Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I should like to tell the minister this, with respect to certain guns which were delivered in England to the first division. The day we visited them they had been waiting months to get these guns. They had only got four out of a total complement of eight, and that was nearly two years after they had gone overseas. So that to say that "we are now producing practically everything required by a fully equipped infantry division every six weeks" is just too much for my credulity.

I have already referred to gasoline conservation methods. I would now ask the minister to give to the house a full report on gasoline conservation methods and a specific statement of the action contemplated to increase the production of petroleum products in Canada and what additional conservation measures may be necessary. I believe that the house and the country wish also to have from the minister a specific statement on the charges of the Joy Oil company.

Then from the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) we shall require information about the objectives of the government in calling up men under the National Resources Mobilization Act; about the enlistment of women in the armed forces, which will come to the fore more and more. Also we shall require information from the minister about the adequacy or otherwise of Canada's information services in the United States. I invite him to tell the house and the country the real truth, the real background of the resignation of Mr. Walter Zeller. Did Mr. Zeller in the course of his inquiry—and I have nothing against him—demand that he be given carte blanche on his own responsibility to spend the public moneys of Canada as, when and where he wished, without authority at all? Is that the true background? I do not know.

Mr. THORSON: The answer is no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is an answer. What then was the reason for his dissatisfaction, and why did he actually resign? The reason is certainly not in the innocuous statements contained in the two letters that passed between the minister and himself. They do not mean a thing.

I should like to ask the minister about a report that appears in yesterday's press of a speech said to have been made by Mr. Lash, the director of public information, as follows—and I quote from the report in the press:

> Public information has done some useful things, but like a number of other war departments it is entoiled in the meshes of the red tape of an archaic system of government.

Is that a true statement? I do not know. Personally I believe in the control of the treasury of the country. One of the things I had against my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) was that he departed in a degree, perhaps in a very large degree, from the well-grounded principles contained in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. It may have been necessary—I do not know enough about the modus operandi to judge. But here is a man who is charged with the responsibility of directing public information, and he says that he cannot do anything because departments are enmeshed in the red tape of an archaic system of government control. I am not accepting the statement on its face value as true, but I think we should have the matter elucidated. Why did he say that? If it is not true we ought to know.

I should like to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) report in due course on his visit to South America and on the present and prospective advantages which will accrue to Canada as a result of the agreements concluded. I have learned that he took in two banquets a day every day during the time that he was there. He is good if he can do that; it is more than I can do. I have read what the press had to say about the agreements and I think I have some small understanding of what they mean. May I ask him to inform the house whether these agreements will be submitted to parliament at this session for approval.

I have already indicated to the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) that we should like to have a full report on the labour situation generally; and, concretely, may we have from him a full and complete statement with regard to the many unfortunate strikes which have occurred during the recess, particularly the strikes at Arvida, about which the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) had something to say in the month of July, and also with regard to the position at Cape Breton and at McKinnon Industries. We shall wish as well to have an analysis of the implications of the new wage ceiling; and I believe that, in addition, the house will wish to have a brief summary from the minister showing the development of the labour policy since the outbreak of the war.

From the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I should like to have some report at some time on Canada's diplomatic position; of the results anticipated from the appointments of new ministers to foreign countries; of the work of the legation in Washington and of what it has accomplished to counteract the sinister influences which have been depreciating Canada's war effort in the United States.

These are merely examples of the information which we seek to have and to which we in this house and the people of this country are entitled. Certain newspapers have suggested that parliament may be peremptorily adjourned or prorogued without adequate discussion of the issues before us. After the survey which I have made and the suggestions I have offered, if the house is prorogued without adequate discussion I suggest that it will not be the fault of the official opposition. We desire to analyse every feature of our war policy, and every important government action directly or indirectly associated therewith. In committee is obviously the desirable place to conduct such an analysis, and I hope that ample opportunity will be provided—in fairness to the Prime Minister, I add that he has offered it—after the various ministers have made their formal statements to the house, or in between those statements, if that is preferable.

In conclusion, on behalf of those whom I represent, may I say that our one objective is now, as it has always been, to promote the greater efficiency of Canada's war effort, and we are prepared to sit here as long as we are of assistance in achieving that end.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend and the house will realize that I do not rise at this time to make any reply to the leader of the opposition. This is not the proper moment at which to enter into a debate. In fact under the rules debate would not be permitted in reply to a statement made on the orders of the day. I rise to suggest that the house do now continue its sitting in committee of the whole so as to permit of that fuller discussion which, as my hon. friend has rightly pointed out, is most desirable, and to give to the acting leaders of the two groups an opportunity to make, before the statements of the ministers are presented, the statements they may wish to make. To that end I move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): When the house adjourned on June 14, there was an understanding that it would stand adjourned until yesterday unless some urgent business came up or some important event occurred that would necessitate the reconvening of parliament. There may not have been any business that would come under that head, but since parliament adjourned on June 14 many things have happened, which, to me at least, have been highly disturbing.

I do not know whether the procedure we are now adopting is the best if we are to have an adequate discussion of the subjects that call for consideration. It seems to me that parliament should now be concerned with the question of how we can organize the will and energy of the Canadian people for more effective resistance to nazism and for its final destruction. I agree with the leader of the opposition that the Prime Minister's speech yesterday did not give much of a lead in that direction. As a story of the progress of the war, or of happenings since we last met, I have no fault to find with the statement made yesterday, but I find nothing in it that will inspire the people of this country to greater efforts or a willingness for greater sacrifice. During the course of his speech the Prime Minister said:

> Every conceivable means by which freedom can be crushed is to-day being employed by nazi Germany.

That is only too true, and because it is true it seems to me that the only way in which the democracies can successfully fight nazism is by the continual and planned extension of freedom. In Canada we are not doing that. Our privileged classes, and our government, which appears to be acting at the present time for the privileged classes and only for the privileged classes, seem terribly afraid to get out of the old grooves or give up for the common good any long-held privileges. Since last we met, the war has taken a new turn; Hitler has invaded another country, a country with which he had made a non-aggression pact, a pact of friendship, in order to begin his war of conquest. Hitler has invaded Russia. Because of that move, no matter what inspired it, the people who are opposed to the nazis, that is, our allies in this war, have received the assistance of a powerful ally. All who are opposed to Hitlerism were glad to note, as the Prime Minister so well pointed out yesterday, that immediately Russia was invaded, and without any prearrangement, every leader of a government in the British commonwealth of nations, and some of our allies as well, hastened to assure Russia of every possible aid. It is indeed well that that was done. But I do not think it was due to generosity on the part of the people of the British commonwealth, it was merely the exercise of intelligent self-interest. Regardless of how Russia came into the conflict, she is now on our side, and I am indeed pleased that we are giving every possible assistance to her, as we must do, because in giving assistance to Russia we are helping ourselves.

I believe, however, that the Prime Minister must go a step further, even if only for psychological reasons. To-day I do not believe this government is taking psychology sufficiently into account, either in home affairs or in our relations with other countries. Russia is now our ally. She is also a great and powerful nation, as Germany has found out. If we are ultimately able to defeat Hitler and all he stands for—and God grant that we may—Russia will have an important part in making the peace and determining the new order that will follow. I therefore suggest to the Prime Minister that he open negotiations with the soviet government for the exchange of ministers or, if that is not the right phrase, start negotiations which would result in the establishment of diplomatic relations between Canada and the soviet union. Canada has now a representative in all the important countries of the world with which we have friendly relations, with, I think, the possible exception of China, and I believe the Prime Minister has already taken steps for the exchange of representatives with China. The Prime Minister should not be timid in this matter. Not only would it be, I believe, a popular move with the majority of the people of Canada, but it is a move that is indicated by the present war situation and also by the long-term political objectives of the war. We should try to get away from some of the prejudices which made it difficult if not impossible for us to appreciate and understand the growing power of fascism. It would be interesting indeed to know how much of the world's present misery is due to the mutual suspicion and distrust that have existed between the soviet government and the governments of some of the democracies since the revolution of 1917. In that regard I would point out two things that have happened since the beginning of the war which have had more effect on getting mass support for the war than everything else that has happened in the last twenty-six months. The first was the entry of representatives of the British Labour party into the British cabinet, after the removal of some of the appeasers; the second was the entry of Russia into the war. For the sake of our war effort, the future peace and the world order that we expect to build after the war, this change in the attitude of the masses of the people, not only in Canada but in all parts of the world, should not be overlooked. Therefore I commend to the Prime Minister the suggestion which I have made. The time to prepare for to-morrow is to-day, for our to-days are the results of our yesterdays.

The leader of the opposition referred to the labour situation. I wish also to refer to that, because, as I said, a number of things have happened during the recess which have greatly disturbed me. It should be obvious to the Minister of Labour and to the government that its labour policy has been and is altogether wrong. It has failed to get the support of organized labour, and proof positive that it is wrong is that there is not a labour organization or a labour spokesman in Canada that has not condemned the government's labour policy. I have tried my best to convince the Minister of Labour on that point during the last two sessions; I do not know whether I was helpful, but I tried to be, for I believe I know the mind of labour. I have given up trying to understand the government's policy. In my opinion it is definitely hostile to organized labour. Let me refer—and I use this as an illuminating example of the government's policy—to the dispute at the National Steel Car Corporation's plant at Hamilton, Ontario. I am referring to this case because it has received dominion-wide attention and also because, when the last strike took place at that plant, I wrote the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, drawing to their attention in terms as moderate, as sincere and as definite as I could command, how the situation appeared to me. Neither the Minister of Labour nor the Prime Minister replied to my letter; all I received was an acknowledgment from a secretary. There may have been this excuse for the Prime Minister; he went overseas about then, and by the time he returned the matter was probably settled and forgotten. There may also have been some excuse for the Minister of Labour, because about that time other labour troubles called him to the maritimes. But I am referring to this case because in my opinion it shows clearly the impossibility of the government's labour policy securing the confidence and support of labour.

This dispute with the National Steel Car Corporation began on February 3, 1941, when the employees made application for a board. It went on and on until, toward the end of July, the employees went on strike for the second or third time. It will be remembered that in April of this year the government appointed a controller, Mr. E. J. Brunning, to manage the National Steel Car plant when the company refused to accept an interim report made by a conciliation board. I believe the appointment was unfortunate, because if there is one man in Canada who has no regard for organized labour and no sympathy with the aims of organized labour, that man is Mr. E. J. Brunning. At the time I congratulated the government on its action, but I am afraid I was a little too hasty in doing so. Three months later, in July, I found that the controller, who had been appointed by the government because the former management would not carry out the interim order of a conciliation board, had on the instructions of the government refused to enter into an agreement with the labour organization in that plant. On July 15 Mr. H. B. Chase, who at that time was director of labour relations in the Department of Munitions and Supply, made a statement with regard to an agreement between the controller of the corporation and the employees, I believe in a letter to the Minister of Labour, although I am not sure on that point. In any event the statement was made, in these words:

> I also stated to the committee that it was my understanding of government policy that Mr. Brunning could not negotiate with a union as a union or to sign an agreement with a union, but fair and reasonable conditions could be arranged for by regulations agreed upon between all parties.

That was on July 15. On July 22 the Minister of Labour, in a letter to Mr. C. H. Millard, who is Director of the Steelworkers' Organizing Committee in Canada, also made a statement, and I should like hon. members to note the similarity between the words used by the minister and those used by Mr. Chase. The minister said:

> I believe that you will understand that Mr. Brunning, as controller, could not negotiate with the union as a union, or sign an agreement with a union, but the regulations which are agreed upon between all parties should form fair and reasonable conditions under which the work of the plant should be carried on.

I do not listen very often to Charlie McCarthy on the radio; but almost every time I have occasion to deal with matters concerning the Department of Labour and the Department of Munitions and Supply, I am reminded of Charlie McCarthy and Edgar Bergen. May I ask why Mr. Brunning could not sign an agreement with the union, as a union? Is there any reason why a government-controlled industry cannot recognize a union and sign an agreement with it? If a government-controlled industry cannot enter into an agreement with its organized workers, then I ask, what becomes of collective bargaining? How are you going to carry on collective bargaining in any government-controlled industry? I want to point out to the Minister of Labour and to the Prime Minister as well, because he is responsible for the acts of his ministers, that in June, 1940, the government passed an order in council stating that they were in favour of the principle of collective bargaining. What becomes of that order in council as far as the National Steel Car employees are concerned? What becomes of it as far as any government-owned or government-controlled industry is concerned, if the Minister of Labour can say over his signature that the manager of that industry cannot enter into an agreement with the union as a union? These are questions which must be answered, and it seems to me they are going to be very, very difficult to answer.

Later the matter was settled; but the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who evidently runs the Department of Labour as well as his own department, was not satisfied with that situation. We find him taking the position that any number of different organizations can be recognized in any one industry. I claim that by this action, by making this statement, by taking this position, the government, through the Minister of Munitions and Supply, is fostering a company unionism, making it impossible for the workers to organize and stabilize labour relations in industry. I want to say most emphatically that by this action, instead of making for peace and harmony in industry the government is making for strife and confusion. I want to know how they are going to carry on in future, because we are not going to get the support of organized labour or of the working class in general if we are to have such authoritarian methods applied as between employers and labour in industry.

The leader of the opposition referred to the labour situation in Great Britain, and said that labour had given up the right to strike. Strikes do take place in Great Britain, but they do not have the situation we have here. They do not have conciliation and arbitration on the question of union recognition. That is not a proper question for either arbitration or conciliation. So far as union recognition is concerned, all that should be necessary is that the union is a recognized union, that the majority of employees in a particular branch of industry are members of that union, and want it to act as their bargaining agent. That being the situation, the recognition of the union should be automatic, and should not be allowed to go to arbitration or conciliation.

The leader of the opposition referred to the Arvida incident. In my opinion the Minister of Munitions and Supply grievously erred in that matter. I understand the Arvida workers have asked for an apology from him for having described the trouble as subversive action with intention of sabotage. In my opinion not only are they justified in asking for an apology from the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but they are also justified in asking for an apology from the government, on whose behalf the minister was speaking. Either that, or the government should repudiate the statements made by the minister.

A royal commission was appointed to look into the charges made. A report from which I shall quote was tabled yesterday. It will be borne in mind that the Minister of Munitions and Supply described the difficulty at the plant as attempted sabotage, and on that basis the military were brought in to deal with the situation. On that basis also an order in council was passed giving the Minister of Munitions and Supply power to call the military whenever in his wisdom he thinks the situation warrants it. Although I have not the order before me, my memory is that that is the purport of it. The report of the royal commission on the Arvida matter states in part:

> The evidence from every quarter indicates an entire absence of any subversive or hostile influence contributing in any way to the strike, and testimony to that effect and of the total absence of sabotage, actual or intended, was forthcoming from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Quebec provincial police, the municipal police, the Department of Labour at Quebec, Mr. LaBelle the security officer, the senior officials of the company, as well as various foremen, superintendents, et cetera. Similar testimony is also forthcoming from Mr. Daris and Mr. Picard, representing the syndicate. Moreover, this testimony is strongly confirmed by the fact that the strikers were in complete possession of the premises for several days and absolutely no damage was done, though every opportunity presented itself. It seems clear beyond question that labour conditions alone were at stake.

It is also clear that had the Arvida plant been properly organized, with constant communication between representatives of the employees—business agents, shop stewards, or whatever representatives may have been chosen—and the management, the strike would never have taken place. If we are to have democracy in government and harmony in industry, labour must be organized, and must be recognized as a partner in industry.

Quoting again briefly:

> There was no trace of latent or developed sabotage, in the sense of hostile or subversive influence, apparent at any time. The strike was one relating to labour conditions and pay, and which might have been avoided possibly had there been better provision against such an emergency.

Since the order in council passed at the request of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, enabling him to call in the armed forces of the country on occasions of this kind was based on false information, will it now be rescinded, or will the government continue to make use of it and to hold it as a club over the heads of other workers? Will they do that with an order in council which was obtained under false pretences? That is a question the government should answer.

I suggest again that the Prime Minister has a responsibility in the matter, because he is responsible for the acts of his ministers. During the recess an order in council was passed making sure that before a strike is called the employees in a plant or industry have by a majority voted in favour of such strike. Penalties were provided. Then, almost every month some order in council is passed for the regulation and restriction of workers in industry. I should like some time to see the government pass an order in council which would affect employers as a group. I should like to see it pass an order in council, or some sort of ordinance, to bring a sense of social responsibility to the minds of some of our employers.

I believe a conciliation board asked for by miners at Kirkland Lake has reported to the minister. What is the situation there, and what is the government going to do about it? What is the Department of Labour going to do about it? I wonder whether the Minister of Munitions and Supply will have an order in council passed permitting him to call out the military at Kirkland Lake mines to deal with the employers as he dealt with the workers at Arvida? I have before me excerpts from the report of the conciliation board in the Kirkland Lake mines dispute. On that board Mr. Justice McTague acted as chairman; Mr. F. Wilkinson, K.C., was the nominee of the company, and Mr. J. L. Cohen, K.C., the nominee of the union. The report is unanimous.

But before the board was able to report, the company washed their hands of the matter and said they would have nothing to do with the report. They said they did not care what report the board made, because they intended to ignore it anyway. What does the government intend to do in those circumstances? Is there to be one law for employees and another for employers?

In part the report states:

> No attempt was made by the employers to establish that the particular local did not represent the majority of the employees. No evidence was offered by the mine operators to establish that the union is not a proper union to represent their employees. The assertion was made that it is irresponsible and that the operators were unalterably opposed to bargaining with it, but no evidence of real value was offered in support of the proposition.

That was the unanimous finding of the board. It seems to me that those who were irresponsible were not the employees. They simply took advantage of all legal formalities in order to get a settlement of their case. The report goes on:

> At a comparatively early stage in the proceedings counsel for the operators informed the board that his clients were unalterably opposed to recognizing the union and wished to withdraw from any further participation in the proceedings.

The board goes on to say:

> In the circumstances we feel there is no other course to follow but to recommend that the union in question should receive recognition as bargaining agent. We are under no illusion that the recommendation is likely to be more than a mere formality. The manner in which the case for the mine operators was conducted leaves little if any doubt on that proposition.

I ask: What do the government intend to do? Will they take action against the employers if a strike takes place, or will they leave the men to fight out their case with the employers? It is possible that the employers have decided that gold is not particularly essential at the present time and therefore they may be able to starve out the men. I want to know what the government is going to do about the matter. Is there to be one law for employers who defy the government and the laws of the land and another law for workers in industry? This is why every gathering of labour, why the latest conventions of the two large organized labour movements, why every spokesman for labour condemn the government's labour policies.

When the house met yesterday the Prime Minister said that there was no business to bring before us, but that we would have this opportunity of discussing any matter which might arise out of the reports to be made by the various ministers. It is exceedingly strange that a man with his background and experience and who has made so many protestations in favour of parliamentary control should act as he has with regard to matters of such importance. I agree whole-heartedly with what the leader of the opposition has said. Just on the eve of the reconvening of parliament we have had placed before us two orders in council of the utmost importance. They come to us as ukases, as decrees by the government. It seems to me that this is a peculiar way of having parliament decide important matters. I have in my hand the text of a radio broadcast which the Prime Minister made on the night of October 18. This was printed and distributed by the director of public information, under the authority of the Minister of National War Services. I should like to quote briefly from this report. After making some brief remarks about the war situation on the Russian front and in the far east and the necessity of Canada doing everything within its power to organize for the defeat of nazism, the Prime Minister said this:

> I am, therefore, going to speak to you to-night about an action which the government proposes to take in connection with conditions within Canada. I believe that what is proposed will vitally affect our war effort, because it will affect every man, woman and child within Canada.

I am going to skip the next paragraph now, but I shall come back to it later on. I quote:

> It has to do with the price of goods and services, and the price of the products of land and sea. It has to do with wages. It is of the greatest importance to every citizen in Canada, and of particular importance to every housewife, every worker, and every farmer. It will affect the daily lives of each one of us. It will require the cooperation and support of all. It will help to intensify the effort of this country in war. It will help to prevent a repetition of distress and depression after the war.

These orders in council come to us on the morning that the house reconvenes and yet, according to the Prime Minister, there is no important business to be placed before us. We do not get this measure in the form of a bill, the principle of which we might discuss on the second reading and then refer it to a committee or discuss it in committee of the whole before agreeing to the third reading. That is not done. The paragraph which I did not read is really a gem, that is why I saved it until the last. The Prime Minister said:

The action which I am about to explain represents an experiment hitherto untried on this continent, and perhaps having regard to its breadth and variety, hitherto untried by the will and consent of any free people anywhere.

May I ask whose will and consent was asked? In his broadcast the Prime Minister said that this had to do with wages. May I ask if the workers or their representatives were asked about this? He said that it would affect the products of land and sea. May I ask if the fishermen were asked about it? May I ask if the farmers or their representatives were asked about it?

Mr. HANSELL: Ask if Mr. Towers was asked about it?

Mr. MacINNIS: He went on to say that it was of particular importance to every housewife. May I ask if the housewives were asked about it? If so, how were they asked about it? As a matter of fact the members of parliament were not asked about it. The sovereign body in Canada was not asked about it. A ukase, a decree is handed to us and we have to accept it.

That is not quite good enough. The subject matter of the order in council freezing wages and the order in council freezing prices should certainly have come before this session of parliament. Surely those are proper subjects for the representatives in this house to discuss and come to a conclusion about. Matters such as these should be dealt with by acts of parliament and not by orders in council. If they are going to come to us as orders in council, what is the use of calling parliament together? What is the sense of having a House of Commons? I may tell the Prime Minister right now that it is time he took control of things and saw that parliament does get an opportunity, if not to decide, at least to discuss matters which now by order in council become the law of the land before we know anything about them.

My time is almost up. In my opinion P.C. 8253, which is the order freezing wages, to use the common phrase, does not go far enough. It takes into consideration only the workers. From a psychological point of view, if for no other reason, it should also apply to salaried people and executives. I came to Ottawa on a train filled with servicemen, navy, air force and army, and I just wish the Prime Minister could have sat in the smoking room and listened to these men, without their knowing who he was. He would have got an earful and an eye-opener too. Unfortunately I am not a good mixer with strangers, so I just sat and listened, and I heard plenty. I heard half a dozen or a dozen of these young men say something to this effect: We are in the service now because Hitler has to be defeated, but we are not looking forward with any degree of pleasure to the time when we shall come back because, while conditions are bad enough now, they will be terrible when we come back. They had no confidence that the men who are governing Canada at this time would use in peace time the powers necessary to provide the people with the necessities and comforts of life. The government must get over to the people of Canada that it will use its powers to provide these necessities and comforts in peace time before it can hope to have a war effort that will have the heart and soul and mind and the will and spirit of the people of Canada behind it.

If the government is going to put a ceiling on wages it should, as a matter of course, put a floor under wages. I agree with what the leader of the opposition said this afternoon with regard to the farmer. Most of our farmers are in a terrible plight to-day, and freezing prices will not help the farmer until something is done to raise the prices the farmer receives for his products to a parity with the prices he has to pay for what he has to buy. If you do not do that, you are going to have an impoverished peasantry in this country before very long. I have marvelled how the morale of the farmers has stood up through all these years. It has up to now, but there is a breaking point somewhere.

In conclusion, I regret that the Prime Minister did not see fit to make this a real session and that he did not bring these matters to which I have referred before parliament for discussion before action was taken. As the leader of the opposition has said, we have amply demonstrated during the last two years that we would not hold up or delay unduly necessary legislation.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): In the absence of the house leader of this group, perhaps it falls to my lot to say a few words in this discussion. It was a kindly gesture on the part of the parliamentary association to take over to England half a dozen members of this parliament including the leader of this group and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. It will be a happy day perhaps when we can all take wings and fly away.

I do not know what advantage trips of this kind may be to parliament. I trust that these men will bring back to us some valuable information so that we may be able to understand better the situation as it exists between Great Britain and ourselves so far as Canada's war effort is concerned. I trust that these gentlemen will have an opportunity to have personal interviews with our boys over there, with Mr. Churchill, with the high commissioner for Canada in London, and with some of the labour leaders and other great leaders in Britain. I shall be disappointed, we shall all be disappointed if their trip turns out to have been nothing more or less than a Cook's tour.

I believe that we in this corner of the house are perhaps more concerned about the war effort as it relates to Canada right here at home. I am neither discouraging nor disparaging any gesture which the parliamentary association might care to make towards members of this house. As I said, I thought it was a kindly gesture and I trust that their trip will prove valuable. Nevertheless the thing that we want to know is, what is Canada doing right here and now for the defeat of nazi aggression? I was disappointed with the Prime Minister's speech yesterday. Perhaps I expected too much when I hoped that he would tell the house exactly what Canada was doing and what Canada's position was in relation to world affairs to-day.

We listened to what the Prime Minister had to say about Syria, Russia and Germany; we listened to what he said about the Netherlands, China and Japan; we listened to what he said about the United States; we listened to the numerous quotations which he gave of speeches that had been made by the President of the United States. But we listened in vain for that which we had come here to hear, namely, what Canada is doing here and now. I felt that had it not been discourteous I should very much have liked to rise in my place and ask the Prime Minister to come to the point. Instead, we listened to that which we can read any day in the newspapers and in the periodicals of the country. I know that the Prime Minister's speech was couched in laudable, well-pleasing terms, and as a review of world affairs since the commencement of the war it was commendable. But it seems to me that we did not get what we were looking for.

In this regard I am going to compliment the leader of the official opposition upon his speech this afternoon. As he told us of his visit to Great Britain I felt that what he was saying was something along the lines of what the Prime Minister should have said yesterday, and other members I believe feel similarly. In fact, at the tea-table a little while ago some of my friends remarked to me that perhaps Mr. Brockington got mixed a little bit in his mail and mailed a speech to the wrong gentleman. Well, I hope that we shall learn from the ministers of the crown what we are really doing in Canada to-day so that we can go back to our constituencies with the conviction and profound belief that Canada is making an all-out war effort to defeat nazi aggression.

As I said, it may be all right to go over to England to discover some of the things that are happening there; it may be all right for the parliamentary association to take members of parliament over, so that they may see things at first hand. But I maintain that it would be much more in keeping for this government to invite members of parliament here to look over the situation seriously as it exists in this country. There is nothing that would restore confidence in our war effort more than for the government to say to all members of parliament: "Here you are, gentlemen, here are the keys to our war effort in Canada." I cannot think of anything that would more quickly remove any possible dissatisfaction than for this government to say to members of parliament: "Here is a free pass to go wherever you want in Canada, to go into any war industry, into any building, into any military camp or depot, on any ship or into any shipyards, or into any place that is manufacturing munitions, to ask them all the questions you like. Go in and make yourselves at home, and if you can discover anything that will help our war effort come back and tell us and we will consider it." That is the sort of thing that should be done. Instead, what do we find? Even members of parliament who are supposed to represent the people of the country find it a little difficult to get into some of these places.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you not get a card?

Mr. HANSELL: We did get a card some time ago from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enter any public building. But that is not what we want. We want the government to say to us, and I think the government should say to us, "This is a war in which all Canada is engaged." It is not a Liberal war effort; that would not be an all-out war effort. This is a war effort in which we are all concerned. During the national registration we were all called in to help; the Minister of National War Services sent us circular letters and called upon us to do this and that. At first my impression was that he was calling upon members of parliament to go into the junk business. Now I think a little differently. I believe the matter of salvage is a very good thing, but as to going any further than that—"Oh, no, members, you must keep out of it here; you are not wanted in here."

Mr. DONNELLY: Who told you that?

Mr. HANSELL: You can go around this country wherever you like—

Mr. DONNELLY: There is no trouble at all in getting into any place.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend is a good Liberal; perhaps he does not have any trouble, but the rest of us do. What I am saying is that such a gesture on the part of the government would stimulate confidence in our all-out war effort. Answering my hon. friend's question, let me tell him that when the special parliamentary committee on war expenditures was sitting I brought the matter up in that committee. When we, as members of the committee, whose duty it was under the terms of reference to recommend to the government where economies could be made, asked for a pass to permit us to go wherever we wanted we were told that would not do, that we could not get such a pass—

Mr. DONNELLY: You must have looked suspicious to them.

Mr. HANSELL: Now there is criticism, we hear it on every hand, that the game of politics is being played in connection with our war effort.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not so.

Mr. HANSELL: All right. If that criticism is a lie that lie should be nailed, and nailed so hard that it will never live again. There is no better way to nail that lie than for the people's representatives to be given absolutely free course in this country. We do not ask to know the nation's military secrets, but we do say that when the people of this country are spending billions of their own dollars they have a right to expect their own representatives to have free course in knowing where and how their money is spent.

I wonder whether the people of Canada are satisfied that Canada is putting forth its maximum war effort. I do not think so. In the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday he said these words in referring to the war and nazi aggression: "Every conceivable means by which freedom can be crushed is to-day being employed by nazi Germany." We believe that, we know that. We would have known it had the Prime Minister not said it. But how much better would it have been if the Prime Minister had changed one or two words there, if he had been able to say, "Every conceivable means by which freedom can be preserved in the world is to-day being employed by the people of Canada." I know that it has been no easy task for this government—or any government as far as that goes—when war broke out to start at scratch and get the whole country organized for a total war effort. It has been a big task. But now over two years have passed away. Why did we have to start from scratch when war broke out? The answer is very easy: we were told in the preceding years that we had no money. It should be noted that in those pre-war days the heads of our government were forced by their financial ties to allow conditions to drift through the years of destitution with belt-tightening in the midst of plenty as a declared policy; thus there was utter failure to solve those pre-war problems. To our tremendous discomfort they are continuing with the same policy and the same financial ties blunderingly to wage war against Germany. I find the feeling abroad in Canada that we are tinkering with our war effort. That may be denied in some circles, but many people to whom I have talked believe it. For instance, the calling upon school children to take their candy money to school so that every few days the class can buy a war savings stamp is nothing to be proud of.

