new impetus to our trade and our industry and are stimulating business to an un hoped for degree. One of the most happy results of that policy has been to put a stop to the exodus which, in years past, had proved the curse of our country and to induce our immigrants to settle down in our midst, instead of finding their way over the border to strengthen our rivals.

Such are the results achieved by the far-sighted and truly national policy inaugurated by the present Administration and its leader. And this accounts for the fact that the electorate of this country who see the hon. leader of the Government redeeming all the pledges given them while in the Opposition, show him their gratitude at each by-election, by an uninterrupted series of signal victories. And as a fit climax to the work accomplished by the devoted and skilful men who are now at the head of our affairs, the fertile soil of Canada has yielded to us one of the most bountiful harvests the country has ever been blessed with, while, on the other hand, the hardy pioneers of the Klondike have been extracting from the bosom of the icy gold fields of the Arctic circle a golden harvest which seems almost inexhaustible. Sir, we do not pretend to say that this bountiful harvest and the discovery of these gold-bearing fields are to be ascribed merely to the Liberal policy inaugurated by the Government; but we hold that the Government may justly claim credit for having adopted the measures best calculated to secure the development of our gold fields and to foster our agricultural interests.

Never before had the Department of Agriculture done so much to second the efforts of our farming community, to facilitate the handling and the transporting of our agricultural products and their selling off on the foreign markets. In this connection, allow me, Sir, as a representative of a rural constituency, to offer my thanks to the Government, on behalf of the farming community. With reference to our gold fields, I may say that the Government have taken the necessary steps towards the civil and judicial organization of those territories, wherein civilisation had heretofore hardly penetrated; they have, through their police regulations, secured the reign of peace and order among the natives and the prospectors, while affording protection to our missionaries as also to the life and property of the miners. And all those gratifying results have been achieved in such a way that the Yukon has been made to pay for the expenses of the Yukon, without otherwise burdening the country with the necessary expenditure. It is also most satisfactory to find in the Speech from the Throne that the Government have thought it expedient in the public interest to authorize the construction of a line of telegraph in the Yukon district for the purpose of maintaining speedy communication with the people of those distant territories. For my part, speaking as a representative of a constituency from which already nearly one hundred miners have gone forth to the northern gold fields, I feel it my duty to convey to the Government the expression of the gratitude of those families which, after a cruel separation, were forced to remain for months and months a prey to anxiety and alarm, because they could not get any news from their relatives, not knowing whether they ought to mourn their loss or rejoice over their good fortune. As hon. gentlemen know, the lack of railway facilities in the Yukon cannot be laid at the door of the Government, who, although well equipped to overcome all the natural obstacles in that country, found themselves unable to cope with certain constitutional difficulties which prevented the passage of their legislation, constitutionally, if you like, but still in such a way as to show us once more that, as all human institutions, our constitution is still open to improvement. Far be it from my thought, Sir, to question the wisdom of the fathers of our constitution, who having such a difficult task to discharge proved truly equal to the duty they were called upon to perform; and now that most of those nation-builders have been gathered to the majority, it is but simple justice to their memory to record here on the floor of the House that they did their duty. As to those framers of our constitution who are still in our midst, let me add that the presence to-day on the floor of this House of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) shows the wonderful vitality and the indomitable energy which those champions of old were endowed with. If I may be allowed to say so, Providence, it seems, wishes him to remain at his post as a striking illustration of what a lion-hearted man endowed with an indomitable will can do. To him I would willingly apply the words of Horace: 'Justum et tenacem propositi virum.' As the righteous man referred to by the latin poet, he stands to-day unshaken amidst the ruins of the past. 'Imparvidum ferient ruinæ.' Every time that the electorate was appealed to and asked to give a verdict on the policy of the Government, the people taking into consideration the fact that the Government had restored peace and harmony everywhere, brought back the equilibrium into our finances, and provoked such an expansion in our trade and industry as to exceed the most sanguine anticipations of the optimists, the people, I say, have invariably sanctioned and ratified the vote given on that memorable date, the 23rd of June, 1896, by ever increasing majorities. And yet, hon. gentlemen opposite and their illustrious leader will not yield to evidence. If we are to believe them, a reaction is taking place, and they believe that they are drawing closer to the ministerial benches, a phenomenon which can only be accounted for by an optical illusion on their part.

On these several points as also on that most legitimate reform, the readjustment of the electoral divisions of Ontario, we must agree to disagree with our friends opposite. There is, however, a matter upon which there cannot be but a perfect consensus of opinion, and, upon a recent occasion, at a time when a disagreement broke out between Her Majesty's Commissioners and those of the United States concerning the delimitation of the boundary between Canada and Alaska, it was most satisfactory to see the hon. leader of the Opposition, relying on a precedent set up by Lord Roseberry, holding out a helping hand to the hon. the leader of the Government, in order to safeguard our national honour. True, at the very time when this generous assistance was being proffered, the honourable commissioners representing Canada at the international conference had honourably discharged their duty. Still, this delicate tribute paid to the policy of the Government, this wholesale endorsement given to the noble attitude taken by our commissioners by no less exalted a personage than the leader of the loyal Opposition of Her Majesty, such tribute, I say, is none the less creditable to the latter, although the methods of action suggested by him seem to savour a little too much of the ages of chivalry. At the outset of this international conference, we could not help experiencing a feeling of national pride when we saw the hon. leader of the Government selecting the historic city of Quebec, the former capital of the old French provinces in America, as the seat of that conference, which was called upon to usher in a new era of peace and harmony. As in the days of Augustus, the doors of the temple of Janus seemed to be closed and the hon. leader of the Opposition himself announced his determination not to break a truce so necessary to the safeguard of the dearest interests of Canada. But later on, when the seat of the conference was removed to Washington, while the hon. leader of the Government, aided by his honourable colleagues, under the presidency of the venerable and regretted Lord Herschell, was peacefully but energetically coping with the American diplomats, securing the settlement of several points in dispute, thus preventing a rupture which the conflicting interests of both countries made more and threatening at every moment, then it was, I say, that hostile newspapers realizing as well as we did that the pressure brought to bear by public opinion in the United States was handicapping and jeopardizing the labours of the commission, did not hesitate to give expression to their untimely rejoicing and to say that the conference was a failure. Fortunately, such was not the case. The representatives of Canada, true to the end to their mission of peace, were at the very same time displaying an energy which called forth a tribute of praise and admiration from all parties. No, Sir, this conference was not a failure. It will not be said that it was to no purpose that great minds shall have conferred together for months and months and assumed the responsibility of finding a common-sense solution of pending differences. It will not be recorded in history that it was to no purpose that among those arbiters, representatives of human justice and equity, two shall have, before the termination of their labours, been summoned before the high tribunal of their Sovereign Maker. The work thus commenced and momentarily interrupted is not lost. "In God we trust" say the Americans. "Dieu et mon droit" shall we say, in our turn, borrowing the words from the motto of the English Crown, and I may remark, in passing, that we, French Canadians, are as proud as our English compatriots of this devise, coming as it does in straight line to us from Normandy, a country from which, we, in common with themselves, claim, for the most part our descent. I hope, Sir, that the hon. leader of the Opposition will not avail himself of this distant relationship to raise trouble for us after the fashion of our Norman ancestors who were remarkable for their love of chicanery, but on the contrary, we hope the Government will often find him willing to proffer a generous co-operation. Such is the wish I dare express for the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne of which I have the honour to second the motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, it now becomes my pleasing duty to offer my hearty congratulations to the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) upon the able speech with which he has just favoured the House, in presenting the motion which has been placed in your hands. The ability that that hon. gentleman brings to the discharge of his duties in this House will cause him to be regarded, I am sure, by every hon. gentleman as a great accession to the debating strength of the House. No person is more gratified than I am to find gentlemen who are elected to sit upon that side bringing to the discharge of their public duties such ability and talent as the hon. member has exhibited to-day. I venture, however, to believe that, with the great intelligence which the hon. gentleman has shown on the present occasion, before he has been here for a very long period, his views will be materially modified, at least with regard to the cause of the great prosperity which, we are all glad to recognize, Canada is enjoying to-day. I listened with especial pleasure to one declaration on the part of the hon. gentleman, a declaration in which, I trust, he expressed the feeling of every member on that side of the House, as I am sure he did of every gentleman on this side, that we shall best discharge our duty to Canada by recognizing that we occupy no dependent position upon our great neighbour to the south of us, but, with the enormous natural advantages with which Providence has favoured this country, we are able to mark out for ourselves an independent course which will command the respect, and even the approval of our neighbours. I regard with great satisfaction the statement made by the hon. mover of the resolution, that he considers the proposition made by the representatives of the United States on the joint high commission in regard to Alaska as a dishonourable proposition, as a proposition that no independent man of any party could recognize as other than an invasion of those principles of international law and justice that every country has a right to expect from another. The hon. gentleman placed before the House in clear and distinct terms his belief that when the representatives of the United States took the ground that they would not agree to arbitration unless the representatives of Her Majesty's Government and of Canada would agree that, whatever the finding was, the United States should remain in possession of that which the arbitration might find belonged to the Dominion of Canada, they took an attitude which no British subject, whether on this side of the Atlantic or on the other, with a single spark of independence would submit to. In that, I trust, the hon. gentleman has with him the hearty and unanimous assent of the members of this House. The hon. gentleman said that, in the arbitration proposed by the representatives in the United States, by which three members should be selected on each side, and there should be no umpire, it was only too clear that this was only a postponement of the consideration of the question—it was not the adoption of any measure or means by which a satisfactory solution of the difficulty could be arrived at. In that, I am satisfied, the hon. gentleman has expressed the sentiment of every gentleman within the sound of my voice.

But I shall be compelled to differ with the hon. gentleman as to the cause of the prosperity Canada now enjoys. We shall not differ in our hearty congratulations to the country upon the great prosperity with which Canada is blessed at the present moment. It is a cardinal principle with the Liberal-Conservative party that, whoever may be in power, they are bound, not only in justice in the interests of their own party, but in justice to that which is higher and above party, to recognize that prosperity and to give credit for it to whom credit is due. But I believe I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman—for, with the great intelligence he has exhibited here to-day, I feel satisfied that he is open to conviction—that the great party to which I have the honour to belong, may justly claim the credit for the great prosperity which Canada enjoys to-day.

I listened, though not with the same satisfaction to myself, owing to my inability to follow him as closely as I would like, yet with great pleasure, to the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Martineau). I should have been glad to follow more closely the beautiful language in which he addressed the House, but I was able to gather enough from what he said to know that the right hon. leader of the House may congratulate himself of having secured in the hon. gentleman a very devoted and a very credulous follower in this House. When the hon. gentleman ventured to say that the leader of the Government and the Government had redeemed all their promises, I fear that, while he shows a disposition to give unbounded credit to his leader, he also shows that he has not given that careful attention to the subject which alone would enable him to speak with authority. Instead of such an extravagant claim being well founded, the hon. gentleman will find that, when challenged to put his finger upon a single promise made to the electorate that has been fulfilled by the Government and its leader, he will be unable to do so. While speaking of the pleasure with which I have listened to these hon. gentlemen, I must not forget the very kind and complimentary references that were made to myself by the seconder of this Address. I should be glad to think that I was entitled to even half the commendation which he was good enough to bestow upon me. I will, however, endeavour, as we become better acquainted, to convince the hon. gentleman that, whether right or wrong, in discharging the high and important duties that devolve upon me, I seek, at all times, to take such a course as will convince him that, though we may not see eye to eye, I am moved only by what I believe I owe to the House and to the country.

My satisfaction in listening to the hon. gentlemen is all the greater because of the fact that I believe that, had they framed their speeches with a single eye to give credit to the great party that I have the honour to lead, they could not have made their remarks more conclusive or more pertinent to the subject. In view of the attempt by these gentlemen to convince their hearers that the advantages that Canada now enjoys have been due to the course taken by the Government of the day, the House will permit me, I am sure, a slight retrospective view of our affairs. From 1867 down to 1873 this country enjoyed a very gratifying degree of prosperity, so great as to enable the Government of the day to complete the great work of confederation by bringing in every portion of this great continent lying north of the boundary line and belonging to Great Britain, except only the Island of Newfoundland. When we retired from office in 1873, we handed over to our successors the government of a country in a highly prosperous and satisfactory condition.

What was the result of the five years' administration of hon. gentlemen opposite? Why, Sir, no person requires to be told that that five years of Liberal administration in Canada was marked by a period of the most intense depression, a period of the greatest commercial and financial difficulty with which any country was ever called upon to struggle. I do not charge hon. gentlemen opposite, or their policy, as necessarily involving that result. The fact is that during the first five years of confederation Canada enjoyed a marked degree of prosperity arising from the protection which, under a very low tariff, we enjoy owing to the internecine war that existed in the great republic to the south of us. That happily passed away, peace was restored, and these gentlemen were called upon to administer the public affairs of the country, but instead of adopting such a policy as was demanded by the occasion, they persisted in nailing what they called their free trade colours to the mast, and refusing to adopt any policy for the protection of Canadian industries such as was absolutely demanded. Sir, I need not remind the House that we on this side, in the discharge of our duties then as we are endeavouring to discharge them now, did not hesitate to point out to the hon. gentlemen opposite the course that, in our judgment, they were bound to adopt in order to rescue Canada from the most deplorable poverty and depression that this country has ever seen since the beginning of confederation down to the present hour. Well, Sir, the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in a moment of weakness, I suppose, made a frank confession to the House—I think it was during the last session, or the session preceding it—in which he said, that they had really made up their minds as to the line they should take in the interest of the country, and he, as Finance Minister, had prepared a tariff, but just as he was about to bring it down, a brigade of free traders from the province of Nova Scotia made their appearance in Ottawa, and threatened the hon. gentleman that if he persisted in doing that, they would go into opposition and he would go out of office. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman concluded that office was of more importance to him than the prosperity of Canada, and he abandoned his tariff which he had prepared, giving a considerable amount of protection to Canadian industries; he abandoned that policy, and pursued that course of free trade folly which landed him and his Government in the slough of despond. And what was the result? The result was that the intelligent electorate of Canada rose in its might on the first opportunity that offered, and swept out of power the hon. gentleman who had admitted that he was only a fly on the wheel and could not do anything in the interests of the country—swept him and his colleagues out of power by one of the most overwhelming majorities that was ever witnessed in this or any other country. I only mention this as a prelude to what occurred. The party opposed to him, the Liberal-Conservative party on this side of the House, declared that if they obtained power they would immediately adopt the policy of giving efficient protection to every Canadian industry that could be carried on properly in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that we did not keep our word, they do us the justice to say that when we came into power we fulfilled the promises that we had made to the people of this country, and we brought down a protective tariff largely increasing the duties on the various products that the people of Canada were able to manufacture. The result was that the country was changed in a marvellously short period of time from a condition of the most abject and deplorable depression into a condition of activity and industry. Under their policy, Boston and New York were made the commercial capitals of Canada; under their policy, money went out of Canada to a foreign country for the products that our people required; under their policy, people finding no employment in this country, were obliged to follow the money, and population was depleted, poverty was rife, and the only industry that these gentlemen were reluctantly compelled to recognize was that of soup kitchens for the poor. Now, Sir, what changed all that? What was it that lifted our country out of that deplorable condition into which Liberal misrule had dragged it? Why, it was that National Policy which, from that hour to this, has created a progress and a prosperity in our country such as we have never witnessed before. What did these gentlemen do? Did they do as we are doing now, hold up both hands for everything that was proposed by the party opposite that was calculated to benefit our country? Not at all. These gentlemen obstructed us with all the power at their command. The English language is not strong enough to furnish them with the terms of obloquy and contempt to pour upon this accursed policy of protection that they pledged themselves solemnly in the face of the country they would scatter to the winds the moment they reached power. Did they do it? Sir, the country is prosperous, but it is not from anything that these hon. gentlemen have done. I stand here to-day in the presence of this intelligent House, I stand here to-day in the presence of a people as intelligent as any to be found on the face of the globe, and I challenge these gentlemen here and now to put their finger on a single act of theirs that has contributed one jot or tittle to the progress of the country. But what have they done? They have done something to make it less prosperous than it otherwise would have been, as I shall be able to show; but when they say that they have contributed aught in any respect to the progress and prosperity of the country, I deny it, and challenge them to the proof. Why, Sir, we have evidence to the contrary out of the mouths of their own supporters, their strongest supporters, that the policy of Canada to-day, whether it be wise or unwise, is the policy of the great Liberal-Conservative party that made Canada what it is, and that has produced every jot and tittle of the prosperity that exists down to this hour. Now, I may say that we did have a wave of prosperity coming over the country, for these things usually go in cycles. What did we do? We not only provided for that which they were unable to provide for, the means of carrying on the Government of the country without rolling up a huge debt by deficits, but we were able to complete this gigantic work of confederation by establishing a great international highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, in order to carry on the trade and business of the country, and to give the means of intercommunication to our own people. Not only were we able to do that, but at the same time we expended no less than $36,500,000, from 1878 to 1896, in deepening the canals so as to obtain a 14-foot navigation, thus affording increased facilities for trade and commerce between the people of the several provinces. Having given evidence all over the country in the erection of important public works as to what could be done for Canada under such a policy as ours, the time came when a wave of deep depression swept over Europe, paralyzed the commerce of Australia, paralyzed the commerce of the United States, and consequently affected Canada, as Canada must always be affected by the condition of commerce in the republic to the south of us. During this wave of depression in the United States, when 600 financial and banking institutions went to the wall, when millions of people were thrown out of employment, and when poverty stalked throughout that great country, Canada, thanks to the National Policy, inaugurated by the Conservative party, maintained a healthy financial and commercial position. I shall read to the House what I consider one of the highest tributes as to what the National Policy did for Canada during that period of depression, commencing in 1893. The late Hon. Mr. Wells, one of the most able and independent statisticians in America, wrote in the "Forum" in the early part of 1894, when everything was at its worst in the United States:

In the Dominion of Canada, separated from us on the north by an imaginary line, there has been no panic, no unusual demand for money, no stoppage of industries, no restriction of trade, no increased rate of interest; in short, nothing beyond the ordinary course of events, except so far as these events may have been influenced by contiguity to what may be termed a financial cyclone whose pathway of destruction was contiguous to, but not within, Canadian territory.

That, Mr. Speaker, is high testimony indeed as to what the National Policy did for Canada. I claim, Sir, and I am prepared to substantiate my claim in the face of any hon. gentleman opposite, that all the prosperity, all the increased trade, all the increased revenue which hon. gentlemen opposite now so loudly claim credit for; all is due to the great Liberal Conservative party which laid the foundation of the National Policy, and laid them so solid that the winds of Liberalism and all the efforts of Liberals to destroy could not prevail. Take the statistics from 1868 to 1898 and you will have further and even greater

I do not hesitate to say, Sir, that these figures give clear evidence of the unquestioned value of the National Policy to the country, for they show the greatness and the prosperity that Canada has achieved under the National Policy. To whom is this prosperity due? Is it due to hon. gentlemen opposite? Is it due to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who when he was threatened with the loss of office was willing to sacrifice the best interests of Canada so as to cling to office, although the people starved. No, Sir, it is due, and no one knows it better than hon. gentlemen opposite, it is due to that great party which elevated Canada out of the position in which she had been placed by the maladministration of the Liberals, and raised it on a pinnacle of such grandeur that these gentlemen opposite, when charged with the duty and responsibility of government, quailed before the thought of attempting to strike down with their unholy hands this policy which had done so much good for Canada. Sir, we have the greatest tribute to the benefits conferred upon Canada by the National Policy in the very fact that the gentlemen now in power—who for eighteen long years engaged in fierce and bitter denunciation of it, who pledged themselves solemnly that they would uproot and destroy it—declare in the face of the whole world that the National Policy is one that they dare not attempt to change. Sir, the National Policy so commends itself to the intelligent approval of the great mass of the electorate of Canada that these gentlemen, if they attempt to interfere with it, would be swept from office. And how did they obtain power? Not upon the issue of the National Policy, nor upon any other issue. Sir, these gentlemen opposite sit there representing no policy and no principle. I challenge any man in this country to point to one single particle of policy or one single principle that they avowed before the people, which they have since attempted to carry into effect. They obtained power by inducing the people of one section of the country to believe one thing, and by inducing the people of another section of the country to believe the opposite. They obtained power by delusive promises which they have never carried out. I am prepared to show any hon. gentleman opposite that there is not one single question of public policy to which the Liberal party in opposition was committed which they have attempted to accomplish since they came into power. I say that without any qualification whatever. A large number of the hon. members of this House are perfectly familiar with these matters, and they know that what I am stating is absolutely correct, but less my hon. friends from East Prince (Mr. Bell) and Montmagny (Mr. Martineau), who have not had the same opportunity to inform themselves, might think me mistaken, I will give them a little evidence of what I am saying. I will show these hon. gentlemen whose policy it was has made Canada the cynosure of all eyes, whose policy has enabled the Government of Canada to put in the Speech, as they have properly done, this glowing account of the magnificent position our country occupies to-day. Any speeches that emanate from my right hon. friend, who with so much ability leads this House, I have always read with great interest, but not always exactly with approval. I am not always able to agree exactly with the view in which he clothes in those delightful and eloquent sentences for which he is so famous. I have begun to think, Sir, when I read the speeches of my right hon. friend, that one of the most essential features of oratory is to be able to say whatever the occasion may require without any reference to the facts. I will give my right hon. friend the evidence on which I make that statement. In a very memorable speech, one which I am quite sure will become historical, for it was one of the most important he had ever delivered, when all its consequences are regarded—a speech which he made on January 4th, 1899, as reported in the Montreal "Herald," he said:

If we are now purchasing more from England, England is purchasing more from us, and that is what we want. We want a market for our produce, and we find it in England. Thanks to our policy.

Now, Sir, what was his policy? What policy did the hon. gentleman carry out? In the first place, the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that those two things have any necessary relation to each other at all. The hon. gentleman knows that our purchases from England have been relatively insignificant for many long years, long before he had anything to do with formulating a policy. The hon. gentleman knows that our purchases from England have been infinitesimally smaller than our exports to England. But that is not all, Sir. What is the result of this policy, this magnificent policy which the hon. gentleman claims has made Canada what it is to-day? Why, Sir, in 1897, the first year for which the hon. gentleman says he was responsible, England took over $500,000 less from us than she did before his policy was dreamed of. That does not look as if what we sent to England had any relation to the policy of the hon. gentleman. And while that was the case, there was an enormous, a gigantic increase in our exports to the mother country. Therefore, the hon. gentleman will see that the one statement has no relation to the other. The hon. gentleman is aware, I suppose, that his policy, while professedly a pro-British policy, was an anti-British policy; for under it, while England sent us in that year $500,000 less than she had done before, the United States of America sent us $19,000,000 more than they had done before. Was it because we had sent more to the United States? The hon. gentleman knows that it was the very reverse. I take the last six months, and what has this wonderful policy done—this policy that the hon. gentleman lives upon, and for which he attained an amount of kudos in Great Britain that we were all delighted to see him obtain if it had only been done on a sound basis? What was this wonderful boon that the right hon. gentleman said he conferred upon England? The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain was asked in the House of Commons the other day by Sir Howard Vincent: "What is the increase of trade sent from England to Canada during the six months ending the 31st day of January?" Why did he say the 31st day of January? Simply because, as was admitted very frankly by the hon. Minister of Finance when at Sheffield, the treaties were not denounced, and the policy did not come into operation until the 1st day of August: so that the first six months of the policy ended on the 31st day of January. What was the answer? What does the House suppose the increase amounts to, as the result of this magnificent policy that was going to secure for us the trade of England as a grateful response? Why, Sir, it amounts to 1 per cent for the six months. Some papers have got the statement that it is 6 per cent, which is an entire delusion. Mr. Chamberlain said: If you include July, which you cannot include, because it is outside of the question altogether, and before the preferential rate came into operation, it would be 6 per cent, but for the first months it was 1 per cent. And this is the policy on which the hon. gentleman prides himself.

But now, Sir, I intend to give an evidence from the Treasury benches with regard to this question upon whose policy the present great prosperity of this country depends. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), at Perth last month, had occasion to make a very important speech, and a very important speech it was. He said:

The tariff was a question that was settled, and was now a dead issue.

No more talk in this House about a tariff; we are done with that, he said. What more does he say?

Because the Liberals had succeeded in solving this great question, and the tariff was one their opponents, if they got a chance, would not change much.

Why would they not change it? Because it is their tariff. The hon. gentleman may say, and there is something in that. But suppose we had carried out our pledges, where would the prosperity have been? I agree with him; it would have been non-existent, and it was because they knew that they had either been deceiving and misleading the people of this country for eighteen long years, or having grown older, they had, as may be charitably supposed, grown wiser, and had come to the conclusion that other people know something about these matters as well as themselves. Well, it appears that the Minister of Interior has been taken severely to task by a number of people from Winnipeg who thought they were Free Traders. The Liberal party there had a meeting, at which they challenged this statement made by the hon. Minister of the Interior for the purpose of condemning it. The ground taken by the mover and seconder of the resolution condemning it was that if that was so, they had been grossly deluded—that if that were so they had been deceived by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who had been one of the strongest supporters of a free trade policy, into giving a support to a different policy altogether. A good many of the friends of the hon. Minister of the Interior said there must be some mistake. Although it appeared in the "Globe" and all the other Liberal newspapers, they said there must be some great mistake; it was impossible that a member of a free trade Government could have made such a statement, and they proposed to defer judgment until they had ascertained definitely whether the Minister could have made such a statement. Mr. Jas Porter, however,—I do not know who he is, but he is evidently a very intelligent man—said he believed that Mr. Sifton did make this statement, but did not condemn him for doing so because he thought the tariff was about nearly as perfect as it could be made. His opinion was—I commend this to the Minister of Finance—that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) saw he had made a mistake, and that Mr. Sifton was sent out to declare the real policy of the party and that the party should stand by his declaration. Now, I want to know how these two kings of Brentford stand—whether the hon. Minister of Finance who declares that only the thin end of the wedge has been entered and that the Government are going to keep on reducing the tariff until some point is reached which he has not particularly indicated, is to prevail, or the hon. Minister of the Interior who declares that the present tariff is a finality. I go with the Minister of the Interior. I think that every man who has had an opportunity of studying this question will stand by the policy he has propounded, namely, that the tariff is settled and that that permanency of tariff, which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) discussed at Montreal a year or two ago and declared to be most essential to attain, has been accomplished. It will be found that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior is right and that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, having found he had made a mistake, sent his colleague to proclaim to the world that he was all wrong. But what does one of the hon. gentleman's supporters sitting behind him say on this subject? These hon. gentlemen who are new in the House may suppose that I am drawing upon my imagination, but they will find that I can produce the evidence of hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that the matter is as I have stated it. What does the Winnipeg "Tribune" of March 9th of this year say upon this subject? It says:

There is something almost pathetic in the unconscious irony of Mr. Sifton's assertion that the present tariff is "one that their opponents, if they got the chance, would not change much." Certainly not. Why should the "opponents" change the tariff if they got the chance? It is very largely the tariff which was in force when these "opponents" ceased to have the chance.

Thus speaks the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson):

Does the reduction of one cent per gallon on coal oil, the reduction of 12½ cents duty on binder twine, the removal of the duty from barbed wire, and a preference on British goods to the extent of one-fourth of the scheduled duties, constitute the difference between the Tory protective tariff and "free trade as it is in England"—the avowed fiscal goal of Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

I do not require to dilate more on this point to show that whatever has been the policy of the present Government with regard to this matter, they owe that policy to the Liberal-Conservative party, and it is by following out the policy of that party that they are able to boast, as they do, of the happy position Canada has attained. That policy, whether discussed by the Minister of the Interior or by the hon. member for Lisgar is one, I am satisfied, the maintenance of which the people of Canada will demand in all its integrity, so as to give to Canadian industries that advantage to which they are entitled.

But what have these changes in that policy which the editor of the "Tribune" pointed out done for Canada? What has the taking off the duty on binder twine done for us? It has closed down the binder twine industry and nearly doubled the cost. What has the reduction in duty on barbed wire done except to destroy the Canadian industry and substitute for it the American? What has the reduction of one cent per gallon on coal oil accomplished? It has led to the transfer of a great and important national industry of Canada into the hands of an American combine and trust that wants to render extinct everything in the shape of a coal oil industry in Canada.

I want to give to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who no doubt is quite sincere in thinking that it is his policy that makes the sun rise in the east and set in the west, a little evidence that Canada was just emerging into the sunshine of renewed trade and vigour when he assumed office. It is an old saying that it is better to be lucky than rich, and certainly hon. gentlemen opposite may plume themselves on being exceptionally lucky. They came into power at a time when we were just passing out of a condition of depression into a condition of unwonted prosperity, and I shall give the evidence. I find in the report just published for the year 1898 by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the statement:

A much larger amount of grain from the North-western crops remains to be removed than ever before at this time of the year, and this, together with the most satisfactory agricultural and industrial conditions now prevailing in Canada, which are due in a great measure—

To the accession to office of the Liberal Government? Not at all.

—to good crops and good prices, and to successful mining, gives promise to a large spring and summer traffic.

If any person be so partisan as to be able to shut his eyes to the fact that we were not only just emerging from a condition of great depression into one of prosperity—that in Canada, in Europe, in England, Australasia and the United States, everywhere this was evident—but that we had besides the good fortune to have exceptionally good crops and instead of the farmer being compelled to take a poorer price for his produce the price was doubled, so that he was practically made rich and the whole country benefited. I give to him these facts, which we cannot suppose the people are ignorant of, nor the fact that the great mineral discoveries in Nova Scotia, Lake of the Woods district, British Columbia, Northwest Territories, Yukon—these enormous gold discoveries poured millions of capital into our country within the past two years. When I heard the eulogium pronounced by the mover of the Address upon British Columbia, my mind was carried back to the time when, standing on the other side of the House, as Minister of Railways, I was fighting to carry the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway that would give us communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I was opposed by a very able and distinguished gentleman, standing where I now stand—Mr. Blake—who demanded: What object is there in saddling this country with an enormous expense for the purpose of making a railway to British Columbia, which is only a sea of mountains? It was a sea of mountains; but it turns out that that sea of mountains, as the hon. mover of this motion has declared, bids fair not only to rival, but to surpass, many of the most important provinces in this Dominion by reason of the splendid mineral wealth which is now being developed there.

But, Sir, I give the right hon. gentleman another evidence, if anything more be wanted. In 1892, the gross earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway were almost $21,500,000, and in 1894 they had dropped to about $18,750,000. Was that drop due to legislation or to any action of the Government? The right hon. gentleman knows that these things had nothing whatever to do with it. He knows that it was a question of crops, a question of commercial depression in 1894, and that, whoever had been in power in that year, the result would have been the same. In 1895 the gross revenue of that road was $18,941,036, and the net revenue about $7,480,950. In 1896, before the right hon. gentleman's policy could have had any effect, the gross revenue rose to $20,681,596, and the net revenue to $8,107,581. In 1897, with the good crops and the greater mining development and the increased capital brought into the country, in fact, with the wave of prosperity that was passing over this country, as it passed over the neighbouring republic, the gross receipts went up to $24,049,334, and the net revenue to about $10,303,775. In 1898 there was a further increase to $26,138,977 in the gross revenue, and $10,475,371. I am sure the right hon. gentleman will not claim that he put all this money into the pockets of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If he does not, then I say to him that the statement he ventured to make—it was in an after-dinner speech, and, no doubt, some allowance must be made, particularly as the enthusiasm of his followers had, perhaps, carried him away a little—that this was due to his policy, is not well founded.

I turn to another evidence, which, I think, the right hon. gentleman will admit is conclusive on this point. Let me read from the report of Mr. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States :

The foreign commerce of the fiscal year 1898 in many respects has been phenomenal. The exportation of the products of both field and factory exceeded in value those of any preceding year, and the grand total of exports was the largest ever recorded. For the first time in the history of our foreign commerce the year's exportation averaged more than $100,000,000 a month, the total being $1,231,482,330, against $1,050,993,556 in 1897, and $1,030,278,148 in 1892, no other year having reached the billion dollar line.

Was this due to the policy of the hon. gentleman? Is it to this Government that the United States owe this that they declare to be a phenomenal condition of progress and prosperity? No, Sir; it is due to those causes to which I have adverted: it is a question of crops—yes, and of prices. The crops may not have exceeded by so very much those of previous years, but when you come to send a hundred millions to Great Britain alone, as the United States did, and at double prices to the farmer that they have been able to obtain before, the hon. gentleman will see that the causes of the prosperity are entirely beyond anything that he has been able to do. But I am wrong, perhaps, in saying that the hon. gentlemen had nothing to do with this prosperity. They had, a little. They ran up the imports into Canada of the products of the United States some nineteen or twenty millions beyond what they had been before, and to that extent their policy may be fairly claimed to have contributed to the increase of the United States exports to which Secretary Gage refers.

Now, let me give my right hon. friend another evidence to show that this idea that it is in proportion to what you receive from a country that you send to that country, is an entire delusion. I have already shown that, while we were increasing by millions the exports of Canada's products to Great Britain, we were actually taking half a million dollars less from Great Britain than had been taken before. And what about the United States? Why, Sir, the United States took from the United Kingdom, in 1889, $179,566,373 worth, and in 1898 only $111,361,617, a decrease of $68,204,758. Now, if there was anything in the hon. gentleman's theory, how could these figures arise? In 1889 the United States exported to the United Kingdom $650,616,283 worth, and in 1893, having taken $68,000,000 worth less from England than they did before, they exported $981,134,110 to England, or an increase of $331,517,827. That, I trust, will prevent my right hon. friend from on any occasion venturing again to claim that the question of how much the products of Canada may be sent to any country depends upon what is received from that country. Now, Sir, I approach the subject that was so fully and so very ably dealt with by the hon. gentleman who moved the Address, and that is the Anglo-American rapprochement, as it was termed. The question is one of the greatest possible gravity, there can be no doubt about that; and I think I may venture to claim at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite that I fully appreciated that gravity in the course I felt it my duty to take in regard to that matter. I felt that if there was anything in the shape of gratitude in the heart of man, it was simply impossible that the United States of America could fail to recognize the deep obligation under which they stood to Great Britain. When all the leading powers of Europe approached Great Britain at the time of the Spanish war with a proposal to intervene on the ground that there was no sufficient cause for war between the United States and Spain, no intelligent person in this or any other country requires to be told that if England had adopted that policy, if she had joined the other powers of Europe in interfering between the United States and Spain, it was impossible that the arms of the former could have accomplished what they did, or that the results could have been what they were. There is no doubt that in the press and among public men in a great many quarters of the United States there was a warm and strong expression of gratitude for England's course in that matter. I confess that although I had had some reason to take a somewhat contrary view, from observations I had an opportunity of making, I was greatly impressed with the opportunity that was thus presented for a closer rapprochement between the members of the great English-speaking family. My right hon. friend will remember that I was obliged to treat a proposal of one of my friends behind me with a little discourtesy, advising him not to persist at this time in urging action on the part of this House that would be calculated to interfere in the slightest degree with what I looked upon as a very great and important movement.

An hon. MEMBER. And you were wrong.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It really looks as though I had been. But as I say, I felt that there never had been such an opportunity for Canada to obtain a fair and just settlement of the various questions in dispute that existed between the United States of America and our own country: and so strongly impressed was I with that view. that when I came out from England and learned that a conference was about to take place between representatives of Great Britain, composed for the most part of members of the Canadian Government, along with another very able member of this House, I felt at once that I must alter the lines I had proposed to take, of carrying on a somewhat active agitation in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), I know, regards with great contempt any effort in opposition to this Government that anybody can make in that province, which he assumes to be entirely his own special charge and care. But I must say that I do not place so low an estimate upon the intelligence of the people of that great province as to doubt that if they were properly informed of the position that this Government occupies in regard to many questions vitally affecting that province, at all events, the relative proportions of hon. gentlemen sitting on the two sides of this House might be very materially changed. That is my opinion, and in that view of the case I had promised to carry on a somewhat active agitation in that province during the past summer. But when I learned that this conference was about to assemble, I felt that I must reconsider the position, and whether hon. gentlemen opposite may attach any importance to it or not, I acted under a sense of what I believed to be a public duty in deciding that while that commission was sitting I must refrain from dealing, at all events, with questions which were under its consideration, and which I felt were more likely to be prejudiced than otherwise by such a public discussion of the position of the Government as otherwise I would have been called upon to undertake. Well, Sir, I met with some little opposition. Some of my friends said: But suppose they accomplish something, they may go to the country, and they may carry the country without our having an opportunity of putting our views before it at all. Well, I answered, I want you to understand that so long as I am entrusted with the responsibility of the leadership of the Liberal-Conservative party, my policy will be the traditional policy that has always governed the actions of that great party, namely, to put the country before party. I said that if I were quite sure the conference would result in accomplishing some great good for Canada, I should be quite willing to continue to sit on the Opposition benches, if that was necessary, in order that Canada might enjoy that advantage. But we have now reached the point where we have to look at this matter from a different standpoint. I feel that everything that we could possibly do has been done by hon. gentlemen opposite, led by that great and distinguished nobleman whose death we all so sincerely deplore. I may say here that in my judgment Her Maesty's Government could have made no happier appointment to the position of leader of the British delegation than that of the late lamented Lord Herschell. I have had the pleasure of a long and somewhat intimate acquaintance with that right hon. gentleman. We were both members of the Royal Commission appointed by the Queen for the purpose of organizing the Imperial Institute, and after the Imperial Institute was organized, Lord Herschell discharged the very important duties of chairman of the executive council, of which I was a member; so that during a number of years I had an opportunity of seeing a great deal of that distinguished man. I need not say to this House that he was not only one of the ablest lawyers, but one of the most able peers that sat in the House of Lords in England; and his appointment by a Government to which he was opposed was the best evidence of how far the British Government are disposed to go in considering the fitness of persons for the discharge of the particular duties which devolve upon them. I felt that it was a great advantage to Canada to have on the commission a gentleman so distinguished as Lord Herschell; and I may say that during my acquaintance with him, and in the opportunities I had of seeing him preside over large bodies of men, nothing struck me more forcibly than the wonderful tact that he always displayed in discharging those duties. I may add that on several occasions it became my duty to approach His Lordship in his position as Lord Chancellor, in regard to several matters, notably two important matters, one connected with the representation of Canada on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and another relating to the admission of colonial government securities for investment in trust funds; and on every occasion I found Lord Herschell not only extremely able and extremely courteous, but disposed to do everything he possibly could to promote the interests of the colonies. I feel it right that, under these circumstances, I should utter my humble tribute to the memory of that great man, and express my deep regret and appreciation of the loss which both the Empire and Canada have sustained by his untimely death.

Now, Sir, the mover of the Address has told us that for six months we have waited patiently for the result of the International Commission, but I am afraid I will have to qualify that word, for I believe that I am expressing the opinion of gentlemen on both sides of the House, as well as the sentiments of the overwhelming majority of the people of Canada when I say, that we have waited the result of that conference with deep impatience. So far as we can judge, from the statement in the press, which is the only means of communication on the matter open to us, for six long months the people of Canada have been placed in the most unfortunate position of being humble suppliants at the feet of the people of the United States. Our representatives requesting as a favour that which we ought to demand as a right. And, Sir, demanding our right, we had the right to receive a prompt and considerate answer from the United States. I do not believe, Sir, that the interests of Great Britain and of the United States are ever likely to resume their former conditions; not, that having experience of the past six months we have anything to hope for or anything to expect in the nature of frank and generous treatment from the United States, but I believe that now that the people of the United States have made such a new departure in their system of government, that the interests of Great Britain and of the United States will very often run on parallel lines, and will draw those two countries together in a manner that probably no other circumstance could have done. But I must say, so far as I am concerned, that notwithstanding the course which Great Britain has pursued in a most eventful period of the career of that great republic, I entirely despair of their being influenced by that to give any more favourable consideration to the people of Canada than they have given in the past.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the Prime Minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The Prime Minister will be here in a moment, I have sent for him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret his absence, because I have now reached a part of my remarks that make it very desirable that he should be present. I have referred to the failure of the negotiations and the fact that at the end of six months waiting impatiently for the result, we learned that an adjournment of the commission had taken place until the 2nd day of August next. I cannot but express my deep regret that there should have been such an adjournment. I think it was due to Canada, and I think it was due to the great interests with which the representatives of Canada on that occasion were charged by Her Majesty, that they should have declined to make any adjournment. Of course we are bound to accept the official statement made by the head of the commission representing the United States, and by the Prime Minister of Canada for Lord Herschell who was unfortunately prevented by illness from being present; but when the reasons were disclosed, when the position was stated to the country, as it was officially stated in that state paper authorized by Mr. Fairbanks on the one side and Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the other, I could not but feel that a serious mistake had been made on the part of the representatives of the Crown. In view of the fact that the United States of America adopted a course which the hon. the mover of the Address has to-day on the floor of Parliament, as the mouthpiece of the Executive of this country, stated, was a dishonourable course, a course not justified by the comity of nations; it is my opinion that the interests of Canada required, not that there should be an adjournment until the 2nd day of August, but that there should be a suspension of these negotiations. I regret that any such course became necessary, but when a great country like the United States of America took a position which demands from the mover of the Address the terms "dishonourable conduct," I cannot but say, that I regret very much that there should have been any question of an adjournment. I do not myself believe that there is any intention on the part of the representatives of Her Majesty; I do not believe that there is any intention to meet on the 2nd day of August. I do not believe that there is any expectation on the part of these hon. gentlemen that they will meet on the 2nd day of August next. Why should they? The statement is made—I do not know on what authority—by the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), that an arrangement was all but reached in regard to a number of questions touching the interests of Canada, but that the representatives of Canada took the ground that there should be no arrangement made of any kind on any of these questions unless they were all arranged. I do not hesitate to express the opinion that if the representatives of Canada took such a ground, it was most unfortunate. I do not see why it was necessary to take the position that every question must be settled. Suppose that a few questions interesting to Canada could be disposed of as was intimated, why should they not be disposed of without reference to any question on which it was not possible to come to a conclusion?

Now, Sir, my right hon. friend the leader of the Government will correct me, if I am wrong in saying that I understand the terms of that adjournment to be, that the commission will meet on the second day of August, provided that in the meantime, by diplomatic intercourse, the Governments of Great Britain and of the United States solve this question of the boundary of Alaska. I assume, from the terms in which the statement is made, that the adjournment is for the very purpose of enabling the respective governments to deal diplomatically with that subject; and I assume that it is not the intention to meet, if that question remains in the position that the United States practically say: Gentlemen, we do not intend to settle this question—for they might just as well say so in so many words, as to use the terms that they have used. What do they say? They say: We will not have any arbitration at all on the question of the boundary of Alaska, unless you agree, before we go into that question, that, provided the arbitrators decide that if we are in possession of Canadian territory, we shall not be required to give it up, but continue to hold it. That is point the first. Point the second is : We do not intend that there shall be any settlement of this Alaskan boundary question at all. Why, Sir, no person ever made so monstrous a proposition as that there should be an equal number on each side, and no umpire, to decide a question of that kind. The question of an international boundary is a question that is perfectly understood in the comity of nations. It is a question that depends on the construction of the treaty under which that boundary is fixed ; and when two governments are unable to agree as to the significance of the terms of that treaty in such a way as to settle the boundary, then, according to all practice, such a question should be solved by a reference to an international tribunal, by calling in experts and by calling in an umpire of an international character to decide what shall be done. Why, Sir, what was done in the case of the north-western boundary of the United States ? Suppose that England, instead of doing what every nation does under such circumstances, had said : We will not have any arbitration ; we will not refer to any third party or to any international tribunal the question as to whether the Island of San Juan is in British or in American territory ; it is in our possession to-day ; we are occupying it, as we have done for many years, and we require, before going into any arbitration, that if the tribunal decides that that island is in United States territory, we shall not be obliged to abandon it, but will continue to hold it. Every person knows that so monstrous a proposition would have been rejected with scorn by the United States of America. That question was referred to an international tribunal, and that tribunal decided that the Island of San Juan was in American territory ; and although England was in possession of that island then, and had been for many years, it was handed over to the United States, and the channel on the Canadian side of the island was made the boundary line. Now, Sir, if the statement be true that has been given to us to-day by the mover of the Address—and we have no reason to doubt its truth—that the representatives of the Government of Canada determined that there should be no settlement of any question without that boundary question being settled, what position will you be in on the second day of August to meet at Quebec, unless in the meantime that question is settled by a diplomatic arrangement between the two countries ? I hold, therefore, that in the interests of Canada, and upon every principle of international law by which such questions are governed, it was the duty of the representatives of the Crown to take the stand there and then that there would be no further negotiations upon those questions, if that question was not disposed of before the tribunal met ; and I assume that will be the case. Now, Sir, what has been done ? We have had six months' long negotiations, we have had the American press and the Canadian press teeming with what was being done, first at Quebec, and subsequently at Washington. Where are we now ? Why, Sir, everybody knows that there became a burning desire on the part of the people of Canada that those negotiations should be brought to a termination, and that the representatives of Canada should return to their own country ; that if it was found impossible to induce the United States to agree to a fair and just solution of these various questions, the matter should be terminated, and Canada should be left in a position to take such measures as, I do not hesitate to say, are absolutely essential to command that respect on the part of that great republic that lies at the very foundation of securing any just consideration for any Canadian question. We have tried the sunny ways, we have tried the plausible means of accomplishing these objects, too long, and we have tried them with such a thoroughly bootless result that the patience of the people of Canada is exhausted, and they say : Let us now—not retaliate ; no person talks of retaliation. No person raises the question of retaliation for a single moment ; but we say the time has come when it is absolutely due to Canadian interests that the world should know that we are not in the humiliating and dependent position of being obliged to crave as suppliants at the feet of the United States of America any consideration whatever. We say that Canada has attained that position, and she enjoys that position to-day. Consider her attitude in whatever light and from whatever standpoint you may, we say that Canada occupies a position in which she asks no favour from the United States of America or from any other foreign country. Canada is so magnificently endowed by nature with such rich and inexhaustible resources of every kind and character as to make it unnecessary for her ; and if it was necessary, no policy is more fatal to attain the object in view than to present ourselves in the position of suppliants. Now, Sir, those deliberations, in my judgment, should have been closed the moment the United States took so unreasonable a position as they did, according to the official report given out by the Hon. Senator Fairbanks and the Prime Minister of Canada, acting as the head of the commission. I say, the moment that point was reached, those negotiations should have been closed, and the representatives of Canada should have returned to their seats in this House of Commons of our country, in a position to take up those questions and deal with them, not in a spirit of retaliation, but in a spirit of adopting just such legislation as the interests of Canada demanded at their hands. A great deal of difficulty that has grown out of this question has been the disastrous result of the policy pursued by the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government. I must say, and I say it with regret, that in my judgment, from the hour the Government was formed in 1896 until they went down to this international conference or meeting in Quebec two years later, if their sole object had been to render it impossible for Canada to obtain any fair and just and reasonable arrangements with the United States, they left nothing undone during these two long years, that could ensure the accomplishment of that result. That is a very strong statement, but I will show the House, as briefly as I can, the ground on which I base it. What was their first step? The first unfortunate step taken by the right hon. First Minister was the last which any man acquainted with diplomacy, or who had any knowledge of the subject of diplomatic arrangements, would have taken. That step was to unbosom himself to a Chicago reporter. In that interview he took the last ground which any man charged with the duty of leading the Government of Canada ought to take. He said that he and his associates were the only men in Canada who were friendly to the United States of America, the only men from whom the United States could expect to receive such treatment as would be satisfactory to them. Was that calculated to strengthen the hands of the right hon. gentleman? Just the reverse. His statement was not true. I do not intend for a moment to say that the hon. gentleman wilfully misstated the facts, but that his recollection entirely failed him. His recollection of the history of Canada, his knowledge of the Conservative party in Canada, entirely failed him when he made the untrue statement to a Chicago reporter that the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada was hostile to the United States of America.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is going rather too far to state that any hon. member of this House has made an untrue statement. There are a great many other ways by which the hon. gentleman can express his appreciation of what the right hon. gentleman said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend for a single moment to insinuate that the right hon. Prime Minister made a deliberately false statement. I draw the distinction between that and an untrue statement. Any statement is untrue which is contradicted by the facts. I have made a great many statements to-night which hon. gentlemen opposite will challenge as untrue because they differ from me on questions of fact. But I do not at all wish to be implied that I am charging the right hon. gentleman with deliberately misstating any facts. I want that to be clearly understood. I would not use the word if I thought it were of a personally offensive character, but I am bound to say that, whether untrue or not, the statement of the right hon. gentleman is disproved by the whole history of Canada from the first hour of confederation down to the present. There never was a party in this House or country that recognized more than did the Liberal-Conservative party the great importance of having the most friendly relations, both socially and commercially, with the United States of America. I hold that as a cardinal principle, and I say that the Conservative party have acted upon that principle from the first hour of confederation down to the present, and shall prove directly, out of my right hon. friend's own mouth, that he was mistaken in bringing that charge against us. What are the facts? Every one remembers that in 1871, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald was sent to Washington, as a joint High Commissioner, to negotiate a treaty between Great Britain and the United States. What happened? He did negotiate a treaty. There is not a gentleman on the other side who will contradict me when I say that there never was so critical an hour in the relations between Great Britain and the United States. Every one knows that the seizures made by the "Alabama" during the civil war in the United States excited the most intensely bitter feeling on the part of the United States towards Great Britain—a feeling not confined to one, but shared by all parties. At that critical hour, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald was sent down to Washington, as one of a High Commission, to negotiate a treaty for the settlement of that "Alabama" question and certain other questions that were in controversy between the United States and Canada at that time. Well, Mr. Speaker, a treaty was negotiated and signed, and its adoption was moved on the floor of this House. I shall have occasion directly to draw the attention of the House to the attitude taken by the Conservatives on the one side and the Liberals on the other, as to what should be done with regard to that important treaty, but first let me refer to the remarks made by the Right Hon. First Minister to the Chicago reporter. He said:

The Liberal Government, which has just taken office, desires and intends to signalize its administration by a renewal—

A renewal, mark you, Mr. Speaker——of the neighbourly relations with our friends across the border. As you have suggested, the relations between Canada and the United States have not been as cordial for some time past as I hope they will be in the future. Some years ago, when considerable friction had been created by the North Atlantic fishery troubles, I took an opportunity to say that the question should be adjusted in a friendly manner, becoming an enlightened and friendly people, by the simple process of give and take, and I do not see now why an arrangement should not be made resembling that effected by the Treaty of Washington in 1871 and the treaty of 1854, whereby not only the ports but the inshore waters of both countries were thrown open to the fishermen of both on equal terms, and the markets for the fish of the two countries made equally free.

I may just in passing refer to that unfortunate mistake of my right hon. friend in supposing that the treaty of 1871 contained any such provision. It was not a question of give and take. It was not a question of free markets for fish in return for free fishing, but a question of the fisheries of the two countries being mutually enjoyed by the fishermen of both and of an international tribunal ascertaining how much should be paid by the one country to the other—which entirely changed the whole complexion of that arrangement. That international tribunal met at Halifax, and by its award the United States were compelled to pay $5,500,000 to Canada and Newfoundland for the use of their fisheries, over and above the value of their own, and the admission of our fish free during twelve years, or something like $500,000 a year. Therefore the position taken by my hon. friend was entirely a mistaken one, and one that, I do not hesitate to say, met him at the threshold of this commission. When he had ascertained the true position and was asked by the United States: Do you adhere to your proposal which you stated to a Chicago reporter you were prepared to make, namely, a proposal of give and take, and give up your inshore fisheries in return for free admission of fish in the markets of the United States, my right hon. friend was obliged to say no.

You have to pay $5,500,000 for the use of our fisheries, over and above the advantage of the free import of our fish into your country, and I cannot agree to anything of the kind—and that closed that question. And I am as satisfied that that took place as if I had heard the conversation between the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. Well, Sir, that treaty was submitted, and I now come to the evidence upon which I stated, that while the great Liberal-Conservative party have always been in favour of the most friendly, cordial, social and commercial relations with the United States, and have proved it again and again, hon. gentlemen opposite are the men who, on the floor of this House, denounced in unmeasured terms efforts that were calculated to bring about that harmonious settlement of the questions at issue. The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, then the leader of the Opposition, in 1872, when the treaty was considered, said:

We believed, however, that there was a limit beyond which we ought not to go. He did not believe that national health, national glory and national pride were always to be purchased by making sacrifices to what is justly called the peace-at-any-price party. It was manifest that if we on this continent, hemmed in as we are by the people of the United States, whose political policy had been singularly aggressive—

That was the language, Sir, of these gentlemen, who are so devoted in their friendship to the United States.

—yielded up to so-called peace every advantage we possessed within our territory, it would soon become a question of how far it would be possible to pursue that policy and retain any trace of national life and public spirit.

I wish that the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was on the floor of this Parliament to-day to stand up and maintain, in the face of hon. gentlemen opposite the position he took on that occasion. For, although the treaty was one which should have received the approval of this House, there is not a word in that quotation that does not come home to every gentleman in this House as one that a self-respecting people would be expected to support. Mr. Mackenzie again said:

He felt that on no consideration ought we to yield our honour at the shrine of mammon, that on no consideration ought we to have bartered away our heritage for this questionable equivalent of money.

I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he has not been engaged in these negotiations, the close consideration of what amount of money should be paid by the United States for bartering away one of the most sacred rights of British subjects? Enough has leaked out to let us know that it was a question whether one of our most important national assets, and one of the dearest rights a British subject can enjoy, the right of going about on the high seas, following a legitimate calling, should not be bartered away for money—putting a price, as the hon. Mr. Mackenzie said, upon one of the dearest rights of the people of this country. Now I wish to call attention to what the Hon. Mr. Blake said:

As to there being now a critical state of relations between the two countries, there would be the same then—the same hectoring, the same blustering, and bragging, if only for the purpose of retaining the fishing privileges.

I wonder if my right hon. friend and his associates have not been enduring of late a good deal of that hectoring, of that blustering and bragging which Mr. Blake describes here as the mode in which the statesmen of that great republic are apt to press their claims. Mr. Young, who was then a leading member of this House, and a member of the Opposition, representing an Ontario constituency, said:

The whole thing was a shameful sacrifice of Canada's interest, and this was generally admitted, and the member for West Durham had fully proved it. This was no reason why the treaty should be ratified. He had seldom heard more paltry reasons than those urged by the Government in pressing the acceptance of the treaty. Where would these sacrifices end? They would never end so far as the United States were concerned and as long as Canada was on the map.

These are the sentiments of that party who have boasted again and again, and have dinned into the ears of the Americans until some of them have been foolish enough to believe it, that the Liberal party were alone willing to make a fair and friendly settlement of the questions between the two countries. I say that this is not, in my judgment, the way to succeed in a diplomatic struggle, such as the hon. gentleman has been engaged in. Mr. Mills, the present Minister of Justice, said :

We should feel entirely satisfied that, before the treaty was ratified, we did not make a mistake, and that by one fell swoop we should not destroy the hopes and blast the prospects of this country.

And, holding up the treaty in his hand, he said :

Here was the hole through which America would get possession of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that our Mills ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Our Mills—the present Minister of Justice. And this was how he spoke of the Treaty of Washington of 1871, and there is not a man in Canada to-day but would hold up both hands to have it enacted or to have had it remain in perpetuity as a settlement of the questions between the United States and Canada. That measure was received by the Liberal party with denunciation, though they now arrogate to themselves the credit for bringing about a renewal of friendly relations. When was there a rupture, with the Conservative party in power, of the friendly relation between the United States and Canada ? Mr. Mills continued :

He had not much confidence, judging by several previous treaties, in the ability of British statesmen, and the Oregon territory dispute would prevent him placing much reliance in the moderation and justice of American statesmen.

So much for the evidence I give as to the statement made by the right hon. gentleman, that it was necessary to bring the Liberal party into power in order to get fair and reasonable arrangements made with this country. Does the right hon. gentleman think I have not answered completely his statement and shown that, if there has been a strong attitude of hostility ever taken on the floor of Parliament toward the United States, it was taken when the Conservative Government were making a fair, friendly and excellent arrangement with the United States, and that arrangement was being denounced as a base surrender of the rights and interests of the people of Canada ?

Well, Sir, what happened then ? Why, Sir, we have the right hon. gentleman himself, notwithstanding all these fierce denunciations of the United States by his Liberal friends, by the leaders whom he followed, no sooner clothed with power than he rushes into the arms of a Chicago reporter, and unbosoms himself of the statement, that what he wants to do to prove his affection to the United States is to adopt this very treaty that had been denounced in unmeasured terms by his friends and colleagues. But I will give the hon. gentleman's own words to prove what he said. I won't say, after the gentle hint that the Speaker has been good enough to give me, that it was untrue, but perhaps he will allow me to say it was inaccurate—I will prove from the mouth of the right hon. gentleman himself that his statement was inaccurate. On July 1st, 1897, at a dinner given in London, the right hon. gentleman says :

I am sorry to say that there are still too many causes of friction remaining between Great Britain and the United States. When I say that the people and the Government of England were not blameless—

He was referring to the civil war, and on that I altogether differ with him.

—yet for all the troubles—

Mark this. This is the language of the same gentleman who says now that the Liberal party are the only party to whom the United States can look for fair and friendly arrangements. He says :

—yet for all the troubles which have arisen since the civil war, the blame, in my estimation, rests not with England, but with the United States.

There I am giving the very best evidence of the inaccuracy of the statement made by the right hon. gentleman. But there is another question. I am asked by the organ of the Liberal party if there are not two Tupper's. They are good enough to remind me of the statements which I made in this House when I was asking this House to accept the treaty of 1888, negotiated at Washington. Now, what was that treaty ? That was not a treaty in which we were at the feet of the United States asking for arrangements. That treaty grew out of a proposal made by Mr. Bayard, then Secretary of State for the United States, to myself, proposing that we should meet and discuss the question as to whether the Atlantic fisheries difficulty could not be disposed of. At that time, as the House knows, the relations between the United States of America and of Canada were in as serious and unpleasant a position as it was possible to imagine. Congress had passed a unanimous resolution, and the President had ratified it, authorizing a declaration of non-intercourse with Canada ; and there was not a paper on the Republican or the Democratic side of politics in the whole of the United States, so far as I am aware, that was not denouncing Canada from day to day for the most inhuman and unfriendly treatment of the fishermen of the United States. There was, however, no foundation for those denunciations, because the Government of the United States had itself abrogated the treaty of 1871, and we were then thrown back upon the treaty of 1818, which was then brought into operation, and which had been suspended by the later treaty. In justice to Canadian rights we were compelled to seize their fishermen if they came into our waters and trespassed upon our fishing grounds. Well, at that time, as I say, the relations between the two countries were of the most unpleasant character, and Her Majesty's Government appointed three plenipotentiaries, of whom I had the honour to be one. The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain was the leader of Her Majesty's representatives. We went to Washington, and after some two months of negotiations we succeeded in making a treaty, a treaty so favourable that the Parliament of Canada—although at the first blush hon. gentlemen opposite denounced it as very wrong and improper, as they always do anything that comes from the Conservative party—the House of Commons unanimously adopted it. That treaty was sent down by Mr. Cleveland to the Senate of the United States, with the declaration that it was a fair, honourable and just statement of the whole question, and he urged the Senate to adopt it. That treaty may be studied by any hon. gentleman in this House, and he will find that every single contention on the part of Canada as to our rights under the treaty of 1818, is conceded in it; and I will give better evidence, directly, than that as to its value. As we had great reason to doubt whether it would receive a two-thirds vote of the Senate, we followed that up by a modus vivendi, to go into operation pending the ratification of the treaty, or until by proclamation it was cancelled. That modus vivendi is in operation to-day; that modus vivendi is one that both President Cleveland had sanctioned, and that Mr. Harrison, who succeeded him as the Republican President, also declared in his inaugural address had caused all the friction to cease between the two nations. I did not hesitate to urge the adoption of that treaty upon the House of Commons, and was fortunate enough to obtain the unanimous sanction of this House to that treaty. But I say more. I put it to my right hon. friend again—he will perhaps say he is not in a position to answer me—but I say that I believe that he offered substantially the re-enactment of that treaty to the United States of America on the present occasion as a settlement of the Atlantic fisheries question. I have reasons for making this statement, because, as hon. gentlemen are aware, despite all efforts to maintain secrecy, a great deal will leak out, and it is impossible to prevent the press and certain parties from getting a good deal of this information.

Now, I come to the next step taken. My right hon. friend sent down to Washington the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to see if they could induce the United States to consider a reciprocal trade arrangement. Well, how did they come back? They came back with the Dingley tariff, largely increasing the duties upon lumber, after the late Government had gone out of office, and with a more stringent alien labour law than existed before. I am not surprised that these gentlemen came back intensely disgusted with the reception they met with. Then, what was the next step in this drama? We then had the Minister of Finance coming to the front, and with a great shout of loyalty that was to echo and re-echo throughout the whole British Empire, he declared to this House, and to the people of Canada, that the Government of Canada had made up their minds, as the United States had given them the cold shoulder, and were not disposed to entertain any of their proposals—they had made up their minds to adopt the policy of giving a preference to British trade in their tariff. I won't go into all the history of that tariff, because it is too well known to require repetition. But we all know the very unfortunate blunders that the Minister of Finance and all his colleagues fell into on that occasion. Now, Sir, one of the very first elements of success in diplomacy is that the men who are negotiating with you should have some respect for you, that the people with whom you are called upon to negotiate these matters should believe that you know something of the subjects upon which you are talking. Well, when they found that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister of Canada held up—and I explained before dinner that these gentlemen owed the National Policy to us, owed all the prosperity and progress that has taken place in Canada under their regime, to us who preceded them, more than that, I say they owe this loyalty cry to us, where would they have been if they could have carried out their policy of 1891? Would they have been in a position to pose as men determined to build up the British Empire if the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada had not been able to beat down their disloyal—I do not say intentionally disloyal—but I say their disloyal effort to break down British institutions in this country? What was that policy which the Liberal-Conservatives of Canada defeated at the polls? It was to adopt the tariff of the United States for Canada against the rest of the world, Britain included; it was that Canada should turn her back on England and discriminate against Great Britain. And when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was asked: Suppose this involves discrimination against England, his answer was: We cannot help that, we are determined to have unrestricted reciprocity and free trade on this continent of North America, let England say or do what she likes. Sir, I stand here to-night to say that this loyalty cry of the Liberals which has stood them in good stead, and which has covered their breasts with decorations, was only available to them because we defeated their attempt to undermine British institutions on this continent. Have we not good evidence on this point? Look at the London "Times," the day after the general election of 1891, in which the Hon. Edward Blake puts on record for all time the declaration: That he had to leave their ranks because he would not fight under false colours, and because their policy was one that would lead to the commercial subjugation of Canada to the United States, which would involve ultimately the loss of British institutions.

When this tariff of the Liberal Government was brought down, the right hon. the Prime Minister was told from this side of the House, that he would not accomplish what he aimed at, that there were two treaties in the way fatal to his policy, and that there were several countries that under his resolution were entitled to the privilege given: when he was told that, he held up his right hand and I can see him standing there in all the majesty of his position and power declaring to this House and to the world: that he and his Government had studied this whole question and they had come to the conclusion that there was only one country in the world that could enjoy the advantages which the resolution offered. I need not detain the House longer than to say that he and his Government soon found they were wrong in that from top to bottom and that they had been trying their prentice hand upon a subject which they did not understand. At last down in Sheffield, at the great annual dinner there, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had the manliness to say, and I give him credit for it: We have no preferential tariff, but we intend to have one next year. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) maintained that this first resolution of 1896 was open to all the world, and to a large extent he was right, but what about the resolution of 1897? Why, this Government that claims to be the friends of the United States of America, and to consider above and beyond all the importance of meeting the wishes of that country; this Government absolutely put upon the Statute-book a discrimination in favour of Great Britain of 25 per cent. Well, it was a sham preference. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with that wonderful ingenuity of his—I do not like to call it by a harsher term—managed, before he took off the 12½ per cent to put that or a little more on, so that when he gave his 25 per cent reduction it was more like 12½ than 25, as he himself knows. I have shown already that this was comparatively worthless to England. It has no doubt embarrassed a few industries in this country, but so far as the trade of Great Britain is concerned, at the end of six months under this professed discrimination in favour of England, the trade returns show that Great Britain sent absolutely one per cent more of their products to Canada under this magnificent boon which was supposed to have been conferred upon them, than they sent before. I cannot imagine gentlemen, who had any idea of approaching the United States of America for a reciprocity treaty, stultifying themselves more completely than they did in this matter, even if they had been offered a premium for doing so. What they did in this respect was bad enough in all conscience, but they did worse. While filling the country with this great shout of loyalty to the mother land (to whom we owe so much and were so anxious to pay a portion of our debt) they turned round and gave to the United States of America everything they had to give and without any quid pro quo whatever. We on this side of the House told them in 1897: Your tariff is a delusion; you are pretending to make a British tariff while you are making a pro-American tariff, and, Sir, the result has been that at the end of the first year of this tariff, there were $500,000 less imports into Canada from England, but $20,000,000 more imports to Canada from the United States. What did the ablest man—I do not hesitate to say it although he is not in the House—that represented Canada on this Commission, Mr. John Charlton, the hon. member for North Norfolk—what did he say? Did any person ever hear before of a body of gentlemen engaged in an important diplomatic negotiation, sending one of their friends out on the stump in Washington and in Chicago, to lecture the people of the United States of America in reference to the subjects that were under consideration of the conference. It may be a new mode of diplomacy, but it is not likely to be a successful one. When they proposed in this House to make corn free, did not the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) tell them: If you contemplate any negotiations with the United States of America, you had better reserve something so as to give you a basis for negotiating. But the policy that prevailed on that occasion and that over-rode the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was the policy of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, who, when formulating that magnificent policy that was to startle the whole of British North America when it came to light, said ("Hansard," 1893):

The great trouble we have always had in our dealings with the American Republic has been simply this, that the Canadian Government has never been generous in their treatment of American citizens and the American Republic. If we have favours to give, if we have concessions to make, we should give them: and make them gracefully.

Well, Sir, he has tried that, and where does he find himself? He lowered the duties on iron, on wheat and on flour; he made corn free, and he increased the products sent from the United States into Canada by over $20,000,000 per annum. That was carrying out his mode, and what did he get by it? Why, Sir, when he went down to negotiate these trade arrangements at Quebec, his hands were empty. He had given away everything he could give, and he got nothing for it. He has not got thanks or recognition or anything that is valuable to a public man; and he has only succeeded in bringing his country into contempt. I say it advisedly: I say, the feeling throughout the whole of this country is that the position of Canada would be infinitely higher, stronger and better to-day, if that commission had never been heard of. We have been suing and imploring on the platform and in the closet and everywhere; we have been begging favours from the United States of America, when there is not a country on the face of the globe that is in a better position than this Dominion of Canada to present a bold front and to say that we are in a position of independence that will enable us to deal fairly and justly between man and man, but that we ask no favour and no affection from any person whatever. Well, Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) no doubt, was confronted with this little statement when he went down to engage in these negotiations. The hon. gentleman visited London in 1897, on which occasion he delivered himself of an address before a section of the London Chamber of Commerce; and what did he say? He said:

In 1895, the last year he had access to the tables, Great Britain took $60,000,000 of Canada's products, while the United States took only $40,000,000; Canada took from the United States $60,000,000 of her products, and only $30,000,000 from the mother country. When the Liberal party came into power in Canada, they thought something should be done to reverse that state of affairs. If it had been brought about by natural causes, those causes might well have been left to work out their own result; but when they saw that it had been produced by artificial means, they determined that all the obstacles in the way of the development of trade between Canada and the mother country should be removed.

Now, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman mean by that statement? He meant this—and it means nothing else—that the Conservative party in this country had been discriminating against the mother country and by unnatural means forcing the trade into United States channels. That is what it meant, and it meant nothing else. And now, Sir, we have the declaration that, when this hon. gentleman went to negotiate a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, they said: We thought you were altogether opposed to having any trade with the United States. Are you the same gentleman who held up to execration the late Government for having by unnatural means increased the trade of Canada with this country? If these are your views, what do you mean now? Do you mean to say that you do not intend to carry out the solemn pledge you gave on the platform in the city of London to the English people and the English merchants, that you and your Government intended to change all that, and to see that Canada would not take more from the United States than from England, and give less? Now, Sir, what is the result? Why, Sir, instead of the hon. gentleman having accomplished that by this sham preference given to England, but a real preference to the United States, he brought about that discrimination in favour of the United States and against England that he had denounced, and here it is. In 1895 the imports from the United States were $54,634,000; in 1898, under the policy of my hon. friend, the imports rose to no less than $78,000,000, or $23,360,000 more than had been brought from the United States under the tariff that he denounced, and that he pledged himself to the English people to remedy. What would such astute men as Senator Fairbanks and the late Mr. Dingley—whose death we very much deplore—think when they were asked to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with gentlemen who had shown, either that they did not know what they were talking about, that they did not understand the subject with which they were undertaking to deal, or that they were most unfriendly towards the United States of America and determined to have as little to do with them as possible? While our imports from the United States exceeded our imports from Great Britain by $20,000,000 in 1895, our imports from the United States exceeded our imports from Great Britain by $46,000,000 in 1898. The free list given by the tariff of the hon. gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches was 72½ per cent of the total free list given to the world, and the free list enjoyed by Great Britain was only 17 1-7 per cent. Was that brought about by natural causes? The hon. gentleman said this disparity in the figures was not the result of natural causes, and he and his Government were going to see that all that was changed. They have changed it, and changed it with a vengeance; and what is the result of all this? The result is that these astute gentlemen with whom they were negotiating, found that they were dealing with men who did not understand the subject with which they were charged, or, if they did, they had placed themselves in a most unfortunate position; and when they went to ask the United States to make a commercial arrangement with a Government that had put on the Statute-book of the country a preference for England, what was their position? Why, Sir, they were met at once: Gentlemen, are you the same men who, in 1891, made those speeches in which you declared that all that Canada required to make it the most splendid country in the world, all that Canadians required to make them rich and prosperous from one end of the country to the other, was to get unrestricted reciprocity with us? If you are the same men, if you have not changed your principles, we are ready to negotiate with you; but if you have turned your backs upon yourselves, and if, instead of wanting unrestricted reciprocity with the United States of America and discrimination against England, which in 1891 you declared you were ready to adopt, you want to give a preference to Great Britain, then you are not the same men, and we have been deluded. We gave you, in the last general elections, from one end of the United States to the other, all the support and influence we could give you, in our press and in every other way, to bring you into power; and now, having got power, the men who told us they were heart and soul in favour of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and discrimination against England, have put on the Statute-book discrimination against the United States. Yes, you say, that is quite true; but see what we did for you last session. We made corn free; we reduced the duties on iron, wheat, flour and all these other articles. Well, they replied, no doubt you did that in your own interest. We presume you were in such a miserable position in Canada, so dependent on the United States, that your own interests forced you to do that, and we do not intend to pay you for what your own interests compelled you to do.

In 1898 Canada took from the United States $36,000,000 of domestic manufactures, exceeding the importation of these manufactures in Great Britain by at least $6,000,000.

From England, the mistress of the industrious world, we imported $6,000,000 worth of manufactured goods less than from the United States—not raw material required for our manufactures, but the manufactured goods themselves.

On August 1st, Consul General Bittenger, of Montreal, a gentleman who, like most of the Consuls General of the United States, is thoroughly alive to the interests of his own country, sent this report to his Government, and I ask my right hon. friend to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest his report on the position into which they have reduced this country, notwithstanding all their professions. The Consul General reports to his Government at Washington that:

Comparing the trade of last year with that of 1893, the United States producers have a far better position in our market than ever, and the British producers occupy a place not nearly so favourable as that which they formerly held.

Is it any wonder that associated with gentlemen who, as I have shown—and I have followed them, step by step, from the hour they got into power down to the hour they went to Quebec—is it any wonder that associated with these gentlemen who, during these two years, did everything that a Government could do to make it impossible to get any intelligent American to listen to their proposals at all, after having given everything available away and having nothing left to give, that great man who led the British Commission should, at the end of six months, have been forced to give utterance to that unhappy wail, which found expression in almost his last words: "It is too bad; here we have spent six months and have got nothing but a broken leg." That is the position, and I repeat that had this Government been formed with the object of making it impossible for us to ever obtain any favourable trade arrangements with the United States, they could not have worked harder or more successfully to accomplish that result than they did in their two years of labour before they went to negotiate this treaty at Washington. Well, I had occasion, when this treaty ended in this deplorable fiasco—for every person cannot but regard that as the position to-day—when it was found that on a question of great importance to Canada, the question of the delimitation of the boundaries between the United States and the Canadian North-west and British Columbia, when it was found that the only terms upon which the Americans were willing to have an arbitration at all were absolutely insulting to any man of intelligence engaged in negotiating such a question, to state that in my judgment the adjournment to the 2nd of August was a mistake from every possible point of view. If the negotiations had then been terminated—as terminated they should have been—with the question of the boundary, which they had shown themselves utterly incapable of dealing with, left unsolved, we had Great Britain to look to, which is bound by every principle of justice and right to Canada, and Canada is in a position to demand that Great Britain shall put that question in a position in which it must be solved. Canada has the right, with the interests she has imperilled, with the obstructions to her trade and the difficulties presented, to insist on that question being solved as all great international questions have to be solved. The United States, however powerful, must be brought to recognize the fact that they are dealing with a country as great and powerful as they, and therefore that question must be submitted to a fair and honourable international arbitration, just as England has, in every instance, submitted the rights and interests she has at stake on this continent and everywhere else to the adjustment of international arbitration. If they were not ready to do that, our Government should have said to them, then we shall adjourn this commission.

But the right hon. gentleman thought that he would have the advantage, and I do not envy him at all. He thought he would have the advantage of saying, when coming to the Parliament of this country, I am very sorry, but I am unable to disclose anything that has taken place, because these negotiations are not terminated. I say that, in justice to Canada, he was bound to terminate the negotiations. When he found he was dealing with parties who were utterly impracticable, he was bound to take the stand of asking the mother country to deal with this question of international law, and have it settled as all such questions are bound to be settled, and he should then have come to the Parliament of Canada and said: All my sunny ways have failed; I hoped that I would have had to deal with a generous and magnanimous people who, when they found I was ready to give all that I had at their bidding, would make some slight return, but we have failed in obtaining an adjustment of any of these questions, and I must be in a position to legislate for Canadians, as they have a right to expect they should be legislated for.

The New York "Times" does not quite accept the version given by my right hon. friend and Mr. Fairbanks. The New York "Times," as quoted in the "Globe" on the 25th February, says that the Alaska boundary is not the real point of contention, but the McKinleyism of the American Commission, and I do not think that my right hon. friend would like very much to contradict that statement. The New York "Times" says:

The lumber duties, the coal duties and the arrangements for reciprocal trade are known to be subjects upon which the two commissions disagreed, and so far as the public is informed, their differences have never been adjusted.

My right hon. friend's colleague, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wrote on the 3rd of January a letter to a friend of his in Winnipeg, a member of the Corn Exchange, a letter which is published in the newspapers:

We, ourselves, at the present moment are in a state of uncertainty as to what the ultimate outcome will be.

And, no doubt, that was the position of matters when it was found that the Alaska boundary was about the best question they had to agree to disagree upon.

Having said so much, I feel it my duty to the right hon. gentleman and to the House to state frankly, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite, the policy that we would propose, the policy that we would be prepared to sustain hon. gentlemen opposite in adopting, and the policy which, if they do not adopt it, we shall feel it our duty to press upon the people as the best calculated to advance the interests of the country. The cardinal principle of that policy is the principle of protection, principle that has been very largely acted upon by hon. gentlemen opposite. We go with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) on that point. We want to retain such protection as is given to Canadian industries and to repair the errors—not very serious, perhaps, but still errors—made by hon. gentlemen opposite in this respect. Wherever they have departed from our policy they have made a mistake. Let me advise hon. gentlemen opposite to cling to the life-buoy of the National Policy. It has held your heads above water; you would have been submerged long ago; you would have been driven from that part of the House if you had not clung with the tenacity of death to that life-buoy. That is the first principle—protection. Wherever there is a Canadian industry that fair and legitimate protection will enable to flourish, give it protection and we will support you. Then, there is the Fast Atlantic Service. I have already boldly challenged any gentleman on the other side to give a single instance in which this Government has done anything that has promoted the prosperity of Canada. I suggest the Fast Atlantic Service as one thing that they were compelled by the force of public opinion to profess to believe in and which they have, by their utter incapacity to deal with it in a business like manner, prevented from being carried into operation. Otherwise, to-day, we should have been in the enjoyment of it. When we went out of office we were in possession of a signed contract with Messrs. Allan, whose wealth and experience placed beyond doubt the excellent manner in which the service would be carried out; and when the late Governor General declined to sign the Order in Council which would enable us to close the contract, I wrote to my right hon. friend a letter so that, by getting that promptly done on his accession to office, he would save two years in securing that important service. Where are we to-day? Why, I am afraid we are further away from the Fast Atlantic Service than ever before. And why? The money was provided. Parliament had placed upon the Statute-books an Act granting $750,000 a year for the Fast Atlantic Service, authorizing the Government to pay that sum to the contractors who would accomplish it. Finding, when I was on the other side of the water, holding the office of High Commissioner, that it was impossible to secure that service for the subsidy offered, I went to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and, after the fullest examination, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain agreed to stand in with Canada in the matter. He so completely recognized the Imperial as well as the Colonial importance of this great work that he agreed, on behalf of the Imperial Government to bear one-third the cost. He agreed that if Canada had to pay £150,000 he would ask the Imperial Parliament to supplement it with £75,000. Thus, a little over a million dollars was provided to the hand of the leader of the present Canadian Government. And why has the work not been done? Because the right hon. gentleman refused, in the first place to accept the contract coming from the best possible source; and, in the second place, because he has been sending one of his colleagues, who is supposed to have the matter in hand, backwards and forwards—whether he wanted to keep him out of Canada I do not know; but unless that hon. gentleman finds an unsinkable ship, which I believe he is now searching for, he will I fear disappear altogether. This gentleman who has been specially charged with the work of bringing about the completion of this great project is the same gentleman who, after he became a member of this Government, went before the Board of Trade of Quebec and denounced the Fast Atlantic Service. I do not think that is the way to accomplish this work. What did the Fast Service, as we had arranged it, provide? Not only would it have put us in most easy and rapid communication with the mother country, not only would it have enabled Canada to deliver the mails in the city of New York twenty hours earlier than they could be delivered by a direct line from Southampton to New York—this advantage being given us by our geographical position—but it would have brought a tide of travel and traffic through this country that would not otherwise come to it. More than that, the contractors were obliged to provide most ample cold storage at any time when demanded by the Government. What did that mean? It meant an increase in the value to the whole farming population of Canada of their meat, eggs, butter, fruit and all other perishable articles. A system of cold storage has enabled Australasia to triumph over tens of thousands of miles of distance, to triumph over an equatorial climate and to surpass Canada in the butter markets of Great Britain. The cold storage system has enabled the United States, which have established depots in various sections of the country, with cold storage cars and ample cold storage in their Atlantic steamers, to put on the tables of the people of England throughout Great Britain all these articles in prime condition and at the earliest possible moment. There is not a farmer, not a man engaged in agricultural pursuits of any kind but would have been greatly enriched by the adoption of that service. Where is it to-day? I was glad to see that the Board of Trade of Quebec had memorialized my right hon. friend and begged him to accept the proposition which the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway offered the other day. According to this memorial the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway—in his speech which was delivered before the Quebec Board of Trade and a large assemblage of people, declared that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were anxious to see this work done. They were willing that any one should do it, willing to join any person in order to accomplish it, but, if there was nobody else, they were willing to take it up and put on a fast service of a complete and efficient character for the million dollars which, I say, was provided to the hand of the leader of the Government before we left office. Not an hour should be lost. Already we have lost two years in this most important matter, and I trust that no more time will be lost, but that the subject will be taken up and dealt with vigorously.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Well, take another question. Those who have studied the question, are perfectly well aware that the policy to which the Minister of Finance obtained the unanimous approval of this House last year ought now to be put into operation. My hon. friend was good enough to consult me, as I would have consulted him under similar circumstances, as to how this side of the House would regard the imposition of an export duty upon logs, spruce, pulp-wood and nickle ore; and I stated to my hon. friend at once, that, so far as I was concerned—and I thought that would also be the opinion of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—we would be prepared to support that policy. He obtained the power; he has got it on the Statute-book to-day. Now, Sir, the "Globe" newspaper, the organ of the present Government, has declared that all these proposals to have fair and friendly relations with the United States have failed—not that they are hung up, but they use the word "vetoed"—now that they are vetoed, they call upon the Government to adopt a Canadian policy, and to put an export duty on these articles in the interests of Canada. What is our position? We are shut out of the United States by the imposition of enormous duties upon the pine lumber that they require, and that the interests of their people call for in the strongest manner? What is our position? Why, Sir, I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite have ever read the information contained in two octavo volumes published by the Senate of the United States in 1890. These two volumes are replete with evidence, mark you Mr. Speaker, the sworn testimony of many witnesses. The Senate of the United States appointed a commission, who, under oath, traversed the whole country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, all along the boundary, from Esquimalt, in British Columbia, and Vancouver to Prince Edward Island. They took the testimony of the best men and the ablest experts in that country. Sir, if any man who is proud of his country, wants to know what position Canada occupies, he has only to read that sworn testimony. What did they say on the Pacific coast? They said, at San Francisco, at Seattle, and all those places: Why, your proposal to have reciprocity with Canada would kill us. We have not a pound of bituminous coal on the Pacific coast: we are depending upon Nansimo. So superior is the lumber of the forests of British Columbia that free trade in lumber would close down every mill on the Pacific coast, because we cannot begin to compete with Canada. And so all along the line. They found that we had coal both on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast. They found that we had forests far transcending in importance anything that the United States possessed. Every man who has studied this question, knows right well that within a comparatively few years the United States will be dependent for their lumber upon these magnificent forests of Canada, covering such an enormous extent of country. Take the question of the fisheries. At the international tribunal held in Halifax in which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took part, he is aware that, after all the sworn testimony that could be obtained from the highest experts in the United States, that commission declared that the value of the fisheries of Canada, over and above the right to enter all our fish free in the markets of the United States, was $5,500,000 for twelve years of use. Then, take the question of agriculture, and look at the condition of things in the two countries. In the United States the population has almost overtaken the consumption, and will at no distant day overtake it. One of the highest authorities in the United States, who had been twenty years consul at Winnipeg, declared that north of the boundary line were three-fourths of the remaining uncultivated wheat fields of North America. Take the question of minerals. Why, with the boundless wealth of British Columbia, every one knows, that all we have to do to get fair consideration from the United States is to adopt their mining laws. That is not retaliation. There is no retaliation in one country adopting the legislation of another country. It is said that imitation is the sincerest flattery; and you simply say: We have such a high opinion of your wisdom in making laws that we will make a copy of your laws and apply them to yourselves, as you apply them to us. What would be the result? Why, Sir, we know that in these rich mining districts, the Rossland district, the Slocan district and the Boundary district, which are to-day attracting the attention of the civilized world, gigantic fortunes have been made by American citizens, just as they are now making them in the Canadian Yukon country. So I say that we occupy a position to-day that enables us to say to them: We will adopt your laws, and you must give to every Canadian in the United States precisely the same advantage that we give to Americans in Canada. If we did this, their laws would be swept from their statute-books in a month or as soon as they could pass the necessary legislation. I ventured to say here, a year ago, that our true policy was to adopt their mining laws; and what was the result? I pointed out, at the opening of the session last year, that their eagerness to take advantage of the Yukon gold fields afforded us a good opportunity to obtain from the United States fair and just consideration for our own people, and within one month after I made that statement upon the floor of this House—I do not know whether it was proper hoc or post hoc, but I merely state the fact, that within a month after that statement was made, a Bill was introduced into Congress giving Canadians on the other side of the boundary in Alaska the same privileges that Americans had on the Canadian side, in the Yukon country. And so, I say that in the interest of Canada not an hour should be lost; in my judgment, with regard to the Alien Labour law, with regard to the mining laws, and with regard to everything that touches the comity of the two peoples, we should simply say to those gentlemen: We are anxious to make the most friendly, the most fair and just arrangement that can be made, but what you mete out to us you must expect to receive in return. We are bound to protect the interests of Canadian citizens on this side of the border, just as much as you are bound to protect the interests of American citizens on your side of the border.

Now, take the question of the iron policy of 1887. I have been occasionally taunted with the failure of that iron policy, but it is only by gentlemen who do not know anything about the subject. Where would be the iron trade of Canada but for the legislation of 1887? That policy would have accomplished everything that the most sanguine expected from it, had it not been for that which no man at that day could foresee, namely, that in a few years pig iron would fall to half its then value. I am glad to see that the Legislature of Nova Scotia is moving in this matter, for I believe there never was a time in the history of Canada when there was such a magnificent opportunity as there is at the present moment for the adoption of a comprehensive policy for the production of iron in this country, to give employment and to create, I may say, a world-wide industry. So important do I consider this matter that I ventured to approach the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Customs, and put before them the evidence that if they would by Order in Council carry out the policy they had committed themselves to in regard to the extension of the bounty system on iron, capital could be obtained to set going at the earliest possible moment gigantic iron works in Canada that would revolutionize the whole of that industry. I am glad to say that the Nova Scotia legislature is approaching that subject, and I trust this Government will follow that up by such an extension of the policy to which not only the late Government, but the present Government are committed, as will build up a great iron industry in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word upon the subject of inter-Imperial preferential trade. It is very well known that this is a matter upon which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has committed himself in the strongest possible way. I do not intend now to recriminate, I do not intend to refer to any question of violated pledges or anything of that kind, because I am sincerely anxious to promote a question that I believe lies at the very foundation of national progress in Canada, and which will give an impetus to our great agricultural community which cannot possibly be overrated. My right hon. friend and several members on the other side of the House have said: Well, your inter-Imperial preferential trade is all very well, but it is impossible to obtain. I want to draw their attention to the fact that within a few weeks we have evidence of the most conclusive character that there never was a time in the history of our country when the Government had such an opportunity of securing a great boon in the interests of the people on that very question. I was laughed to scorn when I advocated the adoption of a small duty upon corn and upon other products, and I was told that England never would be induced for a single moment to do anything of the kind, so that I was expending my efforts in vain. I again appeal to my right hon. friend now, in view of the statement in the London "Times" a few days ago, urging the British Government of the present day to grapple at once practically with the great question of placing the taxation of the country upon a proper basis by the imposition of duties upon wheat and sugar. Therefore, on the very highest authority we have it, that the case is placed in such a position that all that is necessary is active and zealous co-operation on the part of the Canadian Government to accomplish, at no distant date, this great object. I dare say you will remember that it was only a short time ago that a very illustrious personage—I thought at the time a little out of order—gave his opinion to the public in the city of Toronto to the effect that it was quite impossible that countervailing duties on sugar in England could ever be entertained. But, Sir, we find now that Lord George Hamilton, the Secretary of State for India, says that the Government propose—and the Indian Government can do nothing without the sanction of the Imperial Government—propose to consent to an Order in Council passed by the legislative council in India, which imposes countervailing duties on all sugars that come into India in competition with their own. So the whole case is given up, and all we have to do is to stand shoulder to shoulder and to ask the British Government, which at an early date will impose duty upon corn and other products, to leave the colonies in the enjoyment of that advantage they now possess of having free ingress to the British markets, so that the duties, if applied, might extend only to foreign countries. I press that policy as one of great importance on the right hon. gentleman and his friends.

I intend now to say a word upon the question of the Pacific cable, and I would like to ask my right hon. friend in what position that question is to-day? When I attained office, one of my first acts was to appoint Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald Smith, now Lord Strathcona, in conjunction with Mr. Fleming, now Sir Sanford Fleming, as an expert, to go to England to represent Canada at the cable conference. That was caused by the fact that I went at the head of a deputation composed of all the agents general of the colonies to press upon Mr. Chamberlain the appointment of a commission upon the subject of a Pacific cable. Mr. Chamberlain, who is known to be a man of great financial ability and commercial experience, on that occasion stated that having examined the subject thoroughly, he had come to the conclusion that it involved no responsibility whatever, because he believed that the cable would pay for itself, and that in fact, at no distant date, instead of it being a charge upon the public revenue, it would be a source of income. I consequently had no hesitation in authorizing the commissioners representing Canada to agree if they could not get better terms, to be responsible for one-third of the cost of establishing the Pacific cable. This cable would make Canada a great highway, not only with China and Japan and all the east, but also with Australia, and in that way would immensely promote trade. As a matter of Imperial importance, as a matter of strengthening the defences of the Empire, it is impossible to overrate it, and when we satisfied ourselves that practically no monetary responsibility would be involved, I did not hesitate to give the Canadian commissioners the authority I have referred to. Well, this matter has hung fire. The right hon. gentleman will correct me if he has been misrepresented, but in the "Standard" newspaper, which is one of the most reliable organs of the British Government, I find it stated that when the Pacific cable was proposed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the gentleman who took exception to it was my right hon. friend the Premier of Canada. It was stated that he (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) declared that he altogether failed to give his confidence to the calculations that had been made in reference to the scheme by the promoter, and that could refer to no person, I take it, except Sir Sanford Fleming. Sir Sanford Fleming has given years of his life to the study of this important question, and when his views were subjected to the most crucial test any expert's views could be subjected to, tenders being asked from eminent cable constructors for the laying and maintenance of the cable it was found that Sir Sanford Fleming had overrated the cost. Therefore I read with astonishment the cold water that was thrown on this project by my right hon. friend when he stated that he altogether distrusted these calculations as far as they have gone. I hope he has had an opportunity of revising this opinion, and that that important work will at no distant date be undertaken.

Now, Sir, I want to refer to another subject which at this moment is attracting a good deal of attention, and which, unfortunately, by the mover and seconder of the Address, so far as I was able to follow them, appears to have been entirely overlooked, and that is the plebiscite. I am not very much surprised that those hon. gentlemen should have given the go-by to that very delicate subject; but my right hon. friend will remember that a year ago, when this plebiscite was proposed, I ventured to ask him what he intended to do in case a plebiscite was taken. I ventured to express the opinion that the leader of the House and of the Government, before committing the people of this country to an expenditure of a quarter of a million of money—I may overstate the cost, but we will assume that it will be something like that—should have given some indication of the course he intended to pursue. I do not intend at this time to go into the question whether that is an un-English mode of taking public opinion or not; but I say that when the right hon. leader of the House refused to give the slightest indication of what course in any event he would pursue, he struck a deadly blow at the interests of the temperance party in Canada; and I will show you my grounds for making that statement. Every person knows that no party, however powerful and influential, can roll up a great vote on any question without the expenditure of a vast amount of labour and a very considerable amount of money. The necessary expenditure connected with agitating the country upon a question of that kind is very great. I did not ask my right hon. friend to say what he would do if there was a bare majority; but I said, suppose there is a great majority, a two-thirds majority, what will you do? My right hon. friend simply said: "After the plebiscite is taken I will then say what I will do." A position more unfair to the temperance people of this country could not have been taken than that. What is the result? Why, Sir, take an enthusiastic supporter of temperance—a man who believed it was his duty to do everything he could to accomplish the object in view. When he was approached to spend his time and money to promote the object in view, what did he say? "What is the good? The Prime Minister has virtually told us, as he told the deputation who went to see him on the subject, that it would entail an immense amount of direct taxation, and it is quite evident there will be no result." These gentlemen were utterly disheartened. But not only did the Prime Minister refuse to give this House and the people of this country the slightest indication of what he would do in any event, but when, in addition to that, I found the leading members of his Government spreading themselves over the country in the province of Quebec to denounce the plebiscite, and to induce the people to vote it down and prevent it having an effect, I came to the conclusion that it was a shameless imposition upon the temperance people of Canada to lead them to hope that anything could result from this plebiscite except the disappointment that is now stirring the hearts of that great and most important section of this community from one end of the country to the other.

Now, Sir, I want to refer for a few moments to another subject that is introduced in the Address, and that is the Imperial penny postage. I do not intend to go into any very elaborate discussion of that question; but I say this in the outset, that there is no man in Canada who is prouder than I am to be able to claim anything for Canada that it has accomplished. There is no man in Canada more ready than I am to give the most ample meed of praise to any man, I care not on what side of politics he is or what position he occupies in this House, for anything he accomplishes in the interest of Canada. But, I confess, I do deplore and feel humiliated when I find gentlemen in this House and their friends undertaking to put forward claims for them that have no solid foundation in fact. When I find claims made by hon. gentlemen that they have accomplished this or that or the other, which they know right well is the work of other men, and that they are endeavouring to reap where other men have sown, I have no respect for a course of that kind. Now, Sir, I notice in this celebrated speech of my right hon. friend in Montreal to which I have already alluded, this clause:

There is another reform: we have diminished the postal tariff, and the rate has now been reduced to two cents. This is a small thing in itself, yet it represents hundreds of thousands of dollars in the pockets of the people of Canada. We have established that rate for the whole British Empire.

Why, Sir, what does the hon. gentleman mean? We—the Government of Canada—establish the postal rate for the whole British Empire? Why, Sir, it is as unfounded in fact as the statement that "we" got the treaties denounced. And what does he mean by saying that this represents hundreds of thousands of dollars in the pockets of the people of Canada? Hundreds of thousands of dollars in the people's pockets? Is not the postal service to be paid for to-day as it was paid for yesterday? Does anybody suppose that because you transfer the cost, you can make anything free? You could remove the whole postal charge altogether, yet everybody knows that the postal revenue did not then and does not now pay the cost of the service. Everybody knows that that service is a heavy charge on the people of Canada, as it was under the three-cent rate; and to say under these circumstances that it represents hundreds of thousands of dollars in the pockets of the people is to make a statement which I think my right hon. friend will find it very difficult to sustain. But, Sir, what does "we" mean? Do the Government expect to extend the rate to the whole Empire? Does the whole Empire get it now? The hon. gentleman knows that the whole continent of Australasia, including New Zealand, as well as South Africa have not got it to-day ; and yet " we " have given it to the whole Empire. I am doing my right hon. friend the greatest service when I am calling his attention to these extravagances of language that cannot be sustained.

If the Imperial postage is a matter of great Imperial concern, its inauguration is not due to my hon. friend nor any of the " We's " about him. The hon. gentleman ought to know that Mr. Henniker-Heaton, the member for Canterbury, in England, spent twelve years of his life, night and day, fighting for this question of Imperial penny postage throughout the Empire. And for this little " We " to step in and wipe out Mr. Henniker-Heaton is an outrageous piece of presumption in contradiction with all the facts. Mr. Henniker-Heaton, after fighting all the officials of the Post Office Department with a vigour and determination that few men in any parliament have ever exhibited in any country of the world, succeeded, after long years, in convincing one of the ablest men in the United Kingdom that he was right. That man was the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, a gentleman who, when he becomes convinced, does not take very long to give expression to his convictions. What did Mr. Chamberlain say to my right hon. friend and the other premiers, when assembled in London during the Jubilee ? He said :

I should also mention the desire which is widely felt, and which I share, for an improved postal communication with the colonies. I believe the matter entirely rests with the colonies themselves, and they have revenue difficulties in the matter which have hitherto prevented our coming to any conclusion ; but I confess that I think one of the first things to bind together the sister nations is to have the readiest and easiest possible communication between the several units, and as far as this country is concerned, I believe we are quite ready to make any sacrifice that may be required in order to secure a universal penny post throughout the Empire.

What did my right hon. friend say to that proposal ? Not a word. Did he second it ? Did he say that Canada must prepare to adopt it ? Not at all. He gave no support to the proposition whatever. But his friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), when he found these other gentlemen, his colleagues, coming back bedizined with all kinds of decorations, began to think it was time for him to look out for himself. Then " I. William Mulock " issued the very wonderful despatch which will not soon be forgotten. The revenue of New South Wales is $45,993,523 a year ; but that colony was too poor to do what we had done, and declined distinctly to do it. That great colony, New South Wales, with nearly $46,000,000 revenue, was not rich enough to adopt this Imperial penny postage. The colony of Victoria, with a revenue of over $30,000,000, was too poor to adopt it. The colony of New Zealand, with a revenue of $26,250,000, was too poor, and declined distinctly, on the ground that it could not afford this luxury of an Imperial penny postage. The colony of the Cape of Good Hope, with a revenue of $35,750,000 per annum, was also too poor ; and although that colony seconded the resolution, it refused to carry out the scheme unless England would bear a part of the expense. That is the position taken by these colonies.

Now, what has happened ? I have been mortified, in the last degree, to find Canadians so wanting in intelligence as to put forward a claim on the part of the Postmaster General of Canada (Mr. Mulock), that he it was who accomplished this scheme of Imperial penny postage. I do not hesitate to say, that if any public man in the Government of England had done what the Postmaster General of Canada did, he would have ceased to be a member of the Government the next day, and would never have been heard of again in connection with the post office or anything else. To find this man deified and held up as the one who has accomplished this Imperial penny postage for the whole British Empire is a reproach to the intelligence of Canadians. What did our Postmaster General do ? He published, it appears, without the authority of an Order in Council—I see a smile pervading the countenances of his colleagues at my exempting them from the mortification of having been guilty of knowing what their colleague was doing—his ukase, " I, William Mulock," by which he proclaimed to the world that, from such a day, every letter of an ounce weight should go to any part of the British Empire with a three-cent postage stamp on it. As soon as Her Majesty's Government became aware of that proclamation, our Postmaster General was told that he did not know what he was doing. He was told that he had no such power, that the thing was altogether beyond the control of the Government of Canada, and that he could not do anything of the sort. Thereupon, out came another proclamation, cancelling the first one until further orders, and declaring that all letters would require five cents per ounce postage instead of three cents per ounce. What was the result ? The Postmaster General found himself in this position, that every man who received one of these letters bearing a three-cent stamp, had to pay a fine of fourteen cents. He had to pay seven cents additional postage to bring it up to ten cents per ounce, and then, as short postage was punished by a fine, every man had to pay fourteen cents. Then, to extricate himself from this difficulty, the Postmaster General sent out instructions to his officials all through Canada, to do what they had no right to do—to put their hands into the consolidated revenue and make good the difference out of that fund. To tell me that the Postmaster General of Canada has got the postal revenue of this country to make ducks and drakes of as he pleases—the thing is monstrous. In violation of law and every principle of parliamentary government, he instructed his officials to do that which, if they did it without instructions, would be petty larceny, and nothing else. What is his reply to that? He said, the other day, that the British Government had done the same thing. But how the British Government could have done the same thing, when they never committed themselves to any such folly, is beyond comprehension. But, he added, they told me to do that. That is worse still. In this year of our Lord, is it possible that a Canadian Minister shall be instructed by the British Government when to take money out of the consolidated revenue and spend it without authority? It is one of the most monstrous propositions I have ever heard. Then, he had another excuse, and it is one which had been made before on a very interesting occasion—the excuse that it was a very little one; it was only $91.50. And this is the kind of man that is held up to the world as the founder of the Imperial penny postage system, to the utter obliteration of Sir Henniker-Heaton and the other men who have devoted years of efforts to this object long before our Postmaster General ever thought of it. But the proposition itself did not come from "I, William Mullock," at all. I was in London at the time, and you will find in the "Daily Chronicle," the organ of the Liberal party in London, the statement, that at the first meeting Sir David Tennant made the proposition for penny postage. The proposal of the hon. Postmaster General of Canada was not that at all. His proposal was, to send for three cents an ounce letters to every part of the British Empire. But no such thing exists to-day. No such proposal was heard of on that occasion. But Sir David Tennant's proposal at the first meeting was, that Imperial penny postage should be adopted, and he represented the Cape of Good Hope. Then our Postmaster General, not willing to lose the opportunity, gave notice that he would move that at the next meeting, and did so. The suggestion, however, was not his, but that of Sir David Tennant. And it was adopted. As to the challenge I have made of the accuracy of the statement with regard to the British Government, I am willing to make an apology if the Postmaster General will lay on the Table of this House any evidence that the British Government did anything of the kind he suggests, or that in the course he took he acted under the instructions of the British Government. He did act under their instructions in cancelling his absurd proclamation, but that is all. I do not now discuss the question whether, for the sake of a United Empire, this reduction might not be made, but I say it was not done by Canada. We did not move in it originally nor did my right hon. friend second it when it was brought before him by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. It was an afterthought, and when the figures are analysed it will be found that, instead of hundreds of thousands being in the pockets of the people, a million dollars per annum will be taken out of the pockets of the people to cover the deficit. When so rich a colony as New South Wales with a revenue of about $46,000,000, says it is too expensive for them to bear it, we may be rich enough to bear these things and so cover ourselves with glory; but I doubt if the people of Canada will be grateful when they find the heavy tax imposed for this service. I would call the attention of the Postmaster General to one of the gravest scandals of the present day, and that is the postal communication with the Yukon. While he has thus reduced the revenue of the post office, the people of that country have been suffering the greatest hardships and the most cruel injustice because of the scandalous and disgraceful state of the postal arrangements. A correspondent in the Victoria "Colonist" says, March, 1899, he has not had a letter in four months, while his father, to whom the letter is written, says, that he has posted him letters at intervals of two weeks ever since his son has been absent. Then the "Globe's" special correspondent says:

The incoming mail service continues to be marked by its infrequency. With the exception of a small batch of letters, chiefly delayed summer mail, which arrived here on December 6th, and a bag of purely official matter which came in on January 1st, no mail has reached Dawson from the outside since September last. * * * This winter there are hundreds of people anxiously looking for business letters, letters that might save fortunes.

And yet this is the distinguished Postmaster General who has made Canada ridiculous in the eyes of the world by declaring that "We hold a vaster Empire than has been." Why, if Great Britain herself had said that, she would have made herself the butt of endless ridicule. For Canada to say it—"we hold"—by the way, that word "we" seems to be completely turning the heads of gentlemen on the other side. When did Canada "hold a vaster Empire than has been." We are all proud to know that Canada is the brightest gem in the Imperial diadem, we are glad to know that there is no section of this great Empire that commands more consideration than Canada does to-day. But why should we make ourselves ridiculous? I will not say as Goldwin Smith in his "Bystander" letters says that it is a "painted lie," but I protest against it. I ask as a personal favour, I ask as a matter due to the feelings of the people of Canada, that this ridiculous post office stamp be done away with. "Punch" had a most ludicrous comment upon it. It gave half a dozen emblems, together with mottoes suitable for England and other countries. They thought it appropriate that England should say "We have the tallest policeman in the world." I shall not attempt to say what France was supposed to say—my right hon. friend could do it better justice than I. The motto for United States emblem was "We can lick all creation." I can only say that the hon. Postmaster General has made all Canadians, unless they have a brush and water handy, lick the back of all creation in order to get a stamp stuck on a letter.

I have just a word or two to say with reference to a statement in the press that the Government are about to provide a telegraph service to the Yukon country. I am glad to see the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) in his place, because I happened, when in London, to see one or two letters written over the hon. gentleman's signature bearing on this subject, which letters appears to me to conflict with the statement that we were about to undertake the construction of a telegraph line. I found in the "Financial Times" of December 14th, 1898, a letter signed "A. G. Blair," which I will not read in extenso, though it is very interesting, but only that which is immediately pertinent to the question. The "Financial Times" says: "This was made clear by the following letter, addressed last October by Mr. Blair, the Canadian Minister of Railways and Telegraphs, to the gentleman who was arranging the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company." The letter is dated 6th October, 1898, and says, in part:

I told this gentleman very frankly that my department had an understanding with you, and that we were giving you the preference, at least until we were satisfied that you were delaying in pushing the work unduly, and I said that upon that point we would be in no position to form an opinion till next spring.

Then there is another letter also dated 6th October, 1898:

I am very much pleased indeed to learn that it is your intention, representing the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company (Limited), to proceed without unnecessary delay with the construction of the telegraph line from the coast into Dawson City, to be followed thereafter with reasonable despatch by the laying of a cable or cables from Vancouver to the point of connection with the land line.

I draw attention to these letters because I cannot understand, how, as there are two companys, both, I believe, floated in London for the express purpose of carrying out this work, and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had declared that he was ready to give the preference to one company, the Government could undertake the construction without other authority.

I now come to a subject that I should fail in my duty to this House and to the country if I did not draw attention to, and that is something that does not appear in the Speech. I can hardly say that it does not appear in the Speech, because there is a clause that has such a close relation to it that I suppose it may be held to be inclusive. But I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the only proposition that is made to this House is for a re-arrangement of the electoral districts. Now,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I want to ask my right hon. friend where he gets the authority for a re-arrangement of the electoral districts. Canada has existed for some thirty-two years, and I believe I am correct in saying that in that period it has been regarded as a part of the constitution of Canada that a general arrangement of the electoral districts can only take place at a stated period, and that is after a decennial census. Now, I would like to know from my right hon. friend where he finds authority for this fresh innovation of the constitution of Canada—for I regard it as nothing else. I say it is without precedent that this House, called at this late period of the year, at a period most inconvenient for hon. gentlemen to remain here at any great length of time, should be placed in a position to have to deal with such a measure as this, a measure that must keep us here for a very long period. What is the object? what is the necessity? I have stated that the constitution provides for a re-arrangement of the electoral districts only after a decennial census; and since Canada was confederated there has never been anything but a temporary re-adjustment of some particular locality owing to some circumstances which had occurred, as an exception to that rule. Therefore, I challenge the right of the hon. gentleman to adopt such a course. What is the meaning of it? We went to the country in 1896, and the right hon. gentleman, by means to which I have already alluded, secured a majority. Is he afraid to go back to that constituency? He boasts of carrying the by-elections. It is too late to-night to go into the question of by-elections, for I think I could enlighten the House a little as to the way by-elections are carried. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works with his hands over his face, enjoying the idea of the mode in which by-elections are carried. He has much experience in that manner. Sir, I am afraid that these things indicate that the right hon. gentleman, having obtained improperly a majority in this House, having obtained by means that cannot be repeated, a majority in this House, wants to escape a verdict of that electorate that he represents to-day. Last session we had this precious electoral law, which means handing over to the most unscrupulous and most dishonest manipulation the electoral lists in the various provinces, with the control of the franchise of this independent House of Commons of Canada. It meant that a fair and open contest in the presence of the electorate as it exists to-day and existed in 1896, would fail to give the hon. gentleman a similar success. But it appears that is not enough. Where are you with your electoral law? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that he has kept one pledge, at all events, made to the people of this country, and that was that he would pass a new electoral law. He never kept his pledge. He promised that he would accept the law, pure and simple, as it existed in the various provinces for the Dominion elections, but he made twenty alterations of the most important character, and entirely changed the Act from that which he had led the House to expect he would pass. To-day the hon. gentleman has discovered that owing to the utter incapacity—I say it boldly—of this Government to do anything in a business-like and statesmanlike manner, they find themselves in a hole, and they are trying to find some way out of it. I defy the hon. gentleman to hold a general election in Canada to-day. He has torn the former election law to pieces, but has substituted nothing practical to take its place; and to-day he finds the law is either violated, or is a dead letter throughout the whole of Canada, or else is utterly wanting in all those provisions that are necessary to carry out an election. But it appears that it is not enough to change the franchise to suit him, it is not enough to get the local legislatures to do his work in the various provinces, and now we are to have a redistribution in violation of the constitution, contrary to the principle that the constituencies shall only be adjusted after each decennial census. Why is this proposal interjected now? Here we are in the beginning of the spring, at a time when every member wants a short session, so that he can return to his home, and here is flung down before us this proposal to readjust the boundary of the constituencies. Is the hon. gentleman afraid of the constituencies that sent him here? Is he afraid to repeat the means by which he got here last time? It looks as if the hon. gentleman could only fight a battle with the great Conservative party of Canada with loaded dice, as if he was afraid to challenge the people on that great issue. Sir, we are ready to meet him in the presence of the great electorate of Canada at any hour. If he brings forward this measure there will be a long story before it passes through the House and becomes law. But what is the first step that the hon. gentleman takes in regard to this measure, this gross and palpable violation of the constitution of our country? Why, Sir, he breaks away from all those important negotiations in Washington, and he hies himself up to Montreal to attend a banquet, to proclaim to the people of this country the policy of the Government of Canada upon one of the most vital and important questions that ever was propounded, and that is the destruction of the Canadian constitution in regard to the security that the Senate affords. Now, Sir, what is the hon. gentleman's proposal? A more mad, a more silly, I do not hesitate to say, a more absurd proposal never emanated from the mouth of man. You may search the civilized world to-day where liberal institutions exist, and I defy you to find a single case in which so monstrous, so absurd, so utterly and so absolutely untenable a proposal was ever made as this proposal to which the hon. gentleman has committed himself in Montreal. He says:

The reform we propose is this: When there is a conflict between the Senate and the popular House, then there should be a general vote and the majority should carry. That, gentlemen, is the reform which we have to propose to the people of Canada.

Sir, what does that mean? It means to tear up from the very foundation the confederation of Canada. It means to take out the key-stone of the arch upon which that confederation was built, and to let the whole thing topple down. I see that the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) is amused; but let me draw his attention to what has happened. What was the position of Old Canada when George Brown, the great leader of the Liberal party—a man who would suffer martyrdom before he would commit himself to such a monstrous proposition as this—when George Brown, the great leader of the Liberal party, joined hands with Sir John Macdonald to raise Canada from the desperate position she then occupied. As everybody knows, under the then constitution of Canada, Upper Canada and Lower Canada were represented in the Parliament of Canada by an equal number of members. That constitution was formed in 1841, and went into operation in 1842, and Lower Canada had then a much larger population than Upper Canada, and they bitterly complained that they should be forced into a union with Upper Canada and have no more representatives in the legislature than a province with a much smaller population. What happened? A few years afterwards, by reason of immigration, the tables were turned, and Upper Canada had a much larger population than Lower Canada. Then George Brown, the leader of the Liberal party, led a fierce onslaught on the constitution of the country, demanding a change by which they would have representation by population. Lower Canada replied: You denied that principle to us when we were in the majority, and why should you force it upon us now that we are in the minority? Under that condition of things, so closely were the parties balanced, so impossible had government become, neither party having a majority to govern the country, that five new administrations appeared in two years. The country was ruined financially and commercially; no legislation could pass, except as a matter of compromise, and the position of the country was deplorable. What then? In 1864 a conference assembled at Charlottetown for the purpose of forming a legislative union between Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and the Governor General of Old Canada wrote to the governors of the three provinces, asking for the admission of the representatives of the coalition Government of Canada, which had been formed upon the principle of obtaining either the confederation of British North America, or, failing that, to separate Upper and Lower Canada and unite them federally. We received that deputation with open arms; we heard their statements, and when they pointed out to us the deplorable condition in which Canada was, that her 6-per-cent bond securities were forced down to 71, and that the business of the country was paralyzed, we listened sympathetically to their statements. As a result, we adjourned to the city of Quebec, and in October, 1864, there met there thirty-three gentlemen, representing, not one party nor one province, but representing both parties in Upper Canada, Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Both parties were represented from every province except Newfoundland, which does not come into the question, as it does not form a part of the confederation. At the Quebec Conference we came to the conclusion, after long and careful consideration, that it was our duty, as citizens of British North America, as men who wanted to preserve intact the glorious British institutions we possess, to consider this question of the union of British North America. And, Sir, what was the very key-stone of that union? I will read the statement of the great leader of the Liberal party of that day, and I believe it will be accepted here as absolute evidence that without that principle being embodied into the confederation of Canada, no union could be accomplished. He said:

The very essence of our compact is that the union shall be federal and not legislative. Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give us representation by population in the Lower House on the express condition that they shall have equality in the Upper House. On no other condition could we have advanced a step; and, for my part, I am quite willing they should have it. In maintaining the existing sectional boundaries, and handing over the control of local matters, to local bodies, we recognize, to a certain extent, a diversity of interests, and it is quite natural that the protection for those interests, by equality in the Upper Chamber, should be demanded by the less numerous provinces.

Mr. Speaker, to-day I speak, not only in the presence of this House, but of the country, when I say that no union, no confederation could have been achieved except upon the principle that representation by population in the House of Commons should be safeguarded by an independent Senate, whose members were nominated by the Crown for life, and in which Quebec would have twenty-four members, the same as Ontario, whose population was much larger, and Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island should have twenty-four Senators also, although their population was much smaller than even that of Quebec. What is this proposal which is now made? It is a proposal to strike at the very foundation of this principle of confederation. I brand every man in the great province of Ontario who would support such a proposition, as guilty—not of treason to his country, because it may suit Ontario—but I brand him as guilty of the worst description of bad faith in going back upon the pledge under which the province of Quebec and the smaller provinces were induced to enter into this confederation. I am not surprised that the First Minister was obliged, in company with his friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), to hie himself away to Quebec to dragoon the leader of that province into giving support to such a proposition. They found, after all their communications had failed, that the Legislature of Quebec was about to rise without giving them support in this matter. And why? Because there is not an intelligent man in the province of Quebec—and I say it fearlessly—who knows what he is doing, who recognizes what this project would be, that does not know that by supporting it he is cutting the throat of his province.

I feel, Sir, that now, in the last years—I might almost say in the last months, or hours—of my life, I would be only too glad to be exempt from the labour and difficulty which such work involves; but I feel that I would be faithless to the Crown, faithless to Canada, faithless to this great Empire to which we belong, if I did not consecrate every hour of my life to meeting on the threshold this dire attempt to subvert the very foundations of this Canadian Confederation. I have not a knowledge of the French language; but, Sir, I will make it my business to visit every part of the province of Quebec, and, with the assistance of my able friends and compatriots on this side of the House, I shall be prepared to meet the Minister of Public Works or the Prime Minister of this Government, and let it be fairly debated in the presence of intelligent men, whether Sir George E. Cartier, Sir Etienne Taché, Sir Hector Langevin, would not have burned their hands off in the fire before they would have assented to a confederation on any such principle. I do not hesitate to say that no power could have induced either Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island to have any lot or part in this Confederation if they had supposed that any party which obtained power as this party has obtained power, could, without the due sanction of the people of this country, lay their unholy hands on the ark of confederation itself, and endeavour to destroy that work which I need not say to this House has made of this Dominion of Canada a country of which every Canadian can be proud.

Now, Sir, what is the reason that is not in the Speech? Will the right hon. gentleman tell us why, having come fresh from Washington to announce that this was the policy of his party, he has been prevented from putting it in the Speech, and submitting it as a subject for this House to deal with? The right hon. gentleman knows that before he can take one step towards the subversion of the constitution of Canada in this regard he has to have not only the authority of this House, but the authority of the Senate of Canada. There is not a man sitting in that House who does not hold his position for life under the authority of an Act of the Imperial Parliament; and the Imperial Parliament never was known in its history to go back upon its solemn pledges and declarations as a legislative body. What more? Why, Sir, the unanimous vote of this House and of the Senate of Canada would not accomplish the object unless every province in this Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific that is a constituent part of this confederation, on due notice and after an election, ratified it as well. In 1893 you spoke of a reform of the Senate. Some suggested that the members should be elected by the people and some that they should be elected by the legislatures. You now propose that the relative proportions should be changed, because when the Senate and the House of Commons disagree you propose to turn in the House of Commons to swamp the Senate and to entirely ignore the very basis of security upon which the confederation of this country was built. Well, Sir, what is your excuse? The "Globe" newspaper tells us that the first crime for which the Senate of Canada ought to be beheaded is that it ratified the Canadian Pacific Railway contract. Why, Sir, can anybody imagine a man with the hardihood to say, in the face of the people of this country, that that which has made a nation of Canada—for we were a paper nation without it—that gigantic work which has given us communication from end to end, which has made a great country of Canada, and without which we would be comparatively helpless to-day, was a wrong to Canada? The charge is that too much was given. Let me meet that charge here and now. It is not true—I may say that, Mr. Speaker, when I am talking of the "Globe" at all events. What is the fact? The fact is that when all the subsidies were given—and I give to the right hon. gentleman the testimony of a man whose word he will take as soon as that of any man living, and that is Lord Strathcona—that after all the resources of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with all their subsidies, were exhausted, and the work was likely to break down and collapse in 1884, it was saved in that critical hour by Lord Strathcona pledging every dollar of his private resources to raise money to carry the enterprise through. And then it would have broken down and failed—I do not hesitate to say, because I happen to be in a position to know—had I not been able to come down to this House in the session of 1884 and induce it to make a loan of $30,000,000 over and above everything else that was given. What more? Why, Sir, the "Globe" says that Mr. Blake made a great speech in opposition to this contract. So he did; but he made another great speech out on the coast of British Columbia, when he had the manliness to say that when he had opposed the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he had no conception of what that great western country was.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to follow this subject further than to say that the grounds which the right hon. gentleman gives to the people of Canada for this attempt to subvert one of the most important institutions of the country is the crime the Senate committed in rejecting the Drummond County Railway contract and the Yukon Bill. Let me turn his attention for one moment to these two questions. I do not intend at this hour to go into them at any length; but I will say this, that the statement that is put forward by the "Globe," and also, I think, by the right hon. gentleman, that something of this kind was contemplated in the proposed constitution of Australia, is entirely incorrect. No such proposal as this has ever been dreamed of in any part of the civilized world before. The hon. gentleman, if it is original with him, may have the satisfaction of knowing that no great mind has ever jumped to the same conclusion as he did. But supposing it was the case in Australia; the position there is entirely different. In Australia the legislative councils are now elected by manhood suffrage, the same as the houses of assembly, and it is proposed that the Senate of Australia shall also be elected by manhood suffrage. But is it proposed that when the two Houses differ they shall be turned in to vote together? Not at all. What is proposed in the constitution of Australia is that if there is a deadlock between the Senate and the House of Commons, both Houses shall be dissolved, and after they have come back from the election they will then vote in a common chamber and decide the question. There is no necessity, therefore, for this proposed machinery.

The hon. gentleman knows right well that when the Senate, in the exercise of an imperative duty, rejected the Government railway scheme, all he had to do to make that scheme law was to dissolve the House of Commons and get a majority returned which would pass that bill over again, and thus remove the difficulty, because in that case the British constitution comes into play. Under that constitution, whenever the House of Lords rejects a Bill from the House of Commons, they do it because they do not believe that the promoters of the Bill represent the country. It is then the duty of the Government of the day, if they still insist on the Bill, to dissolve the House, appeal to the country, and get a new House of Commons to pass the same Bill ipsissima verba, and the House of Lords will then accept it without the slightest hesitation. Therefore, as there is to be a dissolution in Australasia and an appeal to the country before a vote is taken, how can any man say that there is any parallel or example to be found in Australia for what is here proposed. That proposal is to take away all the security which the present constitution of Canada gives to the smaller provinces.

I do not intend to detain the House further than to show what are the facts with regard to the Drummond County Railway Bill. Does the right hon. gentleman not know that he has himself confessed that he and his Government were all wrong in that measure, and that the Senate were right? Does he not know that the public records of this country prove that by the rejection of that Bill the Senate of Canada saved something like a million dollars to our people. That is the position, and the right hon. gentleman finds himself hoisted by his own petard. That which he assumes as a ground of complaint against the Senate of Canada is one of the highest claims they have to-day to the confidence of the mass of the people. Sir, what about the Yukon Bill? On that Bill, as the right hon. gentleman knows right well, his Government stands equally condemned by what has subsequently taken place. What has taken place since the House last met? I shall not go into the whole story, because the hour is too late, but he knows that the Minister of Public Works sent one of his ablest officers, Mr. Coste, over that Stikeen route and over the Bennett Lake and White Pass, and what has been the result? Why, his own officer has condemned the Stikeen River route altogether, and declared that under existing circumstances, Dawson City can be reached from Victoria in a few days. Therefore, so far as these measures are concerned, the Senate of Canada enjoys the proud position of knowing that at a most important time, when millions of public property, untold millions almost of public property were at stake, they stepped into the breach and protected the people of this country against measures that are denounced by the Government's own officers, and against a Government which, if it dared to dissolve the House and appeal to the country on these iniquitous measures, would have been wiped out of existence. Yet the rejection of these measures is the ground now taken for attacking the Senate of Canada.

I must apologize to the House and my right hon. friend opposite for having occupied their time at such length, but I must throw the responsibility on these gentlemen, who have so mismanaged the public affairs of this country as to demand this too lengthy criticism at my hands.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I can assure my hon. friend that I have no fault to find with him, if he has deemed it his duty to occupy the time of this House at such length. Even if our patience has been somewhat taxed, this is a free country, and we can bear with him. At all events, I think it is preferable, at this late hour, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.05.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 21st March, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell, of East Prince, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Though life is short, Mr. Speaker, though time precious, though this session, from unavoidable causes has been called at this somewhat tardy season, though there was every inducement to the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition to come to the point and accelerate, so far as he could, the business for which Parliament has been summoned, yet he took not less than the best part of five hours in offering his comments to the House on the speech of His Excellency at its opening. In this, however, the hon. gentleman was within his rights. He was within his rights, even if prolix and diffuse. There is no rule of this House, no law of man, to prevent redundancy and verbosity. Human nature can only suffer in silence; but if it be true that a day must come some time, when every man has to account for every vain, idle and useless word spoken by him, I pity the fate of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman spoke at great length, but I do not mean that he said much. On the contrary—and in so saying I place myself in the judgment of every man of this House—I aver that in that deluge of words there were more adjective than ideas, more scolding than argument; and if I were to characterize the speech of the hon. gentleman, I think I would not be too severe in saying it was nothing but the vapourings of a much disappointed man seeking wide and far in order, if possible, to find a weak point in the armour of his opponents where he could plant a deadly blow. Looking at my hon. friend yesterday and listening to him, I could not but be reminded of the old blind king of Bohemia on the battlefield of Crecy. He was vallant, no doubt, but he was blind; he rushed about striking right and left, but doing no harm to anybody except to himself.

Sir, notwithstanding my hon. friend's efforts to be vicious, I may be permitted to pay him a compliment. There are many things to admire in him. I admire his juvenile ardour; I admire his quixotic valour, but I cannot admire his logic, discretion or judgment. And so long as his words are not directed by sound judgment, they cannot be more effective here than they were in West Huron. As my hon. friend went on, he refuted himself most completely. When he made a point, or thought he had made one, he most effectively destroyed it in his efforts to make another. Thus he said again and again that what prosperity we are enjoying was due to the tariff of the late Administration, the good old Conservative policy, or as hon. gentlemen opposite like to term it, the National Policy. Yet despite this, he scolded us most vehemently because we had not destroyed the National Policy altogether, the very next moment he approved and applauded us—most sarcastically I must say—for having kept something of it. He told us that there had been depression from 1873 to 1879, but that prosperity had been restored, not, however, by natural causes, but by the action of the policy of the Conservative Administration which had then come into office. And then he stated that there had been depression in a following period, from 1893 to 1896, and then prosperity had been restored—but by natural causes, and not by the policy of this Administration though we had a moment ago claimed the whole merit for the continuance in this Government of the Conservative policy. And so on and so on to the end of the chapter, blowing hot and cold, dry and damp, in the vain effort to make a point against his opponents somehow and somewhere. Now, my hon. friend devoted the best part of the afternoon to prove, not that the country was not prosperous, but that if it was prosperous, the fact was due to the policy of the late Administration. He could not deny that there was prosperity, and to do him justice, that is about the only thing he did not deny. But while admitting that the country was prosperous, more prosperous, perhaps, than it had ever been before, he claimed all the credit for his Administration. My hon. friend is like the Bourbons—he has learned nothing and he has forgotten nothing. Certainly, he has not forgotten his old speeches because the speech of yesterday I have heard, to my certain knowledge, three or four, if not five, times already, even to the quotation from Mr. David A. Wells. But, Sir, what is the use of discussing all that? What is the use of trying to show the cause of prosperity? The prosperity is here. We can claim some share of it, at all events. If the hon. gentleman were in office he would claim the whole of it. Whether the policy was inaugurated at one time or at another, certainly the policy which exists to-day must be held in some measure to account for the present condition of affairs. But, in any case, these are issues that have been passed upon, the people pronounced upon them in 1896; and it is simply idling away the time of serious men to talk about such questions at such length as the hon. gentleman did yesterday. I do not discuss this point with the hon. gentleman, but I accept at once the challenge he threw down yesterday. He defied us, in stentorian tones, to say what we had done for the country. That question he put in every shape possible. He affirmed it, re-affirmed it and re-affirmed it once more, tortured it into almost as many shapes as there are amongst the gerrymandered constituencies of Ontario. Still the end was the same, to declare that we had done nothing at all for the country, but that the whole credit of Canada's present position was due to the hon. gentleman and his policy. Well, Sir, if he had been content to put this question and to indulge in his idle boasts, I would not have much to say, but he added to this challenge language to which we have not been accustomed in this House. Speaking of the Administration, he said we had done nothing whatever, and that in everything we had done we had shown utter and complete incapacity. Well, Sir, I accept the hon. gentleman's challenge, but I will be more courteous to him than he was to us. I will not—at this moment at least—charge him with utter and complete incapacity; I will say, on the contrary, that the hon. gentleman is an extraordinary man, a most marvellous man, a most unique man for conceit. For bragging and loud talking, for waving his oratorical sword, for pulverizing his opponents, the hon. gentleman never had his equal since the days of Ancient Pistol, and I do not believe that even Pistol himself would do better than hold second place to him. It is evident the hon. gentleman does not look at things from the common level of ordinary mortals, he does not look at things from the level of simple reason, but from the mighty altitude to which he has upraised his gigantic but childish vanity. From that altitude he once proclaimed to the world that he had made Canada. Why, there are men on the other side of the House who believe that Sir John Macdonald had something to do with making Canada, who believe that George Brown also contributed his share, who believe that George Etienne Cartier was also instrumental in this great work. But the hon. gentleman dismisses them all with a wave of his hand, and from the altitude he has assumed, he says: I made Canada. And from the same altitude he says: These gentlemen on the other side are incapable. And there is as much truth in the one statement as in the other; and people smile at the one as they smile at the other. I am not in the habit—I think I can claim that, at all events, if nothing else—of blowing my own trumpet, or of sounding my own praises. I aver my total incapacity for this, but I aver that in that regard the capacity of the hon. gentleman is greater than he himself proclaims it, and that is saving a great deal. I have simply this to say; if in the discharge of the duties entrusted to us as advisers to the Crown, as trustees of the people, as administrators of the affairs of this country we had shown as little capacity as was shown by the hon. gentleman when he was in office, I would go and hide myself for very vexation and shame. I accept the challenge of the hon. gentleman. He asks us to say what we have done for the good of the country. I will try to tell him. In doing so I shall be obliged to tell the blunders that he has made—well, no, not all the blunders he has made, but only some of them; for, if I were to undertake to tell all the blunders made by my hon. friend in his official life, I should be obliged to speak at least as long as he spoke yesterday, which—God forbid—I do not intend to do. When the hon. gentleman came back from England to take charge of his party, which had not been led as it should have been led, according to his opinion, when he came back to lead his party to victory, as he hoped, and give them new life, there was a question that had been long before the country, a most dangerous question, which had brought this country almost to the very throes of civil strife. He tried to solve this question by a measure very much after the manner of one whom I will not name, a measure “loud in tone void in reality,” a measure, at the same time violent and weak, a measure in which there was enough of violence to vex, irritate and madden the majority, in which there was not enough of substance to aid the minority. And this is the gentleman who speaking of his opponents dares utter the word incapacity. We dealt with that question. We removed it from the federal arena to the provincial arena, where it belongs, and where it should have been left, there to be dealt with by the citizens of the province in a spirit of mutually honourable concession. I will not show here the character of the hon. gentleman's blunder in this case. It is there before his eyes. He sees it night and day, and he regrets it night and day. There was another question in the settlement of which the hon. gentleman tried his hand when in office in Ottawa, as he had tried it in London, a question to which he referred yesterday, that of preferential trade within the Empire. The hon. gentleman tried once, twice, several times to do something towards establishing preferential trade within the Empire. But he did not succeed in doing anything, because there were two treaties standing against the idea, the treaty with Belgium and the treaty with Germany. So long as those treaties were in existence, the hon. gentleman could not do anything, for the reason that any preference that we gave to the mother land would have to be given to Belgium and Germany also.

Although Canada was ready and anxious to give a preference to the goods and merchandise of the mother land, she was not anxious or ready to extend the same favour to Belgium or to Germany—there were the treaties. Well, Sir, we came into office, and as he said yesterday, we tried our prentice hand, at the job, and in four months our prentice hand did what his master hand could not do with years of labour. Where, Sir, let me show the blunder that he made on the floor of this House at the time we introduced our policy, a blunder which he persisted in up to the very day that the treaties were denounced. He said we never could succeed, that our efforts were vain, that our policy was a mistaken one from the first. Well, the evidence showed he was wrong again there, and even yesterday he would not acknowledge the results which have been accomplished by our preferential tariff. He told us yesterday that our preference of 25 per cent given to Great Britain had during the six months subsequent to the month of August, 1898, only increased our imports from Great Britain by one per cent. That is what he said. True, he averred, some other parties have stated that the increase had really been 6 per cent; but, he went on to say that he admitted, because in that case the last six months of 1898 would have to include the month of July, and the month of July must not be included in the aggregate amount, because the preference was not in operation in the month of July, 1898. But the hon. gentleman ought to know better, and if I were to talk in the way he does, I would make use of some vigorous language to show his ignorance. He knows that the preference was in operation in the month of July, 1898, it was in operation from the 23rd of April, 1897. True, it is, the preference was not then to Great Britain alone, it was also shared by the other nations which had the benefit of the treaties, but it was there all the same, and according to the statement made by the hon. gentleman then, the preference during the last six months of 1898 increased by 6 per cent the goods sold by Great Britain to Canada. Now, Sir, that is something. I grant it is not as much as I would like myself, probably, it will never reach the figure which I would like to see. But we know how difficult it is to change the channels of trade, how difficult it is to bring people to go into new operations. Sir, at all events, I say that a door has been opened, and that trade at this moment is flowing into it. The hon. gentleman minimizes the efforts which we made in that direction. Allow me to quote to him an authority which perhaps he will recognize as valuable, the authority of a man who has done as much for preferential trade as my hon. friend himself, let me quote Colonel Howard Vincent. On the 1st of August last, Colonel Howard Vincent wired to me from the House of Commons, at one minute after midnight, a.m.

Premier of Canada,
Ottawa.

United Empire Trade League in Mother Land, Australia, Africa, India and Oceania, affectionately salutes Greater Britain in Canada, and confidently expresses the undying gratitude of the British race of to-day and for ever to their brothers throughout the vast Dominion, for their patriotic and filial inauguration of the preferential trade between British kith and kin, in this the first minute of freedom from restraining treaties. May this preferential trade grow and grow into the complete commercial federation of British Peoples and Possessions the whole world over, to the honour of our Sovereign, the glory of the English name, and the increasing welfare of all in Britain and Greater Britain.

I will only add one word in this connection, and it is a word which perhaps the hon. gentleman should have remembered more often during his career. The door is open. Does it follow that everything has been done? No, far from it. There still remains a great deal to be done. But the mistake made by my hon. friend at all previous has been that he wanted to do everything at the same time. Sir, in this matter, as in everything else, you must take time, you must move slowly and victory is sure at the end.

Now, Sir, there is another thing we have done, we have established penny postage throughout the British Empire. I need not tell you how great a reform this is, it has made the Empire more compact than it was. The seas are there as of yore, the valleys and the mountains are there, but everybody realizes that hearts are nearer than they were before. Sir, this reform has accomplished this much, it has brought every part of the British Empire to the next door of every home within it. But I will not dilate upon that subject. The hon. gentleman has only one fault to find with it, and that is that he did not accomplish it himself. If he had done it himself, he would have spoken of it yesterday in very different language from the language which he used, he would not have minimized it as he did, nor have attempted to ridicule it. Why, Sir, if he had done it I can imagine the pæans of victory that he would have sung on the floor of this House in favour of the hon. gentleman himself—and, perhaps, of his colleagues also. The hon. gentleman says that neither myself nor my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) are entitled to any credit for it. I claim no credit for it at all: all the credit is due to my hon. friend the Postmaster General. The hon. gentleman stated yesterday that when I was in England, I refused to second a motion in favour of penny postage. That is quite true, I did refuse to do so, and I may put it stronger and say that I refused several times. On different occasions during my visit in England I refused to have anything to do with penny postage, and I will give you the reason. It was not that I was hostile to it, far from that, as the records will show. But we had not been long enough in the saddle to know where we were, we had not been long enough in the saddle to know what we could accomplish in reforming the Post Office Department. I did not know where we stood in the matter of finances, and until I could be satisfied as a member of the Privy Council of Canada, that such reforms could be accomplished in the Post Office Department as would wipe out, to a large extent, the deficits which had been accumulating during the previous administration of that department, I would not touch the question of penny postage. But, Sir, the day came when, under the administration of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, a deficit of $781,000 was reduced to less than $50,000. The hon. gentleman said yesterday that he could not believe it, that it was not true. There would be a deficit of one million dollars at least, he says. Sir, of course the hon. gentleman having described us as a lot of incompetents, cannot believe that my hon. friend the Postmaster General has done what he did. It is inconceivable to him that the Post Office Department can be administered to-day with almost an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. The hon. gentleman was not in favour of penny postage, he is not now, because he says we have not the financial strength to carry it through. But let him possess his soul in patience. The reform has been undertaken, it is subject to his criticism. To-day there is almost equilibrium, the deficit was less than $50,000 last year. Though the revenue has been decreased by one-third, still the deficit this year will be such that we will be able to give to the people not only penny postage, but domestic postage as well, at one-third the cost, and with a deficit one-half less than the deficit in the old times. The hon. gentleman stated yesterday that he took exception to a statement I made in Montreal that "we had given penny postage to the Empire."

He took exception to the word "We." I understand the exception, coming from him, for, had he been in my place, it would have been the word "I," instead of the word "We." Sir, I maintain the position that I took at Montreal, and here on the floor of this House I reassert that "we did give penny postage to the Empire." Of course, I do not claim that we gave it by legislative authority, nor even by administrative authority. We had not the legislative authority, and we had not the administrative authority. But what we did do was to remove the inertia that existed somewhere, and induce those who had the authority to come forward and to do the act: and it is done, and I claim the credit for it, not for myself, but for the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would not give any credit to my hon. friend the Postmaster General. He claimed the credit for Mr. Henneker Heaton. I agree that Mr. Henneker Heaton is entitled to all praise in that respect, and the first man to proclaim it was my friend the Postmaster General himself, and the second man to proclaim it, if I may be excused for giving my own opinion, was my humble self. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) knows very well that Mr. Henneker Heaton was the very first man to acknowledge the great credit which is due to my friend the Postmaster General in this respect. And if his memory—which is very keen upon some subjects, but which is very dull upon some others—is so dull in this instance as not to have remembered certain correspondence which was exchanged last summer, let me be permitted to refresh it. On the 23rd of July last Mr. Henneker Heaton did me the honour of writing to me, and, after speaking generally of the penny postage, he went on to say :

The negotiations, the discussions, the arguments, on either side, were long and wearisome. Official disinertia was finally overcome in a surprising way, and the victory is won. It is the opinion of those possessing any acquaintance with the history of this affair, that to this victory, the courage, the energy, the determination, the moral stamina, and last, but not least, the discreet reserve of Mr. Mulock largely contributed. He cannot report as much to his colleagues. Permit me to supplement this formal notification of the result.

To this letter I answered as follows to Mr. Henneker Heaton :—

I am much honoured by your favour of the 23rd of July, and I very greatly appreciate it for the recognition which it conveys to me of the great abilities of my colleague the Postmaster General of Canada. I expected much from him, but the great success which has crowned his last effort was almost unexpected. Permit me to add, however, that whatever may be the merits of Mr. Mulock in this latter development of Imperial unity, he would be the first to admit that the credit of it primarily belongs to you.

Sir, these are the sentiments which are entertained with reference to this question on this side of the House. We have done something in this respect, and notwithstanding all the clamour the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) wants to raise against this great reform, the Canadian people will endorse it, not only because it is a matter of domestic policy, but also because it has a wider range for good than anything which has hitherto been achieved by any Canadian Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) wants to know what more have we done. Well, it would take me too long to review in detail everything we have done. I must be brief, for I do not want to follow a bad example ; but I may give summarily what we have done for the people of Canada. First, let me tell the hon. gentleman, we have reformed the tariff, and we have reformed that tariff to the great satisfaction of the majority both of the producers and consumers. When the hon. gentleman spoke yesterday of our tariff reform, he did so in such a way that I was not sure whether he was approving or attacking it ; he was not sure himself. However, he spoke of cordage, and there was a sting in his words to blame us for what we have done in respect to that matter. But yet the cordage business never was so prosperous as last year, though we made cordage free.

We have established a complete system of cold storage for the transportation of perishable goods, and in this alone we have rendered to the people of Canada a most singular service. The trade with Great Britain last year in eggs alone reached almost the sum of $2,000,000, and it is yet only in its infancy.

We have extended the Intercolonial Railway to the great centre of trade in the great city of Montreal. I do not know yet whether we can say that we have done it permanently or not, but there is the attempt, there is the policy, and the Senate will have an occasion to pass upon it by and by. Whether it passes affirmatively or negatively, whether the Intercolonial Railway is to remain with its terminus in field or come to the great city of Montreal, is not a matter of our own responsibility now but will rest upon other shoulders than ours.

Then, Sir, we have obtained another most material reform. We have obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway a reduction of their freight rates, and in so doing we have given the greatest boon to the producers in the prairies of the North-west. We have obtained a reduction of 3 cents per 100 lbs. on wheat ; we have obtained a reduction on a specified list of articles of merchandise, a reduction varying from 10 to 33 per cent, and I understand that in these matters alone we have given to the people of the North-west Territories an advantage of at least $600,000 a year.

Sir, this is something of practical statesmanship. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) does not give us any credit for it, and in the face of all this he has the audacity to speak of incapacity. He speaks as if we did not know anything of the history of Canada. Well, we do know something of the history of Canada, and as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), in one of those moments of candid modesty for which he is famous, has told us that the history of Canada is his history, we know something of his own history, too. I do not mean to depreciate the abilities of the hon. gentleman at all. I told him a moment ago that there are many things in him which I admire. I admire his industry ; I admire his tenacity ; I do not know that I do not even admire that sublime egotism of his which makes him see the whole world through his own personality. I will say more. I have no hesitation to say to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) that he has done some good service for his party, nay, for his country, when he was doing the thinking of anybody else than himself ; that is, when he was serving not leading. But I must also say that whenever he has been left to do his own thinking and carry out his own plans, he has been the arch-blunderer of modern times. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) was something in Nova Scotia at the time he was serving under the Hon. William Johnstone, if I remember right, but when the time came that the Hon. William Johnstone was removed to the Bench, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) had the direction of his own party, he scattered his party in less than three years. Then came the period of confederation, and I must say that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) was clever enough to attach himself to the skirts of Sir John A. Macdonald, and between Sir John Macdonald and himself they sailed the ship of state pretty successfully. The work, however, was divided. Sir John Macdonald was at the helm and supplied the brains; my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) supplied the wind—his blowing swelled the sails. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) came back after a while to resume the leadership of his party, and there was the same result as in Nova Scotia—in three months he destroyed it, and put it in the position where it is now.

In the speech of my hon. friend, there is one thing, however, in which I can agree with him. I can agree with him in what he said of the mover and seconder of the Address. My hon. friend for once during his whole speech was fair and generous, and I give him the fullest credit for the way in which he spoke of my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Bell) and my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Martineau); and the tribute he paid to them was well deserved. My hon. friend from Prince showed that he was already an old hand in parliamentary debate, and that he will be a valuable accession not only to the ranks of his party, but to Parliament generally; and I may say the same thing of my hon. friend from Montmagny.

But having said that much, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition became himself again, and resumed his scolding tone. He was quite himself again when he reached the plebiscite. No, I am in error: there he abandoned the scolding tone and adopted the compassionate tone, and shed a tear in the bosoms of those prohibitionists who have been looking for legislation from this Government. He told us how dissatisfied they were, and what good reason they had for being dissatisfied. He told them: "Come to me—not that I may give you prohibition legislation, but that you and I may condole together on the wickedness of the party on the other side who will not give you prohibition." This was the position taken by my hon. friend yesterday. He gave them a barren consolation; he did not give them anything substantial at all. He told them the Government were blamable for not having done something in the matter of prohibition; but he did not tell them that he was ready to help them in any way. The hon. gentleman took the attitude, however, that we had been deceiving the prohibitionists, that we had not been carrying out our pledge to them.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. I recognize that echo; it is a very natural one to what has been said. The hon. gentleman is quite astray, however. The Government have broken no pledge to the prohibitionists, because the prohibitionists themselves never made any demand. What is the history of the plebiscite? We did not make a pledge to the prohibitionists as a class, as a body, as an association. We made a pledge to the Liberal party. We made that pledge in 1893 at the time of the convention which was held in the city of Ottawa. That convention, which was a most successful one, as everybody knows, determined what should be the policy of the Liberal party. It was attended by men from all parts of the Dominion, from Prince Edward Island almost to Vancouver Island. It was attended by men of all classes, all creeds and religions, by Liberals of every shade. Of course, it was attended by Liberals who were prohibitionists as it was by Liberals who were not prohibitionists. Sir, what is a political party? A political party is an association of men who believe identically on certain subjects, but have honest differences of opinion on other subjects; and it was quite natural, when there was a gathering of the Liberal party to determine what should be the policy of the party, that the prohibitionists in the convention should strive to obtain, if possible, the adoption of their policy by the party to which they belonged. It was quite natural that the prohibitionists who attended the convention in 1893 should use their best endeavours to convince their friends who did not share their views that they ought, as a duty to their party and to their country, to make prohibition one of the planks in the platform of the party. On the other hand, it was quite natural that those who did not share their views should resist the attempt to place any such plank in the platform of the party. There was a discussion. The prohibitionists represented to us that intemperance was one of the great evils, as we know, and that we ought to struggle with it at once by making prohibition a plank in the party platform; declaring that the people were with them, and that if the people themselves had an opportunity to pronounce upon the question they would emphatically pronounce in favour of such a policy. The opposite view was also put forward; and the result was that a resolution was introduced and inserted in the platform, by which the party pledged themselves that if they came into office they would have a plebiscite on the question of prohibition, so as to obtain the honest, unbiased opinion of the people on that great question. Let me say this: When we put that plank into our platform, there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it should be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it, would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand, there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition, that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party. That was the policy we adopted, that was the policy we carried out, and what is the result? You know the figures; I need not give them to the House. Less than 23 per cent of the electorate pronounced in favour of having a prohibitory law in this country. Should the party under such circumstances make that policy its own? Should the Government under such circumstances introduce a prohibitory law? That is the problem now before us; and I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, speaking here with the authority which I hold from my position, and as I hope with the confidence of my party behind me, that the voice of the electorate which has been pronounced in favour of prohibition is not such as to warrant the Government in introducing a prohibitory measure. Moreover, there was not a man living who expected, at the time the plebiscite was taken, that the duty would be imposed on the Government of introducing a prohibitory measure unless at least one-half of the electorate recorded their votes in favour of that policy. Sir, was there any other view expressed? Was the view expressed, before the plebiscite was taken, that the question should be decided upon a comparison of the votes recorded on one side with those recorded on the other? If such a view was expressed, I never heard it, and I do not believe it was expressed. Moreover, I can give to my hon. friends on the other side who appear for the moment to be so much in favour of prohibition, the view of a friend of their own. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), who took the opportunity of speaking on this question, not once, but on many occasions, and who had the manliness to express himself clearly and distinctly upon it, last session said this:

The question is, will this plebiscite vote settle the question of a prohibitory law? I answer that this depends to a very considerable extent on the largeness of the vote and the majority given. A couple of weeks ago I asked the First Minister what he would consider a majority, whether it would have to be a majority of the votes cast or a majority of the total votes on the list.

Of course I did not get an answer, and I did not expect an answer; but I gave the hon. gentleman a chance to make a reply. The right hon. gentleman asked me about the point, as I said I held an opinion, and I gave my views very frankly and fully. I said I believed that if any Government endeavoured to pass a prohibitory law it should be with a majority of the voters on the list in its favour.

Now, after the vote was taken sometime later, several gentlemen well known and identified with the cause of prohibition gave their views—views which correspond exactly with those expressed by my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig). The Rev. Dr. Potts, in an interview published in the Toronto "Globe," spoke as follows:—

He said that in his opinion the vote polled for prohibition was not large enough to warrant a demand for the enactment of a prohibitory law. This is in accord with Dr. Potts' utterances during the campaign. His declarations during the campaign were to the effect that a substantial majority of the electors of the Dominion must declare themselves for prohibition before a prohibition law could be enforced. "Prohibition is still our goal," said Dr. Potts, "but the transgression of a liquor law is not looked upon by the general community as a kind, and the consequence is that a substantial majority of the members of the community would be required for the enforcement of a prohibitory measure."

Mr. J. S. Robertson, Secretary of the Canadian Temperance League, said:

I do not think, in view of the smallness of the majority, that the Government would be justified in legislating on the lines of prohibition. Considering the condition of the confederation of the provinces, such legislation at the present time would not be justifiable. Much as I would like to see prohibition, the vote has shown that prohibition at the present time is impossible, especially with a large majority from one of the provinces against it. I doubt whether the Government, even if it attempted to make a prohibitory law, could pass it. Looking at the matter from a Dominion standpoint, and as a citizen, I certainly think that the Government should not attempt a prohibitory law.

Rev. William Patterson said:

I do not think the Government should enact a prohibitory law under the circumstances, the majority in Quebec and the cities being so great that it would be hard to enforce it.

These are some opinions which, I claim, are entitled to some respect. I know that there are some people who believe that notwithstanding all this, there should be a prohibitory law, but upon that question we have taken our ground and it is well known. The hon. gentleman yesterday did not dare to criticise it. It is open to him still to do so, but I doubt if he will agree with prohibitionists on prohibition as a Government measure or if we will give them anything else than mere barren sympathy.

The hon. gentleman yesterday also spoke at length upon the Senate, and because he did not see the reform of the Senate promised in the Speech from the Throne, he saw in that omission some sinister motive and act on the part of the Government. Let him keep his soul in peace again. There was no sinister motive in this omission. The only reason why we did not include the reform of the Senate in the Speech from the Throne, is, as he well knows, because, whatever we can do here, we cannot legislate on this question. The only thing we can do is to petition the Imperial Parliament. But let me add further, that not only have we the intention of asking this House to express its views upon this question, but certainly we intend as well to have our resolution for the improvement of the Senate submitted to the Senate itself. The Senate is a constituent part of this country; it is part of the institutions of our country. Whether it approves or disapproves—and I am rather inclined to think it will disapprove—at all events, I for one shall always treat it with the respect to which it is entitled. We may differ from the Senate and the Senate may differ from us, but at all events we do not intend to proceed in this matter by any revolutionary methods. On the contrary, the Senate itself will be asked to perfect the work of confederation, not to destroy that work, as my hon. friend has said, but to perfect it, because human institutions—the Senate amongst the rest—are essentially perfectible. The hon. gentleman said yesterday that the Senate was created for the protection of the minority. He called it the corner stone of the Canadian confederation. Sir, woe be the day when the corner stone of confederation would be the Senate of Canada, as now composed. I do not mean to speak disrespectfully of that body. I agree with the hon. gentleman in many things he said yesterday, though he spoke beside the question. He spoke as if we intended to destroy the Senate. Well, we do not intend doing anything of the kind. I believe as firmly as he does in a second chamber. I believe in a Canadian Senate for the Canadian confederation; but whilst I hold that view, I hold the other view also, that the Senate, constituted as it is to-day, perfectly irresponsible, responsible neither to the Crown nor the people, is an anomaly in our institutions which we must blot out. The hon. gentleman said again that our plan was obsolete, not only obsolete but absurd. He said that no such plan had ever been proposed by man before, and that if there was any merit in it we were entitled to the full credit. The hon. gentleman spoke very positively, but I have known him too long not to know that when he speaks most positively it is when he is most in the wrong, and that explains why he is so often in the wrong. The hon. gentleman said we had no such example elsewhere of any similar proposition. He said that nowhere else was the proposition ever submitted that wherever there shall be diversity of opinion between the two chambers, there should be a joint sitting to settle the question. Sir, if there is any fault to be found with this reform which we have proposed, it is perhaps that it is not radical enough, that it does not go far enough; but we have adopted it for one reason of creating the least possible disturbance in the institutions of our country. I love these institutions, I do not want to disturb them unless when absolutely necessary, and as long as I have a seat in this chamber, these institutions will not be touched with my consent, except when absolutely necessary, and then only to give the necessary reform and no more. But let me again draw attention to the statement of the hon. gentleman that such a reform does not exist in any other country. Well, I shall have great pleasure in quoting to my hon. friend the authority of a gentleman whose opinions, I must say, I do not always share, but who, on questions of fact, is generally accurate. I refer to the opinion of Sir John Bourinot. Sir John Bourinot published a paper at the commencement of this year, 1899, and I invite the attention of my hon. friend to what he said. This is his language for a second Chamber:

The second, or popular Chamber, however, is the most powerful. All elected or second assemblies have the initiation of money votes and taxation. The Senate of the United States is probably the sole instance of a legislative body which is not inferior in legislative importance to the lower house, and possesses special functions—the approval or rejection of important appointments and the confirmation of treaties—not enjoyed by any similar body in the world. In the Spanish Cortes, however, either house may take the initiative in all cases of legislation. In the Netherlands, the upper house cannot amend the bills of the lower branch, but must accept or reject them in their entirety. The British House of Lords cannot initiate or amend a money bill; neither can the Canadian Senate, nor the upper house of any of the British dependencies. The Senate of the United States, however, may amend, while it cannot originate a revenue or money bill. The upper house of the Prussian Landtag cannot amend the budget. In some countries there is a union of the two houses to consider and pass bills on which one or the other disagrees.

And this is the system which, the hon. gentleman told us, had never existed in any country. Sir, what would the hon. gentleman say, if I had made such a statement? What floods of eloquence would he have poured out in his comments upon my ignorance of history—comments such as I abstain from making.

The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago, and yesterday also, that he proposed to stump the province of Quebec against our proposal to reform the Senate, and to appeal to the people there upon the language of Sir George Etienne Cartier. Sir, I have read the confederation debates at least as accurately, I believe, as the hon. gentleman. I do not believe that Sir George Cartier said very much upon the question of the Senate. But there was another gentleman, as great as Cartier, whose fame has been growing ever since his death—Mr. Dorion—who spoke upon that question. I place myself in the judgment of the House, when I say that of all the speeches that were made on that occasion, the most statesmanlike, the most far-seeing in its appreciation of the future, was the speech of Mr. Dorion, and Mr. Dorion depicted to the letter what would be the evils of an irresponsible Senate. So, if the hon. gentleman goes to the province of Quebec in order to appeal to the people upon the language of Cartier, I do not believe he will derive much comfort from the result.

The hon. gentleman passed from that to our plan of redistribution. He does not know yet what our plan of redistribution will be—

Mr. GEO. LANDERKIN (South Grey). That does not make any difference.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, that does not make any difference. He condemns it in advance, because to him, I regret to say, and to his party, the word redistribution means gerrymander; there is a sinister import in the very word. Again I say to my hon. friend that he may possess his soul in patience. He said we wanted to play with loaded dice. No, our effort is to unload the dice. Who loaded the dice, I want to know? Who loaded the dice with the infamous Franchise Act? Who loaded the dice with the still more infamous Redistribution Bill? Who carved the province of Ontario into 92 monuments of shapeless deformity—monuments of deformity to the eye and of even greater deformity to every instinct of right and justice? Sir, the hon. gentleman asked me yesterday, where was our constitutional power to pass the Act we propose. I answer, the constitutional power of the House of Commons to undo every wrong and to give justice to those who have suffered wrong. We do not propose, assuredly, to increase the number of members of the House, but it is our aim and purpose to undo the great wrong, the supreme injustice which was done against the liberties of the people in 1882. Let me say to the hon. gentleman, that I should be ashamed of myself, if we were to follow in the path trodden by himself and his friends. We do not want any loaded dice; what we want is to have fair-play for them as well as for us. We are here in the consciousness of our strength and, so help us God, I think we shall have that strength in the hearts of the people, but never by such methods as were resorted to by the party who were gully of the Gerrymander Act of 1882.

Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman passed to another subject, and one of a more peaceable character, when he spoke of the fast Atlantic service. I have to say to him that this is a matter which we intend to take up at some time, and sooner rather than later. He reproached us last night because we had not adopted the Allan contract, when we came into office. We did not adopt that contract for the reason that we believed that the late Government had arranged to pay too dear for the service we were to get from the Allans. We have been attempting to arrange another service. We have not been as successful as we had hoped: the contract we made has not been implemented; but we have not waited for the fast service in order to get all that the hon. gentleman suggested that contract would give us. He said that contract provided for cold storage. We did not carry out that contract, but the cold storage system is now in existence.

The hon. gentleman wanted also to have my opinion upon the Pacific cable. I have only to say to him, that we found that in a position which we could not accept. The hon. gentleman had agreed that Canada should contribute one-third of the amount for that service. We thought that one-third was too much, and we have negotiated to obtain a reduction, and I think we shall succeed. The hon. gentleman stated that I had been, perhaps not suspicious, but not satisfied as to the figures of the estimate of the cost to this country. It is true, I was not satisfied. Not that I meant any disparagement of Sir Sandford Fleming on that question. But did the hon. gentleman expect me, with the responsibility that rested upon me, to accept without verification the figures of any man, however eminent or respectable? I took an opportunity to have those figures checked, and I am bound to say, and I say to the hon. gentleman with great satisfaction, that the information which I have fully confirms the figures of Sir Sandford Fleming. This is not a time to make pronouncements or to give anything away, but I am glad to be able to say that before long I hope to be in a position to make an announcement to the hon. gentleman and to the House on this subject.

The hon. gentleman devoted the greater part of his speech to the negotiations which took place at Quebec and Washington. He devoted no less than three hours, I think, to that subject, and whatever conclusions he came to, I am yet at a loss to understand, except on one point, and that was, that when we adjourned, we should not have adjourned, but should have broken off the negotiations altogether. I shall come to that presently; but let me follow the hon. gentleman as he proceeded upon this question. He told us—and claimed great credit for it—that he had intended to have a campaign in the province of Quebec, to put before the people in that province the true situation, because he believed—to use his own words, which I took down—"that if the true condition of things were properly represented to the people of that province, the condition of public opinion would be different from what it is to-day." And this I hear re-echoed by my hon. friends from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron). What have these hon. gentlemen been doing? Have not they been doing their level best to properly represent the condition of things to the people of Quebec? And my hon. friends from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), and Compton (Mr. Pope), and Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk)—have they not been properly representing the state of affairs to the people of Quebec? But the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) tells us that he refrained from carrying on this campaign, so I must be thankful to him, not for what he has done, but for his good intentions. Then he complained of the length of the sittings of the commission. True, though there were adjournments during the sittings, the commission sat from the latter part of August to a little beyond the middle of February, let us say six months. Is that very extraordinary, in view of the results of some commissions upon which the hon. gentleman sat himself? He told us yesterday—he could not forget to tell us that—that he had been sitting with Mr. Chamberlain in Washington to settle the question of the North Atlantic fisheries. He said that that commission had sat for two months, I think it sat for more than two months; it had only one subject, and it sat for two months. We had ten or twelve subjects to deal with; we had the Atlantic fisheries for one, the Behring Sea fisheries for another, the Alaska boundary for another, the bonding privilege for another, the reciprocity question for another, the Alien Labour Law for another, the interior water fisheries for another, and two or three more which I forget at this moment. Having to deliberate upon all of these subjects within six months, it seems to me that we had not any too much time. But that is not all. We were much delayed by various circumstances, for instance, the untimely sickness and death of Mr. Dingley. Now, Sir, I am bound to say of Mr. Dingley that he was a man not well known in this country. He was known, for one thing, for being a prohibitionist, like my hon. friend. He was not a free trader, as my hon. friend knows, but he was a protectionist, as ardent a protectionist as my hon. friend himself. He was a man of strong convictions, and my colleagues and myself who knew him well, are but doing that justice to his memory which he deserves when we say that a fairer man never lived. He was a man of strong convictions, but always ready to argue and always ready to be convinced. For my part I deplore most sincerely his untimely death. I am sure that had he remained a member of the commission he would have been able to solve, by his authority with his party, many of the difficulties we had to contend with. He was replaced by another eminent gentleman, Mr. Payne. But unfortunately for the time our negotiations were delayed. Then there was the unfortunate accident and the most deplorable death of Lord Herschell. My hon. friend spoke eloquently yesterday of Lord Herschell, he could not have said enough of him. He was not only a great judge, he was not only a great statesman, he was not only a clever diplomat, but he was as true a friend of Canada as ever crossed the Atlantic. I was grieved when I saw in some Canadian newspapers last fall the statement that Lord Herschell was trying to settle some of the questions at issue by a sacrifice of Canadian interests. Sir, there never was a more false statement made in the press, and I hope the Canadian newspapers will at once endeavour to repair the evil which they have done in this respect, and to proclaim, as I have a right to do, speaking from knowledge of Lord Herschell, that he fought for Canada, not only with enthusiasm, but with conviction and devotion. However, all these circumstances led us to the period which we reached at last and which the public knows. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman assumes that in all these negotiations we have been begging for reciprocity; he assumes that in all these negotiations that took place at Quebec and in Washington we were not dealing with the Behring Sea question, that we were not dealing with the Atlantic fisheries question, and with the other questions, but that we were seeking to modify the American commissioners in order to obtain some trade concessions. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that in this matter, as in all others, and especially in this one, he is mistaken. I have no right to speak of what took place in the commission, but I have a right to refer to what is now in the minds of the Canadian people; and if we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with the hon. gentleman himself, would have given many things to obtain the American market; there was a time not long ago when the market of the great cities of the union was the only market we had for any of our products. But thank heaven! those days are past and over now. We are not dependent upon the American market as we were at one time. Our system of cold storage has given us a market in England which we had not before. Some few years ago we had no market except the cities of the union. Those days are over, and I recognize that fact; though I admit without any hesitation that there are yet quite a number of articles concerning which the American market would be of great advantage to Canada.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman stated yesterday that it was our attitude on the question of unrestricted reciprocity which led—I quote his own words—"to failure" in our negotiations on the other side. Unrestricted reciprocity—how many times has the hon. gentleman uttered this word as a reproach towards ourselves! Sir, if unrestricted reciprocity was a crime, the first criminal was the hon. gentleman himself. If there was merit in it, he is entitled first of all to the merit, because he is the man, the only Canadian so far as I know, who, in negotiations with the Americans, actually offered to barter away certain privileges on the basis of unrestricted reciprocity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to make to the hon. gentleman's statement a positive and emphatic denial.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, I expected as much, and I provided myself for it. I expected the hon. gentleman would attempt to deny it. But deny it he cannot, though he may try to equivocate, and quibble, and pettifog upon the subject. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he was once in Washington negotiating a treaty, he was once in Washington to solve the question of the Atlantic fisheries, and he offered to settle the point upon the basis of what he called unrestricted reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let the hon. gentleman be quiet for a moment. I do not want to take any advantage of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman will tell me that he did not make an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, but that he made an unrestricted offer of reciprocity. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he made an unrestricted offer of reciprocity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say this, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. gentleman, if he will permit me to make the observation. An offer of unrestricted reciprocity and an unrestricted offer of reciprocity are two things as dissimilar as night and day. The term "unrestricted reciprocity" covers what it states, but an offer of reciprocity that was not restricted, is as different from it as night is from day.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have it now. An offer of unrestricted reciprocity covers what it meant. What did it mean? It meant reciprocity without restriction. Let us here examine what was included in unrestricted reciprocity. Everything was included; reciprocity in manufactured products, reciprocity in agricultural products, reciprocity in mining products, in the products of the farm, and reciprocity in products of the forests. That was what was meant by unrestricted reciprocity. What did an unrestricted offer of reciprocity mean? Did it include products of the farm? It did, it was not restricted. Did it include products of the mine? It did, it was not restricted. Did it include products of the sea? It did, it was not restricted. Did it include manufacturing products? It did, it was not restricted. It was tweedle dum and tweedle dee, or six of one and half dozen of the other. I want to know, when he made his offer of unrestricted reciprocity to the American authorities, what did he mean? Did he mean to have it accepted or not? Did he mean to deceive them? He would not say that he meant to have it refused. He could have offered it only to have it accepted, and if it had been accepted, the result would have been unrestricted reciprocity. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did as he did on another occasion; but before I pass to that I will quote to him one of his own organs, to show that I do him no injustice. He was well understood by his own party to have made an offer of unrestricted reciprocity. Three years later he went to Washington again, and on the 10th of April, 1891, the ablest and most respectable organ of the Conservative party, the Montreal "Gazette," made the following statement:—

Indeed, Mr. Blaine flatly objected to the appointment of a formal commission, until he learned upon what basis the Canadians proposed to treat, and it was to assure the American Secretary of State that the Canadian Government is willing to discuss the question on the broadest lines, even on the basis of unrestricted reciprocity, that Sir Charles Tupper returned to Washington with Sir John Thompson and the Hon. Mr. Foster.

Therefore, I do the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) no injustice. Here is the organ of his own party setting forth his own attitude. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman did then as he has done more than once, and as he did last year, when he found his party would not follow him—he tried to equivocate and pettifog, in order to get out of the hole in which he had placed himself. We remember what took place last year on the Yukon question. When our contract was made known the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) rushed to the office of a friendly newspaper to publish an interview and to endorse the contract. He wanted to guide public opinion; he was moved by patriotic motives. But when he came on the floor of this House he did not find his party behind him nor beside him. Why, he was assailed upon the very floor of this House by members of his own party, and in our presence, the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean)—whom we all regret not to see in his seat to-day, but who I am glad to hear will be present by and by—the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Maclean) simply took him by the throat and forced him to take another attitude. Then, there was the hon. gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace), who slapped him on the other cheek, and forced him to take another attitude. Then there was the other member from York (Mr. Foster), and the rest of the party, without any qualification at all, who simply ignored him altogether, and they dragged him from the high position he assumed, and as they would not follow where he led, he followed where they grovelled.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) also said that we had been at Washington as humble suppliants at the feet of the American people. Humble suppliants at the feet of the American people! Sir, if ever there was a man who was an humble suppliant, if ever there was a man who disgraced and humiliated Canada at Washington, it was the hon. gentleman who had the audacity to make such a charge against us. Does the hon. gentleman believe that we do not know his history, and that we have lived all these years without knowing what he was doing. Let me recall to the mind of the hon. gentleman what took place in these very negotiations to which the Montreal "Gazette" has referred. Mr. Speaker, once upon a time there was a general election in Canada; it was in the year 1891. The hon. gentleman was not a member of Parliament then; he was in England; he was the High Commissioner for Canada; he was the representative of the Canadian people, not of one party, but of all parties. His duty was to stay in London, and to discharge the functions of his office there, to stand by the rights of the Canadian people as a whole. He left his office, he came to Canada, he stumped Canada from one end to the other in favour and in behalf of the Conservative party, forgetting his position; but let that pass. He made a statement which was to say the least of it—remembering your ruling Mr. Speaker yesterday—a statement which was, to say the least of it, unfounded in fact. He made the statement that at the moment he was speaking the Canadian Government were in possession of an offer from the Secretary of State for the United States (Mr. Blaine) to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity. He stated, in so many words, in numerous addresses in all parts of Canada, that the initiation came from Mr. Blaine. This statement was not correct. This statement was not founded on fact, but it had its effect with the electorate, and the victory was won. He went to Washington after that. Sir Julian Pauncefote asked for him an interview from Mr. Blaine, but Mr. Blaine would not grant the interview until the statement by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) had been rectified. In answer to the letter of Sir Julian Pauncefote, asking for this interview by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), Mr. Blaine wrote to Sir Julian Pauncefote as follows, on April 1st, 1891:—

In view of the fact that you had come to the State Department with the proposals, and that the subject was then for the first time mentioned between us, and in view of the further fact that I agreed to a private conference as explained in my minute, I confess that it was a surprise to me when several weeks later, during the Canadian canvass, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper both stated before public assemblages that an informal discussion of a reciprocity treaty would take place at Washington after the 4th of March, by the initiation of the Secretary of State.

I detail these facts because I deem it important, since the matter has been for some weeks open to public remark, to have it settled that the conference was not "initiated" by me, but, on the contrary, that the private arrangement of which I spoke, was but a modification of your proposal, and in no sense an original suggestion from the Government of the United States.

With this explanation, it only remains for me to say that gentlemen representing the Dominion of Canada, and proposing to discuss the commercial relations of the two countries may be assured of a courteous and cordial reception in Washington by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Blaine would receive the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), and would receive him cordially and courteously, but there was a question of fact to be settled between them. Mr. Blaine stated in so many words, that the initiation did not come from him, and he wanted that fact acknowledged before the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was received. The following day the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was in the office of Mr. Blaine, and he himself records the interview which took place in a letter to Sir John Macdonald. He first makes some preparatory remarks. For instance, he met some of the grantees of the land in Mr. Blaine's office, the German Ambassador was there; the Danish Ambassador was there also; he had to wait some time, but after he had waited until these great personages had withdrawn, he was admitted, and this is what he said took place:

I told Mr. Blaine that I wished, in the outset, to recognize the accuracy of the statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I had seen, in reference to the initiation of the negotiations regarding reciprocal trade arrangements between the two countries.