Recruiting is a very live subject to-day, it was referred to this afternoon by the leader of the official opposition. It is not much to be proud of having officials go through the country gathering together staff officers and other prominent citizens, throwing a banquet, and then giving them a kind of sales talk as to how to get men in the army. We are supposed to be fighting an all-out war. As I stood on the street corner of a certain city not many months ago, a recruiting campaign was going on; there was a little stage set up on the street; a band was playing; some speeches had been made, and the young folks were having a dance on the street. A spotlight was playing upon those who were dancing; that spotlight was thrown upon a young chap in civilian clothes who was dancing with his girl friend, and from the loud speaker came some suggestion to this young chap about enlisting in the army. I say that such tactics in the endeavour to mobilize this nation for an all-out war effort are nothing to be proud of.

A little over a year ago we had a national registration. The people thought we were really getting down to business. At that time it was believed that we were to register everyone, so that each could serve in his rightful place. To my mind that was just a million dollars practically wasted. The country really responded; various organizations, young people's societies, soldier organizations, service clubs and even church organizations throughout the country gave freely of their time and energies during that registration. But what did we get for it? It is true that we answered a number of questions, one of which was "Can you milk cows?" Well, there is one satisfaction; we know how many men and women in Canada can milk cows. I wonder whether we know exactly how many mechanics there are in Canada to-day, and where they are.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The government say there are none.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, there should be; during the last ten years we had plenty of time to train them. Do we know how many welders there are in Canada to-day, and where they are? Do we know how many chemists and engineers there are in Canada? Do we know where they are, so that we could go to them and say, "Here is a job waiting for you. Do you think you can serve your country better by taking it? We will pay you a fair salary." I wonder whether we could do that, as a result of that national registration. Last session I heard someone—I think it was a member of the government, although I am not sure of that—declare that we did not have the skilled workmen we should have in this country. I believe that should be considered a disgrace to a government that was in power for the ten years preceding the war, when young men as well as older men were without employment and could have been trained to be of service during the war which at that time was impending.

Over two years have passed since the outbreak of war. Soon after the war began we passed what was known as the National Resources Mobilization Act. At that time this group fought in this house for the mobilization of the whole country in a total war effort. We said the first thing that should be mobilized and used, so that there might be no restriction on our production, was the banking system of this country. Hon. members will recall that at that time we offered an amendment suggesting that the Bank of Canada should perform its proper function in supplying the necessary means of payment, so that the government should not be restricted in its war effort. At that time we were told by the Prime Minister that the amendment was not really necessary, because it was already embodied in the bill. We were told that the mobilization of material and human resources meant also the mobilization of the financial resources of this country. Well, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether that is true. I say, I think, without fear of contradiction, that there has been no change whatever in the banking policy of this country since the beginning of the war. Banks are still creating credit as they did before the war and as they have always done; and they are creating it as a debt to the nation, with added interest.

Speaking of an all-out war effort, I said that I was conscious of the fact that it was a tremendous task to organize this country for a total war effort, and I am going to commend in some small degree the work that has been done in the past two years by some members of the government. But we cannot say to-day, even after two years have gone by, that Canada is experiencing a total war effort. The other day I picked up a newspaper, but before stating what I read in it let me suggest that the bureau of information, which is under the sponsorship of the government, should be just a little more clever. I do not believe our propaganda machine, if I may call it that, is working effectively. The headline in this newspaper stated that the Germans were within seventy-five miles of Moscow, that they were hammering at the doors of that city. I turned over the pages of the paper and noticed an announcement by the bureau of information that the Minister of Munitions and Supply had said we were now making tanks in Canada, and that we hoped to be able to supply at least one hundred tanks to Russia by Christmas. Here were the Germans hammering at the doors of Moscow, and our total war effort for two years had brought us to the point where if the Russians were able to hold out until Christmas, we hoped to be able to supply them with one hundred tanks. I say that even though the government had to start from scratch when this war commenced, very much more could have been done if this whole problem had been tackled by mobilizing the resources, particularly the financial resources, of this country. When I say that, I mean that this group, as should be well known by now, has in mind the mobilizing of our banking institutions so that there may be no restriction whatever on our war effort; and I am confident that if this had been done our experience would have been vastly different.

Instead of that we find our people to-day wondering whether or not they are justified in fighting to make rich men richer. We speak of bonusing industry and of bonusing labour. I have no particular objection to that. I do not believe anyone could have anything to say against the labourer getting paid in proportion to the increase in the cost of living.

Speaking of recruiting, we have heard nothing about the dependents of soldiers being equally bonused on account of the rise in the cost of living. If we are to call upon our young men to volunteer for service, we must show them that they will get a fair and square deal in Canada, one commensurate with the deal everybody else gets. We have heard nothing about the bonusing of soldiers' wives and soldiers' mothers, or other dependents.

In our travels we have heard something about the word "conscription." I do not like the word. Nevertheless it is one that is being used, and used more extensively in some parts of the country than in others. I read in the press the other day where even the leader of the official opposition had referred to conscription. This article, which appeared in a Winnipeg paper, was headed, "Hanson says public, not political party, may ask conscription." Then, in the article the leader of the opposition is reported to have said:

> I have studied it from every angle. If it were put to a plebiscite I do not know what would happen.

I do not think it is going to be put to a plebiscite. If it were put to a plebiscite I would suggest that all parties be called in to discuss what the people were voting for. I would suggest that they be asked something like this: "Do you believe that the maximum war effort can be reached by the conscription of man-power for overseas service, if at the same time we do not conscript the banking system of Canada?" I think I know what the answer would be. Or, we might say, "Are you in favour of the conscription of Canada's man-power for military service, without first conscripting the banking institutions to create and provide the necessary means of payment?" I think I know how the people would vote on a question framed in those words.

Let me suggest something quite fundamental to the success of our war effort. It is all very well to talk about the mobilization of material resources. It is all very well to talk about the securing of raw materials. It is all right for the government and others to talk about getting the country organized for a total war effort. But there are other vital points which must be taken into consideration and, in my opinion, the most vital factor of all is the Canadian people.

I am going to suggest that there are two points which are most vital. First, the nation must know the seriousness of the situation. Yesterday the Prime Minister attempted in some degree to show the seriousness of the situation. But it cannot be described in high-toned or platitudinous phrases. They must know the danger, and must realize how close these dangers are. Second, the people of Canada must realize that the things we possess are worth fighting for. I do not believe that a large proportion of our people realize this point fully, and I am going to suggest that there is a reason for that situation. It seems to me that the people are asking whether or not they are fighting for a new order. I believe the government is all wrong in the psychological foundation of its presentation of this matter to the people of Canada.

What does the government talk about? Government officials come round telling us to prepare for the aftermath of the war. They tell us that after the war we may have to come down to a lower standard of living—a tighten-your-belt policy. They tell us that after the war they hope the national income will be large enough to warrant paying off our huge debts. The question the people of Canada are asking is whether we are fighting for a new day or the return of an old day. This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver East talked about comments he had heard while travelling east on a railway train. All hon. members have heard similar comments. I heard one young soldier say that when the soldiers came back they were not going to lay down their guns until they were perfectly sure they were coming back to a Canada worth living in. I did not say anything to that young man; I believed that perhaps his statement was a sort of idle boast. But that is what young men are thinking about.

On another occasion when I heard one of the young men of my acquaintance speaking in that way, I said, "Now, young fellow, do not fool yourself, because those who are at the helm to-day are telling the people of Canada to prepare for economic disaster after the war." I said, "When you come back you will be in the very same position as the soldiers who returned from the last war." I said I was old enough to remember with intelligence what was said at the time of the last war, and to remember that the soldiers who fought in that war said the same thing.

But what happened? We all know what happened. I say that if fundamental changes in our economic system are not made before the war is over, this nation will be plunged into a state of despair similar to that through which it has passed in the last ten years. That is the natural result of the present economic arrangement.

The government is continually reminding the people of possible post-war stringency. Only the other day the director of public information came out with a similar statement. That sort of thing is no good. We have to fight for something worth fighting for. We know what freedom means. But to many men freedom does not mean as much as it does to some of us. We recall what happened a few years ago when the men boarded the train at Vancouver in an effort to come to Ottawa to present their grievances to the government. We know, too, what happened at Regina. It seems to me that the young men of that day were fighting for a freedom; they were fighting for economic freedom. They were not fighting with clubs or guns, they simply came down here to interview the government and to see what could be done. There has been no change in our system, and the results after the war will be the same as what we have been going through for the last ten years. Fundamental changes must be made.

Before I resume my seat may I say that I hope before leaving here we shall be given some definite statement as to what is being done now to meet post-war eventualities. It is all right to be told that we are fighting against something, but we should be told what we are fighting for. It is not enough to say that we are fighting for our freedom, and it is not enough to talk about getting jobs for our soldiers. I notice the Minister of Pensions and National Health is in his seat. He is at the head of a government committee which has been appointed to investigate post-war problems. The Liberal party is not only trying to run the war, but trying to determine how the world should be run after the war. I suggest that there are a good many men in this country who are outside the Liberal party and who could say something about how things should be handled in preparation for the post-war period.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health was in Toronto the other day, and according to newspaper reports he spoke quite enthusiastically about getting jobs for soldiers after the war. Once or twice he used the phrase "rehabilitating soldiers after the war." I find it hard to believe that a government which could not find jobs for men before the war will be able to find jobs for men after the war is over. In other words, if they can assure men of jobs after the war, why could they not have legislated so that men could have found jobs before the war? It is not just a matter of finding men jobs; it is a matter of so readjusting our whole economic democracy that men may have economic freedom and be able to produce and consume what they produce.

The government which was in power before the war was not able to find jobs for men, but they are now proposing that after the war jobs will be found. I say that when the Minister of Pensions and National Health goes up and down this country he should tell Canada how he is going to do that. Even our own people have not been told what good alternatives we have to the bad pre-war policies. Until we get a good alternative we shall be merely tinkering with our post-war problem. If our policy is, first, to defend the world and then to develop and organize the freedoms—I say "freedoms" not "freedom"; I mean all freedoms, including economic freedom—we ought to make up our mind as to how we mean to do this and then tell the world about it.

Someone has well said that democracies do not perish at the hands of an external conqueror, that they fall because they are insecure from within. Let us have a democracy that does not end with the ballot-box; let us have one that will actualize those things which people desire. Can we say that we have had a true democracy in this country for the past ten, fifteen or twenty years? Can we say that in those days preceding the war we had a true democracy? Can we say that our people were receiving what they desired? Can we say that the people desired relief rolls? Can we say that the people desired destitution and poverty? Certainly they did not desire those things.

If democracy means anything, it means the people's right to elect a government that will so manage the country that their desires will be filled. That is true democracy. Speaking in London the Prime Minster said that something must be done now to meet post-war eventualities. I agree with him. But he did not say what had to be done. This group dares him to say how this present arrangement can be adjusted in order that democracy may function to the maximum extent or how this system can be changed to deal with the post-war problem.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Chairman, in reporting to hon. members on the current position of Canada's munitions programme, my task is much less difficult than in making earlier reports. Then, many of our largest projects were in the construction and tooling up period; now, most of our large projects are in at least partial operation. Then, my report, necessarily to some extent, dealt with anticipated production; to-day I can confine my remarks to actual production, and at the same time give to hon. members a fairly comprehensive view of our munitions programme.

In his remarks this afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) invited me to be frank with the house as to the actual state of our production and to give the house the fullest possible information on that subject. I propose to do that subject to the limitations which he himself said he had found to be necessary. I am not, however, going to follow those limitations as much as I did in earlier stages because I believe that as the United States are now manufacturing munitions on a large scale and have been quite free in publishing their statements of production, secrecy about our own production is not as necessary now as it was in the earlier stages. There is, of course, certain information about our production which is confidential and which I must keep confidential, but I am going to give hon. members a fairly comprehensive view of the state of our production at this time.

It is always interesting to see ourselves as others see us. Recently a British management and labour delegation made a tour of the United States and Canada, at the request of the United States government, to survey the current position of war production. Four of the members were industrial executives and four were representatives of British trade unions. Last week the delegation issued its parting message as an official press release. I quote from this release:

> While on the North American continent, we have been privileged to inspect over 80 different plants. During our stay in Canada, we have been able to see the production of naval and mercantile ships, aircraft, guns, machine guns, shells, machine tools and other war-time equipment of vital importance, being produced on a scale that not only surprised and heartened us, but which, we believe, will similarly surprise and hearten the people of the dominion itself.

I was interested in the fact that this delegation believed it to be their duty to tell the people of Canada how well we are getting on. Evidently they had heard disparaging remarks from our own people. I am certain that no one in a position to know the volume of our current munitions exports has any desire to disparage our efforts. In saying this, I wish to say also that our effort is no better to-day than it was six months or a year ago. The only difference is that we are witnessing a later stage of our production programme. At the next session of parliament our output records will enable me to give a still more impressive record of Canadian achievement, but that again will be merely a later stage of the same programme.

At present practically every plant in Canada capable of war work is engaged in war work, either wholly or in part. To September 30th the estimated dollar value of contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply amounted to approximately $2,600,000,000. Of this amount, Canadian orders totalled $1,506,000,000, which had been filled by Canadian production to the extent of $1,325,000,000, from the United Kingdom $40,000,000, from the United States $140,000,000, and from other countries about $1,000,000.

Capital assistance to industry for the extension of existing plants and for the construction of new plants, instalment of equipment, et cetera, aggregated a total of $550,000,000, partly for Canada, partly for the United Kingdom and partly for joint account.

Our shipbuilding programme has been expanded to a point where total orders for ships now exceed $500,000,000. To date Canada has launched seventy-seven corvettes and delivered more than fifty of these for active service; has launched fifty-nine mine-sweepers, of which about forty have been completed; and has also delivered eleven patrol boats, nineteen motor torpedo and crash boats, and some 700 smaller boats, some with power and some without power.

Our cargo vessel programme is well under way, and two 10,000-ton cargo ships have already been launched and will be delivered this autumn. Before the end of 1942, we expect to deliver into service about 100 cargo ships, of which ninety will be of 10,000-ton capacity and ten of 5,000-ton capacity. Some 500 industries located across Canada from coast to coast are engaged in manufacturing components for these cargo vessels.

In addition to our cargo vessel programme, we are laying down keels for larger and faster corvettes and for a large number of corvettes and mine-sweepers similar to those already built. All our seventeen major shipyards are working to capacity, and are being expanded to the fullest possible extent. There are fifty-eight smaller yards working on our small-boat programme.

Our aircraft industry has manufactured in Canada and placed in service since the outbreak of war, or has assembled in Canada, 3,749 aircraft. In addition, we have received from the United States in the same period 1,268 aircraft. The present average rate of production is approximately forty per week for all types, and in this regard it should be pointed out that the present production includes a heavier proportion of advanced trainers and service aircraft than in the earlier months of production. Link trainers are also being produced in Canada, with deliveries now well past the 100 mark.

We are now in position to manufacture aircraft to meet all the requirements of the air training plan, as well as the aircraft requirements of the British training schools that have been located in Canada. We are in very substantial production of Hurricane fighters and Bolingbroke bombers for operational work, we are well advanced toward production of the Consolidated P.B.Y. boat, and we have recently undertaken production of the newest type of British 4-engine bomber, as well as a new type of British fighter plane.

The repair and overhaul of aircraft and engines, which is a rapidly growing responsibility as the number of planes in Canada increases, is being carried out by the department in twenty-nine plants strategically located across Canada. It is estimated that the number of aircraft requiring overhaul at the present time is 5,000 a year, and that a year from now the number of overhauls will reach 10,000 a year. This overhaul work represents a very substantial aircraft industry in itself.

The Canadian automobile industry has played a tremendous part in equipping the forces of the empire. Already over 150,000 vehicles of all types, army trucks, personnel carriers, et cetera, have been delivered, and deliveries are continuing at the rate of thousands each month. In addition, bicycles, motorcycles, buses, tires, spare parts, et cetera, have been delivered in large quantities.

In the field of armoured fighting vehicles, we are now delivering infantry tanks, cruiser tanks, universal carriers and armoured scout and reconnaissance cars at a rapidly expanding rate of production. Production of tanks began in June, and the rate of production has increased steadily since that date. Early in 1942 we are scheduled to achieve a production rate of 200 medium tanks each month.

I may say that a tank represents a tremendous amount of work and the cost is in the vicinity of $90,000. I mention that only as an indication of the amount of material and workmanship which goes into a tank's construction.

Universal carriers came into production in the middle of the year, and already over 1,500 have been delivered. These very useful vehicles are now being produced at a rate of over 400 each month, and this rate will be substantially increased early in 1942.

Armoured scout and reconnaissance cars of Canadian design will be produced in quantity before the end of the year, and the production rate of hundreds per month will be reached early in 1942.

Guns and equipments, after long months of planning, building and tooling, are now in very substantial production. This is a wholly new Canadian industry, and has required heavy capital expenditure for plant and for training of skilled personnel. The early period of low production is now moving into the crescendo of mass production. We have already delivered thousands of gun barrels of the anti-aircraft types, and are now delivering complete gun mechanisms. We have delivered tank guns and field guns, and the first of our naval guns will be ready this month. Altogether we are producing more than ten types of complete heavy guns, including anti-aircraft field, tank and anti-tank and naval type guns, together with all mountings and parts to make the complete fighting units. The 1942 rates of production will be:

Anti-aircraft—over 400 per month.
Field—over 500 per month.
Naval—over 150 per month.
Extra barrels—over 1,000 per month.

The production of these intricate mechanisms is high testimony to the skill and determination of Canadian industry.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke of the delivery of four guns overseas. I presume these would be field guns, 25-pounders. All I can say is that many of us in this house attended the opening of the plant on July 1 last when six complete guns were on exhibition and were tested before the assembled gathering. Of course, we only make the guns; where they go after they leave the factory is something with which I have no concern. I should think, however, that probably the guns were more urgently needed elsewhere either in Canada or in other areas of service, which may account for the fact that only four reached our own forces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These were British guns, 5·5.

Mr. HOWE: That is something else.

In the field of machine guns and small arms, Canada is making a worth-while contribution to the equipment of empire forces with rapid fire infantry weapons. We have created rifle and machine gun plants that compare in size with any similar units in the world. We have already produced over 12,000 Bren guns and over 14,000 additional extra barrels. Hon. members will note that, whereas the first Bren gun contract called for this number of guns to be produced over a period of two and a half years, all deliveries called for under that contract have now been made. Production of this gun now runs at the rate of more than 2,000 a month and is still increasing.

In addition to the Bren gun, we are now producing Browning aircraft machine guns, with a production rate rising to thousands a month early in 1942. In addition, we are bringing into production the Vickers machine gun and Boys anti-tank rifle and Sten sub machine gun. Early in 1942 we will be producing naval machine guns and mountings in hundreds, and anti-tank rifles and sub machine guns at rates of thousands a month. We have already delivered substantial quantities of Lee-Enfield ·303 rifles, and production rates, now in thousands a month, will increase to over 200,000 a year.

Trench mortar deliveries, already in hundreds, will increase to a rate of over 400 a month. In addition to trench mortars, we plan 1942 production of bomb throwers and smoke projectors.

In heavy ammunition, we are producing twenty sizes of shell, and have already delivered over 9,000,000 units. Our capacity is in excess of 1,200,000 shells a month. We are producing ten sizes of cartridge cases, and have already delivered over 10,000,000 cases. Our capacity is about 2,000,000 cases a month. We have produced in excess of 7,000,000 fuses of all types, and have capacity for over 1,000,000 a month. We have produced in excess of 8,000,000 primers, with a continuing capacity of 1,300,000 a month. We have produced many millions of gaines, tubes and miscellaneous shell parts, as required for complete ammunition, and have a capacity of about 1,000,000 a month. All these empty components, together with other minor component parts, are required for the complete rounds of filled ammunition. Their production is coordinated with the capacity and requirements of our filling plants, with some surplus shipped empty as required abroad.

Vast new plants have been created and personnel trained for the exact operations of filling ammunition with high explosive and propellant charges. We are now shipping filled complete rounds, and production of these will expand rapidly as our filling plants swing into full production. Capacities for 1942 production are at present arranged as follows:

Complete rounds—over 1,000,000 per month.
Cartridges—over 700,000 per month.
Projectiles—over 700,000 per month.

In addition to complete rounds, cartridges and projectiles, we have provided capacity for filling bombs, depth charges, mines and fuses.

In the field of small arms ammunition, Canada holds an enviable position in the matter of quality and quantity of production. We have already delivered hundreds of millions of rounds of small arms ammunition of various types. Our capacities include ball, tracer, incendiary and armour piercing types of ·303, ·30/06, ·22 long and ·38. New capacity is being created for the production of ·50, ·55, ·45, 9 MM and 20 MM. Current capacities are about 50,000,000 rounds a month, and will be trebled in 1942.

Our bomb programme includes types from 500 pounds down to practice bombs. Deliveries have already been made in excess of 500,000 units. Mortar bombs, grenades and anti-tank mines are in production, with monthly capacity in the tens of thousands.

Our chemicals and explosives programme is a major part of our munitions production. Explosives are produced for our own filling plants and for shipment overseas. The range of production extends from high explosives, rifle and cannon propellants, and TNT, down through the intermediary chemicals and raw materials. The standard of our product enjoys a very high rating, and we have already delivered over 150,000,000 pounds of finished products. Capacity in 1942 will reach 70,000,000 pounds a month of chemicals and explosives, with complementary production of subsidiary materials.

In the field of pyrotechnics, we are producing signal cartridges, flame floats, flares, smoke generators, sea markers, signal rockets, lights, igniters, et cetera, by the tens of thousands each month. Already hundreds of thousands of these special stores have been delivered to our forces and allied governments.

Production of instruments includes technical apparatus and gear, ranging from fire control gear, range finders, telescopes, et cetera, through to clinometers, gauges, et cetera. We are already in production on many of these precision instruments, and production is scheduled to match ordnance requirements from now on. Thousands of gauges and standard instrument types have already been delivered.

Our general purchasing department has procured the vast quantities of personal equipment and barrack stores required for our services, including thousands of tons of food, fresh and canned. Clothing, boots and shoes, caps, mitts, gloves, greatcoats, et cetera, have been turned out at the rate of many thousands a month. Other stores procured include office furniture, office equipment, electrical supplies, fuels and paints, lubricants, medical supplies, tools and hardware.

The construction branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply has awarded construction contracts aggregating 1,558 in number for a total of $146,000,000. These include work for the army, navy and air force and the air training plan, as well as harbour works, and extensions or additions to aircraft manufacturing plants. This does not include civilian housing, which is handled by Wartime Housing Limited.

The air services branch of the Department of Transport, which now operates under the direction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply had, up to the end of September, completed 108 new airports for the use of the Royal Canadian Air Force and air training plan, and had thirty-one additional airports under development. Included in the above are eighteen airports now occupied by the Royal Air Force in connection with its training project in Canada. As at 31st August, 1941, the sum of $64,000,000 had been allocated for airport construction, exclusive of buildings. In addition, the cost of airport hangars, workshops, barracks and associated works and buildings for the Department of National Defence for Air has involved an expenditure of $117,000,000. Over 100 airports have been equipped for night flying; and power, telephone and lighting facilities have been installed by the air services branch at a cost of $5,200,000. Operational airports are now under way in Newfoundland and Labrador, between Edmonton and the Alaska boundary, and along the northern coast of British Columbia, in areas far from human habitation, involving unusual engineering problems. In my opinion, this work of airport construction calls for all credit to Canada's construction industry and to the staff of the air services branch of the Department of Transport, who have planned and supervised the work.

Hon. members may be interested in a brief mention of the work of the wholly government-owned companies operating under the direction of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Allied War Supplies Corporation administers the chemical, explosives, and ammunition filling programme, including twenty-three separate projects. Construction work is now largely completed. Twenty projects are in production, and the remainder will be in operation before the end of this year. Approximately 15,000 employees are engaged in operations, and it is estimated that twice that number will be required as the plants are brought into full production. One new chemical plant has recently been authorized for the manufacture of aniline, and additions have been authorized for four chemical and explosives plants. Capital commitments now total about $112,000,000.

Citadel Merchandising Company Limited supervises the purchase and distribution of machine tools. During the quarter ended September 30 last, this company purchased machinery and machine tools to the value of $23,400,000. Since it commenced operation, this company has purchased and distributed machine tools to a total value of about $60,000,000.

Fairmont Company Limited is responsible for maintaining in Canada adequate supplies of rubber. This company is the sole buyer of rubber for Canada, and its product is sold to war and domestic industries as required. In addition, the company buys and distributes hides for our leather industry.

Melbourne Merchandising Limited was established in September, 1940, to purchase in bulk the wool required for military contracts, and also to act as handling agents for the British wool control. This company is charged with the responsibility for having adequate supplies of wool available for war industrial requirements.

National Railways Munitions Limited was incorporated to produce munitions at various shops and car plants of Canadian National Railways. The company is engaged in the production of naval guns and gun carriages, and will shortly be in production.

The Plateau Company Limited was formed to purchase, store and distribute to war industries adequate supplies of silk, required for parachutes and other purposes. Since the issue of an order in council on August 9, 1941, "freezing" all silk in Canada, Plateau company has been taking delivery of all "frozen" silk for government account.

Research Enterprises Limited was organized in August, 1940, to provide facilities for manufacturing war material of a secret nature developed by the national research council, and for the production of optical glass, fire control instruments, both optical and electrical, and devices of a secret nature required by the army, navy and air force. This operation has developed in a most spectacular way, and has been found to meet a major war requirement. The main plant has been in operation for some months and now employs more than 1,500 men and women. The first optical glass produced in Canada was made by Research Enterprises in June. The company now has orders totalling over $55,000,000 for optical equipment, instruments and secret radio devices.

Small Arms Limited. This company was formed in August, 1940, to build and operate a plant at Long Branch, Ontario, for the production of Lee-Enfield rifles, bayonets and scabbards. The present programme provides for six times the capacity of the original plant. The company has recently undertaken the production of Sten machine carbines. About 1,250 men and women are now employed at the plant. A substantial quantity of rifles has already been delivered, and the output is increasing rapidly each week.

War-time Housing Limited. This company was incorporated in February, 1941, to provide housing accommodation for munitions workers in communities where serious congestion has developed on account of war projects.

The present programme embraces the construction of 4,427 cottages, thirty-five staff houses, four commissaries and two special buildings, in twenty-seven cities and towns across Canada. The expenditure for the entire programme now under way or projected is estimated at $15,750,000. The programme is constantly being expanded to meet urgent requirements for housing for munitions workers.

War-time Merchant Shipping Limited. This company was incorporated in April, 1941, to administer the programme of cargo ship construction in Canada. This programme calls for 143 vessels of 9,300 tons and ten vessels of 4,700 tons. Two of the larger type ships have already been launched, and a third will be sent down the ways on November 6. Keels have been laid for twenty more of the larger class ships. Twelve shipyards are engaged in carrying out this merchant ship programme.

War Supplies Limited. This company was formed in April, 1941, as a means of implementing the declaration of Hyde Park. Its function is to negotiate and to receive orders from departments of the United States government for war supplies to be manufactured in Canada. I should perhaps mention that the declaration of Hyde Park has worked out as was contemplated, with the result that Canada's problem of dollar exchange is in process of being solved.

Federal Aircraft Limited. This company was established in June, 1940, to administer a large programme for the production of Anson aircraft required for the air training plan. Ansons have now been built and flown at all five of the company's assembly plants, and a considerable number have now been test-flown and delivered to the Royal Canadian Air Force. The aircraft being produced by this company is a material improvement on the British type Anson, and production is stepping up rapidly.

An interesting development of our munitions programme, brought into being to mobilize the last ounce of Canada's war productive capacity, is known as our "bits and pieces" programme. Munitions contracts call for a tremendous volume of production, and it was inevitable that the large contracts were placed in large factories. It is now our purpose to have the large plants break down their large contracts into small contracts and to sub-contract these as widely as possible, in order that Canada's peace-time machine tool capacity may be fully utilized for war work.

There are many advantages in expanding our production by a "bits and pieces" programme, rather than by building more large plants. I may mention a few:

[Mr. Howe.]

First. There is a limit to the amount of work that can be handled by our larger manufacturing organizations, as they represent only a portion of the country's productive capacity which, from a mechanical standpoint, can be adapted for war use.

Second. The machine tool market has now reached a point where it is difficult, and in some cases impossible, to secure machine tools as rapidly as required.

Third. By taking work to the men rather than the men to the work, we can avoid disruption of community life in some areas and congestion in others, save in housing costs and community facilities, and obtain a more suitable type of labour. Readjustment problems will be lighter after the end of hostilities, and the load on the taxpayer less.

Fourth. By spreading the work to hundreds of small shops, use can be made of thousands of skilled workmen, who, through their age, position, or other reasons, do not desire to change their homes and source of livelihood.

To facilitate carrying out this programme of sub-contracting, a new branch has been formed known as the industry and sub-contract coordination branch, with headquarters at Ottawa and regional offices across the country. The branch and district offices are designed to help small manufacturers, and those threatened with curtailment of peace-time operations, to obtain contracts or sub-contracts of a type that they are equipped to handle. The purpose is also to encourage sub-contracting and to assist the prime contractors in setting up and operating efficient sub-contracting departments.

A great deal has already been accomplished in the field of sub-contracting. Millions of dollars worth of bits and pieces are already in process of being manufactured. Several large industries such as the pulp and paper, oil, utility, and mining have set up organizations to coordinate the use of the available hours of their maintenance shops. A great many of our so-called luxury manufacturers are changing over to the production of war materials.

As an outstanding example of what has already been accomplished in this direction, I may mention the 25-pounder gun programme being carried out by Sorel Industries. This plant was built to manufacture 25-pounder equipments at the rate of eight a month. It is now building about forty complete equipments a month, and by the end of the year will be building fifty complete equipments a month. The increase in production has been brought about partly by an extensive system of sub-contracting.

The 25-pounder gun is made up of approximately 1,286 parts, and of these 529 parts, or about 41 per cent, are being sub-contracted. These parts are divided among sixty-three small plants in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The parts that are being made at Sorel are some of the most difficult, and also those requiring special single purpose machines. The parts that have been sub-contracted are being handled by shops, the smallest of which is a two-car garage behind a house, operated by the owner and two helpers, and having about $4,000 worth of machinery; and the largest a modern shop having $300,000 worth of machinery and 600 employees. The small garage is providing two precision parts—a pin and a bracket. The large shop is manufacturing a highly complicated dial sight having 122 precision parts, many of which have to be made with the same accuracy as required in an expensive watch.

In the last two months over 82,000 finished parts have been supplied by these sixty-three sub-contractors to the main factory at Sorel. Production of these parts does not come about by merely handing blueprints to manufacturers and asking them to supply the parts. It has been found that in a great many cases, manufacturers, in their desire to assist in the war effort, and because of overoptimism, have accepted work from prime contractors and failed to produce.

The excellent work that is being done in sub-contracting by the Sorel plant is due to the use of engineers on loan from the Chrysler corporation, who have put into effect methods arrived at by years of experience in sub-contracting in the automotive industry. Under the direction of those men, remarkable results have been obtained in cutting down man-hours and costs of production.

What Sorel Industries have done, other manufacturers can do. My remarks on this subject have been extensive, for the reason that I am asking the cooperation of all manufacturers in the further development of sub-contracting and cooperation in our bits and pieces programme. The department is ready and willing to assist in every way, but the manufacturers, both large and small, must do their part. The small shops and displaced industries must be prepared to help themselves if the department is to be placed in a position to help them.

To assist in furthering this bits and pieces programme, I have issued instructions that before additional capital assistance will be approved, a full investigation must be made of the possibility of sub-contracting. Those responsible for purchasing have been asked to break down orders to a size that can be handled by as many small manufacturers and displaced industries as possible.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister mentioned capital assistance. Would he say if there is any liquid capital assistance, or working capital assistance, being given these concerns?

Mr. HOWE: Which concerns?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Small concerns. Would the minister say whether any working capital assistance is being given these small concerns?

Mr. HOWE: It depends entirely upon the individual case; ordinarily not. What we are endeavouring to do in the bits and pieces programme is to utilize existing capacity. Capital assistance would imply that we were building up small concerns for the purpose of participating in the programme. That is not the purpose of the programme. Of course we have offered capital assistance for specialized work which we could not get done in the routine, but that is separate and apart from the bits and pieces programme.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I quite understand about the capital assistance, but I am asking if any working capital assistance is given.

Mr. HOWE: There again it depends upon the circumstances. I do not like to make general statements about a very large programme.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I was asking for a particular statement.

Mr. HOWE: I would not say it has not been done, but it is not usual to do it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Then go ahead; I am sorry to have interrupted.

Mr. HOWE: I think hon. members will agree that the production programme as it is to-day is tremendous in scope. It will be readily appreciated that a programme of this magnitude makes tremendous demands on our sources of raw materials. To supply our war industries it has been necessary rigidly to control distribution of war materials and to assure a priority of use to war industry, as against peace-time industry.

The control over essential war materials has been obtained by the appointment of twelve controllers of materials and services. These twelve controllers are members of the war-time industries control board, under the chairmanship of the director general of the priorities branch. The purpose of the controllers is principally to ensure adequate supplies to war industries, but the work of the board is closely associated with that of the war-time prices and trade board, the latter board having complete control of prices. Each controller administers the policy of the war-time prices and trade board as applied to the industry over which he exercises control. The following is a brief outline of action taken by the controllers to date:

Machine Tools. Machine tools are basic in war production, and every effort is being made to increase their supply and to restrict their non-essential use. In 1940, designs were frozen on a broad list of consumers' durable goods, including automobiles, in which a change of model would otherwise require new tooling. Every effort has been made to distribute machine tools to war industries in need of such equipment. No exports of machine tools may be made without licence. A government-owned company, Citadel Merchandising Company Limited, assists in the financing of the greatly extended production and purchase of machine tools.

Metals. The metals controller has supervision over the supply, distribution and use of all non-ferrous metals, minerals, and alloys. Substantial restrictions have been imposed on the civilian use of essential metals. In the case of copper, lead and zinc, all tonnage in excess of that required for the Canadian war programme and for greatly restricted domestic requirements is sold under contract to the United Kingdom. The production of metals in Canada has been greatly extended, and this country, which produces the principal base metals such as aluminum, nickel, copper, lead and zinc far in excess of domestic requirements, is supplying these metals in very large quantities to Great Britain and/or the United States of America. In addition, progress has been made in developing sources of strategic metals which were not produced in Canada in any quantity before the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: In connection with the minerals that are being produced, has any plant in Canada yet come into the production of magnesium metal?

Mr. HOWE: The first magnesium metal from a pilot plant is being produced now. We have not undertaken large-scale development.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is the pilot plant?

Mr. HOWE: I think it is here in Ottawa, at the research laboratories.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is one small plant in Hamilton, I believe.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think that one is in operation.

Mercury has been in production for over a year, and tungsten, antimony and manganese are being developed.

Motor Vehicles. The motor vehicle controller has substantially reduced the number of passenger cars which may be manufactured in Canada in order that materials and labour may be directed to the manufacture of war vehicles. For 1942 the rate of production of passenger cars has been established at 44 per cent of 1940 production, which is the equivalent of 50 per cent of 1941 production. Steps have been taken to spread this reduced output evenly through the year, to avoid unnecessary peaks and valleys in labour and material requirements.

Oil. A number of orders have been issued by the controller to restrict civilian use of gasoline. These include reduction of deliveries to service stations to 80 per cent of estimated normal requirements, and prohibition of the erection of new service stations, gasoline pumps, storage tanks and oil-burning equipment. Sale of gasoline and oil to motorists on Sundays and at night (from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m.) on week days has been prohibited. Grades of gasoline for public use are limited to two, and credit cards may no longer be used by Canadians. Voluntary cooperation in saving gasoline has been requested, and a list of pointers on how to save gasoline and oil has been placed before the public.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition asked for a complete discussion of the public letter issued by the Joy Oil company. I am quite prepared to discuss that matter, but I should prefer to leave it until the subject matter of this statement is under debate. To discuss the matter at this time would distort the balance of things, and place an undue emphasis on the matter.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister tell us what success he has had with the prohibition—or inhibition—he has established with regard to the consumption of gasoline?

Mr. HOWE: The distribution of gasoline to gasoline stations has been reduced to 85 per cent of what was estimated to be the unrestricted consumption. That, however, is a story in itself—the oil situation.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That would be included in the story. There is a 15 per cent reduction, brought about by those who walk instead of driving their cars.

Mr. HOWE: It has been rather confused, but the situation is becoming clarified.

Steel. Various measures have been taken to conserve iron and steel, and a system of indexing of consumers' requirements is now in operation to ensure that the needs of essential undertakings are met. Measures have been taken to stabilize steel prices, and structural steel shapes have been standardized and reduced in number from 267 to 70. All orders for pig-iron must be forwarded to the steel controller for approval on a preference basis. By the first quarter of 1942, Canada's annual steel productive capacity will be more than double what it was in 1939. This greatly increased capacity, plus greatly augmented imports from the United States of America, is insufficient to meet war orders and domestic requirements, which accounts for the rigid control outlined. Apart from the action of the steel controller, the civilian use of steel is limited by the operations of the controller of construction, the machine tools controller and by the controller of supplies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before leaving the subject of steel, would the minister tell us the state of production in Canada of steel plate? What is the position with respect to the Sydney plant?

Mr. HOWE: We have two plants operating to capacity on steel plate, namely, the Steel Company of Canada and the Dominion Foundry plant at Hamilton. The plant at Sydney is being placed in operation. I believe it is now waiting for electrical equipment, but it will be in production early in the new year. To continue:

Timber. The entire Canadian industry has been organized so that centralized buying for government projects is effected as economically as possible. In May, 1941, domestic prices for timber, lumber and millwork were fixed at the April 1, 1941, level, and price-fixing has since been extended to other lines. The controller also has entire power to direct the sale, storage and movement of timber stock should this power need to be exercised. Substantial progress has been made in arranging for the more efficient use and substitution of timber in order to release steel for war requirements and to make more high grade timber available for export.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before proceeding to the next point, would the minister tell us the timber policy for next year (a) with respect to production or quantity, and (b) with respect to price? The men are going into the woods now. What shortage, if any, is anticipated?

Mr. HOWE: We understand the present situation will continue into next year, namely, that the demand for lumber will greatly exceed the supply. So far as prices are concerned I would point out that domestic prices are pegged and can be changed only upon application to the war-time prices and trade board, with evidence to show that the change is necessary and justified. The export price is whatever the export market will bring.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the industry can show that the cost of production (a) in respect of wages and (b) in respect of supply is increased over this year, will it be given due allowance?

Mr. HOWE: The timber controller has written a letter to the trade within the last week or ten days agreeing that the trade should place their position before the war-time prices and trade board in April of next year. I cannot make the promise my hon. friend is inviting, but I will say that the position will be reviewed, and if a price increase is justified in the opinion of the war-time prices and trade board, I have no doubt it will be granted. My department has nothing to do with prices.

Mr. TUSTIN: Have any price increases been allowed since last spring?

Mr. HOWE: There has been no price increase since April, 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, authorized.

Mr. HOWE: Authorized or made, so far as I know. It has not been made legally, anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that.

Mr. HOWE: To continue:

Chemicals. Through voluntary arrangements, a number of measures have been taken to ensure an adequate supply of chemicals for various essential purposes. Formal orders have been issued limiting the use of chlorine as a bleaching agent in paper making, and prohibiting the use of glycerine as anti-freeze, and restricting the civilian use of refined glycerine to 70 per cent of 1940 levels.

Transit. This controller is responsible for reorganizing transit systems in order to ensure adequate transport facilities to deal with traffic congestion in key war production areas. Organizational work in connection with staggering of working hours to relieve congestion in certain areas is now under way, and introduction of specific measures on a test basis is expected in the near future.

Construction. With certain exceptions, including government buildings, churches, and single, duplex and triplex dwelling houses, construction of new buildings costing more than $10,000, installation of equipment costing more than $5,000, and making repairs in excess of $2,500 are all subject to licence of the construction controller. These powers are being exercised to the end that construction projects shall be limited as far as possible to those of an essential nature.

Ship repairs. It is the duty of this controller to see that the most efficient use is made of Canadian ship repair facilities. These facilities are being stepped up to a maximum to provide quick repairs for both naval and cargo vessels.

Supplies. To date the following commodities have been brought under the jurisdiction of the controller of supplies: Silk, rubber, cork, transparent film, refrigerators, washing machines, stoves, radios and vacuum cleaners.

(a) Silk. Early in August, 1941, all raw silk owned by Canadian companies or on order by Canadian companies was taken over by Plateau Company Limited (government-owned) and will be used exclusively for war purposes. Consequently supplies of substitutes for companies previously using silk for certain purposes have of necessity been arranged.

(b) Rubber. Arrangements are under way for the acquisition of additional supplies of crude rubber to be held as a reserve by the government company, Fairmont Company Limited, which now handles all purchases of crude rubber for both war and domestic requirements. Consumption of rubber for civilian purposes is being curtailed on a sliding scale and by February, 1942, will be down to 70 per cent of the 1940 monthly average civilian consumption.

(c) Cork. While no formal orders have as yet been issued, commercial cork, including cork wood in a natural or semi-processed state, is now under the jurisdiction of the controller of supplies.

(d) Transparent film. The use of transparent films of the "cellophane" variety has been substantially curtailed, and with certain specific exceptions is limited to use as cellulose adhesive tape and for packaging food, candy, drugs and tobaccos when not in tin or glass containers.

(e) Consumers' durable goods—i.e. refrigerators, washing machines, stoves, radios. vacuum cleaners. Production of all these articles for civilian use has now been curtailed. The general principle underlying the curtailment measures is that monthly production for the time being is to be reduced to 75 per cent of 1940 monthly average output. Committees of representatives of the industries concerned are being formed to assist in the efficient and equitable application of this principle.

Power. In order to ensure adequate supplies of power for war industries, the power controller has instituted daylight saving applicable throughout the year in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in the case of those communities which observed daylight saving in the summer of 1940. Use of electric power for steam purposes has been banned and coal boiler installations made, making such power available for war industry. Certain non-war industries have been forced to reduce consumption of power during peak hours. In central areas all power systems have been inter-connected, so as to permit excess power in one area of the country to be used in other areas as required. Many improvements in plants have been arranged on the order of the controller to ensure maximum production of power from all capacity.

I have endeavoured to give hon. members the highlights of Canada's munitions programme without undue detail, but, even so, it has been a long story. I feel that the men and women of Canada are beginning to understand the all-out nature of our productive effort. Looking back over the past two years, I do not see how our full production could have been developed any more rapidly than it is being developed. I have been supported by the unfailing devotion to duty of a very able staff drawn from Canadian industry, and I have also had the fullest cooperation from Canadian manufacturers and from Canadian workmen. Canada's position in war production will stand comparison with that of any country in the world, and recent comparisons that have been made by competent observers are highly complimentary to this country. Our war industries are soundly established, and our present production is all that, and in many cases more than, we had anticipated. It has been our purpose to call on Canadian industry and Canadian man-power for the maximum that the most optimistic estimates of capacity would permit. While we believe that we are reaching the end of possible productive capacity, we are still taking on new projects to the extent that further possible productive capacity can be discovered. If, in the past, other countries have looked upon Canada as a source of raw materials rather than of finished products, the future will find us a country equipped to turn our own raw materials into finished products within our own borders.

It has been our purpose in planning our war industries to maintain a balance between available supplies of raw material and our planned war production. We have counted on curtailment of domestic production of a non-essential character and this is now being brought about through our controllers. I wish to assure hon. members that the only purpose of curtailing of domestic articles is to free necessary raw materials for our munitions programme and to provide needed manpower for that programme. We will continue to make available for domestic use everything not absolutely required by the war programme, and we will not call upon our people for sacrifices that are not entirely necessary to bring about the success of our war effort.

Such measures of restriction as have already been applied have, in general, obtained the full cooperation of our citizens. I ask all hon. members to cooperate with our controllers in explaining to our citizens the need for restriction and in asking for cooperation.

There is no reason to believe that this war will end in the near future. Our industrial effort must be sustained over a long period. We have planned with this in view. Munitions from Canada are now reaching every theatre of war in quantities that are impressive to those receiving them. We have established a reputation of quality and prompt delivery. There is an enthusiasm behind our production that is accomplishing results greater in many cases than we had hoped for. I am confident that, in the months to come, Canada will make history as an industrial nation engaged in an all-out effort in war production.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Chairman, it is now nearly a year since I gave to the house what I then endeavoured to make a comprehensive review of the strength, work, and prospects of the Royal Canadian Navy. In the course of the year that has passed there have been discussions on naval matters both in the house and in committee, but no general statement on the Royal Canadian Navy was made in that period. I shall endeavour now to give briefly and simply some further account of our naval effort during the past year.

When I spoke a year ago I was able to tell the house that the Canadian navy had increased from a strength of 1,774 officers and men on active service at the beginning of the war to a strength of 13,000 officers and men on active service in November, 1940. Those figures represented an eight-fold increase in the space of fourteen months. I stated then that we planned to have 23,000 men and 250 ships by March 31, 1942. I am happy to be able to say that now, six months before that date, we have considerably exceeded that estimate. In the last twelve months the increase in personnel has been even greater than during the first fourteen months of the war. The total strength of the Royal Canadian Navy to-day is 27,000 officers and men, a truly phenomenal expansion from the first days of the war. What is more, there is no dearth of recruits; there is no lack of men offering to serve in the navy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact that you have an embarrassment of recruits?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not know what to do with them; you have no place to send them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We have a waiting list of 4,000 men.

Mr. ROWE: In other words, the boys are ahead of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They want to get in the navy; that is the idea.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the ships which will be manned by these Canadian sailors be sent all over the world, or will their activities be confined to our seaboard?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I shall reach that in a moment. In answer to my hon. friend who just asked whether these men were not ahead of the government, I have to say—

Mr. ROWE: That would not be difficult.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): — that there is no dearth of men. Men are being taken into the naval service as rapidly as they can be trained and as rapidly as ships can be provided for them. You cannot train naval officers particularly, and petty officers, in a short time, but they are being trained as rapidly as is possible in this country and England, and as soon as they are trained there is a place for them.

As to where these men serve I may say to the hon. member for Davenport that they are to be found in every sea of the world. The great majority of them, of course, are to be found in Canadian ships but several hundred of them have been lent to the Royal Navy. These men of the Canadian navy who are serving with the Royal Navy are paid by Canada and at Canadian rates of pay.

To turn now to the question of ships, it is to be noted that the increase here has kept pace almost exactly with the increase in personnel. A year ago the number of ships in the Canadian navy was 155. The number to-day is 300. In that number are included auxiliary cruisers, destroyers, corvettes, minesweepers, patrol boats and auxiliary vessels of a great variety of types.

Like the men of the Canadian navy, our ships are to be found in widely scattered parts of the world. One cannot, of course, specify with definiteness where the ships are at a given time, but it may be said without fear of betraying any secrets that at this moment Canadian ships are separated by 10,000 miles of land and sea. Some of them are on convoy work; some are protecting the shores of this country, and still others are cooperating with the royal navy. The work of convoying both freight ships and troop ships still continues to be one of the most important tasks of the Canadian navy. How important is this work to the success of our cause, and how vital it is to the very life of the British isles are matters that are beyond dispute. It is a source of gratification to be able to say that not one ship proceeding in troop convoy from these shores to Great Britain has lost a single passenger on the way. So far as freight convoys are concerned no fewer than 7,000 ships have left Canadian shores for Great Britain since the outbreak of the war, carrying 42,500,000 tons of cargo to that island. A great deal of the work of convoying these ships and their cargoes has fallen to the Canadian navy. I shall not attempt to specify how this work is allotted, where the duty of one service ends and another begins, but it is true to say that a great part of it, and a very hazardous part, falls to the care of the men of the Canadian navy.

We have been greatly heartened, and I believe that the whole empire has been cheered by certain steps taken not long since by the navy of the United States. The great president of that great country has indicated clearly that certain portions of the seas which lie between America and Europe and which he regards as of primary importance to United States security will be patrolled by United States ships of war. He has asserted the principle of the freedom of the seas in those areas, and the ships of the United States navy are now defending that principle. The decision of the United States president is one of great importance and of great assistance to us and to our cause.

On more than one occasion the work of the Canadian navy has won the commendation of naval authorities in other countries. Thus, speaking in Bermuda in September last, Mr. Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy of the United States, said that the Canadian navy is doing, to quote his exact words, "a very outstanding job" in the defence of north American sea approaches, and he added that it had been "a very considerable help to the whole problem of transport".

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Writing in the Fortnightly Review for September of this year, Admiral Sir Henry Richmond, in an article entitled "The War at Sea" uses the following words in speaking of the need of increasing the strength of escort forces:

> The prospects of such strengthening are encouraged by the news from Canada of the truly remarkable developments of the Royal Canadian Navy. Canada, who began the war with a diminutive navy of thirteen small vessels and 1,774 officers and men, now commands the services of 250 vessels and a personnel of 22,000, and these are employed as far afield as the Caribbean sea, the north Atlantic and the European waters. Besides this, her shipbuilding programme has included the construction of no less than seventy of those useful little vessels, the corvettes, of which sixty were for the Canadian and ten for the British navy, sixty mine-sweepers and a large number of other small craft. Nor is this all that she has contributed to the defence at sea. Her troops have furnished reinforcements for the defence of Iceland, Newfoundland and the West Indies, and her forty shipbuilding and repairing yards are producing merchant ships. These are efforts which should not go unnoticed in this country; they are harbingers of even greater things and they show the awakening of the maritime spirit of that great dominion.

Those are the words of Admiral Sir Henry Richmond. These are significant statements. But added proof can be presented of the value of the work that has been done by Canadian naval forces. Such proof is to be found in the awards and mentions for gallantry. On no fewer than forty-nine occasions, officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy have received decorations, mentions in dispatches, or commendations for their performances. This alone is proof of the valour of our Canadian naval personnel and of the importance of the work which they are doing.

This work is not carried on without its casualties. Since the beginning of the war 364 officers and men have been killed, sixty-seven have been wounded and two are prisoners of war. In the last year two ships of the Canadian navy have been lost. One the Otter an armed patrol ship, caught fire and foundered off Halifax in March of this year with a loss of nineteen men. More recently the corvette Levis, while escorting a convoy, was torpedoed with a loss of seventeen men.

But we have something to show on the other side of the ledger. We, too, have taken our toll. Five enemy merchant ships have been captured by our navy since the commencement of hostilities. Enemy submarines have been frequently attacked by our ships, mainly by depth charges, and while it is not possible or proper to give the details of these actions, it may be said with certainty that some of the attacks have been completely successful and that more than one German

U-boat now lies at the bottom of the sea as a result of the vigilance and skill of men of the Canadian navy.

The protection of merchant shipping is one of our tasks, but the provision of merchant ships and of merchant seamen is in other hands. The Canadian naval staff, however, have taken a deep interest in the training and supply of merchant seamen and have cooperated with the Department of Transport in the provision of manning pools in this country, where merchant seamen may register and remain while awaiting employment on a merchant ship.

Two hundred ratings of the Royal Canadian Navy are now serving as gunners or in some similar capacity on defensively equipped merchant ships.

There are two other matters which I should like to mention briefly in this statement. The first is that very shortly we hope to begin the building of destroyers in this country. Already some skilled naval constructors from England have arrived to supervise this work. Plans for destroyers are well in hand, and as soon as material is available—and this will be on hand very shortly—the work of destroyer-building in Canada will commence.

The second matter which I wish to mention is that we hope to open the Royal Canadian Naval College in the autumn of 1942. This college will be a training ground for officers of the navy, and I believe it will prove to be an invaluable addition to our programme of organizing the Canadian navy.

Expansion in ships and men of the Canadian navy has been substantial, but we aim at still further expansion. We shall have more men and more ships. Changes being made in the art and the practice of naval warfare require changes in ship construction and in the training of naval personnel. We are endeavouring to the utmost of our ability to keep in touch with the latest improvements in training and in shipbuilding and in ship armaments.

The work of the empire navies in this war is of prime and overriding importance. The task of carrying supplies overseas and of protecting the ships which carry those supplies is one which need take second place to none other in the strategy of this war. We must have more merchant ships to replace those that are lost, and to do more than replace them, to make the merchant navies of the empire larger and more efficient than they were before. But merchant navies without the protection of fighting ships are helpless to-day. More and more this fact is being emphasized. Greater and greater becomes the need for more and better escort vessels. Our shipyards in Canada, under the direction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, have done magnificently up to the present. They will continue, I know, their splendid record.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I think I can say with modesty that the personnel of our navy has brought honour to itself and to this country. It will be the aim of the department of naval services to continue to improve upon the work of the past and to spare no effort of thought or labour in carrying out its duties, which are so vital to the successful prosecution of this war.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Chairman, the Department of National Defence for Naval Services has under its charge the drama of the navy. The department over which I have the honour to preside has no such drama. Many of its activities are of a prosaic nature, but they are nevertheless important. A number of functions have been assigned to the Department of National War Services. The department, since the house last adjourned, has been reorganized to a certain extent. This afternoon I tabled an order in council, P.C. 8488, dated the 31st day of October, 1941. This order in council authorizes certain divisions of the department and sets out the purposes of such divisions. It indicates the great variety of the functions that are assigned to this department.

Perhaps I could best illustrate this diversity by reading the operative parts of the order in council:

> The following divisions of the Department of National War Services are hereby authorized for the purposes hereinafter set forth:
> (a) The National Registration division—to administer and carry out the national registration regulations, to record and tabulate new registrations, to record changes of address and of matrimonal status, to compile statistical and such other information as may be required as a result of the said national registration, and to prepare lists of men as may be required under the national war services regulations or otherwise.

The national registration which took place in August, 1940, was the first task assigned to the new department that was created on July 12, 1940. While the employees of the national registration division are on the staff of the department, they act under the supervision of the dominion bureau of statistics. Many of the results of the national registration are to be found in a number of publications, issued by the Department of National War Services in conjunction with the dominion bureau of statistics. The first of these is the preliminary statistical tabulation of the national registration of August, 1940. Then there is the table of specialized occupations, also issued by the Department of National War Services and the dominion bureau of statistics. And finally, statistics relating to labour supply under war conditions, issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, dominion bureau of statistics, social analysis branch.

The second division that is authorized is called the mobilization division. Its functions are:

To administer and carry out the national war services regulations, and to direct the mobilization of men for military training under the said regulations, of women volunteers for auxiliary service with the army, navy or air force, as requisitioned from time to time, of fire-fighters for service in the United Kingdom, and of such other persons as may be required from time to time; to keep the records of the voluntary service registration bureau, and to assist in directing those seeking war employment to employment and towards training facilities which may be available; to give information and other services in connection with prisoners of war and Canadian internees in enemy occupied countries.

The next division referred to in the order in council is that of public information. Its purposes are:

To direct the activities of the bureau of public information; to collect and disseminate to the public information concerning the various phases of the war effort of the Canadian people and the activities of the government in relation thereto; and, generally, to coordinate the existing public information services of the government and originate or employ other means in order that the same may be used in the most efficient way for the obtaining of the utmost aid from the people of Canada in the national emergency which has arisen.

I like to think of the functions of the public information bureau as being carried out with one objective, to bring the war effort of this country as close to the hearts and minds of the people of Canada, and the people of Canada as close to our war effort, as it is possible to do. Indeed I conceive that to be perhaps the main objective of the department which has been placed under my charge.

The Minister of National Defence some time ago spoke of four things as being necessary for the successful prosecution of the war: men, munitions, money and morale. I hope that the department over which I preside may make some contribution towards keeping the morale of the country at its highest possible level.

The next division referred to in the order in council is the war charities division. The purpose of this division is:

To administer The War Charities Act and the regulations made thereunder, to cooperate with all organizations registered under The War Charities Act, including such organizations as are or may become subject to the supervision of the national war charities funds advisory board, and generally to promote, organize and coordinate different forms of voluntary assistance with a view to the most effective use of personal services or material contributions for the prosecution of the war and the welfare of the nation.

The next division that I shall refer to is the women's voluntary services division. This is a new division of the department, and I am very happy indeed to be able this evening to announce its creation. The purpose of this division is:

To promote the coordination of the voluntary efforts of the women of Canada and to encourage the organization of women's voluntary services on a community basis, with a view to their best utilization for the needs of their communities, the maintenance of national morale and the furtherance of the welfare of the nation.

Then there is another division that is called the salvage division, of which the purposes are:

To strengthen the spirit of thrift in the minds of the people of Canada; to encourage the conservation of raw materials and promote the salvage, collection and disposal of secondary raw materials; to direct and supervise the organization of voluntary salvage corps; to cooperate with other departments concerned with the conservation and use of secondary raw materials and assist in the making of the necessary arrangements between producers, dealers and consumers, and to prepare information for distribution.

These are the functions of the department which are authorized by the order in council.

Then certain statutory functions have been assigned to me. One of them is the supervision of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation so far as broadcasting is concerned; another is the chairmanship of the national film board of which I shall speak later. Then further the administration of the Canadian travel bureau has been assigned to my department, and I have been asked to assist in the coordination of censorship activities throughout the various departments of the government.

I shall not attempt to speak of these various functions at any appreciable length. I shall not deal with the national registration or the manner in which that was carried out; that was very fully covered by my predecessor when he spoke earlier this year.

But I should like to say just a few words about the various functions of the mobilization division. The first of these functions has to do with the calling up of men for military training in accordance with the provisions of the national war services regulations made and established in virtue of the National Resources Mobilization Act and the War Measures Act.

As all hon. members are aware, the national war services regulations provide that every male British subject who has been at any time subsequently to the first day of September, 1939, ordinarily resident in Canada, while (as of July 1, 1940) of the ages of twenty-one to forty-five years inclusive and unmarried or a childless widower is liable during the continuation of the state of war now existing to undergo military training for such period as the governor in council may determine by proclamation. On or about the 1st day of July of this year men of the age classes of 21, 22, 23 and 24 as of July 1, 1940, and men as they become 21 years of age subsequently to that date, have been called out by proclamation. (The date of the proclamation as given, July 1, 1940, is not perhaps the correct date, but I have not the exact date now before me). The provisions of the national war services regulations are administered by thirteen administrative divisions established, roughly corresponding to the military districts of Canada. In each one of these divisions there is a board consisting of a chairman and two other members. The chairman of each board is a judge of a superior court or other court of the province in which the administrative division is located. The other two members are prominent and respected citizens of the community. In addition, authority to appear before the board at its hearings is given to a representative of the Department of National Defence and to a representative of the national labour supply council. The various national war services boards are completely in control of the administration of the regulations, and their decisions in all of the matters that come before them are final and conclusive. The Department of National War Services in Canada therefore does not deal with individual cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister explain how those hockey players got out of the country?