He had to eat humble pie, and when he had eaten it, he was heard. This is the man who tells us that we are suppliants at the feet of the United States—the man who was forced to admit that before he could carry on negotiations, he had to correct statements that could not be maintained. Now, Sir, to come back to the negotiations. As I said, the negotiations did not take place on the question of reciprocity more than upon any other question. They took place on all the subjects, and finally, as is well known, we could not agree upon the question of the boundary between Alaska and Canada. My mouth is closed on this subject, and I cannot speak; but there has been a statement made officially by the Foreign Office, coming from the commission itself, which has given to the public the reasons why we could not agree. The American commissioners did not want to have an umpire. They wanted three commissioners on one side and three on the other side. To this we could not agree, because such an arrangement would not give us a definite settlement of the question. They also wanted it agreed, that if the establishment which they have made at the head of the Lynn canal were found to be in Canadian territory, they should continue to remain part of their own territory. We could not agree to that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am glad to see that in this, at least, we have the approbation of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman tells us that as soon as the American commissioners took that position, we should have refused to adjourn, we should have broken off the negotiations. He told us that the Canadian commissioners should have come back to attend to the new situation thus created. The Canadian commissioners, Mr. Speaker,—why did he not speak also of the British commissioner? If the Canadian commissioners should have come back, what was the British commissioner to do, I want to know? The hon. gentleman wanted us to know? The hon. gentleman wanted us to break off the negotiations in a fit of petulance, and incur all the consequences of such a break. We thought it more wise, more dignified, and more in the interests of Canada to give to the Imperial Government and the American Government the opportunity of having some generous talk on this question, with a view of arriving at some settlement. Is there a man here but the hon. gentleman who would blame us for that? The hon. gentleman spoke of the rapprochement between the two nations, and approved of it. What would have become of that rapprochement if, at the very outset, because we could not agree on a question like the one to which I have referred, we had followed the course proposed by the hon. gentleman, because the propositions of the American commissioners were not acceptable? We thought they were not acceptable, and we did not accept them; but because we did not accept them, we thought it the part of honourable men and of true British subjects to give a last opportunity to have that question settled amicably, and I believe the majority of the Canadian people will support us in this, as in other matters. The hon. gentleman said: You should have come back and initiated a policy of retaliation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The hon. gentleman said: Do not have a policy of retaliation in name, but have it in fact all the same. He told us the other day, in a speech he delivered, and more or less repeated yesterday, that we should have a policy of retaliation in the Yukon, because Canadian miners in the American Yukon have not all the rights which are given to American miners—that we should have the same policy in Canada for American miners.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the hon. gentleman has misunderstood me. On the contrary, I stated that in the Yukon the United States had given Canadian subjects on the American side of the boundary the same privileges that we give to Americans, and they did that by an Act of Congress passed since the meeting of this House last year.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend does not do himself justice: he makes a statement which is not accurate. The Bill which was introduced last year was to give to the Canadian miners in the Yukon the same rights as were given to American miners in the Yukon; but, Sir, this is a barren right, and the hon. gentleman ought to know it. What we give to-day in the Yukon to American miners is the same privileges that we give to our own miners. We do not sell, but license, in the Yukon; they do not license, they sell, and because we do not sell, but license, the Americans will not sell or license to Canadian miners. That is the position. I have read my hon. friend's speeches recently with great attention, and I believe, that my memory is better than his; and he said, in so many words, that we should have the same policy towards American miners in the Yukon as are given to Canadian miners in the Yukon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, throughout Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well; what does he mean? We should have the same policy in the Yukon? That might be possible, Sir; but the hon. gentleman should not forget that it would be very dangerous to introduce any such policy in the Yukon. He knows that we have no access to the Yukon gold fields except through territory held by the Americans, whether we go in by the Yukon River or by the Pacific Ocean. Would it be very judicious, under such circumstances, to adopt a policy of retaliation? Ah, if our Yukon Railway Bill had been passed last year,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The PRIME MINISTER—the result would have been different. But, Sir, that Bill was defeated; and the greatest crime, I do not hesitate to say—and my words will become truer and truer as time goes on—the greatest crime that was ever committed against Canadian interests was the rejection of that Bill. The hon. gentleman also spoke of retaliation in fact, not in name, upon spruce wood, pine logs and nickel. I have only this to say to my hon. friend, that, whatever may be the policy which shall be followed by this Government, it shall not have reference to any policy followed by the United States. The inspiration of our policy shall be the consideration of the best interests of the Canadian people. The inspiration of our policy shall come from within Canada, and not from outside of Canada.

Now, Sir, I have nothing more to do at present. I have done; but before I close, I must express my gratitude to the hon. gentleman that in this last speech which he has delivered he has shown himself once more, and perhaps more than ever, as he is—reckless, extravagant, unreliable, ever ready to pander to passion and prejudice, ever ready to gamble away the most sacred interests of this country for the chance of a party advantage. As to us, we have now been in office less than three years; upon our record, such as it is, I claim we can appeal with some degree of confidence, not only to the impartial judgment of history, but to the fair verdict of men now living ; I do not claim that we have been free from imperfections, or infirmities, but I do claim that we have done some lasting service to this country—service which will live in the hearts and minds of the people, and which will still bear fruit a long time after the last of us has been laid in his grave. Sir, I claim this, and I claim it with some degree of confidence. We have closed an era painful and dangerous in the history of our country ; we have healed some burning sores which were fast eating into the very heart of our people ; we have brought harmony and peace where discord had long reigned ; we have reconciled men long estranged by bitter strife ; we have taught them to have confidence in themselves and in one another, and above all things, we have taught them to have faith in the institutions under which it is our privilege to live. This further I claim : we have opened a new era in the history of the trade relations of the Empire. We have removed from our limbs the shackles which were impediments to the freer trade within the broad domains of our Empire ; and the policy which we have thus introduced we shall pursue with care and prudence, and without undue haste, but with an ever vigilant eye and determination and courage to move and to act at the proper time and the proper season.

Mr. FOSTER. After the rather exciting interlude, Mr. Speaker, between the end of my hon. friend's speech and the moment of my rising, I shall endeavour, as briefly as I can, and with a proper fear of the somewhat unnecessary criticism and fault-finding of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, to follow out some of the questions which have been raised in the present debate ; and if I should exceed the length of the time which the right hon. Prime Minister thinks members of the Opposition should confine themselves in the presence of his high mightiness I shall have to bear calmly his criticisms and scoldings, and trust myself to the larger and less excited and I think more generous sentiments of the electorate outside of this House, and of my own friends on this side. One thing is certainly apparent to the members of this House, and will no doubt be equally apparent to the country, when the speech that has just been delivered comes to be read, although I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of the pique and anger and churlishness which showed itself in that speech from the very beginning cannot possibly appear in cold print. I think it will be apparent to this House and the country that my right hon. friend met the questions which were raised last night in this debate in a spirit quite different from that in which they were raised by the leader of the Opposition. I have had some experience in parliamentary life, and there are others on both sides of the House who have been here longer than myself, and I venture to state the opinion that I have never heard in this House, between leaders of opposing parties, on the great questions of policy which divide them, a speech made by the leader of the Opposition in which there was greater moderation and a more persistent effort evident to place the matters in controversy fairly before the House, and in which there was less personal pique or personal rancour than in the presentment made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition last night. And if a criticism may be allowed to myself, an humble member of the Opposition, I venture to say that my right hon. friend would have consulted the dignity of his position and that of his party better if he had replied to that speech in the spirit in which it was made. I am sorry to say that, in my opinion, he did not. My right hon. friend seems to think that his first duty to the House and the country was to indulge in personal flagellation. In that he was quite mistaken. The issue was not a personal one in this House, and neither was the personal issue raised last night. Quite the reverse. The issues raised were those between the parties, the issues on broad questions of policy and administration, and those issues were placed calmly and forcibly and at no greater length than they deserved by my hon. friend. As raised by him, they had their point and their force, and my right hon. friend felt their point and their force, and endeavoured to parry them as well as he could by indulging in what may, without exaggeration, be denominated a tirade of personal abuse of my hon. friend who spoke last night. He may have succeeded in leading away the minds of the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him. They may consider that in this sort of personal encounter there is balm for broken pledges, for unwise policies and wretched administration ; but my hon. friend mistakes the temper and the intelligence of the people if he thinks that fireworks of that kind will avail in the country against lapses and faults such as I have alluded to. My hon. friend's defence is for the moment, but not one which will stand the test of time and reflection and fair thought, and it will receive time and reflection and fair thought by the electorate of this country, or I am much deceived in that electorate. He found fault with the leader of the Opposition for the length of time he took in presenting his views last night. Five hours is a considerable length of time, but not by any means sufficient to properly go over and expose to public view the follies of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, and who play with principles just as easily and thoughtlessly as they play on public credulity. Five hours is but a small portion of time to devote to the gross inconsistencies of hon. gentlemen opposite as public men, and from which they propose to escape by a torrent of personal abuse. Five hours is a very small proportion of time to be devoted to the broken pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite—pledges which they made and made for their party profit, pledges by which they obtained party profit, pledges by means of which they reached the seats which they occupy in this House, pledges which to-day they cynically repudiate—no, not repudiate; they have passed beyond that stage. This has been a matter of stages, of phases of development with hon. gentlemen opposite. When they first came back from the country with their broken pledges trailing behind them, they were apologetic and somewhat shamefaced. They protested that, though they pledged in sincerity and meant to carry out their pledges, they found great obstacles, which were hard to be surmounted. But, give us time, they said to their followers behind them; give us time, they said to the country that was watching them, and you will find that every pledge will be redeemed. That was phase No. 1. Phase No. 2 left the ground of protest and took the ground of apology. But last year they got beyond the ground of apology and took the ground of open repudiation. They have advanced a stage further this year, if we are to judge by what has been said by the right hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Now they will neither protest nor apologize nor repudiate; they will simply ignore the whole thing, as though they had no past and as though history were a thing unknown in this country. Well, Sir, we do not intend to let these hon. gentlemen ignore the past. We intend to put their past before them and to keep it before them and to keep it before the country as well. The right hon. gentleman had a good deal of fault to find, a good deal of fun to make with my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) beside me. Amongst other things he spoke of what he called that hon. gentleman's redundancy and prolixity. He said that human nature, in such cases could only endure. He declared that my hon. friend had nothing but words to offer, idle words, and that some day he would be brought to account for all these idle words which he had spoken. Mr. Speaker, there are some words which are worse than idle words, namely, false words. My hon. friends opposite may criticise idle words or those which they call idle, but they had better do a little introspection and find out what penalties in the present and in the future are laid up against men who speak false words, men who gain advantage by pledges they do not keep, by promises they repudiate. The right hon. gentleman said that adjectives were a large part of the vocabulary of the leader of the Opposition, that he had more adjectives than ideas. That is the fault of most of us—that we have fewer ideas than words; but heaven help us if we have no ideas at all. My right hon. friend must not criticise too harshly the only stock in trade he has. He gives us to understand that he regards the five hours' speech last night as the vaporings of a disappointed man. Well, Sir, he is welcome to that opinion. But I would rather be in the position of one who talks and is disappointed

—even granting that for the sake of argument—than to talk a little less long but to occupy the place of a man who, though not disappointed, had disappointed every elector who had trusted to his promises. He declared that my hon. friend took these whole five hours to seek out the weak spots in the armour of the Government. Oh, no; it requires no diligent search to find these weak spots in the armour of hon. gentlemen opposite. Their whole armour is a tissue of weaknesses; it is open at every joint, so that even the most inexperienced criticism can easily find openings and dull darts can very easily pierce them. He said that the leader of the Opposition went into Huron, that he had been found to be a man of idle words and weak deeds as shown by the results in that county. If the leader of the Government is satisfied with the result in Huron, gentlemen on this side of the House certainly have no reason to complain. In a by-election, with two Governments, the most partisan, the most shamelessly partisan that Canada has ever seen in Dominion and in provincial politics—with one exception in regard to provincial politics, which I may deal with later on—with the patronage of these two Governments used openly, shamelessly, persistently, notwithstanding the high pretensions, aye, even under cover of the vaunted innocence and purity of the leader of the Government, and the no less vaunted purity of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) who sits behind him—with all this, the result was that the majority which the Government enjoyed in that constituency was brought down from 317 in the general election to 117 in the by-election. If the leader of the Government is satisfied with that as an indication of public opinion in the Dominion, I think we on this side may be satisfied as well. The hon. gentleman assumes too much. No man, however sudden his rise, however high he may be, is exempt from criticism in this country. Then my right hon. friend, belauded though he has been, bedizened—democrat though he is—until scarcely an inch of his democratic clothing can be discerned for the high and aristocratic ornaments he bears, must not think that all this singles him out in Canada as above criticism and beyond the exercise of the judgment and intelligence of this country. Particularly when he makes as many blunders as he has, he must expect to be criticised, and he might as well look pleasant about it instead of getting angry. He took the leader of the Opposition to task because, as he said—he did not prove it nor did he hope to prove it, he simply declared it—my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) took credit for having created Canada. Now, while that is entirely without proof on the part of the right hon. gentleman, one thing can be proved, that at a certain time in a certain city many miles from this, my right hon. friend declared that he went to bed one evening when Canada was only a blotch upon the map and when he woke up in the morning, behold Canada was a nation, and he was the man who had wrought that miracle.

My hon. friend is scarcely in a position to criticise what he calls egotism, under such circumstances as that. Well, after indulging in this by-play, he proceeds to the serious work of his speech. What was the serious work the hon. gentleman undertook? He undertook to answer the challenge of my hon. friend, as to what he had done for the country. And how long did he take to do it? He did it, in about fifteen minutes. What has my hon. friend, according to his own statement, done for the country? He says, in the first place, that when he came into power, he found this country rent and torn over a question which included in it elements of race and creed, with all the dangers that apply to questions of that kind, and that he remedied it—remedied it by relegating it to the province. He told us, in another place, that a political party was a party in which the men composing it believed alike in fundamental matters, and disagreed in others. And so a cabinet or a government would have to be composed of men who agreed in all points of public policy, or else they could not keep together. Where is the agreement in this case? My hon. friend says that he has settled this question. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) declares, and has declared within very recent times, that the question is not settled; and the Solicitor General and my hon. friend are members of the same Cabinet and Government, which is supposed to have solidarity! The less my hon. friend says about his shifty methods in trying to settle that question, whether it is ultimately settled or not, the better for his reputation in this country. I do not propose to go into that: I will leave that question for hon. gentlemen who understand it better than I do, and who will take up that point at the proper time.

He declares that he has brought about preferential trade—a real preferential trade. Why, when my hon. friend came down to this House with his first resolutions upon the tariff—I have it from the mouth of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who sits beside him—they had no intention, and it was not the policy of the Government to have preferential trade with Great Britain at all. Preferential trade, if it means anything for a country, is trade which gives to that country advantages which are given to no other country. Preferential trade does not mean most-favoured-nation treatment. But what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said—and I have it, I think, in a paper before me—was, that it was not their intention at all to propose a policy of that kind. Here is what he said:

I say with respect to that offer we now make, that it is not a preferential offer at all in the true and legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the world. The Americans may avail themselves of it, so may the Germans and the Belgians. The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and conditions on which England may take advantage of it.

And he said later:

If the Americans were willing to give us full and fair reciprocal advantages, I would recommend trading with them for the benefit of Canada and the Empire, too; and I think Mr. Foster will find out before he is many years older that very probably, although I admit it is a little roundabout way, this is not a bad way to get at it. We have to-day offered better terms to those countries who will trade with us fairly, but that offer has been made to the United States just as it is to any other country, even to Great Britain herself.

Now, Sir, that was the intention with which the hon. gentlemen framed their policy and brought it to this House. Why have we preferential trade with Great Britain to-day, and for Great Britain and some of her colonies alone? Because hon. gentlemen blundered into it, and for no other reason whatever. When they sat down together, we will suppose, with their wits about them, and laid out their line of policy, their line of policy was not for preferential trade to Great Britain alone, was not preferential trade to Great Britain at all. Their line of policy was in the line of what my hon. friend indicated, I think, in Toronto, when he said that now the policy of this Government was to be, not Canada for the Canadians, but all the world for the Canadians, to trade with all the world and to all those countries that would give to us favouring tariffs, we would give favouring tariffs and favoured treatment. That was the policy which they laid down in their cool moments, knowing what they desired to accomplish. My hon. friend has said something, too, with reference to their getting the treaties denounced. He said, I think, to-day, that a preferential treatment to Great Britain, as everybody knew, would have to be given to Belgium and to Germany also. Everybody knows it now, but everybody did not know it when that policy was first propounded. I put the question to my hon. friend myself, as to whether, under that resolution on that item, Belgium and Germany would have a right to that treatment as well as Great Britain. My hon. friend got up, in the plenitude of his power and his knowledge, and declared:

I have no hesitation in answering my hon. friend. I say emphatically that neither Belgium nor Germany can have any right to that preferential treatment.

Now he says everybody knew that when Great Britain received that treatment, it must be accorded equally to Belgium and to Germany, because these had the favoured-nation treatment. My hon. friend simply blundered into what he calls preferential trade with Great Britain. His policy, as laid down and as explained by himself, as explained by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and by the Minister of Finance, was a policy of favourable treatment to every country which would favourably treat us, and so to make our trade bounds as wide as possible. My hon. friend next took credit for having abrogated the treaties with Belgium and with Germany. I think he arrogates too much to himself. As I read the history of those negotiations, and the history which preceded those negotiations which resulted in the denunciation of the treaties, the working up to that result had been a matter of many years. It is always the case that abuses which are and have been long established, require time in order to disestablish or to abrogate them. There always must be a period, longer or shorter, of agitation, of preparation of public sentiment, and of conveying that public sentiment to the authorities that may be, and of the dispositions which must take place between the contracting parties in order that changes may be made. That process had been going on with reference to these treaties for twenty years, started long ago and persistently held to by the Government of Canada, whilst my hon. friend was in opposition, and adhered to by the government of every British colony, who, by their representatives, with Sir Charles Tupper, when he was High Commissioner in London, pressed again and again upon the British Government the idea that these treaties stood in the way of desirable legislation, and that they ought to be abrogated. These led up to their final result, and that final result was brought about by the co-operation of all the colonies, as is distinctly shown in the records—aided very largely by the feelings which were aroused on the occasion of the Jubilee of Her Gracious Majesty. These all in their years of work led up to the final abrogation; but, Sir, it is quite too much for my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to take for himself or for the Canadian Government the sole credit of having abrogated these treaties. The treaties were abrogated by a process which is common in removing abuses, or in making amendments, or in getting changes which are for the public benefit, whether they be in the higher range of international politics or in the somewhat lower plane of local or provincial politics.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) cites an instance as to why the results of preferential trade must be beneficial to this country. Let me remind him that it is only partial preferential trade; that is, we have given a preference to Great Britain, but Great Britain has given no preference to us. My right hon. friend well knows that before the elections of 1896, in various places in this Dominion, he declared for a mutual preference as between Canada and Great Britain. Taking up the cue Sir Charles Tupper had taken years before and laboured assiduously upon, namely, that of a mutual preferential arrangement between this country and Great Britain; taking up the cue which had been laid down at the Intercolonial Conference which met here in 1894, where a resolution was passed favouring that project, and the report of which was sympathetically placed before the British Government, and had its due force; my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in the heat of the election, was anxious to put himself before the electorate as being in favour of a preference which should be mutual between Canada and Great Britain, and he so declared himself upon platform after platform throughout the Dominion. After having made that pledge and promise, to the country, why was my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) led to repudiate that promise when he went over to Great Britain, and why at Liverpool and in London and everywhere, did he go back upon the pledge which he made to the people of this country in favour of a mutual preferential trade? His preferential trade has not been successful in two things. It has not been successful in diverting the current of trade between Canada and the United States—for which those gentlemen opposite found fault with the late Government. It has not been successful in developing beyond natural causes to an appreciable extent the trade between Great Britain and this country. As far as our export trade is concerned, it has had no appreciable effect. My hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would lead this House and the country to suppose that the door was shut against the exports of Canada to Great Britain until he became the leader of this Government, and then it was suddenly opened. He knows that for the last eight or ten years before he came into office that current of trade had been widening and deepening and broadening in this country towards Great Britain, and that it was growing in satisfactory and increasing volume every year. And, Sir, if you take away the impetus of heightened prices, and take away the impetus of natural increase of production, which is continually going on in this country, then the increase which has taken place since he came into power, owing to the preferential advantage which he has given Great Britain, I beg leave to say is inappreciable in any degree. More than that, everything which draws attention to a country, which makes knowledge more common between the people of different countries helps in matters of trade if there be the natural basis for trade, and the Jubilee year, with all its accompanying conditions of goodwill and of intelligent appreciation by one part of the Empire of every other part of the Empire, had its influence in promoting trade between Great Britain and Canada. But, Sir, the preferential part of it has so far, to say the least, not been brilliantly successful. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says it must be successful, because Sir Howard Vincent, on the very eve of the abrogation of the Belgian and German treaties, and before there could be the least indication of what would be the results of the arrangement, wired him a congratulatory telegram, an Imperial telegram, so to speak. If my right hon. friend will read that telegram closely, he will find that the note which was chiefly struck by Sir Howard Vincent was a note of joy upon the abrogation of the Belgian and German treaties, and Sir Howard Vincent could have nothing of knowledge, and consequently nothing of importance to state with reference to the actual results in improvement of trade between that country and this.

Ah, well, the right hon. gentleman says: We have established a penny postage throughout the Empire. I am quite willing to let the presentation of that case by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) stand before the country along with the presentation which was made by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon. By reading his own letter, he effectually disproved the position he had taken in the city of Montreal, for what he said to-day was that the two things done were: the removing of the inertia which had long blocked the way of penny postage, and the admirable and long-continued efforts of Mr. Henneker Heaton in that respect. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is entitled to all the credit that fairly belongs to him. I would not take away one iota of it, but what my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) was speaking against, and what we have the right to speak against, is that the Prime Minister should take the whole credit of this for the Postmaster General alone, when it is really due to long and persistent efforts, culminating at this time, and aided by the Postmaster General. I am quite willing to give him all the credit that is due him, but to say that "we" or "he" has brought about the boon of penny postage in the Empire, is not, I think, true in fact, and is not a position which the right hon. gentleman is warranted in taking. The Prime Minister declares that he was not in favour and would not move a resolution for penny postage at a certain time, because he was not aware of the condition of things financial and otherwise in the Post Office Department; but that when the Postmaster General showed him that $781,000 of a deficit had been reduced to a deficit of only $50,000 in a single year, then the right hon. gentleman became a convert to the penny postage, and he was quite in favour of it. Now, Sir, I beg leave to say this: That by no system of proper accounting can the Postmaster General or any other man show that a legitimate deficit for any one year of $781,000 was turned into a deficit of only $50,000. To do it you have to juggle with accounts, and the accounts have been juggled with in order to bring that about, which will be properly shown in due course of time. But my hon. friend had nothing to say with regard to another most notable decrease in the postal burdens of this country, made by the Government which preceded his own, and by my hon. friend who sits near me, when, by an enactment in Parliament, and without blowing his own trumpet to any large extent that I know of, he actually gave to the people of this country the right to send one ounce at the same rate at which they had formerly sent half an ounce, and thereby cut into half, for the benefit of the whole people of the country, the postal rate they had formerly to pay. That was a notable achievement, but it was done by a gentleman in pursuance of his duty and without getting up in a metropolitan city and declaring: "I have cut off half the postage impost on the people of Canada." The penny postage, so far as the Postmaster General is concerned, is also the result of a blunder. Just as they blundered into preferential trade, so my hon. friend blundered into Imperial penny postage; because the first idea of my hon. friend was to have a three-cent rate. That was the basis on which he started and on which his colleagues, if he consulted them, proceeded. Blunder succeeded to blunder, and at last my hon. friend blundered into the two-cent instead of the three-cent rate. As regards the great advantages of this penny postage, there may be differences of opinion. For my own part, I have no doubt at all that it is a grateful thing to a good many people in this country, but it is not a boon to the great mass of the people in any sense of the term.

Mr. DAVIN. It is no boon to the farmer.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a boon to certain classes; and to relieve these of a burden, which their business might very well have carried, the poorer classes of this country have to face the deficit that results, and pay it out of their taxes. I acknowledge that there is something of sentiment in it, but the sentiment in this case does not put anything into the pockets of the mass of the people who have to pay the deficit in order that certain classes may benefit. So far as it contributes to an Imperial sentiment between the colonies and Great Britain, it is an advantage.

The next thing my hon. friend says they did was to reform the tariff, and to reform it to the great satisfaction of the people of this country, to a great majority of them at least. But is my hon. friend explicit enough in contending that the only duty he had, consistent with his promises, was to reform the tariff in the way in which he has done it? Of late it has been customary for some of the Ministers and some of the party press to take the bold ground that the Government have carried out in its entirety their whole pledge to the people with reference to the tariff and fiscal policy. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) have taken that ground in speeches which they have made very lately. They have declared openly to the people that the Government have performed everything which they led the electors of this country before 1896 to believe they would perform. Sir, this is a question which cannot be left just in that condition. It is a matter which involves the good faith of public men; it is a matter which involves truth and honesty in high places; it is a matter which involves the demoralization or the ennobling of the public life of Canada; and I lay it to the charge of my right hon. friend and the gentlemen who sit with him that they have been guilty in this respect of setting into operation in this country a malignant influence in the highest circles of public life which is eating out and destroying honest and straightforward principle in all its ranks. With what holy horror my hon. friend would draw his skirts away from a man who would be so base and dishonest as to take a couple of dollars for his vote. My hon. friend, to believe him, even though he associated with the Merciers and the Pa-cauds, would draw away in holy horror from a man who would be so abandoned politically as to take a two dollar bill out of his pocket and offer it to a poor man for his vote. But my hon. friend sits in his high position, holds his head aloft, and looks as innocent as a cherub, notwithstanding the fact that as the leader of his party, he formerly went from one end of this country to the other saying: "Gentlemen, the Government of the present day bases its tariff policy upon the principle of protection, which is a robbery and a fraud; put them out and put us in, and we will base our tariff upon a policy which has every vestige of protection taken out of it." And when the honest electorate of this country took him at his word and elected him and his fellow-members and they became a Government, they utterly repudiated that policy and snapped their fingers in the faces of the honest electors who believed them then, but who will not believe them again. Sir, the crime of corruption by the dollar bill is a venial, a trivial thing, in comparison with the baleful corruption of public men who will make such pledges as that, and will utterly flout and scorn them after getting into office. My hon. friend poses as a man who would not—what did he say? Why, he said he would to God that he might never get power by means such as he charged against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. My hon. friend has posed in that halo of purity for a great many years. To what lower depth of degradation can a public man sink than to make his solemn and honourable promises to the people at large, win their confidence and get their votes, and then snap his fingers in their faces and refuse to carry out those pledges? Would to God that he might never have power if he had to get it by dishonourable means? My hon. friend sits there to-day, and his followers sit with him, because they got votes, got money, got influence, in the most dishonourable way, and used these to their own profit and their own advantage. They have fulfilled all their promises, said the Minister of the Interior. They have not fulfilled their promises at all on the tariff question, and they will not deceive the people by rising with brazen faces and declaring, against the full light of the people's knowledge, that they have kept promises which they have not kept. What were the pledges made by my hon. friends—the pledges of their conventions, the pledges of their leaders? I am going to give you some of them. But first let me have a word with my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who is nothing, if not subtle and darkly ingenious. My hon. friend cogitated, in the course of the interim between last session and this, on this question of getting out of pledges, and in the end he hit upon a very ingenious method. He said to himself, in the silent watches of the night; Laurier is not my leader. He and these men who sit around him—their pledges count for nothing. Blake is my leader, and I go back to 1887 and 1891, and I find what Blake was going to do, and I find that we have done just exactly what Blake was going to do. Therefore we have fulfilled all party pledges. That is ingenious but it is hardly frank, and I do not think it will hold before the intelligence of the people. Why, Mr. Blake—my hon. friend knows it—broke with his party on that very question. If the party had stood by Mr. Blake and fulfilled those promises, if they had obtained power with Mr. Blake as leader, they would have been right with the people, for Mr. Blake, before he went to the people, said: I take back certain things which I held before; free trade may be all right in theory but it is utterly impracticable now in this country, and all I can do—and I speak after having consulted with the members of my party, between whom and myself there is a virtual agreement—under present circumstances is to promise that the duty on flour, corn, coal and one or two other commodities may be lowered, but that other duties will have to be kept at the same range as now. That was an honest announcement, made by an honest man, before the election, when he had to go to the people, and he took the consequences of it. And one of these consequences was that my hon. friends repudiated him, and another consequence that grew out of that was that Mr. Blake, at a certain time in February, 1891, had to jump off from the ship that was being so badly navigated and swim for the shore and make his own salvation sure, whatever might happen the others. Since that time, the ship has been going over the seas without any standard chart, a real derelict on the political seas, simply waiting the favouring gale. My hon. friend cannot go back then to Mr. Blake as leader. His leader sits there in that seat. His leader's pledge is what he is bound by, and it is as to what was the pledge of his leader that I beg now to have a few words to say. It must not be forgotten that there were other leaders besides my hon. friend, and I shall take the opportunity of reading the opinions of a few of them from the report of the Dominion Liberal Convention, an authoritative party publication. What was the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat. He was brought in as the good man with my hon. friend from Lotbinière (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), to season the other more wicked members of the Government and make an average reputable Administration. Sir Oliver Mowat hoped that:—

After the next general election it may be truly said by the whole country that it was at the Liberal Convention held at Ottawa in June, 1893, that protection and bad government, and consequent political unrest amongst our people, received their death blow.

In the very heart of that great convention of Liberals, when the opinion of that convention was known and canvassed, when its pronouncements were decided upon, Sir Oliver Mowat declared that this convention, when it resulted in ultimate success at the polls, was to do what? Strike a death blow at the principle and practice of protection. Well, what did the present Prime Minister say at that convention. He declared this:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I submit to your judgment that the servile copy of the American system which has been brought amongst us by the leaders of the Conservatives, is, like its prototype, a fraud and a robbery, and I call upon you, one and all, to pronounce at once and give your emphatic support to the proposition that we shall never rest until we have wiped away from our system that fraud and robbery under which Canadians suffer.

On another page of this publication, my hon. friend followed that out. He said that he objected to the Government and their policy.

They want to reform the tariff and still retain the principle of protection. I submit to you that the ideal of fiscal systems is the British system of free trade. I submit to you that not a cent should be extracted from the pockets of the people, except every cent goes into the treasury of the people and not into the pockets of anybody else. I submit to you that no duties should be levied for protection's sake, but levied altogether and only for the purpose of filling the treasury to the limits required. I submit to you that every cent that is levied should be levied first and foremost upon the luxuries of the people. I submit to you, therefore, that the system of protection which is maintained by the Government, that is to say, of levying tribute upon the people, not for the legitimate expenses of the Government, but for a private and privileged class, should be condemned without qualification. Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection, our ideal is free trade. Their immediate object is protection, ours a tariff for revenue only. Upon this issue we engage the battle from this moment forward, and I ask you once more never do desist until we have achieved a victory, until we have freed this country from the incubus which has been weighing it down for fifteen long years.

I do not want to multiply instances of that kind of assertion. Stronger, infinitely stronger than that were the statements made by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government on the different platforms of this country from one end to the other. No one who has heard the hon. gentleman speak, no one who has read the proceedings of that convention, no one who followed the discussions before 1896 had any other than the strongest and most fixed idea that what the hon. gentleman pledged himself to do in the way of tariff reform was to eliminate the principle of protection and base his tariff upon the exact opposite, the revenue principle, and put in practice the free trade system of Great Britain, his ideal system, as rapidly and to the very largest extent possible.

Now, there is no use elaborating this further. That was the pledge given, that was the contract made with the electors of this country. Has he carried it out? Has he to-day a tariff that is based upon free trade according to the English ideal? My hon. friend knows that he has not. Has he a tariff based upon principles of bringing in revenue, with no vestige of protection for protection's sake, a tariff that levies no tax except that which goes directly into the Treasury? Can he say that not a fraction of a cent goes into the pockets of what these gentlemen formerly used to call the monopolists and robbers, and men who were despoiling the country? He knows that this tariff is based upon the principle and involves the practice of protection, and that the so-called reform that he has made has simply been the increase of duties in some cases and the lowering of them in some others, and on the whole, with the very slightest reduction in the taxation of the country. Now, will my right hon. friend listen to the facts of the case, as gleaned from the public records of the trade of the country? In 1893, the percentage of duties upon imports for home consumption was 30.28 per cent; in 1894 it was 30.87 per cent; in 1895 it was 30.87 per cent; in 1896 it was 30.07 per cent. Now, in 1897, the first year of the present Administration, but before their tariff had come into operation, it was 30.04 per cent. That is to say, in 1897 there was an alleviation in the duties upon imports for home consumption of exactly 3-100ths of 1 per cent. The year 1898 came, and the rate was 29.43 per cent. Seven months of the year 1899 have passed, and in those seven months the dutiable rate has been 28.89 per cent. Now, Sir, what are the gains? The year 1897 show a reduction over 1896 of 3-100ths of 1 per cent; 1898 shows a reduction over 1896 of 64-100ths of 1 per cent; the seven months of 1899 show a gain over 1896 of 1 and 18-100ths per cent. But what is happening now? January, 1899, has passed, and the reduction shown over 1896 drops back again to 31-100ths of 1 per cent. February also has passed, and it drops back to 47-100ths of 1 per cent. So if you take the later developments of trade in this country, you have still less than  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent reduction in the imposts on dutiable goods. But my hon. friend the Minister of Customs will say : You have not taken into account the free goods that have been brought in. Very well ; let us include the free goods and ascertain the state of things. In 1893 the duty on free and dutiable goods together imported for consumption was 17·38 per cent ; in 1894 it was 17·13 per cent ; in 1895, 16·99 per cent ; in 1896, 18·28 per cent ; in 1897, 17·87 per cent, and in 1898, 16·95 per cent. Thus there is a gain in 1897 over 1896 of 41-100ths of 1 per cent ; a gain in 1898 over 1896 of 1 and 33-100ths of 1 per cent. But what about the gain in January, 1899, and in February of the same year, Mr. Speaker ? Why, it is a gain on the wrong side. In January, 1899, the rate on dutiable and free goods entered for home consumption was 18·07 per cent, and in February, 1899, it was 18·70 ; that is to say, in the latest month the imposts on dutiable and free goods together were higher by almost  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent than in 1896. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite will go before the people and declare that they have reformed the tariff, that they have done away with protection, that they have fulfilled their pledges, and that the people of the country are satisfied. But it seems quite clear that all the people in the country are not quite satisfied. Even some of the gentlemen who sit on that side are not satisfied with the reduction that has taken place. For instance, there is the Winnipeg "Tribune," and there is also the Edmonton "Bulletin," which, I believe, are edited by staunch friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I cannot see that these are quite satisfied that the Government has redeemed its promises. In a late issue of the Winnipeg "Tribune," Mr. George H. Bertram, the hon. member for Centre Toronto is held up to the western consumers at least in no very enviable light, as being a protectionist in disguise—no, not in disguise, but as being an undisguised protectionist in the Liberal ranks—and the Government is warned against being guided by the opinions of Mr. Bertram. Says the "Tribune" :

Mr. Bertram spoke as a Conservative and a protectionist, while professing to be a Liberal and a free trader. It was north by south, and that was why, every now and then, some Liberal in the audience, with a remembrance of George Brown in his head, would nervously and suddenly run his fingers through his thinning locks to try and ascertain where he was at.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), who is the editor of the "Tribune," has been trying to find out where they are at on this tariff question for the last three or four months. At a meeting of the Liberals held in Regina, not long ago, there was a resolution passed, and that resolution reads as follows :—

Be it further resolved that the people of the West, and especially the farmers, are looking anxiously, expectantly and confidentially, for such a revision of the tariff as will conform with the pledges of the Liberal party as contained in the Ottawa platform, and as recently foreshadowed in the Budget speech of Mr. Fielding.

But, Sir, Regina is not the only town in which the Liberals are on the move. There was a meeting, the other night, of a Liberal club in the city of Winnipeg. The city of Winnipeg is roused, so far as the Liberals are concerned, with reference to a statement lately made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) at Perth, in which he had declared :

The tariff was a question that was settled, and was now a dead issue, because the Liberals had succeeded in solving this great question, and the tariff was one their opponents, if they got a chance, would not change much.

And so the following resolution was introduced into the association, and, I believe, is to be voted upon. It lays down the resolution which was adopted by the Liberal party in 1893 :—

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the mass of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burden under which the country labours. This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with fullest confidence the verdict of the electors.

And goes on as follows :—

And whereas, the now Premier of the Dominion, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, when speaking in support of the said resolution at said convention, declared :

"I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade. Let it be well understood, then, that we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their idea was protection : our idea is free trade ; their immediate object is protection : ours a tariff for revenue and for revenue only. Upon this issue we engage in battle."

And whereas, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, in his speech delivered on the 5th of April, 1898, as the same is reported in "Hansard," stated :

"We wish to guard against frequent changes in the tariff, against tariff tinkering ; but let us be careful how we convey the impression to the public, because we do not mean it that we regard the tariff as final. Let it not be supposed that the tariff is settled for ten years, or even for five years. So long as there are high duties there must be demand for tariff changes. Nothing is settled until it is settled in accordance with right, and so long as there are high duties we may expect agitation for reduction. I am afraid there is no rest for the protected manufacturer."

"I am inclined to think, Sir, that he will find eternal vigilance to be the price of his protection. He must be on guard all the time against the attack that he knows must always come. We will say, therefore, to the manufacturer that if he desires permanency in the tariff, he must never expect permanency until the tariff gets down to a moderate point ; and to-day there are duties in the tariff so high that I am sure the Government are not prepared to treat them as part of a permanent tariff."

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that this association desire to place on record a declaration of its continued support of the platform of the Liberal party as laid down at the above-mentioned convention, and its approval of the statements made by the Honourable Premier (Mr. Laurier), in support thereof, and the position of the Hon. Mr. Fielding in regard thereto, as above indicated, that the tariff is not a question that is settled, and is not a dead issue.

That stands before the Liberal Club in Winnipeg, because some gentleman asked that it should be postponed until it was found whether the Minister of the Interior had made the statement. But, whether he has made it or not, that is an expression of opinion by Liberals belonging to that club an important section of them at least, that the pledges made by the Prime Minister and other Ministers previous to the election have not been carried out, and they call upon them to carry them out.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. I have said that the Liberal clubs of Regina and of Winnipeg have called for the carrying out of the pledges which they alleged had not been done, and which, it is also alleged, are now being thwarted. Some of those pledges I have read, the pledges made by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. It may not be out of place to read the pledges made by one or two others. I find one made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, in this wise :

I say our protective system was a huge mistake, in so far as it was honest at all, and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery.

Again :

I stand by the declaration I have made, that protection is nothing more nor less than a deliberate, legalized and organized robbery ; and, more than that, if you do not stamp it out it is the very high road to political slavery first, and industrial slavery afterwards.

I find still later the same voice raised in this wise :

Our policy from first to last has been to destroy the villainous system of protection by free trade, a revenue tariff, or continental free trade.

I find that the leader of the Government himself declared at Newmarket, in 1893 :

I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. Our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection.

A voice from the maritime provinces, to wit, that of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, declared :

We have been attacking this policy year by year. This is an accursed system, a system accursed of God and man.

In the city of Toronto, I find the leader of the Government declared :

Call it protection, call it feudalism, call it slavery, I care not, it is the same thing. It differs only in degree, it is bondage.

Now, Sir, I think that with declarations of that kind, the innocent and deceived members of the Liberal party in Regina and in Winnipeg, and in every other portion of the Dominion of Canada may well stand aghast, and may well make their voices heard, in asking that the men who presume to be their leaders and who make these pledges, should not now call a halt, but should conform to those pledges or tell the reason why. But we find that at this stage of the game the Ministers themselves disagree with each other, and that is indeed the reason for the present resolutions which I have had the duty of reading here to-night. For instance, we find that the Minister of Railways and Canals—who has taken, by the way, no very strong interest in questions outside of his own peculiar sphere—did, in the province of New Brunswick, and in the city of Woodstock, in that province, according to the editor of the "Transcript," declare for continued change :

In a remarkably able defence of the Liberal Government's general policy, he especially dwelt upon the evils of the protective tariff system, and pointing out that the Government had made important reductions in the tariff, plainly intimated there would be in the near future important changes in the tariff along the line of freer trade and the elimination of the protective idea system.

With Mr. Blair's views in this matter, which are thoroughly representative of the dominant sentiment of the Liberal party, and in accord with the best interests of the people of Canada generally, and the permanent prosperity of its industries, every true Liberal will be in hearty accord. It is one of the strongest and most effective statements made by any Cabinet Minister since the change of Government. * * * "It is seldom that any speech by any political leader so thoroughly voices the views of his political party as did the speech by Mr. Blair at Woodstock a few days ago, to which our contemporary takes demagogic exception."

About the same time that Mr. Blair was holding forth at Woodstock to the delight of the editor of the "Transcript" and all true Liberals ; an industrious opponent—I beg pardon, an industrious colleague of his—the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was holding forth in the historic village of Valleyfield. He had gone there to chant the praises and to participate in the glories of the opening of a cotton mill ; a new one I think which was being opened in that village. And Mr. Tarte—as the newspaper speaks of him—in his speech at Valleyfield, after making many other allusions, referred to the cotton industry, in which Valleyfield is so intimately concerned, and is reported as follows :—

At the time when the Government had the question of the tariff under advisement, and were holding investigations throughout the country, Mr. Gault had come to him at Ottawa, and urged that the cotton duties be not lowered. He (Mr.

Tarte) had taken Mr. Gault by the hand and said to him, "Fear not, you can count on me; all I ask is that you should increase the capacity of your mills, especially those at Valleyfield."

Taking up the general question of the tariff at large, Mr. Tarte said that while the present Government had found itself obliged to make many changes for the sake of a removal of anomalies, and for other reasons, they had taken care that the tariff wall should remain sufficiently high to afford ample protection to Canadian industries. Looking now about him, he was satisfied that this policy had been a policy of prudence and of success. The iron, pulp, cotton, in fact all the larger industries of the country were in a better condition at the present time than they had ever been under Conservative rule.

"We do not," said Mr. Tarte, "claim that at our first attempt we have made a perfect tariff instrument, but we do claim that we have done much, and that many industries which were languishing are now prosperous. And I say that the grand principle of the tariff as it exists to-day will remain unchanged. We shall make slight alterations as it may seem to us that they are needed, but the tariff as a whole will stay as it is at present."

What was the grand principle of the tariff that shall remain, according to Mr. Tarte: he mentioned it above:

The Government had taken care that the tariff walls should remain sufficiently high to afford ample protection to Canadian industries.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have them—Mr. Blair at Woodstock, Mr. Tarte at Valleyfield, almost on the same night poles asunder upon the subject of the tariff. But, Sir, later on comes the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who in Perth, according to the Perth "Courier," a Liberal newspaper of sixty years standing, which heads it: "Hon. Mr. Sifton on the Tariff." "He tells the people of the east that it is settled and now a dead issue." "The tariff," he says, "is such that their opponents would not likely change much," is declared to have said:

The tariff was a question that was settled and was now a dead issue, because the Liberals had succeeded in solving this great question, and the tariff was one that their opponents, if they got the chance, would not change much.

And last but not least, to-day in this House, the leader of the Government who had gone from one end of this country to the other and on almost every platform had denounced the principle and practice of protection in all its moods and tenses, who had declared that free trade was the ideal; free trade such as they have it in Great Britain; had declared that they would sweep away every vestige of protection out of the tariff, make it a revenue tariff at once with the idea of modelling it as nearly as possible upon the British free trade tariff—to-day the right hon. gentleman stood up in this House and declared that they had settled the tariff to the satisfaction of the people of this country.

Now, Sir, can you wonder, that under all these provocative circumstances, the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) should raise his voice, and address these words to his chief:

You probably know, Sir Wilfrid, that the agriculturists of Canada, and particularly of Manitoba and the North-west were not fully satisfied with the measure of tariff reform granted them in your 1897 revision of the tariff.

You doubtless know that they were justified in expecting great things in this direction from the speeches which you and your lieutenants made throughout the country on the subject during the time you were in opposition. * * * But, all the same, public expectation has not been satisfied, and the settlers of the west especially, would like to see some further reductions, in fact they would rejoice to see the duty swept away altogether from many of the prime necessities. * * *

Do you wish to utterly efface and obliterate every vestige of disappointment that may linger because of the non-gratification of certain expectations?

Then, Sir Wilfrid, you must hitch your chariot to a star; you must efface all recollections of the past two years of official life; you must think that you are plain Mr. Laurier, leader of the old Liberal party in opposition, with your soul fired with righteousness, and your heart touched with the burdens of the agriculturist, and forgetting all consideration but that of a determination to strike the shackles from off your countrymen, go in for reciprocity and such reciprocity as will bring joy to the people of this land.

Remember, Sir Wilfrid, your promises; remember the past, and strike blows for your country that will put old Tubal Cain to the blush.

Remember, Sir Wilfrid, that for every monopolist and manufacturer you may offend, you will win a thousand friends among the agriculturists of the Dominion.

What do the manufacturers care for you or your Government beyond the length they can go in using you?

Remember that the manufacturer and the monopolist was for years, and is yet, your natural enemy.

Don't overlook the fact that the agriculturist is your friend, and has always been, and if you are to continue in office it will be by his grace.

Then, don't forget him.

You now have it in your power to serve him as he never has been served before.

Then, Sir Wilfrid, pay no attention to the pigmies who would turn you aside from the good work; take no stock in the monopolist and the manufacturers, but strike for the masses of your country.

Strike for the settlers.

Strike for the agriculturists.

Strike down protection.

Give us free implements, free lumber, and every other necessity free.

Hitch your chariot to a star.

Strike.

Strike.

My hon. friends opposite surely cannot withstand the cogency of argument and the infinite plaintiveness of appeal which is couched in the article which I have just read, and which is the heartfelt utterance of the present member for Lisgar, who is fighting the battle of the agriculturists against the monopolists and the manufacturers and the fiscal traitors in the Liberal camp.

Sir, what have we? Three years and a half have passed. The Government which came in on these pledges has had full time to perfect their plans and to put them into operation. They have perfected their plans so far as the tariff is concerned. They have put them into operation; they declare the tariff is settled. Have we free trade as it is in Great Britain? Every one knows we have not.

Is protection annihilated? To the extent of one-half of one per cent. This robbery, this delusion, this fraud, this incubus upon the country, this worse than slavery and bondage, has been annihilated to the extent of from 3-100ths of 1 per cent to a shade over 1 per cent. That is the extent to which it is done. For the whole tariff of my hon. friend, as the gentleman sitting directly behind him says, is modelled upon the principle that there shall be ample protection to the industries of this country. Have we a revenue tariff? My hon. friend knows we have not. The revenue tariff which my hon. friend advocated, and the only true revenue tariff is a tariff which puts on duties and taxation for the sole purpose of getting the revenue and putting it into the treasury, and which places the taxes where the most revenue can be got out of them. The true revenue tariff takes tea and coffee and all such articles of general use as are not raised in the country, and it taxes them all they will bear, and gives no protection of any kind. Protection and a purely revenue tariff are the opposites of each other. A revenue tariff, then, takes the luxuries of the country, which the richer people are supposed to buy, and it taxes them all they will bear; and then, on the general line of imports such as may be produced in the country, it puts what is sufficient to raise the largest amount of revenue, carefully grading it down to the line where it does not allow the productions and manufactures of the country to stop the supply of revenue, which comes from the impost of customs taxes on what is imported into the country. And the true tariff for revenue only will offset this import duty by an internal revenue tax sufficient to prevent any incidental protection. What my hon. friend always denounced in the protective tariff was that although you got money out of it for the treasury, you put more money by it into the pockets of the protected interests. Now, scan your tariff; look over its various items, and from the first item to the last of the dutiable list there is scarcely one item which is not modelled and based on the principle of protection instead of on the principle of either free trade or a revenue tariff only.

Has the abomination of specific duties been taken away from the tariff? How eloquent they grew upon that monstrosity, which consisted in part of a specific duty, in part of a specific duty joined to an ad valorem duty, and was so a mixed tax. They have reformed their tariff. They have had their time of denunciation. They have now taken their period of action; they have settled the tariff, and to-day how does it stand?

The items in the old tariff were 486 in number. Great simplification was to be carried out in the new tariff. The number of items is reduced to 452, a reduction of 34 items. That is simply mechanical. The items of specific duties in the old tariff were 175 in number, taking the sub-headings as items; in the new tariff they are 147, a reduction of 28. The items of ad valorem duties were 311 in the old tariff; they are 305 to-day, a reduction of six. The percentage of specific items in the old tariff was 36 per cent; in the new tariff it is now 33 per cent, a beggarly reduction of 3 per cent. The ad valorem items were 64 per cent of the whole; they are now 67 per cent, an increase of 3 per cent. So that even that abomination of specific duties which in the country was more dwelt upon than almost anything else, has scarcely been touched by these hon. gentlemen in this reform of their tariff.

Well, Sir, what about the rate of the customs tax? Has that been diminished or has it not? I have read the figures to the House this afternoon. What about the amount of the customs tax? for after all, you must take into account the amount of money taken out of the people by a tax as well as the rate. I have shown the House that the rate is not appreciably less; I will now show that the amount is very appreciably greater. The customs taxation raised in 1896, the last year of the Liberal-Conservative Government, was $19,800,000. In 1897 it was a little less. In 1898, however, when the new tariff had got into operation, it came up to $22,000,000 odd, an increase of $2,300,000 over the amount raised in 1896. But, Sir, the Minister of Public Works on a certain occasion said before his admiring auditors, "Wait till you see us next year." Next year has come and is rapidly passing; eight months of it have passed, and in the eight months of 1899 $2,500,000 more have been raised in customs taxation than was raised in the corresponding eight months of 1898. So that, comparing the eight months of 1899 with the year 1896, there has been so far $4,800,000 more of customs taxation raised than was raised in those months of 1896. Provided he same rate holds through the four months to come that has held during the eight months just past there will be considerably over $6,000,000 of taxation increase in 1899 over 1896. The customs rate has inappreciably decreased; the customs tax has increased at a tremendous rate.

Well, Sir, has the trade with Great Britain relatively to our trade with the United States increased? The House will recollect that it was a great item in the indictment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), that in the tariff of the Liberal-Conservative Government the duties were so arranged that we not only threw the trade into United States channels rather than into British channels, but that in the imposition of taxation we imposed a larger percentage of duty upon what came from Great Britain than upon what came from the United States. I will deal with only one point of that question to-night. That was a strong indictment against the preceding Government. It was to be the glory of the incoming Government that they should change all that sort of thing. Have they changed it in either one particular or the other? Let us ask the figures.

In 1897-98, comparing that year with 1895-96, what is shown? As stated yesterday, it was shown that we have imported $500,000 less in value of goods from Great Britain in the former year than in the year 1895-96. On the other hand, it is shown that we imported $20,000,000 more from the United States in 1897-98 than in 1895-96. Never was there so great a disparity. Take next the free goods, for these are free and dutiable imports. In free goods we imported $1,300,000 more from Great Britain and $11,000,000 from the United States. Putting the two together, the figures show that these hon. gentlemen, who attacked the preceding Government for discriminating against British trade, and who promised that they would remedy that sort of thing, have done what Sir, by the provisions of their tariff? They have effected this, that in comparing the two years 1897-98 and 1895-96, the total British trade with Canada has decreased by one half a million, while the total increase in the United States trade has been $20,000,000. That is the result which these hon. gentlemen have attained in that part of their programme which was to change the trend of trade from the United States to Great Britain by changing the discriminating tariffs which were the cause of that wrong trend of trade, as they declared it to be.

But what else have they accomplished? The export of trade of Canada to other countries has been hampered by their tariff. We have practically shut ourselves out from the trade with Germany which was a growing and most promising trade. I have not the figures at hand, but any gentleman who will choose to look up the figures of the exports of the United States will find that one of the best markets, as regards the export trade in American staples, after Great Britain, is the empire of Germany, and these are all staples of the very same kind that Canada raises for export. Under the operations of this tariff, whatever you gain, you have lost the promising opening which was being made for trade in these staples from Canada to Germany, because Germany now levies what are practically prohibitory duties against Canada. You have given our cousins in the West India Islands advantages by our tariff, and in return they have raised their tariff against you, so that you have gained nothing in that quarter. There is not a country in the wide world to which you can point to-day where you have gained one single opening for the exports of this country by any tariff or fiscal favours that they have given you or any alleviation that you have prevailed upon them to make. My hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) who modelled the policy, who determined with his colleagues that the policy of the Government was to be such that they would be able to give favoured terms to any nations that would reciprocate, finds that at last he has stumbled into a place where he is obliged to shut the door on every other country because of the preference he has given to Great Britain. Consequently that wideness and freedom of trade that good Liberals always stood for, and especially our hon. friends on the other side, has been completely blocked by the operations of their tariff and fiscal policy.

They have taken greater powers than any other Government ever asked Parliament to give them—powers to impose by Order in Council export duties which, with one single stroke of the pen, would change the course of the smelting and production of ores in the great province of British Columbia, so rich in resources and so boundless almost in its promises for future development. But the hon. gentlemen, after taking this power, under the plea of urgency and haste, trembled on the brink, and have done nothing to alleviate by changing the smelting conditions in the mining sections.

They took great powers and got legislation with reference to alien labour laws. They made a temporary show of energy by appointing some prosecutors, but latterly called them off, and their alien labour laws have been simply a dead letter on the statute, void of spirit and life.

They took tremendous powers to smash combines, yet under their very noses the octopus from the United States, the tremendous Standard Oil Company, has fastened upon the very vitals of this country, and is rapidly absorbing and assimilating to itself the whole coal oil industry in the province of Ontario and Quebec.

Yet these hon. gentlemen who are such business men, exigent men who wanted such powers given to them, and who got their credulous followers to give them the powers they asked for, sit there and do nothing while all these things are going on.

To-day there is a cry from one end of this country to the other, that if the United States will not give us fair entry to our lumber into their country we shall prevent them—no, Sir, I shall put it differently because that probably offends the sensitive ear of my hon. friend the Premier that we should look to the conservation of our own forest resources and our own industries dependent upon them and impose export duties on foreign lumber to protect our own people in their resources and industries. But nothing of this is done. These hon. gentlemen blunder in what they undertake and make fatal errors in what they do not undertake, and in every case have failed to give the country the advantage which might be gained by their exercising the powers they asked for and obtained.

Under the operations of their tariff, some industries have been annihilated and some crippled, but not a single one has been created. The industries that were annihilated and those that are somewhere crippled cannot force their voices on the attention of the public while times are good and the flow is prosperous and onward, but all the same the weakening effects are being felt, and by and by, in the stress and storm, when the real testing time of a tariff and fiscal policy comes, the country will wake up to find out what are the deficiencies and the real weaknesses of the tariff these hon. gentlemen have given us. Sir, there was no stronger test of the power and efficiency of a tariff policy than that test which, from 1892 to 1895, was applied to this Dominion under its National Policy, when, as was described here yesterday, while industries were being closed down and great factories shut up and banks closed and destitution and want of labour and lack of earnings were shown in the great republic to the south of us to a tremendous extent, here in the Dominion was felt the protective balancing power of our tariff which kept our industries for our own people, which enabled our artisans to earn their wages and kept their families from destitution and retained prosperity within the bounds of our country. When a testing time like that comes to the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, if they tinker much more with it, its deficiencies will be found out and its weaknesses shown. But, in his enumeration of the great things this Government had done for the country, the hon. gentleman declared that they had inaugurated cold storage. He should cultivate a little modesty; but if he cannot do that, he should, at least, manifest some tendency to make his statements square with the facts. If he has any knowledge of the history of administration in this country—and if he has not, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) will have that knowledge—he knows perfectly well, or he ought to know, that the system of cold storage found its initiation in the ably and well-conducted branch of the Department of Agriculture which is devoted to farming and the dairy industry, that the gentlemen whom the late Government appointed, and whom this Government have retained in that department, have been untiring, in co-operation with the Committee on Agriculture of this House, in devising ways and means for increasing, saving and marketing the raw products of this country. It was with these gentlemen that the idea of cold storage originated; it was from them that the recommendations came; it was to our then Minister of Agriculture, Dr. Montague, they came, and it was by myself that the votes to carry them out were brought to the Council and carried through this House. And if their recommendations, and the recommendations of the Government, and the votes recommended to the House as a basis for these operations, had been carried through, as they were not, in the session of 1896, owing to the obstinate obstruction of the then Opposition, a greater impetus would have been given to the marketing of the raw products of this country than was given. In the absence of Dr. Montague, the Minister of Agriculture, I myself, as the temporary head of the department, signed the first contracts that were made for cold storage with the steamship companies, and all preparations were made by Professor Robertson previous to the late Government going out of office. Under these circumstances, is it fair that hon. gentlemen opposite should pose before the country as originators of this scheme, and even if they thus pose before the country, is it seemly that they should pose before this House, which knows the circumstances and is fully seized of what has taken place? All that hon. gentlemen opposite have done with reference to cold storage is to carry out, and, I hope, to expand, the idea with which we commenced, to expand it by giving more money, the motive power in such cases, the idea being there in its fulness and entirety.

But the hon. gentleman says that the Government had the Intercolonial Railway extended to Montreal. Well, it was not the question in this House whether the Intercolonial Railway should go to Montreal or should stop at Lévis. There were differences of opinion on that question; but the discussion which arose did not take place upon the question whether the Intercolonial Railway should seek Montreal as a terminus, or should remain at Lévis, but upon the outrageously extravagant and partisan bargain that was made by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), aided by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). One would think that this would be the last thing that hon. gentlemen opposite would refer to. What does he think of the intelligence of this House, at what does he rate the intelligence of the country? Does he not know that it was only because the Senate held its strong hand upon that scheme that an interval was allowed during which his own Minister of Railways and Canals revised the bargain that he had made, and saved the country the sum of $550,000 in the case of the Drummond Road alone, and hundreds of thousands in addition in the case of the contract with the Grand Trunk Railway? And yet my hon. friend seeks to make it a reproach upon the Senate and upon the Liberal-Conservative party, that time was given to his extravagant, inefficient Ministers to revise the bargain, a revision by which more than three-quarters of a million dollars was left in the public Treasury, which otherwise would have been taken out.

My hon. friend says also that the Government have reduced the Canadian Pacific Railway freights. Yes, and before they gave an extra $2,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Crow's Nest Pass Road, the Canadian Pacific Railway had reduced freights, and in the course of trade would have done it again—must necessarily have done it, and, as a matter of fact, did in this case reduce them before the contract terms called upon them to do so. The hon gentleman had full power to say that the Governor in Council should fix the rates on the Crow's Nest Pass Road. But, more than that, what he did that we find fault with was that he gave the Canadian Pacific Railway two million more than the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were willing to construct the road for. And what some of his own friends behind him find fault with him for, and notably the hon. member from Nanaimo (Mr. McInnes), is that, in doing this, in carrying out the bargain, they allowed a present to be made of very many millions of tons of fine coal in great coal areas, at present valued at millions of dollars, to a company composed mainly of strong friends and political backers of the leader of the Government. That is very well known, and if any one does not know it, I invite him to apply at once to the eloquent and formerly enthusiastic member from Nanaimo. Whether he will remain equally enthusiastic in his denunciation of that deal, I do not know.

The leader of the Government said that they were at work upon the fast line. They are in motion, but whether they are making any progress or not is another thing. The travelling Minister is pretty diligently on his route, going and coming on the surface of the vasty deep, searching now for a new bottle-necked steamer and anon manifesting an intense desire to secure a water-proof and water-tight and unsinkable vessel. When he finds either one or the other, and gets it at a sufficiently low rate, I suppose we shall have progress then as well as motion. Some of the hon. gentleman's friends and colleagues have been a little previous in this matter. I am not sure but my hon. friend himself was. I am not sure but that he was led astray by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who declared in this House that there was no doubt at all but that the Petersens were perfectly able to carry through their contract, and would do it, though they were nothing but ship brokers, and by an enthusiastic telegram from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who, bubbling over with jubilee zeal, at a very opportune time sent a telegram to the Prime Minister which, I believe, inured to the benefit of the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). Being read in the course of the contest, it nerved the sturdy electors of Centre Toronto, in view of the successful accomplishment of a fast Atlantic service, to vote for a supporter of a Government that claimed to have brought it about.

Mr. FOSTER.

I believe that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took occasion to tell an audience—or was it the general public in an interview in London—that all arrangements were made and that in two years' time these vessels would be carrying freights and passengers over the waves of the Atlantic. Well, nothing has been done but this: The hon. gentleman tore up a certainty, and he embarked on a quest for an uncertainty. He went on a quest of getting something for nothing, and if he keeps on that same line, there will be no fast service for many a year for the Dominion of Canada. He has, however, been successful in giving a contract to a firm which were unable to accomplish their object after having hawked it about for nearly two years—successful in more than that, in bringing the period up to a time when the dockyards are so full in Great Britain, when Government and other orders are so far ahead, and when the labouring power is so thoroughly occupied that it will be with very much greater cost, at this moment and for two years to come, that these vessels can be provided, if indeed it is possible to provide them at all. The golden opportunity was lost. We might to-day have had these first-class vessels crossing the Atlantic. We are now about entering a period of time when their cost will be enhanced, and the time when they will be running is indefinitely postponed. That is what my hon. friends have done on the fast line, nothing and worse than nothing.

But that is not all. They have been down to Washington, and have been engaged on certain negotiations. I listened with—I was going to say surprise, and I think I may use that word—I listened with utter surprise to the declaration made by the First Minister, made in cold-blood, in this House, that he had made a discovery; that discovery was that there was not any desire in the country now for reciprocity. How long since? Three years ago every one of those hon. gentlemen was mounted on his hobby horse of reciprocity, careering through this country for all he was worth. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said the old reciprocity was the making of the maritime provinces, and Prince Edward Island particularly longed for the flesh pots of Egypt, on which, from 1854 to 1864, she had fattened and battered. The hon. gentleman, in the plenitude of his knowledge and experience, as no callow politician, but as a public man of years of standing and of ripe experience, as a man of gray hairs, which is supposed to indicate wisdom—he declared up to within six or eight months ago that reciprocity was not only possible, but it was the one boon which, for his own province, for the maritime provinces and for the whole country, was necessary, and was very intensely desired. But there were others. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is no youth either. He has been studying the political conditions of this country for nigh on fifty years. He inherited traits of political sagacity and the training that comes from study ; and for this half century he has been going to and fro in this country, meeting with its people, cultivating all sides of human nature, and becoming a perfect adept in reading the feelings and wishes of the body politic. And here translated, translated in all that tender gush which for a period was so characteristic of my hon. friend he has given the results of his ripe experience :

But what is even of more immediate consequence, we propose to obtain for you the power to trade freely with the rest of this continent ; to have leave to make the best use you can of your great natural advantages, which can only be done by full, free and unrestricted reciprocity with our kinsmen in the United States. The fact is plain, and clear, and simple, the best market for the articles you produce—not by the decree of men, but by the decree of the Almighty—

I wonder if my hon. friend has read that German-English skit which appeared in one of our papers this morning—Meinself und Gott—where the Emperor William connects the Almighty with himself and his different enterprises. I would advise my hon. friend to read it. Next to the serial of the Bytown Coons, which is now passing through the press, that will impress him with a great home truth, and with a certain amount of humour.

—not by the decree of men, but by the decree of the Almighty—lies in the country which extends to the south of you, separated generally by a merely imaginary line along the 3,000 miles of our southern border, reaching from that line almost to the equator. There is your market, there is the only market you can hope to hold, there is the market you have the natural advantages to enable you to compete for. I deliberately tell you—

From the wealth of my experience and of my wisdom—this is interpolated.

—I deliberately tell you that the market of the United States is absolutely—

Mark the definiteness.

—is absolutely and exactly worth all the rest of the world to us, situated as we now are.

In 1895, he said to the Liberal convention at Sarnia, after the Conservative Government had been trying to exploit, and had successfully tried to exploit the British market, and had been trying to open up markets in Australia and in other countries :

We must find you a better market, and we do not propose to look for that by preference at the antipodes. We do propose free trade with all the world as our ultimate goal.

Now they are taking a rest.

But we will be very glad to secure for you free trade with the rest of this continent as an exceedingly comfortable instalment on the highway thither.

A sort of half-way house, something like those imaginary shelters which the Minister of the Interior was to have along the route of the Teslin Railway last winter. But he was not satisfied to preach merely to unbelievers in Canada. He wanted a larger audience and a higher pulpit, so he installed himself in Great Britain, and delivered himself in this wise :

Free trade with the United States is vastly more valuable to Canada than free trade with all the rest of the world would be with the United States left out.

So much for the present Minister of Trade and Commerce ; not when he was a boy, not half a century ago, not twenty-five years ago, but in 1895 and since. He was willing for that even with the penalty of discrimination added, for he says :

When asked does the Liberal party favour discrimination against Great Britain by admitting American manufactures free and taxing the manufacture of Great Britain ?

His answer was :

Certainly we do.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) declared in this House :

One gentleman opposite says that this will discriminate against Great Britain.

What will discriminate ? This free trade with the United States :

Necessarily it must to some extent, but we cannot help that ; in fact, we have the right to discriminate.

That, from my ultra-loyal friend from Prince Edward Island. Again, he says :

I acknowledge that the proposition has on one face of it an element of discrimination.

And the leader of the Government declared :

This involves that we should offer to the American nation what is denied to the rest of the world. So it does, and it is a cause of bitter reproach to us by the Conservative party, who charge us with disloyalty to England.

And the present Speaker of the House (Sir J. D. Edgar)—now happily delivered from my utterance by your relieving him in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I trust that you will carry my words to him—the present Speaker of this House was so sure that unrestricted reciprocity was within grasp that in 1893 he wrote a letter to his constituents in West Ontario in which he said :

Events are moving rapidly, and I wish to say to the farmers of West Ontario that there is no longer any doubt that we can obtain unrestricted reciprocity by a treaty with the United States of America.

That was the belief of hon. gentlemen opposite as late as 1895 ; that belief was carried by them into their Government, that belief was preached by them in this House. Since they have been members of the Government, that belief actuated them and impelled them to the commission which has been sitting for the last six months in Quebec and Washington. My right hon. friend now comes back and having declared over and over again in this House that the only obstacle to an unrestricted reciprocity treaty with the United States that Canada did not have a Liberal Government to go and ask for it; that right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who said that they would go for it and that they would get it—he now comes back with the astonishing discovery he has made, that after the people of this country do not want a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and that he himself has changed his mind. Why has he changed his mind? What was the awful and impelling cause which rooted out from him this last half century of firm convictions which underlay his belief that reciprocity with the United States was necessary and essential to this country. What was the dire force that in a few short weeks rooted out that old and settled opinion and substituted an entirely new one in its stead? Cold storage did it—cold storage. That is the right hon. gentleman's explanation of it. Cold storage operated so powerfully on his mental constitution that it froze out the settled opinion of twenty-five years in the space of at least six months. Cold storage and British markets—and the right hon. gentleman sits there and stands there, and faces intelligent men and asks them to take that down as a reason why he has changed his opinion, his reason being that British markets have opened up within six months and cold storage is just now getting in its work. Why, Sir, British markets have been opening up for the last 12 or 15 years; gradually at first, by leaps and bounds afterwards. Let me tell my right hon. friend that the door of the British market went wide open, when after the refusals of 1891 to make a treaty upon fair grounds with the Dominion of Canada, and after the McKinley high tariff, the people of this country set their faces towards Great Britain and Great Britain took their goods and our people sent their goods there in larger proportion. And, Sir, the late Government bent its energies, and successfully, to the introduction of our goods into that market, and our goods have gone there in increasing quantities ever since. If cold storage changed him, cold storage and the opening of the British market ought to have had some effect on my right hon. friend many years ago, but it seems to have got in its deadly work only within the last few weeks.

What does my right hon. friend now do? He turns round, and with the most vigorous denunciation, he points to Sir Charles Tupper as being the only Canadian who was willing to barter the interests of Canadians for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who staked his own fortunes and that of his party on unrestricted reciprocity and discrimination against Great Britain, who went to Boston and New York, and coddled the people there with his theories, who sowed the seeds the plants of which met him at Washington when he was there recently—the theories of what Canada should do, and what the Liberal party would do when they came into power—my right hon. friend turns around and with that species of reasoning, which does more credit to his ingenuity than it does to his spirit of fairness or his reasoning powers; he tries to thrust all the lapses and errors of himself and his party during the last ten years on to Sir Charles Tupper as being the man who wanted to barter all the interests of this country to the United States for an unrestricted offer of reciprocity. The right hon. gentleman read an article or an excerpt from the Montreal "Gazette" which stated, as far as I could gather it, that Mr. Blaine was anxious that some gentlemen from Canada should meet him in Washington in order that they might talk over the basis of negotiation for a treaty of reciprocity. Well, if the right hon. gentleman will listen he will find how that question was solved; he will find the answer that was given, and the answer that was conveyed to Parliament. The delegates at that time did go to Washington and they met Mr. Blaine, and my right hon. friend has before him the results of that conference. The representatives of the Liberal-Conservative Government talked over the basis of a reciprocity treaty with Mr. Blaine, and they and Mr. Blaine fell apart from each other when Mr. Blaine made a demand for two things: one, for a uniformity of tariff between Canada and the United States, and the other that their manufactured goods should come into this country, and that we should discriminate against Great Britain. The answer was very soon given by the representatives of the Liberal-Conservative Government, and it was a decided negative.

These gentlemen of the Liberal Government went down to Washington with their record of years pledging them to unrestricted reciprocity with discrimination against Great Britain. Thus they prepared themselves measurably well to conduct the negotiation with the people of the United States, in the interest of the United States, but they did not find themselves so free as a Government as when they occupied an irresponsible position, and consequently their previous training rather told against them than in their favour. I could quite understand the United States commissioners, when these gentlemen were introduced one by one. "Sir Wilfrid Laurier! Oh, yes, we would like to negotiate with him. We have seen him in Boston; we have heard him speak; we have read his utterances; we know that he was pro-American through and through; we know that he is on record over and over again as declaring that our market is absolutely necessary for Canada. We would like to have him as one of our commissioners; invite him in."

Mr. DAVIN. He preferred the Yankee dollar to the British shilling.

Mr. FOSTER. "And Sir Richard Cartwright. Certainly, he is not unknown to fame. We have read his utterances, in which he declared that the market of the United States was worth more to Canada than those of the rest of the world put together; we would be glad to negotiate with him. Sir Louis Davies! Under another and more democratic name we have known him, and he has been an ardent advocate of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. And plain John Charlton—we know him. Oh, yes, bring your commissioners here, and we will squeeze them." What position were the hon. gentlemen in, with that record, to meet with astute, well-read, keen business men, and negotiate with them for a treaty that would be fair to this country? They knew the men, they had their history before them, and they would hold them to their previous utterances, and they did hold them. But we see another statement from the Napoleon of the North-west, who, by-the-by, seems to have been laying down the law very dogmatically lately. He has declared, in the very face and eyes of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) that the tariff is settled satisfactorily. In speaking at Stratford he declared that there was no chance for a reciprocity treaty with the people of the United States. What did he say?

We knew that at present it was useless to work for any large measure of reciprocity with the United States, whatever might happen in the future.

When was that spoken? Some time about the 10th of March. These were the gentlemen who went to Washington with the training that they had had. But that was not enough to handicap them. They thought they must handicap themselves a little more. Their pledge before 1896 was to go down and negotiate with the United States. They knew that they had made this pledge. They went down to the United States, but before they went they brought in a tariff measure in which they gave the United States free binding twine and free corn, and lowered the duties on coal oil and on coal, and in many other items of their tariff they gave to the United States what was worth millions to them in trade, and what they are taking great advantage of at the present time. They gave them these advantages in that spirit of generosity which so characterizes my hon. friend when he deals with other people's goods, when he deals with the country's resources and the country's money, as he did with the $250,000 for the sham plebiscite. He generously gave over to the United States the make-weights in the treaty before he went, and so doubly handicapped himself. He then went down to Washington, and as a result of six months hard labour he comes back and says, 'My mouth is closed; there is not any chance to-day for reciprocity, and the country does not want it anyway, and all that is left is a question that the commissioners cannot settle, but that must be settled by the two Governments or it cannot be settled at all.' Then he throws himself upon the mercy of the people, and asks them to call him the successful and great negotiator. Why, Sir, these gentlemen went through the length and breadth of the country to make the simple-minded, honest farmers believe, as in the late election in Bagot, they made the farmers think that they were going to get their hay and other products sent over to the United States free of duty, and consequently that these products would be worth just so much more to them, and that all that kind of produce close to the border which finds an easy transit to the other side of the line would be heightened in value to the farmers of the country. Up to the very latest hour they not only advocated that as a principle, but they advocated it practically to the people of the country, and now they come back and declare: "We have made a discovery: there is no use in the American market for us, and the people of this country do not want reciprocity anyway." I am afraid my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries happened on an unlucky fate. If it had only happened that he could have gone down there whilst Mr. Blaine was in the flesh, he would no doubt have been much more successful, if any reliance can be placed in what I find going the rounds of the papers:

Mr. Davies, the Liberal leader in the east, tells the following story:—"When in the States last year, I called on Mr. Blaine, and was received most cordially. In the course of a long and friendly conversation on continental affairs, he slapped me familiarly on the shoulder and remarked: 'Davies, you Canadians, at least those of you I've met, are mighty clever fellows—how on earth is it that you have in your Government such a confounded lot of asses while such splendid material is at hand?'"

It is a thousand pities that an unkind Providence should have called Mr. Blaine away to his everlasting rest before this mighty clever fellow from the maritime provinces had a chance to grasp the hand of the great statesman, and in turn slap him familiarly on the shoulder and say: "You, too, are a very clever fellow."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). When did you write that?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend the First Minister, although he declares that his memory is good, found it convenient to utterly forget one thing. What was that? It was the hon. gentleman's pledge of economy—a reduction of the expenditures of the country. Do I need to read his pledge again, made in Toronto, made in different other places in Ontario, given to the faithful broadcast, in which he said that extravagance had marked the expenditures for many years under the late Government, but that if they came into power they would reduce the annual expenditure one, two, three, and Mr. Mills said five million dollars per year? The hon. gentleman owes to that more than anything else his place in this House to-day. There is a feeling outside of contractors, and outside of the men who hang on to contractors, and outside of the politicians who bleed contractors for election purposes, and outside of that set of men who hang on to every party maybe, but to none more thickly than to the present party, who are wishing to make something out of the Government. All that class of people want extravagant expenditures, and that is the class of people who swear by the Minister of Public Works, and by whom the Minister of Public Works swears. He is seized with the idea that the people of this country want lavish expenditure, and he is the man who is going to give them lavish expenditure. Wait until you see us next year, he says. Four million dollars will then have been added, but at the end of the next year he will arise again in his might and say: Wait again until the next year, and another $4,000,000 will be added, and the man he leads, and who sits ahead of him (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), forgets his pledge to the country and the people whose confidence and faith he has outraged, and allows the expenditure to be increased by millions, though he pledged himself that it would be reduced by millions. How does that matter stand? It stands in this way. The Consolidated Fund expenditure in 1896 was $36,900,000, in round numbers. In 1897 it was $38,349,000. In 1898 it was $38,832,000. Now we have come to that famous year which the Minister of Public Works wished us to wait for and look at him. Eight months of it have passed, and, comparing the eight months of 1899 with the eight months of 1898, the expenditure is just two millions and a little greater in the first than in the second period. That is, there has been an increase in the eight months of this year over the same period of last year of over $2,000,000 in our Consolidated Fund expenditure. In capital expenditure he has done still better. In the eight months of 1898 it was $3,455,627, but in the eight months of 1899 it was increased to $6,634,729, or a net increase of $3,179,102. The total expenditures out of Consolidated Fund and capital account in 1896 were $40,700,000; in 1897, $41,800,000; in 1898, $42,900,000, and in the eight months of this year, as compared with the eight months of last year, there is an increase of $5,000,000 and a little more, which will make, at the same rate, the capital and Consolidated Fund expenditures for the current year well up to $49,000,000, as against $40,000,000 in 1895. But to parry that to some extent, the Minister of Railways and Canals says this: Do you not see that we have a great work put upon us? We found the canals totally inadequate, not sufficient depth of water on their sills, the Government sleeping, and nothing done, and we had to do all this tremendous work on the canals. But the facts show, I am safe in saying, that pretty nearly three-quarters of the work on the canals was finished when these hon. gentlemen took the helm. The Sault Ste. Marie Canal, which cost over $3,000,000, was finished at 20 feet depth. The Welland Canal, which has the regulation depth, was finished entirely, and the other canals which had to be constructed or deepened, were more than three-quarters finished, and the balance under contract; yet these hon. gentlemen go through the country and say: Yes, we are increasing the expenditure, but we must have canals, and we have been putting them through. It was "we" who enlarged the canals, just as it was "we" who gave the Imperial penny postage, and "we" found a blotch on the map to represent Canada, and made it a nation.

My hon. friend touched the plebiscite, and I use the word "touched" advisedly; but, characteristically again, just as he accused Sir Charles Tupper of being that heartless and abandoned wretch that was in Canada the sole representative who would barter his country's interest for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, he attempted to obscure his own dealings on the plebiscite question by throwing the blame on Sir Charles Tupper, because he only dropped a tear into the bosom of the prohibitionists, and did not say he would do anything more. My hon. friend, if he had dropped any tear of repentance for his devious course of action on this and other matters, would be nearer making his peace with the power above than he is at present. But, says my hon. friend, we have broken no pledge. Casuistry of the first water, and simply that. What more does he say? The prohibitionists, he says, made no demand. That will be news to some of the gentlemen behind him, because his friends behind him, who conducted the elections in 1896 and the campaign before that, went to the prohibitionists everywhere and said: Do you not see what Laurier has promised you? Do you not see what he is going to give you? The Tories never promised you anything like that. Vote for Laurier and the Liberals. They are the men that will give you what you want. My right hon. friend knows that he profited by such statements, the gentlemen sitting behind him know that they profited by them; yet the hon. gentleman has the assurance to say here, that he made no pledge. It is a mere casuist's plea, and nothing else. The prohibitionists, he says, made no demand. Then, let those hon. gentlemen now retrace their steps and take back their words and say, as does the Prime Minister, that the prohibitionists made no demand, that they did not want the plebiscite, and, therefore, were not beholden to the Liberal party for the promise of a plebiscite. But, says my hon. friend, yes, we made a pledge, but we only made it to the party. Now, I consider that very ingenious. If there ever was any medal higher than that blessed Cobden medal, I would have it struck and put on the other breast of my right hon. friend, to commemorate that most ingenious of all ideas, that in convention when the party made a public pledge and put it in their platform, they did not make it to the people, but the party just got together among themselves and made a sort of mutual pledge to one another, subject to a private agreement and mutual understanding.

Was that plank in the platform, the reform of the tariff by taking the principle of protection out of it, a pledge simply made to the party, with an implied condition? I believe it now. The implied condition was well understood by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). It was well understood by the manufacturers who were approached by the hon. gentleman's heelers and friends, saying: Let us shout against protection, they said; but hist! do you be quiet; it will not hurt you men at all; we will do what the Minister of Public Works afterwards comes up and says he has done—see that ample protection is kept for the manufacturers of this country. Do not interfere with our little plan. It is a very fine one. We will shout to the free-trader that we are in favour of a revenue tariff, that we are against these bloated monopolists, but we give you the tip in your ear to be quiet now; let us get in, and we will keep up the wall of protection around you. Then we have had the manufacturer coming to the Minister saying: We want to increase our manufactories; do not take the duty off. Then we have had the members of the Government grasping them with the warm right hand and saying: Fear ye not, we are with you, and we will keep in this tariff an ample limit of protection; go on and build more factories. And the pledge of economy moved by Mr. Gibbons and enthusiastically acclaimed by the thousand and one representatives on that hot June day in the city of Ottawa was not a pledge to the country, it was a pledge to the party with an implied condition. That implied condition I suppose was: We must say something to catch votes, and we will talk economy, but you promoters, you hangers-on, you that want to fatten at the public crib, keep quiet that we may have a chance to get in, and "wait until you see us next year." Was the plan which declared for purity of administration and politics a pledge to the people or simply a pledge to the party with an implied condition? The implied condition has been well understood by some of your Ministers and it has been acted upon to the utter debauchery and corruption of sections of this country. All these things were not pledges to the people, they were pledges to the party with an implied condition and the condition will be carried out whether the pledges are or not. What was the implied condition in this case? Where is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and was he aware of this implied condition? The leader of the Government has now told us what the implied condition was, but from 1893 until to-day he did not open his mouth about it in public, and except to those to whom he may have told it in private nobody was aware that the dice were loaded in that way. Talk about loaded dice! Imagine a man who pretends to be the leader of a great party making an agreement with interested members of his own party about a great matter of public policy, but keeping it silent and secret from the public who were asked to vote upon it. Think of him taking $250,000 of the people's money, and $750,000 more from the earnest men and women who were most interested in this election campaign, and putting all this machinery in operation and doing it without telling these people the conditions under which the contest was to be decided. Knowing well that these conditions were utterly impossible of fulfilment. Why, if a man were to put up two contestants in the prize ring without giving the conditions of the contest he would be tabooed by decent pugilists for ever afterwards. And the man, Sir, I do not care how many decorations he may have on his breast, who goes to the churches and to unions of earnest men and women of his country and forces them into a contest of this kind simply to delude them, allows them to go into such a contest without giving them the conditions under which it is to be decided—what opinion can we have of him? And now he thinks he is absolved when he can read a statement from three or four gentlemen that a 23 per cent vote of the electorate is not quite enough and there ought to be more. The hon. gentleman, with that odd obliquity which characterises him in matters of principle has missed the point of the question entirely. The question to-day is not as to the majority but as to the honour of a man or a body of men who would make a secret agreement with an implied condition to deceive the electorate and put this country to the trouble and turmoil of a great national contest without making public the conditions upon which that contest was to be decided. I must disagree with my hon. friend, I must disagree with his ethics and his peculiar political morality. If the prohibition plank of the platform was not a pledge to the people of the country then, Sir, there was no pledge given in that whole series of resolutions passed at that convention. What need had he to give a pledge to his party? His party was with him. He was looking for votes from the country, and when a party meets together what immense silliness for a man to say that they can make public declarations and pledges themselves, and that it is only for the party and not for the country. And what sublime disdain for the intelligence of common humanity is shown by the man who will rise and declare to an intelligent people that such a course would be honourable in a party or in a man. Who put that plank in the platform?

An hon. MEMBER. Landerkin.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps my hon. friend had some method in his madness and may have meant that plebiscite arrangement for some of his own followers. Who introduced that resolution in the convention? It was introduced by S. A. Fisher, ex-M.P. for Brome. I have read the report of the convention from end to end and I cannot find any intimation that there was any implied condition in regard to any of these resolutions. If it is to be found there, let the hon. gentleman show it. Nor can I find that in the discussions in that convention mention was ever made that they gave this plebiscite plank simply on an implied condition, as the hon. gentleman says, that there should be at least half the votes on the list in favour of it or it should not be enacted into law. It is the hon. gentleman's own statement, but it is not, so far as I know, backed up by anything in the records or by anything that transpired at the convention, nor do I find any mention made of an engagement on the part of the party prohibitionists that in case the vote should not be half of the total list, they should agree to drop prohibition for ever after. I believe that Mr. F. S. Spence, the Secretary of the Dominion Alliance, was a member of that convention, that he spoke in the convention, that he was there not only as a Liberal but as the guardian of the interests of the temperance people in the Dominion. If he was not there in that capacity he had no business to be there at all, holding the position that he did as Secretary of the Alliance. May I ask my hon. friend if the implied condition and the solemn engagement were acceded to by Mr. Spence, who was a member of the convention? My hon. friend does not answer. If it was known to Mr. Spence, then Mr. Spence has put himself in the position of betraying the temperance people in this country. He went through that campaign from beginning to end telling the people to vote for the plebiscite and if they voted for it in the majority they would get the enactment. Or if it was not made known to Mr. Spence, does the hon. gentleman think he treated his own followers rightly if he had implied conditions with his party and did not tell that implied condition to that member of his party as well as to the others? There was an implied pledge and an engagement? Did the hon. gentleman inform the present Minister of Agriculture of that engagement and condition? If he did, he put the present Minister of Agriculture in the position of standing before his first audience in the city of Ottawa, on the same platform as myself, when we spoke earnest and I hope true words to the people, urging them under all the difficulties to come out and vote, for their future depended on the vote that they would give. I took it for granted that the old constitutional laws, which keeps up our administration, which puts governments here, was good enough, if it was good for anything, to govern in this case also. The Minister of Agriculture, on that platform, in my presence, in the course of his address and of his exhortation, declared to the earnest people before him: Now, if you want prohibition, vote for this plebiscite. He put in no 50 per cent condition. Did my hon. friend impart that knowledge to the Minister of Agriculture, or did he allow him to go into the fight without the knowledge of that implied condition? If he did the former, I have no hesitation at all in saying that the Minister of Agriculture did not deal fairly by me or any other friend of temperance, in urging us to go into that contest and spend our money and our time on an utter impossibility. After this assertion made by the Prime Minister to-day, the Minister of Agriculture must explain either his betrayal of the temperance people, or the refusal of his leader to entrust a colleague with such vital information. And the hon. gentleman sits there to-day in his position of strength and mightiness, sits there to-day upon a 28 per cent vote of the electoral list of this country, gained in 1896. He makes laws, and he negotiates treaties, and he would lay down the fiat to both Houses of Parliament, if he could.

An hon. MEMBER. He did not negotiate a treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, he tried to do it. If he did not negotiate a treaty, he negotiated himself, because he found out enough at Washington in six weeks to upset every idea and belief that he and the youthful Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the even more youthful (in appearance) Minister of Trade and Commerce, had for the last twenty-five and thirty years had pounded into them by their experience and by their political study. He went down there imbued with the idea that it was absolutely necessary we should have the market of the United States; he came back unsuccessful and now says that the people of this country do not want it at all. He made discovery, changed a long-held opinion on this matter, an opinion which he and his conferees ran their election upon, and on which they got a great many votes. Then my hon. friend will not tell me whether that 50 per cent condition was known to the Minister of Agriculture, who headed the temperance forces. The right hon. gentleman sitting there was on the platform of the Methodist Church in this city when the women of Canada presented him with that world's petition, and the Minister of Agriculture was with him. The Minister of Agriculture, in his speech, declared that that day had marked an epoch in the onward progress of prohibition and temperance in this country, as he, a member of a Government, had that day introduced a Bill for a plebiscite upon which the people could vote for prohibition in this country. But what irony, what cruelty, what immaculate meanness, if there could be such an aggregation of terms, in the knightly and courtly leader of this Government, to sit there in the presence of those earnest women and allow them to be misled with the idea that they were going into a fair contest where the people's will should rule. when all the time he had made a 50 per cent condition. Sir, what did Mr. Fisher say at the convention in 1893? He said:

I propose to read the resolution which will bring about this result,—

What result? A prohibitory law, that is what he was speaking about.

—and which pledges the Liberal party, if returned to power, to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views upon this question, and the Government in power must necessarily carry out the expressed will of the people. There is no doubt that that is what the Liberal party would do. We know their pledges can be trusted.

He goes on to say:

I am glad, therefore, that the great party to which I belong, and with which I have worked, is prepared to take a stand upon the temperance question, and to declare in its platform in favour of a step in the right direction upon this subject.

These are the pledges of Mr. Fisher, now Minister of Agriculture. But more than the Minister of Agriculture have spoken on this question. In October, 1895, the Prime Minister, then plain Mr. Laurier, then in Opposition, in reply to the Rev. Mr. Huxtable, whom I know very well, and who is a most earnest and, I believe, sincere Methodist minister, said this:

The Liberal party has pledged itself in convention at Ottawa that whenever in power they would take a plebiscite on the liquor question, as to whether the people want a prohibitory liquor law or not. The answer is not in my hands, it is in the hands of the people, and, according to their answer, such legislation they will have at the hands of the Government.

Does not the Prime Minister think that, as an honest man, he should have told Mr. Huxtable, in addition to what he did tell him, have told him frankly: Mr. Huxtable, I must tell you and your temperance friends that you must get a 50 per cent vote, for there is an implied condition set by the party that unless you get that, nothing can be done. At Stratford, before an audience of 4,000, on the 9th of June, plain Mr. Laurier that was, is thus reported to have spoken:

Mr. Laurier's attention was given to prohibition. He said: Up to this moment the question of prohibition has never been approached by electors free from other considerations. We deem it wiser to separate it from all other considerations, and to test the public feeling on the matter, we shall do so when we come into office, as I believe we shall. Then I am asked what is to be done? The answer is plain. I am by nature a democrat. I believe in democratic government, and above all in a constitutional government, and the only way to act under a democratic and constitutional government is that the people must govern, and their command must be obeyed. As the people shall speak so shall be the duty of the Government, if that government be in the hands of the Liberal party. This explanation of the Liberal policy on the prohibition question was apparently satisfactory from the applause with which it was received.

And the editor adds:

Laurier is now where his noble democratic spirit can reveal its true greatness.

At Listowel, the question of prohibition was under discussion, and in reply to an interrogation, he said:

We deem it wiser to separate it from all other considerations, and to test the public feeling on the matter, we shall do so when we come into office, as I believe we shall. Then I am asked what is to be done. The answer is plain. I am by nature a democrat; I believe in democratic government, and above all in constitutional government, and the only way to act under a democratic and constitutional government is that the people must govern, and their command must be obeyed. As the people shall speak, so shall be the duty of the Government, if that Government be in the hands of the Liberal party.

That shows that it was well thought out and stereotyped, for it was the same answer he had given at other places. In Winnipeg he made a vigorous speech to the people against taxation, against increased expenditure, in favour of free implements, and against the bloated monopolists and manufacturers. Then they asked him what about prohibition, and he declared that:

He would pledge his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power in Ottawa they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Did he really say that?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, he said that. But, Sir, we had the right hon. gentleman, in this House, when the Plebiscite Bill passed, when he was pressed by myself and Sir Charles Tupper to give some definite information to the people of the country, both prohibitionists and the liquor men, both largely interested—both would spend money, both would spend time, both would go into a contest of some weeks duration, heated and expensive, and a hard campaign—the right hon. gentleman was asked to say honestly and frankly if he would enact any new condition, or if the old-fashioned British rule of government by majority should hold. The right hon. gentleman, when asked:

If an affirmative vote would be followed by a Bill, and what would be considered a sufficient vote?

Said:

I have often said, and I can only repeat here, that when the will of the people has been affirmed, as it will be affirmed, one way or the other, then the Government must be prepared to abide by the consequences.

When asked, further, what this explicitly meant, he said:

It means that the Government, when they have the will of the people before them, will have to take such steps as will give effect to the will of the people.

That was the latest utterance of my right hon. friend in Parliament. But, Sir, there is another utterance which acts as a gloss to all these—the utterance that he gave to that Liberal Convention of 1893, on a steaming summer day in Otiawa, and which was heralded from the faithful there to the faithful all over the country as the dictum of this great coming leader of the Government of the country. What did he say, written down in the book :

We must be governed by the majority. I do not say that the majority is always right, but until we have something better we must be governed by the rule that the majority must govern.

Now, Sir, if anything could be clearer than that reasoning and that conclusion, I do not know what logic and sound reasoning mean. The right hon. gentleman, whatever were his implied and secret conditions, led the people of this country to believe everywhere, that he was honest and frank with them, and that when the will of the people—such a will of the people as put him where he is, 28 per cent of the total electorate, the will of the people that has put men behind him with 20 per cent of the vote of the electorate to make criminal and civil laws which shall be binding on every section of this country, to sustain an Administration which shall administer millions of dollars and untold millions of the resources of this country, to give the power that belongs to all legislation and all administration as well—the right hon. gentleman led the people of this country to believe—whatever he may have whispered to his interested friends—that if they voted and obtained a majority vote, it would be followed by their will being carried out, and his Government would carry out their will. Sir, it is not necessary for me to read the vote ; it is not necessary for me to take the voters' list of every member who sits behind my right hon. friend, with the percentage of the vote which he got, and to show him that it sums up to about 28 per cent of the total votes on the list. This plebiscite vote is 23 per cent ; but oh ! the cruelty of it, and the unmanliness of it, and the lack of anything like public frankness of it, to bring the two sections of the people of this country together in a heated contest over a great principle, and to keep secret from one section the ultimatum which he knew would dash down irreparably every hope they had of carrying that which they believed to be good for this country. You, Sir, may be an anti-prohibitionist, and I may be a prohibitionist, and we both may be honest in our beliefs. Neither of us would impugn the honesty of the other ; and neither of us, if he had a spark of manliness within him, would think it was proper or manly to gain an advantage by entering upon the decisive struggle under secret and implied conditions which utterly handicapped one of us and gave the victory without a shadow of doubt to the other before one blow of the battel was struck. Such, Sir, is unfair in the rules of the ring ; such is equally unfair and unmanly in public politics ; but it is characteristic of my right hon. friend. It is characteristic of his Government: they seem to have lost any feeling of honourable men that they are bound by their pledges, and bound to be frank and manly with the people, bound to do what they said they would do, when they were seeking for power, and for place, and for position.

The churches, and the unions, and the earnest men and women of this country demanded that this manly and frank treatment should have been given to them ; they have not had it. My own opinion is, that they will think about this matter, and think about it very seriously, and, above all, will hold this in view ; that the question at this present moment is not as to what should constitute a requisite majority, but the question is, as to the policy and the treatment which led earnest men and women on for years with heightened hopes and then plunged them into the final contest where, as I have said, they were hopelessly handicapped by a secret engagement and a condition which effectually barred all possibility of success to them and just as effectually delivered them over to certain defeat.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, there is, I believe, an old and excellent proverb which prevails in the province of Quebec, whereby defeated suitors are allowed a period of two days wherein to curse their opponents and the judge who has decided against them. My hon. friends opposite have enjoyed, according to parliamentary usage, their two days, and very much good may it do them. For myself, I am bound to admit that I feel considerable sympathy with these gentlemen. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition may be excused, smarting from his defeat in West Huron, for feeling a little sore at the response which was made to his somewhat pathetic appeal to the electors of that part of Canada. Whether, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) ingeniously observed, he was beaten on that occasion by 118 stripes, or, as on the former occasion, with 300 stripes—in the contest in which my late lamented friend (Mr. Cameron) took a part—does not materially affect the result. As for his hon. friend beside him (Mr. Foster), he also had a somewhat bitter experience a very few weeks before, when, in the plenitude of his conceit, he thought fit to challenge my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to decide before the electorate of their native province which of the two best deserved the support of the great province of New Brunswick. He may possibly condole with his brother in affliction who sits beside him ; because, if I remember aright, on the occasion of a similar appeal to the electorate of the province of Nova Scotia, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition returned rejoicing, with three members out of thirty.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Three out of thirty-eight.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I thought it was three out of thirty, and I had a reason for thinking, I might almost say hoping so, because, if I remember aright, my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) went down conquering and to conquer, and he returned with four out of forty.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Four out of forty-six.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Then the parallel is almost complete—let them embrace each other. And my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition may derive a crumb of comfort from the reflection that if things peradventure had gone otherwise, his tenure of his present place might not have been as secure as it is at present.

Sir, I do hope that we are not to take the speeches made by my hon. friends, the leader and his first lieutenant, as a sample of the speeches wherewith this House is to be regaled during the remainder of the session. I do trust that my hon. friend will recollect that we are not living in the days of Methuselah, but in the last hours of the 19th century. I do hope they will recollect that the wishes of the people of the country, and I think the wishes of the members of this House, are no longer in favour of yard-long essays, but that they would prefer something shorter, something pithier and more direct than our hon. friends have been pleased to give us. I do trust that they will remember for the future that verbosity is not necessarily eloquence, and that loud talking does not necessarily involve logic.

Sir, I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman who last spoke, if anything could have surprised me, after my somewhat long experience of public life—although I do not muster, I beg to say, the 50 years with which my hon. friend was pleased to endow me—I was surprised to hear him denouncing my hon. friend—for what? For trifling with the great question of prohibition. Sir, I did think there was an hon. gentleman not unknown to fame in this House who had climbed to power and place in this country by his fervent advocacy on all occasions of the principle of prohibition. I did think, Sir, there was a gentleman whom I heard with my own ears in this House speak of the liquor traffic as a traffic in liquid damnation, but who, during the many years he held office—with the exception, I am bound to give him justice, of issuing a commission to certain friends of his own at a cost of $100,000 for the purpose of accumulating evidence touching the condition of the liquor traffic—does not appear to me, during his period of office, to have taken one step or to have raised his little finger to put down this traffic in liquid damnation which he denounced so vigorously in earlier days. Surely, Sir, it was in a moment of weakness that he reproached my hon. friend with coquetting with the liquor question. He coquet with the liquor question? Surely not. That is the privilege, the perquisite, the absolute monopoly of my hon. friend opposite. Sir, my hon. friend beside me has been poaching upon his chosen preserve if he has presumed to coquet with the liquor question. But, Sir, when my hon. friend from York talks of truth, of loyalty, of a fine sense of honour, when he intimates that my hon. friend—I took down his words—"ought to be tabooed from decent pugilistic society" by reason of the part he has taken, my hon. friend must credit us all with fearfully short memories when we recollect the part that hon. gentleman and six others like himself took three years ago in this House on the occasion of their desertion and betrayal of the leader whom they had sworn to support. Perhaps my hon. friend will pardon me for quoting a little stanza that my memory recalls on this occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it from the Bytown Coons?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is somewhat in that sense. My hon. friend talks of trust, of faith, of loyalty, of honour.

Foster's faith and Foster's trust—
Write the characters in dust :
Stamp them in the running streams,
Print them in the moon's clear beams,
And each evanescent letter
Shall be firmer, clearer, better,
And more permanent, I ween,
Than the thing those letters mean.

Mr. FOSTER. We will have to make you the poet-laureate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend from York states, perhaps not incorrectly, that things are discussed by my hon. friend beside me in a spirit quite different from that which prevailed on the other side; and in particular he was struck by the marvellous self-command and self-control and abstinence from the strong language which distinguished the honourable baronet who leads the Opposition? Well, I do recollect that the honourable baronet talked of my hon. friend beside me as silly, absurd, incompetent, described his policy as monstrous and untrue, and hinted at the humiliation which Canada had sustained at the hands of my hon. friend. We will have a word or two to say as to that presently. The hon. gentleman advised us to ignore the past. Sir, does not the hon. gentleman wish that he could ignore his past and that his friends could ignore their past and all those shameful incidents which blotted and marred the history of Canada in the beginning of 1873? I cannot accuse them all individually so far back; but if there ever has been a party at whose hands the people of Canada are entitled to demand a stern reckoning for stains on the public honour, stains that must remain as long as the history of Canada endures, it is the men who held office in Canada in the early part of 1873 and those who held office in 1891. I am not going to-night to rake up all these matters of the past. Were I to do so I would require not merely three hours and a half, as the hon. member for York consumed, not merely five hours, as the hon. gentleman beside him consumed; but I would require ten times three and ten times five hours before I could come to an end of their list of iniquities. The hon. gentleman went on to say that we had broken our pledges, that we had failed to give effect to our policy. He went on to declare that in everything we had undertaken we could only exhibit a record of misfortune and disaster. Sir, the records of the public accounts do not show that; the records of our trade and commerce do not show that. The statements of men far better qualified to judge of what pertains to the honour of Canada than the hon. gentleman is, do not bear out his statement in the smallest degree. The hon. gentleman pretends that the abrogation of the German and Belgian treaties was due to his efforts and the efforts of his friends. Sir, the efforts of himself and his friends were utterly powerless for ten or twenty years to move the English Government one jot. It remained for the Government of my hon. friend, by the introduction of preferential trade, or by the introduction, at any rate, of a tariff which enabled the English people, to all intents and purposes, to obtain preferential trade with Canada, at one stroke to induce or compel—let him call it as he will—the English Government to immediately denounce these treaties.

Now, he says that our policy does not help us in getting trade with England. He very greatly mistakes the facts and the temper of the people of England. Every man in this House and country, who within the last two years has paid a visit to England, knows that the temper of the English merchants and consumers and the people at large has undergone an extraordinary change in favour of Canada since the day my hon. friend rode behind Her Majesty in the Jubilee procession. They know that to-day in England the fact that an article is of Canadian make is a recommendation to the English consumer. They know that the English people are willing to give us a preference if we show we are worthy of such preference by giving them such an article as they have a right to expect at our hands.

He pretends that our exports grew quite as fast under his management and that of his predecessors as under the management of my hon. friend beside me. It is well that the House should have the facts presented to it briefly and simply on this question. I find that in 1892 our exports to England amounted to $64,000,000. In 1893 they also amounted to $64,000,000. In 1894, they were $68,000,000; in 1895 $61,000,000, and in 1896 $66,000,000. For a period of five or six years they made scarcely any increase whatever. The Liberal party then came into power, and between 1896 and 1897 our exports rose to $77,000,000, an increase of $11,000,000 in one year, and in 1898 they reached the figures of $104,998,000. Sir, the increase in our exports to England in the two years of Liberal rule between 1896 and 1898 amounted to close upon $40,000,000, while the increase from 1873 to 1896, a period of something like 23 years, amounted to only $28,000,000 all told. In other words, we have not quite doubled, but very nearly doubled, in two years the total amount of increase that took place in the preceding 23 years.

Sir, the hon. gentleman gave us a number of what I must say were very unnecessary statistics with respect to the percentage of duties. Now, I have to tell the hon. gentleman that that mode of argument is wholly and absolutely inaccurate. If the hon. gentleman will reflect, he would know this, that it is utterly absurd to compare the effects of one tariff with another on the principle of the mere percentage of duties collected, and for this very obvious reason. It is perfectly easy for any man who understands it to draw a tariff which should at one and the same time be prohibitory to a very high degree, and yet, on the articles admitted into the country, levy comparatively a low percentage; and when he speaks of the effect of the reduction of 25 per cent on English manufactured goods, he forgets entirely that over and above the actual amount of money saved, as shown on the customs returns, you must, if you want to ascertain the amount of relief to the people, if you want to ascertain the whole amount saved to the people of Canada, take into account the necessary reduction made by the home and foreign manufacturers who come into competition with the English importers. Put those together, and you will find that the amount of duties which has been saved to Canada by our policy must be measured by many millions more than the mere amount shown in the customs returns.

My hon. friend makes it a charge against us that in the eight months of this year we have collected $2,500,000 more customs duties than were collected under his tariff in a similar period. That is, he makes it a reproach against us that we have very considerably reduced the burdens of the people of Canada and at the same time put a great deal more money into the treasury. Why, that is the very thing which a Finance Minister ought to try to do, and which my hon. friend did succeed in doing; and although I am not going to anticipate the discussion on the Budget, although I think it is entirely out of place at this stage to introduce a lengthy discussion on this subject, I cannot refrain from calling attention to one or two brief facts of the kind.

When he calls attention to the reduction of the specific duties and claims that these are insignificant, he wholly ignores the fact that the great majority of the specific duties retained in our tariff are specific duties on articles of food, which neither he nor I nor any other Finance Minister ever dreamt of proposing to tax ad valorem. Strike out the articles of food in question, and you will find that the proportion of specific duties which have been reduced by us is very considerably larger than the hon. gentleman is pleased to give us credit for.

Mr hon. friend reproached us with the fact that, under the pretense of a money subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the matter of the Crow's Nest Pass, we had granted large areas of valuable coal lands to certain supporters of this Government. Sir, this Government never had an acre of coal lands to give away. These coal areas belong to another company which existed long before this Government had anything to do with the Crow's Nest Pass, and which my hon. friend beside me tells me was then composed exclusively of Conservatives, and these coal areas were acquired in ordinary trade and bargain by the gentlemen to whom he referred. But the Government did do something worthy of notice on that occasion. We did make it a condition that a large section of coal areas which we did not previously own should be deeded to us in trust for the benefit of the people, so that these areas might not be used to the injury and detriment of our people.

It is not my intention to-night to go into the moot question of reciprocity further than this. I say, as the hon. gentleman and his leader has said, and as the late Sir John Macdonald has said, that reciprocity with the United States, if it can be obtained on proper terms, would be a very great boon to a very great number of the people of Canada. But I agree with my hon. friend that while reciprocity is desirable to-day, it is much less important to the people of Canada, and is probably less desired by the people to-day than it was a matter of a dozen years ago. So far we are in accord, and I defy the hon. gentleman, in his calmer and more reasonable moments, to get up in this House, and to tell this House and country that trade with the United States can ever be anything but a matter of great importance and value to the people of Canada.

The hon. gentleman was pleased to enlarge at considerable extent on the fact that our commission went to Washington and returned without accomplishing anything in the way of a treaty as yet. On that I shall have something more to say presently. For the moment allow me to remind the hon. gentleman that the Liberal-Conservative Government did send a commission to Washington. Aye, Sir, they sent a commission twice. Which particular visit does my hon. friend refer to—that visit when they went in the morning and returned in the afternoon, for reasons best known to themselves, or that rather more lengthy visit when the hon.

gentleman immortalized himself by demanding that Mr. Blaine should draw up a scheme of taxation and explain to him (Mr. Foster) how a revenue was to be raised from the people of Canada in case they engaged in a reciprocity treaty.

My hon. friend beside me (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) suggests that I should move the adjournment of the debate. Perhaps, out of compassion to my fellow-members, I should accept the suggestion. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT.

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ending 30th June, 1898.—(Mr. Mulock.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (P.E.I.) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, there are one or two facts to which I would like to direct the attention of the House, and more particularly to direct the attention of the hon. leaders of the Opposition. The first of these is, that, by to-morrow a full week will have elapsed since we were placed, through you, in possession of His Excellency's Speech from the Throne. The other is, that, owing to circumstances altogether beyond our control, and more particularly to the lamented death of Mr. Dingley, the meeting of this House has been delayed as everybody knows, to a period far beyond the ordinary and regular time. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, I hope hon. gentlemen will not take it amiss from me if I suggest that, if, as I understand from the language used by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), they have no intention of implementing their attacks upon the Government by a motion, peradventure it would be as well that we should bring this discussion to a tolerably early close and proceed with the regular business of the session.

Sir, it is probably that it would be more amusing than edifying, on the whole, were we to engage in any fine calculations as to whether the hon. member for York or the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who sits beside him is the worse beaten man in the recent elections in their own provinces. It is rather a fine point to decide whether a man who succeeded in electing three out of 38, or the man who succeeded in electing four out of 46 is, on the whole, the more hopelessly defeated. It would also be more amusing than edifying, did I feel warranted in wasting the time of the House on the subject, to dissect the past lives and conversations of these hon. gentlemen with a view to ascertaining in whose case the professions were the loftiest and practice the lowest.

Sir, far be it from me to interfere with any arrangements which the hon. leader of the Opposition may have thought fit to make for the purpose of enlightening the inhabitants of the benighted province of Quebec: but I have just received a telegram which would seem to show that the task before him is likely to be a somewhat arduous one. As the House is aware, an election was lately in progress in the district of Lévis, and

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

I find that in that district where the hon. gentleman proposes to do missionary work, so benighted were the inhabitants that the candidate of the Government was elected without opposition about sixty minutes ago. Now, Sir, I do not want to deprecate discussion by any manner of means, but I do submit to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, who I suppose desire to get down to the actual business and work of the House, that if they have any attack to make on the trade or fiscal policy of this Government they will have an ample opportunity, with far fuller information, with far better means of attack, in the course of the debate which will shortly be initiated on the Budget. If it be their pleasure to condemn our conduct with respect to the Senate, when resolutions proposing a certain amendment to the constitution of that body are submitted to the House, then will come, I submit, their proper opportunity. If they desire to call in question the conduct of my hon. friend in the matter of the plebiscite, they have it in their power to bring forward a motion in which they could state to this House and to this country what they themselves would propose to do under the circumstances as they now find them to exist. Should they have any objection to our proposal to rearrange the boundaries of the several constituencies, I would recommend them to wait until the Bill is in their hands before they attack us any further on that subject.

Sir, I do not say that I have not some sympathy with those hon. gentlemen. You and I, Mr. Speaker, in our day, have known something of the difficulties of fighting by-elections during a parliamentary term against the Government of the day. We had our full share at that period, of moral victories and electoral defeats, and if hon. gentlemen take no comfort in the uniform ill-success that has attended them since the commencement of this Parliament, they have my sympathy. It is the fate of war, and I would say to them that I think they would do better to accept the situation, and for one thing, at any rate, not to bring forward charges of corruption here which they are unable to substantiate in the courts. It is very easy to make a charge of corruption, as the hon. gentleman did the other night. If he has ground for that, the courts are open to him, let him implead those who are guilty, and he will do it before judges, for the most part appointed by himself, or by his predecessors and colleagues, and he is certain of having full, fair and complete justice at their hands.

Mr. FOSTER. It all depends on what sort of a law you have got.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, Sir, the law is at present substantially and in almost all respects with very trifling alterations, if any, the law which substituted between 1898 and 1896. But, Sir, I am sorry to see that the hon.

leader of the Opposition is not in his place, because it was to him that I desired more particularly to address myself on the present occasion. That hon. gentleman occupies a very responsible position in this House, as he is fond of telling his supporters and the people of this country at large. He knows something of the difficulties, he knows something of the dangers, which attend negotiations between this country and the neighbouring republic. He has enlarged upon them often. He has spoken of them well and feelingly when he occupied the position I now occupy on this side of the House. I think that hon. gentleman should have recalled to mind his own past utterances on these questions; and perhaps the very best answer that I can give to some of the philippics in which he lately indulged is to read to this House a few extracts from a speech which he himself delivered under somewhat similar circumstances, a matter of ten or eleven years ago. Sir, I would appeal from that hon. gentleman desperate and out of office, to that hon. gentleman sane and clothed and in his right mind and responsible for the proper conduct of the affairs of Canada. I have always believed, I have always contended that perhaps the best evidence that hon. gentleman ever gave that he did possess some of the elements, at any rate, of statesmanship, was to be found in the tone and attitude which he took, as I well know, to a certain extent, in opposition to many of his colleagues at that time, and the occasion when he was called upon to stand up here and advocate the adoption of the treaty of 1887 in this House. Now, I desire both sides of the House to listen, because for once I am able, to a very great extent, to concur with every word that that hon. gentleman used; I desire the House to listen to it as an answer to the attack made by him from the other side of the floor; I desire the House to listen to the words which were used by that hon. gentleman when he was responsible for the good conduct and the government of this country. On April 10th, 1888, I find the hon. gentleman, in the course of recommending the treaty which he had then succeeded in procuring from the United States to the consideration of the House, using these words:

I thus call attention for a moment in passing to the language I then used in order to show that I was not guilty of the supreme folly that I would have been guilty of if I had spoken of non-intercourse between 60,000,000 of people of the United States of America and the 5,000,000 on this side of the line as anything but what every intelligent Canadian would deplore, as I think every intelligent American ought to deplore it.

Good sound sense, good sound truth, patriotic and sensible words the hon. gentleman made use of then. Then a page or two further on, resuming consideration of that same phase of the question, I find the hon. gentleman reported, as follows:—

And, Sir, under those circumstances, denied, as we were, the free consideration of the question, of which fact I have given you abundant evidence, we turned our attention to the only means by which we could avert what everybody would feel would be the greatest disaster that could befall this country.

“The greatest disaster,” you will observe, that could befall this country. That greatest disaster eleven years ago in the judgment of Sir Charles Tupper, would have been the passage of an non-intercourse Bill such as the President was then empowered to sanction between Canada and the United States. Later on, at page 686 of the same speech, the hon. gentleman went on to deal with the question at large. He says:

So that I have no hesitation in saying that, dealing with this great question in that spirit, dealing with a question that is of vital importance to the Government of Great Britain, who were constantly threatened with embarrassment and serious difficulties and collision with the great country to the south of us, a question too, of great magnitude to the United States of America, a question of still greater magnitude, in my judgment, to the people of Canada, one on which we had more at stake and more to lose in a great struggle of that kind than any of the great countries to which I have referred—I say, looking at the question in that broad and national spirit, looking at it with a desire to remove the possibility of what I consider would be the greatest misfortune that could happen to the civilized world—a collision between the two great English-speaking nations—looking at it from that broad standpoint, it would have been criminal on my part, and on the part of those who represented Her Majesty’s Government and the interests of the people of Canada, if they had not endeavoured, by making fair and reasonable concessions—

He was not truckling to Washington then.

—by making fair and reasonable concessions to find a common ground that would present a solution of those important and serious questions that might enable a treaty to be formulated and accepted as a just and equitable settlement upon both sides.

I might go on multiplying quotations ad infinitum, but I think these samples, and this one with which I will conclude are amply sufficient. On page 691 of “Hansard” he says:

Under these circumstances, it behoved the Government of Canada to adopt any means in its power to avert such a disaster, which, great as it would have been to Canada, would have been but still greater to the United States; but—

And I call the special attention of the House to this last sentence:

—but it would be very poor compensation for the injury which we would sustain, to know that we had a companion in misfortune suffering more than we suffered ourselves.

Sir, these are words of truth, these are words of sanity, these are words which, I will say, do honour to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who delivered them. They are in themselves the best answer that could be given to the attack which that hon. gentleman—I was sorry to hear him—thought fit to make upon the acts and conduct of the present Government of Canada with respect to these negotiations at Washington.

I am not going, on the present occasion—because I wish, as far as it is possible, to have this matter considered on both sides of the House with some regard to the enormously important interests that are involved—I am not going to refer to that painful episode to which my right hon. friend alluded, which took place between Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Julian Pauncefote and Mr. Blaine, further than to say this: That it ill-becomes the man who figured in that transaction to talk to us of truckling or humiliating ourselves to the Government at Washington.

Sir, I think this Government understands its position and understands its duty—understands its position and understands its duty, not merely to the people of Canada, but to the people of the Empire, of whom on that occasion we were the accredited representatives. England trusted us greatly. For the first time in Canadian history—and it is a special honour to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and a special honour to Canada, too—for the first time in the history of Canada, for the first time in English history, that I know of, an important diplomatic conference between two of the greatest nations of the world, if not the two greatest nations of the world, was conducted mainly by commissioners chosen and appointed by the Government of Canada. Never before, that I know of, in English history, was the Dominion of Canada empowered to appoint four of the representatives out of five in any conference held with the United States.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). They do not seem to have accomplished much.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) would do well to remember the proverb that children and certain other people should not judge of half-done work. Sir, it is not possible always in an afternoon, or in a month, or in several months, to undo the effect of many years of folly, misrepresentation and misunderstanding, and though I do not want to pursue that theme at present, yet if the hon. gentlemen opposite desire it, I could give them ample proof of the extent to which this Government, and to which the people of Canada have been handicapped in their transactions with the United States by reason of the ill-advised conduct of our predecessors on many occasions.

When we were greatly trusted, we were bound by every sense of honour to act worthily to that trust. We were bound to exhaust all honourable means before we allowed our mission to expire. I agree with the gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) whose words I have just quoted, that it would be an act of supreme folly on our part, or on the part of any men, to say, that the good-will and friendship of seventy millions of English-speaking people, extending over 3,000 miles along our border, could be anything but a matter of the greatest moment, both politically and commercially to the people of this Dominion. I am not in a position, and the House knows it well, to go into any details whatever in regard to the negotiations which are still pending. The matter is sub judice; our mouths are closed as to the details, but I think I may, without impropriety, call the attention of the House to certain difficulties, not perhaps immediately apparent, which beset the path of any one who desires to make such a treaty as we were called upon to make. Hon. gentlemen may dispute the proposition if they please, but I say at least what I believe and what I have good reason to believe: that if the Government of the United States possessed a government similar to ours, I have no doubt whatever that my right hon. friend and his colleagues on that occasion could have arranged with ease a thoroughly satisfactory treaty with the President and Cabinet of the United States. I will go further. I believe that, if this had been a matter with reference to which it had been possible to reach the great bulk of the people of the United States, a treaty could very easily have been arranged with them. But, as every man who has had anything to do with affairs at Washington, knows, any negotiator who attempts to make a treaty with the United States, finds himself handicapped almost from the start, by that very peculiar provision of the American constitution which renders it necessary to obtain a two-thirds majority of the Senate, before any treaty can be ratified. It is not for strangers to criticise the constitution of the United States. They, I dare say, had excellent reason for what they have done; but it is as a simple statement of fact, and not as a criticism, that I say, that not merely does this two-thirds majority provision place enormous difficulty in the way of negotiators, but I may add, that the extraordinary constitution of the Senate, apart from the two-thirds requirement, adds still further to the great difficulties that beset them. As this is a matter which our people are not entirely familiar with, I will take the liberty of submitting a few facts to the House—not in the way of criticism, be it remembered, but simply as a statement of the facts as they exist. I find, on looking over the last United States census, that the population of the several states was distributed in the following way:—

At present, and according to the last census, ten states of the union, possessing a population of 32,106,000 souls, more than half the population of the union at that date, had just one-fifth part of the representation of the Senate; while, on the other hand, the ten states, Nevada, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, Utah, Delaware, Oregon, South Dakota and Vermont, with a population of 1,857,000, possessed an equal number of votes in the Senate; and if you add to these the population of Rhode Island, Washington, New Hampshire, Florida and Colorado, amounting to 1,875,000 more, you have this rather remarkable result, that under the present constitution of the United States, fifteen states, with a total population of 3,732,000, less than one-fifteenth part of the people of the United States, would have an absolute veto on the legislation of the Senate, and would far outweigh the votes recorded in the Senate by ten great states possessing more than one-half the total population.

Now, I need not point out to any hon. gentleman who has sat in this House, even for a few years, what enormous difficulties such a state of things presents to the negotiation of a treaty. It is not merely that we must overcome the inherent difficulty of obtaining a two-thirds majority—and let me remind this House that the strongest Government that ever sat in Canada has hardly ever, except in the first years after confederation, possessed a majority of two-thirds of this Chamber—but we must besides be in a position to overcome the inevitable tendency of these various small states to regard their own individual interests without much consideration for the general good. I repeat, Sir, it is not for us to criticise; and, for the matter of that, I am bound to admit that the constitution of our own Senate, theoretically considered, is far worse than that of the United States. But, Sir, I do say that it is a very different and a very much easier thing to negotiate with one state than to negotiate, as we virtually had to do, with forty-five. Add to that, Sir, the whole of the difficulties which have surrounded the relations between Canada and the United States from the time Canada became a state down to the present time, or rather from the time Upper Canada was settled down to the present time, were all grouped together and all required to be disposed of at our hands in the course of a few weeks. As if that was not sufficient, we had our difficulties further complicated by the fact that one important member of the commission was removed at an early date to take part in the peace negotiations with Spain, and that two very important members of the commission on the American side were disabled by illness, resulting, as you know, in the death of one. I say nothing of the lamented death of Lord Herschell, inasmuch as that occurred at a somewhat late period of the negotiations. But I do say that if you compare the magnitude, the importance and the delicacy of the tasks which were imposed upon us with those imposed upon former commissions empowered to treat with the United States, you will see that there is very little cause for condemning us because in a period of about four months, which was all the time occupied in the negotiations, during a large part of which several members of the commission were disabled by illness, we failed to settle questions which required at least an equal space of time to settle as was consumed by commissions previously appointed, though those commissions had to deal with one subject, while we were required to deal with ten or twelve. Sir, I think the best answer to the accusation that the Canadian commissioners were prepared to concede anything for the sake of obtaining some sort of settlement with the United States, is to be found in the fact that the Canadian commissioners during all that time made no concession whatever, and that when a demand was made by the United States which they thought could not be yielded consistently with the honour of Canada or of England, they at once refused to accede to that demand. Again, I say, I simply state facts. I do not wish unnecessarily to aggravate the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I will add that, more particularly with respect to the difficulty which was the cause of the present termination of our negotiations, that is to say, the Alaskan frontier, we found ourselves hampered to the most extreme degree by the extraordinary apathy and indifference which the Government of Canada for a period of 18 years, from 1878 to 1896, had manifested in regard to this question. If the Americans have settled on the Lynn Canal, and have obtained possessory right there, if they are in a position to say that they have been allowed undisturbed possession, whose fault is it but that of the men who from 1878 to 1896 stood with folded arms, and took no steps whatever even to remonstrate against that occupation by the United States? Sir, there was a second cause, and I will tell the House, as my hon. friend has told them, what that second cause was, which added to our difficulties in dealing with that question. That was the most unwise, and I will add the most unpatriotic opposition to the proposal of the Government to construct an interior railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake last year. Had that railway been in operation to-day, we would not only, in all probability, have been controlling a great trade, but would have been very much less likely to encounter the violent opposition in the settlement of that question, of the rival states and cities which desire to possess themselves of that trade. What are we to say of the conduct of the hon. leader of the Opposition under these circumstances? That hon. gentleman knows that we cannot at this moment reveal the details of the negotiations. He knows right well—I have his own words for it, as strong as even I myself could use—the enormous importance of avoiding conflict between Canada and the United States. He knows, and he has laid down in emphatic terms, how vital it is to Imperial interests of the highest moment that the two great English-speaking nations should be kept from collision. He knows more: he knows that the action of his own colleagues, if not of himself, had to a great extent handicapped us and imperilled the interests of Canada in the matter of this very negotiation. The hon. gentleman under these circumstances, I think, looking to the length of time he has spent in the service of the state, and looking to what he has said before, might have done some good service, or at least might have been consistent with his own previous statements. But he prefers, for reasons best known to himself, the role of a mischievous demagogue in a matter which is still sub judice, which is still under negotiation, forgetful of his own duty and still more of his own words under similar circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that I think the expression he has applied to the leader of the Opposition, "the role of a mischievous demagogue," is going rather far.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Then I will say the role of a man who has forgotten the duties he was sworn to perform when he assumed the office of a Privy Councillor of this Dominion. I will substitute that if you prefer it. I decline to follow the hon. gentleman further afield. I purposely confine my remarks on the present occasion to that one vital subject; but I will say this to him, that as regards the relations of Canada towards England and towards the United States, I for my part stand where I always did. Sir, I have returned from these negotiations more impressed than ever before with two things: first, with the enormous importance of maintaining by all honourable means a good understanding and friendly relations with the United States; and second, with which probably the hon. gentleman will not dissent so very much, I have likewise returned very greatly impressed with the superiority of our form of government, our constitution, barring one blot upon it, to that of the kindred republic.

Now, as to the question of reciprocity, which also these hon. gentlemen raised, let the hon. gentlemen wait in patience. Up to the present time. I am bound to say, that without in the least intending it, the United States have been, on the whole, unconscious benefactors to the people of Canada. The policy they have adopted, in my judgment—and I know whereof I affirm—has done more, fairly considered, to raise the standard of farming throughout our provinces, to a high plane, higher than it has attained in the United States higher than a hundred agricultural colleges could have done. Sir, when the United States saw fit, some years ago, to utterly destroy the great trade in barley and coarse grains which existed between us, no doubt it may have appeared to some of us that a very serious injury was inflicted on Canadian farmers. But I find, with great satisfaction, that the result of their action was really largely and greatly to improve the character of Canadian farming. Instead of exhausting our soil and exporting our grain, our farmers have become competitors with the United States in a very considerable degree in a product which they had previously neglected. It is satisfactory to know that just as fast as our exports of coarse grain diminished to the United States, just so fast grew our exportation of fine bacons and hams to the mother country and other parts of the world. While some ten or twelve years ago we sent $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 worth of coarse grains to the United States and exported something like $80,000 or $100,000 worth of bacon and hams to England and the rest of Europe, now we sell very little indeed of our coarse grains to the United States, but according to the last returns put into my hands, our exports of ham and bacon have risen from something like $100,000 to something like $8,500,000, with every prospect of a large increase.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (East Assiniboia). That is due to our policy.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. You never had a policy. It was due to the intelligence and good sense of the farmers of Canada who, when they found themselves shut out from the United States markets, straightway betook themselves—and for the most part of them where this export has been going on they are good, sound Grits—to producing hams and bacon with great success. But that was not due to the policy of hon. gentlemen, for their policy only made it rather more expensive to our farmers to produce hams and bacon than it would otherwise have been. I might give many such illustrations, but one I think is sufficient on the present occasion, and I am bound to add that our American benefactors, if I may call them so, without their in the least intending it—have, I believe, greatly intensified the attachment of Canada to the mother country and aided materially in developing the self-reliance which exists among our people and is making them every day more and more formidable competitors in the markets open to both countries.

There are two truths which both countries would do well to bear in mind. One is this, I think that no man, without being guilty of utter folly, can underate the importance of the trade of seventy millions of people. Although it may be quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that we are more independent of the United States than ever before and better able by far to do without their markets, no man will dispute that the markets of the United States would be of enormous value to us if we could obtain access to them on fair and reasonable terms. That is a truth which the people of Canada and the members of this House will do well to take to heart, and the other which the people of the United States on their side will do well to bear in mind, is this, that the people of Canada are perfectly able if compelled, to thrive and prosper wholly independent of the United States. For the rest, it remains as true as ever that each country is abundantly able to supply the other with many things better and cheaper than either can produce for their own selves. It remains as true as ever that at a great many points along our frontier, it would be an immense convenience and advantage to the people of Canada and the people of the United States if free interchange were permitted. It remains as true as ever that the possibilities of that trade are enormous, and that, were these customs barriers let down, great as our trade is to-day, it would expand by leaps and bounds, the like of which even the last two years have not seen. I am not going to enlarge on the difficulties that await on us on that matter. No doubt they are serious and great. They are found largely in what I must call the ignorant legislation on both sides of the border. They are found in the sinister interests that have sprung up under the fostering care of protection. And while I do not pretend to say that one is much worse than the other, I do say that the difference between a Canadian and a United States protectionist is small indeed.

The hon. gentleman, although he disclaimed the policy of retaliation, did nevertheless, while disclaiming it in name, advised us to have recourse to it in fact. Well, as to this policy of strike back, I have a word to say. If it becomes necessary to strike back let us do so, but in heaven's name let us do it like sensible men and not injure ourselves for the sake of injuring others. It would be the height of folly for us to refuse to allow our people to buy from the United States, to their manifest advantage, what they can obtain there cheaper and better than elsewhere. Why do we go to the United States at all? Does any business man suppose that we purchase from the United States for their profit and not for ours? Why do we buy their cotton, and coal, and iron? We do so for the best of all reasons, because we can obtain these things cheaper there than elsewhere. The true retaliation, in my judgment, is to use these advantages as far as we can. Let us meet the Americans and beat them in the markets which are open to both, and use all the advantages which will enable us to meet and beat them. Let us show them that if they decline to trade with us, they are only putting the competition off a stage and not a very distant stage. Let us show them that so far from putting it off, they are creating a very serious competition in agricultural products, which, I am inclined to think, will soon drive them from the markets of England if not the world. It is a good lesson to point to the United States that immediately after the imposition of what must be admitted to have been a very hostile policy to Canada in the shape of the Dingley tariff, our trade expanded as it never did before. And it is worth noticing as I think it was observed by one of the hon. gentlemen who moved the Address, that per head the total trade of Canada, which now amounts to $300,000,000 is probably double that of the United States which amounts to about $2,000,000,000 during the last year. And even in the matter of exports, in which they have extended their trade to a very great degree, even there I am happy to say that Canada leads them to a very considerable extent if measured per capita.

Now, hon. gentlemen may ask, under these circumstances, what I advise. I will venture to tell them what I advise this House, what I advise the people of this country. I advise them, under any circumstances, to act with dignity and calmness; I advise them to see to it that they do not deal with questions of the first magnitude, involving not merely the welfare of Canada, but the welfare of the whole British Empire, in the temper of angry schoolboys. Sir, let them first see the issue of these negotiations—which are not concluded, which may come, and I hope will come, in spite of all the difficulties that beset them, to a prosperous and honourable issue. When these negotiations are closed, it will be time enough for us to decide on the course we should pursue. Sir, as this House well knows, from the day I first took a seat upon this floor, I have been one of those who have contended, and sometimes have contended almost alone on the floor of this House, for the right of Canada to a free hand and a very large measure of discretion in the management of her own affairs, in the management of everything pertaining to her relations with the United States especially. That is the policy which I have advocated, that is the policy which, I am glad to say, is now obtaining the sanction of the Imperial Government to a very great degree. But, Sir, while I claim for Canada these rights I admit, at the same time, that every right carries its correlative duty with it. Canada is under a grave responsibility, not merely to herself, but to the Empire of which she forms a part, and now is the time for Canada to choose whether she will deal with this responsibility in a way that befits statesmen or in a way that befits demagogues. I repeat that the Government of England has trusted us greatly, and I would have the people and the Government of Canada show themselves worthy of the great trust that has been reposed in them. I will never be one to counsel an unworthy surrender of the rights of Canada, and I think I may say to this House that my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who sits beside me, and my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies), who sits beside him, and myself are just as likely to maintain the honour and dignity of the people of Canada as any three hon. gentlemen that can be selected from the other side of this House. But, while I will not consent to surrender the clear rights of Canada, while I will not be a party to anything that derogates from the honour of Canada or to the honour of England, neither will I be a party to any silly bluster or hectoring or any indiscrete attempt to terminate negotiations that have been entrusted to our hands. Now, I have to say to my hon. friends besides me, and I have to say to hon. gentlemen opposite, whom, on this occasion, I would gladly address as friends too, much, at this moment does undoubtedly depend on the action of Canada. I trust that not merely the Liberal party, but this House will act as becomes it under these circumstances. It is most true that Canada is rapidly growing in to a nation. It is most true that Canada is assuming the responsibilities and duties of a full grown nation. It is most true—and I am very glad to be able to state it, because in past times it was my painful duty to call attention to evidence of a directly contrary character—that the stagnation which long brooded over Canada is rapidly passing away. It is most true that the best proofs of the growth of a nation are being manifested every day, that the people who come here stay here, and the people who are born in this country are glad to remain. It is most true that wherever we look, from one end of this country to another, we see new and great developments calculated greatly to increase the national wealth, calculated largely to increase the number of people whom we can maintain within our borders. But, as I say, with these new advantages and with these new privileges, come new duties also; and perhaps one of the first and greatest duties which are called for at our hands is the duty, under all circumstances, of maintaining a reasonable self-control. Sir, hon. gentlemen on the opposite side either insinuate or allege that this country demands retaliation. If that statement is made as regards the bulk of the people of this country, I, for my part, wholly deny that the bulk of the people of Canada have any desire to engage in a trade war with the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, were that statement as true, as I believe it to be utterly unfounded in fact. Were it the case that at this moment, under the influence of misrepresentation, under the influence of competition, under the influence, perhaps, of natural resentment, a certain portion of our people are to be guilty, as the leader of the Opposition said, of the supreme folly of desiring to engage in a war of retaliation with the United States, my choice, for one, is soon made. I prefer to brave the anger of the people, to brave temporary unpopularity if necessary, rather than advise a course which would result in permanently injuring the people. When I took the oath of office, when I swore to advise Her Majesty for the interests of the people of Canada and not for my own private gain or advantage, I was prepared to do my duty, to carry out that oath, to discharge the obligations I incurred, to the best of my power, by advising the course I believe to be for the interest of the people; and, whatever the results may be, I trust I shall never be found recreant to that duty or false to that oath.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York).
 Mr. Speaker. I should have hesitated to rise after such an experienced and distinguished statesman as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat—one who, by his experience both in Government and in Opposition, and also by his close study of Canadian affairs, is one of the ablest men in our Canadian public life—but that, having listened yesterday and to-day to his remarks, as well as to the speech of the Prime Minister, I find that both these hon. gentlemen have utterly failed to meet the charges made by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and the ex-Minister of Finance. When we find charges of incompetency in the management of affairs entrusted to the Government, when we find charges of broken pledges, left unanswered, then, notwithstanding the ability that these gentlemen undoubtedly possess, I feel less hesitation in rising to address the House after them. Why, Sir, what has been the history of these gentlemen since they obtained power? As has been pointed out, they have failed to redeem a single pledge that they made when in Opposition. Their record is a record of broken promises, it is a record which should make and does make every Canadian blush to think that a great political party, a party powerful in the country and therefore all the more bound to represent the conscientious convictions of those who supported it in the country is led by gentlemen who ignore the policy they advocated when in Opposition and belie the promises to the people before they obtained power. Look, in the first instance, at their tariff policy. I contend that a political party should have a pronounced and definite policy on fiscal affairs. If they adopt a protective policy, let them become protectionists and formulate their tariff on a protection basis; if they are free traders let them commence with free trade, and, so far as they can, embody it in their fiscal system. But I challenge any hon. gentleman on that side of the House to tell on what basis the fiscal policy of the present Government has been built. Some gentlemen say: Oh, ours is a tariff for revenue. As was pointed out by the ex-Minister of Finance yesterday, there is no more palpable fraud in this country than any such pretension. If they had a tariff for revenue they would tax those articles upon which a revenue could be most easily collected, such as teas, and sugars, and those other articles that are either free to-day or that bear a very low duty, and upon which a large revenue could be easily raised. But this is not a revenue tariff, and there cannot be a revenue tariff per se, and no country has adopted such a tariff, more especially Canada. I recall the case of the neighbouring republic. They have had there a state of affairs very nearly corresponding to what we have in the Dominion of Canada. A few years ago, as we all know, the Democratic party took the same ground in the United States as the Liberal party have taken here. They advocated free trade, and when they came into power what was the result? A result remarkably similar to the result in the Dominion of Canada. We are told that those men who were clamouring for free trade had a toll gate, and that those who found their industries threatened, by paying sufficiently large sums, could get protection. We found them believing the promises which they had made when in opposition. We found them in every respect very similar to the political party that holds the reins of power in Canada to-day. And so I was not very much surprised when the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the difference between a United States protectionist and a Canadian protectionist was a very small one indeed. That probably is quite true, and I may retort that the difference between the Democratic party in the United States, with their juggling fiscal policy and their selling out to the protectionists, is very similar to the Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, I say that a Government cannot succeed with their policy unless they come down on some well known, clearly defined lines, either of free trade or of protection. The Minister of Trade and Commerce realized that fact, and a few years ago he was not slow in expressing his opinion of the course of events in the United States when the Democrats juggled with the principles which they professed when they were in opposition, and belied all their professions when they came into power. This is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

Sir Richard declared that the defeat was a just verdict. This, he said, when pronouncing for free trade in Canada, is not a case for half measures, and you have in the fate of the Democratic party in the United States a warning and an example of the doom which must overtake any party which palter with its convictions, and having placed itself at the head of a great movement, will offer the people a stone instead of bread.

So I say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues, and those gentlemen who sit behind them, can apply to themselves this very statement with great aptitude. Sir, I say that those gentlemen made a tariff with no recognized line of principle. But I must qualify that: They professed to give preferential trade to Great Britain as against all the world. But I see by the Report of Trade and Navigation that these gentlemen do not call it a preferential tariff, but they call it a reciprocal tariff. I would like to ask the Minister of Customs by what authority or by what use of words he calls our preferential tariff with Great Britain a reciprocal tariff. As I understand it, reciprocity, or reciprocal, means mutual concessions. But while we gave a concession to Great Britain I am not aware that they have in their tariff made any discrimination in favour of Canada, but we meet with the same terms there as all other nations, even the most hostile nations in the world to Great Britain. There is no reciprocal tariff, and I think the Minister has made a great error in placing that word on the top of the pages on the Trade and Navigation Returns. Now, while professing to have made a preferential tariff, they have adopted two ideas which run through the whole of their tariff. I shall not take up your time in pointing out all its peculiarities, although I might occupy a day or more in so doing; but I shall take the liberty to point out to this House some examples of the way the hon. gentlemen profess to give preferential trade to Great Britain while at the same time they are giving a preference to the United States instead. Take the article of oil to begin with. The duty on coal oil, which we get entirely from the United States, was 6 cents per gallon, and they have reduced it to 5. But they did more, as I shall presently show. The duty on linseed oil was ad valorem, it amounted to about 6½ cents per gallon. What did they do? They increased it,—if I may borrow an expression of the Minister of Customs—they increased the duty on linseed oil 25 per cent. Of the linseed oil that is brought into Canada, seven-eighths of it is from Great Britain, and one-eighth from other countries. They add 25 per cent to the duty on linseed oil, then they give Britain a preferential tariff, and take 25 per cent off. Was not that an admirable concession to Great Britain? I could mention hundreds of other items to the same effect, but I shall confine myself to a few important ones. Take iron or steel scrap. The old duty was $4 per ton, the new duty was $1. They have reduced the duty on that. There were $75,000 of imports from Great Britain, and $458,000 of imports from other countries. They have reduced the duty very largely, but not for the benefit of Great Britain, because she supplies less than one-seventh of what is imported into Canada. Then take the duty on pig iron. The old duty was $4, the new duty is $2.50. We imported from all other countries $330,000 worth, and from Great Britain $50,000 worth; that is, you have more than 6½ times as much from the other countries, chiefly from the United States—altogether I might say, and they give the United States the benefit of a reduction, if we use the figures of the Minister of Customs, of 62½ cents in the duty. That is a great deal more than a 25 per cent preference to Great Britain. Then they make us pay it by a direct tax upon the people by increased bounty. Then take the article of rolled iron or steel angles, tees, beams and channels. I may say that the old duty on that was 35 per cent, or less than $10 per ton. The new duty is specific, $7 per ton, or a reduction, according to the Minister of Customs, of 42·6·7 per cent. The imports are $11,452 from Great Britain and $237,000 from other countries, principally the United States. So that in all these articles a direct and enormous preference is given to those that are imported largely from the United States and scarcely any to those that come from Great Britain. Take another item, rolled iron or steel sheets or plates. The imports are $71,000 from the United States, and $698 from Great Britain. The old duty was $10; the new duty is $7, or a preference for the United States of 42·6·7ths per cent. In the matter of railway fish-plates, the old duty was $10 a ton; the new duty, $8 a ton, and we imported $11,000 from the United States, and $9,684, from Great Britain, a reduction of 20 per cent. On cast-iron piping of every description the old duty was $10, and the new duty is $8, and from the United States we imported $32,500 worth, and from Great Britain $5,600, showing an enormous advantage to the United States and very little to Great Britain. On tubes of rolled steel, the old duty was 15 per cent and the new 10 per cent, a difference, according to the calculations I have referred to, of 33½ per cent reduction, and we imported from the United States $118,000 worth, and from Great Britain $9,000. In the case of iron and steel fittings, the old duty was 35 per cent; the new duty is 30 per cent, and the importations from the United States was $84,600 worth, and from Great Britain, not $1,000 worth, but $809 only.

You will see from that, Mr. Speaker, that in those articles that we import from the United States, when this Government was making this tariff, they reduced—I won't say, in every instance, but in almost every instance—the duties on these articles which the United States were largely interested in furnishing us, and they correspondingly increased the duties on the articles that we are getting from Great Britain. I have referred to the decrease in duties on certain articles because they were United States products; but let us take some examples of the increase in duties on English goods. On damask of linen, diaper napkins and other articles of that description, we imported from all other countries $16,000 worth, and we imported from Great Britain $268,000 worth, or more than sixteen times as much as from all other countries combined; yet on these articles imported from Great Britain the old duty was 25 per cent, and the new duty 30. On handkerchiefs the old

duty was 30 per cent, and the new duty 35 per cent, and we imported $7,800 worth from all other countries, and $104,000 worth from Great Britain. So that in this instance the Government actually increased the duties on British goods, while they told the people of Great Britain: Why, we are giving you a preference of 25 per cent over other nations. Take towels: the imports from all other countries were $4,900 worth, and from Great Britain $104,600 worth, and the duty was increased in that instance from 25 to 30 per cent. In the matter of linens, brown or bleached, we imported from all other countries $982 worth, and from Great Britain $96,000 worth. Yet this Government increased the duty in that instance fully 25 per cent, and then they have taken 25 per cent off in order to be able to tell the British people what they have done for the trade of Great Britain. On the item of braids, cords, fringes, tassels, and so forth, the old duty was 30 per cent, and the new duty is 35 per cent, and we imported from the United States $95,000 worth, and from Great Britain $224,000 worth. Of cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, there is a very large importation. From the United States we took $645,000 worth, and from Great Britain $1,735,000. The duty on these was increased from 30 to 35 per cent. I am reminded that here is a large Canadian industry also. I think a member of the Government boasted that he was the agent who got the increase of duty on those goods from 30 to 35 per cent, and I am further reminded that a member of the Liberal party, when sitting on the opposition side of this House, some years ago, made a long and very elaborate speech, in which he pointed out—and proved it to his satisfaction so admirably that he had his speech printed and distributed by thousands and tens of thousands throughout the country—that the duty of 30 per cent on these goods was a robbery of the Canadian people, that the manufacturers were robbers and millionaires, and were plundering the people of Canada. Indeed, Sir, the gentleman who made that speech and published that pamphlet is now the honoured Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada. But what are we to think, when that 30 per cent duty, which every member of the Liberal Opposition of that day endorsed as a robbery of the people of Canada, has been increased to 35 per cent by the Liberal Government, when they got into power? And who is the gentleman who had the honour of increasing that duty? Why, Sir, he is not hiding his light behind a bushel, because the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has declared publicly more than once, that he was the man who got that increase of duty for the cotton manufacturers of Canada. Are we not again reminded that business is business, and are we not reminded of the fact also, that in the United States, under similar conditions and circumstances, those gentlemen who have the control of the affairs of that country, keep a toll-gate. We are suspicious, Mr. Speaker, and we are more than suspicious, that a toll-gate is kept also on this side of the line under the circumstances I have related.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). It looks like it.

Mr. WALLACE. It looks more than like it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that in all these instances I have referred to—and I could multiply them ten times over—the proof is given that the Finance Minister and the Government, while professing to give a preference to Great Britain, have actually given a preference to the United States, in a larger proportion of these imports to this country. More than that, what do we find? Corn, that had a duty of 7½ cents per bushel, has been made free, and we see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that there were entered for consumption 20,000,000 bushels, in round figures, at a cost of $7,000,000. I call the attention of the Minister of Customs to what is undoubtedly an error. I do not say it was purposely made, but the error has the effect of swelling the imports and exports of Canada and increasing our apparent prosperity. I call his attention to this enormous error, which indicates that four-fifths of these imports of corn, to the extent of 15,000,000 of 16,000,000 bushels, were for the province of Quebec alone, and that only one-fifth went to the other provinces. That cannot be possible, but it has the effect of swelling the Trade and Navigation Returns and making our imports and exports appear to be four or five million dollars larger than they really are.

There is another item to which I wish to refer. These gentlemen opposite have reduced the duty on flour and wheat, and of course all our imports of these articles come from the United States, and none from Great Britain. They reduced the duty on flour from 75 to 60 cents a barrel, and the importation of 35,000 barrels, at a cost of $148,000, and our imports of wheat, the duty on which they reduced from 15 to 12 cents, amounted to 58,000 bushels, valued at $42,000. So that, in all those matters where they made charges of duty, this present Government has made them very largely in the interest of the people of the United States.

Perhaps, Sir, we should not hold gentlemen too closely to account for speeches which they make when they are out on the stump, but it has become the habit of these gentlemen to show the most utter disregard of the facts in their campaign speeches. One member of the Government, the hon. Postmaster General, speaking at the nomination in Goderich on the 11th of February, as reported in the Toronto "Globe," juggled with the customs tariff. He told the people there that the tariff had been modified in accordance with pledges made. Well, I think there will be a very wide difference of opinion with him on that point by any hon.

gentleman who makes himself acquainted with the facts. He said that out of 400 articles in the customs tariff 200 had been placed on the free list, and on 107 the tariff had been reduced so much in some cases as to almost wipe it out. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am quite certain that neither the hon. Minister of Customs nor the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ever authorized such a statement as that to be made by the Postmaster General; and if the statements of that hon. gentleman with regard to his own department are no more accurate, I think we can hardly place much credence upon them. I have taken the trouble, Mr. Speaker, to go over the customs tariff of 1897, and what do I find? That there were 635 items, excluding the prohibited articles. Of these 448 are on the dutiable list and 187 on the free list. The hon. gentleman says, nearly 200 of these have been placed on the free list. Now, I have a list of those articles that have been placed on the free list by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they number, not 200, but just 13. There are 11 more items that were partly free before and they have added them to the free list; so that if you take these two sets of items together, you would have 24 items added to the free list, and most of them of a most inconsequential character. I will take up the time of the House to go over the 13 items they have added to the free list. They are: life-boats, &c., artificial limbs, duck for belting, hose, and canvass for bicycle tires, Indian corn, hare skins, &c., prepared steel for bicycle chains, steel for surgical trusses, steel axle bars, spiral steel for railways, galvanized iron wire, surgical and dental instruments, binder twine, and cream separators, a total of 13 items, and most of them, as I have said, of a very unimportant character. Then, those items which were partly free before, but in which some items have been added, are: 464, some books; 469, fashion plates; 471, donations of books; 526, rape seed and mushroom spawn; 553, sewing machine attachments; 595, furniture casters; 598, steel for augurs, knives, &c.; 602, barbed wire; 604, stereotypes for papers; 617, brass trimmings for bedsteads; 635, certain foreign packages. If you include these all together, you will find that instead of there being 200, there are just 24, which, with the exception of three or four items, are of very inconsiderable importance. But take up the tariff, and what do you find? That in the first 126 items, which include all food products, agricultural productions, animals, and so on, as well as liquors, there are changes in nine items of the tariff in which changes are made, of these five are reductions of duty and four increases of duty, and the increases outweigh the reductions many times over. Take the first item changed, No. 7, they have increased the duty anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent on the value of the article. They have increased it in three other cases. If you go over that tariff and analyse it, you will find in it the hand of some very cunning individual indeed. I have referred to the increased duty on cotton goods. Look at every item of these, and you will find an increase; item 358 is increased from 22½ to 25 per cent; item 359 is increased from 22½ to 25 per cent; item 360 is increased from 30 to 35 per cent.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question? Does he wish to imply that the duty on these articles which he has read, when imported from England, has been increased over the former rate? I am afraid he is giving that impression. Surely he knows that under the preferential tariff the duty on every one of these items is lower than it was before.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman is the only man in the House who would get that impression. Take linseed oil. I say the Government have increased the duty on that item 25 per cent, and under the preferential arrangement have reduced the duty 25 per cent under the preferential tariff. Have not I made that statement about every one of these items? I say that while they were professing to give Great Britain a preference, they were largely killing that preference by adding to the duty in the first instance before taking it off; and I say still further, and I have proved it, that on those goods which are very largely or altogether imported from the United States, in very few instances indeed have they increased the duty, but on the contrary they have reduced it. Therefore, I say this tariff, which professes to give a great preference to Great Britain, does not carry out its professions, but is framed to deceive the English people and to deceive the Canadian people as well. To show still further that this tariff was framed largely in the interests of the people of the United States, let me quote a letter published in Toronto and Washington last December by one of the members of the British commission, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He calls attention to a number of interesting facts, which he was enabled to do through having obtained advance sheets of the Trade and Navigation Returns of Canada. What does he say? That our export trade to the United States has dwindled away to such an extent that at present only $2,000,000 of agricultural products in all have gone to the United States during the past year from Canada; that the United States have raised a barrier against everything we produce, and that the tariffs, as between the two countries, have had the effect of increasing our imports from the United States and decreasing our exports to that country. Twenty-eight per cent of our products went to the United States last year, 66 per cent to Great Britain, and about 6 per cent to all other countries. On the other hand, 72½ per cent of our imports we got from the United States. That is the result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. That is the result of the preference they gave the mother country; and if any proof were needed that their tariff operates directly in favour of the United States and against Great Britain and other countries, this fact, that 72½ per cent of our imports come from the United States, 17.70 per cent from Great Britain, and less than 10 per cent from all other countries, is most convincing proof indeed. That bears out what I have proved in another way as to the effects of that tariff, that we are not studying the interests of Canada or of Great Britain, which these gentlemen in their new-found love for the mother country are so proud of extolling to-day, but that we have framed a tariff pro-American in its whole tendency and effect. I think it is time we adopted a policy that would be a little more Canadian. I remember very well that when these gentlemen were on this side of the House they were never done pointing out the fact that a large portion of our imports came from the United States. But look at the changed condition of affairs since they came into power. Look at the enormous increase of our imports from the United States, and the decrease of our imports from all other countries, and we cannot fail to see that these gentlemen are studying the interests of another country instead of looking after our own.

Another very important matter connected with this is the transportation problem. Our transportation problem may be divided into several parts—our canal system, our railway system, the fast Atlantic steam service which we should have, our Pacific cable and our cold storage, all intimately connected together. With regard to the canal system, the right hon. First Minister stated in Toronto a short time ago that when his Government came into power they found that the transportation question was the great problem, and immediately set themselves to work it out. We decided, he said, to have a fourteen-foot channel from Lake Superior to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and he promised that the next year it would be completed. But what are the facts? They are that nearly the whole of that work, as was pointed out by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), was completed before they came into power. The Sault Ste. Marie Canal had been built at a cost of $3,250,000, and the Welland Canal had been completed years before. Four-fifths of the St. Lawrence and Soulanges system of canals had been completed before these gentlemen came into power, and for the other fifth contracts were let. Practically all the contracts for these works were let by the late Government for a fourteen foot navigation except a couple on the Soulanges system, about which I shall have something to say a little later. Therefore, these gentlemen cannot claim credit to any degree with regard to the transportation problems, so far as the canals of Canada are concerned. They could not help but permit the work to be finished. They are only carrying out the bargains and arrangements that were made for the final completion of the work, and besides are not fulfilling the predictions they made with regard to the time of completion.

As regards these canals, I notice that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), within whose province lies the direction and carrying on of these works, apparently has very little to say about them. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who should have nothing to do with them as a Minister, whose duties are only connected with the terminal system—and I find he has more than he can attend to in that connection, if we can judge of his bungling work in the city of Montreal—seems to have assumed the functions of the Minister of Railways and Canals. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, if he were present, whether he has abdicated in favour of the Minister of Public Works, because bad as the former may be, I would not desire to see the exchange made.

It is a fact that we have more mileage of railways for our population than any other country in the world. It is true that this Government has planned out new railways and new railway systems. What have they done in the matter of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway? They have added to the Dominion debt $2,000,000 more than the leader of the Opposition had contracted for with the Canadian Pacific Railway, when he was leader of the Government. Without one particle of reason or common sense, they have added $2,000,000 to the burdens of the people. We are told that there were privileges to be given the Government, that the Government was to have control of the tariff rates over the Crow's Nest Railway. Why, the Railway Act gives the Government that control completely to-day. They have ample control without any special arrangement being made. But they said, further: We are going to have cheaper transport of wheat from Manitoba and the North-west. And they made a contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway under which the rates were to be reduced a fraction of a cent per bushel. Why, since that time the company have reduced their freight rates from Manitoba and North-west points to Fort William by three times the amount they had agreed with the Government. They have done this of their own accord. It was pointed out from this side of the House that it would be in the interest of the company, as a business proposition, to do so; that in fact, they would find it necessary to reduce their rates, and they have done so. They have reduced their rates voluntarily far more than they were bound to do in consideration of the bonus to the Crow's Nest Pass road. But there is another point of still greater importance in connection with the construction of that road. They had acquired the British Columbia Southern Railway charter and franchise, including enormous wealth in coal, timber and land, particularly coal—more than enough to build that road without any subsidy at all. So the company got about two millions of dollars in cash more than Sir Charles Tupper had agreed for from the Dominion Government, besides a sufficient subsidy from British Columbia alone to construct the road. It is true that others than the Canadian Pacific Railway have profited by this bonus from British Columbia. Gentlemen who were supporting the Government, who were the outside pillars of the Government, have made enormous fortunes by their connection with this scheme. These facts were known to the Government and to the Minister of Railways and Canals. Attention was called to them in the committee rooms upstairs, but in spite of that, the Government insisted upon granting this enormous subsidy.

Let us turn now to the question of steamships. As has been pointed out in this House more than once, under the able, energetic and business-like management of the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) a bargain was made three years ago with the Allans for a fast Atlantic service. Consider what advantage would have accrued to this country had that service been in operation during the war between United States and Spain. People were a little nervous and anxious at that time, and, if we had had the Fast Atlantic Service we could have commanded the entire trade of the Atlantic Ocean for passengers and fast freight. It was of the greatest importance that we should have facilities at that time. But the Government delayed. I will not say they bungled the arrangement, although, in view of the frequent trips of Mr. Dobell across the Atlantic I think it would be hardly too much to say that they had bungled this affair from start to finish. These are questions that should have been dealt with. We are told—these gentlemen themselves with their accustomed modesty tell us—that this is the best business Government that Canada has ever seen. I am unable to remember a single instance in which they have exhibited able management of our affairs. I think I am fair enough to give them credit when they deserve it, but I am bound to say that in the railway matters to which I have referred their action has not been in the interest of the people of Canada; they have not succeeded in doing what they undertook to do. There is another railway question beside that of the Crow's Nest Pass—there is the Drummond County deal—or steal. There were already two lines of railway running from Montreal to Quebec, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. I suppose that one railway would be able to do all the work and still not be extra busy. But the Government must have a third line, not for the purpose of commerce, not for the purpose of improving trade or of benefiting the Intercolonial Railway, not for the purpose of benefiting the people of Canada, but for the benefit of a gang of men in the province of Quebec who had placed the Government, or some members of it, under obligations to them. Why, Sir, the second proposal which has come down showing better terms to the amount of three-quarters of a million or a million proves that the Government must have made a stupid blundering bargain in the first place, even admitting that it was necessary or desirable to build or acquire that road. And now we are told that members of Parliament have the promise of the Prime Minister and the Government that a fourth line, the South Shore road, shall be built from Quebec to Montreal—four lines to divide the trade which is not sufficient for one. We shall see. We shall see, too, whether the rumours—or rather, not rumours but positive statements made by the Minister of Railways and Canals—that a certain road, the Canada Eastern in the province of New Brunswick, will be assumed by the Government, are true. The "Globe" newspaper has come out courageously and valiantly in opposition to that proposal. It is such a palpably corrupt proposal, such an unnecessary buying of patronage and power, that I am interested in watching to see whether it will come before this Parliament. If it does, the corruption connected with it which was made known to the public during the election campaign in the province of New Brunswick a short time ago, will cause such another exposure as we have had with regard to some other matters. But I have digressed from the question of the fast Atlantic service. In this matter, I believe, the Government has neglected its opportunities. If they thought that the price that was being given by the late Government was too large—and it did seem a pretty large sum—it was their duty to have made a hard and fast bargain.

They went into what was an experiment because ships of that class had not been built, had not been engaged in commerce at any rate on a large scale, and Canada could not afford to wait to test the experiment. It was a case of urgent necessity with us. We had the cold storage system, which is so intimately connected with the fast Atlantic service, because the two will necessarily go together. In building new steamers what do we find? That those colonies or dominions of Australia and Newfoundland, 17,000 miles from Great Britain are able to supply Great Britain largely with the articles of butter, that Canada has done so to a very limited extent, and that we require a system of cold storage of the most elaborate and complete description which we cannot fit up in an old vessel; you must adopt that system in a new ship. It was important, therefore, that we should have those new ships fitted up with a cold storage system, even more than prepared for a fast passenger service, because we must have new ships adapted for the purpose with all those scientific appliances which have made it possible for Australia to come 17,000 miles across the equator and land her products in England in prime condition. If they can do it with that distance, why should we lag behind in the Dominion of Canada? Why should we send only one-fourth or one-tenth as much butter to England as Australia is sending? I say that in that respect the Government is censurable, because they have neglected this fast Atlantic service, which is so closely connected with cold storage and those important industries of the farmers of Canada.

Then with regard to the Pacific cable. The course of the Government, so far as I know it, has been simply that of resting on their oars. Now, the Pacific cable has an intimate connection with our trade relations, both east and west. I am told—the Government, of course, have more accurate knowledge—that a guarantee would probably mean no expense, but simply a guarantee, that the Pacific cable would begin to earn revenue that would pay its way, so that it would cost nothing to the Dominion of Canada. But if it did cost us a small sum, why should we hesitate when such connection is so important to Canada and to Canada's business, but still more important from an Imperial point of view? So I say that the Government, if they have been merely resting on their oars and doing nothing, are censurable because they have not realized the full importance of this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter which I will deal with, but I hope not for a long time, that is the International Commission. Before I make any reference to the business of that commission, I must express my deep regret that the Prime Minister of Canada had not seen fit to make the statement months ago that he made in this House yesterday. He tells us, Mr. Speaker, that he read last fall in the newspapers, whether in Canada or in the United States I do not know, that Lord Herschell was censured because he was sacrificing the interests of Canada to the interests of Great Britain. Those statements were running through the press, I saw them myself, and I did not believe that there was any truth in them, but of course I could not give any authoritative denial, as the Prime Minister could. He saw these articles, he realized as he told us yesterday, that there was not a particle of truth in them. Then why did he not correct those newspapers which, I am sure—I will give them credit for that—were only anxious to tell the truth and give correct news, anxious to find out the views of men correctly so as to give a correct impression to the people of the country? Why did not the Prime Minister, when he knew that last fall, announce that these statements were injurious to Lord Herschell, and were hurtful to his feelings, as I am told? Now he says: I wish it to go throughout the length and breadth of the land that there was no truth in those statements. But, Sir, in justice to Lord Herschell, and in justice to the newspapers, he should have months ago made that statement to the press and to the people of Canada; and I deeply regret, when poor Lord Herschell is dead and in his grave, that the Minister has only seen fit to make that statement now. I am sure he failed to do so, not from any improper feeling, but because he failed to realize the importance of the matter at that time. Now, with reference to the commission itself. In July, 1896, nearly three years ago, the Prime Minister of Canada, in an interview with the Chicago "Record," told the people of Canada and of the United States that he was going to make a treaty with the people of the United States which would settle up those many questions that were in dispute between the two countries, and which were causing at times acrimonious feelings, and were liable to cause conflicts; and also he was going to endeavour at the same time to secure a very large measure of reciprocity. Well, I wondered when I read that article, and I have been wondering since the new Government decided to make a new tariff. A new party had come into power in the United States, and the Government knew that the United States were going to make a new tariff. It appeared to me that before these two new tariffs were made, before their fiscal policies were settled, that was the time for the Prime Minister to go to the States to make those reciprocal arrangements and settle up those other questions—though those other questions, probably most of them, could be settled without reference to the tariff. But the tariff itself being the important matter, it appeared to me that these gentlemen lost two precious years. Instead of going in August, 1896, they went in August, 1898. Well, the two parties should have come together earlier to endeavour to arrange these matters. Our Government should have said: We are going to consider, in framing our tariff, what agricultural products we can send into the United States, because a market for agricultural products, as they told the farmers, was the great desideratum. But in August, 1898, when these gentlemen were going to the United States, the Republican party, the victorious party in the United States, published a text-book with the programme of the party. It was not a book published by some irresponsible person, but it was published by the Republican executive committee as the official document of the predominant political party in the United States. What did they say? In the first page of their book, the first paragraph and the first sentence of that paragraph reads thus:

The farmers of the United States have been protected from unreasonable and unjust importations of agricultural products from Canada, Mexico and other foreign countries.

Now, I would like to ask: What was the use of going to the United States when they proclaimed from the housetops that that was their policy? That had been their policy in the tariff which they had made years ago, as the hon. gentlemen know.

They declared their adherence to that policy.

Mr. McKinley, in a speech delivered at Boston, in February of this year, reiterated these sentiments and said:

We have quit discussing the tariff, and have turned our attention to getting trade wherever it can be found. It will be a long time before any change can be had or any change desired in our present fiscal policy, except to strengthen it. The differences on this question which existed have disappeared. We have turned from academic theories to trade conditions, and are seeking our share of the world's market.

In view of the fact that in August, 1898, and in February, 1899, when the proceedings of the commission were about to conclude, that the head of the Republican party which has a majority in both the Senate and the House of Representatives, made this declaration; Was it fair to the farmers of Canada that the Canadian Government should tell them they were going to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity treaty and to get a market for Canadian farm products. Was it fair that our Government should make this declaration, when here was the distinct pledge of the rulers of the United States that they could not give any such concession. There was no possibility then—and I do not see any possibility to-day because the conditions have not changed—of getting Canadian agricultural products into the United States free of duty, or at any reduction that would be a benefit to the Canadian farmer. I suppose these gentlemen know better than those who were not on the commission, for they had the experience of discussing the matter with the American commissioners; but in the face of the official declaration of the President of the United States and their official campaign document, I do not see how there could be any possibility of getting reciprocal trade relations. We read from time to time in the public press that the question of lumber was a matter of serious consideration at the conference, but let me tell these hon. gentlemen that there are three parties to be considered in connection with that industry, and I am afraid the Government has been considering only the lumberman, or the lumber king, without interesting themselves in the lumber workingman and in the people of Canada at large who are deeply interested. We hear that the lumbermen are making enormous fortunes, and indeed no man can live in Ottawa without being aware of that fact. In my opinion they are quite able to look after their own interests; indeed within the last few months the price of lumber has risen more than the $2 duty imposed by the United States, and there is a demand for it everywhere. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that the lumber called North Carolina pine cannot, nor never will be a competitor with our beautiful Canadian pine for it is miserable stuff as compared with ours, so that we need not worry about getting a market for our lumber. What we should consider more seriously is the interests of the poor people who are working in the mills all summer, who get $1 a day for 11 hours work, and who for three or four months in the year are out of employment and unable to support themselves. I am told that there are hundreds of such men who are in destitution and want within a mile of where we are sitting to-day. Let us remember that this lumber industry is increasing the wealth of the masses of the people of Canada to a very inappreciable extent. For until you pay workmen sufficient for their subsistence you are not increasing the aggregate wealth of the country, although you may be making a few millionaires, and you are doing so. I do not blame the Government, but I do say that the system under which the lumber business has been operated has made a large number of very wealthy men without conferring any corresponding advantage on the great majority of our people. In the case of other industries where men get fair wages and constant employment they build up the wealth of the country, but in the lumber industry where the pay of the workman is very small, and where the proprietors make enormous profits, it is the duty of Government to look to the interests of the whole people rather than the interests of the few. I commend this thought to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. As to the pulp industry, I suppose we can hardly realize its enormous importance. I addressed a memorandum to the British Commissioners on this question and I will now take the opportunity of reading a portion of it :

The striking feature of it is the marvellous increase in its extent and operations in recent years. By the census of 1891 the capital invested was $2,900,000 ; to-day the capital invested amounts to $13,500,000, which does not include the value of the pulp-wood limits.

There are in Canada to-day thirty-five paper mills and thirty-nine pulp mills. Seventeen of these pulp mills are attached to the thirty-five paper mills. Of the thirty-five paper mills in Canada and the thirty-nine pulp mills, about fourteen are included which are now closed for several different reasons, namely, some have closed because they could not get a market for their pulp, and others because they had found that they were in the wrong location, it being expensive to bring pulp-wood to their mills, and others were closed because they had become old and out of date, and for these different reasons it was not profitable or possible to rebuild or furnish them with modern machinery at those places.

Capital now invested (not including limits).....$13,500,000
 Wages paid at mills—about $1,700,000.
 Employees (only those at the mills)—4,500.
 Average yearly wages paid—$370.
 In 1896 the production was :                      Tons.
 Chemical fibre ..... 27,000
 Grounder mechanical pulp..... 124,000
 Paper produced ..... 64,000

In 1898 the estimated production, and for which the mills erected and now completed will furnish ample capacity of chemical and mechanical fibre, 331,000 tons, and of paper 97,000 tons, or an increase of 180,000 tons of pulp and 33,000 tons of paper, which at prices estimated on present value, which are lower than in 1896, would give an output of $11,500,000 in value.

Mr. WALLACE.

It is estimated that the cost of labour in and around the pulp mills is $3.50 per ton ; and that the freight on Canadian railroads, averaged from all the mills, and reduced to a dry basis—about $5 per ton ; cost of preparing and baling for shipment, which includes sisal, or wire or other material, also wear and tear of mill, 10 cents per 100 lbs., or $2 per ton.

So that as a manufacturing industry it is beginning to take a front rank, and if the industry be safeguarded it will increase indefinitely. The increase in Canadian production and exportation have been very rapid. Up to and including the year 1889 no pulp was exported. Since that time the exportations have increased from year to year, but the supply of the home market with both pulp and paper was the first consideration. This market has been supplied, and if Canada is to become the source of supply for other countries, which it should be, the present conditions must be changed. A large portion of the supply for American pulp mills comes from our Canadian forests. It should be made into pulp and paper in Canada. This statement shows the rapidity of the growth of this industry, and a fair estimate of its present magnitude :

Here is a Canadian industry which in a few years has quadrupled its proportions, an industry which is yet in its infancy and which deserves the most serious consideration of the Government of Canada. It is an industry which is of too great importance to be handed over in any way to the tender mercies of the United States.