Mr. THORSON: I shall be glad to deal with that when we are in discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should not like the minister to forget it.

Mr. THORSON: The department in Ottawa does not deal with any individual cases. If the hon. leader of the opposition suggests that the departure of the hockey players was a result of any intervention on the part of the department in Ottawa I can inform him that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not say anything of the sort, but I want to know how these young men got out of the country when they were subject to military draft.

Mr. THORSON: I shall deal with that subject when we come to discussion. All communications concerning any young men who are called out for military training should therefore be addressed to the registrar of the administrative division in which the man concerned resides.

Roughly, the purposes of the Department of National War Services in respect of the calling out of men for military training are these: The Department of National Defence indicates from time to time, usually monthly, the number of men that the department requires for military training. A requisition setting this out is sent to the Department of National War Services, and on receipt of instructions to that effect each divisional registrar selects the young men and sends them notices to appear before any medical practitioner in good standing. The men are selected by the divisional registrars from the several cities, towns, villages and the countryside, so that all portions of the division shall furnish men in as equitable a manner as possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By what method does he select them? I know the practice, but what is the method of selection?

Mr. THORSON: The selection is by age groups; first the twenty-ones, then the twenty-twos, and so on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the registrar any right to say this man shall go and that man shall not go?

Mr. THORSON: He has assigned to him the duty of selecting men from the province or administrative division over which he has jurisdiction. I should like to deal more specifically with the question raised by my hon. friend when we get into the discussion.

Mr. TUSTIN: Did I understand the minister to say that a young man who is called up has the right to appear before any qualified medical practitioner?

Mr. THORSON: Yes, in the first instance, since all medical practitioners in good standing have been appointed examining physicians by the Department of National War Services. Therefore in the first instance a man may go to any doctor of his own choice. Then the medical certificates that come in from these practitioners are subject to scrutiny in the department. These medical practitioners examine the men in accordance with the physical standards for the examination of recruits as laid down by the Department of National Defence. The men who are found physically fit for training are then notified to report at an indicated training centre of the Department of National Defence, where they undergo four months' training.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I just interrupt to ask whether this is the final medical examination? Are those reported fit accepted on the strength of that certificate, or do they undergo another medical examination when they report at the training centres?

Mr. THORSON: I do not think they do.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, they do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister should inform himself on that point.

Mr. THORSON: Once the men have been delivered to the training centre they come under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence and are no longer subject to the jurisdiction of the Department of National War Services. There has been a misunderstanding of the situation with regard to this military training.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before he leaves this question of the medical examination, would the minister take steps to inform himself not only with respect to the matter to which I alluded but also with regard to this situation? Young men go to their own family physicians and are reported unfit for service; is there any review of those cases?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have that made quite clear.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, those cases are also subject to review by medical examiners of the department in the various divisions, who check up the rejections.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know how many rejections have been checked during the year or so this plan has been in operation.

Mr. THORSON: I shall be glad to give full particulars in that regard.

I was dealing with the subject of the four months' training. The men are called up for this training under the provisions of a proclamation issued through my department. When they are delivered to the training centre they become subject to the Department of National Defence, which department has issued orders, which are now routine orders, holding these men in continuous service for the duration of the war. I am happy to say that the requisitions of the Department of National Defence have been filled by the Department of National War Services without any difficulties whatever. I should like to pay a tribute to the youth of Canada, to their parents and their friends, for the manner in which they have come forward, willingly and freely, for this compulsory military training—

Mr. HOMUTH: Have they any alternative?

Mr. THORSON:—as men who realize the vital and pressing need of preparing themselves for the defence of their country.

Mr. HOMUTH: Might I ask the minister if they have any alternative?

Mr. THORSON: Perhaps not, but I am commenting upon the splendid manner in which they have responded, and I should like to pay tribute to them. There have been very few delinquents indeed.

Mr. HOMUTH: Could the minister give us the number of delinquents?

Mr. THORSON: I think I can get that information for my hon. friend. The National War Services regulations contain special provisions that are designed to facilitate equitable conditions of mobilization. If the board is satisfied, for example, that the calling out of a man for military training will cause extreme hardship to his dependents, the board may postpone the training period of such man, provided that he applies for a postponement order in accordance with the regulations. Special consideration is also given, in accordance with the regulations, to employees of war industries and men engaged in seasonal occupations and in activities essential to the successful prosecution of the war. But I should remind hon. members that there are no exemptions, and that there are no indefinite postponements.

Mr. HOMUTH: I should like to correct the minister's statement. He has said that there are no exemptions, but he must admit that there are exemptions from military service for Doukhobors and Mennonites.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And conscientious objectors.

Mr. THORSON: There are some persons who are excepted from the application of the regulations, but they are very limited in number. Those persons are set out in section 6 of the regulations, and include judges, members of the clergy, members of the naval, military or air forces, and the like. But those are classes that are excepted from the application of the regulations. I repeat that in respect of those subject to the regulations there are no exemptions and no indefinite postponements.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister mind stating for how long the postponements are granted? For instance, what is the limit in respect of the postponement a young man operating a farm or business might receive?

Mr. THORSON: Usually postponements do not exceed six months at any one time.

Mr. CHURCH: The department ought to be abolished; it helps Hitler more than Canada.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

Wednesday, November 5, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS—COST OF LIVING BONUS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the cost of living bonus apply to the allowances paid to the dependents of members of Canada's armed forces?
2. If so, is it being paid in accordance with the index of the rise in the cost of living?
3. If it is not being paid in accordance with rise in the cost of living index, what provision is being made for these dependents to offset the increased costs of living?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. This matter is under consideration by the government.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF STEEL SCRAP

Mr. REID:

1. What amount of steel scrap has been exported from British Columbia since June 1, 1941, to the end of September of the same year?
2. What has been the importations of steel scrap in quantities and values into Canada during the past twelve months ending September 30, 1941?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Scrap iron or steel, 6,060 tons
2. Cast scrap, 43,392 tons—$908,933; wrought scrap, 267,675 tons—$4,306,836. Totals 311,067 tons—$5,215,769.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) to the fact that my question is this: "What amount of steel scrap has been exported from British Columbia since June 1, 1941, to the end of September of the same year." The answer places the amount of scrap iron or steel at 6,060 tons. My question is as to the amount of steel scrap. I am not interested in scrap iron.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not the answer to the question before me, but my recollection is that the question asked has also been answered in a return which I tabled. In any event I shall look into the matter, and, if necessary, answer to-morrow.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—VACUUM CLEANERS FOR FURNACES

Mr. HOMUTH:

1. How many vacuum cleaners for cleaning furnaces were requisitioned by the Department of National Defence for Air?
2. How many such vacuum cleaners were purchased?
3. To what air ports or training centres were they delivered?
4. From whom were they purchased?
5. What was the total cost of same?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

PRINTING AND ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What printing or advertising contracts were placed with firms in Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, London and Windsor, by the dominion government during the year ending March 31, 1941?
2. Were all of such contracts let by tender, and were the lowest tenders accepted in each case?
3. If not, what contracts were let without tender, what contracts, if any, were awarded to other than the lowest bidder, and for what reason in each case?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AS TO POSITION OF UNITED STATES LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked a question concerning the position in the United States of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement. Legislation to give effect to the agreement is included in an omnibus bill also covering certain other works, which is now before the rivers and harbours committee of the United States House of Representatives. This bill has not yet been reported to the House of Representatives, but it is expected that it will be reported shortly.

WAR MUNITIONS AND SUPPLIES

CREATION BY UNITED STATES AND CANADA OF JOINT DEFENCE PRODUCTION COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table of the house copies in English and French of a statement concerning an agreement recently reached between the President of the United States and myself to accept the recommendation of the joint economic committees of Canada and the United States that a joint defence production committee be established for the purpose of coordinating most effectively the activities of the two countries for the production of defence material. I might add that the establishment of this committee had been arranged before I visited Hyde Park, and is not in the nature of anything growing out of the meeting that took place there between the president and myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will that be published in the Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that might be done I should be pleased.

Yesterday the leader of the opposition also asked if the meeting between the president and myself was other than purely personal, as I had stated it to be. I would repeat what I have said already, that it was a purely personal week-end visit on the invitation of the president; but I would not like it to be assumed that the president and I had not discussed public matters. Certainly there was a very free exchange of both thought and information, and I cannot think of any subject we left untouched.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the commission appointed some time ago to investigate the Alaska highway has made a report; and, if so, will the report be laid upon the table this session?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I know there has been an interim report of some kind. But perhaps my hon. friend would let me give him a more complete reply to-morrow.

DIVORCE

JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE IN WHICH MARRIED WOMAN RESIDES—PUBLIC BILL No. 99

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I would call the attention of the government to public bills and orders appearing on the order paper, and particularly to a bill standing in my name as order No. 12. This bill has passed the senate and has had a first reading in this chamber. Would it not be possible to have second and third readings of the bill in the house, if not at this session, then when the house meets again pursuant to adjournment and before prorogation? If the house prorogues without finishing the business on the order paper, all that has been done before will be washed out and will have to be done again. The bill would have to have three readings in this house, three in the senate, and receive royal assent. It is all but through this house, and I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give me some indication as to what might be expected.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to do anything reasonable and possible for my hon. friend. He may have noticed however that the senate has adjourned until January 21, and I believe that we would be wise not to attempt to proceed with any bill at least until the present year is out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This bill is through the senate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There would have to be royal assent as well. And in addition to that my hon. friend will realize that if we granted him this special request we might be faced with many similar requests, and it would be embarrassing to have to refuse any of them.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I understand that. I would not press to have it dealt with now. But could there be some assurance that this bill, and others in the same position, might be dealt with before this session is ended—perhaps next January?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not like to give any assurance about next January.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Small hope.

THE WAR

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941—CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The house in committee of the whole, Mr. Bradette in the Chair.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment last night I was dealing with applications for postponement under the national war services regulations. The board deals with each individual case on its merits. I think I may say, however, that in each case it is actuated by the national interest and the national economy. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the new section 14, which replaces the former one. This section appears in the Canada Gazette of October 7. Subsection 1 sets out the general principles upon which the board acts in consideration of applications for postponement. It reads as follows:

(1) When considering any application made in accordance with section 10 hereof—

This is the section which deals with the making of applications.

—the board before which the application is made shall have power to grant an advancement or postponement order when it is of the opinion that it is in the national interest to do so and, in granting such order, the board shall state the reasons for such opinion. No postponement order may be made for more than six months but, upon reviewing the application, the board may grant one or more extensions; provided that the board may cancel the order at any time for military reasons or for cause. Provided further that there shall be no exemption and no indefinite postponement of military training or service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the change?

Mr. THORSON: It is a lengthy regulation, but I would be prepared to read it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not wish the minister to read it. I thought perhaps he would be so familiar with it that he could tell us in a word what the change is.

Mr. THORSON: The section in question makes it perfectly clear that in each case the board shall have sole disposition. The previous regulation contained a provision which placed certain responsibilities on the minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is the change not to the effect that it establishes these exemption boards?

Mr. THORSON: No; the boards were in existence before. But this removes from the power of the minister the indication of any particular kind of direction to the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It takes the pull off the minister.

Mr. THORSON: It does more than that, although it does that to some extent. It sets out the principles upon which the board shall be governed in each case of application for postponement.

Then, subsection 2 of the new section 14 is as follows:

(2) When considering an application for postponement order by a man engaged in farming, fishing, lumbering, trapping, mining, placer mining, gold prospecting, seafaring, railroad transportation, public utility, or engaged in an occupation which the minister has declared to be a seasonal occupation or one essential to the successful prosecution of the war or in the national interest, the board shall take into account the supply of labour available and the importance of the particular applicant's occupation to the national economy.

I am reasonably well satisfied that these national war services regulations as amended by order in council P.C. 7680 appearing in the Canada Gazette of October 7, 1941, will enable the divisional boards to reconcile the needs of the fighting services with those of war industry, farming and other essential occupations in the national interest. These postponement applications have imposed very heavy duties upon these boards. I should like to pay a tribute to the boards for the manner in which they have discharged their most difficult functions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the occasion for the amendment? Was a request received from the boards, or was there some loose position that needed to be tightened up?

Mr. THORSON: It was suggested from time to time that directions should be communicated to the boards with regard to certain classes of occupations. The purposes of the amendment will be perfectly apparent to any one who studies the former regulation and the present one side by side.

Perhaps the committee might be interested in knowing what has happened with regard to these postponement applications. It may be interesting to know that out of 19,186 applications for postponement received from farmers during the first nine military training periods, 10,046 were granted by the divisional boards, or 52·4 per cent. The total number of applications for postponement in connection with all seasonal occupations, war industries and others, amounted to 43,390, of which 28,812 were granted, or 66·4 per cent.

There are some aspects of the system that are not very satisfactory. The calling up of men for military training has revealed that the state of health of Canada's youth is much below what might properly be considered the standard of fitness for young men in a virile nation. Out of a total of 217,588 men examined up to October 2, 1941, only about 56 per cent were placed in category A, the only category that is accepted for training at the present time by the Department of National Defence. This is a serious situation, and the plans for the reconditioning of these men who have been rejected are under consideration by an interdepartmental committee consisting of representatives of the Department of National Defence, the Department of Pensions and National Health and the Department of National War Services. Naturally, we are interested in this situation, and if it is possible to recondition these men so that they may be made fit for service, every possible effort will be made in that direction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister indicate how the experience here compares with the draft situation in the United States?

Mr. THORSON: I am not able to make that comparison.

Mr. STIRLING: It is very similar.

Mr. THORSON: I would think that perhaps there would not be a great difference between the experience of the United States and that of Canada, but I have not the figures for the United States before me from which I could make an exact comparison.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A total of 900,000 men were rejected out of 2,000,000, and of those 200,000 are to be reconditioned immediately.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are any steps being taken to improve the health condition of those youths who are not yet eligible for the draft? The minister has said that those who have been rejected are to be reconditioned if possible in order that they may be accepted for service, and that seems a rather hit-or-miss policy to pursue. We should begin at the foundation; we should see that those who are coming up will have such a measure of health that they will be able to pass.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member has raised a serious question, but I think he will realize that I can hardly attempt to deal with such a matter during a discussion of the national war services regulations and their operations.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would think so.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member has brought up an important question which is worthy of the utmost consideration.

[Mr. Thorson.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I would think that the minister was speaking for the government, not just for his department.

Mr. THORSON: I am trying to outline the manner in which the national war services regulations have been working and the experiences which have resulted from their operations.

Mr. McGREGOR: Has the minister the figures for the different provinces?

Mr. THORSON: Those are all available, and if the hon. member is interested in those figures they will be available to him. I wonder if I might not proceed with the general discussion of the matter and then deal with the various questions that may arise later on. Hon. members will appreciate the fact that there are numerous regulations, that their aspects are manifold and that it would be difficult to cover the operations of my department in a general way unless I confine myself to the highlights, if indeed there are any.

The number of men called for military training under the regulations for the first three training periods of thirty days was 94,852; for the fourth to ninth periods under the four months system, 28,605, or a total of 123,457. The men who reported to training centres during the first three periods numbered 89,524; for the fourth to ninth periods, 24,000, making a total of 113,524. I was in error yesterday when I stated that I thought there was no subsequent medical examination. The fact is that there is an examination when the men report to the training centres.

The number of men rejected on medical grounds during the first three periods numbered 7,823; for the fourth to ninth periods, 2,177, or a total of 10,000. If we take the 1,102 men who reported late for training and who were accepted, and deduct the number rejected on medical grounds, we have a total of 104,626 men who were given training in the first nine training periods.

Mr. BROOKS: Is there not a duplication there? Some men reported for the thirty days and were afterwards called up for the four months.

Mr. THORSON: Not in this table. There are still a number of men who have done only thirty days training and who are being called up under the new proclamation.

Mr. BROOKS: They are being called up at present?

Mr. THORSON: Yes. There are, as members will realize, a great many other questions arising out of the regulations, but I think I may say this in a general way, that while there are difficulties to be ironed out, the national war services regulations have in the main worked out in a highly satisfactory manner.

I should like now to pass on to another function that is assigned to the mobilization division. That is the raising of women volunteers for service with the active forces. In addition to the calling out of men for compulsory military training, the mobilization division of the Department of National War Services is responsible for the recruiting of women volunteers for the Canadian Women's Army Corps and the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force. In view of the ever-increasing demands upon Canada's available man-power by the armed forces, war industries, agriculture and other essential occupations and services, the government announced on June 26, 1941, its formal decision to form women auxiliaries for the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force. These auxiliaries will permit the releasing of considerable numbers of men already in the service for combatant duty elsewhere. Several thousand women volunteers who will serve as full-time auxiliaries in the armed forces will be enlisted within the next year. From time to time the Department of National War Services is asked by one of the defence departments to find women volunteers who are qualified in accordance with the standards laid down by the armed forces. All these applications for enlistment are received into the Department of National War Services, where the applicant's qualifications are carefully assessed, candidates possessing the required qualifications are subsequently notified to report for medical examination and those who are physically fit are notified to report for enlistment.

Since the 1st of September of this year, when the first women's recruits were received, some 600 women have been enlisted in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Corps and the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force. As the facilities for the proper housing of the women personnel are carried to completion by the defence departments, larger numbers of women will be notified to report for enlistment. The response of the women of Canada to the appeal for volunteers has been magnificent. Up to the present time approximately 16,000 women have written to the department. They have been given the necessary information with regard to enlistment and have received the necessary application forms, and we have in the department over 5,000 applications from women who are being accepted for service later on. I should state that included in this number is a very considerable number of women from the United States who have indicated their desire to serve with their Canadian sisters in these auxiliary services. In order to build a large reserve of physically fit and qualified women volunteers, plans towards the intensification of recruiting are now being worked out. With the exception of a very few direct entry officers appointed by the armed forces concerned, all promotions to non-commissioned officer or officer rank will be made from the ranks by the defence department concerned.

I should like to pay tribute to the many women's volunteer organizations throughout Canada which have in a commendable and patriotic spirit trained women with a view to fitting them for more active participation in the war effort of this country. The women of Canada are playing an increasingly important part in the war effort. For the first time in the history of this country with the exception of the women in the nursing services, the women of Canada are taking their place side by side with the men. But this is not the full extent of the contribution which the women of Canada are making to our war effort. By the thousands Canadian women are working in armament and munitions plants and in first-aid classes and are contributing in innumerable other ways to the cause of victory.

There is one other function of the mobilization division to which I should like to make passing reference. The prisoners of war information bureau of the Department of National War Services gives information to next of kin concerning Canadian sailors, soldiers and airmen who have fallen into the hands of the enemy, Canadian merchant seamen who have been taken prisoner of war and Canadian citizens who are interned in enemy or enemy occupied countries. After it has been definitely ascertained that a Canadian has become a prisoner of war and the next of kin has been notified by the service to which he belongs or, in the case of a merchant seaman, by the ship on which he was employed, the case is turned over to the prisoners of war information bureau. It is the duty of this bureau to keep the next of kin advised on all matters pertaining to these prisoners of war and internees. Instructions covering all the regulations established under the international convention relative to prisoners of war are sent to the next of kin, and they are given information as to how to communicate with the prisoner, how to forward parcels and what such parcels may contain.

Recently the government asked the Department of National War Services to undertake an additional function. Canada will send to the aid of Britain Canadian fire fighters for service in Britain. In this way Canada will once again answer the call for assistance and will send civilian fire fighters to assist in the protection of the lives and property of those persons in Britain who are so barbarously being attacked from the air. The chief of the new unit which will consist in the first place of approximately 400 men has been appointed, Mr. D. A. Boulden, chief of the Winnipeg fire department. The work of organizing the corps is progressing, and it is hoped that this corps may be in a position to render assistance to Great Britain in a very short period of time.

If I may now pass from this division to that of the division of public information, I should like to say a few words with regard to this important function which has been assigned to my department. I can say this with regard to the bureau of public information, that with the exception of the stage, it now operates in every known field for the distribution of news and informative material on the Canadian war effort and has done so since the start of the fiscal year. I do not intend to detain the committee with a great volume of statistical matter with regard to the number of releases, the number of items of literature that are put out by the bureau; but I should like to say just a few words with regard to the manner in which the bureau functions and the activities of the various branches of the bureau.

In addition to the material which the bureau produces itself, it also acts as a distribution centre for news material produced by the three departments of national defence, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the War-time Prices and Trade Board, and the Department of National War Services. The mailing list includes every daily and every important weekly newspaper in Canada, and, for public information material, that is material which is prepared by the bureau itself, about 400 daily and weekly newspapers in the United States. All of the United States newspapers to which I have referred have especially requested this material.

The French branch does not concern itself with any activities in the United States, but otherwise it operates in the same way as the English one.

One of the important activities of the bureau lies in the photographic field. The bureau maintains its own photograph branch with two staff photographers. It also acts as a distributing organization for the air force, the army and the navy; but, as their photographic services have not been particularly active in the period under review, that is since the end of the last fiscal year, about 90 per cent of the work is initiated and carried out by the bureau of public information. It sends these photographic prints to Canadian papers and Canadian syndicates, to United States papers and United States syndicates, to other parts of the empire, to publications other than newspapers and syndicates, and sends a considerable number for window and other display services. In the period that I have mentioned there was a total distribution of photographic prints of over 45,000.

In addition to the photographic prints, the photographic branch also looks after the production and distribution of mats which are sent to the daily and weekly newspapers. An exclusive service is provided for the weekly newspapers, this being the first time that the weekly newspapers of Canada have been so treated, and the weekly newspapers have on many occasions expressed their appreciation of the service thus rendered.

Since August of this year a weekly mat service has been distributed in the United States. This service is sent only to those newspapers which ask for it; and the total has now reached over 2,000 small weeklies and large dailies per week.

The bureau of public information also operates in the motion-picture field, and I shall have much pleasure later on in the course of my remarks to say something about the magnificent performance of the national film board and the relationship between the national film board and the bureau of information.

The bureau of information also operates in the closest cooperation with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The public information Sunday night programme, "Carry On, Canada!" is now in the twentieth consecutive month of its career, and recent surveys have indicated that it still holds, if not the top-ranking position, very close to the top-ranking position among all commercial or non-commercial radio features originating in Canada. The bureau works in the closest possible manner with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the production of this feature, providing many of the ideas and much of the basic material, and steps are now under way for the further strengthening and improvement of that feature.

In April, the radio feature "Canadians All" was still on the air, and continued until the middle of May, attracting a wide audience and much favourable comment.

A French section is on the air with the radio feature "l'Histoire en Marche", which is a sort of French version of "Carry On, Canada!" It also has several features in the process of organization.

Then I should like to say a few words about the library which exists in the bureau of information. I think I may safely say that the bureau of public information maintains what is undoubtedly the best war library in Canada based upon topical information. Most of the material is secured from newspapers and magazines, although a number of important books on war subjects are also on its shelves. A small staff of readers scans fifty Canadian fifteen United States and seven British daily newspapers a week, and 123 Canadian and ten United States weekly papers a week. They mark material which they consider of interest, and these items are then clipped. The approximate number of clippings filed each month is over 3,000. These are filed by fully qualified librarians in accordance with library procedure and are instantly available on very short demand. Approximately 260 periodicals, weekly, monthly and quarterly, are read and indexed each month. The value of the library branch of the bureau of public information is becoming more and more widely known, and no day passes without its visitors and frequent requests for data.

In addition to the members of the bureau, who, of course, make an extensive use of the library, members of parliament are using it; so are the high commissioners with offices in Canada, Washington and London; consulates in Canada; libraries and universities in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States; schools and study groups; news writers and editors. The library can, I am sure, be of very great service to anyone who wishes to obtain material on any subject affecting the war, because, in addition to the factual material which is on the files, the library is also in the possession of regular source material on almost any subject related to the war.

I am happy to be able to say that there is the utmost cooperation between the bureau of public information and other publicity branches of the various departments which have such publicity branches. Members of the bureau attend all meetings of the recruiting committee of the Department of National Defence, and I think I may say that they have contributed valuable service to that committee, not only in an advisory capacity but also in the actual carrying out of some of the activities. Similar assistance is also being rendered to the other war departments of the government. The office has cooperated in the closest possible manner with the Department of National Defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply in respect of various activities of those departments.

When I took over the functions which have now been assigned to me, I saw the terms in the statute relating to the coordination of the existing public information services of the government. I also had before me the experience of other ministries of information in attempting to bring together into one department the publicity branches of all other departments. There had already been set up in many of the departments of the government publicity branches that were doing most excellent work, and I came to the conclusion that it would be both unwise and undesirable to attempt to bring all the publicity branches of all the departments into one department under one head.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the bureau of public information attempting to edit any of the material that comes from these other publicity sources, or does it pass out such material irrespective?

Mr. THORSON: In respect of its functions as a distributor for the departments of national defence, of munitions and supply, and the other departments I mentioned a moment ago, it acts only as a distribution agency and does not in any way reedit the news releases that come from the departments. Instead of seeking, therefore, to bring all the publicity branches of all departments of the government into one department, we set upon a different course—that of establishing an interdepartmental committee composed of representatives of the various publicity branches of all the departments of government. The chairman of this interdepartmental committee is one of my deputy ministers, Hon. T. C. Davis. Included in this committee, in addition to the representatives of the bureau of public information, are representatives of the three branches of national defence, of the Department of Munitions and Supply, of the Department of Labour, of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, of the Bank of Canada, of the Foreign Exchange Control Board, of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, of the National Film Board and of the Department of External Affairs. Other departments are invited to send representatives to this committee whenever subjects of interest to their own departments are to be discussed. The committee sits once a week for the purpose of determining how best the various publicity branches of all the departments of the government may cooperate to the one end, namely, the furtherance of the war effort of Canada and the accomplishment of the objective of this department, that is to say, to bring the people of Canada and the war effort of the nation as close to one another as possible.

I believe in this cooperative attitude to the various publicity branches of the departments of the government, rather than in the coordinating attitude, if one means by that the attempt to bring all the publicity branches of the government into one channel. Indeed, I am of the opinion that it would be wise and in the public interest that in every department of the government which has any great impact upon the public there should be a publicity or public relations branch. The need for proper public relations between the departments of the government and the people, is, I think, of paramount importance; indeed, I believe that a proper sense of public relationship is an essential element of democratic government.

Our literature distribution is based upon actual demand from the public; that is to say, we do not send out large quantities of unsolicited printed matter. Roughly speaking it can be said, that all literature sent out by our office is sent because it is asked for. During the past six months, from May 1 to October 31, we have distributed a total of over 13,000,000 pieces of printed matter, not including posters. This total is broken down into English 8,537,845, French 3,835,576, and bilingual 649,728.

I should like to call attention particularly to a leaflet that has been produced by the bureau of public information, entitled Canada's War Record. This is a leaflet with which all hon. members are familiar. It is full of facts about Canada's participation in the war. It was designed primarily for presentation to persons crossing the United States boundary, to enable southbound Canadians to talk intelligently to their friends in that country about the war effort of Canada, and to inform northbound travellers about our war effort when such travellers enter Canada. This leaflet is revised and re-issued each month. In June our first experimental printing of it totalled 100,000 copies. Since then there has been an ever-increasing demand for this particular publication, and in October it was necessary for us to print 550,000. It appears likely that in a few months we shall be obliged to print about 1,000,000 copies per month to meet the demand that has arisen.

I may say in passing that the British ministry of information are interested in the distribution through south and central America of several million copies of the leaflet, printed in Spanish. I cannot give an exact statement as to how many copies of the leaflet are being distributed throughout the United States, but I think I may safely say that over a quarter of a million are being circulated there per month at the present time.

I might say more about one other activity of the bureau of public information, namely, that which has to do with the publication of posters. We are making very considerable progress in that regard. While there has been a great deal of progress in the activities of the bureau of public information, I for one am not entirely satisfied that we have gone as far as it is possible to go. In the field of public information it is rarely possible, if indeed it ever is, to go as far as it is desirable to go. However, we have in mind the establishment of other branches of the bureau, one of which will deal with the people of Canada who speak languages other than English or French. We have in mind also the establishment of a speakers' branch of the bureau of public information.

The subject of the activities of the bureau or of the government in the matter of public information in the United States has received a great deal of attention from the administration, but I cannot add to what the Prime Minister has said, that the method of giving additional information to the United States with regard to the war effort of Canada is under careful consideration. In respect of the activities of the bureau of public information, I should like to pay a tribute to Mr. Lash and to his associates for their devotion to duty, their unremitting efforts, and their very considerable success in the promotion of public information.

I said yesterday that the object of the bureau of information was to bring the war effort of Canada as close to the people, and the people as close to the war effort, as possible. I realize the difficulties involved. I realize, too, that ministries of information have exceedingly difficult tasks imposed upon them. I have admitted that I am not fully satisfied with the steps that have been taken; but I can say that a great deal of progress has been made and I am confident that a great deal more progress can and will be made. In the bureau we now have a staff of able men and women, for whose efforts I am very grateful. I can further say, in a general way, that while the task in connection with public information is a difficult one, it is likewise an interesting one. There is a challenge in the difficulty itself. I have not in the past shrunk from challenges when my heart was in a cause. My heart is in this cause, and I shall not shrink from the challenge that presents itself in this particular field.

Now I shall deal somewhat briefly with other functions related to the matter of public information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves this topic, surely he intends to deal with the startling statement of the director which I read into the record yesterday. I want an answer to that challenge; I want to know how this department is "entoiled in the meshes of the red tape of an archaic system of government." There is a challenge to the minister which he must meet, and not with platitudes.

Mr. THORSON: It might also be well if the leader of the opposition would quote the whole of the statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had not seen the whole statement up to the time of preparing my address.

Mr. THORSON: This is what Mr. Lash said:

I could talk to you about the work of my office, but to me that is a somewhat difficult subject. Public information has done some useful things but, like a number of other war departments, it is so entoiled in the meshes of the red tape of an archaic system of government that the things it has been able to do are not, in the opinion of those of us who work there, as important as the things it might have been doing, and which—

This is what the leader of the opposition did not mention:

—we hope we still may be able to do.

This is simply the statement of a man who has come into the public service, expressing some irritation over some of the necessary, essential controls. If the whole speech is read in its totality, it is simply the expression of a man who is intensely keen to do everything possible and who realizes the impossibility of doing everything at once. For instance, he finds himself confronted with the necessity of building up a staff, which perhaps he cannot build up as quickly as personally he would like to do; yet he has the hope that the job may be done, and the determination that the job will be done.

Since its inception the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has carried on an important activity. When I assumed supervision over the broadcasting aspects of the corporation I attempted to enunciate certain general and fundamental principles; and I pledged myself then, as I do now, to the maintenance of the integrity of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as an independent corporation and a great national instrument. I hope to defend it to the utmost of my ability against its enemies, if it has any. In its programme department the broadcasting corporation has continued to seek an expansion of war effort features, on the one hand commentaries and special broadcasts, and on the other hand the development of new entertainment ideas. As an example of growing interest I may mention the fact that following the end of the first series of "We Have Been There" talks, which featured personal impressions given by competent observers fresh from visits to the United Kingdom, nearly fifteen thousand paid requests for copies of the talks were received at the offices of the corporation. Notwithstanding the fact that these programmes were carried only in Canada, requests for copies of this booklet also were received from most of the states of the union. This fact alone, without taking into consideration the programmes carried on behalf of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the various United States networks, is evidence that the story of Canada's war effort is reaching at least a part of the population to the south of us.

I should point out that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does not function as a news-gathering agency. It is not responsible for the gathering of news; it relies upon authorized news agency dispatches for the preparation of the bulletins.

In the United Kingdom the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's overseas unit, which now has a staff of six, plays an ever-increasing part in maintaining the link between Canadians at home and overseas. A steady weekly flow of programmes is transmitted between Canada and the old country through the medium of short wave relay and recordings. Regular news bulletins, news features and important declarations are transmitted from Great Britain, recorded and distributed by the broadcasting corporation's receiving station near Ottawa, and then broadcast over a nation-wide network, as well as over some stations in the United States.

Contemplated Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programmes include a series entitled "Brothers in Arms," which will tell the stories of nationals of occupied countries who have fought their way out from under the nazi yoke to arrive in Canada and train with the armies of freedom.

Generally I may say that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation plays an increasingly important part in furthering the war effort of the country, and plans are under way for further cooperation between the broadcasting corporation and the bureau of public information.

Now I should like to say something about the national film board, and I speak of the activities of this board with great joy and pride. The activities of the board are now spreading over almost all the world that is not under nazi domination.

Perhaps the outstanding work that the board is doing in the production of films is being done for the director of public information, under the now well-known film series called

"Canada Carries On." These films which deal with the broader aspects of Canada's war activity come out once a month. They circulate in French and English versions to about nine hundred theatres in this country. The Canadian audience for each film is estimated at approximately 2,500,000 people. I believe I may quite properly say of the "Canada Carries On" films that they are noted for their dramatic quality not only in Canada but in the wider film industry outside Canada. Arrangements have recently been completed which will ensure their theatre circulation in most of the countries of the world free from nazi domination.

May I give a brief indication of the manner in which the distribution of these films has proceeded. I have told the committee that the films appear in approximately nine hundred theatres in Canada. They are contracted for by the theatres, which are indeed glad to have them, by reason of their quality. Lavender prints from which new negatives and other prints may be taken are sent to the news reels in New York, the Twentieth Century Fox in Australia, the Ministry of Information in the United Kingdom and the High Commissioner for Canada in the Union of South Africa.

The "Canada Carries On" series is distributed in Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands East Indies, and the Straits Settlements through the Twentieth Century Fox Film Corporation. They also go to Thailand and India. Some seven hundred to eight hundred theatres exhibit these films in Australia and New Zealand. Figures for the other areas in Australasia are not available at the moment, but a recent report indicates that between forty and fifty theatres exhibit these films in Thailand.

The High Commissioner for Canada in the Union of South Africa has arranged for theatrical distribution of the films in the "Canada Carries On" series through Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Twentieth Century Fox and The American Consolidated Theatres. These comprise all the major theatres in south Africa.

In the British West Indies, Columbia Pictures of New York distribute the "Canada Carries On" series commercially throughout the theatres of the British West Indies.

In the United Kingdom the "Canada Carries On" series was first distributed through Paramount Pictures. It reached several hundred theatres. Distribution of national film board war productions in the United Kingdom is now in the hands of the British Ministry of Information, and we have not received complete reports from them. The government film commissioner has lately arranged for the United Artists to distribute one of the recent films, "The Battle of Oil," in the United Kingdom.

In the United States the national film board has not undertaken extensive commercial distribution, but several issues of the "Canada Carries On" series have been widely shown in news-reel theatres from coast to coast in such cities as New York, Cleveland, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles and other places.

I believe I can say generally that the distribution of this series is proceeding in a satisfactory manner in many parts of the world. These films have ranged in subject matter from descriptions of life in the Canadian forces, such as the pictures, "Heroes of the Atlantic" and "Soldiers All" to descriptions of Ottawa office workers and Winnipeg volunteer women's services, and the vital war contribution of Canada's miners, as in the pictures "A Tale of Two Cities" and "The Strategy of Metals." They have ranged from an account of Canada's religious and racial tolerance, in the picture "Peoples of Canada," to the strategy of the battle of Britain, the war work of the scientists, and the significance of the world's struggle for oil. "Churchill's Island," for example, "The Battle of Britain" and "The Battle for Oil" are illustrative of what I have said.

Perhaps the most remarkable film picture ever taken is that of "Churchill's Island", for it actually depicts German gunners firing their guns, and shows German airmen taking off. These pictures were actually taken by Germans themselves, then captured and incorporated in the thrilling picture known as "Churchill's Island".

I believe Canada is very fortunate in having as commissioner of the national film board a man of such genius in the film field as Mr. John Grierson. In addition to its activities in this field the board carries on other activities for many other departments of government. They have produced numerous films, trailers and the like in support of the campaigns for recruits, war loans, war savings, salvage, oil conservation, and even the cheerful payment of income tax.

The board is also active in the promotion of tourist activity.

It has been an important part of our work in the board to command large theatre audiences for films which describe the Canadian war effort, and stimulate civic cooperation. The national film board, however, regards it as equally important to bring this film service to the rural communities of Canada, so many of which are out of touch with the theatres. Working in cooperation with the departments of education of the provinces, the national film society, and various groups within the film industry itself, the non-theatrical circulation of the national film board productions has been greatly extended, and we now have repositories of our government motion-picture films in all parts of the country, so that they are easily available to educational, civic, agricultural and other interested groups. It has been a special satisfaction to me to note that our films have been particularly useful in the teaching of citizenship in both schools and training camps.

I wish the time at my disposal permitted a wider treatment of this extremely interesting activity which has been placed in my charge, but I should like to say that it is the policy of the board to make all its films in both French and English versions. In certain cases, however, films are produced in French alone, on account of the specialized interest of the theme. For example, owing to the lack of French news reels we issue monthly a news reel produced under the title of "Les Actualités Canadiennes". This, however, does not exhaust the various linguistic responsibilities of the board. For our south American circulation we are obliged to make Spanish and Portuguese versions; for south Africa we have undertaken to make an Afrikaans version, and in the circulation afforded to some of our films through the British Ministry of Information we are involved in other languages still.

I hesitate to interject a personal note, but it was my great pleasure to speak the commentary in Icelandic for one of the films produced by the Canadian National Film Board and subsequently sent by the government of Canada to the government of Iceland. This film was entitled "Iceland on the Prairies". We are gradually getting together many films of the same kind depicting the life of various racial groups which recognize this country as their own. My work as chairman of the national film board has brought me into a new and unaccustomed field, but I must confess that it has had special forms of attraction. I am satisfied with the progress that has been made and am proud of the fact that we have such an organization in existence in this country at this time.

I am speaking at greater length than I thought I would, but I should like to say a few words about another division of my department, the one having to do with war charities. This division exercises important functions in respect of the supervision of war charities. These war charities occupy an important part in the war effort of this country because they afford an outlet to thousands of men and women in Canada who are anxious to make some contribution to the war effort of this country. Early in the activities in this department the administration of the War Charities Act was assigned to this department. The department seeks to exercise the greatest possible care so that only bona fide funds may be registered. All war charities must be registered. We seek also to avoid any attempt at commercialization of war charities and to coordinate the various activities of the many war charities that now exist in this country.

The object of the War Charities Act is to provide a measure of control and regulation over the voluntary efforts of organizations throughout Canada who may desire to raise funds for war charitable purposes. A war charity fund is defined in the act as "any fund having for its objects or among its objects any purpose, charitable or otherwise, arising out of or connected with the war". Under the act any organization which makes an appeal to the public for donations or subscriptions in money or in kind for any war charity fund or which attempts to do so by sponsoring a bazaar or any other form of entertainment for that purpose must be registered.

Since the act was assented to on September 13, 1939, and up to October 29, 1941, a total of 1,312 central funds have been registered. In addition, 821 branch funds have been registered under certain central funds, which makes a grand total of 2,133 war charities funds registered in this manner. During this period the registrations of some 15 funds were cancelled by the administrator, while the cancellation of 49 registrations was requested by the funds themselves. The registrations of 31 central funds have been cancelled because they are now operating as branches of registered funds. This leaves a net total of 1,217 central funds, 852 branch funds, or a grand total of 2,069 war charities operating in Canada at the present time.

I cannot give an exact statement of the amounts of money that have been raised by these various war charities, but I can make an approximate statement. About $27,000,000 was reported from September, 1939, to March 31, 1941. Of course this includes the Canadian Red Cross Society appeal of 1940 and the Canadian war services fund drive of March, 1941. With regard to the subject of war charities generally, may I say that the department feels that the whole field of war charities has now been fairly well covered and that it should not be necessary for new organizations to be constantly brought into the field. I would suggest that a consolidation of effort rather than an expansion in the number of funds should be sought. The division of war charities will seek to carry this principle into effect and an effort will be made to prevent any rapid increase in the number of organizations to be registered under the act.

I would point out that under the provisions of the act it is necessary for all funds to furnish an audited financial statement of their receipts and expenditures as at March 31 of each year. This year financial statements will be required as at December 31.

In the course of the administration of the War Charities Act it has been found necessary to make an effort to ensure that a larger percentage of the money contributed by the people for war charities should actually reach the war charities and not be eaten up by organizational or other expenditures. Accordingly a new regulation, No. 15, was promulgated recently. This provides as follows:

No fund registered under the War Charities Act, 1939, shall undertake any special project such as a carnival, bazaar, show, exhibition or other entertainment unless the estimated cost of such special project shall not exceed 25 per cent of the anticipated gross proceeds, and registration shall not be granted to any fund which proposes to undertake any such special project except subject to the condition that the estimated cost of any such project shall not exceed 25 per cent of the anticipated gross proceeds.

The purpose of this regulation is to ensure that at least seventy-five per cent of all money contributed for war charities shall actually reach the war charities.

It has also been found that the bringing in of talent from outside Canada is a costly way of raising funds for war charities. Another regulation, No. 16, has, therefore, been enacted, providing as follows:

A registered fund which plans to engage the services of entertainment talent from outside Canada must first secure the permission of the minister.

These regulations were passed for the purpose of ensuring that the greatest portion of every dollar that the people of Canada contribute to war charities shall actually go to the war charities.

Another important function has been assigned to the war charities division. It is related to the one I have just discussed, but it is more closely concerned with the supervision of the great national organizations such as the great auxiliary war services organizations, the Canadian Red Cross Society, the Independent Order of the Daughters of the Empire, the Navy League of Canada, and other such national organizations.

All of these are war charities; to the department has been assigned the important function of exercising budgetary supervision in respect of the amounts for which they wish to make a national appeal. There are five of these national auxiliary war service organizations, having their sponsorship in such organizations as the Canadian Legion, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association. These national organizations are concerned with the supplying of auxiliary services to Canadian troops both at home and abroad. They operate in their activities under the direction of the director of auxiliary services in the defence department. Last spring all five of these national organizations came into one united joint drive for funds, together with the Independent Order of the Daughters of the Empire in respect of the branches of that order in the four western provinces. The objective which the joint drive had in mind was $5,500,000. The people of Canada contributed $7,000,000. Last year the Canadian Red Cross Society conducted a separate drive. Its objective was $5,000,000, and the Canadian public contributed $6,000,000.

Last year an effort was made to bring about a united drive in which the national auxiliary war service organizations and the Canadian Red Cross society should combine. The efforts that were made to bring about such a joint drive failed for a variety of reasons. I am very glad to be able to say that now, in the next national drive, the national auxiliary war services organizations that I have mentioned, and the Canadian Red Cross Society will join in one national appeal in the spring of 1942 at a date to be announced later. I am also glad to be able to say that the Navy League of Canada, which has been doing such excellent service in the interests of the men of the sea, will also join in this national drive. Other applications for leave to join in this drive are under consideration.

The government has been seeking to reduce the number of national appeals to the Canadian public for funds, and to coordinate and systematize these national drives. The general policy of the government is this, that the fall of the year should be reserved for drives of a peace-time nature, such as community chest drives and appeals of other public welfare organizations of a similar nature; for the government realizes the necessity of maintaining the ordinary everyday charitable activities of the communities of Canada. Then it is proposed that the spring shall be reserved for all the national war service organizations, including organizations which supply auxiliary services to our troops, the Canadian Red Cross society and other national organizations. This will leave the rest of the year clear for the necessary government financing by way of campaigns for war savings certificates and war loans.

Next year, in the spring, the joint drive of which I have been speaking will probably make an appeal to the Canadian public for a large sum of money, from seventeen to twenty million dollars. It is therefore essential that there should be as close a supervision as possible over the budgets of these organizations, for the sum of money which I have indicated is a very large one. But just as no appeal which has ever been made to the Canadian public has failed, so I am confident that the Canadian people will respond to this appeal that will be made to them in the spring in order that the magnificent services performed by these organizations may be carried on with full success.

In December of last year, under order in council P.C. 7273, dated December 11, 1940, an advisory board was established by the Department of National War Services entitled the National War Charities Funds Advisory board, under the chairmanship of Mr. C. L. Burton. This board deals in the first instance with all applications for leave to conduct a national drive. The board functions only in an advisory capacity. It is through the operations of this advisory board that the principles of budgetary control and supervision of expenditures are applied. All the funds that are contributed by the public of Canada in respect of the national auxiliary service organizations go into the custody of one central organization called the Canadian War Services Fund Incorporated. No moneys are paid out of this fund except on the direction of the minister. The minister acts on the recommendation, if he approves it, of the advisory board of which I have spoken.

I have attempted to stress again and again the importance of the strictest budgetary supervision and the strictest control of expenditures. It is not the wish of this department to curtail activities. We do not exercise budgetary control or supervision of expenditures with a view to curtailing services —not at all. We know that the public contributes all of this necessary money and that if it is not obtained from the public the services cannot be performed at all. Therefore I like to think of this exercise of budgetary supervision and control of expenditures as being in aid of the objectives of these organizations and helpful to them. The public is entitled to know when an appeal is made to it for funds that there has been a strict scrutiny of the budgets, that the objectives are worth while, and that there will be the most careful check on expenditures. I have indicated to the committee the manner in which we are trying to give that assurance to the public. All the funds contributed by the public go into the fund. They are paid out only on the direction of the minister, and the minister has the benefit of the advice of the advisory board which I have mentioned, and that advisory board exercises careful budgetary supervision over the budgets presented by the various organizations before they go into the drive. The objective of the drive is fixed after the budgets have been carefully supervised in this manner. Then the expenditures are made only in the manner that I have indicated. If the public contributes more than the objective of the drive, as was the case on the occasion of the last drive, then the various organizations who participate in the drive submit supplementary budgets to the advisory board; these supplementary budgets are checked with care and recommendations made to the minister to write to the central fund advising that moneys may be released from the fund.

Speaking generally with regard to the organization of war charities, while a good deal remains to be done in the matter of coordination of war charities, I may fairly report that satisfactory progress has been made.

With regard to one other division of my department, the division of women's voluntary services, I stated yesterday that I was very happy indeed to be able to announce the creation of this new division. I was glad to be able to announce it by reason of the increasing participation of the women of Canada in the war effort of our country. I have indicated to the committee the splendid manner in which the women of Canada have volunteered for active service in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Corps and in the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force side by side with their brothers in arms. I have indicated also the magnificent contribution that is being made in everincreasing degree by the women of Canada in the war factories, the munitions plants, and the war industries of Canada generally. But the women who serve in the armed forces and who work by the thousands in munitions plants and war factories are not the only women who are doing war service in Canada. The women who keep the heart of the nation sound by doing their daily tasks in the homes and in the communities are doing war service of the highest possible order. It is essential in time of war, even more so than in peace time, that the life of the community should be maintained, that the aged and the needy should be assisted, that the dependents of our fighting men should be comforted in time of need and that the men themselves should be encouraged and remembered. It also is essential that the great national war auxiliary services organization, and such great national organizations as the Canadian Red Cross society and other war charities, should be fully supported. The women can organize in a variety of ways; two plans were at first suggested to me: one, that representatives of the great women's organizations of Canada should be asked to assemble in Canada in a conference with a view to building a great women's organization for coordination purposes. That plan was discarded. The great national women's organizations of Canada are doing excellent service in their own respective fields. Another plan is being adopted in the place of the one that I have mentioned. It is in the communities of Canada that the women of Canada will be doing their work. We have therefore felt that we should take steps to promote the organization by the women themselves of women's organizations on the basis of what I shall call community solidarity. The women in their own communities can organize and coordinate their activities on the basis of this community solidarity. They can form pools of volunteer workers in their own communities for all of the purposes of the communities and for the purposes of the nation as well. In that way, I suggest, they can best mobilize their efforts in the maintenance of the morale of our country; for I feel this, that if the needs of the community are met as only the womenfolk can meet them, the heart of the nation will be kept sound. Many of these tasks performed by the women of Canada are dull and prosaic. There is not a vestige of glamour attached to them, and no publicity. Yet they are necessary tasks in time of peace; they are vital when the nation is at war. Our women in this respect are the guardians of the morale of the nation. It is my hope that this new division will be of considerable assistance in that regard.

I shall deal only very briefly with the remaining division which has been assigned to my department—the salvage division. The origin of this division lay in the fact that there was a large salvage movement in Great Britain and in other parts of the commonwealth, and also in the fact that hundreds of Canadians were writing to the various departments of the government suggesting that much might be done to assist the war effort by the collection of salvage. With that in mind, the officials in the Department of National War Services suggested a salvage campaign. While at that time there did not appear to be any great apparent shortage of material, the first thought of the campaign was to further the spirit of thrift in the minds of our people and provide an outlet for the patriotic desire of many people to assist in the war effort. It was also anticipated that, as the war industries increased their demands, there would be an evergrowing demand for raw materials, making the collection of salvage absolutely necessary. As a result of the interest and cooperation of the members of the house and officers of public and service organizations, the division has succeeded in moulding public interest in the salvage campaign to such an extent that the division is now in communication with 2,227 voluntary salvage corps. The main object of the campaign was to promote salvage through the organization of voluntary salvage corps operating in the various communities. The salvage division of my department is in constant communication with these organizations, seeking to advise them as to the types of material for which there is a demand, the methods of collection, and available markets. Where it is necessary, these salvage organizations are required to register under the War Charities Act.

There has been a great deal of activity and interest in the salvage campaign, and questions have been raised as to the success of it. May I say in a general way that in some localities the campaign has been an outstanding success; in other localities the success has been only moderate, while in still others there has been very little success. There have been many difficulties in the way, difficulties arising out of the collection and disposition of the salvage, difficulties of freight and transportation. The division has been operating under a comparatively small staff, but it has been felt that its activities should now be increased, for it is now evident that the collection of salvage is increasingly necessary. Consumer and material controllers of the Department of Munitions and Supply and the material administrators under the war-time prices and trade board have indicated to my department the urgent necessity of procuring increasing quantities of various classes of material, and have requested us to intensify the campaign for its collection.

The division is now working in close cooperation with the controllers of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the material administrators of the war-time prices and trade board, the department of Trade and Commerce, the export licence control board and the foreign exchange control board. In order to regulate the distribution of steel, iron and other metals, bones and paper, products of essential war industries, these materials are now placed under export control, and the salvage office is required to advise the controllers as to quantities of material made available by voluntary salvage organizations, and the quantities available in industry. For the purpose of stimulating interest in the salvage campaign, and in order to meet the views of those who are concerned with the salvage, collection and disposal of secondary raw materials, and to ensure that this shall be done as efficiently as possible, authority has recently been granted for the appointment of field organizers and inspectors. It will be the duty of these officers to promote the organization of new voluntary salvage corps where they do not exist, and to stimulate the activities of those that are at present operating; also to bring about the utmost cooperation between persons gathering salvage, those collecting it and bringing it to central stations, and those disposing of it, so that the activity may be as useful as possible.

I hope that many of the difficulties which we have found in the course of launching this campaign will be overcome. I do not know that the committee will be interested at this stage in the results, but I might observe that through two hundred salvage organizations the salvage collected and disposed of represented a total value of $254,982, or an average of $1,270 each. This money is used as a direct contribution to war charities of one kind and another.

During September of this year the department inaugurated a special drive for aluminum, which was sponsored by the Canadian Red Cross society, and although full reports are not yet available, information to hand would indicate that this drive will result in the Red Cross receiving approximately $75,000. The facts, however, with regard to this phase of the department will be available very shortly.

I shall say only a few words with regard to the Canadian travel bureau. The importance of the Canadian travel bureau lies in the fact that through the coming of tourists from the United States to Canada we are able to obtain essential United States exchange, which we must use to such a great extent in the financing of our purchases in connection with our war effort in that country. Since the outbreak of war, the development of Canada's travel industry has assumed a much greater importance to the successful operation of our war-time economy. The building up of United States exchange within our country has enabled increased purchases to be made of vital war supplies from the United States, and that has naturally been one of the major efforts of the government. The flow of tourist travel to Canada is now one of the chief factors in acquiring and conserving much-needed United States dollars.

In this connection it has been the policy of the bureau to seek to increase this flow by expanding and developing a promotional campaign for tourist traffic from the United States. The war has brought its difficulties. It has caused a change in the travel habits of people of the United States, just as it has done in the habits of the Canadian people. The foreign exchange control board, keenly desirous of holding our exchange position to the best possible advantage, found it absolutely essential to prohibit Canadian pleasure travel in the United States. This regulation, essential as it was in the interests of the general economy of Canada, created some feeling in the United States, particularly in those parts that border on Canada. The regulation was misinterpreted and rumours were current, not perhaps so much this year as the year before, that United States citizens bringing money into Canada could not take any of it out. There were other activities of an adverse nature in the United States. In June of this year the necessary gasoline regulations were put into effect and these also caused considerable difficulty.

By and large, however, there has been a great improvement in the tourist industry in Canada this year. Despite the unusual problems that have confronted the travel industry of Canada, to which I have made reference, I think hon. members will be interested to learn that up to the end of September of this year our tourist traffic had increased and expanded in all parts of the dominion. Until June of this year the tourist figures were running behind those of a year ago; but in July this traffic showed a substantial increase. Up to the end of September 3,122,683 automobiles had crossed into Canada from the United States. In the month of July Canada had 2,585,041 tourist visitors; in August, 2,741,112 and in September, 1,304,467. In other words up to the end of September Canada had welcomed 11,492,811 tourist visitors, an increase of 286,825 tourists over the corresponding period in 1940. While these figures are encouraging I am free to state that I am not entirely satisfied with the Canadian travel bureau. A careful study is being made of the whole subject, and every effort will be made to bring about the improvements which I think are desirable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall conclude an address which I find has become altogether too long, in spite of the fact that I have tried to compress it as much as possible while still endeavouring to give the house some outline of the activities of my department. I should like to say how deeply I have appreciated the loyal support I have received from my two distinguished deputy ministers, Major-General LaFleche and Hon. T. C. Davis, as well as from every member of the staff of my department. I should like also to express my appreciation of the kindness of hon. members on both sides of the house since the Prime Minister honoured me with this appointment, for which I thank him deeply. This support and this kindness have made my task very much easier than it would otherwise have been.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I dislike to begin with an apology, but hon. members will understand that I have not had a great deal of opportunity to get together, at least in condensed form, the information which the committee might desire from me. Neither have I had an opportunity to consult my colleagues with regard to the matters which were discussed overseas. I am afraid the presentation I am about to make may be somewhat disjointed, but I shall endeavour to do my best to give information in which hon. gentlemen may be interested and, according to the arrangement made, to answer questions when the time comes to deal with the various subjects which will be brought up during the course of the statement.

May I say a word with regard to the army programme for 1941-42 which the Prime Minister and I announced early in the year. The highlights of that programme were the sending overseas during this year of a large number of corps troops and reinforcements; the sending overseas of an army tank brigade, which up to that time had not been even mobilized; the sending overseas of a third division, which had been mobilized and was in training, and the sending overseas of the armoured division, which at that time was mobilized but in a very preliminary stage of training. I am glad to say that, with the exception of the armoured division, that programme has been carried out. I obtained the figures just a short time ago, and I find that since March 11, when I last reported to the house, no less than 41,843 other ranks have gone overseas, together with 2,484 officers. So that at the present time we have overseas the first and second divisions; the third division, which went overseas in July; the army tank brigade, and thousands of corps troops and army troops, to which I want to refer with a little more particularity later on. We have in Canada the fifth armoured division, which according to the programme is to go overseas before very long. We also have in Canada the fourth division, which was mobilized at the time I last spoke; and since that time authority has been given for the mobilization of the three brigade groups of a sixth division. In addition to that we have authorized, just lately, the mobilization of another five companies of the forestry corps, so that the Canadian forestry corps will consist of twenty-five companies when this additional authorization goes overseas. Then we have the coast defence artillery, on both the east and west coasts, together with a number of battalions doing coast defence duty—that is to say, carrying out protective duties in cooperation with the artillery on both our coasts—and finally we have the troops in Newfoundland and the West Indies.

This sums up briefly the material side of the situation of the Canadian army at the present time. Apart from that there is the reserve army, which consists of something like 150,000 men just now.

Mr. MacNICOL: In Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, in Canada. That is the extent of the progress that has been made since I last reported to the house.

As part of the day's work, and not with any special errand in mind, I went overseas a few weeks ago together with the chief of the general staff, and Lieutenant-Colonel Currie, my executive assistant, and Lieutenant-Colonel Cameron, secretary to the chief of the general staff. If I were to outline the purposes of the visit I think I might say the first purpose was to see as much as I could of Canada's fighting forces in the old country; second, to consult with Lieutenant-General McNaughton and Major-General Montague regarding many matters of organization and administration, all of which took considerable time; third, to review with our officers and the war office the task of the army in the war and the part which the Canadian army could most usefully play; fourth, generally to be informed at first hand regarding conditions and developments, because as hon. members will understand, in making plans for the future with regard to Canada's contribution on sea, on land, in the air, and in the fields of munitions production and finance, it always helps to get as close to the situation as possible; fifth, and not least important, to repeat that rare experience, as I told the press in England, of meeting and talking with the citizens of the British Isles, those indomitable people who give to those of us from the western hemisphere who go there both an inspiration and a challenge by their courage and steadfastness.

I am not to-day going to go into the lengthy discussions which we held over there. It was a great satisfaction to see the Canadian troops. I spent four days with them. The first day was with the holding units, the second day with the third division, the third day with the second division and the fourth day with the first division. I am sorry to say, however, that I was not able to see a great many of the personnel of the first division. That was a gala day for the first division, in that Her Majesty the Queen graciously presented to the Saskatoon Light Infantry the colours of that battalion. A great day it was, indeed!

I am speaking at present to my hon. friends the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), and other colleagues who went with them, as well as some others who have been over there, and I know they will agree with me that all that has been said about Canadian troops is not too much. I speak with regard to their keenness, their alertness and their readiness to do whatever job may come their way, and as to their intentness not only in their training but also in those operational tasks they are carrying on. I saw them in a variety of activities, not only in training but in actual operational activities as well. My hon. friends know they are holding an important part of the line. At the time I visited one of the divisions, it had just taken over.

I saw ceremonial parades as well. I can say to the committee and to the people of the Dominion of Canada that the morale of the Canadian troops is good—and I say that without any reservation. I said that they are alert and that they are keen—and they are. They have good, Canadian common sense. They know that we cannot defend the citadel—and we have been calling England the citadel of freedom—without troops, and that, at the moment, their job is just where they are.

They were greatly bucked up, shall I say, by their participation in what has been called "bumper" exercise. Those were tremendous exercises in which troops of the United Kingdom, imperial troops, as well as Canadian troops, took part. It was an exercise which covered something like eight days in time. I am not sure whether or not it was in progress when my hon. friends were overseas. It was, however, a test of both the endurance of the men, the endurance of the vehicles and of equipment generally. There were many amusing stories—stories about generals who had been captured, and stories about platoons which had been cut off.