When the commission sat at Washington there were repeated rumours that this and that question had been settled. I do not wish to discuss this matter because the Government say their mouths are closed ; but I must say that when the commissioners came back to Canada and when it was declared that no treaty was arranged a thrill of satisfaction went through the Liberal party in this country. They were afraid that something would be done that would not be in the interests of the people of Canada, and it was a great satisfaction to the Liberal party that nothing was done. I believe the Conservative party in Canada is patriotic enough not to wish any harm to a Government that to that extent at least was looking after the interests of the country, and the same thrill of satisfaction filled the minds of the Canadian Conservatives as well, because we are Canadians first and last and all the time. If the Government made a mistake which would be injurious to the interests of the people of Canada we Conservatives would all regret it. Among the other rumours that came from the conference chamber was that the Canadian representatives were to submit a list of manufactures that were to be sacrificed.

I do not know what grounds there were for it, but that was the impression prevailing through a large section of the country, and that feeling I believe was one of enormous importance. I do not believe the Canadian people are prepared to sacrifice any of their industries; they are too much wedded to the importance of maintaining every industry we have, because there are no industries in this country to-day that have not proved their right to live. We have all the qualities required to make up a manufacturing nation, and no country can become prosperous and great without manufacturing industries. We are increasing our manufactures very rapidly, and anything that any commission or any Government could do to disturb that state of affairs would cause wide alarm, not only to the industries interested, but to all other industries as well. Why, Sir, what is the magnitude and importance of these industries to-day? The last census tells us that there were in 1890 in this country 75,000 manufactories and 370,000 employees. If we have that progress which we all hope and desire, we can surely add 20 per cent to those figures to-day; so that we may reasonably say that we have more than 90,000 manufacturing establishments and at least 450,000 employees at the present time in the various industries in Canada. According to the last census, these industries had in capital, land and buildings, $91,000,000; in tools and machinery, $81,000,000; in working capital, $181,000,000; in wages paid, $100,000,000, which undoubtedly has increased to $125,000,000; in raw material used in the manufactures, $256,000,000, and in the value of the articles produced, $476,000,000, which has undoubtedly increased to $600,000,000 to-day. Anything that would disturb even a portion of these manufacturing industries would be viewed with alarm by all the manufacturing industries of the country, and by the farming industries as well, because there is no portion of the people of Canada who realize so thoroughly the importance of the manufacturing industries of our country as the farmers themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Government of Canada, with all the circumstances in their favour, have not been able to make a treaty. They have come away without one. They have told the people of this country that the Conservative party, when in power, were not sincere, otherwise they would have concluded a treaty at any time. They have now had their opportunity, with all the circumstances in their favour, with a friendly feeling on the part of the people of the United States towards the people of Great Britain which has not existed in the history of that nation before, with a desire on the part of the Government and people of the United States to meet their wishes; yet, in spite of all these advantages in their favour, they have not been able to come to any arrangement, and any arrangement they could have come to, I am satisfied, would not have been advantageous to the people of Canada. If after six months of negotiation and discussion they have found that they can make no treaty, my own opinion is that the commission will not meet again, at least to accomplish any useful purpose; but they did not want to come back here to Canada and say: We could not make a treaty, and so they called it a postponement rather than an ending of the convention. With all their advantages they have had to come back and say that not only has nothing been done, but that the proposals of the United States were humiliating to Canadians. Take the proposal of a commission to decide the Alaskan boundary. If that commission should disagree, nothing would be done. That would be playing the United States game, would it not? Then it was proposed that if that commission decided that some of the places occupied by the United States belonged to Canada, the United States should continue in possession of them. Well, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, that was the time when our commissioners should have concluded the labours of the commission and have come back to Canada and said: "We have done our best, we have used every means that a commission could honourably use to accomplish the objects in view, and we have failed; we will come back to Canada and sit down and consider simply what are the best interests of Canada." If they had done that, if they would do that to-day, they would have the warmest support, I am sure, of every member on this side of the House. Suppose they say: "We have in Canada most of the pulp wood of the world; we are going to make our pulp wood and pulp into paper within the borders of our own country; we will put an export duty on pulp wood equal to the import duty our neighbours impose on the paper." That is the interest of Canada. Suppose they say: "We are going to put an export duty on saw-logs, and have them manufactured in Canada." Suppose they say: "We are going to do the same thing with the nickel, of which Canada appears to have control of the only profitable mines in the world." I have an article here from a Washington newspaper which I think shows the great importance of that question. It first calls attention to the fact that Canada has the world's supply of nickel, that she employs 500 men in the mines, and sends $500,000 worth of nickel to New Jersey to be refined into nickel and copper billets. But this paper, "The Post," which is the most influential of the Washington papers, says this:

The "problem," as the attentive reader will have begun to suspect, has a good deal to do with the New Jersey link in the business. Why should it be necessary for Canada to share with the United States the advantage of her great and valuable deposits of metal that is coming more and more into use? Of course there is no objection on this side of the line to an indefinite continuance of the shipping of nickel in the rough to New Jersey to be refined. If Canadian business men find it necessary or expedient to furnish work in that way for our citizens, we shall not cry out against it. But while doing their work, and taking their money for it, we shall be compelled to marvel that they don't do it at home, and thus save the cost of transporting the waste product, while keeping the wages among their own people.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). What paper is that?

Mr. WALLACE. The Washington "Post" of March 28, 1898. There is something further in the same line, but I do not want to take up the time of the House reading it. I say that is the true proposition with reference to nickel; that is the true proposition with reference to our lumber and our pulp. Let the Government sit down and simply legislate in our own interest. They say that is retaliation. Nothing of the kind. As the hon. leader of the Opposition pointed out, imitation is the sincerest flattery, and we would be simply adopting the measures of our neighbours. But I say further that if the Dominion of Canada is to-day afraid to legislate in what is palpably and clearly in her own interest, she had better go out of business. Why, Sir, what are we afraid of?

Retaliation—there is nothing they could do that they have not done over there, in looking after their own interests and disregarding ours. They know little of us, and care still less. Our Ministers who went there know that, and our duty now is simply to sit down and study out our own interests and legislate in their favour. But, unfortunately, when we here assembled in the Parliament of Canada and ready to-day to do anything that is in the interests of our people, we are told that those gentlemen have postponed the consideration of the business of the session until the 2nd of August next. What does that mean? It means that our hands, that the hands of the Government, at any rate, are tied. It is impossible for the Government to make a single line of legislation about lumber, pulpwood and nickel, without interfering with the negotiations. They have tied us up for a whole year. They have prevented our legislating in our own interests by this postponement the 2nd of August next. They have thus forgotten the interests of the people of Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce asked, why do we not set down to business. Why, by their own act in postponing that convention, they have prevented our doing that business which it is in our interests to do.

They say that we must not discuss reciprocity, but some newspapers, and, I think, the members of the commission, too, have said that they would like to have advice. They asked why the Conservative party does not advise them in such an important matter. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall take the liberty of giving a little advice to our Canadian commissioners. In the first place, I would advise them not to give the right to the United States to send their war vessels up our canals and have control of our lakes, and to control, in the case of disturbance, the whole of the eastern portion of the Dominion, from the head of Lake Superior, out to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. That is what it would mean, and I would strongly advise our commissioners, if they are going to make a treaty, not to give that power to the Americans. The next advice I would give them is not to give up our rights on the Behring Sea. Why, Sir, I was amazed when the rumour came floating in the air, that arrangements were being made to buy out the old sealers and to prevent any in the future prosecuting that industry in the whole, or a large part, of the Pacific Ocean. We are too much restricted now around these Pribyloff Islands, but at any rate, I think the Canadian commissioners should not give up the right, not only to navigate the seas, but to prosecute an industry on the open sea which has always been the inalienable right of every British subject.

The First Minister said yesterday that one of the important matters before the commission was the bonding privileges. With due respect to our Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), I do not believe he quite understands the effect of those bonding privileges and the various intricacies of railway and water navigation. I know, moreover, that the railway companies do not want any interference, and I know, further, having somewhat studied the question, that if the United States were to end our bonding privileges to-morrow, we would gain more than we would lose, and that the railway companies of Canada are not in the slightest degree alarmed about it, so that the Canadian Government would act wisely in letting this matter alone. The agitation has come from those southern railways that want the whole business of the United States going their way. It is a fight between the southern railways of the United States and the northern ones, in which we are not particularly interested at all; so that, if the commissioners would leave that question severely alone, I am sure they would study the interest of the railways and transportation companies of Canada.

The next thing I would advise our Government not to do is, not to give away any of our rights in the North Atlantic fisheries. Newfoundland has been, from what I can learn, assiduously preserving her interests and freedom, both as against the interests of France and the United States. The Gloucester Massachusetts fishermen are a decaying lot. The prosperous fishing maritime constituencies are those of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—all Canadian or British subjects at any rate. Any legislation that would tend to revive the prosperity of Gloucester fishermen, we are not particularly interested in. Let them look after their own interests and let us look after ours.

I would also advise the Government not to be afraid to preserve our placer mines for British subjects. The United States have preserved their placer mines for their subjects. The British Columbia Government has made that the law in that province—at any rate for the Atlin Lake district—and it looks to me like this. We have the richest gold country in the world in the Yukon—the richest placer country. Foreigners from all nations are going up there. They are making their fortunes there, and going out of the country immediately afterwards. It is not like Colorado and Australia and those other countries, where the men who went in settled on the land after the gold mines were exhausted. Nobody would ever settle in the Yukon country after the gold is taken out. It will be deserted, when the gold disappears, just as it was ten, or twenty, or a hundred years ago. I would make it imperative that no man but a British subject should have permission to placer mine in the Yukon country. Let us look after our own interests, and in that we will be following the example of the United States. Supposing they do complain. It is our own property, and if we cannot do what we like with our own, we had better let somebody else have it. They say: Look at the great wealth of the Yukon. Well, why not keep it for British subjects, and British subjects alone, as regards the placer mines? As regards the quartz and other mining, which require machinery and capital, I think, in the United States they let others come in and spend their money in developing it, and we might do the same; but as regards placer mining in the Yukon country, we would never have a single inhabitant in the country but for the gold it produces, and when the gold is gone, the country will be deserted twenty-four hours later. We should keep that wealth for Canadians or any other British subjects who come to join them. There are tens of thousands of young Canadians who desire to go out on adventurous trips, who would take this in. People from all parts of the world are going in at present and crowding out Canadians. There is a large percentage of Canadians there, no doubt, but placer mining in the Yukon country should be exclusively kept for Canadian citizens or British subjects.

I was going to give some further advice to the Government, but they apparently do not require it. The Government, to my very great pleasure, say there is not such a great necessity for reciprocity as there appeared to be six or twelve months, or twelve years ago. I am very happy to hear them admit that. I do not believe we can get any reciprocity from the people of the United States that will be of benefit to the people of Canada, and would be greatly surprised if we could. They are looking for their own interests. They are producers and producers to a larger extent than their own consumption, of almost every article that we export. They are our rivals in business. If they take our products at all, it is only to act as middlemen for the supply of the markets of the world, taking the profits of the middleman. We can do that business ourselves. Canadians are finding fresh markets for their lumber and other products. Through the cold storage system, which has been but recently established here, we are able to transport our perishable products to the market, thus immeasurably increasing the value of our perishable farm products and heightening the prosperity of the people of Canada. So, if the Government, in this international commission affair, had only concluded their labours instead of postponing them, it would have been much better. They would then have been free to come to Parliament and say: We have done our best to get a reciprocity treaty, and now we are going to do our best to consider in the future what we can do for the people of Canada by legislation here. I regret that they have not done so, but that for a year they will be estopped from proposing such legislation here. I must apologize for claiming so long the attention of the House.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, we have heard from the three heads of the honest watch-dog Cerberus who guards the entrance to the regions of darkness on the other side of the House, and is supposed to keep an eye on the British constitution at the same time. The three heads all spoke with somewhat the same meaning, but there was a slight difference in the tone of voice. The first head has not forgotten his reputation and name, and he speaks with the voice of a war-horse. To be sure, the war-horse has come down from careering across the field of victory to turning one of those old-fashioned horse powers to run the party machine. He tramps around in the eternal beaten path without arriving anywhere or advancing further from the centre of his revolution, that single eye which he keeps upon the interests of the country. This head of Cerberus may be classed as the snorter. The next head speaks in a way that has become familiar to us all, and, without going further, we may call him the sneerer. The head that has just finished speaking addresses us in a fault-finding tone, and may be described as the snarler. Well, Sir, we have heard from the snorter, the sneerer and the snarler, and, perhaps, when we come to digest all that they have laid before us, we may derive some comfort from their remarks—in noting that they have proved their eminent capacity for the positions they now occupy at the head of the Opposition. Their criticism has been mere fault-finding; there has been nothing constructive or instructive about it, except the few words of candid advice given by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), who has just taken his seat, which, no doubt, will be considered in the most leisurely manner by the commissioners between now and next August.

Before criticising the utterances of these gentlemen in any detail, I must make some reference to the Speech itself and to the hon. gentlemen who inaugurated this debate. The constituencies of East Prince and Montmagny seem to be remarkably favoured in having abundance of material out of which to make good representatives in this House. They have long been well represented, so well that the hon. gentlemen who now fill these seats will find it difficult to live up to the record; but I am glad to say, from what we have heard of them, it seems likely that they will be equal to the task. The hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) gave us a speech unusually full of material for the mover of the Address. It is a great many years since I had the questionable pleasure of performing that duty. I know it is a rather thankless task, especially for a gentleman absolutely new to this House. But I have seldom heard it performed in a better manner, in all the years I have been in this House, than it was performed this session. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Martineau) was extremely modest in the length of his speech, and I hope that ere long he will give us a further opportunity to judge of his oratorical powers.

Now, coming to the subjects of the Speech itself, I think we may conclude from all that is stated in that Speech, from all that we know of the condition of the country, that the phrase adopted by one of our leading newspapers is very fitting when it speaks of the present as the "growing time" of Canada. Our natural productions are growing, our exports are growing, our imports are growing, our revenue is growing, and, what is better than all, there is growing in Canada more and more rapidly every day a thoroughly national and Canadian spirit.

Mr. GEO. LANDERKIN (South Grey). Our majority is growing too.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend (Mr. Landerkin) suggests that majorities are growing also. That is the case, but as we are remarkably strong already, perhaps that does not require special notice. But we are beginning to feel more than we ever did that we are not only British subjects, but British citizens in this country; that not only do we belong to the greatest Empire of the world, but we have a real and effective voice in directing the destinies of that Empire. And I am happy and proud to say that it is under a Liberal Administration that we are beginning to recognize that fact. One of the very first acts of the Administration was to secure a modification of the foreign commercial policy of the Empire favourable to Canada and other colonies. The next manifestation of our influence in the affairs of the Empire was when, directly through our efforts and intervention, Imperial penny postage was secured. And now, Sir, during the past six months we have found all the influence, and one of the best minds, of the mother country

(the late Lord Herschell) directed to secure for Canada the settlement of the points in dispute between us and our great neighbours to the south. I think that the record of Canadian influence in the councils of the Empire during the last two years and a half is worthy of pride. But I do not see why we should stop here. I think that the idea of Imperial unity should go on and grow, and that all schemes of Imperial interests should obtain our support—the Pacific cable scheme, or anything else that tends to the unity and progress of the Empire, and that we should try to impress upon the people at home, as well as to realize ourselves, that we are citizens, not subjects, of no mean Empire.

On this occasion I cannot help alluding to the chaff which was intended to be irritating, and which has been going round about the Imperial postage stamp and its motto. Why, Sir, I am proud of that postage stamp, I am proud of the motto on it. It is the cheapest map in the world, the only map of the world ever issued for two cents, the only map in the world ever issued for the purpose of showing what a large part of the world, and what an overwhelmingly large part of the British Empire, the Dominion of Canada is, a map which goes wherever the correspondence of the people goes, a map which has done more to attract attention to Canada than anything, perhaps, since the Jubilee celebration. Who could find fault with the motto? "We hold a vaster Empire than has been." Well, Mr. Speaker, do we not? Will any member of the Opposition say that the British Empire of to-day fails in comparison with the proudest Empire of the past? I hope not, I hope not even the pessimistic member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) will make any such assertion. As I said already, if anybody has a right to glory in the greatness of the Empire and to shout abroad their delight in it, I think it is the people of this Canada. Then, Sir, that reduction of Imperial postage has been followed, judiciously, followed just at the right time, by a reduction of the general rate in postage throughout Canada, which means throughout the continent of America, since our mail is carried without extra charge in the United States. I cannot pass away from that subject without complimenting the Postmaster General on the grand success of his two great enterprises. The hon. member for York, N.B., said yesterday, in referring to this, that the Postmaster General had blundered into Imperial penny postage, and that then he had blundered into the domestic reduction, he had gone from blunder to blunder. If this is so, Mr. Speaker, I need not dispute his words, we can pray heaven to give us more of such blunders and more of such blunderers. If the hon. gentlemen who now worthily fill the front seats on the Opposition benches had been inspired to such blunders as these some years ago, probably they would still be sitting on this side of the House. Then we come to the question of the negotiations at Washington. These have been so exhaustively discussed already, that there is not room for me to say a great deal. I have never felt the slightest doubt of the ability of our commissioners worthily to represent Canada in those negotiations; I have never felt the least fear that they were going to sacrifice Canadian interests in any respect; and if anybody had any such fear or any such uneasiness, the bare official fact stated in the joint protocol of the commissioners on both sides, that these negotiations were interrupted because our commissioners were unwilling to agree to what seemed to them contrary to the interests of this country, is sufficient to wipe it all away. These gentlemen went there hoping to make a treaty, desiring to make a treaty, expecting to come back here with all the glory and honour of having a treaty. Do you think that they would have given up that honour and glory, and the profit for the country, for any small thing? I do not. I think these gentlemen were honestly ambitious, properly ambitious, to have the credit of making that treaty. If they have failed to make a treaty, if they have refused on the ground stated in this joint protocol, they have refused because they found they could not get a treaty without injury to the dignity and interests of this country. And for that, who is there in this House who will condemn them? What is the use of sneering and snarling at them because they did not get a treaty when we know they could not get it without doing something which we would all have condemned them for doing, if they had agreed to it? Able men could not be found than the Canadian commissioners, better diplomatists are not, than those who represented us, a better representative of Great Britain could not be found than he who represented her on that occasion.

To what, then, are we to attribute the failure on the part of the American commissioners to agree to what we consider reasonable? Are we to assume that the case is hopeless? I think by no means. I think we are not at all entitled to assume that the case is hopeless. Ripe consideration may change people's minds on any question. We must remember the influences which must have been constantly affecting the American commissioners during the sessions at Washington. This treaty, if it passed, must have gone before the Senate. The senators were there on hand, and it was absolutely impossible for the American commissioners to conceal from them altogether the nature of the questions discussed. These commissioners knew that if they accepted a treaty that would not pass the Senate, their time would be wasted. Naturally there was something in the way of consultation and caucusing going on all the time. As a matter of fact the Canadian commissioners, acting in strict silence and at a distance from their constituents, were negotiating with men who were harried at every turn by senators and representatives who said: You must not do this, you must not do that, you must not consent to this or agree to that. It was extremely hard to get them to agree to anything definite under those circumstances. Had those negotiations been carried on while the senators were not present in full force representing different interests, it might have been possible to agree to a treaty that the Senate would have accepted under the influence of the leaders of the party now in power in the States. Those circumstances may occur when the commission next meet. If they do not meet, if the failure is final, still I claim no blame can attach to Canada or her commissioners for the failure. I shall not follow the example of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) in giving advice to these commissioners as to what they shall do at that time. I think they know their own business in that respect pretty well already, and that whatever the result may be, nothing will be done to lower the standing of Canada or her respect in the eyes of her neighbours.

Now, Sir, something must be said about the redistribution Bill. My hon. friend from West York started out by saying that this party had broken all the promises we had made in opposition. He confined his attempt at proof to tariff questions. But here is a convincing evidence that this party does not break its promises when it gets into power. What did we promise the electors in 1896?

Mr. TAYLOR. Free trade.

Mr. CASEY. We promised them freer trade, and we have given them as free trade as they want, and are moving in the same direction. We have satisfied the people of Canada on the trade question. Let the hon. gentleman ask his own constituents, if we have not. When it comes to the question of redistribution, we promised them to undo the wrong that had been done. Speaking for the members supporting the Ministry, I venture to say that we shall do our best to undo that wrong. I am not one who suffered by the Conservative gerrymander; I gained by it. My constituency is one of those which was made into a Grit hive at that time, but I know this was done at the expense of others. I know it is an injustice to those constituencies surrounding West Elgin. For the sake of justice, I am willing, if necessary, to lose a district of good and faithful Grit electors, in order that my neighbours may receive that to which they are honestly entitled. I am pleased, Sir, that the Government, thus early in this Parliament, have decided to take this question in hand and to settle it, so far as this House is competent to do so. It has been said that such a measure is unconstitutional; but we know that the constitution does not anywhere say that we shall not make a redistribution at any time we please, although it does say that we must make one after each census, and that that is the only time we can change the proportion of the number of members in each of the provinces. We do not propose to interfere with that principle of the constitution, but we propose to divide the representation within this province more fairly and equitably than it is now divided. Gentlemen on the other side may call it a gerrymander. We taught them that word pretty well a good many years ago, and it is sometimes, perhaps, not wise to teach your opponents a word of that kind, because it is possible they may misapply it. Sir, I am prepared to say that, if that Bill, when it comes down, bears the same earmarks as the gerrymander Bill of 1882; if it is evidently drawn for the purpose of party advantage, and not for the purpose of giving fair representation in this House, I will call it a gerrymander, and I will speak against it, and vote against it, as will many other members on this side of the House. But, Sir, if that Bill appears to be a fair attempt to rearrange the constituencies, so that the people of Ontario shall be represented according to their actual political opinions, the whole country must recognize that this is another Liberal pledge fulfilled, and must give us credit accordingly.

After Recess.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at Six o'clock, I had concluded my remarks on the specific subjects dealt with in the Address. But, Sir, there is another question which has given rise to a lively debate during this discussion, and which no doubt may form a subject of controversy in the country. I do not know whether we shall have any other opportunity of discussing it in this House; we may, or we may not; and consequently I wish now to say a few words in reference to it. I refer to the question of the plebiscite and the effect which the vote taken should have upon the legislation of this country. My friend, the middle head of the watchdog Cerberus, to whom I referred this afternoon (Mr. Foster) known long for his self-assertive connection with the cause of prohibition, ventured to attack the Government in connection with this subject, or rather, he sneered at the Government for refusing to initiate prohibitive legislation on the basis of the vote polled when the plebiscite was taken. That compels us to consider on what basis the question was put before the electorate. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) said that the implied condition of requiring at least half of the electors of the country to vote for prohibition, was not published before the vote was taken, and that the vote was taken under the general impression on the part of the people, that if prohibition obtained a majority of those who voted at the polls, prohibitive legislation would be introduced in this House. I cannot credit the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) with such shortness of memory as would justify his misstatement in that respect, for I find that during the debate on the Plebiscite Bill last session, he was very keen in questioning the right hon. the Premier as to his intention in regard to this Bill. For instance, the following is reported in "Hansard":—

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has a perfect right to state his own views, but he certainly is not stating mine as I stated them. All I ask is, that when the Government take the first step, which involves this expense and requires a contest, they will let the people know whether they will follow with the second step if the people will tell them to do so.

The Prime Minister answered:

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, I do not know whether I understood my hon. friend, or whether he is correct in his first statement or not. I do not care; I accept his present version. My hon. friend wants to have a declaration from the Government to this effect. I have often said, and I can only here repeat, that when the will of the people has been affirmed, as it will be affirmed one way or the other, then the Government—every Government—must be prepared to abide by the consequences.

A little later on in the same debate, I quote from the words of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster):

Mr. FOSTER. For the sake of clearness—we want to know just where we stand. The hon. gentleman has said that whatever the will of the people is, he will carry it out. That is one version. I want to ask my hon. friend if that means that if there is an affirmative vote for the principle, my hon. friend will straightway, at the next session of Parliament, we will say, introduce a Bill to carry out the will of the people. He asked the Premier a straight question on the subject, and the right hon. gentleman replied:

The PRIME MINISTER. It means nothing of the kind. It means that the Government, when they have the will of the people before them, will have to take such steps as will give effect to the will of the people. There is the question of revenue to be considered. There is also the question of compensation to be considered. There are different questions which will have to be considered.

Mr. FOSTER. The people consider them when they vote.

Again, the question arose of putting certain riders on the ballot paper. It was decided by this House, with the knowledge of all, that that should not be done, but that the question should be yes or no as to the desire of the people for prohibition; and on what ground? First, that the people would consider these questions before they voted; and, second, that this plebiscite was not a vote the result of which would be an enactment by this House, but was merely a means of ascertaining the will of the majority of the people of this country. Now, Sir, with these answers of the Premier before him, which went into the "Debates" and into the press of the country, how could any man honestly assert that when people voted on the plebiscite they had the impression that if it were carried by a bare majority of those voting, the Government would be bound to introduce a Bill on that subject?

Not only did the Government not pledge themselves to do so, but the Premier said distinctly that he would not be bound to do so. The pledge was that when the will of the people was ascertained the Government must abide by it; and what is the will of the people? The will of the people is the will of a majority of the people, not the will of 22 or 23 or 24 per cent of the people. When the Premier answered the delegation on this subject the other day, he took his stand on that ground, that he was not satisfied by this vote that the people of Canada desired prohibition—nay, that he was satisfied by the vote that the people of Canada did not desire prohibition. And I ask the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) or any other hon. member of this House, if he does not come to the same conclusion from the figures of the votes polled on that occasion? The argument is used that a majority of those who vote carry parliamentary elections, and that therefore they should carry in this instance. There is no parallel between the two cases. In the case of a parliamentary election the question before the people is merely as to which of two sets of ordinary political principles shall be put into force—a question between protection and free trade, a question between one method of managing public works and another, and things of that kind. When the plebiscite was put to the vote, the question was whether we should introduce a total change into our whole social, fiscal and commercial system; and no reasonable man will say, with his whole heart and conscience, that such a thing should be initiated unless a majority, and a considerable and prevailing majority, of the people of this country want to have that change.

Now, those who ask for prohibition say that we do not know how the people who stayed at home would have voted. It seems to me quite certain that when you ask the people if they want a change of this kind, a total and revolutionary change, you may take for granted that those who stay at home do so because they do not want that change. You have no right to assume that any one of those who stay at home wants it. If he wanted it, he had an opportunity of saying so, and if he did not use that opportunity, that is his fault, and it will be his loss if the verdict is wrongly understood. Now, it is admitted on all hands that somewhere between one-fifth and one-fourth of the electors of Canada declared in favour of this change. Our Opposition friends say that is not a full expression of the prohibition strength. I should like to know why it is not. The friends of prohibition had months in which to conduct a campaign, and I heard of no campaign carried on by those who opposed it. They say many voted against prohibition for fear the Government would be embarrassed if prohibition carried. There is no use of denying that that motive may have had its effect upon a number of Liberal voters. On the other hand, to my personal knowledge, many Conservatives voted for prohibition simply in the hope of embarrassing the Government. In my own county leading men in every sense of the word in the Conservative party openly stated that they were working to get votes for prohibition in order, as they expressed it, to put the Government in a hole—"to put a rotten Government in a hole"; I will give them the benefit of their whole expression.

Mr. BENNETT. How did you vote?

Mr. CASEY. As this was a vote by which the members of this House consulted their constituents as to what they wanted, I did not consider it my duty to vote at all, and I did not vote. I say it may be admitted that men for party reasons voted against prohibition or abstained from voting for it. On the other hand, men for party reasons voted for it or abstained from voting against it. There is no way of getting at the particulars of these cases; therefore, let us assume that such reasons worked equally on both sides, and then the percentage is not affected.

Then, again, an attempt has been made in the province of Ontario to make it appear that the sole obstacle to prohibition is the vote of the province of Quebec—that it would have been carried only for the heavy vote against it there; and certain politicians, taking advantage of the Premier's nationality, have begun talking about French domination preventing the passage of prohibitory legislation that was desired by the other provinces. I hold in my hand a little brochure remarkable in some of its statements, but possibly correct in some figures, issued by Mr. Spence and Mr. McLaren, of the prohibition committee, in which there is a statement of the votes and percentage of votes polled outside of the province of Quebec. We find that the percentage of votes polled outside of Quebec was only 44.6 per cent. Less than half the people outside of that province voted at all. The percentage voting for prohibition in all the provinces outside of Quebec was 28, a little over one-fourth of the people; and we are asked to say, with such a showing as that, that French domination is standing in the way of prohibitory legislation!

Now, Sir, I say without fear of contradiction, that the plebiscite has decided positively that the majority of the people of Canada at the present time do not want prohibitory legislation. I was a little afraid, I confess, of the results that would follow this experiment when it was tried. I do not think it is exactly the sort of experiment which our constitution contemplated; but I must admit one thing: it has settled, for a considerable time at least, the question whether prohibition is a live issue in this country or not. There is no possibility of enforcing the will of a minority against the will of the majority, or against the inertia of the majority. We might possibly pass that legislation in this House; but you could not enforce it in the country by any means known to our law and constitution.

I say all these things with regard to prohibitory legislation without pronouncing any opinion as to the desirability of prohibition itself. The stage has long passed for the expression of individual opinions on that point. Whether you or I believe in prohibitory legislation as a useful thing or not, whether we wish to see that experiment tried or not, I say the pronouncement of the country has been decidedly against it, and I fail to see how any Government consulting the interests of the country, and careful of its morals, could either introduce or permit the passing of any legislation of that kind.

But my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), the ex-champion of prohibition, the gentleman who got his seat in this House by talking prohibition, who got his prominence in the country by it, who got into the late Government by it—where is he? He is sitting in his seat sneering at the Government for not doing anything. But what is he willing to do himself? What did he get done when a member of the late Government? He got a commission appointed, which sat several years, went all over the country, spent something like $200,000, and reported that prohibition was not then practicable. And now what does he do? There was a meeting, called by circular, of the friends of prohibition in a committee room of this House to-day. I do not find the name of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) amongst those present. Why was he the apostle of prohibition not there among his disciples, comforting them and helping them to devise legislation to be submitted to this House? No, Mr. Speaker, that was not politics. Was the leader of the Opposition there, (Sir Charles Tupper), a gentleman who is said to be in favour of prohibition, although he has not been an apostle of it like his colleague? He was not. Were any of the leaders of the party there? Was the party whip there?

Mr. DAVIN. Was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) there?

Mr. CASEY. I did not see his name, but as a member of the Government which has declared that it does not see its way to introduce prohibitory legislation, I do not see how he could be present at a meeting to devise any such legislation. I am asking why those who claim to sympathise with the introduction of prohibitory legislation were not present. Why was not the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) there? If the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) wishes to do something for the cause of prohibition, why does he not take charge of legislation in this House on that subject? It is just as open to him to introduce such legislation as to a Cabinet Minister. Anybody can introduce a prohibitory Bill. Will he take charge of it and get the leader of the Opposition to support it and make it a party issue? No, Sir, they dare not do so; and for a man who would be the leader of his party, and who pretends to be the leader of prohibition sentiment in this party, to sit on a front bench sneering at gentlemen on this side on that subject while he will not do anything himself, is to take a position that will cover him with contempt from friends of prohibition. He is neither here nor there, neither for nor against it, but can only sit in the corner and sneer at those who are willing to take an active part on the one side or the other on this great question.

I do not know that I need say anything more about the speech of the hon. gentleman, whom I have called the sneerer (Mr. Foster) except to note "en passant"—

An hon. MEMBER. English.

Mr. CASEY. I use the word advisedly. I need say nothing more except to note "en passant" that the hon. gentleman ventured to sneer at the pronunciation by my right hon. friend the Premier of a certain English word. He sneered at him for some slight fault in pronunciation, for not pronouncing the word just as an Englishman would. And then we have my hon. friend who sees fit to sneer at the manner in which an educated French gentleman speaks English, and who could not, to save his life, make a speech in French that could be understood by anybody, turning round and murdering the Queen's English altogether, talking about "constitootions," and treating us throughout the whole of his remarks to an accent which is more displeasing to British citizens in this House than the French Canadian accent can possibly be. Most of us will admit that the French Canadian way of pronouncing English has something piquant and pleasing about it, but we do not at all enjoy the down-east twang of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster).

The speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) calls for much more lengthy remarks than I could possibly give it, because it offers opportunity for pitching in in almost every sentence. But time forbids. It is a long time, some twenty-five or twenty-six years ago, since I made use of a certain comparison in describing that hon. gentleman's style of oratory, and I may be justified, as the hon. gentleman himself is so fond of chestnuts, and dishes them up in all forms, in repeating that same comparison to-day. I said that a speech by him was like a natural phenomena, something you could not reason with, not stop, nor mitigate in any way—like a thunder storm or a hurricane or the rush of the springtide that flows up the beach of the Bay of Fundy. That springtide has some other name, but I forget for the moment what it is.

Mr. FLINT (Yarmouth). The Bore.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend says it is called "the Bore." At all events, it is a curling, rushing flood which tears up the beach and sweeps away everything in front of it. All you can do, when you see that springtide coming along is to get into a safe place behind a rock and watch it until it comes to a head and curls over on the beach and smashes everything before it, and then come away and say "what a grand old-springtide that was!" That is about what a speech by the hon. gentleman is like. I have no objection to it. We are accustomed to see that tide rise and fall in this House for many years through much the same channel and do not mind it in the least.

There is only one objection that I find in the tone of the hon. gentleman's speech, and that is he seems determined to make it impossible for us to negotiate any treaty with the United States. He has done the best, in a vindictive spirit, to stir up bitter feeling between the two countries, and at the same time to persuade American statesmen that our Canadian commissioners are very easily deluded and got the better of. I doubt if he will succeed in this latter particular. The American commissioners have met these men and know what they are like, but he may possibly succeed in stirring up ill-feeling and in preventing the conclusion of a satisfactory agreement. It would be undoubtedly gratifying to the man who had to sign a certificate to his own incorrectness of statement—I suppose that is within the rules—before he could obtain an audience with Mr. Blaine on a former occasion. It would be consoling to him if he found that any remarks of his had placed insuperable difficulties in the way of the success of my right hon. friend the Premier. It is to be hoped that the froth and fury, the spume and foam of his recent tide, however, will not reach as far as Washington, or will make but little disturbance when they get there.

Now, a word or two with regard to a remark made by my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), the third head of the party. He said that we had broken our promise, as the tariff we had instituted was not a revenue tariff. It is a very peculiar thing that a tariff that is not a revenue tariff should produce such a tremendous amount of revenue. It seems to me that a tariff that even when reduced by about 25 per cent as regards a very large volume of our trade, should yield several millions a year more revenue than the old tariff did, is a fairly good revenue tariff. If it is not a revenue tariff, it remains for the hon. snarler of the party to explain—

Mr. DAVIN. Is a revenue tariff one that produces the largest amount of revenue?

Mr. CASEY. We have heard from the three heads of Cerberus; now we are hearing from the "wag" at the tail.

Mr. DAVIN. The tail of Cerberus is a very powerful weapon.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for West York said that we had not done the fair thing with England, because we had increased the duty on certain articles more than we had reduced them by the preference given to that country. I think he was somewhat incorrect in making that statement. I do not think there were any items of duty increased more than 25 per cent. But, even had the duties been increased quite as much as they had been reduced toward Great Britain by the preferential clause of the tariff, still Great Britain is given a preference of 25 per cent over other countries. As a matter of fact, very few of the duties were increased before they were reduced in Great Britain's favour. Nearly all articles of British goods come in cheaper than under the old tariff, and in all cases they come in at 25 per cent less than the products of other countries. The hon. gentleman told us that Great Britain got no preference, because we imported so much scrap-iron from the United States. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman in all his gropings in the junk-shop, but I desire to point out one thing. Our promise, when we came into power, was to reduce the duties on raw materials. We reduced them on iron, along with other things. We must get our raw materials where they are to be had. We get our scrap-iron from the United States, because we can get it there cheaper than elsewhere. Why does it not come from Great Britain, seeing that there is a preference of 25 per cent in favour of that country? I am informed by a gentleman who is well qualified to speak on matters concerning the hardware trade, that Great Britain is actually importing scrap-iron and pig-iron from the United States. Instead of having this material to sell us, she must look to outside markets for her own supply.

Now, having to some extent criticised the heads and other terminals of the party, I think I shall relieve the House from any further discussion on my part. I conclude by saying that I am sure the hon. leader of the House, when he was making his grand speech yesterday in reply to the leader of the Opposition, must have felt as the leader of a Liberal party has seldom felt before in Canada—that he had the party at his back, solid, united, enthusiastic, and ready for the fray.

Mr. BENNETT. Where were you on the Yukon?

Mr. CASEY. I was where my conscience led me, and I am as strong a supporter of the Government as I was before; and the Government know that independent opinion counts for a good deal. The Liberal party is thoroughly united and solid behind the leader of the Government. The members of that party are proud of their leader, proud of the record of the Government, proud of the progress of the country, proud of the country and the people of the country, and perfectly confident as to the future.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Mr. Speaker, I wish to engage the attention of the House for a short time while I address a few words to you, and through you to the hon. members on both sides, and through the press to the people of this country. In the first place, I wish to congratulate the hon. mover and seconder of the Address upon the very ingenuous manner in which they dealt with the Speech of His Excellency from the Throne. They certainly made the most they could out of a very bad case. I am sorry I cannot compliment the Government that prepared that Address for having placed such a Speech in the hands of the Governor General, particularly as it is his first Speech from the Throne. There were some things in that Address that certainly must have brought a blush to his face, considering that he had to refer, in the very beginning, to a violation of the constitution. There were many things that were not in the Address that the people of Canada, I am sure, would expect to hear from His Excellency in this, his first deliverance. Before I deal with the subjects touched on in the Speech, I wish to refer to one or two statements by my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey). Among the first statements that he made was: "We, the Liberal party, are now loyal. Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives are now in opposition. Though I occupied the honourable position of Government Whip for several years before the late Conservative Government were defeated, I am glad as a Canadian, glad as a British subject, that the Conservative party are in opposition to-day. Their being in opposition has made—I will not say the Liberal party—but has made many of its leaders loyal. You remember, Sir, as the people of this country remember, that but a few years ago an appeal was made to the people of this country by the leaders of the Liberal party, then in opposition, on a cry of commercial union—unrestricted reciprocity—so that the Hon. Edward Blake deserted his party, and said: "If you carry out that policy, you will drive us into annexation. We heard many disloyal cries then, but to-day we do not hear disloyalty from any leading member of that party.

Therefore, I am glad the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition and those who sit behind him are on this side, and that we as Canadians and British subjects are in opposition, because it has made the leaders of the Liberal party in this country loyal. The next matter my hon. friend from West Elgin

(Mr. Casey) referred to, one of the things he gloried in, was that now for a cent you could buy a map of Canada, a map of "the greater Empire that we hold." This must be another edition of the postage stamp that the Postmaster General has issued, for we on this side of the House have not yet seen a postage stamp that can be purchased for a cent, and that has a map on it. It may be an edition issued specially for the Postmaster General's friends, that he sells to members on that side of the House for a cent. But as I understand it, the two-cent stamp is the only one on which a map is displayed. My hon. friend also quoted the words that the Postmaster General had placed on that stamp, and he quoted them thus: "We hold a greater Empire than has been." I think the stamp, if I recollect it right, reads: "We hold a vaster Empire than has been." That is the edition we have seen, but the one-cent edition may have the word "greater." The hon. gentleman congratulated the hon. Postmaster General on the publication of that stamp which, in my opinion, has brought ridicule to the Government of this country. We find "Punch," the leading paper of England, taking up this question and suggesting to the British Government that it publish a stamp something like it, but in place of saying: "We hold a vaster Empire than has been," they should put on it some one of these statements: "We are richer than anybody"; "We are tremendous swells"; "The policeman outside of the Mansion House is the finest in the world"; "There are more faddists in England than in any other country"; "Our fleet can smash all the rest"; "Mind your eye"; "There are more omnibuses in London than anywhere"; "One of our journals has the largest circulation in the world"; "We have a Prime Minister who is bigger than any other"; "We had a leader of the Opposition of similar stature." There is what the leading paper of England says of this great production of the hon. the Postmaster General of this country, that is the ridicule that that paper throws upon Canada and its Government for having issued this stamp. Then the hon. gentleman congratulates the Government and the Postmaster General in particular for having inaugurated a domestic two-cent postage for Canada. When they were in Opposition the Postmaster General, my hon. friend from West Elgin and their friends, then sitting on this side of the House, charged the Conservative Government with always legislating to make the rich man richer and the poor man poorer. I want to ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General what the farmers of Canada are going to save by this two-cent postage? They know that this Government is run by the revenues received from the people of this country. The Minister of Public Works says: "We have made lots of money, and we are going to spend it. The Government of this country do not make money, they have no mint, they do not create money.

But judging from the remarks of the Minister of Public Works, the Government made all this money and they are spending it. Where do they get it? They have three or four sources of revenue. They collect by customs, they collect by excise, and they collect by postage. Who pays the greater portion of the taxes of this country? I say the farmers of this country do. I am a manufacturer, and having been among the manufacturers of this country, I know that many of them are saving a large amount of money yearly on account of the reduction of postage. Every banker in this country, every bank in this country, will save thousands and thousands of dollars annually by the reduction of postage. The large manufacturers of this country will save large sums of money, so will the large mercantile houses. What does the farmer save? Who pays the taxes to make up the deficiency? Last year we received from the sale of the three-cent postage stamp, perhaps, three million dollars, this year we will receive two. There is a million dollars deficit; who pays that million dollars? The farmers of this country pay three-fourths of the taxes of this country; therefore, the farmers of this country—for although I live in a town, I represent a large agricultural district—I say the farmers of this country pay three-fourths of that million dollars we lose in revenue by the reduction of domestic postage from three to two cents. What do the farmers save? I say that the farmers of this country, on the average, do not write ten letters a year each. Therefore, each farmer will save ten cents by the reduction of postage. And what do they pay to make it up? They will pay 75 cents to a dollar each to make up the deficiency. This is the boon which the Postmaster General has given to the farmers of this country by the reduction. The effect will be to make the bankers, the merchants, the manufacturers, the bloated monopolists—to make them richer and make the poor farmer poorer. Then my hon. friend from West Elgin, in speaking of the plebiscite, stated that as a member of this House he did not feel it to be his duty to go out and vote either for or against it. Now, if any hon. gentleman sitting on that side of the House could hit the Government a harder slap in the face than that, I ask him to do it. He says: We submitted this question to the people of this country, we wanted them to come out and give an honest expression of their opinion without any interference from members of this House, who should not vote. Let me point him to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), to the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), to the member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion). What did these gentlemen do? Detailed by the Prime Minister of this country, I have no doubt, to go out and stump the province of Quebec, instead of being here and earning their salaries of $7,000 a year that the people pay them to transact the business of the country. They were detailed to go out and stump the province of Quebec, to tell the people that if the plebiscite carried, the hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have to go out of power. The member for West Elgin said that we wanted a fair and honest expression of opinion and, therefore, he would not vote. What has he to say of those members of the Government who went out and asked the people to vote against it? Then my hon. friend asked the question: Who was up in the meeting to-day of the Dominion Alliance? He wants to know if the whip was there—I presume he referred to me. I know the Government whip was there, and I think some gentleman present jumped on him pretty severely. But I was there, as I can inform the member for West Elgin, and I took a little part in the discussion. The Secretary of the Dominion Alliance quoted statistics, the Prime Minister quotes statistics, and says that only a certain percentage of the vote, about 23 per cent, was polled for the plebiscite. I obtained from the secretary to-day how the list was made by which they make up this percentage, and I can point to my hon. friend across the way who can produce it. The percentage was made up by the number of names on part 1 and part 3 of the Ontario list. Part 1 and part 3 are for the electors who can vote for Dominion or provincial purposes. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) appears on the list for Gananoque in two wards, and I have no doubt he appears in Kingston. In the statistics that have been made up, this 23 per cent can only vote once, yet a man may be on the list and count four, or five, or six.

In the province of Quebec a person can vote every time his name appears on the list, whereas in Ontario he can only vote in the polling subdivision where he resides. There are hundreds of names of voters on the lists of the front of Leeds and Lansdowne who live in the United States, they being owners of islands in the River St. Lawrence, but they cannot come to Canada and vote, and so they are included by the Prime Minister in his percentage against prohibition. We have also in Gananoque numbers of voters whose names are on the lists in the townships of Leeds and Lansdowne, but who can only vote in Gananoque, where they reside, and they also are counted in by the Prime Minister to make up his calculation of 23 per cent. I contend that the percentage of the votes given for prohibition in Ontario was nearly as large as the percentage of the vote given for either Dominion or provincial purposes.

I propose, Sir, to deal with some of the subjects treated of in the Address, but let me say first, that we have in Canada to-day the most honest, the most truthful, the most business-like, the most economical and the most industrious Government that has held power in Canada since confederation. I do not wonder, Mr. Speaker, that such a statement brings a smile to your face, because you, Sir, know that I would not make a statement either in this House or outside of it that I did not believe to be true. In order, therefore, that you, Mr. Speaker, and that the people of the country may believe that statement I must qualify it, and I must add the prefix "dis" before the word "honest," the prefix "un" before the word "truthful," the prefix "un" before the word "business-like," and I must substitute the word "extravagant" for the word "economical," and for the word "industrious" I must substitute the word "careless." When this is done, my assertion will read so that you, Mr. Speaker, and the people of this country will agree with what I say, and we will therefore find that we have in power to-day in Canada the most dishonest, untruthful, unbusiness-like, extravagant, reckless, careless and corrupt Government that has been in power since confederation.

Now, Sir, the first paragraph of the Address deals with the large degree of prosperity that we Canadians now enjoy. The present Government lay claim to the credit for that, but all thoughtful men will give the credit to a kind Providence who for the last two or three years has blessed our country with a bountiful harvest, which blessing, combined with the scarcity existing in other countries, has caused a good demand and high prices for the products of Canada. Another reason is the adoption by the Conservative Government some years ago of the National Policy, a policy which preserved to the people of Canada to a very large extent, their markets for manufactures and for the products of the farm and the forest and the field. Little thanks is due hon. gentlemen now in power for the National Policy. They promised the people of this country that when they attained office the National Policy would be swept out of existence. They have swallowed that promise, it has not choked them, but, at all events, they have swallowed it, with every other promise they made to the electors of the country when they appealed to them for support. What act of the present Government has brought about this prosperity in Canada? Surely it has not been caused by the increased duty they have placed on sugar and tobacco, or by the reduction of the duty on coal oil from 6 to 5 cents a gallon—although they promised to give us coal oil free. These are the principal legislative acts of the Government, and I ask any intelligent man have these brought about that prosperity, a reference to which the Government was pleased to put in the mouth of His Excellency. Is this prosperity brought about by the act of the Government in making corn free of duty? Has the entrance into this country free of duty during the last twelve months of 19,770,630 bushels of corn (over and above that imported for distilling purposes), has that brought prosperity? Has that importation of free corn caused Canada to produce more cattle and more hogs? Surely the farmers of Canada grew corn and peas and oats and barley enough for their own wants. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed to the fact that in this country we are producing pork enough to feed the people of Canada, and also to export a large quantity of hams and bacon and pork to the mother country. Has any legislation of the Liberal Government brought about that state of affairs? No. I will tell the hon. gentlemen opposite what has brought that about. Some ten or twelve years ago I proved in this House by the Trade and Navigation Returns that for the year preceding we had sent $12,000,000 to the United States to purchase beef and pork to feed the people of Canada. I argued that if the then Conservative Government would place a duty of 3 cents a pound on these products that within a few years we would not only have pork enough to feed our own people, but we would also produce a large quantity for export. The Conservative Government then placed a duty of 3 cents a pound on pork, and that is why to-day we produced such a large quantity for export. Has the right hon. the Prime Minister wiped away every vestige of protection as he promised to do? Is not 3 cents a pound duty on pork sufficient protection to keep the American pork out of Canada, and to enable us to grow enough for ourselves and a large quantity for export. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) takes credit for this, but I tell him that the credit is due to the late Conservative Government, although he tries to steal that good policy like everything else that was done by his predecessors. Neither can this Government claim that the prosperity has been brought about by their blundering legislation, which has closed the German markets against the Canadian farmers. On account of their blundering policy, Germany has shut out our rye, our pease and our wheat, and we cannot to-day sell a bushel of these commodities in that country.

Reference is also made in the Address to the expansion of trade and, Sir, that again is due to the bountiful harvest and the fairly good prices for the last two or three years.

Reference is also made in the Address to the increase of revenue. I hold in my hand a few statistics which I have gathered from the Trade and Navigation Returns which were laid on the Table of the House yesterday, showing the taxes paid on a number of articles during the last seven months; and I am glad to see my hon. friend from North Leeds (Mr. Frost) in the House. During the past season, I think in the month of June, I happened to stop at the Village of Stittsville, a station or two distant from my hon. friend's agricultural implement factory, and there on the station platform I saw 15 self-reapers and binders from Chicago, freighted all that distance and planted right down at the side of my hon. friend's factory. These machines were sold to the people of Canada, our Canadian money went over to the United States to employ American labour, while our Canadian boys went idle in this country. These American implements are sold no cheaper, and they are no better, than the implements produced by my hon. friend from North Leeds. Here is a list from the Trade and Navigation Returns, showing the quantity and value of American goods imported during 1898 :

Making a grand total in these few items of $1,824,274 of the money of the people of Canada sent to employ labour in the United States, where the farmers of this country cannot send their produce to feed those workmen. There is not an article in that list but can be produced as cheap and cheaper, as good and better, by our Canadian labour, than can be done in the United States. These implements, when used for a few years, are worn out, and what have we left? Our money is over there and the machinery is played out. If that machinery had been made in this country, the money would be in the country when the machinery is worn out, and our Canadian men would have employment and our farmers would be feeding them. There is the tariff I would advocate for this country, so far as I am personally concerned: make in this country every article that can be produced by Canadian labour, and have the labourer fed by Canadian produce raised by Canadian farmers. The farmers pay three-fourths of the customs taxes. The customs taxes collected for the seven months ending the 30th of January, 1899, amounted to $14,189,000; last year for the corresponding seven months they amounted to $11,747,000, or an increase of $2,441,000. What does that mean? It means that $2,441,000 more was collected in taxes, and $8,000,000 more was paid to the Americans to produce the goods on which that amount of taxation was collected.

Reference is also made in the Address to the increased number of our population. I do not know, but I feel quite satisfied, that it was the blue-ruin knight, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) who inspired that clause, because that was his particular hobby when in opposition. It is true, we have received a large number of Galicians, a large number of Doukhobors and a large number of Italians. I hope they may turn out well, but they are a doubtful quantity, to say the least of them.

The Address goes further: it says that the exodus happily has ceased. The exodus was an imagination, an illusion of the hon. gentleman who ought to have been the Finance Minister of this Government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because when in Opposition it was his particular hobby to talk of the exodus and emigration. There are going from Canada to-day as many of our young men and young women as went at any time under the Conservative Government. The United States is a larger field, and our young boys and girls, some of them, occasionally, find their way over there; and as many are going to-day as ever went, except those who went in the imagination of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The next paragraph of the Address makes reference to the treaty negotiations which have engaged the attention of the three knights of this Government—the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and associated with them the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. John Charlton). If there is one thing more than another which these hon. gentlemen ought to be ashamed of, it is the time that has been wasted and the money that has been spent in trying to see what effect the Premier's sunny smile would have on that hard-faced, keen bargain-driver of a Yankee. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted a few verses of poetry last evening. I will quote a few made by a Canadian poet which I think are particularly applicable just here. They have reference to that sunny smile of the hon. Prime Minister:

When Sir Wilfrid went down, there was never a frown
On his face, which was bright and contented,
But he wore all the while—just the sunniest
That ever a Premier invented.

They travelled in style, both himself and his smile,
Creating, of course, good impressions,
His clothing was rich, in the pockets of which Were stacks upon stacks of concessions.

He was constantly wined, he was constantly dined,
As oft as occasion demanded,
He was fain to remain—in that land of champagne,
And his smile in the meantime expanded.

And the times they were fine—mid the banquets and wine,
So runneth the newspaper story,
And they stood hand in hand, while the flag of our land Hung right along side of Old Glory.

And day after day, as he gambled away
Concessions which should have been traded,
Of rights that were dear to the commonwealth here,
His smile it grew withered and faded.

And soon they were gone, his mission was done,
And he said, though his voice was not hearty,
“They have collared my pile—they have collared my smile,
I'll go home to the Liberal party.

And the dear Mother ‘Globe’ will throw round me her robe
Of charity, love and protection,
And with Israel Tarte, I'll immediately start
To plan for a general election.”

An hon. MEMBER. Who is the author?

Mr. TAYLOR. The author is a lady who lives in Oshawa, and wrote to the Oshawa “Vindicator.” I think, Mr. Speaker, in the interests of Canada, that it is a great pity that the Government, when a commission was to be appointed, did not appoint three sharp, shrewd, business men, with my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), to go down and negotiate a treaty. And if these sharp, shrewd business men had been sent, they would either have had the basis of a treaty agreed upon within six days or have come home. They would have gone down with their propositions, and would have said to the American commissioners: Here is what we propose doing. What have you to say about it? These gentlemen would not have waited until the sunny smile was worn out; but if their propositions were not entertained, would have refused to do anything, and have come home.

The next paragraph of the Address refers to the plebiscite, and reads as follows:—

In compliance with the Act which passed last session, a plebiscite was held on the question of prohibition. The official figures of the vote will be placed before you.

It certainly was not the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) who framed that paragraph. I have heard Cabinet Ministers on the stump hold up the Minister of Agriculture as a representative of the farmers of this country, as having been taken into the Cabinet because he was a practical farmer. Whoever heard before, when the members of the Government when in opposition, or since they have obtained office, any person say that the Minister of Agriculture is a practical farmer? I always understood that he was taken into the Cabinet as a representative of the temperance party. To show you what he knows about farming, let me tell the House that one day, as I was travelling on the train, I met a gentleman from the hon. Minister's own constituency, who said to me: Here is about what Mr. Fisher knows of farming. When he became Minister, a French farmer, living in Coaticook, who had a fine crop of tobacco, invited the Minister to come out and see it. The Minister went, and was shown a fine field of tobacco. The farmer pointed to a beautiful plant, and said: “Is not that a splendid plant of tobacco, Mr. Fisher: is not that a beautiful leaf?” “Yes,” replied the Minister, “but when is it going to plug out?” He actually thought that plugs of tobacco were going to grow on the plant. I certainly think that paragraph in the Address which I have just read, must have been framed by the hon. Minister without portfolio, the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), because, when the campaign was on, he said, in his stumping, that in a moment of weakness the Liberal party had committed themselves to this plank in their platform at the Ottawa Convention of 1893, but that, no matter how the vote would go, there would be no prohibition. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman then let out a Cabinet secret. He then let out what the right hon. Prime Minister told us a few days ago. Four Ministers were detailed to stump against prohibition, and, in view of what has occurred, I think the paragraph should have read as follows:—

That my responsible Ministers, when in opposition, called a convention at Ottawa in June, 1893, and passed a resolution pledging the Liberal party, when they came into power, to submit the question, and, if carried, to give effect to the will of the people.

That at the last session an Act was passed, and $250,000 voted to pay the expenses of submitting the question, but in order to kill it in advance, if prohibition carried and went into effect, it was made a penal offence for any person to make apple cider or grape wine, hoping this would influence the electors, when they came to read the ballot, to vote against it.

That, although this objectionable feature was put in the Act and in the ballot, my responsible Ministers yet feared it might carry, so they sent word out privately to all their officials and followers whom they could trust to vote against it, for if it carried it would put the Government in a hole.

That is what the returning officer did in my county.

They also instructed the Government press to discourage the party from voting for it.

Just as my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) did not vote for it.

Fearing still that it might carry, the electors in the province of Quebec were given from one to ten votes each, while in all the other provinces one vote was allowed to each elector.—

An hon. MEMBER. They were put in three days after the polls were closed.

Mr. TAYLOR—

—That, even after all these precautions by my Ministers, it still carried by a large majority.

And, notwithstanding the pledges given by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, when he moved the resolutions at the convention—

This is the Minister of Agriculture's speech, when he introduced the motion. In addressing the convention in 1893, the Minister of Agriculture said :

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen : At this late hour the only thing that can justify me in asking your attention for a few moments is the importance of the question I am going to bring before the convention. It has been the proud boast of the Liberal party that its principles are those that make for good and right in the country. It is in consequence of this that we find in the ranks of the Liberal party the best elements of the moral, intelligent and religious people of the land. It is in consequence of this that the young men of the country who wish to do their duty manfully and well are flocked to the Liberal standard. Therefore, I am glad to say, I am going to ask this convention to pass a resolution which is in the direction of one of the greatest causes of good in the land—a resolution on the question of temperance. It is one of the greatest satisfactions of my political career that when, as a young man, I acquired the franchise in the Dominion of Canada, the first occasion which I was called upon to exercise it was when the question of prohibition or license was before the people, and that I cast my vote in favour of local option. At that time local option was the cry of the temperance people, and we had the Dunkin Act in force in this country. Afterwards, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to you (Hon. Mr. Scott) introduced in the Senate the Act which bears his name, and which was the hope of the temperance people for many years. But the temperance sentiment now asks for something more than local option. I am glad, therefore, that the great party to which I belong,—

I wonder if he will resign.

—with which I have worked, is prepared to take a stand upon the temperance question, and to declare in its platform in favour of a step in the right direction on this subject. I understand that this is the first time a great political party in this country has ever faced this question in a fair and true spirit. I am not aware that any political party in this country has ever declared itself squarely upon this question. I was aware that the House of Commons itself passed a resolution to the effect that when the country was ripe Parliament should enact a prohibition law. It is some time since that was passed. The Tory party has been long in power, but has not taken any steps to obtain the vote of the country upon this question. It is true, as you know, that Finance Minister Foster—and when I speak his name I have to look back to the first years when he and I were in Parliament, when he was looked upon as a temperance cham— pion. I regret to say that that hon. gentleman, on the floor of Parliament, has told the country that he, one of the leaders of the Tory party, only advocated temperance "in a moment of weakness," and that when he came to his sober senses he went back on that record.

I wonder where his sober senses are after making that statement.

The Tory party has not done justice in favour of temperance, it has only appointed a Royal Commission to go about the country and find out something ; but, as Mr. Laurier said, we have all the information of the kind that a Royal Commission can collect. They have put off that question, they have shunted it, and have not taken steps to find out the attitude of the country upon this question. I am glad to be here to ask this Liberal convention to take a step which will bring about an opportunity for the people to express themselves upon this question. We know that in three of the provinces the Liberal governments of these provinces have brought about local or provincial plebiscites, thus giving the temperance people the opportunity to show what they believe to be the truth, that the temperance sentiment in this country is strong enough to enforce a prohibition law if it is given us. I propose to read a resolution which will bring about this result, and which pledges the Liberal party, if returned to power, to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views upon this question, and the Government in power must necessarily carry out the expressed will of the people.

There is no question of percentage there. The will of the people has been expressed. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who made that speech, is in the Government to-day, although he said that, after the will of the people was expressed, it would be the duty of the Government to carry it out. Now, let them do it. Then he reads the resolution, and concludes his speech thus :

This will bring the question clearly before the people of Canada, and will enable the Government to know just what the sentiment of the country is, and I have enough confidence in the people to believe that the result will be so pronounced that the legislature and Government will be only too glad to meet the wishes of the people, and that we shall be able to get a law of total prohibition.

But there was more than that, there was a circular issued by the Dominion Alliance, signed by Mr. E. L. Bond, chairman of the plebiscite committee for the province of Quebec, and the fifth paragraph of that circular reads as follows :—

It is claimed that, even if the plebiscite be carried, the present Administration has no intention of giving effect to the vote by parliamentary action. It is difficult to conceive any greater insult to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Let us examine the facts.

The Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Liberal party, who were then out of power, preparing for a general election, recognized among the electors an important body known as prohibitionists, and placed among the political measures upon which he was to appeal to the electors the following proposition :—

" Prohibition.—That, whereas public attention is at present directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite."

Furthermore, Sir Wilfrid Laurier has given, in connection with this proposed policy, repeated assurances, of which the following is the most notable. In reply to a deputation of Winnipeg prohibitionists, Mr. Laurier is reported to have said: "He would pledge his honour that, as soon as the Liberals came into power at Ottawa, they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion, by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party."

There is his pledge.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). That is what Mr. Bond said.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, this is the circular issued to the electors just before the vote was taken. Then he quotes the Montreal "Gazette":

The Montreal "Gazette," in its edition of the 6th of September, 1894, published this statement with the following comment:—

"This declaration carries the Liberal party further than they have ever gone before. * * * Mr. Laurier has now promised that if a majority can be obtained in support of prohibition all over the Dominion,—

Not 23 per cent.

—prohibition will be granted. This is one of the largest promises ever made by a political leader. To bring a country, nearly the size of Europe, under prohibition would be an achievement which would satisfy the most extreme of temperance enthusiasts."

The Liberal party was duly elected, and the Hon. Mr. Laurier made Premier. Up to the present he has literally fulfilled his promises, and the plebiscite unhampered is before the people. If the electors of Canada now show that they want prohibition, is it even decent to assert that this gentleman of untarnished reputation would stoop to the position of a pettyfogging politician, and virtually say:

"It is true I promised an Act, it is true I had an estimate of $250,000 passed, and have expended the same on the plebiscite, but it was only to hoodwink you. I have changed my mind—I think we had better go on as we are."

Does any sane man think this possible of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? Does any one believe that, assuming such a position were possible, the Hon. Sydney Fisher would remain in the Cabinet one day after such a decision had been announced? This gentleman, in speaking to the resolution in the Liberal convention at Ottawa, said:

"I propose to read the resolution which will bring about this result, and which pledges the Liberal party, if returned to power, to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views upon this question, and the Government in power must necessarily carry out the expressed will of the people. There is no doubt that this is what the Liberal party would do.

No, an argument like this against the plebiscite is an insult to the integrity of the honourable gentlemen, as well as to the intelligence of the electors of Canada.

We desire a full, fair vote. If it is against us, that ends the question for many years to come. If for us, we look confidently for all the pledges of the Government to be fulfilled.

E. L. BOND,

Chairman of the Plebiscite Committee for the Province of Quebec.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Then we have the address of Mrs. Thornly, the president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which I find summarized as follows:—

Mrs. Thornly, the provincial president, in her annual address at the W. C. T. U. convention, said that against most unconquerable odds the temperance party scored a victory for prohibition. "Let us thank God from our inmost hearts, for the battle was the Lord's. There were shameless desertions and unexpected treachery; but despite all, the Dominion of Canada had declared for the abolition of the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicants."

She proceeded to say that with the evidence of such political rascality and trickery it was a wonder that there was any majority, and scored the Government for the delay in introducing the Plebiscite Bill.

Mrs. Thornly said: "When the Bill was presented, we found it had a catch question on the ballot. It was not alcoholic, but intoxicating liquors of which we had asked the prohibition. One-half per cent of alcohol makes an alcoholic liquor; but it takes a good deal more than the double of that to make it intoxicating. The voter was directed to pronounce for or against alcoholic beverages. He was further requested to decide whether or no cider might be manufactured. Sweet cider is manufactured. Hard cider makes itself. Is it any wonder that our opponents found a bonanza at this point? Mr. Fisher's explanation was not embodied in the Bill, and the words of the ballot contradicted him, for while cider is not intoxicant for some time, it is alcoholic, under ordinary conditions, in forty-eight hours. The elector had to record himself against the manufacture of cider and the use of all alcoholic liquors, if he was to be counted in favour of national prohibition. One begins to realize the magnitude of the victory as they study out the unnecessary obstacles that had to be surmounted to reach it."

"The season for the campaign," she said, "was bad for the vote—the worst in the year; the polling booth arrangements were not good; the punishments for fraud were inadequate; intimidating was practised; prohibitionists in London were threatened with the boycott in business; and with all this, the wonder was that the majority was so large. By the 'Parliamentary Companion,'" she said, "Sir Wilfrid Laurier had a minority of 40,000 votes in the Dominion."

Mrs. Thornly asked that the mandate of the people be carried out, and prohibition granted, and concluded as follows:—"Now that a census of the people puts to flight the doubt of their desire for such legislation, let us have prohibition, and let the opening act of the coming House be such trenchant action concerning the Klondike as shall reassure the doubters and restore the hearty confidence of three years ago."

There is another pronouncement in the form of a letter which I would like to read, but I must not occupy the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no doubt that if it had been drawn to the attention of His Excellency, he would have given some such speech as I have mentioned. The letter is from Mr. J. T. Bulmer, of Halifax, and I may say he is one of the leading barristers in that province, a gentleman who contested the constituency of Cumberland with the hon. leader of the Opposition. He wrote a most scathing letter that appeared in the Ottawa "Citizen" a few days ago, but it is too long to read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, if hon. gentlemen desire it, I will read it.

Mr. Bulmer heads his letter addressed to the "Citizen," with the following:—

"Ah! May God grant me life, and may Jesus pardon me, I will raise a gibbet a hundred yards high, I will take hammer and nails, and I will crucify this Beauharnais called Buonaparte, between this Leray called Saint-Arnaud and this Fialin called Persigny."

Editor Citizen,—The above was used by Victor Hugo in exile as a shout of defiance at the third Napoleon after the infamous December days of 1851, in which he had broken the pledges and by the coup d'état assassinated the French Republic. It is not only a description by the master of the man of the hour, but it is a description of one Frenchman by another, exactly applicable at this moment to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and probably represents the feelings of a hundred thousand voters in Canada. In his letter Sir Wilfrid Laurier has tested his party as an engineer tests a bridge; he has loaded it with infamies; will the party stand it? Even party honesty recoils with a sort of dread anxiety before the outrage on which they are entering, and a leading man of their party in the local legislature said to me yesterday, "This is too bad." Yes, it is too bad, and any one raising the cover a hundred years hence for the purpose of history will smell the stench. It is the most terrible attempt at a thrust backward which Canada has ever received, and the moral obliquity of the act surpasses a hundred fold all the questionable acts committed in the name of politics by both political parties since 1867.

That letter leaves everything in ruins, as complete as though the thunderbolt which rent had been answered by the earthquake which scattered. A party platform, the solemn promise of the leaders, the encouragement and support of the party press, the debates in Parliament, the pledges of hundreds of representatives elected since the adoption of the platform at Ottawa in 1893, all are now repudiated. We are told by the leader of the Liberal party, to-day in power and governing Canada, himself, by twenty-nine per cent of the whole vote of the Dominion, in effect that before we can have a solemn pledge carried out we must have above fifty per cent of the whole vote of the Dominion; in other words, a liquor vote of fifteen per cent shall govern Canada. Surely the impudence of this argument following the repudiation of the platform is only surpassed by the hypocrisy of the party pledge preceding it. The truth is, the party have been playing the game of government as a species of state swindling—a conjuring feat on a large scale, and the Conservative party can say to men like myself, who worked for the Liberal party at the last election, and went up and down the province for months assailing the Conservative party because of the Royal Commission, "What a joke they have played on those idiots." Yes, they have; but I have to remind the men composing the rank and file of the Liberal party in Canada, that there is a scene in Homer where Nemesis appears behind Thersites. National politics with such violations of principle as this is not politics at all—not even the depraved politics of the violent partisan, but a herd of provinces, through their representatives, hunting together for their food.

IN A POLITICAL CUL DE SAC.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has led his party into a place of annihilation, and made that terrible choice of a political battlefield without an outlet. To-day 2,000 pulpits, 5,000 societies, 100,000 voters are busy denouncing the Government and its supporters for this base betrayal, while the religious and independent press are sounding the tocsin of a free democracy from one end of Canada to another. Who is to stem this tide? Whose voice will the people hear? Can any one say anything for them, that the death roll will not appear through the whitewash? Never was Sedan more certainly a mortar into which the German army went pounding, then will be the ballot-box a retort for the destruction of the Liberal party. If I knew the day in June, 1893, that the plebiscite was adopted into their platform, and the day that the Dominion elections will be held, I should be able to show that that which was knitted together on those two days came apart the day of the election, that the party which began at the convention under the black flag of a lie, ended at the ballot-box under the white flag of disgrace, that the monstrous fabrication of the convention burst asunder the day of election.

Nothing that the Liberal party can do will from this day forward to election day divert public attention, not if they created for us a fresh Klondike every month, if they made every citizen as wise as Solomon, blameless as St. John and safe as an angel in the courts of Heaven; to vote for such a Government would still be a damnable crime, while its lever of power was the liquor traffic. It is too late to deliberate; the gauntlet is thrown down; we must take it up, as the "Wesleyan" says to-day "through the hundred and twenty constituencies in Canada giving majorities." This letter of the Premier is an infamous and insolent challenge to the democracy of this country, and it is true that for a time it kills us; but happily such deaths as these, like the deaths of the gods, are only for a time. When we are able, through county conventions, held in every county in Canada, by public meetings held in every centre of population and schoolhouse in the land, articles in every paper, and sermons and speeches from every pulpit and platform, to rouse the country as it never was before, then our masters at Ottawa will begin to see rising in the gloom behind them the enormous head of the people. Let us get ready for 1900 by giving the world an exhibition of a country "where the citizen is always the head and ideal, where outside authority enters always after the precedence of inside authority, where the populace rises at once against the never ending audacity and insolence of elected persons." My only object in writing this letter is to rally into one unique thought the courage of the country. On the body of Charpentier, who perished at the barricade at the Petit Carrew, in Paris, was found a note book with a single line, "Admonet et magna testatur voce per umbras." In that spirit I write this letter.

J. T. BULMER.

Halifax, 15th March.

But His Excellency would have gone on and said:

And, notwithstanding the pledge of my First Minister to temperance deputations, I, Lord Minto, Governor General of Canada, think it best that my responsible advisers should break their pledges, as I don't think they will lose many votes by so doing, as most of the leading temperance workers who are Grits will not mind it.

If a paragraph like this, dealing with this question, had been put in the Address for His Excellency to read, it would have been honest and truthful, but this Government do not understand the first principles of either.

The next paragraph in the Address says that the mother country and the British possessions have adopted a penny postage. We, in this country, thought it was "I, William Mulock," who made us a Christmas present of that postage. But now we find by the Speech of His Excellency, that it was due entirely to the conference called by the mother country with her possessions that penny postage was procured. Then, on New Year's Day another gift was made us, notwithstanding that the Postmaster General had stated in a speech, a few days before, that although an Act was passed, the revenues of the country would suffer to the extent of $800,000, and he could not see his way clear to enforce the Act calling for a two-cent domestic rate. But on New Year's Day, seeing the position that he had placed himself in by his blunder, he issued another proclamation, calling into effect a two-cent domestic postage. The next paragraph in the Address deals with the Yukon country, and I think the hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have put into the hands of His Excellency a paragraph on this subject reading as follows:—

The people of Canada are deeply grateful to the Senate of Canada for at its last session having prevented my Government from giving all the gold lands in that country to Messrs. McKenzie & Mann, the friends of my advisers, for the building of 150 miles of tramway, which my Ministers said, if it was not done starvation would come to a lot of Her Majesty's subjects who had gone in there in search of the gold to be found there, and to prevent the Americans from wresting that country from us. Owing to the action of the Senate, this land, and all this gold has been preserved to the country, a railway is being built, not costing Canada a dollar. The country is full of provisions for man and beast, and there is no danger of the United States, Russia or any other country putting a finger on Canada while England stands behind her.

The next clause in the Address informs us that a better arrangement of the electoral districts throughout the Dominion will be made during the present session. Why not call a spade a spade? The hon. gentlemen, preparing that paragraph in the Address, ought to have made it read as follows:—

That my Government, when in opposition, always charged the Conservative Government, as the constitution provides for after each census, re-arranging the representation by population, with having gerrymandered the constituencies; and notwithstanding the fact that my Government attained power in 1896, with the constituencies as at present formed, and notwithstanding the fact that it is unconstitutional to interfere with them until after the next census in 1901, my Government have so mismanaged affairs, broken all their pledges, increased the national debt, increased the expenditure, increased taxation, that they are afraid to again face the electors with the constituencies as at present formed, but hope by legislation to so gerrymander them as to give the Conservatives and again snatch a verdict, assisted by a large campaign fund secured from the Standard Oil Company and other corporations for favours granted.

Had a paragraph like that been put into the Address, I think three-fourths of the electors of this country would have said: That is right; that is proper. The Yukon country has been saved to us by the action of the Senate, and nobody has been killed out there, and no British subject has starved to-death. The Government wanted to give for this 150 miles of tramway all the gold lands in that country, which have been estimated by the Minister of the Interior since at $10 per acre, and he was giving nearly four million acres of land. Multiply that by $10, and you will see what this Government were prepared to give to Mackenzie & Mann, to put in the pockets of friends of one of the gentlemen who sits on the Treasury benches. This, Mr. Speaker, is all the Address contained, except that stereotyped paragraph that is always put in, stating that the Estimates will be laid before the House of Commons, and that they will be prepared this year by the Minister of Public Works, giving us lots of money to spend next year. I propose now drawing the attention of the House to a few things that I think the Address ought to have contained, as thus far I have criticised what the Address did contain. I think the people of this country expected that, upon the arrival of a new Governor General, he would have delivered an Address dealing with some of the questions that now agitate the minds of the people of this country. There should have been a paragraph in the Address to this effect: My Advisers, when in opposition, stated that when they attained to power, they would reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers in this country. Have they done so? They have increased them by two. At confederation it was arranged that Ontario, having the largest population, should have the largest representation in the Cabinet. That has been lived up to by all Governments. Liberal and Conservatives, from confederation up to the time this Government obtained power. They came in on a pledge that they would reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers. When they got in, the Prime Minister of this country—or was it the hon. gentleman sitting behind him, who is the boss of the machine—said: No, we cannot reduce the number; we must increase it by two. We must put in two from the province of Quebec, so that Quebec shall have seven and Ontario five. That is the number of members of the Government. The Solicitor General has not a seat in the Cabinet, but he is a member of the Government all the same, and we have seven members from Quebec and five from Ontario. Then, Sir, how does the province of Ontario stand with regard to the control of the great spending departments of the Government? Ontario has two tax collectors, the Minister of Customs and the Postmaster General. Ontario has also the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who when he sat on this side of the House said there was no use for a portfolio of Trade and Commerce, and promised us that when the Liberals got in he would be Minister of Finance. But the boss of the machine would not allow a man of the stubborn will of Sir Richard Cartwright to handle the cash of the country. There was a little kicking of course, but the boss said: Oh, we will quiet him; we will take his boy from Kingston, we will lift him over the heads of all the militia officers at Ottawa and plant him there, and we will give him the portfolio of Trade and Commerce, and he will be satisfied.

My Ministers pledged themselves when in opposition, that when they obtained power they would abolish the superannuation business which they charged the Conservative Government with having abused. But, Sir, what do we find? On the 1st of July, 1896, when the Reform party came into power the amount paid for superannuation was $288,235.42 per annum. Now, after two years of their Government, on the 1st of July, 1898, according to the Public Accounts the amount paid for superannuation was $340,185, or an increase in two years of their rule, amounting to $51,950.25. From 1870 to 1896 the annual increase in the superannuation fund amounted to $10,675.70, and from 1896 to 1898 it amounted to over $25,000 a year under Liberal rule as compared with $10,000 per year under the Conservative Administration. That is the way my Ministers have abused the Superannuation Act. Let me take one case out of very many in which this Government abused the Superannuation Act, and I will refer to the city of Kingston from which my hon. friend (Mr. Britton) comes. We find in the Public Accounts, that Mr. Shannon, the late postmaster of Kingston, was superannuated and the reason given by these Ministers to His Excellency, in order to get him to sign the Order in Council was "advanced age," Mr. Shannon being 68 years of age. Mr. Shannon was superannuated and is at this moment drawing $1,400 or $1,500 a year, out of the hard-earned moneys of the people, in order that this Government might appoint as his successor, Mr. Gunn, who was two years older than Mr. Shannon. You cannot go around the streets of Ottawa without stumbling up against several young men thirty or forty years old who have been superannuated and are drawing annually a large allowance. Take the case of the late Deputy Postmaster General, Col. White, one of the ablest officers in this or any other Government. He is as able and as active a man as any member of the Government today, but he is drawing a pension of $2,400 a year in order that the Government might make room for a henchman of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), a man who knew nothing of post office affairs. That is the way this Government has abused the superannuation system which they were pledged to abolish.

My Ministers pledged themselves when they attained power that no member of Parliament would be elected to office during the term of the Parliament for which he was elected and until one year afterwards; and the Postmaster General introduced a Bill to that effect. Have these hon. gentlemen opposite carried out that pledge? They charged the Conservative party that they had men supporting them in the House with promises of place in their pockets, and they pledged themselves that that would be stopped when they got into power. What is the first thing that my Ministers have done? They first put away Mr. Devlin, a gentleman who sat in this House, one of the brightest minds in the House, a man who should have been taken into the Cabinet and who claimed a Cabinet position as a representative Irishman of Canada. The boss of the party would not have him. Mr. Devlin had to be quieted. He was going to speak against this Government, they had to buy him up and they appointed him an immigration agent and sent him over to Ireland at a large annual expense to the revenue of this country. Devlin claimed that he should be taken into the Government as the representative of the Irish people of this country, and so he should. I claim, Sir, for my part, that the Irish Roman Catholics of Canada have a grievance against this Government, for not giving them a representative in the Cabinet. They had an able man in Mr. Devlin, but the boss would not allow a man with Devlin's abilities to be in the Cabinet, and so they went over to the Senate and they took an old fossil from there and put him into the Cabinet as the representative of the Irish people. Well, he happens to be a Catholic, but at the same time he happens to be a Scotchman. Our friend Béchard had to be transferred from the House to the Senate, in order to make room for a Cabinet Minister, and my friend Dr. Fiset had to be transferred over there also. As to our friend Langelier, from Quebec, what became of him?

Mr. CASGRAIN. He kicked.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, he was a kicker here and would not vote sometimes. He had in his pocket a letter from the Prime Minister of this country promising him office. Langelier was one of the men who had a right to a place in the Cabinet, but the boss of the machine would not allow a man like Langelier in. Then the Prime Minister sent Mr. Langelier a letter in which he said: I am sorry we cannot find a place for you in the Cabinet, but the Governorship of the province of Quebec is becoming vacant and we will give you that, or failing that I will give you a judgeship ; stay quiet for a while.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Was it in writing ?

Mr. TAYLOR. It was in writing and Mr. Langelier sat in this House with that letter in his pocket for a session, or more than a session. The time came when the term of Mr. Chapleau as Governor of Quebec expired. The boss thought Chapleau would be a dangerous man to let loose on the country, and it was rumoured that he was going to get a second term as Lieutenant-Governor in order to keep him tied up. Langelier heard this and he went to the Prime Minister and demanded his pound of flesh and he published the letter and so he had to be quieted, and he was elevated to a seat on the bench.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). He makes a good judge, though.

Mr. TAYLOR. I believe he does, but he would make a better Cabinet Minister than many of the hon. gentlemen who are in that position to-day. Mr. Lavergne, the law partner of the Prime Minister, had to be provided for, and he was elevated to the bench, and a good judge he makes, but it was a flagrant violation of the pledge which the Liberals gave to the people of this country. The late Mr. M. C. Cameron was another kicker. He should have been in the Government also, but the boss would not allow him there, as he wanted men he could control, and so they sent Mr. Cameron out to the North-west as Lieutenant-Governor. Another by-election had to be brought on there. My hon. friend the late member for West Lambton—"fighting Jim," as we used to call him—was elevated to the bench because he was a kicker. He ought to have been in this Government, but they made a judge of him.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Come down to Choquette.

Mr. TAYLOR. I cannot say of Choquette what I said of my friends Lavergne and Langelier, because he was chairman of the Debates Committee, and we saw last session how he would weigh evidence. There he is on the bench, and we will say nothing disrespectful of the bench. Forbes, who was a member from Nova Scotia, had to resign to make place for the hon. Minister of Finance, and King was transferred to the Senate to make room for the Minister of Railways and Canals. These hon. gentlemen have been breaking their pledges and spending $40,000 or $50,000 of the people's money holding elections.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louls Davies). And winning them.

Mr. TAYLOR. You had them won before, but you broke your pledges, and did ten times worse than any Conservative Government has ever done in making such appointments. The Ministers have the brazen-facedness now to come forward, as the Postmaster General did the other day in Ottawa, when speaking at a public meeting he said, "We redeemed every pledge we made to the people of this country, except changing the Senate." They do not deny it ; they claim that they have redeemed their pledges ; but the people of this country know that they have not.

Have they abolished the National Policy ? My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) to-day gave figures that are invaluable to the people of this country, showing what they had done ; and I have in my hand a copy of the tariff, and I could show that in page after page of it no change has been made. There are only a few changes in the tariff from beginning to end. They have made a different classification, putting an item that was paying 30 per cent in a different classification where it is paying 35 per cent. This is what they call changing the tariff ; but they have not reduced the taxation one-half of 1 per cent in all the changes they have made. The hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries both got up in their places in Parliament and pledged this House that no civil servant would be dismissed without first having a fair trial ; but what happened in my own county during the last summer ? Mr. John R. Dargavel, one of the ablest men in that part of the country, a merchant of standing, whom Liberals as well as Conservatives respected, got a notice from the Postmaster General stating, "You are dismissed." That is all he knew about it, and the position was handed over to Mr. Brown, an offensive partisan. There was no trial or investigation—nothing but the notice. My friend Mr. Singleton, postmaster at Delta, was similarly dealt with. I have a copy of the notice that was sent to him, telling him that the post office was to be handed over to a Reform politician, and there was no investigation in his case either. Yet these gentlemen had the pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite, made in Parliament and recorded in "Hansard," that they would not be dismissed without a fair investigation. They dismissed a good many other men in the same way. In the North-west they dismissed men to make places for Mr. Lépine and Mr. Nolan, a gentleman who took part in the rebellion there, and was convicted and sent to prison.

These hon. gentlemen said that they would show good results in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway, which they charged had been run by the late Government in the interest of the Conservative party ; but what is the record ? My hon. friend the former Minister of Railways and Canals, in the last year of his management, showed a surplus in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway of $56,000. How is it to-day ? Under the present Minister of Railways there was a deficit in his first year of $59,940, and last year a deficit of $139,978, according to the public accounts. This is how they redeem their pledges. They promised to handle the railway in a business-like manner and make it pay. They pledged themselves to put coal oil on the free list. My hon. friend from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) will, I am sure, deal with that question. They have reduced the duty from 6 cents to 5 cents. I made a statement in this House two or three years ago, I think in the first session of this Parliament, that I had received information that hon. gentlemen opposite had received a contribution of $100,000 from the Standard Oil Company on condition that if they obtained power they would grant them concessions. I made that statement, it has never been contradicted in this House, and we have evidence to-day that the statement I made is true. They have got the legislation, more than $100,000 worth—by granting tank vessels—deny it to-day if you can. Then, they talked a great deal about our late lamented leader Sir John Macdonald and his successors having a private car to ride about in. It is true Sir John had a private car. I would like to inquire how many the present Government have, because I read in the papers daily about the Minister of Railways going in his private car and the Minister of Public Works going in his. I think they have four private cars to-day. I just want to read a clipping from an American paper :

There was tremendous excitement in Washington the other day. A special train steamed into the station with a gorgeous palace car attached. The baggage was speedily unloaded and forwarded to the Shoreham. A large entourage of secretaries and officials disembarked and meekly awaited the great man who was soon to follow. Immense crowds gathered around the palace car to catch a glimpse of the celebrity, whoever he might be. A little man with a nervous twitch in his neck and a closely trimmed beard finally emerged and bowed to the assembled citizens. "Who is he?" asked the people, supposing that they had captured one of the crowned heads of Europe. It was Tarte, who had taken it into his head to run down and share in the spree part of the performance.

But they are not satisfied with private cars. The hon. Minister of Public Works wanted to go on a tour of inspection down around the lower provinces, and down to the Island of Anticosti, and he had a steamer fitted up in first-class style.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Belonging to the Connollys, too.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, the steamer was owned by the Government, I believe. He had a crew all newly dressed to dance attendance on him while he was going on this tour of inspection. He went down to the Island of Anticosti. I do not know that we own that island or want to make any improvements there, but I saw an interview, shortly after he returned to Anticosti, in which he said that no doubt this Government would have to confirm Mr. Menier in his title to that island. It was just a few days after my hon. friend's interview that I read in one of the Quebec papers how a colony of Methodists, which had settled on that island some twenty-five years ago, came all the way to Quebec in an open boat and put their case before the Quebec Government. They said that they were going to be driven off that island. This deputation came to Quebec immediately after the visit of the Minister of Public Works. I have seen it stated that the Government of England have drawn the attention of the Government of this country to the present condition of the Island of Anticosti, and have represented that that island, which is down in the mouth of the St. Lawrence, cannot be owned by any person paying allegiance to a foreign country. I do not know if that be true or not, but I am going to give notice of a motion to have the correspondence laid on the Table so that we may know exactly how the matter stands. But the fact is undoubted that Mr. Menier claims to own the island. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) said that this Government would have to confirm him in his title, and that these people whom I have mentioned would have to be removed, but they have not been moved away as yet. After the hon. gentleman came back from that trip, he made some speeches in the city of Montreal. There is a club in that city called Le Club Geoffrion, which is no doubt the club of the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion). At a meeting of that club, the Minister of Public Works made a speech in which he said :

I knew Sir John Macdonald intimately, and I am prepared to say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is a greater and more distinguished statesman than he.

That is what he said to the Geoffrion Club, but let me read now what he said of the same Sir Wilfrid Laurier a few years ago. He said :

Under a veneer of polish, he is mediocrity itself, and will never be true to principle, for that he does not possess.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). Who said that ?

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Minister of Public Works said that of the right hon. Prime Minister three or four years ago. To-day, however, he says that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is a greater statesman than the late Sir John Macdonald ever was.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). You are mistaken in the date.

Mr. TAYLOR. But at this meeting of the Club Geoffrion, to which I have referred, Mr. Rodier said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech at the Monument National did not cover some important question, and that Mr. Tarte should have talked politics instead of trying to lead the people to believe that he had the right to display the French flag in this country. What did the hon. Minister say in reply ? He said :

It has been made a crime on my part in certain quarters that I floated the French flag on my yacht.

Not the Government yacht.

—on my tour of inspection. Well, I did so, and I shall go out of the Government when I have not the liberty to float the dear old French flag. There is one of Her Majesty's Ministers travelling about on a boat owned by Her Majesty, ordering the crew to pull down the Union Jack and hoist the flag of France when going around the Island of Anticosti, and when brought to book for his conduct by his own people, he says in the face of the Prime Minister :

I shall leave this Government when I have not the liberty to float the dear French flag on my yacht—

If the hon. Minister of Public Works, who is receiving the pay of this country, owned a yacht of his own and went on his vacation, as every civil servant does, for a couple of weeks, and not for six months as he did, nobody would care whether he hoisted the French or the Yankee or any other flag on his own boat. But as he represented the Queen and Her Majesty's Government, he had no right to order Her flag to be hauled down and the flag of France to be hoisted in its stead.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he is altogether mistaken. If he would be kind enough to quote all I said, he will find out that I said this, which I am prepared to repeat in the House, that being on a tour of inspection, I raised, where there were French groups, the French flag, while at the same time I had the English flag flying from the other mast of the boat. If in that I did anything wrong, I wish him to say so.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have quoted from "La Patrie." the hon. gentleman's own organ.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken. He did not quote from "La Patrie."

Mr. TAYLOR. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, I quote from his own paper "La Patrie."

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I say no.

Mr. TAYLOR. "La Patrie" has published what I am saying now—nothing more nor less.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I say no.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. At the meeting of this Liberal club in Montreal East, the hon. gentleman said on Thursday night, as reported in "La Patrie."

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. TAYLOR.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the date ?

Mr. TAYLOR. January 4th. He said :

I knew Sir John Macdonald intimately, and am prepared to say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a greater and more liberal statesman. I am devoted to the improvement of the harbours of Montreal. We shall spend millions on that harbour. In a couple of months the plans will be ready, and during the approaching session shall demand—

He does not say that he will come and ask Parliament, but that he will demand——the money necessary to make Montreal a rival of the ports of the great American cities.

He then said :

It has been made a crime on my part in certain quarters that I floated the French flag on my yacht when on my tour of inspection. Well, I did so, and I shall go out of the Government when I have not the liberty to float the dear flag of France.

Now he says that the Union Jack was floated at one end of the boat and the French flag at the other. That is the case. The French flag was floated from the mast, and the Union Jack from the stern of the boat.

An hon. MEMBER. That is the proper place.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, it is not. The mast head is the proper place. Then the right hon. Prime Minister told us, in the Speech from the Throne last year, that the Manitoba School question is settled. I want to show him what another member of his Government said the other day, and I do not know how these two men can remain in the Government when the one makes an important public statement contradicting that made by the other. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) up in Guelph the other day said, as reported :

The hon. gentleman also touched upon the Manitoba school question again, which, he said, though not settled entirely, is in a more satisfactory state than when the Reform party assumed power.

Mr. QUINN. Who said that ?

Mr. TAYLOR. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). He there said that the school question is not settled, but the Prime Minister says it is. Whom are we to believe ?

There is one more matter to which I wish to refer. In Ontario we have laws—I am sorry the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is not in the House—different from those in the province of Quebec, where the right hon. Prime Minister lives, which compel the youth of that province to hold sacred the Sabbath from 12 o'clock Saturday until 12 o'clock Sunday night. What sort of reading matter will the youth of that province have to read when they find reported in the newspapers the conduct of the First Minister—a gentleman who ought to have some respect for the religious beliefs of others who consider the holding of a political meeting on Sunday a violation of the Sabbath—who, when down at Washington, had not time to call his Ministers to his side or come to visit them in this city, but called them to meet him at New York, and on the Sabbath day discussed with them political questions. They arrived there on Saturday at noon, they took carriages and went about to see the sights of the city, and on Sunday afternoon they held a Cabinet meeting in the city of New York. This is a lesson for the youth of this country surely. If a father corrects his boy for breaking the Sabbath, how does he know but that the boy will point to the fact as published in the papers that the Government holds Cabinet meetings on Sunday.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. It may be all right in the province of Quebec, but we don't think it is all right in Ontario. Here is what the papers say, with great headlines:

SUNDAY CABINET COUNCIL—CANADIAN MINISTERS TALK OVER AFFAIRS OF STATE AT THE WALDORF-ASTORIA, NEW YORK.

New York, November 6.

The Canadian Cabinet held a session in this city on Sunday, at which official business of the Dominion was discussed. Sir Wilfrid Laurier presided, and almost the entire Ministry were present.

I think that credit is due to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was a member of that commission, that his name did not figure among those who attended this Sunday meeting, after having, in this House, year after year, introduced the Bill to compel better observance of the Sabbath. The paper I quote is the Montreal "Star." It is a good paper—

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. gentleman deny? Will he say that what this paper states is not true? The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), in West Huron, when I quoted from the "Star," said I was quoting from a Tory paper. I would ask the Prime Minister or his colleagues to deny, if they can, that they went to New York, and on Sunday held a Cabinet Council there.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have no hesitation in saying that there was no Cabinet meeting in New York.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Ministers went to New York, arriving there on Saturday and remaining over Sunday. The meeting they held there may not have been technically a Cabinet meeting, but it was a meeting to discuss the affairs that were under consideration at Washington.

Now, in conclusion, I will give my view of the record of this Government since they obtained power. They offered to give to friends of the Ministers 3,700,000 acres of gold lands for 150 miles of tramway; they have spent $12,000,000 more of the people's money than did their predecessors in the same period; they have increased our national debt by $7,000,000; they have increased the taxation by $2,000,000; they have increased the duty on sugar and tobacco; they are allowing the poor man a lower rate of interest on his savings; owing to their policy, some of the manufacturers of this country have had to reduce the poor man's wages 10 per cent in order to hold the market; they have let contracts innumerable without tender. I have a question on the paper, to which I expect an answer in a few days, and I intend, at a later stage, to point to the contracts given without tender—one to my friend McGillicuddy, of Goderich—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Given under tender.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not public tender.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Given under public tender, and the lowest tender accepted.

Mr. TAYLOR. This Government has given orders by the wholesale for the Toronto "Globe"; they have already made a confession in Parliament that the Drummond County Railway arrangement involved a loss of half a million dollars; they have given dredging jobs without competition to relatives of the Ministers—my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) will not deny that—and these men draw profit, and do not do the work; and they attempted to raid the Manitoba school funds to distribute among their friends. These and other things of the kind constitute what they call redemption of their pledges; these acts and such as these, they say, brought prosperity to the country, and these things, they say, are the redemption of the pledges that they gave to the people. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the House for the attention with which you have heard me.

Mr. LEMIEUX (Gaspé). It is always with a deep emotion that I rise from my seat to address you, Mr. Speaker, in your own maternal language. Never have I been impressed more strongly than to-day with the obligation which is devolving upon me, as a French-Canadian member—that of speaking, if not classically, at least fluently, the English language—in order to take an efficient part in the debates of this House. Arduous as may be the task, I, for one, will accept it cheerfully, relying, as I do, upon the unvarying courtesy and indulgence of my fellow-members. Besides, I may add, that I am a believer in the law of compensations.

Every generous effort of the human mind brings its reward. Eloquence is indeed less captivating when foreign words and accents are its vehicle, but is it not more argumentative and more logical? Is not the thought clearer, the power of reasoning sounder, when one's imagination is, so to say, checked and bridled?

Before discussing any of the public questions which have been raised during this debate, I wish to state that my mind is not so biassed by party prejudices that I cannot express an honest, impartial opinion, without fear or favour. I am a Liberal, and I was elected as such in 1896. English Liberalism has always impressed me as being, above all other political creeds, consistent with our modern ideas of reform and progress. To use the language of Macaulay, I believe in that

Class of men sanguine in hope, bold in speculation, always pressing forward, quick to discern the imperfections of whatever exists, disposed to think lightly of the risks and inconveniences which attend improvements, and disposed to give every change credit for being an improvement.

Yet, Sir, Liberal as I am, I wish to rise into loftier spheres and speak in the course of this debate, not as a partisan, but as a Canadian. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that we can well afford to cease our party strifes, with all their bitterness, and take equal pride in the achievements of Canada.

Looking backwards over the three decades which have elapsed since confederation, I cannot refrain from saying, that the last thirty years have been years of progress on national and commercial lines.

The problem of self-government, which was declared impracticable in 1867, has been solved long ago. Religious and racial quarrels—thank God—have been obliterated and shall no longer arouse the passions of the electorate. This ordeal has of itself been a process of self-development—the greater the obstacles, the greater the gain in mastering them. The material progress of this country has been no less astonishing. The total volume of trade has increased from $131,000,000 in 1867 to $257,000,000 in 1897. The wheat fields yielded of late as much as 60,000,000 bushels; the mineral products aggregated in 1897 nearly thirty millions. Twenty millions are received annually from the fisheries, both sea-coast and inland. Fifty millions worth of agricultural products are now exported, and our forest wealth is becoming more and more invaluable. Moreover, when we come to realize that the people of this country have nearly fifty millions deposited in savings banks, and one hundred and ninety-three millions in chartered banks; that life assurance companies have four hundred and sixty millions of insurance in force, and that our railway companies have a capital of nearly one billion—should we not be proud of our standing, and should we despair of the future of this country? Mr. Speaker, if we were to believe the sad predictions made by some of my hon. friends opposite, this country of ours would soon be on the verge of ruin and desolation, if the present Reform Government remains in power for any longer period of time. I am, Sir, a student of English history, and from what I can gather in my readings, I can lay down as a principle, that Toryism in Great Britain or in Canada, nowadays or fifty years ago, bear a striking resemblance. It has been said that a Tory believes first in himself, that it is also part of his creed to believe that the good things of the world are made for a few, and that, of course, he is amongst the few, that his intense anger and distrust are excited if others, not of his own party, control national affairs. Taking as granted, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of argument, that the Tory party rules by divine right, is the situation, after three years of Liberal government so desperate? Is the outlook so gloomy, the prospects so discouraging? I beg to answer this question with a few facts and figures. Unless prosperity is a symptom of decay, I fail to see how the sinister predictions of my hon. friends will realize. We have before us the statistics of the last fiscal year, and I claim that we have concluded in June last a year unparalleled as yet in Canadian trade. Our exports aggregated $158,726,801, and our imports entered for consumption, $130,630,195, a total of $289,356,996. This total, Mr. Speaker is $44,059,852 greater than the figures for the previous year. The aggregate trade is a round fifty million dollars greater than in 1896, and is the greatest record in our history.

I find, also, that the financial operations of the Government for the year 1897-98 have resulted in a surplus of $1,575,881, a cheering result indeed. Who knows better than the hon. leader of the Opposition that for years and years back there had been an uninterrupted succession of deficits. A deficit of $1,210,333 in 1894; of $4,153,876 in 1895; of $330,551 in 1896, and of $519,000 in 1897. During the electoral campaign of 1896 we were told by the Conservative press and on the platform that the accession of the Liberal party to power would mean the closing of the manufactures and would be a death-blow to the industries of Canada. Well, Sir, the Liberal policy has been given full sway during two years, and I claim that never before has there been such a wave of prosperity in the manufacturing districts, and this result has been reached in spite of a tangible reduction in the duties. In 1896 the exports from our manufactures amounted to $9,365,384. In 1898 the exports from the same source reached $10,639,227, an increase of $1,273,843. Not only did our manufacturers face pluckily the reductions contained in the new tariff, but they competed advantageously with foreign industries on foreign markets. I can also point to another strong indication of our steady commercial improvement: It is the record of failures as compared with previous years. The total number of failures in the Dominion in 1898, as reported by Bradstreet, number 1,427, against 1,907 a year ago, while the liabilities involved aggregate only $9,644,000 this year, indicating a decrease of 24 per cent in number and 35 per cent in liabilities. I say that this decrease is gratifying, because the proportion of Canada's business failures last year to the whole number engaged in business was smaller than in any other year of her existence.

Every painting, Mr. Speaker, has its lights and its shades. In their description of the affairs of this country under the present Government, my hon. friends opposite have completely forgotten the light, but in return they have not spared the shades. I appeal to their artistical sense, and I beg them to give the last finish to their picture by adding a few rays, a few streaks of light. Surely, Sir, there still remain some bright colours on the pallet of my hon. friend from Beauharnois. Fair criticism, eloquently uttered, is indeed very attractive, but who will deny that the foundation of all that can be called eloquence is good sense, solid thought, and above all, veracity? Anything else is vain and declamatory. This is why, Mr. Speaker, the advice of Quintilian cannot be too often remembered even to the classical minds of the hon. gentlemen. 'Cura sit verborum; sollicitudo rerum.' "To your expression be attentive; but about your arguments be solicitous." Far from being at all gloomy, the prospects of this country have never been so brilliant, and with its record the Government is exceptionally strong in public confidence and esteem, and deservedly so. Let us not forget that under the constitution this confidence of the people is the luminary which shines in the darkness of political disputation. It is by its guiding light alone that the statesman can proceed. Beyond it all is vagueness, uncertainty and confusion. For lack of this unerring beacon light the great leader of the Conservative party drifted, in June, 1896, headlong, like an unskilled helmsman on the shoals of the Opposition.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Government could appeal to-morrow to the electorate, and that their lease of power would be renewed, because every measure, every project that has been undertaken, has been carried out with energy and ability. I have read somewhere that gratitude is traced in sand, and ingratitude is engraved on brass. True as this saying may be, it will not apply to the electors of this country when, at a future date, they will be called upon to pronounce a judgment upon the respective policies of both parties. They will not forget that the ties which bind the Dominion to the Empire have been strengthened by a special change in our tariff, beneficial to both countries; that a wise and prudent tariff reform has afforded abundant relief to the taxpayers. They will call to mind that a costly and unjust Franchise Act has been repealed, thus reducing an unnecessary expenditure, putting an end to electoral frauds, and sanctioning the principle of provincial autonomy in the preparation of electoral lists; that the Intercolonial Railway has been extended westward to Montreal with a view to putting it on a fair basis for competition; that the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is nearly completed under an agreement which assures running powers to competing lines, low freight rates, cheap fuel for the rich mining districts of British Columbia; that the deepening of our canals will soon be completed, thus making of our inland navigation the natural outlet of the immense wheat production of the western prairies, and solving the cheap transportation problem in this country.

They will remember that the penny postage has become an accomplished fact; thus binding the British Empire closer together. Again, they will remember that there has been for the last three years an influx of population such as will materially alter the figures of the next census returns; that the exodus of Canadians is a thing of the past; that an immensely rich heritage has been added to our Dominion by the gold discoveries in the Yukon basin; that this Government has carried on our public affairs without being assailed with specific charges of corruption and electoral debauchery which in the past had made of Canada a by-word and a reproach. Nay, more, they will not overlook the fact that the Liberal party has upheld a principle which is the corner-stone of British freedom, and the very essence and stability of the whole Imperial fabric—that Government is by the people, that it should aid in securing the greatest good to the greatest number; that there are no privileged classes, and that, above all, there is equality before the law. Mr. Speaker, the Government will not only secure the support of one province, but they will obtain that of all the provinces. There will be, as far as they are concerned, one platform and one issue.

It was stated after the election held lately in the county of Bagot, a county gallantly redeemed from our opponents for the first time since confederation, that the electors were asked to vote for the Liberal candidate because of the religion and nationality of its leader. As I took part in that contest, I wish to emphatically deny that such sentiments were ever uttered. We, in Quebec, may have our short-comings, but as the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) knows well, narrow-minded chauvinism is not one of them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) knows that we belong to a race which for countries, and rightly so, has been looked upon as knight-errant of all that is chivalrous in mankind. Such appeals would be scorned as an insult to the intelligence of the electors of Quebec, who, throughout the whole constitutional history of Canada, from its inception, have given abundant proof of their knowledge of public affairs and their competency to weigh them in the scales of common sense, and not those of prejudice. The mother province of confederation can confidently appeal to those of its representatives who are English-speaking, and who profess a creed foreign to that of the majority, to testify to her broad-mindedness, and to her unbiassed and unprejudiced conduct in public affairs. And what better evidence, Mr. Speaker, if such were needed, than her faithful support of such men as Sir John A. Macdonald, Alexander Mackenzie, Edward Blake, Luther Holton and Henri Joly de Lotbinière. On the other hand, Sir, we would not be true to ourselves if we had not the pride of our origin. Let us remember that each race has its peculiar temperament and tastes, which must not be overlooked in making up our judgment. That my native province is proud of the noble leader whose gifted speech has chained and fascinated not only his own countrymen, but also the cold and immobile Saxons themselves; that we admire the orator, who in 1896, when the national heart was heaving with anxiety, could control its pulsations and direct its energies, I readily confess. We admire in our homes, not only the orator, not only the statesman, but also the citizen, with his temper, generous, placable; with his genial courtesy, which has its seat in the heart and of which artificial politeness is only a faint and cold imitation. If this is a crime, Sir, from my seat in Parliament I plead guilty for the whole province of Quebec. Far from arousing passions or fomenting narrow ideas in our province, the name of the Prime Minister is synonymous of conciliation, of tolerance and of Canadianism, in the broadest sense of the word. His speeches and his acts as well, breathe that independent, tolerant and liberal spirit which pervades the whole French population. More than any other statesman of his time he has shaped public opinion in such a mould as to cause, by his uncompromising loyalty, the British institutions to be loved and cherished amongst his countrymen.

But, Sir, we are told that this Parliament will soon be dissolved and that the great issue fought between the two parties will be the proposed Senate reform. In a very recent interview, the hon. the leader of the Opposition stigmatized this proposed reform as being a destructive legislation and a bold attempt to break up the confederation of British North America. He concluded his interview by the following appeal:—

I call upon the loyal defenders of British interests in Canada, I call upon every man who is unwilling to be branded with bad faith to that great confederation that has made us what we are, to stand shoulder to shoulder, irrespective of party and politics, and repel this dastardly attempt to destroy the most important institutions of our country, just as in 1891 they stood shoulder to shoulder to repel the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and discrimination against Great Britain.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

This impassioned appeal made by such an eminent gentleman as the hon. the leader of the Opposition would, I am sure, resound in this country; it would undoubtedly stir British hearts all over the Dominion—if, fortunately for us, we did not find on the British soil other statesmen of at least an equal standing as his, completely at variance, and differing 'toto cælo' with the views expressed by the hon. gentleman.

Was there ever, under the sun, Mr. Speaker, a better Englishman than the late John Bright? Was he not a patriot whose name is, and will be revered as long as a true Briton exists? Was he not at all times during his long parliamentary career a staunch friend of British institutions at home and abroad? Yet, Sir, if we were to accept the pessimistic views of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, John Bright, yes, John Bright himself, would have been a traitor. Speaking in the British House of Commons on February 28th, 1867, on the measure to effect Canadian confederation, John Bright, referring to the clause of the British North America Act concerning the Senate, expressed himself as follows:—

I have not the smallest objection to any people on the face of the earth following our institutions if they like them. Institutions which suit one country, as we all know, are not very likely to suit every other country.

And further—

I venture to say that the clause enabling the Governor General and his Cabinet to put seventy men in that council for life, inserts into the whole scheme the germ of a malady which will spread, and which before very long will require an alteration of this Act and of the constitution of this new confederation. * * * I regret very much that they have not adopted another system with regard to their council or Senate, because I am satisfied—I have not a particle of doubt with regard to it—that we run a great danger of making this Act work ill almost from the beginning.

I have made this quotation from one of Mr. Bright's speeches, not to use it as an argument in favour of the proposed Senate reform. It will be time enough to discuss this important question when a resolution to that effect is introduced in the House. But it tends to establish how unwarranted are the apprehensions of the hon. gentleman, how exaggerated are his fears as to the future disruption of confederation, and how misguided we would be if we were to listen to his frantic appeals.

Rarely, however, has any abuse been removed without a similar wail. In the eyes of a Tory, a reform is necessarily a step in the wrong direction. Even when he is convinced by overpowering reasons that innovation would be beneficial, he will consent to it with many misgivings, and forebodings (Macaulay). Such was the case when the Reform Bill was passed in England, when Catholic emancipation was effected, when responsible government was granted to this country, and when slavery was abolished in the neighbouring republic.

But, Sir, whether this Senate reform is accomplished or not, I will not lose faith in my country. There are notions, there are dreams which, as a Canadian, I love to recall.

Looking forward, I see this Dominion, like a young giant, sitting astride the great continent, commanding two oceans, into which his great railways that connect Pacific with Atlantic, pour the ever-increasing wealth that is being gathered from her teeming resources as yet but scarcely developed. It requires no prophet to foretell the dimensions to which our trade must swell with such unlimited capacity of production, of such varied and exhaustless wealth.

True it is, as we are reminded by our friends opposite, that the negotiations between Canada and the great American republic for better trade relations and the settlement of outstanding disputes, have given as yet no tangible result, but, Sir, even if the break was complete between the commissioners of both countries, which I do not admit, I would feel as if the Canadian commissioners had gone all honourable lengths in seeking for a fair basis of settlement, and to quote the words of a leading Canadian daily, "We shall go on our way with a sole regard to our interests, and the interests of the Empire to which we belong, holding always to a scrupulous good faith in all international obligations and relationships, and moving on to what the future may have in store for us, hopeful, serene and unafraid."

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarkable essay which our hon. friend has favoured the House with this evening, and I may say that in much of what fell from his lips I recognize a great deal of profundity of thought. In his disquisition on the differences that existed formerly between the Whig party and the so-called Tory party of England, I recognize much of the fervour of Fox and of the brilliancy of Sheridan. But, Sir, there is one fault, I must immediately indicate, which I find with my hon. friend, and that is that he is so excessively British. He is British, not only to the core, but beyond the core. He confesses himself to be a British Liberal. He tells us—and I took down his words—that thanks to the action of the party to which he belongs, religious and racial quarrels have been completely obliterated, and many other things of that kind. The fact is that in listening to the hon. gentleman I wondered whether he was the same man whom I had met not so long ago on the hustings in the county of Bagot; for on that occasion, Sir, I can tell you and the members of this House, he had not in any degree the Britishism which we find him displaying this evening.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). His speech was not written.

Mr. MONK. On that occasion the hon. gentleman was speaking extempore, and I heard him appeal to the electors of that county and ask them—my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) was there too—how they could hesitate between voting for a leader who was Catholic and French, and voting for one who was English and Protestant, and much more to the same effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I never said it.

Mr. MONK. I am aware, Sir, that in a controversy which arose in the papers since that date, the hon. gentleman denied that he had made such a statement.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I still deny it.

Mr. MONK. But while I am prepared to accept that denial, which the hon. gentleman has made again this evening, nothing has occurred to change the impression which I gathered, standing below him in the crowd, when he made that appeal. The hon. Prime Minister in the House yesterday asked us why we, the paltry few who represent the province of Quebec on this side of the House, were unable to enlighten the people of that province on the real political issues before this House. I will tell the right hon. gentleman that so long as among his followers there are to be found men who in the province of Quebec adopt the system of appeal which the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) adopted on that occasion, and then come to this House and speak—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has denied it, and the hon. member should accept his denial.

Mr. BERGERON. He has not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He has.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman to have denied it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have listened with great attention to the statement of the hon. gentleman, and I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, on what grounds you called my hon. friend to order. In my judgment, he was quite within the bounds of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No hon. gentleman has the right to discuss the ruling I have just made. A certain charge was made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) concerning an appeal to prejudice which he declared were made during the Bagot election by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). The hon. member for Gaspé has denied that he made such an appeal.

Mr. BERGERON. He has not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, he has.

Mr. BERGERON. He did not rise in his place and deny it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Gaspé, to my own knowledge, denied that he ever made such a statement, and I think we must accept his denial.

Mr. MONK. I bow, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to your decision at any rate. But on the occasion to which I have referred the hon. gentleman had not committed to writing the statements he made this evening, and I believe that if the hon. gentleman denies having made that statement on a public platform his recollection is not correct, for it was impossible for me, seated right below the platform, to have misunderstood that appeal which had so much significance and was so promptly taken up by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron). But what is the use of making a particular point on what I contend was uttered on that occasion by the hon. member for Gaspé, for it was upon just such appeals that the by-elections were carried on in Quebec, all through the province, as far as I have been connected with them, and also in the general elections of 1896. I fully agree in what the hon. member for Gaspé has said to-night as regards the independence of my province, for the people there are fair-minded, but what I do say is that as long as in the province of Quebec political discussions are carried on by means of such appeals, it will be impossible for us to bring forcibly before the people of that province the real issues between the two parties. We have only to take the organ of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to bear out what I say. We have only to read its articles and to follow carefully the harangues made in every election to find that these appeals are constantly made, and I do believe that if we are to establish in this country real Canadian citizenship, if we are to forget these racial and religious differences that my hon. friend has so properly spoken of to-night, we must, once for all, adopt another means of carrying on our political struggles in that province.

The hon. gentleman entertained us at great length upon the present prosperity of the country. Indeed, Sir, in the Speech from the Throne and in the Address which we are called upon to vote in answer to that Speech, an extended reference is made to that prosperity. I have followed with interest the addresses of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, and I fail to see in anything they have told us, how we can connect the present policy of the Government with the existence of these favourable conditions which prevail at present throughout the Dominion. The hon. gentleman seemed to say that we saw everything on black on this side. I do not believe he can point, in any one of the speeches made on this side upon the Address, to anything which did not indicate perfect unanimity on this side as regards the prosperity which exists in this country. But what we have endeavoured to show is that that prosperity could not be traced to any action of the present Administration, but that prosperity itself no one can or did deny. To what does the hon. gentleman ascribe that prosperity? He says that the tariff has been reformed. I would like him to point out in what way the changes made in the tariff have improved the commercial conditions in this country. There has not been an absolute change in the fiscal policy of the Government or any change whatever with which we can connect these altered and prosperous conditions. The fact is that the improvement in the general condition of this country exists all over the globe. It began at the time of the advent of power of this Government, and if, as I maintain is the case, we are continually told, at any rate in our province, these improved conditions are due solely to the fiscal policy of the Government and the changes they have made in the tariff, I warn these hon. gentlemen that when, in the usual course of events, this wave of prosperity will begin to recede, they will be the first to suffer from this argument which they are so prone to use when appealing to the people.

Is this prosperity due to our improved trade relations? What improved trade relations have we, since this Government is in power, established with other countries? I would like to ask the hon. gentleman in what way the present Government has improved these relations? We have made a certain concession in our tariff to the British trader. That, to a certain extent, but far less than anticipated, has increased British trade with this country, but where has been our benefit in that improvement? Take, for instance, the increase which has taken place in the importations from England under the present reduced tariff. In the month of February last our exports diminished by some $246,966 compared with those of the corresponding month in the previous year. On the other hand our imports increased by $832,948. The duties paid by Canadians on these imports amounted to $63,498. I understand that under such conditions the English exporter has profited considerably, and this no doubt will satisfy, to some extent, the ardent criticism of my hon. friend, but where do we come in? That is what I would like some gentlemen on the other side to point out. Now, take the eight months during the year 1898-99, finishing on the 28th February last. The figures indicate an increase of $11,691,441 in the total volume of our trade. Let us examine under what conditions. Our exports diminished by $4,951,564 compared with the corresponding period of last year; but on the other hand our imports increased by $16,592,005, upon which the Canadian people paid in customs duties an increased sum of $2,277,013.

This is money taken out of our pockets to form the vaunted surplus which the Government is supposed to have in its coffers. But where is our profit? Can these hon. gentlemen point out what increased agricultural facilities have been afforded to our people since their advent to power, which would explain the increase of prosperity? They have done nothing but carry out plans which were in execution when they came into power. So, while we are all agreed that business is better than it was, we would like to hear some explanation from the other side, showing a connection between the policy of the present Administration and this improvement in our affairs.

I am not desirous of detaining the House unduly, and therefore I will not refer to the proposed measure of redistribution. I will wait until that measure is before the House and we know exactly what is its purport. But some reference has been made to a matter of great importance to our province—I refer to the proposal regarding the Senate, and I wish to say a word or two on that subject. As the House is well aware, the bi-cameral system exists throughout the Anglo-Saxon world. They have it in England, and, in spite of the advanced democracy of the United States, it prevails throughout that republic; it exists in all great British dependencies. I would point out, that in that case the existence of a second chamber is of special significance. It is there as the result of a compact made at the time of confederation. At that time the constitution of a second chamber was regarded by the people of Quebec, I need hardly remind the House, as connected with the preservation of certain distinct rights, and more particularly of the rights interference with which at that time was greatly feared—the rights of the Quebec minority. It seems to me, that, under the circumstances that were connected with the establishment of our Federal Chamber, it is essential that the constitution of that chamber should be touched in no way except with the unanimous consent of all the parties to the original federal compact—not only of the more powerful provinces, not only of the provinces of Anglo-Saxon origin, but of the province of Quebec particularly. It seems to me, there would be extreme unfairness in proceeding even a single step with any reform, or any project of reform of that constitution before the province of Quebec, and, indeed, before all of the minor and less powerful provinces have had ample opportunity of considering the project and expressing their opinion freely upon it. As regards the province of Quebec, it seems to me essential, that that province should have the opportunity of weighing carefully the projected reform and of expressing its opinion with no uncertain sound upon the matter, because, as is well known in the province of Quebec, there are institutions dear to the people, dearer to them than their lives, for the preservation of which they have struggled greatly, and for the maintenance of which the Senate, as at present constituted, was provided at the time of confederation. It is needless for me to point out how little applicable in the case of our own confederation is the still untried Australian plan. But, inapplicable as it might be, it is different from the crude project which has been publicly proclaimed as his project by the right hon. the Prime Minister. It is needless for me to point out how easy it would be, under that project, to swamp the Senate by the vote of this House. I consider that a measure simply bringing together the House and the Senate to vote upon a question on which there is a disagreement between the Houses, without a previous appeal to the people, would be extremely unfair to that House and to the several provinces of the confederation. If we need an example of what may happen, we have only to turn to the province of Manitoba. I remember reading in the able argument made by Mr. Ewart before the Government at the time of the discussion of the Manitoba School question, an account of the proceedings before the Legislature of Manitoba at the time the Legislative Council there was done away with. Parties representing at that time the minority in the province of Manitoba expressed a fear that the removal of that chamber might lead to invasions of the rights of the minority in that province. The language used in the report expresses most ably the fear the minority then entertained. They were assured, that if they would consent to that constitutional change, under no circumstances would the rights of the minority be interfered with. And those who represented the minority, who were imbued with the fear which I have just attempted to describe, thanked the people who desired the change, and expressed their confidence that, with such an excellent spirit animating the legislature, there was no fear that at any time would the rights of the minority be interfered with. Yet, what we do find. It was not extremely long after that constitutional change that the change in the school laws was made. It is, to my mind, probable, even certain, that if that change had not been made, one of the most painful questions that has agitated this country since confederation would not have arisen. Therefore, it behooves us, before we touch the Senate, to obtain that full and ample consideration and the adhesion of the parties who, at the time of confederation looked to the constitution of that assembly for the protection of their rights. Such great changes are surely not to be promoted by such means as those adopted by the Prime Minister, when he went down to Quebec at the time the legislature was about to adjourn, and called upon that legislature, by its accredited mouthpiece, to express their adherence to his plan. Surely, sir, the province of Quebec is entitled to far greater respect and regard than is manifested in this off-hand way of proposing the sweeping away of institutions in which that province is particularly interested.

In this connection, leaving aside all questions of party, that I would appeal—because we are very few on this side of the House who represent the province of Quebec—I would appeal to my hon. friends who represent that province on the other side of the House, to give its people ample opportunity to study the proposed reform, and to express their opinion upon it. I believe that if that proposed reform were fully discussed before the people of the province of Quebec, and they had an opportunity of seeing to what it may lead, they would not approve of it. Now, I merely wish to say one or two words with regard to the Conference. There has been, I think, on the part of some of my hon. friends, judging from what fell from the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) a misapprehension as to our own position. We do not blame our representatives of that Conference for not having come back with any kind of a treaty; we do not think it was their duty to come back with something. That is not the position which, for my own part, I am prepared to take up. But where I find fault with them is that they have obtained nothing after making such extraordinary promises to the electorate of this country that, were they returned to power, they were sure to obtain a great deal. In my county, at several elections previous to my own, and especially so in my own election, we were told that if the gentlemen who were at the head of the Liberal party only had a chance of obtaining power, everything would undoubtedly be changed with regard to our relations with the American republic, and changed to our advantage. We were told that it was certain that the agricultural population in my county would receive a benefit immediately. There was no question then of opening negotiations and endeavouring to obtain something, everything was certain. It is therefore asking a great deal of human nature to ask us to come here, after the rather ignominious return of those gentlemen, and not remind them of that promise and of the repeated assurances they gave to the electorate that if any opportunity was given them they would unquestionably obtain for us the greatest advantages. I think their failure may reasonably be ascribed to a number of causes. In the first place, they gave away everything which we had to concede before they went down there. That is the main difficulty—their yielding to the Americans everything that they required, and in reality almost everything that they could yield before the Conference took place. Another reason was the preferential tariff which we have with England. We have given a preference to England and have obtained nothing in return; and having given that preference to England we cannot obtain much from the Americans. I do not believe that we shall. It may also be—we know the

Mr. MONK.

Americans are a very shrewd people—that they were aware of the opinions held by the public men who represented us on that Commission, they may have known what opinions these gentlemen had expressed before going down there, and so it is not surprising that they should not have met with better success.

Sir, one word in regard to the plebiscite. I am not a partisan of prohibition, I do not believe in it. I believe there is much progress to be made in legislation which will lessen the terrible evils of the liquor traffic. I think that progress is being made, and there is much to be made still. But what spectacle have we presented to us? We have the spectacle of a plebiscite in which earnest workers in the case of temperance have obtained a majority of the votes of the people, a majority very much the same as that which brought the present Government into power. We have heard the leader of the Government say that no effect would be given to that vote. It seems to me that the resort to a plebiscite was an extremely un-English method, and little in conformity with our parliamentary institutions. The strange position in which we find ourselves to-day is due to a resort to that singular mode of procedure. Although I am not a prohibitionist, I believe that the argument addressed to the Government, which I find in a pamphlet I have received, signed by Mr. Spence and by Mr. MacLaren, as President of the Dominion Alliance, as an argument founded upon the promises made by the Liberal party, is an unanswerable argument. Of course, in our own province we took very little interest in the question. The whole force of the Government there was brought to bear against a prohibition vote, and that is to my mind an explanation of the indifference which existed there upon the question, and the small vote which was given, a vote which I was surprised to find afterwards had grown so large. Now, as regards the broken pledges, we find fault with the Government for giving contracts without tenders. The Liberal party before they came into power complained that contracts were given without tenders and they pledged themselves that that custom would be dropped, but that pledge has been broken. There was a pledge given that the expenditure would be reduced, and it was not reduced. We were promised, particularly in my own county, that our own trade relations with the United States would certainly be vastly improved by a change of Administration, and that has not been done. We were told that a terrible abuse had existed in the past in erecting public buildings in favoured constituencies, and that that would cease, and it has not ceased. We were told that the members of the Government had travelled in private cars, but that they would never do so again. Well, Sir, we find that abuse has continued, and we have heard to-night for the first time that the Minister of Public Works has carried that abuse down as far as the city of Washington, probably with the object of bringing back our commissioners as soon as possible. There was a pledge made, and a most solemn one, in regard to the constitutional rights of the Manitoba minority. I have said as little as possible on that question since I have sat in this House. It has been a burning question. It was desirable that that question should be removed from the arena of party politics, and I have endeavoured, as far as possible, to give effect to that desire. At the same time we cannot forget the circumstances under which that question arose, and the trouble which beset that minority. I deem it our duty to remind the Government that the promises they made in regard to the restitution of the rights of the minority have not been carried out, and we would like to know from the Government exactly what their intentions are in regard to the minority in the province of Manitoba. Sir, the hour is getting late; I perceive the right hon. the Prime Minister frowning upon me.

The PRIME MINISTER. Smiling sweetly.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). What about his sunny ways?

Mr. MONK. I can only say for my own part, in regard to any measures which the Government may bring down in which there is a real spirit of justice, in which there is no desire to further political ends, and in which is shown an anxiety to maintain a proper equilibrium in the finances of the country, I shall be most desirous to give the Government my support.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—(Mr. Blair.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell, of East Prince, for an Address to His Excellency the

Mr. M. T. STENSON (Richmond and Wolfe). Mr. Speaker, it is to a regrettable incident which occurred in this Chamber last evening that is to be attributed the share which I shall take in this debate. I had not intended to take any part in the debate, but to leave it entirely in the hands of the older and more experienced members. But when I see an injustice committed, or attempted to be committed, either upon friend or foe, I cannot be a mute or an impassive spectator. This I consider has been attempted towards my hon. friend the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). In the first place I remarked with pain that the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), who is an old veteran in politics, and an ex-Deputy Speaker, objected several times to the hon. member for Gaspé referring to his notes or manuscript while he was speaking in a language foreign to him, and doing so out of courtesy to the majority of the members of this House. The hon. member for Gaspé requires no privileges when speaking in his own mother tongue; but when speaking for the first time before this House in the English language, I think it was an act of discourtesy on the part of an old veteran in politics to try to disturb him. But, Sir, I remarked with pride and with pleasure that not one English-speaking member of this House made a similar objection, neither did any other French-speaking member. This, I think, will be a sufficient lesson to the hon. member for Beauharnois not to interrupt in future when a young member particularly is speaking. But, Sir, a still more regrettable incident occurred when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) accused my hon. friend from Gaspé of having used language which could not fairly be attributed to him. I was present at the meeting at which the hon. member for Gaspé spoke. I heard every word that he uttered, and I claim, without boasting, I think, to know and to understand the French language just as well as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier accused my hon. friend for Gaspé of appealing to race and religious prejudices in favour of the Liberal candidate in Bagot County, "because the leader of the Liberal party was a French Canadian and a Catholic, while the leader of the Conservative party was an English Protestant." I do not accuse the hon. member for Jacques Cartier of wilfully misrepresenting my hon. friend's words. But, Sir, I can understand how he failed to grasp their meaning, for the ordeal was too great for him, it distorted his hearing to be face to face with defeat in that old Tory county of Bagot which had not for so many years returned a Liberal candidate. To that alone I attribute his misinterpretation of my hon. friend's words. That county had been represented for many years by our late regretted friend, Mr. Dupont.

and I can say without fear of mistake that had Mr. Dupont himself been present he would have put no such interpretation on the words of my hon. friend for Gaspé. I knew the late Mr. Dupont well, and I attended him during his last illness after the accident he met with. One thing I remarked, and remark with pain, that there was not a single Conservative member to attend his remains from the hospital to the depot when they were carried there. The only member of the House of Commons who was present on that occasion was your humble servant, who, although not belonging to the same party makes no distinction between parties in cases of personal friendship and sympathy. Sir, speeches were made in French at St. Liboire on nomination day, and the remarks of my hon. friend from Gaspé, which have been referred to, and which I heard, were these, in substance. I do not pretend to repeat his words exactly, for I did not take them down in writing, but I heard every word he said, and I will tell the House the interpretation I put upon them. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) had spoken at the meeting, and he had spoken in a manner of which I think he has no reason to be proud. He criticised the conduct of the international commissioners at Washington, and his criticisms were couched in such language that I thought they were entirely out of place. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) in his speech accused the Canadian commissioners, and the British commissioner of dining and winning at Canada's expense instead of attending to the business which called them there. His speech was in French and his language was even stronger than that, and in order to prove my statement that his words were out of place, I shall give the original words which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) used. He accused them "de festoyer et danser aux dépens du public du Canada, au lieu de surveiller les intérêts du pays." It was in reply to these remarks that my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) used the following language in substance:—

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), an Englishman elected by French Canadian votes (as I have been myself) would not dare to repeat before an English audience in Montreal his aspersions on the international commissioners, of whom Lord Herschell and the Premier of Canada formed a part, because the English-speaking people of Canada would hiss him for speaking disparagingly of these distinguished gentlemen, although the honoured Premier of this Dominion is a French Canadian and a Catholic.

These, Sir, were the remarks made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), made in Bagot. I see my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) smiling.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON. Yes.

Mr. STENSON (Beauharnois). Yet he would not endorse the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).
Mr. STENSON.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes.

Mr. STENSON. Well, the hon. gentleman did not endorse the report in the "Gazette" although asked to do so.

Mr. BERGERON. I said the truth.

Mr. STENSON. I have here the Montreal "Gazette," in which the report of Mr. Lemieux's speech in Bagot was given, and in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) was accused of making these appeals to national and religious prejudices. I find in the Montreal "Gazette" the denial which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) made the very day after that report appeared. Let me read that answer:

MR. LEMIEUX'S SPEECH.

Sir,—I have read the report of the nomination meeting in the county of Bagot, published in the "Gazette," and I beg to state that you have been misinformed as to the tenor of my speech on that occasion. I am represented as having spoken of "Sir Charles Tupper, a Protestant," and as having asked my hearers "if they would vote for him against Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a French Canadian, who had made so imposing a figure at the London Jubilee proceedings, and who was now at Washington, winning the admiration of all." I wish to emphatically deny the above statement, and say that I never used such language. Indeed, I would find myself unworthy of being a Canadian, if I were to arouse the passions and prejudices of my fellow-countrymen by holding such narrow views. On the contrary, I have always expressed the opinion that Sir Charles Tupper was a statesman with lofty ideas, and those who know me will never believe that I would allow myself to refer to his nationality and religious persuasion, or that of any public man, as a political disadvantage or disparagement. I have too much respect for my numerous English and Protestant friends, in Parliament and elsewhere, to resort to such a line of argument, and I feel sure that even without this denial, every one of them will understand that the information given to you was entirely wrong.

Montreal, December 8, 1898.

In face of that denial, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) insisted on stating last night that Mr. Lemieux did not deny it.

Mr. BERGERON. I heard him say so.

Mr. STENSON. There is the denial made the very day after the report appeared, and I believe every reasonable person will admit that the denial is sufficiently strong. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) and the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) and others, were present at that meeting, and they heard the words of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), and they can find no such meaning in them as was attributed to them by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier last night.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) also spoke of the Manitoba schools, and declared that he did not consider the question was settled in a satisfactory manner. I will not undertake to say whether the question is settled in a satisfactory manner or not, but I will say that if the settlement of the Manitoba school question is not satisfactory to the Manitoba Catholics, we have not heard from them of late, and I will say further that if that settlement is not satisfactory to them, the same settlement is satisfactory to the Catholics in my own constituency, where religion is taught only after half-past three o'clock in schools which are largely attended, indeed almost exclusively attended, by Catholic children. That is the custom in the municipality of Stoke, and it was the rule in the municipalities of Orford and Ascot. In the municipality of Stoke, which contains twelve schools, there are not over twenty Protestant children. In four of these schools some Protestant children attend, and in one school to my own knowledge, only two Protestants attend. I shall now read the by-laws laid down by the commissioners, and in case that my translation should be suspected I shall read them in the French language, in which I have received them, and then translate them for the benefit of my English friends. The following are the resolutions passed by the School Commissioners of Stoke in November, 1896 :

Proposé par le commissaire J. S. Tremblay, appuyé par le commissaire H. Deziel :—Que la résolution passée, il y a quelques années, stipulant qu'aucune religion ne devra être enseignée durant les heures de classe dans les écoles mixtes, soit maintenue, et que Mlle E. A. Horan soit avertie de ne pas enseigner aucune religion comme susdit ; cette décision doit être observée dans toutes les écoles mixtes de cette municipalité.—Adopté.

Proposé par le commissaire H. Déziel, appuyé par le commissaire J. S. Tremblay :—Qu'à l'avenir tel que pourvu par l'article 123 du Code scolaire, les heures de classe pour les écoles mixtes seront comme suit :—Elles commenceront à 9 heures et cinq minutes ; dix minutes de récréation à 10 heures et demie, et finiront à midi moins cinq minutes. Elles commenceront ensuite à 1 heure et cinq minutes ; dix minutes de récréation devront être données à 2 heures et demie ; les classes devront se terminer à trois heures et 35 minutes de l'après-midi. Il est de plus décidé que Mlle E. A. Horan soit notifiée de traiter tous les enfants également.—Adopté.

Proposed by Commissioner J. S. Tremblay, seconded by Commissioner H. Deziel, —

And you will remark that both of these are French-Canadians and, to my knowledge, they are Catholics also.

—That the resolution passed several years ago stipulating that no religion should be taught during the hours for classes in mixed schools, be continued, and that Miss E. A. Horan be notified not to teach any religion as aforesaid ; this decision to be observed in all the mixed schools of this municipality.—Adopted.

Proposed by Commissioner H. Deziel, seconded by Commissioner J. S. Tremblay, that in future, as provided by Article 123 of the school laws, the class hours for mixed schools shall be as follows :—They will begin at half-past nine o'clock ; there will be ten minutes for recreation at half-past ten ; they will close at five minutes to twelve ; they will begin again at five minutes past one ; there will be ten minutes for recreation at half-past two, and the classes will close at three thirty-five in the afternoon. It is furthermore decided that Miss E. A. Horan be notified to treat all the children alike.—Adopted.

Here, Sir, are resolutions passed in the Roman Catholic, French Canadian municipality of Stoke, within the shadow of the spire of the cathedral of the bishop of Sherbrooke, and passed with the knowledge and consent of that high ecclesiastical authority—why ? Because we desired not to have, in our Eastern Townships, at least, any collision or any difficulties between the different races and religions. There were but a few Protestants in that municipality, but they claimed that it was offensive to their children going to school to have the catechism taught in their hearing, and they requested that this practice be changed. It was radically changed in 1881 to the effect that no religion be taught during school hours, from 9 in the morning until 4 in the afternoon. It was afterwards modified, with the consent of those same Protestants, by the provision that those mixed schools should close at half-past three and it was understood with the teachers that they would teach the catechism after that hour. This was consented to by both the civil and the religious authorities in the diocese of Sherbrooke, and I do not see that what is good for the Catholics of the diocese of Sherbrooke is not equally good for the Catholics of Manitoba.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier asks, what has been done for agriculture by the present Minister of Agriculture. That is a question that is very easily answered. To tell all that has been done would take a little too much of the time of this House, and besides, the House is perfectly aware of what has been done. I will mention merely one item, that of cold storage, to satisfy my hon. friend that a good deal has been done. In one industry, that of butter-making, we sent to the English market last year over $2,000,000 worth of butter, where we sent none before ; and that is due to the cold-storage system initiated by the present Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. DAVIN (West Assinibolia). No, no.

Mr. STENSON. I will give hon. gentlemen opposite the credit of saying that they had thought of initiating it. They had done with that as they did with so many other things. There is a certain place known to be paved with good intentions, but they did not carry their intentions into effect. It did not take the present Minister of Agriculture long to carry them into effect after he took office, and he will keep on extending that system.

With regard to the dread of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that the rights of the minority in Quebec may be injured, if the Senate is touched, I think he may possess his soul in peace, for there is no intention of doing anything to injure the minority of Quebec. If the people of Quebec were asked their opinion on this matter, I think they would tell us unanimously that they want some change in the constitution of that body, so that it may protect them and assist in carrying out their desires a little better than it does to-day.

The hon. member, speaking of the international commission, said that he did not blame the Canadian commissioners for not obtaining, because he considered that they could not obtain, at least up to the present, but he blamed them for promising the great things they were to do. I do not think there is much logic in that position. He admits that they have done their best, and yet he does not know, nor do I, what is to be the result. Whether we are to obtain all our Government promised or only a part of it, time will tell. The hon. gentleman then contradicts himself. He says, in the same breath: I do not blame the Canadian commissioners for not obtaining what they wanted to obtain at Washington, but I do blame them for their ignominious return from Washington. Now, how will he reconcile those two statements? Sir, I believe their return was far from being an ignominious return. They returned to Canada with honour; they returned in such a way that no one can say that they sacrificed one iota of Canada's interest in that negotiation. Then, the hon. gentleman attributes their failure to the fact that they had given everything away, and that the Americans had nothing to accept from us, but in the same breath he again contradicts himself, for, after saying that, he mentions that the preferential tariff with the mother country was not given to the United States. I do not think there is much logic in that. The proof that we did not give everything away to the United States is the fact that Great Britain has that preferential tariff, and the United States have not, nor will they get it until they give us an adequate return for it. Then the hon. gentleman discussed prohibition. He declared, honestly, that he is not a prohibitionist, but nevertheless he wants this Government to bring in a Prohibition Bill. Is there anything logical about that? I would challenge the hon. gentleman himself to say, that if the Conservative Government were in power, they would bring in a Prohibition Bill under similar circumstances, and I think his answer would be, decidedly, no.

Let me just say a parting word to these two hon. gentlemen from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron). They accused the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) of appealing to race and religious prejudices. The hon. gentleman denied that charge and I also deny it, for I heard every word of his speech. But what did these hon. gentlemen do? They were in the County of Bagot, where they had a perfect right to be, championing the Conservative cause in favour of their candidate, but not only were they in the county of Bagot, but they went over into the county of Missisquoi, where a local election was going on, and where the candidate of the Quebec Government was an English-speaking Protestant. These hon. members both went into that county, if I am rightly informed—and I think I am—and brought out a French Canadian Catholic in opposition to the English-speaking Protestant.

Mr. BERGERON. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that I was in the county of Missisquoi?

Mr. STENSON. I understand you were.

Mr. BERGERON. I was not there at all. I never put my foot in that county during that election, but was busy in Beauharnois.

Mr. STENSON. Of course I take the statement back on the hon. gentleman's denial, but I still maintain that if the hon. gentleman was not there his friends were, and his friends were carrying out these tactics. These hon. gentlemen who have attacked my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) went through several counties, and I have myself met with the hon. member for Beauharnois in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, and I challenge my hon. friend to state that at any time during that campaign any Liberal speaker in that county said a word about religious and national prejudices in favour of the Liberal candidate.

Mr. BERGERON. I did not hear my hon. friend say so, but I heard other French speakers say the very same thing in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska and in every other county have I heard them.

Mr. STENSON. You must have gone astray.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are playing your old game.

Mr. BERGERON. Prohibition is your game.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, but I can play it and you cannot.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind hon. members that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) has the floor.

Mr. STENSON. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) is apt to forget some things and change his mind at times. I recollect quite vividly hearing him, when I was seated on my own verandah, denouncing in his stentorian tones the great Conservative party of which the late lamented and distinguished Sir John Macdonald was then the leader, for its many crimes, but he shortly afterwards changed his opinion and became Deputy Speaker of this House.

Mr. BERGERON. That is very dangerous talk for I may have the floor by and by, and I understand that there are some postmasterships to be given somewhere around your place.

Mr. STENSON. I shall just make one remark with regard to what I am told the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) said concerning the English pronunciation of the right hon. First Minister. I did not hear the hon. gentleman, but I am told his remark is in "Hansard," and I wish merely to say that if the hon. gentleman will come down to the province of Quebec and speak French he will not be criticised if his accent should be a little foreign; and then I would ask him what sort of a figure he would cut over at the Paris exhibition next year if he were to address the French people there in the French language. The hon. Premier, however, can go either to Paris or to London and speak both languages in a manner to do credit to himself and Canada.

Then the hon. gentleman wants a fast line and told us that we lost a golden opportunity. Perhaps we did, but if so we did not lose all the gold that he was willing to pay for that fast line, and which was altogether too much. He also told us that three-fourths of the taxes of this country are paid by the farmers; but if that be the case, I would like to ask him if three-fourths of the benefit of that fast line would accrue to the farmers. I do not believe it would.

The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) told us that we had broken our pledges because we have not taxed tea and coffee. That was one of his great arguments. We should, he said, tax tea and coffee. Well, we have not taxed them and do not mean to do so as long as we can do without that taxation. But we have reduced the taxation on the other commodities of life.

The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) prophesied that we are going to have a million dollars deficit in the Post Office Department at the end of the year. Well, I think that when the year is up, that prophecy will be proved as false as many of the other prophecies which these hon. gentlemen have so frequently indulged in. He was so accustomed to a million deficit under the Tory regime in that department that he cannot anticipate anything else, but that day has gone by and to-day we have reduced the carriage of letters one-third and we expect not to come within one-half of the deficit our predecessors used to saddle us with. I am confident that that will turn out a truer prophecy than the hon. gentleman's.

He also told us that free corn was of no use. I would like him to go down to our part of the country and tell our farmers, who get it in by whole train loads that it is of no use to them. I think that the farmers of the eastern townships know their own business and interests too well to purchase an article that is useless to them. Then we were told that this treaty over which our commissioners worked for six months should have been completed in six days. We are told that by an hon. Conservative member who knows that it took his party two months to secure an agreement upon one item of international difference. He tells us also that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was never known as a practical farmer until he came here to pose as one. Well, if he was not known as a practical farmer to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), it is because the hon. member for Leeds is not acquainted with the eastern townships of Quebec, for there is none of these townships in which the hon. Minister of Agriculture is not known, not only as a practical farmer, but as a successful farmer, and also as a successful Minister of Agriculture. We were also told that the Quebec voters gave from one to ten votes each on the plebiscite. Well, we will let that go for what it is worth, and its worth is stamped on the face of it. The Quebec voters had one vote each in every county in which they were qualified to vote. Thus one man might have a vote in more than one county, but in comparatively few cases could a man register two votes because of the distances between the polls where those votes must be cast. As to prohibition, I may say that I am not in favour of it, because I think it is impracticable, and because I think that the vote indicates that the people of Canada do not want it. There is another reason why a prohibition Bill should not be proposed in this House under existing circumstances and it is this: The Liberal party declared for no coercion in the case of Manitoba on the school question. Why then should they undertake to coerce the province of Quebec on this prohibition question? It is out of the question to attempt such thing. The people of Quebec have given their answer absolutely and formally that they do not want prohibition in that province. I claim from my personal and intimate knowledge of all that province, that there is no more sober province in the Dominion of Canada. They have local prohibition almost everywhere throughout the province and with that they are satisfied. Under their local prohibition they have shown themselves to be a sober, temperate and industrious people, and they will not try to impose by their votes a law upon any other province which that province does not wish. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will yield the floor to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), under whose threat of complete annihilation I slept very comfortably last night.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it was rather unkind for my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) to allude to the fact that at one time the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) was a Nationalist, and to insinuate that he ceased to be a Nationalist to become Deputy Speaker of this House. It is not only unkind, but it is rather imprudent on the part of my hon. friend. That is not argument, any more than it would be argument if I were to say that the zeal of my hon. friend (Mr. Stenson) was probably due to the fact that he is an agricultural lecturer in the pay of the Government of the province of Quebec. Nor would it be argument to say that probably the zeal he displayed is due in part to the fact—if rumour be true—that he is about to be elevated from his low sphere to a higher one as postmaster of the city of Sherbrooke. I hope that is true. I hope that he will soon join that lucky band of Liberal ex-members who are now judges or Lieutenant-Governors, and thus remove to a pleasanter sphere of action. It is very amusing to me to hear the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe disclaiming that the Liberal party in the province of Quebec have ever appealed to race prejudice and race passion. Of course, I am bound to accept the word of my hon. friend from Gaspè (Mr. Lemieux) when he says that he did not declare during the election in Bagot that the French Canadians were bound to vote for Sir Wilfrid Laurier because he was a Frenchman and a Catholic and against Sir Charles Tupper because he was an Englishman and a Protestant. I am bound to accept his statement, but I am surprised if he did not make such an appeal; I am much surprised that he did not do what a great many if not all his fellow members on the other side of the House have been constantly doing for the last five or six years in the province of Quebec. Sir, I have been in many a fight in that province, both in the district of Montreal and in the district of Quebec, I have met these gentlemen on many a platform, and I can declare that for the last five or six years I have not been on a public platform in the province of Quebec when such words were not used either by gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House or by their friends and supporters. I take it to be the duty of every public man when he goes before the people on the hustings to endeavour to instruct his audience, to say something about which they can think seriously and which will help them to cast an intelligent vote. But whenever we go before the public with arguments, whenever we try to reason with our fellow-citizens, we are met, not with argument, but with a statement: Our leader is a French Canadian Catholic, while your leader is a Protestant Englishman. Sir, I call the province of Quebec to witness that the statement I make is absolutely true from beginning to end. I heard my right hon. friend the leader of this House express himself in a different way. I am glad to say, and I am glad to do him the justice to declare it here. I have heard him say that his ambition and his desire is that we should be a united country, that the different races which inhabit the Dominion of Canada, English, French, Irish and Scotch should sink their differences as much as possible so that we may be a united people with one only object, that of making Canada prosperous. I concur in that sentiment, and I implore the right hon. gentleman to see to it that his supporters in the province of Quebec abandon the line they have followed until now. Sir, it is so true that they have made these declarations constantly, that I myself have warned these gentlemen; I have said to them: I will bring the blush of shame to your faces because I am going to repeat in the House of Commons the argument you use. To-day, I warn them again, that if they continue this line of conduct, on the next occasion we will, if possible, have stenographers to take down their words, so that there shall be no equivocating when they come to this House. There are other questions that we can discuss in the province of Quebec. I take it that our audiences in that province are composed of intelligent people capable of learning the political history of this country and desirous of being informed upon public questions. There are many questions upon which we can enlighten the inhabitants of the province of Quebec, and it is our duty as public men to enlighten them. I might quote here as evidence of what I have just been saying the former statements of our adversaries in relation to a question to which allusion is made in the Queen's Speech. The Government congratulates itself upon the fact that within the last year there has been a considerable increase of immigration into this country.

But, Sir, this fact, upon which the Government congratulate themselves, contrasts singularly with the statements which we had from the hon. gentlemen opposite in the election of 1896, when, from platform to platform, they went around saying that we had stocked Manitoba and the North-west with immigrants from the old country, hostile to our race and hostile to our religion. This statement was made a great argument against us. But what is the increased immigration which we have to-day, and upon which the Government congratulate themselves? Why, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said yesterday, we have Gallians and Doukhobors. Of course, the doors of Canada should be open to immigration, if it is of the right sort, to fill up the land in the great North-west, and also some of the older provinces with thriving and industrious citizens. But if we are to have hordes of people coming in here who have to leave their own country because they would not submit to its laws, if it be true, for instance, that these Doukhobors are men who will not perform the duties of citizenship, I say, we have no use for them, and the Government should not congratulate themselves upon bringing these people to our shores.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) said something about broken pledges. He did not say much: there is not much to say. We have heard some good speeches from the other side, but I fail to see that any argument has been given to this House, any reason has been given to this House, refuting the arguments which we use, when we say that the Government have broken almost every pledge, aye more, have broken every pledge they made to the electorate in 1896. Of course, such language is not very pleasant for hon. gentlemen opposite to hear. Whenever, on the hustings, or in the newspapers, or anywhere else, we bring up this question, they answer: Oh, that is an old story; you should not allude to that at all. But, Sir, we have to allude to it. We have to try to convince the electors of this country that they were deceived in 1896. We have to show that these gentlemen on the other side of the House have obtained the confidence of the electorate of Canada by false pretenses, and that they sit to-day upon the Government benches because they led the people of Canada into error, whether designedly or not. But there is no doubt that to-day, looking back at their past record, looking at the declarations that they made on the hustings, they have broken every one of their pledges. The Government have boasted upon the great prosperity which reigns in this country. We will not do as they did when they were in opposition. Whenever we showed that the country was prosperous, they denied it; they preached blue ruin. They said that the country was going to bankruptcy time and again. Sir, we admit that at the present time the country is prosperous, and we are glad of it, we are proud of it, and we hope that it will continue to be prosperous, even under the rule of my hon. friends on the other side. But I remember that, when we were on the other side of the House, we were constantly told: You have increased the revenue; you are taking in an enormous revenue, but by doing so you are taking out of the pockets of the people money which belongs to them. The customs dues and the dues which you collect from inland revenue, are nothing else than taxation. And who pays these taxes? The farmers of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, what have we to-day? Let me give you a few figures only. Between 1892 and 1893, the average revenue from customs was, if I mistake not, $19,800,000. To-day, if we take the returns published by my hon. friends opposite, we find that the revenue from customs amounts to $21,000,000, one million more than the revenue that we derived from customs. Therefore, if the argument of my hon. friends was correct, and if this revenue represents taxation upon the country, is not this taxation greater than when we were in power? Now, if you take the revenue from customs and excise both together, the average from 1892 to 1896, under Conservative rule, was $27,710,000. But now, in 1898, it is $29,000,000; and if the statement made in this House last year by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, is correct—and I have no doubt it is—this year it will be $29,500,000. Now, according to the argument of my hon. friends opposite, all this money comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country: they are taxed to the extent of $29,500,000. This is one of the pledges which they have broken. They said they would decrease taxation; but instead of doing so, they have increased it ten-fold. But they answer us: Not only is the country prosperous, but we have a great revenue. In the Speech from the Throne the Government congratulated themselves upon the fact of the flourishing condition of the revenue. Why did they not congratulate themselves upon the flourishing condition of the public expenditure? Hon. members will remember that not very long ago, at a banquet which was given to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in the town of Valleyfield, in the county of my hon. friend who sits near me (Mr. Bergeron), that hon. gentleman said: "Yes, it is true—he is honest in his statements generally, always, I hope—it is true we have spent a great deal of money. I will admit we have spent more than the Conservatives; but just wait till next year, and you will see how much we will spend then." Sir, I do not think that statement is at all in accord with the declarations and the pledges made by my hon. friends opposite when they were in opposition. I do not want to dwell too long upon the subject, but I cannot help making a comparison and quoting some figures, without at all desiring to weary the House. It is singular to read to-day the eighth resolution of that famous convention in 1893, where all the great leaders of the Liberal party were assembled in the city of Ottawa, trying to devise a programme for the elections which were to come on. It is amusing to read, in that resolution, how alarmed the Liberal party was at the enormous increase in the expenditure of the country. But what have we now? What have we, after the declaration of my right hon. friend the Premier, in Toronto and elsewhere, when he said that the expenditure of this country could be decreased by two millions, three millions, and even four millions a year? What have we now, in face of the declarations made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said it was a shame, that it was a disgrace, that it was monstrous, that we should spend in this country forty million dollars? Why, in 1898-99, the first year for which these gentlemen are really responsible, we have an expenditure of $39,282,000. For this current year, without the Supplementary Estimates, which, no doubt, will be brought down, we have an estimated expenditure of over $41,000,000. Compare this with the last year of Conservative rule, 1895-96, when they only spent $36,949,000. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite object to comparing 1895-96 with this year or with the first year during which they were in power. But I will go back a little further: I will go back to 1885-86, when we had the extraordinary expenditure occasioned by the rebellion, and what took place then? Sir, we spent $38,011,000 in the year of the rebellion, against forty-one millions estimated expenditure for the current year. If you compare the first year for which these hon. gentlemen are responsible with our last year, you will find that they spent $2,332,000 more than the Conservatives did. If you compare the last year of Conservative rule with the current year, you will find that they are spending over $4,000,000 more than the Conservatives spent. They are spending $1,396,000 more than the Conservatives spent in 1885-86, during the year of the rebellion. The Government have been warned, not only by the Conservatives, that this thing could not go on any longer, but they have been warned by their own friends, and most seriously warned on many occasions. Their press in the country and their friends who sit behind them, have told them that this condition of things could not last, that the Liberal party must keep its pledges, especially upon this particular subject, or that they could not face their electors again. I wonder, Sir, how the hon. gentleman who spoke against me in my own county can ever again go before his electors, in face of the enormously increased controllable expenditure which this Liberal Government is guilty of. It is sad to observe that this increase of expenditure is progressive. It was bad enough on the 30th July, 1898, but when we look at the returns of controllable expenditure in the last official "Gazette," we find that on the 28th February, 1899, the expenditure for the first eight months of this fiscal year was $23,597,000, against $21,595,000 for the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year, making an increase of over $2,000,000 for the first eight months of this year, as against the first eight months of last year. But the Ministers tell us, in answer to all this: Oh, it is true that we have swelled the controllable expenditure of Canada, it is true that we have broken our pledges in this matter, but you see we have increased the revenue enormously. Sir, when this promise of economy was made by the Liberals to the electors of Canada it was an unqualified promise. They did not tell the people: We will spend three or four million dollars less than the Conservatives, even if the revenue goes up, but they made the promise absolutely and without qualification, that they would spend three or four million dollars less than the Conservative Government did. I find that even if it be true that the revenue is increasing, the public debt is also increasing in a very alarming manner. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite: How is it that if the revenue is increasing so rapidly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has to go to England every little while to borrow money, and how is it that the public debt advances month after month. On the 31st October, 1896, the net public debt was $254,352,000, and on the 31st October, 1897, after these gentlemen had been in power little more than a year, the public debt had increased by $1,886,000. Well, Sir, that is a pretty handsome sum in one year. But, they did not stop at that; they went on increasing the debt. On the 28th February, 1899, we find that the net public debt of the Dominion stood at $264,287,000, being an increase in the three years for which the Liberals are responsible of $9,834,000, and these are the gentlemen who pledged themselves solemnly to the electors of this country that they would decrease the public debt and decrease the expenditure, and that it was a crying shame that the Conservative party had been increasing the expenditure and the debt. Is it to be wondered at that the Liberal party outside of Parliament is becoming alarmed? When my right hon. friend the Prime Minister came down to Montreal on the 4th January last to make his great speech in which he announced to the world that he was going to reform the Senate—he had better begin by reforming his own party—he was waited upon by a delegation—not a delegation of Conservatives, but by a delegation of his own political friends from the counties of Huntingdon and Chateauguay. I will quote the words of this delegation to the Prime Minister, and I beg to remind the House that they are words used, not by Conservatives, but by Liberal supporters of the Prime Minister. After referring to the fact that the debt and expenditure was increasing, the petition of these Liberal farmers goes on to say:

That, being in this serious plight, your petitioners view with anxiety the continued increase of the public debt, which means to them additional taxation, and a heavier lien on their real estate;

That the necessity of raising a large revenue to meet the interest on the public debt ensures the continuance of protective duties, so that the farmer loses doubly, for he has not only to help to pay the interest, but to pay more for goods manufactured in Canada than he otherwise would;

That, instead of, as we fondly hoped would be the case, the debt being reduced, or at least kept at a standstill, under your Administration, it has risen from $326,000,000 to $340,000,000;

That, having regard to their own solvency, and the future of their children, your petitioners regard it as imperatively necessary that there be no more loans;

That, if it be urged putting an end to borrowing would stop the development of Canada, we would remind you that no interests can be of more importance to the welfare of the Dominion than those of its farmers, and that a suspension of subsidies to railways and the extension of public works would be less injurious to the general weal than the continued decay of the farming industry;

Therefore, we pray that no further additions be made to the debt of the Dominion, and that money needed for extraordinary expenditure be found by reducing the public establishment to a standard in keeping with the means of its labouring classes, of which the farmers form the most important part.

Can there be any better proof than this that the right hon. the Premier has broken the solemn pledges he made to the electors of Canada.

In connection with this matter of broken pledges, I shall refer to some pledges which the Liberal Ministers opposite have made to the people of the city and district of Quebec. If it be true that they have such an enormous surplus this year, now is the time for them to fulfil these pledges. Are they going to enlarge and improve the station grounds of the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis, as they have time and again promised to do. Whenever there is an election, either federal or local, in that county, the Minister of Public Works appears on the scene, and tells the people that he is going to extend the station and going to buy out the property around there. He promises again and again that he is going to spend the $48,000 which were passed in the Estimates the very first year the Liberal Government was in power. Then, they promised to lengthen the graving dock at St. Joseph de Lévis. That is a question of long standing, and the promise has been made time and again by the Liberal Ministers to the electors of Lévis and Quebec, and to the commercial men of the district. Now that they have an increased revenue, it is time for them to fulfil this promise. How often have they not promised to build the Quebec bridge. My hon. friend the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell)—whom I regret not to see here and who I trust is crossing the ocean on an unsinkable ship—he told the people of Quebec that they were going to get $1,000,000 for the Quebec bridge. I notice that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) looks a little alarmed, but he knows that this promise was made to the electors by the hon. gentleman from Quebec (Mr. Dobell). When is this promise going to be fulfilled, I ask? I see in the report of the directors of the Quebec Bridge Company a paragraph in which they say that they have petitioned the Government to give them 33½ per cent on the total cost of the bridge, and that they fully expect this Government will give them that amount. At a banquet which was tendered in February, 1898, to my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), he told his hearers that before the snow again covered the hills around Quebec they would see the pillars of the Quebec bridge rising above the waters of the St. Lawrence. Sir, these are promises which were made in the city and district of Quebec, and the city and district of Quebec will hold these gentlemen to their promises. If it is true that we have such a great surplus, that we have more money than we know what to do with.

now is the time to carry out these solemn pledges and keep faith with the city and district of Quebec.

There is another subject, Sir, on which I wish to say a few words, that is, the question of the plebiscite. Hon. gentlemen know how the work was done, in our section of the country at all events. I noticed yesterday my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) using a very strange argument. He said: "No, I did not vote on the plebiscite one way or the other, because I considered that the plebiscite was granted for the express purpose of the members of the House consulting their constituents as to what they wanted." Well, Sir, how does that argument accord with the position taken by some of the leading members of the Government in the fight over the prohibition question? How does that accord with the course of my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), who went down to Quebec on purpose to tell the people not to vote for prohibition? How does it accord with the stand taken by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the stand taken by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the stand taken by the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion), who went so far as to say that this plank had been put into the Liberal platform in a moment of weakness, and that it was not the best thing the party had done. If the Government really wanted to know the wishes of the people on this question, why did they not let the people vote freely? But I have another word to say on this question, and it is this. What is the position in the province of Quebec? My hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) said something about it a short time ago, and my hon. friend the leader of the Government, when he answered the delegation that came here some time after the vote on the plebiscite was taken, took what seems to me to be the correct position. In the province of Quebec we have a perfect local option law. Whenever any municipal council wants prohibition within the municipality, it passes a prohibition by-law under which within the limits of that municipality no liquor can be sold. Out of 900 municipalities in the province of Quebec, about 700 have prohibition by-laws, and in these municipalities no liquor is sold. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe said a little while ago that the people of the province of Quebec were as moral and sober as the people of any other province in the Dominion of Canada. They are, Sir; I can bear witness to the truth of that statement, having had something to do with the administration of justice in that province. In Gaspé, in Rimouski, in Rivière du Loup, in Chicoutimi, in Murray Bay, in Arthabaska, in St. Johns, in St. Hyacinthe, in Beauharnois, there is hardly ever an inmate in the jails, which I take to be an evidence of the morality of the population of the province; in fact, in almost all the rural district jails. Therefore, I say that the province of Quebec had no need of prohibition; it did not want prohibition; its laws were such that it was needless to propose prohibition for that province. My right hon. friend the leader of this House should have known that before he went to the people with the plebiscite. What has been the consequence? That the province of Quebec, because it voted, for the reasons I have stated, against prohibition, has been held up to the contempt of the other provinces of Canada. We have been told that we are illiterate, that we are ignorant, that we are governed by the passion for drink.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse). The Tory papers said that.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I ask the hon. member for Bellechasse not to interrupt me; I will not take any interruptions from him. This was known before the vote was taken; my right hon. friend who leads the House knew it; and if the province of Quebec is to-day held up to obloquy and shame by the people of the other provinces, it is due to the action my right hon. friend took on this question.

Coming to Senate reform, I am not going to discuss that question at present. The time will come when we can discuss it. We need not discuss the question whether we should have an upper House or not, because I believe that is admitted by everybody to-day. Although one of the planks in the old Liberal platform was the abolition of the Senate, my right hon. friend the leader of the House said the other evening that he was in favour of an upper chamber. Sir, upper chambers are necessary in our constitution. But we must have an upper chamber on the same lines and with the same constitutional powers as the House of Lords in England; and if you take away from the Senate the power it has to-day, of vetoing or efficaciously opposing the legislation passed by this Chamber, you render it a useless institution, and entail a useless expenditure upon the electors of this country. Something has been said of the relation which the people of the province of Quebec bear to the Senate. I say that the people of the province of Quebec are to-day almost unanimously in favour of an upper House, but an upper House such as I have described. My hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue will remember the fight he put up against the Legislative Council in Quebec in 1879. That body threw out the Supply Bill, and thereupon my hon. friend, with his supporters, stumped the province from one end to the other, trying to work up an agitation against the Legislative Council, and subsequently the Liberal party in the province inserted as a plank in its platform the abolition of the Legislative Council? What has happened? The late Hon. Mr. Mercier was in power for five years, with an enormous majority at his back, and yet he never dared to propose the abolition of the Legislative Council, because he knew he would fail. To-day Mr. Marchand is in power in Quebec, with an enormous majority behind him, and he does not even dare to propose to change the Legislative Council, because he knows that if he did he would be defeated. The sentiment in the province of Quebec for an upper Chamber on the lines which I have set forth, is so strong for both the province and the Dominion that even those powerful Liberal governments, with enormous majorities behind them, dare not carry out this pledge which they made to the electors in 1879, and which still exists as a plank in the platform of the Liberal party. Sir, it seems to me strange that this question should now be discussed in the local legislatures. What has been the consequence? This question has been brought up, for instance, in the legislature of the province of Ontario, and we find the members of that body, instead of discussing their own family affairs, the affairs of the province of Ontario, discussing the Yukon Bill and the Drummond County Railway Bill. Is that what was contemplated when this confederation was founded? Is that what was contemplated when it was said that the local legislatures would act within a certain sphere, and the Federal Parliament would act within the limits of another sphere? Has it come to this to-day, that the local legislatures are going to pass judgment on the measures which are adopted in this House? Why, if the local legislatures take that course, we shall be equally competent to discuss provincial affairs in this House and to ask the First Minister of Ontario why he is increasing the taxes all round in that great and prosperous province, and to ask the Government of Quebec how it is they are going on, year after year, increasing the public expenditure so that to-day the province of Quebec is almost on the verge of bankruptcy. We will return the compliment and discuss those questions, but if we do so the constitution will be violated.

Another strange thing which struck me very much is this, that one of the most influential Liberals in the legislature of Quebec the other day, in discussing Senate reform, gave as one of the reasons why the Senate should be abolished that it made an investigation in 1891 into the Baie des Chaleurs scandal. Sir, did you ever hear such a reason given why the Senate should be reformed? Reformed, forsooth, because it ferretted out the nest of boodlers who were stealing money, hand over fist, from the Quebec treasury. If there is any reason why the Senate should not be abolished, which should convince the electors of this Dominion that it is a useful institution, it is surely because in 1891, it was the means of saving the province of Quebec from this band of thieves who were stealing the money out of the Quebec treasury. That is one of the principal reasons, one of the good reasons at any rate why the Senate should be maintained as it is. It is also urged that the Senate committed a crime when it threw out the Yukon Bill. Well, Sir, it was persistently rumoured throughout this House, while the discussion on that Bill was going on, that several of our hon. friends opposite only voted in favour of the Yukon Bill because the Senate was sure to throw it out. And they were glad the Senate saved their party from this measure which these hon. gentlemen did not approve of. That act of the Senate was a crime, the right hon. gentleman says. If so, then several members on the other side who voted against that measure also committed the crime charged against the Senate by my right hon. friend the leader of this House. Then another reason given is that the Senate threw out the Drummond County Railway Bill. One knows not whether most to admire or to condemn the audacity which can urge such grounds for the abolition of the Senate. Why, the Senate rendered great service to the Dominion for throwing out that measure. Let me give you a few figures to show what service the Senate rendered, not only to Canada but to the Government itself, by its action. What was the proposition of the Government in 1897. It was that we were to pay $64,000 a year for ninety-nine years to the Drummond County Railway which, at 2½ per cent, would amount to $2,094,000 as the price of this road. Yet, in 1894, the road had been offered to Mr. Farwell for $500,000, and Mr. Schreiber valued the road, if it were built according to the rules of engineering, at $1,535,000. On account of the action of the Senate in throwing out the Government Bill in 1897, a new arrangement was made in 1898, empowering the Government to buy the road for $1,600,000 and binding the company to spend $100,000 on it. Therefore, by the Government's own showing, from their own books and mouths, we have proved beyond contention that the Senate saved the Dominion, in this instance at least, $600,000. Could there be any better argument for the necessity of maintaining the constitution of the Senate as it is to-day? I spoke a few moments ago of the desire of the people of the province of Quebec to see this institution remain as it is, and I take my evidence from another source. Just a few days before the Quebec legislature adjourned, my hon. friend, Mr. Leblanc, got up in that House and asked Mr. Marchand whether he was going to bring down a resolution approving the policy of the leader of this Government upon the question of Senate reform. Mr. Marchand objected to the question being put without notice, knowing full well that notice could not be given because the House was to be prorogued the next day or the day following. Mr. Marchand was evidently not sure of his ground, he was not sure that he would have behind him the province of Quebec if he declared from his place in the legislature that he was in favour of Senate reform. But in the Government organ of Quebec, "Le Soleil,"

I find it reported that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works took my right hon. friend the First Minister down to Quebec just before the end of the session, the 10th of March, I believe. They travelled down to the ancient city in the sumptuous palace car against which they used to speak so much when in Opposition. What did they do there? They held a conference with Mr. Marchand which lasted quite a long while. Of course I do not know what happened at the conference, but comparing the fact that the day before that meeting Mr. Marchand refused to answer the question at all, with the fact that the day after this conference he got up and answered a similar question put to him in the House as follows, and I shall read from his answer as published in the "Soleil," and which being within quotation points evidently gives his exact words, we can draw our own conclusions:

The Government have taken cognizance of the policy announced by the First Minister of the Government with regard to the reform of the Senate, and entirely approves of it, and is of the opinion that the interests of the province of Quebec would be better safeguarded in confederation if the constitution were amended—

How, Sir?—

—so as to render the Senate responsible.

Sir, the parrot did not quite understand; it did not quite catch the right words. What did Mr. Marchand say? Did he say that he approves of the reform of the Senate as proposed by the right hon. First Minister? No, but that he approved of making the Senate responsible. Does he want an elective Senate? Does he want a Senate responsible to some of the great bodies in the Dominion? He did not say so and he dared not endorse the policy of my right hon. friend. He dared not say that he is in favour of a Senate which would be only a fifth wheel to the coach, but he says he wants a responsible Senate. Therefore I take it that my hon. friends, although they are endeavouring to get an expression of opinion from the different provinces, cannot get one from the province of Quebec favourable to the reform which, they say, they are going to propose in this House. Is this the constitutional means of getting the opinion of the different provinces on this important question? I say not. The provincial legislatures have no mandate from the people or the constitution to pronounce upon this question. This is a question between the people of the different provinces and the Dominion legislature. If this question had been agitated in the local elections, there might be some excuse for their pronouncing upon it, but it was never mooted before it was mooted in the newspaper of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, "La Patrie" of Montreal, some few months ago, from whom I believe the right hon. gentleman got his inspiration on this question as he does on a great many others.

My right hon. friend said something about the school question. I was not going to mention the school question at all if it had not been for what fell from the lips of my right hon. friend. He said that they have opened up a new era, an era of harmony and union in the Dominion. I listened very attentively to hear whether my hon. friend would say that the school question had been definitely settled. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), in a speech made at Guelph the other day, said that the question was not yet settled. Still, Sir, we have the organs of these hon. gentlemen in the province of Quebec, and we have the hon. gentlemen themselves on the stump and on the platform declaring that the question is settled. If it is settled, I want to know whether it is settled to the satisfaction of the minority in Manitoba; I want to know whether it is settled to the satisfaction of the authorities who can pronounce upon this question from a religious standpoint. I want to know whether it is settled in accordance with the written pledges given to the different bishops of the province of Quebec by a great many members on the other side of the House. I want to know if it is settled in accordance with the pledge given by my right hon. friend to his electors in St. Roch's in 1896. If it is settled, I say it is settled to the detriment of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, as my right hon. friend well knows. What did he say? Let me recall his words, words that were endorsed by his supporters in the province of Quebec in 1896, and let me contrast the promise with the execution. Sir, the hon. members of this House will remember the solemn pledge given to the electors of the city of Quebec and the province of Quebec by the right hon. gentleman, when he said at St. Roch's that if he obtained power he would first try to settle this question by conciliation, that he would take six months to do it, that he would appoint a commission at the head of which he would place Sir Oliver Mowat, and if, in six months he did not succeed in settling the question by conciliation, he would employ all the means given him by the constitution to restore every tittle of the rights of the minority in Manitoba. Has he carried out that pledge? Is the settlement a satisfactory settlement? I am not bringing up this question to discuss it; I am not trying to elicit any expression of opinion from this House upon it. We may differ upon this question. But I am giving you another instance of the way in which the right hon. gentleman has carried out the solemn pledge which he gave to the electors of the province of Quebec, but for which pledge he would never have obtained the position he now occupies. My right hon. friend the other day talked about history, in alluding to the hon. leader of the Opposition. But what will history say of his action upon this question? It will say that he gave his pledge to the electors of the province of Quebec; it will say that a Government, a great majority of whose members were Protestants, passed a remedial order calling upon the Manitoba Government to restore to the Manitoba minority the rights they had enjoyed prior to 1890; it will say that this was carried to the highest tribunal of the Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that tribunal, composed exclusively of Protestants, declared that the minority had rights under the constitution and that those rights should be restored as they were in 1890, and that what prevented the constitution from being vindicated was the action of a Roman Catholic and French Canadian, the present Premier of the Dominion of Canada.

Sir, I cannot resume my seat without paying my respects to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the master of the Liberal party. Sir, you have seen the revolt which took place some time ago within the ranks of the Liberal party against the hon. Minister. I said a moment ago that the right hon. gentleman who leads the House took his inspiration from "La Patrie," the organ of the Minister of Public Works. The other day, when the right hon. Premier rose, about half-past ten, after the great speech made by the leader of the Opposition, he could not reply to that speech, but must move the adjournment and closet himself with the hon. Minister of Public Works to find out what he should say next day. We have read the resolutions of clubs in Montreal against the Minister of Public Works. We have seen that hon. gentleman—and I give him credit for his pluck—going around to banquets which had been got up for him from time to time in the province of Quebec, and deliberately saying that he was a Conservative. And we have had him, under pressure and under question, saying: Now, my friends, you know that in 1896 a great many Conservatives voted for Sir Wilfrid Laurier—I represent those Conservatives in the Cabinet, and I remain a Conservative. And, Sir, on account of these declarations on the part of the Minister of Public Works, he has been held up to the scorn of the Liberals of the province of Quebec, and clubs have passed resolutions against him, and we have had members on the other side of the House going around the streets talking against the hon. gentleman, and saying: Tarte will leave the Ministry, Tarte will go. But notwithstanding this, he is stronger than the combined forces of the Liberal party. As a Conservative, I am proud of him. I am proud that, although he has told these gentlemen, time and again, that he remains a Conservative, and though they have done their best to put him out, he still holds his place. It was when he was with us that he learned to be plucky, learned the virtue of perseverance; and he sits there in the Cabinet notwithstanding all the hon. gentlemen representing the province of Quebec on the other side can do. It came to this point at one time, after deputations had called upon the Premier asking for the expulsion of the Minister of Public Works from the Cabinet: my right hon. friend the Premier wrote an encyclical letter, 'urbi et orbi,' to the Liberals of the province of Quebec saying: No, the Minister of Public Works will remain in the Cabinet. And there he sits to-day, notwithstanding the efforts of certain gentlemen whom I see before me who are continually talking against the hon. Minister, and in spite of whom he will remain in the Cabinet to the last day. I could not sit down without paying this compliment to my hon. friend.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse.) I merely rise to correct the false impression which may be created in this House by one expression used by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) when he spoke of the racial cry being raised in the province of Quebec during the campaign of 1896. I think that if such expressions as those the hon. gentleman referred to were used in that province during the last general election campaign, we were perfectly justified in saying that we had more confidence in the settlement of a question in which the Catholics were interested if that settlement was made through the efforts of a Catholic than we would have if made through the efforts of a Protestant. And what was the reason why we said that? The reason was that it was published throughout the press of Canada that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), while in Winnipeg, addressing a Protestant audience, said in substance: Is there any man who can boast of having a level head upon his shoulders who will not think that, in the interests of Protestants, I cannot settle this question better than can one who is a Roman Catholic? We candidates in the province of Quebec, upholding the interests of the Liberal party, seeing these words published and not contradicted, were we not justified in saying that, as French Canadians and Catholics, we had more confidence in a settlement by Sir Wilfrid Laurier than we would have if the settlement were left in the hands of the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. A. A. C. LARIVIERE. Just one word.

Mr. TALBOT. Not only this, but the hon. member for Montmorency knows that some of his own friends—

Mr. LARIVIERE. I wish to say one word in explanation. I stood on the platform in Winnipeg, when Sir Charles Tupper spoke, and he never used any such expressions at all.

Mr. TALBOT. I am repeating what was published in several newspapers, and these words I have quoted were never contradicted; so I think we are perfectly justified in saying what we did say. My hon. friend from Montmorency knows very well that other means were used in 1896 against the Liberal candidates throughout the province of Quebec. He knows very well that Senators and leaders of the Conservative party went from hustings to hustings, presenting a paper to the Liberal candidates for them to sign, and saying to them: If you sign this paper, we will give you an election by acclamation. There is a member who sits now in this House, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Morin), who owes his election to a moment of weakness on the part of Dr. Vaillancourt. He was surrounded by these men, who were using all possible means to remain in power, and was told by them: Dr. Vaillancourt, if you sign this paper, we will guarantee that Sir A. P. Caron will withdraw, and we will give you an election by acclamation. In a moment of weakness, Dr. Vaillancourt signed the paper. What was the consequence? On nomination day, the present member for Dorchester was put in nomination, and was elected. Such things were done throughout the counties of the province. It was tried in my own county. I remember, in St. Raphael, when the present editor of the "Courrier du Canada" came there with the paper, backed up by Senator Landry, and asked us to sign that document. We did not sign it: we went into the battle, and won the day. The hon. member for Montmorency spoke about the band of thieves in connection with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, who, he says, were discovered and routed out of power by the action of the Senate. The hon. member who just took his seat (Mr. Casgrain), has been Attorney General of the province of Quebec after 1892, when the Conservatives were returned to power. Why did he not, as Attorney General, when he had the power in his hands, put these thieves, as he calls them, in jail? When he ran in Montmorency against the Hon. Charles Langelier, he went so far before the electorate as to give the number of the cell in which he would put Mr. Langelier. Why did he not do it, when he was Attorney General? How can he stand up now before this House and tell us what he would have done, but which he did not do, when he was Attorney General of the province of Quebec? If they were thieves, why did he not prosecute them? I suppose he is alluding to Mr. Pacaud and to that $100,000. This question is now being settled by the Supreme Court, and before long we will have a judgment which will prove whether that money was stolen by Mr. Pacaud or not. But what about Mr. Riopelle, a good Conservative, who got $75,000 at the same time? Nothing was said about him.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Was it stolen money?

Mr. TALBOT. The same money. Mr. Riopelle got $75,000, and Mr. Pacaud got $100,000. The hon. member for Montmorency also said that the population of Quebec had been called ignorant and illiterate because when wheat is plentiful and the farmers obtaining a fair price for it and flour not quite so dear. Sir, the members on this side of the House rejoice equally with the members on the Government side at the present prosperity of Canada. There were years of depression from 1892 to 1896, depression not only in Canada but depression all over the world, and without fear of contradiction I state that because of the National Policy, Canada came through these years of depression with a better showing than any other country in the world. I shall give the Government credit when they deserve it. They do deserve some credit for our prosperity, and I will tell them why. They deserve credit because they have conduced to this prosperity by not altering the National Policy very much. They have shown by their course in this matter that they agree with me when I state, that if they had carried out their professions of free trade or freer trade, or whatever they choose to call it; if they had cut the tariff down as low as the people were afraid they would, then, Sir, we would not be able to congratulate ourselves on Canadian prosperity to-day. They had the good sense to know that they could not carry out these pledges which they made; they had the good sense to know that it was far better to break their pledges than to ruin the country, and I trust that good sense will remain with them so that they may long continue to recognize the fact. The Prime Minister in recounting what the Liberals had done stated that they had reformed the tariff. Well, they have in certain respects, but the right hon. gentleman was rather unfortunate in mentioning the item of cordage in this connection. He told us his Government had made binder twine free, and that last year the cordage business was more prosperous than it had ever been before. It was more prosperous with those who had laid in a stock of raw material, which increased three times in price on account of the war in the Philippines. These lucky ones made money, but the people who had not a stock of raw material on hand did not find the year so prosperous. As an illustration of what free binder twine has done, let me tell the hon. gentleman that the Consumers' Cordage Company, who were not fortunate enough to have a stock of raw material, had a factory in Port Hope and on account of the duty being removed, they have taken the machinery out of that factory and removed it to Montreal, because they are obliged to consolidate their business in Montreal. The consequence is that the town of Port Hope in my constituency has been injured very materially. I cannot agree with the free binder twine part of the Liberal tariff reform, because I believe it has done no good whatever in the country, and I know it has done a great wrong to my own constituents. The speech of His Excellency also refers to the exodus, on which we used to hear a great deal from

hon. gentlemen opposite but about which they talk very little now. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) very innocently told us that during the years of the National Policy he found many farmhouses in the country empty because the people were driven out of Canada on account of the National Policy, and he tells us that now all these houses are occupied. Well, I am glad the houses are filled and I am glad that my Liberal friends think the exodus has stopped, but we have the National Policy just the same at the present day as we had it when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) says he found those houses empty. I am very glad indeed if there is no exodus in the country, but let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite that no small part of that exodus was due to the speeches made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and by some other of his political friends when in opposition, who were constantly decrying this country, and constantly exalting the United States. I remember saying in those days in this House, that if I were a young man thinking of coming to Canada and I read the speeches of Sir Richard Cartwright, I would make up my mind that I would not emigrate to such a miserable country as he depicted, but I would go to that beautiful country of the United States which he pointed to in such glowing colours.

A word as to negotiations at Washington. We may, I believe, congratulate ourselves on the conduct of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) with reference to these negotiations, for he tells us that although he intended to conduct a campaign in the lower provinces he postponed his intention because he did not wish to embarrass these negotiations. That, Sir, is conduct on the part of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) which we must all admire. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that the great difficulty in the way of these negotiations was the United States Senate which must give a two-thirds majority in favour of a treaty. No one will deny that difficulty. But let me ask him, and let me ask his friends, did not the same difficulty exist when the Conservatives were in power and had not the United States Senate the same constitution then as now? Nevertheless the Liberals then told us: the Conservatives cannot make a treaty because they have alienated the friendship of the United States; we are friendly with that nation, put us in power, and there will be no trouble about getting a treaty. In view of such language have not these gentlemen opposite some reason to be ashamed of their want of success under the circumstances. I was rather surprised to hear the Prime Minister state, that Canada to-day does not want reciprocity. That announcement startles me. I know that ever since I have been in this House reciprocity was the main plank in the Liberal platform, and gentlemen opposite have constantly been telling us: The United States is our only market; Great Britain is not a natural market on account of the distance it is from us; but, Sir, all that is changed now, and the Liberal Premier of this Dominion announces that Canada does not want reciprocity. It is rather a strong statement, and I do not believe his Liberal followers throughout the country will accept it. I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not accept it in its entirety, for he tried to modify it so as to make it not quite so positive and abrupt. He (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that what was meant was that we are not dependent on the United States. Why, the Conservatives said that long ago. It is true the Conservatives did not say that we did not want reciprocity, but we did say that we did not want a reciprocity treaty unless we got a fair one. That was the Conservative position years ago, and that is the Conservative position to-day. We fully realize the trade possibilities with the United States, we are quite willing to trade with them if they will trade with us, and we are quite willing to make a treaty as long as it is a fair treaty.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the responsibilities of office have taught the gentlemen on the Treasury benches what the Conservatives of Canada knew long ago, namely that this country is not dependent on the United States. It is well, Sir, that even at this late date they have learned that lesson. It is unfortunate they did not know it before, and that in their ignorance of the subject they led the people of the United States to believe that Canada was dependent on that country. It may be that such statements of the Liberals in the past have made it difficult to obtain a treaty even now, because the people of the United States have had that lesson impressed on their minds so strongly that it is difficult to teach them that in a commercial sense we are independent of them, and can get along without them whether they make a commercial treaty with us or not. Gentlemen on the other side persist in telling us that the leader of the Opposition is in favour of retaliation, although the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) told us he was not. But what does the Prime Minister say? The Premier says he will not frame a policy on the United States policy, but for the good of Canada. That is very nice, but what does it mean. It is a very indefinite statement, like a good many other statements that are made. We all believe in framing a policy for the good of Canada, but the point is, what do we think is good for Canada? That is the whole question. There is no doubt there is a feeling in this country to-day—we need not call it retaliation—a feeling not among Conservatives alone, but among Liberals as well, all over this country, that if the United States are not willing to make concessions, if they stand out for the pound of flesh, we should imitate their example, and protect our own industries. That is the feeling all over this country to-day. I suppose the Premier knows this, and that is one reason why he said that this country does not want a reciprocity treaty to-day. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said: "I will not be one to surrender the rights of Canada." I was glad to hear that statement; we were all glad to hear it; because while the commissioners were at Washington there was a fear throughout this country that so anxious would they be to make a treaty with the United States and to settle all the controverted points at issue, that they would be willing to surrender some of the rights of Canada. The whole country was afraid of that. Liberals themselves were afraid of that.

Mr. CRAIG. There may be some Liberals in this House who were not afraid; but I know Liberals spoke to me in Toronto who were. However, I for one am relieved to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce make that statement. He goes on to say that a great honour has been conferred on this commission by England; and he adds, "I hope we shall be worthy of this trust." Well, Sir, I hope they will. I hope they will not forget that they represent England in this business; but I hope they will remember as well that they represent Canada, and are expected to protect the interest of Canada. That is the important point for us. The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of the difficulties which confronted the commissioners; and although I do not minimize them, I say they were just as great for the Conservative Government. But there is one advantage which the present commissioners have over any other commissioners, that is, the very cordial feeling existing in the United States towards England arising out of the conduct of England during the war with Spain. That is a great advantage, and I hope that advantage will conduce to the success of the commission. I hope they will succeed. I hope a treaty will be made, provided it is fair to Canada. I do not think we need bother considering whether it will be fair to the United States, for their commissioners are perfectly able to look after that part of the business. In almost every treaty which the United States have made they have got the best of the bargain. I hope they will not get the best of the bargain in this case. If a treaty is made—and I hope a treaty will be made, for it would be a great advantage to us to have all questions between the two countries settled—I hope it will be a perfectly fair treaty to Canada.

Now I come to a question which has been touched on by all the previous speakers, and on which, of course, I have to touch, that is, the plebiscite. I think the plebiscite is rather a live question to-day. I am afraid that a good many members of the Liberal party, from the way they talk, would like it to be a dead question. The Premier says that no pledge was made to the prohibitionists, but that it was made to the Liberal party. Well, I think the pledge must have been made to the prohibitionists in the Liberal party. I am sure that the pledge was not made to the liquor men or to the men who did not bother their heads on this question. The Premier says the object was to obtain the honest and unbiassed opinion of the people on the question. Well, I do not think that object was attained. In some cases the unbiassed opinion of the people was not obtained. I think political considerations were allowed to creep in. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) used great pressure on the people of the province of Quebec so as to prevent them expressing an unbiassed opinion on the question. A great deal was made of the fact that this question would be placed before the people apart from any other question, and apart from political considerations, so that the people might pronounce yes or no on the question unhampered by any other considerations. I am satisfied that that was not done. We know it was not done in the province of Quebec. We know the great influence of the Minister of Public Works in that province, and he worked there to secure an adverse verdict from the people. He threw himself energetically into the fight, and did all he could to influence the people on political grounds not to vote for prohibition. I know that there were members of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario who would not vote, although in favour of prohibition, because they said they did not wish to get the Government into a hole on this question. I hold that, with the present state of public opinion in this country, and with political parties constituted as they are, it is impossible to obtain a verdict from the people on a question like this without taking politics into consideration; and that has been amply proved in this case. But I wish to call attention to a very important statement made by the Premier. He says this:

Moreover, there was not a man living who expected, at the time the plebiscite was taken, that the duty would be imposed on the Government of introducing a prohibitory measure unless at least one-half of the electorate recorded their votes in favour of that policy.

That is a pretty strong statement, and on that I take issue with the Premier. I do not agree with him that there was not a man living but thought that at least one-half the electorate should vote for prohibition before the Government would be justified in introducing a Bill. I thought that, but I found that I was a sort of anomaly. Nobody else seemed to think that at all.

Even temperance men on the other side of the House did not agree with me, and temperance men on this side did not agree with me. They thought I had made a fool of myself, and I am still told to-day by a good many that in making that statement I made a fool of myself; and I did not know, until I heard that statement of the Premier that there was not a man living who did not agree with me. I did not meet them in the country, and some of them do not act even to-day as if they agreed with me; some of them say even now that the vote is quite sufficient. Some of the members of the Dominion Alliance say that; and I suppose these men were alive then; they certainly seem to be alive now. I just call attention to that, because I think the statement is rather extreme and hardly correct. The Premier quoted my remarks of last year, and I am told that he thought they were of great assistance to him. He is welcome to whatever assistance he can get from them, because I think the same to-day. He quoted my opinion that if any Government endeavoured to pass a prohibitory law, it should be with a majority of the voters on the list in its favour. Let me contrast my conduct on that occasion with the conduct of the Premier and other members of the Government—with the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture, and other temperance men on that side of the House. Why did they not get up and say that they did not agree with that? But they would not say anything. They heard me make that statement; they heard me ask what majority would be required, and they said nothing. I made my statement, and I am prepared to stand by it. But it did not make much difference what I said; but it did make a difference what the Premier said. I think we should have known then what we know to-day. Why did the Premier not make the statement before the vote was taken that he has made now after it has been taken?

I think this is a question he ought to answer to those who want prohibition. Why did not the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who introduced the Plebiscite Bill in this House, who introduced the plebiscite plank in the platform of that convention in 1893, get up and say: No, I do not think one-half the votes need be recorded in favour of prohibition. Why did not some of the other members who agreed with him on prohibition at that time say so? This is a fair criticism on the conduct of members on that side and a just complaint by those who are in favour of prohibition to-day. There is no doubt that the insertion of that plebiscite plank in the platform of the Liberal party helped them in the election of 1896. I was somewhat surprised when I read the remarks of Mr. Fisher, which he made at the convention in 1893, and which I had not read before. He said that the Liberal party was the party that was always on the side of reform and morality and virtue, and that the young men of the country recognized that, and that these young men who believed in these qualities of morality and temperance and all that sort of thing, all naturally gravitated to the Liberal party. He went on to say that they were now showing how they felt on that question, and said: I introduce this plank in the platform on that account. If his remarks meant anything they meant that the Liberal party were going to give this question a fair chance.

An hon. MEMBER. So they did.

Mr. CRAIG. The prohibitionists do not think so. I have no doubt at all that this helped that party at the elections in 1896, because the people in favour of temperance said: See there is the plebiscite plank in the platform, they are going to grant us that, and that is a step in favour of prohibition. I am afraid that it has turned out to be a step in the other direction. Let me read still further what the right hon. First Minister said, and it is very interesting reading. He said:

When this plank was put into the Liberal platform, there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it should be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand,—

This is a most important statement.

—there was an engagement—

He did not say whether it was an implied engagement or not.

—on the part of those who believed in prohibition, that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party.

I would like to ask this question of the right hon. Premier, who, I am sorry to say, has gone out, but I do not suppose he would answer it if he were here. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) will tell me, for he knows more about it, and took an active part in this campaign on the plebiscite.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I never said a word, never made a speech about it.

Mr. CRAIG. What is meant by the word "implied"?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. CRAIG. I take it back certainly if the Minister of Public Works says he took no part in it, but I again ask what did the right hon. Minister mean by an "implied agreement." I suppose he meant something.

Mr. CRAIG.

although sometimes he uses language that does not mean anything, and perhaps he will find it rather difficult to tell us what he means by this implied agreement. I say that his statement that there was an implied agreement on this question, should have been made on the introduction of the Plebiscite Bill. I think that Parliament was not treated with proper respect. If the Premier knew, as I have no doubt he did, since he says so, that there was an implied agreement, that there had to be an overwhelming majority in favour of prohibition before anything could be done, he should have told us so on the introduction of the Bill. I think he did not treat Parliament right when he introduced the Bill without letting us know that fact, and I think certainly that he did not treat the prohibitionists fairly, because they knew nothing at all about any such implied agreement until a day or two ago. But how does the right hon. Premier know there was such an implied agreement? I am very sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not here where he ought to be, but I have not seen him around lately.

An hon. MEMBER. He has gone to Europe.

Mr. CRAIG. I did not know he had gone away, and wish he were here. But perhaps somebody who can speak for him will say whether he knew of this implied agreement. It was he who introduced this plank into the Liberal platform at the convention. Did he then know of this implied agreement? He should have known it, but he did not say anything about it in that speech. He did not say there was any agreement, implied or not, that an overwhelming majority would be required before we could have a prohibitory law. This implied agreement was kept entirely in the dark. I would like to know who were the parties to it; and if it is in writing, I would like to see it. But the Premier went further. He said there was an arrangement that if the majority was not sufficient, then the prohibitionists in the party would drop the question for ever. Are the members of the Dominion Alliance, who belong to the Liberal party, agreed to drop the subject altogether? Evidently they are not judging by the remarks some of them made at the meeting upstairs yesterday, when they urged that we ought to go on and press this subject still. I am glad that there is one prohibitionist in the House who was a member of Parliament at that time. I refer to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). He it was who introduced prohibition legislation into this House session after session. I would like him to tell us whether he knew of this implied agreement and that an overwhelming majority would be required before the Government would introduce prohibition or of this engagement—not an implied engagement—that if the majority was not sufficient, the prohibitionists in the party would drop the subject for ever. Perhaps a little later on the hon. gentleman will enlighten us on this question. Will he tell us now whether he knew of this implied agreement?

Mr. GEO. LANDERKIN (South Grey). You must not pry into family matters.

Mr. CRAIG. I am glad to hear another prohibitionist talking. I was about to ask this other question. What is the country going to say about the statement of the First Minister? That statement puts the Minister of Agriculture in a very strange position. It was he who introduced the plebiscite plank at the Liberal convention, and the right hon. First Minister says there was this engagement on the part of the prohibitionists.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He did not say there was any engagement.

Mr. CRAIG. If the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) will read "Hansard" he will see that the Prime Minister said there was an engagement.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Implied engagement.

Mr. CRAIG. No, he said there was an engagement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Read it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Anything the Premier said is well worth reading.

Mr. CRAIG. I will agree with the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) that this is well worth reading; it is well worth attention; and I intend to try to impress it upon the members of this House and the people. I quote from page 104 of "Hansard."

On the other hand, there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Prime Minister said clearly that it was an implied engagement.

Mr. CRAIG. He does not say so there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read the whole speech.

Mr. CRAIG. If the hon. gentleman for South Grey would read this speech instead of making one himself, it would be better. I repeat that the Premier said that there was an engagement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Implied engagement.

Mr. CRAIG. He does not say so. I do not know whether the Minister of Railways and Canals would have made a better speech, I am only quoting what the Premier said.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He never suggested that there was an express understanding.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not know what he suggested. The people throughout the country can take the meaning out of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Mr. Tarte). It was an "implied agreement"—the words are there.

Mr. CRAIG. Read a little lower down. I said that.

Mr. FOSTER. There are two things the Premier said.

Mr. CRAIG. I said that, but unless the vote was overwhelming there would be no prohibition. I say, why did he not tell us that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was simply an implied agreement. Every man has his own feeling about the matter.

Mr. J. SOMERVILLE (North Wentworth and Brant). That was the conclusion you came to.

Mr. CRAIG. We are not talking about last year, we are talking about when this was put in the platform, and the Premier says that there was an agreement. That must have meant something. It could not possibly have meant that one party to the agreement thought one thing and the other party to the agreement thought something else. That would not have been an agreement, but a disagreement. The Premier said that it was understood—that is, it was understood by the Prohibitionists in the party and by the non-Prohibitionists in the party—that unless there was an overwhelming vote in favour of prohibition there would be no prohibition and the Prohibitionists would drop the matter.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is what you thought too.

Mr. CRAIG. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) will rise and tell us what he thought about it. I shall expect to hear from him; no doubt he could enlighten us. I am not trying to say what the Premier meant. I am reading what he said. The Prohibitionists throughout the country can read as well as we can, and can understand the meaning of these words as well as we can. The words are not mine. I only repeat them. I draw one conclusion from this utterance of the Premier, and that is that such gentlemen as the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the members of the Alliance who were members of the Liberal party understood this matter. If there was an implied understanding, there must have been some parties to that understanding. This was an understanding between those who were prohibitionists and those who were not. The Minister of Agriculture was one who represented the Prohibitionists, and, if there is any force in the Premier's words, the Minister of Agriculture must have been one of the parties who understood the case. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) must have been a party to the understanding. He is the only gentleman I see here to whom I can refer, except the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). These gentlemen were Prohibitionists in the party, and, if there was this agreement, implied or otherwise they must have known of it. If they did not know of it, there could have been no agreement. Now, I make this further statement which I think cannot be repudiated in view of what the Premier has said—and I am not manufacturing that statement, I am basing my argument upon it—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Argument, is it?

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. member for South Grey might have a little politeness. I think I am discussing this question very fairly and very moderately. I have given the Government a good deal of comfort already by stating my views honestly and openly, which they would not do last year, and which some of them would not do to-day, I suppose. The argument I make is a fair and legitimate one. If I were misrepresenting the Premier or quoting something not in "Hansard," there might be reason for calling me to account; but we have the words before us, and I have quoted them as they are. It is the Premier who placed his friends in this position, not I. It seems to me that he has placed the Minister of Agriculture, and the members of this House at that time who were Liberals, and the members of the Dominion Alliance who belong to the Liberal party in an exceeding awkward position. If they deny that there was any such engagement as the Prime Minister says there was, how can they explain his utterance? I leave them to settle it with their leader. I intended to say a little on the subject of Redistribution, but I think it is not necessary to discuss that question now. I may say that I agree with what the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) said when he declared that if the Bill was not a fair Bill he would both vote and speak against it. I hope the Government will show that they can do what they profess they will do—bring down a Redistribution Bill which shall be fair and just. They say that the members of the Opposition are talking against the Bill in anticipation and calling it a gerrymander, a word which they repudiate. They say this is going to be a fair Bill to all parties. Well, if it is, I cannot say that I will object to it. But, if it is a Gerrymander Bill, the Government will be doing what they have always condemned. If they say that their predecessors did wrong and that therefore they will do wrong, that is no excuse. I will reserve anything I have to say on that question until the Bill is brought down.

With reference to Senate reform, we have heard a good deal, and I agree with a good deal that has been said on that question on that side of the House. I was glad to hear the Premier make the magnanimous statement that they did not intend to destroy the Senate. Well, the Senate must have been very much relieved when he made that statement. I am not so sure that all the members of his party agree with him. I see, the Premier of Manitoba says he would like to wipe the Senate out completely. The Premier says that he believes in a second Chamber, but he says that one neither responsible to the Crown nor to the people is an anomaly. Well, I may say that I consider the remedy proposed by the Premier for reforming the Senate is an anomaly, too, that it is a worse anomaly than the Senate could possibly be; because, while professing not to destroy the Senate, and while professing to be in favour of a second Chamber, the plan proposed is the very plan which would destroy the Senate, or make it entirely useless. Whether it is so or not, there is an impression abroad in the country—and I do not think this impression is confined to members of the Conservative party—that if the Senate had not stopped the Yukon Railway Bill and the Drummond County Railway Bill, we would not have heard anything of Senate reform. I think it is a fact, that if the Senate had not stopped these two Bills, there would have been no talk of Senate reform. But the cry has gone out, that the Senate will stop all good legislation. Well, I hold that the people of the country are grateful to the Senate for throwing out these Bills; and I happen to know that there are some members on the other side of the House—I know one very prominent member on the other side—

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. CRAIG. It is not necessary to give his name. I do not intend to give his name; my statement is sufficient for that; it is for myself that I am making the statement; if the hon. member does not choose to accept my statement, I do not ask him to do so. But I know one very prominent member on the other side of the House who said that he took no stock in this talk about doing away with the Senate and all that sort of thing, because, he said, the Senate had done a great service to the country by throwing out the Yukon Bill. I think he expressed the sentiments of a good many Liberals all over this country. I think the Senate earned the gratitude of the people by throwing out that Bill. I heard a good argument, the other day, in favour of leaving the Senate as it is, because now is the time that the Senate is useful. Hon. members on the other side say that when we were in power, the Senate was of no use, that it was simply an echo of the Government. I do not agree with that. On several occasions the Senate has thrown out Bills that were passed in this House by the Conservative party, when the Senate did not think they were in the interests of the country. But to-day the Senate can be useful, and the Senate has been useful. It may be said that the Senate ought to be reformed. Many people have an objection to the present constitution of the Senate; I am not discussing that. But I say a better way of reforming the Senate can be found than that suggested by the Premier, and I think we had better leave the Senate alone. This plan, I think, is about the worst that could be devised, because, under guise of keeping the Senate, it is really destroying all the influence of the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to talk about broken pledges. I am afraid, if I did, I would talk too long. There is one pledge which has been talked about before, and that is the pledge of economy. The Minister of Trade and Commerce—I remember the speeches he made, and how he used to inveigh against the extravagance of the Conservative party, how he used to say it was perfectly disgraceful the way they were squandering the money of this country; that Canada could not stand such a thing very long, and we had a doleful picture presented of what we were drifting to by the extravagant Government of that day. Well, I think the extravagance of the Government of that day pales into insignificance before the extravagance of the Government of the present day. Their pledges of economy have gone the way many other of their pledges have gone. If the people of the country, if the Liberals of the country, who put them in power, because of these pledges, are satisfied, if they are satisfied that, instead of being economical, they should be extravagant, that, instead of reducing the debt, as they promised to do, they should go on piling it up and increasing it faster and faster—I say, if the Liberals are satisfied, then of course I have nothing to say in the matter. But I believe the day will come when the Government will find that the people are not satisfied with a party who got into power by making certain pledges, and as soon as they got into power, threw these pledges away and tore them up. When our party was in power, we heard something about a reduction of the members of the Cabinet; we have not heard a word about it since the present Government have been in power. We heard something about wiping out every vestige of protection; we never hear anything about protection to-day. Protection to-day is sacred with them; we do not hear anything about doing away with protection. I do not blame them for that. I am glad they have broken that pledge, although it is not much to their credit. It is not much to the credit of any party to break their pledges, but I am glad that they have found new light and that they have found that the policy inaugurated by the Conservative party, and maintained by the Conservative party against their assaults year after year, is the best policy for this country. I feel satisfied, the longer I live, that this country must have protection, that lying alongside a highly-protected country like the United States, we must have protection for our manufacturers. I am glad that in the Cabinet there are men who have the same idea, and that they have prevented the party from doing away with the National Policy, and have kept up protection for our manufacturers. I hope they will still continue to do this. But with all their pledges they have broken I have nothing more to do. I leave the people of the country to settle with them for those pledges, and I have no doubt that, when the time comes, they will do so.

Mr. A. BRODER (Dundas). Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to say right here, concerning this question of the plebiscite, that there is not the slightest doubt that the plank in favour of the plebiscite was put into the platform of the Liberal party for the express purpose of influencing the temperance people throughout this country in the then ensuing campaign on behalf of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I think the Premier and his colleagues are mistaking the temper of the temperance people of this country, if they imagine that their course on this question is going to satisfy the serious people with whom they have to deal. I want to say, that there never was a more unfair attempt, not only to deceive people who are serious and are in earnest, but to jeopardize an important interest in this country, by placing it in a doubtful position; I refer to the investments in the liquor traffic in this country. The fact is, that there was not a man throughout this country who had a dollar invested in a hotel or in the manufacture of liquor, but whose interests were endangered by the doubtful position in which the Government placed that business by their course on this prohibition question, and that without having any serious intention to take action. I say, that is a position that no class of people in this country should be put into by men clothed with the responsibility of carrying on the business of the country. I wish to say also that if the hon. gentlemen now proposing to do away with, or to make useless, the Senate of Canada, have the respect that they claim to have for the voice of the people of this country, then they have a right to take the voice of the people as expressed at a recent date.

In the power of his might the Premier of this country takes the voice of the people by the throat and stifles it. While he is talking of giving the people more liberty by changing the constitution of the Senate of Canada so as to give freer expression to the will of the people, while, Sir, he says he is doing that, he proposes, at the same time, to stifle the lately expressed will of the people on the question of prohibition. Why does he do it? And what argument does he use in favour of his action? He says the vote is too small to justify the passing of a law. He should have told the people that when they were contending on the hustings over this question. Further than that, the press of this country, from one end of it to the other argued that a majority of votes was to decide the question one way or the other. Take the Canadian newspapers, Reform or Conservative, and you will find all of them arguing on the supposition that a majority vote, according to the British practice and principle, should decide that question, as it decides all others. Why was not the Premier of this country and the men who follow him honest enough to tell the people that that was not a proper argument, and that what he and they intended the people to understand was that they must poll at least 50 per cent of the vote before they could have a prohibition law. Did you hear the Prime Minister use the argument that the reason why Quebec cast a large vote against prohibition is because they have prohibition already in great part in that province? If there is any force in that argument at all, it justifies the right hon. gentleman in enacting a prohibitory law, because, according to his own statement, Quebec is already prepared for prohibition. But, Sir, he uses that argument because he wants to get out of trouble and to get his friends out too. It is, I suppose, quite understood that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) should be conveniently away from this House when this discussion is going on. He is rather tender and does not want to get roasted in this House. I say, Sir, that he should be in his seat to-day justifying the position he took in the country, or condemning the position that his friends in the Cabinet took. We find in the province of Quebec no less than three Ministers of the Cabinet going out on the public platform to influence the people to vote down the plank they put in their Liberal party platform of 1893. Is that fair treatment to the people of this country? I claim that the least these gentlemen could have done was to allow the people to use their judgment without being influenced by not only the position these gentlemen held as Cabinet Ministers, but by the arguments they were enabled to use. What were the arguments used by the Liberals throughout the country. Why, some men who were previously prominent temperance men, and whose voices were heard denouncing the Government on the prohibition question, when the Conservatives were in power, these gentlemen were good enough to go around and to tell some of the good, honest Grits: Oh, you had better not vote for prohibition; you will put Laurier in a hole. And, Sir, it is a very significant thing that where we have the largest Grit majorities we also have the largest vote against prohibition. I always thought the Liberal party was the temperance party, but when they came to vote on this question they did not show it. There is something strange about the whole thing. Take the large village of Morrisburg, where I reside, and which has a Grit majority, and it was the only poll in the whole county that gave a majority against prohibition. And, Sir, the strongest and most pronounced vote against prohibition in the province of Ontario was in the large majority of cases given in the Grit counties, which is a certificate that these gentlemen opposite used their influence against prohibition, against their own principles, and against the plank in their party platform of 1893, in order to get away from the responsibility which they asked the people to put upon them. I believe, Sir, that the people of this country will hold them responsible for their action. I believe, further, that there is no candid man, whether he agrees with the temperance people or not, who will refuse to condemn these gentlemen opposite for their lack of honesty of purpose in so dealing with this question which involves a great economic principle. Sir, any party in this country that will needlessly place contending elements of society in such a strife against each other, has the right to be accused of lack of honesty in dealing with public questions. But, unhappily, that is not all. The effect of what they have done will be to add in the future to the acrimony and contention that will continue on this question. Instead of allowing the people to go on quietly and calmly in their honest conclusions according to their conscientious scruples, the action of the Government will intensify the strife, and in the future much harm will arise. I believe, Sir, that if the people of Canada ever get prohibition, they will have to get it within the next fifteen years, or they will not get it at all. Why do I make that statement? I make it because I believe that the influx of the foreign element into this country in the near future will be so great that they will overcome, to a large extent, the purposes of the people who are in this country to-day, and who are willing and able to carry prohibition at the polls in Canada. When great centres of population grow up in any country as is the case in the United States or England or in these older countries of Europe, it is impossible to carry prohibition. That will be the effect in this country, too. So, I say that the Liberal Government has done the temperance people in this country a terrible injury; an injury that no one can measure. And they have done this injury for what? For party purposes and no other. They cannot get away from that. The logic of the whole thing makes it apparent on the face that they have done it, not in the interests of the country, but in the interests of the party in power.

It is amusing to any sensible person in this House or out of it either, to hear the Liberal members opposite stating that their party has kept its promises to the people. Well, if that is so, their promises amounted to little, for they have changed very little on the old Conservative policy. They have cut a strip off the coat, it is true, and they have put a frill on it which they call preferential trade with England in order to deceive the people and to lead them to conclude they had changed the National Policy. Sir, I dare them to rip a seam in that coat or even to remove a button from it. They dare not; they are afraid. I defy them to meddle further with the clothes they have on them, and which they have stolen from the Conservatives—might I remark that these gentlemen are better dressed to-day than they have ever been in their lives before. All I am sorry for is, that there are not better men in our clothes. They stand to-day condemned before the public, and they know they are condemned, because when there is a county in this country opened up what do we find? We find all the resources at the command, not only of the Federal Government, but of the several provincial governments, hurled into that particular locality. Is that to get an expression of public opinion, think you? No, Sir, but to stifle public opinion, and to hinder public opinion giving full expression to its intention. That is the case all over the country. Go west, go east, go anywhere, and that is the practice. Wherever there is a county opened up, where there happens to be some harbour improvement required, you will find the Minister of Public Works there the next day to see how the shoals are, and to see how the rocks are. But, Sir, it is the political rocks he is after. It is the shifting sands of their principles that he is after. He tells them: "We want to spend money right here in your midst; ask for it—how much do you want? and we will give you what you want." That has been done from time to time, all over the country, from the building of railroads to the building of school-houses. The provincial government, backed up by these men, say to the people: "You want a school, and we will build you one," and these gentlemen say to them: "You want to get into such a place by a railroad, and we will give you one." This is their record all over the country, and they are afraid of their record at the bar of public opinion. I have proved it, and I intend to prove it still further after six o'clock.

After Recess.

Mr. BRODER. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the position of the party in power in regard to the plebiscite, and to the conduct of the Government in dealing with the verdict of the people on that question, which the people certainly looked upon as a serious matter. Many gentlemen who have the honour of sitting on this side of the House, and a great many people throughout this country, understood that when the Liberal party put that plank in their platform in 1893, they were putting it there for the purpose of honestly testing public opinion on that question, and that the only logical conclusion which the people could come to after the verdict was had, was that the voice of the people would be carried out. I have in my hand a book which is certainly interesting reading for this side of the House, and there is not the slightest doubt that it will be interesting reading as a matter of history. There have probably been no set of men in the political history of this country so anxious to get away from themselves as hon. gentlemen opposite. Ever since they have been in power they have been trying to get away from their own record, and I do not blame them for it. We have a record of their action in what might be considered their calm moments, when they sat down in solemn council to decide on a policy for the great Liberal party of this country to announce to the electorate. Some gentlemen who were at that convention, first, as members of the Liberal party, and, secondly, for the purpose of assisting the Liberal party as temperance men, were instrumental in putting into the platform the resolution to which I have referred. Other men were there who had convictions on the question not in accord with the convictions of those who were advocating its insertion in the platform of the party. I wish now to read from a speech delivered on that occasion by the late Hon. Mr. Anglin. Mr. Anglin, I may say, was opposed to having that plank put in the platform, and I believe every honest, candid man in the country, in this House and out of it, will feel that no other construction can be put upon the action of the Liberal party in their convention of 1893 than that which Mr. Anglin put upon it at that time. After stating that he is opposed to prohibition and opposed to putting this plank in the platform, he says:

It may be said, indeed, that this resolution only asks for a plebiscite. But what do we mean if we ask for a plebiscite if we are in earnest? It is not that we desire to know what the opinion of the people is on this question; that we desire to ascertain their opinion in a particular way, and that we will do all in our power to give effect to their decision as thus ascertained? It may be that not one-half of the adult male population will vote. Nevertheless, should a majority be obtained at the polls when this question is submitted, the friends of prohibition will be in a position to call upon the Liberal party to follow up their resolution logically by assisting in the passage and enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law.

That is the position taken by the Hon. Mr.

Anglin in the convention, and his position was right, it was logical, it was honest; and where are the men to-day who were in holy counsel on that occasion with Mr. Anglin? Trying to get away from their own record, trying to get away from themselves, and it will be a good thing for the country when they do get away from themselves. How was that resolution carried? The record says that it was carried almost unanimously, after the statement of Mr. Anglin putting the proper construction upon it. On this great question hon. gentlemen opposite have been trifling with the electorate of this country. There are many serious people in this country who believe in prohibition, and those people have a right to have their opinions respected at the hands of the Government when they ask them to pronounce those opinions at the polls.

While there is great difference of opinion as to the advisability of a prohibitory law, it would have been better not to have put this machinery in motion than to have attempted to stifle public opinion after putting it in motion. I cannot help but recall the fact that when the late Sir John Thompson was approached by the prohibition party in this country, he stood up manfully, as a statesman should, and said: It is impossible for me to tell you gentlemen in two hours how I shall provide $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 revenue. I can hold out no inducement to you that we will be able to meet your views. That was statesmanlike and manly and in strong contrast with the stand taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to-day. Were they candid? Were they sincere? Were they in earnest? Did they mean what they said? Why, if we are to square their actions by their professions, they were not honest in what they said, they had no intention of giving to the people what they asked the people to pronounce upon. The position of the First Minister on that question is such that if not one man who had gone to the polls and voted against prohibition, when the plebiscite was taken, the right hon. gentleman had just the same argument against granting prohibition as he has to-day, because he counts the men who stayed at home and did not vote. Why, every one might have stayed at home except the few who voted for prohibition, and it would still have been defeated. It is generally assumed that if a proposal is put before a community, which has a right to pronounce upon it, the men who absented themselves and failed to record their votes are bound by those who did pronounce their opinion; and when the Government gave this plebiscite and asked the people to pronounce upon the question submitted, it was in duty bound to stand by the proposition it had laid before the people. But the Government did not want prohibition carried. They were afraid it would carry, and they attempted, to my knowledge, in some localities to prevent it being carried at the polls. Further than that in Quebec while the vote, the day after the plebiscite was taken, was something over fifty thousand against it, that fifty thousand kept growing until two weeks later there were ninety-four thousand against it. That vote continued to grow for two weeks until the Government could proclaim to the country that there was not a sufficient majority in favour of prohibition to make it the law. It is pretty well understood and admitted that in some localities in the province of Quebec the ballot boxes were tampered with. Some men were good enough to say that they were tired voting all day. One man said that he had voted seventeen times against the plebiscite. Another said: the returning officer knows what we want in this community, and he will put our ballots in the box. It must have been understood what was going to be done in the province of Quebec, because the Government drew all their forces there, including the much respected Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), who is, of course, the exponent of the best element of the whole province of Quebec, but who nevertheless was good enough to take the public platform against this question down there. The men who put that plank in the Liberal platform, if they were sincere when they did so, should have been equally sincere when the question was submitted at the polls; but it appears that the proper kind of business concern now to run this country, is one in which you must have a good man and then a wicked partner. The wicked partner must go out and drink whisky with the boys, but the unfortunate part of this business concern is that it has too many wicked partners, so they thought it necessary to take in our friend over there into the concern in order to give it respectability. It is astonishing how the machine works to suit the wicked partners. Every time the wheel of fortune turns it stops where they want it. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was particularly prominent in this province talking on this question, and nobody could give any other construction to what he said than that this was a serious matter. If the people want prohibition, he said, vote for it at the plebiscite, and he gave them to understand that if they were in the majority they would get it. But where is the hon. Minister to enforce his views to-day? He ought to be here. Even if he be a practical farmer, the crops are not now growing and he need not go out in this cold weather to hoe his corn or sow his wheat.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). They have put him in cold storage.

Mr. BRODER. Yes, and the cold storage is not so much for carrying produce to English markets as for freezing out the principles of these hon. gentlemen. They have got every promise they made to his country in cold storage where they are going to freeze it to death. We hear a great deal about this cold storage, as if it was this Government that first enunciated that policy in this country. To hear these men talk, you would think there was no ice in this country until they came into office. They had been long enough in the cold shades of opposition to make ice. They had been so long in these cold shades that they got the monopoly of that business, and in order to get rid of their surplus stock, they had to take up this system and all their professions are now being shipped out of this country in cold storage.

I am a prohibitionist. I have stood up for it when it cost a great deal in my political record to do so, but I am glad to be able to say that I represent a county which gives every man the right to think and speak for himself, and should it happen that my county would prefer some other man than I, I shall submit to their decision. But there are times in the history of every public man when he should not fall down at the foot of public opinion but stand up in a manly way and help to lead public opinion in the right direction. These men, however, have not had that courage. Why, they are afraid of their own friends to-day. They have shown by their own record that they are afraid of their own friends and dare not carry out one jot or tittle of what they proclaimed to the country as their great policy. I do not wish to say more on this prohibition question than this, that the First Minister and his followers have done this country and the cause of temperance a great injury. Why have they done that? For this reason. They gave the people to understand for years that the only true hope of the prohibition party in this Dominion was to put them in power. But what do we find now? There are a great many serious, conscientious, earnest men, who were perhaps largely identified with that party because they thought it was a party which would most likely give them prohibition. What do they find to-day? They find that the idols they have been worshipping for years are broken at their feet. They find that instead of being genuine these idols were only polished up for shelf use, were only made of pipe clay. They find that they have been worshipping gods made of clay who have fallen to pieces at their feet. Such men are disappointed and have a right to be disappointed. The Government cannot get away from the logic of their own doings, and the people are intelligent enough to square them up by their professions. The people will weigh them in the political balance and will find them wanting as the worse sinners that ever governed this Dominion.

Now, I want to say a little more about this Washington business. The Premier, last evening, made a little play on the word "Cabinet." I suppose, you could not have a meeting of the Cabinet of this country in a foreign country, but he will not deny that they met in New York, and on Sunday too. What to do? To consult whether they should come home, or still stick to the Yankees, I suppose. That is not the only Sunday business they did. They went to Montreal. What for? I suppose they were afraid that somebody would take possession of the post office if they were not there to guard it. That reminds me of a story of an Irishman, a friend and fellow-countryman of my own. Unfortunately, his financial condition was not just what it ought to be. He had been taking the Montreal "Gazette" for a long time, but had not paid for it, and owed about $15. During the time of the Pacific slander—that is the proper name—the "Gazette" people wrote him a rather sharp letter. This was about the time when John Young and Abbott's private clerk had interfered with the letters in the post office. My friend wrote to Mr. Thomas White, whom he approached in a very familiar way, a letter something like this: "Dear Tommy, enclosed find $2. I would send you more, only I am afraid of John Young and the post office." So, these gentlemen were afraid of the post office, and went down on Sunday to take care of it, I suppose. I do not know whether it was decided that Mr. McShane or somebody else shall have a post office.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Did you say, on Sunday?

Mr. BRODER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is that possible?

Mr. BRODER. Everything is possible now. Now, as to this Washington business, the Premier said, in his speech the other night—and it was an astonishing statement, I think, for the Premier to make, when we consider the past record of these gentlemen and their former pretenses—that the people of this country do not want reciprocity. Then why, in the name of sense, was he over there trying to outrage the public sentiment of this country? Why did he not come home? For my part, I believe that it was an immense relief to the people of this country, and lifted a general feeling of anxiety, when news came that these gentlemen were coming home with nothing done. This is what the Premier says:

There was a time, not long ago, when the markets of the great cities of the Union was the only market we had for any of our products; but, thank Heaven,—

They do not thank the Tories for anything. "Thank Heaven," says the Premier——those days are passed and over now.

Does the right hon. gentleman pretend to say that if they had had their way in 1891, those days would not now be passed? He would not be thanking Heaven, but thanking his stars for the change that would have taken place. This country would not be in the position it is in to-day. If these gentlemen had had their way in 1891, this country would not have stood out conspicuously as the coming country of this world. They may thank the Conservative party, that stood up and defended this country against foreign aggression under the principles of hon. gentlemen opposite. The result of their policy would have been to put this country into the hands of the United States, because no seventy-five millions of people would submit to the rule, in commercial matters, of five millions. These gentlemen are thankful to Heaven now that that is not the case, and they ought not to forget their thanks to the Conservative party, that held the fort in those days until these gentlemen recovered their heads. When the Conservative party was in power, helping to build up this great country, these gentlemen were decrying it. What is the position to-day? Do you find the leading men of the Conservative party, or even the rank and file, going up and down decrying this Canada of ours? No, Sir. During the time these gentlemen were in Washington, endeavouring to negotiate a treaty for the settlement of these questions, which every true Canadian would be glad to see settled, did the Conservative party, in their newspapers, or on the platform, or anywhere else, do anything but hold up the hands of the negotiators? The conduct of the Conservative party contrasted very favourably with the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition and the Conservative party were endeavouring to secure a treaty. They did everything they could to thwart the efforts of those who sought to negotiate a treaty with the United States. I am glad to see gentlemen have learned the lesson of patriotism from the Conservative party. They are loyal to-day: they are British to-day. But take up their speeches in 1891—were they British then? Their effort in 1891 was to subject this country to the commercial control of the United States. The Conservative party prevented that. When these gentlemen were trying to negotiate a treaty, the Conservatives even postponed taking the public platform on these questions. But that was not the treatment we received at their hands, when they were out of power. I wish to point out that these gentlemen gave away every argument they had before they went over to the United States. The Yankee will not give anything, if he can get what he wants for nothing. He is a shrewd, sharp business man—they are a nation of shrewd business men. I would like the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to explain why it is that he is out of harmony with his friends. When he was in Chicago, and felt he could talk without getting into trouble, he said we had made a mistake in giving free corn. But that question was raised when free corn was proposed, and these gentlemen were told that such a step would hamper any efforts at negotiation with the American people. But they put corn on the free list, and then they went over there, hoping to get pay for what they had given the Americans before they went there. Well, they are not going to get it. They expected to get it, but they have come home, knowing more than they did before. When they were here, they thought they were all-powerful, that they would go over and negotiate a treaty, whether the Americans wanted it or not. But they have found that the Americans were looking after their own interests, and what the Canadian Government ought to do is to look after Canadian interests, without regard to the welfare of the United States. As soon as they get into that position, and propose legislation solely with a view to our own interests, just so soon will they begin to get into a position to secure a treaty with the American people. We know very well that American public men know less about Canada, probably, than the public men of almost any other country. I dare say, that has dawned on hon. gentlemen opposite. They would find the most prominent public men over there by no means well posted as to the position Canada occupied or the value of Canadian trade to the people that might get it. I must say, I have never been a strong advocate of sacrificing too much in order to get a treaty with the Americans.

The twelve years that treaty of 1854 was in force, were the twelve most favourable years for us that could possibly be; the conditions were such, the American war having removed a large portion of their population from agricultural pursuits that the American people wanted our products. But notwithstanding that the conditions were so favourable apparently to us, I find by some documents published in England, which I think the Hon. George Brown was instrumental in getting up from American records that during those twelve years the Canadian people bought from the United States $150,000,000 worth more goods and products than the United States bought from Canada. Now, if, under those favourable conditions we bought from them that much more than they bought from us, how can we expect under changed conditions that are not so favourable, to get a treaty that will be of much benefit to us? I want to say this further, that I believe this Government ought without any delay to put a duty upon pulp wood in this country. The American people are confined to very small areas now for pulp wood, they have got to get it in this country. Now, I am informed—and I do not wish to make a statement that it is not borne out by facts—that every cord of pulp wood when manufactured is worth $40 on the market. I do not see why we should let the Americans cut our pulp wood—I think the stumpage is 40 cents a cord—I do not see why we should let them take away our pulp wood to the States at a cost of $4, and make it worth $10. The market for the pulp is in Europe, not the United States. The Americans come here and take up the raw material, take it over there and manufacture it with American capital and American labour, and ship it to Germany and to England, and get this large profit out of it. Why should we not keep that profit for Canadians? If we put an export duty on pulp wood the Americans would begin to open their eyes on this question, they would begin to see that we can take care of ourselves, and I would vote any time in this House for a resolution to put an export duty on pulp wood. Now, I wish to deal with another matter. I want to talk a little about the Senate before it is gone. No matter how you feel, you have to talk very respectfully about any one that is dead. I want to say something about it while it is alive—of course the Premier intends to kill it. His scheme will kill it, that is what he wants. I want to say that any Government that deliberately disturbs the constitutional conditions of this country ought to be careful before making the step. Suppose the Premier lightly takes hold of the Senate and does what he says, what is to hinder every province changing the position of the minorities? What protection have the minorities without the Senate? Why, you un hinge the whole basis underlying the respective positions of majorities and minorities. You set on foot a movement that you cannot stop this side of revolution. I quite understand that some people in this country wish to do away with the Senate because they are opposed to the expense it incurs; but I cannot understand how, while wishing to yield to the idea of those people who want to do away with it, you still retain all the expense of it, all the paraphernalia. There are those who say it is of no use. The Premier talks about the Australian system. I am satisfied the Premier knows it although he has not told us all about it; but his proposition is not the Australian proposition at all. Both Houses in Australia are elected under the new law, and when the Senate there rejects the law they wait three months, and if they reject it again, the Government goes to the country. That is a very different thing to what the Premier proposes. It would be well for him to look that matter up, because it is worth considering, and he will find that they have changed that law lately. Then why should we attempt, even if he were right, to take up something that has never been tried? Better be a little more conservative, and wait till we see whether the cart will run or not. But I want to go a little further. The people of this country must feel that as the great interests of this country are developing and becoming more important, still more important will the Senate become. In England we very often hear the expression: Thank God, we have a House of Lords; and the time will come in this country, it has come already, when the people will say: Thank God, we have a Canadian Senate. Now the hon. gentlemen opposite say these old gentlemen in the Senate have never done anything. Well, let us see what they have done: I have a statement here which may not have been seen by everybody, although it has been published in the press. It is a statement made up by one of the members of the Ontario legislature and used in the debate there; it was published in the "Ottawa Citizen" and copied, I think, from the "Toronto Mail and Empire." I want to call the attention of the House to the number of bills that they have dealt with altogether, and the number of bills they have dealt with while their own friends were in power. Now, you know these gentlemen have told the people all over the country that the Senators are there just to help their own friends. Well, they have really rejected more Bills of their own friends than they have of hon. gentlemen opposite. Of course there is a good reason for that because the people have not given these gentlemen their confidence for many years; and the probability is that if they wait a while the Senate will have no longer any occasion to reject their bills. Now, they say these Senators are very old. Why, you would think that when these gentlemen came into power they were going to put young blood into this old body, that they were going to put some life into the Senate. Almost one of the first appointments that they made is the oldest man in the Senate to-day with one exception. It is surprising how Reform members will rejuvenate when they get into the Senate.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). How old is he?

Mr. BRODER. He is over 80. Now I want to tell you the average age of the Senators. You would think that every man put there by the Tories was old enough to be fit for the next world—almost. The average age of the Senators is 65. That is a good, safe average. If you put the 65 years men out of this House the best of it would be gone.

Mr. TAYLOR. There would not be many members of the Government left.

Mr. BRODER. I would not object to that. The youngest Senator is 38, the oldest 94.

Mr. TAYLOR. He is a Grit.

Mr. BRODER. No, I think he is a Tory. When Sir John A. Macdonald was alive, I heard a countryman of mine say to him: Sir John, you look young, I think you will never die. Sir John said: That is what the Grits say. I think the Senators must be Tories because they do not die when they become old. If there is anything these gentlemen over there want, it is that these poor old fellows in the Senate should get ready and die. If they were all 80 years old they would not change the Senate. What is troubling them to-day is that the Senators are too young now. They were old before they got into power, but now they are too young, they are not dying fast enough. When they find out that the average is 65, they say: We cannot wait for them to die because our men will be dead before they are, and we must make some change. As I say, the youngest is 38 and the oldest is 94. The Liberals have recently appointed one of 90. Oh, I beg the Premier's pardon, I said he was 80. I do not want to steal anything from this man; I do not want to take ten years of his age; he was ninety.

The oldest Senator was as young as any in respect of work done. In thirty years since confederation the Senate has thrown out——since confederation they have thrown out 153 Bills: 65 Government measures, 35 public, and 53 private Bills, including divorce. The Government measures were distributed as follows:—From 1867 to 1873, Conservative Administration, 53 private Bills, including divorce. The Govern-13.

Here is what I want hon. gentlemen opposite to particularly study:

Remember, 23 Tory Bills, and only 13 Liberal Bills for the same number of years; of course, the Grit legislation was so good that the Senate could not throw it out.

From 1879 to 1896, Conservative Administration, 24 Government Bills; from 1896 to 1899, Liberal Administration, 5 Government Bills.

That is the position so far as the rejection of Bills by the Senate is concerned. Mr. Speaker, there is no country that ought to cling to a second House with greater tenacity than this country of ours, and there never was a time as now when it was so critical to disturb the existing conditions. I can prove it by the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite. They say that things are going so well, that we will have thousands upon thousands of a new population right away. The people have just learned what this country is, and you want to keep things as they are so that they will recognize it. Further, Sir, there is a principle involved in the constitution of the Senate which no Government of Canada can lightly disregard. I took the trouble to read the confederation debates long before I was a member of Parliament, and let me ask who were the first men to make concessions to bring about this great union of Canada? Who were the men to make the starting point that we might bring about this scheme which all parties, Grit and Tory, found necessary to put an end to that strife which before confederation tore the country asunder. Sir, the people of the province of Quebec made the first concession. They consented to take 65 members in the House of Commons while Ontario had 73, and although Quebec retains her 65 members Ontario has a great many more to-day. Quebec allowed this country to adopt the principle of representation by population, although it was against their interests as a minority. But, Sir, there was the law of compensation which ought to come in and which always does come in, and so Quebec said we must have 24 members in the Senate, and they have 24 senators, and Ontario has 24 also. The proposition of hon. gentlemen opposite is to change that understanding, and they propose to make the Senate under certain conditions subject to the popular body, when the province of Quebec will have only 65 members in this House, and the other provinces will have a great preponderance.

But it occurs to me that there is something underlying this scheme which has not come to the surface. Do these hon. gentlemen intend to say when the Senate is so over-ridden by the popular body, that then it is time for Quebec to have more members in the House of Commons. Is that underlying this scheme? This country should know the intentions of hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to disturbing the settled conditions of our constitution, for the people of Canada will guard with jealous care the rights they have given to the minorities. Sir, we ought to protect minorities. There is perhaps no man in a better position to speak on this question than I am. I stand here the representative of one of the strongest Protestant counties in the province of Ontario, a county that has comparatively few Roman Catholics in it. I am sorry to say that with a few exceptions nearly every one of these Roman Catholics has been identified with the Reform party for years. When the constitutional question of the rights of the minority in Manitoba was discussed and fought out bitterly in this county, I could have taken the side of the majority in Manitoba and got into this House by three or four hundred majority of the popular vote; but I chose otherwise and contended that it was necessary to stand on the great principle of right by giving the people what they were entitled to under the constitution. In one place I was told they would not allow me to speak if I took that position, but I stood on the public platforms of that county and I was able to convince the people of the right, and they sent me here as their representative, so that I feel I am competent to stand up for the rights of minorities. Sir, it is my duty as a Protestant to do it. I declare here that if Canada is to be a great and happy nation the minorities must be considered by the majorities, because the majorities can always take care of themselves. I believe that in this scheme to change the constitution of the Senate there is something underlying it that has not yet been revealed.

Mr. TAYLOR (South Leeds). They say you are an Orangeman.

Mr. BRODER (Dundas). Well, try me and see. I am not ashamed of it, but as such there is nothing to hinder me from standing up to advocate that every man in Canada should have his right. I am a citizen of this great country, and I say that the welfare of this country depends on the just recognition of every man irrespective of class or creed. I was sorry to hear it stated in this House that the race cry had been used in certain localities, and if I mistake not it has been used, but no lover of his country will endorse the using of it in any section. I believe that we ought to appeal to the intelligence of the people of Canada and not to their prejudices. If hon. gentlemen opposite have been guilty of feeding the people upon their prejudices instead of upon their argument, it is their own business not mine, but it will recoil on their own heads. You cannot feed a man all the time on prejudices; you must give him something better than that for both soul and body. And so, every honest Canadian ought to consider most seriously the proposition laid down by the leader of the Government. I venture to say, Sir, that the country will not endorse him. The great underlying common sense of this Canada of ours is conservative in principle, and our people desire to preserve this country and every institution that is in it. I venture to say that the Senate will become more and more important as time goes on. What do these gentlemen want to change the constitution of the Senate for. Their own conduct since they have come into power gives the answer. The Senate stands in their way; but it does not stand in the way of the right minded people of this country. It stands in the way of the men who want to get their arms into the public chest up to their shoulders. It stands in the way of men who want to give improvident contracts without the scrutiny of the Senate. It stands in the way of men who want to exploit, if I may use the word, the public chest of this country of ours. Sir, that great safeguard ought to be retained, and the retention of it will be in the interest even of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Premier himself will be most interested in having the Senate. What would the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie have done if he had not the aid of the Senate, when, as he told us, he was sleeping with his arms on the public chest, guarding it from his Liberal friends who were trying to exploit it. Poor Alexander Mackenzie would have a bad time if he was here now. He was glad to have the Senate, and the Premier will be glad to have the Senate before he is many days older, perhaps. He ought to have it to help him out of trouble once in a while, and it will help him out of trouble. But it looks as if there was a scheme on foot. If he puts his policy before the country we cannot tell whether he will carry it out or not. This may be another plebiscite business. I think I know pretty well what he wants to do. He wants to bring in a most outrageous gerrymander Bill, which he thinks the Senate will throw out, and then he will go to the country with a tremendous cry, and sweep the country again. That is the scheme, because all that is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is a gerrymander Bill. It is a pretty small grist to bring to a big mill like this; but we are going to grind it—and I suppose there is not the slightest doubt that they will run away with the dough. We are going to grind the grist, and we will grind it that fine that they will not know it when they get home. Have they got done with all the great questions which have agitated this country? They have got down now to a very small business, when they have nothing to offer but a gerrymander Bill. They are going to the country and they want some cry. They never got into power without a cry or a scandal, and when they have none, they manufacture one. I always thought that a great party ought to appeal to the country on principle. They remind me of the American public man who spoke for two hours and a half very earnestly, and at the end said, "Gentlemen, these are my principles; if you do not like them, I can change them." It is an old story, but it applies with great force to these gentlemen to-day. The people of this country begin to see that these gentlemen are insincere, and they are not willing to put their great interests into their hands for the future. These gentlemen find the ground slipping away from them; they hear such rumblings that their stomachs have got sour—they have got too much Tart.

An hon. MEMBER. Castoria.

Mr. BRODER. That won't do; he is too old a sinner for that. The Premier cannot do without him, and he knows it. He may be glad to get rid of some of his wicked partners, but there is one there that he cannot get rid of; he cannot do without him. He is the dominant man in that party—there is no doubt about that; and I am not sorry for it, because I think he will bring them to grief before long. I would not care if they had a couple more men like him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to engage the attention of the House too long. I do not speak often, and perhaps you are all glad of it. I am here representing a serious county and trying to do my duty as a citizen of this country, and I believe there is a feeling of disappointment on the part of a great many of the people of that county because of the position this Government occupy with reference to carrying out what they proposed. I might go back to this red book. We used to hear years ago of the red parlour, but here is a red book. It is hard to tell where it came from. I will tell another story, and hon. gentlemen may catch the idea. There was a very zealous curé, a Roman Catholic priest, in the province of Quebec, who was in the habit of remonstrating with his people on political matters from the altar. His bishop told him, and properly so, that he must not do that; but his feelings got the better of him one day, and, preaching very earnestly, he said to his people, "Heaven above is blue, hell below is red." Now, I do not know where this book came from, but it is red. Sometimes a man will hardly recognize his own child, and I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite will recognize some of the children that I will bring to light from this book. Here is one page headed Sir Richard Cartwright. I do not know whether the people know him or not. They used to know him, but he is so changed now that I do not know whether his old friends would recognize him. In this book he says:

More than that, I have always held that in Canada protection was not only a crime, but a blunder. I have always felt that there was absolutely no excuse for introducing such a system in a country like this.

We do not hear him using such language any more; but while the lamp holds out to burn you know there is a chance. Sometimes these gentlemen say: "The Tories left us so many rascally bills that we cannot take off protection; we must have a big revenue." But I say this, and I say it seriously, that these gentlemen, with the buoyant revenue they have to-day, with millions of a surplus, are in a position to carry out their principles if they wanted to. Why do they not reduce the tariff on those items which have been so objectionable to them, and keep on doing it? They do not want to do it; it is the last thing they are thinking about.

An hon. MEMBER. Next year.

Mr. BRODER. Yes, we will see them next year, there is no doubt about that; but we cannot tell where they will be. If they wanted to carry out their principles of free trade or even to introduce free trade to a small degree, the buoyant revenue puts them in a position to do it; but they do not want to do it. Now, before I sit down, I wish to thank the House for their forbearance.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). I am, Mr. Speaker, one of a very considerable number of men in this House, on both sides, who have not been a very long time in this House. What has struck me very forcibly, and I am sure it has equally struck all of the new members, is the tremendous time that is wasted here in personal abuse. The older members take up half their speeches in abusing each other like pickpockets. One side is as bad as the other in that respect; and if half of what they say of each other be true, not one of the members who have been in this House for the last fifteen years is deserving of a seat in it. I had hoped, in my innocence, that the hon. Premier, with his sunny ways and childlike smile, would have found some way or another to remedy this evil. He returned from the memorable Jubilee trip, where his sunny smile and other pleasing qualities procured for him the Cobden medal and other decorations. He returned, in fact, with a sort of halo around his head. He had satisfied the hearts of the free traders, and received the Cobden medal, and there was a glow around his head perceptible by free traders. But very shortly after he returned, he satisfied the most inveterate protectionists that he was just as much an out-and-out protectionist as any of them. Take the figures quoted last night, which show that the utmost reduction in the duties on the average goods coming into Canada is less than one-half of 1 per cent, and who can doubt that hon. gentleman's zeal for protection? I am greatly afraid, therefore, that the head of the right hon. gentleman is considerably shorn of its former free-trade halo, and, after the exhibition he made on the floor of this House the other night, I think we have seen the end of his sunny smile, and pleasant ways, and pretty speeches, and the remaining faint glimmer of halo has departed.

In replying to a speech as able, perhaps, as any ever delivered in this House, instead of meeting it as a man in his position should, he started out into a tirade of abuse. He used language worthy of a Billingsgate fishwife, and if it had not been for the restraining influence of your presence, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid we should have had to submit to language worthy only of a sailor's parrot. Therefore, I greatly fear that my hope that there was any chance of this long-continued personal wrangling being put an end to has been cruelly dispelled, and there is evidently no longer prospect of any change for the better being brought about by anything which the right hon. Premier may do or say.

The treaty which was to have been made in the city of Quebec, has evidently been a failure, and in future it will, no doubt, be looked upon, not as the Treaty of Quebec, but as the treating at Washington.

The right hon. gentleman said that the great act of wickedness of which the Senate had been guilty, was the rejection of the Yukon Bill. He must be woefully ignorant of the feeling of his own people, woefully ignorant of the feeling of Canadians, because, from one end of the country to the other, satisfaction is expressed at this act of the Senate, and the right hon. gentleman did not dare go to the country and appeal from the vote of that body in rejecting that Bill. But a red herring is sought to be drawn across the path by assuming that hon. members of this side were opposed to the opening of the Yukon country. Nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker. Not one of the members on this side objected to it. But what we did object to was the infamous bargain which the Government attempted to make. Had that bargain been effected and carried into operation, had that country been put into the possession of contractors, as was proposed, there would have been a rebellion out there which nothing could have stopped. Had the main streams where these deposits are been given into the hands of the contractors, who could have taken them from the prospectors out there, and had one percentage been imposed on the contractors, and a much higher one on the general public, the attempt to put that bargain into force would have resulted in a revolution, and the Senate, in throwing out that Bill, did infinite benefit to the country, and infinite credit to themselves.

As to the general increase in the prosperity of this country, that is a cause of rejoicing for all of us, but let me ask hon. members opposite, what would have been the condition of this country, had their policy been carried out, which for years they advocated—the policy of stopping the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Without the Canadian Pacific Railway, the British Columbia mines, the Yukon mines, the great fields of the North-west and the ranches of that great country would have been valueless to this Dominion, and our country, instead of having prosperity to-day, instead of being a nation, would have been but a narrow, small, restricted colony, without enterprise or energy.

As to the question of the plebiscite, I think that enough, perhaps, has been said, but I cannot help saying, that I was one of the few in this House, I am sorry to say, who had the courage of their convictions, and who stood up and told the Government that the whole scheme was a humbug, that the Government knew it was a humbug, and that they never intended to put it into effect, no matter what the vote might be. I entirely agree with the Government, that it would be an outrage to attempt to enforce it on the vote or any other vote that might be given. The right hon. Premier said that 50 per cent of the people was the reserve figure he had in his mind who ought to record their vote in favour of it. Will he tell me, that on any question that has ever come before this country, 50 per cent of the electorate voted on the one side or the other? I do not believe it will be ever possible to have such a vote, and therefore the reserve figure he had in his mind was absolutely misleading and intended to mislead, and I hope that, in some way or other, the Government will be made to suffer for the sin they committed in stirring up strife between one class and the other, and putting this country to a vast and useless expense.

Coming back to the question of the Senate for a moment, let me say that it is a very beautiful sight to see this Government lean for support upon the Government of the province of Ontario—a government so discredited that if it went to the country it would be overwhelmingly defeated, a government that is hanging together merely by means of patronage, and the fears of its supporters that some one will get an appointment before the others who are seeking it can be equally fortunate. This Government is simply attempting to get hold of something to sustain it by raising the cry for the abolition of the Senate, and putting that policy before the people of this country and the Parliament of England, and thus raising an issue which would draw the attention of our people from their extravagant and foolish record. If the Government wish to abolish the Senate, let them go to the people, from one end of the country to the other, and submit to them a plan for its abolition. If they consider it necessary to change our constitution, let them submit their scheme to the people and ask them to vote on it, and let them go to the proper quarter and ask for a change, if any change be advisable. I believe that the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House (Mr. Broder), hit the nail on the head when he said the Government have so entirely failed in fulfilling their promises that they are afraid their hold on the country is loosening, and they want to make a cry on which to appeal to the country, and they propose to make that cry the abolition of the Senate.

Such a cry was raised against the House of Lords, I think by Mr. Gladstone. I happened to be in London at that time, and Mr. Gladstone, perhaps a little wiser than our Ministers here, got up a monster meeting in London. Hundreds of thousands of people went to Hyde Park. There was a great procession, and at intervals in the line, were barrels of beer in carts for the thirsty people. Various banners were displayed. One of these I well remember, because it apparently, represented the sentiments of the people. A large pear tree was depicted with huge bunches of pears, and a rabble underneath with sticks and stones knocking down the fruit, the legend being "Down with the Pears." But Mr. Gladstone's demonstration fizzled out, as any demonstration looking to the abolition of the Senate of this country will fizzle out, unless supported by the people. In Ontario, so far from wishing to abolish the Senate, we are beginning to feel that the only safety we have for our property and our rights is in the hope of the establishment of a second chamber for the province. Laws are being rushed through for party purposes; they are being passed without due knowledge of what these laws mean, disgusting every man who has the interest of Ontario at heart and who knows how matters are drifting there. What would you be in the province of Quebec without your second chamber? Do you want to abolish it? If second chambers are to be abolished, let us begin with the smaller provinces, and if the plan succeeds there then try it elsewhere. But I believe that if you secured an expression of thought from the people of Ontario, you would find a strong opinion there, that before many years some sort of second chamber must be established, some sort of check on the reckless law making of the present legislature will be a necessity to keep the country in prosperity and to keep industry and enterprise moving as they ought. So much has been said on these subjects that I do not intend to go into details, but simply to give my opinions on broad ground on the various matters that are before you. The Speech from the Throne is so utterly barren that it is a great wonder that it was put in the mouth of His Excellency. Everything was omitted from it, apparently, that the Government intends to do. It contains so little that people wonder why it was worth while calling Parliament together to discuss such a bill of fare.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the country on the auspicious opening of this fourth session of the eighth Parliament. I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon being in the Chair; and I congratulate the new Governor upon the eclat which has attended his advent to this country. While upon that point, one cannot but add a word with reference to the late Governor and the Countess who left us after so constitutional a rule and after doing so much good to Canada as they did. Returning to their former sphere of usefulness, we may congratulate ourselves that, with the added knowledge of Canada and its affairs, they will be of very much use to this country still. I would have wished, as no doubt, would many others, that this session had been called a little earlier. I suppose, however, that that was beyond the control of the Ministers, and we must only accept the situation. I must say that I was a little in sympathy with an idea said to have been expressed by a member of the House during vacation,—I do not know how it could be brought about, but I hope it will be brought about—that there should be a fixed time for the opening of the Dominion Parliament each year, so that those who are members might prepare for the session without very much loss of time from their ordinary business. However, we have assembled and ought to be ready by this time for business. I congratulate the Government, who are growing stronger and stronger, not only in the estimation of members of Parliament, but in the estimation of the country. We all remember that in 1896 prophecies were made with reference to the Government. It was prophesied by men on the other side of the House who thought themselves wise in these matters that the Government would not last a single session. At the end of the first session the time was extended, but we were told: You will see when real serious business of a new session comes on. The instinct of government is with the Conservatives, the Liberals will soon go. But the session of 1896 passed, followed by that of 1897, and that by the session of 1898, and here we are at the beginning of the session of 1899, with the Government not only willing but able to defend themselves and with such a record of administration of our affairs that it has to be conceded that we are in a prosperous condition. Three members of the Government have been singled out, apparently, for special attack. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). Hon. gentlemen on the other side have not been afraid to say, and have said both out of the House and in it, that these men were corrupt, that they wanted to get their arms, as was said to-night, up to the elbows or up to the shoulders into the public chest, that they wanted to do and could only do things that were corrupt, things that would not bear the light of day. But on a previous occasion, when these hon. gentlemen were asked to specify, to put their charge in such a form that it could be considered, they retreated from their position and stated before a committee that they had never made such charges—this was in the Drummond Railway matter—but that the charges were made by irresponsible parties. And yet, notwithstanding this, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) did not hesitate to call it not only the "Drummond deal" but the "Drummond steal." That is the way the Government was treated. Nothing is specified, nothing is put in such a way that the charge can be met or investigated in an open way. We hear nothing but generalities. The other day an illustration was made of the case of the blind King of Bohemia striking right and left against his enemies. The case of the Government reminds me of that of the Jews under King Nehemiah building the walls of Jerusalem, when they built with one hand, while in the other, they held the spear to protect themselves against attack. The Government while they have been administering the affairs of this country in such a way as must be satisfactory to the great majority of the people have had to spend a good deal of their time in defending their administration from attack.

In reference to the Drummond Railway case which I have just mentioned, the charges which were made, so recklessly made, led a newspaper that is independent of politics altogether—I refer to the "Insurance and Finance Chronicle," an independent observer—to express the following opinion:—

Such inquiries tend to degrade us in the estimation of others, and the fear of being vilified and of having unworthy motives imputed as the cause of activity in the performance of public duty is calculated to keep many a man out of the arena of politics.

Now, the Address contains many things that one is tempted to consider, and to make lengthy remarks thereon, but I will endeavour to confine my remarks to as short a time as possible. I thought when we came here, judging the hon. gentlemen opposite by what we hear outside, that even the prosperity we are enjoying in this country would be denied, and that they would say: Oh, this is only newspaper prosperity, we have not got it in the country. We have got as many empty houses, the wages are as poor in the factories, there is as much stagnation in trade as we ever had. Instead of that they come here and acknowledge that the country is prosperous, so that we have no argument to make on that point. We feel, as was said by the Prime Minister in a speech in Toronto, that the prosperity is so evident that statistics are not required to prove it, it is in the air. We all know that the prosperity is upon us, that the exodus has ceased, that people are coming back from Dakota and from Nebraska, to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and they are coming back from Washington and California into British Columbia; while from the eastern states many are coming back to Ontario and to Quebec. These people now find more work at home than they do abroad. It is said that this is not the work of the Government. But surely if the argument was ever good on behalf of the Conservatives when they had good times and attributed them to the Government, it ought to be to the same extent applicable to this Government. I see in a statement that is made by Lord Strathcona to the London "Times," something that is worth while repeating here, because every one will admit his authority on such questions:

Canada seems to have entered upon an era of prosperity. The harvests of the past two years have been generally satisfactory. The other industries, as well as agriculture, have shown considerable expansion, and the export trade, notably in food products of all kinds, is rapidly increasing. The same remark applies to the import trade, especially from the mother country, which cannot fail to be benefited by the preferential tariff. The inauguration of penny postage will certainly also have the happiest results in cementing the bond of union between the different parts of the Empire.

I saw also the other day a report of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, president of the Hastings Loan Savings and Investment Company, where he makes a statement of the great prosperity of this country. My hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), the other night, gave statistics of the failures in business, showing that the present year compares very favourably with preceding years. I also notice that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have issued a report showing that in 1897 there were 2,406 homesteads taken up, while in 1898 there were 4,848, an increase in the year of 2,442. They also say in their report that in 1896 the Canadian Pacific Railway sold 87,878 acres; in 1897, 199,482 acres; in 1898, 348,680 acres. So you see substantial signs of progress which we cannot ignore, and upon which we may congratulate ourselves.

Now, as to the work of the international commission, we must remember that it has only suspended operations. I think we ought to be very grateful that it is a suspension rather than a conclusion without anything having been accomplished. There is no doubt a bad bargain would be a very disastrous thing for us to make. We do not want any bad bargain to be made. But while a treaty is being negotiated, and there is an opportunity of making a bargain that will be satisfactory to us, I am sure that every one ought to be willing to trust to the honesty and to the ability of the commissioners, not only of Canada but of the commissioner who will represent England in the matter; and I think we may feel sure that, shrewd bargain-makers as the Americans are, they are not going to get something for nothing. But if they are willing to treat with us we ought to be willing to treat with them, and try to see if some of the many questions that are outstanding between us cannot be settled satisfactorily to both parties. It takes two to make a bargain. If the negotiations are broken off there is an end to the matter; but whether broken off in a huff or in the most friendly way imaginable, in either case it would be difficult for us to renew negotiations under other commissioners, but while the matter stands open we may hope that great benefit will come out of further negotiations. The leader of the Opposition, in speaking of this matter, said if certain things could be settled then they ought to have been settled, even if no settlement could be arrived at on some other questions. I think we cannot agree with that opinion. If that had been done what would have been the argument used in this House? Precisely the same argument that has been used tonight and on other occasions in reference to taking the duty off corn. They said: You have taken the duty off corn, so that you have nothing to give the Americans for what you are asking. If these other matters were settled, although they may be comparatively trifling, there would be less likelihood of securing a settlement of the more important matters. I, for one, shall continue to hope for some good to come out of the negotiations when they are resumed. Our friends opposite complained, not so much that this commission did not continue to negotiate, because there was nothing to negotiate about, but because they were discredited in the eyes of the American people, and, therefore, were not likely to accomplish anything. Now, if any one thinks that argument can be taken seriously in this House of Commons where we know the men who represented us on that commission, or can be taken seriously by the country, who knows these men just as well as the leader of the Opposition, he is very much mistaken. Passing over some other matters, I come to that paragraph referring to penny postage. That is something that has been accepted by the people of this country as a great boon. The correspondence will increase so that at the end of a year or two the loss will not be great, and every one except the man who is of the smallest calibre in business matters, accepts this penny postage as of great benefit to Canada, and I think too much praise cannot be given to the Government in reference to it. We have heard talk about scandals in the administration of the Yukon, but until the finger is pointed to some particular one who has offended, so that an investigation may be had, fair-minded men will hold their opinion in suspense, and believe in the purity of the administration of affairs in that great and new country, as they do with reference to the affairs of the older portion of Canada.

A redistribution has been promised in the speech. Inside and outside of Parliament, I have heard hon. gentlemen say that it is unconstitutional to do anything of the kind until after another census. Let me refer to what the British North America Act says upon the subject :

Section 40. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts as follows.

Then it gives the electoral districts, and that section is entirely in reference to the representation of each province in this Dominion Parliament. Section 51, has reference to the adjustment of representation in the different provinces. The two sections are entirely different—one having reference merely to the territorial limits of any constituency, and the other having reference to the representation of different provinces based upon the unit of 65 members in the province of Quebec. So there seems to be nothing in the constitutional question, and it only requires to call attention to these two sections in order to have that satisfactorily settled in the minds of any hon. members in this House. But we do not need to rest merely upon the interpretation one may put on these sections, for we have a precedent to go by. In 1881, the census was taken and in 1882, we had a representation Act. In 1891, another census was taken and in 1892, another representation Act was passed, but having passed that Act in accordance with section 51 of the British North America Act, it was not left alone, for in 1893 the Act of 1892 was amended, and in that Act of 1893, this Parliament under the control of the Conservative Government changed the limit of the following constituencies. Nipissing, Ottawa City, Hochelaga, Rouville, Bagot, Richelieu, and St. Hyacinthe. They changed the limits of each one of these by the amending Act of 1893. All that is suggested as I understand in the speech from the Throne is, that that Act of 1892, amended in 1893 by hon. gentlemen opposite shall now be amended again, and surely if this Parliament had power to amend it in 1893, it has power to amend it in 1899. There is therefore nothing in the constitutional question as any lawyer on the opposite side will admit on reference to the statute.

Mr. BRITTON.

The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) spoke of the Washington conference and the statements he made in reference to it need hardly be answered, because there was nothing of serious argument in them, nothing except a mere slur at the commissioners. But the hon. gentleman did attempt a serious argument in reference to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and he said that this Government had given away a large amount to that railway and got in return nothing that they did not have before. In looking at the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Act there are two observations to be made. That Act provides first, that the road is to be built, the tolls on the road are limited, they are to give running powers to other roads over it, we got a reduction on their general rate of freight from Port Arthur West, and we got from them, 50,000 acres of coal land if the company got these lands from the province of British Columbia. All these things were obtained in return for the subsidy that was given by this Parliament. No honest minded man can say that nothing was obtained in return for the privileges given the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Company, although I see in to-day's Toronto "Mail" that there is a strong plea against the Government on account of their action in this matter. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) did not ask for a division of the House, on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Bill, nor did he in any way oppose it when it was passing through. I have not looked to see whether he was in the House the night the Bill passed or not, but I suppose he was within call and knew what was going on and could have voted for or opposed the measure if he choose. Let me call the attention of the House to what the leader of the Opposition, (Sir Charles Tupper) said with reference to the Crow's Nest Pass Bill. At page 4530 of the "Hansard" he is reported as follows :—

I am glad to have an opportunity of saying a few words on this subject, which is one of very great importance, and I am glad to be able to say that I have listened not only with interest but with warm approval to a great deal of what has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) who has just resumed his seat. There is one point on which we all agree, and that is that it is impossible to overrate the enormous mineral wealth that British Columbia possesses ; and we also, I believe, all agree that it is the duty of the Government to take such measures as will open communication between the great North-west and the eastern portion of this Dominion and that great mineral region as promptly as possible.

He goes on to approve of what has been done and at page 4535 of the "Hansard," I quote Sir Charles Tupper again :

It is due to the hon. gentlemen opposite and to the House, without respect of party, that I should frankly state these things as they present themselves to my mind. The committee will naturally infer from what I have said that I am prepared to support this very important proposal that is now submitted. I do not hesitate to say that I am, and I will give the committee briefly my reasons for taking that position. I felt that I was making a wise and judicious arrangement in the interests of Canada when I pledged the support that I did pledge for the purpose of accomplishing that undertaking.

I am reminded now that the Conservative Opposition members were very much afraid that the Government would not either adopt the scheme they did adopt, or some similar one and put that road through. Yet this is one of the Acts of the Liberal Government which hon. gentlemen opposite clamour about in the House and out of it, and called it one of the jobs or the wrongs that this Government has done towards the people of Canada. An hon. gentleman reminds me that after the Bill passed this House, the question of how speedily it could be got through the Senate was a matter of great concern to the Conservative members.

The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), after indulging in some of the abuse which the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) has so strongly condemned to-night, and after using as strong adjectives as could possibly be used in regard to every member of the Ministry and all they did, set himself about suggesting what the Speech from the Throne ought to have been. I could not help wondering, when he was framing a Speech for the Governor General, how he happened to be able to do so. I knew he had never been a Secretary of State or a member of any Government; but then I remembered that this was the gentleman who had issued a Queen's proclamation in his own name in regard to alien fishermen or boatmen. I do not remember which, forbidding them to come over to Canadian waters to do their work. I saw that it was that experience which might fairly entitle the hon. gentleman to make the Speech which he thought should be delivered by His Excellency at the opening of Parliament.

The speech of the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) to-night was an interesting one. We all know that that hon. gentleman is an excellent stump speaker, whose services are greatly sought after when an election contest is on; and it is evident, from the exhibition he has given us to-night, that he is able to do yeoman service. I am sure that this House has seldom the opportunity of listening to so amusing a speech as that which the hon. gentleman made with the assistance of his red book, which he said came from somewhere below. It occurred to me to ask, if this red book came from below, how was it that the hon. gentleman got it?

With regard to the question of the Senate, which is not referred to in the Address, but which has been discussed in this House as if it were, I shall reserve what I have to say in the main, until the resolution comes before the House. But, in reply to those who say that the Senate was a pledge at the time of confederation, I venture to remark that that means nothing more than that it was adopted as a part of the machine for the government of this country. In 1841, in the union of Upper and Lower Canada, a legislative council was established; and that was just as much a pledge to the province of Quebec as the Senate was a pledge at the time of confederation. In 1854 there was discontent and agitation, growing out of which an address from the Assembly was sent to England, and following that an Imperial Act was passed empowering the legislature to make the legislative council elective, and that body was changed. At that time of the union the legislative council began with a membership of not less than twenty, appointed by the Crown. That number was changed to forty-eight, and the legislative council was made elective. As Canada secured that change at that time, so if any change is to be made now in the constitution of the Senate that change must be, I take it, at the instance of all the provinces of the Dominion; and if the people wish it, the people must have it. The majority must rule in this country; and I venture to say that there are many to-day in the red chamber who would not only vote for, but would welcome some change which would bring that branch of the legislature up to what is required by the spirit of the age, and put an end to what is now an anomaly and an anachronism. If the hon. member for Gaspè (Mr. Lemieux) had not in his address the other night given the House what John Bright said in regard to the Senate, I should have done so; and I commend it as the opinion of a far-seeing statesman on this question. I must say that I am not so sure about the suggested remedy. It can only be used when the majority in the Commons is large enough to overcome the majority against the Government in the Senate. In that case, if desirable, it is proposed to turn in the Commons, not for conference, but to vote without debate. The members of both Houses, having committed themselves, many by speeches and all by votes would not be likely to change even if there was a conference; but the scheme suggested is to be only a matter of votes. In such a case, the Senate would be of no use, and if so, it seems to me logic would be against the plan. But if this is the best means of relief from the present anomalous condition of things that can be suggested, one is tempted to accept it. It seems to me that in a matter of that kind we ought to go one step further and say that not only should there be voting in that way so that there would be a majority, but the majority should include the majority of the particular province in question, if the legislation proposed applied specially to any one province. However, that is a matter which requires some further consideration.

Now, the burden of the song of the Opposition is that the members of the Government have not kept their promises—that they have been inconsistent. But if they have adapted themselves to the circumstances of this great Dominion, if they have not in every respect been able to implement all the promises they made, I think the country will excuse them if they have done the best they could with regard to the matters that have come under their hands. In considering this question, there are two things to be taken into account. First, we must consider if we rightly understand the promises that were made. I do not think any one understood that we were to have immediately free trade in this country; I do not think that was expected by the majority of the people. Then, in dealing with the tariff in 1897, we had deputations headed by gentlemen on the opposite side, urging upon the Government what they ought to do. The Government have dealt in such a practical manner with these matters that the country seems to be prosperous under their hands, and I think no one is going to complain or set it down against them that a promise was not fulfilled literally. They have had a difficult task enough to perform in doing the work of this country. They came into it in 1896 with a hostile Senate, and with all the departments filled from cellar to attic with persons opposed to them. They had difficulties in the administration of every department that none except they know of, and having met these and having dealt with such difficult questions as they had to deal with in a country developing as rapidly as ours, they ought to be congratulated on the success which has met their efforts. As was hinted at by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) it has been true in the case of this Government as in other cases, that new occasions bring new duties, and the present Administration have shown themselves able to successfully perform these duties which the new occasions have brought in a way satisfactory to the majority of the people.

Mr. MOORE. Before this important debate closes, I desire to offer a few observations upon some of the subjects which have been laid before hon. members in this House for their consideration in the Speech from the Throne. It is a matter of gratification to those of us upon this side who are not actuated solely by partisan motives—and we know that none of us are—to be able to meet on a common ground hon. gentlemen opposite and unite with them in sentiment. There is one paragraph in the Speech from the Throne upon which I am very glad to find we can all agree, and that is the paragraph pointing out the prosperity of the country now enjoyed. I was a little amused at the remark just made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. He expatiated upon the point that the prosperity of this country would be denied by hon. gentlemen on this side. He was no doubt judging us by the record of his own party when they sat on this side of the House, for when we were in power and this country was prosperous, we had the object lesson of hon. gentlemen opposite who preached up hill and down dale, throughout the length and breadth of the land, that we were in a condition of blue ruin, and hence they expect that because they gave utterance to such an unpatriotic sentiment when in opposition, we were going to follow their example. But I am happy to find that here is an agreement between gentlemen at the right of the Speaker and gentlemen at his left rejoicing over the prosperity of this great country. But what we differ upon is the cause of that prosperity. There is where comes the parting of the ways. Hon. gentlemen on the other side, the Government and their supporters, claim that it is due to their policy and their able management. They claim to have so reformed the administrative affairs of this country that they have induced prosperity and placed us in the enviable position we now occupy. The hon. leader of the Opposition challenged the right hon. First Minister to tell us how in one single particular the Government have contributed to the prosperity of this country, on which we are congratulated by the representative of our noble Queen. That challenge has gone forth throughout the country, and I know of no instance yet where any member of the Government or any of their supporters has pointed out how in one single particular, originated or manufactured by themselves, the Government has contributed to that prosperity. We claim that the Government are assuming an influence to which they have not the least title; and if we were living to-day in ancient times and the same punishments were inflicted to-day as were inflicted then upon those who arrogated to themselves supernatural powers, a similar penalty would be visited upon the members of the Government as was visited upon Nebuchadnezzar, who impiously declared that the great city of Babylon was built by the majesty of his power. The result was that he was turned out to grass. If the same punishment were to-day visited on these gentlemen for a similar offence, they would be sent out to grass. They would certainly not present a very attractive appearance were their hair to turn into eagle's feathers. But though the same punishment be not visited on them, it is none the less evident that they do not properly appreciate the position they occupy. We may claim the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party which was adopted in 1879 and continued in operation until 1896, and which has been continued in operation since, has been the cause of the proud position we occupy and the prosperity on which the representative of our noble Queen congratulates us. But I think it will be admitted that good times and times of depression follow each other alternately, that they come in cycles and are not very many years apart; and when hon. gentlemen opposite point back to 1896 and the few years previous and enlarge on the then depressed condition of the country, we can reply that in those years there existed a depressed condition all the world over, but one which Canada felt less than any other country, thanks to the wise policy that we adopted and continued in force. It was fortunate for hon. gentlemen opposite that they came into power in 1896, for the times then had begun to improve all over the world, and the affairs of this country improved in sympathy and continued to improve, and one of the most important items in that improvement was the abundant harvests we have enjoyed ever since hon. gentlemen opposite gained office. And for that most important item we have to thank Almighty God, who is the greatest factor in the prosperity of this country. I think it was General Ethan Allan in the revolutionary war who took Ticonderoga. He went to the English commander and demanded its surrender. The English General asked by what authority he did so. General Allen replied: "By the authority of God Almighty and the Continental Congress." He ascribed something to the Almighty, but the present Government gives no credit to a higher power but claims all the credit themselves. As to reciprocity, I think that nothing has ever caused a greater feeling of relief in this country than was felt when it was known by the people that the commissioners had come back without succeeding in getting reciprocity with the United States. The most successful thing in this matter has been their want of success in doing what they were trying to do. In my opinion, they were not the right men to send to the United States to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. The sentiments of all these men were previously known to the people of the United States to be in favour of commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, free trade, as it is in England, and other unpatriotic fads, and the American commissioners had the right to believe that these representatives of the Liberal party were in sympathy with the sentiments that had been expressed by them and other members of the party years before, and consequently that, in Canada, they had what is sometimes called "a soft thing." I have here some expressions of the sentiment that actuated American politicians, sentiments that were, no doubt, entertained by the commissioners of the United States. Hon. James G. Blaine, one of the greatest statesmen that ever lived in the United States, was a strong believer in reciprocity, but his policy was not to have reciprocity with any country raising products that came into competition with their own, and, as Canadian products came into competition with American products, he was opposed to any treaty being made with us. He said in 1888:

There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be assured that no scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion, confined to natural products, will be entertained by this Government.

Speaking at Calais, in August, 1888, Mr. Blaine said:

Beyond the frontier, across that river, our neighbours choose another Government, another allegiance. They are subjects of Queen Victoria; they are loyal to Her Majesty. They live under a foreign flag. They do exactly as they have a right to do. I neither dispute their right nor envy their situation. It is their right to choose for themselves, as it is our right to choose for ourselves. But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to give to the Canadian the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes, and the actual cash remuneration of American markets. They cannot have both at the same time. If they come with us, they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens, that millions of men who hold the United States no allegiance, who have no part or lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign to us—it is an absolute wrong for a Democratic Congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have.

Here is a statement made by President Lane of the Boston Merchants' Association:

Our Liberal friends, Fielding and Longley, of Nova Scotia; Davies, of Prince Edward Island; Mercier and Laurier, of Quebec; Cartwright, of Ontario, and a host beside, look to us, the people of the United States, for "the sign by which they shall conquer." Can we deny them?

The whole region of Canada will, when this commercial union is established, become as if she were so many vast territories added to our domain, and up and down a continent the world will see the result of an unrestricted trade in all that continent produces, natural or manufactured:

There was an answer given to that by an hon. gentleman who is a member of the present Government, but who, I am sorry to say, is no in his seat at the present time who said:

Briefly, Sir, if this project can be carried out, it will mean for you the addition of half a continent for commercial purposes and the creation of a complete new tier of northern states, with an enormous area of unoccupied fertile land, with very great mineral resources, with a present population of some 5,000,000, but with a capacity of maintaining fully 50,000,000, and the certainty (in such a contingency) of a very rapid increase, which population—and I hold this in no small matter—is essentially in character the same as your own, with much the same habits, customs, and prejudices even.

Mr. Blaine again said:

If Canadians want to get the advantage of the American markets, it must be by becoming American citizens.

General Benjamin Butler said:

Canada is blubbering for a reciprocity treaty. Let her blubber until she is willing to join the union.

Senator Carlyle gave his reasons for favouring unrestricted reciprocity, as follows:—

I am in favour of commercial union, because it will bring Canada under our flag.

Senator Depew, a very important man now, said :

I am in favour of it because it will advance the stars and stripes from Niagara Falls to the North Pole.

Mr. Bullock, the President of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, said :

The ready road to reciprocity with our neighbours—to accept Sir Richard Cartwright as senator from the state of Ontario.

The Premier of this country stated on several occasions that he hoped to be able, and it would be his greatest effort to conciliate the people of the United States, if he became Premier of Canada.

Now, when this commission from Canada went to the United States, had not the public men of that country a right to expect that all the concessions that were anticipated by the commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity arrangement would be accorded to the people of the United States? That, perhaps, is the reason of the failure. Would the commission from Canada dare to make a reciprocity of that nature with the United States? That is, perhaps, the reason why they did not succeed, and, rather than break off the negotiations, they suspended them and adjourned their meeting until next August, in order that they might not be called upon to explain to this House what they had offered to the American commissioners, and in that way have their conduct discussed and understood by the members of this House. I suppose that that is according to parliamentary usage, yet I think it a very important matter to the people, that they should know before the close of this session just the propositions made by the commissioners on either side. There are a few articles of reciprocal trade in which would be a benefit to Canada. So far as the dairy is concerned, it would be no advantage whatever to have freedom in their markets and they in ours for this important industry, because they raise a surplus, and so do we. We meet in England in the common market and are competitors there. Reciprocity would do us no good in most things, but in some things it would be beneficial to the farmers of this country. If we had free access to their markets with our barley, peas, oats, potatoes and hay, it might be an advantage. But what position do we occupy to-day to go to the people of the United States and ask for the entrance of these articles into their markets free? We say to them: We put corn on the free list; and they say: Yes, but you did it in your own interests, you asked for nothing in return for it; and if we make this concession you must be prepared to make other concessions to us besides that. Why, Sir, they threw away the trump card of Canada in taking the duty off corn, and thus rendered a fair exchange of farm products impossible. I have been informed that the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

after he had been to Washington, made the statement, that the Government made a great mistake when they took the duty off corn. We on this side thought that they had made a mistake in giving to the people of the United States a favour, the greatest they wanted in any of their products of the soil without demanding and receiving anything in return. Corn is one of the greatest productions of the American soil, a great surplus of it is raised, and they are seeking for markets for that corn all over the world. Canada was the nearest market and the best market; and it was a surprise to the Yankees, I am sure, when they found by the Canadian tariff that we had freely taken the duties off corn without asking from them any compensation whatever. Now, Sir, I have always felt for years that it was time for us to cease truckling to the people of the United States. We have a country as great as theirs, we have a country with more glorious prospects for the future than they have. We have a more fertile soil, we have greater wealth in our soil. We have but 5 million of a population while they have 72 millions, and they are now turning immigration back from that country because they cannot get just the population they want. The best part of their country is taken up, and the result is that the off scourings of Europe, and the roughs are rejected by the United States, are shipped over into Canada, and that is the kind of population that is increasing in this country which is so gratifying to hon. gentlemen opposite. We have greater wealth in our forests, we have greater wealth in our fisheries, we have greater wealth in our soil; and we have a population of 5 millions that cannot be matched by any 5 millions in any other country. I ask, then, what is the matter that Canada cannot stand upon her own feet and live, as she can live, without depending upon the United States, or giving them to understand that they are absolutely necessary to our existence? We wish to live on amicable terms with the United States, but we wish to be commercially independent, and we can be so if we are only true to our interests, and like true Canadians will stand up for our rights, and give nothing away except we get a proper return for the same.

I have a few words to say regarding the ante-election promises of the present Government. It has been stated by some of their supporters that they have carried out all their promises to the people of this country. They said in 1896 and 1897: Give us time, and we will redeem every pledge that we have made. They have had three years of power and, Sir, their whole pathway is strewn with violated pledges and broken promises. They promised to give us an honest administration that would reduce the expenditure of this country, and would reduce the public debt. When election speeches were made throughout the country in 1896 and previous to that time, accusing the Conservatives of being corrupt, dishonest and extravagant, I trembled, for I thought when they came into power they might disclose great irregularities and extravagancies that would, as they said, keep us out of power for 20 long years. But, Sir, tell me a single instance of unearthing one corrupt act of the Conservative party while they were in power. They have no doubt tried to do it. They have no doubt tried to discover something in the administration of the Conservative Government that would give our party a black eye, and injure its reputation in the eyes of the people. But one of the prominent Grits in the city of Montreal, a journalist, when he was asked if that had been done, said: No, it has not been done. We expected that it would be done, but we find that it cannot be done, and we regret the accusations that we brought against the Liberal-Conservative party. They have increased the public expenditure, and no one can deny it. The people throughout this country are beginning to understand what kind of economy it is that this Government practices in comparison with that of the late Conservative Government. They told us that they would reduce the public debt; instead of that we hear to-day that it has been increased between 9 and 10 million dollars. Is that carrying out the promise that the public debt should be reduced? Is increasing expenditures two or three millions a year carrying out the promise made to the people that they should have an honest administration and run the Government for 2 or 3 million dollars a year less than it was costing under the Liberal-Conservatives? Then we have the trade policy. They told us that they would eliminate every vestige of protection from the tariff. Have they done that? Is there a man on the other side of the House that can stand up and say that they have carried out that promise in good faith? They have not eliminated the principle of protection from the tariff, but they have stolen, as we have heard to-day, the Conservatives' clothes, and we say that they look better clad than they ever did before. But, Sir, I think that the robes are a little too flowing, and a little too large for them yet. They will have a long time to grow before they fill them.

Mr. COCHRANE. They do not cover their political nakedness.

Mr. MOORE. They promised that the people's money should be properly guarded, and should not be paid out without a vote of the representatives of this country. How many instances have we where Governor General's warrants have been obtained, and the people's money paid out contrary to that promise? Did they not promise, too, that contracts should be let after duly advertising for competition, and after public tenders? Did they not condemn the Liberal-Conservative party for years for what they characterized as a most extravagant, corrupt, and unbusinesslike transaction? I think, if my memory serves me, that some seven or eight days before the meeting of this Parliament in 1897, in secret session, the Government sat down and made a contract with Mann & Mackenzie that involved millions and millions of dollars in value of the lands of this country. And to-day they are condemning the Senate because they obstructed that transaction. They said themselves it was a huge gamble, that this property was worth nothing, that the work would cost nothing to the eastern provinces. But I am told that an Order in Council has been passed not very long ago that this land, which was said to be worthless, shall not be sold for less than $10 an acre, reserving all mineral rights. That would amount to $37,500,000 which the Senate, that they are trying to dispose of, has saved to the people of this country. Sir, that one act alone of the Senate should make every conscientious, scrupulous, honest man in this country, every patriotic citizen stand by the Senate, and I believe they will do so. These gentlemen opposite promised that they would reduce the taxation of the people of this country, but they have increased it to the tune of two or three millions of dollars a year, and they have not to my knowledge destroyed any combines or monopolies. There is one article largely consumed in this country on which the action of the Government has been rather peculiar. I refer to coal oil. I have been pleading with the Government to give to the poor people of this country an opportunity of getting their coal oil at a reasonably low price, but my appeals have been unsuccessful. Coal oil has decreased very much in price during the last few years, and 5 cents a gallon to-day represents a much greater ad valorem duty than it did a few years ago. Does the Government, and do their followers know how much coal oil costs at the place of production. If they do not, I shall give them a little information upon that score, and we shall then see something of the operation of this tariff, that a free trade Government is forcing upon the people, and we shall also see something of the enormous sums of money that they are taking out of the pockets of the farmers and labouring people who purchase this household necessity. I have in my hand an invoice of the 30th September, 1898, for three cars of the best water white Pennsylvania oil, f.o.b. on cars in Warren, Penn., at a cost of 4½ cents per gallon, which means 5 1-10ths cent per gallon Imperial measure. I have here an invoice on Car No. 3,121 for 6,571 gallons costing at Toledo, Ohio, $295.70. That was delivered in Montreal free of freight, and the freight on these important lines of railway that are contributing very much to the success of these combines and monopolies cost $144.99, so that the 6,571 gallons of oil netted the producers $100.71 or 1 53-100 cents per gallon. Now, the Ohio oil is a better oil than is refined in any place in Canada. Pennsylvania oil stands first, Ohio oil second, and the Crown Acme Oil of Canada third. Ohio oil is sold in Ohio netting the producer 153-100 cents per gallon. Upon that oil this free trade Government, this Government which was to protect the rights and liberties of the people and shield them from the burdens of taxation, is charging 5 cents a gallon on an article that costs where it is produced 154-100 cents per gallon Imperial measure. I have laid before some of the members of this Government a scheme which should be carried out in Canada, a scheme which is carried out in the United States and by which the cost of oil to the consumer would be greatly lessened. I have asked them to permit the deposit of oil coming in tank cars, in tanks, to be there inspected and to be distributed in tank wagons to the consumer. If that scheme were adopted it would avoid the necessity of the consumer having to pay for the barrel, which amount to 2½ cents a gallon on the oil. That would not be done by the Government, because they said it would throw the business into the hands of this Oil Trust and the people of Canada would then be at the mercy of the combine. No doubt there is a great oil trust existing, but to meet that I proposed to the Government that they should allow oil from the Canadian refiners to be distributed in tanks, and compel oil coming from the United States to be barrelled. That would give the Canadian consumers 2½ cents more and would give that much preference to the people of this country, but the Government have refused to do it.

Let me call the attention of the Government to another important matter. This Government took credit to itself in 1897 for being opposed to monopolies and combines, and in Article 18 of the statute of that year, they took power to themselves that whenever a combine existed which enhanced the price of goods to the Canadian consumers, they could reduce the duty or take it off altogether. What has become of that Government that took authority to exercise such power; have they ever put it into operation? Do they know that this great oil trust has absorbed all the oil industries of Canada, that it has enhanced the price of oil, and that the people of the country are at its mercy. If they have any doubt about it I shall establish it to them by satisfactory evidence. Here is an affidavit which I ask the Government to consider:

CANADA,

Province of Quebec,
District of Montreal.

I, Andrew Downie Gall, of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, oil merchant, do solemnly declare that I am extensively engaged in the wholesale trade of coal oil, burning oil and other oils in the Dominion of Canada.

That all the petroleum oil refineries in Canada at the present time are under the control of the Standard Oil Company, or Standard Oil Trust, through the said company having acquired some outright and a controlling interest in others.

That since acquiring the said refineries in Canada, the said Standard Oil Company, which is operating in Canada under the style of the Imperial Oil Company, Limited, has closed up some refineries, demolished others, and is operating only such as it sees fit.

That no petroleum oil from Canadian refineries can be obtained to-day unless it is procured from or through the Standard Oil Company or the Imperial Oil Company, Limited, directly or indirectly.

That it is quite apparent, and investigation will establish beyond doubt, that the said Standard Oil Company, or the Imperial Oil Company, Limited, has so acquired and controls said refineries for the purpose of forming, and they have thereby formed a trust or combination to unduly enhance the price of such oil, and to unduly promote the advantage of the said company at the expense of the consumers.

That the firm of which I am a member and other firms engaged in the oil business are compelled to buy in the United States and import therefrom our supplies of oil to supply our customers and the trade.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

(Sgd.) A. D. GALL.

Declared before me at the said city of Montreal, this twenty-first day of March, A.D. 1899.

R. H. DUNTON,
Notary Public.

I now ask the members of the Government if they are satisfied that there is an oil trust, and if they are, why do they not put into force this article which I will read for their benefit as it is possible they may have forgotten it.

Mr. T. G. JOHNSTONE (West Lambton).
The hon. gentleman (Mr. Moore) is speaking now entirely of the manufacturer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MOORE. I expected somebody would begin to flutter. Here is the provision:

Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among manufacturers of such article or dealers therein, to unduly enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any Superior Court in any province of Canada, to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists.

The judge may compel the attendance of witnesses and examine them under oath, and require the production of books and papers, and shall have such other necessary powers as are conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purpose of such inquiry.

If the judge reports that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article, when imported, then the Governor in Council shall place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

I know that the Government must have overlooked that; they could not have seen it; but I am very happy to call their attention to it, because they are a Government who fulfil their promises, of course, and we expect that they will fulfil this promise to the very letter. I am very glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce is present; I know he is an honest and an honourable man, and will take cognizance of this article, which has perhaps escaped his eye until the present time, and it will not be very long before the people will be relieved of this great burden, and there will not be such a large gap between the price of coal oil in the United States and its price in Canada. It is now sold at retail for 8 cents a gallon in the United States and for 25 cents in Canada, the difference conduces to smuggling, and I do not so much blame the people along the border when they know that it is due to the crass neglect of the Government that that great gap exists, and that it could be removed by a stroke of the pen.

When I commenced to speak, I had in my mind a very important subject on which I desired to say a few words, and that was preferential trade. I think that the people of this country generally, and I am quite certain that the members of the Government, their colleagues and supporters, do not appreciate and perhaps do not understand the benefit preferential trade would be to the people of this country. I know that our respected leader, a man than whom no one stands higher on this continent as a parliamentarian, a man who could stand on any platform beside such men as Lord Salisbury and the late Wm. Gladstone, and lose nothing by the comparison, in his prescience and foresight saw that the time must come when this country must have preferential trade. He did what he could to call public attention to the subject in Great Britain. He converted the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the Duke of Devonshire and other men there to the idea that it would be desirable to have this carried out by some means or other. The question was mooted and discussed in 1894, in this city at the intercolonial conference; measures were taken to bring it before the English Parliament, and it was discussed before the people of this country. The hon. Premier of this country spoke in different places on the question, and said he was as much in favour of preferential trade as the hon. leader of the Opposition. We then thought it was within sight. We thought that with the leaders of both parties converted to the idea, the time was not far distant when this great boon would be conferred upon the country. What was the surprise of the people of Canada when, instead of preferential trade, the Government adopted a preferential tariff, which put it entirely out of sight. What was our surprise when the representative of Canada, in the person of our courteous and graceful Premier, attending the Queen's Jubilee, in the first reception given to him, said that he did not want preferential trade, that he did not want to see England adopt a protective policy, because it would be a curse to England as it had been to Canada. The Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, after listening to what he said, though he had been in favour of preferential trade, yet, with the Premier of Canada taking that attitude on the question, said he would no longer touch it with a pair of tongs. That is the present position of the question. We have a preferential tariff, under which the duties have been cut down to that point where there is very little protection. The result is that importers are buying more freely from England, and bringing in commodities to compete with the products of Canadian factories. In one factory I know the production is reduced $25,000 a month. I need not tell the members of this House what preferential trade would have done for Canada. The mother country, with a population of 40,000,000, is able to raise only enough food to feed 17,000,000 leaving 23,000,000 people to depend entirely on outside countries for their food. What would it mean for Canada had we a preference in supplying food to the people of that country? But at present we have to send our products there in competition with those of the United States and with every other country in the world, many of them with high tariffs on everything that comes from Great Britain, while Great Britain allows them free access to her markets. We have a great country, composed of 300,000,000 acres of valuable arable lands not yet scratched by the plough. If we had a preference in the markets of England over foreign countries, we could then induce immigrants to come to us from that country, tenant farmers, who, rather than pay three or four dollars per acre per year for the lease of their lands, would come here and buy our arable lands for a mere song, and settle the country, increase its population and material wealth, thus furnishing markets for our manufacturers, and help to make the country what every patriotic Canadian desires that it should be made. But the reduction of 25 per cent in the tariff prevents Canada reducing the tariff any further as a concession to Great Britain, in return for preferential trade. That has to be undone. It cannot be undone under this Administration. The country must change the Administration and take men into its counsels who are in favour of preferential trade and a business arrangement between England and Canada. When that time comes, we shall be able to point out that the party to which we belong, which has always been a progressive and patriotic party, has done the greatest good which it was possible to do to the people of this country.

I shall not take up the time of the House at any length with regard to the Senate. I shall only ask this question, which I would like to have go out to this country, and which I am sure will go out to this country. Is there any sane man in the Dominion Parliament who can believe for a moment that if the Senate were in the hands of the Liberal party, that paragraph would appear in the Speech from the Throne relating to the Senate? Would the Government oppose the Senate if the Senate were composed of a majority belonging to the Liberal party? If not, then this is a partisan political move merely for the sake of overcoming the Opposition which the Government find in the Senate because of its Conservative majority. As soon as that majority becomes Liberal, you will never find one supporter of the Government desiring to reform it or touch it in any respect. We had that experience in the province of Quebec, during the time of Mr. Mercier. The Liberal party had been crying out for the abolition of the Legislative Council, but when they got into power, fortunately for them many of the Conservatives in the council were replaced by Liberals; and as soon as the Liberals got the majority, they had not a word to say about the abolition of that council and forget completely their cry for its abolition.

It would perhaps not be becoming for me, in view of the active part I have taken in the prohibition movement, to take my seat without first referring to that important subject alluded to in the Speech from the Throne. I have not got a copy of that speech here, but I think the great consolation it gives to the prohibitionists of this country, to the churches of this country, to the Women Temperance Unions and other auxiliary associations interested in this great moral movement is, instead of the prohibition we expected, that the Government are going to have the official figures of the plebiscite laid before us. That is the great consolation which is expected to pacify a great body of men and women who have been struggling so hard to rid this country of this great evil. Why, some of them are beginning to think that possibly they are in the position of having asked for bread and been given a stone. I will now take the time of this House to give a short history of this plebiscite business. I can remember, and every hon. gentleman of this House can remember very well, that during the administration of the late Government they were accused of having made promises that they did not intend to fulfil, and that the temperance people of this country had to look to the Liberal party for the great moral reform they desired, and that when that party got into power they certainly would give the people what the prohibitionists and the temperance advocates asked for. And I am sure that these gentlemen who spoke in this way were, in many instances, taken at their word, and I am sure as I can be of anything that if we were to eliminate the vote of the temperance people who voted for the Liberal party on that question from the votes cast for these hon. gentlemen, who are to-day drawing their fat salaries, they would be on this side and we on the other. What were we led to believe? We asked for prohibition, we did not ask for a plebiscite, but the Government said they would not give us prohibition but would give us a plebiscite, and every conscientious earnest man in this country, reading all that was printed on the subject and listening to all that was said by the Liberal party on the subject, could come to no other conclusion than that if a plebiscite were presented to the people and resulted in a majority of votes being cast for prohibition, prohibition was certain to come. Let me take the liberty to refer to the speech that was made by the Minister of Agriculture here in the city of Ottawa in 1893. He made there a very good temperance speech, in which he said that he believed the country was ripe for prohibition, that the Government had dallied too long on the question, and were not honest and did not intend to give prohibition, but that the Liberal party, just as soon as they thought the country was ripe for prohibition, would, if they got power, pass a prohibitory law, and he said that he believed the country was then ripe for prohibition and should get that law. He said:

I am glad, therefore, that the great party to which I belong, with which I have worked, is prepared to take a stand upon the temperance question, and to declare in its platform in favour of a step in the right direction upon this subject. I understand that this is the first time a great political party in this country has ever faced this question in a fair and true spirit. I am not aware that any political party in this country has ever declared itself squarely upon this question. I was aware that the House of Commons itself passed a resolution to the effect that when the country was ripe Parliament should enact a prohibition law. It was some time since that was passed. The Tory party has been long in power, but has not taken any steps to obtain the vote of the country upon this question. It is true, as you know, that Finance Minister Foster—and when I speak his name I have to look back to the first years when he and I were in Parliament, when he was looked upon as a temperance champion, I regret to say that that hon. gentleman on the floor of Parliament has told the country that he, one of the leaders of the Tory party, only advocated temperance “in a moment of weakness,” and that when he came to his sober senses—if we may call them sober senses—he went back on that record. The Tory party has not done justice in favour of temperance; it has only appointed a Royal Commission to go about the country and find out something; but, as Mr. Laurier said, we have all the information necessary of the kind that a Royal Commission can collect. They have put off the question; they have shunted it, and have not taken steps to find out the attitude of the country upon this question.

I am glad to be here to ask this Liberal convention to take a step which will bring about an opportunity for the people to express themselves upon this question. We know that in three of the provinces the Liberal Governments of those provinces have brought about local or provincial plebiscites, thus giving the temperance people the opportunity to show what they believe to be the truth, that the temperance sentiment of this country is strong enough to enforce a prohibition law if it is given us. I propose to read the resolution which will bring about this result, and which pledges the Liberal party, if returned to power, to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views upon this question, and the Government in power must necessarily carry out the expressed will of the people. There is no doubt that this is what the Liberal party would do, for we know their pledges can be trusted.

There have been some doubts expressed in regard to the statement made by the hon. leader of the Government, but I think the remarks I have quoted are about as clear and concise and plain as any language can be, and I notice that there is a question put upon the order paper asking the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) how he can consistently remain a member of the present Government after the hon. First Minister has declared that he cannot give us prohibition. I have here an extract which I will crave the indulgence of the members of the House to read. It was written to the Montreal "Witness":

Sir,—On June 2, 1893, the Liberal party in their Ottawa convention adopted this resolution and embodied it in their political platform:

"That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite."

On September 6, 1894, the Hon. Mr. Laurier is reported to have said (and it has not been contradicted), in reply to a deputation of Winnipeg prohibitionists:

"He would pledge his honour as a man that as soon as the Liberals came into power at Ottawa they would take a plebiscite all over the Dominion. By that declaration the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party."

On June 9, 1896, in reply to a deputation at Stratford, Ont., the Hon. Mr. Laurier said:

"Up to this moment that question (prohibition) has never been approached by the electors free from other considerations. Whenever it has been submitted to the electors it has always been submitted along with other questions that affect the public mind. We deem it wiser to separate it from all other considerations, and test public feeling in the matter, and that we shall do when we come into office, as I believe we shall."

On September 3, 1896, the Premier, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, said in reply to the prohibition delegation at Ottawa:

"The plebiscite is part of the Liberal programme adopted at the convention of 1893. Our policy has been before the people, who have pronounced upon it. It now becomes our duty to carry out our programme, and I say frankly it is our intention to do so. As to the time when it should be done, my answer is this: It is the intention of the Liberal party to carry out to the letter every article of its programme within the very shortest possible limit. There is no intention to delay. On the contrary, speaking even politically, it is perhaps the best policy of all to deal with the question within the shortest time. It is not our intention this session, but I have every hope that next session, and not later, we shall introduce the legislation we have promised."

In the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the present session of Parliament the following clause occurs:—

"It is desirable that the mind of the people of Canada should be clearly ascertained on the subject of prohibition, and a measure enabling electors to vote upon the question will be submitted for your approval."

An anxious and impatient public awaits the fulfilment of all these promises. Will the Liberal party be true to its pledges?

That is written by a very strong supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have another article from which I would like to read. I may explain, that the hon. the Premier made a speech in Carleton Place. A reverend gentleman, from Montreal, stepped on the platform at the conclusion of his speech and desired permission to ask the Premier a question. The chairman said that he did not wish to have interruptions. But the Premier said: Let us hear the gentleman's question, and I will be most happy to answer it. This is the reverend gentleman's account of it:

Some of the local Reform journals are saying that Sir Wilfrid Laurier will not consider the majority sufficiently large to justify him in enacting a prohibitory law. He governs the Dominion with a majority far smaller than that which the prohibitionists have won in the recent election. He will not forget that to refuse a prohibitory law will be to flaunt defiance in the face of seven provinces out of eight. He will not forget that such a course will be in direct violation of the most solemn and definite pledges which he has personally given to the temperance people. Some persons say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier never gave any definite pledge on the subject. I will quote here for the benefit of your readers the exact words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a promise as definite as words can make it. It was given in the town hall in Carleton Place, Ont., in reply to a question which I put to the hon. gentleman at the close of his address:—These are his words verbatim: "The Liberal party has pledged in convention at Ottawa that whenever they were in power they would take a plebiscite on the question, as to whether the people want a prohibitory law or not. The answer is not in my hands, it is in the hands of the people, and according to their answer such legislation they will have at the hands of the Government."

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Who signs that?

Mr. MOORE. Reverend George G. Huxtable, a very strong party man, who has always, I believe, supported the Liberal party. But, if I know anything of the temperance of that man, unless prohibition is carried out to the satisfaction of the temperance people, Mr. Huxtable has given his last vote for the Liberal party, and the same may be said for Mr. Spence, Mr. Carson, and hundreds of others.

I have here something further for your consideration, some extracts from letters written by agents sent out by the Quebec executive. You are aware that a delegation waited upon the Premier to press his Government to give an answer as to what they would do in view of the results of the plebiscite. The Premier accused the temperance people of not doing anything. He said that, to his knowledge, only two meetings had been held in the province of Quebec, one in Montreal, and the other in St. Hyacinthe. However, agents were sent out by the association to work amongst the French people of the province of Quebec, and here are some of the letters which were sent in, but the names of the writers are not given :

Sept. 14.—Several M.P.'s, among others Messrs. —, — and —, have received instructions from the Premier and from Mr. Tarte to advise the voters to vote against prohibition, but they have resolved to keep quiet, and the clergy do the same.

Sept. 15.—We had a splendid meeting at — ; over 500 people were present ; it was the best meeting held.

Sept. 27.—I spoke after mass yesterday, and obtained a good hearing. — and —, leading politicians, told me they had received strict orders from Sir Wilfrid Laurier to work tooth and nail against prohibition. Now, you can draw your own conclusions. I was at — last night, and held a meeting at the village hall, with an attendance of about 150.

From the second representative who was sent out, came this letter :

Sept. 10.—Now, in — and — there are but few for prohibition. The most part of these farmers won't listen to anything. They have a fear of the direct tax.

Sept. 17.—I went this afternoon to —. The parish priest there would be very glad if such a law would pass. He is in favour of it, still he cannot pronounce himself on the subject, not being authorized by his bishop. He is under the impression the most part will be for prohibition.

Sept. 24.—On Tuesday I went to — and — ; was well received by the parish priest of both places. The Rev. Mr. — told me : " Tell Mr. Bond, on my part, Mr. Laurier and his Government are fooling them. * * * They won't obtain anything whatever." He allowed me to distribute my circulars, as he considered they would do a great deal of good.

Now, these are letters which came from the agents working for the prohibition party to the officials of the alliance, with Mr. E. L. Bond, as chairman of the executive committee, and Mr. Carson, as Secretary. Now, if there are any who doubt the validity of these letters, this is what the gentlemen say who wrote them :

They will be prepared to substantiate them in the event of an inquiry being made, and the points are deemed of sufficient importance.

That comes from an organized and important body of men, the Dominion Alliance, through their chairman and secretary. Now, if that does not fix the responsibility upon the Premier and his associates, that they are bound by all that is honest, and right, and square, to the people of this country, to give prohibition, then I cannot read the English language correctly. I have here some evidence of the work that was done in some portions of the country, besides the meeting in Montreal and the meeting in St. Hyacinthe, which I will read to you :

The following is a detail of the meetings held and the literature distributed in Montreal and elsewhere in the province, apart from the two representatives hereinbefore referred to :—Montreal, 63 meetings, 199,000 leaflets ; Compton, 120 meetings, 73,000 leaflets ; Megantic, 33 meetings, 14,000 leaflets ; Missisquoi, 30 meetings, 20,000 leaflets ; Wright, 15 meetings, 30,000 leaflets ; Argenteuil, 34 meetings, 55,000 leaflets ; Labelle, 39 meetings, 12,000 leaflets ; Stanstead, 80 meetings ; Quebec, 9 meetings, 10,000 leaflets ; Huntingdon, 35 meetings, 20,000 leaflets ; Richmond, 41 meetings, 21,000 leaflets ; Pontiac, 100 meetings ; Brome, 69 meetings ; Shefford, 25 meetings.

Now, let me ask the House : After these leaflets had been got up and distributed, after these numerous meetings had been held, at such an expense of time and money, and the honest prohibitionists of this country were under the belief that their wishes would be complied with, and the promises of the Government would be carried out, if there was a majority of voters who went to the polls, what kind of a position are these men placed in, who are now told that they are not going to have prohibition after all ? I tell you that it is most scandalous, most—damnable. I hear an hon. member say, though I suppose that is not parliamentary, but it comes awfully near the mark—and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that such a course on the part of the Government is not to be submitted to, and the prohibitionists will not lie down under their defeat. I have also in my possession the pronouncements of many church associations, in their official character, in favour of prohibition, and in demanding from the Government that they carry out their promises. If the Government think that the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the philanthropic societies of this country, the ministers and the churches are going to submit tamely to this treatment, they will find they make a great mistake. I think the Premier of Canada has missed one of the grandest opportunities of his life, an opportunity that he had to engrave his name in letters of gold on the hearts of the people of this country, by fulfilling the promises which he had made, and giving the people what he had led them to expect that they would get.

We mark the man who has climbed fame's envied hill,
And proudly stand upon its lofty height.
The admired of all observing eyes,
Until some other comes before the light.

But the man who climbs beyond the hill of fame
To that great mount, a nation's fervent love,
Will never be forgotten, and his name
Will stand engraved all other names above.

He has climbed the hill of fame, and he could have gone a step higher by fulfilling his pledges which would have placed him on the mount of a nation's fervent love, where he could stand upon its lofty height, the pride and the glory of the Canadian people.

Sir, the Premier of Canada had an opportunity which he has missed. He has climbed the hill of fame, and he might have gone a step higher and climbed the mount of a nation's fervent love by carrying out in good faith his promises to the prohibitionists, and his name would have gone down to posterity honoured, instead of disgraced.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificate of the return of Louis Julien Demers, Esquire, for the electoral district of Lévis.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell, of East Prince, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, although, Sir, apparently carrying out the ministerial rule, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not in his place, I am inclined to yield to his appeal to be one of those to shorten this debate as much as possible, because I think it desirable that as far as is consistent with the public interest, we should proceed quickly with the business of the House; and also because I like the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) although ever since 1887, when I had the temerity to cross swords with him in this Chamber, he has looked on me with hating eyes of scorn; a thing that I attribute to a misconception on his part because I have always thought that the reason the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) looked upon me with such an evil eye, was, that he supposed me to be a manufacturer—one of the robbers great and robbers small, who used to excite his ire, and who were so long ensconced in the branches of the Upas tree which was to be torn up, and whence they shot so severely at the people of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, there are reasons why it is impossible that any man true to his duty to the people of Canada; above all, any man true to his duty to the North-west Territories, should allow the debate on the Address on this occasion to go by without close and careful and stringent comment.

Let me call the attention of the House to His Excellency's Speech. It commences with an illusion to the fact that the country is prosperous. As has been well said, we all thank God for that. There is no doubt that heaven, and earth too, have had something to do with it. Then we are treated to a reference to the negotiations of the international commission which took place during the recess, and that is really the commencement of this Barmecidal bill of fare. We are treated in this banquet to which we are invited, in the first place to the cold soup of a consummate failure, and then we get for entrées, first the plebiscite—an outrage: an outrage from every point of view you regard it. I shall not go elaborately into that, but from whatever point of view you regard the plebiscite having regard to the lately exposed policy of the Government, it is an outrage. One of the first and most prominent achievements of this Government was to inaugurate unconstitutional methods. You, Mr. Speaker, as a student of the British constitution know well that a plebiscite is contrary to that constitution of which we have a replica in Canada, and yet the first thing that was done by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), himself a student or a supposed student of our constitution, was to inaugurate the plebiscite. Well, what has happened? A quarter of a million dollars, which might have been spent most fruitfully in the North-west Territories for instance, in seeking for water in those parts of that fertile country where water has not been found, was spent—for what purpose? For the purpose of not having it forced on the Prime Minister of Canada to say a plain yes or no as to what was the policy of the Government on so important a question as prohibition. That is the first course.

Then we have the penny postage. I see the Hon. William—oh, I beg pardon. So historical has "I. William Mulock," become that I had nearly committed a breach of parliamentary etiquette and referred to him, not as my hon. friend from York, but in his character as the great stamp dictator—who will go down to history as that Postmaster General who was perpetually issuing stamps which he had perpetually to recall. That is the second course. Then we come to the pièce de résistance, which is the reference to the fact that there is gold in the Yukon; and because there is much gold in the Yukon, the inference is irresistible that my right hon. friend who leads the House is a great statesman, and that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is a heaven-born administrator; and the menu which commences with the cold soup of failure ends with the menace of an outrage. It ends with the menace that my right hon. friend intends to bring in at an unconstitutional period a redistribution Bill, for which he has no authority under the British North America Act.

That is the Queen's Speech. We will take the first course; is there anything for the farmer in the cold soup of a protracted failure? Is there anything for him in the entrees? Is there anything at all in this Barmecidal menu that can satisfy the farmer who is accustomed to nourishing, invigorating food? No: he has to fill himself with the east wind of a Queen's Speech such as has never been presented to Parliament before. Well, this is the fourth session of this Parliament. I may tell the head of the Government that a short time ago I travelled west with a leading supporter of his, a man well known in Ontario, a leading man in Waterloo, a man who has spent his money and his time, who has travelled here and there and fought on platform after platform—for what? For Liberalism, as he told me in tones of indignation—for the Liberalism of George Brown, for tariff reform, for free trade, for a revenue tariff. He had fought for all these; and I said to him, "What do you do now?" He said, "I sit and howl." "Well," I said, "what are you going to do?" He said, "I am waiting for the coming session, and many a Liberal in Ontario is doing the same, and if in the coming session they do not redeem their promises, and do not show themselves true to Liberalism, then I will take the stump, and as I fought for them in the past, I will fight against them in the future."

Now, Sir, I will ask the attention of the House for a few moments to the constitutional aspect of the situation which we have now before us; for, Mr. Speaker, it is a most extraordinary situation. We have seen here since the House met the extraordinary spectacle of two or three Ministers of the Crown and their supporters rising and praising the policy of the Opposition. One man after another comes forward, and takes credit for some plank, some time-honoured plank in the platform of the Conservative party. This was especially the case with the speech of the Prime Minister and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is a spectacle which has rarely been manifested in this House, and it is a spectacle to which I want to call the attention of Parliament from a constitutional point of view. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is our constitution? We have in England a king or a queen: we have the House of Lords, and we have the House of Commons. We have in Canada the Governor General representing Her Majesty; we have a second chamber, the Senate; and we have the House of Commons. The House of Commons is the great power, because it controls the purse. And we have, as we say here, self-government. Now, suppose you were to take our constitution and transfer it to Cuba, would it work? Would it work in the Philippine Islands among the Filipinos? Everybody knows it would not work there—and why? For this reason, that the people of Cuba and the Filipinos, in their present state of development, are utterly unfit for this constitutional government which we enjoy in England and in all the self-governing colonies of the Empire. When you cast your eye over Europe, you find in Russia a strong government, but no individual liberty. In Germany you have a strong government and constitutional government, but individual liberty is greatly circumscribed. In France you have neither a strong government nor individual liberty. As for Italy or Spain, I will not refer to them. Only in England and in our self-governing colonies has this great problem been solved of uniting a strong executive with almost boundless individual liberty. Why is that? It is not because of our system of king, lords and commons, or of Governor General, a Senate and a House of Commons, with an extended franchise; but it is because the men in these countries—in England, in Canada and the other self-governing colonies of the Empire—are trained in self-government. What enables us to have this admirable constitutional system, which does not exist and has never existed, in any country of the world outside of Great Britain and her colonies, is not the mechanical form of the constitution. It is not the wide suffrage; it is not the balanced system of king, lords and commons. It is because you have a people trained in self-government; in other words, because you have a community where organized public opinion is possible. How is that organized public opinion created and expressed? Sometimes in newspapers, sometimes in hotel parlours; sometimes in public meetings in school-houses; sometimes in vast public meetings in towns and cities; in the home; in the mart; at the fair; in the forum; at the street corner; in the blacksmith's forge; in the barber's shop; and especially is it shaped and expressed at those recurring periods when the Parliament of Canada, the Lower House, which is the great wheel in the mechanical part of our system, is remade, because its life is for five years, unless the Governor General should have some reason to end it before. What happens then? You have then throughout the entire country that immense wheel of organized public opinion going at full momentum, going at full power, in meeting after meeting. You have men going before their fellow-citizens—the one side saying: We have been in power so long, vote for us. Look at our policy, that policy has been successful; we have served you well, we have been economical, we have kept down the public debt, and, as far as was consistent with the progress of the country kept down the expenditure; we have, as far as in us lay, punished boodling and whatever went wrong; we have been a pure and clean Administration. But then comes another set of men, who say: Do not vote for them, but for us. Their policy is bad; they are extravagant; they have not kept down the debt; they have not kept down the expenses; they have been lavish in expenditure—vote for us; we will administer your affairs better, and, above all, we will change their policy. Is it not manifest to you, Mr. Speaker, and every man within my hearing, that that great wheel of organized public opinion is connected with the smaller wheel that sends the power on to the operative machinery, by what I call the belt of confidence between the public and public men? Destroy the confidence in the minds of the people that public men mean what they say, and will they go to the meetings? Would the meetings be anything but show, not a dumb, but a noisy show, without meaning? Would they listen for a moment to those public men unless they had some confidence in their professions? So that one or two things is required in order that our system shall work. First, you must have confidence in the public mind that public men will do what they promise, or, failing to do it, that they will be held to a strict account and punished for their failure. Where shall we be if men can get into power and then turn round and laugh at the people, and laugh especially at the party with which they are connected, and which they have led?

Let me recall what happened here in this Dominion up to 1896. I need not go back further than 1893, when, in this very town, a vast concourse that might have swelled any man's heart with pride to look down upon, met to greet my hon. friend the leader of the great Liberal party (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Those three thousand representatives met here, and what did they do? They formulated the policy of the great Liberal party. The right hon. gentleman himself pointed out that the policy formulated that day was a much more solemn thing than if he simply, by his ipse dixit, declared what would be the policy of that party. On that eventful day committees were struck, and in those committees resolutions were carefully drafted by the foremost men in the party, and then adopted by the whole meeting and sent broadcast throughout all Canada as the policy of the Liberal party.

Foremost, came the policy of tariff reform. Nay, not tariff reform, for tariff reform is my own phrase; it is what I contended for, it is what the men believing in the policy of the late Government called for, but what the Liberal party proposed was tariff revolution, not tariff reform. And my right hon. friend, in the speech he made, and which is published in the bound volume containing the official report of the proceedings of that meeting, and which speech I have carefully read, sometimes with admiration, sometimes with amazement, and sometimes with such feelings as it will be impossible to give expression to, said, in supporting the resolution with regard to the tariff, that he emphasized the determination expressed in that resolution—to do what? To touch the fringe of the subject, to touch only a leaf on the tree, to amend one little tiny infant twig protruding from a branch? No, but to uproot the Upas tree of protection; and I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been salutary for him, if he could have seen the expression on the faces of Liberals when I read to them, as I have done throughout the length and breadth of the North-west some of those eloquent expressions of his with regard to the tariff, and which I deem it my duty to read to you now. In that eloquent speech, supporting the resolution for the destruction of the tariff, he said:

Apart from the logic of events, you have the word of Mr. Foster himself, who has declared again and again within the last few weeks, that tariff reform would consist in this—

I draw the attention of the House to what follows; for if some goblin imp had perched on the shoulder of the right hon. gentleman, if we could believe, as was believed in other days, that invisible creatures of the goblin species influenced our minds, if some such goblin, fully determined to cynically show up human nature, had lit on the shoulder of the Prime Minister and prompted him, it could not have prompted words that would have painted him as he would be in the near future, in more disastrous colours of satirical contrast and consummate mockery.

That there might be a few changes here and there, but that the principle of the National Policy would be maintained. This simply means—

You can easily understand, Mr. Speaker, with what grace of gesture my right hon. friend, who is a master of rhetoric, used this language.

This simply means that the Government are going to scratch off the paint and put on a new coat of varnish and call it tariff reform.

Well, I may tell you that Liberal farmer after Liberal farmer, when I read that, laughed as if it were one of the best jokes ever made—"that they would scratch off the paint and put on a new coat of varnish and call it reform of the tariff." Why, these hon. gentlemen have not even scratched off the paint and put on a new coat of varnish. At one time my right hon. friend, in a fit of candour, which was a little inconsistent on his part, and I do not think he should break into the inconsistency of candour—said: I do not mind wearing the clothes of my opponents, if they fit me. He might just as well have said: I do not mind wearing the clothes of my opponents, if I steal them. But his colleagues go around the country and they say, not that they have scratched off the varnish and put on a new coat of paint, but that they have fulfilled all their promises. With a brazen effrontery such as there is no power of language to describe, they stand on the public platform before intelligent men and say: We have fulfilled our pledges. They put their arms akimbo and, with the effrontery of a class of persons who are not usually clad, however, as the portion of humanity that we belong to, with the effrontery of a brazen scold, they assert that they have done what they have not done, and proclaim their title to a virtue which the whole world knows they have not. The National Policy, the right hon. gentleman said, must be got rid of entirely, and not merely the branches. After I had spoken at Regina and quoted some of these utterances, Liberals waited on me and asked me to allow them to see the speech of the right hon. gentleman from which I had made these quotations. They could not believe that the right hon. gentleman had used such language, and I showed them his speech, and drew their special attention to these words:

You know it has been the system of the Conservative party, more than once, whenever their clothes became dilapidated, to steal the clothes of their opponents and present themselves before the people decently attired.

Mr. DAVIN.

This is what they want to do again, and on this occasion I do not object to their stealing our clothes,—

May I ask the right hon. gentleman's attention to these words:

—but I do object to their appearing before the country in false colours.

I can assure my right hon. friend that when I read that I cannot refrain from laughing.

They want to reform the tariff and still retain the principle of protection. I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade. Sir, my loyalty, as I stated, does not ooze from the pores of my body, but I do want to go for an example to the mother country and not to the United States, much as I respect and love the people on the other side of the line. I say that the policy should be a policy of free trade such as they have in England.

Now, the right hon. gentleman came west, and he was heralded by articles in the "Globe" which described him as the future saviour of Canada, because he would do away with protection. And, not content with this, there was a picture which represented my right hon. friend as the good Samaritan bending over the North-west farmer and pouring into his open wounds the oil of revenue tariff and into his gaping and gasping mouth the wine of free trade as it is in England. Well, if any of that oil reached a wound of that prostrate North-west farmer, I do not think it would be enough to lubricate the spring of the smallest Geneva watch that ever ticked, and if any of the wine of free trade as it is in England touched his gullet, I do not think it was enough to disturb the cerebral equanimity of the smallest and youngest chipmunk on the prairie.

Well, he came to Moosomin and at Moosomin he was accompanied by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who, rumour tells us, has resigned in consequence of the tergiversation of the Government on the plebiscite question.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Has he resigned?

Mr. DAVIN. I am told that the Minister of Agriculture, disgusted with the policy of the Government on the plebiscite, has resigned. But he may possibly come back. Now, Sir, he declared at Moosomin that 20 per cent on implements was an outrage. And he said: If we get in it will be taken off. The words I read here last session when I interrupted the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). He said the people of the North-west and Manitoba have had to pay through the nose, this 20 per cent amounting to a considerable sum—I think it was about $14,000. Now, what would the North-west farmer who heard that or who read it think? Would he not think that if these gentlemen came into power there would be relief as to that 20 per cent on larger implements? But the 20 per cent is there today. Would he not think there would be relief in regard to the smaller implements? Why, Sir, there is a higher duty on these smaller implements than that fixed by Sir Leonard Tilley's tariff in 1879, which the late Mr. Mackenzie declared to be prohibitory, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce characterized as an outrage.

A pamphlet has been distributed throughout the North-west Territories and Manitoba, and I have no doubt it has been distributed throughout Ontario as well. That pamphlet contains the speeches of Hon. W. S. Fielding, Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, and Hon. Wm. Paterson. By referring to pages 52, 53, 54 and 55 of that pamphlet, you see that the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) gives a list of articles in regard to which he suggests that the preferential tariff gives an advantage to the people of the country and especially to the farmers. When that speech was being delivered, I did not understand the object of it. If you will turn to "Hansard" you will find that I suggested that hardly any of these articles came from England, and so were not affected by the preference. Of course, such a representation as that made by the hon. Minister could not deceive us here, because all we had to do was to send for the Trade and Navigation Returns—I have them here—and by consulting these we could see at once that the figures in that tabulated statement were delusive. If I were speaking elsewhere, I would use stronger language than that. Now, let me call attention to what is stated in this speech, and let me bring before you and before this House the enormity of the conduct of a man in the position of the Minister of Customs in perpetrating such an outrage on the people of Canada, and especially on the farming community as is to be found in this speech. I know now why this speech was made. We could see through it, it did not deceive us; but the poor people in the country, who would only see this pamphlet and would not have the Trade and Navigation Returns before them to expose the fraud would not know the character of the trick that was being played upon them. Now, this is what the hon. gentleman says:

Every one of these articles is an absolute necessity, and is used by every agriculturist in the country in his house or on his farm. Among the articles I ask attention to is a long list of agricultural implements over and above that which I have read, and I ask attention to the reductions as answering the question whether the Government has carried out its pledges to reduce the duty on agricultural implements and to reduce the burdens resting upon the farmer. The list of articles, with the new rate under the preferential duties and the percentage of reduction from the old rates is as follows:

Now, if any farmer who has this book in his possession will turn to page 53, he will find one of the first items on the list to be springs and axles. What has the free trade revenue tariff done for the farmer in regard to springs and axles? Or what has the right hon. gentleman done who was heralded by the "Globe" to the North-west farmer as the good Samaritan? Nay, more, there was a companion picture which represented the North-west farmer lying manacled, with gyves on his wrists and chains on his ankles, and on these links was written "30 per cent, 25 per cent, 22½ per cent on cottons," and showed the benevolent Prime Minister bending over and filing off the links. I am afraid that file belonged to goods of the wooden nutmeg order. I do not think it could make much impression on the chains, for, the chains are there still.

Now springs and axles—what do you think has been done? Why, every farmer in the country will throw up his cap the moment the name, the sacred name, of Wilfrid Laurier is heard; he will throw up his cap and cry: What wonders have been accomplished by this great and good man! What were springs and axles under the old tariff? As is seen in the first column, on page 53 of this pamphlet, 38 per cent. But what reduction? 3 per cent; down to 35 per cent. $35 in the hundred, the revenue tariff of free trade as it is in England, that wine of free trade that was poured copiously down the throat of the poor North-west farmer! Somebody says: But look at the preference that is given to the English manufactured goods in our market, and see what that will do. But the poor farmer who reads that extraordinary and outrageous sentence introducing these columns, the poor farmer who has not the Trade and Navigation Returns which are now in my hand, and which I ask any hon. gentlemen opposite to turn up and look over—he does not know that we do not get springs and axles from England at all, that they all come from the United States, and that we could not get them in the nature of the case, from England, because the springs and axles they make in England would not suit the carriages and wagons we have here. So that here you have it held out to the farmer that he gets springs and axles at 26½ per cent. Suppose he did get them at 26½ per cent, is not that a high percentage? From the place where the hon. gentleman who leads this Opposition sits, in 1879 Mr. Alexander Mackenzie declared that 25 per cent was prohibitive. And, Sir Richard Cartwright declared that 25 per cent was an outrage. And here you have held up to the farmer that 26½ per cent is a panacea for all his ills, a great boon, something that he ought to honour the Liberal leaders for. But here is the outrage, here is the painful thing about that. I could hardly tell you with what pain, as a member of this House, I find myself called on to refer to it. The painful thing is that even that statement of 26½ per cent is a fraud. Now, Sir, we take some other things. Take files and rasps. The farmer needs them. What are they under the present tariff? 30 per cent; the great bulk comes from the United States. Adzes, 30 per cent; cleavers, 30 per cent; hatchets, 30 per cent; saws, 30 per cent; wedges, 30 per cent;

hammers, 30 per cent; crowbars, 30 per cent; picks, 30 per cent; mattocks, 30 per cent. Well, Sir, there is a preference, but when you look at these Trade and Navigation Returns on which my hand now rests, and which are open to the inspection of anybody over there you will find that no advantage under that preference comes to the farmer. Mr. Speaker, I want your special attention to this. When, Sir, you used to sit a little behind where my hon. friend the member for York (Mr. Wallace) sits to-day. I remember that you made a most elaborate speech upon cotton, and you showed to this House and to the country what an outrage it was that there should be the high duty imposed by a Tory Government. Now, I want to show you this,—because I think that it might even impart a sense of liveliness to the somewhat monotonous position you occupy. On page 54—I will assume that you have the pamphlet in your hand and can turn to it—you will find cotton fabrics unbleached, under the first or Tory column, 22½ per cent. Now, what great thing has been done for the farmer? I want the House to understand what has been done. It has been sent down at a run from 22½ to 25 per cent! Marvellous! Why, Sir, we should have three cheers with a tiger for the Liberal leaders, they are so loyal to Liberalism. Then there is the preference. But what is the use of the preference? The great bulk of unbleached cotton comes from the United States, and only 217,159 yards from England. Here are the Trade and Navigation Returns that show the monstrous character of this work of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs—and I am glad to see that he is in his place. I suppose he has been sent for. He has been straying away from school, and has been sent for. I wish the Prime Minister would discipline all his Ministers, because ever since the meeting of this House the members of the Government have done what Mr. Wade and Mr. McGregor did in the Yukon: The moment Mr. Ogilvie was sent up there as commissioner, the two great criminals fled. And when we are here now trying the foremost political criminals on this continent, they disappear from the dock. Now we come to coloured fabrics. The Minister of Customs could have done something for us there. The farmer's wife, the farmer's daughter, the young ladies in towns, wear coloured cotton fabrics. And, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is anything pleasanter than to see a young lady well and properly attired in a coloured cotton fabric. Something could have been done there, and I will tell you why. Out of 34 million yards of coloured cottons that were imported into this country, 24 million yards came from England, so that some three-fourths come from England. Something could have been done there. What was done? But it was not the Minister of Customs who did this, it was my hon. friend the Minister of Finance who did this. What does the gallant Minister of Finance do, who, I am told, used to be—in a thoroughly drawing room way, of course—in those years that have passed away for both of us, a squire of dames? We should have expected something gallant from him, and what does he do for the young ladies? What does he do for the fairer portion of creation? Well, he saw that the preference was coming into play, that 24 millions yards were imported from England out of the 34 millions, and that the manufacturer might possibly be hit, the manufacturer that you, Sir, proved from your place in Parliament to be such a robber, that cotton manufacturer who you proved was sweating the money out of the people. When the Minister of Finance saw what this poor manufacturer would suffer, it went to his heart. He looked at the old Tory tariff, which was 30 per cent. Why, 30 per cent is very high, it is 5 per cent higher than what Alexander Mackenzie said was prohibitory in 1879. But his heart fails him for the sufferings of the poor manufacturer, and thereupon he says: Before that preference comes into play, we will put on 5 per cent. And so this revenue-tariff Minister, this free-trade Minister, sends it down at a run from 30 to 35 per cent! Shenstone says, speaking of some one in his day:

He kicked him down stairs with such a sweet grace,

You might have thought he was handing him up.

These gentlemen opposite have kicked the manufacturer down in such a pleasant manner that the manufacturer finds himself, after having been kicked down stairs, as my hon. friend the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) declares, in the drawing room, in the best room on the first floor. The member for Centre Toronto is a distinguished ornament of the band made up of "robbers great and robbers small" who were to be kicked down stairs, but who are up on the first floor, in the best room and as for my hon. friend (Mr. Bertram) why he is in the best arm-chair. It is a delightful spectacle. I remember my late lamented leader, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, used to tell a story which, I suppose, without infringing on the dignity of this House, I may be permitted to relate. It was that of a Cheap John at a fair selling slices of bread and butter, which were quickly disposed of and so deftly that a man in the crowd cried out: "First he butters them up and then he slithers them down." That is the way the Government is treating the manufacturers; first, they butter them up, and then they slither them down, and they do not feel it. Well, Sir, take curtains which, now that our farmers are prosperous—and I may tell you that I am glad to bear my testimony here to the prosperity of the North-west—are important to our people. The North-west is prosperous like the rest of Canada. The farmer's wife wants curtains; curtains are 35 per cent—under the old tariff they were 30 per cent. They have sent them down from 30 to 35 per cent! Is that not magnificent as a free trade tariff? Is it not magnificent as a revenue tariff,—the wine of free trade as it is in England, the oil of joy of revenue tariff! Well, take handkerchiefs; every polite person needs handkerchiefs, and the preference would undoubtedly have done us good in England, because we get many of our handkerchiefs there. Lest the Government should hit the poor manufacturer too hard they sent the duty down from 30 to 35 per cent. We come then to woollens. Now, here in this country, but especially in the North-west, semi-arctic as we acknowledge it is, we ought to expect some consideration. Many persons outside think the climate of the North-west is severe, but no man has ever lived there for a short time without feeling that there is no climate in the world so stimulating, so delightful, so that even when the glass is low you do not feel cold. But we must wear woollens there, and there is no doubt whatever that the preference on English goods would have helped the farmer. But what does the Finance Minister do? Before that hammer of the 25 per cent preference goes down on the manufacturer, the Finance Minister in his pity for the poor fellow, sends it up from 30 to 35 per cent! Under the old tariff of 1894-95 it was 30 per cent, but they sent it up by the tariff for revenue, the free-trade-as-it-is-in-England tariff to 35 per cent. Take tweeds and flannels. These were sent down at a run from 32½ per cent to 35 per cent; carpets, from 30 per cent to 35 per cent; umbrellas 35 per cent, and so on. Well now, Sir, do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that it requires some audacity for any man to stand upon the platform and say that these gentlemen who are now in power and who call themselves the leaders of the Liberal party have fulfilled their pledges in regard to the tariff, or that they have been true to the principles of the Liberal party? Where is the Liberal party? Mr. Speaker, no man knows more about the Liberal party than you do. Sir, you were to my knowledge the trusted and bosom friend of the late Hon. George Brown and you were to my knowledge the trusted and bosom friend of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie; no man should know more about the principles of the Liberal party than yourself. And, Sir, I think it will be in your conscience when I say here that in the face of the promises we have heard, and which I have read, in the face of the resolutions passed in 1893, in the face of the well-known principles that the Liberal party enunciated for eighteen years while the Liberal-Conservative party was in power, in the face of the well-known principles of the Liberal party for the last thirty years, these gentlemen who are now in power are not the leaders of that party. There must be amongst the Liberals in this House some who are not office seekers.

An hon. MEMBER. There are none.

Mr. DAVIN. That is candid; I am very glad to hear the authoritative statement from a leading member of the Liberal party that there are none who are not office seekers. At any rate there are men outside of this House who are not office seekers; there are Liberals outside of this House who have a career of their own in commerce, on the farm; the yeomen of Canada, the merchants of Canada, the professional men of Canada, the tradesmen of Canada, who are not office seekers. And if there is no liberalism left in this Chamber to which I can appeal, and perhaps there is not, then I appeal to the liberalism outside of this House. Who is that gentleman on the other side who said that there are no Liberals on that side who were not office seekers? I see before me the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), and he is one of those who have risen in revolt in the west against the Minister of the Interior. He is one of the men who have revolted against the incompetence and against the most objectionable character of the administration of the affairs of the country so far as they come under the control of the Minister of the Interior. I can well appeal to him, therefore, if there is no other vestige of the old liberalism in the House. But I can with confidence appeal to the liberalism of Canada which I know to be made up of as patriotic and as true men as can be found in any part of the world. Where is their party? Mr. Speaker, you are yourself a man of imagination, and you could picture this: Suppose the shades of the late Hon. George Brown and the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie were to march in here; suppose they came down—or up—I do not know—I assume it too readily it was down, but wherever they are, suppose they heard something of the politics of the country and learned that their party was in power. Imagine Mr. Brown and Mr. Mackenzie appearing in the House. Suppose we saw Mr. Brown putting to his ghostly eyes, a pair of spectacles. He would recognize the Prime Minister at once; I have no doubt he would make some very familiar remarks and he would ask: "Who is that behind him, Mackenzie? Is not that Tarte?" Mackenzie, with ghostly fingers, scratching a ghostly head, would say: "I believe, George, it is." "But was not he a Tory? And then who is that over there? Is that not Blair?"—referring to the hon. Minister of Railways—"Used not Blair be a Tory?" And he would reply "Why of course he was." And then George Brown would ask: "Who is that highly intellectual man in one of the back Ministerial benches; is that the son-in-law of my enemy Sir David Macpherson?" "Why certainly it is," and George Brown would hesitate and stammer as George Brown's manner was and he would ask in astonishment: "Is it a coalition government? have you heard anything of that, Mackenzie?" And Mackenzie would answer:

"No, George, I have heard the first you mentioned is the Minister of Public Works." "Minister of Public Works, mon; make that mon Minister of Public Works! the great spending department; why, mon, he used be the worst element in the Tory party." And then George Brown would ask: "Is this a Liberal Government with three Tories in it;" and pointing his eyeglasses at the Minister of Finance, he would say: "Is that not our old friend the Premier of Nova Scotia; why, mon, he used be a secessionist," and Mackenzie would reply: "why of course he used," and Brown would sigh: "what an extraordinary conglomeration my poor friend Laurier has under him." But Mackenzie would say to him: "George, the worst thing is that I am told the Minister of Public Works controls our friend who leads the Ministerial ranks," and George Brown would be shocked and indignant, would laugh with scorn and shake his gaunt sides over the pass inferior hands had brought the party to, that party which he led so long on genuine Liberal lines.

To come from the ghostly to the concrete, what strikes the Liberals of Canada to-day is: where is Liberalism? We have the evidence of the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) on that point. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) went to Perth recently and made a speech (of which I have a verbatim report here) in which he said: If our opponents were to come in they would not change the tariff to-day; it is a dead issue. And in reference to that, what occurred in the hearing of the member for Lisgar the other day at Regina? There was a Mr. J. G. Grant speaking there, and Mr. John Dougan interrupted him and said: "Have you seen what Mr. Sifton said at Perth that the tariff was a dead issue." Do you know what this gentleman replied, and he dare not reply anything else in the capital of the Territories? This gentleman, Mr. Grant is an aspirant; he sought to run against me at the last election, and he replied to Mr. Dougan: If Mr. Sifton said it—and there is no "if" about it because I have a verbatim report of the speech here—if Mr. Sifton said the tariff was a dead issue, then all I have to say is, that I do not agree with Mr. Sifton. And my friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) declared at that meeting that things had come to this pass—I now quote from memory but I have his words here, things had come to this pass, that he would say that any Liberal who said you should support the Liberal Government the whole time, was what he would call a "yellow dog" Liberal.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, I beg to state that I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, you did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What I said was that a man who voted for the Conservative party once when it was right and twice when it was wrong, was called in Winnipeg a yellow dog Tory; and I added: That the man who voted for the Liberal party once when it was right and twice when it was wrong, should properly be called a yellow dog Liberal.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I will accept that. I have the words of the hon. gentleman here and I think it comes to the same thing and I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) was right in stating that he said nothing of the kind. I will read his words reported in his own paper. They are as follows:—

There is a good deal of nonsense talked about Liberalism and Conservatism. The Conservative who voted once for his party when it was right and twice when it was wrong was in Manitoba called a yellow dog Conservative. The Liberal who would vote for his party once when it was right and twice when it was wrong should properly be characterized as a yellow dog, for what was wrong in a Conservative could not by any stretch be made right in a Liberal.

And that remark was applauded. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) knows very well, because he was present, that when Mr. Grant was praising the Liberal party—the Liberal "leaders," because I distinguish between the Liberal "leaders" and the Liberal "party," and mind you the Liberal party in the country is distinguishing between them. There is no connection any longer between the Liberal leaders and the Liberal party, except the connection there is between betrayer and the betrayed. When Mr. Grant was saying that the Liberal leaders had fulfilled their pledges, my friend John Dougan interrupted and called attention to what Mr. Sifton said at Perth; that the tariff was a dead issue, and Mr. Grant had to say, for he dare not say anything else: then if Mr. Sifton said the tariff was a dead issue I do not agree with Mr. Sifton.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram) is here, and he declared that the tariff should not be changed for the next ten years. He is quite satisfied with the tariff, as he well might be. You remember that the other day in Manila, the Americans did not know whence they were being shot at, and it turned out that some of the Filipinos were hidden away in the leafy branches of the trees and were popping at them. Now, the people of Canada, and especially the people of the North-west, feel very much like the Americans did. They look around and they discover that the manufacturers are shooting at them, firmly and comfortably ensconced in the umbrageous branches of the Upas tree to which I have already referred. And men like my friend from Toronto (Mr. Bertram)—

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). And Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) too.

Mr. DAVIN. Leeds and Grenville, yes. Oh, I forgot the brother in manufacturing implements of Massey-Harris. He travels around with the young Napoleon and he tells audience after audience that he is delighted with the tariff. Why should he not? The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) at a banquet that was given to Mr. Hardy declared that the tariff should remain as it was, and he said in his own somewhat gruff way: Some people say that it is a bad tariff, but I tell them there is a worse tariff, and that is an uncertain one: people should pay their taxes. So with a wave of his hirsute hand, he bids them begone; tells the grumbling farmer who holds up before him what was said in the "Farmers' Sun" (a paper that the Postmaster General subsidized)—the farmer holds that up before him and the Postmaster General turns round and says: Begone, I am not going to say one word to get the promises of the Government fulfilled; they fulfilled my end; they got you to vote for us, and that is all I want. Something still more extraordinary occurred at that banquet. I think I have it here. I am going to frame it, Sir, because it was one of the most extraordinary things that have ever happened in the history of public life in Canada. There was another gentleman at that banquet—that same young Napoleon who is not now in his place, who seldom is in his place. He made a speech there, and of course it was heralded as a great speech. Every speech the young Napoleon makes, Mr. Speaker, is a great speech. We have in Winnipeg, a paper which heads in big letters, every speech made by this young Napoleon: "Great speech by the Minister of Interior."

Mr. BENNETT. What paper is that?

Mr. DAVIN. The Winnipeg "Free Press."

Mr. BENNETT. Is that the Canadian Pacific Railway paper?

Mr. DAVIN. No, it is the paper of the Minister of the Interior; and another paper in Winnipeg has asked the same question in regard to this paper that has been asked in regard to "La Patrie;" where did this Minister—who at a period before he became a Minister of the Crown could not pay his indebtedness to the city of Winnipeg—where did he get money to buy an organ for $30,000? Did it come from the same source that supplied the coin to buy "La Patrie" for the two promising youths who rejoice in the name of Tarte? Well, Sir, this great young man, whose career during the short time he has been a Minister has been characterized by such a series of blunders as have not distinguished a single other department of my right hon. friend's Government—and that is saying a great deal—

Mr. BENNETT. You have forgotten the postage stamps.

Mr. DAVIN. The postage stamps pale into insignificance compared with the blunders of the Department of the Interior. He was at that banquet, and of course his great speech was published at length in the "Globe" of November 16th. As a member of this House I think I have some reason, on behalf of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, to complain of the "Globe" because it presented him with a picture of himself. I do not say that my hon. friend is a walking Apollo; but I will say that at his worst he does not look so like a criminal at large as that picture makes him.

Mr. BENNETT. That was the morning after the banquet.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says that was the morning after the banquet; but although my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has back-slidden so far as to tolerate the sound of the clanging fiddle and the hilarious pipe, and to indulge in terpsichorean gyrations, I do not think he has back-slidden to the extent of taking champagne. I do not think he has gone further than the greatest teetotalers will do—taking Roman punch at the middle of the meal. Well, here is the speech; and, speaking about the tariff, this is what the Minister of the Interior says:

We have, therefore, succeeded in bringing about a revision of the tariff, which has afforded much needed relief—

To whom? To the North-west farmer, over whom my right hon. friend bent with sympathy, and mingled tears with tears? To the shopkeeper and the tradesman? To the artisan and the housewife? Let me read to you the words, and I call the attention of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to them. It is incredible. I will hand the paper to any Liberal who comes over here. I do not suppose any Liberal would doubt my word, but this is almost incredible, and I would like them to look at it. I call the attention of the hon. member for Centre Toronto to it. If he had the least doubt that the machinations of himself and his brother manufacturers would be endorsed and carried out to the utmost by this Government, that doubt may now disappear. Here is what the Minister of the Interior, the farmers' member in the Cabinet, the member in the Cabinet for the North-west Territories, says. The words should be printed and hung up in every farmer's cottage, in every shack, in every home on the prairie, in every artisan's house in the country. They should be hung up in order that the people may see in them the character of this Government. This is what he says:

We have, therefore, succeeded in bringing about a revision of the tariff, which afforded much needed relief to the manufacturers of this country.

The poor manufacturers! Why, Sir, I thought they were the robbers great and the robbers small who were piling up millions of dollars at the expense of the people of the country. I thought they were bleeding the farmer white by reason of the tariff which the Finance Minister did not think high enough, and so, where it was 25 per cent he put it up to 30 per cent, and where it was 30 per cent he put it up to 35 per cent. I thought that was the character of the manufacturers. But it seems they needed relief. My right hon. friend, in this tariff matter, reminds me of a Yankee who made a bet with an obese fat man that he would swallow him. The bet was taken, and the Yankee said, "Lie down on that table." The fat man lay down, whereupon the Yankee knelt at the end of the table, and began to bite his big toe. The fat man cried out, "Hold on, you are hurting me." Of course I am," said the Yankee, "do you suppose I can swallow you whole?" The Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior have not even bit at the big toe of the manufacturers; for, instead of the manufacturers crying out, they sing hymns in honour of the great leader of the Liberal party, and you have the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. F. T. Frost), the implement manufacturer, going around with the Minister of the Interior and telling the people the tariff is what they want, and you have the hon. member for Centre Toronto declaring how happy he is.

Now, I want to say something about this tariff and the conduct of the Government in regard to it, because if the people of Canada could look calmly on the terrible outrage on public faith of which the present Government is the embodiment, then I would despair of the future of my country. I have here in my hand the "Farmers' Sun" for October 24, 1894, at which time it was subsidized by the present Postmaster General, and in it I find a letter signed "Richard Cartwright."

You will remember, that some time before that the Patron organization was formed. I do not know whether there is a Patron now remaining in the House. They are all changed. I see a gentleman that was elected partly as a Patron, but who puts himself down, however, in the "Parliamentary Companion" as a Liberal—my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas).

Here is a letter, dated the 1st October, which appeared in the "Farmers' Sun" on October 24th, written by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and in that letter he says, addressing his friends in the Patron ranks:

I know, no man better, how utterly fatal any protective system must be to liberty and to honest and economical government; and it was the profound conviction of this fact, quite as much as any belief in the material injury it was certain to work to the chief interests of Canada (as I pointed out in my Budget Speech of 1876, and have done continuously ever since), which induced Mr. Mackenzie and myself and our colleagues to set our faces determinedly against the introduction of that most pernicious system here.

He goes on to add:

Nevertheless, I feel that there is great danger of their—

That is, the Patrons—

—making a very grave mistake at this juncture. The foes of liberty and good government are a very powerful body in Canada to-day. They are strongly entrenched and very highly organized indeed. Protection has many roots. It has a full treasury and a great hold on a large part of the press of this country. It holds the reins of Government, and it has a very large proportion of the active wealth of the Dominion on its side. You may be sure it will die hard here as well as in the United States. Now, this being so, for the opponents of such a foe to quarrel with each other on the very eve of a pitched battle against the common enemy is, as the French statesman said, even worse than a crime—it would be an irreparable and unforgivable blunder.

The man who wrote that is now a member of the Government, who wished to obtain the aid of the Patrons in overcoming their common enemy; but to-day he has linked arms with the one robber, and the Prime Minister has linked arms on the other side with the other robber. Whether he has linked arms with the robber great, and the First Minister with the robber small, I do not know. Later on in that letter, he said:

Then the Patrons desire to reform the tariff and to improve the system of taxation. Good again. By all means let us do so. This is the very cardinal plank in the Liberal platform, and has been so ever since 1878, as the records of Parliament testify most abundantly. The Patrons asked that the interests of the farmers be fairly considered. Was it not solely and simply because the Mackenzie Government would not agree to deliver over the farmers, bound hand and foot, to the tender mercies of the ring of would-be protective manufacturers that Mr. Mackenzie was defeated in 1878?

And the man who wrote that is now a member of the Government that keeps the farmers bound hand and foot to the tender mercies of that ring. He continued:

Let me ask, too, by whose votes was Mr. Mackenzie defeated then? I do not say it as a reproach, but it is a matter of history, that Mr. Mackenzie was defeated by the votes of the Liberal farmers, who were cajoled by the false promises of home markets, high prices and general prosperity held out by the reckless and ignorant charlatans who foisted this precious protective system on Canada in 1878.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have substantially the same tariff to-day; and if those gentlemen who in 1878 inaugurated the National Policy, were ignorant charlatans, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) cannot be characterized otherwise than as a conscious criminal. Further on in that letter he continues :

What are the other planks of the Patron platform affecting Dominion politics ?