The chief lessons which were learned, and the outstanding points in connection with the exercises were perhaps three in number. The first was the usefulness of the communications with which the army is equipped. When one understands that communication has to be maintained between vehicles in columns miles and miles long on the tortuous roads in England, when orders are constantly being changed, and those changed orders have to be communicated to the driver of each vehicle, he realizes that it is a test of both the army communications themselves, and the men who operate them.

It was a tremendous satisfaction to the officers with whom I talked to feel that those communications had stood the test, and that the men had stood the test under what were at that time abnormal circumstances. I believe the men, as a matter of fact, bivouacked for the whole eight nights. They travelled about four hundred miles altogether. Changed orders came from time to time. The column which had started for a particular point early in the morning might receive at ten o'clock in the morning verbal orders—they had no written orders—calling on them to go to some other point. That information had to be communicated all the way down the column, which stretched for miles and miles. Then, probably in another hour a dispatch rider would rush up and deliver another verbal order indicating a change in destination to some other point. Those were two of the factors, namely communications, and the ability to find their way about. The Canadian battalion and Canadian units reached the places to which they were directed.

The third factor was the test with regard to the maintenance of vehicles. I was going to say something about this later, but I might as well mention it now. I do not know of any more important task in the modern army than the maintenance of vehicles. That was illustrated beyond doubt in those exercises. The men learned perhaps more than in any other way how important it was for the driver mechanic, night after night, to go through the routine with his vehicle, to go over the number of operations laid down in the book for him, in order that he might be sure his vehicle would start in operations next day. The vehicles stood the test remarkably well. I am not so sure that the tanks did as well as the transport vehicles. Nevertheless, all that experience was to the good. From the imperial officers in command I heard the most glowing references to the part which the Canadians played in the exercises.

I found this, that the men of the Canadian corps—and I am not speaking of the "bumper" exercise, and not simply of the officers—those in the line, which is only about forty miles away from the enemy, were each of them fully aware of what their job was, and how they were to do it. Seeing the dispositions, it appeared absolutely clear on the ground, that they were prepared for whatever might come and that each individual man would see to it that the fort was held.

Barbed wires and guns are not the whole thing in connection with the defence of the island. They do not by any means tell the whole story. Those men with strong bodies, clear heads and hearts of oak realize their responsibilities, and I have not any doubt that Hitler would get a warm reception, should he attempt the invasion which has been threatened for so long.

May I say also that although I did not see the actual unit, I did see the officers in charge of the tunnelers, who have made such a record for themselves at Gibraltar, and who are operating in England as well, particularly in connection with aerodromes and tank traps. They also operate in connection with certain public services, where they are doing an extremely fine and important job to provide power for one of the most important manufacturing projects operating in the United Kingdom.

That is just a general appraisal of the Canadian corps and Canadian troops, as I saw it. Something has been said—I do not think there has been very much lately—with regard to the task of the Canadian corps. As I said a moment ago, they have common sense. They realize what the situation is. They realize, too, that if Hitler had invaded England in September, 1940, as was expected, they would have been in the thick of it. They realize, too, that if, instead of going into Russia after the invasion of Crete, Hitler had come to England, they again would have been in the middle of it. They realize, too, that at the present time their job is to buttress the defences of the British isles, and at the same time to train, to work, to prepare and to be ready for any job of any kind, anywhere, any time, for which they may be needed. They know that their task is to see to it that the enemy's plans are frustrated, and that Hitler is driven back.

I do not think any finer tribute could be paid than that which was paid by Mr. Churchill at the dinner tendered to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) by the Lord Mayor of London. On that occasion Mr. Churchill said:

> You have seen your gallant Canadian corps and other troops who are here. We have felt very much for them that they have not yet had a chance of coming to close quarters with the enemy. It is not their fault; it is not our fault; but there they stand, and there they have stood through the whole of the critical period of the last fifteen months at the very point where they would be the first to be hurled into a counter-stroke against an invader.
> No greater service can be rendered to this country, no more important military duty can be performed by any troops in all the allies. It seems to me that although they may have felt envious that Australian, New Zealand and South African troops have been in action, the part they have played in bringing about the final result is second to none.
> The war effort of Canada during this war, happily, has not so far required effusion of blood upon a large scale. But that effort, in men, in ships, aircraft, air training, in finance, in food, constitutes an element in the resistance of the British empire without which that resistance could not be successfully maintained.

Perhaps I should have mentioned that the boys were bucked up particularly by the Spitsbergen operation. As you know that was an operation of about a week and it took place after intensive training at a special coastal training area where the men were instructed in invasion tactics and beach assault as a prelude to the expedition. The purpose of that expedition is given in a dispatch which was sent us. It was to destroy existing stocks of coal, to paralyze mining facilities, to destroy radio and meteorological stations, and to evacuate Russian and Norwegian miners. These tasks were all accomplished with a minimum of dislocation and in record time. Naturally the troops were envied by their comrades when they came back from this expedition to within 750 miles of the north pole. That is with regard to my visit to the troops.

I had a number of discussions with Captain Margesson, the Secretary of State for War, with Sir John Dill, the chief of the general staff, with General Brooke, commander in chief of the home forces, and I should have said with the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Churchill, with Lord Cranborne, with Lord Beaverbrook and with others who had the particular information which we desired to get. One of the things I wanted to ascertain was in regard to a matter mentioned yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson)—the views over there as to the role of the army in this war. There has been an idea that the army will play some sort of minor role, that this really is a navy and air force war. Let me say to you that from the views which were given to me it was made quite clear that the role of the army in this war is and will be no minor one. The navy and the air force have been and are bearing the shock and stress of battle, and words cannot adequately express the measure and the quality of their contribution. But there is no illusion that this war can be finished without an army to meet and, with the cooperation of ships and planes, eventually beat Hitler's land forces. The navy and the air force must keep the sea lanes open for men and supplies. They must slow up and retard invasion. The army must repel it. The navy and the air force must deal with the enemy by blockade and bombing. The army, supported by the other services, must eventually strike the decisive blow.

As in Jugoslavia, in Greece and in Crete, so to-day in Russia, it is Hitler's land forces whose clutches are reaching for Russia's throat. Hitler's drives have been to enslave people and to win territory, and the army, the land forces, have been his major instrument. France and Greece and Crete and Russia have all been overrun, and it is the army which must be called upon both for resistance and for effective counter-offensive when the time comes.

So that for a minute or two I want to speak of the activities of the army and with regard to recruiting for the army, to which the leader of the opposition referred yesterday. The army has a major role to perform, but in building up a Canadian army alongside the requirements of the navy and the heavy calls for the gigantic air training plan there was bound to be some difficulty. Owing to the pressing needs of the navy and air force the only restriction upon taking in man-power for these services has been the provision of physical equipment. Otherwise the sky has been the limit. We in Canada have put first things first, and no one questions the policy of giving the right of way to the requirements of the navy and air force. Those two services must build up quickly. The immediate necessities of both these services have made it impracticable for them to make any concessions to industry. That is to say, men have been taken on no matter what their trade and technical qualifications in civil life might be. This meant that the army and civilian needs divided up the remainder of the eligible men. The army has already made clear the policy which still prevails, that of giving leave to men who enlist if a board decides that they are for the time being essential to war industry.

Army enlistments called for in the recruiting campaign of last summer were forthcoming, and I think, and I said so at the time, that it represented a thumping answer by the young men of Canada to Hitler. The full returns showed over 34,000 enlisted and about 48,000 actually volunteered. This was in addition to the 15,500 who enlisted in the navy and air force. So that in all over 60,000 young men volunteered during that period to serve in the fighting forces of Canada. The house will recall that the campaign for the army was a special call, and, as I pointed out, it was only a chapter in the story. The steady month to month requirements had to be met right through to the end of the book.

Civilian committees helped tremendously, but not unnaturally when the objective was reached there was bound to be some let down in activity. The assumption was that if we could enlist men at the rate of 12,000 or more per month in the campaign, there ought to be no difficulty in enlisting 7,000 or 8,000 under the influence of the momentum which had been generated. But there was a definite falling off. As the figures show, in the last four months, since the campaign, we have asked for 37,000 odd, and something over 24,000 have actually enlisted.

I do not want to make any excuses, but there were at least three major factors which had an effect upon that effort. First, there was a further and unexpected expansion in the air training plan. This arose out of discussions in England by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). When he came home he found it necessary to indicate very definitely that there was a need for a further unlimited number of men in the air force. This need has been repeatedly emphasized, and an intensive and nation-wide effort has been made to recruit airmen. The result has been that since that call from the minister there have been no less than 35,000 enlistments in the air force.

Another factor was the rapid expansion in industry. I could not help thinking as I listened last evening to my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), tell of the peaks which were being reached in industrial production what an effect that must have had upon any campaign calling for men. The rapid expansion which my colleague so graphically described was bound to absorb a large number of men. I must say that there has been a gratifying recognition by many industrial executives of the needs of the army. In many instances readjustments have been made to release men for the services, and industrial executives have been slow in taking on men who are eligible for military service. But the pull of increasing war production has been a heavy one nevertheless.

A third factor which was bound to have its effect was the difficulty of convincing our young men, and in many cases their families as well, that more men were needed for the army. People could not understand why we had to keep on getting men. The assumption was that the reinforcements needed must be small because the casualties were confined to normal wastage and accidents causing medical unfitness. As I have already tried to explain, that assumption is wholly unsound. There is a constant drain even in these quiet times, resulting from discharges for medical unfitness of men who cannot stand the strain of fast-moving, energy-consuming activity in training and operations. Unfortunately that drain will increase heavily when active operations begin.

Another drain upon enlisted man-power is the steady call for men to increase establishments and to form new units. I heard a good deal of that when I was overseas this time. We have experienced it already. The organization for modern war is constantly changing. The war office, from experience gained in fighting on the part of British and allied forces, have found that units need more personnel to do a certain job. They have changed the organization accordingly, and the Canadian army has changed with them. They have found too that new units are necessary to perform special tasks which have been done previously by the more or less standard formations. They have found that units formed to do a certain task could more usefully and effectively be used in other roles. In order to be more self-dependent the Canadian corps has found it necessary to ask for special units not contemplated even by the British establishments. Not a few of them were formed on the spot as the need arose, from reinforcements from the holding units in England. These will eventually have to be replaced. This has required men in thousands and equipment as well. And so to meet our need of men for the army, men are required, first, to replace those discharged from time to time as unfit; second, to provide for new units or an increase in the establishment of existing units; and third, as reserves for battle casualties. These requirements go on ceaselessly month by month. I should like to impress that upon hon. members. I know that within this house and in the country there is some sort of idea that you do not need men because the army so far has done no fighting. But this increase in establishments is going on continually, also the formation of new units, and there is a continual drain by reason of medical unfitness. The reserves have to be kept up.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the monthly wastage in the Canadian active service force?

Mr. RALSTON: I can only tell my hon. friend this. There has to be an arbitrary figure, as he will understand, for monthly wastage. To make a rough estimate just to give my hon. friend some idea, I would say that the wastage might be between 2,500 and 3,000 a month.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister just now arrived at a figure of 24,000 recruits who had recently come in. Was that before medical fitness had been attested, or after?

Mr. RALSTON: I spoke of 34,000. I said 48,000 had volunteered—

Mr. STIRLING: I understood the minister to say that 38,000 had been asked for and 24,000 had enlisted.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg the hon. member's pardon. The number asked for was 37,000, and 24,000 have been enlisted. We have to remember that every unit sent overseas or formed over there necessitates provision for the maintenance of a supply of reinforcements. It is not enough to give a unit its complement of men any more than its complement of Bren guns or 25-pounders up to the number called for by the war establishments. Spares and spare parts must be provided for against wear and tear, accidents, and enemy action, and that applies to men as well as to machines. That is why I have said we need from 7,000 to 8,000 men per month to take care of wastage, to provide for new and increased units and to build up reinforcements; and the need for men is bound to continue, although at a diminishing rate, as the British organization becomes more standardized.

So far I have dealt with the matter of recruiting and the fact that our recruiting has fallen short of the full quotas asked for, and I have indicated some reasons why that may be so. Here is the situation as I see it. The government of Canada, pledged to a full-out war effort, has authorized the mobilization of the first division, the second, third, fourth, and fifth armoured division, and the brigade groups of the sixth division. In addition, thousands of corps and army troops have been authorized and raised. The first duty we have is to keep up and maintain these formations. I want to impress this on the committee as I did over the radio a short time ago that this is not the job simply of the Department of National Defence. It is a pledge given by the government of Canada in the name of the people of Canada, and it is the people of Canada themselves who have the obligation to see to it that the men in these units are backed up to the limit and that the Canadian Army which has been authorized is kept strong and reinforced. That need has been put before the citizens of this dominion more than once, but we have to repeat and repeat and repeat that the need is there. If we believe what the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Minister of this country and the leader of the opposition have said with regard to the seriousness of this war and what we ourselves know in our hearts to be true, namely, that this is a desperate fight for Canada as well as for the rest of the world, then it seems to me that we can with the fullest confidence rely on Canadians to support their army.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has referred to six or more divisions. I would ask him now if that is the final objective.

Mr. RALSTON: I will deal with that in a moment when I am dealing with the question raised by the leader of the opposition. I want to say again, with all the emphasis and with all the sincerity I can, that this is not a matter to be left simply to the Department of National Defence and civilian recruiting committees. It is up to the members of this house and the people they represent to put their hearts and wills and energies to this task of inducing and convincing the young men of this dominion that their place is in the Canadian Army. We in the Department of National Defence will do our level best to help to organize the recruiting which is necessary. The problems are not the same in every part of Canada. In some districts we must deal with a population which is largely agricultural. In others our young men, from the nature of their environment, are more interested in the naval service, for instance. In highly industrialized areas we have the special problem of the cooperation which is necessary with industry so that we shall not denude our factories of the skilled labour necessary to the continued production of armaments. Consequently recruiting efforts are decentralized to the various military districts throughout the country, and where possible the district officer commanding is assisted by civilian committees.

A couple of months ago we appointed two civilian directors of recruiting, Colonel James Mess, of Toronto, and Leon Trepanier, of Montreal. They have made a study of the whole situation and at this moment are actively engaged in interesting and enlisting the services of civilians all over this country. I think we have taken a step forward in the development of that organization, and that as a result we shall have a closer relationship between the civilian and the army. The efforts of the committees have already given ample evidence of the growing desire on the part of the people of Canada to get behind the army's effort in its need for men. These men and the committees through which they work will stimulate the public in the service of the army and bring to all our citizens a keener appreciation of the fact that the army is the individual citizen's army, and not an outside organization of which they know nothing and care less.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): May I ask if the broadcasts being made by Colonel Mess are nation-wide?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend. As a matter of fact I did not know that he was making broadcasts.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps at some later time the minister will tell us.

Mr. RALSTON: We expect to be able through this organization better to meet the demands of the public for information, to provide an organization for the distribution of information regarding the army's activities and requirements, to secure the support of civilians for our army's effort, and to indicate to the people that a public movement is behind the army in its need for men. I have already expressed to hon. members my appreciation of the help they have given in connection with the recruiting campaign which started in May last. I want to ask each individual hon. member for continued support, by assisting personally in every possible way the actions of the local committees.

My hon. friend the member for Davenport asked about the objective. That was also the question which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked yesterday; he inquired as to the ultimate objective of man-power which it is hoped Canada will contribute. I can answer him in one sentence and in one phrase. It was used by the Prime Minister; in fact it has been employed repeatedly by him. He used it in his speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet. Canada is determined to contribute "to the utmost of her strength". You cannot count that in divisions alone. I might refer the hon. gentleman to a somewhat similar phrase which I used in March, when, speaking to the house, I said I told my friends overseas that Canada's contribution was an all-out contribution; and by "an all-out contribution" I am not talking about divisions alone; I am not talking merely of squadrons, of ships, of production, of finance; I am talking about a balanced programme which represents the very best and most that Canada can do. That is the ultimate objective.

In this connection may I say to my hon. friend and to all members of the committee that I do not think we quite realize, when we are speaking of divisions, just what we have. Here I am not speaking complacently or saying that this is the last word by any means. I would only indicate to my hon. friends that sometimes there is not an appreciation of the degree to which we have gone. I am speaking now particularly of the army. We think of the Canadian corps as consisting of three divisions and an armoured tank brigade, to be joined before long by the fifth armoured division—that, along with the artillery regiments, the signals, the engineers, ordnance, and army service corps units. But as a matter of fact we have supplied many units which would be needed to work with the corps when that corps becomes part of an army. To-day we have overseas three divisions and an army tank brigade, and a fifth division soon to go overseas, with their ancillary units, and corps troops, and army troops, the fourth division here, and mobilization going on of the three brigade groups of the sixth division. Our forces in the United Kingdom alone consist not merely of three divisions but of over 300 units of various types; and these corps and army troops are formed to serve the corps as a whole or to be apportioned and attached to serve a Canadian division or divisions in case it or they should be detached for the time being to another corps. I am satisfied that there is not in the United Kingdom a corps as complete in that respect as the Canadian corps. At the present time the Canadian corps has developed almost from a corps to an army by reason of the line of communication troops and the corps and army troops which have been added to it. Yet we still think of a corps as consisting of three divisions, the army tank brigade, and, soon, the armoured division. May I tell the committee that to-day there are fifty per cent more corps and army troops in the Canadian corps of to-day, although no battles have been fought, than there were in the Canadian corps of 1915 to 1918.

Mr. CASSELMAN: How many Canadian soldiers are overseas at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: Over 110,000. That is exclusive of the air force. I am giving my hon. friend a round figure; the number is more than that; and when I say "overseas" I am referring to those who are outside Canada. The leader of the opposition asked for a separate statement with regard to those outside Canada but not in England. I feel that it is not desirable to make that figure public, but I now intimate that I shall be glad to give it to him in confidence.

As I say, we have the Canadian corps, consisting of those 300 units. In the air force alone are 90,000 men, the equivalent of more than four divisions.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are all overseas, are they?

Mr. RALSTON: No. Then there is the fourth division in Canada, the brigade groups of the sixth division, and the coast defence units.

In the navy we shall have before long the equivalent of two divisions.

[Mr. Ralston.]

I want to point out to the committee, so that we may not get a distorted idea regarding this matter of enlistments, that since the middle of May, 1941—that is, during the last six months—the army has recruited 59,502 men; the air force has recruited 35,108 men, and the navy has recruited 11,163 men, or, in the last six months, a total of voluntary enlistments of 105,773.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Has the minister the number of those who have been rejected?

Mr. RALSTON: No. The only way, I assume, one can get it is by taking the percentage of rejections and adding them to this figure.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the 105,000 enlistments in the active army?

Mr. RALSTON: No; there were not 105,000 enlistments in the active army during that six months period. That is the number of enlistments in the army, navy and air force. There were 59,500 in the active army; the numbers I gave for the army have reference to the active army.

That is Canada's war activity from the point of view of man-power. Hon. members have already heard from the Minister of Munitions and Supply of Canada's war activity from the point of view of production. I am sure it impressed the committee, as it will impress the country. The committee will hear from my colleague, the Minister of Finance, of Canada's participation in the war from the point of view of finance. It seems to me that Canada's war activities are nothing to apologize for and nothing to deprecate; in men, munitions and money they constitute a tremendous effort; but I want to assure the committee that we shall keep right on.

A preliminary study of the man-power situation in Canada has just been made. The chief of the general staff and I have returned from England after consultations with the general officer commanding the corps, and our friends in the United Kingdom. I have had no opportunity as yet to report to my colleagues. The war committee of the cabinet will be examining the situation thoroughly in the light of Canada's potentialities, and in the light of the needs, to determine the most effective ways in which the army can act and in which the army programme for 1942 can be developed as part of our war effort; and that, of course, will take account of the other calls on our resources of man-power and of materials. Therefore I say to my hon. friend that that is our objective—an all-out effort to the utmost of our strength based on a study of the situation and in the light of other calls which are necessary upon our resources.

In the meantime I want to stress again that the important task which cannot be shelved or ignored is that of seeing to it that the formations which we at present have are kept up to strength and in fighting form.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I ask the minister a question while he is talking of enlistments? Is everyone who offers his services, provided he is medically fit, taken into the service, even though he may be a key executive man in some industry; or is that situation taken into account?

Mr. RALSTON: Opportunity is given then for him or his employer to make representations that, although he wishes to enlist and does enlist, he is needed in connection with a key war industry. Then a board, under the Department of National War Services, on which neither the army nor the employer is represented, an independent board, hears the case and decides whether or not that man is essential to that industry. If he is, it recommends that leave be given him to go back to the industry for as long a time as may be necessary, and that leave can be renewed if occasion requires.

I am glad my hon. friend brought that out, though I have tried to make it clear on many occasions. I spoke of an increase in war production, of the additional demand on man-power in war industry. I have said publicly to employers all over the country, that I feel they have a responsibility in connection with this matter and that they themselves, if they are doing the utmost they can to further the war effort, must make plans to have men replaced from time to time, first, by men who are not physically fit, and second, by women, if necessary. The time is coming and perhaps has come when employers ought definitely to have, as part of their plans of expansion of production, regard to the importance of man-power for the army. I have said also that this is being done already in a number of plants in the country. Many employers are endeavouring, first, so to arrange that a physically fit man's place may be taken by someone not eligible for the army, making the necessary adjustment accordingly; and endeavouring, second, as far as possible to see to it that those men whom they take on are those who would not be eligible for the army. I pay this tribute to many employers, that they are already taking this question into account.

The leader of the opposition let drop a remark to which I wish to refer for a moment. He said something about the Canadian troops over in England being trained for defensive warfare. I suggest to him that he is misinformed in that regard. He is confusing two things: strategy and tactics. The strategy may be the defence of Britain, but the tactics of the defence may be attack. Canadian troops are being trained and it is expected that they may have to be used for the time being in the defence of Britain, but that does not mean that they are being trained for defensive warfare in the sense of sitting down and holding a trench. What may be called purely defensive warfare this morning may turn into offensive tactics this afternoon; counterattacks are as much offensive as a prolonged attack on the continent or somewhere else might be. If you reduce it to fractions and put it on a mathematical basis, I should say that two-thirds of the training of any soldier is training for offensive rather than defensive warfare. That is the sort of training which is being given Canadians both here and in England.

We think of defensive warfare as more or less the use of the man with the rifle and perhaps the Bren gun; we think of offensive warfare these days as being carried on by the man with the tank and with the carrier. The Canadian troops are equipped with the carrier. I do not know whether my hon. friend had the experience I had, but I saw three different reconnaissance battalions—I am not going to say how many carriers they had. The enemy probably knows, but there is no need to spread it on the record. Suffice it to say that they have very many more than the infantry unit has, and if anything could be more "offensive" than those fellows I should like to see it.

With regard to tanks we have, or we shall have when the armoured division goes over, four divisions altogether: three infantry divisions plus one armoured division, plus one armoured tank brigade, which is roughly a third of a division. In other words, we shall have one and one-third armoured divisions, which are essential for offensive warfare, and three infantry divisions. If my hon. friend will look up the records with regard to the German army he will find that Hitler has not more than one panzer division as against ten ordinary infantry divisions. I do not want my hon. friend or the country to get the idea that the Canadian troops are being trained for defensive warfare in the sense that they are sitting down in a trench and waiting for the enemy to come. They are trained for attack. They are equipped for attack. The bumper exercise was an exercise in offensive tactics. My hon. friend used the expression "training for defensive" on two occasions, once when he said that some divisions were pretty well trained in defensive tactics and others not so well trained.

With regard to equipment, the Minister of Munitions and Supply has gone fully into the matter of equipment and I thought that perhaps I would leave that unless someone wanted to ask questions with regard to any particular items. There is one thing I should say, and that is that all the equipment that is being made is not being used by the Canadian Army. There was some misunderstanding between my colleague and the leader of the opposition with reference to 25-pounder guns. These are not being retained on this side, except to a limited extent for training purposes. They are on the other side, and at the present time we have two divisions, and we shall soon have three, equipped with these guns.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have any Canadian tanks reached our men yet?

Mr. RALSTON: I think there may be one or two.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We heard that they were on the ocean.

Mr. RALSTON: There may be a small number.

Mr. STIRLING: My hon. friend says that the Minister of Munitions and Supply has dealt with the matter of equipment. Could he tell the committee whether there are any units in training in Canada to-day who are lacking essential equipment for that training?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid that is a question I shall have to look into, because I have not the details. I shall, however, give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. STIRLING: I shall be glad if the minister will, and I would ask him particularly to turn his attention to the armoured division which is still in Canada and is still going through the processes of training. Have they the equipment necessary for the training of such troops in this country?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows about the armoured division. They have about ten or fifteen of the large old-type tanks and also the American tanks, as we call them.

Mr. STIRLING: Tanks are not the only form of equipment which an armoured division requires.

Mr. RALSTON: That was only one item. My hon. friend asked whether they had all the equipment. The tanks they have, old-type as they are, are extremely valuable for training.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members have been under the impression that the house would not sit to-night, but would follow standing order 6, which provides that at six o'clock on Wednesday Mr. Speaker adjourns the house without question put, the house then standing adjourned until Thursday. On May 27, however, that order was suspended by a resolution of the house, that thereafter for the rest of the session the house would sit on Wednesday evenings. In order not to disappoint hon. members in the view they have entertained, I move that the house do now adjourn, which will give hon. members the evening free. The resolution, I think, should be allowed to stand because we may find it convenient to use it next Wednesday evening.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6 p.m.

Thursday, November 6, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR COOPERATION AS TO MEDICAL CARE OR COMPENSATION

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 104, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

He said: This is really a reintroduction of a bill I introduced in the early part of the summer, but which was not reached. I withdrew it, believing there was no chance of having it forwarded. I am reintroducing it at this time in the hope that at an early day it may be considered by the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS—COST OF LIVING BONUS

Mr. CHURCH:

What action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding a high cost of living bonus for dependents of those serving in His Majesty's forces?

Mr. ILSLEY: This matter is under consideration by the government.

EXPORTS OF SCRAP STEEL

Mr. REID:

1. Is scrap steel allowed to be exported from Canada?
2. If so, what total amount has been exported from the various provinces to the United States or any other country during the twelve months ending September 30, 1941?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes, under permit only.
2. Exports of scrap iron and steel.

Province	Tons
Quebec	1
Ontario	3,943
British Columbia	10,430
Total	14,374

I might add that yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) called my attention to the fact that while he had asked for information concerning the amount of steel scrap which had been exported from British Columbia since June 1, 1941, to the end of September of the same year, the answer tabled included scrap iron and steel. In reply I advised him that I should be glad to obtain any additional information. I am informed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that scrap iron and steel are included in the one classification. This is to conform with the custom tariff, and I am told it is not possible to obtain a break-down of these figures.

Mr. REID: It should be brought up to date.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

SHIPMENTS OF PORK PRODUCTS TO BRITAIN UNDER AGREEMENTS

Mr. SENN:

How many pounds of each of the following pork products were shipped to Great Britain during the term of the 1940-41 bacon agreement: 1. Wiltshire sides; 2. box cuts (a) hams and gammons, (b) fores, (c) rib in back, (d) middle, (e) tinned hams; 3. offal or pluck, (a) livers, (b) kidneys, (c) tongues?

Mr. GARDINER:

Bacon Contract Volume
1940-41

Following is a statement showing the volume in pounds of the pork products shipped to Great Britain during the term of the 1940-41 bacon agreement:—

	Product	Volume in Pounds
1.	Wiltshire sides	330,532,422
2. (a)	Hams and gammons	30,354,051
(b)	Fores	17,230,246
	Picnics	570,453
(c)	Backs	30,996,365
(d)	Middles	16,290,645
(e)	Tinned hams	42,120
*3. (a)	Livers	8,141,896
(b)	Kidneys	1,505,587
(c)	Tongues	1,871,572

*Now in transit 1,200,000 lb. livers, kidneys and tongues.

Mr. SENN:

What was the price agreed upon or realized under (a) the 1940-41 bacon agreement; (b) the present bacon agreement, for each of the following pork products: 1. Wiltshire sides; 2. box cuts, (a) hams and gammons, (b) fores, (c) rib in back, (d) middle, (e) tinned hams; 3. offal or pluck, (a) livers, (b) kidneys, (c) tongues?

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. A. CLARK*

Mr. REID

1. Since September, 1939, have the services of Brig.-Gen. J. A. Clark of Vancouver been considered by the government in any military capacity?
2. If so, has he been asked to consider any military appointment comparable to his military status and experience, and what military appointment was suggested or offered him?

Mr. RALSTON: I should be glad to give my hon. friend the information asked for; but on consideration my view is that to disclose information with regard to offers of military appointments would be a precedent not in the public interest.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a military secret.

Mr. REID: There has been considerable agitation in British Columbia owing to statements that this man's services have been ignored. The information is very important.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOUSING

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Under Wartime Housing Limited, at what locations have housing developments been constructed?
2. How many houses have been built at each location?
3. What are the descriptions of these houses, showing number of rooms, construction, material, etc.
4. What conveniences are at each location, such as water and sewers?
5. What was the estimated cost of each unit at each location?
6. What was the contract price at each location?
7. Was it a lump sum, cost plus percentage or fee?
8. What was the actual cost of each unit at each location?
9. How many of these units are occupied at the present time at each location?
10. How many units were built under the national housing administration and at what locations, showing, size, description, number of rooms, estimated cost, contract price, actual cost and other information as above?

ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED SINCE SEPTEMBER 1, 1939

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. How many orders in council have been passed since September 1, 1939?
2. How many of such orders in council have been published in the Canada Gazette?
3. How many orders in council passed pursuant to the War Measures Act and/or the National Resources Mobilization Act have been approved since September 1, 1939?
4. How many of such orders in council have been published in the Canada Gazette?
5. How many orders in council have been passed since September 1, 1939, while parliament was actually in session?
6. How many orders in council passed pursuant to the War Measures Act and/or the National Resources Mobilization Act have been approved since September 1, 1939, while parliament was actually in session?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION OF ADJOURNMENT IN VIEW OF MEETING OF GENERAL EXECUTIVE OF DOMINION CONSERVATIVE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the government to adjourn the house at eleven o'clock to-night until Monday next in order to afford our Conservative colleagues an opportunity to settle their internal affairs once and for all by the selection of our favourite candidate for the leadership of their party?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The affairs of our Conservative friends are in their own hands. Happily they are not in mine. So far as the proceedings of parliament are concerned I imagine that all hon. members, irrespective of party, will wish to have this part of the session end as speedily as may be possible and to that end hon. members will no doubt desire to sit to-morrow afternoon but not in the evening.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

INFORMATION AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) inquired yesterday with respect to the report of the Alaska highway commission. I have made inquiry as to the present position of the report and I find that it is in its final stages. I am unable to say whether it will be completed in time to bring down at the present session, but if it is, it will be brought down.

LEGATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENTS OF MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY AND HIGH COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A few days ago my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), said that during the course of the present session he would like me to make a statement with respect to diplomatic appointments and other appointments of a representative character that had been made since we adjourned in June last. There is one important appointment which I should like to announce this afternoon. With the permission of the house I shall avail myself of this opportunity to give the entire list so that hon. members will have it before them.

Mr. Jean Désy, formerly Canadian minister to Belgium and the Netherlands, was appointed in June, 1941, to represent Canada in Brazil Mr. Désy arrived at Rio de Janeiro on September 10 and presented his credentials on September 30. This appointment reciprocates the appointment of the minister of Brazil to Canada, Mr. J. A. Lins de Barros, who presented his credentials to the Governor General on May 15, 1941.

There has also been an appointment to the Argentine republic and to Chile. Honourable W. F. A. Turgeon, formerly Chief Justice of Saskatchewan, was appointed minister to the Argentine and Chile on September 24. He has now arrived in Buenos Aires and is expected to present his credentials shortly. The minister of the Argentine to Canada, Doctor Pablo Santos Munoz, presented his letters of credence to the Governor General on June 3 of this year.

I am pleased to be able to announce that the Chinese government has nominated and the approval of His Majesty has been signified to the appointment of Doctor Liu Shih Shun as minister from China to Canada. Doctor Liu has had a lengthy experience in the foreign service of his country and since 1931 has headed the European and American divisions of the foreign ministry in China. It is not known how soon he will reach Canada. In due course, as was announced some little time ago, the Canadian government will appoint a minister to China.

Mr. John Doherty Kearney, K.C., of Montreal was appointed on July 31 of this year High Commissioner for Canada in Ireland, in succession to the late John Hall Kelly. Mr. Kearney has been in Dublin for some time.

We have felt that it was important to have a representative of Canada in Newfoundland. As hon. members realize, Newfoundland is now occupying a most prominent place in international affairs, from the point of view of military strategy, and also as respects relations between the British government, the Canadian government and the United States government with Newfoundland and with each other as respects developments taking place there. We felt that if we could persuade Mr. Burchell, who has been our high commissioner in Australia, to accept the position of commissioner to Newfoundland, we would have, with his knowledge of conditions in the maritime provinces and in Newfoundland, an exceptionaly well-qualified representative for the post. Mr. Burchell, realizing the importance the government attached to its representation in Newfoundland, accepted the position and at the present time is serving there as High Commissioner for Canada.

Mr. Burchell's appointment to Newfoundland left a vacancy in the position of High Commissioner for Canada in Australia. With the situation what it is in the orient, and having regard to the many and highly important matters related to the Pacific which require most careful consideration at this time, we have felt that it was important that the best possible appointment should be made. The government believed that no person possessing a wide knowledge of eastern problems as related to Canada and other parts of the commonwealth, and also exceptional experience in military affairs, could be found who was as well qualified to fill this position as Major-General Victor W. Odlum, at present general officer commanding the second Canadian division overseas. I am happy to be able to announce that General Odlum has agreed to accept the appointment and that the appointment has been made. I need hardly say that General Odlum accepted this position with reluctance and only on the assurance that in the opinion of the government this new post will provide exceptional opportunities for him to serve Canada at this very critical time.

Another appointment, a minor appointment, has been made which the government has felt to be important at this time. Believing that Canadian interests would benefit from the establishment of a consular office in St. Pierre Mr. Christopher C. Eberts of the Department of External Affairs was appointed a few weeks ago, vice-consul and acting consul for Canada at St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Mr. GREEN: There has been a vacancy in the post in Japan for a considerable period. Will an appointment be made in the near future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has been quite prepared to make the appointment and has had a nominee ready to send to Japan, but for some time past there has been no transportation to take him across.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MARITIME PROVINCE LUMBER WORKERS EMPLOYED IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. O'BRIEN (Northumberland, N.B.): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. According to information which has recently been brought to my attention, there is a serious shortage of labour in the lumber industry in the eastern provinces, and essential war production is threatened by the fact that large numbers of young, able-bodied lumber workers are crossing the border to work in the woods of the United States for United States companies. The number who have gone during the past few weeks is said to have been established at a figure of at least 2,000, but may total 7,000. In view of the requirements of the lumber industry in eastern Canada and the essential need for man-power in Canada, including the forestry corps, may I ask the Prime Minister to indicate: (1) why permits have been issued to these young men to cross the border; (2) what action will be taken to stop this drain on Canadian man-power.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not in position to give a categorical answer to the questions asked by my hon. friend, but I may say to him that the government has had before it the matter to which he has referred and has been giving it careful consideration. I shall be able to give him further details at another time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are visas being issued for this purpose, or have they been stopped?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am unable to answer that question offhand, but I shall secure the information.

CANADIAN ARMY

HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION—CONDITIONS AT CAMP BORDEN—QUESTION OF NATIONAL SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Last session I asked the government to make a national survey of hospital accommodation, first, in the camps in Canada, and, second, for the men who are coming home. So far no reply has been made to this request. A disastrous fire occurred yesterday at Camp Borden and the Globe and Mail reports that the loss is set at $75,000. This included valuable equipment. It is stated that there was insufficient accommodation and that many patients were being housed in ramshackle huts. Cases of pneumonia and pleurisy had to flee the fire. The camp officials are reported to have said that there would have been a heavy loss of life had this fire occurred at night. What steps have been taken to remedy the hospital situation at Camp Borden, and will a survey be made of the other camps to see if they are safe? I should like to know also what additional fire protection will be afforded.

[Mr. O'Brien.]

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I expect to receive shortly a report with regard to the occurrence at Camp Borden to which my hon. friend has referred. I know that extensive improvements in hospital accommodation were made at Camp Borden. If a survey is necessary, I shall see that it is made. If improvements are required, of course they will be taken in hand at once. From the reports which I have had, however, it would appear that the conditions to which my hon. friend refers certainly do not obtain generally and I doubt whether he has accurate information.

PENSIONS

COST OF LIVING BONUS TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND RECIPIENTS OF MOTHERS' ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): During the last twenty-four hours I have received several letters from the Toronto district outlining the suffering of old age pensioners and those receiving mothers' allowances due to the fact that they are not receiving a cost of living bonus. Great hardships have been inflicted. Will the government give consideration to the question which I raised last session, and will a reply be given before parliament prorogues?

Mr. ILSLEY: Consideration is being given to the matter.

QUESTION AS TO GENERAL REVIEW OF PENSION SCHEMES AND STATEMENT OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I ask the government whether there is to be a general review of the pensions and dependents' allowance schemes in force in Canada? I refer more particularly to mothers whose sons are serving overseas, and who are finding it very difficult to exist under present allowances. Will a general statement on the various schemes of payment be given to the house before parliament prorogues or adjourns?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think that is a similar question to others that have been asked. The reply is the same, that the matter is under consideration.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

1941 DECLARED AN EMERGENCY YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): Has the Minister of Agriculture given consideration to declaring this year an emergency year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The Prairie Farm Assistance Act provides that after the 1st of November of each year the government shall give consideration to the question whether that particular year shall be declared an emergency year. The government has given consideration to the question whether 1941 shall be declared an emergency year under the terms of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and has agreed that the conditions are such as to warrant the year 1941 being declared an emergency year.

BUTTER AND MILK

QUESTION AS TO PEGGING OF PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. LECLERC (Shefford): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it is the intention of the government to peg the price of butter this month and the following months, and will the price of fluid milk throughout the cities be pegged at summer or winter prices?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am sorry that from this distance I was unable to hear the question asked by the hon. gentleman. I shall take note of it in Hansard.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY

QUESTION AS TO FURTHER ARRESTS AND INTERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) my question will be directed to the Prime Minister, and as I have not given notice of it he may not be able to answer this afternoon. My question is based on a news item which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal of yesterday, to the effect that Harvey Murphy, a native of Kitchener, has been arrested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The item goes on to state that Murphy was president of the Ontario Federation of Unemployed until 1938, and that until his arrest he was district organizer of the communist party in Hamilton, Ontario. In view of the fact that Russia is now our ally, is it the intention of the government to continue with the arrest and internment of persons in this country because of membership in the communist party?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend has anticipated, I can hardly be expected to answer his question offhand, but I shall seek to give him a reply a little later on if the Minister of Justice does not happen to be in his seat.

WAR EXPENDITURES

FURTHER SITTINGS AND EXTENSION OF POWERS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): May I ask first, whether it is the intention of the government to continue now the sittings of the committee on war expenditures, and whether the powers of the committee will be extended to enable it to investigate contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall have to reply to my hon. friend a little later on that latter point.

FEED GRAINS

SITUATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND REQUEST FOR FREIGHT RATE ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I would like to direct two questions to the Minister of Agriculture. First, is the department aware of the great loss suffered in British Columbia in feed grains, and, second, will British Columbia be given the same treatment as eastern Canada in freight rates on feed grains?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The answer to both questions is yes.

THE WAR

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941 —CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The house in committee of the whole, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose yesterday I was dealing with the matter of equipment. My hon. friend the member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) had asked with regard to training equipment for units. I have had the matter gone into, and I should like to give him this reply.

He asked whether there were any units in training in Canada which are lacking in essential equipment for that training, and he spoke particularly of the fifth armoured division. I think we ought to differentiate in the matter of training equipment between the training carried on at the training centres and the training carried on in the units themselves. With regard to items of armament and equipment of which there was initially, as my hon. friend and the committee know, a marked shortage, we have in general given priority to allotment to training centres. The reason for that is obvious. It enables the utmost possible use to be made of the limited quantities of equipment for the benefit of the greatest number. As a result of that policy I can say that some time ago we reached the stage where all our training centres were in possession of essential training equipment of all types except for two or three items of which we are still deficient, and I shall mention them in a moment.

Mr. STIRLING: That applies to the training camps across Canada for the trainees?

Mr. RALSTON: To the training centres.

As regards the equipment necessary for the training of units, this, as I said, got a lower order of priority in the distribution. Nevertheless, again excepting a few items which I shall mention in a moment, the situation now is that all units of the active army are in possession of adequate scales of modern armament and equipment for training. We have, for example, ample supplies for training purposes of rifles, pistols, Bren guns, Vickers guns, submachine guns, 3-inch mortars, field artillery, mechanized transport, including universal carriers, and anti-gas equipment.

Our position regarding other items of equipment, such as wireless sets of which I have spoken more than once in the house, and supplies of which have been delayed, has recently shown a marked and rapid improvement.

The chief items in which there has been a notable deficiency are anti-tank and anti-aircraft weapons, 2-inch mortars and modern tanks. We are now, I am happy to say, well on the way to remedying these shortages.

My hon. friend asked me with regard to the tanks at Camp Borden, and I told him that we had there something like fifteen of the old type tanks, and also a number of what we call the American tanks and that they were being extensively used for training purposes. I did not tell him what I did not know at the moment, and what has occurred quite recently, that we have now at Camp Borden over twenty of the most modern tanks as well. These tanks were built in Canada and have already been of the greatest possible value to the armoured training centres and to the units of the armoured divisions.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the weight of those tanks?

Mr. RALSTON: I am referring to the Valentine tank. We are also now making anti-aircraft guns, anti-tank guns, and 2-inch mortars, and issues of all of these items will be made for training purposes, we expect, within a very few weeks.

The committee will realize that we have to allot our production where it is most needed at the moment. Training needs do get a very high priority, but it is not possible to apply the whole of our output by any means to training. Shipments have to be made overseas both for our own troops, to ensure them adequate reserves, and for other forces of the empire as well. We have to watch the situation constantly and send those weapons and equipment where they are most needed, and that is why sometimes we are slower than we otherwise would like to be in building up training equipment in Canada. I want to assure my hon. friends that while we are not at all complacent about this matter, it is clear that the great bulk of our deficiencies are now a thing of the past. Each day that passes will show an improvement, and I expect before long to be able to tell the house and the committee that every unit and training school has every essential item, in completely adequate quantities, for training.

As I indicated to the committee, I do not propose, unless the committee desires it, at this stage to go into the matter of the various items of equipment. My hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has done that. I have here a statement with regard to equipment if it is desired to ask questions on any item.

With regard to training I could take a good deal of the committee's time on this subject. There has been quite a bit of discussion in the newspapers about it. But I do not propose this afternoon to deal with the various methods of training, because I feel that the best testimony to our training is the fact that the general officer commanding the Canadian corps in England has expressed his satisfaction at and appreciation of the way in which training has been carried out and the nature of the training which has been given to our troops in Canada before going overseas. Our training is, of course, progressive; men are at different stages of training as they leave for overseas; the longer they are here the more they are trained. But our training is integrated with the training overseas, so that one dovetails into the other and they go right along from the stage they reached before they left Canada to the next stage overseas.

There is complete understanding between our training officers. As I indicated to the house before the adjournment, the director of military training at national defence headquarters spent two months in England last winter going into this matter of training, ascertaining what the needs were and what methods were best adapted to ensuring the highest efficiency having regard to the tasks which Canadian troops might be called upon to perform.

To remind the committee with regard to our system of training centres may I put on record the figures? We have at the present time in Canada thirty basic training centres. Their capacity at any one time is 22,000, and the annual output is about 132,000 men. We have 35 advanced training centres, which include officers' training centres, small arms training centres, army trades schools, junior leaders' schools, administrative schools, driving and maintenance schools, and the senior officers' course at the Royal Military College. The capacity of all these advanced training institutions at one time is 27,000 other ranks and 3,000 officers; the annual output—again—is about 132,000 other ranks and 6,000 officers. You cannot simply multiply the former figures by twelve, because the length of the course is different in different places, but that is the aggregate annual output of these advanced training institutions.

We have worked out what I think is a very complete system of interchange between England and Canada of officers and non-commissioned officers who keep in touch by going back and forth between our troops in England and our troops here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is for training purposes?

Mr. RALSTON: For training purposes, yes, and also in respect of matters to which I will refer in a minute. While this is perhaps an aside, as it does not refer to Canadian officers, I may say that there are in Ottawa at the present time twenty British officers who have come to this continent for official purposes. We have taken advantage of their presence here to have them go to our training centres and examine our training systems to see if they can give us any suggestions—and I am sure they can—with regard to the system of training which is in force there. We have the benefit of that.

Generally speaking with regard to training, every effort is being made to follow British experience and practice. Senior officers proceed to Britain periodically in order to keep in constant touch with the latest training methods, and these officers return to Canada and make such alterations in our training methods as seem to be required. In addition, there is a constant interchange of officers and non-commissioned officers between Canada and the Canadian corps. This policy ensures that our training methods in Canada are in line with the requirements overseas.

Every training officer charged with training at national defence headquarters has been overseas in this war, either on a liaison visit or in actual service with the Canadian corps. The two divisional commanders in Canada, all their senior staff officers, and many of their junior officers, in addition to a large proportion of the brigade commanders, have had overseas experience.

In connection with the schools we have these arrangements for interchange. Every advanced training centre in Canada has some officers and non-commissioned officers on the training staff who are back from the United Kingdom. There is a constant flow of personnel between the holding units in England and the training centres in Canada. That is, the holding units in England send back officers to our training centres here: we send officers over to the holding units there in order to gain experience and to integrate and coordinate the training. We are providing for—as a matter of fact orders have already been issued for—the sending to the United Kingdom of officers and non-commissioned officers from units now in Canada for attachment to units in England so that they may gain experience over there. In addition to that we have staff attachments. We send over staff officers from Canada to England, twenty proceeding at a time. In addition to that we are providing that all active units in Canada will have a certain overseas representation in their officer strength; that is to say, some of their officers will have been overseas.

May I give another example with regard to the schools which are operating in Kingston —and there are a number of them. At Kingston, where there are four different schools, fifty per cent of all the instructors are from overseas. This applies to the three months' senior officers' course, to the three months' company commanders' course, to the four months' junior war staff course, and the four months' junior intelligence course—which is both for officers and for non-commissioned officers. The junior war staff course was started in England. Its first term was held there, and then it was removed to Canada for reasons which hon. members will appreciate, because it was regarded as a permanent institution; and as I say, over fifty per cent of the instructors at that school have had overseas service.

We have also exchanges with the British Army, apart from the ad hoc arrangement which I mentioned a moment ago, under which certain British officers now in Canada are giving us the benefit of their experience. I can assure the committee that everything that can be done to bring the Canadian training of cadets into line with modern requirements, and the experience which has been gained overseas, is being done.

I will deal with one other matter. We have, as the committee knows, officers' training centres at Brockville and Victoria, the one at Brockville serving eastern Canada and the one at Victoria serving the west. These are organized to turn out 4,600 officers for the active army each year and to train over 2,000 officers for the reserve army each year. In addition to qualifying those already granted commissions, these schools take on for training 1,200 cadets who have been recommended and who are seeking to qualify for commissioned rank in the active army. We have also made arrangements in that connection with what is called the O.C.T.U. in England, the officer cadets training unit in the United Kingdom, so that at the end of every second course they send to us, to be attached to our officers' training centres here, two officers who have had experience instructing in the cadet training unit overseas. We keep them here for two courses and then allow them to go back, having other officers come to take their place.

I spoke of the junior war staff course at the Royal Military College for officers up to the appointment of G-2—a three months' course. Forty officers can be accommodated at one time. We have a school of army administration, providing for an administrative staff course for eight officers for four weeks; a wing for unit administration course for twelve officers, of four weeks; a wing for adjutants, company sergeant-majors and orderly room sergeants' course, eight officers and sixteen other ranks, covering two weeks; a wing for quartermasters and quartermaster sergeants, eight officers and sixteen other ranks, two weeks; and an advanced clerks' course for thirty other ranks covering four weeks.

We have a bilingual junior leaders' school at Megantic. There are fifteen courses in the year, there being two hundred candidates in each course. It is what its name implies, a course for non-commissioned officers, for junior leaders who are given special training in the responsibilities of leadership.

We have an advanced driving and maintenance school at Woodstock, Ontario. The men who go there first take what we call phase 2 training, which is training given at the technical schools which are operated under the Department of Labour throughout Canada. They then go to Woodstock and take one month's intensive course as driver mechanics. We accommodate four hundred a month, and the output ultimately will be about five hundred a month.

I cannot emphasize too strongly what I said last night as a result of what I observed overseas, namely, the importance of the work that is done by the driver mechanics. There is a great deal of work behind the lines which can be saved if the driver mechanic is taught the principles of his trade and learns to look after his vehicle each night when he comes in, instead of allowing it to go until it gets so run down that it has to be laid up and sent to the workshop for major repairs. We give that special course in addition to some other courses for tradesmen, to which I shall refer.

Mr. LOCKHART: While the minister is on that point, recalling the statement made in this house about a year ago, may I ask to what extent non-commissioned officers have been privileged to get commissions? It has been said that the men must all pass through the ranks before commissions can be granted, but there have been many complaints from non-commissioned officers who say that they are still without opportunity of reaching that objective. Perhaps the minister will give a word of explanation.

Mr. RALSTON: That would entail my getting information as to the number. My hon. friend will note what I said, namely, that at Brockville and Victoria we have no less than 1,200 cadets who are being trained during the year. They have gone through the ranks—almost all would be non-commissioned officers. They are recommended as cadets and they go to the officers' training school on that basis and obtain commissions if they pass their course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They come principally from the non-permanent active militia.

Mr. RALSTON: That may be. I shall have the figures looked up to see what number of non-commissioned officers or cadets have been put through.

I did not mention, in connection with the promotion of close relations between England and Canada, the matter of commands. I need only remind the committee that the divisional commanders have all had overseas service. Practically all brigade commanders in Canada at the present time have had commands overseas. A great number of senior staff officers in the various formations have been brought back from overseas. In a word, we have endeavoured as far as possible to see to it that there shall be a very substantial proportion of the senior officers in our formation who have had overseas service and experience.

Let me now say a word with regard to tradesmen. We have to realize, as I said last night, that the army cannot indefinitely continue to draw from the ranks of civilian labour large numbers of technical qualified tradesmen without seriously disrupting industry, and we have a set-up which is now in operation, a very extensive scheme, for training large numbers of tradesmen required in the army. Potential tradesmen are secured by enlistment or selection from existing units. Selection boards have been set up for the purpose and they are assisted by a directorate at headquarters, which has to do with the selection of personnel for the various types of occupation needed to be filled in the army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister speaking of Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will he tell us the position with respect to tradesmen in ordnance in England? I understood that there was a substantial deficiency which really ought to be filled. Perhaps he knows about that.

Mr. RALSTON: I do know about it, and that is one of the reasons why we have doubled and almost trebled our capacity for the training of tradesmen in Canada. The facilities in England at the particular school I saw afforded training to fit men for trades of different kinds. Some of them were in training as driver mechanics. In Canada—and that is where the supply must come from—there has been, as probably my hon. friend has heard, a certain amount of combing out of units to find men adapted for that work. We have recognized that need and it has been thrown at us by the fact that the transport equipment is getting older. Some of it has been used a year and a half, and the maintenance question is an important one. There are 18,000 motor vehicles alone, apart from armoured fighting vehicles, and therefore we have had to enlarge substantially our provision for the training of tradesmen.

All these men who go to these schools about which I am going to speak are first given what we call phase 1 training, that is the basic training of a soldier for two months. Then they go on phase 2, which are these schools I have spoken of, conducted under the Department of Labour, which were the technical and vocational schools operated by the provinces all over the country. About four thousand men are being trained in those schools at the present time. The trades being taught in the vocational schools are blacksmiths, bricklayers, masons, concretors, carpenters and joiners, clerks, coppersmiths and tinsmiths, architectural, engineering, mechanical and topographical draughtsmen, electricians, engine artificers, fitters, instrument mechanics, motor mechanics, operator signals, plumbers and pipe fitters, welders, wireless mechanics, driver mechanics, turners, diesel mechanics, cooks and painters.

At these phase 2 schools, that is the vocational schools, facilities are being extended in order to handle about 6,000 men at any one time, or an annual capacity of 25,000.

As the committee knows, Canadian industry is cooperating in the instruction of additional men in a large proportion of those trades. At the present time about 4,000 men are being given instruction in various industrial plants, and the annual output from that source is now about 1,200.

When this phase 2 instruction is completed, the majority of the men proceed direct to their units or to training centres being classed as training reinforcements. The rest proceed to the army trade school at Hamilton or to the mechanics' training centre at London for further training. At the army trade school at Hamilton, which is a busy place—I know a number of hon. members have visited it—additional instruction is given in the following trades: artificers, blacksmiths, carpenters, electricians, engine artificers, fitters, instrument mechanics, motor mechanics, wireless mechanics, welders.

There is accommodation for 2,000 men at this school and the annual output will be about 500 a month. Those are more general trades. At the other school, the mechanical training centre at London, which was opened comparatively recently, I think about four months ago, instruction is given particularly in motor mechanics, diesel mechanics and aero engine mechanics. There is accommodation there for about 750 men, with an annual output of about 2,400.

They graduate from these schools and then go to the advanced training centres of their different arms—that is to say, the ordnance men go to the ordnance training centre, the A.S.C. men to the A.S.C. training centre—and there they are given further training in the military application of their trades. So far they have been learning their trade; then they are shown how to apply it to the military vehicles and equipment of which they will have charge. Men of the ordnance corps, for instance, go to the ordnance training centre at Barriefield, where the present accommodation for 2,000 will soon be increased to 3,000. This releases men for overseas as and when required. In addition to giving the finishing touches to the training the ordnance training or other schools give complete training in certain specialized ordnance trades which I have not listed. The annual output will be from 1,500 to 2,000.

Then there are training centres not only for ordnance but also for other technical corps such as engineers, signals, army service and medicals. They carry on specialists' tradesmen training in addition to completing the training of the men passed through the other schools.

To sum up, it means we have or are creating facilities for training of tradesmen in Canada which will give an annual output of about 40,000 tradesmen. These 40,000 are not all motor tradesmen but men to fit into the different trades required in the various army units. May I say that for an armoured division the percentage of tradesmen required is about 32 per cent, and for an infantry division, a percentage of about 17 per cent.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is being done about training more efficient types of cooks throughout the army and the camps in general?

Mr. RALSTON: One thing that is being done which I know about particularly is at the school at Borden, which I believe has done extremely good work. I am not fond of comparing the new with the old, but I am absolutely satisfied that the cooking and dietetics in this war are greatly ahead of those in the last war.

Mr. LOCKHART: What else, apart from Borden?

Mr. RALSTON: We have a chief inspector of catering and messing, Colonel Webb. Colonel Webb keeps in constant touch with the messing in all the districts. The units also have messing officers who get special instruction, and their duties are to supervise the preparation, cooking, and serving of the meals. They should see that the daily diet sheet is lived up to and that the food is properly cooked. Each district has a messing inspector specially qualified. I cannot state at the moment where there are other cooking schools. I am sure there are some in the west. Has my hon. friend some complaint in regard to cooks?

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes, there seems to be a general feeling that good food is being spoiled in so many camps by men who have not had any training or only very limited training as cooks, perhaps before they entered the army, and who in some instances neglect to remove much of that infernal grease before serving and maybe doing injury to the health of many of our men in service.

Mr. RALSTON: I am very sorry and disappointed to hear that, because that is not the report that comes to me. Probably the good reports come to me, but I must say that the inspectors generally as I know them are pretty rigid in regard to the matter of rations and cooking. I see or am referred to most of their reports, and I do not get reports such as my hon. friend suggests, indicating the existence of any general condition of the kind. I did have a bad report from one training centre. I had it investigated from the top down, or the bottom up, and the reports that came to me, from an officer who was absolutely independent, showed that the condition complained of was an exception; with the exception of the one meal in question the situation was not general at all. But I should be obliged if my hon. friend would give me particulars of any instances of the kind, because no doubt there are cases where men do not complain to the orderly officer, they may think they will get in wrong by doing it, and where some action from headquarters may help.

Mr. BROOKS: So far as the training of cooks is concerned, men selected in the different districts as prospective cooks are being sent to selected cookhouses at training centres and other units to receive instruction in cooking, besides going to Borden for their special training there. That is being done in our district as well as in others.

Mr. RALSTON: I thank my hon. friend for calling that to my attention, because he has had personal experience in connection with this whole matter.

The committee may be interested to hear a word with regard to the National Resources Mobilization Act personnel. Since the four months' training plan announced last March came into effect, there have been accepted for training 25,903. Of this number over 10,000 are still in training, 4,296 have completed their training and are actively employed in the army, and about 4,000 have been discharged on medical grounds or released to war industry. The balance, according to the figure I have here, is 8,296. I am not sure that that jibes exactly with the total I gave at first, but I think it is about right. The balance of 8,296, as of October 25, have enlisted for active service in the army, navy or air force. Of these about 5,000 enlisted in the army. That is to say the figures show that out of 25,903 trained since March 20 there were 8,296 who have enlisted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is about one-third.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, I generally estimate it at about 25 per cent. The figures are larger than I thought they were.

The committee will realize of course that this has been a very disjointed presentation, but I am trying to deal with subjects in which the committee may be interested, and concerning which perhaps not a great deal has been said.

I was glad to announce the authorization of the Canadian Women's Army Corps. That corps has been organized. At the present time it has a strength of 21 officers and 425 other ranks. It is expected that by April 1 it will grow to upwards of 2,000 all ranks. As the committee knows, this is one of the ways of endeavouring to save man-power, and I am confident that once it has got under way it will grow very substantially.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the intention in that regard? What are they to do?

Mr. RALSTON: There are four major occupations. First we have dietetics, including cooks and waitresses; then, clerks, then auxiliary services and canteen workers and then motor transport workers. These are four of the outstanding lines of occupation. The committee will understand that where we have to have female assistance in outlying camps or outlying areas, special accommodation has to be provided. That is being done now. I think yesterday's press contained a report of some examples of cases where men have been replaced by members of the Canadian Women's Army Corps.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that for service in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, for service in Canada. Nothing has been done as yet with regard to services outside of Canada. We want to get it well organized first. It is a situation we cannot rush at. But the response has been good, and the appointments which have been made have, in my opinion, been excellent. I believe it will be proved that we have been wise in going slowly in the matter. We have not yet appointed a commandant of the Canadian Women's Army Corps, although I expect an announcement will be made shortly. We asked Matron-in-Chief Smellie to act as adviser with regard to organization. Her experience and her judgment and advice have been invaluable. Matron-in-Chief Smellie has travelled throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and has met women in different organizations interested. She has explained the needs of the army for the service they can perform. As I say, the response has been excellent. As the committee is aware, personnel are obtained through the Department of National War Services. The Department of National Defence makes requisition on the Department of National War Services, and that department sends us personnel, subject to approval by the department itself.