If there be a Patron here, let him hear. If there is a Liberal here, let him hear. If there is a man who believes in common honesty in public life, let him hear these words written by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) on that occasion to the Patrons :

What are the other planks of the Patron platform affecting Dominion politics ? They are these : 1. Economy of administration. 2. Purity and independence of Parliament. 3. Tariff for revenue only. 4. Reciprocal trade. 5. Protection from labour monopolies. 6. No railway bonuses. 8. No gerrymandering—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker :

—No gerrymandering. 9. Lands for settlers.

If the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) were here, I would ask him to listen to that.

Now, there is no single one of all these objects which the Liberal party have not been fighting for, moving resolutions for, and doing their very best to obtain any time during the last twenty years. Look at the records of Parliament. Look especially at the several motions on the Budget. Look at their platform, and at the very last resolution moved by myself in Parliament, and you will see that as regards Dominion politics there is evidently no ground of bitterness between the Patrons and the Liberal party.

Is not that holding out to the Patrons the promise : Put us into power, and we will carry out your planks and make them the laws of Canada ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picou). But there must be an implied condition.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think there is implied condition here. No, the hon. gentleman holds it out categorically. If there be a condition it is : Put us into power, and we will carry out your planks. What is the Liberal party to do with such a leader ? What are the Patrons to think of such a Government ? Was there ever such a deception practised as has been practised on the Patrons by this Government ? Further on, he adds :

Tariff for revenue only and taxes on luxuries and not on the necessaries, reciprocity and reservation of the lands for the actual settlers are things the Liberals, collectively and individually, have always advocated, nor is there any political single argument which has ever been advanced in favour of all these things, either by the Patrons or anybody else, which has not been previously and most generously said many times over by the Liberal members of Parliament and out of it.

The hon. gentleman then emphasized his offer of association with the Patrons :

You see, as I have said, that the objects of both organizations are absolutely identical. The Liberal party, for fifteen years and more, have been fighting at heavy odds for the very objects the Patrons professed to desire. The Liberal party lost office rather than forsake these principles.

And they are keeping office now, rather than carry them out.

The Liberal party might have long since regained office if they would have betrayed them, and yet we find certain Patrons continually declaring that both parties are alike, and advising their friends to make no distinction between a Liberal and a protectionist candidate.

Again, he adds :

We will do well to remember that, after all, Ontario is not the whole of this Dominion, and that under certain conditions—

Then he goes on to suggest the fear to the Patrons, that if they do not take care, there may be a coalition between the Liberals and the Conservatives, and where, then, would be the Patrons :

Now, you will bear in mind that I am very far from stating such a condition would be justifiable or desirable. My point is, and it cannot be brought too clearly before the minds of all those Patrons who desire to promote the real welfare of their country, and who, I make no doubt, constitute the vast majority of the order, that such a move would be always on the cards in the event of such proceedings on the part of the Patrons as I have indicated.

Later on, he said :

I, for my part, would be sorry to see the issue dwindle down to a mere question of revenue tariff.

This is a good thing in its way, but very much more than this is needed now, and very much more than this can be got, if only our chances are not recklessly thrown away. We need, among other things, a radical readjustment, not only of our tariff, but of our whole system of taxation.

Mark that, Mr. Speaker, because I shall have to refer to it later on.

Great evil has been done, but out of evil good may come, and the colossal villainy of the protective system may be made to pave the way for so thorough a reform that it may prove possible for the first time in the history of Canada so to distribute the pressure of taxation that every man shall be compelled to contribute to the public needs according to his means and not according to pleasure.

The man who wrote this is in a Government that maintains a protective tariff and that has put a cent a pound on sugar.

I have no intention, and, indeed, no desire, to see your organization put at the disposal of even the Liberal party. Let them remain distinct but friendly. This is pre-eminently a case for mutual concession. Both Patrons and Liberals profess to have the same ends in view. Let them meet and adjust their difficulties—differences of principles there are none.

No differences of principle, Mr. Speaker. Why with that letter on record, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a Government that supports what he calls the villainy of a protective system, we have, as I say, one of the most immoral spectacles ever witnessed in any country. I am not done with this question. It is one that comes home closely to the people of the North-west Territories. We up there have been shamefully deceived, shamefully betrayed. In fact, if you will turn to copies of that very paper from which I have been reading, issued after the Minister of Finance had declared his policy, you will find that that paper, which had been attacking the Conservative party and Conservative policy, declared that the farmers of Canada had been betrayed by the Liberal Government. I wish to deal still further with this question, and, as it were, to drive home the nail. If you will turn to the Liberal campaign sheet issued during the election of 1896, you will find that more is said about the tariff even than was said at the great meeting of Liberals that took place in 1893. You have there in detail a comparison which shows the enormous fortunes that were being made out of the farmer by the protected manufacturers. Therefore, not only in the speeches of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, not only in the speeches of his colleagues, not only at that convention of 1893, but in the campaign sheet it was still more emphasized, that if these gentlemen got into power, we should have such a radical revision of the tariff, that every vestige of protection would disappear. I need hardly say how completely we have been betrayed. I have in my hand the tariff, and, as I turn over page after page, as I am doing now, I find that every page teems with rates of duty of 30 and 35 per cent, page after page, 30 and 35 per cent—the whole tariff pockmarked with 30 and 35 per cent. This is the Liberal free-trade revenue tariff!

Now, Sir, clearly, they have not fulfilled their pledges with regard to the tariff. Have they fulfilled their pledges with regard to expenditure? They said that the expenditure was excessive. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a distinguished member of the commission which has failed, said eight years ago that the country could be run for $5,000,000 less than it was being run for. Another gentleman, the present Minister of Justice, declared that the country could be run for $4,000,000 less. My right hon. friend the Premier would not go so far. In his speech in Toronto, in 1893, he said, that they might not be able to run the country for $5,000,000 or $4,000,000 less, but he declared, that it could be run for $3,000,000 less. They have come into power, and what has happened? The first year they were in power they spent $1,400,000 more than the old Government had spent in its last year, and considerably more than the average of the old Government's expenditure from 1887 to 1896. Taking the old Government's expenditure of $36,949,000 as the standard of comparison, we find that in the first year they spent $1,400,000 more; in the year after that, $1,800,000 more, and this year, over $1,900,000 more. So that in the first year taking the $3,000,000 less which they said they would expend, and the $1,400,000 more which they did expend, we find them to be $4,400,000 worse than they promised; in the next year, $4,800,000 worse, and in the present year, $4,900,000 worse.

Then, what about the debt? They declared that the debt was too high, and that they would reduce it. But, as a matter of fact, during the first year they sent up the debt about three and a half millions more than it was under the old Government; and the next year, about four millions, making in the two years an addition to the debt of about seven and a half millions. This year, they are away out of sight. And yet, in the Public Accounts issued by the Finance Minister, we read that the receipts on account of Consolidated Fund for the year were $40,555,238, and the expenditure $38,832,526, showing a surplus of $1,722,712. Now, is it not a very extraordinary thing, that when the Minister of Finance shows that he has a surplus of about a million and three-quarters, he has a man in London trying to borrow two millions and a half? Is this not on a par with their candour with regard to the tariff? What is the explanation? The people outside, when they read the statements of the Finance Minister, as published in the newspapers, are not aware of the way in which the hon. Minister keeps his accounts. He keeps his accounts in this way: He has a consolidated revenue column, in that column he brings out a surplus. He then has a capital account column; so that by means of transferring a sufficient number of millions into the capital account column he can run heavily in debt, he can increase our obligations, he can pile up interest, he can go to England and borrow $2,500,000 of money, and yet go to the people of the country and say: We have a surplus of $1,750,000. We read on:

Expenditure chargeable to capital account was as follows:—Intercolonial Railway, Prince Edward Island Railway, Lachine Canal, Ottawa works, St. Lawrence River, Sault Ste. Marie Canal, Trent Canal, $3,477,906; public works, $376,852; Dominion Lands, $127,504; Militia, $173,740; making a total of $4,156,004.

Sir, I need not make the calculation myself, because if I turn to a page further on of these public accounts, which are given out under the imprimatur of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I find on pages 15a and 15b: "Expenditure for 1898 chargeable to Consolidated Fund, $38,832,525; expenditure chargeable to capital, $4,143,503." Then, here comes an item that will astonish the country after the pledges which we know were made, after the resolutions that were passed, after the promises that were held forth, under the head of railway subsidies we find $1,414,934. Then you have the total disbursements of this Government, which claims to have a surplus of $1,750,000: $45,334,281; total receipts, $40,556,510. Then, under the heading of the difference between receipts and expenditure, that is to say the real deficit, we find $4,777,771. That is our position; so that in regard to the way the country is run, it is precisely the same thing as in regard to the tariff. But let me call your attention to that surplus. What is it, according to the best political economists and the best finance ministers, such men as Gladstone—what is it but an evidence of incompetence? I have seen it stated as though it were a feather in the cap of this Government, that it has a surplus of $1,750,000. Now, Sir, I have here what I read at one of my meetings before the people, who were greatly impressed with the statement that there was a surplus of $1,750,000; I have here a statement made as to the real character of such surpluses—that it is taking money out of the pockets of the people that should not be taken out, that it is bad financiering, it is, in fact, bad statesmanship, even if it was a true surplus, which I have shown by these Public Accounts that it is not. Hear what this great authority says, that I am now going to read to you:

Why, Sir, you heard the hon. gentleman driven to the expedient of giving it as an evidence of prosperity, that during the last fifteen years which the country has been under a protective regime, the finances of the country balanced year after year by surpluses which now aggregate to the enormous sum of $20,000,000. This fact, which I do not hesitate to say to the hon. gentleman, is nothing short of a disgrace and a shame for the Administration, was treated by him as a boast. I assert that such a condition of things is a shame and a disgrace to any Government. In England the aim and the purpose of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is so to calculate the expense and the expenditure as to make them balance evenly, and the reputation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be lost for ever if, year after year, his calculations were found to be wrong. If, instead of having just the revenue which is wanted to meet the expenditure, it was found that there was such a discrepancy in his calculations as exists in Canada, the reputation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, I repeat, be lost for ever, unless he were able to show that the discrepancy rose from a sudden disturbance in the condition of business. What is the truth about these surpluses? Twenty millions of dollars, says the Minister of Finance. The truth is, that these surpluses represent $20,000,000 of unjust taxation, which have been wrung by the Government from the consumers of the country, $20,000,000 which would have been left in the pockets of the people for the purpose of their own business, for instance, to be applied to the redemption of the mortgages with which this country has been plastered during that term of years.

Now, Sir, who is the author of that statement as to the character of a surplus? I would call the attention of the Treasury benches as to the author of it. If you turn to the "Hansard" of April 12th, 1894, you will find that the word L-a-u-r-i-e-r is at the head of that speech in which this statement occurs. So that this boasted surplus is characterized by the present Prime Minister as an outrage. Let me use his own words in regard to what his Finance Minister boasted of, and I believe that he himself has boasted of it. Let me read:

What is the truth about this surplus of $1,750,000? Is it not $1,750,000 of unjust taxation which has been wrung by the free trade revenue tariff of the Government from the consumers of the country? $1,750,000 which should have been left in the pockets of the people for the purpose of their own business?

There it is. I have the "Hansard" here in my hand. It is almost incredible, but my right hon. friend and his Minister of Finance can inspect it. It is for their behoof that I read it, as well as for the behoof of the whole House and the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to turn my attention to the subject of the Department of the Interior. That department as run by the present Minister of the Interior, has certainly been a much bungled department.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). Take a little breath.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell), I am told, is in spirit imitating the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of the Interior has been learning dancing; I am told that my hon. friend from Kent is learning French; and if he will confine his attention to what he calls his 'entourage,' I think the business of the House will go on much better. I wish the Minister of the Interior was here, because I am going to expose some of his blunders, and one of them especially, which was destined to embarrass my right hon. friend at the beginning of his diplomatic life. Last year, in the presence of the Minister of the Interior, I exposed to the House the fact that this great pamphlet, the official handbook of the Dominion of Canada—I read it here and I am not going to do it again—contained pages of libel on Western Assinibola, declaring that the finest wheat fields in the world, that portion of Canada that Mr. Macoun said was the kidney of the North-west could not grow wheat. If anybody doubts it, I will read the passages again, but as I read them last year and as the blunder is familiar to the people of the west, it is hardly necessary for me to do so. But I think it has been surpassed by a blunder the most signal that probably has ever been perpetrated by any department. As regards that great international commission, of which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is a member and of which my hon. friend the member for Norfolk was, according to the United States papers, a more distinguished member, of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are members, things leaked out as to what took place. Now, I am not going to enter into a discussion of the incidents connected with it, nor am I going to dwell upon the mistakes that the Government has made, because I have things touching my constituents more closely to deal with; but what I am now about to speak of touches very closely the honour of Canada, and it excites my sympathy for the Prime Minister, who, in consequence of the blundering action of the Minister of the Interior, found himself, during that conference in Washington, in a very unpleasant position. It has leaked out that one of the great bones of contention, in fact it was the large bone of contention, between the commissioners for the United States and the commissioners for Her Majesty, was the boundary between the American and Canadian Yukon. It will be remembered that the Minister of the Interior spoke, I think at Vancouver, but I have his speech here. He was coming back from a visit to the Yukon, or rather from a point on the route to Dawson. He declared that he had consulted with Mr. King, who had been at the head of the Boundary Commission, and that he was thoroughly acquainted with the boundary question. I am told that the Prime Minister was presenting the case of Canada and pointing out the boundary that should belong to this country—I am not at liberty to mention the name of the American commissioner who replied to him, but I am told that he said to him: "Sir Wilfrid, is your Minister of the Interior not well posted on the question of the boundary between Canada and the United States in the Yukon district?" I believe the answer came, as it could not fail to come from a loyal leader. "Yes, certainly, I believe that he has studied it under the direction of Mr. King, who has been at the head of the Boundary Commission on this question." "Yes," replied the American commissioner; "well, now, you do not say so: here is a map issued by a department of your own Government showing the boundary between Canada and the United States, and the boundary shown on this map is the American boundary we contend for and not the boundary for which you are contending."

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). What map is that?

Mr. DAVIN. It is a descriptive atlas of western Canada, showing the maps of the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia, the districts of Assiniboia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, a map of the world and of the Dominion of Canada, issued by authority of the Hon. Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior, Ottawa, Canada. There it is, and when you look at the Yukon you see that the boundary is marked as contended for by the Americans, and as against our contention.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where was that printed?

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). It was printed in Chicago.

Mr. DAVIN. It is suggested that this map was printed in Chicago. I will send it over to the Prime Minister that he may look over the boundary. I have no doubt he will recognize it as the map that one of the American commissioners presented for his consideration.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I never saw it before to-day.

Mr. DAVIN. I see that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is behind him, and is giving my right hon. friend the Prime Minister a pointer. I would say here that he must not always reply on the soundness of the advice coming to him from that quarter. No man ever existed in public life in any country so distrusted as the present Minister of Public Works. The whole of the honest Liberalism of the province of Quebec is in revolt against him; all the unbought Liberalism of western Canada is in revolt against him, but by some extraordinary power he keeps his place and exerts his influence over the Prime Minister. Clubs in Montreal pass resolutions against him, but what happens? My right hon. friend writes letters to silence the voice of indignant Liberalism, and he himself tries to make the peace of the Minister of Public Works with the outraged conscience of the more respectable members of the Liberal party in French Canada. This is really one of the most peculiar of positions, that of the Prime Minister of Canada in regard to the Minister of Public Works, and it excites grave feelings in the minds of the Liberals and even of Conservatives. Mr. Speaker, you will remember the story of Mezentius, who used to tie dead bodies to living bodies, not to quicken the dead but to destroy the living. And some Liberals ask the question: Is this close relationship that exists between the Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister going to destroy the Government? Conservatives, not sharing this fear yet having correlative feelings of surprise and alarm, ask: Is it going to launch the ship of state on a rolling sea of corruption without bar or shore? What is to be the end of it? Such are the questions people ask when they see this extraordinary influence exercised over the Prime Minister by the Minister of Public Works. As some of you know, McEwen took respectable and able men, professors of colleges, barristers, merchants, and put them under the control of his will in such a way that while apparently in their senses they could not do other than as he bade them. Some such hypnotic influence as that seems to be possessed by the Minister of Public Works over my right hon. friend the leader of the Government. It is a bad thing for the Liberal Government, yet I would I could wake the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) from his trance; wake him completely from the spell that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) throws over him. Whatever effect it might have on my own party, I would like to wake him and break the baneful chain, because it is a painful thing to contemplate. It recalls a situation that was congenial and captivating to the imagination of the Middle Ages. It is a situation that our own Marlowe played with; a situation that has been treated with consummate power and undying art by Goethe the great German poet. You remember, Mr. Speaker—and probably you will have seen it represented on the stage—you will have seen a beautiful and aspiring and instructed nature; a man with academic relations and learned, brought under the spell of a dark and evil spirit, completely sold as it were to that dark and evil spirit, forced to do its bidding, but rewarded by the gratification of every wordly desire. The kingdoms of the world I will give thee. I will give thee rule, only make yourself subject to me. And the right hon. gentleman has not the power to say "Get thee behind me"; but remains under the spell helpless, supine, and there he sits the Faust of Canadian politics, and behind him the Mephistopheles.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is a very curious thing. Here we have an elaborate descriptive atlas of Canada, 220,000 copies of which have been issued by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and in that atlas he places the boundary between Canada and the United States according to the contention of the United States. I have to accept the statement of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), but what an extraordinary thing that the Prime Minister should never have seen an atlas like this that was issued by the Minister of the Interior as an official document. What an admission! Last year when I pointed out to the Minister of the Interior certain mistakes in a book of his he said he would withdraw it. I do not know whether he has suppressed it or not, but if it is still being circulated, the kidney of the North-west as a grain-growing country is maligned. It is stated in that official document that no wheat could grow on lands where I will take you to men who have farmed 320 acres for 15 years and have each $10,000 made out of growing wheat to their credits in the bank. The title of this book is "An Official Hand-book of the Dominion of Canada." When my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) was in the west and attended some meetings to which I invited him, I exhibited this hand-book, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows very well what effect the false statements it contains had upon the people there. Now we have a map issued from the Department of the Interior with such an egregious blunder as I have described. Perhaps it is hardly a question that should be asked, but I would like to know from my right hon. friend if he has never seen this map, whether that map was not quoted to him at Washington.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There is a note explaining the whole thing on the cover.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not addressing the Minister of Public Works. I am dealing with the Prime Minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There is a note explaining the whole thing, and my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) knows it too.

Mr. DAVIN. I am speaking to the Prime Minister, and what I am asking him is: Was not that map quoted in Washington as a proof that the contention of the American commissioners was correct?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) does not expect me to give any secrets of the commission.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may, however, tell him that it was not or could not, because it is on too small a scale to affect the deliberations.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There is a note which explains the whole thing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When was it put in.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is on the last page, and a very clear note it is.

Mr. DAVIN. This is first-rate. I have made Mephistopheles very angry. He knows very well that I have sent a spear by pointing out this blunder through the incompetency of this Ministry that will let blood flow for many a day. What has happened? Every issue of that map has been withdrawn and if they could have got that copy out of my hands they would have got it too. Sir, this is evidence of gross incompetency.

I will now refer for a moment to the Yukon district. Can you conceive greater blundering than has characterized all the management of the Department of the Interior in regard to the Yukon? I may tell you, that if it were the time and place I could show you that to this hour in the Yukon district there is the grossest possible mismanagement going on. Take the issue of the commission. What was the use of sending Mr. Ogilvie as the commissioner? Mr. Ogilvie when he went up there went into the gold commissioner's office, spoke to one or two clerks, and declared after ten minutes that he was perfectly satisfied. It is an open secret that Mr. Ogilvie has Mr. Fawcett in the hollow of his hands; Mr. Fawcett is Mr. Ogilvie's creature and although there was a chorus of praise every one knows that this Klondike brochure, issued by the Department of the Interior with the name of Mr. Ogilvie, is full of gross errors. People have been induced to go up rivers prospecting on statements made here which are founded on mere hearsay.

Take, for instance, the Stewart River. The Stewart River is described as a splendid place to prospect, and hundreds of men have gone up that Stewart River and neither in the Stewart River nor in the "pups" of the river have they found gold in any paying quantities; although if you read this pamphlet of Mr. Ogilvie's you would feel that all a man had to do was to go up that river and get all the gold he wanted. Mr. Ogilvie has been greatly praised, but the fact is that while he is a good engineer, he is quite as unfit to be Governor of the Yukon as Major Walsh proved to be, to my great disappointment. Major Walsh was a man that if he had been properly instructed might have been able to do his work well, but he was sent up there, as we were told last year both by the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior, with no instructions whatever. And what was the result? Why, he actually thought that he could defy and override the laws of Canada. He defied the laws of the North-west Territories while the Klondike and the Yukon were as much under the jurisdiction of the North-west Territories as they are now under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada, and he behaved in a very extraordinary way. But the information I have about Mr. Ogilvie is also of a very extraordinary character, and I am sorry the Minister of the Interior is not here. I am told, for instance, on good authority that Mr. Ogilvie, in order to raise money, had put a tax on women plying an improper trade.

Mr. J. DOMVILLE (Kings, N.B.) No. I was out there the other day.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I would not dispute an authority like my hon. friend.

Mr. DOMVILLE. No, the women are all free.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I know that my hon. friend is a great authority on these subjects; but my information is, that a tax was imposed upon them, from which in one day $16,000 was raised.

Mr. DOMVILLE. From what—from women?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Oh, no; you are wrong.

Mr. DAVIN. Look at the position of things, Mr. Speaker, in this House. Here we are, debating questions relating to the North-west Territories, questions relating to the boundary between Canada and the United States, questions affecting the moral management of the Yukon; and the authority we have to fall back upon, in order to obtain information, is my hon. and gallant friend. I have a high opinion of my hon. and gallant friend, but he is not a Minister—at least, he is not a Minister yet, and he cannot speak with the authority of the Minister.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DOMVILLE. If my hon. friend would allow me to say one word. Would he take my word for it, that the women are not taxed out there?

Mr. DAVIN. I will take his word for anything he would say on that subject, because I know that it is probably the only subject on which he is thoroughly well informed. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say it is a serious thing that we have not the hon. Minister of the Interior here, when such questions are being debated.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Permit me. I am sorry the Minister of the Interior is not in his seat to-day. If he is not, it is because he is kept in his room by rather serious illness.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not know that, and I am sorry to hear it. I am very glad he is not neglecting his duties. However, I have here a speech of the hon. and gallant member for King's (Mr. Domville), in which he declares, that there has been in the Klondike the grossest possible mismanagement.

Mr. DOMVILLE. No, excuse me. I never made any such statement. I ask my hon. friend to read where I made any such statement.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not intend to trouble the House with my hon. friend's eloquence; but now I shall have to do it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Well, do it.

Mr. DAVIN. I will do anything to oblige my hon. friend. Is that my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) who is making an interruption? Let us have a good one, as he said when he went into a Winnipeg cigar store the other day, and the store-keeper asked him whether he would like a foreign or a domestic cigar. "I do not know," he said, "but give us a good one." Give us a good interruption, if you give us one at all. Now, I have here what my hon. friend from King's said, because I treasure what he says. There is a virility about all my hon. friend's utterances that I admire.

Mr. DOMVILLE. May I ask my hon. friend, what paper he is quoting from?

Mr. DAVIN. First, I must have my hon. friend deny it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I cannot deny it until I know what you are reading from.

Mr. DAVIN. This is what he says about the 10 per cent royalty:

It is ridiculous; simply ridiculous. As a result of it men are hiding away their gold and getting it out of the country, and I do not blame them. I would do it myself. If the royalty was 2 per cent, more would be realized from it than from 10 per cent. The present system simply put a premium on rascality. It originated from reports of officials here, made in Ottawa, that the mines were owned by Yankees, and that they were richer than they are.

The hon. gentleman does not deny that ?

Mr. DOMVILLE. I cannot tell what my hon. friend is reading from. He may have made it up. I do not say he did ; but when he quotes a statement from me, I want him to give the authority he got it from.

Mr. DAVIN. I am quoting from a report of the hon. gentleman's speech, which is quoted in the Winnipeg "Telegram" of August 12, 1898.

Mr. DOMVILLE. That is all right. I do not admit that I made that statement.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend can keep his soul in peace, because it will console him to know that it does not matter the least to me or to the people of Canada whether he ever said it or not.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Why do you talk about it ?

Mr. DAVIN. But I will say this, that the information I have is, that the 10 per cent royalty is a mistake, and that more money would be obtained from a more moderate royalty. In a speech which I already quoted from the Minister of the Interior, he said, when asked about the banks, that the banks would go up there. He was asked, whether he would provide that the management of the banks in the Yukon would be such as would be just to the miners. He distinctly said in that speech—I am quoting from memory, but I have his speech here—that he would take care that justice was done. What is the fact at the present time ? Mr. Ogilvie went up there, and the first thing he did, when he went there, was to get his little council to pass an ordinance forbidding payments to officials in gold dust. The principal currency of a mining camp like Dawson is gold dust ; but if a miner goes into the gold commissioner's office, or if he has to pay for land that he buys from the Government, the Government will not take payment in gold dust. He has to go to the bank, and the bank will not give him anything like an equivalent of the value he used to get. The bank will not give him the actual purchasing power of the gold dust. The consequence is, that the banks there are making a huge profit, and are fleecing and plundering the miners.

Mr. TAYLOR. Senator Cox's bank.

Mr. DAVIN. One of them is Senator Cox's bank. I believe. There is another thing to which I wish to draw attention. The chartered banks are doing what my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), whom I now see present, when he used to sit on this side, was wont to denounce. He was then very much taken up with the question of usurious rates of interest, and I rather think he made an effort in this House to control the rate of interest debtors could be forced to pay. Well, what are the facts to-day in Dawson ? The chartered banks there are charging the usurious interest of two per cent per month. I may be told that this is no affair of the Government but a purely commercial matter. That, however, is not the doctrine which was preached here before by some of the present leaders of the Liberal party. They used to hold out to the people that if they ever got into power they would not allow usury to prevail in any part of Canada, and certainly would not allow it to run rampant and be practised by chartered banks. That surely is a most serious matter.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) whether there is a Mr. Emery Lafontaine in his employ at present. Anyway there was a Mr. Lafontaine in the employ of the Public Works Department, who went up to Dawson last year. If an inquiry be held, and there must be an inquiry into the whole of the Dawson management, it can be proved, I am informed, that his conduct as well as that of Mr. Ogilvie has been anything but becoming officials in any department. Mr. Ogilvie is not heavy enough for the position of commissioner. To use a French phrase, he has not the "exterieur" for his position ; he has not the experience or the weight for his position. He is not fit for it and has made mistakes, some grave and some trifling, but even the trifling ones show the man's character. For instance, during the fire at Dawson, they got an experienced man to work the fire engine. Mr. Ogilvie, however, came along, and without consulting the mounted police who were around, without consulting anybody, said to this man, who was working away at the engine : Get out, you are not in uniform. I would not like to repeat what this man replied, because I would be guilty of irreverence, but he turned round and said to Mr. Ogilvie something to this effect : You are not the creator of the world. I may not be the creator of the world, retorted our commissioner, but I am Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner of the Yukon, and you must get out of this. He then called a policeman to take in charge this man, who was actually working away at the engine, and had him sent to jail. The people around hooted and jeered, and there was danger of such a scene as that described by Lord Macaulay, when one of the worst of the Claudian gens had behaved so improperly that the Romans gathered up their gowns and took up the benches and created great riot. The result was that this high and mighty commissioner had to take back water and let the man return to his work. That may be a trifle, but it shows the character of the man. I am told that Mr. Ogilvie is in with Mr. Fawcett. I do not wish to say anything more about that, because it is only rumour, but I am told further that he is a cousin of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). That, I do not think is quite proper, and if there be an inquiry, as there should, there ought to be one of the broadest character and not merely an official one. Mr. Lafontaine went up there, and if we have an inquiry, I have the names of witnesses who will go into the box—and these names I will give to whoever may have the authority to call witnesses—and prove that he used to go into the gold commissioner's office and look over the book of abandoned claims and use for his own personal advantage the information he got there. This book, it seems, shows all the claims had to be abandoned by poor miners who were not able to fulfil the conditions, although many of these abandoned claims are good ones. The public outside were not made aware of the fact that these claims were abandoned, the whole thing was kept in the dark; they did not know that these claims were open to be restaked, and Mr. Lafontaine, after looking over this book, would go out and send one of his agents or go himself to some miner and arrange for taking them up. People would say: Lafontaine is in with the Government, he belongs to one of the departments, he knows all about this, he knows where there is a good mine, let some one stake it out, and give Mr. Lafontaine one-half, and one-quarter to Lafontaine's imp or acolyte or messenger or whatever you like to call him, and the man who stakes the claim may keep the other quarter. According to the information I have, that was done on a large scale by this officer of the Department of Public Works.

Let me refer now to the case of MacGregor and Wade. They, the two principal criminals, fled from the Yukon the moment Mr. Ogilvie went up, and what was the story told? Mr. MacGregor who was sent up as an inspector of mines, and, therefore, was guilty of misconduct and of a breach of the Order in Council, as I am informed, went directly contrary to the existing law, in staking out claims, made a raid on the Monte Christo Island, where he and his friends staked claims, and the result is that in consequence of his official knowledge he has made some $65,000 or $75,000.

But it appears that the whole conduct of the department up there is on a par with this. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has organized the department as no department was ever organized, namely, on a personal basis. His official staff is made up of heelers, of his own friends, of relatives of his own, and I may tell the right hon. Prime Minister, who is interested in knowing it, that the Yukon is being exploited in a manner to throw grave suspicion on the Department of the Interior. And I say that if there is anything like an adequate inquiry, it will be shown that lands out there are being kept back from being staked in the interests of somebody or another—I suppose in the interest of men like Drolet, who got such dredging advantages as we showed last year he obtained, and then went over to England and sold them for vast sums—went over paupers, he and others, and returned millionaires or half millionaires. Is this a sample of the very pure administration that the Minister of Trade and Commerce promised those patrons in the letter I have read and which he published in what was then the subsidized organ of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) who is now looking at me? I wish he had been here when I read that letter. It would have done his heart good to hear the vigorous protests made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), as to the sincerity with which he grasped to his bosom the Patrons and their platform. He will see them in "Hansard," and I beg him to read, mark and inwardly digest the sentiments. Not even after looking into his own heart and conscience and his pledges to the House, will he be able to plumb the depth of the sincerity of the Government of which he is a member, as he will be on reading those words written by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Well, there is Wade. He is a sort of pooh-bah holding a lot of offices. He too had his reign. And both of them came back. But, first, I am sorry to say, Commissioner Walsh came back, and what did he say? The first thing he did was to make a report, and the first thing that report does is to prove that the statement made by the Minister of the Interior from his place in this House was incorrect—that is the strongest language in which parliamentary rules will allow me to put it. Mr. Walsh says positively that his orders were to go to Dawson. Positively from his place last session the Minister of the Interior said that Mr. Walsh's orders were not to go to Dawson. Mr. Walsh said he did not see why officials should not stake claims. And when McGregor came—he is a horse dealer, I may say.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). Did you say horse thief?

Mr. DAVIN. Well, Sir, that is an inspired utterance, for, I may say, the police were after McGregor a short time before for horse stealing in the west. He was a horse dealer, and I suppose the Minister of the Interior thought that he could tell the quality of a mine, as he could the quality of a horse, by looking at its mouth. Well, McGregor and Wade came back, and what did they say? They said they had permission to stake claims. Permission from whom? McGregor could have had permission from nobody except the Minister of the Interior, who is the master of the department. Well, Sir, that is a serious charge, and it is part and parcel of the egregious bungling.

Now, take a feature of the hon. Minister's department that there is great boasting about, and in regard to which I have never said a word of condemnation. I have never said a word adverse to the Minister of the Interior in regard to immigration. My right hon. friend the Premier will remember that when he was sitting on this side of the House, a great friend of mine, Sir John Carling, was Minister of Agriculture. I have since been sorry that even once and indirectly I should have girded against the department under him, because I believe he was a good Minister of Agriculture. One year—I think it was 1890—he only had $50,000 in the Estimates for immigration. As a western man, I attached great importance to immigration, and I was angry that any man should be content to remain in the department with only $50,000 provided for that service. I contended that we should have plenty of means for immigration, and that the immigration branch should be transferred to the Department of the Interior; and it was on that occasion that I said that the Cabinet of my late right hon. leader was a “cabinet of antiques.” And I may tell you what happened then. My hon. friend the whp (Mr. Taylor) came over, after that disturbing speech, and asked me where I was. I said: I am where I have always been, a true supporter of the Conservative party, but independent on North-west matters. This position is shown in all my addresses to the people of the North-west and it was because I was so independent of the Liberal-Conservative Government that I was able to accomplish so many things as I did for the farmers of the North-west Territories. For instance, the Dominion Lands Act—I took that Act and turned it upside down. Why, even since you came into power I have accomplished something for the North-west Territories. My hon. friend the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has been making speeches in Calgary and in Regina. When he was in Regina, unfortunately, I was speaking at Balgonie. Otherwise I should like to have heard him, and also my hon. friend from Lisgar, and another who spoke there, because I am certain I should have been interested. But there was one extraordinary thing about the speech of my hon. friend from Alberta. When he spoke in Calgary he tried to show what the Liberal party had done for the west. Two things he dwelt upon particularly. In the first place, he compared the number of creameries in Alberta at the present time with the number that were there in 1896. But the increase in those creameries is in consequence of a motion that I moved in 1896. And the first thing the hon. gentleman did when he broke cover on coming down here was to oppose my motion. I think it would have been more in accordance with the independent character he loves to assume if the hon. gentleman had not insisted that the Liberal Government were deserving of that credit, but had said: I made a great mistake when I went down in 1896. I was impatient to flesh my maiden sword on somebody or other, and I attacked the member for West Assiniboia. Fancy what I did. I actually assailed Davin; I live after assailing him and I am here. The hon. gentleman will remember that he opposed my motion about the creameries, and he should have told these people that it was in consequence of that motion, and not in consequence of any policy of the Liberal Government, that these creameries exist in Alberta to-day. At Regina, as well as at Calgary, the hon. gentleman made much of the statement that the Liberal Government had modified the Dominion Lands Act to suit the ranchers. Of course, if the Liberal Government had opposed it, I could not have had it passed. But the change that was made was proposed in my Bill, and that Bill was adopted by the Minister of the Interior. The Liberal Government was entitled to the credit of not opposing it; if they had not yielded to me, it could not have been passed; but they are not deserving of credit for it any more than they are deserving of credit for the hon. gentleman's vote against them on the Teslin Lake Railway, or the hon. gentleman's denunciations of the many peccadilloes of the Minister of the Interior. We are in this extraordinary position—that everything the Government and its supporters take credit for is found to have been proposed from this side, either by the former Government or by myself.

I have dwelt on the mismanagement of the Department of the Interior. I have said that I have not spoken against its immigration policy. And I will tell you why. As long as a man is fit to assimilate with us, however poor he may be or wherever he may come from, I would not say a word against him. I have never said a word against the Galicians, who are the bête noir of my hon. friend from Alberta. He has assailed the Galicians and assailed the Department of the Interior for bringing them in. Others have assailed the Doukhobors. Now, Sir, I believe that the Doukhobors, those immigrants from the theatre of the sufferings and triumphs of Prometheus to this new and happier stage where humanity enjoys all that the friend of humanity could have desired it to enjoy—these people seem to me to be a most interesting class. But, Sir, I have this criticism to make. I cannot agree with colonial settlements; I cannot agree with planting colonies. It is a most serious thing, because the colony, as a rule, is cut off from the public opinion of the country around. It renders it very difficult to make Canadians of them. Here we are, a people that lay so much store on the public school as a nationalizing influence, and here is our immigration policy which, by making settlements by colonies, strikes a serious blow at the nationalization of our people. Suppose it goes on, where is it to stop? Before you know where you are you will have an immense and controlling portion of people in those vast tracts who are outside of Canada sentiment altogether. So that while I am ready to welcome the Doukhobors, and the Galicians, for that matter, I am opposed to settlements by colonies. Mix them up with our own people, let them amalgamate with our own people.

I regret the cause of the absence of the Minister of the Interior as well as his absence. But I must go on, because I have to leave for the Lower Provinces. I object to exceptional treatment to any immigrants. If there is to be any exceptional treatment, I say it should be given to our own kith and kin; to the people of Ireland, to the people of Scotland, to the people of England, to the people of France, if you will. But any way, if there is to be exceptional treatment, it should be at the command of the possible immigrants in England, Scotland or Ireland. Give any intelligent man authority to go to England and make the proposals to the poorer classes, to the English agricultural labourer, that have been made to these very interesting and welcome Doukhobors; and we shall have the Englishman, the Scotchman and the Irishman coming into this country. We have to-day an immigration agent, in fact we have paid a premium to a gentleman, Mr. Devlin, who used to be a member of this House, in order to silence him, in order to prevent him from knifing the Minister because, in his view, the Minister had been false to its promises. So the Government said: We will get rid of him, we will put the whole sea between him and us, we will give him such a salary as has never been given to any immigration agent before. Having sent him to Ireland, what has been the result? Have they got any results from Ireland? No, Sir. Then take a Scotchman. Why, Sir, the best immigrants that you can possibly have from any country are the thrifty Scotchmen, and how the Scotchmen would jump at such treatment as has been dealt out to those gentlemen from the Caucasus. What have they done there? The hon. gentleman in order to get farmers and agricultural labourers from Scotland, does he go to a Scotch settlement? Does he go down to Glengarry and say to the gentlemen in Glengarry: Give me a good Scotchman to go as an immigration agent to Scotland? No, he does not do anything of that sort. But he goes down to Rideau Hall, and I suppose he said to Lord Aberdeen: Lord Aberdeen, I would like to bring out a few shiploads of butlers, good Scotch butlers. We have grown so wealthy, we are so prosperous now in Canada that we want to put on great style. We want some first-class butlers. Will you lend me a butler? And the butler is provided, he is sent to Scotland as an immigration agent, and really I do not know what great results he has achieved. He came west to us, and he visited some farms, and I am told on good authority that, looking at some timothy seed, he said: That is the most interesting specimen of wheat products that I have seen. He was looking at a binder, and he asked the man who owned the binder: Now, how do you run that? Do the horses go before it or go behind it? There, Mr. Speaker, is a sample of their immigration agents.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Was this man Lord Aberdeen's butler?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, he is the immigration agent in Scotland. Now, I have not heard that he has brought out a single farmer; and I have sought in vain the records of the department to find that he has brought out a single Scotch butler since he went there.

When we come to the expenditure and ask how our debt is running up, we have only to recall what came out here last session. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has the courage of his convictions, his boldness is admirable, he does not shrink from anything. He was speaking at Valleyfield and he said. We have expended much this year, but wait till you see us next year. These gentlemen drunk with the prosperity which they did not create, when they are confronted with their vast expenditure and their debt piling up, instead of saying in a repentant tone: Well, we will do better; they say: Wait till you see us next year, then we will have an orgie such as will throw the present financial debauch completely into the background. It reminds me of a circumstance that occurred in one of our departments here which used to amuse my late right hon. leader, Sir John A. Macdonald. There was a gentleman, a good officer, but his habits kept him back. He overcame his habits, and he was promoted from the rank of a third-class clerk to that of a second-class clerk. He could not stand it; he had to celebrate it, and the next day when he came to the office, his chief said: "Is not this a nice way for you to show your appreciation of what the Government has done for you?" The gentleman asked: "What do you mean?" The chief answered: "You were drunk yesterday." "How do you know?" "I saw you drunk, sir, and you were very drunk." "What time was it?" "Why, sir, it was two o'clock." "Well," he said, "you should have seen me at six." That is something like what the Minister of Public Works said. Drunk with the prosperity for which, as I say, they should have no credit, power unearned and undeserved, glorying in that policy which for eighteen years they repudiated, priding themselves on having cast off the honourable uniform of Liberalism and donned the livery of the manufacturers, the hon. Minister of Public Works cries: "Yes, we spend much now; wait until you see us next year." Well, Sir, I may tell you that the people of this country do not think that it was he who made the prosperity, nor the gentlemen who have abandoned Liberalism who have made that prosperity, and if next year or this year they should come face to face with betrayed Liberals and a disappointed country they will find that my hon. friend's cynical attitude is one that does not commend itself to the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I have probably lengthened out these few remarks a little longer than I intended, but as I have one or two more topics to deal with we had better call it six o'clock.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I repeat, Sir, my strong regrets that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior is not able to be in his place. I greatly regret the cause. As he is not here I feel compelled to go more particularly into his relation to the North-west Territories, because if he were here, it would have been enough to have stated, as I have stated, that he has been false to his promise and to his pledges to the people of the west, but, as he is not here, I feel bound to prove fully what I have indicated. Sir, I have shown how completely forsworn the Prime Minister is; I have shown how completely recreant to his former principles and pledges the Minister of Trade and Commerce is; I am now going to show how still more recreant to his promises and pledges and former principles the Minister for the West in the Cabinet is. Mr. Speaker, you remember that my late friend, Mr. Dalton McCarthy during the election of 1896 ran for two constituencies; he ran for Brandon and he ran for his old constituency, and the present Minister of the Interior was his manager in the former election. Here is a Bill printed under the direction of the Minister of the Interior, on a white ground in red letters:

Vote for McCarthy, the friend of British connection and national schools,—

And then come the items I want to call attention to——reduced freight rates, free machinery, free lumber.

My hon. friend the Finance Minister is in his place and he knows as well as I do that there has been no relief in regard to freight rates, or lumber, or the machinery used by the farmer of the North-west Territories as promised in that bill or placard. On the 20th May, 1896, a meeting was held at Brandon, at which addresses were delivered by Mr. Sifton, Mr. James A. Smart, the present Deputy Minister of the Interior, and others, and at which my late lamented friend, Mr. Dalton McCarthy, was nominated. Mr. Sifton, now the Minister of the Interior, strongly supported Mr. McCarthy, on the tariff, and a resolution was passed in which the platform of 1893 was endorsed and in which these words were used:

We condemn the Government of the Dominion for its adherence to the policy of protection, which imposes grievous burdens upon the agricultural community without any compensating advantages.

"We condemn the Government of the Dominion." Why, Sir, you can read that resolution to-day, and it has intenser significance. On Thursday, May 28th, 1896, Mr. Dalton McCarthy was enthusiastically received at Brandon. Mr. Sifton spoke on that occasion. The Minister of the Interior, at that time Mr. Sifton, spoke at the meeting there, and this is what he said:

We have in Mr. Dalton McCarthy a man who supports our principles.

Along with others, I have been blamed with having changed my principles; but where does a better Liberal policy exist than in "tariff for revenue only."

That is quoted because it is one of the planks in the address of Mr. McCarthy. This is what is said about the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) on that occasion:

He closed with an earnest appeal to the electors that every one who felt his duty to the country as a country of his own, would work hard until the 23rd of June that Dalton McCarthy may be our representative.

You remember, Sir, that Mr. McCarthy elected to sit for his old constituency, and a convention assembled at Souris on October 27th, 1896, for the purpose of choosing a candidate to represent Brandon in the room of Dalton McCarthy. This is what Mr. Sifton of that day said:

When Mr. McCarthy was elected last June, the people here did the best day's work ever done in one day in Manitoba, for they furnished an argument that could not be subverted, and secured a man of the utmost prominence to advocate—

To advocate what, Mr. Speaker:

—to advocate their views on the tariff.

And he says elsewhere:

We men of Manitoba have certain strong views—

Strong views upon what?

—upon the tariff question, and it is doubly necessary that we should be represented.

In the address that Mr. Sifton issued to the electors of Brandon and dated November 18th, this is what he says:

It will be my especial duty to lend my assistance in bringing about such reform in the tariff and such alterations in the methods of administering North-western affairs as will enhance the prosperity of the farming community, and thus lay the best possible foundation for a successful immigration policy.

This gentleman (Mr. Sifton), prior to his entering the Ministry spoke in that way, but let me read what the same gentleman said at Perth the other day—and I quote his exact words now, as I quoted them from memory before:

The tariff question in Canada is settled. It is, I venture to say, a dead issue. There will be changes, but as an issue between the parties it is dead. We have succeeded in solving the difficulties, and our opponents, if in power, would not alter it, because they are satisfied, and we are satisfied.

You, Sir, know the way the Winnipeg "Tribune" commented on that. The "Tribune," a Liberal newspaper, said: We would want a new political vocabulary to understand the Minister of the Interior; and the writer went on to express his utter astonishment that any man, a member of the Liberal Government—at least, a so-called Liberal Government—would talk in that way.

There are other features about the method of the Minister of the Interior which justifies his title to the young Napoleon. We know that Napoleon was unscrupulous, was tyrannical, and was impatient of independence of thought. His sole idea was to have one mind in the country, and to have that mind—his own—control everything. One of the methods of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is this. He has established here in Ottawa a central press bureau, whence letters are sent to any papers that will publish them. The consequence is that you can take one paper after another in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and you will find a letter from "Our correspondent at Ottawa." It may be the "Bally Boomerang Gazette," or it may be the "Shang Wang Sentinel," or it may be the Red Deer "Cultivator," or it may be the "Townships Incisor"; but whatever the title, if it be a Liberal paper there is a letter in it identical with the others. Not only that, but leading articles are sent out from Ottawa. This is what is called in the west the "Siftonian Reptile Press." Sir, let me call your attention to the gravity of this method. The press is one of the most efficient instruments of government in a free community. The organized opinion of which I spoke in the earlier part of my remarks is mainly given voice and effect to in this country by means of the press, and in order that the press shall do it, it must be an independent press. You cannot have a paper published 2,000 miles or 1,500 miles from Ottawa and the articles concocted for it here, and at the same time have that newspaper fulfil the functions which the press ought to fulfil. Sir, the system thus adopted is a fraud on the community. To have these letters sent out under the direction of one of the Ministers of the Crown, and sent out in order to boom that one Minister cuts at the very root of the independence of the press. These letters are full of the greatness of the young Napoleon; he is a heaven-born Minister; everything he has done is wonderful, and his immigration policy is unequalled. Let me say en passant that in that immigration policy he has only followed the principle laid down by his predecessors. Mr. Daly brought in some colonies of immigrants and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is doing the same thing. I did not at all agree with Mr. Daly having done so, because I disapprove of immigration by colonies. Everything that the young Napoleon does is perfect according to these letters. But sometimes a mistake is made, and one of the letters was sent to an independent paper called the "Grenfell Sun," edited by a very able man, Mr. John Nicholls. That paper contained the following article in its edition some time ago:

A few days ago we received a communication from a gentleman in Ottawa, offering to send us a weekly political letter free of charge. We have received one already which we have published entire this week. We are always thankful to get live, up-to-date correspondence of either local or general interest, but judging from the letter we publish, our friend in Ottawa seems to be writing from an altogether partisan point of view in favour of the Government. Now, we desire to do the Government every justice, as we appreciate the difficulties which men in such positions have to meet, but we can do that the more effectually, and also act more in accordance with our views of the public interest, by judging the Government by its own deeds, and not through any party-coloured spectacles. While therefore, we thank our friend for his courteous offer, we shall have to reserve to ourselves of judging how far his letters may be intended to serve mere party and not general interests, and to act accordingly.

This system of things was commenced by the Minister of the Interior, it seems, even before he became Minister of the Interior, because a Mr. W. G. King, who was one of his acolytes, and had fallen out with him, writes on the 4th of September, 1897, to express his disgust at the way he had been treated, and declares that the Minister of the Interior was deeply indebted to him, amongst other reasons for this:

And he owes it also to the writer, who, by the judicious management of the entire south Manitoba press, formed the entire public sentiment in Mr. Sifton's favour, which ultimately secured his election by acclamation.

So here, on the eve of his coming down to Ottawa, this Napoleonic gentleman of Napoleonic instincts and Napoleonic methods, had already corrupted the entire press of southern Manitoba. He had sent down a man who unblushingly declares that he corrupted that press in order to secure the election of the hon. gentleman by acclamation. Says the "Telegram":

The judicious management of the western press for the fictitious manufacture of public sentiment in Mr. Sifton's favour has been systematically pursued ever since. So gross has it become, that nine papers published simultaneously as their own editorial an article defending Mr. Sifton, which has been prepared at Ottawa, and a number of others publish the same article otherwise than as an editorial.

Nine papers publishing an editorial, declaring that this gentleman who presides over the Department of the Interior is everything that is to be desired as a statesman—an editorial concocted in the Department of the Interior itself. Why, Sir, it is a monstrous state of things. As an old Liberal, Sir, I think you will be pained to learn that the organ of the Minister of the Interior in Winnipeg is laying down doctrines not only contrary to Liberal principles but contrary to the principles of Liberal and Conservatives in every free and constitutional country the world over. The Winnipeg "Free Press" of February 6th takes occasion to comment severely on the action of the late Mr. Jameson in speaking at a meeting as follows:—

The effect of our representative system was to place a good deal of power in the hands of one man, who, as long as he has the support of the House of Commons, he was to a great extent a dictator. As soon as the Cabinet are united the members have to choose between following their decision and practically voting against his party. As a consequence, there might be a great deal of hasty legislation introduced which might not have the approval of a great number of members, and, under the ideas of party discipline which prevail, that legislation goes through anyway.

It is well known that Mr. Jameson, who was a man of large mind and broad sympathies, was entirely impatient of the boss system of machine politics that obtains here to-day in the Liberal party. Well, Sir, he was taken to task by the organ of the Minister of the Interior, which declares that this gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that a member of Parliament should be independent. Not only that, but it says he is under a complete misunderstanding as to what is our parliamentary system. Referring to some extracts, which it quotes from a book, it says:

If these extracts are read over carefully, it will be seen that the Government dictates everything to Parliament, and that it is in accordance with our system that it should be so. Parliament is at liberty to reject the advice of the Government, but it does so at peril of losing the services of that Government. It is indispensable that the House should have a leader, and that responsible Minister is not in the least injured by being called a dictator.

And it goes on to say that the proper view of a responsible Minister is that he is a dictator to the party. I may say here, looking back at the past history of the Parliaments in which I have sat, that anybody who goes over that history will see that it was because I acted with the independence I did since 1887, when I struck the first note of independence here, right on to the defeat of the Government—voting against them, and acting against them whenever it was necessary in the interest of the North-west Territories—it was for that reason I was able to do more than any other private member ever accomplished. Now, Sir, what are we to think of a Liberal newspaper which comes out and declares as follows:—

It is laid down that the Government is not only responsible for legislation, but the authorities go so far as to say that "it is the special duty of the Government, as the responsible leaders (dictators) of legislation, and the chosen guardians of the public interests in Parliament, to watch carefully the progress of private legislation in the House and its committees, and see that it does not in any way interfere with the policy of the Ministry." It will be seen from this that the dictatorship is a fundamental part of the British system of parliamentary government.

I say, as everybody who is acquainted with the constitutional history of England knows, that the true duty a member of Parliament has to perform is to express the opinion of the country and especially of his constituents. He comes here to confer. This is the great council of the nation. We are not the mere puppets that this writer has made out. We are the persons who govern the country, and these gentlemen of the Government are only a committee into whose hands, for convenience sake, we place the duties and the great responsibilities that are ours. But, Sir, this is in entire keeping with the view dear to the heart of the present Minister of the Interior, because, Sir, you remember what happened in regard to that monstrous transaction, the Teslin Lake Railway. You remember that seven days before Parliament met that gentleman had a contract—a contract that was not worth the paper it was written on without the sanction of this Parliament—signed. Seven days before Parliament met, that gentleman had that contract signed in secret, and thus showed a high-handed contempt for the independence and authority of this Parliament.

Having mentioned that Teslin Lake Railway, Mr. Speaker, I may say that since we were here last year, the Minister of the Interior has placed the price of $10 an acre on all the gold-bearing land in the Yukon. You remember, Sir, what we were told from these benches. We were told by one Minister of the Crown that the gold-bearing land that was to be given to Mann & Mackenzie might turn out to be worth nothing—that it was all a huge gamble, and now not an acre of it can be had for less than $10. Let me dwell on the monstrosity of the bargain made by the Minister of the Interior with Mackenzie & Mann for that road, and I am going to point out features of it that were unknown to us last year, or at least were not fully known. First and foremost, you have 25,000 acres of this gold-bearing land which is now valued at $10 an acre, or $250,000, for the purpose of building one mile of a little tramway.

You have 25,000 acres, worth on their face, without anything being done at all, $250,000. You give that for the purpose of building what? One mile of a little tramway, just the length of two quarter sections, but the best way of bringing it home to the farmers is this. Divide the 25,000 acres by 640, the number of acres in a section, and you have thirty-nine sections of gold-bearing land given to build the length of two quarters of sections of a one-horse tramway. But what have we discovered since? From the North-west Territories was sent, in order to carry out certain regulations considered necessary, Mr. Bulyea, a prominent Liberal in Dominion politics, who is a member of the local government. He has told us what has been told by more than one traveller, that that Hootalinqua River would have been perfectly useless as one of the links of that Teslin Lake Railway. Not only that, but on the other side there is an immense marsh, and the most recent reports we have from the Klondike country are to the effect that the worst possible route that could have been chosen was that route. What were we told last session when there was a possibility of that happening which did ultimately happen, namely, the rejection of that Bill by the Senate? We were told that the people would starve. Have they starved? No. We were told that great evils would result. Great evils have not resulted. It was asserted to be the most feasible line. But a line has been built far into that country without one dollar of help from the Dominion Government, and everything that has happened since has been of a character to demonstrate what I lay down here, that from the beginning to the end there has been nothing but bungling in the Klondike.

Coming back once more to the immigration policy of the department and the immigration of the Doukhobors, there is something wrong, as I will show you, Mr. Speaker. A special arrangement was made with regard to this Doukhobor immigration. So far as one can make out from the papers, seven dollars a head were given to these people. Whether given directly to the immigrants or to Count Tolstoi, I do not know, but there is something to be explained, and I refer to this in order that it may go on "Hansard," and that we may get an explanation by and by from the hon. Minister of Interior (Mr. Sifton). A committee met in London and collected money to bring out the Doukhobors, and it seems that Count Tolstoi chartered vessels from Batoum to bring these immigrants here. Well, some 2,300 immigrants came out in one ship, and $7 a head for each of these would do much more than charter one of such vessels as brought them from Batoum, so that I think there is something to be inquired into regarding the details of that arrangement. I repeat that I should like to see something like the same consideration given to our own people in England, Scotland and Ireland.

I wish to refer to the ignorance on the part of the department as to its proper position with regard to the Yukon. And I think that, considering that my hon. friend the Minister of Interior (Mr. Sifton) is a lawyer, this ignorance is inexcusable. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that last session, and I think also in 1897, I called the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the rival jurisdictions that might possibly arise in the Yukon, and I think I suggested that the Minister should at once inform himself of his exact position and the exact rights in the Dominion Government in that Yukon territory, and indicated what was my own strong opinion that it was the local government in the territories that had jurisdiction there. Well, what do we find? We find that the department here began to exercise the functions of the local territorial government, and not only that, but Mr. Smart actually telegraphed to Mr. Justice Richardson not to receive any recommendation for permits from the local government in the territory. The consequence was that a correspondence, which I hope to move for in order that we may have the opportunity of reading it, took place, and the hon. Minister of Interior made a statement, which I do not think we can congratulate him upon as a lawyer, because if any man were ever hopelessly sat upon he was in that correspondence, the upshot of which was he had to yield completely to the contentions made by the Attorney General for the Territories. While Mr. Bulyea was on his way up he met Major Walsh, who was then the Commissioner of the Yukon. They met by appointment, and Mr. Bulyea showed Major Walsh the Order in Council under which he held his appointment, and his authority, under which the regulations were passed which he was instructed to enforce. The first officer of the Minister of the Interior there, Major Walsh, scouted the idea of his appointment, and held that the appointment and regulations did not amount to anything. Mr. Bulyea then showed him the North-west Territories Act, under which the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories has the sole right to issue permits and to regulate all matters in connection with the liquor traffic, and pointed out to him that the Act of the Parliament of Canada under which his appointment was made could not be superseded by an Order in Council or instructions from the Ottawa Government. Mr. Bulyea went to the Yukon and got to Dawson. The first sign of coming trouble was the receipt by Mr. Constantine, the inspector of mounted police out there, of a letter from Major Walsh. When, as a result, the former resigned from the Board, he gave Mr. Bulyea by request a copy of the letter. Mr. Bulyea read it to the House. Major Walsh wrote cautioning Mr. Constantine against recognizing the man sent out by the North-west Territories Government to issue wholesale liquor permits and regulate the tariff; that Mr. Bulyea seemed to be a first rate fellow but had no business to be there. Mr. Bulyea pointed out that such a letter from his superior officer placed Mr. Constantine in a difficult position.

Next day they met again, and the major seemed in very bad humour. Major Walsh said, he was surprised that, after what he had told Mr. Bulyea, the latter should have interfered with the liquor business. Bulyea replied, that he was acting strictly by authority and under express instructions from the lawful authorities. The major got angry, and, as it was Sunday, and a crowd commenced to gather, Bulyea moved away. Walsh informed him that he (Bulyea) had no jurisdiction, that he (Walsh) would see all the parties and tell them that anybody had a right to engage in the retail liquor business, regardless of Bulyea, and that Bulyea had no machinery for enforcing regulations.

Then, later on in this report, we are told how the major gave licenses to whom he pleased, and refused licenses to whom he pleased, and the result was, that, after a short time, he introduced such confusion into Dawson that Dawson was back again to the old system of no restriction whatever. You ask: Why, then, did not Mr. Bulyea enforce the law? He tried to enforce it. But Wade was the only lawyer, and Wade would not act for him, and when another lawyer came, he was afraid of Wade, and would not take instructions, while the magistrates were afraid of Walsh. So here was the proper representative of the only legal authority in these matters, namely, Mr. Bulyea, let and hindered by the officers of the Department of the Interior, the magistrates afraid of the Attorney General to act, and the whole process of law hindered and hampered by a Dominion official. Mr. Speaker, this same kind of bungling still goes on: similar incapacity, illustrated by what I have read to the House, is still rampant there. I think I have substantiated, so far, at all events, as the Department of the Interior is concerned what I said last session, or a couple of sessions ago—a remark which created so much perturbation in the mind of the Minister of the Interior—that this Administration has not the instinct of government.

Now, I will come back to this map. When I was exposing the colossal blunder of having, in a map issued by the Department of the Interior, the Yukon boundary shown as contended for by the Americans, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) asked to see the map. The map was sent over to him, and what does he point out, as though it was a cause of triumph. He points out a note here at the end: "The question of the boundary between Canada and Alaska is undecided. The boundary line is shown on the map as claimed by the United States." But anybody who looks at the printing of that note, will see that it is in a different type from the line immediately above it. It is plain, the printing of this was an afterthought. The colossal blunder had been committed of having this map, "issued by the authority of the Hon. Clifford Sifton," printed and published in Chicago, and, when it was pointed out by the critics that the printers in Chicago had put in the boundary as contended for by the United States, evidently these maps were sent out to a printer in Ottawa, and on the whole two hundred thousand this note was printed. What is the meaning of this system of giving work away from our own people, sending to the United States to have our maps for the Department of the Interior? When you pass the building where our currency is issued, you will see the sign, and what is it? Is it "Canadian Bank Note Company"? No, it is "American"—it is an American institution. I confess to you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not understand this system of going outside of our country to have work done, when we have men in the country perfectly competent to do it. But when such a blunder has been committed as in this case, I do not understand the action of the Minister of the Crown who will have a little note of that kind printed, instead of frankly acknowledging that he had committed a blunder and withdrawing the evidence of that blunder from the public sight.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his speech, did not recall the Cartwright of this side of the House. We all remember what a lion of the Tribe of Judah the Minister of Trade and Commerce was, when he was on this side, free and unshackled, preaching the Liberal doctrines dear to George Brown and Alexander Mackenzie. He was the strong fighting man of the Liberal party. But now he has gone over there, and he, the denouncer of nepotism, he the denouncer of "robbers great and robbers small," among the manufacturers—there he is, toiling, like the blind Samson in the mill of the Philistines, with one son in one department and another son in another department, Cartwright after Cartwright feeding at the public crib, his independence gone completely. Somebody has sent me a list of the hon. gentleman's relatives in Government employ. I had no idea that the number was so great. Why, he is a more nepotized Minister "than has been." Here is the list:

1. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), $8,000 a year.
2. Rev. C. Cartwright (brother), chaplain of the Kingston Penitentiary.
3. Robert Cartwright (son), Assistant Attorney General.
4. Frank Cartwright (son), inspector North-west Mounted Police.
5. Harry Cartwright (son), Ontario civil service.
6. Jas. Cartwright (cousin), position in Osgoode Hall.
7. John Cartwright (cousin), Deputy Attorney General, Toronto.
8. M. O'Hara (second cousin), private secretary and with the commission.
9. Straubenzle Cartwright (second cousin), appointed to Military School before qualified.
10. Mr. O'Hara (married to cousin), Master in Chancery, Chatham, Ont.; Government appointment.

Why, Sir, it is no wonder his independence is buried under such a heap.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). That is why he cannot sing the old songs.

Mr. DAVIN. That is true. The hon. Minister made a very peculiar point. He smiled oleaginously at the thought that the Government were able to carry by-elections by improper means. That is the only way of interpreting what he said. He said: You and I Mr. Speaker—he was addressing you, Sir, and I do hope that there was no truth in the implication; I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that you ever could have known anything about ways that are dark and tricks that are vain in election matters. But he says: You and I, Mr. Speaker, know very well how by-elections are carried. And he seemed to glory in it. What is the fact underlying the recent by-elections? Notwithstanding the sneers cast across this House by my hon. friend the Liberal whip, these elections are full of hope. You must remember that with the exception of Bagot, every one of them except one was a strong Liberal constituency. In West Lambton we gained 400 votes; in West Huron we gained 150 votes. In Simcoe they put up a Liberal against a cousin of the late Dalton McCarthy and they were unable to carry it. With the exception of Bagot, they carried champion Grit constituencies with reduced majorities, notwithstanding the truth underlying the opinion I am going to read to you of the value of by-elections expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself. This is what he said at a time when the Conservative party was winning by-elections:

Yet, nevertheless, with all those things against them, we find the Government sustained at all points throughout Ontario, and absolutely winning 18 out of 20 by-elections. Sir, the mere statement of those figures is in itself enough. Does any sane human being who knows anything at all of the conditions of political life believe for one moment that this result was obtained by honest means? The thing is an absurdity. Those figures carry condemnation on the very face of them. "As well defend Sodom." As well say that it is possible to cast double sixes eighteen times out of twenty. Sir, it is only possible on one condition, and on one only—that the dice are loaded.

Are the dice loaded now? I am afraid the dice are loaded, and I am afraid, from the course taken by one of the Ministers especially, that the dice are loaded very heavily to-day.

I want to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary course taken by this Government in regard to what is called the school question, bearing out, as it does, the character for duplicity that I contend inheres in this Government. On the 5th of September, 1896, a correspondent of the Brandon "Sun" inquired of the present First Minister as to the truth of a story in the "Mail and Empire" that the Government had sent an emissary to Rome on the Manitoba school question, he replied in these words: "It is one of the 'Mail's' usual canards, there is not a word of truth in it." Well, we know that since that time several emissaries have been sent to the eternal city. We know that Mr. Drolet was sent, we know that Mr. Russell was sent, that the Solicitor General was sent, and that the Prime Minister went there himself. So it would seem this correspondent did not get much satisfaction, because we know very well that these gentlemen have been sent, and that the right hon. gentleman himself addressed a letter to the Cardinal, who is Secretary of State of the Vatican, on the subject of the Manitoba schools, and we heard in this House that he acknowledged he had written it. I am told that the Minister of Public Works has made statements to the effect that the Catholics of Manitoba have got back all they had been deprived of by the Martin Act, and in "La Patrie" of November, 29th, 1898, it is said:

The French Canadians of Manitoba enjoy more privileges in the schools than before 1890.

Yet more than two years ago we were told by the Prime Minister, immediately after the House met here, that the school question had been settled. So that those who hoped that the settlement that was made was a final one, if what is stated from time to time is true, are deceived; and on the other hand, if it was a final one and if there has been nothing done since, those who are assured that in consequence of this diplomatic action all that was taken away by the Martin Act has been restored—those persons must be deceived.

I want to say a word on a question that interests a large number of my constituents, I refer to the plebiscite. You will remember that the right hon. gentleman, replying to one of the leaders of the Temperance Alliance, stated that he could not act upon the vote which took place upon the plebiscite. I call attention to what the Montreal "Daily Witness," a Liberal paper, says on that head:

Meantime, we protest very strongly against the disingenuous language used by those Liberal papers in deprecating the vote. Their language from one end of the country to the other about the prohibitionists having polled "a very small minority of the registered vote," is a simple impertinence, seeing that outside the province of Quebec, in which the vote was abnormal, prohibition polled five-sixths as many votes as were polled for the straight candidates of the Liberal party in the triumphant general election of the 26th of June, 1896, and that they did this out of a panel of voters one-tenth smaller. The pollable vote is usually considered about 70 per cent of the total vote on the list. At the last general election, the lists being old, only 68 per cent was polled. Outside of Quebec the number of votes on the lists was almost exactly a million, of which the Liberals polled at that election, for straight party candidates, almost exactly 300,000, or 30 per cent of the voters on the list, being 44 per cent of the vote actually polled. The number on the list for the plebiscite vote was as nearly as possible 900,000, of which the prohibitionists polled just about 250,000, or 28 per cent of the whole list, and 40 per cent of the presumable pollable vote. Considering that those who voted for prohibition did so from purely patriotic impulses, without any of the usual personal and partisan incentives to goad them to the polls, and, considering that there is almost no other case on record in which the vote on a mere proposition apart from party or personality has not been been meagre, it would be nonsense to treat these figures as insignificant or as any other than extraordinary and startling. The only question that remains open is as to what their real significance may be, and whether, in spite of the opposition or indifference of the province of Quebec, they do or do not constitute a mandate to do something.

That states as much of the argument as is necessary for me to place before the House.

I want, Sir, to say one word that will show to you and to the members here to-night how our money is being spent and how the extravagance to which I have referred is being piled up. I am glad that the Minister of Public Works is in his place. I will take three specimen bricks, as it were, of the building, of the—I do not really know what to call it, because if I use the word that comes to my lips I am afraid it would not be parliamentary; so I will leave it unexpressed. The Minister of Public Works has gone into amateur dredging. There is a man in the west named McGillicuddy, and he was kicking hard—very hard, whereupon he was given the contract for dredging Goderich harbour. I do not suppose McGillicuddy ever saw a dredge.

Mr. BERGERON. And without tender.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think there were any tenders. It would be an interesting spectacle to see McGillicuddy advancing, pen in hand to dredge Goderich harbour. You have a companion picture in Montreal. You have Mr. Gauthier. He never saw a dredge; he has no dredge; he does not know anything about dredging, and he too has a $20,000 contract for dredging. If we ask the Minister of Public Works, "is he a relative?" he says, "No," but when we ask him if he is not his son's father-in-law, he says: "How can I help it if my sons have fathers-in-law." Surely the public of Canada are entitled to the difference between what the people pay Gauthier and what the people pay McGillicuddy, and what McGillicuddy and Gauthier pay others to do the dredging. The Minister of Public Works says, when we ask him, "Why do you not give the contract to dredgers?" When we ask the Minister of Public Works, "Why do you not give the contracts to dredgers?" He says: "How can I do that and put money into the pockets of my friends?" He tells us that all the dredges are in the hands of Tory dredgers, and he says that if he were to ask for tenders the contracts might go to Tory dredgers. He turns around and gives a contract to one man who has kicked hard in one case, and in another to a man who happens to be one of his son's father-in-law. I might repeat what I said here before of that deal for that $30,000 that was got for buying "La Patrie" in connection with the Drummond County deal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There is not one word of truth in that, not one word of truth, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman says there is not a word of truth in that, but my hon. friend swore in court that he did not tell the truth to this House in regard to it. He swore that what he said to this House was not true. How am I to know that what he is telling us now is true?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refuse to accept the statement of the Minister.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not refuse to accept my hon. friend's statement, but, Sir, I do not endorse it.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think that the Minister of Public Works has a right to interrupt the proceedings of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have given my decision on the point.

Mr. DAVIN. I abide by the decision.

Mr. J. TOLMIE (West Bruce). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member (Mr. Davin) has made an assertion that Mr. McGillicuddy—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There can be no personal explanation when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has the floor unless he chooses to give up the floor.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope the hon. gentleman will deal with Mr. McGillicuddy when I am done, because the more this matter is ventilated the better the people will see how the debt is being piled up and the way that extravagance is going on.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I rise to say that the hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken. Mr. McGillicuddy never got any dredging contract from me.

Mr. TAYLOR. He got one for crib and pier work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). After public tender.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, without public tender.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). After public tender.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was never advertised.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). After public tender, I say it again, and it is true.

Mr. DAVIN. I think I have McGillicuddy's own words here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I do not care what he says, the contract is there. The contract was given after public tender.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon. friend will not take what McGillicuddy himself says, what are we to say. Of course, there is no contract if he would take what McGillicuddy says.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. McGillicuddy never got any contract for dredging, and he never got any contract without public tender. These are the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Minister of Public Works must really ask the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. DAVIN. In 1896 I pointed over to the Government, and I said it had the colour of death in its face. A still more dangerous symptom has manifested itself to-day, a moribund symptom has manifested itself, and it is the same symptom that manifested itself two years and a half after the Mackenzie Government came into power. They began to plunder, to get deeper and deeper into the quagmire. The moment that anybody criticised them, instead of being able to refute what their critics said, they got out of temper like the Minister of Public Works and like my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in his speech, which was not up to the mark to which he or any other Prime Minister should attain. He had lost his temper, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce had also lost his temper, and this is a sure sign that the Government is moribund. Now, I will give Dan's own words; I did not intend to take up the time of the House by doing it:—

To the first count—being an office-seeker—we plead guilty. After nearly a quarter of a century's faithful service in the not very remunerative business of making politicians out of "nobodies," or as Kipling says of Sergeant What's-His-Name, in "making men out of mud," Mr. McGillicuddy came to the conclusion that when an office became vacant he had as much right to it as any other man in Huron, and he thinks so still. At the same time, Mr. McLean was of a similar opinion, and was an applicant for the self-same position. The only difference between the two was that McGillicuddy made no application until the office was vacant, whilst Mr. McLean put in his application as soon as the registrar was taken ill, and about a year before the death of the then incumbent. If we mistake not, he was the first on the doorstep, waiting for death to step in and give him a job.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard what my hon. friend has to say about Mr. McGillicuddy. Will he tell us something about Gauthier or about the Edmonton bridge, about that outrage upon the pockets of the people of this country where a contract was made at $35,000 for solid ashlar masonry? Without new tenders and without anybody else being allowed to tender, and without any modification in price a man is allowed to change a specification from ashlar masonry to concrete, which does not cost half as much.

Sir, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to talk metaphorically, I put the handcuffs on his wrists last year and there is no sub-lunary power can take them off. I will tell you why. If he will recall what I did, he knows that I took the excuse that was made for this transaction. The excuse was that the contractor went up to Edmonton, went to the quarry some ten miles from Edmonton, inspected the stone there, then came back and inspected the stone at Calgary, came to Ottawa and then entered the office and told the department there was no stone either at Calgary or Edmonton fit to make piers for a bridge. The cautious department sent Mr. St. Laurent at once to examine whether what this contractor Mr. Lemoine said was true or not. He makes the same trip, and back he comes and confirms what Mr. Lemoine has said. But I took the time table of the Canadian Pacific Railway for that month and I showed that, if the moment Lemoine had got that contract in Montreal—and he got it in Montreal the last day that tenders were to arrive in the office; by some extraordinary means the Minister was down there and so was Mr. Coste, and he got it in Montreal the day the tenders came in. He got it therefore without the Minister seeing the other tenders. I showed that if the moment Lemoine got it he had flown to the station, taken the train, gone right on to Calgary, taken the next train, gone to Edmonton, taken a trap and gone to the quarry, hurried back, got in his train and hurried to Calgary, then by some extraordinary slight of hand inspected all the quarries in Calgary, then got the next train, hurried to Ottawa, and then gone gasping and panting into the Department of Public Works, he could not have done it in the time. One trip could not have been made in the time in which it was said two had been made. And remember we have the dates, because the date I took is the date of the re-arrangement of the contract to enable him to build it of concrete. My hon. friend the Postmaster General is there and he is a lawyer and he knows very well that if any witness told that story in the witness box, when he left the box the judge would say to the sheriff: Sheriff, do not let that witness leave the court; and he would have him up under arrest and prosecuted for perjury. That is the way our money is being spent. It is the way that the debt is being piled up; it is the way extravagance is being carried on. Why, Sir, we know very well there is every indication that the flood gates have been opened, and there is no body to do what Alexander Mackenzie did. You know, Mr. Speaker, because you were intimate with the late Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, and you have read his life—probably you assisted those who wrote that life—but anyway, Sir, you know all about the late Alex. Mackenzie, and you remember that letter he wrote.

Day and night I lie on my arms protecting the treasury—

Against whom?

—against our friends.

But though he lay day and night upon his arms protecting the treasury against "our friends"; "our friends" were able to—as was proved by commissions—able to put their hands into the treasury. Alas, Sir, there is no one now to lie on his arms to protect the treasury from "our friends"; and the wolves are able to have it their own way. And, Sir, while they were only able to put in their hands in the time of Alex. Mackenzie, they can put the hands now into the treasury right up to the shoulder, and all that is done is, my hon. friend opposite sits and laughs, and thinks he can carry it on and "business is business."

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). And a scallawag is a scallawag.

Mr. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). From first to last, from the top to the toe, in the whole official machinery of this Liberal Government, there is this same taint of want of sincerity. Why, one of the things I did during the recess was to visit the Saskatchewan, and what did I discover there? I discovered that the present member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) had made a most immoral bargain, an utterly immoral bargain, about the patronage.

Mr. DAVIS. No.

Mr. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I say I discovered that the present member had made an immoral bargain about the patronage.

Mr. DAVIS. What was the bargain?

Mr. DAVIN. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) deny that he made an immoral bargain?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, I do.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I discovered that he made an immoral bargain, and not only that, but he had the insincerity of not being ready to pay what that immoral bargain entailed. Does the hon. gentleman deny?

Mr. DAVIS. State what the bargain is.

Mr. DAVIN. I have the proof here, and if I am challenged I will have to prove what I say.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) will defer that portion of his remarks for a few minutes until the hon. member for Saskatchewan returns. He has been obliged to leave the Chamber for a short while.

Mr. DAVIN. When I was up there he was invited to a meeting and he came to the meeting, and after the meeting was over he went about, and when I was out of the town he said: I could have answered that in a quarter of an hour. So another meeting was held to give him an opportunity, but he did not come there as he got the mumps. Has he got the mumps now again?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) will permit me to say so, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) has just received news of the serious illness of one of his children, and Mrs. Davis is in the gallery and he has gone to take her away.

Mr. DAVIN. Under the circumstances, I won't refer to it of course.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to postpone it until the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) returns.

Mr. DAVIN. I will postpone it altogether under these circumstances.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not ask that, the hon. member (Mr. Davis) will return in a few moments.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I have something else to say, Mr. Speaker. In connection with the election something took place at Battleford in which I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) is personally interested, for under the circumstances I do not wish to refer to anything in which he is interested. There was a gentleman named Mercier there who was postmaster and he was dismissed on the affidavits of a man named Skelton and a man named Daumais and others. The trial took place, and Skelton and others were convicted of perjury, and a strong effort was made to influence the Minister of Justice, an effort that I brought before the House last session, because the Minister of Justice had no authority under any Act of Parliament that exists in Canada to have entertained any application in regard to these men, before judgment had been pronounced.

Well, Sir, what has happened? I think I prevented an outrage taking place last session, because I prevented the Department of Justice being guilty of an illegal act, entailing the grave scandal of interfering with the course of justice. Subsequently, these men were sentenced to a term of imprisonment. And now what has happened? No sooner are they sentenced, than word comes from this Government that the perjurers are to be let out. Why, Mr. Speaker, after Connolly and McGreevy had served a considerable time in prison for an alleged offence—a trifle, compared with the grave crime of perjury—it was only after doctors' certificates came to show that their health would be impaired and their lives imperilled if they remained in prison, that they were let out; and we heard no end of talk about that in certain quarters. But here we have men convicted of perjury before one of the ablest and most impartial judges in Canada, Mr. Justice Wetmore, a man who is able to stand up to any lawyer in Canada, and who is the equal of any judge in Canada. There cannot be a more impartial or a more fearless man; and yet the course of justice is interfered with on partisan considerations, and the immoral spectacle is presented to the whole young community of the North-west Territories of allowing perjurers to go free because the perjury is committed in the interest of party. Why, Sir, it is a great scandal.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). What did they do with the postmaster? Is he reinstated?

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no; they dismissed the postmaster on a false charge. There is a point made by my hon. friend from York. Of course, to be logical, they ought to have reinstated the postmaster. They dismissed the postmaster on the oaths of those people.

Now, Sir, up at Bennett there is a Government hospital, supported by the Dominion Government, in which there was a medical officer, named Dr. Diseau. I would like to know whether that gentleman is still in the employment of the Government, because his conduct was such that he ought to have been arrested and prosecuted; yet he is allowed to go free. I am not going into what his conduct was. The enormity of it was such that it would not be proper for me to do so at this time. But I know very well that his conduct was winked at by the department.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that in my character as an advocate—and although I do not practice law much now, politics and what not taking me away; I sometimes go into court, and my training has been that of an advocate—suppose that, as an advocate, I were feed to defend this Government and meet the indictment made against it by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister, how could I defend them against the charge that they have been false to all their pledges? Is there any pledge under Heaven to which they have not been false, from the great pledge, that they would uproot the Upas tree of protection, down to the trifle on the part of the Prime Minister, that he would not take a title? I have here his language used at Renfrew, when the Rev. Mr. Huxtable asked him a question in regard to the plebiscite. I will read what he said:

The Rev. Mr. Huxtable. A majority of some 80,000 of the voters in Ontario have decided in prohibition of the liquor traffic. We understand that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has already promised that a plebiscite for the whole Dominion shall be taken in the event of his attaining to power in the coming election. I would like to ask that in the event of that being done, and a majority of the electors voted in favour of prohibition, will Sir Wilfrid Laurier pledge himself to give us a prohibitory liquor law?

Mr. Laurier. I must tell my friend, first of all, that I am not Sir Wilfrid. I am only plain Mr. Laurier. I am a democrat to the hilt.

The Rev. Mr. Huxtable. So am I, sir.

Well, what happened? The shoes that he wore when he made that pledge were not old, the breath that came from his lungs and travelled north, had hardly frozen over the polar sea when he goes across the Atlantic, to London, and he finds there in his bedroom a package.

Mr. DAVIN.

He looks at it, and he finds that it is his patent of peerage: "Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G." What does he do? All his manhood rises up against the idea of taking it, and he puts it aside. He remembers what he said: "I am a Democrat to the hilt; I will go back like a man, plain Mr. Laurier." And then he thinks, "Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G.! To have my breast plastered all over with gold! To wear a cocked hat and ostrich feathers as high as a stone wall! Sir Wilfrid Laurier!" He feels himself an inch higher. He is fascinated. He is drawn to it; he takes it up, and is about to perform the deed, when whatever manhood lingers in him rises again in protest, and he puts it down and says: "No; I will return to Canada plain Mr. Laurier, a man of the people, a Democrat to the hilt." And then his eye falls on the hypnotizing paper once more and it fascinates him; he is again drawn to it; he takes it up; he determines to consent and the deed is done. He has put his manhood under his heel, and if he could plaster that Windsor uniform from neck to the tip of it with gold, and if the cocked hat were twice as high, and had the ostrich feathers in it of a hundred birds, that manhood which he then trampled under foot, could never come back. He returned to Canada Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but he did not come back with the manhood that he carried away. Sir, that is only a trifle, but it shows what has happened from beginning to end. Why, Sir, he wears the Cobden medal, side by side with his star, on which is written, "Auspitium melloris ævi—the pledge of happier times." He wears the Cobden medal on the other side, on which is the motto, "Faith, truth, peace, and prosperity." Faith, truth! Where are your promises, Sir Wilfrid? Where are your pledges? Faith!—where is your loyalty to the people of Canada, where is your Democrat to the hilt, where is free trade as it is in England? Faith! truth! Why, he is foresworn even to the very Cobden Club, whose medal he wears. He comes back, and he tells a dinner party at Toronto that he was in favour of preferential trade, for strangling which he got that medal. Faith, truth—truth, faith. Pots and kettles and pans—pans and kettles and pots. All the black belongs to that wretched machine which is called the Government of Canada—the true Liberal party is free from it; and I appeal to whatever Liberalism is in Canada to-day, to rescue itself from the thralldom of those betrayers of Liberalism. Suppose that, in the days of our fathers, when port wine was a great drink, you were to visit a man famous for his hospitality, who would have thirteen decanters on the sideboard and a little silver label on each, describing what was within as port wine, and he were to say to you: "Will you not have a glass of port wine?" You would reply: "I do not mind if I do." And he pours out a glass of something the colour of port wine from one of the decanters, but which is not, what would you think of it? If you were to say to him: "That is not port wine," what would be your opinion of him, if he, after you had tried each particular decanter and finding that each contained some other liquid the colour of port wine, he were to point to the label and say: "There is the label; it is indeed port wine"? Do you suppose that the label of Liberalism will make these men Liberals? No, Sir, the leaders of the Liberal party are in power, it is true, but Liberalism and the Liberal party are out of power and are betrayed. Where is the Liberal party to-day, that it does not rise up against its wrongers? I am reminded by its present position of a harrowing circumstance that my hon. and gallant friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) will be interested in. One of his constituents and admirers is a butcher, and one day, this butcher noticed a ghastly, cadaverous, ghostly, lean and hungry-looking cat, all ribs, the skin of one side clinging to the other, hardly able to walk across the shop. This butcher was a sympathetic man, and he said to his assistant: "Give that cat a pound of meat a day until it is fattened up." He then went up to the Atlin country, and when, two months later, he returned, he again saw this ghostly, thin, meagre, skinny cat walk through the shop, and said to his man: "Did I not tell you to give that cat a pound of meat a day?" The man said: "So I did: he has had a pound of meat within the last three minutes." The butcher seized the cat and put it into one of his scales, and the animal just turned the beam at a pound. "Well," said the butcher, "there is the pound of meat; but where is the cat?" In like manner, I may say: There is the pound of meat; but where is the Liberal party? There are the leaders of the Liberal party in power; but where is the party itself? Where is Liberalism? Ah, Sir! Liberalism is not to be found on those front benches, as was said to me by a gentleman who travelled west with me a few weeks ago, towards Moose Jaw, a leading Liberal, one of the old Liberals, one of the true Liberals, one of those men that Mr. Martin, when addressing the Liberal Association in Winnipeg, appealed to, when he said: Let us go back to the principles of George Brown and Mackenzie; because you know, Mr. Speaker, there is a revolt against the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in Edmonton and Regina, where the anti-Siftonites invited my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) and my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) the other day. I echo what Mr. Martin, the brother of Joe Martin, said in his appeal: Let us go back to the old Liberalism, the Liberalism of George Brown and Mackenzie, and not endure this wretched masquerade of Toryism, saying it is Reform given by the Government, which has thrown off the uniform of Liberalism, and put on the livery of the manufacturers. Why, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the moment he came into the Privy Council Chamber, went to the wardrobe, and, finding there some of the cast-off clothes of the late Sir John Macdonald, put off his uniform of Liberalism and donned those cast-off garments, and, thinking he looked mighty well in them, said: I am satisfied to wear the clothes of my opponents, if they fit me. But they do not fit him. He has hardly the figure to wear those clothes, and the way these hon. gentlemen have bungled one thing after another where they have tried to touch that tariff, shows that they did not go into it with a single eye to honest government. They have touched nothing that they have not deformed, and after their two and a half years of power—three years nearly now, and into the fourth session—they stand condemned before the Liberal party of Canada and the whole country, and, as may be seen by their faltering accents, when speaking from those benches, condemned by their own consciences. I sometimes ask myself, what is to be the fate of the right hon. gentleman, who is so completely under the influence of that dark spirit which excites so much fear in the minds of respectable Liberals. The only fate I can think of is this, that he will one day or the other leave the Council Chamber in disgust and despair, determined to flee from the spell and hide his political head under a cowl, and shed abundant tears, and offer up penitence and prayers for broken pledges and promises unfulfilled, for having deceived the people of Canada in 1896, and since 1896 betrayed the Liberal party.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). What about the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis)?

Mr. DAVIN. I was about to deal with him, but will take some other opportunity, as he is not here now.

Mr. BERGERON. He will come in. Let him be produced.

Mr. DAVIN. No; under the circumstances, as he is not here, I shall wait some other opportunity.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). My hon. friend from Beauharnois appears to question the accuracy of what I said, and therefore I prefer that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) would continue and deal with the subject, if he dares to deal with it.

Mr. DAVIN. No, we can bring up the matter another time.

Mr. RUFUS POPE (Compton). In rising, Mr. Speaker, to make some remarks on this important debate, I must say, that they are called for neither by what is contained in that Speech, nor what is wanting in it, so much, as by the shortcomings of those hon. gentlemen who form the Government of the day. A government has a right to the support of the people only when it has fulfilled its pledges, when it has acted up to its promises, and has not broken faith with the public. Under no other circumstances has a Government a right to ask even its friends to follow it, to say nothing of independent members of the House. Business men continue in business purely and simply upon the confidence of the people. No business man can prosper or continue to conduct any sort of legitimate business in this or any other country who does not upon all business matters carry out his pledges and stand true to his obligations. This principle is just as applicable to men when they associate themselves together under the name of a Government, I do not care what party name that Government may bear. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite, if they have kept their pledges to the people, can look with every confidence to the electorate for support. There is no doubt about that, and there is equally no doubt about the insecurity of their position if they must appeal to a people whom they have deceived, whom they have betrayed and who feel that the confidence that was asked of them has been misplaced.

Now, I find in this Liberal bible, this red book with a title, "Dominion Liberal Convention, 1893," several resolutions which embodied the principles of the Liberal party, at that time in opposition in this country. It was through the anticipation that these resolutions would be implemented at least to some extent, that the people of Canada saw fit to extend their confidence to hon. gentlemen opposite. Looking at this bible, and reading it over, I find it is about as applicable to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite as would be the wooden and stone gods of old times to a land that had been converted from idolatry to Christianity. The Government's course was one of insincerity. It reminds me of a story, a very short story, which I think is appropriate to this occasion. A young man travelling west on the Canadian Pacific Railway was standing on the rear platform of the train as it was passing through the Rocky Mountains. He was looking about and enjoying the beautiful scenery. The conductor came out and said, "You must not stay out here." The young man replied, "I am enjoying this magnificent scenery, it is wonderful." "That is all very well," said the conductor, "but you can't stand on this platform." Why have not I a right to stand on this platform, is not that what the platform is for—to stand upon?" "No, sir, this platform is to get in upon." It is quite evident that when hon. gentlemen opposite had this bible printed, it was only intended to get in upon and not to stand upon after they came into power. We have had and we still enjoy a certain amount of prosperity in this country. That has been recognized by every speaker on this side of the House. We are always pleased, whether we are in opposition or whether we are behind the Government, to give every credit to the people of this country for the results of their industry. There are two things that have played important parts in this prosperity, the first is the world's market and the price which the world generally has been obliged to pay for the articles purchased. I fancy that hon. gentlemen on the other side, even in their wildest flights, will hardly claim that they did anything particularly affecting the prices in the world's market. The other point is simply this, whether and how and when and why we in Canada have placed ourselves in a position to reap the greatest possible benefit from that world's market. I think you will find the answer to that in the three great steps in our national history—confederation, the National Policy and the Canadian Pacific Railway. By confederation we brought ourselves together under a political arrangement that has proved very satisfactory to all those who live in this Dominion. Through the National Policy we gave encouragement to the industries that we found struggling here at the time when that policy was adopted. It is not necessary for me to go back to the dark period that preceded the inauguration of the National Policy. That has already been dealt with in this House. It is never referred to by hon. gentlemen on the other side. They never take the opportunity of appealing to the people of Canada and asking them to give them support on the basis of anything that transpired during the period when they administered the affairs of Canada before. By this National Policy we gave new life and new encouragement to industry—we gave diversified employment to the people of Canada. By the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway we made it possible to convey from one end of Canada to the other, from one ocean to the other, the industrial, agricultural, mineral and forest products of our people. These are the three great steps in Canadian history, and to the Conservative party, and to the Conservative party alone, must be given the credit for these three great factors in our development, because during all the time we were fighting these battles we were opposed by these gentlemen on every occasion. And now we see that, with all the hatred that it is possible for men to inspire themselves with by twenty years of training, these hon. gentlemen hate and detest the Canadian Pacific Railway and the National Policy. I do not dare say the same of confederation, because that would be charging disloyalty. But, though they hate the Canadian Pacific Railway and the National Policy, they dare not touch them. They know that if they began to trifle with these two great props of our industry, they would step upon dangerous ground. Wherever they have tampered with the National Policy and have attempted to make what they call improvements, they have put themselves in a position whence it will be necessary for them to retrace their steps. Take the price of wool in this country to-day. The tariff these gentlemen placed upon yarns coming into this country had the effect of forcing down the price of wool to a price lower than it ever reached before in the history of this country. They tell the farmer: We have given you a cent a gallon on coal oil. But the farmer replies: I use ten gallons a year, that is 10c., and you have lowered the price of wool 6c. One sheep would yield five pounds, so that the loss is 30c., counting that one sheep alone I am 20c. worse off than when you came into power.

Now, Sir, if they had been able, as they promised us, to give us extended markets, if they had found new consumers for the products of the industries of our country, they might claim some share in the prosperity which we now enjoy. But they have done nothing of the kind. On the contrary, if we had not fought out the fight of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if we had not forced the successful completion of that road, the markets of this country would have been circumscribed in spite of what the hon. gentlemen opposite could have done.

Take the great mining development that has occurred in British Columbia, would we have heard of that if it had not been for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Take the ranches of the North-west, would they have had a market for their cattle if it had not been for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Now, hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to watch for all time, to see future generations benefit from the operations of the National policy and of the railway system of this country. And when these hon. gentlemen can put their finger upon one act of theirs that will benefit future generations, then they can begin to claim for themselves originality which entitles them to the confidence of the country, but not before. They talk of preferential trade. You would imagine that they had brought about preferential trade. To hear these hon. gentlemen discuss the question, you would imagine that we had preferential trade. England has preferential trade, Canada has not. What has Canada gained from preferential trade? Where is the market obtained through their exertions, that the farmer or the artisan of Canada can send his products to and have a preference? The First Minister visited England for the first time, and he scarcely waited to set his foot on the soil before he announced to the people of Great Britain: We will give you a preference in our market. But he never asked for any preference in their market for the products of the people of this country. I say that when the hon. gentlemen took that stand, he did more injury to Canada than he will ever be able to confer benefit upon Canada if he lives to be as old as Methuselah. Why, Sir, what would have been our position as an integral portion of the Empire, with the finest soil, with great forests, with mines in abundance, if true preferential trade had been brought about? We would have had a preference for everything that grew upon the soil of this country. Every article grown upon it would have been worth more money than if it had grown upon any other soil on the face of the globe—not because the Zollverein would not have taken in Australia, the Indies and South Africa, but because we are nearer to the consuming people, because we have better connection between us and the consuming people, and we in Canada being the largest surplus producing agricultural country in the world per capita, would have received the greatest amount of benefit from the adoption of a true preferential trade. It would have solved the question of immigration at once. A man leaving Europe for this side of the Atlantic, if he had an opportunity of settling in a country where every article he produced would have a preferred price in the great consuming market of the world, would not hesitate whether to go to the United States or to Canada—not for a moment. The Government claim credit for bringing out Galicians, Doukhobors, and all that sort of people to this country, but I say that the whole expenditure would have been saved if we had a true preferential trade with Great Britain. There is a tremendous expenditure going on to bring in strangers. I do not know much of them, sometimes I hear good stories, and sometimes I hear bad. But there is a class of people that attract my attention, a class of people that I think deserves the consideration of the Government of this country, and that is our young Canadian boys. What is the matter with expending some of the money of this country in settling some of our own people out west in comfortable homes? Why go across the water to get the offscourings of the world, to Galicia, or some other point, and pick up the dregs of humanity which have got to be made into citizens. They are not tolerable, they are not such a society as hon. gentlemen opposite would like to stay over night with. They might prove lively society during the night, but I do not think the hon. gentlemen would fancy it. That is a point worth consideration. We have young men in eastern Canada, we have large families in the province of Quebec, and in the older settled portions of Canada, who are hunting for homes. Now, why not expend some of this money to help them find homes? I see the hon. Minister of Public Works who is detailed by the Government to pay special attention to the province of Quebec; why does he not impress upon the Minister of the Interior, who is not present to-night, the idea of assisting some of the young men of our country to find their way out to the North-west where they can make comfortable homes for themselves? Now, Sir in speaking of the pledges that have been given by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were asking the support of the people of this country, I find some very interesting reading in this Liberal bible, dated 1893. I have looked into it with a great deal of curiosity to see when it was printed. The Convention took place on June 20 and 21, and I find it was printed immediately after the meeting, because those hon. gentlemen change so quickly that unless they had the book printed the next day, it would not have been of any use to them. I find the first speech was delivered by a gentleman who has gone to enjoy the recompense of a long political life, Mr. Mowat. I find that he says, after delivering a long speech in favour of free trade, in favour of changed conditions, in favour of everything that we have not got :

May its (meaning the Liberal party's) accession to office be soon, may its tenure of office be long.

Now, Sir, he based that, I presume, upon the previous part of his speech which called for radical changes in the fiscal policy of this country. What would that hon. gentleman say to-day if he were back again and looking at the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? Could he say to the Liberal party of Canada: I wish that your tenure of office would be long? The next gentleman of importance who spoke is the leader of the Government :

I submit to you, therefore, that the system of protection which is maintained by the Government, that is to say of levying tribute upon the people, not for the legitimate expenses of government, but for a private and privileged class, should be condemned without qualification. Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection: our ideal is free trade. Their immediate object is protection: ours a tariff for revenue only.

I might read on, it is beautiful reading. A tariff for revenue only! The hon. gentleman must have calculated what he was going to do when he came into power when he would want a tariff for revenue only. He must have considered the extreme expenditure that he was going to make, he must have thoroughly intended to run up the expenses of the administration of affairs in this country to a point never before touched, and so he wanted a tariff for revenue only. I can well understand that at that time he expected to take the hon. Minister of Public Works into his Government, who says: Wait and see us next year, who has no limit to his ambition to squander the funds of the people of this country—and so the hon. gentleman wanted a tariff for revenue only. So, Sir, perhaps in that respect the hon. gentleman spoke with a great deal of feeling upon that occasion. I think there is one other party here who is very interesting and that is the gallant knight from South Oxford, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He says :

Mr. POPE.

I may say at once that I think no man who has taken the trouble to examine the working of the protective system will fail to endorse the statement I make that liberty and protection are a contradiction in terms. You can have no true liberty under a protective system, the function of which is to create a privileged class and to concentrate an undue proportion of the wealth of the community in the hands of a few individuals.

So much for that hon. gentleman; I presume he is ready to take his medicine like other hon. gentlemen who sit around him. There is one other poor innocent here somewhere, a farmer. I do not know where he comes from. I have paid a great deal of attention to this as it has been very interesting reading. I would like to find this farmer, who is a practical man, but while I was looking for him I found Israel on himself. As usual that hon. gentleman did not refer to anything in particular. I speak of the hon. Minister of Public Works :

We may be obliged to submit to law, as all citizens are obliged to submit to it, but I claim, all the same, that our rights have been infringed by this Tory Government at Ottawa. This is our position: we are ready to stand by our declarations, but we don't want to be misunderstood. Now, I have said a few words to you as well as I could. When I was 27 years old I could not speak one solitary word of English. I was born in a French parish, and I was 10 years old before knowing that there was any English people on the surface of the earth; but my boys won't be in the same position.

Their education is being attended to and they will not have to pass through that state of early ignorance that the Minister says he himself came through. Here is one other remark of the First Minister which is worthy of consideration :

The Government, which has its headquarters in those buildings, takes $36,000,000 or more in the form of taxation every year. The Ministers who spend that money, you may be sure, do not take it out of their pockets—they take it from you, from me, from all the people of the country.

What would the hon. gentleman think if his Government only took $36,000,000 to carry on the Administration, yet he deplored that fact. I have not only to find fault, Sir, with hon. gentlemen for not having kept their promises, but I have to find fault with them for having deceived the people of this country in a way that is shameful, in a way that must shortly be atoned for by them, because I take no stock in bye-elections. I know precisely what bye-elections cost and so do hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I have to find fault with them first, because they are lowering the standard of political morality in this country. It was never dragged down to the depths that we have it to-day. They came to power breathing vengeance; they introduced a reign of terror; they went about dismissing people they made mock investigations, but occasionally they were respectable and dismissed people without any investigation at all. And during the period that this guillotine was going on in this country the First Min-Ister visited England and he set up there in a certain speech, the model of his great ambition. There may have been some cases in which there was some cause, but I am bound to say that for every case so far as my knowledge is concerned in which there was cause there were twenty dismissals where there was no cause. When a man entered the service of this country it was understood that he should remain during good behaviour and during the faithful fulfilment of the duties of his office. In many cases public servants gave up employments which were more or less lucrative and disconnected themselves from business and a great hardship has been imposed upon these people; not that I find fault as a member of the Opposition from a purely political standpoint, for we are going to reap the benefit of the dismissal of these people. We find fault because it is lowering the standard of political life for the Government, after they get into power, and with a controllable majority at their dictation, use that power over the people to bring down vengeance upon the heads of a few innocent persons by displacing them to make room for their own friends. Their very first act was an act of terrorism. I find fault with the combination of governments in this country. We have this Government sandwiching itself in with all the local governments through the length and breadth of the Dominion. We saw last year the adjournment of this Parliament to aid in the election in Ontario. We never witnessed before in the history of this country the shame and disgrace which contrary to the will of the people of Ontario secured the return of the Ontario Government, for I have no hesitation in saying that the Government that sits at Toronto does not represent the people of Ontario, and it is doomed without doubt to destruction at an early period. Then we see them pass down to New Brunswick. We see the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals exercising himself in that province as no man, I believe ever exercised himself before in New Brunswick. I see reported in the papers gross charges of corruption; I personally cannot say what there is in them, but I do say that for a Minister of the Crown in the Dominion Parliament to take part in an election of that kind, to lay himself and his Government open to criticism and to charges of gross corruption is demoralizing to the political standard of this country. It is dragging it down to a depth that never has been reached by any public Administration. In a democratic country like Canada, a country where people are free to express their opinions, I assume it to be the duty of every public man to put forth all his influence to raise up the public morality of the country, to elevate the standard of public life, by impressing upon the electors that the public men of Canada are simply their servants with honest purposes in view, and that they are not plodding against pure administration. We have had two or three by-elections in the province of Quebec in local matters. We found the Minister of Public Works, that is the gentleman who runs the machine in that province, putting forth every effort, and be it said to the credit of the people of the province of Quebec, that they were the first to see through this, and he found himself defeated in the county of Beauharnois, and he found himself, in the county of Mississquoi, with only 9 majority, where they had 500 majority less than two years ago. I see indications that the French people—let these gentlemen opposite say what they like—will not be overridden or overburdened with this combination of politicians. I believe we shall find through the province of Quebec, as we shall find through every province, this interference on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite resented at every possible opportunity. As to their administrative ability here, it is well known they have proposed a few of what they call reforms. They have proposed to bring about certain results, preferential trade as they call it, a reduction of the postage, a fast line, and so forth. What has been the result? There has not been a measure upon which they propose to hang their hat, where the First Minister hung his hat the other day, that has not been presented here bottom side up, and has had to be taken back and remodelled. What would we say, in the old days, if our Conservative leaders were so wanting in common knowledge of law and administrative ability, that their legislation and their proposals on every occasion were without warrant or were absolutely wrong? Look at the Postmaster General with his two-cent stamps. He undertook, from his own fiat, to offer to the Empire a reduction in postage. I need not mention that famous circular he sent out, nor need I mention his other circular praying our country postmasters to tell every one who came in, that they had to pay three cents, instead of two. The very fact that there were existing treaties in the way, and that this was an arrangement that England had to be consulted on, was enough, that he, as a lawyer presiding over a department and surrounded by seven or eight more lawyers, as colleagues, should know that he could not carry out his proposal. I say, it is a shame and a disgrace to the administrative ability of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. That kind of thing is something that we have not been accustomed to. But we have also an opportunity of judging to the fullest of their administrative capacity in that new Yukon country. There you can see modern Liberalism running wild. I am bound to say, that if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had found Canada unorganized and without any system of government, and they were entrusted with the formation of a constitution for this country, the confederation of Canada, the very existence of the name of Canada, would never be a fact, if we are to judge by their efforts in the Yukon administration. The tax that is imposed on miners, the gross corruption exercised by the officers of that district are enough to prove that. I do not say that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) told these officers to go there and commit atrocious acts; but when the Minister of the Interior started forth an army of officers into that district, with the right and privilege of speculating as they saw fit, of investing as every opportunity presented itself, giving them small, miserable salaries for work in such a district, there was but one outcome of the opportunity that was presented to these young men, and that was, that they were going to trifle with the positions they occupied, and reflect shame, and disgrace and discredit to the Government and the people of Canada. Did you notice, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of the Interior only recently issued orders that no further speculation and no further investments on the part of the employees of the Government would be tolerated? Do you fancy, for a moment, that the Minister of the Interior would have changed the instructions to his officers, if he had not seen the error of his ways? The very fact, that he has made that change, and ordered that no longer will it be tolerated that Government employees shall speculate, directly or indirectly, in mines or mining, is complete proof to my mind of the fact, that the Government of the day, through the Minister of the Interior, are responsible for all the bad administration that will be disclosed in that district. I shall not discuss it further on the present occasion. Because before this session closes, we shall have many and many an opportunity of discussing these matters in detail, in order that the people of Canada shall know the character of the Administration now in power.

The right hon. the leader of the Government informed us, the other day, that it was well known that the public sentiment at present is opposed to reciprocity, and he looked around among all his followers for approval, when he said it. But, Sir, he has spent just six months in the United States trying to get reciprocity, knowing all the time that he did not want reciprocity. But when you turn to the Liberal bible, you will find that the Minister of Finance says that second in importance to the tariff, is the reciprocity question. The second resolution that is to be found in this Pagan bible says, that reciprocity is absolutely essential to the industrial progress of this country. Sir, the right hon. gentleman ought to be thankful that the American people have taught him something, and that by going to the United States and taking communication with the representative of the United States, he has found out that we had just as progressive a country as they. The Conservatives have told him so for twenty years, but yet he had to spend six months in the United States to find it out.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). And $50,000.

Mr. POPE (Compton). And $50,000 to boot. Well, I do not begrudge the $50,000, because the right hon. gentleman has learned that the unrestricted reciprocity he tried to force on this country is all wrong. I am delighted to see him stand up in this House, even at this late hour, and acknowledge to the people of Canada, that he attempted to drive them into a bargain that would be disastrous to their future prosperity and present prosperity. I do not begrudge the $50,000 for another reason, namely, that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who took only one trip, discovered that there were 70,000,000 people in the United States, and he immediately rushed to Huron and told them: We cannot expect to make 70,000,000 people treat with 5,000,000 people. Until he went to New York, the hon. gentleman never knew that there were 70,000,000 people actually living in the United States. The hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte) is active, the hon. Minister has great capacity, the hon. Minister, no doubt, is a quick operator, but, all the same, I do not believe there were any more people when he left the United States than when we went there. But why should the right hon. gentleman wait until he comes back here? I do not know whether there is any truth in it or not, but I was told from a source that I had a right to take it into serious consideration at least, that the right hon. gentleman offered to exchange certain industries in Canada for free hay, free barley and one or two other things, that he thought would be popular with the agricultural districts of this country. But this I do know, that the right hon. leader of the Government made one grand impression on the commissioners he sat with, and this knowledge of the impression he produces is gained directly from the mouths of the commissioners themselves. This was when they were leaving Quebec on their way to Washington. They said: "Our difficulty in treating with these Canadian people lies right here. The First Minister is so timid and uncertain that he not only does not know what he wants, but he does not know what he does not want." This is from an undoubted source, and I venture to say that if the gallant knight from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had the power of speech, which he will not have until the 2nd of August, when we shall hear from him, he would agree with me, and so would the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. John Charlton). I am glad to pay this compliment to the hon. member for North Norfolk, and to have it put down in "Hansard," as it is the first opportunity I have had to pay him a compliment. I do not believe in him; I do not believe in his sincerity; I do not believe in the position he is about to assume; but I have this to say, that the American commissioners said that of all the Canadian commissioners the man of the most brains and with the most business in him was the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Sir, we have in the province of Quebec an exhibition going on at the present moment which is very interesting to those who study politics. We have some very large manufactories there employing hundreds of people, and these people vote just as they have a mind to when they get the opportunity. At the present moment the Government are busy investigating all the foremen, all the managers, all the people who are supposed to control these votes; and certain heads are being recommended to be cut off, and I know some men have been discharged because they did not suit the people in power. This is an indication that the reign of terror has not yet ceased, but that hon. gentlemen are preparing for what they term an intelligent and independent vote of the people. We have seen the results of their reign of terror in other lines, and we wait with perfect confidence the results of their operations in the line they have taken up. Take the great cotton mills. There is not one of these cotton mills that is not at this moment being gone over most thoroughly. There are men appointed to investigate and see who are Liberal foremen and who are Conservative foremen, and who will control the votes, and wherever they are found to be Conservatives, they are recommended for death. This is a sign of preparation for an election. The hon. gentlemen have also considered that this is an opportune moment to introduce a Bill into this House to rearrange the constituencies, which is another evidence that they are preparing for an election. Now, I wish to say to these hon. gentlemen that so far as this side of the House is concerned, if they want to prepare for an election they might just as well give us a fair notice, because if they do not give us fair notice, we are just going to stay right where we are until we are ready for an election. We are not going to leave this session nor this House of Commons to fight the elections, without being thoroughly prepared, thoroughly organized, and having everything in shape and in form; and it makes no difference to us whether we stay here for one month or for six months. We are not going to leave our position in this House until we are prepared to meet hon. gentlemen opposite at the polls on an even footing. We have many things to observe, and we are going to observe them; and as each day passes along and each part of the programme comes forth, we will stop to study and investigate them. The hon. gentlemen need not imagine that because it is late and because the summer is going to be hot, and it is going to be uncomfortable here, that they can steal any little march upon us. I see the Minister of Public Works smile. He imagines that he owns the province of Quebec. I suppose he does. I suppose every part he gets he pays for, and he ought to own it.

Mr. WALLACE. Where does he get the money?

Mr. POPE. I know on one occasion where they got the money. I was looking the other day over some old records of the province of Quebec, in which Mr. Pacaud disclosed certain transactions. The Minister of Public Works knows what took place then. He knows where they got their money then. He knows that $100,000 was furnished on that occasion by Mr. Pacaud, a man who five years before that could not have furnished 15 cents, a man who never did any particular legitimate business. He furnished $100,000 and it was accepted—not by the Minister of Public Works, however. The fullest benefit of that went to the gentleman who is First Minister of Canada to-day, to elect him and put him in power. Of course, the latter is innocent, not knowing anything about it when anything is done for him or against him. On that occasion, in 1891, he contested Richmond and Wolfe. He was defeated by my friend Mr. Cleveland, and the election was protested. For that purpose $1,000 had to be put up, and Mr. Pacaud put up the money, but of course the right hon. gentleman knew nothing about it. He never does know anything. He never has the slightest appreciation of what is going on around him. I do not charge him with knowledge but simply set forth the facts. I set forth the fact that here was a man whom the right hon. gentleman knew was powerless to raise money except he stole it, who had no money to his credit either legitimately or illegitimately, and yet who put $100,000 into the general elections of 1891, who endorsed and paid notes to that value, $1,000 of the proceeds of which went to the credit of the right hon. gentleman in the protest which was filed against Mr. Cleveland. All this is shown by sworn testimony. We have often heard hon. gentlemen opposite insinuate that gentlemen on this side are the only men who have ever in the past stood in a position that was doubtful. I have heard a good many times insinuations against the leader of the Opposition in days gone by, but let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they are living in glass houses themselves, and that if we are going to lower down the standard of political morality to the consideration of these questions, they will find hon. gentlemen on this side who are able and willing to furnish them proof of Liberal corruption if they want it. At that time I am speaking of, the evil of this combination of Governments was clearly shown. There was then shown the splendid opportunity that exists under such a combination and which must still exist to-day. Here was a Liberal Government in the province of Quebec, run by a friend of the First Minister, stealing from the public treasury and spending the money for the benefit of the party which he wanted to put in power. Now, if that is shown to have taken place at that time, and only became ventilated by that party being put out of power and the facts being got at, I want to ask you what is going on throughout the length and breadth of Canada to-day, with all these Governments in the hands of the Liberal party? I tell you, Sir, that the public voice if Canada is attempting to raise itself beneath a heavy load of corruption, a corruption greater than was ever known in any country anywhere on the face of God's earth. You cannot get in such a state of things an honest expression of public opinion. These hon. gentlemen went into the county of Bagot, in which, as in any other county, there are certain sections known to be purchasable, and that purchasable vote was bought for the man who came here to support this Government. There can be no secrecy about this sort of thing. We do not go about the country like a pack of fools, not knowing the good and bad districts. Those who live in Quebec or Ontario, or any other province, know exactly in what sections corruption can be used, and where an election takes place and the two parties are pitted against each other, the one with plenty of money and the other without any, and you see the public vote going in a certain direction, that is as positive evidence of corruption just as if we saw the money paid over. Why, if you see a dead body with a bullet wound in its head, you can tell that the death was caused by shooting even though you do not see the bullet.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Tell us about the Pacific scandal.

Mr. POPE. My hon. friend could not understand it if I did tell him. He may be a judge of cigars, but he is not in it on the Pacific scandal. This point I wish to impress on the House. There must be an education of the public in Canada against this power of corruption, which despite all hon. gentlemen opposite may say, is the greatest evil that can permeate any nation, I do not care whether it be the Canadian people or any other. Any hon. member who sits in this House and has bought his way into it, will realize the truth of what I say. When you are in the midst of an election, it is all very well for you to say: I am going to get elected at any cost. But when you come here and claim honour as a representative of any constituency, you are not entitled to any credit because you have bought your honour and have paid for it. You have lowered the people of your county and of the whole of Canada to the same appreciation that you have of cattle, sheep or swine or any other article you purchase, and it is for that reason I stand up in this House to denounce the combination of Governments as unhealthy and injurious to the best interest of the people. I do not care what the party is that is running that combination of Governments, it is against the best interests and progress of Canada, it is opposed to good legislation and the morality of Canada. Let me say further that our late chieftain, the right hon. Sir John Macdonald never tolerated it. Sir, there were at times Governments here and there in the country that were in accord with him, but never did he allow this Parliament to be adjourned to take part in local elections, never did he allow his Ministers to go into the different sections of the country and say: we come here as federal Ministers to manipulate your local elections. He always denounced such action. He said the people of Canada would not stand it. We have an example of the evil of this course in the election in the plebiscite lately held. When the returns came in from the province of Quebec, we had about 45,000 of a majority against prohibition in that province. All the other provinces had their various majorities, the same as they are recorded to-day, practically. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite were particularly anxious to know precisely how the province of Quebec stood after the close of the polls, and had made every arrangement to have immediately the returns from the different provinces; and when these returns came in they showed about 45,000 of a majority against prohibition in Quebec. But to-day we find that that majority has been by some occult means swelled to 92,000 or 93,000. Votes sufficient to make this majority were never cast, and I am prepared to prove it. Thousands of those supposed voters never went to the polls. Now, what brought about this result? Was it the so-called liquor party or the distillers? Not at all. They put up no fight. Was it the temperance people voting against themselves? Not much. Then where is the manipulation that brought these changed results. It must be brought home directly to the Liberal organization in the province of Quebec, and nowhere else, headed by three federal Ministers. The First Minister himself said to the people: It will cost you $2 for every man, woman and child if we have prohibition. Where did he say that? In a province where more than any other part of Canada those remarks would have the greatest possible influence and to those people whom he claims to represent to such a degree.

An hon. MEMBER. Who said that?

Mr. POPE. The right hon. First Minister. He said: You will have to pay $2 apiece every man, woman and child, as the cost of prohibition. Why, at my very door, speaking to the French people myself—because I took no part in that election, except to vote—and asking them how they were going to vote, they said: We are going to vote against prohibition. I asked them, why. "Because, they said, "Sir Wilfrid Laurier wants us to; he has told us it will cost us so much money, if we vote the other way." The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) is not a man who looks dissipated, nor would one pick him out as a man likely to wake up. But he did wake up. He went to his constituency, and got there on Sunday—probably he was afraid he was not going to get there soon enough. He made a speech to the people there, and said: I know you are waiting for me, that you feel a great desire to hear from me, and, when a great public question like this is before you, I must come and give you my advice. My advice is, to oppose prohibition. Now, the hon. Minister is a careful man, a man who does not get excited, a man who remains calm even under fire. He never departed from his quiet course of life except by special instructions. Moreover, he does not take his instructions from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). He is one of the few French Canadians in the province of Quebec belonging to the Liberal party who do not take their instructions from that hon. Minister. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue got his instructions direct from the leader of the Government. He would not attempt to direct a policy under any other circumstances. Then, there is the hon. Minister without portfolio (Mr. Geofrion). He said, that in the convention of 1893, of which this red book is the bible, at a late hour, when all the principal men had left, when nothing but the rag-tag and bob-tail and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) remained, this resolution was passed. That is the compliment he paid to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and he knows the Minister of Agriculture: he sits with him, hears him, studies him, has an opportunity of weighing him at his true weight and estimating him at his true value. It was under these circumstances, he said, that the resolution was passed, but thank God, he said, we did not agree to carry it; we did not agree to give prohibition. So much for the Ministers.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). And how about the Solicitor General?

Mr. POPE. The Solicitor General is included in the lot, but as he is not here, and we do not know that he will be here, particularly if he gets an appointment to a judgeship, there is no use bothering with him. Further than that, in our district all the machinery of the Liberal party was set at work to defeat prohibition. I live in the village of Cookshire. Sawyerville is 7 miles distance. There are licensed hotels in these places, kept by respectable men who do not drink whisky themselves—we do not have hotelkeepers in our country who do. The leading Liberal light outside of our county, who is supposed to represent the power behind the throne in the county campaign, lives by practicing law in the city of Sherbrooke. From his office was sent forth a letter to the hotelkeeper, whom he imagined to be a Liberal, and which did not happen to be. The letter was about like this:

My Dear Friend,—I am sending you a package by express containing pamphlets, which will instruct the electors to vote against prohibition. I want you to circulate these at the Catholic church doors in Sawyerville, Cookshire and St. Malo. Keep it in the dark; do not let anybody know where it comes from. It is very important that we should carry the largest possible vote in the province of Quebec.

Yours truly.

After reading this letter, the man showed it to me, and asked: What shall I do. And I told him to distribute the circulars, or course; that he did not want prohibition, that this machinery could be used, and, as he was interested in that side, it was better to use it. Of course, the hotelkeepers in our village were as anxious about their business as this man in Sawyerville. But they were Conservatives, and this keep-it-dark-and-don't-let-anybody-know business would not have answered with a Conservative hotelkeeper; so the literature was not sent to them, but to men who were supposed to keep the matter to themselves. This shows that all the wires that could be pulled by the Liberal party were pulled, that the organization of the party was brought to bear to defeat the will of the people as to prohibition. You take the words of the Minister of Agriculture in this convention bible, you take the version that Mr. Anglin placed upon it, as contained in this bible, and you will understand why I look to see the Minister of Agriculture resigning his place and going out of office. If he does not do it now, he will, on some future occasion, cease to hold that position. The Government have deceived the electorate in bringing about this plebiscite. We may, or may not agree, Mr. Speaker, with the temperance people, but we know that they are a respectable body. These people have been deceived. All the machinery of the Liberal party, all the means that the Minister of Public Works knows how to utilize in an election—and you know what that is—were brought to bear to defeat prohibition in Quebec; and when after all, they found that they had not enough votes, they went on voting for I don't know how long—I suppose, a week or more. And why? It was an attempt to get out of the hole. Now, when I first heard of the Minister of Agriculture, he came into the constituency I have the honour to represent, and palmed himself off there as a temperance man. He assured the people, that he had no other desire than to promote the cause of temperance, that whenever political allegiance stood in the way of the advancement of the cause, he would disregard that allegiance. He was prepared to consecrate his life to the sacred cause of prohibition. He it was who brought forward this resolution, as shown in this political bible, and he declared, that if it was carried, the wishes of the temperance people would be fulfilled. And he had not stamina enough in him to stop his colleagues from cutting his throat with his eyes open.

Think of a man belonging to a Government, think of a man introducing a resolution into Parliament bringing about an expenditure of several hundred thousands of dollars, who at the same time has not got manhood enough about him to say to his colleagues: If you do not agree with me, you should at least respect me, and if you do not respect me, I will go away from you. That is the position that he ought to take. Instead of that there is truckling and catering to all kinds of sentiment, associating with those picnics we have had up in the tower. I tell you the only place to get prohibition is right here on the floor of the House. These little by-promises that we have had from the leader of the Government, what do they amount to? We have had his positive assurance that there was an understanding. Why did he not come boldly forward and tell the people what the understanding was? Why did he continue to give them to understand that they were going to win, that they were fighting for a grand principle, and they were fighting with a chance of winning? But instead of that he carries them on from stage to stage. And the Minister of Agriculture, there in his own province, under his own eyes, at his own door practically, lets his colleagues knife him right and left. I say, Sir, that a man who will stand the insults that have been heaped upon the Minister of Agriculture, first at Valleyfield by the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion), and then by his other colleagues, is deserving of pity. I must say that I cannot help grieving sincerely at the evidence that his colleagues do not respect him. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, if I were a member of a Government from a certain province, and the Government had sat round the Council table and deliberated upon a resolution which had been agreed to by the Government, and upon a subject that was my topic, my hobby, my sacred claim on public confidence, and my colleagues had gone around and knifed me, do you think I would stay in such company? Not much. I say that the only reason the hon. gentleman does stay there, is because his manhood has left him, if he ever had any, and he is truckling for the $7,000 or $8,000 a year.

Bravo.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman can say, Bravo, I say, Bravo.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
You are very flat.

Mr. POPE. Yes, so are you. Now, Sir, speaking about the vote. It is an awful small hole. There were 23 per cent of the total vote polled for prohibition, as compared with the 28 per cent that put the hon. gentleman in power, a difference of 5 per cent. The hon. gentleman will swallow an insult for 5 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture has been given a great deal of credit, as I find in the speech of the

Mr. POPE.

First Minister, for the cold storage system. I expressed my opinion last year as to this cold storage system adopted by the Minister of Agriculture. In the first place the hon. Minister does not deserve credit for creating cold storage, but he does deserve credit, such credit as there is, for adopting a system that was started by his predecessor. I am bound to say in this respect that I take exception, not only to the hon. gentleman's policy, but to the policy that was begun by the hon. gentleman who preceded him. Canada does the greatest export trade of perishable agricultural products of any country in the world, per capita, the greatest trade of all the colonies who are exporting products of a perishable character to Great Britain and to Europe, but I can say we are the only country which does not possess, and has not possessed, a first class cold storage system capable of carrying articles in the most perfect condition for years. If the hon. gentleman wished to make himself celebrated, if he was desirous, as undoubtedly he is, of obtaining some recognition for having originated an idea, he would have put into the service of this cold storage some of the very best ships in the world that are utilized for that purpose. But instead of that he temporises with it, he puts in a few cold boxes here and there, year after year. Now, if it is a good thing to carry over one ton, or 20 tons, or 50 tons this year, it would be much more rapid progress and much better advancement to carry over thousands of tons. There is no reason whatever why the hon. gentleman should not have employed some of the best lines of steamers in the world, with captains and crews thoroughly trained in the management of cold storage. So instead of saying that they have made progress worthy of a Government that came in taking so much credit to themselves, I say their progress has been slow, has been backward, and in comparison with Australia, New Zealand, South America, Africa, or any other country, the cold storage system of Canada would be laughed at. It is nothing in comparison with those of other countries. Then the First Minister said another thing, for which they should be given great credit, and that was that by the Crow's Nest Pass Railway arrangement they had forced the Canadian Pacific Railway to reduce rates three cents per hundred weight on products coming from the west—I think he said three cents, and I think he set it high.

Mr. WALLACE. One cent and a half.

Mr. POPE. Well, that is about the way they multiply. However, that is excusable in the First Minister. He is not supposed to keep all these details in his head. He said he had induced the Canadian Pacific Railway to make a reduction of three cents. The policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been to reduce freights out of that country upon wheat and other articles, ever since they first ran their road into the country.

From time to time they have followed out the principle of reducing as rapidly as possible the cost of transportation, while making a reasonable profit. It is policy for them to do so. Now, do you think the Minister has accomplished a great act when, after giving them one or two millions of dollars, he induced them to follow up the policy they had already been carrying out for years, by making this reduction? They had carried out the same policy before without any special bonus or consideration from any Government, and when they could get well paid for following out their regular policy, they were likely to accept the offer. But instead of the hon. gentlemen deserving credit, I think it shows a lack of business appreciation. If the hon. gentleman should attempt to appeal to a constituency upon the claim that he had induced the Canadian Pacific Railway, by paying them one or two million dollars, to follow up their regular policy, a policy they had adopted for years, I do not think he would meet with much success.

Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman has seen fit to say to us during this debate that the question of reciprocity should no longer be considered by the people of Canada. I am not going to quarrel with the right hon. gentleman in regard to this point, I am not going to quarrel with him in regard to the length of time which it took him to come to this conclusion; but if the cardinal principle of this bible is no longer tenable, if he has changed absolutely his views upon this question, and if we are no longer to be guided by anything this gentleman has promised this country in the past, I want to know, Mr. Speaker, what we ought to look for in the future, because after all it is the future that is particularly attractive to the people of Canada. I think the Government could have spent their time more profitably to the people by having sat as a commission if they are worthy of sitting as a commission—and I presume they ought to be—in the great west of Canada. I believe the mineral wealth of Canada is one of the sources of our material development, and I think that the development of the mines, of trade and commerce on the Pacific coast should receive the attention of the Government. I believe in smelting our ores, in the encouragement of trade between this country, China, Japan and the east by extending the assistance that the Government should give, that the benefit that would accrue to the people of Canada would be far greater and more absolutely direct than anything that could possibly have been anticipated by the right hon. gentleman when he makes the admission that we do not want reciprocity with the United States. Then take the Pacific Ocean, its future will be as great in the development of trade as that of the Atlantic has been, and we should be preparing ourselves to take a position on those waters, and no uncertain position. We should be giving the matter our closest thought, and the Government should be lending their influence in that direction. And if hon. gentlemen do not do that, they are not up to the appreciation of the needs of the country, they are falling short of their duty as a Government and ignoring the future of this country. They will not wake up until the glorious opportunity is lost and trade has been turned and fixed in other channels. I regret to say that the right hon. gentleman does not see eye to eye with the leader of the Opposition in regard to the expenditure that will be necessary for laying the Pacific cable, because I look, Sir, with great hope and with great confidence to the results that will follow the proper development of Pacific Ocean trade. We have in this country the cheapest forestry, the cheapest wood fibre that is to be found, and I believe it is well worth the attention of the Government to assist in the development of these industries. I believe that you can change the values of land, that you can change the entire value of forestry by giving that stimulus that is needed to the pulp industry of Canada. The pulp industry touches particularly the eastern part of the Dominion, the lower portions of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the forests lying close to the Atlantic Ocean. Hampered as we are by duties between Canada and the United States we are looking in the direction of England where new markets will be opened to us. I would be prepared to support a resolution in the direction of a bonus bounty or encouragement that would bring about the required development of that great industry, because it would not only enhance the value of lands and of forestry in this country, but would also give employment, and intelligent employment to mechanical life in this country. Now, Sir, I shall close my remarks with a reference to rapid transit across the Atlantic. The hon. Minister, without portfolio, who is the business head of the Government, has made several trips to England to bring about the establishment of a fast line of steamers. He started out after making a contract with a firm in England, which, as I told him last session, would never be carried out, and now he has come to the conclusion after having spent two years in the effort to realize his expectations that it will not be carried out. He entered into negotiations with a set of men who were respectable enough. I have nothing to say against the respectability of Petersen, Tate & Company, but they had no more opportunity of launching that arrangement in the financial market of England than I have. Then he takes it into his head that all the ships that are going across in the service of the best lines and designed and controlled by men of the greatest experience are not built properly. He must have a ship built like a bottle; he must have a bottled-neck ship so that if it got turned around in the wind you would not know where it was going. It reminds us of a story of a little boy who got up in the morning and made a mistake in dressing himself. As he was going to school he began to cry, and a gentleman meeting him asked: "What is the matter?" He replied: "I have my pants on the wrong side fore, and I do not know which way I am going." It will be the same with the hon. gentleman and his ships. He is going to have something different; he is going to have something that nobody has had, and he is still hunting for it. He has lost himself, and he has lost his opportunity of securing this fast Atlantic service. The hon. Minister of Agriculture and I do not agree upon this question. I met him in his county and heard his views upon the subject. He did not think that the fast service was going to prove a great benefit to the agricultural community. I thought it was. The time has arrived when rapidity counts in all things. Rapid transit in steamers is the proper and the only method to develop the country. I do not care whether it cost $500,000 or $1,000,000. I claim that the Dominion of Canada cannot afford to stand still and lay behind her competitor, the United States, in crossing the Atlantic Ocean. It is unjust, it is cruel, it is a fault that is not soon to be forgotten, for the Government to have, without consultation, thrown out the contract that they found prepared by the late Government to create this fast service, and then to connect themselves with a set of men who have proven themselves incapable. I remember being at luncheon, in London, with a friend of mine, and I said to him: What do you think about this fast line service: will these people carry it out? He said: There is a gentleman sitting on the other side of the table who is an authority, and I will ask him. He said to this gentleman: What do you think of Petersen & Tate's contract? And the reply was: You must have a most extraordinary Government in Canada, to enter into a contract of such magnitude as a fast line service with men of so little financial ability as Petersen, Tate & Co. My friend asked the exact standing of Petersen, Tate & Co., and he gave it, which, so far as the figures are concerned, proved that if times were good, they would be solvent, and if times were not good, they would be doubtful. Surely the Minister, and surely the other members of the Government, had an opportunity of verifying these facts which this gentleman, whatever his name might have been, and who seemed to be an authority on shipping, had at his fingers' ends. We find, Sir, the whole result of our two years' work precisely where it began. We had the greatest opportunity we will ever have for getting good passenger traffic during the late war in the United States. If we had a cable, as we ought to have, on the Island of Anticosti, and a fast line of steamers, in three days their friends in America would know that the passengers had crossed the great Atlantic, and the steamer would be telegraphed from points along the river until the passengers finally took the railroad for their homes, and they could find their mails landed in New York and other points twenty-four hours quicker than by any other means. I was surprised, the other day, at some hon. gentlemen opposite intimating that they would contract for slower steamers. Do not let them commit a second fault, Mr. Speaker. They have committed one which they should not easily be forgiven for, but if they go to work and encourage and maintain a slower line than the very fastest boats that cross the Atlantic, they will be utterly unworthy of anybody's confidence in this matter. We should have steamers second to none afloat. If the Americans have twenty-two knot boats, we should have twenty-four knot boats; because, if we put on a fast line of steamers, with the distance between Quebec and Liverpool, as compared with the distance between New York and Liverpool in our favour, even if the Americans get steamers two knots faster, they would not catch up to our steamers in the next five years of shipbuilding. That would give us an opportunity, not only of gaining that trade, but of holding it. If we are to have action on that matter, it should be along the most improved line, and let us no longer fool with the Minister without portfolio. Let us give him a portfolio, let us give him a salary, let us give him something to play with, if he wants it, but do not entrust him with such vital interests of this country to play with any longer. I have no objection to have him paid his expenses. If the Government put in an item and say it is necessary that he should have some consideration voted by this Parliament, I would vote that consideration. If he wants us to pay his way back and forwards across the Atlantic to do his business in selling deals and lumber in England, why we will pay his way. If he wants a title, or two titles, give them to him; it won't cost us anything. Give him anything he likes; but, for Heaven's sake, take him out of the fast line service.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 27th March, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

IRREGULAR PETITION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the petition praying that additional pay of 25 cents per man per day be granted to non-commissioned officers and men during drill, is out of order, because it involves the direct expenditure of public money.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Louis Julien Demers, Member for the Electoral District of Lévis, introduced by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Charles Fitzpatrick).

REPORTS.

Report of the Secretary of State of Canada, for the year 1898; Copy of the Civil Service List of Canada.—(The Prime Minister.)

Report of the Department of Militia and Defence, for the year ending 31st December, 1898.—(Mr. Borden, King's.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Criminal Code of 1894.—(Mr. John Charlton.)

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assinibola). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to call your attention to what I find in the report of the debate of March 24, 1899. I find that the reporter attributes to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. J. I. Tarte) these words :

And a scallawag is a scallawag.

These words were not, so far as I know, pronounced by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). If they were, they were an interruption in my speech; and, as the suggestion is palpable, I should have dealt with them then. I am told that the Minister of Public Works went down to the "Hansard" reporter and got him to insert these words. Now, I want to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he used these words. If he did, I certainly want them withdrawn.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, I may say that I used those words. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman applied them to himself. I hope and trust—I am sure such is the fact—that there is no scallawag in the House. It is a general sentence that I had a right to use, just as the hon. gentleman had a right to use some other general sentences. As to having gone to the reporter, it is true, Sir, I did so. I know something about newspaper work and about reporting; and, looking at the reporter, I saw that he had not inserted the words that I had used. I may have made a mistake in going to him. I asked him, passing by, whether he had put down my words or not. He said no. I told him: "I want my words to be inserted." If, by so doing, I have committed an offence against the House, I am very, very sorry for it; and, as we are entering into a week of penance, I am going to submit to any spiritual or corporal punishment which you, Sir, may deem fit to mete out to me.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince), for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to address the House on this occasion, nor would I have done so were it not for some remarks which fell from the hon. member for West Assiniboa (Mr. Davin) in the course of his speech on Friday last. The hon. gentleman saw fit to make some personal reference to me, and I therefore deem it my duty to trespass as briefly as possible on your attention. He saw fit, on the occasion I refer to, as he generally does, to take the great territories of our North-west, from the great lakes to the Pacific coast, under his wing, and posed as the only representative of the people in the North-west; but when we take into consideration the magnificent rejoinder that the hon. gentleman met at the last general election there, I doubt whether we will be disposed to accept at his own word his title to speak for the whole of the North-west. I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman throughout his oration, if I can dignify it as such, though I should think, it would be more properly called a harangue, for in fact it was a driftwood of ideas in a sea of self-conceited verbosity. As self-constituted champion of the North-west Territories, the hon. gentleman travelled through them from one end to the other, including in his tour the district I have the honour to represent, and everywhere he told the same time-worn old story. From one end to the other he sang the same song, with the result that during last autumn, when an election took place to the legislative assembly in the North-west Territories, in which the hon. gentleman thought proper to call to his aid some one who was of a little heavier calibre than himself to assist in returning Conservative members, and when the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), who had just returned from New Brunswick where he had made the onslaught on Mr. Emerson, with the result we all know of, their combined efforts had the effect of defeating their own candidates wherever these two gentlemen preached their mission. They held a meeting at Moose Jaw, and another at a place called Indian Head, two ridings in constituencies which were represented by two Liberal Ministers in Mr. Haultain's Cabinet.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is making a mistake as to a matter of fact. He says I held meetings having some reference to the local elections. I never held a meeting in the North-west Territories having any reference to the local election.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan.) Does the hon. gentleman mean to say he did not hold any such meeting?

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but nevertheless the fact still remains that he did hold a meeting at Moose Jaw.

Mr. DAVIN. I held a meeting there, but the only subjects discussed were Dominion politics.

Mr. SPEAKER. Personal explanations are not questions of order, and they can only be made during a speech with the consent of the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. The hon. gentleman held a meeting at Moose Jaw, and the result was that whereas before he and his colleagues went to that town some parties had intended to put a man in the field against the Hon. Mr. Ross, the Liberal member; after it was held, the Hon. Mr. Ross was elected by acclamation. In the riding at Indian Head, which was a strongly Conservative riding, the Hon. Mr. Bulyea would not have been able to secure his re-election had it not been for the visit of these two hon. gentlemen to that riding, but their visit had the happy result for him of securing his election by a big majority. These two hon. gentlemen travelled around in the character of mascots, but they turned out to be, not mascots, but Jonahs. The hon. member for West Assiniboia, not content with these exploits to which I have referred, travelled into my riding, and the other evening he made some allusion to his visit there. Previous to his coming an election had been held, in which the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, Dr. Brett, one of the leading Conservatives in my district, was snowed out of sight. The hon. gentleman thought he would rush into the breach, and so he came into the district of Saskatchewan, where he managed to raise quite a little disturbance. In the North-west Territories Legislature Act, it is provided that polls may be opened again where it is considered they were not properly held. Three polls had been held, but the hon. gentleman there had his usual success. We have an example in Holy Writ of a famous character who at one time destroyed an army with the jaw bone of an ass; but though this new Samson, the self-styled champion of the North-west Territories has been wielding that weapon for the last fifteen years, I do not think it can possibly be said that he has yet succeeded in destroying anybody. He told the House in his speech that at the meeting in Alberta, which he attended, I was invited to attend. True, the little clique which calls itself the Conservative party in the town of Prince Albert, called a meeting, and billed the hon. gentleman as the greatest orator in Canada who was going to address them. They invited me to attend about half an hour before it was held; but if they had sent me an invitation three days previously, I would not have attended, because I would have deemed it beneath my dignity to take any notice of the hon. gentleman. He mentioned the other evening that I had on another occasion refused to attend a meeting addressed by him. Well, the hon. gentleman and his friends, after they learned I had been laid up in bed about three days from illness, called a meeting and sent me a notice to attend it three days before it was held. I told them I was ill and unable to be present, but they went on with their meeting, at which the hon. gentleman was the principal speaker, and there he spent most of his time in abusing me, and no doubt it was in reference to that meeting that the other night he expressed the hope that I had not the mumps again. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not subject to that complaint. What did he tell the people of Saskatchewan? I was in the gathering at the first meeting he held, and I never in my life heard such a hotch-potch addressed to an intelligent people as he dished up to them on that occasion. Why, at the outset, he proceeded to explain to the people, whom, no doubt, in his superior wisdom, he deemed ignorance personified, how they are governed. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, he said, in that beautiful rich brogue of his, which smacks of the Lakes of Killarney, you have a Governor General, you have a Senate and you have a House of Commons. Next he proceeded to give a lecture on the newspaper which is published in the town. Taking it up, he said: There is a paper that is a lying paper. He said: Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, never believe a word you read in newspapers, because they are untruthful. And next he went on in that same brogue that smacks of the Lakes of Killarney to read a number of long, old clippings from the "Mail and Empire" and ask the people to swallow them. That is the sort of argument he was using. The next part of his speech was personal abuse of the Prime Minister. He spent half an hour abusing the Prime Minister for having accepted knighthood at the hands of Her Majesty in the Jubilee year. Then he proceeded to abuse the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). He made use of a statement in the town hall of Prince Albert which I challenge him to make on the floor of this House. He told the people that the Minister of the Interior was a thief, that he had gone to the city of Ottawa in a starving condition and that to-day he was worth millions. I was there and took down his words. He said that the Minister of Public Works also was a thief, and he, the hon. member for West Assiniboia, had fastened the gyves upon his wrist. The hon. Minister of Public Works, when he was a member of the Opposition, made charges against gentlemen then sitting on this side of the House. But he took the manly way of doing it; he stated on his responsibility as a member of the House that certain charges which he made were true, and asked for a committee to investigate, declaring that if he was not able to prove his charges he would leave the House. I would like to see the hon. member for West Assiniboia take a like course, but I am afraid he is not likely to do that. The hon. gentleman would rather hang on to what Providence and Dixie Watson have given him—his seat in this House. Will the hon. gentleman make those charges here or will he, as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) said a session or two ago: "take to the tall timber." I fancy he will take to the timber. Before the hon. member arrived in Saskatchewan, the local poet, learning of the anticipated visit of such a great man amongst us, thought it fitting and right to embalm the event in verse. I ask leave to read these few lines to the House. In reading them, I must, like the hon. gentleman, use the language of the Lakes of Killarney:

We had a short visit from Davin,
Another wan soon we'll be havin',
To organize the Conservative bhoys
And rub down the ould horse wid the spahvin.

Arrah, thin, a grate spache he'll be makin',
All former ricords he'll be brakin',
The divil can't beat ould Nick to orate
Whin the scalps of the Grits he is takin'.

You'll hear all about his grate spaches,
How he dressed down the monopoly leeches,
Hit the railways a lick, made Van Horne sick,
And Shaugnessy shake in his breeches.

The Widdy McManus he'll mention,
The Grits should have given her a pension,
In the broad light o' day, they tuk her office away,
An' to his protests they paid no attention.

He'll rade the extracts from a paper
They call the "Moosomin Spectator,"
How Fisher he said when the tariff he made,
That implements wud be much chaper.

Of many strange things he'll be spakin',
An' very wild statements be makin',
But his burden o' woe is: the Grits stole the clothes
O' the Tories, while a nap they wur takin'.

Now, Nicholas he wudn't be mindin',
If a sate here he thought he'd be findin',
So he'll jolly the bhoys wid buncombe and noise,
For his arguments he left behind him.

Now, in the long harangue to which he treated the House on Friday last, the greater part of the time was taken up with criticising the members on this side of the House for their lack of sincerity in carrying out what he calls their promises to the people. Well, as the representative of one constituency in the North-west Territories, I can say that the people of my district, at least the majority of them—for there are some people you can never satisfy—believe that the Government of the day has carried out its pledges to the people of this country. The Government is not responsible for the saying of individuals who may have seen fit to make speeches in the school-houses in the back constituencies any more than the Opposition are bound by the orations of the hon. member for West Assiniboia. The Liberal party, in its convention of 1893, promised tariff reform, and I submit that we have that tariff reform. Now, the hon. member went over a lot of figures and tried to show the people that nothing had been done for them. He took up all the items he could find, in my opinion, the people of the North-west Territories were not interested in one way or the other. For instance, he mentioned one article in the tariff—crowbars. What have the Government done for the people, he asked, in regard to crowbars. I would like to ask the hon. member how many crowbars the people of his constituency used in a generation—or two generations for that matter. Then he demands to know what the Government have done for the people in the matter of springs and axles. He says that nothing has been done for the North-west Territories in that regard. I would ask him how many springs and axles the people of his constituency, or of the North-west Territories use in the course of a year or in a generation. And so on all down the line. But he conveniently left out all the things on which the duty has been reduced. For instance, he never mentioned the item of hoes and pitchforks, things which the people of the North-west Territories have to buy every year. He forgot to mention that the duty on these articles had been reduced from 35 per cent to 18½ per cent, that is to say, by nearly one-half. Then he made no mention of shovels and spades. Now, under the old tariff of 1894, these articles bore a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem and 50 cents a dozen. The ordinary iron shovels used by the majority of people cost about $2 a dozen, so that the duty amounted to about 50 per cent.

Mr. DAVIN. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) himself said 38 per cent.

Mr. DAVIS. I happen to be engaged in business and I have bought plenty of shovels and spades and all such commodities, and I think I speak with a little authority when I say that the old duty was about 50 per cent. That duty has been reduced to 26½ per cent, that is by nearly one-half. Now, I have a little list here of articles on which the duty has been reduced. I may say to the hon. member for West Assiniboia that the whole tariff is not "pock-marked," as he said, "with 30 and 35 per cent." A great many of the duties are down to 18½ per cent, and the majority down to 25 per cent or lower.

Now, tarred paper, under the old tariff, the duty was 25 per cent, under the new tariff that has been reduced to 18½ per cent. Paint—there is another article of which the farmers use large quantities; the former duty was 25 per cent, it has been reduced to 18½ per cent. Window glass—there is another thing the people have to use constantly; 20 per cent, reduced to 15 per cent. Whips—35 per cent to 26½ per cent. Now, I should advise the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to look over his list once more. Wood screws, reduced from 45½ per cent to 26½ per cent. Wire fencing 27½ per cent to 11½ per cent.

Mr. DAVIN. There is a misstatement as to a matter of fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member wishes to correct a misstatement, as he says, he must ask the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman to correct a misstatement he has just made?

Mr. DAVIS. What is it?

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has stated that tarred paper is down to 18 and a fraction per cent. I have the tariff of the present year, and it is 25 per cent. Here it is; I will send it over to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS. Under the preferential duty, it is 18½ per cent. Now, I would advise the hon. member for Western Assiniboia to get a new pair of spectacles, his eyesight is falling. And a bottle of hair dye, too, would not come amiss. The next item is wood screws. Under the old tariff wood screws, ad valorem, amounted to 45½ per cent, to-day it is 26½.

Mr. DAVIN. 26½? Again I ask the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. I ask the hon. gentleman's permission—

Mr. DAVIS. If the member for West Assiniboia will possess his soul in patience—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is very inconvenient to be interrupting the hon. member who has the floor unless he is perfectly willing to be interrupted.

Mr. DAVIN. He does not say he is not willing. What he says is a misstatement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take your medicine.

Mr. DAVIN. The medicine is over there.

Mr. DAVIS. I may just say concerning wood screws that I mentioned before, the old duty was 45½ per cent, and it has been reduced to 26½. Of course, I am applying the preferential duty to that. I suppose the member for West Assiniboia is aware that many of those wood screws come from Great Britain, he will not deny that. Now, take wire fencing; I am alluding to the ordinary wire fencing used by farmers in inclosing their fields, they use a great deal of it. Under the old tariff that bore a duty of 27½ per cent, it is now 11½. Scythes 35 per cent, that has been reduced to 18½ per cent. Hoes, 35 per cent, reduced to 18½; pronged forks, 35 per cent, reduced to 18½; shovels and spades, 36 per cent, reduced to 26½; post hole diggers, 35 per cent, reduced to 18½. Now, those are commodities that the farmers of the North-west Territories have to use day in and day out; they are constantly buying these commodities. Therefore, it is of more importance to them to have the duties lowered on these articles than on such articles as the hon. gentleman mentioned the other day, such as crowbars, springs and axles. Now, the hon. gentleman tried to show the other day that scarcely any of the goods used by the people of the North-west—I suppose he was speaking of them—come from Great Britain, but that the majority come from the United States. I have here a list made up from the Trade and Navigation Returns, showing goods imported from Great Britain under preferential tariff:—

|------------------------------------|-------------|
| Woollen fabrics—                   |             |
| From England .....                 | $2,208,300 |
| From United States .....           | 26,847      |
| Yarn—                              |             |
|                                    | Lbs.        |
| From England.....                  | 120,525     |
| From United States.....            | 2,124       |
| Shawls—                            |             |
| From England .....                 | $42,642    |
| From United States.....            | 2,068       |
| Socks and Stockings—               |             |
|                                    | Doz. pairs. |
| From England .....                 | 260,666     |
| (Duty paid on same, $136,070.09.) |             |
| From United States.....            | 10,885      |

Mr. DAVIN. But the preference comes in, I beg leave to call the hon. gentleman's attention—

Mr. SPEAKER. I must really request the hon. member for Assiniboia not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. The hon. member, I think, spoke for some time the other day with very little interruption.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. Whether that is the case or not, the hon. member knows perfectly well what is the parliamentary rule.

Mr. DAVIS. Socks and stockings—we imported from England 260,666 dozen pairs, on which we paid a duty of $136,070.09; from the United States we imported only 10,885 dozen pairs. It will be seen that the greatest portion of the articles used by the farmers in the North-west Territories come from Great Britain, and are, therefore, subject to that preferential clause in the tariff. Now, I have here another short list of goods imported from Great Britain under the preferential tariff. Spool thread—there is a commodity that is purchased constantly by the farmers of the North-west Territories. I know that, because I am in business myself, and we sell an enormous amount of it. We would sell a ton of spool thread where we would not sell one crowbar in the North-west. From Great Britain we imported $276,303 worth, on which we paid a duty of $60,451.93. From the United States we imported only $72,193 worth, the duty of which was only $18,048.50. So it seems that the great bulk of this commodity comes from Great Britain, and is therefore subject to that preferential clause of the tariff. Now, take printed cotton fabrics. The hon. member dwelt on cotton goods a long time during his speech on Friday, but he never touched this item at all: Printed cotton fabrics, or in other words what we call prints, are used in every family all over the Dominion. We imported from Great Britain 20,491,128 yards.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is misrepresenting me. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman raises a point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. The point of order is this: The hon. gentleman says I did not refer to these coloured prints. I say I referred to it specially, and called attention to the amount of the imports.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I say, Mr. Speaker, that the value of these coloured prints imported from Great Britain was $1,698,758, and that the duty collected upon the same was $522,522.06, so that the great bulk of that commodity comes from Great Britain, and is therefore subject to the preferential clause in the tariff. I think that the hon. member for West Assiniboia will not deny that he dealt with the item of handkerchiefs. I read his speech of Friday over and I think he said something about handkerchiefs. We imported last year from Great Britain $93,804 worth of handkerchiefs, and from the United States $1,610, so that the great bulk of our importations came from Great Britain and was therefore subject to the preferential clause in the tariff.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and other hon. members on the other side of the House, try to make us believe that the country is going to the dogs. But I can tell them that they are mistaken in this. It is not the country that is going to the dogs, but it is their own party that is going to the dogs. I have sat in this House not only during the present session, but during the last two sessions, and I have listened to these hon. gentlemen day in and day out. It is the same old scold, the same old story, the same old charge of broken promises. I am looking at this matter from the standpoint of a North-wester, and as such I may say that I want the best policy and the best Government that we can get. We know, as a matter of fact, that this Government has done something for the farmers of the North-west; we know that they have reduced the duty on a great many of the commodities that the farmers of the North-west use largely; we know also that they have placed binder twine and barbed wire on the free list—two commodities that the farmers use a great deal more of than they do crowbars. We know that they have given us good, honest government in this country. I would like to know what hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House propose to give us? If they have a policy that differs from that of the Government, I would like to know what it is. If they have a policy I would like to hear it stated, and if it is a better policy than that of the Government, I do not know but that they might be able to convert me. I will say, however, that it will require an argument stronger than that presented by the hon. member for West Assiniboia or his leader to produce that result. That suggests to me a question. I would like to know who is the leader of the hon. member for West Assiniboia? I attended a meeting held in the town hall at Prince Albert, and listened to a two and a half hours speech by the hon. gentleman; I heard him speaking about the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) and about the late Sir John Macdonald, whose photograph occupied a conspicuous place upon the platform, while the photograph of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) was conspicuous by its absence. The hon. member for West Assiniboia in his speech of two and a half hours' duration never once mentioned the name of the leader of the Opposition in this House. The hon. gentleman held organization meetings in my district, and upon making inquiry, I was informed that he pursued the same course throughout the district that he had followed at Prince Albert. When we take into consideration that the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) came junketting up to the North-west Territories, that he and the hon. member for West Assiniboia were holding meetings together, while the leader of the Opposition, who had just come from the old country, was making that famous declaration that he was not going to take any action during the sittings of the High Commission at Quebec, we will be led to believe that the hon. member for York and the hon. member for West Assiniboia must have had some kind of an understanding between them. I can assure the House that during the whole of their trip through Saskatchewan the hon. member for West Assiniboia never once mentioned the name of the leader of the Opposition. He was challenged in one of the papers at Prince Albert. He went over the articles in the paper, taking a long time to do it, and when he came to this he said: "This paper accuses me of not having mentioned the name of my leader, of being ashamed of mentioning the name of my leader." He never from that day mentioned the name of the leader of the Opposition. I am just mentioning this circumstance to give information to the leader of the Opposition, and I will not charge him anything for it either; it is as free as the air. I will mention another thing that happened in my constituency. The hon. member for West Assiniboia and a coterie of dismissed officials went out to hold a meeting in a polling district in my constituency called Halero. The hon. member for West Assiniboia made a speech upon that occasion. It was a great speech, I am told; he spoke for two and a half hours, and thinking that he had converted the people in the room, he asked them to remain as they were going to organize an association. The people took him at his word and stayed. He drew his document out of his pocket, sent it around and asked the gentlemen in the room to put their names down and join the association. After two and a half hours' eloquence, such eloquence as we heard here on Friday, the hon. member for West Assiniboia sent that paper around the hall. There were some forty or fifty people present, but the only signatures he could get were those of one man and of a small boy fourteen years of age. They at once proceeded to organize a Liberal-Conservative association, electing the man as president and the small boy as vice-president. These are the kind of organizations that the hon. member for West Assiniboia has formed in the interest of the Conservative party in the west.

I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to know what hon. gentlemen opposite propose. They scold and scold day after day. During the first session that I was here, when the tariff was brought down by the hon. Finance Minister, I remember the Opposition set up the cry that the industries of the country were going to be ruined. They trotted out the old stock argument about the smokeless chimneys and the starving artisans. They said that the country was going to the dogs in consequence of this iniquitous tariff that was being brought in by the Liberal Government, and they predicted that the Government would not be able to raise enough money to run the affairs of the country. Time passed, and the predictions of these hon. gentlemen were not fulfilled. They found out that the blue ruin cry had no effect, that the treasury was overflowing with money, that the industries of the country were not going to the dogs, that more artisans were being employed, that more chimneys were being erected. Then they changed their cry and said, "You have stolen our clothes; this is the same old National Policy." If the Government of the day have, as they claim, stolen their policy; if it be a fact that it is their policy that the Government are carrying out, what have the hon. gentlemen to complain of? The Government must be doing right according to their argument. It is nothing but the old scold. Are they prepared to do anything better for the people, or is it only plunder that they are after? Do they just want to get back to office for the sake of the sweets of office? The present condition of affairs reminds me a good deal of the atheist; the atheist wishes to take something away from the people, but he has nothing to give in return. Now, they say that we have the same old tariff, and the same old National Policy. I claim that we have not the same old tariff or the same old National Policy. The Liberal party promised a tariff for revenue; that was laid down in the platform of 1893, and I submit that we have a tariff for revenue. I submit that if there is any protection in our system it is incidental; it is a secondary consideration. The ex-Finance Minister gave us some figures to show that the duty had only been reduced, as he said, about  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on an average; but I submit that his comparison was not a fair one. What the people of this country wanted was a rearrangement of the tariff, so that the burden of taxation would be placed on the shoulders of those who were able to bear it, and so that the agricultural classes might be relieved of the taxation which was grinding them down. That is what has been done by this Government. The tariff has been rearranged in such a way that the agricultural classes of Canada have got substantial relief, and the duties have been placed on luxuries, so that the wealthier classes, if they will use luxuries, will have to pay for them. Hon. gentlemen opposite have, for years and years, been waving the old flag in my part of the country. They told the people that the Liberals were annexationists and rebels, and in fact it was not considered quite respectable to be a member of the Liberal party. But these gentlemen were in power for eighteen years, and I would like to know what they have done during that term to bring the different portions of the Empire closer together. They did nothing at all. When the right hon. Prime Minister went over to England, it is claimed by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), that the Premier was met in Liverpool by the Duke of Devonshire, who, without consulting his colleagues in the British Government, and without consulting the British public, offered a preference in the British markets to our agricultural products. Does any sane person believe that the Duke of Devonshire would do any such thing? Notwithstanding the fact that no such thing ever occurred, the leader of the Opposition has been continually repeating this same old fable. Let me call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to an article on this matter which appears in "Britannia," the official journal of the British Empire League. It reads as follows:—

Has not the time come when the Toronto "Mail and Empire" may fairly be called upon to give chapter and verse for its repeated assertion that the Duke of Devonshire made Sir Wilfrid Laurier an "offer" of preferential trade at Liverpool in June last year, or, in default, to withdraw it once for all? This fable, as it must be called, recently took the following form:

"The Duke of Devonshire, it will be remembered (so the 'Mail and Empire' wrote on May 19th) 'urged the Premier to consider the project favourably, and to enter into negotiations.' Now, we say emphatically, and we challenge contradiction, that neither of the Duke's speeches contained any passage which is capable of being represented in this sense. Let it be clearly understood that neither 'Britannia' nor the present writer has any concern with the controversy which still rages as to the Canadian Premier's policy or diplomacy in the matter. The 'Mail and Empire' is, of course, free to hammer him to its heart's content. That is a question of party politics in which the British Empire League, comprising, as it does, many members both in Great Britain and in Canada who dissent from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's action as well as many who cordially approve it, has no intention of meddling. But for the very reason that the League, having the Queen herself as its patron, is an organization of a national character, it becomes a sheer impropriety to misrepresent its president as having committed himself on a highly disputatious topic, when he has done nothing of the kind. We write with the most friendly feeling towards the 'Mail and Empire,' which has rendered no mean service to the cause of British unity; but we must ask imperatively to be allowed to stand outside the pale of political controversy."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Duke of Devonshire is the president of the British Empire League, and it is a fair inference to draw from this article, that it is an official contradiction of the statement that any offer of preference to Canada was ever made by him. No later than a week or two ago, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), speaking at a smoking concert in Toronto, repeated the same old fable, and he said:

He (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was met almost on landing by the Duke of Devonshire, who made a speech offering this great boon (preferential trade) in unmistakable terms.

I submit, Sir, that it is not fair-play for the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to repeat this mis-statement, when we have an official denial of it. For my part, speaking for the people of the North-west Territories, I may say, that we would like to have a preference in the markets of the old country. It would be a good thing for all Canadians, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, if the British people would give us a preference in their markets; but we all know that the British people are not prepared at the present time to do anything of the kind. When the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was in the district of Saskatchewan, he spoke a good deal about the expenditure, and he told the people that this Government had raised the expenditure by eight or nine million dollars a year, notwithstanding that they had promised to reduce it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) took care to say nothing about the increased revenue. He told the people that millions were being wasted, but he never told them that our revenue had been increased by millions. Let me remind the hon. gentleman of some facts about this matter. The last year the Conservative Government was in power, they brought down Estimates to the extent of $36,449,000, but the reason they brought down these Estimates was, that they thought they were going to the country, and they tried to make the people believe it was an economical Government, and that they were reducing the expenditure. But how did they reduce the expenditure? They reduced it by starving the public works of the Dominion, and I might mention that, in my own district, we had a court-house held up with crutches for two or three years. It was a beautiful sight, especially for new settlers, to see this court-house propped up with poles to keep it from falling down. Another way in which they made a saving was by not drilling the militia for a year, and a third way in which they discovered they could cut down expenditure was by not paying their bills. The hon. member (Mr. Davin) must have some knowledge of this, because I think he knows that many bills in the Indian Department and in the North-west Mounted Police Department were not paid, and were only called in after the fiscal year had expired, so that a good showing might be made. They left about $500,000 of accounts in the Post Office Department, which should have been paid in 1896, but which were not paid. This is a very easy way, indeed, to reduce the expenditure, but it is hardly a statesmanlike way. Now, in 1896-97, the Conservatives thought they would make up for lost time, and when the Liberal Government came into power, they found the Conservatives had prepared Main Estimates amounting to $38,306,586.18, and Supplementary Estimates to the extent of $3,621,689.50, or, in all, $41,930,237.68. This was not a bad showing for the Conservative Government, that called themselves an economical Government.

Now, I heard the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), in this House last year, when these figures were given, make the statement that they had not brought down in that year any Supplementary Estimates. I see the hon. leader of the Opposition in his place; and if he would condescend to reply to an humble member on the back benches, I would ask him to say whether or not there were Supplementary Estimates brought down in that year for $3,621,689.50. If he does not answer me, this speech will go to my constituents, and they will see that the leader of the Opposition did not reply. Therefore, we may take for granted, that those Estimates were brought down, and that they would have spent, if they had got back to power, $41,930,237.68. Does the hon. leader of the Opposition deny that there were Supplementary Estimates in that year? I would like to get an answer. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think there can be no doubt at all that there were Supplementary Estimates. I will give, as an authority for that statement, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who certainly speaks with some authority for the Conservative party; and if the hon. leader of the Opposition says there were not any Supplementary Estimates in that year, then it will be all the worse for the hon. member for West Assiniboia. They can take whichever horn of the dilemma they please; they must either admit that there were Supplementary Estimates or that they were going around the country deceiving the people, in telling them that there were. Now, in the second session of 1896, the hon. member for West Assiniboia, in answer to Mr. Talbot about creameries in the North-west Territories, made this statement, which will be found at page 592 of "Hansard":

Mr. DAVIN. That is not what I said. What I said was that the Government had agreed with me to place in the Supplementary Estimates the sum of $20,000 for the purpose of carrying out this policy, and if they had been allowed to pass those Estimates, we would have had that money, and I used that as an argument why the people should support me as a supporter of that Government.

Now, could there be anything plainer than that? The hon. member for West Assiniboia, who is one of the leading men on the other side of the House, went around and told the people that the Government had $20,000 in the Supplementary Estimates. But the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) denies that there were Supplementary Estimates, and I have heard half a dozen members on the other side of the House make the same statement. Therefore, it is very evident that the hon. member for West Assiniboia had been going around deceiving the people of the North-west Territories, which I have no doubt he had been doing.

Now, take the expenditure by the present Government on Consolidated Account for the year 1897-98, and compare it with the expenditure of hon. gentlemen opposite for their last year, leaving out of account the $41,000,000 which they had brought down for 1896-97. In 1897-98, the expenditure of the present Government was $38,832,525.70. But of this over $2,000,000 was for new services which the late Government had not to provide for, such as opening up the Yukon, bringing the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal, providing a steamboat to run between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and certain other expenditures. If we deduct the $2,000,000 from the total, we find that the present Government, in that year, did not spend as much as hon. gentlemen opposite spent in 1895-96, the year in which they were practising economy in public works. Besides that, they did not leave a deficit of over $4,000,000, as hon. gentlemen opposite did in 1895-96, but instead, they had a magnificent surplus for the year of $1,722,107.22. I ask any fair-minded man in the country who may read these words, to compare the way in which the business of the country has been carried on by this Government with the way in which it was carried on by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House.

I would like to make another comparison. I notice that the hon. member for West Assiniboia was very careful to dodge the question of railways. In the whole of the five hours hotch-potch to which he treated the House on Friday last, I do not think he ever mentioned railways. If he did, I will have to apologize, for I read his speech and did not find one word about railways in it. The hon. gentleman claims to be a man who looks after the interests of the people of the North-west Territories. He says no one has ever done anything for the farmers of that country but himself. Now, I want to compare this much talked-of Crow's Nest Pass Railway deal, as it is called, or bargain, with some of the bargains made by hon. gentlemen opposite, when looking after the interests of the people of this country. I want to compare it with the bargains made with the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, and with the Regina, Saskatchewan and Long Lake Railway. I am sorry that the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Osler) is not in his seat, because he has something to do with the latter railway. The other day, when the ex-Finance Minister was addressing the House in regard to this Crow's Nest Pass Railway, he held up his hands in holy horror, and said that $3,000,000 of the people's money had been thrown away on that iniquitous bargain. But at the time that proposition was before this House, the hon. leader of the Opposition said nothing against it: he was quite willing to let it pass; and the ex-Finance Minister, in the words of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), retreated to the tall timber. He did not stay in the House to vote, but went when the vote was called. Now, I claim that the bargain that was made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, was in the interests of the people, for this reason. In the first place, the road was acquired for the purpose of opening up the mineral resources of the Kootenay country, and, in the second place, for the purpose of furnishing a market for the products of the North-west Territories. Look at the contract that was made. The Government of the day gave the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the construction of this road, some $3,360,000 by way of subsidy, and they gave that subsidy without granting them any monopoly whatever. The Government took care to safeguard the interests of the people in every particular. They took care to retain for the people running powers over that road. They were not prepared to do as hon. gentlemen opposite did some years ago, allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to stand with a club at one of the passes between the prairies and the Pacific Ocean and levy toll; but they said: This pass belongs to the people, and it must belong to the people for all time to come. Therefore, they retained running powers for the people, and also retained control of the road. Further, they got 50,000 acres of the coal lands we hear so much about, to keep them for the people of this country. Besides, they got reductions in freight rates, which I have heard estimated here as equal to $600,000, but which I claim to be equal to not less than $800,000, for the settlers of the North-west Territories, and, for that matter, for the people of the whole Dominion of Canada.

I have the items here. Upon all green fruit brought into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, we got a reduction in freight of 33½ per cent. And that is a benefit, not only to the people of the North-west, but of the whole Dominion. We do not raise fruit in the North-west, we can grow cattle and all sorts of grain but we do not profess to be able to grow fruit, and the people of Ontario, who grow apples, have a profitable market in our country provided we can get reasonable rates of freight. Up to that time, however, we did not. I myself had to pay $518 freight on one car-load of apples, which I purchased from the hon. member from Huron (Mr. McMillan) and which were brought from Seaforth, Ont., to Prince Albert. In obtaining that 33½ per cent reduction, or a reduction of $170 per car, the Government saved a dollar per barrel on every barrel brought into Manitoba and the North-west. That is not only a benefit to the people of Manitoba and the Territories but also the people of Ontario and the rest of the country who have this commodity to sell. This Government also secured a reduction in the rates of freight on cordage and binder twine of 10 per cent, which are also largely used by our agriculturists. On agricultural implements of all kinds, set up, or in parts, they obtained a reduction of 10 per cent in the freights. On iron, including bar, band, Canada plates, galvanized, sheet, pipe, pipe fittings, nails, spikes and horse shoes, 10 per cent. They also got a reduction in freight rates of 10 per cent. On window glass, they got a similar reduction. Also on paper for building and roofing purposes and roofing felt, box and packing, 10 per cent. Also on wooden ware, household furniture. These are all commodities which the settler must have, and these reductions in the rates of freight are a great boon to our people. Another item I forgot to mention is the item of coal oil, on which this Government got a reduction of 20 per cent, which means three cents per gallon to the profit to the people of Manitoba and the Territories. They also got a reduction in freight rates on all the grain exported from Manitoba and the North-west of three cents per hundred pounds, and taking last year's crop, that would amount to a saving of something like $500,000 to the people out there. Take the imports, the reductions in freight rates on these would certainly amount to close on $300,000 more, so that I think I am within the mark when I say that this Government effected by this bargain, a saving in freight rates of no less than $800,000 per year to the people of Manitoba and the Territories.

I wish now to ask your attention to the bargain entered into by the late Government with the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Company. I would ask the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who styles himself the watch-dog of the Territories, why he did not see that this bargain was not concluded which fastened such a monopoly on the people of my district. Why, the late Government gave the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway no less than 6,400 acres of the best lands of the North-west Territories in the Saskatchewan Valley per mile for building that road, not one acre of which have they sold at less than $2 an acre, and some of which they have sold at $3 an acre, so that taking a reasonable estimate of $2 an acre, I find that this company got $12,800 per mile for building that road, besides $80,000 a year for twenty years cash subsidy, for carrying the mails into that district. And all this for the construction of a road, which it only cost the company $10,000 per mile to build. There was no agreement made about running powers or bonding privileges or anything else, but the people were handed over holus bolus to this railway company. And further, mark this, that the people of Saskatchewan were not allowed, under the late Government to tax railway corporations, but, on the other hand, these railway corporations were allowed to tax us to their heart's content and to do what they pleased with the people of that district. What did this company do when they got this grant of 6,400 acres per mile to build that road? They went to the English market and bonded it at $3,800,000. Now, the figures in the blue-book show that it only cost them $2,500,000 to build the road. Where then did the balance, or $1,300,000 go? It must have gone into the pockets of somebody. And in what position do the people of my district find themselves? They find themselves in this position, that they have not only to pay interest on the money which the road actually cost, but also on this additional $1,300,000, and that road we claim we never asked for because it was not built through a section of country which would commend itself to any one of ordinary judgment. Why did not the hon. member for West Assinibolia (Mr. Davin), who always speaks of himself as the watch-dog of the Territories, see that the Manitoba and North-Western line was built which the people needed and asked for instead of this road. Instead of doing this, he sat quiet as a mouse and never once opened his mouth. I do not know from personal knowledge, but it was generally rumoured that he remained silent because he was afraid of injuring the Regina "Leader," which at that time, I believe, was his property.

Take the Calgary and Edmonton road, of which I shall not speak at any length, because the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is here and will probably have occasion to attend to that himself. That is in a still worse position, and any one, I do not care whether he be Conservative, Liberal, Grit, Tory or Patron, who will compare the two bargains—the business bargain made by this Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass and the bargains the late Government made with the Calgary and Edmonton, and also the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan road, not to mention the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company and all the other companies in the land, will find that the record of the present Government stands out in very favourable contrast with that of its predecessors. I defy any one to show one charter given under the late Administration, during eighteen years, in which they safeguarded the interests of the people, or one charter granted during the three short years since this Government came into office, in which the interests of the people have not been thoroughly safeguarded.

I must apologize to the House for taking up so much time speaking of the hon. member for West Assinibolia (Mr. Davin), but I think it advisable to give the House some little information concerning that hon. gentleman. I am afraid his labours in the Saskatchewan district have borne no fruit. As I mentioned, he came to Saskatchewan for the purpose of electing a great friend of his, Speaker of the Assembly.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, what the hon. gentleman states is perfectly untrue.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry to say I did not catch the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Davis), but I think it could be contradicted in a milder form.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman accepts my statement.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say, then, that it was a very strange coincidence that as soon as the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly was buried or snowed under, as you like to call it, the hon. member for West Assinibolia came junketing up to Prince Albert. In fact it is mentioned in the verses I read: "We had a short visit from Davin." He stayed there a couple of days and arranged to come back. They thought they had made arrangements to defeat the successful candidate, Mr. McLeod. They established a poll at a place away down seven hundred miles from Prince Albert, where there are a lot of poor people, they thought they could manipulate, as they had manipulated them in the old days through the Hudson's Bay Company officials and others. But the hon. gentleman did not succeed in electing his friend the ex-Speaker of the Assembly; but, on the contrary, that gentleman was buried out of sight again. I wish to remind the hon. gentleman of that fact, because he might forget it.

Now, I wish to refer for a short time to the management of the Post Office Department. The hon. gentleman spoke of the management of the Post Office Department under the present Administration. I have here a small book, not the "bible" referred to by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), but it might well be the bible of the Conservatives, for it has blue cover. It is a supplementary report of the Postmaster General for the year 1896. I assure you there is good reading in it, and I would advise anybody who has not already done so to read it. I commend it especially to my Conservative friends all over the country. This tells us something of the doings of the party of economy and honesty as the representative of which the hon. member for West Assinibolia spoke. In this book we find that contracts were let without tender, and that they were renewed, year after year, without tender. We find that if an incorrect tender came in a supporter of the Government would simply drop a letter to the Postmaster General and he would renew the old contract at the same price, though perhaps, he had a tender for twenty or thirty per cent less in his hands. Now, the hon. member for West Assinibolia is not guiltless in this regard. I was looking over this book, and under the heading "Manitoba and the North-west Territories," I find a case mentioned in which the hon. gentleman was interested. There was a contract let for the carrying of the mail between Balgonie and Hednesford. Mr. H. Edmonds, a gentleman there, put in a tender for $90 a year, and another gentleman tendered at $94 a year. But the hon. member for West Assinibolia did not want these tenders accepted. He belonged to a party of purity and economy, so he wrote a letter, which is as follows:—

Ottawa, 18th May, 1895.

My dear Sir Adolphe,—I have just received the inclosed from a great friend of ours. If you can manage to give Cockwill the carrying of the mail you will do well. I know the lad; he is almost a hero. I have known him bring the mail from Loon Creek in the face of a strong wind and the glass 30 below zero—one of the most extraordinary feats that probably have ever been performed.

Yours truly,
N. F. DAVIN.

The Hon. Sir A. P. Caron, K.C.M.G., Postmaster General, Ottawa.

And he wanted this hero of his, who, I have no doubt, was a good Tory and a heeler of his own, to get the difference between $125 and $90 a year to put in his own pocket. And the hon. member for West Assiniboia is not the only one. Take a case in my own district. There was one contract that had been let to the same party from the time the road went in until I was elected. The contractors, Messrs. Leeson and Scott, had the contract for a route of 90 miles between Saskatoon and Battleford. They had no intermediate post office to serve and they carried the mail twice a week. The price was about $7,200 a year. Now, there were other gentlemen of the same political stripe as the hon. member for West Assiniboia who were hungry and wanted to feed at the public trough. But these contractors were like the big hog who was eating all the swill, while the lean pigs were grunting round and wanting to get a little, but when they came to the trough, the fat fellow would drive them away. One of these discontented parties, a gentleman by the name of Stovel, got very restless. The hon. gentleman knows him well, as he is one of his good heelers. He writes to the Postmaster General complaining that the contract has been let for ten or twelve years without tender, and offers to take it at $5,000 and furnish all the security required. Mr. Macdowell, the gentleman who represented the district in this House at the time, apparently had not a very strong pull with the Administration of that time. He wrote a letter recommending that the contract be given to Mr. Stovel, on the ground that it was in the interest of the country that the saving should be made. Mr. McLeod, the post office inspector in Winnipeg, also recommended that the contract be given to Mr. Stovel, on the ground that he had investigated the matter and found that Mr. Stovel was a thoroughly responsible man. But a certain hon. gentleman who was then on the Treasury benches, I think, Mr. Daly, wrote a letter, which is published in this book, in which he says that he wishes Messrs. Leeson and Scott to get the contract. Notwithstanding the letter of the hon. member for Saskatchewan for that time and the recommendation of the post office inspector, and notwithstanding that a change would effect a saving of $2,200 a year, the contract was renewed with Messrs. Leeson and Scott at the old figure. I have heard that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has said something about me in connection with a post office. A little paper in Battleford, for which he may write occasional correspondence, published a lot of trash last winter saying I was connected with some post office contract jobbery. The only jobbery that I know of in regard to post office contracts came from the hon. member's friends in that district. When I was elected, this Tory contractor, who had been feeding at the public trough, had the audacity to write to me a letter offering me $1,000 if I would allow the contract to run eighteen months. It evidently was a fat contract. My answer was to write to the Postmaster General to cancel the contract at once, and it was cancelled. And that contract was let for less than $2,000. So there was about $5,200 a year, something over $30,000 altogether, that had been put in these men's pockets—enough to build a bridge across the Saskatchewan. And this was only one contract; there are twenty or thirty in the North-west Territories. This contractor, apparently, regarded it as a business transaction and it seemed to be one to which he was accustomed. Apparently he had been doing business on these lines, and had, no doubt, come to the conclusion that every man had his price. And he approached me in that way. He approached me in the same way as he had been doing to this other gentleman, but he found out he had to deal with different material.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. But do I understand him to say that I ever had any transaction with Mr. Leeson in respect to any contract?

Mr. DAVIS. I said he was your political friend. You will not deny that.

Mr. DAVIN. I never in my life had a word of conversation with Mr. Leeson on any subject of the kind.

Mr. DAVIS. I was going to say that there was over $5,000 a year on that little contract being stolen from the people of this country. Let me make a comparison. There is a mail contract that runs from Prince Albert to Melford, ninety miles, the same distance as this other contract running to Battleford. I think it serves not less than twelve post offices; while the poor half-breed who carried the mail on that line gets only $600, while this other gentleman was getting $7,200. But there was a rake-off in some places; as I said before, it was done on business principles. Somebody was getting it, I know it was not the member for Saskatchewan at that date, because he recommended that the contract be let to another party, which was not done. Now, on all the contracts in the Territories we were paying more than $50,000 a year over what the work should cost, and no doubt there was a rake-off for these people. The member for West Assiniboia could no doubt give valuable testimony as to who participated. No doubt it was easy to form associations, easy to have campaign literature and all that sort of thing in a state of matters like that. We find that contracts of this kind have been running for years, not only in Saskatchewan and Alberta, but all over the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But that has been changed; we now have an honest administration of public affairs in this respect. The contracts have been re-let with a consequent saving of over $700,000 to the people of this country since the present Postmaster General took possession of that department. Now we have got penny postage that these gentlemen sneer at, these same gentlemen that were waving the old flag and an appropriation," that is what they used to say out west. Now, I have just one thing more, and that is the question of prohibition. I do not know that my hon. friend from West Assiniboia mentioned the question of prohibition, but I think he did allude to it in some way. I may say that there is no gentleman sitting in this House to-day who is in a better position to speak with authority on that question than the member for West Assiniboia. Why, Sir, he is an expert, his advice should be taken, he knows all about it. I remember one occasion when he came to Prince Albert to deliver a temperance lecture in the Methodist church. That was in the old prohibition days when there was supposed to be no liquor out there; that is to say, if a man got liquor to drink he was breaking the law. But the hon. member, as I understand, for some reason failed to deliver that lecture. It was a good deal like the speech that was never delivered here in Ontario. I remember a speech that the hon. gentleman was advertised to deliver in Stratford. The speech came out in the paper with big head-lines, "Great speech by Nicholas Flood Davin, M.P." Not only was the speech there, but the cheers were there. Frequent parentheses filled with "great applause," "tremendous enthusiasm," "cheers, cheers." I tell you the member for West Assiniboia knows how to put in cheers. I think he must have a grievance against the "Hansard" reporters of this House, and also against the gallery, because in reporting his speeches they do not put in cheers. Well, he started in to deliver this lecture at Prince Albert, and the lecture was never delivered. There happened to be a beastly—shall I call it?—well, it was an ungainly, unsightly ditch between the Methodist church and the hotel where the hon. gentleman was stopping. What happened to the ditch I do not know, but when the hon. member appeared before the church doors the people were just leaving. He insisted on going into deliver the lecture, but the clergyman held up his hand and said: "Oh, no, just go away." The hon. gentleman was a terrible looking sight. I do not know whether he looked like a Free Trader, or a Liberal or a Conservative, but he was a terrible looking sight anyway at that time. Therefore, I say that this prohibition question is one that the hon. member might have touched on. It is a question that interests the people of the North-west Territories, it is a question that will come up on the platform at the next general election, I have no doubt, and therefore it would have been well if the hon. member for West Assiniboia had given his experience, not only his experience at this temperance lecture, but his experience at Medicine Hat at one time during the election campaign. I do not know what happened there again, but people talked something about a wheelbarrow. I heard the hon. gentleman quoting a little piece of poetry the other night about an Irish jaunting car. I do not know that I ever heard him say anything about riding in a wheelbarrow, but we have heard a story up there to that effect. I think the hon. gentleman knows something about the width of the streets. However, I have no doubt that he is a good temperance man because he joined the temperance lodge immediately after this memorable ride, and therefore he ought to be able to speak with authority on this subject. I do not wish to shirk this question at all, I will make my position very plain upon it. I think the Government of the day have done perfectly right, and I am willing to take the responsibility for what I say here, because the district that I represent gave a majority in favour of prohibition. But, Sir, the majority was small, the vote polled was small, as it was all over the Dominion. I do not think the Government would be justified in bringing in a prohibitory measure on a vote of 23 per cent of the people. I have had some experience with the prohibitory law in the North-west Territories, because I was there in the old prohibition days. Unless you have the people behind this law you cannot enforce it. What is the use of passing legislation when you know everybody is going to break it? There is no sense in doing that at all. The trouble is to get the public to look at a breach of a prohibitory law in the same light as they do a breach of any other law. That is my experience on this question in the North-west Territories years ago. We could not get the people to look at it as a crime, the people in the country were breaking the law continually, and the member for West Assiniboia knows that. I say that in order to enforce a law of that kind we have got to have the people behind us. Another thing—what do you propose to do with the province of Quebec?—notwithstanding the story that we heard from my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) about stuffing the ballot-boxes, and all that sort of thing. No matter what he may say, the fact remains that the province of Quebec, by a sweeping majority, voted against it. Are you going to pass legislation to coerce the province of Quebec? You cannot do that. This is a question the people of the provinces will have to settle themselves. The only way this matter can be settled is by an amendment to the British North America Act to allow the people of each province to deal with it themselves. If the people of Quebec want to drink liquor, the people of Ontario have no right to force their views down their throats; and if the people of Ontario wish to have prohibition, why should the people of Quebec force their views on the people of Ontario? The only thing to do is to allow each province to settle this question locally; and that is the position that this Government or any Government will eventually have to take. I was speaking with a temperance man in my district, one of the leaders, and I said: Do you suppose you could enforce a prohibitory law in this country? Look at the enormous extent of our boundary line from the Atlantic to the Pacific; look at the scattered settlements. How do you propose to enforce a prohibitory law in this country? How are you going to enforce these prohibitory laws?" He said that it should be done. I said: "Supposing that a prohibitory law were passed, and you saw your neighbour going home with a gallon keg of whisky, would you consider it your duty to inform upon him?" The answer was: "No." I said: "Suppose you saw a man stealing another's cow, or burning his house, would you go and inform on him?" The answer was: "Yes." That is the way it is all over the country. You cannot get people to look upon breaking such a law as a crime. There is no use of trying to pass a prohibitory law without having at least half of the people behind it, because you must assume that those people who do not take sufficient interest in the question to go to the polls, are against prohibition.

Now, I want to speak a few words about some charges that were levelled by the hon. member for West Assiniboia in reference to the administration of the Yukon. He made some serious charges, but, like the rest of the charges made by the hon. gentleman, he fails to present the proofs. What proof has the hon. gentleman given us that any of the officials in the Yukon have misbehaved themselves? He has no proofs; he attacks Mr. Ogilvie, and says he is not a fit person to act as commissioner to investigate these charges. Mr. Ogilvie has the confidence of the people of this country, be they Liberals or Conservatives. I have known him for a long time; he has worked in my district, and no finer man ever came into that part of the country. The hon. member for West Assiniboia has not a tittle of proof that any wrong-doing has been done in the Yukon, but he comes here and asks this House to take his statements without evidence. I am quite willing to compare the administration of the affairs of the Yukon, as carried on by the present Government, with the administration of affairs in any new country that has been opened up, into which there has been a rush of placer miners, such as took place in the Yukon. I am willing to compare the administration of the Yukon with the administration in California in 1847. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say, that this administration was not under the British flag. Well, I will take a country that is under the British flag, and I will say, that I am quite willing to compare the administration of affairs in Australia in the early days of the gold fever there, when there were bushrangers and all kinds of people about, and where many murdered men were found. That was under the British flag. I will come nearer home, and I will compare the administration of affairs in the Yukon with the administration of affairs in Manitoba by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they started in to open up that country. It is not so many years ago; we all know how hon. gentlemen bungled in that respect. We know about how they sent their lieutenant-governor and their officials up to take possession of the country, when they had no right to take possession of it. We had the beautiful spectacle of a lieutenant-governor, appointed by the Crown, holding court on American territory. The bungling of the Government of that day and their officials started a rebellion in Manitoba. Hundreds of good, loyal British subjects were shut up in Fort Garry and starved, and it ended in the unfortunate murder of poor Scott. This was the kind of administration that was given in that country. I will go further than that, because it may be said, that Manitoba was isolated at that time, and that it was impossible to reach it without going through American territory, though the same may be said of the Yukon district to-day. The late Government undertook to open up the North-west Territories, which were in no sense isolated. They were connected with the east by a great railway, by that great band of iron that hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of talking about. The Government sent up there all the political hacks of the east, as officials, and these people were responsible for that unfortunate rebellion, where millions of treasure were destroyed, where the blood of innocent people was shed, where the houses of hundreds of people were burned over their heads. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will get up and talk about the condition of affairs in the Yukon. Two rebellions inside of fifteen years is their record. After the officials had caused that rebellion, the Government sent a commission to investigate, with the result that every person who was a voter and a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, was paid for everything he lost, and a great deal more than he lost. I know of one case, where a man was allowed $13,000 for a lot of stuff that he could carry on his back. If that man had been a Liberal, there would have been nothing for him at all. I will instance the case of two widows, who were like the women grinding at the mill, in the sense that one was taken, and the other was left. One happened to be the widow of a Conservative, with a son; the other the widow of a Liberal, and she also had a son. The Conservative widow was paid her account in full, while the other widow never got a cent. The hon. member for West Assiniboia mentioned the names of several officials—among them, that of Mr. McGregor. He said—I speak subject to correction—that he was a horse thief. Is that not what the hon. gentleman said? Well, I see no difference between one who steals a farmer's horse, and a man who steals the character of an official 3,000 miles away. One steals the horse and is amenable to the law; but the other steals the official's character, knowing that there is no punishment to be meted out to him, because he is protected by this roof, under which we stand to-day. I am quite willing to compare Mr. McGregor, a man with unblemished reputation, with such men as Bedson, Hayter Reed, General Middleton, and a gang of satellites, who went up during the rebellion to plunder the poor people. Talk about a horse thief! Bedson, who was one of the great pushers in the Conservative party, drove away a whole herd of horses, besides which, he is known as to have taken a man's billiard table. We have Middleton taking Bremner's furs, and taking a horse belonging to a half-breed, named Champagne. He was brought before Judge Burbidge, who found that he had taken the horse. Champagne was offered $200 for his horse. They took everything but the red-hot stove, and they would have taken that, if they could have got their hands on it. It ill-becomes the hon. gentleman to talk about the affairs of the Yukon. I think the administration of affairs in the Yukon will compare favourably with the administration of affairs in the North-west Territories under the regime of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

I just want to devote a few minutes further to my hon. friend from West Assiniboia. There was one misstatement that he made on the platform at Prince Albert; I heard him speaking to the people there, and I could hardly keep from laughing. He said: "Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if there is one thing more than another that I am known for, it is my sincerity." Talk about the sincerity of the hon. member (Mr. Davin). Why, he has been moving motions in this House for several years, and then taking to the woods, so that he would not vote for them.

Mr. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I ask the hon. gentleman's permission to make a statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) has made a statement for which there is not the least foundation in fact.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). The hon. member (Mr. Davin) moved a resolution in this House one time and voted against his own resolution. Does he say he did not do that?

Mr. DAVIN. There is no truth whatever in it.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose I will have to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but we will see about that later on. When he is in the Territories, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is a great advocate of free binder twine, and in this House used to sweat in every pore over the wrong that was being done the farmers, and his own paper, the Regina "Leader" used to publish his long speeches, freely interlarded with applause and immense enthusiasm. Now, in the session of 1891 the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) moved that binder twine be put on the free list, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) voted against that, and he excused himself on the ground that he did not know what his constituents wanted in the matter, and in the Regina "Leader" there is an article on binder twine, April 7th, 1892, in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) wrote:

In the interests of the farmers of Western Assiniboia, the "Leader" raises its voice against the duty on binder twine. We have felt for years that the National Policy bore too heavily on the North-west, and with regard to the particular item of binder twine, no one has come forward to defend a proceeding which compels the farmers to pay some $400,000 more for the twine than the twine is actually worth.

There are more farmers in the Territories now than there were then, and if in 1891, as the hon. gentleman asserts, $400,000 would be saved to the farmers of the North-west Territories, then according to the same calculation, $1,000,000 is saved to the farmers now by this Government putting binder twine on the free list. The hon. gentleman made a speech in Parliament supporting a reduction of duty on binder twine, and it will be interesting to see how he voted. It was a very pathetic speech; his sympathy was oozing out of every pore for the poor farmers of the Territories, but when it came to the test vote, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) turned around and voted against the resolution. He could send his speech to the farmers in the North-west Territories, but they were not in a position to know how he voted, and they no doubt would come to the conclusion that he voted as he spoke. Such, however, was not the case. The hon. gentleman is very fond of talking about independence in this House, but where is there any independence in conduct like that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) told us in one of his speeches, and I agree with him for once, that the air of the North-west Territories was so invigorating and so fine that any man who drank in that ozone never wished to leave the Territories. But, Mr. Speaker, I know that on several occasions the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) was only too anxious to leave the Territories, if he could be pitchforked in as Minister of the Interior at Ottawa. We all know how disappointed he was when Mr. Dewdney was hoisted in over his head. We all know that he called the Ministers of that day a cabinet of antiques, and stated that he could not supply them with brains. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has forgotten this, but we in the North-west Territories have not forgotten it, and we feel like keeping him in mind of it. The record shows that in 1893, when the Postmaster General again moved that binder twine be placed on the free list, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) supported the motion in his speech and voted against it. In 1893 Mr. Dalton McCarthy moved the following resolution:

Since the introduction of the protective system, sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as, under existing conditions, can be successfully carried on in Canada. Moreover, many manufacturers sheltered behind the rampart thus erected have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and maintain monopolies.

That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure, has proved in many instances oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes, and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits; is unfair and unequal in its incidence, and has been productive of discontent, verging on disloyalty, among those who suffer from its injustice.

That no sufficient reason has been adduced, or exists, requiring investigation respecting the foregoing facts, which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation, which is imperative.

The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) on that occasion shirked the vote, and he explained the matter, in an article which he sent to the Regina "Leader," his own paper, and which it will be very interesting for the House to hear. He said:

Any resolution impugning the existing fiscal policy is, as demonstrated on the strictly party vote on Mr. McCarthy's motion, regarded as one expressing want of confidence in the Government. It was impossible for Mr. Davin, advocating a protective tariff, to support a resolution condemning such a tariff and suggesting unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, but we do not exaggerate when we say that Mr. McCarthy's proposals of reduction of customs met with the private approval of many members of both parties. It is easily understood that, with party discipline—

It had his "private" approval, but he was afraid to vote for it. These are the words of a man who is constantly talking about his independence and sincerity. I would call the attention of the House to the last sentence in this article. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) thought it was a terrible thing for the late Mr. Jameson to say something of that sort, but here he is writing the very same thing himself that he condemned in others. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has said and written so much that he actually does not know what he has said and written. He reminds me of a story which I will repeat for his benefit. A gentleman once had a parrot and a dog, and the parrot was trained to say "Sic 'im," so that the dog would jump up and tackle any other dog that happened to be around. One day the parrot was perched on the back of a chair, and the dog was lying on a mat on the floor. The parrot said "Sic 'im," and the dog jumped up, but finding no other dog around he went for the parrot, and in a few moments there was a confused mixture of parrot and feathers and dog. The parrot escaped and started to scratch the side of his head, and on reflecting, he called out: I know what is the matter with me, I talk too much. So it is with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin). He talks too much, and he does not remember half the time what he has said. In order to keep up the farce with his constituents, on the 13th February, 1893, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) moved the following resolution:

That it is the opinion of this House that the duty on barbed wire, on agricultural implements, on coal oil and on cotton should be reduced so as to give no more than reasonable protection, and that the duty on binder twine should be abolished.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) was willing at that time to have a reasonable protection, but now he is extremely anxious that the whole thing should be wiped out. He has changed his mind since he went on the other side of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman never pressed this motion to a division, but as is customary with him, when the question came before the House, the hon. gentleman retreated to the woods.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). He got under the barn.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Yes, he got under the barn. The present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) had previously introduced a resolution to make binder twine free, but this the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) opposed, and I will read a brief extract from his speech as reported in his own paper:

Mr. Foster had promised to make known the Government policy on the tariff, and in the face of such a request he (Davin) could not have voted for the motion. Had he done so, he would have been supporting what, coming from a member of the Opposition, was practically a vote of want of confidence in the Government.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) did not know as much then about the intentions of his own Government as he seems to know now about the intentions of the present Government. He was apparently not "the greatest orator in Canada" then, as they recently billed him in the North-west Territories.

Now, in the session of 1893, Mr. Cleveland had a motion for free coal oil, and respecting this, the hon. member for West Assiniboia, sent the following to his paper on 13th February, 1893:—

"A proposal was now before the House to abolish the duty on coal oil. He (Davin) could not go that far,—

To-day I find he is asking for free coal oil. How things change in a few years when a man moves from one side of the House to the other.

—but that the duty should be reduced. Speaking on binder twine, he (Davin) made a strong appeal for free binding twine for the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west."

Members from the west can congratulate the hon. gentleman on any strong appeals he may make, but we would like to see him at least consistent enough to vote as he speaks in the House.

I am sorry I have had to take up so much time in referring to the hon. gentleman, but he has not been very complimentary to me. On Friday night, in his speech, the hon. member said—I quote this from "Hansard":

I will do anything to oblige my hon. friend. Is that my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. T. O. Davis) who is making an interruption? Let us have a good one, as he said when he went into a Winnipeg cigar store the other day, and the storekeeper asked him whether he would like a foreign or a domestic cigar. "I do not know," he said, "but give us a good one."

From that I infer that the hon. member for West Assiniboia thought I did not know the difference between an imported and a domestic cigar. I can tell him that I have sold as well as smoked plenty of imported as well as domestic cigars, and I can tell him that not only do I know the difference between them, but I can tell an Irish jackass when I see him.

The hon. member for West Assiniboia says he was the means of getting $20,000 for the people of the North-west Territories for creameries. The hon. gentleman forgets that the present Government has spent for creameries in the North-west Territories not less than $32,000; so that the people evidently got from this Government a great deal more than the hon. member asked for. He must have great influence with this Government, but he evidently had the ground work laid in the Supplementary Estimates of 1896-97 to which I alluded a little while ago.

Now, I repeat the challenge which I have already made to the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, in the town hall at Prince Albert, made certain statements with regard to the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of the Interior, calling them thieves and everything else. I told my people that I would challenge him on the floor of the House to repeat those charges here. I now ask him if he is prepared to go on and formulate those charges.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that this Government have done nothing. I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition make that remark. He said he would like to see what they had done. Well, for one thing they have settled the Manitoba school question. That is something that bothered us in the Territories, and that question is settled, and settled to the satisfaction of the people of the west, and I presume, from the different members who are walking into this House from the province of Quebec, that it is settled to the satisfaction of the people of that province as well. If hon. gentlemen opposite had been returned to power, I have no doubt that, with their accustomed bungling, they would have mismanaged that question as they did the affairs of the North-west Territories and Manitoba in their early days, until they would have had another rebellion on their hands, with another waste of the country's blood and treasure. The right hon. the leader of the Government promised to settle that question, and he has settled it successfully.

Another thing the Government have done is this: they have brought the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal, which I claim is greatly in the interest of the people of the west, because it is giving us a competing line all the way from Parry Sound on the Georgian Bay to the Atlantic Ocean, something we greatly needed. If the Intercolonial Railway was ever going to be a paying concern, it should not be left to end in a buckwheat field, but it should have a terminus in a great commercial centre. I have no doubt that when the returns are brought down we shall find that that road is paying well.

One of the greatest cries about the tariff was that the present Administration did not take off the duty on agricultural implements. Now, I am strongly of the opinion that that was a war measure. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in an article in his paper, said that the reduction in duty was a substantial relief, and all the farmers could expect; but to-day he wants agricultural implements put on the free list. He is not satisfied to-day with what satisfied him when his friends were in power. It all depends on whose ox is gored. If hon. gentlemen opposite had got into power again, it would not have been many months before they would have put the duty back to 35 per cent. I am sorry the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not in the House. In the late election in West Huron he said the Government were doing too much for the farmers of this country. I have here what he said, and I will read it:

To the Editor of the Signal.

Dear Sir,—I notice that the speakers for Mr. McLean are telling the farmers what the Tory Government would do for them if they got in power; yet, strange to say, the story they tell on the other side is entirely opposite.

I had a call from Mr. McLean and his henchman, Mr. Taylor, the Conservative whip of the House of Commons, at my office on Wednesday morning, and during our conversation Mr. Taylor said: "What we want, Mr. Saunders, is more protection to manufacturers. The Government is doing altogether too much for the farmer. If we (the Tory party) were in power, we would raise the duty on agricultural implements to 45 per cent, and there would be no free binder twine or barb wire. It is the manufacturer we want to help. What is the use of pandering to the agricultural vote? The present Government is doing too much of that."

There is the statement, signed "A. Saunders."

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the hon. gentleman, I would like to make a statement in connection with that. Mr. Taylor is not present, but I saw him, and I saw his denial of that statement. He gave an unqualified denial of it from first to last, and published his denial in Huron during the election.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who signed this is the manager of an organ factory, a very respectable man in West Huron.

An hon. MEMBER. He is a Grit.

Mr. DAVIS. The hon. gentleman says he has seen a contradiction of this by the hon. member for South Leeds. Did he see a contradiction of it by Mr. Saunders?

Mr. HUGHES. I saw a contradiction by Mr. Taylor, backed up by Mr. McLean, the gentleman who is reported to have been present.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Then it is a question of veracity between the hon. member for South Leeds and this gentleman, who is a very respectable man in West Huron. I do not wish to go through a long list, but we know, as a matter of fact, that this Government has done a great deal for the people. We know that our trade is increasing by leaps and bounds and that immigrants are flocking into the North-west. The leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said out in West Huron, that the reason why the great West had not filled up and why the two hundred millions of bushels output of grain yearly, which he at one time predicted that country would supply, was not taking place, was the low price of wheat. That alone, he said, has kept the country back. But, Mr. Speaker, when the late Government succeeded the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, what was the position? There was then some 12,000 people in the Territories, and when the late Government went out there was 80,000 people in them. Thus, in eighteen years, not more than sixty thousand people went in and settled. But since this Government has been in office, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has put 30,000 good settlers into that country in the last year, and I venture to say that at the end of this year, we will find that 40,000 more have gone in, and if this party should remain in power during the next eighteen or twenty years, as I am confident it will—for notwithstanding all hon. gentlemen may say, they will have to get a policy and cease scolding before the people will listen to them—we will find a million people in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and then we will see the two hundred millions bushels of wheat, which the leader of the Opposition predicted, coming out of that country. But that will be under Liberal rule, and not under such bungling rule as we at last succeeded in freeing ourselves from.

I do not wish to follow the example set by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), nor that given us by the leader of the Opposition. I do not care to weary the House by attempting to rival either of them. I shall therefore conclude by saying merely this, that knowing, as I do, the people of the North-west Territories—and I know at least as much about public feeling there as does the hon. member for West Assiniboia—I claim that they are satisfied that this Government is doing all it can in the interests of the farmers, and it has done a great deal. I have letter after letter from supporters of the opposite party, some of them the head men of that party, to bear out what I say. I can tell the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that one of his own constituents in the Saskatchewan district, a retired British officer, who formerly was always the head centre of the Conservative party out there, told me he was perfectly satisfied with this Government, and was going to support it at the next general election, and I have similar assurances from hundreds of others. The hon. member has made many abortive attempts at organizing in the North-west Territories, but has never succeeded in getting together more than a corporal's guard, and it is an ordinary occurrence to find, at the close of a meeting which he has addressed for two or three hours at a time, those who listened to him give three cheers for Laurier as the meeting breaks up. Notwithstanding what organization he may attempt out there now, and though he may continue organizing from this to doomsday, he will find that when a general election comes on, he and his party will be swept out of existence. He will not even have the vote of the returning officer the next time to give him a seat in this House.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). There being so few representatives, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the province of Manitoba, I deem it my duty to take advantage of this debate on the Address to touch upon a few of the subjects that I consider would be interesting to that particular portion of the Dominion; and in doing so I do not at all propose to follow the hon. gentleman who has just sat down in all his peripatations from Dan to Beersheba, bringing as he did, a lot of irrelevant matter with which this Parliament should have nothing whatever to do. As a medical man, it recalled to my mind an interesting phase of human nature, and that is, how long a man's tongue will continue to wag after his brains have ceased to work. The hon. gentleman stated that he can always tell an Irish jackass when he sees one. I have not the least doubt of it, Mr. Speaker, because from long study before the looking-glass, he ought to be thoroughly well acquainted with the appearance of that animal. I can quite well understand that my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) must have hit the hon. gentleman pretty hard during the campaign, for otherwise we would not have had him attempting a stump speech in the House to-day for the purpose, as he himself says, of distributing it among his constituents, and the best evidence that he did not base his statements on facts, is the fact that every time he was called to order he had to take something back. Life is too short for me to attempt to correct the inaccuracies he was guilty of, for his whole speech was a tissue of unfounded facts and has only to be read by any intelligent person to find—I will not say the untruthfulness—but the inaccuracies of his statements.

The hon. gentleman indulged considerably in personalities and accuses the hon. member for West Assiniboia of having attempted to make a temperance lecture in a church. Well, if we can judge of the number of times the hon. member for Saskatchewan has been at church by the language he has used in this House to-day, no one can suspect him of having attended church, either for the purpose of making a temperance lecture or listening to one or for any other purpose.

Let me take a few samples from the hon. gentleman's speech which will give you an idea of the character of the whole, for if we are to judge the other parts of his speech on the same basis we will see how very far he was from stating the facts. In the first place, let me say that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), from his seat the other day, accused the hon. gentleman of having made an immoral bargain with regard to his own election; and I notice that the hon. gentleman did not attempt to deny the charge. The facts are these. The hon. gentleman was opposed by a member of his own party, Mr. McPhail, and we are thoroughly conversant with the fact that there was a considerable split in the Liberal party in Saskatchewan at the Dominion elections. The hon. gentleman's election was protested by his opponent, Mr. McPhail, and this protest created so much trouble in the party that the present lieutenant-governor of the Territories was sent up to Calgary to untangle the twisted threads. The Lieutenant-Governor, however, by mistake, went to the wrong Mr. Davis and put his foot in it, and as a result the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) had to send his own brother out from Calgary to undo the mischief. An arrangement was then made in order to get Mr. McPhail to drop his protest, by which the patronage was to remain in Mr. McPhail's hands, the cost of entering the protest to be borne by the present member for Saskatchewan, and the present member was to retain his seat. I am not going to give this on my own authority, but will prove it by the affidavit of the defendant himself, the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). This is the amended defence put in by the hon. member for Saskatchewan. I may say that the defendant had given a note for $180 to pay the expenses of the protest which had been entered against him to have that protest dropped:—

The defendant says:

That he made the said note for and on account of certain costs incurred by the payee in the prosecution by the payee of a certain election petition filed by the payee of the said note against the defendant, the duly elected member of the House of Commons of Canada for the district of Saskatchewan, in which petition certain acts of misconduct on the part of the defendant's agents at such election were preferred against such agents, which charges, if proved, would be sufficient to unseat the defendant and render such agents amenable to the provisions of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act in that behalf; and the said note, as given as aforesaid, to prevent inquiry into the said charges and insure the abandonment and dismissal of said petition, and to illegally suppress the same, as the payee then well knew; and said note was endorsed to the plaintiff after due, and the said note and the consideration therefor were and are illegal and contrary to public policy.

There was a second affidavit by the same gentleman, which reads as follows:—

I, Thomas O. Davis, of the town of Prince Albert, in the North-west Territories of Canada, merchant, make oath and say:

1. I am the defendant in this action.
2. The circumstances under which I signed the note sued on herein are set out briefly in count 3 of the former affidavit made by me and filed herein, and in my examination before the clerk of this honourable court in respect thereof.

3. The note sued on herein was made after and as a result of certain negotiations which have been conducted by me, and on my behalf, with a view to having a certain election petition abandoned which has been filed by the payee of said note against my election and return as a member of Parliament, and in which certain charges of alleged misconduct by agents were made. Many of the events of the said negotiations have escaped my memory, but I now recollect more clearly than when I made my said former affidavit the circumstances immediately attending the making of the said note, which were as follows:—

One of the conditions voluntarily assumed by me, and which I was prepared to carry out when informed that the said payee had decided to abandon his said petition, was to pay the said petitioner's costs, which I was advised I was liable therefor. However, when I found that the sum demanded was $175, I declined to pay the same, as I considered the amount excessive; but I was then told that unless I agreed to pay the said amount, or whatever sum might be due for costs from the said petitioner, the said election petition would not be abandoned, but would be continued in the name of another petitioner, and I thereupon signed the said note as an agreement to pay the said sum as costs. I think I was promised an itemized statement of these said costs, but I never received the same. I was not aware until long afterwards that my agreement to pay the said costs under the circumstances herein-before set forth, was contrary to law or public policy, and when I did become aware that my said agreement was illegal I repudiated said note and refused to pay same.

I make this affidavit in explanation of the facts deposed to in my affidavit filed herein and my oral examination held thereunder, and in support of my application for leave to amend my defence.

This is the evidence of the immoral bargain the hon. member for West Assiniboia had charged the hon. member for Saskatchewan with being a party to. I have never heard of any petition that was made against any member being returned to this House and the defendant paying the costs without some consideration. The consideration in this case was that the party who had filed the petition should retain the patronage of the constituency, the hon. member retaining the seat.

Now, I would just take up a few of the items which were referred to by the hon. member for Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman attempted to impress this House with the idea that the preferential tariff was a very great benefit to our people, that a great number of the articles were being imported from Great Britain. But take, for instance, the item of tar paper, which was one of the items he brought forward as illustrating the benefit to our western farmers of the preferential tariff. The value of tar paper brought into this country last year was $8,031. How much of that came from Great Britain do you think? Just $754 worth, while $7,867 worth came from the United States. Practically the same is shown in the case of wood screws. The value of these imports last year was $10,565. Of this $499 worth came from England while a little over $10,066 worth came from the United States—about one-twentieth of the imports being affected by the preferential tariff. Then take the item of pronged forks. The number imported last year was 58,098, of which 50 came from Great Britain. What wonderful saving to the people to have had a reduction of duty on 50 pronged forks. The hon. gentleman has told us that this Government has given us free barbed wire. It is true they have put barbed wire on the free list. But it happens that nearly all the barbed wire industries were run by those who were Conservatives in politics. But the case of woven wire was different. Woven wire was manufactured in the county of Essex. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) is an ardent free trader when it applies to the other fellow, but a great protectionist when an industry in his own constituency is affected. And so we have barbed wire on the free list, while woven wire comes in under a high duty. Binder twine also they have put on the free list. But under the old tariff that paid only a revenue duty of 12½ per cent. But in the way this duty was taken off the peculiar methods of the Government in discriminating in favour of their political friends were exemplified. They sold the output of the penitentiary binder twine plant to their friend Mr. Hobbs, of London, and delayed the time when the twine should come in free until he had been able to sell out. The hon. member for Saskatchewan even had the hardihood to mention coal oil. Of course the people are buying it for a mere song, now that the Government has made the enormous reduction of one cent a gallon in the duty. The legislation of this Government with regard to coal oil has had the effect of handing over our oil industry to the greatest monopoly that exists in this or any other country, a monopoly so powerful as to be able to hold up our railways with a demand of discrimination in their favour, threatening that otherwise they would take their tank cars to lake ports. They have succeeded in closing up small rival concerns and have bought many of the best wells at Petrolia. This is an octopus that has stretched out its arms and grasped and seized—

Mr. JOHN FRASER (East Lambton). Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to say a word. The company to which the hon. gentleman refers has not purchased any oil wells—

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Lambton) may be an authority on some of the oil wells, but I hardly think he can be an authority on all the oil wells in the Dominion of Canada. I may mention also that coal oil is dearer than it was under the old tariff, as we might expect, considering they have handed over this business to the most gigantic monopoly that exists in this or any other country. We have also been told that freight rates have been greatly reduced since the accession of the Liberals to power, because of the contract with the Crow's Nest Pass road. The hon. member for Saskatchewan forgets to say that in accordance with their well known policy for years past, the Canadian Pacific Railway had reduced rates before that, and they have reduced them since. They had reduced the rate previous to that, and since then they have reduced the rate on the eastern section of the road, where the Crow's Nest Pass contract does not affect it at all. Surely, the hon. gentleman is not going to have the hardihood to claim all this reduction as a result of the contract made between that company and the Government on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. He has seen fit to refer to the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and to the members of the Conservative party in his district, as having a very limited use for the leader of the Opposition, whose name, he says, is scarcely ever mentioned up there. He should, however, have told this House that one of the liveliest Conservative associations in the whole North-west Territories exists in his own town, at Prince Albert, to-day, and recently had one of the most enthusiastic meetings known in the history of that town, endorsing the actions and policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Now, that hon. gentleman, in dealing with the Yukon policy of the present Government, had to go back, for a comparison, to the policy of other countries fifty years ago. He could not get a modern parallel, but had to go back to the days of the rebellion, and he accused the member for West Assiniboia of having so little manliness as to denounce a man 3,000 miles away. The member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) did far worse than that. He reflected upon the character of the dead: he characterized as a satellite of the Conservative Government a man who is to-day in his grave—General Middleton. He also reflected upon another gentleman as a "satellite" at that time of the Conservative Government, our honoured Governor General of the Dominion of Canada. He says that political hacks were sent up to that country. I would like to know what he would call McGregor, if not a political hack. What qualification had this man for the position he was sent up there to fill? He was a dealer in horses, and he was sent up there as inspector of mines. After coming back, he declared that he did not care whether he returned to the Yukon or not, as he had made a competency sufficient to enable him to live at ease the rest of his life. And still, they placed this man in a dual position of commissioner of mines and license commissioner. Mr. Wade, the Crown prosecutor, was a political hack, and one who had so little respect for the dignity of his profession as to take the law into his own hands and to thrash a newspaper correspondent who reflected upon him in his newspaper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne is supposed to contain a prospectus of the measures that we are to adjudicate upon, a programme that is mapped out by the Government of the work of the session. It should be a fair indication of the length of time that we are likely to be here, and should afford us an indication of the matters that Parliament is expected to deal with. Judging the present Speech by this rule, I think it could be disposed of in a short time, and with but little expense to the country. Indications, however, are not wanting to impress us with the idea that the half has not been told. It looks as if the Government were purposely keeping back until the latter end of the session some of the most important measures that may engage the attention of Parliament, when, of necessity, they cannot receive that careful consideration and attention that their importance demands. The Government are probably acting on the principle, that they do not believe in making themselves a target for their political opponents at the beginning of the session, and hope in this manner to escape the criticism that they would otherwise receive. Thanks, however, to parliamentary practice, Her Majesty's loyal Opposition are not restricted to this narrow limit, and we intend to take full advantage of the privilege, and to do full justice to the occasion by anticpating some of those prospective acts of the Government that they have, thus far, seen fit to keep in the background. The able criticisms that have emanated from this side of the House, have undoubtedly covered the whole political field pretty thoroughly, and I recognize how difficult it is for a young member of the House to put forward any thing very original under the circumstances. Knowing, however, that the truth will stand repetition, however unpalatable it may prove to hon. gentlemen opposite, I have no apology to offer for the few remarks I purpose addressing to the House. Time was, and not so very long ago, when any allusion to the prosperity that our country was enjoying in the past, while a Conservative Government was in power, was met with ridicule on the part of our opponents. If any hint were made that this prosperity was in any way attributable to the Government of the day. They were the last to acknowledge the improved condition of trade and the first to deny the Government connection with the same. But what a change has come over the spirit of their dreams. Now that there has been a general revival of trade throughout the universe, a revival that had already been foreshadowed in the last Budget speech of the late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), now that Canada is participating in this revival, in common with other countries, we find those same gentlemen, who formerly combatted the contention that the Government had anything to do with bringing about such a condition of affairs, trying to take credit to themselves as the originators and promoters of this prosperity. Good crops and better prices are treated as a mere secondary consideration by them in the part they play in the national prosperity, and we are asked to look with admiration on these immaculate statesmen, who, by their magic wand, have effected this change, though, when we ask for details, they are remarkably dumb. What a fortunate thing it would be for them, if they had no past history, if their past utterances did not, like Hamlet's ghost, confront and haunt them day by day. What a relief to them it would be; but, even as it is, what they do not ignore, they repudiate, and what they do not repudiate, they boldly swallow. During the severe business depression that existed between 1873 and 1878, the Conservative Opposition of that day did not blame the Government as being the cause of such depression. What they did blame them for was, for not taking some steps to overcome the depression, and, by the adoption of a national policy, assist our manufacturing, mining, fishing and agricultural industries. It was their refusal to do this that brought about their defeat, and, though they at that time acknowledged their inability to cause a revival of trade by legislative enactments, we now find them arrogating to themselves credit which they are thoroughly undeserving of. 'Tis true, the ruthless hand of the destroyer has been stayed, and the policy which has made Canada's credit in the world stand in a foremost position, has been practically left untouched, except in a few minor particulars, but, in doing so, they have acted contrary to their professions of the past twenty years. Principles have been scattered to the wind, and they have stultified themselves in the eyes of the whole electorate. The western farmers do not forget the promises of free agricultural implements, free coal oil, free lumber and other necessaries of the farm, upon the strength of which they gave their votes to Liberal candidates. Smarting under the sense of being sold, they are but awaiting the opportunity to mete out deserved punishment to those who thus deluded them, and no amount of sophistry, no quibbling or plausible excuses will avail to wipe out the insult offered by the Minister of the Interior, who was one of the loudest declaimers against the outrageous protective policy, and now says the tariff is a settled question. To break the disappointment which the Government know the western people felt after the tariff was first submitted to Parliament, and when it belied all their ante-election pledges, we were told by the western representatives, that it was but an instalment of what was to come, that continued reductions would be made; but now we have the declaration of the man who is supposed to be the guardian of the interests of the western people in the Cabinet, to the effect that it is a dead issue, satisfactory alike to both parties and no longer a bone of contention between political foes.

This opinion, however, is evidently not shared in by an important section of the Liberal party in the west, and the result is we have seen the hon. Minister taken severely to task by the members of the Liberal Association of Winnipeg, who appear to have a greater respect for past professions than he has, and he will find it a difficult feat to reconcile his past and present attitude on this question. A candid confession on his part that he had previously advocated a policy that he now recognizes as one totally unfitted for a country situated as Canada is; that free trade, while perhaps well enough in theory, is an impossibility in practice, an admission that he was wrong in the past, but is now trying to make amends, would have won him at least the respect of both political friends and opponents, and free him from the accusation of duplicity that is now truthfully charged against him. But it is paying a poor compliment to the intelligence of the people to find him labouring to reconcile the present tariff with his free trade theories, and to convince them that the Government had fulfilled their pledges in this respect, had given them a purely revenue tariff, when the merest tyro in politics knows differently. Deceived as the people were in the first instance, they are not likely to be caught with chaff the second time, and this political acrobat from the west, who blamed his predecessor in the Interior Department for not, as he said, standing firm in the interests of that portion of Canada, the gentleman who came down here with a great flourish of trumpets, and declared he was going to run his own department without interference from any source, until some of his own friends began to look upon him as a political Goliath. Now, we find that the fruits of office have proved too much for his equilibrium, and we see him sacrificing the interests of his own province for the emoluments of office. The expectations of his friends have been shattered, and a corresponding sense of disappointment and chagrin now prevails amongst his previous followers.

The Speech from the Throne refers to the plebiscite, but as the Government evidently looked upon it as a question of minor importance after their past declarations on the subject have now come to the conclusion that discretion is the better part of valour, dismissed it with but two or three lines. We had the unique spectacle of a Government granting a plebiscite, and four Cabinet Ministers stumping against it, the Minister of Agriculture, who introduced the Bill in this House, being the only member of the Government having a word to say in its favour. A house divided against itself is a precursor of the fate to come. Where was our own Minister of the Interior on this question? He always plumed himself in Manitoba as a great temperance advocate, and his friends, or at least a portion of them, took pride in claiming him as a rather goody-goody young man, but I fear that not only have the blandishments of society at the Capital proved too much for him in other respects but also, as evil communications corrupt good manners, so evil associates have corrupted whatever good political morals he had when he came here. Surely, the hon. gentleman, were he sincere, should have raised his voice in its favour, at least have given the cause he professed to have at heart, the influence which his position would carry with it, but no, party interests were paramount with him, temperance principles were good enough to advocate while the Tories were in power, and so he remained dumb as an oyster, and just as slippery. The argument used by the Prime Minister that they had given no pledge to the people in reference to prohibition, but to the party, and that there was an implied agreement amongst themselves that 50 per cent of the total vote would be required before they could act, is not only one of the lamest excuses that ever fell from the lips of a Cabinet Minister, but was also a deliberate act of duplicity practiced upon the temperance people in keeping them in ignorance of the Government's intention, when time and again during last session they were pressed to do so by members on this side of the House. The very best evidence that the Government never intended enacting a prohibition law, no matter how large the vote might be in its favour, is the declaration made by a member of the Cabinet, Mr. Geoffrion, and on matters of public policy members of the Cabinet are supposed to be agreed, to the effect that the plebiscite was merely granted by the Government to redeem a promise, and in his opinion the granting of it was one mistake the Government had made. He made the declaration that prohibition was the antithesis of Liberalism, that it was opposed to the very essence of Liberal principles, and while the prohibitionists would have their plebiscite, that is all they would get. Now, Mr. Speaker, if that is not a plain declaration of policy on the part of the Government by one of its members, I would like to know what it is. Why, Sir, the temperance people must feel as sold and deceived on this question, as were the free trade Liberals on the Government's tariff policy. Could duplicity go further, could hypocrisy be more apparent. Read the Premier's declaration to the citizens of Winnipeg wherein he promised to carry out the wishes of the electors as expressed at the polls. Was this promise only meant for the party? It was laid down side by side with the plank referring to the tariff. Will he contend that also was only meant for the party? No, those promises were made on behalf of his party to the people at large, and no amount of quibbling will get over that. The fact is, those gentlemen were so long in the cold shades of opposition, that they were willing to promise anything no matter how impossible of fulfilment, to gain the Treasury benches. They became more reckless and daring at each succeeding election, and now when their numerous pledges confront them, when they see their chickens coming home to roost, they find that they had contracted with the people for more goods than they can deliver. Hon. gentlemen opposite know perfectly well that they received thousands of votes at the last election that they otherwise would not have received were it not for the promises made in regard to prohibition and free trade. Do those gentlemen imagine for a moment that the people of this country are so blinded by partisanship that no matter how they are trifled with, how many pledges are broken, how much they may play fast and loose with their principles, that the electorate will overlook all this and support men who have so little respect for political morality? I would despair of our country and its future did I have no higher opinion of our people than to think they would thus wink at such exhibitions of political depravity. If the hon. gentlemen have fulfilled the expectations of their friends, if they have redeemed their pledges, if credit is due them for our present prosperity, why all this dissension in their ranks? Why is the Minister of Public Works repudiated in his own province by so many of the Liberal clubs? Why has the Prime Minister been called upon to dismiss him from the Cabinet? Why have the farmers of the eastern counties, Liberal farmers, waited upon him and demanded a fulfilment of past pledges? Why has the Minister of the Interior been referred to in the inaugural address of the president of the Liberal Association of Winnipeg as being the representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Cabinet, and why is the Liberal party of that province rent in twain, into the Sifton and anti-Sifton factions? What is the reason that dozens of influential Liberal papers in every portion of the Dominion are attacking the Government because of the non-fulfilment of those pledges, and boldly accusing them of attempting to force upon the people of Canada some of the most scaly political transactions ever exposed in the history of Canada? Is not this rather an original and peculiar manner of exemplifying the satisfaction the people feel with the Government? Is this a new illustration of the new Liberalism of the present time? Why, Mr. Speaker, there is more dissension, more disunion, more dissatisfaction in the ranks of the Liberal party in every province of the Dominion for the two and a half years that they have been in office, than existed in the Conservative party after having been eighteen long years in power. How could it be otherwise? Contrast the language of the First Minister when several years ago he spoke in Toronto on the question of reciprocity as follows:—

Every great reform has cost the reformers years of labour, and those years I am prepared to give. Though the Democrats may be defeated in the United States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted, the Liberal party, so long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause of unrestricted reciprocity until that cause is successful.

Contrast that language with his language of to-day. There is no equivocation there; who could mistake such a declaration as that? There is none of that airy indefiniteness about it that usually characterizes the utterances of the Prime Minister.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Who used that language?

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The present Prime Minister of Canada did. In the face of that declaration, we had the First Minister declaring on the floor of this House, a few days ago, that the country does not want reciprocity. If that is not an evidence of the weather-cock politician, I do not know what is. I fear there is much truth in the estimate placed on that right hon. gentleman by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)—some years ago, of course, before the latter accepted office under the present Prime Minister—when he unbosomed himself as follows:—

Mr. Laurier is a man not wanting in polish. * * * He is without large ideas. * * * The fact is, that he has not yet pronounced a single discourse of a nature to manifest in him a man of serious worth. His polished manners, his astuteness, a certain ability in concealing his principles—not far removed from hypocrisy—have won for him his popularity in the country.

And again :

Mr. Laurier is not a nobody ; still less is he what we call a man of talent. He has a character venerated on the outside. Scratch a little and you will discover the mediocrity within. He is not learned ; his speeches show it. His thought never rises above the plane of his prejudices.

He will never be faithful to what he does not possess—principles, sound convictions, or patriotism.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Who wrote that ?

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). That was written by Mr. Tarte. Whoever would have imagined that the gentleman who uttered those words, would now be the dictator of the Liberal party, holding a portfolio under the right hon. gentleman he thus referred to in such uncomplimentary terms ? To borrow an expression used in the House not long since, the Prime Minister is supplying the wind, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is supplying the brains.

After Recess.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, I had almost concluded my remarks at Six o'clock, when I was paying my respects to the First Minister, and I had quoted the language used concerning him by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)—language couched in not very complimentary terms. I congratulate the First Minister on the exhibition of Christian charity he has shown in overlooking all this, in forgetting the past, taking that hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) into his Cabinet, and now declaring that the best is none too good for him. I am sorry, however, that I cannot congratulate the Prime Minister on the tone of his reply to the speech of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), in throwing aside his sunny ways and in giving an exhibition of temper that was not calculated to add to the dignity of Parliament, to help his own case, nor to set a good example to the younger members of the House. With such an example, what could we expect from the hon. member from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) ? We certainly could not expect him to rise above that level that he attained in his speech this afternoon. I think the very best compliment that could be paid to the speech of the leader of the Opposition, was the tone of the Premier's reply. It was personal abuse, bitter invective, and gross misrepresentation, instead of a statesmanlike reply to a statesmanlike speech.

Passing from this, I will again revert to a comparison of Liberal pledges with Liberal performances, though I know hon. gentlemen opposite do not care for any such comparison. The hardihood of these hon. gentlemen, in claiming that they redeemed their pledges, would be rather amusing, were they not so audacious. They told us, when they were in opposition, that Canada was groaning under a huge debt, a debt that took millions of dollars out of the public treasury in order to pay the interest on it, and they told us, that this debt was to come down with a thud on the accession of the Liberals to power. They told us, also, that taxation was too high, and must be reduced, and they were to cut down the expenditure by from three to four million dollars per annum. We were no longer to see the degrading spectacle of members of Parliament sitting in their places in the House with offers of public positions in their pockets, and compelled to vote for legislation that, in their inmost conscience, they disapproved of, because of the fear of losing these prospective positions. Railway subsidies were to be a thing of the past, as they afforded opportunities for plundering the public treasury and enabled contractors to amass huge fortunes at the country's expense. The Senate was declared to be a repository of broken-down politicians, of defeated candidates, and of men so old as to be in their dotage. Merit alone was to be the qualification for filling public positions, and Conservative Ministers were denounced for appointing relatives to office. Private cars were to be done away with, and ministerial junketing trips were to be heard of no more. Innumerable other reforms were to be inaugurated, if only the people would hearken to the voice of the Liberal candidates, and turn the wicked Tories out.

Well, strange to relate, the people really believed in these professions—or, at least, a sufficient number believed to effect the change the Liberals desired. They did turn the Tories out, and they placed the Liberals in power. They gave them a free hand ; they afforded them the opportunities of their lives, and they waited, with bated breath, to witness these reforms that never came. As we all know, the public debt, instead of decreasing, has gone forward by leaps and bounds until it has reached a height of several millions greater than ever before. The taxation, instead of being reduced, as promised, has also been increased. The expenditure, instead of being cut down three or four millions, has reached a height never before known in the history of Canada. We have seen upwards of a dozen members of Parliament appointed to positions of emolument under the Crown, in direct contravention of the pledges of the Liberal party on this subject. Millions of dollars have been voted for railway subsidies, and millions more would have gone the same way, if the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) had had their way; but, thanks to the Upper Chamber, the country was saved this spoliation at their hands by the rejection of the Drummond County and Yukon Railway Bills. Public positions have been given to political favourites, to relatives of Ministers and to members of Parliament, whose only qualification for the positions were because of such relationship and party services of rather a doubtful character. Private cars are still in vogue, and there is scarcely a week during the recess that we do not see them attached to outgoing or incoming trains from the capital city. Ministerial junketing trips are more numerous than ever, and we have seen almost the entire Cabinet go to England, some of them twice and thrice—one of them spends his time almost entirely either in England or on the ocean, going to and fro. A certain number of them have actually been to Rome—upon what mission, we may well imagine. Several of them have crossed the continent to the Pacific coast, and it is rumoured that a number of them have been to Washington—alas! I fear once too often for their own good. And whenever a by-election is about to take place, the handy man of the party, he who shuffles the cards, the man who is versed in the ways that are dark and the tricks that are vain—the Minister of Public Works—soon appears on the scene, with profuse promises of lavish expenditure of public money for harbour improvements, for wharfs, for public buildings, as the particular occasion demands in these constituencies. And when, by unblushing bribery—for bribery it was—they carry those constituencies, how the tocsin of delight is sounded, and we are asked to admire this hero. But, Mr. Speaker, when we take into consideration the cost of those victories, my mind reverts to the old song, which, no doubt, you have all heard, about the man with the vermilion nose:

It's only a brandy blossom painted on his face
so fair,
But, oh, what money it cost him to paint that blossom there.

So with the by-elections. Hon. gentlemen opposite must admit that they come pretty high, though I presume they must have them. What a spectacle it is to see members of Parliament sitting in their places on the opposite side of the House, who, in Parliament and out of Parliament, have been denouncing for years the gross extravagance and corruption of their predecessors; and now we see them rising in their places and attempting to condone and justify the extravagance and corruption of the present Government, which transcends anything ever known before in the history of our country. Why, Sir, the events of last session constrained the Montreal "Witness," whose Liberalism is unimpeachable, to raise its voice in protest in the following language:—

The heavy extra expenditures carried through Parliament this session have been the subject of a good deal of criticism, and have exposed the Liberal Government to a good deal of jeering and jibing. In Opposition, the Liberals strongly objected to the growing tendency of the Government to take all sorts of industries and projects under its wing and foster them with subsidies. They held that steamship lines, railways, manufacturing and other industries, as well as other commercial enterprises, should cease to be dependent upon the Government, and should be left to individual and corporate enterprise, founded upon a pure business basis. That was the theory and policy of the Liberals in opposition, and yet this session, with a Liberal Government in power, new and costly lines of railway have been heavily subsidized, new steamship lines have been given large annual grants, cold storage warehousing and transportation have been undertaken at considerable cost, increased expenditures under canals proposed, and for other projects considerable sums voted. Liberals who have been and are strong supporters of the Government have objected to the Government's course; indeed, they have been, perhaps, the most strenuous all-round opponents of extra expenditure this season. These Liberal critics are, for the most part, the old guard of the party, who have through seventeen years of extravagance been the champions of economy and of free trade and of purity of administration. They hope that the victory of their party meant the immediate radical reform of every abuse, the immediate curtailment of every extra expenditure. They have been disappointed, and have taken no pains to conceal the fact.

This is only one of many instances in which the present Government have met with condemnation from members of their own political household. With a sham policy of preferential trade to deceive the people of England, whether designedly or through ignorance I am not prepared to say, but which has the effect of turning trade more than ever into the United States channels; with free corn and a reduction of the duties on the products of the farm from the United States to compete with the products of our own farmers to their detriment; no wonder our commissioners, after six months of negotiation, have had to return to their country dissatisfied, and unsuccessful in the negotiation of a treaty. With the spoils system in force in almost every department of the public service, and hundreds of Conservative office-holders turned adrift on the slightest pretext, and some on no pretext whatever, except to make room for political favourites of their own; with the Yukon policy of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) being characterized by the most influential journals of Great Britain as a disgrace to any civilized nation; with the spurious editorials appearing in Liberal papers in the North-west, with the intention of making the people believe that they were the spontaneous utterances of the editors of those papers, when, as a matter of fact, they were manufactured in Ottawa and sent out under the personal direction of the Minister of the Interior ; with the subsidizing of the Liberal provincial press to stem that tide of reaction which has set in against the Government, particularly against himself ; with the Franchise Act so unworkable that we have not had in the province of Manitoba lists revised for three years and a half, the result of which is that the important constituency of Winnipeg has to go unrepresented in this House. But fortunate it is for the Government that that constituency is unrepresented, for if thrown open to-day, they have reason to fear that it would send a representative to this side of the House, who would prove a thorn in the side of the Minister of Public Works at any rate, for the fast and loose manner in which he has been playing with the question of improving the St. Andrew's Rapids. I may say here that the vote on the prohibition plebiscite was taken on lists over three years of age, and was no criterion of the strength of public opinion on that question. If the vote had been taken on up-to-date lists, I am sure that the majority in favour of prohibition would have been several thousand more than it was. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been warned time and again of the notorious character of that provincial Franchise Act, but they paid no attention to the warning. They adopted it blindly, and now they see where they have landed themselves. With all this and much more of a like nature, no wonder that this Government are in disrepute with the people at large. I venture to say that never in the history of Canada has there been an Administration, either in provincial or Dominion affairs, more corrupt, more incapable, and more deserving of public censure than the hybrid conglomeration that now rules Canada under the misnomer of Liberalism.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, in continuing this debate on the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, I wish for a few moments to direct attention to the conduct of the Government and their supporters in this debate. The first exhibition of weakness which we had on that side was the display of bad temper on the part of the leader of the Government in his reply to the leader of the Opposition. It is often said, and said truly, that the man with a bad case is the one who usually gets angry, and this display of bad temper came with much greater force from the hon. gentleman, who is noted for his sunny smile and his good temper on almost all occasions. I could not help thinking that his exhibition of temper on this occasion was an evidence that he had no argument to present to the House and the country, and he had to fall back on the lawyer's device and abuse his opponents. Following him several other hon. gentlemen spoke in support of the Government, and they gave, I presume, the best answer they could to the arguments advanced on this side of the House. But I noticed that in a short time they abandoned argument and decided to remain silent—from being unable, I presume, to give any answer to the strong indictment which was presented from this side of the House.

I noticed with some significance the fact that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) intimated it was time this debate was brought to a close, that all had been said which could be said to enlighten the people, and I thought that he might with a great deal of wisdom and propriety have applied that remark to his own side rather than to ours. We then had a few speeches from hon. gentlemen opposite notable for their lack of strength in argument and soundness of reason, the last of which was from the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), and I was amused at the time he spent this afternoon, over two hours, in endeavouring to answer my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who had treated this House to a very cogent and logical reasoning on the public matters of the day. As the hon. member for Saskatchewan spent hour after hour in abuse, destitute of logic, or reasoning, I was reminded of a couplet which describes his lucubrations pretty accurately :

When nature made this captain vain,
She had at hand but few ingredients—
Was therefore forced to use expedients.
She put therein a little learning,
A grain of sense and some discerning,
And when she saw the void behind
She filled it up with froth and wind.

I think that would apply to the hon. gentleman very appropriately because his speech was not calculated to convince any person, but largely made up of noise and abuse. His statements did not appear to be founded on fact, for, when repeatedly contradicted, he either took them back or was obliged to admit by his silence that he was entirely wrong in the assertions he made.

I was also amused at a statement made by the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Speaking of his efforts to obtain reciprocity, he said : We know the hearts and minds of our people at present, and I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the feeling in Canada is not in favour of reciprocity. If that be the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, why did he and his colleagues spend six months at Washington endeavouring to get reciprocity ? Was that complimentary to the view which he endeavoured to impress on the electorate for eighteen years, that reciprocity with the United States was the great desideratum. Was it complimentary to the statesmanship of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, in that memorable letter of his to the "Economist" said that Canada badly required unrestricted reciprocity. He then seemed to think that Canada could not get on without it. In fact he told the people, over and over again, that if the Reform party were brought to power they would obtain a reciprocity treaty, but that the Conservative party would not try to get it. I thought how sadly he must have been misleading and deluding the people then, when he was forced to admit to-day that we could live and do very well without it, because, although we had lost the market of the United States for our barley, which only gave us in return a few hundred thousand dollars, we had gone into the manufacture of pork, which brought us several million dollars. I am astonished that years ago he did not make that admission, instead of telling the people of Canada that without reciprocity they must go down and continue to go down and would ultimately drift into bankruptcy or the arms of the United States.

I was also most interested in the speech made in Perth by the Minister of the Interior a short time ago, when he said the National Policy was a dead issue to-day and that both parties were agreed on it. The question naturally suggested itself to my mind: How can both parties be agreed? The Conservative party stands to-day where it always stood in defence of the National Policy, believing in its soundness for the requirements of the Canadian people; and if it be a dead issue to-day, that can only be because those who always decried it have abandoned their own arguments and accepted those in favour of that policy. The conduct of the party opposite, since they came into power, bears out that view, because although they invariably told the people that the National Policy was the bone of contention, they no sooner obtained office than, instead of abandoning it, they went on to keep it almost in its entirety as before.

In looking over the Speech from the Throne, I was very much amused at its brevity and the little it contained. In analysing that Speech, I could not but think that hon. gentlemen opposite had the old adage in their mind when concocting it. "the least said, the soonest mended." It started out with congratulations on the great prosperity of Canada, as evinced by expanding trade, increasing revenue, and the large number of immigrants settling in our country, and then refers to the almost total cessation of the exodus which has been going on heretofore. Then it gave us the information that negotiations have been going on between Canada and the United States to settle the difficulties between these two countries. That subject, however, was merely mentioned, and of course we were told by the right hon. leader of the Government and his colleagues, that the House was not in a position to deal with that question, because the question still remained in statu quo, and the Government were not in a position to give us the date or information which would enable us to deal with it intelligently. But if we are in that position, it is because, for some purpose unknown to us, the Government secured an adjournment of that commission until next fall. No doubt, however, the object was to prevent this House knowing what was done or to hold back information of what was done, in order, if possible, to give the Government a reasonable excuse for going to the country and saying to the people: Now we are prepared to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, we have named a commission that has done a lot of valuable work, we are on the verge of concluding a treaty to the advantage of the Dominion, and if the Canadian people desires to conclude that treaty, let them send us back to power, because if they do not there will have to be another commission appointed, which our opponents are not likely to do, and all the important work we have accomplished will be lost and all hopes of our obtaining a treaty will disappear. Return us, however, and we are very likely to conclude a treaty to your advantage and interest.

Then mention is made of the plebiscite and the penny postage rate between Canada and the British possessions, and of the reduction in the rate of Canadian postage. Then follows a paragraph stating that much information has been obtained since you last met relative to the extent and value of the deposits of gold and valuable minerals in the Yukon and other parts of Canada.

And we are then treated to the promise that a measure will be submitted to us for a redistribution of the seats, or what is called a gerrymandering of the electoral districts, and after that we are promised several enactments of less importance. It seems to me that the paragraph would have read better in this way:

The only measure of any importance that will be submitted to you will be one for the redistribution of electoral districts in the interests of the Government of the day.

Of course any other matter would be of much less importance to the Government. Then follows this paragraph, which seems somewhat ironical:—

On what subjects is serious consideration required? Is it the commission that went to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity treaty? Why, we are estopped in considering that by the action of the Government in keeping everything in the dark which would enable us to intelligently deal with it; so that we might enlighten the country on what was being done, and what was likely to be the result.

Then there was penny postage. We thought that was a thing of the past. It did not seem to me that it required so much consideration, except, it might be, to ascertain what prompted the Postmaster General to do as he did at that particular time. Then there was much information about the Yukon. No doubt, that might properly engage our serious attention. There is much about it we ought to know to tell the people of Canada. The plebiscite was a thing of the past, and, after the announcement made by the leader of the Government that he and his party had decided not to introduce prohibitory legislation, it might be left in the background. Then we have congratulations with regard to the prosperity of the country. That may call for a little attention at our hands. It might be pertinent to ask: What are the factors in the situation? What contributed to the present prosperity of the country? I presume that the Government intended to lead the country to the inference that the prosperity which we enjoy was, somehow or other, largely due to the conduct of the Government in the management of affairs. If that was not their intention, I do not know what it could have been. The Canadian people will naturally ask: How has our prosperity been brought about? Was it anything done in the two and a half years during which the present Government have held power? Did they introduce great changes in the system of Government which would account for that prosperity or secure it to the Canadian people. In my opinion they did not, and I think that the electors of Canada will come to the same conclusion. What were the items that contributed to that prosperity. In the first place, there was the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway several years ago, by means of which goods are transported across the continent, the manufactures of the east being carried to the consumers of the west, and the produce of the west being brought to our seaports to be sent across to the markets in Europe. There was a large expenditure of money in this way, and its branches and subsidiary lines that act as feeders to it, was an important element in our prosperity. It was the policy of the late Government that opened up the highways of commerce so that the people of Canada might advantageously and economically carry on trade. I have no doubt that gentlemen opposite believed that the Opposition were going to contend that there was no prosperity in Canada. The present Opposition are not likely to take the course their opponents did when they were on this side of the House. We frankly and gladly say that Canada enjoys prosperity to-day, and no one is better pleased to see it than the members of the Opposition. But it is quite in order to analyse the situation and ascertain what contributed to that prosperity. Another great element in our prosperity was the National Policy, which was introduced, organized, systematized and carried out by the Conservative party. It gave employment to labour throughout the country in many different industries, who would otherwise have been unemployed. It had the effect of encouraging the use of the raw material of the country. It also kept the money of Canadians in Canada, and it secured the markets of Canada for the Canadian people. This, to my mind, was one of the greatest elements contributing to the prosperity which we enjoy to-day. And, as evidence of that, I need only say—what is well known to the people of Canada—that when the present Government came into power, though they had decried the National Policy for eighteen years, they dared not change it, they dared not carry out their policy of free trade as it was in England. They dared not change the policy which had been so instrumental in bringing about the prosperity of the country. Another element in our prosperity was the educational work done by the Experimental Farms which were all established, organized and carried on by the Conservative Government. The effect of this educational work was to increase the product of the farm and of the forest. Not only did it increase the products, but it improved the quality. Moreover, it enabled the Canadian people to direct their energies to the production of the goods required for markets that could be reached to the greatest advantage, and it assisted them in making those goods and preparing them for shipment. The lines of transportation also were improved as a result of work of the late Government, greatly assisting the prosperity of the country. The great transcontinental line of the Canadian Pacific was completed, the enlargement and deepening of the canals carried on and other improvements were made which greatly decreased the cost of transport, thus giving the Canadian producer a better price for what he had to sell. Much was done also to introduce our goods to the English market, by sending over agents to study what the English markets required that could best be furnished by the Canadian farmer. This was part of the educational work commenced several years ago by the Conservative party through the experimental farms and by the Commissioner of Agriculture. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the trade done last year and the year before in sending out Canadian products. Let them not forget that trade cannot be stimulated in a day or in a year. This is a work of education, and it requires time. It was done, as I contend, by the experimental farms and other agencies for the education of the Canadian people. Then, again, the late Government devised and mapped out the cold storage system. We have heard what cold storage has done for the farmers, and the present Government assume credit for what has been done. But they are practically using other men's brains. They did not devise this system. It was established, and was being perfected as rapidly as time and money could do it before they came into office. If the accidents of fortune had kept the Conservatives in power, we should have had a much more perfect system of cold storage, and should now be enjoying much greater benefits from the marketing of our products than we now enjoy. Why? Because the present system of cold storage is of a very imperfect character. It is a mere beginning, and is practically of little value compared with what it would be if it were perfected, which might easily be done.

But in connection with that, what we did require and what we require to-day and what the present Government did not provide for us, but which was being provided by the former Government, would have been achieved, had they remained in power a little longer, was a fast Atlantic steamship line properly equipped for cold storage. We want something more than putting in a few compartments of cold storage in the very imperfect vessels that are crossing the Atlantic to-day, of slow travel and in imperfect condition, vessels that have never been designed for that purpose. What we want are vessels designed for that purpose, fitted out especially for that purpose, so that every article in every line that is sent across in cold storage shall have a separate compartment suited to the requirements of that article. Then it requires to be carried across at the most rapid speed that can be attained. A few days or a few hours make a great difference. I noticed that in some of the reports that came back regarding the products that were sent across to the other side in cold storage, it was stated that they would have arrived a few days earlier in magnificent condition, but towards the last they seemed to deteriorate very rapidly. I thought, what a pity we had not those bottle-necked steamers of which we heard so much, that were going to cross the Atlantic with such great speed. Had the contract which was entered into by the previous Government been carried out, as it should have been carried out, and had those vessels been properly provided as they might have been provided, we would have now been receiving the benefit from such a system. If I know anything about the requirements of trade to-day, one of the most urgent demands is to carry our produce across the Atlantic rapidly and in suitable vessels; these vessels should be made up to date, they should not be vessels made a quarter of a century ago and fitted over again for certain purposes. Unless they are constructed for that purpose, they can never do the work as well and with as much advantage to the people of Canada, nor return the same profit to the producer of Canada, as if they were made up to date with all modern appliances. I say that Canada lost one of her golden opportunities to increase that prosperity mentioned in the Speech from the Throne when this Government cancelled the contract that was entered into for the fast steamship line by their predecessors. Where are they landed to-day? The hon. Minister without portfolio, the member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), who has been making excursions backward and forward across the Atlantic so many times during the last year, has been telling us what magnificent steamers he was providing in those bottle-necked vessels. Well, the bottle-necked ships have been buried in the graves of the hopes of the past. We hear nothing of them to-day, although he has made trip after trip, and the announcement was made in the election in Centre Toronto of what great achievements had been accomplished by that hon. gentleman, and how much cheaper he was going to get this consideration for Canada than their predecessors were going to pay for it. But that election passed over and their friend was elected. We heard it announced in election after election how much they were saving to the country by this contract. But as time went on we heard suspicions that the contract was not likely to be carried out, that the company were not able to get the bottle-necked steamers, that the bottle-necked steamers were an untried experiment, and something the people would not be justified in spending so much money upon. Like all experiments and like all new inventions, they would not come up to the expectations of the people of Canada, and now they are abandoned in despair and abandoned at a very unfortunate time. The conditions are such now that we will be compelled to pay a very much larger sum in any new contract for the provision of suitable steamers to do the fast Atlantic business that we require to-day. We are told now that the dockyards in the old country are very busy, that they have contracts enough on hand to keep them going for months and years to come, that there is no hope at the present time of the Government being able to enter into a contract for a suitable fast Atlantic service unless they pay an extravagant figure for it. What a lesson it is to the people of Canada, and what a humiliating acknowledgment by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have been deluding the people of Canada for nearly three years, telling them what they had done, what they were doing, and what they were likely to accomplish by this fast Atlantic steamship line. But now they have to acknowledge utter failure, and it is impossible at present and for some time to come to provide this service so urgently required by the people of Canada.

Then the Speech from the Throne refers to the negotiations with the Government of the United States. In connection with that it would be interesting for us, if we were able, to give this question the serious consideration which we are advised to do by His Excellency the Governor General, if we were able to get behind the scenes and find out the various offers that have been made by the Premier and his colleagues while they were down at Washington, being junketed and feted so well and so hospitably by the American people. It would be interesting for the Canadian farmer to know what value they placed upon reciprocity for him; it would be interesting to know what interests of the Canadian farmer were likely to be sacrificed in the event of these reciprocity negotiations being carried out; it would be interesting to know how far the manufacturer of Canada was going to be sacrificed in these negotiations. But we are estopped from dealing with that question seriously as we are advised to do by the Speech from the Throne. The adjournment of that conference until the work of this session is over prevents us from giving it any further consideration.

The question of the plebiscite is the next one which we are invited to direct our attention to. Now, I have no doubt that we could, with a great deal of profit to the country, give it our serious consideration for a short time. We might very properly consider it under the following lines: Why was the plebiscite put in the platform of the Liberal party in 1893? Why was it put there if not to delude the electorate of Canada? After the statement made by the hon. Prime Minister the other night as to his understanding on this question. It would be very proper for us to consider why it was put in the platform of the party. The Premier tells us:

When we put that plank into our platform, there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably—

“Unmistakably,” something that was never told to the Temperance Alliance, I apprehend.

—if it should be shown that the great majority—

Was that told to the Dominion Alliance? I think we might direct our attention seriously to that.

—that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand, there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition—

I presume that includes the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), and Mr. Spence, the secretary of the Alliance. These were the contracting parties for whom that plank was put into the platform, and we might profitably inquire if that engagement was kept from the people of Canada who believed in prohibition.

—that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party.

Now, then, it seems to me proper to inquire whether, in putting that in as one of the planks in their platform, they were not deceiving the people: it seems pertinent for us to inquire: Did the Minister of Agriculture enter into that agreement; did Mr. Spence enter into that agreement—because he was a member of that party, and helped to make that platform—did the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) enter into that agreement, because these are the representative men of the party in the Parliament of Canada and in the ranks of the Dominion Alliance? Did they enter into that agreement without making it known to the Dominion Alliance, and if they did, should not the temperance people of Canada come to the conclusion, that those who entered into it, were greater politicians than prohibitionists? Did the leader of the party ever intend to do more than delude the people and get the temperance vote at the polls? That would be a pertinent question for us to direct our attention to. Was the hon. Minister of Agriculture deceived himself, or was he in the secret, to dishonestly deceive the alliance when he assured them, that the plebiscite would be submitted, and that the behest of the people would be carried out in a constitutional way, as expressed by the vote? I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture that question. Was he deceived, or did he deliberately deceive the Dominion Alliance? Was he misleading the people? I will give him time to answer, if he is willing to do it. Well, silence gives consent; I will take it for granted, that he deceived the people, and I am brought to the conclusion by the fact that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has not made his appearance in this House since the debate on the question of the plebiscite was started until now. What did the Minister of Agriculture mean, when he said:

The Government in power must necessarily carry out the expressed will of the people. There is no doubt that this is what the Liberal party would do, for we know their pledges can be trusted.

I would rather get an answer from the Canadian people than from the Minister of Agriculture, as to the truthfulness of that. I ask the question directly: Was he deluding the temperance people of Canada, when he led them to believe that their pledges could be trusted, that the expression of the will of the people on that question would be carried out, as he said it would? Then, again, I would like to ask the First Minister, what he meant by his answer to the deputation that waited upon him in Winnipeg, in 1894, when he said:

He would pledge his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power at Ottawa they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion, by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

Does the alliance think he has carried out his pledge? I have resolution after resolution from the temperance associations in all parts of Canada, which say that the Government are not carrying out their pledges, that they are not doing what the Premier declared they would do, or what the Minister of Agriculture declared they would do, if the verdict of the people was in favour of prohibition. These are pertinent questions, which might well engage our attention at this time. The Premier says, in reference to the plebiscite, what I have just read, that there was an understanding between the members of the party. Was it known to, and assented to on behalf of the Dominion Alliance, by those members in the confidence of the Liberal party, who helped to make that platform? Did they come back and report to the alliance, and tell them what would be the result of it? I presume they did not. I am not surprised to find Mr. Spence to-day using no very complimentary language in expressing his opinion as to what they have done. It will be pertinent for us to inquire, whether there were not thousands and thousands of fraudulent votes polled in the province of Quebec in opposition to prohibition, and whether this did not take place with the connivance of the officials who were appointed by the Government and sworn to do their duty honestly and faithfully in recording that vote. If the information we have from Quebec may be relied upon, we can justly come to the conclusion, that these officials did not do their duty either faithfully or honestly. Then, we can seriously consider how far the present Government and party are entitled to the confidence of the temperance people, in view of the fact, that three Ministers of the Crown stumped Quebec against prohibition. We consider how far they were influenced by that plank in their platform. We should seriously consider, whether the conduct of those Ministers of the Crown who stumped the province of Quebec against prohibition, in that campaign, is consistent with the professions of the Government and the party which claims to be the temperance party of Canada. I say, we may very well accept the views of the Governor General, and give these questions our serious consideration, because they are weighty and important questions to the people of Canada at the present time.

In regard to penny postage, I intend to say little at present, because I purpose dealing with that subject later on; but, in the meantime, I would like to say a few words in regard to it. Should we not seriously consider, whether the Postmaster General was an efficient and intelligent man in his office, when we remember his conduct regarding the issuing of postage stamps? Take, first, his issue of the Jubilee stamp, by which he dishonestly mulcted the people of Canada out of about $300,000. His conduct in this transaction resembled more that of the three-card monte shark than that of an honourable statesman. I would like to ask, whether that was creditable or not to Canada, whether it was good statesmanship on the part of the Postmaster General, and whether it was not calculated to injure a great country like Canada, of whose reputation abroad we are jealous? We should seriously consider, whether the Postmaster General displayed great ability by his manipulation of postage stamps, the number of issues that he had, the kind of stamps that he issued, and how he doled them out to the Canadian people. He will live in the history of the future as a man who never seemed to know his mind for three months at a time on the question of postage stamps. I do not know that I could more succinctly draw the attention of the House to this matter than by reading a letter on the question published in the Montreal "Witness," the other day. I may remark, that this paper is usually regarded as Liberal, and it is to be presumed that it would not publish anything which would be very hard upon their own party. The letter is as follows:—

Sir,—In your issue of March 11 there is a communication dealing with the muddle into which the postage stamp business of the country has fallen. Your correspondent quite fairly points out some of the absurdities, which are many and serious. The issues have been so frequent and so confusing that it is now impossible for either collectors or the public to decide where we are. First came the Jubilee issue, in which faith was broken with purchasers, causing merited condemnation in all countries. It was more like a piece of commercial huckstering than the official act of a Government. The Imperial issue brought upon us nothing but ridicule on account of its bumptiousness and bad taste. It might fairly be thought that the department would learn the common rudiments of business from these two transactions. But worse was to come—the three cent issue had to be recalled, because the Postmaster General did not know his own mind a month ahead, when he sprang his two cent game; then came the two cent issue with maple leaves in the corners, of which the users could not literally make head or tail. The outcry against them was so loud that these, too, had to be recalled. Instead of issuing the same dies with the denominations added, he allowed a new stamp to be made, differing in many particulars from the former, and now, after a period of retirement of some months, he brings the old issue out again.

The absence of a good settled standard confuses the public, enrages collectors and dealers, and pleases nobody but counterfeiters. All the other denominations have been dealt with in the same way. A large expense was incurred by issuing three cent envelopes. Instead of confessing his failure and setting them aside as a mistake, the Postmaster General resorts to the puddling operation of marking them down to two cents, with a rubber stamp, and disfiguring Her Majesty's profile. The letter card was mutilated in the same way. The whole business of stamp issue has been bungled in such a way as to make us the laughing-stock of every country with whom we have any correspondence.

Can you not help us by urging upon the Government to make up what does duty for its mind, to decide what is to be the Canadian stamp? At present there are eight different varieties of the two cent denomination before me as I write.

What an exhibition for the Postmaster General of a great country like Canada to make of himself. When we are asked to give our serious attention to the question of penny postage and other postal matters, is it not pertinent for us to inquire whether the Postmaster General—in view of the muddle he has made of this business—is or is it not a capable and intelligent man who can properly administer the affairs of this important department of the public service?

It is said that much information has been gathered with reference to the Yukon, and we are asked to give that question our serious consideration. We may well give it our serious consideration, for if we can believe the press of the country and the people who have returned from that district, the mining laws which the present Government have made and are enforcing, are bad and vexatious and seriously retard mining operations. We must believe also that the officials sent out there are incompetent, dishonest and unreliable, and generally engaged in selfish speculations of their own instead of discharging the important duties assigned to them. It must seriously engage our attention to ascertain if this information is accurate, and I presume it is accurate, because we have had as yet no authoritative denial. Last year the Government proposed to give for the building of 150 miles of railway, 3,500,000 acres of land, which, if valued at only $2 an acre, would amount to a subsidy of $7,000,000 for a short tramway. We might seriously inquire if that was a wise speculation on their part, or a business-like proposal and whether the Senate, for that one act of theirs, in throwing the bill out, is not entitled to the lasting support and gratitude of the people of Canada. We might seriously ask also, whether private enterprise and private capital would not have furnished, without any cost to the country, all that the Government proposed to furnish for a very large expenditure of the public money. After that Bill was proposed to the House last year and rejected by the Senate, I was much amused at the conduct of the Government in regard to a Bill that was submitted to the Railway Committee, requesting the privilege for a company to build a railroad through that country. That proposal did not require that the country should part with an acre of land or give one dollar subsidy, and the company proposed as a guarantee for the completion of that work within two years, to deposit with the Government a marked cheque for $250,000. I think it is very pertinent for us to inquire why the Government refused to accept that guarantee of good faith which these people offered, and declined to give them authority to build that road. I have a copy of that Bill of last year before me, and I think it is well that the Canadian people should know what its provisions were. When we came to that clause of the Bill, which says:—

The company shall deposit with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars as a guarantee for the commencement and completion of the said railway within the time above mentioned, and the said deposit shall become absolutely forfeited to and for the use of the Government of Canada if the said railway shall not be so commenced and completed within the period aforesaid.

The members of the Government opposed the Bill and would only allow that clause to pass with this amendment: They substituted after the word "company" in the first line, the following words so that the Government might not be compelled to accept the deposit, for they knew these men would complete the road:

May if so disposed and the Government accepts the same.

Even after that they would not allow the Bill to pass, and the only excuse they gave was that it was conflicting with their railway policy in that country. It appears to me that the Government opposed that Bill because it conflicted with the feeling that the Government would like to create amongst the electorate, that in the Yukon Bill they were doing some wonderful thing for the people of Canada. They were afraid that if that private Bill passed and these gentlemen built the road without any cost to the public treasury, the public would soon discover that the Government had not done the best they could do. These were the reasons which impelled the Government to prevent this Bill from passing, although that private company was prepared to build the railway without the cost of one cent to the country.

Then we are promised a gerrymander Bill in the Speech from the Throne. We are told on the high authority of the Premier that this measure will not be a gerrymander, but a fair and equitable redistribution of the seats. Well, I can put the same question to him as some of his friends put to the Conservative Government when the Liberals were in Opposition. If this Bill is to show an honest desire on the part of the leader of the Government and his friends to redistribute the constituencies fairly, why does he not refer the whole question to an impartial tribunal of judges, as they do in England, for the purpose of mapping out these electoral districts. If the right hon. gentleman does that, the Canadian people will give him credit for honesty and sincerity, but if he proposes to do otherwise he leaves himself open to grave suspicion from the start.

I wish now to draw the attention of the House to what in my judgment is an innovation upon the established order of things in Canada. We have never interfered with the boundaries of the constituencies except after the taking of the census; and if the proposal of the Government is not directly a violation of the constitution, it is at any rate a violation of the principles on which the constitution has been carried out up to the present time ; and since we must have a redistribution two or three years hence at the furthest, or after the next census is taken in 1901, it seems to me that hon. gentlemen might very well wait until that time arrives before they introduce a redistribution Bill. Then we may seriously consider whether this was contemplated under the constitution. In my judgment it was not, because the British North America Act provides that after each census is taken there shall be a redistribution of the representation according to population. Then, we might fairly ask the Government, if all they want is a fair redistribution of the seats, why they do not submit the work to an impartial tribunal. Then, I ask the Government whether the constituencies which elected them are not the same as they have been for many years past, and if their attention has ever been drawn to the fact that by their proposal they are dishonouring the electors who have put them in power. They are declaring that they are afraid or ashamed to go back and trust the people who elected them in the last election, because if the people who elected them elected them on the lines of the present constituencies, they can do it again if satisfied with their conduct since they came into power, and there is no occasion for a redistribution Bill. This very proposition is an evidence, and a strong evidence, to the Canadian people that the Government want more than fair play—that they distrust the electors of the country, and are not willing to submit themselves to the tribunal which sent them here before for a renewal of the confidence of the people.

Now, I would like for a short time to direct my attention to some of the promises made to the people of Canada by the present Government as to what they would do if entrusted with the management of public affairs. For eighteen years they carried on educational work among the electors on certain lines, pointing out to them what was the best policy for the governing party to carry out in the interest of the country. One of the leading subjects they dealt with, one which they always dealt with, very vigorously some times, if not very logically, was the tariff question. The National Policy was denounced as a curse and a robbery, and all the other choice language which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) could command was invariably at his disposal when he talked on that question. In the platform of 1893 the Liberal party declared to the Canadian people their views of the result of the tariff in the following terms :—

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare :

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations ;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property ;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few ;

It has checked immigration ;

It has caused a great loss of population ;

It has impeded commerce ;

It has discriminated against Great Britain ;

In these and in many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff remains in force.

Now, I ask the pertinent question, did they change that tariff system ? The tariff system in existence to-day is the same as that introduced and carried out since 1878. If all the evils pointed out in that platform were the result of the system, and if prosperity could be restored to Canada by doing away with it, then I ask, were they honest or dishonest when they did not abolish that system ? I frankly confess I am glad they did not abolish the system, because I believe it had a great deal to do with bringing about the prosperity which the country enjoys to-day ; and had they abolished it, it would have been the worst thing that could have possibly happened to Canada. Under these circumstances, I may very justly inquire whether the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was honest and whether his judgment was good when he wrote that letter to the " Economist " a few years ago, a copy of which I have in my hand. In that letter he referred to the evils to Canada caused by the National Policy and the taxation resulting therefrom, saying that the agricultural class was being simply bled white. Are they not being bled whiter still ? Did the hon. gentleman do away with that which was bleeding them white ? Then he went on to say :

Over and above the taxes actually paid into the Dominion treasury to be expended for so-called federal purposes, they have been mulcted during all these years under the protective system of at least an equal amount, which is either totally wasted or goes into the pockets of a very small number of protected manufacturers.

The exact amount levied, or, to speak more accurately, pillaged, in this way can hardly be estimated ; but it is known not to be less than a sum fully equal to the entire amount credited to the treasury, and probably much exceeds it. In fact, the Canadian tariff (which has been, in the most literal manner, dictated by the protected manufacturers) is so constructed that there are innumerable cases in which for each single dollar paid into the treasury, three, four, five and even ten dollars are taken out of the pocket of the consumer ; nay, in many instances, the tax is made absolutely prohibitive, so that the public are heavily taxed without any benefit to the revenue ; e.g., the duty on sugar is now so arranged (for the advantage of half-a-dozen sugar refiners) that the Canadian consumer is obliged to pay a tax of nearly two millions a year, of which only the most insignificant fraction finds its way into the public treasury.

Taken altogether, it is well within the mark to say that while the present nominal amount of the taxation of the Dominion is about thirty-one millions of dollars, the genuine actual taxation i.e., the sum taken out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of the protected manufacturers, in addition to that paid into the treasury is certainly not less, and is probably a good deal more than sixty millions ($60,000,000).

And yet, when they came into power, did they change the system? Not a bit of it. The system remains to-day as it was, and it is not materially changed in any respect from what it was at that time. He went on:

It is not merely the policy, but the fixed determination of the Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada to overthrow this system at all hazards; and, after very full deliberation, they have come to the conclusion that the best and probably the only really available method which presents itself for that purpose, lies in introducing a system of perfect continental free trade, or unrestricted reciprocity, with the United States.

And that was the solemn conclusion of hon. gentlemen opposite, as to what they would do, when they came into power. But the system remains to-day, and stands as a monument of the inconsistency and of the untruthfulness of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and of the intelligence and the wisdom of the men who devised and carried out that system in 1878.

We may fairly ask, what have the Government accomplished? The Canadian farmers seem to be the class above all others for which they profess the highest regard. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) subsidized a Patron organ, and got his friends to contribute to it for the purpose of reaching that important class, because it was believed that many of them were Patrons; and these hon. gentlemen sought to convince these people that, owing to the dastardly nature of the National Policy, great injustice had been done them, that by the return of the Reform party they would derive great benefit, and that the Reform party stood exactly on the same platform as the Patrons. But when these gentlemen got into office, what did they do? They put through their policy of preferential trade, which lost to Canada the German market, that was rapidly becoming most valuable to us, and obtained for us nothing in return. These hon. gentlemen did not know that they were losing that market, but by their incompetence forced through what they called the preferential trade policy, and destroyed that market for Canada. In return for the loss of that market, and for what they gave England, they got nothing back. They generously gave away what did not belong to them. It is easy to be generous with another man's money, and it was on that principle the Government acted, when they gave away valuable concessions to England and got nothing in return.

They took off the duty on barbed wire, and then said to the farmers, with a great flourish: See what we have done for you: we have taken the duty off barbed wire, and see how much cheaper it is now. But, Mr. Speaker, it is selling at the same rate as before. We pay the same price per hundred pounds, and the only result of the hon. gentlemen's action was the destruction of an important industry in Canada and the throwing out of employment of three hundred or four hundred hands. Then, they reduced the duty on coal oil 1 cent per gallon, and cried out: See what we have done for you farmers. But while they did that on the one hand, on the other hand, they made a concession to the Standard Oil people which enabled that company to bring in their vessels of coal oil to certain ports and force competing railway companies to give them discriminating rates, to the detriment of the people of Canada, whose money was invested in that industry. They destroyed the oil industry here, and did not make coal oil any cheaper to the people, because we are paying exactly the same price to-day as we did before. They did more; they destroyed the oil industry used by the manufacturers, so that to-day that industry is under the control of that gigantic monopoly, the Standard Oil Company. They played deliberately into the hands of one of the largest, most injurious and most oppressive monopolies that exists on the continent of America to-day. They did that by taking the 1 cent off, and allowing the company's steamers to bring in oil to certain ports, thus giving them the power they have used since so successfully, of compelling the railways to give them discriminating rates against other people in the business. But I have heard the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Fraser) say: Oh, they did not interfere with an oil well up there. Probably, he was literally correct. It was not the oil wells the Standard Oil Company were after, but the refiners; and when I talked with Mr. Fairbanks, a short time ago, he admitted that they were compelled to sell to the Standard Oil Company to save their money and their plant, and that the time was rapidly coming when every refinery in Canada would have to do the same thing. First, control the refiners, and then you will control the oil wells and output. That is the result of the policy of the Government, namely, to destroy a Canadian industry and build up a huge trust and combine. Although they always declared themselves, in the strongest terms, opposed to combines and monopolies, yet the first thing they did was to come to the assistance of one of the worst monopolies in the Dominion or the United States to-day.

Then, the hon. gentlemen took the duty off binder twine, and said to the Canadian people: See what we have done for you; we have made binder twine free. But what did they do next in that connection? They never attempt a good act without doing something that will destroy its efficacy, and in this respect they reminded me of the cow which gave a pail of milk, but invariably kicked over the pail. They took the duty off binder twine, but made a corrupt agreement, under which they sold all the output of the penitentiary factories in this country to one of their own friends and supporters, the Hobbs Hardware Company, in London. Mr. Hobbs then got himself appointed agent of the American factories, and joined with the American combine, with the result that we paid, last summer, for binder twine from 14 cents to 16 cents per pound, whereas before that duty was taken off or the regulations changed, we bought it at 6 or 7 cents per pound. I am free to admit, that that large increase in price is not, perhaps, all due to the conduct of the Government in taking off that duty, or to the way in which they sold the penitentiary output. But it was largely brought about by their policy. It might possibly be, that, owing to the scarcity of manilla and its consequent increase in price, the cost of binder twine would also have increased under any circumstances, but I am told that manilla has not gone up to the extent to warrant the increase that now exists, and that binder twine could be sold at a fair profit at the rate of 10 cents per pound. If the Government had done as their predecessors did, reserved the right of selling binder twine by the carload to any man in any part of the country at the same price as they did to this firm, then any man could go to a penitentiary and get a carload and distribute it to the farmers at a moderate profit, and our farmers would not have been victimized to the extent they have. Our Government would not then have fallen into the hands of a combine, but because they did not, whether intentionally, or honestly, or dishonestly, take the course which ordinary business intelligence should have prompted them to take, they have enabled this combine to control the market and compel our farmers to pay at least 5 cents a pound more than they would have done, had the policy of the preceding Government been adhered to.

Then, these hon. gentlemen took the duty off corn, and they did that although they were proposing at the time to try and negotiate a reciprocity treaty. As the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said last year, they gave away one of the best levers they had in their hands for the purpose of moving our neighbours in the direction of reciprocity. The Americans sent us, in round numbers, twenty million bushels of American corn, which came into competition with Canadian coarse grain, and compelled our farmers to accept lower prices for their own product. The Government gave that valuable interest away, which belonged to the Canadian people, just as they gave England preferential trade, and in each case got nothing in return. They, therefore, found themselves in the position, when they went to negotiate a treaty at Washington, of having given away everything, and hav-

Then, it is pertinent for the Canadian farmer to ask himself: Was the Government working in the interest of the Canadian farmer when they took the duty off corn, considering that the result of that was that twenty million bushels of American corn were brought into Canada in one year, supplanting in the markets of our country at least an equal amount of coarse grain that might have been produced and sold by our people. It is pertinent for the Canadian farmer to ask whether the Government, in changing the tariff in that respect were working in the interest of Canadians or in the interest of Americans. For eighteen years hon. gentlemen opposite tried to convince the people of Canada that taxation was too great. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in that noted letter which I have read, said that the taxation was so burdensome that the farmers could not bear it, that they were bled white, but, if the Liberals were put in power, they would run the country for much less and be able to give better results in the administration of public affairs. I thought that was a strange acknowledgment he made the other day when, in speaking in answer to a remark of mine as to what had been accomplished in Washington, he said that children and others whom he would not name—I suppose he meant fools—should not judge half-done work. Well, if it took him and his colleagues six months of hard labour to half do the work and then get nothing, how long would it take them to get a reciprocity treaty? Did these gentlemen reduce taxation? In 1896, the year before they came into power, taxation collected through the customs was $20,000,000. Last year they collected $22,000,000. These gentlemen used to say that for every dollar that went into the public treasury, $2 besides were taken from the pockets of the people, and so they figured that this customs taxation really represented a burden of $60,000,000. If that was true, then the taxation that they impose now through the customs is $66,000,000. Now, were they unwise then, or were they deliberately deceiving the people? Which horn of the dilemma will they choose. The collections from all sources in 1896 were about $36,000,000. This was far too much, according to these hon. gentlemen at that time. The Prime Minister said that if his party were in power they could easily save $4,000,000 by doing away with the Franchise Act, and by economizing in other ways. Well, they have done away with the Franchise Act, and I suppose they have exercised as much economy as they thought was right. But, instead of $36,000,000, as in 1896, their collections amounted to $40,000,000, or $4,000,000 taken from the Canadian people than they said was already too much. Then, they said the taxation was too high. The customs duties at that time were $3.91 a head of the people. But to-day the rate has gone up to $4.22. What conclusion will the Canadian people come to as to that? Will they say that these gentlemen were ignorant and did not know, or will they say that they deliberately tried to deceive the people. Then, when we turn to their expenditure we find that they declared they could carry on the affairs of the country for a much smaller sum than the late Government did. Well, their predecessors managed to get along with an expenditure of $36,000,000 a year, and last year these gentlemen spent $38,000,000—and some people are ungenerous enough to say that our affairs are not managed as well to-day as they were for a smaller amount by the predecessors of these hon. gentlemen. They were going to give us stringent economy in public affairs. They made a bargain for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway at a price so high that they themselves admit now that from half to three-quarters of a million can be saved in the bargain. There were to be no more superannuations. They declared that this was one of the ways of spending the people's money that should not be allowed. These gentlemen have now been in power for some time, and it would be well to tell the Canadian people authoritatively what has been done in that line. I am sorry that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is not in his seat this evening, because this was an expenditure which he denounced and which he said he would denounce no matter who practiced it, that he would even vote against any Government that would practice it. I got a return going back for ten years, and I want to tell the Canadian farmers, and particularly constituents of the hon. member for North Wellington and of other members who took strong grounds on this question, what has been done by the present Government, as compared with their predecessors. I begin with 1890, for I think that is far enough to go back. In that year, thirty-two officers were superannuated, involving an annual expenditure of $15,486 until these people died out. In 1891, sixty people were superannuated, involving an expenditure of $38,099. In 1892 there were sixty-one people superannuated, involving an expenditure of $32,689. In 1893 the superannuations were fifty-one, and the expenditure thus caused $28,000. In 1894, fifty-seven superannuations; expenditure, $22,000. In 1895, 106 people were superannuated, saddling the people with an expenditure of $59,000 a year. In 1896, thirty-six people were put on the list at an annual addition to the public expenditure of $21,000.

Before the party came to power they were going to do away with superannuation, and not be out of any more money in that line. What did they do in their first year? Last year they superannuated 137 people, the largest number, I think, that has ever been superannuated in one year in the history of Canada; they put an annual expenditure on the country for the superannuation of these people of $64,239, and added to that, $12,856 for gratuities to parties that were dismissed. And this was from the friends of economy, this was by the very class of men who told the country that they would never squander any more money in superannuation. And, Sir, the strangest of all, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) sat silent in his seat and never, up to the present moment, so far as I know, said one word in condemnation of the action of the Government. It is well that the Canadian people should see these things, they are able to judge whether these men were sincere when they told the people: If you entrust us with the government of Canada we are going to do away with superannuations and save that amount of money to you annually. They told the people that they were going to get reciprocity; and now the Premier says that in his judgment Canada does not require reciprocity. Well, he could with equal propriety have told that to the country years ago. What does he think of the judgment of himself and his party, who, for 18 years, told the people of Canada that they could not live without reciprocity, that they needed to get back to those old days between 1854 and 1865 which, they said, were the halcyon days of Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce used to say: There is no doubt that if we are returned to power we can get reciprocity for you, because we have never antagonised the people of the United States as our opponents have done. They told the Canadian people they were going to destroy monopolies. What monopolies have they destroyed? I ask the Canadian farmer: What monopoly have they destroyed? What monopoly did they destroy when they played into the hands of the gigantic oil trust and gave them control of the oil industry? What monopoly did they destroy when they practically assisted and organized a monopoly that compelled the Canadian farmers to pay last year at least 5 cents a pound more for their binding twine than they would have had to pay were it not for that monopoly which the Government allowed to go into the hands of their own friends? What monopoly did they destroy when the leather dealers came down and appealed to them to do something to destroy the monopoly that was almost shutting up their industry, and prevented them from being able to sell a pound of sole leather in our markets? Last year I had a number of their letters, but they were sent back to them, so that they might be sent to the Government for the purpose of impressing on them the necessity of suppressing this combine. The Government were to do something to destroy that monopoly, but up to the present time, so far as my knowledge goes, they have not moved hand or foot to do so, but have allowed it to go on to the detriment of that large class of our people. Then they were to submit a plebiscite and enact a prohibitory law if the vote showed a majority of the people in favour of it. I have dealt with that sufficiently, and I do not propose to refer to it again. But I do say that if ever there was anything disgraceful to the Reform party, and that showed their absolute dishonesty and insincerity, it was their conduct on the plebiscite question. The fact that they would not allow the electorate of Canada to vote upon the question on the same terms in the various provinces, that in the province of Quebec, where it was known some members of the Government were going to oppose the plebiscite, they allowed the people to vote under a law which gave one man four, five or six votes, whereas they would only allow one man to give one vote in Ontario, where they were likely to vote in favour of prohibition—I say that was discreditable, and, to my mind, it plainly shows the insincerity of the party, and the sincerity of the leader of the Government who allowed that to be done. From this side of the House a motion was made to remedy that incongruity in the situation, and to give fair play to the Dominion Alliance and to the temperance people when they asked a fair expression of the will of the electorate of Canada. I say they did more. They not only introduced a new system of Government heretofore unknown in our constitution—because we copy the English system, and they introduced the referendum into Canada—they not only introduced a new system which was unknown in the country, but after the electorate had given an honest expression of their opinion, the Government dishonoured their own system, dishonoured the very proposition they had submitted to the people for their verdict. I say they dishonoured their own system, because clearly and unmistakably the rule in this country is that the majority should govern; in all money votes, in votes for members of Parliament, in votes of town councils, or votes for school trustees, the majority always rules, and a majority was entitled to rule on this plebiscite vote as well as in any other case.

But the Premier made a statement the other day which I thought was very interesting, and very valuable for the people to know. He said: It is pleasant for us to contemplate the fact that everybody in Canada is loyal to-day. Loyal to-day! I thought it might be pertinent to inquire how they became loyal, and when they became loyal. When they were in Opposition were they loyal? Why, we know there was a propaganda organized, and carried out, and assisted by the Minister of Public Works, by the Mercier party down there, and a great many of his friends, aiming at the annexation of Canada to the United States. I thought it was pleasant for the Premier to say to the people of Canada: We are all loyal now, because that is giving them some information that they did not possess and that they hardly expected, when they see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who, a few years ago, ran an election in his own province as a secessionist. It was a confession that the people of Canada were glad to hear. If these hon. gentlemen were made loyal by their accession to the Treasury Benches—and there is no other way to account for it—then I say it was well worth while to put them in power for a short time, because there were a great many disloyal men in the party. We remember that when they were advocating their unrestricted reciprocity scheme, the Hon Edward Blake could not follow them because he considered their scheme disloyal. We remember that Erastus Wiman, one of their ardent friends and supporters, assisted them because he knew that it would lead to annexation. I say it is refreshing to hear from the mouths of those hon. gentlemen that they are all loyal to-day, and if that was brought about by putting them in power, it was well worth while to put them in there for a short time so that they might be made loyal. The next question we might reasonably ask is, Is the present Government composed of capable and intelligent men, and are they, therefore, entitled to the confidence of the people of Canada? I say most emphatically, No, if we are to judge them by the conduct of the Postmaster General, whose first act, almost, was to show that he did not know anything about running his department, when he lowered the postage contrary to the conditions of the Berne Postal Convention. The way he bungled that question, and had to withdraw his noted proclamation, is evidence of incompetency. And the Canadian people have concluded that he is not the most suitable man to be at the head of the Post Office Department. Then take the history of the stamp business, the number of stamps he issued, and the pilfering way in which he took from the people of Canada about $300,000 by the Jubilee stamps. Why, you would expect no different conduct from a three-card-monte man. It was not creditable, either to the Postmaster General or to the Dominion of Canada. He issued stamps and then he withdrew them, restamped them and gave them out again, showing that he did not know his own mind from one month to another.

Now it is said that he reduced postage to the Canadian people, and I am disposed to give him all the credit that I think he has a right to, I believe that he acted rightly; but I say that he was forced into it. It was not because it was in the interest of the Canadian people that the rate was reduced, but because of the introduction of penny postage between Canada, Great Britain and the British colonies. The Canadian people asked: What good is that to us? What good is it if a man sending a letter ten miles is obliged to pay three cents when a man sending a letter 7,000 miles can have that letter delivered for two cents? After having taken the step that he did in the first instance he was obliged to go further and reduce the domestic rate of postage. But with a great flourish of trumpets the Canadian farmers were told: "See what I have done by the reduction of this postage." I think he did right, and I give him credit for it, but he did not do so much for the Canadian farmer because a man in the country does not write more than a dozen letters in a year. It does much for the lawyer, for the money lender, the banker, the rich merchant, and the bloated manufacturer, of whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce was inclined to talk so much. The action of the Postmaster General did a great deal for these classes of wealthy people, but very little for the farmers of Canada, for when the deficit is to be made up, to run the postal business, which was caused by the reduction to postage, the farmer must pay a large share of it. I do not think the farmers will be inclined to give the Postmaster General credit for sincerity in claiming to have acted for their benefit. Was there evidence of incompetence in the reduction of postage? I think there was. Was there evidence of ability and intelligent statesmanship in the first preferential tariff of the Government? From this side of the House the Government were warned that every nation that came under the operation of the most-favoured nation clause, under treaties with England, would be able to take advantage of the preferential tariff. They were told by the leader of the Opposition and by the ex-Finance Minister time and time again, but they ignored the warning, yet in three months, when they went home to England and had the question submitted to the law officers of the Crown, they were obliged to admit that they were entirely wrong, that they had displayed bad judgment and that every country coming under the preferential clause could take advantage of the preferential tariff the same as Canada could in her trade with Great Britain. Was that evidence of good judgment or was it the reverse? The Canadian people, I am quite sure, will come to the conclusion that it was not evidence either of good judgment or statesmanship. Was it evidence of good management, when we had a contract made for a fast trans-Atlantic steamship line for them, with great unction, to tell the Canadian people that they had saved over a quarter of a million dollars in their bargain for a fast Atlantic line? Have they succeeded in getting what they bargained for? If they had by any means got everything that the previous Government contracted to get they would have had the same class of vessels and the same equipment for carrying the important trade of the country in cold storage that is needed, and that was contracted for by their predecessors. But instead of that the bottle-necked steamer which we have heard so much about, was launched upon the country. They came back and were obliged to confess that they had made a complete failure. All the trips made across the Atlantic, all the elections carried by it, was evidence, not of ability but of incompetency on the part of these hon. gentlemen. Was it evidence of ability and of competency to burk the Canadian Pacific Cable scheme. The late Government would have succeeded in carrying this project to a successful conclusion. To-day it is being allowed to pass rapidly into oblivion; the Government have confessed that they are not likely to get the cable; they have not the ability to carry it forward nor to conduct a successful negotiation upon the subject as had their predecessors. It is pertinent for the Canadian people to ask whether these are the best men to govern Canada, and that is the question they will ask when they have a chance to return a new Government. Was it evidence of ability or want of ability that the reciprocity negotiations have been without result? Is it evidence of ability on the part of the Government to give away everything they had to give and which they might have used to advantage in negotiating a reciprocity treaty? I believe the Canadian people will come to the conclusion that the members of the Government were not the best men to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. They will ask if there is evidence of ability in their conduct in connection with the Drummond County Railway and the Yukon Railway. I am afraid they will come to the conclusion that we have not the right class of men in power.

We are sometimes taunted across the floor of the House with the question: What is your policy? The National Policy is dead. No, we stand on the same platform that we stood upon in 1878. When the time comes that the Conservative party are again entrusted with the management of the affairs of the country as undoubtedly they will be, as soon as the Government appeal to the electorate, it will be found that we have an up-to-date policy, an energetic policy, a distinctive Canadian policy, not a give-away policy such as our opponents have been inclined to follow since they came in power. We have a policy that will promote the interest of the miners, the farmers, the manufacturers and the traders of the country; we have a policy that will give a larger return to industry, that will perfect the lines of transportation, a policy I say, which the Canadian people want, a distinctive Canadian policy, a loyal policy, not only to Great Britain, but loyal to Canada. The people demand first that we shall give evidence of our loyalty to the Dominion, and I have no doubt that we will be prepared to submit a policy that is far ahead of the policy that has been carried out by the class of men who have been governing the country for the last few years. We sometimes think that they are preparing to appeal to the country, and we say that the day cannot come too soon. They can only appeal to the country on a catch question like that of the Senate issue. We have been told outside of the Speech from the Throne that they are going to reform the Senate. The Prime Minister says that is one of the promises made by the Liberal party to the Canadian people, that they propose to carry out as they carried out all the other promises that they made. It is known to the Canadian people that the present Government are pressing into their service the provincial Governments, notwithstanding the fact that Blake said that it would never do for the Federal Government to enter into entangling alliances with the provincial Governments. The Government are endeavouring to get the provincial Parliaments to pass resolutions to show the Imperial Parliament that Senate reform is in accordance with the sentiment of the Canadian people, but in my judgment these resolutions will not have much weight in Great Britain. I would like to say a word of warning to the Canadian people, to the province of Quebec and to the maritime provinces upon this important question. If they commence tampering with the constitution it will lead in a direction that cannot be clearly foreseen to-day. We know that the secessionist party would not mind breaking up the confederation and that they are found running elections upon that principle. If they attempt to tamper with the constitution it will lead to other amendments that may be demanded by the Canadian people that may be far reaching in their disastrous effects to the provinces and the men who propose this amendment.

At confederation the Senate was constituted so that it could protect the smaller and weaker provinces in the confederacy. For that purpose Quebec was given twenty-four members in the Senate, and although the population of Ontario was much larger, Ontario was given twenty-four, and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were also given twenty-four senators. Therefore, Quebec and Ontario and the two maritime provinces had each an equal voice in all affairs of state. Let me draw the attention of the people of the province of Quebec to what will happen if the proposal of the Government succeeds. What would be the result of a joint vote in the two Houses, so far as Quebec is concerned? Ontario has 91 members in the Commons and 24 in the Senate, or a total of 115, while Quebec has 65 in the Commons and 24 in the Senate, a total of 89. If a joint vote were had on a question in which the province of Quebec is vitally interested, Ontario would have 115 votes against 89 in Quebec. What would Quebec think of that? How much credit would that province give the Premier and his friends for reforming the Senate in that direction? Why, Sir, such a proposal would simply swamp Quebec, and destroy the equal voice which that province now has in Canadian affairs. To a greater extent would this be the case in Nova Scotia, because that province has fewer members in the Commons than Quebec, and they will have relatively a smaller representation if this change in the constitution of the Senate is carried out.

But there is a still worse evil which I foresee. We have representation by population in the House of Commons, but not in the Senate, in Ontario and in the other provinces, except the province of Quebec, which gives us the basis for our representation, Quebec always having only 65, the number never increasing. Census after census, the number of members from the other provinces will increase, and if this reform of the Senate is carried out most assuredly Ontario will demand representation by population in the Senate as well as in the House of Commons. What will the province of Quebec think of that? If this proposed reform is carried out the Government must logically go further and give Ontario representation by population in the Senate, which would give Ontario a preponderating voice in that House. I warn the people of Quebec to beware of what they are doing, because the day will assuredly come if this change in the constitution takes place now, when Ontario will have a larger representation in the Senate than it has to-day. But why does the Government wish to reform the Senate? Is it because one or two of their pet schemes have been burked in that Chamber. We hear some hon. gentlemen opposite say: Oh, the Senate is a political body, but would it be any less a political body if it is merged with the great political Chamber of the Commons. No, Sir, whatever independence and honest judgment the Senate now possesses would be done away with by this proposal. The senator would become part and parcel of one or the other of the political parties in this House, and they would not be likely to exercise any better judgment or any more impartiality than they do at the present time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) brought to our attention the fact that one of the great weaknesses of the United States constitution was that the small states had as many members in the Senate as the wealthy and populous states, and, if I understood him correctly, he led us to infer that that was a mistake. If the Prime Minister's scheme of Senate reform is carried out, its trend will be to intensify the evil that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) spoke of. The Reformers tell us that the Senate has been a partisan body. Let us see if that is the case. Since confederation, has the Senate rejected more Bills when the Conservatives were in power than when the Reformers were in power? That is a very pertinent question to ask, for we know it has been stated that the Senate has always had more Conservative than Liberal members. Let us see what Bills were rejected by the Senate since confederation. From 1867 to 1873 the Senate threw out twenty-three Government Bills ; from 1874 to 1878 they threw out thirteen Government Bills ; from 1879 to 1896 they threw out twenty-four Government Bills, and from 1896 to 1899 they threw out five Government Bills. In all, sixty-five Government measures were thrown out since confederation. The Conservatives were in power for twenty-four years since confederation, and the Senate throws out forty-seven Conservative measures, or nearly two for each year. The Reformers have been in power for eight years, and during that time the Senate threw out eighteen Government Bills or a fraction over two each year. Practically the same number of Bills were thrown out when the Conservatives were in power as when the Liberals were in power. Surely that does not show that the Senate is a partisan body. Any one who analyses this list must come to the conclusion that the same even-handed justice and the same impartiality was meted out by that honourable body under all circumstances. No matter which party was in power, they exercised the same independent judgment, fearless of the consequences so long as they believed they did right. Sir, it is my judgment that the electors of Canada will amply justify the Senate, and that they will emphatically pronounce against the proposal of the Prime Minister. His proposal is unwise and imprudent. It is tampering with our solemn constitution, and above all other men in Canada such a proposal never should have come from a representative of the province of Quebec. I believe I know the situation of the country, and I believe that the Canadian people will come to the conclusion that the men now governing Canada were dishonest when they were in opposition in preaching principles of government for eighteen years, which they never intended to carry out. I believe the country will declare, that these men were incompetent when they came into power, that they were the wrong men to choose to manage our public affairs, and that when the time comes, they will be swept from power as unceremoniously as they were called to power at the last election.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). Mr. Speaker, I can promise you that, whatever pledges have been broken, I shall make one to-night which shall not be broken, that is, that I shall speak briefly. I do not intend to cover all the ground that is covered in the Address, nor to discuss subjects which have been so ably discussed on both sides, and at such great length, during this debate. I wish, however, to say a few words upon one subject, and one subject only, mentioned in the Address. In reference to that subject, I am bound to say, that to one who, like myself, has a belief in the doctrine of prohibition as applied to the liquor traffic, there is not very much comfort in the position taken by the Government, and there is no more ground for hope in the position taken by the Opposition. While both parties seem inclined to avoid taking a square stand on this question, I do not hesitate to say, at the risk of being considered a faddist and a fanatic, that this is the largest and most important question in sight to-day in Canadian politics. While, probably, not one of the other questions that have been discussed during this debate, will live in its present shape to face another Parliament, this question will yet enter into political contests in this country, will yet face parties, and will be a living issue until it is settled, and settled right.

I want to say a few words upon the merits of this question, as it is now presented to this Parliament, and, in doing so, I shall, as far as it is humanly possible, avoid being influenced by any considerations of party. I am in a good position to do this—in fact, I am bound to do so—because, when I accepted a nomination at the hands of the Liberal party, and was elected, while I distinctly declared that I supported the general policy of that party, and had the most perfect confidence in its leaders, I considered that upon this question neither political party in Canada had taken a proper stand ; and, therefore, I felt myself absolutely free to take whatever course, in my judgment, was best calculated to promote the principle in which I believed. That is my position to-day. I do not need to discuss the merits or demerits of the doctrine of prohibition. Upon that abstract principle Parliament has given a very emphatic pronouncement ; and, until that declaration is reversed, I am bound to accept it as the deliberate and matured conviction of this House. In the year 1884, the present hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) moved this resolution :

That the object of good government is to promote the general welfare of the people by a careful encouragement and protection of whatever makes for the public good, and by an equally careful discouragement and suppression of whatever tends to the public disadvantage ;

That the traffic in alcoholic liquors as beverages is productive of serious injury to the moral, social and industrial welfare of the people of Canada ;

That, despite all preceding legislation, the evils of intemperance remain so vast in magnitude, so wide in extent, and so destructive in effect as to constitute a social peril and a national menace ;

That, this House is of opinion, for the reasons hereinbefore set forth, that the right and most effective legislative remedy for those evils is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

To this resolution the late Hon. Thomas White moved an amendment, by adding these words :

And this House is prepared, so soon as public opinion will sufficiently sustain stringent measures to promote such legislation, so far as the same is within the competency of the Parliament of Canada.

The resolution, as moved by the hon. member for York, and amended by Mr. White, passed this House by a majority of 122 to 40. In the year 1889, this House reaffirmed the position taken in 1884, and has not since that time reversed its decision or modified its opinion. From that time forward the discussion has not been upon the abstract principle of prohibition, but the question discussed here and in the country has been: Is the country ready for this legislation?

Now, at the time this resolution was passed, and for many years after, the Conservative party were in power; and I think I do not state their position unfairly, when I say, that, while they did not dispute the general doctrine affirmed, they took the position, that the country was not ready for the enactment of such a law. But so strong was the prohibition sentiment in the country, and so great was the pressure brought upon that Government, that they felt compelled to do something to satisfy public opinion. They, therefore, proposed to appoint a royal commission to inquire into all the facts of the case, and to report to Parliament. Now, much censure has been heaped upon the late Government for that action. For my part, I am bound to say I never did, and I do not now, concur in that censure, in so far as it is directed at the policy of the Government in appointing such a commission. I have always been of the opinion, that such a commission, properly constituted and honestly conducted, might do a great deal in clearing away many of the difficulties that surrounded this question. Of the commission, as constituted and conducted, I am sure I do not speak too strongly, and I am sure I shall be sustained by all the sincere prohibitionists in the country and by many who are not prohibitionists, when I say, that if that commission escaped being a swindle and a humbug, it did so by becoming a farce. The majority of that commission reported against a prohibitory law for Canada. In this report the Government of that day quietly concurred, and from that day to this we have had no declaration of policy from the Conservative party on this question of prohibition.

Now, I am not inclined to attach any very great weight to the opinions of the royal commission. I have attended too many meetings of that body to have any great respect for their fairness or good judgment. But I wish to call attention to one important fact. So great were some of the evils which flow directly from the traffic in intoxicating liquors in this country, so apparent were they, that even this biased and prejudiced body of inquirers were compelled to report to this Parliament, that there was a necessity for some legislative action. On page 504 of the report of the majority, I find the following statement:—

The licensing of saloons, the only business of which is the sale by retail of intoxicants, the commissioners consider should be put an end to.

Mr. McCLURE.

There is no justification for their existence founded on necessity, and it is certain most of the evils which arise out of the immoderate use of intoxicants have their origin in or are encouraged by the existence of these saloons.

I shall not stop to argue, as it might very reasonably be argued, that there was no evidence produced before the royal commission and none can be produced, upon which the sweeping condemnation of the saloons of the country can be based that does not apply with equal, if not greater force, to every hotel or bar of this country or any other places where liquor is sold by the glass. My present object, in making this quotation, is to show that although the royal commission reported against the enactment of a prohibitory law, they nevertheless admitted that some kind of legislation was necessary. The Conservative Government in Parliament, however, accepted the report of that commission as final and conclusive, and since that day have declined to do anything to advance prohibitory legislation. With that position I certainly cannot agree. Now, what is the position of the Liberal party. I think it will be generally admitted that although, while in Opposition, the Liberal party pronounced itself perhaps more favourably inclined towards prohibition than the Conservatives, they nevertheless also took the position that the country was not ready for the enactment of such a law. But just as the Conservative party felt compelled to do something to satisfy public opinion and gave the country the Royal Commission, so the Liberal party gave the people the plebiscite. Now, we must be fair enough—and I think I am not a partisan in making that statement—to admit that the Liberal party never promised to give this country prohibition. They promised to ascertain the mind of the people by a vote, just as the Conservative party promised to ascertain the facts of the case by a Royal Commission. There was, of course, in both cases, an implied promise that they would be bound by the result. Now, we have the result of the plebiscite, and we are told that those results do not justify the enactment of a prohibitory law. I submit that, even if this be true, it does not follow that Parliament has no duty to perform. As I could not, and do not, agree in the decision of the Conservative party to accept the report of the Royal Commission and do nothing, neither can I agree that the Government should accept the vote of the plebiscite, as a final decision against prohibition, and do nothing; for, as I contend, the report of the Royal Commission was based upon an imperfect and one-sided view of the evidence and presented by a prejudiced and an unfair tribunal; so I say the vote of the plebiscite fails to reveal the full strength of prohibition sentiment in this country, and for most obvious reasons. Let me say, however, that I do not at all agree with those who, in this House and elsewhere, have argued that because a simple majority of those who voted "yes," the Government have a mandate to pass a prohibitory law. This is not like the case of an ordinary election, where you can count the noses and give the victory to the side having the largest number. The object of this plebiscite was to ascertain the strength of the prohibitionist sentiment in the country—to ascertain if there was sufficient moral sentiment in the country to render it probable or possible to enforce such a law if once enacted. In other words, Parliament, having endorsed the abstract principle of prohibition, the object of this vote was to answer the one question remaining unanswered. Is the country ready for such a law? In arriving at our conclusions upon that, I say we must take into account the size of the vote. We must not only count those who voted yes, but those who stayed at home. In saying this, I do not mean to say, by any means, that we should count all who stayed at home as against prohibition or that we should count them all in favour of prohibition. My own view is that the most of them were absolutely indifferent on the subject. Practically the answer they gave to the question was: "We do not care whether you pass a law or not." But certainly this indifferent sentiment in the country must be taken into account. We must view all the circumstances of the case and arrive at a fair decision as to what the whole vote, polled and unpolled, indicates. Now, there were many side issues that entered into this plebiscite campaign and distracted attention from the real issue. In the first place, the plebiscite is something comparatively new in Canada. I am not one of those who condemn it because it is new and not English. I believe there are many good things that are not English, and the plebiscite is one. Further than that I believe that it might be with advantage resorted to more frequently than it is. However this may be, it is practically a new thing to our people, and for that very reason it was difficult to make them believe that it would result in anything practicable, and, therefore, it was difficult to poll a full vote. Then it is an undoubted fact that the party organizations of this country are against the prohibitionists. I do not speak of the one party more than the other, but it is characteristic of party Government that parties are only held together, as the right hon. First Minister indicated the other day, by a spirit of compromise, and for that very reason it is difficult to get any great political party to take a square stand upon a great moral question. The Liberal party gave us the opportunity to vote, but the Liberal party as such gave no encouragement to the principle of prohibition, while the Conservative party in this House and the Conservative press in the country did their utmost to convince the people that the plebiscite was a sham and a humbug and would amount to nothing. Then, again, there was a fear in some quarters—and I am bound to say it was not altogether without foundation—that certain Conservatives were endeavouring to swell the prohibition vote, not because they loved the cause of prohibition, but because they desired to embarrass the Government, and many Liberals refrained from voting their convictions because they did not desire to give political capital to their opponents.

An hon. MEMBER. That is an extraordinary statement.

Mr. McCLURE. Is it any more extraordinary that a Liberal should refrain from voting his convictions rather than give political capital to his opponents than that a Conservative, who hated prohibition, should go to the polls and vote and work for it in order to embarrass the Government? It may be an extraordinary statement, but it is a true one. All these things combined to involve the issue and to prevent a fair verdict being given, and yet I am bound to say that the number of persons who, without hope of personal reward, or influenced by party considerations or moved by passion or prejudice, went to the polls and recorded their conscientious convictions on this question in September last was a remarkably large one. In the history of those countries, where such votes are common, I fail to find a single instance in which any great moral question submitted to the people under similar circumstances succeeded in bringing to the polls so large a proportion of the voters as this did. Take any other one of the questions that have been debated during this Address, or take, if you will, any question that has come before this Parliament, eliminate from it, if that be possible, the question of party, take out of it the element of personal interest that always attaches to a contest, and will any man here tell me that any one of those questions will bring to the polls, on its own merits, as many votes as the prohibitionist cause did September last. This vote is one which, I say unhesitatingly, demands attention. It is one which cannot and will not be ignored in the country, whether ignored here or not. But the Government tells us that it does not warrant the enacting of a prohibitory law.

Now, let me say frankly: I consider this a perfectly honest answer. Prohibitionists may not fully agree with it. For my part, I cannot fully agree with it, but there is nothing dishonest in it and there is no breach of promise expressed or implied in that answer. The Liberal party has done everything that it had promised to do on this question. As far as the Government have gone I have no fault to find with them. I wish they had promised more and I wish they had performed more. I hope to see the day when this Government or some other Government will promise more and will perform more, but I have no charge of dishonesty and no charge of broken promises to make.

The prohibitionists are now at a point where they have to face a serious problem. They have forced this issue into the practical politics of this country; and there it must remain until it is settled, and settled right. Both parties, both party organizations, flatly refuse to go any further. What the present course of the prohibitionists should be I have no authority or right to advise. I can only speak for myself. It is plain to me that if we can hope for nothing from the Government or the Liberal party, we can hope for no more from the Conservative party. I have listened in vain to the many speeches we have had from the Opposition side of the House for any declaration of policy on this question. The Conservative party stands to-day where it has stood since 1893—committed to a blind, placid acceptance of the illogical and prejudiced report of the Royal Commission. I have heard much criticism of the Government. Of this, I do not complain. They are within their rights; they are discharging their duty. I have heard many appeals, some more direct than others, to prohibitionists to punish the Government for breaking their pledges. But I ask those who make these appeals: What help will that give us towards getting a law? I tell them I am ready, and thousands of others in this country—aye, more than the practical politicians often estimate—are prepared to vote against this Government or any other Government, if they will give us a reasonable hope that by so doing we shall get what we want. But the prohibitionists of this country are not all children or fools. We are not going to be caught with empty denunciations that are without a semblance of promise in them. I do not propose here or elsewhere to make capital for the Conservative party until I am convinced that by so doing I can advance the cause of prohibition. When they convince me that by making capital for the Conservative party, I shall advance the cause of prohibition, party names will count for very little with me. Let the Conservative leaders declare their policy. In the meantime, my advice to the prohibitionists is: Keep as clear as you can of party entanglements, and make your fight in the country. I believe the great mass of the common people are with us on this question, if the party leaders are not. I believe we can appeal to them with all confidence on this question, and to them we must appeal. It shall not be made a party football; it shall not be made the means of putting one party in and another party out, but dealt with on its merits. As I said in the opening, so I conclude—this is the largest, most important and most comprehensive question now before the Canadian people. It is a question which stands face to face with nineteenth century civilization—and demands an answer; and it is a question upon the proper decision of which depend issues of the most vital importance to Canadian homes and to the hopes of the Canadian people. I do not know what the result of this present situation may be, but I for one am looking for the way by which we can vote according to our convictions on this question, and when I see it, I shall not be afraid to take it. I hope soon to hear of this policy. I have not heard of it in this House as yet.

Mr. L. A. CHAUVIN, Terrebonne. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne, which the Government has placed in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General congratulates the country upon the number of immigrants that have settled down in Canada.

Now, who are those immigrants? Have those immigrants been sent here by our immigration agents in France, Ireland, England or in the United States, who are paid by the Government in order to select the class of settlers the best suited to our country? No, Sir; those immigrants are foreigners whose tenets are at variance with our manners and the laws of our country. Among other tenets, they profess that of never taking up arms, were it even for the defence of their own homes and their own country. It was no doubt on account of that doctrine that the Doukhobors had to leave Russia. They do not seem to take any stock in the peace and disarmament proposals of the Czar of Russia. But, Sir, even had we here no military conscription, we have a written constitution which commands us, when necessary, to call up to arms all citizens for the defence of our territory. Let me call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to the Militia Act, chapter 41, section 10, which enacts:

Her Majesty may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in case of a "levée en masse."

Have the Doukhobors been exempted from military service by some ukase of the Napoleon of the west, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton)? We have a right to be enlightened on the matter; if not, it will be understood that this immigration of thousands of settlers is an infringement of our constitution, and their presence in the west is to be looked upon in the light of an open challenge to the laws and the institutions of our country. But what do the letter and the spirit of our constitution amount to in the eyes of a Minister and a Government who did not scruple to outrage and trample under foot the same constitution when it was their bounden duty to protect the rights and privileges of the French Catholic minority of Manitoba? Instead of encouraging the immigration of those foreigners, the stream of which flowing strong and broad into the North-west Territories threatens to submerge the small group of French Canadians, the pioneers and first occupants of those fertile lands: why do they not encourage the repatriation of French Canadians from the United States, and chiefly of those who have settled down near the boundary line of our Canadian west, and those in the state of Michigan, who, as stated in "La Patrie" a few days ago, wish to come home again and settle down in our midst? By so doing the Government would carry out a truly national policy, such a policy as is advocated by the valiant Archbishop of St. Boniface, who is keeping up the fight, "pro aris et focis," such a policy as is also advocated by that good missionary and immigration agent for the Government out west, the Rev. Mr. Morin, a policy which is also endorsed by another missionary, the Rev. Mr. Gérin, who writes as follows:—

What we need is a solid fulcrum in those regions where so many powerful forces are concentrating. Whatever contributes to extend and strengthen French influence, either to the west, to the north, or to the east of confederation, redounds to the benefit of the province of Quebec.

Such a policy would have been carried out by Sir George Etienne Cartier, who was wont to say to his fellow-countrymen, chiefly those who were tempted to cross over the boundary line: "Young men, go west! It is the land of promise." The Government of the day, with a French Canadian Prime Minister at their head, prefer to say: "Doukhobors, go west, and take possession of the best lands."

Why, Sir, I am told that those foreigners, in order the better to group together and concentrate their forces, have taken hold of lands belonging to other people. If I am misinformed, I am willing to be corrected by the hon. gentlemen opposite. There is another important matter which is not referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and upon which I deem it my duty to draw the attention of this House. I refer to an event which has transpired since last session, and one which has aroused public opinion to a high degree, chiefly in the province of Quebec. The fact I wish to refer to is the expulsion from the Canadian soil of two Spaniards, Senors Carranza and Du Bosc. Let me say that in referring to this matter, I disclaim all ties of partisanship. I wish it to be understood that I assume the whole responsibility and initiation of the protest I am about to make. It is as a British subject, as a French Canadian and a member of this House that I wish to protest against that expulsion. The British Government has always been the faithful guardian of the freedom and traditions guaranteed by the British constitution. It has always been the proud boast of Great Britain that she afforded a safe asylum to foreigners of all countries, to all refugees and political exiles, and she has welcomed to her shores those whom the French Revolution had cast adrift upon her shores, as well as those refugees of the Napoleonic dynasty and the princes of Orleans. Now, either these two Spaniards I refer to were guilty of having violated the laws of the land, or they were not. If they were guilty, it was the bounden duty of the Government who accused them to bring this crime to the notice of Parliament, or to arraign them before the tribunals of this country. If they were not guilty, nothing could justify the Government for committing such a serious breach of international law, for so grossly violating the constitution of the country and the rights of citizens, as they have been violated at the present instance. And by what right did the Prime Minister write that letter to Mr. St. Pierre, that letter to "my dear St. Pierre," signed by Wilfrid Laurier? If he did so in his own personal capacity, he has outrageously abused his position as constitutional leader of the Government. Not even the Czar of Russia, not even a potentate of Africa or Asia would have carried to greater length autocracy and tyranny. If he did so in his capacity as chief of the executive, I would like to know where is to be found the legal enactment which confers on the Government such a right of expulsion.

We have been told, Sir, that in pursuing such a course the Government acted upon the instructions of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or of some important personage at Washington. Since when, I ask, has this Government, in the conduct of public affairs, to depend upon the good pleasure of the English Cabinet or of Downing Street, or of the British Embassy at Washington? No doubt, the Prime Minister—and this is probably the exact explanation of the matter—was anxious to truckle to the United States Government and get into their good graces. On this side of the House, we do not wish to wage war upon the United States. We have hailed the Anglo-American Alliance, which, to our mind, was a prudent marriage, as well as a love match. But we did not hail it with as much enthusiasm as the right hon. gentleman himself did, because it is a well known fact that the fusion of our race with the Anglo-Saxon race has been the dream of his life; he who, in an interview with the New York "Herald," reported in the "Canadien" of the 26th February, 1890, thus delivered himself: "The achievement of this great object, an alliance of the whole British race upon the face of the globe." But the policy of the Conservative party towards the United States of America has ever been one marked by an attitude of dignity and self-respect, which is a much surer way of winning the respect of other nations than by truckling to them. If our representatives have had to humble themselves at the Washington conference, the reason may perhaps be found in that action of the Government, contrary to justice and honour, the alien labour law, which has been postponed from session to session, in order to please the United States Government.

As to the reform of the Senate, I presume that it is a flash in the pan, and that it is going to meet the same fate as the prohibition movement did. In connection with the last matter, I cannot help remarking that the Government are refusing to obey the people's verdict. Now, if the popular will is no longer the law even under a Liberal administration why should they complain of the Senate and clamour for its reform on behalf of the sovereign people? No, Sir, the reform of the Senate is but an election and party manoeuvre, and "La Patrie," the organ of the Liberal party in Montreal, from the very outset of the debate on that reform, did not fail to calculate the majority of votes which it was bound to give the Liberal party. If they mean to carry out a reform calculated to place the Senate outside of the influences of active politics, then, I say, let them select its members from the ranks of the public bodies of the people, from the universities, the clergy, the liberal professions, trade and agriculture. But I hesitate not in saying that they merely obey the dictates of narrow partisanship in disturbing our constitution, and an institution which showed in the past what it could do, and which, far from trammelling public business, has, on the contrary, upon several occasions, saved the country. No, Sir; the hon. gentlemen opposite are not actuated by a love of the constitution. A still more serious result of the proposed reform would be that, by nullifying the influence of the Senate, the guarantees secured by the provinces, and chiefly by the province of Quebec, would also be nullified. In a speech delivered on the 22nd of this month, at Quebec, the Hon. Thomas Chapais, a gifted speaker and writer, quoting the opinion of Sir Hector Langevin, one of the representatives of the province of Quebec at the conference which was held for the framing of the Act of Confederation of British North America, reports the latter as stating that "had any member of the conference proposed the formation of a Senate organized upon the plan of reform advocated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir George Etienne Cartier and himself would have at once withdrawn from the conference, and broken off all negotiations."

Before concluding these remarks, let me quote the celebrated words of Sir Etienne Paschel Taché, who said that "the last gun fired for the maintenance of the British flag on the American continent, would be fired by a French Canadian." Let me express the hope that the first blow struck at the structure of confederation will not be dealt by a French Canadian Minister.

During the session, I intend to give fair-play to the Government, as I have done during previous sessions. As a matter of fact, I do not see why we should wage war upon a Government who continue the policy of the Conservative party, and are indebted for their prosperity to our methods and political platform, which reminds me of the saying of the Latin poet: "Sic vos non vobis." Why, I ask, should we arraign an Administration who are carrying out our political programme, and are borrowing from our party their views and methods? But is it fair, and sound logic, on the part of the hon. gentlemen, after so long disparaging and traducing that programme and those ideas, now to claim credit for a policy to which the country owes its prosperity? Let the Government encourage immigration of the right kind; let them help French Canadians from the United States to repatriate themselves, and I will support them. Let the Government encourage the colonization of the province of Quebec, a truly patriotic work; let them encourage the development and the settlement of the northern townships of the province, opened up by the heroic Curé Labelle, and they may rely upon it that I will help them to reach that end by all the means suggested at the last meeting of the Congress of Colonization, held in Montreal last summer, the proceedings of which have been submitted to the Government for approval. The Government may count upon my support in any measure calculated to foster the interests and the progress of the farming community, as also in any progressive measure of social reform framed with a view to fostering the well-being of the working classes, and righting the wrongs perpetrated upon them in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway matter. The Government will also find in me a willing supporter should they aim at reforming the Senate so as to make it a body truly representative of the larger interests and important bodies of the country, and not a voting machine, as the Prime Minister and his faithful adviser, the Minister of Public Works, are trying to do. I will support the Government if they deal with the United States as the latter deal with us, and provided they no longer allow them to monopolize our natural wealth, our mines, water powers, natural gas, etc., provided they impose a tax upon those foreigners and expel them from the country, if need be, so as to restore to our fellow-countrymen, the common inheritance of the Canadian family so far monopolized by our hungry neighbours.

Let the Government also grant further concessions to the Manitoba Catholics and they may rely upon my support; but I will agree with them that the school question is settled only when full justice will have been done, according to the pledges given to the Quebec electorate at the elections of 1896, and in pursuance of the supreme orders issued by Pope Leo XIII. Finally, in whatever measure may best serve the interests of the province of Quebec, I will support the Government, claiming, however, equal rights for all, for Quebec as well as for Ontario. And in this connection let me, Sir, invite the attention of the right hon. gentleman to some of those demands and beg him to consider and solve that of the "better terms," that is to say, a readjustment of the subsidies granted by the Dominion Government to Quebec. That question was brought up before the Interprovincial Conference called together by the Hon. Mr. Mercier. Two hon. gentlemen who now sit upon the Treasury benches, the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals attended that conference, and among other resolutions subscribed to by them was one enacting that, should the Liberal party come into power, they would grant the province of Quebec "better terms."

Let, then, the Government redeem the pledge given to the province of Quebec in the matter of the "better terms," as also in the matter of the rights of the Manitoba minority, without heeding the threats of fanatics of whatever description, nor paying any attention to the faint-heartedness of some of their followers, relying upon the co-operation of truly independent men, of men of good-will, ready to do justice and grant equal rights to all, and anxious, before everything else, to uphold the constitution of the country and have it respected.

Mr. H. G. CARROLL (Kamouraska). I would not have arisen to address the House at this time, were it not for the speech delivered the other day by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). That hon. gentleman made some statements which certainly cannot remain unanswered. I may, first of all, congratulate the hon. member for Montmorency for his great achievements, for his rapid advancement in the leadership of the French Conservative party. At the same time, I cannot refrain from expressing my sympathy with the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), for, if rumour is correct—and I think it is—there was a new movement inaugurated a few weeks ago in the city of Montreal, a result of which is, that the hon. member for Montmorency is proclaimed by the Tory press, by the "Mail and Empire" and by the Toronto "World," as the brilliant young leader of the French Conservatives of the province of Quebec. Sir, that must be painful to the hon. member for Beauharnois, who sits in this House, an old parliamentarian of twenty or twenty-two years experience; but he is relegated to the old movement, as we are now in the new movement. The hon. member for Montmorency touched upon several different subjects in the speech which he made the other day. He spoke of the Quebec bridge; he spoke of the race appeals to the French Canadians, which, he says, the French Liberal members in this House are always making. Sir, I can understand very well why the member for Montmorency speaks of the Quebec bridge. He remembers when the leader of the Opposition, in the city of Quebec, declared, that if there was no bridge, there would be no votes for the Conservative party. There has been no bridge, and there have been no votes for hon. gentlemen opposite. But I can assure the hon. gentleman—though I am not authorized, and do not know the intentions of the Government—that the Quebec bridge will be built, and, as usual, there will be votes for the leader of the Government. Again, the hon. member for Montmorency stated in this House, that the French members appealed to the electorate of the province of Quebec for their support of this Government on the ground that our leader is a French Canadian and a Catholic. Sir, I deny the statement in toto. It comes with a bad grace from my hon. friends opposite to state that we make these appeals, when those hon. gentlemen, during that memorable session of 1896, when the Remedial Bill was under discussion—a Bill which, according to the leader of the Government, was a measure of a shapeless deformity—when these hon. gentlemen in this House made just such appeals against the leader of the Opposition. I say, this accusation comes with a bad grace from those hon. gentlemen, who at that time appealed to the passions and to the prejudices of the electors in the province of Quebec. Such a charge comes with bad grace from those hon. gentlemen who, in 1896, conducted a campaign of slander and misrepresentation and falsehood in the province of Quebec against the hon. gentleman who was then leading the Opposition. Why, Sir, they even went so far as to try to peer into our private lives, and, through well-known means, to influence the electorate of that province. The hon. member for Montmorency, and other hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House during this lengthy debate, have assailed the Government, and have said, that it was a bad Government, that it was a Government which does not deserve the confidence of the people of this country. Sir, I will give them an authority, the authority of the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies. Mr. Chamberlain, speaking at a banquet given in his honour in the city of Birmingham, replying to the charge made against his Government, that it was the worst Government of modern times, spoke thus:

They passed a resolution in which they declared that the present Government was the worst Government of modern times. It is, then, for the worst Government of modern times that I have to respond. For what are the signs of a bad Government, and, above all, what are the conditions which you would expect to find in a country which has been ruled for the past four years by the worst Government of modern times? Surely you would expect to find bad trade, a falling revenue; you would expect to see general insecurity and want of confidence.

Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition has admitted, that in this country we find great and growing trade and prosperity, but he attributes it to the luck of the leader of the Government. Well, it is something to be lucky; it is not much, but it is something, and I am sure the leader of the Opposition, after the by-elections that have been held in the province of Quebec, would like very well to enjoy a little of that luck. The hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Quebec complain that they cannot appeal to the electorate of the province of Quebec, that they cannot put the real issues before the electors. Real issues! What are the real issues in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite? The Curran bridge, the Tay Canal, the graving dock? Sir, the trouble is, not that the electorate of the province of Quebec do not understand these questions; the trouble is, that they understand them too well, and that is the reason the hon. gentlemen opposite are so unpopular there. I suppose, the leader of the Opposition has asked explanations from the leaders in Quebec—from the hon. member for Beauharnois, from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), from the hon. member for Montmorency—I suppose, he has asked: How is it that in the by-elections we cannot succeed? I suppose, they answered him: Well, Sir Charles, we cannot succeed because we cannot put the real issues before the people. That is a bad excuse, and I think it is not a loyal excuse, and it is one that will recoil on the hon. gentlemen who give such reasons, because it implies an accusation against the intelligence of the population of the province of Quebec. Now, the question of the Senate has been discussed at considerable length by the leader of the Opposition. He opposes the reform which has been proposed by the leader of the Government, on the ground that it will affect the position of the French minority in this confederation. Now, let me ask: What has brought about this confederation? Was it not the friction that existed between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario? Was it not because the two provinces could not get along together? Was it not because Her Majesty's Government could not be carried on? Sir, we demand this reform because we say, that Her Majesty's Government, as the Senate is now constituted, cannot be carried on. But the hon. gentlemen should not give that reason, because, though I approve of confederation, though I think it has been a great and a good work, there is a defect in its working which is evident to every one. At one time, under the union, there were 42 members from the province of Quebec, and 42 from the province of Ontario, an equal number of French representatives and of English representatives. But, at confederation, the province of Quebec was sandwiched between the maritime provinces and the western provinces, and now we have only 65 members out of the 213 members sitting in this Chamber. If the hon. leader of the Opposition gives that as a reason, I say that he should not, himself a father of confederation, give that as a good reason. But, Sir, I contend that the constitution of the Senate of Canada is a unique constitution; I contend that there is not a second chamber, an upper chamber in any Parliament of the world which has the constitution of the Canadian Senate. What is the constitution of the House of Lords? It is in the power of the Crown to appoint an unlimited number of Peers to the House of Lords. In 1830 the number of names on the roll was 401. It was 457 in 1840; 448 in 1850; 458 in 1860; 503 in 1877; 575 in 1896. The constitution of the Senate in France provides that senators are appointed for nine years, one-third being replaced every three years. Look at the constitution of the Senate of the United States, and you will find that the Senate of that country is composed of members chosen by the State Legislatures for a period of six years. Under the constitution of Belgium the Senate consists of members elected for eight years, partly directly and partly indirectly. I was surprised to hear to-night statistics given by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). The hon. gentleman said that there were as many Bills thrown out by the Senate under Conservative regime as under Liberal regime. I was surprised at that statement, because when I look into the volume written by Sir John Bourinot on Parliament procedure, I find that from 1874 to 1896 five Bills were thrown out by the Senate: in 1875, Bills respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, and County Court judges; in 1877, a Bill respecting the auditing of public accounts; in 1878, a Bill creating the office of Attorney-General; in 1879, a Bill respecting two additional judges in British Columbia. In 1878 a Bill amending the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874 was sent up and was returned. I find that from 1877 to 1896 there was only one Bill delayed and that was sent down to the Commons. It was a Bill for the construction of a railway from Harvey to Salisbury or Moncton in New Brunswick. From 1878 to 1896 five Bills were thrown out and these were thrown out in the four years of the administration of the late Alexander Mackenzie. These are the statistics that I have found in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure. I find that by rule 99 of this House it is provided that in the case of conflict between this House and the Senate there may be a conference of members chosen by each chamber, but though it is provided, that such a conference can be held, there is no provision if the members composing this conference cannot agree. In every country where such conferences form part of the rules of the House, it is agreed that those who have the majority carry the Bill, if the Bill is presented.

Much has been said about the plebiscite. I cannot do otherwise than congratulate the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) on the able speech which he has delivered on this question. Some prohibitionists ask this Parliament to pass a prohibitory law when 23 per cent of the population has declared itself in favour of such a law. They say that they have secured a majority and that in a constitutional country it is the majority which rules. It is well to state at the outset that this popular consultation, as well as other consultations held on other subjects, do not form part of our constitution. There is a great difference between the result of a vote on a consultation of this nature and the result of a vote for the election of a member of Parliament. The constitution provides that for parliamentary elections it is the majority of voters voting which decides the fate of the candidate, and that, whether a candidate secures one per cent, or eighty per cent, it is he who secures the majority that is elected. The referendum is no part of our constitution and it is therefore proper to turn our eyes towards those countries where the referendum is part of the constitution, and, being guided by the experience furnished by these countries, we can see that the majority of the electorate is required to take action upon a referendum. The country where the referendum is particularly practised is Switzerland, and, when we refer to the statistics, we find that from 1874 to 1892 there have been 21 popular consultations, and we also find that an average of 62 per cent of the qualified voters voted. Formerly the constitution of Switzerland provided that the majority of the electors voting and the majority of the cantons decided the fate of a law submitted to the popular vote, but in 1890 an amendment to the constitution was passed by which it was enacted that the vote of the communes should be compulsory, because it was found that the majority of the voters did not always represent the real majority of the population. And yet if there was a country where the referendum could be relied upon as the expression of the popular will, that country was surely Switzerland, where education is so spread, territory so limited, population so dense, public spirit so developed, where for centuries the people have been trained to the exercise of liberty, the good sense of whose population is so well known, and whose interests are so common. The prohibitionists want us to introduce a law which will not only bring a revolution in the fiscal system of the country, but which will affect the very root of social organization. It has been well said that the best laws are those which are best adapted to the sentiments and inclinations and genius of those for whom these laws are made. In a question of this nature we must consult our past, our origin, the examples, which are given us and the characteristics of our people. As a thinker has said, when we wish to legislate upon a question affecting our social organism we must take into consideration the various elements which govern men, climate, religion, experience of past events, habits and manners from which are formed the resulting general spirit, and I ask every member of this House, are we to-day in a position to legislate with impunity on a question of this nature? It is true, as the Prime Minister declared in England, that we are a nation, but we have not been long born to the life of a nation, and I contend that we have not to attempt to venture the necessary experience. The different parts of the country are being brought closer and closer together by the bonds of friendship and by the ties of fraternity. Sir, I do not think that we are yet a completely homogeneous people. We are asked to make a trial, which England with its secular experience has not attempted and is not prepared to attempt, an experiment which France has not tried, which the United States have not ventured upon, and which no country holding traditions of science and experience has adopted. We are asked to make this experiment at the request of 23 per cent of the population. Taking into account the small vote in favour of prohibition I ask any member of this House if he thinks that this law could be put into operation? To put the question is to answer it.

Much has been said regarding the International conference, and it has been claimed that this conference has ended in a fiasco. For my part, I admit that our commissioners on some points were placed at a disadvantage. The question of the Atlantic fisheries and the questions relating to the Behring Sea, whereby our plenipotentiaries at Paris have caused to be proclaimed the great principle of the freedom of the seas, have given rise to the statement, and not without reason, that we were left with the principle, while the Americans retained the seals. Whatever may be the outcome of these negotiations, I think it is the duty of every public man to wait until a treaty has been completed or its idea abandoned. For my part, I none the less persist in the belief that arbitration is the wisest and most rational means of settling our difficulties with our neighbours. Sir, as nations progress, as civilization is developed, arbitration becomes the most powerful safeguard of peace and freedom. It is in this century that the principle of arbitration has received its most practical application, and, in spite of the gloomy days which here and there sadden the end of the century, my feeling is none the less strong, that it is not force, but justice and humanity which will in the end rule the world. I believe that in no way can we better manifest our patriotism than by aiding in this great work of peace between the people of the United States, Canada and England. This idea of uniting the populations of the different parts of the Empire, as well as the population of the United States, has haunted thoughts of many, but to give substance to this idea and to cause these sentiments to penetrate the imagination, and in the masses, it was necessary to strike the imagination of the masses, and to do this there could be no more favourable opportunity than the royal festivities of the golden Jubilee, which were the public and solemn ratification of this great work of national organization. Often of late years, faithful and friendly hands have been stretched towards one another across the sea, but these isolated examples were but the presages and preliminaries which now appear of themselves as if by gradual ascension, to end in this great official act of national solidarity. But we will be asked: What will be the attitude of those who differ from the majority by blood and by language? I am sure I do not err when I say that our province of Quebec has none but good wishes for the intentions of British statesmen. Our people are profoundly attached to its institutions, to its laws, to its language, but after all our population is not a population of dreamers. It understands its position and appreciates our constitutional system. For over half a century our province has lived in peace and security, and it understands the inestimable value of these privileges. Our population tells itself with reason—with the good sense which characterizes it—that after all, liberty is the best of all gifts and the greatest of all boons which a nation can enjoy.

Reference has again been made to the school question, but nothing new has been said. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has alluded to it in this House, and the hon. member for Beauhar- nois (Mr. Bergeron) has spoken of the school question in every county in which he addressed the electors. But, Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite, have of late years considered themselves providential on this question, but the illusion is now gone. If they are prepared to submit a new plan for the definite solution of that question, well and good, but let us see it. Let us see their brow illumined by new light, and we will cheerfully ascend with them into the light but let them abandon the sterile paths of criticism and ill-will.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). You will go back on your pledges all the same.

Mr. CARROLL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) knows something of going back on his pledges, because the hon. gentleman once in the city of Quebec declared, that if there was no bridge there would be no vote. There was no bridge and he voted just the same.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I took occasion last session to contradict that statement, and I now contradict it most emphatically. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. CARROLL. I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) of course, but it is too bad his organ reported him as having used these words.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Never.

Mr. CARROLL. Well, I am not bound to accept the statement that the organ did not report him as having used these words.

Mr. CARROLL.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I defy the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carroll) to find one of the organs of the Conservative party at that time, which reported that I used that language.

Mr. CARROLL. The "Chronicle" of Quebec, did the next morning.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

Mr. CARROLL. Well, even if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) did use these words he spoke truly, because there was on the school question no bridge, and his party got no votes, Sir, and, on other delicate questions, let it be said to the honour of this Parliament, that at every critical phase of our history our Parliament has understood its role. When under various circumstances difficulties have arisen, the superior voice of reason has always been heard within these walls, and our public men have not measured "their works by the length of their short lives, but have rather attached themselves to these ideas which last, and which are masters of time." Sir, this question has been practically settled, and it has been settled by the hon. leader of the Government.

In 1871, after the Franco-Prussian war anarchy reigned supreme in the streets of the French capital. After the sorrows of defeat, almost before the enemy had left the soil, civil war was unchained. A man of strong will and unconquerable patriotism had been entrusted with the painful duty of signing the Treaty of Peace, and after having brought about peace between Germany and France, he was entrusted with the no less difficult task of pacifying his countrymen. One day, making his appearance in the Chamber of Deputies, he was acclaimed as the liberator of the French people, and Gambetta said, pointing to Thiers: There is the liberator of the territory. Our country has indeed never known such a crisis as this. We have, it is true, lived in relative happiness, but a few years ago if civil war was not at our doors, hearts were swelling, hatred was making its way in our midst, the spectre of intolerance was unfolding its sinister wings, even within the walls of this Parliament. To-day, Sir, we enjoy the blessings of peace and contentment and if hon. gentlemen opposite will not join us in this expression at least we Liberals can say with truth and with justice of our leader: The liberator of the territory is there.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it would seem as though, of late, the French language had been done away with in this House. There are several hon. members opposite who could address the House in our beautiful French tongue much more creditably than I can, and yet they are always heard speaking English. I cannot help remarking, in this connection, that such a course is a crying injustice towards the people of the province of Quebec. I quite understand that the party leaders in this House should use the language of the majority. Still, Sir, allow me to say that I do not think it would be neither a breach of etiquette towards the French Canadian members of this House, nor a lack of delicacy towards the English-speaking members, for an hon. gentleman to use the French language when addressing the House. This objection, which holds good in the case of the party leaders in this House, does not apply any longer in the case of a member who represents a constituency like Gaspé, where there is an overwhelming majority of French population. I felt a genuine surprise, the other day, when I heard the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) who—let me pay him this compliment—could speak so eloquently in French, I was amazed, I say, when I heard him addressing the House in English. I make bold to tell him, in the name of his constituents of Gaspé, that he certainly does not deserve any credit for his English lecture. We ought to make it our duty here to speak French oftener than we do, and that on several grounds. It is a debt of gratitude we first owe the people of the province of Quebec, then, those who have secured us that right, and lastly, the electors who did us the honour of sending us to Parliament as their representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one hears nothing else talked of, but the prosperity of the country. I am glad to see by the Blue-books that prosperity prevails everywhere. I am happy to be able to join with the hon. members who have taken the floor before me to state that our imports and exports are on the increase; that a larger stream of immigration has set in, and that those settlers will help us to develop our agricultural resources and the latent resources and wealth of the country. I am glad also to state that our trade is developing and that our intercourse with foreign countries is on the increase; but I cannot help calling the attention of the House to the difference which exists between the course pursued by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and that of the hon. gentlemen opposite, prior to 1896. During the electoral contest, the hon. gentlemen opposite were heard to say on all the hustings that the country was on the verge of bankruptcy. And yet, once the contest was over and the hon. gentlemen had reached power, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went over to England and succeeded in floating a loan at 2½ per cent. That is the best evidence that when the Conservative party went out of power, the credit of the country was good on the foreign markets, and therefore it follows that the hon. gentlemen opposite were wittingly deceiving the electorate when stating that the country was on the verge of bankruptcy, that blue ruin was staring us in the face. On the other hand, Sir, what do we see? Here is our old chieftain, Sir Charles Tupper, with his indomitable energy, travelling all over Canada and crossing the Atlantic, and everywhere extolling to the skies the wealth of the country, and telling people what a bright future is in store for us. Quite different was the anti-national course adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and, if people had placed any reliance in their statements and in their organs, they would have had a very poor idea of the future of the country. But, fortunately, we have a leader who sets a great example to us. Have we not seen him everywhere praising up Canada, extolling her wealth, the fertility of her soil, pointing out to the world the prosperous state of our commerce and the ever-increasing volume of our exports and imports, and calling the attention of immigrants to the fact that here, in this land of ours, all those who are willing to work, if they do not find wealth, may, at least, enjoy a sufficient and decent competency, in which consists the happiness of individuals and of peoples.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been asked to whom we are indebted for this prosperity? One need not make any superhuman efforts nor look very far ahead, before finding out the cause of the prosperity which this country is blessed with. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, by dint of repeating the statement over and over again, have finally come to fancy that they had brought about the prevailing prosperity. As I said a little while ago, when the hon. gentlemen assumed the reins of power in 1896, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was enabled to go to England and float a loan, bearing interest at 2½ per cent, a transaction by which the country benefited to that extent, thus showing that the prosperity and the credit of the country were very great at that time. And now, lo and behold! These hon. gentlemen come and tell us on the floor of the House that theirs is the credit for the present prosperity which is owing, they say, to their fiscal policy. To whom, Sir, I ask, belongs the credit? If the country is prosperous, it is owing to the fact that they carried out the National Policy framed by the Conservative party, which was a plank of the platform of the late Administration. But this prosperity is chiefly owing to the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite failed to carry out the electoral platform which they had advocated and propounded to the electorate. What they advocated, then, was free trade with the United States, with a view, they stated, to bettering the lot of the farming community and of our manufacturers. Such was their avowed policy. They were well aware of the fact that free trade was not a suitable policy to Canada. It may suit a country like Great Britain, with her great and fully equipped industries; it may suit Turkey, with all her natural wealth, but it is not the right and proper policy for a country like ours. The hon. gentlemen were heard in every part of the country preaching the gospel of free trade and telling the people that Canada would enjoy a greater degree of prosperity under a free trade policy than under the National Policy. But, Sir, I shall refrain from going into all the policies framed by the hon. gentlemen opposite and advocated by them before the electorate. Let me only add this, that, in order to further develop the prosperity of the country, they must needs carry out the National Policy, which was in force under the Conservative régime.

I now wish to call attention to the conference held by the Prime Minister with the United States, first at Quebec and, later on, at Washington. I cannot say what has taken place at that conference, as the proceedings were kept secret; still, from what has transpired, we may gather that very little has been achieved. However, I hesitate not to say that, in my humble opinion, reciprocity with the United States would, perhaps, not turn out to the advantage of Canada. Moreover, one must also take into consideration the views of the American people. I remember reading that, under the administration of Sir George E. Cartier a reciprocity treaty was debated in the House. Let us hear what that statesman then thought of the American people, and I am of opinion that they have not changed very much since that time. On the 16th of March, 1870, he said :

The House has empowered us to admit, duty free, by Order in Council, the goods which did not pay any customs duty under the reciprocity treaty, as soon as the Americans were willing to do the same. Our whole legislation has been framed with that object in view, and we have in that way forestalled the Americans. Individually, the Americans prove good neighbours, but as a nation, there are no people in the world less prone to liberality towards other people, with the exception of the Chinese.

And, a little further down, he adds :

In the eyes of the Americans, the bonding system is most advantageous; but, liberality is all on our side.

I believe that if we wish to have a reciprocity treaty with the Americans, liberality will have to be on our side only. And here again, I repeat it, the policy which we must still adhere to is the National Policy, which has made Canada prosperous as it is to-day. We are not yet able to keep up competition with our powerful neighbours; but, as the hon. gentlemen opposite admire so much the American people, I would offer them a suggestion: Let them follow their example by raising a tariff wall against the other countries as the Americans have done.

It appears from the Speech from the Throne, that the Government propose to reform the Senate. It is only on very serious and weighty grounds that a constitution like ours should be disturbed; and the question is: What are those important and weighty motives that have impelled the Government to propose the disturbance of our constitution. The plan suggested by the Government is not without its drawbacks. The "Electeur," one of the organs of the Liberal party, stated in one of its latest issues, that the majority in this House was 54, while the majority in the Senate was 38. Now, the combined majority of both Chambers would be 16; but, supposing that the majority in this House were 20, whilst that in the Senate were 38, we would then be at the mercy of a Senate with a majority of 18, and the House of Commons would have completely lost its independence. And yet, the Government, under the proposed plan of reform, pretend to aim at securing a larger sum of independence and freedom for those who are directly elected by the people. I am of opinion that the Government will miss the mark should they carry out their scheme. Moreover, the so-called remedy they wish to apply will eventually prove worse than the evil they pretend to cure. Why do the hon. gentlemen wish to reform the Senate? They want to operate that reform, because the Senate refused to pass the Drummond Railway Bill and the Yukon Railway Bill, and above all, because they refused to vote the $300,000 grant in favour of Mr. Greenway's schools, which had been asked by the Government of the day. If the Prime Minister and the Cabinet wish to go and urge those reasons before the Imperial Government, we are not afraid of the issue, and we will await it without fear, provided that while enforcing their reasons they do put them in the proper light. Let them make a clean breast of it and give the true motives which prompt them to disturb the constitution of our Senate. Why should they be called upon to reform the Upper Chamber? It is a well known fact to-day in connection with the throwing out of the Drummond Bill by the Senate, that this action of the Upper Chamber has resulted in keeping several thousand dollars in the public coffers. It is a well-known fact that the Senate did protect our national domain when securing to the country the 3,750,000 acres of land which the Government had not hesitated to give to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. We are not afraid to go before the Imperial Government and to state those reasons which are further evidence of the necessity of the Senate.

There is still another reason why the hon. gentlemen want to carry out that reform. The Senate has refused to adopt a Bill to grant a certain sum of money to Mr. Greenway. I may say that the Senate, when they threw out that Bill did render a most important service to the Catholic minority in Manitoba, because those $300,000 were exclusively given to Mr. Greenway in aid to the public schools, and the Manitoba minority would have been denied any share in that grant, ratably to their number. Let me tell the hon. gentlemen that should an appeal be made to the electorate, and should the people be invited to give their verdict on that reform, I believe that the Canadian electorate will duly show their appreciation of the wisdom of the Senate and of the important services rendered by that body to the country at large. The people will understand that the Senate has proved itself the safeguard of the public treasury; they will realize that the Senate is composed of wise men, perfectly conversant with the laws of the country, able to tender good and sound advice and to take the steps best calculated to promote the welfare of the country.

I now approach another subject, which has been dealt with by nearly all the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, and I also deem it my duty to offer a few remarks in the same connection. I refer to that great question of the plebiscite, which is now engrossing public attention. As the hon. gentlemen know, a civil war broke out among the members of the Government when this question had to be tackled, and the Cabinet was split into two different camps, for and against this measure. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) whether it is fair to vote here for a measure which he says should not be enforced in this country? Is it fair, I ask, to spend $250,000 of the people's money to take a vote upon a measure he looks upon as a Utopia which cannot be enforced? I believe that it is unfair for the Government to ask for a measure which they believe impracticable. Should such a principle be carried out in private life, it would lead to most serious consequences, and I do not think it proper to apply, in the conduct of public business, principles which are not applicable to private life. It is a well-known fact that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue went to Cap Santé and canvassed against a measure in favour of which he had voted in this House. In so doing, the hon. Minister has proved himself recreant to his duty and to the most elementary principles of public life. It is also well known that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) went into the county of Quebec and took the stump against a measure which he had endorsed here.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). (Translation.) It was to Quebec Centre that I went. In the county of Quebec, that was altogether unnecessary.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. Solicitor General did not act more consistently with himself in Quebec Centre than he did in Quebec County. Now, Sir, I suppose that the Government are aware that the Prohibitionists have obtained a majority. I think the Government are right in not introducing a Prohibition Bill, and that on several grounds, which have been successfully dealt with by hon. gentlemen opposite. For my part, I endorse most of their arguments, if not all of them.

I also deem it my duty, Sir, to approach another question, although I am well aware that the hon. gentlemen opposite would rather have me pass over in silence. I refer to the Manitoba school question, and if I avail myself of this opportunity to deal with it, it is because I wish to bring to the attention of the House the following words, uttered by the Prime Minister in that connection:—

We dealt with that question. We removed it from the federal arena to the provincial arena, where it belongs and where it should have been left, there to be dealt with by the citizens of the province in a spirit of mutually honourable concessions. I will not show here the character of the hon. gentleman's blunder in this case. It is there before his eyes. He sees it night and day, and he regrets it night and day.

Such utterances, Sir, are really astonishing, when one remembers the course pursued by the Prime Minister, and the pledges given by him to the electorate of the province of Quebec. But before going any further, let me, at the outset, state that the school question is not settled, and let me also show the House how the provincial Government have settled this question. In order the better to elucidate the matter, let me first quote the statement made on the 13th February by Mr. Greenway, at Winnipeg, in connection with this same question, for the settlement of which the Prime Minister is claiming credit. Here is what he says about the progress of the matter since 1890. Let us see what kind of concessions have been made. Mr. Greenway says:

There are now people who have undertaken to discredit the position taken by the Government in connection with the public schools. Those people have not hesitated to state that the Government had flinched and receded from the position first taken by them. Let me tell those people that they could not possibly labour under a more egregious mistake. It is impossible for the Government to have officers go on guard at the door of each schoolhouse, but what the Government can do and will do, is to confiscate the legislative grant, should the regulations respecting the conduct of those schools be violated. The Government are still adhering to the very same position which they have always adhered to since the passage of the Public School's Act. Their object is to make the people of this province one people by education and one people by the concurrence which they must give to the development of the country, and the Government will not tolerate any interference contrary to the carrying out of that plank of their platform.

Such was the statement made by Mr. Greenway with regard to the concessions which have been made since 1890.

The statement of the Prime Minister sounds strange to our ears, nay, more, it is painful to the electors of the province of Quebec in particular and to those who sympathize with the Manitoba minority. I could use much harsher words than those I have used, but I think the Prime Minister fully realizes now the blunder he has made, and he must feel the pangs of remorse. From the statement made by Mr. Greenway, we may gather what kind of concessions have been obtained, what progress has been made in the settlement of this question. Surely, the Manitoba minority ought to be satisfied now with that arrangement and they ought to feel grateful to the Prime Minister. Those who were asking full justice, ought to be satisfied with the legislative grant given by the Manitoba Government, and they ought, forsooth, to be grateful to the Prime Minister, because, to borrow his own words before the electors prior to the elections of 1896, the Manitoba Catholics now have not only half a loaf, but a whole loaf of bread. It was, therefore, with good reason that the hon. gentlemen opposite boasted of the concessions made by the Manitoba Government, and it was on good grounds that they assured the Quebec electorate that the question had been removed from the political arena and that the Catholic minority enjoyed more privileges than they did, prior to 1890. What a mockery! The question is not settled. We know that justice has not been meted out to the Manitoba Catholics and that they are still denied their most sacred rights. Their schools are nothing else but public and Godless schools. Catholic parents cannot send their children to those schools, and have to tax themselves or else have public collections taken up in churches, in order to have their children properly educated in schools of their own where their children may be taught according to the tenets of the church.

The hon. gentlemen opposite boast of professing a veritable cult for provincial autonomy. It is all very well, but when the Dominion Government have a duty to perform, they ought to attend to that duty and have those rights respected. We are quite willing to respect provincial autonomy, but when we see the Manitoba Government abusing their power, it is our duty to insist that the pledges given to the electorate should be carried out.

The sunny ways, the conciliatory means resorted to by the hon. Prime Minister have undoubtedly failed, and have not fulfilled their purpose. Now, let the hon. Prime Minister come forward and introduce a constitutional measure, a remedial Bill, and thus redeem his promise to the Quebec electorate. Let him say: "The Catholic minority are still denied their rights by the Manitoba Government; we have all equal rights in this country; we are all equal before the constitution and, we have here the authority which has been conferred upon us by the highest tribunal in the Empire; let us then take action." Thus would the hon. Prime Minister show that he can hold with a firm hand the reins of power. Thus would he show the subaltern Government that there is here, a superior power, and that the Government know how to safeguard their dignity and have their rights respected. Then could he say with good reason that he is protecting the weak from the mighty and that he has restored their sacred rights to a people who had long been denied the same. Then could he turn towards the province of Quebec and tell her people: "I have pledged my word that I would mete out full justice, and, full justice has been meted out." And thus would we side with him on this question, as on many other issues, and on the tariff issue in particular, one which he has stolen from us.

Last session, I rose in my seat and inquired how many members had pledged themselves not to vote in favour of a Remedial Bill. Four of them got up, and among the lot was the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris). With the exception of those four members, all the others had pledged themselves to vote in favour of a Remedial Bill. Now, I ask, what prevents them from implementing their promise to the electorate? Let them stand up and propose a remedial Bill. I see here the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) who will vote with you. I see also the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) who will vote with you.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) I would have to do myself violence, to do that.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The leader of the Opposition told us, at the beginning of the session, that he was ready to cooperate with the Prime Minister; therefore, the latter has nothing to fear. You may rely upon a majority; you may banish all fear from your minds; you have friends on this side of the House who are ready to vote in favour of a remedial Bill. What, then, prevents you from taking action? Redeem your promises and all your pledges. The only trouble is that you lack the necessary courage to do it.

As we all know, the school question is not yet settled; and, from the statement made by the Prime Minister during this session, it is safe to infer that he is not willing to render justice to the Manitoba minority. The hon. gentlemen have given pledges which they refuse to implement. Nothing prevents them from implementing them now. Were they ready to do so, harmony and concord would prevail everywhere; we would no longer see a portion of our people deprived of their most sacred rights. Peace and harmony would prevail, and nothing would block the way to the rapid development of the country. If that question were settled once for all according to right and justice, our fellow-countrymen would no longer have to beg and the people would be grateful to the Prime Minister for having redeemed his pledges.

The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) told us that the Prime Minister would be called to a very strict account for the course pursued by him in that connection. There is no doubt, Sir, that he will be called to a strict account on that head, but I would rather have him settle the question, so as to restore peace and harmony to the country. It will be recorded in history that the right hon. gentleman declined to settle that question, because he did not want to risk his position as Prime Minister, and because he preferred honours to the glory of meting out justice to his compatriots in Manitoba. Let us hope that not a single member of this House, not a single man in this country, will oppose such a measure. Let us hope that justice will be meted out, and that finally, peace and harmony will prevail in Canada, in the general interest of the country.

Mr. MONET (Napierville) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I now move the motion of which I gave notice :

That when this House adjourns on Thursday next, it stand adjourned until Tuesday the 4th day of April next.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRY—AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman who leads the House when we may expect the report of the Auditor General to be laid upon the Table. It is well known to hon. members that it is extremely important that at the earliest possible moment, the House should be in possession of that report.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give much information upon this subject to the House. All I can say is that the report is in the hands of the printer, so far as it has been completed, but I understand that the report itself has not all been issued to the printer by the Auditor General.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell, of East Prince, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. D. MONET (Laprairie and Napierville). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I participate in the debates of the House, since the advent to power of the Liberal party. Although I am quite an enthusiastic admirer—with the exception of a few details—of the Liberal Cabinet, such as constituted, I thought that before overwhelming my friends with compliments, it was better to wait till they had earned them. The hon. gentlemen opposite did not act with so much caution in their attacks, and if we may judge from their crossness and peevishness in their arraignment of the Government, it may be inferred that they were under the impression that the Government of Canada was their property and that they had a perpetual lease of power. Hence their belief that the Canadian electorate, in hurling them down from power, on the 23rd of June, 1896, made themselves guilty of a crying wrong. Hardly had the Government sat down on the Treasury benches when they accused us of having reached power under false pretenses, by giving pledges which we knew well we could not implement. Hardly had we assumed the management of public affairs and begun to modify certain items of the protective tariff, when the very men who had framed that outrageous fiscal policy, arraigned us for not having cut it down more. When at the end of the first year of their administration, the Government had to face a deficit, the hon. gentlemen opposite declared that we would not do any better than they had done, and now that we have a surplus, they say that we do not understand a word of political economy ; that it is preposterous for a Government to have a surplus and that their first duty is to spend every year the revenue collected by them.

When we were in the cold shades of opposition, the Conservative party, of course, used to carry all the by-elections, and as a rejoinder to the attacks levelled by us at their management of public affairs, they were wont to say that we were too exacting and that we expected too much from their administration. The voice of the people would they say, is the voice of God, and when Heaven smiles on us, why do you require anything more? But of late, the tables have been turned, and we now carry all the by-elections: Bagot, a Conservative stronghold, has fallen into our power; in Lévis our candidate was returned by acclamation, and they can no longer find a candidate to run and stand till polling day in that constituency which, not so long ago, was Conservative. But, the voice of the people is no longer the voice of God, and, if Heaven, they say, allows the Liberal party to carry the by-elections, those victories are only a forerunner of defeat, and should the general elections come on, we would be swept away from power.

But one of the most glaring instances of inconsistency on record on the part of our hon. opponents, was when, to my utter surprise, I heard the other day, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) taunting us for not having brought down, this session, a prohibition Bill. Why did not the hon. gentleman, when he was a member of the late Government, state on the floor of the House that although he was personally in favour of prohibition, he could not advocate such a Bill, on account of the loss of revenue it would entail? And during this session, the hon. gentleman was heard to declare that we were falsifying our promises, in failing to bring down a prohibition Bill, which he said he could not support, when he sat on the Treasury benches.

Another criticism which has vastly amused me, was when I heard some Conservative members from the province of Quebec and some Tories from the province of Ontario charge us with appealing to racial and creed prejudices, in order to carry the by-elections.

It does even appear that the Liberal party is no longer allowed to state the fact that their leader is a French Canadian! It would seem as though his very name was endowed with the magical power of a talisman, and that just as, in olden days, the mere presence of Du Guesclin was sufficient to put to flight the Black Prince and his troops, so, the mere mention of the name of the Prime Minister is enough to scatter the army of the Quebec Tories. So, it is well understood that henceforth it will no longer be lawful for us to declare that the right hon. gentleman is one of our fellow-countrymen.

Now, Sir, who are they who dare pass censure upon us, in this connection? They are the very same men who, for twenty years, kept stumping the province of Quebec, raising without any scruple those very racial cries, those very national and religious prejudices which they now accuse us of resorting to for party gains, and instead of discussing political issues, used to denounce, on every husting, the alliance of the French Canadian Liberals with the Ontario Grits and Freemasons! Let it be recorded, to the discredit of the Quebec electors, that the cry of Freemasonry has carried more elections than that of the National Policy ever did. These are the very gentlemen who now accuse us of raising the race and creed cry! Let us for a moment look up the records of the political campaign of 1896, of which we have preserved a pretty vivid recollection, and see what took place on all the hustings of the province of Quebec.

Our political opponents would begin by stating that there was but one issue under discussion, and that was the Manitoba school question. According to their views, we had no business to drag into debate the Curran Bridge scandal, the Caron deal, McGreevism, etc. We were forbidden by those gentlemen to discuss the management of public affairs under Conservative rule, or the live political issues. We were to confine ourselves to the politico-religious issue which alone, they said, ought to engross public attention, to the exclusion of all other issues. The province of Quebec, they said, had only to concern herself about what the leader of the Government of the day had done in favour of the Catholic minority in Manitoba. That is the way the political campaign was conducted through all the constituencies of the province. Now, what was the directing idea of that policy? When, prior to the opening of the campaign, the hon. leader of the Opposition did remodel his Cabinet in so far as the Quebec representation was concerned, why did he evince such a lack of confidence in those colleagues of his who had sat in this House during the preceding session, and why did he summon three Ministers who were known—and let this be said without any disparagement—as three “castors” of the deepest hue, to represent the province of Quebec in his Administration? Now, if they were so selected, it was not owing to their having given any marked evidence of their fighting powers in this House in upholding the Conservative cause, as one of them, at least, was hardly known in the arena of federal politics. Evidently, the hon. leader of the Opposition by this move, wished to appeal to race and creed prejudices and enlist in favour of his party the support which those clerical influences were likely to secure from a body of men upon the concurrence of whom they relied, to carry the province of Quebec.

As far as we are concerned, Sir, it is not necessary for us to appeal to race and creed prejudices, in order to maintain the present Government in power. As to the province of Quebec, we are not afraid whenever the Government may think it their duty to do so, to go before the electorate, because the pledges we have given them can favourably hold comparison with the meaasures carried out by us. What were the ante-election pledges taken by us? The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) has just stated that we were free-traders and that we had falsified our promises, because we had not yet introduced free trade as it is in England. I have sat for several years in this House, but never yet have I heard it stated by any of the leaders of the Liberal party that our policy was a free-trade policy. But, our policy has ever been to gradually progress towards free trade as it is in England, and all fair-minded men will grant that the goal we are striving to reach is not to do away with protection root and branches, but to cut down, as much as possible, the tariff rates, so as to have merely a revenue-producing tariff. The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) told us that we had broken our pledges. You had pledged yourselves before the electorate, he said, to revise the tariff so as to relieve the farming community from the burden of taxation. I know that in certain parts of the province of Quebec, and particularly in the county of Napierville-Laprarie, which I have the honour to represent here, and which is almost contiguous to the boundary line, we had long cherished the hope of having a reciprocity treaty with the United States, which would have enabled us to find access for our farming products to the American markets. True, we have been disappointed, but we are not so unreasonable as not to make allowance for the difficulties that confronted the Government. The only pledge we had given the electorate, was that, in case an offer of reciprocity were made to the Government, such as had been made to the late Administration, we would accept it, being well aware that our friends would not refuse what the Conservatives had declined to accept. Hence it follows that we are not open to condemnation at the hands of the people, even on that head. A paper which was brought down here, during the session of 1893, shows conclusively that if we failed to secure reciprocity with the United States, the whole blame for it is to be laid at the door of the Conservative party. From that paper, which emanated from Mr. Blane, the former Secretary of State for the United States, we gather that in 1892 the government of the United States had offered to the Canadian delegates a commercial reciprocity, such as the farming community would have. Those offers are embodied in the following paragraph, which reads :

The delegates were informed that the United States Government would not be ready to renew the treaty of 1854, nor to consent to a commercial reciprocity based on natural products alone ; and that, owing to the considerable development of the manufacturing industries in the United States and the changed conditions of the commercial relations between both countries since 1885, it was deemed essential to include many manufactured articles in the free favoured list in any reciprocity arrangement.

Mr. MONET.

So, we may gather from the above quoted paper that under the Conservative regime, the American Government were willing to give us access to their markets for all our farm products, provided that we should include in the schedule of free goods a certain number of manufactured articles. What was the reply of the Canadian Commissioners to that proposal ? Here it is :

At the conference held on the 11th the Canadian delegates stated that they had carefully considered the question of including in the free list manufactured articles, as well as the desire expressed by the United States Government to see articles manufactured in the United States exported to Canada given the preference over articles manufactured in other countries ; and they declared that it was with regret that they found it impossible for them to agree to the wish expressed by the United States Government.

We told the electors of the province of Quebec that we were ready to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States, but as our neighbours decline to negotiate with us, we are released from the pledge given to the electorate. The United States Government, at that time, had expressed the wish to enter into closer commercial relations with Canada, but the hon. gentlemen opposite declined to accept their offer, as shown by the paper which I have just brought to the attention of the House. Now, the circumstances are quite altered, and we cannot be blamed for not negotiating a reciprocity treaty, the negotiation of which depends, as much, to say the least, upon the consent of our neighbours as upon our own.

Although he did not arraign the Government with vigour, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) could not help confessing that the country was prosperous ; he even went to the length of admitting that the people were satisfied and that many vacant houses, as remarked by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) the other day were now occupied by their owners who had come back from the United States, and to cap the climax, those events were taking place under a Liberal Administration ! But I was quite amused by the explanation he gave us of these facts. He told us that the present Government could not claim any credit for the actual prosperity of the country, and why so, Sir ? Because, he said, under the Conservative rule, the then leader of the Opposition, who is now Prime Minister, kept disparaging the country and running down the Government then in power, and consequently, immigrants would not come and settle down in the country, because the credit of the country and public confidence in the resources of the Dominion as a field for immigration had been destroyed abroad by the speeches of the then leader of the Opposition.

Such an accusation, Sir, is one of the most serious charges that can be formulated against a party leader. When the right hon. Prime Minister was at the head of the Opposition, the present leader of the Opposition was our High Commissioner in Great Britain, where he represented our interests. Now, when the hon. member for Champlain states on the floor of this House that the present leader of the Opposition when filling in London the important mission entrusted to him, could not demolish, by the weight of his arguments and by the vigour of his eloquence, the denunciations of the then leader of the Opposition, he is paying a very poor compliment to his leader. If the reason put forward by the hon. member for Champlain to explain the difference existing between the prosperity now prevailing in the country and the depression of which the people were then complaining; if that reason, I say, ought to be held as well grounded, we cannot help inferring therefrom that the hon. leader of the Opposition cannot better serve his country than by sticking as long as possible to his present post. Let then the hon. gentleman remain in the cold shades of the Opposition, while we will continue at the head of public affairs, the leader of the House, who is so well fitted to discharge his onerous duties and to maintain the present state of prosperity with which Canada is blessed.

There is another pledge we gave the electors, that of administering the affairs of the country more honestly than our opponents had done. But can the hon. gentlemen arraign us on any good ground for having broken our pledge in this connection? It is quite true that, during the by-elections, these gentlemen have raised a cry against our so-called extravagance in the management of public affairs; but they have not yet dared to move a single vote of want of confidence on that score. This is the fourth session of the present Parliament and the hon. gentlemen have not yet mustered enough courage to propose a vote of want of confidence, inviting Parliament to declare that in their opinion, the Government have mismanaged the affairs of the country. There are two measures against which the Opposition have entered their protest, the Yukon Railway Bill and the Drummond Railway Bill. As the hon. gentlemen know, both bills were killed in the Senate. Therefore, the hon. gentlemen cannot ground themselves on those Bills to accuse the Government of having badly administered public affairs, at least, in considering them from the standpoint of real facts. Moreover, I think the best evidence that could be invoked in favour of the Government in this connection is to be found in the silence of our opponents on the floor of the House.

I now come to another pledge which we gave to the electors. We never said, as stated by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) that we would settle the school question, by passing a Remedial Bill; no, never did the leader of the Liberal party give such an absolute promise; never did he pledge himself to introduce a remedial bill in such a formal manner; he only undertook to resort to constitutional means, in case the Manitoba Government should not give the Catholic minority a more ample measure than that proposed by the Conservative Government. In order to substantiate his proposition, the hon. member for Champlain should have begun by showing that the settlement brought about by the Manitoba Government was less efficacious than that provided by the Remedial Bill; Now, in this connection, I think, it may easily be proved that the minority in Manitoba are satisfied, from the fact that there cannot be found in the votes and proceedings of this House, a single word, a single amendment, showing that, on the other side of the House, the hon. gentlemen are not satisfied with the settlement of this question. The hon. leader of the Opposition, during the debate on the Remedial Bill, said that he was ready to die and sacrifice himself on the altar of equal rights; now, if he thinks that justice has not been done, why, I ask, does he not stand up and arraign the Government for this settlement of the question? I see several Catholic members in their seats, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). So far, not one of these hon. gentlemen has stood up to arraign the Government for the settlement of the school question.

We are asked how the question has been settled? Some say that it is not yet settled; others ask us whether it has been settled permanently, as if, under a constitutional regime, a Government could not undo, next year, what has been done, last year; as if the Government who will succeed the Greenway Cabinet in Manitoba were not free to undo what has been done by their predecessors. And while they are everywhere crying out, in the by-elections, that the school question is not yet settled, the leaders of the Conservative party do not know where they stand on that issue. I have here before me the Order paper of this House, and I find that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) does not know where he stands on the matter, as he had to put to the Government this question:

Has there been any correspondence, since this House was last in session, between His Holiness the Pope or the Sacred College of the Propaganda or any of the Roman Catholic Archbishops or Bishops of Canada and the Government or any member thereof, in relation to the Manitoba School question.

Here is a question well calculated to edify those who believe in the profession of orthodoxy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It is to be presumed that this question was not put with a view to appealing to national and religious prejudices. I presume that the hon. gentlemen are sincere when they stand up in this House, composed of members of different religious denominations, and put such questions to the Government. But it must be borne in mind that it is fair fighting for our opponents to resort to such means, while it is never fair play for us to have recourse to similar proceedings.

I now come to deal with another reform referred to in the Speech from the Throne, in connection with the Senate. For my part, Sir, I would rather the Government had not announced this reform.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) I for one, Sir, am simply in favour of the abolition of the Senate, and if the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) had a moment of jubilation, when I stated that I did not feel enthusiastic over this Senate reform he may now repent at leisure, after hearing the opinion I have just expressed. I am in favour of the abolition of the Senate. Not only is the Senate useless, but it may, under certain circumstances, prove a cause of ruin to the country.

Let us take the Senate, such as it is constituted. Here is a body absolutely independent and absolutely irresponsible to the people. The second Chamber can block or kill legislation emanating from the popular Chamber. We, members of the House of Commons, when we do wrong, are responsible to the people. Without meaning to insinuate anything against the fair reputation of Parliament, I may be allowed to say that for most members, the fear of the electorate is the beginning of wisdom. Whatever it may do, the Senate is not responsible to the electorate for its action, when it throws out legislative measures. Therefore it is a perfectly irresponsible body. We are told that this second Chamber was created as a safeguard of the rights of the minority. Look up the records of the Senate from its very creation and you will not find a solitary example when it has interposed itself as the protector of minorities. Did it stand up as the protector of the minority in Nova Scotia, and tell the Government of the day: "We will cut off your subsidies, so long as you do not mete out justice to the minority"?

When New Brunswick, or rather a minority in that province, had good ground to complain, did the Senate stand up to protect that minority? When the same thing occurred in Manitoba, did the Senate rise in its might, to tell the Government of that province: "Do justice to the Catholic minority of your province, or we will sweep you from power, by refusing to vote the subsidy Bill"?

No, the Senate is not the safeguard of the rights of the minorities. But I am wrong, Sir, the Senate did once constitute itself the protector of a minority, and that minority is the one that sits opposite; that minority is the loyal Opposition of Her Majesty. Still, had they given fair-play to the Liberal party, when they were out of power and in the minority, I might grant that there are in the Senate some redeeming features, that offset its disadvantages. When bad measures are carried by the majority, the constitution provides a remedy to that evil, as the majority in the House of Commons; being responsible to the people, have to appeal to the same people for an approval of their action in Parliament. We may be swept from power, driven from public life, and be made to pay the penalty of our wrong-doing, but it is not so with the Upper Chamber. Another reason why the Senate should be abolished, is that that institution is out of touch with our system of Government, and that it may prove the cause of ruin and of countless evils for the country. The Senate has invariably and as it were prompted by instinct, opposed itself to every reform advocated by the country; a further reason why it should be done away with. Another argument invoked in favour of the maintenance of the Senate is that it is an old institution, the fruit of the wisdom of nations, there being an Upper Chamber in every country in the world. Now, Sir, there is not a single country in the world under parliamentary government like ours where is to be found a second Chamber similar to the Canadian Senate. The English House of Lords, a copy of which the framers of our Senate had no doubt in view, is not above the common law; as, in case of conflict, the Prime Minister is always free to ask Her Majesty to appoint a certain number of members to that body, thus overcoming the resistance and stubbornness of the Upper Chamber. The original, a copy of which the framers of our constitution meant to take, is not all reproduced in the Canadian Upper Chamber. In no other country of the world under representative institutions similar to ours is there a Senate framed on lines like those of our Senate, which is responsible only to its political friends who have granted it powers which will only lapse with its natural death.

As I said, I would rather the Government had not proposed the reform of the Senate, but simply its abolition. Before undertaking to support that measure introduced by the leader of the Government, it may be that I need be convinced that it was impossible for us to obtain more from the Imperial Government; as, otherwise, my constituents, who are men of much good sense, would be likely to pass censure upon me for not proceeding with that surgical operation having for its object to rid us of the Senate. In this connection, I recollect the case of that surgeon who having to amputate an arm, told his patient: "Cheer up, I will not do you any harm; I am going to cut your arm by bits and you will not feel it." Should we begin by clipping the Senate's wing, we would only be increasing its tortures, as we would have to abolish it later on. Our fathers fought for responsible Government, and we should do the same, so long as we have not secured government of the people, by the people, which is the only safeguard of a good administration of public affairs.

Mr. J. CLANCY (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne is always looked forward to with a great deal of interest by this House and by the people of the country as foreshadowing nearly all the important measures to be dealt with during the session. I am bound to say, Sir, that we have been met with one of the most extraordinary spectacles this session that has ever occurred in this House. We have a single measure foreshadowed, and it is one in defiance of the constitution, one for the sole and single purpose of gerrymandering the constituencies for the purpose of suiting the ends of hon. gentlemen opposite. If we are to judge from the Speech from the Throne I am sure we will readily come to the conclusion that our only duty now is to vote the supplies and vote for a measure to defeat the will of the people and go home. I venture to say, Sir, that before this session concludes there will be some evidence, at least, given that there is other and more important work to be done. Hon. gentlemen opposite have complained of what they call the harsh language that has been used from this side of the House, namely, that hon. gentlemen opposite have not fulfilled one single pledge which they made to the country before the election in 1896, that they have not contributed in any sense whatever to the great prosperity that now obtains in Canada, and that they have shown marked incapacity in dealing with the great public questions of the country. These statements may appear extravagant and somewhat startling in their character, but they are only startling in their character because they have the elements of truth in them as has been so conclusively shown in the most admirable and as yet unanswered speech made by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) an evening or two ago. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that many of the predictions made by the Conservative party have not been fulfilled, amongst these, the prediction that when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power they would only remain in power for a short time. We believed, as the country then believed, that hon. gentlemen would carry out their pledges, and we were quite sure that if their pledges were fulfilled there was not the slightest doubt that the prediction as to how long the hon. gentlemen would remain in power would have been verified. If we have failed in our predictions it is simply because hon. gentlemen have shown themselves to be altogether unreliable so far as their pledges are concerned. One of their great pledges, one which overshadowed everything else in that election, was the pledge to completely change the fiscal policy of Canada. That was one pledge that was made above all others, because the prosperity of this country must largely depend upon the fiscal policy of a Government of the day and upon it being faithfully carried out. That was the pledge above all others that the people expected to see fulfilled, and that is the pledge above all others which instead of being fulfilled has been entirely ignored. The truth is that it is becoming a very nice question with the Government of the day and with their followers as to whether pledges are made to be broken or to be carried out. Our experience of the past has shown that the making of pledges to be broken has become a cardinal principle with the Liberal party. The Conservative party had no long record of broken pledges; their policy has been consistent from start to finish and it is the same to-day as it was in 1878 when first enunciated in this House, and it is the policy that hon. gentlemen opposite declared the Conservative party would never carry out. Long experience, however, has shown that the Conservative party were prepared to carry out their policy and that they did carry it out, greatly to the chagrin of hon. gentlemen opposite, has been witnessed by the long lease of power granted to the Conservative party. The greatest pledge made by hon. gentlemen opposite was that they would wipe out what was called by the Finance Minister in his own province, a most vicious policy. But in what way do hon. gentlemen opposite try to shield themselves now? We are told that they never promised free trade, and that therefore they are substantially carrying out their pledges. The Conservative party has never demanded anything more than a substantial compliance with the pledges of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but there was no uncertain sound as to what the position of these hon. gentlemen was; there was no uncertainty as to what the people would expect of them when they came into power. We had the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) shedding bitter and salty tears for the people of this country; we were told that the people were in a state of ruin, that the National Policy was one so bad in its effects that it should not be tolerated for a single day. We have the declaration of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and also that of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries declared the fiscal policy of the previous Government was a thing accursed of God and man. I remember reading many speeches delivered by the right hon. First Minister declaring that the National Policy was a system of bondage in this country, and promising that the moment he came to power there would come commercial emancipation, and that the people would have received the benefit. The Minister of Trade and Commerce went further than the rest of them, and I am sure the House will see that that hon. gentleman was wonderfully distressed when he gave utterance in this House to such sentiments as I shall ask the indulgence of the House to read in a moment. They were of rather a startling kind; the hon. gentleman was driven to the last stage of desperation in his eagerness to rid the people of that vicious National Policy. This is what the hon. gentleman had to say in 1894, a very short time ago, although I hear it said among the rank and file of the followers of the hon. gentleman: You should not seek to hold the Liberal party responsible for the utterances of members of the Liberal party a few years ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious that we should forget the days when these utterances were given out, but they are so near the period in which we now live that they have a pertinent bearing upon the action of the hon. gentlemen in revising the tariff. This is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to say:

It is, as the hon. gentleman was good enough to remind us, exactly fifteen years, or within a few days, since the initiation of that scheme of fraud, misnamed the National Policy.

Protection and corruption are political Siamese twins. They never have been separated in this world, and I do not think they will in the next.

It would seem as if the Siamese Twins of that day still live and are as healthy as ever they were, so far as any change by hon. gentlemen opposite is concerned.

I announced it years ago. My policy, from first to last, ever since this infamous system was put on the statute-book, has been to do away with protection—how I did not care. If free trade would do it, I was for that. If continental free trade or reciprocity with the United States would do it, I was for that. If a revenue tariff would do it, I was for that. Always and at all times, from the time I was Finance Minister until the present hour, I have set my face like a flint against recognizing, in any shape or way, the tyranny of protection.

The country is now asking what has become of this oral volcano; what spell has come over the hon. gentleman that we hear no more about that?

An hon. MEMBER. That volcano is extinct.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, it is very extinct. These gentlemen opposite who now sit there without uttering a word in defence of their conduct, for eighteen years, cried out through the country about the evils of the National Policy. Sir, the people of the country now want to know what they have done about it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have repeated in this House and outside of it that the present Government has substantially changed the tariff, that they have practically eliminated all the vicious parts that savoured of protection, and that now the people are satisfied with the new tariff. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) declared a few days ago that the tariff was no longer an issue between the two parties, and when he was brought to task by the Liberal club at Winnipeg, who held the sword over his head, he made the ingenious explanation as reported in one of the newspapers yesterday: Oh, the fiscal policy has been so settled that the Conservatives have come to the side of the Liberals and declared it to be a sound policy. What does the House and the country think of such an explanation from a Minister in a free trade Government? These gentlemen on the Treasury benches cannot escape through the back door of declaring that they never promised free trade, nor can they escape by trying to fool the people into a belief that they have attempted any reasonable fulfilment of their pledges. Sir, the statement of gentlemen opposite that the tariff has been so substantially changed as to constitute a reasonable performance of their pledges, is a statement utterly destitute of truth. Let us see what these gentlemen have done with the tariff? The total number of items in the old tariff as it stood under the Conservative Government was 486, and of this number the Liberals changed 144 and left 342 unchanged altogether. And, Sir, how did they deal with the 144 items they changed? Eighty of these items they reduced, causing a loss of revenue by such reduction (calculated on the importations of 1896) amounting to $680,000, not a very great reduction after all. On the other hand, they took sixty-one items and increased the tariff on these, adding by this increase $796,000 to the revenue. Now, forty-two out of these sixty-one items included goods manufactured in this country, and so the present Government added additional protection to that Conservative protection which they so loudly railed against. Is that a revision of the tariff by which the people of Canada have been relieved of the burdens of taxation?

These hon. gentlemen in opposition went further than that. They made war on specific duties, and they stated—and the statement has some foundation—that the truest system of protection is found in specific duties. It matters not what the first price of an article may be, when a specific duty is imposed it undoubtedly is the most far-reaching system of protection. In the old Conservative tariff there were 191 items having specific duties, and of these the Liberal Government left 109 items that it did not touch at all. They changed ten items so as to raise the specific duty on them higher than ever, and twenty other items they lowered. Fourteen items they struck out, but they substituted an ad valorem duty on them which was higher than the previous specific duty, and we had three items made free. In all, we find that in 139 items, the specific duty was entirely unchanged; only fifty-two items were dealt with at all; on fourteen of these the duty was raised, and only thirty-five items were made lower. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if that is a fair compliance with the promises they made to the people. I have no doubt that some gentlemen over there, although they may feel the necessity of responding to the party whip, and of the two evils they have to choose, prefer to stand by their leaders, yet I do not despair that some of these hon. gentlemen are not so far gone that they are entirely unconscious of the responsibility of bolstering up the most bald fallacy that has ever been foisted on the people of this country. One of the pledges given to the country by the Liberal party was that in addition to removing every feature of protection from the National Policy, they were going to take the duties off these articles that were prime necessities of life. I confess that is rather a plausible policy. I confess that if the people of this country believed in these promises at the time, and believed that such a policy could be carried out, it was a pledge which might draw to them the support of Conservative as well as Liberal voters. But let us see how the present Government carried out that policy. I will take twenty items which all will agree with me are prime necessities to the consumer, and instead of carrying out their pledges these hon. gentlemen opposite selected these articles of prime necessity for the purpose of increasing the duties rather than lowering the duties on them. Here they are: Rice, Portland cement, grindstones, hats and caps, cutlery, n.e.s., lumber, and timber, cotton bats, unbleached cotton (grey), printed cotton, clothing, including silk, cotton and wool, velvets and velveteens, cotton sewing thread, damask of linen, woollen manufactures, ready-made clothing, towel-ling, shawls of all kinds, and women's and children's dresses. Here are twenty items of the tariff, all prime necessities, on which these hon. gentlemen opposite raised the duty. The whole increase of taxation, as I have stated, imposed by these gentlemen (and not including cigars and tobacco, for that is left out of the calculation), amounted to $795,000, and upon these twenty items I have stated, imposed by these gentlemen nearly $600,000 was put on, or 80 per cent of the whole increase of taxation by the Government. Yet, this was done by the gentlemen opposite who declared that they were going to sweep away every feature that savoured of protection in the National Policy, and that they were going to make the prime necessities of life free of duty. They said that in distributing the taxation upon the taxpayers the articles of prime necessity should be favoured in the interest of the workingmen and the farmers of the country.

Now, it has been charged, and with startling truth, that hon. gentlemen opposite have shown a wonderful incapacity for dealing with the affairs of this country. I see the hon. member for West Quebec (Mr. Dobell) in his place. Without directing the question especially to him, I would like to ask him and hon. gentlemen generally on that side of the House, if there has been extraordinary capacity shown in dealing with that very important question, the fast Atlantic service. The hon. gentleman has favoured us with his presence in the House so little that none of us on this side of the House would be surprised if the hon. gentleman should be away on a trip to-morrow, and we should not have the pleasure of seeing much of one another this session. The hon. gentleman seems to have been living on the Atlantic Ocean. Whether he was doing most business when he saw nobody on this side of the Atlantic or on the other side, is a question of considerable doubt. But there is no doubt that this fast Atlantic business in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite has been a miserable fizzle. These hon. gentlemen came into office when everything was ready. The hon. leader of the Opposition went a distance that many of his friends thought undignified in the leader of a great party, in the interest of this great undertaking. He was willing to set aside all those forms of delicacy that exist between the leaders of rival parties, and went to the leader of the Government and implored him to carry out the contract that had already been arranged, and that only needed to be consummated by the signatures of the parties concerned. But, no; hon. gentlemen declared that under that contract too much money was to be paid. They claimed to be able to get the work done for very much less. Nobody found fault with that; but the hon. leader of the Opposition while declaring that he would applaud and assist everything that would result in a saving to this country, was able, with his clear foresight, to predict then and there that hon. gentlemen could not obtain a service for such a sum of money as they proposed, and that their whole effort would fail. I would like to know if that prediction has not been fully verified. I am sure that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are as anxious as hon. gentlemen opposite to save every dollar possible to the country; but they have foresight and statesmanship enough to know that we have first to get a good service, and then we have to pay the price at which a good service can be had. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have shown a great deal of forbearance. Without reflecting on the promoters, Messrs. Petersen & Tate, we were confident that they had not sufficient financial standing to make the undertaking a success, notwithstanding that the hon. member for Quebec West, who said he had a personal knowledge of those men, led the House to believe that they would be able to carry it out in a short time. The House has not forgotten the hon. gentleman's work; and what have we in prospect to-day? We have nothing more in sight in regard to the fast Atlantic service than we had when hon. gentlemen came into power, and refused to carry out a contract arranged by their predecessors in office. I would like to ask if this is an indication of great business capacity. I would like to know whether the charge of incapacity against this Government had not a good foundation in that case alone.

But there are other cases which indicate the same thing. Let me take the case of coal oil. I see my friend here slumbering peacefully when every interest in his constituency is being swept away. He rose yesterday when an hon. member happened to make the little mistake of saying that the oil wells were in the hands of that Yankee octopus which has fastened itself on the people of this country, and said in great indignation, "I deny that entirely; that is untrue." What has happened? Hon. gentlemen opposite took a course which many people anticipated some months before they came into office. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) won his election with a coal oil can in one hand and a pound of rice in the other. He declared that that was the salvation of the whole country. He calculated the percentages of the taxation paid on coal oil, showing them to be very great, and asserted that if his friends came into power the iniquitous duties on coal oil would be entirely wiped out. I would like the hon. gentleman to look back over his splendid work on coal oil and rice. The truth is that people are paying to-day a great deal more on both than they did at that time. We had the Standard Oil Company come into Canada at what time? During or shortly after the election.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) No, they were in before the election.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend reminds me that they were in before the election; and before a single item of the tariff was changed, giving the advantages which it now gives to the Standard Oil Company. What took place? The Standard Oil Company came to the town of Sarnia, and without a particle of security, they got large works built, large buildings put up, and spent enormous sums of money there—why? Simply because, as my hon. friend says, they were here before the election, and they knew well that however unfaithful hon. gentlemen opposite would be to their other pledges, they would probably deliver the goods in this case. I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend who represents East Lambton (Mr. Fraser) that there never was in this country a more deadly blow struck at the oil industry than has been struck by this Government. Did it show any great capacity on the part of the Government to lower the duty on coal oil one single cent? We find that the price of oil to-day is greater than it was before. As was pointed out by the late hon. member for West Lambton, at the time these tariff items were being passed, the Government were giving an enormous power to that great monopoly, which, with its great control of capital, and its business connections and enormous power in other ways, it could put coal oil at whatever price it pleased. Now, what has happened? The Standard Oil Company has come in and purchased nearly all the oil refineries in the town of Petrolia, so that the oil well of a private individual there to-day is not worth a farthing if that monopoly chooses to say so. The producers are entirely in the hands of the refiners in that town, and the oil interest in Canada has received such a blow that there is not a man connected with it as a crude oil producer who dare make a complaint for fear that this gigantic monopoly will not only silence him but destroy every interest he has. This is another mark of the great business capacity of hon. gentlemen opposite. If any one were to commit so great a breach of good manners and good taste as to hint that these hon. gentlemen have shown marked incapacity in that direction, he would be at once accused of speaking harshly and of slandering hon. gentlemen opposite.

But there are other cases illustrating this capacity of our present rulers. The franchise is a striking proof of it. We found hon. gentlemen opposite, when in opposition, declaiming against the disadvantage the Liberal party were under owing to the "infamous" Franchise Act. They declared the first thing the Liberal party would do would be to repeal that Act. I venture to say there was not a Liberal in this House, who had not taken leave of his senses, nor was there a Liberal outside who understood the case who ever for a moment thought but that if they repealed the Act they would give us a federal Franchise Act in place of it, whether making the franchise that was in use in the several provinces or not was entirely immaterial. If they had hinted to the country that they would do what they afterwards did, nobody would have listened to them. They kept crying out that the Liberals were deprived of their votes that young men were disfranchised, that the tyranny of revising officers satisfied justice, and that nothing but the repeal of the old Act would enable justice to be done. I wonder if their action in this matter is one of the things that hon. gentlemen pride themselves upon as great achievements. Why, we have a seat open in the city of Winnipeg, and the condition of things there proves that these hon. gentlemen had not the least conception of what the operation of their new Act would be. Of course, they had the power to repeal the old Act, for it only requires a majority to do that, but more than majority is needed, some business capacity is needed, to frame an Act to take the place of the one repealed. I am not here to defend the old Act beyond any other. Like every other law upon the Statute-book, it was open to some objection, and its defects could only be seen when it was put to the test of practical operation. But by repealing the Act and handing over the control of this matter to the provinces, hon. gentlemen opposite have placed themselves in a most humiliating position. We have to wait for the action of the provinces, and whatever the provinces may do, whether it be right or wrong, whatever may be the opinion held concerning their action by members of this House, we are absolutely in their hands. Whatever franchise they may make from day to day, we are compelled to accept, or else hon. gentlemen are compelled to recede from the position they took in adopting the provincial franchise. Why, people never supposed for a moment that hon. gentlemen had any intention of doing other than adopting the provincial franchises in part or in whole as they found them. The preparation of the lists did not necessarily involve the adoption of the provincial lists. But the majority in this House have entirely closed their eyes and adopted the franchise in the provinces. No more humiliating position could be taken, and no better example could be found of the utter incapacity of hon. gentlemen opposite to deal with the legislation of this country.

But we are told that a preferential tariff is a great achievement, and the farmers are going to be benefited specially. Well, we have the resolution that was moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) declaring something the very opposite of what the hon. gentleman contends for to-day. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) spoke on it, it was a resolution, not of preference, but of reciprocity with any country that would comply with the conditions of the resolution. Hon. gentlemen will not say that that is the case now, and if it is not, we see another evidence of their great business capacity, their foresight and their ability to grapple with the problems of government in this country. These hon. gentlemen have ended with something they did not want or something they did not know they were going to get. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said :

The Premier thoroughly understands it. The Premier took that stand which the Finance Minister took, which every member of the Cabinet took and holds to-day, that these treaties did not apply and did not bind Canada. The Premier took the stand which is now carried out in every custom-house in Canada, that these treaties do not bind Canada, and German and Belgian goods are not entitled to preferential treatment because of these treaties.

Now, the hon. gentleman is the legal mouth-piece of the Government to-day. He made a very elaborate speech proving successfully to his own mind, and, no doubt, to the minds of his followers, that in adopting that resolution the Government of the day saw clearly they were not interfering with the most-favoured nations treaties, that Germany and Belgium would not be entitled to any preferential, or rather, as the hon. gentleman put it, to any reciprocal treatment, and that it was open to any country in the world. The hon. gentleman went to England to argue the case before the law officers of the Crown. He had hardly time to take off his hat before he was told that he was talking nonsense, that his law was bad, that the opinion of his friends here had no force whatever. And then, he turned about and said : Our object is to give preferential trade to England and no other. And here we are with preferential trade. The people of this country have by no means forgotten these matters. These things are as clearly in their minds to-day as they were in the first place. Here is what the hon. Minister of Finance said :

I stated that the tariff I am about to read to you is the general tariff ; but that before I conclude I shall be prepared to make a statement in relation to a special tariff. That will apply to Great Britain and any other country which is prepared to accept the conditions which that tariff imposes.

Now, I would like to ask where hon. gentlemen opposite are now on that question. Ministers may turn their backs and sit silent in their seats in this House, but the people are looking for answers, looking for explanation of the conduct of the hon. gentlemen on this question as well as on others. I say we now have evidence beyond all doubt of the most striking incapacity of the Government in dealing with this question. They came as novices, and they have shown that whatever they have learned, they have learned at very considerable expense to the taxpayers of this country.

Well, Sir, hon. gentlemen have, after all, stumbled into something which, they say, will confer special benefits upon the people of this country. I think I can say something for the class to which I belong, namely, the farmers, as to the preferential tariff. The farmers are the largest number of persons who are concerned in the tariff, and as paying the most taxes, they are largely the most interested ; as a single class, they are probably the most important in this country. Now, I have taken the trouble, as other hon. gentlemen have done, to examine the last report of Trade and Navigation. We find there, under the heading "Reciprocal Tariff"—that is a very strange heading to put in—the operations of what they call the preferential tariff. Of course, we must not be too nice in making distinctions where hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned. Now, I want to point out, that I have taken a list of 34 of the principal items that are of absolute necessity for the farmers of this country, articles that are used by every farmer in Canada, but they are all items concerning which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have given the farmers scarcely any thought, when they were revising the tariff. When we point out that there will be no relief to the farmers in the arrangement of the tariff, hon. gentlemen opposite reply, that there will be a great relief to the farmers by the operation of the reciprocal tariff, as they call it. I am sure, every farmer will see how essential these articles are to the farming class of this country, but on all these articles the farmers receive scarcely any advantage from the revision of the tariff. I will mention cultivators, binders, hay-tedders, harrows, horse-rakes, manure-spreaders, mowing machines, ploughs, post-diggers, weeders, reapers, feed-cutters, farm wagons and carriages, buggies, cutters, windmills, fanning mills, threshers and separators, road scrapers, saws, pumps, grain-crushers, fertilizers, grindstones, seamless bags, household furniture, stoves of all kinds, sewing machines, woodenware, tubs, pails and churns, seed of all kinds used for field and garden purposes, wire fencing, harness and salt. These are thirty-four items in the tariff that received no reduction, and in which no change whatever was made. These are 34 items, as hon. gentlemen may see, most important to the whole farming community of Canada. Now, they received no relief under the revision of the tariff; but, as the hon. gentleman contends that they will receive relief under the reciprocal tariff, just let me give you the importations made under what is called the reciprocal tariff, and those under the general tariff, and we will see how much was saved on all those articles. The entire importations of these articles in 1898 amounted to $2,468,000; the amount imported under reciprocal tariff was $50,959. The whole saving on these $2,500,000 to the great farming community of this country amounted to the large sum of $1,323, or less than one-fifth of one cent each. Now, Sir, I would like to ask my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), who is always telling us about post-hole diggers, about lawn mowers and scythe snaths, what he thinks of these figures. The hon. gentleman plumes himself as a champion and defender of the Government on the ground that they have reduced the tariff on land rollers, forks, hoes, hay-knives, post-hole diggers, rakes, scythes and snaths, reaping hooks, spades and shovels, axes, wire nails and cut nails. Well, Sir, the whole importations under the general tariff, where that reduction was made, and on none of which there was a less duty than 25 per cent, amounted to $102,000. The whole amount under the reciprocal tariff upon these goods was the very large sum of $7,379. The whole duty saved to the farming community under that reduction was the grand sum of $294, or one-twentieth of one cent each. That is the sum and substance of the preferential tariff, as concerns a benefit to the farmers of this country. Sir, I do not want to use harsh language, but I say there never was a balder sham anywhere than the pretense of this kind—and I say, without hesitation, a dishonest pretense—that the great farming community of this country have profited one iota by the revision of this tariff that has been made. I mean in a general sense, or that they have profited in any substantial sense—I was going to say, one particle—by the reciprocal tariff. It is one that may affect some persons favourably, but it does not affect the great mass of the taxpayers who are most concerned. An hon. member near me says it was made to humbug the farmers. But the farmer is being humbugged in more ways than one. We find that the Postmaster General is engaged in that business, and I am told that he is on the eve of receiving a knighthood for his great services to this country. That hon. gentleman, in the recent campaign in Lambton, laid particular stress on his great achievements with regard to the postal system of this country. The hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) have sufficiently punctured the hon. gentleman's contention in all its details, and have shown that if he has been right in any respect, it was by accident, and not by design, or from having thought the question out in any sense. The hon. gentleman was setting the law at defiance; he shifted two or three times, and finally got down to Imperial penny postage, and to a two-cent domestic rate, instead of three. The reduction of the domestic rate from three to two cents is held out to us as a great boon, as if the hon. gentlemen opposite were putting so much money in the pockets of the people. I say, it is the refinement of folly for hon. gentlemen, for sensible men in this House, to declare that any service in this country that does not pay its way, but has to be assisted from other sources, is going to put money into the pockets of the people. I say, such a contention is perfectly idle, and is unworthy of full-grown men, either inside or outside of this House. The hon. gentleman's own friends have shown him, and even journals supporting the hon. gentleman have shown him, that, in consequence of adopting penny postage and a two-cent domestic rate, making, in other words, a reduction of one-third, there will be a great loss to the revenue, amounting to at least $800,000. What must follow that? Why, it must follow that 90 per cent of the people who do not profit by it, will pay for the other 10 per cent in the country who reap all the benefit from the reduction. I would like the farmers of this country to consider this matter; I would like to call it to the attention of the hon. member for South Huron, who has on some occasions posed as the champion of the class of which he is a very honourable representative. I would like to ask him what he thinks about this, and what he has to say to the farmers in his constituency as to the action of the Postmaster General in unloading this extra charge upon the general public.

I venture to say that a single house in the city of Toronto will use more postage stamps than all the farmers in one county of Huron, including the three constituencies, and I believe this comparison to be applicable to the whole of Canada, yet the Postmaster General comes back and will give us that same defence—always the same defence—because I fear that hon. gentlemen opposite are no longer their own masters. I say, Mr. Speaker.

that whatever may be the merits that belong particularly to the Postmaster General there is one that the great taxpayers of this country and one that the people not belonging to the favoured class in this case, will bear in mind, and bear in mind when the time comes. They will remember that this Government, so far as the great mass of the people is concerned, has been a Government for a few persons, for the Standard Oil Company, for the persons who propose, and very rightly as business men, to profit by the mistakes and blunders of the Postmaster General in imposing upon the people a tax that is wholly unwarranted. We will all welcome the day when the two sides of the ledger will balance so far as the postal service of the country is concerned, but no man of experience, no man who has given the slightest attention to the question can escape the conclusion that in a sparsely-settled country like Canada the postal service will not be able to make ends meet. If we were unable to do it in the past we will be unable to do it in the future for some years to come at least. Then and then only is any Government justified in adopting a system that at present enslaves one part of the taxpayers of the country and makes them pay for the benefit of another class. The Postmaster General in saying that he has reduced the postal deficit from $781,000 to $50,000 makes an unfair statement of the case, because, as the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) pointed out, it can be justified by no manner of bookkeeping. I shall leave that point where the hon. member for York left it, because he gave a complete answer to the statement of the Postmaster General. I would like his attention for a moment because it is a serious one. It is that the hon. gentleman adopted what I maintain was a cowardly position when he exercised the power of the Crown—a very extraordinary power that is reserved in the hands of Ministers—to cancel the contracts of men who had been living upon such beggarly sums, almost approaching starvation, as were paid them for the performance of postal service in this country. The Postmaster General said that, when he came into office, he found these contracts had been renewed year after year, and that therefore he considered it his duty to cancel and relet them. I know of a case where a man furnished a double team, travelled over 20 miles a day and received 85 cents a day. His contract was cancelled and was relet. You go and relet these contracts again; you will have men pitted against each other, not because they can perform the service better or cheaper, but for the simple reason that they conclude if someone has been performing them at a certain rate they can take them at just a little lower rate. The hon. Postmaster General prides himself upon making war upon this class of people as a whole. It is no excuse to contend that there are some cases calling for intervention. It is his duty to rectify these cases and no blame would attach to him, but when a man enters into a contract in perfectly good faith he should not be unjustly treated. The first duty of the Postmaster General should be to cut down some salaries nearer to his own elbow. I can tell him that he has achieved rather an unenviable reputation amongst a class of men performing services to the country who are underpaid rather than overpaid. I believe in saving every dollar that can be saved, but we must have efficiency in the service and this great country ought to be manly enough to pay fair compensation for services of this kind.

There is another way in which the Postmaster General has endeavoured to balance the ledger and it is by the issue and sale of Jubilee stamps. If I may use a vulgar expression, I would tell him that he will not have a snap of that kind every year. The people charged the hon. gentleman with issuing Jubilee stamps, nearly 70 per cent of which are utterly worthless to-day, because they have been repudiated. They may do as curiosities because the hon. gentleman has the reputation of being associated with the stamp fakirs of the country. He has issued all sorts of stamps to give those who are engaged in the laudable enterprise of collecting stamps a wide field, but there never was a more disgraceful act of repudiation than to lead the people, without the slightest warning, to believe that these stamps had value. Nearly 70 per cent of the whole issue are to-day of such denominations as I believe the people cannot use.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). No.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says no. I am going to ask the hon. gentleman what he is going to do with the $5 stamps? How many of these were issued. I am unable to say, but the hon. gentleman in answering a question put in this House said that $125,000 of these would be issued. I am not in possession of information to enable me to say whether they were issued or not, but that was the proportion to be issued. There were to be, of $4 stamps, $100,000 worth; $3 stamps, $75,000; $2 stamps, $50,000; $1 stamps, $25,000; and of 50 cent stamps, $500,000. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what he is going to do with these. Are these not absolutely and utterly worthless; has this not been the means of taking that much money out of the pockets of the people? Is it not the fact that so far as any value is retained in them that by the action of the Postmaster General they have become as worthless as anything could be worthless, and that not a single dollar could be realized upon them. What was present in the mind of the people who bought these Jubilee stamps? Besides these stamps being a sort of curiosity the people who bought them yielded to the splendid impulse suggested by the events of the Jubilee year.

They got these Jubilee stamps believing that they might, at a future time, exchange them for any others that they might use in their business not expecting that they would become utterly worthless. What are the people going to do with the stamps of the denominations that I have just mentioned ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). They will use them for postage.

Mr. H. F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). The $4 stamps ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, the $4 and the $5 stamps. If any hon. gentleman desires he can come down to the department and he will see many of these denominations that have been cancelled used as postage.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sorry to say that we have just as much light as we had before. We knew before that if any one was foolish enough he could put a $5 stamp on a letter and it would go. Notwithstanding that we have a 2-cent rate, we know that according to the issue we have no less than $750,000 of 5-cent stamps that could be put on a letter in the same way. We knew that we could use $75,000 of the 6-cent stamps, $200,000 of the 8-cent stamps, $150,000 of the 10-cent stamps, $100,000 of the 15-cent stamps, and $100,000 of the 20-cent stamps in the same way, and that if we put any one of them on a letter it would go. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has now disclosed this startling information to the public which was entirely in the dark, that they can put a 5-cent stamp or a $5 stamp on a letter and that it will be carried through the mails.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). That, of course, is not what I said. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) wants to be fair, and I presume he does, I trust he will interpret properly my statement. There are many parcels of mail matter that require postage stamps up to $5, and in excess of $5. Five dollar stamps have been used for regular ordinary legitimate postal needs—not paying $5 for more than $5 worth of legitimate postage tax. That state of affairs has gone on during the time this custom has existed, and I would say that postage stamps of the denomination of $5 are now a matter of public convenience, and will be continued as part of the regular legitimate issue of postage stamps.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) will come to the department I shall have much pleasure in showing him cancelled stamps that have come into our department in the legitimate way, aggregating large sums, and covering all denominations of stamps that have been issued since I have been in the department.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). On what particular item would you put a $5 stamp ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I happened to be in the post office in this city one day, and I remember the postmaster saying to me : I have just seen a postage parcel go through to England with some $8 of stamps upon it, and one of them was a $5 stamp. It happened to be a day when some hon. gentleman was making remarks, as my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) is doing to-day, and the postmaster of the city of Ottawa made the statement to me.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the parcel ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I refer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to the postmaster of the city of Ottawa for the particulars ; he gave me the information.

Mr. POWELL. How did these stamps come back to your department cancelled ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). If the hon. gentleman comes to my office I will give him that information ; he can see for himself.

Mr. WALLACE. How does the cancelled stamp come back to your office ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I do not wish to seem uncourteous by intruding on the time of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), who is addressing the House, but if the information is desired, I will say that in regard to one branch of postal matter which only began on the 1st of January last, but is now a fixed branch of post office business, namely, the postal rates upon newspapers ; and also in regard to postage upon large quantities of mail matter that was always sent in bulk, such as magazines ; and matter that does not have the stamp affixed to each particular piece, in regard to all that class of mail matter it has been customary for the patron of the office to bring in postage stamps equal in value to the charge on the whole weight of the mail matter. It is an ordinary thing, it has always been the custom, and it is partly the law. A news agent would perhaps send down many bags full of magazines or parcels, and the postage stamps are not affixed to each separate piece, and the whole of it is weighed and so many dollars are paid in stamps, or if paid in money it is the duty of the postmaster to put stamps on a piece of paper or in a book and transmit these stamps to Ottawa in proof of cancellation. There are accumulated at the Post Office Department, books in which have been pasted the postage stamps in payment of such postage accounts.

Mr. WALLACE. Is not that in violation of your own regulations?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). It took place under a previous Administration, at all events, and before I issued any regulations.

Mr. WALLACE. That is hardly an answer.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Well, I am not sitting in judgment just now, and I will not discuss that question.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, you are.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I am not sitting in judgment on the actions of others, but I may say that it is neither in violation of any previous regulations nor of any regulations that I have made.

Mr. CLANCY (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has made a very lucid explanation. He has not been limited to time in doing so, but he is convicted by the words from his own mouth. The charge I made against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) was that he was guilty of bad faith, and his explanation has proved it. We are told that it is a very customary thing to have parcels go through the mail stamped with these large denominations. If that be true, and the hon. gentleman kept faith with the people of this country, why did he not exchange these stamps and have them used as occasion requires, instead of forcing men to use stamps in their possession on very special occasions. The charge against the hon. gentleman is that he repudiated that issue, but the stamps are coming back to him in spite of himself. For the purpose of these articles that require heavy postage he could have let the stamps go out again after he redeemed them, and if they were redeemed the public would not suffer, and the Postmaster General could have given other stamps. I am speaking in the judgment of the House and the country—it was stated in the press—when I say that the fact is that the hon. gentleman made nearly half a million dollars by a pure act of repudiation. It is no explanation of the evil for the hon. gentleman to say: Well, we have parcels coming in stamped in that way. What about a man who has a set of these stamps and has no parcel to send?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). He could sell them to the newspaper men.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) The newspaper men might not be able to pay for them.

Mr. CLANCY (Bothwell). And that remark of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) may be very true. The truth is that the Postmaster General has been able to balance the two sides of the ledger by two acts that are hardly creditable to him. One of these is to hamper men who are already underpaid, and the other is a wholesale repudiation of the stamps that were held by those who were innocent purchasers and which the post office would not redeem.

No reference has been made in the Speech from the Throne to the change in the constitution of the Senate, but the right hon. the Prime Minister made a deliverance on that question at a recent meeting, and he also made some reference to it in this House in his reply to the speech of the leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister stated that it was going to be the duty of the Liberal party to make the Senate responsible to the people. Now, Sir, when you talk of having an independent Senate in this country, and to declare at the same time that you will make it directly responsible to the people, you are talking of two entirely different things. Take the case of the judges. They are not responsible to the people in that direct sense, but at the same time their very independence of the people attaches the greatest responsibility to their position in this country. I say that the Senate of Canada is in this matter a body somewhat similar to the judiciary. What would be the consequence if you made the Senate elective? Sir, you will make them responsible to the people wholly at the expense of their independence. In the case of the Canadian Senate and in the case of the English House of Lords, you cannot have direct responsibility to the people, and have independence at the same time.

Now, what is the greatest proof of a man's fair discharge of duty, either as a member of the Senate or as one of the judges of the land? In the United States there are cases of the election of judges, and the judiciary in that country is infinitely below ours, for the simple reason that they have responsibility at the expense of their independence. They must fulfil their pledges. They must yield to all those influences that tend to undermine their independence, simply because they have come into collision with the people. What is the safeguard of the people provided by the Senate of Canada? It may be briefly stated in two or three words. Each member of the House of Commons is responsible to his constituency, and no further; but the members of the Senate are not individually responsible to any constituency less than the whole Dominion of Canada. Responsibility must walk hand in hand with that high duty that is imposed upon men who have nothing to tempt them to go wrong. They are entirely independent; they have no local question to consider or local influences to yield to; they have no interest except to serve the country, without thought of reward or approval. If you think it out, you will see that we cannot have a Senate in this country that can be put in a more independent or responsible position than is our present Senate by being free from those entanglements that come from party strife. Hon. gentlemen say the Senate is partisan. You cannot entirely eliminate party feeling from men, and I am not saying that the Senate has been entirely uninfluenced by party feeling. But suppose we adopted the plan adopted by the Prime Minister, what would happen? An independent body comes to settle questions with a body which is in no sense independent. I have no hesitation in saying that the members of this House are not wholly independent. They must answer to their constituencies. There is not a member here who is not bound to listen to what may be the opinion of his constituency on certain questions. That is not the case with the Senate. Then, why should you bring these two bodies into collision? I could understand the consistency of any man who declares that in a democratic country like this, in which the principle of democracy is advancing rather than receding, we could do without a second Chamber, as the people could correct their own wrongs. But if you admit the necessity of a second Chamber—for I understand that the proposal of the First Minister, if adopted, is only to be maintained so long as the Senate are on their good behaviour, and a further step would be resorted to if they returned to their independence—I cannot understand the consistency of causing an independent body, which is responsible to the whole country, to meet with the House of Commons to decide a question which may be entirely a party question. The whole future of the dominant party may depend upon that question being settled according to their wish. Would the right hon. gentleman call in the Senate if the united majority were unfavourable to him? The hon. gentleman would not call in the Senate except at such times as he believed there would be a sufficient number of Senators combined with his own supporters in the House of Commons to carry out his views. The principle of our constitutional system requires our business to be carried on by party; and we have a check on hasty legislation in the form of a second Chamber, which has the staying power to prevent vicious legislation coming from one or the other of the great parties of this country. If hon. gentlemen are agreed as party men, they have their mode of redress at their hand: they can appeal to the great tribunal of the electors, and have any wrongs corrected. There was an opportunity presented last session to test public opinion on a most vital question, if hon. gentlemen were honest and believed that the people were behind them. Had they not the most conclusive proof that the Senate were acting rightly, they would have appealed to the people, and the popular verdict, if against the Senate, would have been a lasting condemnation of it and a vindication of the principles and practices of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CLANCY.

But they did not resort to that opportunity, because they knew perfectly well that the action of the Senate would have been sustained. Under our system of Government, the Senate is an independent body in theory, and, I believe, in practice. It cannot be shown to be a corrupt body. Nobody makes the charge against it. It has not been engaged in jobs or in endeavouring to serve its party friends. What has been the offence of the Senate? Its offence has not been one against the country, but one against hon. gentlemen opposite. The Senate has headed off their schemes, and for doing that it has brought down upon itself the wrath of these hon. gentlemen; and we are told by the party press that the Imperial Government will take into consideration the question stated by the First Minister, and that the right hon. gentleman has an assurance from Lord Salisbury that should the provincial legislatures and a majority of this House declare for Senate reform, on the ground stated by the right hon. gentleman, legislation will be introduced in the Imperial Parliament to carry it into effect. It seems to me that it is unbecoming in the provincial legislatures of this day to be used as donkey engines to further the schemes of hon. gentlemen opposite. This action comes with ill-grace from the legislatures of the provinces of this country, for whose protection the Senate was constituted. Nothing could surpass the effrontery of these legislatures in passing resolutions in favour of reforming the Senate, for the Senate has never, in a single instance, offended against the rights and interests of these legislatures, of which it is the special guardian. I say we can afford to leave the question until the time comes, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to take that as their fighting ground, the hon. members on this side, as well as the people, may well be glad of their choice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is just one question more, and it is a rather delicate one. I refer to the mission of the hon. gentlemen to Washington. Every patriotic Canadian must recognize that many difficulties would confront the Canadian and British commissioners in dealing with the questions that have caused considerable irritation between the two countries, and we cannot but desire that these questions should be finally settled. The leader of the Opposition made a sacrifice that few men in this country would make. He set aside all the advantages which would accrue to any great party leader who would go to the country and state the unpleasant truths about the hon. gentlemen opposite, and discredit them in their mission to Washington by showing the position they held in their own country. And the hon. gentleman who leads this side of the House with such marked ability, refrained, as a patriotic duty, from going before the people to discuss these public matters at that time. These are matters that are beyond the realm of party politics. When we come to discuss great international questions, we must not be bound by party distinctions—that would not be patriotic. However much we may be divided among ourselves, we cannot be divided when there is a contention between Canada and any foreign power. It is upon national, and not upon party grounds, that we propose to judge hon. gentlemen. What was the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite before they came into power? It must be remembered—and I am afraid that the Prime Minister himself was one of the chief offenders—that the Americans were told that the Conservative party of Canada were hostile to the Americans, that their whole aim was to prevent the success of any movement to obtain better relations between the two countries. I think the hon. gentleman is on record for having made a very clear statement of that kind in the city of St. Thomas, a statement that is still remembered, and is being read with great interest now. When they came into power, they could not wait. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) had to go at once to Washington to talk over reciprocity and other matters. I contend that that was an undignified course. The advent to power of these hon. gentlemen must have aroused great expectation among the American people, as it did among the people of this country, who were looking to a just and reasonable fulfilment of their pledges. It would be illiberal to cavil at the hon. gentlemen for failure to fulfil their promises in every detail; all that could be fairly expected would be a substantial fulfilment of their pledges. But these hon. gentlemen were guilty of the undignified act of going to Washington during a session of this House to discuss these matters with the Americans. And, when they came back, they did even worse. They threw away by legislation everything that they would otherwise have been able to offer the American people in exchange for concessions. So, afterwards, when they went to Washington, they went away empty-handed. And now they have returned empty-handed.

The first thing that these hon. gentlemen threw away which might have been of value in treating with the Americans, was the duty on corn. They might well have held that duty for the benefit of our own people, regardless of the use that might be made of it in the negotiations. The effect of their course was to levy tribute on one class of our farmers for the benefit of farmers in other parts of the country. It has not been the policy of the great Conservative party to make one class of our people pay tribute to another. The duty upon corn meal, wheat and wheat flour were reduced. Then, they placed upon the Statute-book a faint-hearted—I say that advisedly—a faint-hearted Alien Labour Bill. That law was crippled by every means in their power, even at the expense of decency in this House. Notwithstanding that there was an alien labour law in the United States that had been in operation for years, and that had been harshly exercised against our people, it was provided, at the instance of the First Minister himself, that our law should be brought into life only by proclamation. And why? For fear of offending the people of the United States, for fear of offending these people who had set the example, who thought it right to have such a law, or they would not have enacted it. At the very moment when this law was being so harshly enforced against us, we must not have a similar law for fear of offending those who had first established it. But the country pressed so strongly for an effective law, that the hon. gentlemen had to recede from their position. They then took another step. They provided that this law could only be brought into operation after a special agent of the Department of Justice had been appointed to bring it into force, no matter how long that might take. This made the law utterly inoperative, and it is inoperative to-day. What was the reason given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) I am sorry he is not here at the moment. He said, that if we did not put checks upon this law, the most irresponsible person could put the law in operation, and might bring about a state of things that would lead to war between the two countries. Why, the people on the other side of the line were not afraid of war, when they put their Act in force; but it seems that, if we imitated them, then hon. gentlemen opposite were afraid that there would be war. Further, the Government procured the passage of legislation which had the effect of reducing the duties on four and a half million dollars worth of goods coming from the United States, while they reduced the duties on only a million dollars worth of goods coming from Great Britain. They did more—they increased the duty on two and three-quarter millions of goods coming from the United States, while they increased the duties on ten millions of goods coming from Great Britain. Having completed these things, these hon. gentlemen went to Washington without a single weapon in their hands to bring about any concession, or anything that they could offer in exchange for them. And now we are told by these hon. gentlemen, as an excuse for this, that the people do not want reciprocity, that they can do without it. I would like to ask them: If the people to-day can do without reciprocity, who taught them self-reliance and self-respect? Was it the Liberal party, with their doctrine of continental free trade, with their doctrine of unrestricted reciprocity? Was it the Liberal party, declaring, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce did: If continental free trade will give us relief from the National Policy, I am ready for it; if unrestricted reciprocity will give us freedom, I am for that; if a revenue tariff will give us freedom, I am for that. The fact is that everything that could be thought of hon. gentlemen were ready to resort to. My hon. friend who sits opposite me, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) declared that the farmers of this country tried to grow two-rowed barley and tried to fatten their cattle by different methods of agriculture, in order to overcome the difficulties, but they had failed; and he told us a story about a man who had water in his barnyard and the ducks that swam in it, as an illustration. He pledged his reputation—and I am bound to say that the hon. gentleman has considerable reputation of a kind in this House—he pledged his reputation that if the Liberal party came into power they would get a treaty of reciprocity including those items; they would not only be able to deal on more friendly terms with the people of the United States than the Conservatives, but they would give the people relief by reciprocity. We are told now by the First Minister that the people of Canada do not want reciprocity, though we are told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that unless the people are so blind that they cannot see, they should still desire reciprocity. Well, let those hon. gentlemen settle that question between themselves. But if it be true, as they say, that the people of this country do not want reciprocity, it is because of the policy that was adopted by the Conservative party, and carried out by them, under which the people were taught self-reliance, and I can only add, self-respect. Our people sought new markets, and found new markets. The Canadian people are not slow to adapt themselves to changed circumstances. I have no hesitation in saying that if the Canadian people do not want reciprocity, it is because they have learned to live and to act independently of our neighbours to the south of us, and we can get along without reciprocity. I will only say further on this matter that there has been an adjournment of the international commission, and the people are looking forward with some anxiety to its resumption. We have been told that all the questions except one could have been settled. The alien labour difficulty could have been settled, the North Atlantic fisheries question could have been settled, the question of the seal fisheries could have been settled, as well as the question of reciprocity. No doubt, these are four important questions. What the people are asking now is why, if these four questions could have been settled, they were not settled. They are surely large enough for a settlement. We are told by the official statement that was sent out by the commission that the reason of this disagreement was that the American commissioners would not agree to anything within the bounds of reason; we are told that if a commission were to be appointed to settle that one difficulty that has delayed a settlement of all the others, it would have to be proceeded with upon such grounds that the Canadian and English commissioners could in no sense assent to it. But hon. gentlemen have chosen a falling place. Now we are enjoined not to speak above our breath lest we should endanger the negotiations that are now pending between Great Britain and the United States and Canada. I am sure there is one thing that the people of this country are agreed upon, and that is that the whole thing has been a miserable failure from start to finish.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. Let my hon. friend who says "hear, hear," wait a little, and he will find that the people of this country will entertain the idea I have just expressed. But I wish just here to mention a matter I forgot to mention with regard to the attitude of hon. gentlemen on the question of preferential trade. We have heard from the mouth of the First Minister himself that the sole ground of giving a preference to Great Britain was that of gratitude and loyalty to the mother land. Well, Sir, this is the first time I ever knew the Canadian people to put their loyalty on so low a ground as that it could be bought by a preference. Conservatives, as a great political party in this country, do not understand loyalty to be a thing that can be procured by a favour; but we hold that it is a man's duty to be loyal under our institutions in this country. We think loyalty rests on a higher and sounder ground than gratitude for favours. We think we should be loyal because it is our duty, because we receive protection to life and to property, with the inestimable blessings of civil and religious liberty. We have that protection and that liberty to a greater extent, I believe, than any other country under the light of the sun, and if we are not loyal, it is all the more to our discredit. I say it is our duty to be loyal, and we should not wait to be purchased. But what have we to be so grateful for? Are we to be grateful because we have been treated no better and no worse than others? Are we to be grateful because we have not been put at a disadvantage compared with others? I say this plea is the greatest nonsense that hon. gentlemen could put forward. The people of this country do not take much stock in such reasons; they rather take the ground that has been put forward by the great leaders of the Conservative party in this country that our trade relations with the mother land should be brought closer and closer, but they should be brought closer upon such mutual grounds as would be beneficial to both parties, that they should not be in the nature of favours extended to each other. They think that the business transactions of this country should not be based on a sentimental basis, but on a sounder and more lasting ground. What is the proposition of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition? He proposed that we should have a preferential arrangement between Great Britain and all her colonies. And how was that to be done? Why, Sir, just to the extent that Britain gave us favours, just to the extent that they extended to us what they received from us—and even I do not know that the hon. gentleman would have been very exact in that—upon that sound business principle he proposed to proceed. Upon that principle the First Minister promised to proceed, but he lost his head, he lost his head for reasons that made him no longer a democrat, and he is now the one man in this House who is wearing the reward of his treachery to the promises made to the people of this country. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place. But I see several members of the Government sitting opposite, some of whom were not Ministers at the time of the Liberal convention, but they were prospective Ministers. I see the Minister of Public Works, I see the Minister of Customs, I see the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Postmaster General, all of whom were at that great convention, besides some others, making in all eleven Ministers out of the thirteen who preside over the affairs of this country just now. The Minister of the Interior was there and was elected chairman of one of the committees. These gentlemen formulated a policy that was a pledge to the people of this country, and if they did not mean it they did not mean anything. Can any one well conceive a great convention formulating a policy, printing that policy, and having it distributed from one end of the country to the other, discussing it in every detail, and not meaning anything by it? If it meant anything it meant a direct pledge to the people. One of the questions included in it was the question of prohibition. The Minister of Agriculture was selected to introduce the resolution embodying that plank, and the reason of his selection was that he had been trading a good deal upon the prohibition question in the past. I am not sure but that that was one of his qualifications in becoming a Minister.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). It was his principal qualification.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says it was his principal qualification, and I am quite willing to concur in that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) declared that he felt a special pride in belonging to a party that was prepared to face this question in the country, a party supported by the young men because of its courage and moral qualities, proposing to make for legislation that would be of great benefit to the country. But there was an honest man in that convention.

Mr. BERGERON. Name him.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sorry to say that that honest man has lately gone to his long home, where we must all go some day. I refer to the late Hon. Timothy Anglin. When that matter came up, when the resolution was proposed in a very elaborate speech by the Minister of Agriculture, plain Mr. Fisher then, Mr. Anglin, who was not prepared to play the part of the hypocrite for his party, protested against the introduction of a resolution of that kind under false pretenses. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was there, but he did not raise his voice in protest.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). I do not think he was there.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, he was there. He was one of the newer ones. He told them he came there notwithstanding big prizes held out to him to stay. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but if he desires it, I will read his speech; his statement was that big prizes were held out to him, and he did not take them. He went over to the Liberal party, not the strong party, but the weak one. Coming back to the statement of Mr. Anglin, which had the ring of the word of an honest man, he said that he was not willing to commit himself to anything laid down in the platform that the Liberal party might be prepared to carry out. His statement was as follows:—

It may be said, indeed, that this resolution only asks for a plebiscite. But what do we mean when we ask for a plebiscite if we are in earnest? Is it not that we desire to know what the opinion of the people is on this question; that we desire to ascertain their opinion in a particular way, and that we will do all in our power to give effect to their decision as thus ascertained? It may be that not one-half of the adult male population will vote. Nevertheless, should a majority be obtained at the polls when this question is submitted, the friends of prohibition will be in a position to call upon the Liberal party to follow up their resolution logically by assisting in the passage and enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law.

Mr. Anglin made that statement in the presence of eleven out of thirteen gentlemen who are Ministers to-day. There was no dissenting voice; it was accepted that to pass the resolution meant just what Mr. Anglin said. It meant that there was a pledge given as significantly as any pledge could be given, because if hon. gentlemen can repudiate that pledge, in the very nice terms in which the repudiation was couched by the right hon. Prime Minister, who said that it was merely a pledge to the party, they can repudiate any pledge. Attention being called to the consequences of the resolution by one of the most prominent Liberals in the country at that date, was there a man in that convention who rose in his place and said that it had not the meaning attributed to it by Mr. Anglin? Not a single one. We have hon. gentlemen opposite after coming from the country sitting down at the Council table, preparing a Bill assenting to it, to give effect to a resolution adopted as one of the planks of the Liberal party, sending out several of their number, and doing what? Four Ministers of the Crown are found going out in Quebec and fighting in every possible way against the passage of the Bill. How does that compare with the position of the Minister of Agriculture? If the Minister of Agriculture was at all in earnest, then he is not in earnest in the position he takes now. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has not been here; I am sorry to say that the hon. gentleman has been skulking about the corridors of this House while this discussion has been going on. The hon. gentleman has not the courage to sit in his seat or to rise up in exposition of his attitude and if he remains in a Cabinet which refuses to give effect to the resolution moved by himself, is it that the Liberal party alone had courage to face the country on this issue? I say he is in a disgraceful position. He is not so great a man that he can disregard a statement made in this House. He ought to be in his place to defend his course, because he cannot ignore, by his silence, the criticisms that have been made of his conduct. We have a splendid example in the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) of what the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite will be on this question. That high-minded gentleman had no party until he came to the question of prohibition. In a long speech delivered last night he saw nothing good in the appointment of a Royal Commission by the Conservative party, but what could be attributed to bad faith and a determination to sidetrack the question. He saw in the Liberal party some things that he did not quite agree with, but he saw as clearly as noonday, that they were perfectly honest from start to finish. I have no hesitation in saying that the prohibitionists can have prohibition if they want it, but they will never have prohibition from a Government represented by such hon. gentlemen as the hon. member for Colchester. He may be a prohibitionist, but he belongs to that class that you can fairly characterize as renegade prohibitionists, who try to delude and mislead the people by telling them that he does not think the Government are bound to introduce a prohibition Bill. If the hon. gentleman spoke with authority he and his party will have to deal with the people who take an entirely different view, if this pledge of the hon. gentleman was not good, as was pointed out by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), there is not a single pledge contained in their platform of some twelve or thirteen articles, and if that is the case let hon. gentlemen be manly and honest enough to acknowledge that they have repudiated every other pledge. This pledge they have repudiated in words, and every other pledge they have repudiated by their acts, so that the hon. gentlemen opposite have the consolation, if consolation it be, of having by their acts and words repudiated every pledge they made to the people of Canada.

I regret that the Prime Minister is not in his seat, because I have a word to say to him of a somewhat personal character.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). Oh, never mind.

Mr. CLANCY (Bothwell). We hear from my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) when coal oil and some other comparatively small things are talked about, but let me ask him now: can he go back to his constituency and with truth on his lips, and I know I am imposing an impossible task on him and tell them that his party have performed their pledges? It is rather interesting for us to compare the stand he took in this House before the elections, and his silence since. I wonder if it is extreme sensitiveness that imposes such profound silence on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) in this Parliament. I was about to state, Mr. Speaker, that I regretted the absence of the Prime Minister from his place in this House, for I have a word to say regarding him. The right hon. gentleman accepted all the challenges thrown down to him by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) but he answered none of them. He told us that one of the great achievements of the Liberal party was to settle the Manitoba school difficulty. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) also declared that the question had been settled, but strange to say the Solicitor General, who, in a sense, represents a very numerous and a very intelligent and very powerful section of the people of this country, declared that the question is not settled. I will leave these hon. gentlemen to settle that difference of opinion amongst themselves, but let me ask you, Mr. Speaker—because as your duty is merely to listen to what is said around you, you will be able to form an impartial opinion—I ask you, Sir, who raised this question first in Canada, who initiated this difficulty, and who traded on it when it was once started? Sir, was not that question first raised by a body of conspirators within the shadow of the legislative buildings in Winnipeg, and is not the product of that conspiracy to-day holding a portfolio as Minister of the Interior? It does not lie in the mouths of these hon. gentlemen to declare that the Conservatives could not settle the Manitoba school question, because it was part of the conspiracy that they should not be allowed to settle it. Every endeavour was made by the Conservative Government to arrive at an amicable understanding; commissioners were sent to Winnipeg, and the provincial government sent them back with the message, that they were not prepared to settle. No terms could be offered by the Government that a self-respecting federal Government could entertain. These hon. gentlemen opposite entered upon the conspiracy in order that they might profit by it and be enabled to say that the Conservatives were unable to settle the question but that the Liberals were. Whether that question has been rightly or wrongly settled, or whether it has been settled at all, I will not discuss at this moment. But I do know that the people of this country recognize to-day that the whole thing was a conspiracy. If, as the Prime Minister has told us, this country was brought to the verge of rebellion and civil strife, that civil strife was fomented by the Liberal party in Canada, and it was continued so long as it suited them to continue it. What was the result? The moment the general elections were over, the very man who told the people of the province of Manitoba that he was holding out for a great principle, was lionized in the city of Montreal and at a family union of the Liberal party held there to divide the prizes according to the merits of those who had served the party, this very man obtained a rich prize as his share. Sir, the whole thing in connection with that transaction is a lasting disgrace to the Liberal party, and it will live longer than the not very reputable fame of hon. gentlemen opposite, in the minds of the people of Canada.

Let me point out briefly, Sir, what seems to me to be the duty of the Conservative party. It is not a new duty, for we have the old policy, and we have one of the oldest leaders of public opinion in Canada at our head. Our leader is a man who has contributed more than any man living to the bringing about of the unity of Canada and the welding of these provinces together in this great confederation. We have at our head a man who deserves all credit for his great stability of character, and for that strong personality of his which it is the lot of but few men to possess. We have a leader whose supporters have no occasion to be put to shame by any one declaring that our leader has said one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow. Our leader has never been charged with having repudiated, or with having left unfilled any pledge he has made to the people of Canada. Sir, the duty of the Conservative party is easy under such a leader. We are equipped with a policy that was inaugurated by the efforts of our present leader, for he was the first to propose that we should have a national policy; national not alone in name but national because it protects the interests of all our people; national because it does not impose undue burdens on one class for the purpose of relieving another; national because it never sanctioned jobbery; national because it contributed to the best interests of Canada. Sir, we have a true national policy; we have the Father of the National Policy as our leader, and our patriotic duty will be to faithfully follow that leader until he attains power, as he deserves to.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. J. I. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, the eminent baronet who leads the Opposition has given notice to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and to myself that during the recess he will pay a long visit to the province of Quebec. Let me assure him that he will be received with all the consideration due to his age, to his many years in public life, and to the important position he occupies in this country. I even apprehend, Sir, that French flags may be displayed in his honour, unless he feels for the three-coloured banner of France the same dislike—nay, the same disgust—that the chief whip of his party expressed with so much vehemence in the House a day or two ago.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman misstates the fact if he says that I showed any hostility or disrespect to the tri-coloured flag. What I stated was that the hon. gentleman had raised that flag on Her Majesty's boat.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very glad indeed that the hon. gentleman eats humble pie so soon. The hon. leader of the Opposition believes that the province of Quebec is not well informed. I beg to take issue with him on this very point. I claim that the province of Quebec is one of the best informed provinces of the Dominion; and it is because she is so well informed that she has taken the political position which astonishes so much the hon. leader of the Opposition. There is no other province where the newspapers are more largely circulated than in my native province; and I will add that there is no other province where newspapers of both political creeds and of both languages are read as they are in Quebec. Take the city of Montreal: The "Star," "La Presse," "La Patrie," the "Witness" and the "Herald," I am glad to say, are seen in everybody's hands. The one-cent paper has extended the reading of newspapers all over the province. There is scarcely a village or a parish where the "Star," "La Presse" and "La Patrie" are not sold every day at one cent. At Lévis, where my hon. friend (Mr. Demers) was elected without opposition a few days ago, the "Star," "La Patrie" and "La Presse" are circulated. In Bagot the same papers are read in every house. In point of fact, it is because the newspapers of both political parties and of the two languages are read in Quebec everywhere, that false statements and unfair accusations have no weight with our people. The hon. leader of the Opposition has been away practically for the last fifteen years, and that is the reason why he has lost track of public opinion in my native province. When he so gallantly came from the other side of the ocean to relieve Sir Mackenzie Bowell of the onerous duties of Prime Minister, he thought, I am afraid, that he was living fifteen years in the past. He had to form a new Administration. He had been a colleague of Sir George Etienne Cartier. I am sorry indeed he is not in his seat, for I would ask him, what did he do? Did he apply to the old comrades, the old colleagues of Sir George Etienne Cartier? No, Sir, he went to the representatives of the school who did everything they could to destroy and disgrace Sir George Etienne Cartier. He invited to be one of his colleagues Mr. Desjardins. I have nothing to say against that gentleman's reputation or character. Mr. Desjardins was one of the opponents of Sir George Etienne Cartier, so was Mr. Taillon. I will not put in the same category Mr. Angers; he does not belong to the same class of men, and I have been very sorry to find him at times with them. But, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition applied to the representatives of that school for the very reason pointed out by my hon. friend the member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) to-day. He appealed to the most retrograde element in the province of Quebec, with the view of securing what he thought would be a dominating influence in that province. Sir, I will not allude further than is necessary to what took place in the campaign of 1896; but it is my duty to my party and to my province, and to the country at large, I may add, to state again the position which I stated in the House in 1897. I am amazed when I hear members of Parliament from the province of Quebec speaking of appeals to prejudices. I say that in no part of the British Empire, nor at any time, was such an attempt made at religious coercion as the one which was made in the province of Quebec in 1896 on behalf, in the interest, and with the knowledge and consent of the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends. Sir, the French habitant stood up to the mark like a man. He was not coerced, but felt that he was a free citizen, and that he had the right to vote just as he pleased, and he voted just as it pleased him to do. Neither the hon. leader of the Opposition nor any of the other leaders of his party have ever repudiated the part they played in the campaign of 1896. But, they have found out that coercion did not succeed in the province of Quebec, and they made up their minds to change front. They do not, they say, rely any more on the province of Quebec, and they have resolved to coerce that province in other ways. They seem to have made up their minds to appeal to the Protestant provinces against the province of Quebec. Their war-cry seems to be: "No French Premier! No Roman Catholic domination! Down with the Pope!" Their campaign is not new to me. The "Mail," which is the chief organ of that unholy campaign, started it long ago.

Mr. TARTE.

In 1884 or 1885, the "Mail" started on the course which they are still pursuing. So much so, Sir, that although that paper had cost the Conservative party nearly $400,000—and I speak of what I know—Sir John Macdonald established the "Empire." My hon. friend spoke of moneys collected for party purposes, but I may tell him one day in Montreal—and I do not reveal any secrets in saying this—Sir John Macdonald collected $40,000 to start the "Empire." There was no harm in that. I point out these facts to make a comparison between the late lamented chieftain who so long directed the destinies of the Conservative party and these gentlemen who are leading it to-day. Sir John Macdonald died, and the "Empire" was suppressed, while the "Mail" was kept on with its old staff. Sir John Abbott took office. Unfortunately, he did not lead his party long, and we all exceedingly regretted his death. He was succeeded by Sir John Thompson. The reorganization which took place then has some interesting features about it. I am very glad indeed to see my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) in his place. I may tell him what he has, perhaps, ignored up to this time. Sir John Thompson had made up his mind to take Mr. Meredith and Dr. Bergin into the Cabinet with him. Dr. Bergin went to Ontario and got the consent of two or three bishops that Mr. Meredith should be taken in. Before the negotiations were completed, however, my hon. friend from West York was taken in with Mr. Montague. If my hon. friend does not know these facts, I know them, on the best possible authority. Dr. Bergin was to have come in, but he did not, and he was replaced by my hon. friend from West York. Anyhow, wrangling and unseemly differences were more acute than ever in the Conservative party. If Mr. Justice Ouimet and Mr. Angers would speak freely and frankly, they would say to the country that on more than one occasion they were very near going out of the Government on account of the unfair treatment they received at the hands of their Tory friends. The same element that then got the upper hand in the Conservative party has the upper hand to-day.

And what is the result? I will not weary the House with too long quotations, but I cannot refrain from alluding to what some of the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite are saying and writing. The "Telegram" is a newspaper published in the city of Winnipeg. I have been informed, and it was with a great deal of regret and chagrin that I heard it, that the "Telegram" is controlled by Mr. Hugh John Macdonald. I hope that is not the case, because I cannot conceive that the son of the late lamented chieftain whom the province of Quebec so faithfully supported for twenty years would allow to be written against the French Canadians what I read in that paper. On the 16th December the "Telegram," commenting on the election in Bagot, wrote this:

So far as Bagot is concerned, the "Telegram" is not sorry of the loss of the seat; the lessons it teaches are more valuable than one member more or less on the Conservative benches in Parliament. It shows that against a French Premier and unlimited boodle it is useless for the Conservatives to bother particularly about Quebec. The French have shown themselves utterly ungrateful for the sacrifices of the Conservative party made in 1896 to see justice done their race and religion. They have shown themselves to be mere venal opportunists. In Quebec they are evidently of the same calibre as the Prendergasts, the Forgets, and the Martins of Manitoba. The Conservative party will do well to realize that it had better not prejudice its chances of success in other parts of the Dominion by further truckling to that unprincipled province. Whenever the Conservatives are strong enough to obtain power without the aid of a Quebec majority there will be no difficulty about obtaining a Quebec majority. Quebec will then come flocking over to Conservatism solicitous to be seduced. Her venal electorate will swarm around the dispensers of patronage like flies round a honey-pot. Meanwhile, Conservatives had better let Quebec stew in its Laurier juice, and build up its strength elsewhere, even at the expense of the Quebec interests.

And further :

A French Canadian Premier means, it is very evident, that the rest of the Dominion is to be despoiled for the benefit of Quebec. We in Manitoba have been made to keenly realize this, if the other provinces have not. While millions are being spent on Quebec, we cannot get even consideration for necessary public works whose costs would be comparatively a bagatelle. We are starved that Quebec may gorge. The arrogance of Quebec under the Laurier regime has become insufferable. Mr. Tarte not only lavishes millions on his province, but he flies the French flag on Government vessels in preference to the Union Jack.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds). Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," of course. He has never read and never understood a word of French in his life. And yet he quotes French speeches and articles. I do not suppose he will ever learn that so beautiful language, but he will go on quoting my words in French, words that he is quite unable to understand. I am very sorry indeed that the "Telegram" is not the only Conservative paper that speaks in that strain.

The hon. member for Leeds who interrupted me a moment ago, spoke the other day of an incident which, I believe, I have explained in a manner satisfactory to every reasonable man.

The hon. gentleman has said—of course, I do not suppose he was serious—that I had hoisted the French flag and given it the place of honour over the English flag. Sir, that is too ridiculous—I am sure he is not serious. What did I do? Any man in my position would have done what I did; there is no doubt about that. I am just as loyal a British citizen as my hon. friend from Leeds, or any other member on that side of the House. I had occasion to inspect the public works of my department in a Government boat. I did not go on foot; I could not walk on the water, and so I went in a Government boat. I took with me several flags. First of all, I took the Union Jack, which is the flag of my country, and which, in the speech the hon. gentleman quoted without having ever read it, I said was the flag of my country. I put it in the place of honour, as any British Minister is bound to do. But I do not deny that I took with me a French flag also, and an American flag. I took an American flag in order that, when I met an American vessel, I might be able to salute the flag of a friendly nation with the flag of a friendly nation. I did that on several occasions. Now, Sir, if I have been guilty of hoisting the French flag on several occasions, that is to say, where I was visiting groups of French people in the province of Quebec, then let the House condemn me. I have done it, and I do not regret it in any way whatever. Mr. Speaker, Sir John Macdonald often came to the province of Quebec, and he was never horrified at the sight of a French flag. The French flag is in nearly every home in the province of Quebec. On more than one occasion I have witnessed the touching sight, in the houses of my French countrymen, the portrait of the Queen wrapped in the French flag. I have expressed elsewhere, and I express here, the earnest desire of a French Canadian, and as a British citizen at the same time, that the two flags of Great Britain and France may always float together to the breeze in friendship and amity.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) No, Sir; no, Sir.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman says, No.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let me remind my hon. friend of what Queen Victoria said, a few months ago—and it was reported in the press of the whole civilized world. Her Majesty, in an interview with Eugenie, ex-Empress of France, during those painful days of the Fashoda incident, said to the ex-Empress: "If war were to break out between France and England, I should ask God to let me die before the beginning of hostilities." Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) has been a Minister of the Crown in this country. Let me appeal to his better sense; let me say that what he has said, he should apologize for just now. Why should not the two greatest civilized nations in the world walk in the ways of peace and harmony? Does the hon. gentleman desire war between France and England? Why should it be so? Sir, the hon. gentlemen is but expressing the sentiments of a group of men on the other side of the House who hate everything that is French.

Why, his interruption just now proves that. Because I hoisted the French flag, I have been denounced as disloyal to the British Empire.

Mr. PRIOR. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I hope the hon. gentleman is not in his sober senses. Now, Sir, my hon. friend for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has thought proper to allude to the fact that I had visited the Island of Anticosti. My department has a telegraph system of 250 miles on the island, and I thought it was my duty, when making a tour of inspection, to inspect that system. The Island of Anticosti was the property of an English syndicate. Mr. Menier, a well-known French capitalist, bought the island from that English syndicate. My hon. friend from Leeds—again I say that I do not think he was serious—accused me of having gone there and of having been practically a party to the proceedings having in view the expulsion of a Methodist settlement from that island. So much has been said about that expulsion, that I may be permitted to say a word in explanation of the circumstances. As I say, Mr. Menier, a capitalist from France, bought the Island of Anticosti from an English syndicate, who had purchased it years ago. When my hon. friend opposite, or any other hon. gentleman opposite, buys a property, he believes himself to be the owner of it. Mr. Menier found at Fox River about twenty families, who had settled there. Those of us in the province of Quebec who know what is going on, are amused at the reports that have been spread abroad. It is said, that all those who have been settled there are Methodists, and that they are going to be expelled on account of their faith. I may say, that my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Angers) is acting as a counsel in the case, and he will bear me out in what I am going to say. There are some people of the Protestant faith on the island, and I may add, that, among those whom my hon. friend opposite characterized as persecuted Methodists, are a couple of French Canadians and a couple of Irishmen, and, perhaps they may not be the best of the lot. Everybody who lives in the province of Quebec knows—that nearly all those who live on that island are professional wreckers—people who deceive the captain of a ship, in order that the vessel might be wrecked, and that they might steal everything on board. Every lawyer in Quebec knows—my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) knows—that that company was not a very suitable company for Mr. Menier, and he took proceedings to expel them. They resisted, and, as there were some Methodists among them, the whole lot were supposed to be Methodists. They came to Quebec, enlisted the active sympathy of some of our friends of the Protestant religion, and the fight is going on. It is a question of property—a question as to whether Mr. Menier has the right to own land or not. Proceedings are now pending in the court. Some of the Conservative organs, and my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has quoted their sentiments in the House, have said that Mr. Menier should not be allowed to remain the possessor of Anticosti Island. The question is very clear. Shall a French capitalist, who comes to Canada to invest money, be allowed to do so or not? If, because Mr. Mernier is French, he has no right to buy property here, the case is very clear. If a Frenchman coming from France has no right to buy property, it is better for us to say so; but nobody will say so. Mr. Menier has spent a million and a half of dollars; he is employing only Canadian labour, and I am always surprised to see that so much noise has been made about a thing which, in my estimation, is a very clear one indeed. But, of course, all these appeals are made in accordance with the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a two-faced policy. In Ontario, and in some of the other Protestant provinces, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is represented as the vicar-general of the Pope, and in Quebec—well, in Quebec, he is represented as a man who has no religion whatever. My hon. friend for West York (Mr. Wallace) made a speech at Barrie, a few days ago, in which he alluded to the religious position, if I may express myself so, of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and that of ourselves. Speaking of the Manitoba school question, he said:

It is enough to make our blood boil to think that a foreign potentate was asked to interfere in our government.

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman is a member of Parliament—

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). I said that in Parliament last session, and I am prepared to say it again.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And it was no more true. The more the hon. gentleman says so, the more he will prove that he does not mean to be fair. There is nothing like truth in this world. All the false statements that may be scattered, even if they come from the mouth of my hon. friend the member for West York, cannot prevail against truth. I say here—and nobody can deny it with any success—that the Pope was never asked by the Prime Minister or myself to interfere in this country in political matters. What was done was very fully stated by me on March 30, 1897. I have the statement before me. We appealed to Rome for freedom, for liberty against oppression, against organized oppression, against the oppression organized by the hon. gentleman and others in this House. Because the man who was placed at the head of Catholicity, is one of the broadest-minded men that ever lived, we got freedom, justice and liberty. The hon. gentleman has a reputation to save: he is a responsible man. He should not go on saying, that we have appealed for interference in political matters to the Pope. It is not a fact; it is not true. He cannot deny, that we have never appealed to Rome in regard to those matters.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman deny the letter written by Charles Russell, in which he said, that he was sent there by the powers that be for that express purpose?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Whatever Mr. Russell may have said, he cannot have said anything else but what I am saying now.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, he did.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In Rome there is a court just as in any other capital in the world, where there is work to be done and arguments to be given. Was it a crime for the leader of the Opposition to go to Rome lately? He went to Rome a few months ago. Was it a crime? If the hon. member for West York should visit Rome, he would go to see the Pope, I have no doubt. The Pope has seen worse men than he, and he has always blessed them with both hands. It would not do any harm. I will always remember an incident which has become history. The pope that Napoleon put in jail, was passing through the crowd, and somebody would not kneel to be blessed by him. "Well," he said, "the blessing of an old man can do harm to nobody." What the hon. gentleman is saying, and what the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite are writing, is all of very great importance. The question really comes down to this point, that we Roman Catholics are obliged to ask ourselves whether we are to be banished from public life on account of our faith. Is it because the right hon. Prime Minister is a French Canadian and a Roman Catholic, that he cannot be Prime Minister of this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; nonsense.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nonsense! The organs of the hon. gentleman are writing that every day. I have my hand full of quotations to that very effect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read.

Mr. TAYLOR. What about Sir John Thompson?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Sir John Thompson was not very long Prime Minister, and I doubt very much that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was very hot for him. When the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) does us the honour of coming to Quebec, he will have to explain why a French Canadian cannot be Prime Minister. We have always thought that the French Canadians are a respectable minority in this country: we are a million and a half, and we do not lose any time in having more and more population. I read, a few days ago, in the able address of Mr. Tooms—a brother of my hon. friend, who is an Orange chief—the doleful complaint, that the French Canadians were swarming to Manitoba and covering the whole ground very fast. Sir, these gentlemen opposite speak of Quebec domination because the people of the province of Quebec have thought fit to vote for my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who is a French Canadian. But political history is open to us, and we know that for nearly twenty years the province of Quebec voted steadily for Sir John A. Macdonald. I never then heard my Tory friends complaining very loudly about it. They were very complimentary to us in those days; they relied very much upon us, and Sir John A. Macdonald never dissolved a Parliament without doing some of us the honour of calling us up to Ottawa and asking us what we thought of the chances of war. The Conservative party had good leaders in those days. They were well organized, as my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) knows, and we generally carried the day against the Liberal side of the House. I repeat again that our English Tory friends never complained of French domination when Quebec voted for Sir John Macdonald, and it cannot be denied that the province of Quebec kept Sir John in power for nearly twenty years. Why is it that because the Prime Minister happens to be a French Canadian there is so much talk about French domination now? It means, Sir, that these gentlemen deny to the French race the same privileges and the same aspirations as they claim for themselves. At one time the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) had nearly his whole province behind him, but nobody cried Nova Scotia domination. A day or two ago some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House pointed to the great danger that was likely to result from the fact that all the provinces were now Liberal, but when the province of Nova Scotia was in the hands of a Conservative Government, or when the majority of the representation from that province was Conservative at Ottawa, there was no talk of Nova Scotia domination. They cry to-day that there is Nova Scotia domination in the province of Nova Scotia because the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) could not carry more than four out of forty-six members in the provincial legislature.

But, Mr. Speaker, 1896 was not the first year that the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada was leader of the Liberal party. It was in 1888 that my right hon. friend was chosen as leader. The English Liberal party did great honour to the French race in choosing one of them as a leader. Sir, we greatly appreciate that honour.

Mr. GEO. LANDERKIN (South Grey). So do we.

Some hon. MEMBERS. So do we.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). We greatly appreciate the honour that has been done us, and I do not believe that our friends of English origin have any right to say that we have abused that proud privilege. There is no doubt that the province of Quebec is French; she is French and British at the same time; she is as loyal to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen as any other part of the British Empire. Lord Elgin, who, I think, had as high ideas as my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior), wrote in the year 1848 to the British authorities as follows:—

I must confess that I for one am deeply convinced of the impolicy of all such attempts to denationalize the French. Generally speaking, they produce the opposite effect from that intended, causing the flame of national prejudice and animosity to burn more fiercely. But, suppose them to be successful, what would be the result? You may, perhaps, Americanize; but, depend upon it, by methods of this description you will never Anglicize the French inhabitants of the province of Quebec. Let them feel, on the other hand, that their religion, their habits, their prepossessions, their prejudices, if you will, are more considered and respected here than in other portions of this vast continent, and who will venture to say that the last hand which waves the British flag on American ground may not be that of a French Canadian?

Well, Sir, knowing my native province as I do, I say that if there was any necessity, if there was any appeal to the French province of Quebec on behalf of the British Empire, there would be more than one French Canadian hand ready to wave the British flag in any part of the world. It is painful to us as a race to be assailed as we sometimes are in some quarters. We feel that we are just as loyal as you, my English friends, are; but still we see that a part of the population (to whose respect we attach a great deal of importance) is under the wrong and false and unfair impression that we are a disloyal race.

The hon. leader of the Opposition has spoken at great length on the question of Senate reform, and he told us he was ready to die to save the Senate, and especially the province of Quebec. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is a little too ready to sacrifice his life for the province of Quebec, for I think we can take care of ourselves without his blood being shed on our behalf. I remember very well that one evening in this House when the school question was being discussed, he gave us a most solemn assurance that he was ready to give the last hours of his life to save our religion and our altars. Today he is ready to die once more for us.

Mr. TARTE.

Providence spared him then that he might save us now. Allow me to say that the French Canadians do not want the Senate more than do their fellow-citizens of other origin. If the people of this Dominion want to maintain the Senate, the province of Quebec has no objection, but I add without any hesitation whatever that if the people of the Dominion make up their minds to abolish the Senate the province of Quebec will have no objection to it either. And, Mr. Speaker, I shall tell you why. Times have changed; confederation was enacted in 1867, long years ago. Previous to that time there were struggles, violent struggles between Upper and Lower Canada, and the fathers of confederation thought it necessary to give special guarantees to the French Canadian and Catholic minority in the Federal Parliament, and special guarantees to the English minority in the legislature of Quebec. The Senate was then created, with an equal number of senators for each of the provinces. As I said a minute ago, times have changed. We are now the Canadian nation; thank God, we are more and more the Canadian nation; and the French Canadians feel that they are quite as much at home in Ottawa as they are in the province of Quebec. We do not require any special protection. We feel that we can take care of ourselves. We are just as strong in the House as our friends of other origin, and we are treated with the same fairness and justice as our friends of other origin. We are proud to content ourselves to be British and Canadian citizens, pure and simple. Sir, there was an English legislative councillor appointed in Quebec a few weeks ago, Mr. McCorkill. It is stated that the Legislative Council exists in the province of Quebec to protect the English minority, as the Senate was created to protect the minority here. Mr. McCorkill stated in my hearing that he consented to be appointed a Legislative Councillor so as to vote for the abolition of the Legislative Council.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). He did not mean it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On this side of the House we never say what we do not think. The existence of the Senate may have been considered a necessity in former days; I do not believe it is a necessity now. I do not mean to say that I am prepared to vote immediately for the abolition of the Senate, but I say without hesitation that if there were a vote taken in the province of Quebec to-morrow, 95 out of every 100 votes would be cast for the abolition of the Senate. There is no possible doubt as to that, and any man who does not see that has not looked carefully over the political ground.

Sir, we are living in the last part of the 19th century, the century of liberty par excellence, the century of government by the people and for the people. Have we got responsible government in the proper sense of the word? There is no use denying that the Senate is just as partisan as we are. Now, what is the position of affairs? Here is a Government, which was returned in 1896 by the popular will, and has been maintained since 1896 by the popular will. The Senate can block, can put to nought, its policy at any time, and there is no remedy. I heard to-day the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) saying: "Oh, we should appeal to the people every time the Senate refuses to pass a measure passed by the House." If such a proposition were propounded on the other side of the ocean, the man who made it would be the laughing stock of the whole community. The House of Lords have never claimed the right to force a dissolution of Parliament. If we simply had a Senate like the House of Lords, it would be tolerable, although the English people are pretty restless under the rule of the House of Lords to-day. But we have not that at all. We have a Senate composed of men who were appointed 25 years ago, 20 years ago, 15 years ago, 10 years ago—appointed by governments composed of men belonging to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite; and that Senate has not the right but the power to block every measure introduced in this House. All party questions and all party feeling put aside. I say this state of affairs is intolerable. I was very much struck by a few words uttered by Mr. Gladstone which I find in Heaton's "Three Reforms of Parliament." Says Mr. Gladstone:

The strength of the modern state lies in the representative system. I rejoice to think that in this happy country, and in this happy constitution, we have other sources of strength in the respect paid to the various orders in the state, in the authority they enjoy, and in the unbroken course which has been allowed to all our national traditions; but still, in the main, it is the representative system which is the strength of the modern state in general, and of the state in this country in particular.

And here are some other words of Mr. Gladstone, uttered in 1895, which I find in Mr. McCarthy's book:

Above all, present purposes vindicate the right of the House of Commons as the organ of the nation.

Well, Sir, we are proceeding on these lines. We want to vindicate the position of this House of Commons as the organ of this young Canadian nation. It is amusing to hear some of our friends speaking of the guarantee that the Senate is supposed to be for the province of Quebec. Do you know how many French senators we have from Quebec in the Senate? We have 16 of them. What a bulwark! If we had only that bulwark, I would pity the poor French Canadians. The names of those French senators are as follows:—Mr. Armand, Mr. Bellerose, Sir C. A. P. Pelletier, Mr. Bernier, Mr. Bolduc, Mr. Ross, Mr. de Boucherville, Mr. Thibaudeau, Mr. Dandurand, Mr. Fiset, Mr. Forget, Mr. Landry, Mr. Masson, Mr. Montplaisir, Mr. Poirier, Mr. Paquet—sixteen all told. I say it again: Is it not preposterous to ask the province of Quebec to believe that without those sixteen men we are nowhere? The French Canadian habitant will not take much stock in that saying; he knows better than that.

The hon. leader of the Opposition, and nearly all of those who have spoken after him, have alluded to the great expenditure which this Government, they say, has been guilty of. I would like to have a frank understanding with my hon. friends on the other side. They have held the reins of power almost continuously since confederation. We find that they have increased the public debt of this country by $118,000,000. We find that when they came into power, succeeding the Government of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the annual expenditure was $23,000,000 in round numbers, and they increased it to over $38,000,000. I do not blame them for doing so. I could not very properly blame them, having supported them nearly all that time. I do not blame them. This country has made great progress, and besides, hon. gentlemen opposite were not always as bad as they are now. But, Sir, what do they reproach us with to-day? I am sorry that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), who have more authority to speak for the other side than others—although the leaders are not very safe in their seats on the other side—are not in their places. I would ask them to point out the items of expenditure to which they object. There is no use in saying in a vague way: "You are spending too much." On what great public work are we spending too much? Since we came into power we have been going on with the deepening of the canals. That policy was initiated before we took office, only it was not pushed as it should have been pushed. Hon. gentlemen opposite had too much wrangling among themselves to go on with anything of importance. We have been going along with this work as fast as we have been able. Do hon. gentlemen opposite object, I want to know, to the further deepening of the canals, in view of securing to this Canadian nation the trade of the west. Will they make a motion condemning this Government for having deepened the canals? No, the money was voted in this House and these hon. gentlemen have not said a word. The other great work is the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. They did not object to that. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) reminds me that the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, more than any other man, was pushing it forward. He was afraid we would not bring the measure in. No vote has been taken to oppose any of these appropriations. There has been shaking of the head on the part of my hon. friend from West York, but when he shakes his head, the brains of his party are not always there. Now, I wish to call the attention of the country to the unfair position that is assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite. They speak against the expenditure. Let them tell us to what item of expenditure they object. A deputation came to me a few days ago from the city of Toronto, composed of men of both political parties. They asked me to apply, for a start, for half a million of dollars to improve the port of Toronto. Shall I decline their request? Shall I say: We are spending too much money. Shall I say that the port of Toronto is deep enough, that it is sound Canadian policy to allow trade to flow to American channels and not go to the city of Toronto? I cannot say that. Let hon. gentlemen opposite make a motion declaring that I should not spend that money, and we will see. This very morning the Prime Minister received in his room with some of his colleagues, of which I was one, a deputation from what we call "New Ontario," a deputation composed of men of both political parties. Members of Parliament on the other side were present with the deputation. They asked us if we were willing to favour the appropriation of half a million dollars to help with the construction of a railway. Shall we tell them that our hon. friends on the other side are opposed to that? Shall we stop the progress of that district? Shall we close the door? If my hon. friends want to say it, let them do so. Then there is the port of Hamilton. The works that were built there years ago are in a decayed state. There is only about 12 feet of water. I received a petition from the Board of Trade, including the most influential citizens, who asked me to rebuild these piers and give additional water. That will cost money. Shall I tell them that our friends on the other side are opposed to further expenditure? Shall I allow this port to be closed? I say again there is no use speaking in a vague way. Let hon. gentlemen opposite tell us what they object to. Sir, there are works going on in Collingwood and Goderich. Now, as to Goderich—I am sorry not to see my hon. friend from Leeds in his place—

Mr. TAYLOR. Here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am glad that he is present, and I hope he will stand corrected. He has repeatedly asserted that the contract for the rebuilding of the crib-work at Goderich was given to Mr. McGillicuddy without tender. I vainly told him that he was mistaken. Reading his speech—which was no very great fun—I found out that he repeatedly said there was no tender in this case. What are the facts? The contract was awarded to Mr. Madigan, who was the lowest tenderer. My chief engineer reported that the price was so low that the work could not be done for the money. Still, Mr. Madigan had made his deposit, and I gave him the work. He could not carry it out and he gave it up. My department asked for new public tenders, publishing the advertisement in about thirty papers. McGillicuddy & Smith tendered and their tender was found to be the lowest. They had made their deposit—I insisted on a large deposit, $5,000—and I awarded the contract to them. That is the whole story in a few words. Shall I stop the contract? Since dredging was done there, a new elevator has been built, besides the one already there, bringing additional traffic to the port. Now, we have work going on in Collingwood. My department is deepening that harbour. The present contract was given for $144,000. The Board of Trade of that place, the Grand Trunk Railway people, and Chicago capitalists have come to my department and have told me that if the Government can give them 20 feet of water in that port, they are prepared to build one or two, and perhaps three, additional elevators.

Shall I say: No, we won't spend any more money. The people of Toronto, the people from the great province of Ontario, come to my department, and come to the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, and say to us: Are you going to allow the trade of Canada, the great trade of the lakes to be permanently diverted from us? We have not given the despondent answer that our hon. friends opposite would have given. We have the results before us. I gave an additional depth to the port of Midland, and the result is that, if I am not mistaken, about eight or ten million bushels of grain have been handled during the last season; the result of next season will, doubtless, be far greater. During this season the Grand Trunk Railway will take from the port of Midland about 20,000,000 bushels of grain, as a result of the additional accommodation that we have given there. The work of deepening the harbour is going on. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance also reminds me, that there are smelting works to be erected at Midland. Messrs Drummond, McCall & Co. are going to establish works at Midland which will give employment to hundreds and hundreds of men. I also did some additional dredging at Kingston. When I inspected the port of Kingston, I found that for the last ten or twelve years the Government had been carrying on the work of deepening that harbour with hand implements, wasting a great deal of money. I took one of our powerful dredges, and, during the last session, have been able to give about 18 feet of water. The result has been, that 15,000,000 bushels of wheat have been handled in the port of Kingston, two additional elevators and a flour mill have been erected. The Kingston Board of Trade, the most influential citizens of both political parties, are applying to me for further accommodation. Shall we tell them, that we will not do anything? Shall we close the door? There is also the port of Burwell, there is the port of Dover, there is the port of Parry Sound, of Port Stanby, and there are some other ports which require our attention. I ask the hon. members opposite who come from the great province of Ontario, to rise above party spirit. We cannot go on with important public works without spending money; it is out of the question. But, Sir, Ontario is not the only province which requires attention at our hands. Look at the province of Quebec. A great and healthy agitation has taken place in reference to the port of Montreal, and we have at last come to a satisfactory agreement. I am glad to be able to inform the House and the country, that the plans for improving the port of Montreal have been agreed to, both for the east and for the west, and everybody is pleased. I shall not grieve over it. The port of Montreal has never received any help from the federal exchequer. The harbour commissioners have been carrying on their work by the income derived from tolls raised on the trade of the port. I do not know whether they will apply to this House or not. I hope they will be able to go on without asking any assistance from us, though I am not sure of that. But I ask this House and the country, if the time has not come when the port of Montreal should be made a genuine national harbour. The port of Montreal is the distributing point between the east and the west. Is it not a crying shame, that, out of about 50,000,000 tons of trade on the great lakes, on that magnificent reservoir of great lakes, we get scarcely anything, although our St. Lawrence route is the shortest? Are we not bound to make it the best? It is the shortest, and it is possible to make it the best. I say, that not only is it possible, but it can easily be done. Since taking this office, I have felt a deep interest in the transportation question. It is not a Montreal question; it is not a St. John or Halifax question; it is not a Toronto question; it is a national question, par excellence. We have the route at our disposal, the shortest route, and it is relatively easy to make it the best. I am now working, to the best of my ability, with the implements that were left by my predecessors, in deepening the St. Lawrence. During the last season, we never had less than 28½ feet of water in the St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal. Still, there remains a great deal of work to be done. If we want the biggest ships to be able to come to Montreal, to the distributing centre of the Dominion, without any danger, and without being obliged to pay too heavy an insurance, we must make a deep and safe channel in that river. My department is now engaged in this work. Big vessels coming from Europe up to Montreal and big vessels coming from the lakes to Montreal, mean cheap transportation, and cheap transportation means prosperity and development to the farmers of the west, to the manufacturers of the country, and to the community in general. The port of St. John and the port of Halifax cannot be overlooked. If we are going to be a nation, we must have our own winter ports. Are we going to depend for our national life on the ports of Portland, Boston and New York? If this Canadian nation is to grapple with the national question of transportation, it must be prepared to spend money. I ask this Parliament, on both sides, to give their best attention to this very important question. Then, there are other routes than the St. Lawrence that are worthy of consideration. A great deal has been said about the Georgian Bay Canal. I am not prepared to give my opinion to-day as to the best mode of carrying on that work, but I have no hesitation in saying, that, in my opinion, that project is worthy of all consideration. A good deal has been said also in reference to the Trent Valley system; a good deal has been said against the project. I made an inspection of that system during the last recess, and I have come down here as a convert: I am glad to say, that, in my opinion, the Trent Valley Canal work is not the building of a canal; it is the improvement of a magnificent system of lakes and waterways. It would be, in my humble judgment a fatal mistake and a blunder to think for a single moment of not proceeding with that work.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Will you push it through?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To the best of my ability, but of course I hope that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) will have enough influence on the other side of the House that they will not accuse us of crimes when we go on with the work. I alluded a minute ago to the port of Collingwood and to the proposed connection with the port of Toronto. A great deal of correspondence has been had with the Department of Public Works and with the Department of Railways and Canals about the construction of a piece of railway, 70 miles in length, between Collingwood and Toronto. Business men of great ability have represented to us that by the construction of that piece of railway, between Toronto and Collingwood, it will be possible to bring from the upper lakes an immense traffic to Toronto where that trade will be taken in Canadian bottoms through Canadian waters. I am not prepared to say that, or when that work should be carried out. It is something that requires money, but I say without hesitation that public men who would despise all these projects would not be worthy of public confidence. We are entering upon a new era; it is no use being afraid to spend some money. I am accused of spending too much money. What money can I spend that has not been voted by this Parliament? I cannot spend money that has not been voted here, but I am one of those who have unbounded confidence in the future of Canada. I have travelled a great deal since I took office ; I have to the best of my ability tried to acquaint myself with the circumstances of the country, and I say that we have a great future before us if only we are true to ourselves. Should we not divert from American channels the trade that has been taken away from us ? We cannot even handle our own Canadian trade. We have built the Canadian Pacific Railway at an immense cost, but that railway is taking wheat to Fort William, and from Fort William it goes in Canadian and American bottoms to American ports. That is what is taking place every day. The question is whether we are going to stop that or whether we are going to allow the trade of the country to be destroyed. We cannot stand still ; our neighbours are spending millions and millions of money. They have spent $25,000,000 in the port of New York, they have spent about $30,000,000 in the ports of Baltimore, Boston and Philadelphia, they are spending enormous sums of money. The country will ask, if we are spending money judiciously and honestly, and I think that if we are doing so, it will not hesitate one minute to spend all the money that is necessary to promote the progress and development of Canada. But who are these economists we have heard on the other side of this House ? The leader of the Opposition is posing as an economical man. When he took office he started his campaign by making speeches. He made a great speech in Winnipeg. I will not read his speech, although there are some features that deserve to be read. It was on the 8th of May, 1896, in answer to an address presented to him, his colleague, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald was present. He promised, first, to build the Hudson Bay Railway, a little item of about $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, and he also promised $1,000,000 for St. Andrew's Rapids. He promised moneys for other improvements, but when he had got to Port Coldwell he found that he had neglected to make any promise to the Manitoba and North-western Railway, and he wired back to Mr. Macdonald repairing the omission. He promised in the same speech to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway ; he promised in another speech to give a subsidy to the British Pacific Railway ; he promised in another speech to resuscitate the Chignecto Railway scheme involving the payment of $175,000 a year for 20 years. Well, Sir, did he promise something else ? The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), who is now in the House, will remember very well that in 1891 the leader of the Opposition made a celebrated speech in Quebec. As soon as he put his foot on Canadian soil he climbed up to the Citadel of Quebec and made a speech—a fine speech it was too—in which he solemnly promised to build the Quebec bridge. The Conservative party carried the election and the bridge was not built, but it meant $1,000,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Are you going to build it ?

Mr. TARTE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am delighted that my hon. friend has asked the question. We are going, I have no doubt, whatever, to keep our promises a great deal more faithfully than hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will add that unless Providence turns against this Government, which it has not done yet, the Quebec bridge will be built. But it means money ; the hon. member for Montmorency knows that it means money. Now, Sir, unless I am mistaken, when our estimates come to be discussed, there will be demands and requests and petitions from the other side of the House that we spend more money. Last session you will remember that nearly every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House got up and said : "Give me this and give me that." I am ready to give money, but give me money. I cannot give what I have not got.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What about the $1,000,000 to be given to the member for Quebec West ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We do things a little cheaper than the other regime. I hope that we will not spend money in Quebec as it has been spent in the past. If there are two men who know something about it, it is my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) and myself. Mind you, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has made all these promises.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What do they amount to ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). About forty million dollars, all told, but I am just taking the principal items, as I could not have time to detail the whole thing to-night. Our friends on the other side of the House were complaining that we are spending too much money, but nevertheless the leader of the Opposition reproached us most vehemently because we have not yet succeeded in establishing the fast line. Does he not know that the fast line would, on the basis of the proposal of the Conservative Government, entail an annual expenditure of $750,000. That is a very, very large sum of money. Take three-quarters of a million a year for the fast line, and $175,000 a year for the Chignecto Railway, and you will see that if all the promises I have pointed out had been implemented by the leader of the Opposition, how much money do they think this country would spend ? I say the hon. gentlemen opposite are not fair when they reproach us for our expenditure. If they intend to get any advantage out of it they must suppose that the electors of Canada have a shorter memory than they really have. Many accusations have been made against us in the course of this debate, but they were all of a general nature. Not a single specific charge was ventured by any hon. gentleman opposite. One of the accusations is that some of us have fallen into bad habits, and that we are travelling in private cars. Well, Sir, when I go to the old car Cumberland, I find myself quite at home, because I was there often before I was a Minister. Let me say only a word on this question. I believe that a special car should be properly called "an office on wheels." I would rather travel in public cars and not do any work than travel in a private car and be obliged to work all the time.

Mr. PRIOR. Then, why did you object when we were in power?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). My hon. friend will permit me to say that I never did object to it.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Your leader did, then.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Never—not a word against it.

Mr. PRIOR. The member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did.

Mr. J. McMULLEN (North Wellington). No.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What?

Mr. McMULLEN. I objected to the abuse of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I know too much about the work of a man occupying the position of Minister to object to it. I say without the least hesitation, that a Minister cannot travel too much. If my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) had travelled more; if he had gone oftener to the city of Montreal, we would not have had the Curran bridge affair. I repeat that Ministers cannot travel too much. They must, of course, attend to their office duties, but after the experience I have acquired, I state that the Minister who wants to understand his business has to travel, and to travel a great deal. I have travelled a great deal and have been reproached for it. As I have before stated, I do not travel on foot nor do I mean to do so. I always remember a remark made by Sir John A. Macdonald in this House. He was reproached for having paid $750 for his cab-hire, and he said, in his nice way: "The country has to pay for my cabs this year, and I am very much afraid the country will have to pay for them next year." Every one who has been a Minister knows that the salary of the office is more than inadequate to the obligations of the office, and if I as a Minister were asked to stay in my office and not to spend a dollar travelling, I would much rather read the reviews and books there, when I had some spare time, than go tramping on the wharfs and breakwaters of this country. It is no pleasure for me, but when I do so, I feel that I am doing my duty.

This Government has been reproached by gentlemen opposite for having spent a great deal of money in elections, and the hon. gentleman from Compton (Mr. Pope) has especially singled me out for violent attack with reference to this. Well, we have been travelling together in past days, and if he believes that I am not improved, he is quite mistaken. We have travelled together in elections in days past, and I think he might not have spoken of that. If there is a man who knows what amount of money has been spent in elections by the Conservative party—and all parties under a constitutional government spend money in elections—that man is my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope). He knows all about it. He is not in his seat now, and I shall not for that reason deal with the personal allusion he made to some of my family. I believe, Sir, he should not have made such an allusion. I will not retaliate on him, but I wish to say this, at all events: I have got sons; I hope they will live long; I did not give them any money, and if I were to die to-morrow, I am very much afraid that if they relied on being wealthy men from what I would leave them, there would not be very much left in their hands.

Now, Sir, we have been told that the hon. gentlemen opposite are organizing. On the 2nd of February last, there was published in the Montreal "Star," displayed in a very prominent place and surrounded by a border, the announcement that the Conservative party was organizing and that the money was piling up.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Lots of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). They have lots of it, as my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) says. He is a great organizer in Montreal; I suppose he is just as good there as he was in Quebec.

I would not fulfil my duty, Mr. Speaker, if I did not allude to some accusations which have been made against the province of Quebec in reference to the vote on prohibition. I am very sorry that some hon. gentlemen have thought proper to say that ballot stuffing, improper practices and so on, have been carried on in Quebec. If these gentlemen can substantiate these charges, why do they not do so? I say that they cannot prove their statements. I challenge any one of them to rise in his seat and to make specific accusations, and I promise that they will be answered immediately. There is not one solitary word of truth in what has been said in that connection. The vote in Quebec was a straightforward vote. Had we not the right to vote just as we liked; have we not the right to vote against prohibition? We may be mistaken in our views, but the province of Quebec is a peculiar province. There is no corner of the land where the love of liberty and freedom is more accentuated and pronounced than it is in that province.

The French habitant wants to be free, and he wants his neighbour to be free like himself. That is why he has voted against prohibition. I am proud to say that my countrymen do not drink more, if they do not drink less, than people in other parts of this Dominion. The French Canadians do not drink. They take their little 'coup d'appetit': I suppose that is allowed to them, as it is to people in other provinces. Sir, the vote has been straight; it has been honest; and it is unfair and unjust on the part of some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to reproach us with what they cannot prove. I was sorry the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) made himself the echo of those accusations. He, a gentleman of English origin, to whom the French electorate of Jacques Cartier have given their confidence and their mandate, should be the last man to rise in this House and decry the province to which he owes the position he occupies to-day. But that is not the only accusation that has been brought against our province. It has been said that we are appealing to prejudices—racial prejudices. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has said a word as to that; but the hon. gentleman who made the strongest statement was the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. Mark again, that hon. gentleman is of English origin, and he has been elected in a riding where four-fifths of the population are French. Is that an evidence that we are a prejudiced people? My hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Stenson) is not a French Canadian; yet he has been elected in a riding where the vast majority are French Canadians.

Mr. M. T. STENSON (Richmond and Wolfe). Three-fourths.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On many and many occasions have the French Canadians given their mandate to friends of English origin. It is a common thing in the province of Quebec to see an Englishman the mayor of a French parish. It is painful to us to be accused in that way; it is so unfair and so ungenerous. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that our brethren and friends from the other provinces will not side with our accusers. I trust and hope we are better known throughout this vast Dominion.

I will not say much on the negotiations at Washington.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Oh, yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend is a learned man, but he has still something to learn. Although there are men who are not apt to learn much, he is not one of them, I am glad to say. My hon. friend the leader of the Government has been reproached for not having succeeded in negotiating a treaty, because he had preached reciprocity. Sir, the story has been very soon forgotten. In 1871, Sir John A. Macdonald went to Washington to try to negotiate a treaty. What was the main object he tried to achieve? It was reciprocity. Read Pope's book; read the letters that were written by Sir John Macdonald to Sir Charles Tupper, the present leader of the Opposition, and to Sir George Etienne Cartier, and you will find that the main object Sir John Macdonald tried to achieve and could not achieve was reciprocity. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has reproached the Government to-day with not having succeeded, because, he said, "You have given away a lot of things that would have been useful to you." Read what Sir John Macdonald wrote to Sir Charles Tupper from Washington:

I am now satisfied that the repeal of the coal and salt duties in Canada has been the cause of the change of feeling here. The moment the coal and salt owners found that our market was open to them, they put the screws on their representatives at Washington.

In other words, his colleagues allowed the duty on salt and coal to be removed without his consent, and Sir John attributed to that action on their part his want of success at Washington. Yet, in the face of this fact, hon. gentlemen opposite have the temerity to reproach us with having lowered the duties on some articles. They are queer people. We have heard them time and again saying that we have not kept our promises—that the whole tariff has been allowed to remain as it was, that we are protectionists to the hilt. And now an hon. member reproaches us with having taken off $4,000,000 of taxation. Sir, my right hon. friend the leader of the Government and his colleagues who have taken part in the negotiations at Washington have returned to Canada in the full possession of the confidence of their countrymen, just as they had it when they left for Washington, if not more so. The letters of Sir John Macdonald that were published after his death, and that I hold in my hand, proved that he signed the treaty of 1871 against his own will. The hon. leader of the Opposition is not in his seat, but I will remind him of the action of himself and his colleagues on that occasion in Canada, when they instructed Sir John Macdonald not to sign the treaty, so bad they thought it was. But he thought proper to sign the treaty because he was so instructed by the Imperial Government. My right hon. friend was not in the same position as Sir John Macdonald. Sir John was the only Canadian representative in the negotiations of 1871, whereas in the negotiations which are now going on, the Canadian Government is represented by four and England by one. We have made some progress under this Liberal Government. We have become a nation, and England understands it, and treats us as a nation. The negotiations have not been closed; they have not yet come to a satisfactory issue. An adjournment has been agreed to by my right hon. friend and his Canadian colleagues and the representative of England. Never lose sight of the fact that England was represented at the table of negotiations, and if there has been a humiliation for us, there has been a humiliation for old England as well. But there has been no sort of humiliation. We are negotiating on difficult questions with a great nation. Six months are not so long, after all, and the negotiations are not yet closed. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that no adjournment should have taken place. Let the hon. leader of the Opposition and his colleagues read the letters of Sir John Macdonald, and they will find that Sir John himself suggested an adjournment in 1871.

I have only one word more to say, if I may be permitted, and that word in reference to myself. The Tory press and some of my friends in the House are kind enough to say that I rule this Government. When I read the utterances of the public press about me, I feel like being a proud man sometimes. Not only do I rule the right hon. Prime Minister, it appears, but I rule my colleagues—I drive them at my own will. And not alone do I rule this Government, but I rule the Government of Quebec. Why, I rule also the Government of Ontario—so these gentlemen say. Upon the life of me, I ask myself occasionally: When shall I begin to rule the British Empire? I am becoming ambitious.

My role has been a very simple one since I took office. I have devoted all my time and the little energy I possess to the duties of my department. Perhaps I may be permitted to add that I have given some attention to politics. I have meddled in some elections. Of course—I am a very unpopular man, especially in my native province of Quebec, everybody is against me, the clubs and everybody—still. Mr. Speaker, we have not lost one by-election in Quebec. I have taken some part in elections in Ontario, and we have been fortunate enough not to lose them either. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has been courteous to me. He has complimented me on my pluck. Well, there is not much courage required to stay where I am. I have good colleagues around me, who, I may say without undue pride, have confidence in me. I am surrounded by members of Parliament who are good enough to have confidence in me. My personal tastes—and I say it upon my word—would keep me out of this Chamber. I would rather be a newspaper man. I have said that repeatedly, and it is true. But my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked me to join him. He may have made a mistake. He is free to repair that mistake whenever he likes. If he should suggest to me to-morrow that somebody else in our ranks would do better work than I can do, not only should I go out not dissatisfied, but I would, from outside the Government, give him the same cordial and enthusiastic support that I give him now. My hon. friend from Montmorency has spoken of dissatisfaction with me among the clubs. As to one of the clubs in Montreal, I know that some of the fellows there came to me wanting positions—wanting pap. I had no pap to give them. One fellow particularly wanted a place, and when he did not get it, he went direct to the great Tory organ and got money, and now I am, with him, a most unpopular man, while he has the glory of being quoted by responsible men in this House as a leader of the party. Now, as I have said, the people in the province of Quebec, in all the villages and parishes, read both sides. And when they read preposterous statements such as some of those heard in this House, they will think: We cannot place confidence in men who will say such things. I give my opinion to my Conservative friends that they are very wrong in the policy they are pursuing. Parties do not last for all time. We are strong to-day, but the time will come when we shall be a little less strong. That is only fair. When we have been in office twenty-five years or so, that will be enough. But these gentlemen should not make statements which will lose them the confidence of the people for a century to come. Let them take their little medicine in patience. The Conservative party was twenty years in office. We have been scarcely two years and a half, yet these gentlemen do not want to allow us to proceed with our work. In my opinion, the electors do not sympathize with that kind of opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I must thank you and the hon. members of this House for the kind indulgence shown to me. I had not expected to speak so long.

Mr. WM. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I must, first and foremost, congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in this the hour of his triumph. To us who have watched that hon. gentleman for the last three years and have seen his faltering, timorous steps, and contrast them with what we see to-night, when we find him with all the bravado and braggadocio possible, defying those who would pull him down but a few years ago, it is plain that he is a fit object of congratulation. Behind the hon. gentleman for the past two or three years there have been cliques and intrigues. But one by one these intrigues have been overcome, one by one the intriguers have passed from the scene. First came the late hon. member for Centre Quebec, Mr. Langelier, who worked all day and planned all night to despoil the Minister of Public Works of his well-earned honours. Time passed and the hon. Minister relegated him to a judgeship. But, Sir, disappointed at seeing Langelier despatched from the scene, rather an inferior gentleman came forward in the person of Mr. Choquette. He, too, has been shifted from the scene. And to-day in the newspaper it is announced that the Minister's great rival, the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) is to be relegated to the position of postmaster for Montreal. Little wonder the Minister of Public Works glories in the fact that he is in fact the master of the Administration. And while he glorified himself in this fact, he threw out an intimation to the Premier and to hon. gentlemen behind him which they would do well to note, when he spoke of leaders not being safe in their seats. If there is a man in this country who knows that leaders are not always safe, it is the hon. Minister of Public Works, who, I regret to say, has left the Chamber. He stands to-day in the public life of Canada as the man who, after kissing the hand of one who gave him position, stabbed the man who had trusted and befriended him. He is the man who, night and day, preyed upon Sir Hector Langevin until he invaded the privacy of state secrets. Then, Cassius-like, he stabbed this Cæsar in the person of Sir Hector Langevin.

The Premier to-day knows full well that he sits on a gunpowder mine. A little while ago he was appealed to, to go to the city of Montreal on behalf of the Minister of Public Works, but instead of going he wrote a letter endorsing the position and the stand of that hon. gentleman; but when he found that would not suffice, he was forced to go there in person and plead for the Minister of Public Works in the extremity in which he found him. But that has all passed away, and the Minister of Public Works to-night has defied all who sit behind him. Sir, I think he is to be congratulated on the position he has attained. Coming into Parliament with prejudices against him, he has sprung into a position which is astonishing when we remember how his reputation had been blackened by the basest of all calumnies, ingratitude, and he now finds himself at a single bound the master of an Administration, and the master of the party that sits on the Government benches to-day. But while the Minister of Public Works has been applauded to the echo, I have seen to-night on that side of the House faces that were not glowing with enthusiasm, faces that were blackened with scowls when they heard the Minister of Public Works throwing out his notes of defiance, and those who are the men who represent the stern, honest, unbending, uncompromising Liberalism of the province of Ontario. Little wonder is it that sitting to-night behind the Government are men who will applaud every utterance of a Minister, afraid to stand up in their places as one by one the positions are indicated that these men are to fill. I know that in the innermost recesses of the Premier's heart he would sooner have the applause and commendation of a few men like the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) than all the applause of the hangers on that endeavour to be foisted into positions. Why, Sir, what has been the course of this Administration in this debate? Man after man has risen on this side of the House and has assailed the Government. The Premier himself, so strong and startling was the indictment brought against him, was unable to reply to the criticisms of the leader of the Opposition, was forced to go off for a day and endeavour to formulate some defence. And then be it said, not to the credit of the leader of the Government, he came back, not in the spirit of fair argument, but in the spirit of animus and of anger that ill-became him, showing that the hon. gentleman's armour had been pricked in a very vulnerable part. Now, Sir, to go into some of the matters that were touched on by the Minister of Public Works. I do not intend to follow him through the bulk of his utterances, remarks that had nothing whatever to do with the matters that have been introduced into the Address, but those matters which alone constitute the stock in trade of the Minister of Public Works, questions of race and religion. I am not here to-night to resurrect the dead issues of the Remedial School Bill, but I have this to say, that among the men from the province of Quebec who applauded the sentiments of the Minister of Public Works, I did not find the Solicitor General nodding acquiescence, for the reason that the Solicitor General is a man of ability, is a man who looks forward to political preferment, and is not prepared to stable himself in some petty position, and jeopardize the political future that he believes awaits him. The Minister of Public Works went into questions of expenditure. But these hon. gentlemen must remember that they stand to-day before the people of Canada, not only advocating that the expenditure to-day is correct, but that the expenditure of past years have been grossly excessive, grossly outrageous. Why, the First Minister went through the province of Ontario, year after year, he was followed by his present Minister of Justice, and followed by other hon. gentlemen who are allied with him to-day. What was the burden of their song? Why, the burden of their song was that the expenditure in every department of state was grossly excessive, and that if they were permitted to have access to the council chambers of the nation, and were given the reins of power, there would be shown a decrease in the expenditure of this country—not only of $4,000,000, but some of them went even as high as $6,000,000. And to-day, after all their pledges, after all their promises, little wonder is it that the Premier a little while ago, met in the city of Montreal a large deputation from the Eastern Townships, headed by the editor of that influential eastern journal, the Huntingdon "Gleaner;" and there these men demurred, and demanded that the Premier should carry out some of the pledges that he had made in reference to the expenditure. The Premier must not imagine that the people—and I am speaking now particularly for the province of Ontario—are to be hoodwinked; he must not imagine that after having gone through that province and after his Ministers had gone through that province making these promises, they can go back to-day and stultify themselves in the manner that they are doing. Because those hon. gentlemen are not only bound by the promises that they made, but they are bound by the resolutions that were placed upon the records of this House, declaring that if they were given an opportunity for retrenchment, retrenchment would commence at once. Where is the Premier to-day, and those who are associated with him? Instead of the expenditure being some 34 odd million dollars, it has sprung up to $40,000,000. Why, the Minister of Public Works says, do you not from time to time challenge this expenditure in the House. He gave one instance, that of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I say there was no opportunity afforded of differing with the Government on that question. When the Government brought down their proposition to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway it was accepted by this side of the House, as we thought it was in the interest of the Dominion that that railway should be gone on with. But we found that the Government were going to undertake it themselves, then this side of the House jumped at the opportunity of giving a bonus rather than that the chance should be given to those hon. gentlemen, headed by the Minister of Public Works and the rest, to undertake the construction of a large public work which would incur an expenditure of millions of dollars. But, Sir, time has proved how wise and how provident it was that the work was not undertaken by the Government, when we look about it and see some of the expenditures that have been made by these hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentleman then went on to instance the case of the Collingwood harbour grant, and said that we made no demur on this side. I challenge the Minister of Public Works in this. When he came down to the House a couple of years ago and stated that a contract was being entered into for $144,000 for that work, I then asked him, and the "Hansard" will bear out my statement, whether that was to complete the work. Why, Sir, what was the result? The $144,000 that had been spent in the Collingwood harbour might as well have been thrown into the sea. And to-day the Minister of Public Works will and must come down to this House, in fulfilment of the pledge that he has made, and ask this House, in order to follow up that work and make it accessible for the boats sailing on the upper lakes, not merely to expend $144,000 but $1,000,000 before that work can be consummated. There is a case of stupid blundering in the hon. gentleman's department, undertaking a work which to-day practically amounts to nothing. Then the hon. gentleman went on and said that they had spent money because we would not demur to it. Why, look at the reckless waste there was in spending the $250,000 on the plebiscite vote. What was that done for? The hon. gentleman has referred to carrying out the pledges of this Government. To-day in this Dominion, the public have been despoiled to the tune of $250,000, expended in the taking of that vote. Nothing has been accomplished beyond the distribution of a large amount of Government patronage among their friends. Now, Sir, I am not going to follow that hon. gentleman through all the list of figures and matters that he spoke about. Suffice it to say, that those hon. gentlemen stand before the people convicted in this, that they have not carried out the promise they made to the people of retrenchment and economy. The opportunity has been afforded to them, and when the time does come, that such of those hon. members as I see sitting before me who have not been provided with positions under the Crown, have to meet the electors, they will have to answer for the breach of trust of which they are guilty in this respect. The Minister of Public Works touched upon the Senate, and I should say, that, of all men, it comes most properly from him that the Senate should be touched upon. Master of the Administration, as the Minister of Public Works is, he entirely sets at defiance the Ministers sitting about him, and two years ago we saw him usurping the position of the Minister of Railways and Canals and taking upon himself, in the discharge of his assumed duties, the handling of what is known as the Intercolonial Railway deal. What was the result of that? The country has been saved over a million of dollars on that deal already, but had this hon. gentleman been permitted to go on with this scheme and to carry it out in its entirety, as the figures compiled show, there would have been saddled upon the people a charge of $7,000,000 for all time to come. But, worse than all that. Before the House there was the question of the expenditure, and there would have been the other question as to the desirability of taking over the Drummond County Railway. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has assumed the responsibility of that action, but the whole Ministry stand here committed to the scheme of taking over this Drummond County Railway and making this arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for running from a point on their line to Montreal. The absurdity of their position was recently pointed out in a letter to the "Globe" by the hon. member for Halifax, who discussed the endeavour of the Government to foist upon the people that line of railway. What would the result have been, if the Government had purchased that railway, and it had become part and parcel of the Intercolonial Railway system? There are to-day running into Montreal from western points the lines of the Grand Trunk Railway and of the Canadian Pacific Railway companies. The Grand Trunk Railway Company has one terminus at Montreal and another terminus at Portland. The Canadian Pacific Railway has its terminus not only at Montreal, but also at St. John, and yet the Minister of Public Works—because, after all said and done, it was he, and not the Minister of Railways, who was engineering the scheme through the House—undertakes to foist upon the people and upon this House a proposition by which they would have a seaport also at St. John. A reference to the figures will show the absurdity of this scheme. From Montreal to St. John it is 481 miles by the Canadian Pacific Railway; by the Intercolonial Railway it is 740 miles. From Montreal to Portland by the Grand Trunk Railway it is 297 miles. What was it that this business Government were going to do? They were going to get railway connection into the port of Montreal; then, when they had secured that, they expected to get freight from there to the seaport of St. John, because Montreal would, of course, during the winter season, be closed. The position then would have been this. They represented the Intercolonial Railway; the Minister of Railways would have to approach a shipper who had shipped his merchandise to Montreal by the Grand Trunk Railway, and say to him: You have brought your goods here by the Grand Trunk Railway? Now, let us take them to an ocean port over a road 740 miles from Montreal to St. John. The Grand Trunk shipper would have told him at once what folly it would be to ship goods 740 miles, when he could have them carried to Portland via the Grand Trunk Railway, with a mileage of 297. One would have imagined, that men claiming to be the members of a business Government, would have looked into these figures. The merest tyro in business would never expect, that a shipper would choose a route 740 miles long in preference to one 297 miles long. But, failing to secure the business of the Grand Trunk shipper, the Minister would next go to the man who had brought his freight to Montreal by the Canadian Pacific Railway line. An appeal would be made to him to have his goods carried 740 miles instead of 481 by the Canadian Pacific Railway to St. John. What has been the result? This remarkable scheme has been in operation for the past year, and the loss has been upwards of $150,000. And here is the Intercolonial Railway, which, under the management of the late Administration, was earning $50,000 a year, going into the hole further and further under this business-like arrangement of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Let us come down to the question of the Senate. The Senate cost this country about 3 cents per head per year, and these hon. gentlemen ask the people to abolish that body, which, in a single year, saved millions of dollars, while, in the matter of the Yukon deal, the country would have been despoiled of an asset which cannot be calculated in point of value, but for the action of the Senate. These hon. gentlemen have had an opportunity of pronouncing upon the Senate, but they must sooner or later appeal to the people of the Dominion. The Ministers care not one iota for the clacking and applause of the hon. gentlemen who sit behind them, and I may tell hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that we care even less than they do. We never do hope to effect any conversions on that side of the House, but it is the electors that we hope to convince, and from now until this House closes I hope every hon. gentleman will avail himself of every opportunity of expressing his opinion of the course of the Government, despite any protest which may be made as to the time of the debate being lengthened, and that they will lay before the people facts and figures to show how they are being hoodwinked and humbugged by this business Administration.

Coming down to the question of the Yukon Railway, the First Minister got very warm the other night. It is seldom that the hon. gentleman loses his head so completely as he lost it then. In opposition he was a mild-mannered man, but like the hon. Minister of Public Works, his head has rather run away with him, and the other night he undertook to read a lecture to some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. He stated that the throwing out of the Yukon Bill by the Senate had been a criminal act. I ask the right hon. gentleman, if the throwing out of that Bill by the Senate was a criminal act, was it not even more criminal in members of this House to vote against that Bill? I ask the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson), who is an independent member of this House, how he likes to be branded as one of the criminals. The right hon. Prime Minister knows that the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Erb) voted against him on that occasion, and there is no doubt that he would prefer to have had the votes of these gentlemen, rather than the votes of Mr. Lister, Mr. Langelier, and other gentlemen, who were going out with positions in their pockets. The country sees how these votes have gone, and it to-day endorses the stand taken by the Senate on the Yukon Bill. Why, not only was the Yukon Bill not endorsed in the Senate of Canada, but it was not endorsed in the independent press of this country. Even such a warm friend and ally of the Prime Minister as the Hon. Joseph Martin, of British Columbia, has denounced the so-called Yukon scheme, the Mann-Mackenzie deal, to be one of the most absurd things ever attempted to be perpetrated in this country. The Senate must go. Is the cry of the Minister of Public Works. Well, the Senate will live for a long time, and that is saying a good deal more than I think of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) as a politician. I believe the day will come when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) will revolt against his leader. It is his second nature to be disloyal. He was disloyal to Sir Hector Langevin, who first brought him into prominence, and the man who to-day will try to hit the Minister of Public Works, will be slapped back with double force and violence. That is the reason why to-night the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), having swept away all the opposition against him, glories in the fact that he is a Minister in this administration, and that he is there to stay; at least as long as this Government stays.

These hon. gentlemen opposite have been masquerading in this country with promises of so-called reforms, and in the Speech from the Throne there is foreshadowed what is known as a redistribution Bill. I shall not enter into the question now as to whether this is, or is not, the proper time for a redistribution of the electoral divisions in this country. The question I ask of the Government now is: what do they propose in this regard. The Prime Minister indulged in a good deal of mock heroic style in appealing to his creator as a witness to the justice of the action he would take in this matter. Sir, I will be bound to say that when that Bill is submitted to the House, there will be little proof of any higher power being concerned in it than the average peddling politician. Why, I can tell the Government to-day what will be in the Bill, so far as my riding is concerned. It has been rumoured for weeks what the change in East Simcoe will be, and that change will please the hon. gentleman from Huron, because it is a delightful scheme and will help to kill off the Tories in his constituency. It is stated that they are even going to split up a township, county lines will be adhered to, but township lines are to be cut in twain. I will be much surprised, and the Liberal party in East Simcoe will be much disappointed, if the township of Tiny is not split in half, and the southern, or strong Conservative part, put in the riding of North Simcoe.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). That will be a "tiny" blunder.

Mr. BENNETT. It may be as my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) suggests, but I will tell those hon. gentlemen opposite that there is yet some public opinion left in the country, and that kind of thing cannot go on. The public opinion that to-day is revolting in the Eastern Townships against the Government, and the public opinion that is being pronounced in the province of Manitoba against them, is pretty general throughout the whole Dominion. They had a warning in the results of the last elections in the province of Ontario, and speaking about that province, I might say that these gentlemen pay a very poor compliment to the county divisions of Ontario for legislative purposes. Why do they not divide the province of Ontario for federal exactly as it is divided for provincial purposes. The number of seats are practically the same, and it could be very easily done. But, Sir, infamous and outrageous as is the distribution in Ontario for provincial purposes, I venture to say that it will pale into utter insignificance compared with the scheme that will be introduced into this House by the present Government.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). You had better wait until you get the Bill.

Mr. BENNETT. I have no idea whatever that any particular kind of fairness would be introduced into that Bill by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). I feel quite sure that if any finishing touches are required on that Bill, to make it excessively bad, these finishing touches will be furnished by that hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell). First and foremost then, Mr. Speaker, this Liberal gerrymander Bill is to be worse than the law which now exists in the province of Ontario. That goes without saying, or else the Government would announce to-day, that Ontario would be divided as it is for the legislative assembly. They are afraid to take the constituencies as they exist for local purposes, and so the result must be that the Government intends to cut and carve and twist the province of Ontario, despite the pious ejaculations of the Prime Minister.

Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches are rather in a composed mood on the plebiscite question, and they seem to think that all is well. I can tell them that I do not think it is so well for them in the province of Ontario, for the strongest in denunciation of the tricks played by the Government on the temperance people is the Liberal press in my own constituency. There is in East Simcoe a township which stands second to none in point of intelligence in the province of Ontario. It is a township that has within its borders a single hotel license, and although I regret to say that township is strongly Liberal, still in point of intelligence it cannot be surpassed in the whole province. If there is one part of that township with stronger Liberal tendencies than another it is the part known as Rugby Post Office, and for the edification of the Premier I will read what a correspondent from that place says with regard to the Prime Minister of Canada. It is as follows:—

The recent answer of the Premier to the temperance delegation that waited on him last fall, in the interest of prohibition,—

I am sorry to see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is going out of the Chamber at the very idea of prohibition.

—may not be much of a surprise to some, and the best of good news to others, still to us who asked for prohibition, and only got the plebiscite, it is discouraging, to say the least, after spending our time and money on it. And, moreover, let him take warning that if he fails to fulfil his promise there are thousands of us who will vote against him at the next election.

From another point in the same township the following is written :—

Sir Wilfrid's reply to the secretary of the Dominion Alliance in regard to the action, or rather inaction of the Federal Government respecting the verdict of the electorate at the recent plebiscite, must savour of broken pledges and disappointment to temperance advocates, who were led to expect better things at the hands of the party leaders, more especially as the Premier himself boldly asserted after the vote had been taken that the mandate of the people would be respected. The mandate of the minority we presume was intended. Out of 148 English speaking constituencies in the Dominion the prohibitionists carried 120 with average majorities of over 1,042, and yet the Government are handicapped for the want of a more definite expression of the people to legislate in the matter. We have had plebiscites galore—every English speaking province in the confederation and the Dominion as a whole have declared for prohibition with no uncertain sound, yet our rulers prefer to toy with the wishes of the masses, while they shrink the responsibility and seek an exit through some trifling technicality, in order to pander to the liquor interests. The ruling is hardly consistent with the pledges made at Liberal conventions prior to the election, which was prophesied at the time was promulgated in order to pull the wool over the eyes of confiding electors.

Now, Sir, what was the stand taken by the Liberal leaders on this question of prohibition? When they had their famous convention in the city of Ottawa, we were told that among the sinners who were assembled on that occasion there were at least a few saints; at all events, saints on the temperance question, and these gentlemen made a demand that there should be inserted in the platform of the Liberal party a clause to the effect that a plebiscite should be taken in the event of the Liberal party coming into power.

Well, Sir, what happened? The vote was taken and a good, fair majority was polled in favour of that measure; and as a result the temperance people throughout this Dominion expected that the hon. gentleman would carry out some of the pledges and promises that had been made. Even at the risk of wearying the House, I must read some of the pledges made by the present Premier when going throughout the province of Ontario and endeavouring to enlist the sympathies of the temperance people. The Premier spoke at different points in the province, and at each point he found the temperance people alive to the promises and pledges which had been made by the Liberal party on that question. Speaking at one of these meetings, I think at Perth, the Premier, when asked by the Rev. Mr. Huxtable, a Methodist minister, as to what the position of the Liberal party would be after coming into power, replied as follows :—

Mr. BENNETT.

The Liberal party has pledged itself in convention at Ottawa that whenever in power they would take a plebiscite on the liquor question, as to whether the people want a prohibitory liquor law or not. The answer is not in my hands, it is in the hands of the people, and, according to their answer, such legislation they will have at the hands of the Government.

And poor innocent Mr. Huxtable went away believing that the Premier really meant what he said. At Stratford the Premier addressed a large number of people. There again the temperance feeling was strongly predominant, and in response to a question as to his stand on the temperance question, he made this reply :

Up to this moment the question of prohibition has never been approached by electors free from other considerations. We deem it wiser to separate it from all other considerations, and to test the public feeling on the matter, we shall do so when we come into office, as I believe we shall. Then I am asked, what is to be done? The answer is plain. I am by nature a democrat. I believe in democratic government, and above all in a constitutional government, and the only way to act under a democratic and constitutional government is that the people must govern, and their command must be obeyed. As the people shall speak so shall be the duty of the Government, if that Government be in the hands of the Liberal party.

The Premier journeyed on from one point to another, and at the town of Listowel, addressing another meeting, he made this statement :

We deem it wiser to separate it from all other considerations, and to test the public feeling on the matter, we shall do so when we come into office, as I believe we shall. Then I am asked what is to be done. The answer is plain. I am by nature a democrat; I believe in democratic government, and above all in constitutional government, and the only way to act under a democratic and constitutional government is that the people must govern, and their command must be obeyed. As the people shall speak, so shall be the duty of the Government, if that Government be in the hands of the Liberal party.

Then, as the hon. gentleman got still further west his enthusiasm for the temperance cause seemed to grow; and, addressing the people of Winnipeg at a large meeting, he said :

He would pledge his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power in Ottawa they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

But times have changed altogether with the Premier. The vote has been taken; and here, to the astonishment and amazement of the temperance people of this country.

the Premier informs the House and the country that while he was making these statements and pledging his solemn honour, he and his party were practising on the people of this country a piece of duplicity and a piece of trickery, because, he says, "While I made those pledges, I never stated the whole truth"—and half truths are dangerous. "It is true," he says, "I made these statements and promised that my Government, if we came into power, would introduce a prohibitory Bill." When the Liberal convention met at Ottawa, this is what happened; but this was studiously kept back from the temperance people. Surely the hon. gentleman must imagine that the people are fools to be hoodwinked in this manner. "It is true," he says, "that I gave that pledge, but when I did so there was another understating altogether." I say it was the bounden duty of the right hon. gentleman to tell the people what the true position of himself and his party was. I am going to repeat his own words as reported in "Hansard" the other day as to what the stand of the party was in the Liberal convention held in Ottawa. He said:

The prohibitionists represented to us that intemperance was one of the great evils, as we know, and that we ought to struggle with it at once by making prohibition a plank in the party platform; declaring that the people were with them, and that if the people themselves had an opportunity to pronounce upon the question they would emphatically pronounce in favour of such a policy. The opposite view was also put forward; and the result was that a resolution was introduced and inserted in the platform, by which the party pledged themselves that if they came into office they would have a plebiscite on the question of prohibition, so as to obtain the honest, unbiased opinion of the people on that great question. Let me say this: When we put that plank into our platform, there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it should be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand, there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party.

Well, Sir, there was one gentleman present on that occasion, the present hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and I am doing him no injustice when I say that to a great extent his stock-in-trade as a public man has been that he was an earnest advocate of temperance; and I think every man on this side of the House and also on that side for that matter, will join me in congratulating the hon. gentleman, especially in the company he is now in, on having that tendency. Well, where was the Minister of Agriculture? He attended a large meeting in the city of Ottawa; he saw earnest men and earnest women there working and striving for this cause. Did he say to the people there: "Now, my friends, let me tell you the honest truth about this matter. There is a contract between the members of the Liberal party that unless we get a large majority there will be no prohibition Act." Not at all; not a word was said about it; and to-day there is a complaint, and it is an honest complaint, on the part of all the temperance people in this country, save and except, of course, such men as the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), whose sails apparently are set for any breeze, whether it is light or heavy. It is well known that temperance people are asking this Government to-day what they mean by the pledges they made, and they are going to ask the Premier if all his statements are to be found as utterly unreliable as his statements in this regard have been. The other night the Premier made the statement that not less than 23 per cent pronounced in favour of having a prohibitory law in this country. I would like to ask the right hon. First Minister, if he will be good enough to answer the question, whether that computation was made on the provincial lists or on the federal lists.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). On the provincial lists.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I have not had an opportunity of going into the figures for the whole Dominion; but I can tell the hon. First Minister that in the riding which I have the honour to represent the vote on that occasion stood this way: For the plebiscite there were 2,500 votes, and against it 2,297, or a total of 4,797, while the number on the list was 9,613. It is plain that over 50 per cent of the vote was cast on one side or the other. But the people of this country were never told that that was to be the arrangement, they were simply informed by the Premier and his statements have been read in the House—and the First Minister nods acquiescence that he was not misreported in the newspaper—that if there was a majority in favour of prohibition, though it cost the Liberal party power, they would carry out their pledge. When the Bill was brought in the Premier placed himself plainly on record:

I have often said, and I repeat here, when the will of the people has been affirmed one way or the other, then the Government must be prepared to abide by the consequences. We must be governed by the majority.

Where is mention made of 50 per cent of the total vote there? Let me show how absurd and unfair it would be to ask that there should be 50 per cent of the vote in the affirmative. Let me give the figures recorded in the general election of 1896 of the riding of East Simcoe. The number cast was 6,501, out of a total of 11,010 on the list. Every man knows that it is impossible to poll on one side of a question 50 per cent of the voters on a list. The duty of this hon. gentleman was this: He had pledged his word and his honour to the country that if the temperance people succeeded in carrying a majority of the votes, a prohibition measure would be enacted. But, if he choose, he could change front and say: I made a statement as to the legislation that should be given under certain circumstances, but it must be understood that there shall be at least 50 per cent of the total vote in favour of it. But if the First Minister's position is to be condemned, what is to be said of those hon. gentlemen who attend that convention representing especially the prohibition sentiment, notably the hon. Minister of Agriculture and several of the members of the House, who did not honestly disclose to the temperance people of this country the terms and conditions on which the battle was to be fought. And the fact is, as shown by what I have read from the Orillia "Times," there is to-day among the earnest and honest temperance people, not only in East Simcoe but throughout this province and throughout the Dominion, a deep feeling of protest against the duplicity and trickery practiced upon them by this Administration.

Now, Sir, if hon. gentlemen opposite have masqueraded through the country on one question more than another, it was on the tariff question. Twenty years have passed since party lines were clearly drawn on the tariff question. Hon. gentlemen opposite, after four or five years power under the Mackenzie Government, found themselves in Opposition, and a party in power with a well-known and clearly-defined policy—the policy of protection to native industries as against revenue tariff, free trade or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Year after year these hon. gentlemen who are now in power carried on their attacks against the administration policy. One by one they formulated different lines of policy. But there was one thing ever certain and ever present in their minds, and that was that they were strongly adverse to a protective tariff. And so we find that while they were moving about the country these hon. gentlemen, unfortunately for themselves in the light of recent events, made pledges and statements in reference to the ground they would take; and I am going to read for the edification of the House, even at the risk of trespassing on the time of Government members, some of the statements made by these hon. gentlemen. The Premier spoke in Oakville in 1888, and on that occasion he said, referring to the trade policy:

Sir, what must be the new departure? Sir Richard Cartwright indicated it during last session. Mr. BENNETT.

sion. We have tried the policy of restriction and failed, let us try the policy of expansion. The policy propounded by Sir Richard Cartwright is that we should have unrestricted reciprocity with the sixty millions of men on the other side of the line. That policy is that we should open as wide as we can all the avenues of trade between the two nations.

Further on he said this:

When Sir Richard Cartwright proposed his resolution last session he knew it would be defeated. He will renew it next session, and he knows that it will be defeated then; he will renew it the session after that, and he knows that it will be defeated. He will renew it again and again, but in the meantime, there will be a general election, and we believe that the result of that election will be the return of a majority, whether Conservatives or Reformers, pledged to support a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States. This is the policy which we have to place before the people. There are other issues, there are other questions, but every other question must take a back seat, and leave the first place to unrestricted reciprocity.

Further than that, the hon. gentleman said:

They (the Conservatives) want to have no reciprocity with the United States, the great nation to the south of us, for fear that we might be seduced from our allegiance to the mother country. But they are ready, they say, for reciprocity with Great Britain. I have only this to say. I say it openly, I say it on my own responsibility, and I believe I can speak as well for the Liberal party. If reciprocity with Great Britain is practicable, I am in favour of it; but Britain is 3,000 miles away, and the Americans are just to the south of us. They are our near neighbours. There is not a natural barrier between us.

And further on:

We have heard the statement made in the House by Mr. McCarthy and others that perhaps Great Britain might resort to protection, might tax foreign products and exempt Canada. Well, if this were offered, I say I am ready for it. If we can persuade the English people to put import taxes upon the productions of every other country but Canada, and to admit the products of Canada free, I am in favour of that. But I am afraid it will take some years before we can persuade the British workman to tax his bread, even to oblige his Canadian brother.

At Oakville, he said further:

Well, I have only this to say: It is a great argument in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, because, if it means anything at all, it means that the change will be so advantageous to the people that they will want to go into still closer union with the United States.

Now, that was the position hon. gentlemen took for years, and they made statements and pledges throughout the country. There seem to be some pangs of conscience among these hon. gentlemen. Some of them demurred to broken pledges, and it is sad to see the punishment that is meted out to such offenders. There is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). He made pledges to his constituents, and he is apparently an hon. gentleman who thinks, in the discharge of his public duties, there should be some attempt at least to act in the public interest. So that the hon. gentleman who is, unfortunately for the Liberal party in control of a newspaper in Winnipeg, has seen fit to lecture these gentlemen in that newspaper on broken pledges and unfulfilled promises. And what was the result? The other day he was practically read out of the party, because he saw fit to give expression to his opinions. Well, all I can say is as I have said, that we do not hope to affect votes on the other side. We have nothing to offer for votes, nothing to offer for gentlemen on that side to change their opinions. And, speaking of changes in opinion, this House has been treated to a sight in the present session that, I hope and trust for the honour and good name of Canadian politics will never again be seen. We saw an hon. gentleman sitting on this side who had been elected as a Liberal-Conservative in opposition to hon. gentlemen opposite, and we see that hon. gentleman cross over and take his seat with hon. gentlemen opposite. I have only this to say—I do not know who is worse, when goods are stolen, the receiver or the thief. My sympathy goes, as a rule, to the thief, because he is a weak-minded party. But to the receiver severe punishment should be meted out. Well, we are well rid of him and hon. gentlemen opposite are very welcome to him.

Now, the Premier, speaking the other day, said that these were not serious matters at all, that it was simply idling away the time of serious men to talk about such affairs as the tariff at so much length. Sir, does the Premier and his friends think they can make all these pledges, all these promises, and then snap their fingers at the people who placed them in power? The Premier does not believe in that at all, but he is endeavouring to read a lecture to the rest of his followers, such as has been read to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), lest some more of them would break into open rupture and do what the Huntingdon "Gleaner" and what the hon. member for Lisgar are doing. There are disaffected but straightforward Liberals, who, from one end of this Dominion to the other, are dissatisfied with the gentlemen who are in power to-day. A couple of years ago the Minister of Finance threw out a note of warning to the manufacturers. He told the manufacturers that if they wished to have their rights they must be eternally vigilant. But, lo and behold, for the edification of the whole Liberal party, the other day, speaking in the town of Perth, the Minister of the Interior made the startling statement that the tariff to-day is fixed, and fixed practically for all time to come—a dead issue. How can these hon. gentlemen hope to reconcile all their statements? No less a personage than the Premier himself, in speaking in the House the other day, said:—

We have reformed the tariff to the great satisfaction of the majority of both the producers and consumers.

Well, the result of this change of front is that these gentlemen have abandoned every principle that they laid down when they were in Opposition; they have abandoned all the pledges they made to the voters who supported them throughout the country. They must stand or fall on their record, and I am bound to say that from this side of the House they will at all times, and on all occasions, be reminded of their broken pledges and of their unfulfilled promises. But while the Premier says that the tariff is satisfactory to-day to the people, he says that certain changes have been brought about in this country which have resulted in making it a most satisfactory tariff, and the great point that he brings to bear is that they have established a system of cold storage with England. Well, Sir, I see the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) who has been persistent on the question of the removal of the lumber duties between this country and the United States; the hon. member for Russell no doubt is now told, and the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Mackie), and those hon. gentlemen whose constituencies are largely interested in the lumber business, are told now, when they remonstrate against the tariff, that the tariff is satisfactory, and that they cannot ask for anything better in the lumber business, because they have cold storage to England, as if cold storage had anything to do with the lumber business. Then these hon. gentlemen who live on the border counties, like the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan), and some of the hon. members on the Lake of Ontario, whose constituents have been told that the only natural market for their horses, for their barley, and for their hay, is that of the United States—these hon. gentlemen are told now: You do not need anything better, you do not want any foreign market, because we have got cold storage. This is indeed a statesmanlike explanation of the question, and probably the Premier is well satisfied, seeing the applause that greeted his efforts the other day in explaining that matter. But I do not think the electors of this country are going to be so easily satisfied with their explanations. The electors are going to look to something else, they are going to look to the merits of the case. And when we see the electors are alive, and that they are prepared to deal with these questions on their merits, the Minister of Public Works announces with a flourish of trumpets that there have been by-elections, and the electors have pronounced in their favour. Well, Sir, I regret to say to-day that in the province of Ontario there has been reached a state of depravity lower than has been touched for years and years; and I trust and hope that the public sentiment may be in the ascendant in the next few years. An hon. gentleman near me says New Brunswick is worse. Well, all I can say is, Providence help New Brunswick if it is worse than Ontario to-day. I have taken an interest in some of the local elections that have been held in the province of Ontario ; I have taken an interest in the last election that was held in the riding of West Huron ; and I have only to say, if public opinion has got down to the state where, as the "Globe" says, in every constituency in Ontario there are a certain number of electors who can be bought, and that the Liberal party are going to buy them, then I can only say, that it is high time that the manhood of the men of Ontario asserted itself. The Minister of Public Works to-night speaks here in a vaunting tone about the West Huron elections. Of all the elections in the world that was the last election that should be referred to. Why, Sir, how was that riding carried ? So desperate were the chances of the Government in that riding that the members of the administration in the province of Ontario pronounced themselves helpless to stem the tide of indignation that had set in there. Then the Minister of Public Works came in post haste, and when the Minister of Public Works goes into a riding, why, something has to give. I do not know who he had in his following—

Mr. BENNETT. It is a startling commentary on the present condition of public affairs that in that great riding of West Huron, one of the richest ridings in the province of Ontario, the stern uncompromising Liberals like the hon. member for North Wentworth were not there ; not there with arguments ; but the hon. member for Bellechasse, all the way from the province of Quebec—

An hon. MEMBER. Are there any French in the riding ?

Mr. BENNETT. There was not a Frenchman in the riding. I was assured, but there was the Minister of Public Works, doing what ? Telling the people of Goderich what the Attorney General of the province of Ontario told the people of Owen Sound when the Minister of Customs was elected there a few years ago, telling them in effect that grass would grow in the streets of Goderich if they did not support the Government candidate. Those were the promises that were made. The people in that town were terrorized. They had a harbour there, that, as the Minister of Public Works says, requires a great deal of money to be expended upon it. There is a large elevator built there, and the people of that town knew well that a public expenditure would be to their advantage. And there was this paragon of excellence, this innocent Minister of Public Works, in that riding, owing to the fact that the Ministers from Ontario had announced themselves as being powerless to stem the tide of indignation. What was the result in the townships where the honest yeomen of West Huron were to be met with ? I was through that riding a good deal, and you could not go to a country hotel and wait there for a meeting, but that you would see a gang in the riding, and the same gang has been taken around from one riding of Ontario into another, disgracing it and debauching it. Worse than that I am informed and believe that the same outrages were perpetrated in that riding on the ballot boxes, that were perpetrated in the riding of West Elgin for the local election a little time ago, because I am not able to believe that in an intelligent riding like West Huron there were 75 electors who did not know how to mark their ballots, and who spoilt them. If they were spoilt they were spoilt by friendly hands, I have no doubt, the deputy returning officers. What do we see to-day, right within the corridors of this building ? The Brockville election is in sight, and the first of the gang was moved into the city to-day in the person of the notorious Cap. Sullivan. What a travesty on honesty, what a burlesque on decency, that an election cannot be conducted in that riding without the aid and assistance of a lot of men whom the First Minister or any other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, would be afraid to leave his purse within the same room alone. Yes, they have carried West Huron ; they have carried some ridings in Ontario, but I can only say there are some ridings that cannot be purchased, and when these hon. gentlemen come to a general election in the province of Ontario, I would be bound to say, that their Cap. Sullivans and G. F. Macdonalds will be given a very warm reception. And if either of these loafers makes his appearance at Brockville, he will be kicked out of the place summarily. These are the kind of things that hon. gentlemen opposite indulge in when carrying elections. They had an election in North Simcoe, and they tried their hand there, too. They endeavoured to procure the return of the hon. gentleman who now represents that riding (Mr. McCarthy). The Liberal feeling being too strong for them in that riding, prevailed. The member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) went up there and prayed with might and main that the Liberal party might not bring out a candidate. The result was that the wishes of the Government were set at defiance, and a Liberal candidate was brought out. The Conservative party in the riding stood on one side and left the hon. gentleman who represents the riding and the Liberal candidate to fight it out. Notwithstanding that there was no candidate in the field in strong opposition to the Government, notwithstanding that while in the local election a short time before, some five thousand votes had been polled, there were on the same lists a little more than 3,000 votes polled on this occasion. They can lay up plenty of unction to their souls when they look at the by-elections. They have had by-elections in Ontario, but when the time comes for an appeal to the public, if the Minister of Public Works attempts to flaunt through the province of Ontario as he flaunted through West Huron, I will be bound to say that he will get a rebuke from the honest electorate which he will long remember provided the hon. gentleman is then in the Cabinet. He may be there and he may not be. To-night in the hour of his triumph, the hon. gentleman has our congratulations, but he must not be so boastful as that when he comes into Ontario.

There has been much discussion of the business of the high commission at Washington. The Minister of Public Works attempted to make merry over it, and referred to the fact that Sir John Macdonald went down there alone, while on this occasion the Dominion had four representatives. I can only say that I think the people of Canada had more confidence in Sir John Macdonald, although he was a unit on that occasion, than they had in the four hon. gentleman who went there this year. The composition of that deputation was a matter of comment and of strong comment. One would imagine that when an occasion of this kind presented itself, members of the Administration would be selected as commissioners, but to the surprise of everybody in this country when the personnel of the commission was announced, it was found that no less a personage than the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was placed upon it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The best man on it.

Mr. BENNETT. My hon. friend says that he was the best man on it. I quite agree with him. It was an odd and striking fact that with so many members of this business-like Cabinet they had to go outside of their ranks to secure a gentleman, and I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will recall that in events of a year ago, an explanation was afforded of the presence of the hon. member for North Norfolk on that commission. We all remember the weeks that were devoted to the discussion of the Yukon Bill. Hon. gentlemen of prominence on both sides of the House rose in their places and discussed the Bill, approving or disapproving of it. Day after day we saw the hon. member for North Norfolk sitting listening to the debate; day after day we saw the approaches of the Government to the hon. gentleman, and of hon. gentlemen outside the Government to him; we saw them closeted with him. The last day of the debate came on, but the member for North Norfolk had not spoken. I well remember on the evening that the vote was to be taken, seeing the Premier himself having a last consultation with the member for North Norfolk, and after that consultation, the member for North Norfolk stood up in his place, and endorsed the Yukon Bill that he did not endorse a week before. It was a striking event in the history of the debate, and many hon. gentlemen at once arrived at the conclusion, that on that occasion the deal was made, which gave the hon. member for North Norfolk his place on that commission. All I can say is, that it was a serious reflection upon the other members of the Administration that they were not accorded the place of honour upon it. But yet it may have been important to have the hon. member for North Norfolk on the commission, because I believe he brought to the duties and labours of the commission a mind better seized with the business interests of the country than that of any other hon. gentleman. Still, at the same time, the hon. gentleman was not a desirable man to be on the commission, as representing Canadian interests, by reason of the fact that he had been so pronounced and so strong in his utterances in favour of reciprocity. What was the position of these hon. gentlemen when they went to Washington? They did not go to Washington as gentlemen who were seeking to drive a hard and fast bargain, but they were approached by the representatives of the United States as men who were prepared at all hazards and all costs, according to their past utterances, to make a treaty with the United States. These two countries lie so close together that the utterances of public men must be heard and read from one country to the other, and more than that, the right hon. Prime Minister on more than one occasion had spoken in the large cities of the United States, and had enunciated the principle of having a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity. The hon. member for North Norfolk also stood in that position. He had on more than one occasion gone to Washington, and I regret for the honour of that hon. gentleman, that he had been in direct communication, as can be shown by the "Hansard" of this House, with the people of the United States through their Government, assisting and aiding and pointing out to them ways in which they could harass and hamper the trade of the people of Canada, particularly the lumber trade. What did the hon. member for North Norfolk say? Speaking from his place in this House in the session of 1891, I find on page 4787 of the "Hansard" that he said:

Sir, we want, in short, and the sum of it all amounts to this, we want to participate on equal terms, and without impediment and without exaction, in the energies and in the activity that characterizes all the Anglo-Saxon people of this continent. We want, in place of having free trade with seven Anglo-Saxon nations under the British flag, to enlarge the number, so that we will have free trade with forty-nine. We want the market of 63,000,000 of people across the border; we want to sell them the productions of our mines, and our forests, and our seas, and our soil. If the Liberal policy is carried into effect, if that arrangement which the Liberal party is able to give this country, and which the Liberal party, if in power, would secure for this country, if that arrangement is carried into effect, then, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance says, the turning point would indeed come.

And the hon. gentleman, on the same occasion, said :

Here, Sir, are the results of this miserable fiasco called the National Policy. Here are the results of this political falsehood, of this fiscal confidence game, that enables the few to plunder the many, that makes the fishermen, the farmers, the lumbermen and the miners the prey of a very small portion of the population. This is the outcome of what the Government designates by the high-sounding title of the National Policy ; and yet we are told by the Minister of Finance that under its operation for twelve years, with the evidence we have now before our eyes, that that policy has been a satisfactory one.

These gentlemen went to Washington, with the announcement made in advance that they were opposed to a protective policy for Canada, and that the policy they desired was a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. They dealt with the United States commissioners month after month, but with the only result that a little while before they returned from Washington, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), in his paper "La Patrie," made the announcement that the negotiations were at an end. Parliament met, the Ministers say their mouths are closed, but this much, we have had the satisfaction of wrenching from them, much against their will, the humiliating confession that, after trying to make the people of this country believe that the National Policy was a snare and a delusion, they accept it now almost in its entirety, and, after having assailed the principle of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, they now come before the people of Canada and say : We do not want unrestricted reciprocity, and negotiations to that end should be dropped once and for all time to come. What has come over the spirit of the dream of these hon. gentlemen? Either they were ignorant of the real wants and the requirements of the country, or they were endeavouring to induce the people to accept a policy that they knew, if they came into power, they could never carry out. Having vilified the National Policy in every shape and form, they find themselves now bound to accept it in its entirety, and, Sir, it is in the best interests of the country that it should be so. I state here, and I shall reiterate it time and again, that we do not hope to make any impression on hon. gentlemen opposite in this House. It is to the electorate of this great Dominion that we hope to appeal, and to appeal successfully. True, hon. gentlemen opposite may whistle to keep their courage up ; true, we read that the Ontario Liberals had an enthusiastic meeting the other day, but I do not believe that they can take much comfort out of what they see passing around them. My hon. friend from South Victoria (Mr.

Mr. BENNETT.

McHugh), who sits in front of me, cannot give them a very encouraging report, because his riding gave a majority for the Conservatives of 500 in the provincial election. Then, my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. Graham) cannot give them a very encouraging report either, because he has got notice from his riding to quit, and we may not hope to see him in this Chamber again. From one end of Ontario to the other, the same tide of public opinion runs against the Liberal party. Centre Toronto and the city of Hamilton will no longer know their representatives in this House, for Hamilton a little while ago gave the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite a little minority of 900 votes. In the interests of the Conservative party—but certainly not in the interests of the country—it might be well that this reign of gross extravagance should be continued a little while longer, because the more the country knows of it, the more anxious it will be to turn out those who are guilty. If we consulted the interests of party, and not the interests of country, we would allow these gentlemen opposite to have full scope, knowing, as we do, that the end is in sight. But, Sir, so long as the Conservative party is in opposition, their one aim shall be the interest of their country before the interest of their party. With regard to the Yukon Bill, had the Conservatives studied the interests of their party, and not the interests of the Dominion, that Bill would be to-day on the Statute-books of Canada. That nefarious deal—because, had it been consummated, it would have been a nefarious deal—would have resulted in these hon. gentlemen opposite having a civil war on their hands to-day in the Yukon district. Does any sane man believe that, had that immense area of territory been handed over to Mann & Mackenzie, the hardy pioneers from Canada and other countries who had gone into that country in search of fortunes, would have quietly allowed themselves to be despoiled and robbed? No, Sir. Close as this Government has been to a rebellion in the Yukon within the last few months—and God knows they have been close enough to it—had the Yukon Bill not been rejected by the Senate last year, that territory would now be in open revolt. The administration of the Yukon, as well as the administration of every department of Government to-day, bears evidence of gross incapacity. First, this Government selected Major Walsh as administrator, and they had to recall him, and to-day, and for months past, there have been pouring in from all quarters complaints against the Government in that territory, complaints of wrong-doing, and of incapacity, and of corrupt officials. There will be many opportunities before the session closes for these hon. gentlemen opposite to try and square themselves on some of the positions they have assumed. There will be opportunities for some of these hon.

gentlemen into whose capacious mouths the goodly plums are about to drop, to explain their position in this Parliament. If this depletion of the members of this House is to go on and continue in the same ratio as in the past, then, in a short while, there will be very few men behind the Ministry who can bring to bear fair and impartial minds upon any question. Why, within the last few years upwards of fifteen members of Parliament, supporters of the Government, have gone to their rewards, and if reports are to be believed, there are upwards of fifteen more ready to flit to soft offices on the slightest provocation. The Liberals promised the country honest and economical government. The Liberals have absolutely failed to give it, and the time is not far distant when the country will punish them for their broken pledges and extravagance, and return to power a party that has always stood by the best interests of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have this moment received a notice from two members of this House formally informing me of the death of the late Hon. ### BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to make a suggestion to hon. members of the House in regard to the introduction of Bills. If a Bill is not introduced by the hon. member whose name is on the back of it, but by some other hon. member, I would suggest that, if the introducer would be kind enough to write his name on the back, it would save considerable confusion.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the Montreal "Daily Star." It is headed: "Sir Louis Davies' View." "He claims that he is not neglecting his work as a Minister." Certain statements are attributed to me in this article. There is a very great mistake somewhere; I made no such statements to the correspondent of the Montreal "Star" nor to anybody else, nor did I make any such statements to anybody of any kind or description.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I have heard the statement of the hon. gentleman with great satisfaction because I felt, if this statement were true, a very serious blow would be dealt to a measure of some importance which the Government has under consideration.

REPRESENTATION OF WINNIPEG.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, if your warrant has issued for a new election to fill the vacancy in the representation of Winnipeg, caused by the lamented death of the late hon. member for Winnipeg, to which your attention was drawn in a very formal way at the opening of the session?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not issued my warrant for an election at Winnipeg, because I do not consider that my attention was formally drawn to the death of the hon. member. A mere debate on a subject of that kind, no matter how clear it may be, is not understood by the Speaker as a notice without a formal notification.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask, then, if you would accept that formal notification now?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman gives me that formal notification now, the writ shall be issued to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Thank you.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Clerk will please enter on the Journals the formal notification.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bell (East Prince), for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that you have already heard everything that could be said, and many things that should not be said, on the subject of this debate. I do not hope to add any new feature to it. I am simply giving way to that peculiar instinct of parliamentarians which seems to induce us so strongly, at the opening of every session, to exhale the most obnoxious talking microbes that we have germed and nursed during the eight months of the recess.

Eloquent and dull words have been used during this debate on the actual prosperity of Canada and as to the share of responsibility and of merit which should be attributed to the Government as a factor of good times. At all times and in all lands, rulers are apt to exaggerate their creating and initiating powers. Louis XIV is charged with having said, "L'Etat, 'est moi." In our democratic days, political leaders more modestly say, "I am the Almighty." I must, however, note a signal exception in the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), whose mental energies being altogether of the talkative and sounding sort, more properly says: "I am the Almighty Voice." But if no government can make the rain fall, the sun shine, the soil produce, and the genius of man move, work, and generate, a good government can, by a sound policy, help natural and even providential causes to have their full effect, and therefore contribute largely to the general welfare of the country.

I am not going to enter into a general appreciation, or even give a simple enumeration of all the works and reforms accomplished by this Government since their advent to power. I will content myself with pointing to one cause which I think has not been mentioned already in this debate—perhaps because our opponents gave birth to it, though it is no credit to them.

For years back the talking and publishing organs of the Conservative party were sounding with lamenting prophecies about all the evils that would befall this country on the day the Liberal party should come to power. No doubt several of those dismal predictions went to the winds, in company, I must admit, with some of our own pathetic appeals to the electors; but nevertheless they created among the trading and manufacturing classes of this community a feeling of uncertainty as to what would happen in the event of a change of Administration. Nothing, however, in the public platform adopted by the Liberal party warranted such a feeling. The very word "tariff for revenue," coupled with the most rudimentary knowledge of our financial situation, and in the absence of any new form of taxation, meant, in itself, still a large amount of protection to manufactures.

As to unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, allow me, Sir, to call it, happily, an accident in the political life of both parties—with the difference quite illustrative of the characteristics of both parties, that the Liberals spoke of it openly and frankly at a time when they could do nothing in the matter; whilst the Conservatives, after loud protests of virtue, came very near committing the sin, and certainly went as far as full consent, which, if my theology is right, is equivalent to commission itself. In this matter I would advise the Opposition to imitate the conduct of the laird of Redgauntlet, who wanted to keep the poor Steenie Steenson responsible for a rental already paid to his father; but when Steenie came back from the dark spot and told Sir Robert that he had found the old gentleman there himself, and in a very bad fix, the laird gave him his discharge and begged him to speak no more about it.

But, coming back to the question of tariff reform, I must admit that if it meant not a revolution in the tariff, the mere fact that a readjustment in the customs schedules of the country would take place in case of a change of Administration, created, no doubt, a certain feeling of uneasiness among the industrial classes.

But there were some other causes for that feeling. The scandals that were poisoning the blood of the Conservative party, once healthy and robust; the Manitoba school question, which created a political agitation and kept it up for two years previous to the general elections; several Ministerial crises, taking at the end the hideous appearance of open treason; the dislocation of a huge political structure, once imposing and bearing the character of the powerful men who had built it up—in fact, all actions and all inactions of the Conservative Government, at the end of the last Parliament, were giving to all classes not only the impression, but the deep conviction, that the next general elections would bring a change of Government; that the Conservative party was doomed, and that the Liberals would come to power and have for the first time a chance of applying their financial theories. This may be rhetoric and sentiment; but statesmen and business men who do not take into account moral causes in business matters are no real business men and no real statesmen.

After the general elections were over, after the Liberals had come to power, the Government could not bring down at the first session their tariff Bill. Therefore, we may fairly state that for two years the manufacturers of Canada limited their importations of raw materials and the wholesale merchants their importations of foreign manufactured articles to the strict figures of actual requirements. But when the tariff of 1897 was brought down; when it was found that the burden of the consumer was lifted to some extent without any injury being done to the producer; when it was found that the policy of the present Government was to seek new markets for our agricultural products without consenting to the slaughtering of our own industrial market—a deep aspiration of hope and relief filled the breast of the nation, and the Canadian people went to work with a feeling of joy and of self-reliance which alone makes peoples and individuals strong, progressive and productive.

If our opponents are so sensitive that they do not like us to say that our coming into power is the cause of the progress of this country, let us say that their going out of power was the cause.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. You may think, Sir, that these two propositions belong to that same system of logic which makes such a difference between an unrestricted offer of reciprocity and an offer of unrestricted reciprocity. But I shall venture to explain my statement. I maintain that so long as the Conservative party remained in power; so long as before the trade community of this country, they would have posed as the only economists, as the only men who could create, develop and maintain our national industries; so long as by reason of that, a certain number of traders in this country would have believed, rightly or wrongly, that the coming into power of the Liberals would have meant a change in the tariff—there was a check to the full and free development of the energies of this country.

But now that our tariff policy has been firmly established and proved to be a stable one—not the thing of one party or one class of men, but the property of the people of Canada—there is full confidence that, whoever may be the men in power, the trade and the industries of this country are safe.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. I see the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) laughing at my naïveté, but I am just coming to the point which probably brings that smile. It is charged by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Liberals have not fulfilled their pledges, that they are illogical, that they are not sincere, that they are inconsistent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as far as logic is concerned, I will state, at the risk of scandalizing the philosophical mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), that in public affairs, that in politics, in government, in business, in trade, I do not believe much in logic. Pure logic is one of the most deceiving and dangerous guides of public men.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. BOURASSA. Well, it has been the sham and the curse of all weak and decaying governments! It is all very well for theorists to sit quiet in their cabinets and libraries, far from men and from reality, to write splendid articles and books on free trade and protection, inspired by the best of logic and the most profound erudition; but they will not change the climate, the soil, the mines, and all the varied consequences which natural causes impose on human communities. Their philosophical logic will never break the brutal logic of facts. These books may be very useful to the men of action because they may throw light on their actions. But I claim, Sir, that the good governments are those that clothe the people with garments fit to their size and proper to their actual life and work.

Free trade may be a splendid policy for this country in some years to come, and no doubt it will be the duty of the Government of that future day to adopt it—if only for the great pleasure of the descendants of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who are so sorry that we do not adopt free trade now.

Mr. BOURASSA. I say, Sir, that the only actual possible policy for this country, and I am not ashamed to say it, is a policy of moderate protection. I am a young politician, I admit, and perhaps if I were as old as the hon. gentlemen opposite I would not give my sincere thought with so much liberty; perhaps I would have such a sufficient knowledge of politics as would prevent me from speaking frankly. I ran in my county as a moderate protectionist; or rather I said to my electors that I did not believe in theories in matters of trade, but that I believed in facts and in figures, and in any Government that would give to my country the policy that was required for the moment, and not the policy that might be required fifty years hence. Let the words and deeds of the Governments of the past speak for themselves—and so far as that is concerned, the hon. gentlemen opposite have more to their debit than to their credit. Let the men of the future make the proper policy for the future of Canada. I have hope enough in my countrymen of any race and of any language to feel sure that when fifty years will have passed upon this country, they will know how to deal with the policy of their days.

But on this very ground of logic, to what school of philosophy belongs the reasoning by which the hon. gentlemen on the other side, who predicted that we would, on coming into power, bring ruin and starvation to this country, reproach us now that we did not accomplish such ruin and starvation? Do they think the electors will look on it in that way? Much more consistent and much more dignified was the position taken at first by the leader of the Opposition, when he said that the Liberal party had simply put on the shoes of the Conservative party and done nothing of themselves. Of course, that was one of those strong assertions which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has accustomed the House and the country to hear from him, but, at the same time, I repeat it was far more dignified and consistent than the present attitude of the Conservative party. It is another evidence that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is too big for what is left of his party, or that this remnant of the past is too small for him.

Now, as to sincerity. I believe and have always believed that there is a good deal of misapprehension, both in public or in private life, as to what sincerity really is. Of course, if sincerity meant a direct and constant relation between intention and words and actions, very few men indeed, and still fewer political parties, could be called sincere—and I do not think the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would get the prize. In my humble judgment, sincerity is the direct relation between thought and word, between thought and action at the moment the word is uttered or the action is performed. Under this interpretation, I candidly believe the majority of men to be sincere, either in public or in private life. In politics especially. I see no ultimate gain to be made, no sound public opinion to be created by suspecting, and causing the people to suspect, the sincerity of our public men. There should be enough to criticise and to blame in the actions of all political parties, without attributing low motives to any—unless there is absolute evidence that such motives exist. For my part, I am ready to admit that our opponents are as much animated with a fair spirit of justice and a sincere devotion to the public welfare as we may be ourselves. I want to believe it at least; and if the hon. gentlemen opposite do not talk too much I will continue to believe it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. I go a step further, and I say that I quite agree that the Conservatives have done good work for their country in their time—intermingled, of course, as must be in any human community, with misdeeds—though at last a too long use of power made the bad overcome the good until, for the great benefit of the country and for their own, they were sent to the regions of penance, and—

An hon. MEMBER. Oblivion.

Mr. BOURASSA. I forgot, for the moment, the word I was about to use, but anyway the thing is there, and the hon. gentlemen are on the other side of the House. I meant to use the word "purification," but it will be a long time before they are purified, and so the word will come in just as well next year.

But now supposing we stand the accusation of insincerity, how can we face the charge that we are inconsistent? On this subject again I must confess having a very strong opinion. I believe that consistency is another great danger of public life. I believe that next to the logical, the consistent have been the worst rulers of any country. Of course, I must explain. Consistency in philosophical and moral problems is the only protection for the dignity of the human mind. Consistency in action is most desirable, provided that the cause which gave birth to such action remains unchanged through unvaried circumstances. I have no respect for political men or parties that are not consistent with themselves, that would change their programmes and bend their principles for the sole purpose of catching the capricious wind of public favour. But I have no regard for governments, who, for the petty satisfaction of being told that they are consistent with theories and programmes adopted in years past, would not do the duty of the day. Whatever may have been the varied and isolated opinions of some members of the Liberal party, the general principle of the party in regard to protection and free trade was laid down in 1893. We promised tariff reform, and we have given tariff reform—not, perhaps, to the full extent some of us would have desired, and surely not to the point which hon. gentleman opposite would have liked us to reach, so as to kill ourselves. If in years to come, further reform is needed, I hope and I know that the Government of the day will be equal to the task and will give that reform—provided they are not moved by the crocodile tears of the patriots on the other side exiled from the sweets of office, but by the real touch of the sound public opinion of the country.

It seems to me as if the Opposition was not aware that in a free British country like ours there is a public opinion. There is a great deal of common sense, a spirit of justice, by which our people do not judge politicians so much by their words as by their deeds—and it is probably because they judged our opponents by their deeds that they put them where they are. Of course, they applaud speeches and programmes, but when the time for action comes, they judge men, I repeat, by their deeds.

At least, it is so in my native province, the province of Quebec. And this alone explains the so sudden and so complete changes that have taken place in the political arena of Quebec, both in federal and in local affairs.

This brings me to a statement which I was surprised, and painfully surprised to hear from the lips of a personal friend of mine, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), whom I regard as a broad-minded man. He said the other day :

I fully agree in what the hon. member for Gaspé has said to-night as regards the independence of my province, for the people there are fair-minded, but what I do say is that as long as in the province of Quebec political discussions are carried on by means of such appeals, it will be impossible for us to bring forcibly before the people of that province the real issues between the two parties.

I regret that the hon. gentleman is not here, for I would like to ask him this question: Does he mean to say by these words that when appeals are made to the French Canadians on religious and national grounds they listen to nothing else and can no longer judge of any political question? I do not believe that he means it, because I repeat, he is a fair-minded man. But if he does not mean that, why did he use such words? He should have left that language to his colleague and chief whip the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor)—last year I might have said to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace); but I really believe that since that hon. gentleman has spent a couple of months in Quebec he has so much changed his mind on such subjects that we should not despair of hearing him, in a nice French speech, tell of the loyalty and liberal-mindedness of the French Canadians.

Sir, the province of Quebec is Liberal today because she believes that in both Parliaments where she is represented, there are men at the head of affairs who are to be trusted. Times are good, crops have been bountiful, trade is active and the people are merry. And, as everybody knows who has travelled in Quebec, there is no population in the world that can be so easily merry as the true sons of the nation of which its sovereign said: "The people is merry: my Government is safe."

Not that the French Canadians are not interested in politics—quite the contrary. But when they feel that the public chest is in safe hands, they let politics alone and go to work. When they think that a change is needed—and they can make up their minds very quickly, as both parties know by experience—they make the change.

Of course, to say that they are not proud of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would be a great untruth and an insult to their appreciative sense of honour and greatness in men. Like all sincere and sensitive people, they give way to their love and their admiration, not by mere words, but by deeds and by votes. Who can blame them? Surely not the men who came down in the by-elections of the province of Quebec in 1893 and 1894 and asked the people to vote for the candidates of the Conservative Government because Sir John Thompson, the Prime Minister, was a Catholic and the only man to settle the school question.

I admit that in the province of Quebec, or rather, to make it broader, I admit that with the French people more than with the English, the personality of leaders and candidates has to do with the political movements of the masses. But, Sir, is it not true that in all countries a few men, often one at a time, give direction to public opinion. And when in any country a man arises of whom a whole nation can be proud, it is natural that those who are more closely connected with him are proud of him and say so and prove it. What I deny most emphatically is, that the love and admiration of Quebec for Sir Wilfrid Laurier would make her forget her public duty and her joint responsibility in keeping a sound Government for this country.

Our history is there to be read by all. At one time Louis Joseph Papineau was the idol of the French Canadians. He could move the entire population by the charm of his voice and the power of his magnetism. When after a struggling and unwearied constitutional agitation, his compatriots had obtained their rights as British subjects, they set him aside, and followed the less ideal but more practical policy of Louis Hypolite Lafontaine. They were accused of ungratefulness. But after all, gratitude is not and cannot be a national virtue: races and nations must follow their instinct of self-government.

Another leader came to the front, George Etienne Cartier, and he also, to a less degree, possessed the confidence of his fellow-citizens. But if I know a little of the history of that time, the political fathers of the men who are trying now to raise the Francophobe cry did not complain, because, as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) pointed out last night, it was the only way for them to retain power. Later on, another leader came whose popularity in Quebec attained very nearly the point which Papineau had reached: that was Honoré Mercier. Like all strong men he had warm friends and bitter foes. No man surely was ever calumniated and misrepresented to such a degree, both inside and outside of his province. The day came when his compatriots listened to his denunciators, and threw him out of office. When the whole truth was known they regretted their sincere but prejudiced movement of indignation, which shows anyhow that, sensitive to a point of injustice when the honour of their province is at stake, they do not hesitate to break their most worshipped idols.

No doubt some hon. gentlemen opposite, disappointed to see the race cry and religious appeals die out all over the land, would be happy to start out a little French domination cry. Not only is such an appeal utterly unfounded and most unjust to the people of Quebec, but it is an insult to the common sense of the English-speaking provinces. I hope the Conservative members coming from those provinces, have more respect for their fellow-citizens than to try and make us believe that their constituents start furious at even the words of French and Catholic, as wild bulls do at the sight of a red rag.

Giving to the language of the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) its proper wording, I would say:

As long as the Conservative party carries discussion by means of such appeals, it will be impossible for them to induce the people of Canada to trust them back in office.

Sir, as I came up to the Parliament House this morning, I noticed the statues of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier both shrouded with snow. It seemed to me as if the two great leaders, disgusted with the conduct of their party in abandoning its traditions, were hiding their faces as if they wished to return into the tomb.

Coming to the plebiscite, I need not say that the question of bringing in a prohibitory law is settled, and it would be futile and most pretentious to add anything to the straight and impregnable position taken by the Government. But I want to make a few observations on the Quebec anti-prohibition vote. Two causes have been pointed out by some of the prohibitionists as an explanation of that majority, both of them equally untrue and insulting to my native province. One, the worst, has been rather whispered than stated openly, and it is that the vote indicated the marked inferiority of the French people in morality and civilization. I quote the "Camp Fire" organ of the League, number of November last:

The vote that went against prohibition was mainly a French vote. All the Quebec constituencies that voted against prohibition have a very great French-speaking population. Many of them are entirely French. Outside of Quebec a majority of the constituencies that voted against prohibition have large French or German elements.

Mr. BOURASSA.

Then, after an analysis of the vote:

These figures show clearly that a great majority of the English-speaking counties in which reside a great majority of the people of Canada, are overwhelmingly in favour of prohibition. In these days of majority rule, there cannot be any entertainment of the proposition that we should all wait for the legislation we need and desire, until our fellow countrymen from continental Europe are far enough advanced to be fully in accord with the progressive ideas of Saxon civilization.

Does it not sound like an echo of a speech made in the Temple of Jerusalem some two thousand years ago: "I am a just man—not like that publican"?

The first of those two paragraphs was reproduced almost literally in two circulars sent around the country, one in December last and the other a few days ago. The second one was wisely skipped over.

I believe in the good faith of the author. But then his only excuse would be his utter ignorance of foreign people, especially of the French, one of the most sober and civilized in the world. I invite that gentleman to take a trip across Quebec and especially through those farming districts where the vote was almost unanimous against prohibition, and if he can find elsewhere a rural population more honest, sober, moral, polite and hospitable I will join his league and become a temperance preacher, without a moment of weakness. Of course, I should warn him against the good-humoured wit of our old habitants, for, if he presses them too much to join the league he might get the reply that a good Irishman once gave to Cardinal Manning who was urging him to take the pledge. "I took it myself, Pat." said the great archbishop—to which Pat replied with a most respectful wink of the eye: "No doubt your Grace needed it."

The second cause to which the prohibitionists have decided to stick as an explanation of the Quebec majority, is that the vote was fraudulent. This is what I find among the resolutions adopted by the Dominion Alliance at their last meeting:

That we record our profound conviction that the adverse vote on the prohibition plebiscite in Quebec province, as reported, does not correctly represent the sentiment of the electors of the province, but was the result of gross irregularities and frauds in many parts of the province.

Some members on the other side, more virtuous, as usual, than virtue itself, have re-echoed and exaggerated this contention. The member for Compton (Mr. Pope) stated in this House that the majority had grown up from 45,000 to 95,000. Now, what is the use of bringing such accusations when unable to prove them? And this cannot be proved, because it is false. It may be that in some quarters men voted who had no right to do so, but perhaps if we make a thorough inquiry in all the ballot boxes, we may find that those votes are quite evenly balanced. I admit that I did not expect such a vote to be polled in Quebec. The people were not excited over the matter, being unable to understand why they should be deprived of a liberty of which they abused so little. Without going out of my own constituency, I may say that I was absent in Quebec during the whole time of the plebiscite organization and took no part whatever in the matter save in the appointment of the returning officer. Had I been there, it would have been the same. There was quite a prohibition party in Labelle, recruited amongst the best class of people, and most of them my personal and political friends. I would have done nothing to prevent their trying to convince the people. They sent lecturers and canvassers in the most important centres of the county; they organized their representation at the polls. There was no organization whatever on the anti-side. But when the polling day came, people turned out to vote, and figures were: Yes, 546; No, 1,785. Negative majority, 1,239. The whole vote was less than two-thirds of the vote polled at the general elections. The prohibitionists proclaimed that they had no organization in Quebec. Had they had a stronger one they would have simply induced more people to go to the polls and the negative majority would have been still larger.

The explanation is a very simple one. The people of Quebec like to vote, and to vote the way they like on any question. This is not the first instance where they have shown their independence of opinion, and I hope it is not the last, because that independence is most respectful of vested rights and of outside opinion. They simply do not want what they do not think proper, to be imposed upon them.

I intended closing these remarks by a reference to the Anglo-American Commission. But my connection with that body imposes upon me a special duty of discretion. I think it more proper to wait for the moment when negotiations will be ended one way or the other. May I be permitted, however, to say this much? Whatever may be the immediate and practical results of these negotiations, they will mark an epoch in our history. They are the first indication that, after having achieved our political and commercial independence, we are now in the full practical possession of our international liberty. The first step in that direction was the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties at the request of the Canadian Government. But this had still the appearance of a gift from the mother land to the child colony. In the present instance, the whole thing was left within our hands. Not that I want to depreciate in any way the good work done for Canada by the representative of the Home Government. Far from it; and I consider the sad death of Lord Herschell as heavy a loss to Canada as it is to Great Britain. His very appointment was a great favour and a high compliment to Canada, as well as an acknowledgment of our independence. One of the most eminent jurists of this century, a straight opponent of the present English Administration, and therefore out of political office, the presence of Lord Herschell on the commission meant that the whole political direction of the negotiations was left to the Canadian commissioners, who were given the help of a great legal mind and the moral and constitutional support of Great Britain. And the American commissioners understood it: they saw clearly that in Canadian matters they must deal with the Canadian people, behind which stands the British flag, not as a forced protection to a flock of slaves, but as a free help to free men.

It suffices to go back to the inside history of the Treaty of Washington and compare it with the still incomplete developments of the present negotiations, to appreciate how far we have advanced on the way towards self-control in international affairs. The correspondence of Sir John A. Macdonald, to which the hon. Minister of Public Works referred last night, constitutes a testimony which the hon. gentlemen opposite will, no doubt, readily accept. The great statesman made a gallant fight for Canada; we should all be happy to acknowledge it. But not only did he meet the American stubbornness on his way, but he realized very soon that the British commissioners had decided to bargain the Alabama claims and other Anglo-American trials at the expense of Canada. He tried uselessly all means, persuasive and threatening. He yielded at last for the sake of Imperial satisfaction. Let it be said, to his credit or to his detriment, according to the point of view taken by oneself: on this, as on some other occasions, Sir John A. Macdonald proved that his devotion to British interests could silence for a moment his Canadian sentiments. But I am not prepared to say, that, under then existing circumstances, he acted wrongly at Washington; and his letters show, at least, that his motives were of the most elevated and statesmanlike nature.

I hope that the negotiations will be resumed and carried to a happy end. In the meantime, it would be fruitless and foolish to start up a jingo cry and raise the feelings of the Canadian people against their neighbours. As I heard once said by Senator Gray, one of the noblest men and broadest in mind that could be met in the great republic or in any other country:

There are always enough of natural and unavoidable differences between two nations. Why create new and artificial ones?

It has been said often that it is most difficult to deal with the American Government. It is quite true, and quite explainable, too, if we go back to the circumstances which gave birth to their constitution—a monument which bears testimony to the high motives and shrewdness of the men who framed it for the thirteen new-born free states—but unmistakably too narrow for the great nation which the shores of two oceans can hardly contain to-day.

I have come back from Washington a greater admirer than ever of the illogical but so broad and so humane British constitution—and, I must add, a greater admirer than before of the American people; a larger gathering of free men, intelligent, progressive, sincere, quick and broad, both in mind and in action, never existed under the sun. Let us rely upon the better feelings and keen judgment of the best, if not the most numerous class of Americans. Let us stand in a cool, dignified, unprovoking attitude. And if John Bull and Brother Jonathan meditate some good bargains in partnership, somewhere else in the world, they will soon understand each other as to Canadian affairs. Many think that the new friends may find the pieces too small for an equal division, but others add that they may meet on their way some other concerns too big for either one of them. This is a pretty safe guarantee of friendship. And then—there is no use of denying it—the Anglo-Saxon feeling is there. It had been dormant for years; it may go asleep again; but for the time being it is awake—not perhaps to the point indicated by the most enthusiastic statesmen and journalists of both countries, but beyond what I expected to find there myself. I was never so much impressed as during my late stay in the United States, with the truth of the proverb, “Blood is thicker than water.”

Of course, I am too much of a Frenchman to call for an Anglo-American alliance all over the world; but I am enough of a Canadian and of a Britisher in Canada to desire its accomplishment as far as Canadian interests are at stake.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, I can join with the right hon. leader of the Government in congratulating the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) on the very excellent speech which he has delivered here this afternoon. The introductory part of it, showing the benefits of the policy which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada have been upholding for many a long year, and which has been rigidly opposed, even to the most bitter end, by the right hon. leader of the Government and his associates all through the Dominion of Canada, was magnificent. His logic, I noticed, was very peculiar. Sitting on this side of the House, as we are, we have the privilege of watching the countenances of hon. gentlemen on the other side, and it is really amusing to see the change of expression from grave to gay of our volatile friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). One moment his heart is in his boots, and the next moment he is off like a pop bottle. I noticed last night, when the hon. Minister of Public Works was speaking, that our good friend the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) wore a dejected countenance, and I also noticed that the broad-brimmed hat which the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) wears, was pulled down tighter than ever over the face, and that a smile played across the countenance of that hon. gentleman, and that our good friend the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) and a number of others never once brought their hands together in applause of the Minister of Public Works. When that hon. gentleman made a majestic wave of his hand, and said he had the confidence of his colleagues and the support of hon. members around him, I noticed that the applause came from those who are looking for jobs. However, I must congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) on one thing, and that is the magnificent system of lighting which he has introduced into this Chamber. The Minister of Public Works and I have been personal friends for many years, and I trust he will not take amiss anything I have to say in reference to him to-day.

We have been catechised by gentlemen on the other side of the House, and criticised, and I might almost say censured for daring to take up the time of the House and of the country in discussing matters affecting the welfare of the nation at large. Sir, these hon. gentlemen opposite might as well learn first as last, that the Liberal-Conservatives are here as free men representing the people of Canada, are here as Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, and we shall not shirk that duty even though we have to stay here during the long sweltering days of summer. I forget the metaphysical term which my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) used, to describe what “sincerity” was, but whatever it be, the little variations in opinions and the little explanations regarding the inconsistencies of the Government will be threshed out in this Chamber to a final issue. And what reasons did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) give as to why the country placed the Liberal party in power. He did not say it was the strength of the policy as propounded by the right hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), or by the knight (Sir Richard Cartwright) who sits at his left, but he did say, that the Liberals were in power because of the dissensions that tore up the ranks of the Liberal-Conservative party. And, Sir, throughout the hon. gentleman's speech from first to last, I challenge hon. gentlemen to point to one word which would justify the platform of the Liberal party. His definition of sincerity was truly metaphysical. They say that a proper definition of metaphysics is this: When you see one man talking to another about something which neither of them understand, that is metaphysics; and so the definition by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) of “sincerity” was really metaphysical. When I was a boy I always thought that the word sincere was derived from an old Latin root, meaning “free from wax.” It had its origin in the fact that the porticos of the villas on the hills around Rome were made largely of marble, and in making the contracts for the erection of these buildings it was always stipulated that the marble should be pure, and that the flaws in that marble should not be filled with wax. That was how the word "sincere" came into being, but it has had broader use since then. The word "sincere" applied to a political party, may be taken in general terms to mean absence of fraud or of hypocrisy or deception, and if the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) remembers that definition, he will find that he has failed to clear his political friends from the charge of their being insincere; a charge which he himself advanced.

We have had the Address in reply to the Speech presented to us and I must say it does not contain much. True, it says the country is prosperous. But I have never read a Speech from the Throne and I have never read a reply in answer to the Speech from the Throne in Canada, which did not contain the same statement. In the present instance I may take the liberty of pointing out a few causes of the prosperity which prevails not only in Canada but in the United States, in fact over all the new world as well as a greater part of Europe. First, the price of grain was raised on this continent, at the outbreak of the war between Greece and Turkey a few years ago. Following that we had an enormous crop for a couple of years, and that together with the good prices, undoubtedly largely benefited the farmers of this community. Then as every one is aware, famine in Russia and in India have removed from competition in the grain markets of the world two of our great rivals in the grain trade. Furthermore, for three years, yes, for four successive years, our fellow countrymen who live under the same old Union Jack as we do, our fellow-countrymen in the Australasian colonies have suffered severely from drought throughout their land and consequent failure of crops. These are the negative causes of our prosperity, but the positive cause of the good times in Canada is the development of the gold mining industry. We can therefore heartily join with the right hon. the leader of the Government in congratulating His Excellency on the prosperity which prevails in this country. In all kindness, however, I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues to another cause of our prosperity. When the Liberal-Conservatives sat on the Treasury benches, and while they were maintaining the National Policy in spite of the determined opposition of the Liberals, they were met on every platform in Canada, and not only in Canada but in the United States and in the old land, with the charge made by Liberal politicians: that the National Policy was ruining the country, that as soon as they got into power—and at every election they were surely coming into power as they preached—they were going to change the National Policy. Sir, the effect of such conduct was: Capitalists who were interested in the development of industries in Canada, men who would have invested their money in the development of the mines, our lumber industry and other commercial pursuits, these men were debarred from investing through fear that the Liberals might come into power and that when they did come into power they would abolish the National Policy in its entirety. Blue ruin was then preached, by the Liberals within the walls of this legislature, and on every platform in Canada. I ask the right hon. the leader of the Government to contrast his conduct and the conduct of his colleagues when they were in opposition, with the conduct of the leader of the Opposition and his colleagues to-day, now that Conservatives are out of power. Have they directly or indirectly heard the members on this side of the House say one word in detriment to the upbuilding of the Dominion of Canada? No, Sir. Although we may have fault to find with the Government, still we do not propose to wash our dirty linen before the world, but we do propose to stand loyal to Canada, even to the extent of backing up these gentlemen opposite before the outside world in the mistakes which they may make.

We have heard a great deal of talk about the plebiscite. I have never taken a great deal of stock in the agitation that was carried on to bring about prohibition in this country. It was honestly carried on, I have no doubt, by the great majority engaged in it; but a great many, to my certain knowledge, joined in the cry for prohibition while the Conservative party was in power in order to handicap and hamper them and win votes for the Opposition. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) read some extracts which I presume are placed on the pages of "Hansard" in order that he and his friend the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) might appeal to the province of Quebec with the cry, "Oh, the French are attacked, the French are attacked, the French are attacked." I presume that the hon. gentleman did not know that the very document he quoted from, was prepared and published by members of his own political party, and not by members of the Liberal-Conservative party. Mr. Spence, of the city of Toronto, and Mr. J. J. MacLaren, well-known both in Toronto and Montreal, are two of the most ardent Liberals in Canada, and they have, in season and out of season, engineered the prohibition cry for the benefit of the Liberal party. These two gentlemen will now have to show themselves in their true colours or for ever be relegated to oblivion. I have a resolution to which I wish respectfully to draw the attention of the First Minister, in order to show that members of the Methodist Church, at all events, have had some communication with him on the subject of prohibition. It is a resolution that was adopted in the county of Oxford the other day. That county is represented in this House by the chief Government whip, and also by the hon. knight on the right of the Speaker. We all know what that county is. You can scarcely get any Tory to run there against a Liberal and save his deposit.

These people must have thought that the chief Liberal whip had become a prohibitionist because he attended a meeting of the Prohibition Alliance the other day; and thinking he was on their side, they passed this resolution:—

The executive of the Oxford Prohibition Association desires to record its great dissatisfaction and disappointment at the decision of the Dominion Government to take no action in regard to prohibition, thus ignoring the will of the majority as clearly specified in the recent plebiscite vote. Outside of Quebec that majority was throughout the whole Dominion very large, much larger than that by which the present Government rules, and even Quebec included, the vote was an emphatic condemnation of the liquor traffic. Quebec is not opposed to prohibition, for a large majority of its constituencies are already enjoying the blessings of prohibition. It is well known that no less than four members of Mr. Laurier's Cabinet did what they could, on the platform and in the press in the province of Quebec, to defeat prohibition, assuring the French people that if the measure passed it would defeat the Laurier Government. While it is quite correct that in Parliament the Premier refused to commit himself to a majority vote, it is not true that he did not pledge himself before the people to introduce prohibitory legislation if the plebiscite showed a majority for it. Here are his words to the general conference of the Methodist Church: "If a plebiscite meets with the support of a majority of the people, those who find themselves in the minority will have to concur in the verdict of the majority." Let the tens of thousands of temperance electors throughout the Dominion, who are not subservient to any political party, take a note of this.

I would ask the right hon. First Minister whether he denies the words which are here credited to him. I presume he will not attempt to deny them, as they were evidently in writing.

I notice that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is not in his seat. I shall not take up the question of penny postage, as it has been already well thrashed out. I will simply point out that the Liberal-Conservative party, without any flourish of trumpets or brass bands or processions, made a substantial reduction in the internal postage of Canada a few years ago, reducing it from three cents for the half ounce to three cents for the full ounce, a reduction of 50 per cent, while the recent reduction in the internal postage has been only a reduction of 33½ per cent, and yet there has been a great flourish of trumpets over it. In connection with Imperial penny postage between Canada and Great Britain and a few of her other colonies, I may say that it has given me considerable annoyance to find Liberal speakers and newspapers, possibly unintentionally, failing to give due credit to Mr. Henniker Heaton, the member for Canterbury, I think, in the English House of Commons, who has made a hobby of Imperial penny postage for many years, and who, in furtherance of it, has visited Canada, all the Australian colonies, New Zealand and South Africa, and spent thousands of pounds in working up the agitation, while the Liberal party in this country invariably opposed the proposition. And yet an attempt has been made to rob Mr. Henniker Heaton of all the credit that is rightfully his due in connection with that matter.

I notice that the Government propose to run a telegraph line into the Yukon. I am very much surprised that no further reference to the Yukon is made in the Speech or in the Address. Last year this House was treated to a Yukon Railway Bill, and I ask the right hon. First Minister to remember the incidents of that occasion. While I supported his Bill, and will do so in case he introduces a similar one this session, on the ground that the frame work of the measure was on the lines of Liberal-Conservative policy, and in the general interests of Canada, yet, as I pointed out on that occasion, the details of the scheme had many drawbacks. I certainly expected, when the Bill was defeated in the Senate last year, that this Government, instead of remaining neutral and idle throughout the whole year, would have brought in an amended Bill that session; and then, if the majority in the Senate should prove adverse to a Bill, with the drawbacks of the last Bill removed, there would be some justice in the cry which the right hon. leader of the Government and his colleagues have raised against the action of the Senate. I endorsed him last session in face of an extraordinary outcry, some of it genuine, more of it not genuine, in the country. I am prepared to take the same stand again; but I say that the Government are open to condemnation for not having brought the matter up again in some form or other. Let them pursue the old Conservative policy, and start from a Canadian port and carry the line over Canadian territory into the Yukon country, opening up a country every foot of which would be valuable, and building up a town and a harbour on the Canadian seaboard. One town of 20,000 inhabitants is of greater value to Canada than a hundred gold mines. Let them build up such a town on our own seaboard and not on the American seaboard, and they will have my hearty endorsement. I think the Senate did wrong in rejecting the Bill last session, but I would not for a moment think of condemning the Senate or reforming it, because of that.

The constitutional course open to the hon. gentleman, if he is not satisfied with the action of the Senate, is either to bring in another Bill with the objectionable features removed, or go to the country. I tell the hon. gentleman frankly that I am prepared to stand or fall on such a measure, if laid before the country, in case the Senate takes similar action this year on a properly amended Bill, but following the framework of the one brought in last session. But the talk of abolishing the Senate because of their action on the Yukon Bill and on the Drummond County Railway deal, will meet with no echo, not only in the hearts of any Conservatives in this country, but from a great many men in the ranks of his own party throughout the older provinces particularly, and, I believe, also in the new ones. Therefore, I am surprised that no proposition is made in the Speech from the Throne in reference to the development of the Yukon and of northern British Columbia generally. The question of the electoral districts is the only positive measure foreshadowed in the Speech, and inasmuch as a Bill will be brought before the House dealing with that subject, I shall not discuss it here.

The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) last night, spoke of the good old democratic principles of their party. Well, now, when we read of his arrival in the city of Washington, as chronicled in the New York papers, we could not help thinking of his democratic principles. I presume the sensation created in Washington by his arrival was something akin to that created in a county town by the arrival of Barnum's circus. When a circus arrives in a town, the small boys all congregate on the platform to see it come in. I well remember the first time I saw Barnum's circus, and I think, judging by the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, some of them must have heard what P. T. Barnum used to say in his early days: "They tell me, and they tell the country, that my circus is a fake. I admit it, but the thing is to detect the humbug. The people of this country are bound to be humbugged, and I am bound to humbug them." And so, I presume, these hon. gentlemen, profiting by the experience of Barnum, are going around the country endeavouring to humbug the people in some of the constituencies, and being fairly successful at it. It is true, they have a menagerie, with the white elephants, which will be marched out after a while, and the public will have an opportunity of seeing them. They have the best set of acrobats that any circus has in stock, because these men can turn a somersault back-handed or front-handed with an agility very astonishing, from the Prime Minister down. I did look into the Speech from the Throne, and into the Address in reply, for some announcement respecting the question of free trade. We have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and we have heard the First Minister, again and again speaking upon these subjects. We have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce say this:

That party that abandons its principles and repudiates its pledges should not be left in control of the affairs of any self-respecting colony. Speaking of reciprocity with the United States, the Minister of Trade and Commerce goes on to say:

This is not a case for half measures, and you have in the fate of the Democratic party in the United States a warning and an example of the doom which must overtake any party which palters with its convictions, and having placed itself at the head of a great movement, will offer the people a stone instead of bread.

So, we find hon. gentlemen opposite bringing in no proposition in relation to free trade. I noticed that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) winced considerably under the scathing criticism of the leader of the Opposition the other evening in regard to the question of the fulfilment of pledges of the free-trade wing of the party. I noticed that when a parallel was drawn between the actions of the free-trade wing of the young Napoleon, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) the young Napoleon's head was raised erect in the air, while the head of the Minister of Finance was bowed down. I presume victory rests for the present with the young Napoleon and his wing of the party. I looked also for a fulfilment of the pledge that a Bill would be introduced during the coming session to make it criminal for any member of Parliament to be appointed to an office under the Crown. But when I glanced over the list I saw that one hon. member of this Parliament was removed in order to make room for the Minister of Public Works; another in order to make room for the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair); another to make room for the Minister of Finance; another to make room --or rather not to make room for the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), because he was making it so hot for the First Minister for not having been himself appointed Solicitor General, that he was given an office outside the country: they got rid of him and sent him off to the south of Ireland, somewhere near Limerick, or Tipperary, or some part where he would have ample opportunity to display his fighting qualities. I refer to Mr. Devlin. I presume the First Minister will have some explanation to offer of the fact that this commissioner of immigration to Ireland was recently quoted in the newspapers as threatening to resign. I wondered if the appointment of the late organizer of the Liberal party, Mr. W. T. R. Preston, as superintendent of immigration, had anything to do with the kicking on the part of this immigration agent in Ireland, and how they have managed to silence him in the meantime. I noticed, further, that the law partner of the First Minister, a very eminent gentleman, who had been occupying a seat in this House, was taken out of it, in face of the doctrine preached for so many years by those hon. gentlemen, that no man occupying a seat in this House should be given an office under the Crown. But that gentleman has been taken out of the House and made a judge. I noticed, also, concerning the late member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), who made it so warm for these hon. gentlemen opposite for a long time, that not a word could be got out of him; he was dumb on all the great questions affecting the province of Ontario until he had received the commission of Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories. When he had that in his pocket, he suddenly received vitality, and was heard from a couple of times in this House, and then departed from it for ever. The same may be said in regard to the late member for West Lambton (Mr. Lsiter). We all know how he walked the corridors and the hotels around Ottawa with a heavy, solemn brow for two or three sessions here. The sunny ways of the First Minister were futile to revive life, and vigour, and the old party fealty in the member for West Lambton; and it was not until he had the prospect of a judgeship, perhaps the commission in his pocket, that the sunny ways had an effect upon him, and he made a speech in this House in the defence of the actions of the Government. We have sat here, and we have noticed the heavy brow—I might almost say, the scowl—of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). When he places his right hand on his heart and stands before this House, he will not ring out the old note of criticism and defiance at the extravagance, corruption and all that sort of thing on the part of this Government. His conscience pricks him; I know that he is above accepting any gift from the Crown, except possibly a Ministerial portfolio. But as the race is so close, as others might reach the goal for Cabinet positions ahead of him, I am afraid he will have to chew the cud of disappointment, and lend his valuable influence to the cause of economy and good government, remaining out of the Council for some years to come. But on this side of the House we cannot but notice that heavy, dissatisfied look upon the face of the hon. member for North Wellington, as he sees the conduct of hon. members of the Government from day to day. Then, there is our good friend from South Huron (Mr. McMullan), who used to talk so much about free corn. We hear no more from him now. He sits there, reading the "British Statistical Journal," or some other work on agriculture, in peace and quietness. He got his little bit in the shape of free corn, and that settled him. I notice our good friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell), and our good friend from North Wentworth and Brant (Mr. Somerville), both men who asked no favour of any Government, who now remain quiet. We hear no more from them, as we used to in the good old days, on questions of economy and so forth. However, I do not know what their object may be. I presume they do vigorous kicking privately with the First Minister, who seeks to hold them back as much as he can. They are loyal to the party, there is no doubt; but the onlooker cannot but see the disunion and the disruption that are going on in the ranks of the party. But I would advise these hon. gentlemen, if they wish to get good positions in the Cabinet, or to get judgeships, to follow the practice of our good friend, Judge Choquette, and the other gentlemen I have named. If they wish to get anything out of this Government the way to succeed is to kick most vigorously, and they will soon be pacified and got out of the way. Now, the Liberal-

Mr. HUGHES.

Conservative party, in my knowledge, has never complained, has never objected, to deserving members of Parliament being appointed to office. I am sure that when Mr. Lister was appointed judge, no man was better pleased to see him promoted than I was; I believe he will make an excellent judge. So with the others; although I must say that I think some of them are not fitted for the positions to which they were appointed. But in the case of Judge Lavergne, I think he will make a most excellent judge; others will do very well also. We do not object upon this side of the House to deserving members of Parliament, to men who have given the best days of their life in the service of the country—we do not object to see these men getting positions for which they are fitted. But the point I make is this: The hon. gentlemen opposite, in season and out of season, made the welkin ring with the cry that no man occupying the position of member of Parliament should be appointed to an office under the Crown. More than that, having in view the record of our hon. friends in the past on that question, we expected to see a Bill foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne making it, possibly not a criminal offence, but an impossibility for this or any other Government to appoint relatives to office. I stand here, and I say this further—I have already said so in this House—that no man has a better right to name any one for an office than a member of Parliament, and I go further and say that no man has a better right to an office than the son of a member of Parliament, all other things being equal. Supposing a good position in the service was vacant to which my son should aspire, and for which he was qualified, I say that if I had given my service to this country and to my party for a number of years, no man would be better entitled to hold that position than my son. That is the ground that I take as a Liberal-Conservative, and that is the ground our party has always taken. But hon. gentlemen opposite have gone up and down this country seeking to make it appear that the Liberal-Conservative party were guilty of the most notorious corruption and nepotism in appointing their relatives to office; and yet as soon as they get in we see every public office in the country filled, as far as possible, by relatives and associates of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I must say that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is a sinner in this respect, as some of the others are that have sons. However, I will say this for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that long years ago when the Liberal-Conservative party was in power, I took occasion to do my best to get one of his sons in a position in the permanent force of the Dominion of Canada. I consider that all his sons, those of them that I know, at all events, are thoroughly well fitted for any office to which they may aspire. This young man having done his duty fearlessly and well in the North-west rebellion, it was a pleasure for me to put in a word with the Tory Government, and to get that young man appointed to the permanent corps. But I again deny that any member of the present Government or of the then Opposition can find any fault with the Liberal-Conservatives for having put their friends in the public service. The complaint we make against these hon. gentlemen is that they are not consistent, and no hon. member opposite can explain away their inconsistencies before the people of this country.

We also looked for a Bill to be foreshadowed against combines and trusts; yet none is found because, I presume, this Government is under the thumb of the Standard Oil Company. More than that, it has been pointed out again and again in this House, and in the country, that in their dealings with the agricultural implement makers of Canada they have violated every pledge they ever made. We were met on every hustings, I was, and I know other members on this side of the House, were met in our contests during the last Dominion elections by the cry that if the Tories stayed in power the duty on agricultural implements would remain as it was, that the price of binders, for instance, would not be reduced lower than $95 or $100. The cry then was: Put us in power and we will make the price of binders $60. The Liberals have got into power, and what is the result? The duty remains the same on binders, but the duty on the raw material of the binders is reduced, in other words, the case is a little worse than it was before. And here let me draw the attention of the First Minister to a point that is impressing the people of the North-west Territories, of Manitoba and of western Ontario, at this time. There is a large firm that has grown enormously wealthy in Canada, called the Massey-Harris Agricultural Implement Company. I am told on pretty good authority, though I do not vouch for the truth of it, that the Massey-Harris Agricultural Implement Company own the Winnipeg "Free Press." I would like to know whether there was anything in the deal by which the agricultural implement manufacturers received an additional rebate of duty on what we may call the raw material going into the manufacture of their machines. Is there anything in the charge that these men who are putting up money in this paper are doing so out of the duty which was saved to them on their raw material. That is a point which impresses the farmers of this country, at all events.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Ask the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost).

Mr. HUGHES. I think he is out of the House. He is one of those gentlemen interested in the manufacture of agricultural implements, he is one of those gentlemen who, before the election, had a private tip, whatever the deal was, and could use that privately in his canvass with the agricultural implement mechanics of his town, telling them what was going to be done if the Liberals got into power. Others had the same tip, the Massey-Harris firm had the tip undoubtedly, and used it to the fullest extent in favour of hon. gentleman opposite. We do not hope for much, but if these hon. gentlemen had been true to their professions and had been consistent in what they claim to be their principles, we would have witnessed a reduction in the annual expenses and in the taxes of the country, as well as in the national debt. But, Sir, in place of reductions, there have been increases. However, that matter has been exhaustively dealt with already, and I shall not enter into the subject further. A criticism of which much was made among the rank and file of the farming community by hon. gentleman opposite, was based upon the statement that enormous sums of money were paid by the Conservative party in lawyers' fees. They made every platform in the country ring with that charge; they pointed out that we had a Solicitor General paid to perform these duties, and yet the enormous sum of $100,000 was paid out in lawyers' fees. The fact is, that more money has been paid out for lawyers' fees by hon. gentleman opposite, over and above the Solicitor General's salary, than was ever paid out by the Liberal-Conservative party. It was upwards of $100,000 last year, as compared with $89,000 under the Liberal-Conservative rule, and the accounts show that it has increased every year. I know that the returns of last year, in some instances, do not contain the full amount of the fees paid to certain lawyers, but I presume these payments will appear this year in the Auditor General's Report. A great many of these payments are held back for a year or two, while the elections are going on, so that the total amount will not appear too large.

In regard to the question of parlour cars, I remember the time that the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) came to the village of Sunderland in a private car. On every platform throughout the length and breadth of the country, night after night, the iniquity of the Finance Minister of this country travelling in a private car was heralded, when the fact was that had he not taken a private car, he would have been obliged to turn out at Peterborough at four o'clock in the morning and hang around until eight to make connections.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (King's, N.B.) They are offices on wheels at present.

Mr. HUGHES. We are not finding fault with hon. gentlemen riding in private cars. If the First Minister, or a gentleman of the standing of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is going on a tour, in which he will have to turn out at an unseasonable hour in the morning, or if he is going on public business, it would ill-become him not to travel in a private car. But these hon. gentlemen are not in any position to find fault with the ex-Finance Minister for travelling in a private car, nor do I find fault with hon. gentlemen for doing it now. It is their inconsistency I condemn. Another matter in which I am in a position to show that hon. gentlemen have been inconsistent is this: On every platform, great and small, in the province of Ontario, and in the English-speaking provinces—I draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that I mention an English-speaking province, so that he can get his dander up and make a speech in behalf of his province—the First Minister grew eloquent. He would swell his breast up, and, substituting for his sunny smile a serious countenance, shout, “No coercion; hands off Manitoba.” That was the watchword through the English-speaking provinces. He would tell how he, a French Canadian born, but a lover of the institutions and constitution of Great Britain, would resist any attempt to coerce Manitoba. But his speech was almost as metaphysical as that delivered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) this afternoon. I would ask, if it was the principle of the First Minister that there was to be no coercion of Manitoba, if his cry were not simply to blind the people in the English-speaking provinces, why was it necessary for the Solicitor General to go to his bishop and sign a document declaring that he would go the Tory party one better? The document is here; he will not deny it, and, further, he has held to that line, and that is why he is going around the country shouting that the question is not settled, while the hon. Minister of Public Works is shouting: We have effected a satisfactory settlement. The hon. gentleman has to leave the Cabinet, or else he will be brought before his bishop, so the story goes. If the First Minister was sincere in his cry of “No coercion; hands off Manitoba,” why was it necessary for him to make a pledge, at St. Roch, that he would go to the utmost limit of the law in forcing separate schools on Manitoba? Why was it necessary, if he was consistent, that he should coerce the Prime Minister of Manitoba into passing the most iniquitous separate school law that is upon the Statute-book of any province in the Dominion of Canada to-day? It is not satisfactory to the Protestants of that province, nor is it satisfactory to the Roman Catholics of that province. It gives the Roman Catholics no guarantee by law; it gives the Protestants all the annoyance and imposes upon them the iniquity of a separate school system in practice. Possibly, the young Napoleon might explain things. Why was it necessary for the First Minister, not longer ago than last autumn, to attempt to still further coerce the Prime Minister of Manitoba by removing certain restrictions in the regulations which they will not put on the Statute-book? Why, if the hon. gentleman's intention was that there should be no coercion, was it necessary to do all these things? It shows the same cool and deliberate want of sincerity that has marked other professions of hon. gentlemen opposite.

My good friend the Minister of Public Works wants a good excuse to wave the French flag. I would not for the world disappoint the hon. gentleman. He is one of the nicest gentlemen that this country could produce, and I shall have the opportunity of gratifying him by giving him a chance of saying something in the interest of his province. He attacked the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) the other night on account of some remarks that hon. gentleman made in reference to his speech on the French flag. I would like the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works for a moment or two. He may read it in the “Hansard,” but I might fix the “Hansard” up, and he would not know what I had said; it is just possible that I might go and fix the “Hansard” up. I think he will agree with me, that whatever charge may be hurled against the hon. member for Leeds, or any other hon. member on this side of the House, the charge of being against the French Canadian people cannot be hurled at me. I have placed on record before in this House a statement of Judge Dugas, at one time the major commanding the 65th Regiment, in which Judge Dugas thanked me for the kind words I had said of the 65th Regiment and of the French Canadian people generally, and in which he stated that it was pleasing to find one English-speaking writer in the province of Ontario doing justice to the 65th Regiment and the French Canadian people. More than that, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) will remember that in the old days, when he was editor of “Le Canadien,” he and I crossed swords at a certain point in regard to some articles published in his paper, and I think it was generally admitted then, that I taught him some of the virtues of the French people which he previously was not willing to recognize. It is, therefore, not necessary for me to proclaim here that I am now, as I always have been, willing and ready to recognize the virtues and grandeur of the French race. The Minister of Public Works was not justified in claiming during his crusade in the province of Quebec, that I, at all events, was actuated by any prejudices against his race. And why should the Conservatives of this province of Ontario throw any slur on the people of Lower Canada for their conduct at the last election, for we know that although we did not get many Conservative members returned to this House, the Liberal-Conservatives in that province polled a very large vote, a vote which I trust will be largely increased when the elections come on.

The Minister of Public Works endeavoured to show in his speech that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had improperly quoted his utterances with reference to the using of the French flag on the Government yacht. The words quoted by my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor), as used by the Minister (Mr. Tarte) were as follows:—

It has been made a crime on my part in certain quarters that I floated the French flag on my yacht on a tour of inspection. Well, I did so, and I shall go out of the Government when I have not the liberty of floating the dear old French flag on my yacht.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). It was not his yacht; it was the people's yacht.

Mr. HUGHES. The Minister of Public Works objected to the language used by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor); he stated it was not a proper translation, and he charged my friend (Mr. Taylor) with not knowing a word of French. Now, I have here "La Patrie" for the 4th January of the present year, and I find there a magnificent speech made by the hon. Minister (Mr. Tarte), in which he speaks of the sins he is made to answer for—amongst others, that he is boss of several of the Ministers—and he goes on to say that another fault found with him was that he had a French flag floating on his yacht. He says:

I said it elsewhere, and I repeat it here again, assuming the full responsibility of what I say: the day when I will not be allowed to float the French flag beside the English flag where there are Frenchmen, I will retire from the Cabinet as a man. And I will tell you why I speak that way, Minister of the Crown as I am: it is because I understand that the French Canadians have equal rights with the other races in this country.

The Minister of Public Works therefore goes further than the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) went the other night, and he says that he floated that flag, —because he understands that the French Canadians have rights equal to those of other races in this country.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No, no, read the whole of that quotation.

Mr. HUGHES. I gave the words of the Minister (Mr. Tarte).

The PRIME MINISTER. No; you did not translate everything.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) send me over that paper and I will read for him what I said.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) translate into English all he read in French.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the First Minister be good enough to point out what I have omitted?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman omitted to translate the first part of the words which he read in French, where the Minister of Public Works says he claims the right to float the French flag beside the English flag.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) read the whole thing or I will read it myself.

Mr. HUGHES. The Minister of Public Works has a perfect right to do that, but I am justifying the language used by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) the other night, and I am showing that he did not make any incorrect statement as to what the Minister of Public Works said. But, Mr. Speaker, who was it first raised the question of the French flag being floated beside the English flag, or being floated on that yacht at all. Sir, it was the friends of the Minister of Public Works, in order that he might have the kudos of it among his French Canadian countrymen. His newspaper was the first that wrote anything about it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). May I be allowed to explain?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The first newspaper that wrote anything about that incident was the Tory organ in the town of Pictou, and it was circulated in nearly every other paper in the land.

Mr. HUGHES. Did the Minister say that it first appeared in the "Pickwick Paper"?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No, I said the Pictou paper. It was then reported in the Halifax "Herald," and after that in nearly every other Tory paper in the land.

Mr. HUGHES. The first I saw of it was when the matter was brought up in a Liberal club in Montreal, where the Minister of Public Works was advised—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I answered the charge there.

Mr. HUGHES. I am referring to a Liberal club in Montreal, where the Minister of Public Works was advised to attend to his business, to do something for the people of the country besides flaunting a flag in their face. Mark you, it was not an English club, but a French Canadian club, and not a Tory club, but a Liberal club, composed of members of his own party, who brought the matter up in that way.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. So-called Liberals, who are doing the work of the Tory party now.

Mr. HUGHES. As British Canadians, we repudiate the charge made against us by the Minister of Public Works that we attacked him for flying the French flag. He is at liberty to cover his vessel from stem to stern with French flags, for all I care. He may cover every house in the province of Quebec with French flags, but if he is so loyal as he pretends to be, I would like him to run in a British flag once in a while, and I insist that he shall fly the British flag at the post of honour in the Government yacht. That is all we care for—at least, it is all I care for, because so long as the British flag gets due honour, I have no objection to his floating the flag of old France, or the American flag, or a whole string of flags, for they look pretty on a vessel, and so long as the British flag has the post of honour there can be no objection to it. But the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), or the Minister's friends, took advantage of the incident to make capital for him, by saying that the English Tories were attacking him because he used the flag of France. The statement first given to the public was, that the Minister floated the French flag alone, and I have no hesitation in saying that on a vessel belonging to the Dominion of Canada, carrying any citizen or any Minister either, none but the flag of the country in which that vessel is registered, the British flag should fly at the post of honour.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES. I quoted in French some remarks of the Minister of Public Works and if you will pardon my pronounciation, Mr. Speaker, I will give you a little more of it. I was delighted to hear the Minister (Mr. Tarte) speak of his loyalty to the British Crown. I know his loyalty. He served too many years in the ranks of the Tory party, and he was trained by too great a master mind not to be truly loyal to England. But, Sir, he has been absent from the office of his newspaper, and on various occasions articles do find their way in the columns of "La Patrie" which make those of us in the province of Ontario who read that paper wonder what it all means. We know the French Canadian people are loyal. It is true that in 1837, a few of them stood out in rebellion, but, Sir, there were Englishmen in rebellion also in those days. There were renegade Englishmen in Ontario and Quebec, just as there were renegade Frenchmen: but the great mass of the French Canadian race was truly loyal on those occasions. They were sons of men who had refused to join the American colonies in rebellion in 1775. They were sons of men who fought and fell in defence of Canada's rights in 1812. These were men who, in 1837, stood out loyally with their English fellow-countrymen in defence of the country. They also proved themselves true to British institutions and to Canada during the Fenian raids of 1866 and 1870, and many of the men in the brigade that went to Manitoba to put down the Red River rebellion in 1870 were French Canadians. They also proved themselves true in the Nile expedition later on; and in 1885, the 65th of Montreal and the 9th of Quebec, though possibly not as well drilled as some of the other regiments, willingly left their homes and marched on that terrible trip to the North-west to put down a rebellion, not of our kinsmen, but of their own, displaying a loyalty for which they deserve every credit from this country. Therefore, I am not here to say a word against our French fellow-countrymen in this respect. But I do point out as very strange that articles like those to which I refer are not intended to breathe a very loyal or friendly spirit to Great Britain. "La Patrie," of the 29th September, says:

Nous avons raison de conseiller à nos compatriotes de se défier des dépêches américaines; elles sont constamment hostiles à tout ce qui touche de près ou de loin à la France et elles tendent systématiquement à déconsidérer notre mère patrie dans l'estime des étrangers.

Speaking of the troubles in Paris, this article says:

We wish to advise our compatriots to mistrust the English despatches. They are constantly hostile to everything which touches France near or far, and tend systematically to discredit our mother country in the estimation of foreigners.

I want to note here that the despatches objected to were not English despatches, but United States despatches, and yet not a word is said about United States despatches. If the reference were intended to United States despatches, the word "Américaine" would have been used. Further on, speaking of Col. Marchand on the Nile, it says:

Vous avez lu d'abord que les Anglais avaient été étonnés de trouver les Français à Fashoda, que ceux-ci auraient à déguerpir, que l'Angleterre ne tolérerait pas la colonne Marchand sur le Nil, que Kitchener n'en ferait qu'une bouchée, que la France se ferait mettre en charpie dans la Manche si elle ne se retirait de Fashoda, etc. Mais voici maintenant qu'on change de ton devant la ferme et fière attitude du gouvernement français, qu'on annonce que l'imbroglio du Nil sera soumis à une commission d'arbitrage et que, sans l'arrivée d'un détachement anglais et égyptien à Fashoda, Marchand se serait fait massacrer par les derviches.

You have read at the outset that the English were astonished to find the French at Fashoda, that the English would not tolerate Colonel Marchand on the Nile, that Kitchener would make one mouthful of him, that France would be torn to pieces in the channel if she did not retire from Fashoda, etc. But, nevertheless, they changed their tone before the firm and proud attitude of the French Government, which announces that the trouble on the Nile will be submitted to a commission of arbitration, and that without the arrival of any detachment of English or Egyptians at Fashoda, Marchand would be massacred by the dervishes. Yes, mistrust the English despatches.

I regret that the hon. Minister of Public Works was absent from the office on the day that article appeared, for I am sure that had he been there, he would have inculcated a better and more loyal spirit to Britain in the printers. There is another article dealing with Fashoda, which says :

Les Français sont à Fashoda, et ils ont certainement autant droit d'y être que les Anglais, car il est admis que ce point n'a jamais été compris dans les limites du Soudan et n'appartient pas aux provinces que l'Angleterre prétend avoir mandat de restituer à la puissance des khédives.

The French are at Fashoda, and they have certainly as much right to be there as the English, for it is admitted that this point has never been comprised in the limits of the Soudan, and does not belong to the provinces which England pretends to have the mandate to restore to the territories of the Khedive.

Further on it says :

Or, on sait que des Français venus de l'Oubanghi explorent la vallée du Bahr-el-Ghazel, et c'est sur Fashoda justement que se dirige cette fameuse expédition du capitaine Marchand, dont la marche audacieuse à travers une immense région inexplorée a donné depuis deux ans tant de tablature aux ennemis de la France. Si le capitaine Marchand et ses compagnons sont, à l'heure présente, comme tout porte à la croire, solidement établis sur le Nil et en relation directe, par la rivière Sobat avec le pays des Abyssins, les Anglais ne pourront passer et la France aura, par l'effort d'un petit nombre de héros, conquis l'une des portes du Nil, accru, dans des proportions énormes, la valeur de son empire africain et porté un coup irréparable à l'orgueil et au prestige anglais.

Now, it is known that the French, coming from the Oubanghi, explored the valley of Bahr-el-Ghazel, and it is even to Fashoda that they direct the famous expedition of Captain Marchand, whose bold march across an immense unexplored region has caused so much discussion during the last two years to the enemies of France. If Captain Marchand and his companions are at the present moment, as everything leads one to believe, solidly established on the Nile and in direct relation, by the river Sobat, with the Abyssinian country, the English cannot pass, and the French will have, by the effort of a small number of heroes, conquered one of the doors of the Nile, increased in enormous proportions the value of her African empire, and struck an irreparable blow to English pride and prestige.

Now, there was another day that the Minister of Public Works chanced to be away from the office, when the printers worked in another article on Fashoda, which says :

Remarquez, s'il vous plaît, que jamais, au grand jamais, la bourgade en question, où Marchand était revenu en partant du haut Oubanghi et en traversant le Bahr-el-Ghazel, n'a appartenu à l'Angleterre. Tout au plus pourrait-on prétendre, au Caire, que les cartes géographiques, dressées sous les Mehemet-Ali, englobaient cette région dans ce fameux " Empire du Nil " qui n'a guère existé que sur le papier.

Nous n'ignorons pas que les Anglais ont toujours rêvé d'établir une sorte de grande route commerciale depuis Alexandrie jusqu'au Cap de Bonne-Espérance. Mais qui donc empêche la France de rêver, à son tour, une autre grande route commerciale, perpendiculaire à la première et allant de l'Atlantique à l'Océan indien, du Congo à Obock ?

Note, if you please, that never has the town in question, where Marchand has arrived in setting out from Upper Oubanghi, and in traversing the Bahr-el-Ghazel, belonged to England. Nor can we pretend at Cairo that the geographical maps, prepared under Mehemet-Ali, took in that region in the famous Empire of the Nile, which has existed only on paper. We do not ignore that the English have also dreamed of establishing a kind of grand commercial route from Alexandria to the Cape of Good Hope ; but what then prevents France dreaming in her turn of another grand commercial route, perpendicular to the first, and running from the Atlantic to the Indian Ocean, from the Congo to Obock ?

Now, I know that the Minister of Public Works is thoroughly loyal, I know he would not for a moment have allowed these sentiments to appear in the journal which he controls had he been at home, but being absent on those days, these articles found their way in. I leave it to the judgment, even of the hon. Minister of Public Works himself, whether they tend towards building up a better feeling between the French Canadians and the English people. When these articles appeared a declaration of war between the two countries seemed not improbable, and I leave it to the judgment, even of hon. gentlemen opposite, whether the publication of those articles at such a critical period, tended towards a better feeling between the French and English people in this country, whether, in other words, if the French Canadian regiments had been ordered out, some of them would not have been a little affected by the articles in the paper of the Minister of Public Works. But, fortunately, there was such an overwhelming sentiment of loyalty among the French Canadians of the province of Quebec that the publication of such articles in any French paper was discouraged, and the true spirit of Lower Canada, the loyal spirit to the British Empire, found expression, and those articles were discontinued. While I am dealing with the Minister of Public Works, there is one other point I will mention. Last night, in his speech in reference to the Washington Treaty of 1871, he pointed out and quoted correctly from the speech of Sir John A. Macdonald to the effect that the duty on salt and on coal removed by the Conservative Government should not have been removed. Sir John said :

But, Mr. Speaker, I made an entirely erroneous application of it.

The Minister of Public Works says :

Yet in the face of this difficulty, the hon. gentlemen have the temerity to reproach us with not having lowered the duty on some articles.

Why, Sir, what we have done is to reproach the hon. gentlemen opposite with having lowered the duty on articles when they should not have done so. We claimed that before they went to Washington they should not have lowered the duty on corn; we claimed that when they went to Washington they should not have lowered the duty on wheat; we claimed that in that preferential tariff of theirs they should not have given the American manufacturers favours over the English manufacturers. That is the very thing we claim that they should not have done, and above all, that when the example of that grand old chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald, was before them in cold print, they committed, according to his own statement, the very fault that was committed by the Conservative party away back in 1871. But I want this fact to be noted carefully. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) claims credit for this commission for being composed of four Canadians and one Britisher, while the moving spirit of this commission was Canadian. He pointed out that in the other commission we were represented by but one Canadian. He pointed out also what the late Sir John A. Macdonald clearly showed, that when he got to Washington he found the majority of the commission anxious to serve British ends rather than Canadian ends, and he found an adverse spirit among the members of the United States commission. Now, what are the facts? Sir John A. Macdonald returned with a treaty, and in that treaty he obtained the free entry into the United States of fish oil, and he got $5,500,000 in cash for the use of our fisheries, or $4,500,000 as Canada's part. He also got free navigation of the Yukon, the Stikine and the Porcupine rivers, and bonding privileges on the railways. Although single-handed, with the majority of the commission, as our friends opposite say, looking after British interests instead of Canadian interests, and with an adverse United States commission, still he came back bringing all these advantages with him, though he was handicapped, as these gentlemen say, by the action of the Canadian Parliament in making coal and fish free. In comparison with what he did, what have these hon. gentlemen secured? Why, not even a title. Now, I have briefly pointed out some of the broken pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite. We did look, I frankly confess it, for these hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out in power some of their promises made in Opposition. Well, I believe they intended doing so, but when they got into power they found that the interests of the country would not permit it, and consequently they endeavoured to put on our clothes. However, there are a few questions that have arisen since these hon. gentlemen assumed office, and we had hoped that while they were not specifically on record in reference to these in the past, they might do something during the present Parliament. One of these questions is in reference to the export duty on nickel ore. We have in the Dominion of Canada, I suppose, about the best nickel mines in the world; yet all we get out of them are the wages paid to a few men for blowing up a few tons occasionally, and the profit that may be derived in carting it across to the United States. I am speaking of these matters from my view-point solely, not for any section of the party; and I say that a duty should now be placed on nickel ore. I am also in favour of a duty on saw-logs, inasmuch as the Americans are holding up their duties against our Canadian lumber. I maintain that the best way to bring these men to their senses is to let them see that we have the self-reliance of a self-governing people. I am prepared to impose a duty on saw-logs and on pulp-wood, and thus give our young men at home employment, and in every sense increase the prosperity of Canada. I did look for something in the Speech in reference to the great transportation problems which the Minister of Public Works and others have been explaining to the people of the country, although I must say that some of their views upon this question are rather laughable. Nevertheless, I did look for something in the Speech from the Throne outlining their policy on these questions. I hoped to see something in reference to the development of the Ottawa Canal up the Ottawa River by Mattawa, through Lake Nipissing and down the French River into the Georgian Bay. I had hoped that a distinct pledge would be given that the construction of the Trent Canal, or a route from the Georgian Bay and the Bay of Quinté down to Montreal would have been carried to a finality within the next twelve months. I still hope that when the Estimates come down a substantial sum will be placed in them for this purpose. I had looked for improvements of transportation in other lines. I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is not present at this moment, because I wished, to use a sporting term, not only to endorse him, but to go him one better, in his endeavour to build up Montreal. I am anxious that our great Canadian city of Montreal should be built up. I would be pleased to see Montreal have a population of a million souls. I believe its geographical position is such that in the near future it will have a population of one or two millions. I would also be pleased to see the city of Quebec made the terminus of a fast line of steamships, or, at all events, made such a port that she could command a great deal of freight that now goes by New York, Boston and other American cities. I would be pleased to see St. John and Halifax able to take the commerce that now goes by Portland, Boston and New York, and I see no reason why an arrangement cannot be made whereby running powers should be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway from St. John to Halifax, and to the Grand Trunk Railway from Lévis to St. John and Halifax, in order that our own Canadian seaboard cities might be built up in the winter season by our own business, instead of the American cities. I need not enter into this question at length, it will doubtless come up again at a later period in the session. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that since you have occupied your present distinguished position, and even previous to that, I have repeatedly taken a stand in favour of building up the Canadian seaboard cities and the Canadian lake cities in preference to the American cities, and any action which the Minister of Public Works, or the Minister of Railways and Canals, or the Minister of the Interior, or any other Minister, may take along practical lines with that object in view, will meet with my hearty endorsement. I take my stand, as I did last year, upon the Yukon Bill, that a great Canadian city could ultimately be built up at some Canadian seaport. I want to see Vancouver and Victoria grow, instead of Seattle, Tacoma and San Francisco. I am satisfied that no Government can remain in power in this country that will long ignore that line of action. Another subject I looked for in the Speech was regarding our ocean commerce. At present Germany bonuses her sugar industry. Take up the Trade and Navigation Returns for Great Britain and Ireland, take up the Trade and Navigation Returns of the Dominion of Canada or of any other country in the world, and you will find that thousands of tons of German sugar are imported into those countries. How can that take place? Germany bonuses her sugar industry, more than that, Germany bonuses the companies manufacturing that sugar; still further, Germany guarantees the bonds of the companies that build these immense steamships that carry goods from German ports all over the world. I chanced to be out in Australia a year or so ago, and I noticed, in Sydney harbour particularly, German vessels riding at anchor, bringing in German goods and driving English goods out of the market. I was admiring one of those vessels, when an English admiral pointed out that it was a German vessel. He used an expression which, perhaps, I ought not to repeat, for, although the times are so peaceful just now, they may become warlike again very soon. The admiral looked at it, and said, "A magnificent prize in case of war." But in the meantime there is another war going on than a war with powder and shot: a commercial war is quietly and slowly going on, by which the British merchant and the British manufacturer are being driven to the wall by the bonused manufactured products, and by the bonused steamship lines, whose bonds are guaranteed by the German Government. We find, in relation to British trade on the Pacific Ocean, that there is a great falling off into the hands of German steamship companies. They have a chartered line running from German ports to all the ports in Australia. There is another line, a weekly line, about being established to run from German ports to Australian and New Zealand ports, and thence to Europe, calling at Indian ports. Whether we realized it or not, these bonused ships, and bonused companies, and bonused manufacturers of Germany are gradually driving our British lines to the wall. I maintain it is the duty of this country, first, to stand true to herself, and next, to the grand old British Empire. I had hoped that the Government would direct its attention towards encouraging still further, for instance, the fast Atlantic steamship service coming down to Montreal. Even in our Canadian harbours you will find German vessels rivalling us in our own ports. I hoped that there would be something definite proposed, not a mythical election campaign scheme. What was their cry, when we offered $750,000 to a company to run fast steamships across the Atlantic? They called it extravagance, and said it could be done for $500,000. They get in, and they try to get a service for $500,000, and fail, even with the bottle-necked ships under the command of the Minister without portfolio from Quebec. Then they came up to $750,000, and they have again failed. We are now told, in the speech of Sir William Van Horne, that he is in a position to run such a service, provided his company is guaranteed a subsidy of $1,000,000. Now, I stand here to say, that, from my view-point, if we can get a fast steamship service from Canada to the old country, with proper cold storage facilities, for $1,000,000, it would be a good bargain for this country. Even if it costs that sum, it would amply repay this country over and over again to grant any properly organized and properly managed steamship company the sum of $1,000,000, provided it furnished these cold storage facilities between here and the old country. Sir, one would scarcely imagine the volume of trade that comes from the little islands scattered up and down the Pacific Ocean between Vancouver and Victoria, on the one hand, and Australasia on the other. Last year I drew attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that they did not place the Fiji Islands and Queensland on the list of the most-favoured nations. I may say, that there is not a vessel leaving the harbour of Vancouver or Victoria for Australia, that does not bear with it, for the Fiji Islands, for the Australian ports and for New Zealand, tons and tons of freight. On the docks of those cities are tons and tons more that cannot be taken on board the vessels. Yet, when these vessels return, they return comparatively empty. I maintain that it is the duty of this Government, in the early stages of this transportation problem, to come to the front and to give a judicious helping hand in order to encourage return cargoes. It would be a great benefit to Canada. I think I can claim the credit of drawing the attention of the Vancouver sugar refinery people, and of other parties interested in that business, to the advantages to be derived from importing sugar from the Fiji Islands. I understand that 400 tons are brought in on every vessel that returns from Australia and the Fiji Islands to-day. There are tens of thousands of tons more that will be brought in. I see no reason why we cannot trade with our friends in Queensland and the other Australian colonies, the British people in the Islands of Fiji—because the foreign white population is entirely British—why we cannot trade with our friends there, and build up this Great British Empire on these lines. I was also surprised that there was no reference to the Pacific cable in the Speech from the Throne. Now, I am not belittling the importance of the telegraph line to the Yukon, which is certainly necessary; but I maintain that a cable line from our Pacific ports to the Australian colonies is necessary, not only from a national view-point, but from an Imperial view-point as well. I believe the hon. gentlemen opposite are now so thoroughly vaccinated with the loyal spirit that they, at all events, appear to be desirous to upbuild the British Empire as well as the Liberal-Conservative party. Now I will say a few words on the international commission. I do not want to appear harsh to any one who was on that commission; I do not want to appear unfriendly to the United States. If you turn up the parliamentary records, you will find that a number of years ago I stated my views on these questions, and advocated, first, a cordial union along trade lines and the lines of defence of Britain and all her colonies, and ultimately maybe a political union, first of Great Britain and her colonies on the one hand, and then of Britain, on the one hand, and the United States on the other. Therefore, I have been long favourable, having due regard to Canadian and British interests, to closer lines of union with the people of the United States, but I never dreamed that that union was to be brought about by lowering our blades and getting down on our knees to that people. We have the benefit of the experience of Sir John Macdonald when he went to Washington in 1871. He found the Americans sharp traders, ready to take advantage of every point that they could raise in their favour in the negotiations that took place there. I maintain that, in the first instance, the hon. gentlemen who went to Washington made a mistake in giving their case away before they went. We have $7,000,000 worth of corn imported last year into Canada, while there is an export of only half a million dollars' worth more of cattle from the country. I think it is rather a dear experiment, because that $7,000,000 that was invested in corn could as readily have been used up in buying the coarse grains grown in Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Does the hon. gentleman think that this corn was imported for consumption in Canada?

Mr. HUGHES. It was imported and duty paid on it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Duty paid on free corn?

Mr. HUGHES. It was imported and entered into Canada. Would the hon. gentleman tell us what it was imported for?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This corn is passing through Canada, and it is imported to increase our carrying trade—that is, a portion of it.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the hon. gentleman say that that $7,000,000 worth was exported?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, no.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries what he does say.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I merely asked the hon. gentleman if he wishes the House to understand that $7,000,000 worth of corn was imported into Canada for home consumption, because much of it is imported for re-exportation?

Mr. HUGHES. This is another evidence of how these hon. gentlemen deceive the people. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have the country believe that the corn is imported for export.

Mr. P. MACDONALD (East Huron). Over $5,000,000 of it is.

Mr. HUGHES. For the seven months ending January 31st last there were over $6,000,000 worth of corn imported free of duty for home consumption. The statement is this in the "Unrevised Statement of the Values of the Principal Imports, free, entered for consumption in Canada"—not for export—during the seven months ending January 31st, 1898 and 1899, respectively. Here is what the amount entered in January, 1899: $239,000 worth. During the seven months ending January 31st, 1899, $6,081,000 worth was entered free, or nearly 20,000,000 bushels in seven months, that we imported for home consumption, and every bushel of that corn that was imported drove at least two bushels of oats out of sale. It is all very well for the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to shake his head; as the saying is, there is not a great deal in it. I made the statement that there is nearly $7,000,000 worth of corn entered for home consumption, and I was exactly right. The amount actually entered for home consumption was $6,964,000, or 19,000,000 bushels during last year alone.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). If the hon. gentleman will look at the explanatory note on the first page of the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will see what is meant by the term "home consumption," as applied there.

Mr. HUGHES. I will give the Minister of Customs a chance to speak later.

Mr. J. McMULLEN (North Wellington). We will have it out in the Budget debate.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Have it out now.

Mr. HUGHES. The Canadian commissioners had a good time in Washington. In the first place, as I have already said, they gave the whole case away, and in the second place, they robbed our farmers of a home market worth $7,000,000. The Minister of Customs may appoint a few Philadelphia lawyers to explain his regulations, but he cannot deny that $7,000,000 worth of corn was imported in one year. They had a splendid time at Washington; they had a jollification, and I am only sorry they did not bring something back. The right hon. the First Minister had read up some of the old treaties of the early days between the white man and the Indians in Canada, and the first thing that they would have, upon reaching Washington would be a glass of fire water, after which would come the pipe of peace and the presentation of the wampun belt. Then they would have a little pow-wow, a war dance and so on. We are told by some of the American commissioners when it was all over that some of the Canadian commissioners came down and acted as if they had been at a debating club. I know it was not the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who acted in that way, and I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) could not be charged with being a debater when there is anything diplomatic on, and I am satisfied that it could not refer to the First Minister, who was employing his sunny ways and manipulating the machine generally. There is only one other pair of shoulders upon which we can lay the burden of being a fussy debater. I can easily imagine how the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries went into that commission and said: "We are going to show that we have a plan of doing things different from that of Sir John Macdonald." He was going to show that "we Canadian fellows are not a lot of asses, but that we know how to do things up in first-class shape." He entered that chamber in which the commissioners met and undertook to show them how we run things in Canada. I can easily picture him with his fist clenched and swung above his head in debate. A great deal has leaked out, and as Mr. Chamberlain says, it is all pretty accurate. The Yankees got the start. When they had got the start of us on the Behring Sea question they said, "We will do something for you on the Alaskan boundary question." When they had got the start of us on the fisheries question, the tariff, the alien labour question and reciprocity, and on every question, they told the Canadian commissioners, "Wait until the report of the commission on the boundary question is brought in, and we will have something nice for you." After they had got the Canadians to surrender every right and every point excepting the boundary, they said: We think you should hand all these over to us, and then they adjourned. They got angry, and I dare say there was a good deal of fuss and feathers flying around for a little time, but at all events the four Canadians who composed that commission came home, and they got nothing.

Mr. COCHRANE. And their secretary besides.

Mr. HUGHES. And their two secretaries.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, we were considering the question of the import of corn. The Trade and Navigation Returns indicate that about 19,000,000 bushels of corn were imported, valued at $7,000,000, and that there were about 14,000,000 bushels exported. But, Sir, in considering the question of the export of corn it must be borne in mind that the people of Ontario alone—not considering the rest of Canada—grow about 25,000,000 bushels of corn, much of which may be included in this amount exported.

I had about concluded considering the Washington conference also before recess, but I omitted to give one statement which an American made to me as the cause of the failure of the Canadian commissioners to impress the American commissioners. He said to me: When the Canadian commissioners came down here, they reminded us of the chap who went out duck shooting with blank cartridges and a brass band. These hon. gentlemen know better than I do what transpired within the walls of the conference chamber, but so far as the public can judge they have accomplished nothing whatever. There is another point in connection with this conference which should be considered. When the Cuban war broke out our American friends were very loyal to Britain; the old lion's tail was no longer twisted, but on the contrary hats were raised (and I believe sincerely raised by the great majority of the American nation) in honour of Queen Victoria and the British Empire. To my mind, then was the time that our Government should have looked for a settlement of these questions involving the relationship between the two countries. But time wore on, and the Americans got through with the Cuban business. The commission will meet in six months again from to-day, and by that time the Philippine affair will be settled, and mark my words, Mr. Speaker, our commissioners will get very little out of the United States. As the American ambassador to England stated the other day: while he trusted Great Britain and the United States would always be friends they would never cease to be rivals. The experience of the past proves that. Even between the cities of New York and Boston and New York and Chicago, there is rivalry in business matters, and so in business matters between nations there will never cease to be rivalry. We cannot expect to get anything from the Americans except on the basis of a very generous quid pro quo to them, and, as I have stated before, we have thrown away the strongest levers in our possession to enable us to bring them to their senses. In passing, I might note that the friendly relations existing between Canada and the United States have materially improved during the last few years. But the credit for this is not due to the gentlemen who now govern Canada, and who, when the Liberal-Conservative Government was in power, contributed greatly to produce friction between the two countries. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was then managing the affairs of Nova Scotia, and he was truckling to the Americans in every imaginary respect, almost to the verge of secession from the Dominion of Canada. We found the First Minister and others of his party then making speeches severely condemning the Liberal-Conservative party for their stand on various international questions, and openly almost siding with the American people. This language was stored up in the mind of the Americans, and when these gentlemen went to Washington to negotiate, they were met with their own speeches in days gone by. To the conduct of these gentlemen more than to any other cause is traceable any unfriendliness that may have existed between Canada and the United States. Having pointed out that the Americans are a keen business people, I desire to mention one reason which to my mind has tended greatly to produce friendship between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and strange as it may appear this involves my mentioning the names of four or five business men. I believe that Sir William Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway,

Mr. HUGHES.

Chas. M. Hays, who for a few years has been general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, with the able assistance of Mr. Shaughnessy, Mr. McGuigan and Mr. Wainwright, and gentlemen managing other railways of Canada doing business with the United States, have taught the business community of the United States the importance of Canadian highways and a Canadian trade; and to these gentlemen more than to any other single influence is due the good feeling that exists between the business people of the United States and the Dominion of Canada. We must remember, however, with all our dealings with that people, that it is not many weeks since the Democratic candidate in the last presidential election condemned the American Government for interference in the Philippine Islands and in Cuba, but pointed out that lying north of the United States was a country that should be annexed to the United States. We must remember that during the war of 1812 a very small percentage of the people of the United States were in favour of that war. We all know that the State of Massachusetts refused to obey the mandate of Congress calling for men to enlist in the war. Her mandate to the United States Government was: "The war is unjust and unholy, and Massachusetts will not send a single man." Nevertheless, war was declared, and as time wore on all of the states of the Union were found contributing their troops to that unfortunate event. At that time the population of Canada to that of the United States was 1 to 40. The remarks I make now, I make with all kindness to the United States, recognizing that a very small element in any country may produce great trouble for the nations around. In that war the United States had thirty-six times as many troops as Great Britain and Canada combined; and yet, commencing at Detroit, and following down to Lundy's Lane, Chippewa, Chrysler's Farm and Chateaugay, on every occasion when we met the invaders, and we never met them without meeting five or six to one, they were defeated. To-day our population, in place of being 1 to 40, is 1 to 10; and as the most potent cure for the jealousy of Germany and for the quarreling of Russia and France with Great Britain was the fitting out of the Flying Squadron and the strengthening of the British army and navy, so there is nothing that will bring our American neighbours to a sense of their responsibility as quickly as to let them know that we are ready to stand on our rights and are not going to cringe to them; and if the worst comes to the worst, we can, with the assistance of Great Britain, change the international boundary from the forty-ninth parallel down to the forty-second. At the time of the settlement of the boundary between our North-west Territories and the United States, you know, Sir, for you have read history, that the mandate of the United States Government was: "the fifty-second parallel or fight"; and you know that Lord Palmerston's quiet reply was : " We have rights and we are ready to defend them." Let the same spirit actuate the Government to-day in their dealing with the United States, and, mark my words, we shall be better friends, and there will be no gunpowder wasted on the border.

The question of preferential trade has been before this House, and I regret that in the Speech from the Throne there is no promise of any legislation tending in that direction this session. We have a species of one-sided preferential trade. It is preferential for Great Britain, but there is no preference in it for Canada. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and the volatile Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), went to Washington in 1896, and they came home again sadder and wiser men. Then hon. gentlemen opposite became seized with the Jubilee fever and they crossed to the old land, where I must say the Prime Minister conducted himself with credit to Canada, except for a few free trade speeches which he made when he was carried away by his association with Mr. Gladstone—and he won the Cobden medal. He declined, however, to enter into any negotiations for preferential treatment, as we understand it, and as the Liberal-Conservative party had long fought for it, between Great Britain and her colonies. I was rather amazed that such a keen observer as the right hon. First Minister undoubtedly is, did not learn that free trade and Cobdenite ideas have been a perfect farce in the old land. I know it is looked on as heresy here to say that free trade has not made England great. Let us examine the facts of the case. I maintain that it has been in spite of free trade that England has grown great. At the time the Cobdenite idea seized possession of the English mind, steam vessels were about supplanting sailing vessels, and in many parts of England and Scotland factories were established for the construction of engines and boilers which gave an impetus to all other industries. The iron ship-building industry of England sprang into existence. We know that in Canada, to our cost, the old ship-building yards for the construction of wooden vessels, furnishing employment to thousands of men, were banished off the face of the earth, and the ship-building business was centralized in the shipyards of London, Birkenhead, Belfast and other points in the British Islands. In this way England secured and maintained her lead in commerce, and to this cause and not to free trade is due England's commercial greatness. What are the facts to-day in connection with our association with Great Britain? Canada taxes herself—I am free to say that it is not much and it should be a great deal more—for the defence of the Empire; but Great Britain is not taxing herself a particle for the defence of Canada. Were Canada wiped off the face of the earth, Great Britain would still have to maintain her naval supremacy as she is doing to-day. She taxes herself hundreds of thousands of pounds every year to protect herself against Russia and other hostile foreign nations; and yet the Russian farmer is able to put his grain on the English market as freely as the farmers of friendly colonies and those of her own possessions. Facts like these should be pressed home, and if they fail to have any effect the first time, they should be pressed time and again; because, that is the only way to bring the people across the water to a sense of their obligation to us.

Now, as possibly this is the last evening sitting before the adjournment for the Easter holidays, I shall cut my remarks somewhat shorter than I had intended, in order that others who may desire to do so may have an opportunity of addressing the House. There are just a few points which I will summarize briefly.

The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who is familiarly termed "the young Napoleon" of his party, made a speech at Perth, and followed it up with one at Stratford. Correctly or otherwise, the public believe that the gage was there thrown down and warning was given to the free trade wing of the Cabinet that there must be no more tampering with the tariff. As I pointed out this afternoon, when that announcement was made by the leader of the Opposition, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) dropped his head, while the young Minister of the Interior held his head aloft. We on this side endorse the stand taken by the Minister of the Interior. It will be a sorry day indeed for this country should the free trade wing of the Cabinet triumph over the protection element. I am very much surprised to find an old colleague of the Minister of the Interior in Manitoba taking up the gage which he has thrown down. But then one does not know how that machine may be engineered by these hon. gentlemen on the other side. It may be that there is a real difference among them, or it may be that they are all working in perfect harmony, and that the seeming quarrelling and disruption among them is only seeming and not real. However, that hon. gentleman pointed out something that the Liberal party had done since they came into office. But, after reading his speech two or three times, I have not been able to see what it amounted to. I would like to point out briefly what these hon. gentlemen have done as it appears to me. They coerced the Prime Minister of the province of Manitoba to establish in that province the most iniquitous system of separate schools to be found in the Dominion. As I have pointed out, it is not satisfactory to the Roman Catholics, because they are granted no permanent rights, and it is not satisfactory to the Protestants because the regulations are most annoying and irritating to them.

They have favoured the Americans in the changes they have made in the tariff, as witness free corn, and reduced duties on wheat and flour. And, at the same time, they have made changes which increased the burden upon imports from Great Britain.

They have endeavoured to carry out the Drummond railway deal, and, through the action of the Senate, were prevented from doing so.

They have promised—and I regret that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) is not in his seat to hear what I say—to carry out a deal which, I suppose, will be known as the Canada Eastern deal. It is true that many have only been for the purpose of making a good impression in the province of New Brunswick in the recent election. I know not what may be the object or whether it is intended to be forced upon the people of the country during the present session. Possibly it will be held over until the general election when it will be used to carry the province against the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), and the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan).

They introduced a Bill last year for the construction of a railway to the Yukon country, but failed to get it placed on the Statute-book. They carried it through this House, and I backed them in it. As I stated, if they would present and carry through a proper scheme for the establishment of railway communication with the Yukon, starting from a Canadian port, I would support it, and would take my chances of re-election. Their Bill last year was defeated in the Senate, and this Government, instead of acting as a business administration would have done, sat still and let a whole year roll round without turning a hand to secure that great trade to the Canadian railways or to build up a Canadian town on the coast.

They have had the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), who sits in the Cabinet without portfolio, buzzing backwards and forwards between Great Britain and Canada, nominally in connection with the fast Atlantic service. They have tried two or three times to make an arrangement for the establishment of this service, but have always failed. Had they carried out the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, which they found perfected and ready to their hand when they came into office, we should have had a fast service to-day with a first-class system of cold storage from which the farmers and tradesmen of Canada would have reaped immense benefit. They tell us now that it will be impossible to establish a fast Atlantic service in less than two years.

They have removed the duty from binder twine and reduced the duty on barbed wire. And to-day, I am informed, binder twine and barbed wire are dearer than they have ever been before in the history of the country. The effect of their policy has been to close our Canadian industries in these lines; and now the American manufacturer dumps his spare twine and barbed wire upon our market at prices to suit himself, and the Canadian farmer pays the enhanced price.

More than that, we charge these hon. gentlemen with duplicity. I certainly have proven, and it was practically admitted by the gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) who preceded me, that they had been insincere and inconsistent. But in his metaphysical attempt to define the difference between sincerity and insincerity, inconsistency and consistency, he merely fastened the charge more clearly and firmly than before. We say they have been guilty of more than inconsistency, they have been guilty of duplicity. We have from the lips of the First Minister himself, the private statement he made to the members of his own party, that, in submitting the plebiscite, it was not the intention that they should act upon it, unless prohibition were carried by a certain majority. This was a deal, so to speak, made by the hon. gentleman with his own particular friends. But it was not made known to the people of the Dominion of Canada, and I maintain that in this he and his colleagues were not acting fairly toward the people. We find also that prior to the general election the Prime Minister of this country, while he and his colleagues were standing on the platform declaiming against protection, declaiming against the manufacturers of this country as "robbers great and robbers small," wrote a private and confidential letter, undoubtedly he intended it to be hawked around, as it was hawked around by a gentleman in the city of Toronto, who took that letter from manufacturer to manufacturer in that city assuring him that he need have no fear whatever of any change in the tariff in case the Liberal party came into office. They had to keep up the old song and dance before the people, but Laurier, as he put it, would not interfere with the tariff in the slightest degree—an example of duplicity, which, I venture to say, cannot be equalled in the history of responsible government in the British Empire. We find also that while they were holding up their hands in holy horror in the other provinces and calling out "No coercion" and "Hands off Manitoba," these gentlemen were going along the side roads and in the villages and on public platforms in Quebec inciting the people against their English fellow-countrymen, declaring that in case the Liberals were returned to power, they would go the Conservative party one better and give a more complete system of separate schools in the province of Manitoba. We find also documents to their bishops and priests to this effect, again attempting to humbug the people and playing a double game. We find that while they were crying out against collusion between the Dominion Government and the provincial authorities, this Government had dealt after deal in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Ontario and Manitoba with the provincial governments, in order that they might supplant the Liberal-Conservative party and get into power. And they pretended to give a preference to Great Britain under their system of customs duties when it is apparent that they were giving a preference to the manufacturers of the United States.

A famous general, whom it is not necessary I should name, on the eve of an important engagement passed the word to his officers: "Let there be none but true men on guard to-night." The hour has arrived in our history when the mandate of the people to the politicians on either side must be: Let there be none but true men on guard in the halls of Parliament. Philip of Macedon, used to boast that he could capture any city, provided he could get a donkey through a breach in the wall with a bag of gold on his back. Our friends of the Liberal party seem to have profited by the teachings of the Philip of Macedon. I would like to point out to these gentlemen that the Empire over which Philip reigned, and the whole Greek nation descended in the scale of human progress until it presents the pitiable spectacle that Greece presented in the recent war with Turkey. A more degraded people in all that pertains to the greatness of a nation than is the Greek race to-day, it would be hard to find. Spain has largely followed a similar course and with the same results. That course is appealing to selfish motives in the people and buying them with this concession and that. And these tactics, if carried out in this country, will ultimately bring this people to the same level upon which the people of Greece stand to-day. When we find at least three Ministers of the Crown obtaining their positions in this House by deals with members of Parliament, what can we expect of such an Administration and what shall we think of the example they set? In Nova Scotia, the Finance Minister got rid of one member of this House by giving him first a landing waitership and then a judgeship. That gentleman had to hang around as a landing-waiter until they created a judgeship for him. We find the Minister of Railways and Canals getting rid of another in the province of New Brunswick, and the Minister of Public Works appointing a member in the Eastern Townships to the Senate. When you find the members of the Government stooping to such conduct, how can these judges whom they create condemn the unfortunate who comes before them for stealing a loaf of bread to keep his family from starving? If our public men are proven guilty of double dealing, of making secret understandings with their own followers and others on great public questions, as has been proven in the case of the temperance questions and in the case of the Prime Minister's stand on the National Policy, what must we think of the example thus set to the people of the country? It is good old British rule to have things done in the broad light of day. One of the things I most admire about the Englishman is that he does not fear criticism. If he is going to take his glass of liquor, he takes it and cares not who knows it—he is open, manly and fearless. And responsible government has for its corner stone that very principle—that politicians shall stand or fall by their public pledges. The course taken by the Government on the plebiscite meant that $250,000 of the money of the people was squandered. Had this been placed in the hands of my good friend the Minister of the Interior to be spent for immigration purposes, it might have been the means of bringing many people to our shores and of establishing thousands of happy homes in the North-west. When we find our political leaders recklessly casting aside their past pretensions on assuming office, a change in our methods is sadly needed. I have nothing further to say, I conclude by stating that like the general whose words I have already quoted, Canada to-day demands that whatever men may be on guard in our public life, shall be true men.

Mr. J. A. C. MADORE (Hochelaga). (Translation.) I do not rise, Sir, to vindicate the Government from the attacks levelled at them by the hon. gentlemen opposite,—the Government does not require to be vindicated from the accusations and the denunciations of those gentlemen—but I merely rise to congratulate the Government upon the policy they have pursued since their advent to power and upon the gratifying results of that policy throughout Canada. The gloomy forebodings of the hon. gentlemen opposite, upon the occasion of the advent of the Liberals to power, resulted, it is true, in disturbing to some extent, a certain portion of the electorate, but that anxiety and uneasiness were pretty soon dispelled. It had been foretold that a new era of deficits would coincide with the return of the Liberals to power, but the Government has given the lie to those false prophets by ushering in an era of surpluses. The last financial year has closed with a surplus of a million and a half, and there is every reason to presume that the next financial year will close with a still more considerable surplus. An increased taxation had also been predicted, but the Government have again silenced the false prophets by remodelling the tariff, and thus considerably cutting down the burden of taxation which bore so heavily upon the people: and, further by reducing to 2 cents the rate of Imperial postage, for all the British possessions and for the United States, and, later on, by reducing to two cents the Canadian domestic letter-rate. Through those reforms the cost of correspondence carried on by the people of this country has been cut down by at least one-third.

The hon. gentlemen further predicted that the trade and the industries of the country would be ruined, but looking at the Blue-books, I find that since the coming into power of the present Administration, the volume of our trade has increased by sixty million dollars and never have our industries been in a more flourishing condition. Our opponents, on finding out how judicious was the reform of the tariff carried out by the Government, and that the changes brought about were not exaggerated either in the direction of protection, or in that of free trade, while considerably lightening the burden of taxation that bore upon the consumers, the hon. gentlemen, I say, began to arraign the Liberal party for breaking their promises, and not carrying out, when in power, their past professions and the policy they had advocated, when they sat in the Opposition. I have often heard the hon. gentlemen opposite, and even the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) imputing as a crime to the Government, the fact of not having removed every vestige of protection, on the ground, as they said, that when sitting opposite, the Liberals had proclaimed that such was their policy and that should they come into power, they would carry out that programme. As the saying goes, what does not happen one day may happen another. I remember perfectly that, at the outset of the first session of this Parliament, during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. leader of the Opposition gave expression to views diametrically opposed to what he advocates now. I still have a vivid recollection of having heard him say that in the course of the election contest, the Liberals had stolen his programme. And, in support of that proposition, the leader of the Opposition referred to the speeches of a certain number of Liberal candidates, and he also referred to the speech delivered and to the position taken by the right hon. leader of this House, who then occupied the position now filled by the hon. gentleman himself. What were the pledges given by the Liberals, in the course of the electoral contest? It will suffice, in order to fully understand the matter, to refer to the speech delivered upon that occasion by the hon. leader of the Opposition :

I believe I am warranted in saying that the hon. gentleman opposite has received no mandate from the people of this country to break down the protection that is now given to our industries, and to adopt a policy of free trade or a revenue tariff policy. At a public meeting held at Westmount on the 19th of May, 1896, as reported in the Montreal "Witness" :

"Mr. Madore impressed upon his hearers that he was utterly in accordance with Mr. Laurier's policy. He was with him in tariff reform, and also in his policy with regard to the reform in the general administration of public affairs, also on the question of Manitoba schools. * * * Speaking of the reform of the tariff, of which he was decidedly in favour, he said it did not mean a radical change, but it was purely and simply a legislation on a better scale with regard to the duties on different goods. The tariff reform had been a necessity for more than one year. It would be beneficial to every one, including manufacturers, and would not injure them as the Conservative party makes it appear. It would lessen the taxes, and it could be called a kind of protection.

The hon. leader of the Opposition further said :

Well, Sir, that, I think, was climbing very vigorously unto our platform, and adopting the issue upon which we were standing, and forsaking the issue upon which hon. gentlemen opposite said they would go to the country.

The "Star" of the same date gives this report of the same speech :

"The speaker was in accord with his leader on the tariff question. The Liberal party was not seeking to make any radical change in the tariff, but simply wished for a readjustment of the duties on a more equitable basis—a tariff which would assist the manufacturers, and at the same time, would not press too heavily on the consumer."

That does not exactly square with the views expressed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That desire to assist the manufacturers does not exactly square with the policy of removing every vestige of protection, to which the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.), (Mr. Davies) had committed himself. But I may remark that the hon. First Minister, who was present when Mr. Madore made his speech at Westmount, stated in the course of his address :

"The issues now before the electors had been well defined by Mr. Madore."

So that this view of making no radical change in the tariff, but rather improving the condition of affairs in the country, was heartily endorsed by the hon. First Minister, who was there to ask the electors to accept the policy stated by Mr. Madore as the policy of the Liberal party.

At that time, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition agreed with us that the programme upon which we had gone to the people was a tariff reform policy and not, as he now contends, a radical policy. Now, if, as admitted by the hon. leader of the Opposition, our tariff policy is not a radical policy, our opponents are quite astray in arraigning us for having broken pledges which we never gave to the electorate. I am well aware that they are unpatriotic and selfish enough to wish that the Government should lack wisdom to the point of respecting no vested rights, and, through an inconsiderate policy, dealing a deadly blow to the trade and commerce of the country. But I may venture to tell the hon. gentlemen this, that they will be sadly disappointed, if they indulge in this vain and foolish hope, and they will soon find out, to their utter dismay that, despite the considerable reduction in taxation brought about by the new tariff, despite also the decreased revenue which that reform, and chiefly the operation of our preferential trade policy must necessarily involve, the manufacturers are satisfied with the policy inaugurated by the Government and the flourishing condition of the revenue will allow the Government to meet the public expenditure of the country, still leaving in the public exchequer, at the close of the financial year, a handsome surplus of several million dollars. There can no longer be any doubt that throughout the length and breadth of the land, the people hail with delight the tariff reform carried out by the Government. Even those manufacturers who dreaded most the reforms foreshadowed in our programme, are now ready to declare that they view them with satisfaction; and to take but one instance, coming from people who bitterly opposed at the outset our policy, let me read to the House the following letter, addressed to me, some time ago by the manager of the "Montreal Rolling Mills Company":

Dear Sir,—I take this opportunity of writing to thank you for the trouble and attention given to our claims regarding tariff.

While, of course, as you would expect from a manufacturer, we did not get all that we asked for, viz., that the materials that we used for rolling into skelp, now $2, while the duty on skelp is only 5 per cent, say 95 cents per ton, and the result being that we lose about one-third of the tonnage that we have in the past turned out in our rolling mill, still we must acknowledge, with many thanks, that our claims reduction in duty on steel billets enables us to continue the manufacture of bar steel, and together with the specific protection on cut nails and wire nails now afforded us, will give us the opportunity of continuing the manufacture of the same.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman tell us who signed this letter?

Mr. MADORE. (Translation.) It is signed by William McMaster, manager.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) What is the date?

Mr. MADORE. (Translation.) The 27th of May, 1897, just after the tariff reform had been carried out. If it is true, Sir, as stated by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that, during the electoral contest, we pledged ourselves to a tariff reform policy; if it is true as the most competent men declare, that the manufacturers are satisfied with a tariff reform, which, while lightening the burdens that bear on the consumers, allows the manufacturers to realize reasonable profits, I would like to know on what authority the hon. gentlemen ground themselves to state that we have falsified our promises? There is another issue which, the hon. gentlemen opposite predicted, was to prove a stumbling block to us and bring the Government to grief. I mean the settlement of the school question. It is to no good purpose that the hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to stir up civil strife among the different classes of the community, by appealing to religious prejudices; it is of no avail for our opponents to proclaim everywhere before the electors of the province of Quebec and to tell the Catholics that the Greenway-Laurier settlement does not give satisfaction to our co-religionists, while their Protestant colleagues denounce before the Protestant electors the fair and reasonable concessions granted by Mr. Greenway to the Catholic minority. It is of no avail for them to blow hot and cold, dry and damp, in order to stir up religious strife among the people. The school question is permanently settled, and it has been settled to the satisfaction of the interested parties, and in such a way as to meet the views and the approval of all moderate and right-minded men in the country.

It is a noteworthy fact that in the Catholic province of Quebec in the name of which the hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to speak, nobody complains of that settlement. The most authorized voice, that of the competent religious and ecclesiastical authorities, has only been heard to warn the faithful against denouncing the settlement carried out by the Government. If the Church authorities are satisfied, I say without hesitation that the Government have done their duty, and that, having applied the proper remedy and righted the wrong, they are entitled to the congratulations which I proposed to offer them, when I took the floor. The two political parties are at the antipodes as to the policy respectively pursued by them on that vital issue. One party tries to stir up one class of the community against the other class; they try to sow dissension and discord, by appealing to racial and religious prejudices, to civil war, while the other party appeals to the best interests of humanity, to the good feelings of all classes of the community, reminding our fellow-countrymen that they are brothers, and that if they do not kneel at the same altars, still they all adore the same God, and are all brothers in Christ. From what I have just said, it will easily be inferred where is to be found true patriotism. No greater misfortune could befall a young country like ours than that of becoming the seat of a religious war; because as history shows us, religious feuds are all the more fierce as both parties are blinded by fanaticism.

In the last century, in Nova Scotia, then called Acadia, there prevailed a fierce religious conflict. The Acadian Catholics, who were in the minority, were the butt of persecutions of every description. The Abbé Sigogne proved their protector, and it was by conciliatory means that he often succeeded in obtaining justice for his people. It was by this means that he enlisted in their cause the services of one of the most eminent statesmen who ever commanded the confidence of the people of Nova Scotia, Haliburton. I may be allowed to place on record here what that good Protestant statesman told his co-religionists of those days, in connection with religious matters. Would to God such views were shared in by all my fellow-countrymen! Would to God they were endorsed by our opponents, so strong is my conviction that it would do away with many prejudices. I invite the hon. gentlemen opposite who are now trying to stir up race and creed prejudices to deeply ponder over the words of that statesman, as I also invite my fellow-countrymen to treasure them up in their minds :

Every man who lays his hands on the New Testament, and says that that is his book of faith, whether he be Catholic or Protestant, Churchman or Dissenter, Baptist or Methodist, however much we may differ in doctrinal points, he is my brother, and I embrace him. We all travel by different roads to the same God. In that path, which I pursue, should I meet a Catholic, I salute him—I journey with him; and when we shall arrive at the 'flammantia limina mundi'—when that time shall come, as come it must—when the tongue that now speaks shall moulder and decay—when the lungs that now breathe the genial air of Heaven shall refuse me their office—when these earthly vestments shall sink into the bosom of their mother earth, and be ready to mingle with the clods of the valley—I will, with that Catholic take a longing, lingering, retrospective view. I will kneel with him; and instead of saying, in the words of the presumptuous Pharisee, "Thank God I am not like this Papist," I will pray that, as kindred, we may be equally forgiven: that, as brothers, we may be both received.

Such are the principles, such are the feelings on which is grounded the Laurier-Greenway school settlement, and such principles I would like to see prevailing among all classes of the community in Canada. Unfortunately, I fear our opponents are trying to weaken and uproot these noble feelings from the midst of our community.

The Government having so successfully settled both these vexed questions, no wonder that the people should welcome the proposed Senate reform, which is a still more important scheme from an administrative standpoint, than the tariff reform was, from a financial point of view. Was the course of the Senate during the two last sessions, such as to justify the movement now on foot in favour of the reform of that body? I may say, before giving an answer to that question, that I am not in favour of the abolition of the Senate. When brought face to face with a problem of such moment we should beware of hearkening to the voice of passion and prejudice. I am well aware, as all those who are opposed to the Upper Chamber, of the blunders committed of late by that august body: I know also all the arguments that may be urged in favour of the abolition of that branch of our legislative system, but I know also that it would be unfair to urge the reform of our constitution on the ground that some bad votes were given by that branch of the legislature. I am, therefore, an advocate of the bicameral system. I am also in favour of the appointment of senators by the Governor in Council. As in the case of the administration of justice, and the appointment of judges, I believe that the senators should be responsible to nobody. I believe that the senators, like the judges, should be free from all party entanglements, and that like the judges of the land, they should be disgraced in the eyes of the community, whenever, in the discharge of their duty, they act as political partisans. Such were,

Mr. MADORE.

I believe, the views held by the fathers of confederation. It is not to be presumed that the men who framed the constitution by which we are governed were not conversant with the various modes of constituting an Upper Chamber; and if we refer to the debates of confederation, we will find that the different systems were well threshed out, and that the one by which we are now governed, was finally adopted.

The fathers of confederation never entertained the idea that any disagreement or friction would occur between the Upper Chamber and the Lower Chamber; not only did such an occurrence appear to them highly improbable, but it was even thought impossible. In order to show that such was the case, let me here put on record what was stated on that subject by the hon. George Brown, who is recognized by both parties as the chief factor in the work of confederation. Referring to such dead-lock as the members of the then Opposition thought likely to occur under the new order of things, he said:

And, after, all, is it not an imaginary fear—that of a dead-lock? Is it at all probable that any body of gentlemen who may compose the Upper House, appointed, as they will be, for life, acting, as they will do, on personal and not party responsibility, possessing as they must, a deep stake in the welfare of the country, and desirous as they must be, of holding the esteem of their fellow-subjects—would take so unreasonable a course as to imperil the whole political fabric?

Sad to say, the Senate of the day has given the lie to the predictions of the hon. George Brown. The senators appointed some twenty years ago by the Tory Government, remembering their old party ties, have showed themselves partisans. I know men who, up to lately, had made a name for themselves for their broad views, for the unswerving sense of justice and fair-play, ever displayed by them, for the contempt in which they held the petty manoeuvres of party politics and political partisanship, and who, through their political career, had ever been guided by the beacon-light of patriotism, and yet, these men, I say, during the two last sessions, did derogate in certain respects, and yield to political partisanship. They have forgotten that it belongs to the elective branch of Parliament to govern and they did not hesitate for party considerations, to block Government measures, because they were introduced by political opponents. Those senators who were bound to act with the same impartiality as a judge presiding over a court, those men whose political career had so far entitled them to an honourable record on the scroll of Canadian history, those men, I say, will be called to a severe account by unbiassed historians and their name will go down to posterity as that of men who have soiled and tarnished their reputation, when yielding to the promptings of party spirit, they forgot what they owed to their country and proved recreant to the voice of patriotism.

They will go down to history as men who allowed themselves to be influenced by party spirit, instead of hearkening to the voice and obeying the promptings of patriotism, which is the standard by which the course of true patriots is to be gauged. It will be recorded that Senate reform had become a necessity, owing to the fact that the majority of those composing that body had yielded to partisanship, thus giving the lie to the predictions of the fathers of confederation who treated as an imaginary fear that of a dead-lock, or disagreement between the Upper House and the Lower Chamber, holding that any body of men who might, in the future, be called to compose the Senate, desirous as they must be of holding the esteem of their fellow-countrymen, would act with such impartiality as would be dictated to them by a sense of lofty patriotism, and would never be so unreasonable as to yield to the suggestions of party spirit and prove recreant to their duty as patriots.

The friction which had been foreseen by the Liberals at that time, predicted by Sir A. A. Dorion, and which the fathers of confederation thought could never occur, that conflict, I say, is now a fact. Such an evil ought to be remedied. Doing away with the Senate, in my opinion, would not remedy the evil. Radical changes are always fraught with danger, and making the Senate elective would to my mind, prove too radical a measure.

The remedy suggested by the right hon. Prime Minister, that of calling together the two Chambers, and asking them, at a joint sitting, to give a vote on the question on which they disagree, to solve it, in a word, by a majority of the votes of the Senate and of the House of Commons, such a remedy, I say, seems to me one well in accord with the spirit of our institutions and with the principles of representative Government.

We have been told that it was a mere utopia. The leader of the Opposition has so qualified it, adding that it was a preposterous proposal. Whether it is a ridiculous proposal or not, I cannot say, but I know that it is the proceeding resorted to in the most civilized countries in the world, in France, for instance, under the most solemn and trying circumstances. Under the Republican rule, a few weeks ago, the hand of God lay heavy on France. The first magistrate of Republican France was suddenly carried away by the grim visitor and the government was left without its official head. All the European nations, the jealous rivals as well as the devoted friends of the Republic, were in daily expectation of one of those terrible crises attended with results fraught with the greatest dangers to the whole world. Thanks to the admirable mechanism of the French constitution, the second day had scarcely elapsed when the Republic gave a new president to France, and all the world realized that the republican system in France could work just as efficaciously and as smoothly as the old monarchical system did, when they cried out: "The King is dead! Long live the King." Now what was the mechanism adopted by France, and which worked so promptly and so effectually? It was just the same as was proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister, and to be resorted to in our country, in case of conflict between the Upper House and the popular Chamber. The French Senate and Chamber were called together and the president of the Republic was elected by the joint vote of both Chambers.

The people consider, on good ground, that the president whose name comes out ahead of all others from the ballot-box wherein the members of both Chambers have cast their ballots, is truly the choice of the nation itself. So, the vote given here in the present case by the two Chambers, in case of disagreement between them, will be looked upon as the vote of the people and as the expression of the popular will.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). (Translation). Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Whenever there arises a disagreement, in France between the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, is the Congress called upon to discuss the question?

Mr. J. A. C. MADORE. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman knows very well that no such thing takes place in France; because, the Senate in that country, is partially elective. But the instance I referred to shows that under the most trying circumstances, the most civilized country in the world has adopted the very mechanism proposed to us by the Prime Minister here, in case of disagreement between the two Chambers. As our senators, in this instance have thought fit, through political partisanship, to give rise to a disagreement between the two Chambers; and as, owing to their action, it has become necessary to provide for a mechanism calculated to remedy such a state of things; as the same hon. gentlemen have chosen to assume, in the eyes of posterity, the responsibility attaching to the reform of the Senate, I am in favour of the proposal of the hon. the Prime Minister as the most moderate reform that could be devised and the one most in conformity with the democratic views which I hold.

There is still another question, in connection with which I have to congratulate the present Administration, that is the Anglo-American rapprochement. It is referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and we find also stated therein the reason of the adjournment of the Conference to the 2nd day of August next. Mr. Speaker, it was highly creditable to the present Government as well as a marked advantage over their predecessors, to have been able to bring together in conference the representatives of the two nations. We have it on record how in the past the attempts made by former Administrations to negotiate treaties or to hold conferences with the United States of America proved dismal failures.

The mere fact of having provoked this opportunity of having debated between the representatives of the two people, the various causes of differences existing, is, in my opinion, a marked success and one highly creditable to our Government whatever may be the issue of the conference. I find the best evidence of the importance of that result for the country in the fact that the hon. leader of the Opposition was so impressed with the same view that he thought it a public duty to tell his followers that while the commission was sitting, they must refrain from dealing with questions which were under its consideration, and which might be prejudiced by such a public discussion of the position of the Government. From this action of the leader of the Opposition it may safely be inferred that he considered that the Conference might result in accomplishing some great good for Canada, and that in his view it was a work of the utmost importance and gravity which the Government had undertaken, when they had succeeded in bringing together the representatives of the two countries. This first step was well calculated to urge on our opponents to renewed efforts to serve their country. We may be told, I know, that it was in order the better to choose his ground that the leader at first assumed a neutral attitude, and one of mere expectancy. It was not so very long ago that he had proved so unlucky in his role as a prophet: he had declared that never could the Laurier Government succeed in having the treaties with Belgium and Germany denounced by Great Britain, and on the very day he had committed himself to that statement, the treaties with Belgium and Germany had been denounced by the Government of Great Britain. Now, if the hon. gentleman was wary and circumspect in his conduct, his followers did not show themselves as circumspect as their leader. While the Commission was sitting, the hon. gentlemen and their organs, unwillingly satisfied that the conference would result in accomplishing great good for Canada, began to cry out that the concessions wrested from the Americans would cost us great sacrifices, that the Canadian Commissioners were even ready to give up a portion of our national territory, in order to obtain a few paltry concessions. Now, the reason why the Commission was adjourned is well known. It was because our representatives resisted those extravagant demands; and then, the statement made by our opponents is at least premature, as the conference is only adjourned.

The Canadian Commissioners, representing the Dominion Government, instead of having been more or less courteously shown the door at the American capital, as was the case with the delegates of our former Government, had enough influence with their colleagues representing the other countries, to have the conference adjourned to the 2nd day of August, in order that they might be enabled to elucidate the various questions under their consideration, and to get the necessary information as to the means best calculated to remedy the present condition of affairs.

But, it is not only in the United States that the prestige and influence of the Canadian people have gone increasing since the advent to power of the Laurier Government. Through the voice of their Prime Minister, the Canadian people have been duly appreciated beyond the seas. It was in the mother country and in old France that the increased prestige and influence of this young nation were first felt, in such an unprecedented way. And if we have now the honour of being looked upon as a nation by our powerful neighbours, we owe it to the more thorough information they have had about us and to the éclat of the Prime Minister's visit and reception on the European continent.

To sum up, a greater prestige and influence abroad, an increased prosperity at home, decreasing prejudices and dissensions between men of different races and creeds in this country, such is the balance sheet of the present Government. With such a record, the Government may well laugh at their traducers, and as the God sung by the poet of old, poured forth floods of light over his obscure blasphemers, well may the present Government pursue their triumphant course and continue to pour forth the beneficent results of their policy upon the Canadian people, upon their obscure traducers as well as upon their admirers.

Mr. G. V. McINERNEY (Kent, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and considerable interest, as I do not doubt you have done yourself, to the many admirable speeches contributed by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House in the course of this important debate. We thought at one stage of the proceedings—a very early stage—that the Government had sent forth the order that their supporters, sitting behind them, should be gagged and muzzled, and that the attack which had been kept up all along the line upon the Government's position should not be answered by any of their supporters. For a whole week, in the early part of the debate, no man rose on the other side of the House, to answer the charges levelled against the Government by the numerous speakers of the Opposition, but the Government evidently changed their tactics, for last Monday, having no doubt given careful and prayerful consideration on the previous Sunday to the situation, they determined that it would not be wise or in the interest of the Liberal party to allow this wordy war to continue and have all the discussion on one side only.

On Monday, on Tuesday and to-day, we saw the Government putting up their men to answer, and if possible repel the attack which has been directed against their position. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to all of the speeches that have been made, but I must pause for a moment to pay a highly deserved compliment to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) on the very elegant diction of the essay which he delivered, though not in the honourable gentleman's mother tongue. There can be no doubt that that dissertation on parliamentary history was quite interesting to those who have given any attention at all to such subjects. The hon. gentleman proceeded to tell us that he was a Liberal of the English school. I think we have heard that expression before. He proceeded further to tell us that the Tory party in England was noted for its illiberality, that it was constantly opposed to reforms and all measures designed to extend the liberties of the people. He became specific in his charges against the Tory party. He praised the Liberal party in England as being the party of reform and laid to its credit the great reforms which have been carried in that country. That hon. gentleman, who, I believe, is a professor in one of the schools in Montreal, told us that the Liberal party deserved the credit of carrying Catholic emancipation. I felt shocked when the hon. gentleman made that statement, and I am amazed that one who is credited with being so erudite should have made such an inaccurate statement of an historical fact, for the merest tyro in the study of history knows that it was the Duke of Wellington's Government that carried Catholic Emancipation, and it is well known that the Duke of Wellington was the leader of the Tory party in England. Not only that, but it was while Sir Robert Peel, was leading the Tory party in England that he introduced the Reform Bill into the English House of Commons, and let me go one step further and tell the hon. gentleman that Sir Robert Peel, while a Tory, endeavouring to carry the Reform Bill, fell. Now, Sir, I am not so much interested in pointing out the inaccuracy of the statements made by the hon. member for Gaspé, as I am concerned with showing what object the hon. gentleman has in reading such lessons from English parliamentary history. It is well known to every man who studies our politics, that the large majority of the Irish Catholic people of this country support hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is well known to any student of political matters in Canada that a number of Catholics do so because they believe that in some mysterious way the Liberal party in Canada has some connection with the Liberal party in England, that the Liberal party in England has been the great friend of reforms, and that it had given them, as hon. gentlemen opposite claim, this measure of Catholic emancipation. Now, Sir, I am here to-night to show that, while hon. gentlemen make such appeals as that in order, as I have shown, to prejudice men's minds apart from the general questions, upon which their judgments should divide them, the Liberal party in this country has not been the friend of the Irish Catholic population, nor have they, when in power, given them a legitimate share of patronage and positions in the country. What do we see to-day? We see that the Irish Catholic population in Canada is not even represented in this Chamber by any member of the Cabinet. It is true that the Solicitor General is a member of the Government, but not of the Cabinet, and in this whole Government there is but one representative of that large body of the population. Compare, if you please, that conduct with the conduct of the Liberal-Conservative party. The Liberal-Conservative party, though charged with illiberality towards Irish Catholics, placed the late Sir John Thompson at the head of their Government, and with him there were three other gentlemen of the Irish Catholic persuasion. There was the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Mr. Costigan), the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Sir Frank Smith, who had a position in the Senate, and Mr. Curran, now Judge Curran, of Montreal. I have refrained hitherto in this Chamber from calling attention to this matter, because it may wear a demagogic look, but I believe that when such appeals are insiduously made, as they have been made, by the hon. member for Gaspé, it is time for such an answer and such retaliatory arguments as I have made here to-night. I pass from the speech of the hon. member for Gaspé, and the next hon. gentleman I would refer to is the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He is a gentleman of erudition and scholarship, and I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech that he gave us this afternoon. There was only one thing that I found fault with particularly, in that long speech, and that was in the hon. gentleman saying that if Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier had been alive to-day they would have found fault with some of their followers in this country for the position they have taken on all great public questions. He went so far as to say that as he came up Parliament Hill this morning he saw the statues of Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier shrouded in snow as if the statues of those gentlemen were anxious to hide themselves and to retire again to their tombs. What the hon. gentleman meant by the statues wishing to retire to their tombs I can hardly understand, nor can I understand by what method he diagnosed the brazen mentality of the statues, but if he could assume what might be in that mentality. I suppose I may have the same privilege. It rather struck me that these statues covered themselves with snow, to use the figure of the hon. gentleman, because notwithstanding the preferential tariff, they found that even in the end of March snow was cheaper than cotton.

Sir, in the Speech from the Throne with which this Parliament was opened we are denied the privilege, which generally inures to the Opposition, of discussing any question of policy, because if I may be allowed to state a paradox: the policy of the Liberal party in power is to have no policy. We do sigh for the good old days when these hon. gentlemen opposite had a shifting policy for every day in the year, and when their chameleon-like condition permitted them with every motion to change their colour, and don a different garment to suit the occasion. They appeared before us as if they were dressed in shot silk to attract the eye of the public; one day unrestricted reciprocity, the next day commercial union, the next day free trade as they have it in England, and on all other days of the year a policy for each varying phase of public opinion. We feel regret that we are not allowed the privilege now of criticising any policy of the Government as it may appear in the Speech from the Throne. That document simply contains, as it should contain, they say, the programme of the Government for the present session; but we are still allowed the privilege to contrast the announcements in the Speech from the Throne with the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite adopted in 1893, at their great convention in Ottawa. What was that Liberal platform? It called for economy, it called for retrenchment, it called for a reduction in the number of Ministers, it called for the independence of Parliament, it called for an end to nepotism, it dealt death to protection, and it announced the repeal of the Franchise Act, and a plebiscite on prohibition. Sir, the only two pledges in the Ottawa platform they have attempted to carry out, are the plebiscite and Franchise Act repeal. And with regard to the latter, I am here to-night to state that the Franchise Act which last session these gentlemen placed on the Statute-book, is in many parts of the country an unworkable Act. I made bold to state in this House that that Act, as introduced by the Government, was unworkable, and as perfected—as far as it could be perfected by the arduous labour and industry of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the help he was willing to admit he received from both sides of the House—that Act remained after it left this House and even after it passed the Senate, a very imperfect piece of legislation indeed. If time permitted, I could specify instances in which the Act has failed altogether in its operation, and instances in which unintentional wrong on the part of officials—even in the plebiscite election and in the local election held not long ago in New Brunswick under the same lists as we will have for the Dominion election—instances in which unintentional wrong was done to a very large number of the electorate in the county which I have the honour to represent. But, Sir, I will let that pass for the present.

Mr. McINERNEY.

The other planks in the Liberal platform of 1893 have been altogether unfulfilled. Instead of retrenchment we have inflation; instead of economy we have extravagance, and instead of a reduction in the number of Ministers, we have a larger number of Ministers in this Government than in any other previous Government of Canada. Instead of having the independence of Parliament asserted, as the hon. gentlemen opposite boasted we would have, we find that members supporting the Government have sat in this Parliament with promises of offices in their pockets, and no less than a dozen of them are now enjoying lucrative positions on the bench and in other high offices, because they supported the present Ministry. Why, rumour tells us that even at this hour there are sitting opposite members of Parliament, with the expectation, aye and the promise of remunerative positions in their pockets. These were the gentlemen who before they came to power, declaimed in favour of the independence of Parliament; these are the gentlemen who found fault with every member of Parliament who was appointed to office when the Conservatives held the reins of Government. And as to nepotism, I will not state what my own view is as to the principle of members of Parliament and Ministers having their own relatives appointed to positions of emolument under the Crown, but, Sir, it has been clearly proven that all the criticism formerly levelled at the Conservative Government is a broken shaft in the hands of these gentlemen opposite, who in the face of the pledges they made, have in some instances placed nearly a dozen of the near relatives of some of the Ministers of the Crown in positions of the greatest emolument. They were to deal death to protection—that was the principal plank in the platform of 1893. I will deal with that question at a later stage in my remarks, but comparing the platform of 1893 with the performances of hon. gentlemen opposite, and with the programme they now announce in the Speech from the Throne, one is inclined to ask: Is this the same Liberal party that held the convention in Ottawa? It is true that we miss the faces of the Listers, of the Langeliers, of the Camerons and of the Guays, and many others of the old guard of the Liberal party, and that we find in their places men of much more pliable material. The members of the old guard have been weeded out from the other side of the House, and in their places have come gentlemen who are much more amenable to the party whip, and who can be moulded more easily to the will of the men who now conduct the affairs of Government. Sir, one is inclined to parody the allusions of Burke to the disappearance of chivalry in France after the French revolution, and to say: That the age of chivalry in the Liberal party is gone, that the age of calculators and pretending economists has succeeded, and that the glory of that party has departed for ever. Where one might ask, is the party honour that formerly felt a stain like a wound; where is the party honour when such transactions as have been recited in this House have been unblushingly performed by hon. gentlemen opposite? I claim, Sir, that we can expect nothing else, seeing the formation of the party as it is to-day. It may be the first time that the statement has been made in this Parliament, but I take the responsibility of this statement when I say: That I believe that the downfall of the Conservative party dates from the convention of Quebec in 1890, when the provincial premiers of Canada met to resolve, and to resolve principally for the purpose of bringing about the downfall of the Conservative Government. There the initiatory step was given to the Jesuits Estates Act, and there was started the Manitoba school question. These gentlemen who met at Quebec believed, and believed in their hearts, that between the Scylla and Charybdis of these two questions it would be impossible for the Conservative party to steer their course in safety. They were right, and I find as a reward for the institution of these Quebec resolutions, that the different premiers from the different provinces were installed in this Government as soon as it was formed. I find the Premier of Nova Scotia; I find the Premier of New Brunswick; I find the man who stood most closely to the then deceased Premier of Quebec; I find the Premier of the province of Ontario, now departed from this scene. These gentlemen were taken into the Government, not for any services they had rendered to the Liberal party in the great fight of 1896, for some of them, I am told, hid behind the wood-pile in that fight. No, Sir, it was because the arrangement had been previously made that these gentleman, who worked so ardently and insidiously to bring about the downfall of the Conservative party, should be the first to get the reward when the Liberal party came into power. Sir, in that aggregation I see the spirit of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. J. I. Tarte), who represents, as nearly as I can judge, the Hon. Mr. Mercier, once the Premier of the province of Quebec. Here, Sir, I would like to utter a warning to the hon. Prime Minister. He may not heed or welcome that warning, but nevertheless I will give it to him. I warn him that he should take heed of his association with that hon. gentleman. Let us inquire into that hon. gentleman's associations in the past. He became an intimate friend of Honoré Mercier, and Honoré Mercier fell from the high position in which the people of his native province had placed him. He became the friend of Sir Hector Langevin, and Sir Hector Langevin fell. He became the friend of Sir Adolphe Chapleau, and Sir Adolphe Chapleau fell—fell, I am forced to admit, in the estimation of his party and the public. And, Sir, in the fight which the hon. Minister of Public Works instigated between Sir Adolphe Chapleau and Sir John Thompson, the hon. Minister of Public Works was the Iago of the piece; for, Sir, he was prepared to say, "Whether Cassio kill Rodrigo, or Rodrigo kill Cassio, or either kill the other, my cause must gain." Sir, I would tell the hon. Prime Minister that the hon. Minister of Public Works can best be described as he has been described by the French people of the province from which I come—as the political assassin of the political reputations of great French Canadians; and, Sir, I would warn the Prime Minister against the insidious association of that gentleman. He has himself remarked that the Tarpeian rock is not far from the Capitol; and I would tell the hon. gentleman that, if the history of public men in this country is to be taken as an indication of what is to happen in the future, the sooner he cuts the alliance between himself and that hon. gentleman the better.

Now, Sir, the first paragraph in the Address that calls for consideration, is that which refers to the expansion of trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not yet answered the question that has been put to them from this side of the House—to what is that expansion of trade due? To what is due the wonderful prosperity—because we admit that it is wonderful prosperity—that this country now enjoys? Hon. gentlemen opposite do not tell us that it is caused by the reduction of the tariff; they do not tell us that that has caused the increased exports and imports; because, if they made any such argument as that, I would direct their attention to the figures of the trade of the great American republic for the last year. Why, Sir, the exports of the United States for last year increased over those of the preceding year by the enormous sum of over $180,000,000. Under what sort of a tariff did that great increase come about? Under the Dingley Tariff, the highest protective tariff that country has had for many a year—higher even than the McKinley Tariff. Therefore, hon. gentlemen opposite are precluded from making the argument, as they have done in some cases, that the great prosperity has been brought about by the reduction they made in the tariff. On this point I would quote for their benefit an article which I have clipped from the New York "Commercial," one of the very best and financial trade papers in New York, of the 16th of July last:

The complete foreign trade returns of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, show a net gain of $328,995,880 in our favour over our trade in the previous fiscal year. Of this stupendous increase no less than $180,318,312 represents the greater value of exports, while $148,677,568 represents the smaller value of our imports of foreign goods. This last change is mainly due to the effect of the Dingley protective tariff, which has excluded from our markets the products of foreign factories, thereby enabling the American wage-earners to have a chance to sell their labour in supplying the home trade to the improvement and betterment of our general business conditions.

And the same argument could be made here, that if our imports have greatly increased, that increase has been at the expense of our own Canadian industries, which were thus prevented from providing labour for the betterment of the condition of things in this country. The Canadian figures, during all the time since hon. gentlemen have been in office, except for a very late period, do not show increased exports to any great extent. They show, rather, decreased exports and increased imports, and we want no better authority, as to the result of that condition of things, than hon. gentlemen opposite. We could go back to the "Hansard" of a few years ago, and find plenty of instances in which hon. gentlemen argued that that meant the decay of the local industries of the country.

The next thing hon. gentlemen call our attention to in the Speech is the flourishing condition of the revenue. Are these the same gentlemen who, a few short years ago, were wont to teach us that a flourishing revenue meant bleeding the country white—that increased revenue meant increased taxation? Why, Sir, compare the tariff, as we have it to-day, with the tariff of 1896, when hon. gentlemen came into power. In 1897 there was a reduction in the tariff of 3-100ths of 1 per cent, as against the tariff of 1896; in 1898 there was an increase of 57-100ths of 1 per cent, and in 1899 there was an increase of 3-100ths of 1 per cent over the tariff of 1896. In January and February, of 1899, on dutiable and free imports, there is an increase in the tariff of  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent over the tariff of 1896. In the face of figures like these, hon. gentlemen cannot, and do not claim that they have carried out their pledge of tariff reform, and I was very much pleased to find one of them, at least, frankly admit that that never was his platform, and that he did not intend now to state that the tariff was reduced or should have been reduced—I refer to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). Taking the proportionate figures which I have just read, taking the full amount of customs duties collected, and comparing 1898 with 1896, we find that in 1898 they collected \$21,000,000 in customs duties from the people of this country. And I find that the average collected in 1892 to 1896 was only \$19,000,000. In 1898, in customs and excise together, they collected \$29,000,000, against an average for 1892-96 of \$27,100,000. And these are the gentlemen who were to cut down and reduce the burden of taxation which bore so heavily upon the people.

Sir, I have here a few figures which I hope will not weary the House, but which I wish to embalm in "Hansard":

These gentlemen claimed that they would do away with the National Policy. But they had fought the National Policy on many a hard-fought field, and had found out what the opinion of the people of this country was on that question. And they bowed before the verdict of the people, like the heathen Hindoo before his god; for while they saw it was ugly, they recognized that it was great. They were also to reduce the expenditure of the country. In 1898 they had an expenditure of $39,250,000. In 1899 the estimated expenditure is over $41,000,000. This is against an expenditure in 1895-96 of $36,949,000, or an expenditure estimated for the present year of nearly $5,000,000 greater than in 1895-96, the year before they came into power. Why, Sir, their estimated expenditure for this year is more than $2,000,000 more than the Conservatives spent in 1885-86, the year of the rebellion. On the 28th February, 1899, the expenditure of this Government for the eight months of the current year was $23,927,000, as against $21,595,000 for the similar eight months of the year immediately preceding, an increase for the eight months of this year of over $2,000,000.

Now, it is known to every man who has ever heard these hon. gentlemen in this House or in the country that they pledged themselves to reduce the expenditure. Their resolution to that effect is there in the celebrated red book containing a report of their convention in 1893. But, besides that, on every political platform in Canada these gentlemen denounced the Conservative party as the creators of this terrible and burdensome public expenditure, which must be reduced and which they would reduce if they got into power. We had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) telling us that the expenditure should be reduced by about two or three millions. We had the Minister of Trade and Commerce telling us the same thing, and Mr. Mills, the Minister of Justice, who is now in another place, telling us that there should be a reduction of at least four millions. But they were also to reduce the public debt. Now, we find that the net public debt on the 31st October, 1896, was $254,352,000. In 1897, on the same date, it had increased by $4,886,000. On the 20th February, 1899, the net debt was $264,- 287,000, or an increase in the three years during which these hon. gentlemen have been in power of about $10,000,000.

But they take consolation to themselves in what they call their preferential trade policy which, they said, would foster trade within the Empire. But what is the answer of the facts of the case? Our dutiable imports from Great Britain in 1897-98 were half a million dollars less than 1895-96; our dutiable imports from the United States in 1897-98 were twenty millions more than in 1895-96. Our free imports from Great Britain in 1897-98 were a million and a quarter more, and from the United States eleven millions more than in 1895-96. So that instead of these gentlemen advancing trade within the Empire, their preferential trade policy has had the very opposite effect. The total British trade shows an increase of about three-quarters of a million, while the total United States trade shows an increase of about thirty-one millions. That is to say, the American trade with Canada has increased forty-fold as much as the British trade with Canada since this policy has been in operation. But I think the issue should be defined on this preferential question between hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. They propose and have inaugurated a preferential policy which, according to their own contention, freely and gratuitously gave everything to England. I hold that it should be the policy of the Conservative party to favour such a preferential trade system as will give the preference to England, and also secure some return of benefit for this Dominion. I believe that is the preferential trade system that would be acceptable to this country. It is all very well to talk about Imperial interests, but we must be fully alive to colonial interests also. It is true that Rudyard Kipling has been called the poet of the Empire, but he can just as well be called the poet of the colonies. In one of his songs he proposes this colonial toast:

We've drunk to the Queen—God bless her!
 We've drunk to our mothers' land;
 We've drunk to our English brother
 (And we hope he'll understand).
 We've drunk as much as we're able,
 And the Cross swings low to the morn;
 Last toast—and your foot on the table!—
 A health to the Native-born!

A health to the Native-born (Stand up!)
 We're six white men arow,
 All bound to sing o' the little things we care about,
 All bound to fight for the little things we care about
 With the weight of a six-fold blow!
 By the might of our cable-tow (Take hands!)
 From the Orkneys to the Horn,
 All round the world (and a little loop to pull it by),
 All round the world (and a little strap to buckle it),
 A health to the Native-born!

There is one thing that is of considerable importance to the people of this country, and that is the management of the Intercolonial Railway. I do not find in the Speech from the Throne any mention of that subject. I do not find it stated that the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway for the last year show a deficit of $129,000, without taking into account the $64,000 of rental for the Drummond County part of the road, as against a deficit in 1895-96, under the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), when he was then the Minister of Railways and Canals, of only $50,000 or thereabouts. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), whom I see in his place, was to have brought about an equilibrium between the receipts and expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway, but so far he has been unable to do anything of the kind. He has found it not quite so easy a task as some of his friends contemplated when he assumed that high and important office.

The next paragraph in the Address to which I shall make reference is that which calls attention to the increased number of immigrants into this country. I have my own view, which I am free to express in this Chamber, as to the introduction of any great number of Doukhobors and Galicians into Canada. I am free to admit that our doors should not be shut against any deserving portion of population from the old countries who wish to find homes in Canada and become citizens of this country. We should give a welcome to—

Each man who bears his honest part,
 And does what duty bids him do.

But I claim that we are not in a position financially, and I think it would be a political mistake on our part, to pay vast sums of money to bring into this country a class of people not suited either by their training or the institution under which they have lived, for citizenship in this country. And it is not my own opinion alone that I give the House. I would give the House the opinion of Dr. Whitelaw, who is in the North-west and speaks from observation of the Galicians on his adopted heath. He writes to an Ontario Liberal paper, the Guelph "Mercury" to discourage the importation of more Galicians. Dr. Whitelaw says:

Having for generations been ground down in the most abject servitude by the Russian government, under which they lived as serfs, they have become degraded, almost bestial, in their nature, and it is scarcely to be expected that they would make desirable neighbours to English-speaking people of ordinary intelligence. They will certainly improve with time, but we have now an ample sufficiency of them to give the experiment a fair trial, and to those who say the emigration of such to Canada should continue to be encouraged, I would suggest that they come out here and settle in their vicinity. These Galicians will in a short time have the right of the franchise, and, living as a community, they will necessarily vote as a community, and will certainly, if their emigration continues, be numerous enough, even if not already so, to turn the scale in any election towards that side which offers them the highest inducements.

The announcement made by the Minister of the Interior that he intended importing six thousand more Galicians is met by the Winnipeg "Telegram" with this protest:

Not only are they poor and filthy, but their moral character is disgraceful. The revelation of the character of these people which the atrocious Stuartburn murder has afforded is sufficient in itself to condemn them. Not only do they hold robbery and murder in very light estimation, but they are inveterate and unscrupulous perjurers. In the vicinity of every Galician settlement the justices of the peace have been kept busy. The "Telegram" does not condemn these people from exceptional cases. All the time evidence is being furnished as to their disgustingly low moral standard. One of the most recent instances in this regard is furnished in a late issue of the Calgary "Herald." There are very few white women who sink so low as to become the mistresses of Chinamen. Yet the Galician women have no scruples against so doing.

Is this the class of population that should not only be invited into this country but for which the good solid dollars of the people of this country should be given to pay their passage across the ocean, to sustain them during the winter, to build them houses and give them land free—when they will not take up the burdens of Canadian citizenship? I hold that every man who is invited to become a Canadian should at least take up the ordinary burdens of citizenship. Some of these people are opposed to anything like war, and would not go to war even in defence of their dearest institutions. I contend that such a class of population is utterly undesirable and should not be encouraged. I think that the Government, instead of deserving the praise of this Parliament for encouraging such immigration is deserving of our condemnation, as I am sure they will receive the condemnation of the people for what they have done.

I now come to a very important paragraph, as I consider it, in the Speech, that dealing with the negotiations at Washington. We all remember the old Liberal cry that the Conservatives did not want reciprocity but if the Liberals were placed in power, they would not be twenty-four hours on the Treasury benches before they would inaugurate a policy of reciprocity with the United States. In 1893 I made bold to declare in this House that I was opposed to any great measure of reciprocity with the United States. When I made that declaration the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who was one of the most violent partisans of reciprocity, spoke as though he had caught me in a political trap and would use my declaration against me. But I repeated what I had said. I said that the sooner the farmers of Canada could be taught the necessary lesson that they should turn their farms into manufactories of goods for the highest market instead of remaining hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans, the better. I said that, instead of sending their coarse grains, hay and potatoes across the line for what they might then have regarded as remunerative prices, they should carry production further and produce goods of the highest class for the markets on the other side of the water. That was the opinion I held then, and that is the opinion I hold now, and I am glad that we have such a high and notable convert to this view as the right hon. the Prime Minister, who boldly made the assertion the other night that the time had gone by when there was any great desire in Canada for reciprocity and that reciprocity was not very desirable in itself.

Now, in order to show how thoroughly fallacious is the doctrine that it is absolutely necessary for Canada to have the United States market, I point out that the United States sent across the ocean to the markets of England alone $540,000,000 worth of their products, including wheat, $123,000,000, bacon, $32,000,000, and hams, $18,000,000. Now, it is idle to tell our people to produce just such articles as these with the hope of finding in the competitive market of the United States remunerative sale for these products. I am glad that the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite have been opened to the truth, even at this late day.

They call our attention in the Speech from the Throne to the very serious disagreement in these negotiations. For diplomats as these gentlemen pretend to be that phrase "serious disagreement" is a very unfortunate and very undiplomatic phrase, if the negotiations are merely adjourned, as they say. I would read to the House what the Boston "Transcript" thinks of the declaration made by the right hon. gentleman. It is as follows:—

The speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the Canadian House of Commons in reply to Sir Charles Tupper was of peculiarly timely interest, not alone to the people of the Dominion, but to the United States as well. The Premier's statements that Canada did not seek reciprocity in the negotiations, and that it does not desire it now, must be taken as settling for the present, at least, all chances of putting our trade relations with our northern neighbours on a more desirable footing.

Here is the Boston "Transcript," published in that place where, if in any part of the United States, there is a feeling in favour of reciprocity with Canada, making the assertion that the speech of the right hon. gentleman, in reply to that of the hon. leader of the Opposition, sets at rest for ever the question of closer trade relations between the people of the United States and Canada, notwithstanding that these were the negotiations from which they looked for such happy results and which were simply adjourned until 2nd August. I agree to a very large extent with the prophecy that has been made that it is very doubtful if ever they will be taken up again by the commissioners on either side. There was a very remarkable statement made by the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), and while I mention his name, I will do him the credit of saying that he succeeded in putting the Government's bad case in a very good light. The hon. gentleman said that all the questions but that of the delimitation of the Alaskan boundary were settled. Whether that statement was made with authority or not, I do not know, but if the other nine or ten important questions were amicably concluded, how was it that these hon. gentlemen with an ounce of sense in their heads did not sit down and make a treaty including those that were settled and leave this other question open to be taken up on August 2nd? But there is another phase of this question that I wish to deal with. The delimitation of the Alaskan boundary the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) said was the only question upon which there was a disagreement. There was a Yukon scheme brought down last year which found its greatest foundation, its only foundation, upon the representation of hon. gentlemen opposite that it was an all-Canadian scheme. We on this side of the House would have been willing to forego very much of our criticism if they could have shown that it was an all-Canadian scheme. But what was the fact as was pointed out by hon. gentlemen then. It was that the Stikine River for twenty-five miles from its mouth was claimed by the Americans, and that we could not ship or tranship freights on that river without the permission of the American people. Hon. gentlemen opposite answered that we would get that permission. We told hon. gentlemen opposite, in our innocence and naivete, that they should have got that permission long before they entered into the contract. We pointed out that it was foolish to have entered into a contract by which they were to give 4,225,000 acres of the finest gold-bearing lands in the world, that it was unpardonable that they should have entered into a contract calling for this tremendous consideration for the construction of a tramway, when they had not entered into negotiations with the American people for transshipping rights at Wrangel or for shipping rights up the river which the Americans claimed belonged to them. We said: You may not be in a position to obtain these rights afterwards. They said: There will be no difficulty about that. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) claimed that the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, in which he was denounced, for having failed to negotiate first for the rights necessary to the carrying out of the contract, was such a speech as made differences and brought about quarrels between nations. But he was answered that it was such dealings as he was a party to, that it was by entering into such contracts as these, in which foreign nations were somewhat interested, before negotiations had been concluded, to obtain the rights which we must necessarily possess before they could be carried out, that contributed very materially to bringing about disagreements between the two peoples on either side of the line. After having boasted to us that it was an all-Canadian route and that they would get these transshipping rights at Wrangel, they come down to this House at this session and make the declaration in the Speech from the Throne that it was upon that very point that the commissioners disagreed. The delimitation of the Alaskan boundary, which, last year, they said was a simple matter, was the issue upon which, according to the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), the negotiations fell through. Now, Sir, there is just one other thing I wish to say in connection with the Yukon matter while I am on my feet. It will be remembered by you that, during the discussion of the Yukon scheme we found fault with the preparations the Government had made for the carrying of Major Walsh's party to Dawson City. We said that that gentleman had got no further than Big Salmon River, and it was thought remarkable that a party sent forward for the administration of that country should not find its way to its destination. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) turned around and coolly told us that Major Walsh was at Big Salmon River, where he was sent to remain for the purpose of taking care of men coming out from Dawson during the winter. We have here, Sir, the report of Major Walsh as to his administration at Dawson, and the very first sentence of that report gives a most emphatic and specific contradiction to the statement made last year by the hon. Minister of the Interior. What does he say:—

When the Canadian Yukon party first camped on the Big and the Little Salmon Rivers, it was with the expectation of pressing on by dog teams as soon as they arrived to Selkirk and Dawson City.

That was a most important contradiction, because it was on that very point that I offered to make a very foolish wager, which was ridiculed by the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair)—to wager that Major Walsh was even then in Dawson City, against the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior, that he was at Big Salmon River and was sent there to stay. I say that it is a clear and specific contradiction of the Minister's statement.

While I am on the question of the negotiations at Washington, I would like briefly to compare the Treaty of 1871 and what we got from it with the negotiations which hon. gentlemen opposite have carried on, at Washington and Quebec. I wish to point out that the fishermen of the Maritime provinces today must give credit to the Conservative Government for its treaty of 1871, because, if it were not for that treaty and that negotiation, they would be entirely without the bounty which they receive and which is such a great encouragement to them. Hon. gentlemen opposite denounced that treaty at that time and for ever after, but it was a very much more successful negotiation than that which they have lately carried on at Washington.

The third paragraph of the Address deals with the plebiscite, and it will be immensely interesting to the prohibitionists of this country to know that the Government is now in a position to lay the official figures of the vote before Parliament. We understand that the vote in favour of prohibition was 23 per cent of the voters on the list, while the vote for the Liberal party which returned them to power in 1896 was 28 per cent of the total registered vote. Yet these gentlemen tell the prohibitionists that because they did not poll a majority of the votes on the lists, they are not in a position to demand prohibition from this Government. Let me point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that the prohibitionists of Canada never asked for a plebiscite, and that it was the Liberal party who in the Ottawa convention of 1893 forced the plebiscite upon them, as the Liberals thought it was a good card to play. Take the record of the transactions of their convention, and you will find that Mr. Spence, a Liberal, I believe, who represented the prohibitionists there, declared that he did not want the plebiscite, but that he wanted the Liberal party to declare straight in favour of prohibition and to go to the country on that issue. It is true that subsequently when the plebiscite resolution was moved, Mr. Spence said he would not oppose it, because, he said, that half a loaf was better than no bread, but I know that the prohibitionists all through this country during the plebiscite campaign, stated they never asked for a plebiscite, and that although the Government gave it to them it was not at their request. The opinion of Mr. Anglin in the Ottawa Liberal convention has been referred to. This is the same Mr. Anglin who from 1873 to 1878 represented a New Brunswick constituency. He was one of the ablest men. I think we ever had in Canada, and he is a man whom these gentlemen opposite could not find a place for in their Cabinet all the time they were in power. These great Liberals, these broad-minded statesmen, could not find a place for Mr. Anglin in their Cabinet from 1873 to 1878. This was the same Mr. Anglin who at the Liberal convention in 1893, stated that he was opposed to prohibition 'per se,' and that he was opposed to a plebiscite, because if the plebiscite carried and the prohibitionists got a majority of votes, the Liberal party would be logically bound to enact a prohibitory law. Mr. Anglin said: If a plebiscite is granted and a majority of the votes is polled for it,—not the votes on the list, but the votes polled, mind you—then the Liberal party is in honour bound to bring in a measure of prohibition. On that ground Mr. Anglin was opposed to a plebiscite.

Mr. McINERNEY.

The next paragraph in the Address deals with the penny postage, and I am not here to make very much of a criticism on what the Government claims so much credit for, but I am here to repeat what has been already very much better said, namely: that penny postage in Canada is more calculated to give advantages to large commercial concerns, banks and extensive traders, than it is to the ordinary farmer or artisan. It cannot be very much benefit to the farmer who will only write a very few letters in the year, and who will save one cent on each of these.

The last paragraph of the Speech deals with the question of the redistribution of seats, which I suppose will be the 'piece de resistance' of this session. I will have an opportunity later on to make a contention as to what the constitution means on that question, but let me say to-night, that I do not see how gentlemen opposite can claim that the present distribution of seats has worked very disadvantageously to them for they must remember that although they were returned to power in 1896, they had 20,000 less of the popular vote than the Conservative party which they whipped on that occasion. If the distribution of population had been so very much against them, I cannot understand the logic by which they claim that with a popular minority of 20,000 votes returning them to power, the constituencies of the country had been gerrymandered so as to work them a very great injury. If they had received 100,000 or 50,000 of a popular majority and had still been beaten in the elections, then I might well see some force in their contention, but under the circumstances I cannot see the logic of it. It has been said, Sir, that this Speech from the Throne is a Lenten bill of fare, and it rather looks that way, but we may fairly assume that the Government does not pretend to rest its case this session on the announcements contained in that Speech. We have the statement of the Prime Minister, that he has a plan for the reform of the Senate, which amounts to a joint vote of both Houses in case of non-agreement on any great question. Well, Sir, this plan is at least novel: it is original: there is nothing like it in the heavens above, on the earth below, or in the waters under the earth, and one could fairly fall down and adore it. I doubt if there is any country in the world that has such a system as the Prime Minister has pledged himself to adopt. It is surprising to say the least of it, that such an important matter as a reform of the Senate should not have found a place in His Excellency's Speech. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) tells us that it was not necessary to place it there. Well, Sir, I can tell him it was not wise on his part to place it there, because had it gone to the Senate, the Senate would very naturally have amended the Address, and the right hon. gentleman and his friends would not have been able to do very much during this session. So, in order to avoid any such difficulty, they eliminated from the Speech any reference to the Senate, and they propose to base their acts in this regard on a statement made publicly by the Prime Minister. I shall refer for a minute to the number of Bills the Senate has thrown out during its existence in this country, and in this connection I call attention to the erroneous figures given by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll). The figures that I have in my possession are quite authoritative, and hon. gentlemen opposite will, I believe, not have the hardihood to contradict them. For thirty-one years, from 1867 to 1898, there have been 153 Bills rejected by the Senate. Of these rejected by the Senate, there were 20 Government Bills, 27 public Bills, and 28 private Bills, or 75 in all which originated in the Senate. Of the Bills rejected and which originated in the Commons, there were 45 Government Bills, 8 public Bills, 25 private Bills, a total of 78. Of the Government Bills rejected by the Senate, 47 were during a Conservative Administration—I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carroll) said 5—and 18 during a Liberal Administration. Which it seems to me to be about a fair proportion. They were divided as follows: Conservative Administration, 1867-73, 23 Bills; Liberals, 1874-78, 13 Bills; Conservative, 1879-96, 24 Bills; Liberal, 1896-98, 5 Bills. Now, Sir, I wish to give the credit for the figures I have quoted to the gentleman who represents the city of Ottawa in the local legislature—Mr. Berkeley Powell. He brought them up, I think, in the debate on the Senate in the local legislature at Toronto. The figures will be found, I think, strictly accurate and within the mark.

Now, Sir, I do not think that any scheme for a rearrangement of the bicameral system in this country is at this time in order. What is the raison d'être of the Senate? Why was the Senate formed in the first place? Why was the Second Chamber put into the constitution of this country? Everybody knows that in every country the second chamber must necessarily be the safeguard of the rights of the minority—and why so? A wave of prejudice, or of passion, may sweep over a country, and effecting a majority may carry it off its feet, and legislation of a very vicious character may result. But if you have a second chamber, that is not responsible for the moment, that is not whirled about and swayed by the passions of the moment, it will stand for the rights of the people against the prevailing agitation. Therefore, I have always claimed that a second chamber is the greatest safeguard and bulwark of the rights of the minority in any country. The abolition of second chambers in New Brunswick and other provinces in this country has led to no good. Cheap legislation is like cheap law—it is not worth paying for at all. If you want good law, you have to pay for it, and I think the people of this country ought to be taught that good legislation is worth paying for.

Why, Sir, the few hundreds or thousands of dollars that the people pay for legislation, what is it compared with one single Bill that might pass a legislature, depriving them of millions, aye, hundreds of millions of money—yes, a Bill like the Yukon Bill. I may here cite, as an instance, the abolition of the Legislative Council of Manitoba. Everybody knows that that council would not have been abolished, had it not been for the promise, open and above-board, made to the minority in the province, that their rights in regard to their schools would never be invaded. Speeches have been quoted in this House to show that it was on that ground alone that the minority acceded to the abolition of the legislative council. But, no sooner had the council been abolished, than the Manitoba school question arose, and that brand was thrown into the political arena of Canada, until the Manitoba School Act of 1890 was passed—that measure which wrought the passions of the people of Canada to the very highest pitch, and, as hon. gentlemen opposite have said, almost brought Canada to the verge of civil war, which they say was happily averted by their accession to office. But if there is a piece of impertinence on record, it is the action of the Legislature of Nova Scotia. In that province they have a legislative council, a second chamber, and, notwithstanding that, the lower chamber passed a resolution by an overwhelming majority, declaring that the Senate of Canada should be destroyed. It seems to me that the old maxim about people who live in glass houses not throwing stones, would apply very well to Nova Scotia in this case. The Senate's crime has been, not that it opposed the popular will, but that it has opposed the will of the Government in regard to the Yukon scheme and the Drummond County Railway scheme. For these two acts alone, I say, the Senate is entitled to the lasting gratitude of the people of this country. With regard to neither of them did the Government dare to take the constitutional course which they knew they should have adopted. If they thought that the Senate had done wrong in throwing out the Yukon Bill, they should have appealed to the country. That was the course taken by Mr. Gladstone, when the House of Lords threw out the Home Rule Bill, although his Government was not in power so long as hon. gentlemen opposite were when the Yukon Bill was thrown out by the Senate. That is the course always adopted in England; it is the course of every constitutional government in the world where a second chamber, such as ours, exists, when any measure having a majority of the lower house behind it is thrown out by the upper house.

There is another very important matter omitted from the Speech: that is, all reference to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council touching the rights of the provinces, as distinguished from the rights of the Federal Government, in the matter of the shore fisheries. Will hon. gentlemen say that subject is not important enough to refer to in the Speech from the Throne? I answer them by saying, that the most important paragraph in the Governor's Speech, in opening the Legislature of New Brunswick, was a paragraph alluding to that very subject, claiming that the governments of the provinces had the right to the shore fisheries, though admitting that the matter was in some doubt. I, for one, cannot see why the Government, in the Speech from the Throne, have not given us some idea of the course they intend to pursue on that important matter.

I do not know, Sir, that this Government can be praised for any great achievements they have performed. I do not know that anything they have done has obtained for them the gratitude of the people of this country; but, Sir, there are some achievements which the Government have been guilty of. They have been guilty of the Drummond deal; they have been guilty of the Yukon deal; they have been guilty of the Jaffray-Cox Crow's Nest deal; they have been guilty of the Toronto harbour dredging scandal, the Coteau dredging scandal, the Ottawa park fence scandal, the Dan. Rose guide-book scandal, the Drolet gold dredging scandal, the bogus Manitoba prosecutions scandal, the $20,000 St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary investigation scandal, the Killam cows scandal, the Baie des Chaleurs Railway scandal, the Calgary Bridge scandal, the Hamilton Smith cablegram scandal, the Bank Note Printing Company scandal, the "La Patrie" scandal, and the Yukon officials scandal, which we shall hear about later. These are some of the achievements of hon. gentlemen opposite. But they would seek to hide all such transactions from the people under what they call their successes in the elections. These, they say, are the vindication of their conduct. They point to West Huron and say: See what we have done there. With the Ontario Government supporting them, with the power of patronage in their hands, with all the Ministers in the riding, they had a majority of 300, which had been polled in the general election, cut down to a majority of 100 in the by-election. In East Prince, from which comes my hon. friend who moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Mr. Bell), they had a majority of 200 cut down to a majority of 43. The hon. gentleman who is now seated in another place in this Parliament, when running against the Conservative party in power, in the general election of 1896, polled a majority of 200 votes in the riding, whereas the hon. gentleman who moved the Address, when he appealed to the constituency in a by-election, with the local government supporting him, with the Dominion Government and all its patronage at his back, polled the magnificent majority of 43 votes. One more fact—the returning officer and deputy returning officers, appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, rejected 130 ballots, and, while the defeated candidate made an application for a recount of the votes, that application was refused because a holiday intervened and made it three days instead of two days after the return. But Liberals as well as Conservatives from the province of Prince Edward Island tell me that the Government candidate was fairly and honestly defeated.