Mr. STIRLING: How are the commissions granted?

Mr. RALSTON: Most of the officers appointed so far had had service with other women's corps of this type. They have not been granted from the ranks. It is expected that shortly we shall be able to institute the system we have in the army—that is to say, coming through the ranks for a certain period, and then being commissioned.

Mr. SENN: How are the ladies to be employed called up? Is it according to date of application? A number in my district are anxiously waiting to be called.

Mr. RALSTON: This is within the jurisdiction of the Department of National War Services. I shall make inquiries to see whether anything can be done by the Department of National Defence with respect to those who are particularly eligible.

May I just say a word respecting the reserve army. Two or three months ago we issued instructions with regard to the reserve army, which, while somewhat changing its status, gave it a definite role in our whole scheme of military organization. We have pointed out that the reserve army constitutes an important factor in the defence of Canada and in maintaining our active army overseas. In order to meet the situations as they arise in an ever-changing war it is essential that we have the reserve army well organized, well trained and, as far as possible consistent with other requirements, well armed. Present plans do not contemplate any extensive additional mobilization of reserve units, but that possibility is to be kept in mind.

We have outlined the duties of the reserve army to be these: an operational role in the defence of Canada, when and where required; aid to the civil power in cases of subversive or other disturbances; reinforcement of the active army—that is to say, by enlisting men, and having them ready to support their active unit, if it is overseas, or some other active unit in the same territory, if it happens that that particular unit has not an active unit overseas. Then there is the possibility, in some instances at least, of mobilization.

We have indicated to them that those functions are not cited in order of importance. They are all important, and we cannot tell which one at a particular time may have to be complied with. It does make the position of the reserve units difficult; at the same time that is the situation which exists in Canada, and we cannot do otherwise than ask them to have their eyes on those four roles as the major jobs for which they were organized. We have asked that they be administered so that they may be in a position to carry out whichever function they may be called upon to perform, in view of conditions at a particular time.

Then, there was another new rule. We felt we should increase the age limit and decrease the medical category. In other words we have raised the age limit for the reserve to fifty years and decreased the medical category to category C. But we have indicated that in view of the fact that they will be taking in men who will be reinforcements, and also that in some cases there might be possibility of mobilization, they may take up to a certain percentage of A or higher category men.

What they are doing is paying special attention to training, both basic and advanced and specialized. There will also be increased issue and distribution of equipment with regard to the reserve army, taking into account, of course, the needs of the active units. It is no lip-service I am paying when I point out what a valuable contribution the reserve army of Canada and its officers have made to this war effort through at first being the backbone of the active army, being in their places and endeavouring in every possible way to train men to make them ready to enlist in active units, and doing their best to induce them to understand what their duty is when the call comes.

The officers and non-commissioned officers have been indefatigable, and the men have been most faithful in training, in the attention they have given to their work, and in their desire to be of service. To some extent the reserve army consists of men who because of financial or domestic or personal reasons are unable to take their places in the active army. In the reserve they are trying to do their part as best they can, so that we may release all the men possible for active duty.

Mr. STIRLING: The pay the officers and men receive is still on the same basis as it used to be, is it not? It is based on the time of service in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: It is on the basis of training. The basis this year is up to fifty per cent of strength, that is to say, they may receive training pay for personnel up to fifty per cent of their total war strength. That is now being reconsidered.

Mr. GREEN: Are the reserve units permitted to recruit up to strength? I understand that some units on the Pacific coast are far below strength and are greatly discouraged. There seems to be something wrong with the way the reserve army is being handled.

Mr. RALSTON: There are some officers at headquarters who have an especially warm spot in their hearts for the reserve army and they give it constant attention. They realize the difficulties and are endeavouring to improve their position in every way and to give the reserve the recognition which will ensure that it is used to the best advantage. Representations have been received from the west coast with regard to a unit which was recruited practically up to strength and which desired to be paid for that number. The present rule is that they may recruit up to strength, but they are paid for training only up to fifty per cent.

Mr. GREEN: Would not the esprit de corps be improved if they were paid for the full strength?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it would, and the matter is being considered. Just before I left for England I had a talk with the army council, and I am not satisfied with the situation in this regard. The rule was made because of a lack of training equipment and because of the tremendous appeal which was being made for recruits for the active army. There were not a great number of units in which the strength was more than fifty per cent, and that figure was taken as a fair average for payment. In many units the men pool their pay; they train without pay except that it goes to the benefit of the regiment as a whole. In other words, pay has not been the absolute test of whether or not a man would serve in the reserve unit. Many have agreed that their pay should go into regimental funds.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any method whereby an officer or a non-commissioned officer in a reserve unit can transfer to the active army and retain something like the rank he held in the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: If an officer in the active unit asks for a man who is qualified as an officer and recommends him accordingly, I do not think there would be any difficulty about the transfer. A man may transfer to an active unit simply by enlisting.

Mr. GREEN: If a sergeant-major in a reserve unit enlisted in the active army would he have to give up his rank?

Mr. RALSTON: If he was commission material he would be recommended by the officer commanding for an officer's training course where he could qualify for a commission.

Mr. GREEN: A sergeant would have to revert to the rank of private?

Mr. RALSTON: Unless the commanding officer asked for a man with that rank.

Mr. GREEN: A major would have to revert to the rank of lieutenant?

Mr. RALSTON: Neither of those ranks would be carried to the new unit as of right. If a man has the qualifications and is needed, he can be transferred.

Mr. GREEN: I know of cases where a man has been asked for by the officer commanding an active unit and it has been impossible to have him transferred.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will give me the particulars of any case where a man has been qualified to cover off a particular vacancy, I shall look into it.

Mr. GREEN: He was qualified.

Mr. RALSTON: Was there a place in the other unit into which a man of his rank would fit?

Mr. MUTCH: Wouldn't that matter lie in the discretion of the commanding officer of the reserve unit? He would have to have the consent of both commanding officers.

Mr. GREEN: The officers in both units were willing, but the district would not allow it.

Mr. RALSTON: I am assuming that the man was requested by the unit to which he was going, and consent was given by the unit from which he was going.

Mr. BRUCE: In view of what the minister has said with regard to raising the age limit to fifty years and lowering the medical category, is it not likely that the number who will enlist in the reserve army for service overseas will be greatly diminished? Is there any provision under which a certain proportion of those admitted into the reserve army will be expected to state their willingness to go overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: There is no such provision. Those are the subjects upon which I think the committee would like information. No doubt there are other subjects in the minds of hon. members about which they would like me to speak and when the opportunity comes I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister give us a statement at some stage of the proceedings with regard to the position of our troops in England, and who has the last say in their disposition overseas? I understood that there was some difficulty in the early stages of the war. I consulted the Minister of National Defence for Air at one time and he endeavoured to make this clear to me, but I could not understand the situation. I think the fault was probably mine rather than his.

Mr. POWER: The legislation is not very clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that there has been some clarification and that the position is now quite satisfactory. I should like to know just what the steps have been and what the position is now. I heard that enlistments will not be received by the department for active service in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I really hesitate to make a statement with respect to the visiting forces act. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) asked me to make a statement, which I did. I will be quite frank and say that that statement was made after I had seen the Department of External Affairs and had obtained their statement with respect to the matter. There are two expressions used, "serving together" and "serving in combination with".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any difference?

Mr. RALSTON: There is quite a difference. If my hon. friend will permit me, I would rather look up the statement I made before.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize it is a technical matter.

Mr. RALSTON: The statute is technical and the order in council passed under it is technical. I think I can say that the last word with regard to Canadian forces going to serve outside the United Kingdom lies with the government of Canada. If they go out of England for service the government of Canada would be asked to give its consent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have the last word?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the government of Canada undertake to act upon the recommendation of the commander of the Canadian corps, or does it exercise independent judgment and make an independent decision?

Mr. RALSTON: The government of Canada would give the greatest weight to the recommendation of the general officer commanding the Canadian corps. The government of Canada would have to take responsibility eventually. I was writing a note in order to get the reference in Hansard to what I said before. If my hon. friend will leave it, I shall make a statement later.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize the difficulty. Will the second question I asked be looked into?

Mr. RALSTON: No, they cannot volunteer for active service confined to Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You cannot volunteer for active service in Canada—that is a fact. Will the minister express any reason for that policy? If he does not want to do so, I shall not press him.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall deal with that later, if my hon. friend will permit me.

What I have said, Mr. Chairman, was bound to be disjointed, but I have tried to give as quick a résumé of the activities of the department as I could in the short time at my disposal for preparation.

Before I sit down I want to join with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said with regard to what we learned overseas, and to pay tribute to the morale, courage and determination of the British people. I found them, as he found them, still superb, and better prepared than they were last December when I was over there. I found them still ready to go short themselves if they thought that any other theatre of war provided an opportunity for effective use of equipment against the enemy. It is both a challenge and an inspiration to go to England and to meet those men and women and those boys and girls who have stood so much in the last year, who know it is coming again, and who are absolutely unflinching.

With regard to the course of the war I think we must remember that Greece and Crete gained time for us. Hitler's attack on Russia was thus delayed, and Russia's resistance to Hitler's attack has again delayed the invasion of Britain. We now know that we have reason for thankfulness that the invasion of Britain did not come in June or July of 1940, at a time when, as Lord Gort's dispatches indicate, the situation was serious enough.

I want to impress on the committee what has already been said but cannot be said too often. My own feeling is that the war has only just really begun, that so far all that we have done is to avoid defeat, that we still have to begin to win.

Casting up the balance sheet as of to-day as compared with a year ago, we have on the debit side Yugoslavia, Greece and Crete overrun, Russia attacked and very serious inroads made upon her. The one-by-one policy has seemed to prevail, and the juggernaut has run on. On the other side, we have that outstanding fact which I have just mentioned, namely, that the British have come through. They have proved that they can stand the blitzkrieg. There is no chance in the world of bombing ever bringing those brave people to their knees. We have Iran,

[Mr. Green.]

Iraq and Syria, all on the credit side of the sheet. We have United States sentiment, and not only sentiment but powerful influences and support as well, more strongly consolidated and being exerted in a more effective way than a year ago. We have growing resistance in occupied countries, which is making itself felt day by day, and we have the heroic resistance which Russia is making, to the amazement and gratification and admiration of the world. All that is on the credit side of the sheet. Hitler's dream of securing not merely military but economic domination over Russia is yet unfulfilled. He expected a rapid victory. He has not had it, and it surely must have upset his plans.

But I do want to emphasize the fact that resistance is not enough and will not bring victory; that so long as the forces of destruction continue to rage there can be no security and no peace in any corner of the world. The way to shorten the war is to have the free world with its whole resources and its total energy concentrated on the supreme task of being able to deal with Hitler in the only language he knows, and that is the language of force. Canada has its place in that great undertaking.

I am no defeatist. I believe we shall win, not simply because we say so, but because Canada along with the other democracies will stop at nothing which can effectively be done to ensure that the forces of evil shall be stamped out, that the menace of slavery shall be banished, and that free men and their families may enjoy the liberty which until this struggle began we in this dominion had somehow taken for granted. We cannot take it for granted any longer. The menace is against Canada as well as against the rest of the world.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In giving enlistment figures last night the minister said that about 105,000 had volunteered for service. They would not all be medically fit, I presume.

Mr. RALSTON: They are the enlistments.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What are the figures of those medically fit?

Mr. RALSTON: Those are the enlistments, the number accepted.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Attested as medically fit?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We had a case in Winnipeg of a man wanting a medical rejection. The recruiting officer told him that that could not be granted until he had actually enlisted and been medically examined. That is why I was a little confused by the minister's figures.

Mr. RALSTON: By enlistments I mean accepted.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Chairman, the personnel of the Royal Canadian Air Force in Canada and overseas on the 1st of November, 1941, was 89,000 odd, which brings us to approximately 90,000 to-day, the 6th of November. This is in addition to personnel attached to the Royal Canadian Air Force belonging to the Royal Air Force, the Royal Australian Air Force and the Royal New Zealand Air Force. It is also in exclusion of something like 11,000 civilians, about half of whom are taking the place of service men who have been released for more active duty. So that, all told, there are to-day under the control of the Department of National Defence for Air well over 100,000 persons.

It may be of interest to the committee if I discuss for a moment the question of man-power in Canada as it affects the Royal Canadian Air Force. The age limit for the entry of pilots—I am speaking largely of air crews, that is those who will eventually become pilots, observers, wireless air gunners and gunners, in whom we are particularly interested—the age limit for pilots is from 18 to 31; it is 18 to 30 really—those who have not reached 31. For observers the age limits are 18 to 32—those who have not reached 33—and for wireless air gunners and gunners the age limits are the same.

The class of the population in which we are particularly interested is the class from 18 to 25 years of age, and so I have asked the officers of the department to give me some statistics regarding that class in order that I may indicate to the house and the country the approximate reserves of man-power which will be necessary to enable us to carry on our operations.

Assuming that there are in Canada to-day 177,150 males between the ages of 18 and 25 who have completed junior matriculation—the educational qualification is a most important factor in our work—and assuming that 33 per cent are physically unfit for aircraft duty, because we require a very high standard, and that 17 per cent have no inclination to fly, this would leave 50 per cent available, or 88,575.

It is impossible to estimate the number of these who have already enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force and in the other services, but assuming this figure to be 50 per cent, which I think is a little low, it will leave a pool of 38,575 available for enlistment as pilots or observers.

The educational qualifications for wireless air gunners and gunners are somewhat lower than junior matriculation. Two years of high school will do. For the moment I am speaking only of wireless air gunners or gunners.

It is estimated that 26,000 men with complete junior matriculation reach the age of 18 each year. Deducting fifty per cent of this figure to cover those who will be medically unfit or have no inclination to fly, will leave 13,000 qualified for enlistment as pilots and observers becoming of age each year. There will therefore be a deficiency, because we will require many more than 13,000, if we take only those coming up each year. Part of this deficiency will be made up by bringing up to the required educational standards, through the medium of the dominion-provincial youth training schools and the Canadian Legion, applicants who in other respects are qualified for enlistment in this category. We also have our backlog of the 38,000, and besides, if the necessity arises, the age group between twenty-five and thirty-two, to which I have not referred, but which is in existence to some extent, although it must have been seriously depleted by enlistments already, both in the air force and in other arms of the service.

Fortunately it has been possible, and without any very great propaganda on our part, to enlist a certain number of American applicants. So that for the moment at least, though I give no guarantee of the future, and for some months to come, we have a considerable reserve from which we can draw for our aircrew requirements. During the month of July, for instance, we enlisted something near 4,000 aircrew, and at the end of the month there were about that many whose applications were in a more or less complete state and of whom we could probably get 3,000 to come into aircrew training should we require them.

I give this next figure with some reluctance, and with a warning to the committee that it may not mean all that it appears to mean. It is called "approaches", "approaches" meaning that a man has visited a recruiting centre. The total number of approaches to the Royal Canadian Air Force recruiting centres since the war started is 317,304. I do not want that to be taken to indicate that there are really 317,000. I am under the impression that, particularly in the early stages of the war, a man may have gone two or three times and have been checked two or three times. But this is continuing. Last week, for instance, the figures were something like 1,790, indicating that there is a continuing interest in recruiting in the Royal Canadian Air Force, which has not slackened in any appreciable degree since the beginning of the war.

Total medical examinations at recruiting centres since the beginning of the war were 153,277. I am sorry to say that I have not the figures indicating how many of these were rejected. The total trade tests were 97,145, of which 41,896 have been enlisted. Sometimes the trade tests are only interviews with the trade tests officers, but they are all counted in here as trade tests.

I give these figures to show that, in any survey of actual or potential man-power in Canada, having regard to the requirements of the armed forces, the needs of the Royal Canadian Air Force must be taken into consideration. Particularly there is that field of the age group between 18 and 25, wherein, without any particular efforts on our part, without any propaganda, there will undoubtedly be priority for the Royal Canadian Air Force. Whether we like it or not, whether we take any other steps, selective or otherwise, the young men of Canada between 18 and 25 want to join the Royal Canadian Air Force; and it does not matter what we do about it, they are going to join it anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or the navy.

Mr. POWER: Or the navy. We have been asked by the leader of the opposition what is our objective. In so far as the air force is concerned the sky is the limit. We will take as aircrew all the young men of Canada who are willing and able to serve, and we make no limit anywhere. I do not even follow the example of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence for the Army. If anyone wants to enlist in our air force, whether his employer likes it or not, whether his employer calls him a key man or not, if he wants to come in the air force he comes in, and that is all there is to it.

With respect to the higher strategic aspects of the war which were discussed by the leader of the opposition and the Minister of National Defence, namely as to with what particular branch of the service the war is eventually to be won, I am not prepared to discuss that, because I do not know. But I will say this: you may need the army to win the war, but you will lose the war without the air force. That has been patent to everybody since the war started, and that condition is going to obtain to the end of the war. The experience of this war has shown that, even with her mighty mechanized forces, Germany made no advances whatsoever until she obtained air superiority. If one were to assimilate this factor to what has occurred in ages gone by, probably you would recast the somewhat blasphemous expression attributed to Napoleon, that God is on the side of the heaviest battalions, and say that this war has shown that Providence is on the side of those who have air supremacy. Up to this time there has been no doubt of that.

As is usual in discussing matters relating to this department, for the sake of clarity I have endeavoured to divide the activities of the department into home war, joint air training plan, and the overseas forces.

Beginning with home war, activities during the summer recess have been confined largely to the construction of new defensive aerodromes and to the consolidation of those already started: on the east coast, Yarmouth, Shelburne, Dartmouth, Sydney; and in Newfoundland, Botwood, Gander, and Torbay—the latter recently opened officially by the unofficial landing of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence on his arrival from the other side only last week, in the first aeroplane to land at that particular aerodrome. Going north, we have established aerodromes and staging facilities at Goose Bay—that is Northwest River, Labrador, and elsewhere. These are for defence, for ferrying, and for spare aerodromes in case fog or weather conditions make any of the other places unavailable.

On the west coast we have carried out the same programme of developing stations all along the coast—Alliford Bay, Ucluelet, Tofino, Coal Harbour, Bella Bella, Prince Rupert, and, on this side of the mountains, of developing the great circle route Edmonton-White Horse-Alaska. The squadrons on both coasts have been materially increased in numbers, and above all we now have a certain number of aircraft for them—Digbys, Hudsons, Bolingbrokes, and Stranraers made in Canada, and, recently, Kitty Hawks and Catalinas. In that respect, let me repeat what was said in the house, I believe in June, 1940, or earlier. So far as we are concerned, the first line of defence of this country is on the other side, and if we have here aircraft that are required over there they will get them. Recently we were about to take delivery of a certain number of Aerocobras, the fastest fighting aircraft in the world, but they were more useful on the other side and they were sent there. Only two or three weeks ago delivery had begun of a certain number of Catalina PBY flying boats, the latest and best development in this type of aircraft. They were found to be more useful on the other side and they are there now.

With respect to the personnel of these squadrons on both coasts, they have a risky, dirty, tiresome and boring task. They may not have all the risk, but certainly they have a large proportion of the risk encountered by those on active service. They serve in lonely places and in dirty weather and patrol work is hazardous in the extreme. Little glamour is attached to it, and yet they carry on day after day without complaint. I therefore wish once more to pay tribute to them and to assure them that, as circumstances permit, it will be my intention to give them an opportunity to do the kind of work overseas which all of them desire to engage in.

In connection with the home effort, we have instituted a school known as the CWAAF—the Canadian Women's Auxiliary Air Force. In that connection we have taken a different attitude from my hon. friend, in that, with the exception of three or four commissions, no commissions have been given directly. One commission was given the commanding officer, Mrs. Walker, and two others were female medical doctors who have come into the service with commissions. The remainder are being trained at the school in Toronto, where we have taken over the Havergal ladies' college. We began by selecting for training, to be turned out in accordance with the marks obtained, either as non-commissioned officers or officers, 150 women from across Canada. When these have been selected they will form the nucleus of the officers and non-commissioned officers of the corps, and we expect to open training schools for others, who will come in very much greater numbers as time goes on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How do they propose to make these selections?

Mr. POWER: The 150 have been selected. The board was composed of the commanding officer, a medical officer, Doctor Davey of Hamilton, one officer who was lent to us by the United Kingdom from the W.A.A.F., and one male officer of the Royal Canadian Air Force. The board received applications in the different sections of the country and from among those applications selected those who were to go to this school for training.

Mr. STIRLING: What will be their principal duties

Mr. POWER: Largely clerical and dietetic, perhaps more in connection with motor transport and more active work at the aerodromes. For instance, at the flying training schools such as Uplands, we shall require 126 to take the place of men. They will serve as cooks and so on, and do the work of service men who are employed operating telephones, and they will engage in parachute packing and work of that kind. In the Royal Air Force an infinite variety of work is being done by these women, and we expect that as time goes on, more gradually than would have been the case on the other side, it will be possible to introduce women into a great deal of the work now done by general-duties men or by men in orderly rooms on the station.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there a flood of applications?

Mr. POWER: We do not get the applications. I was surprised to hear the Minister of National War Services say that he had only 16,000 applications altogether from women. I surmise the reason is that women who are in existing unofficial organizations probably prefer to remain in those organizations in the hope that they will be taken over as a whole. I am only surmising that; I do not know. If so, that may account for it. I had anticipated such a flood of applications as would render it difficult to deal with the matter.

In addition to the organization of the women's auxiliary corps, the air cadet league of Canada has been instituted. It was inaugurated in June and began its work some time ago. I have here a list of the directorate. The president is Mr. George B. Foster, K.C., of Montreal, and there is a list of excellent men chosen from all over Canada. I will put the list on Hansard.

The honorary secretary is Mr. Arthur L. Melling, and Squadron Leader R. W. Frost, R.C.A.F., is acting national director.

At the present time there are in existence in Canada something like 14,000 air cadets in units divided somewhat as follows—I will give the number of air cadets: British Columbia, 2,500, nineteen units; Alberta, 1,200, eleven units; Saskatchewan, 2,400, eighteen units; Manitoba, 700, three units; Ontario, 1,000, eight units; Quebec, 5,000, thirteen units; Nova Scotia, 200, three units; Prince Edward Island, 100, two units.

This is the potential which they have at the moment, because most of these units are in process of organization and have not yet applied for affiliation to the league. Actually enlisting under their auspices or belonging to the league are 3,400 cadets in thirty-three units. These 3,400 are actually affiliated to the league but the others are outside the league, though it is expected that they will come in. The league is rapidly organizing cadet units across Canada.

Mr. SENN: Is there an age limit?

Mr. POWER: The age limit is eighteen—well, they must not have reached eighteen because by that time we take them for the R.C.A.F. They can start at twelve, but those from twelve to fourteen are not encouraged.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Fourteen to eighteen?

Mr. POWER: They have the right to go down to twelve, but we are not encouraging that; the ages that are encouraged are from thirteen to seventeen. I am glad to say that in many instances former Royal Canadian Air Force or fleet air arm officers have turned out gladly to help these boys by giving them their drill and training. The air cadet training programme is a basic training programme and is similar to the elementary ground training received in our own schools. In addition to that we have inaugurated a system of university training for future air crew recruits. It is not a C.O.T.C. in that we do not give or promise them commissions, but it is a university air training course. A number of Canadian universities have made arrangements with us to provide what is called pre-flight training on the Royal Canadian Air Force syllabus as an alternative to army training. Only university students who can meet the medical requirements for air crew training and who sign a statement of honourable intention to join the Royal Canadian Air Force at the completion of their university course are being accepted. Medical examination and uniforms will be provided by the Royal Canadian Air Force, which will also make available the necessary training equipment and instructional assistance.

Students who have completed compulsory military training may complete the air force course this year, and other students who have not yet undergone compulsory military training may spread the air force course over two academic years. Students completing this course will be recognized as having fulfilled the requirements under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

The course will be equivalent to the course of training at initial training schools of the Royal Canadian Air Force in connection with the British commonwealth air training plan. Such schools provide preliminary ground training for future pilots and air observers. The university course will provide 200 hours of similar instruction in mathematics, armaments, air force law, airmanship, theory of flight, et cetera and will be followed by two weeks of summer camp at one of the service flying training schools, where this ground instruction in air force life will be continued under service conditions.

Mr. STIRLING: They will still have to attain the educational standard?

Mr. POWER: By the very fact of being students at the university they have matriculation.

Besides this, in an endeavour to salvage those who have failed on their first attempt, we have opened a "cease training" school at Trenton, Ontario, for pilots particularly who fail through no fault of their own, perhaps on account of physical defects or because they just naturally cannot fly a machine. We have formed a reorientation school, or rehabilitation school if you like, at Trenton, wherein these young men are assisted in finding some other trade. It may be a man would not make a good pilot but has the educational qualifications to be an observer, or it may be a regional control officer, or if he has a good educational background he may make a ground navigator instructor, if he has a good knowledge of mathematics. I am glad to say, and I know it will be of great interest to the committee to know that that school has been placed under the care and command of one of our colleagues, who is doing a mighty good job, Wing-Commander Denton Massey, at Trenton.

Mr. TUSTIN: After these boys are "washed out" as pilots, as I believe it is called, do they all go to this school to be re-selected for some other branch of the service?

Mr. POWER: Yes, I think so. There is quite a number there at the present time, and at one time until they got properly organized, they stayed there some considerable time, but I am told that that situation has improved enormously and we are getting them out to other branches and other trades. My information is that this school has been a great success.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister ascertain whether it is compulsory for these boys to go to that school, or have they the right of election?

Mr. POWER: We have had two or three kinds of enlistment; the original enlistment for aircrews I think gave us the right to say, "Even if you do not succeed as a pilot you will have to go on and try as an observer or a wireless air gunner or gunner if we want you to." As a matter of fact we did that. I shall have to check back to see what the status is of a man who enlisted for aircrew and failed on one or more points, whether we can put him down to standard duty. I think that lately we have brought that into effect, but I am not sure.

I come now to the joint air training plan. The growing importance of this plan I think I need not stress, but as an example of the interest with which it is being regarded on the other side I call attention to the fact that it was thought of sufficient importance for a member of the royal family, His Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, to visit the air training schools of the joint empire training plan in Canada, as well as those belonging to the Royal Air Force. He came as an air commodore in the Royal Air Force and, as befits such an officer, he flew from one end of this country to the other and visited as many schools as, if not more than, any inspector excepting the inspector-general of our own Canadian force. He was well received by our people; they were extremely glad to see him, and when he left he told me he had enjoyed his visit very much.

In connection with the joint air training scheme some flying statistics may be of interest:

1. Hours flown by J.A.T.P. schools to September 30, 1941	1,795,893
At 125 miles per hour this represents	224,486,625	miles
Number of fatal accidents	157
Number of hours flown per fatal accident	11,438	hours
Number of miles flown per fatal accident	1,429,851	miles
2. United States civilian flying in 1940 show 1,269,231 miles flown per each fatal accident.
3. The fatal accident rate of J.A.T.P. schools has come down from November, 1940, when it was ·17 to September, 1941, when the rate was ·067 or 1 fatal accident to 1,818,279 miles flown, but we must expect an upward trend during the winter months.
4. Total flying time for September, including home war establishment and Royal Air Force in Canada	253,490	hours
Total flying time since April, 1940	1,887,130	hours
Total flying time since Sept. 30/40 to Sept. 30/41	1,760,640	hours
Total flying time since Jan. 1, 1941—that is for nine months of the present year	1,596,680	hours
This latter figure indicates that the total flying time for the present calendar year will be about	2,250,000	hours
5. If the average flying speed is taken at 125 miles an hour, then we are exceeding 31,686,250 miles a month, or over 1,000,000 miles a day.

Now this I am sure will be of interest to hon. members; all the flying stations in Canada are now selected. I am not asking for any more aerodromes. As far as the joint air training plan is concerned they are not all open, but they are all selected, and I am handing to Hansard a list of the British commonwealth air training plan establishments. The plan is now in full operation. As a matter of fact there remain two schools to open before the end of the year, but all sites are selected and construction well under way, and we do not propose to develop any more aerodromes. That does not mean that we are going to remain static; what we shall do will be that when we "upgrade" or increase the pupil population we shall add more buildings to the existing establishments. For instance, in the elementary training flying schools we propose to make into double schools, I think five this month which are at present single schools, and next spring probably two or three more. The British commonwealth air training plan establishments are as follows:

By that system we shall avoid the necessity of further expenditures in the building of aerodromes. We upgraded our output by what is known as overbearing—that is, taking on more pupils. In some instances we have done this because the courses have been lengthened. Where we had a ten-week course we have made it a fourteen-week course. But in order that there be no interference with output we have taken on more pupils. Therefore in the long run the final result is the same.

As time has gone on we have been changing the syllabus. We must keep up to date with the progress of the war and with science. At one time the call was all for fighters. At the present time there is a very special call for observers and bombers. Accordingly we must meet the difficulties as they come. We must keep our schools up to date, so that we may be able to develop the men who are most required at a given time. It has been necessary to increase the number of manning depots and initial training schools to a considerable degree over that which was anticipated at the beginning.

With the construction of schools, new construction at schools already in existence, new projects in the way of reserve fields, and new buildings for auxiliary services, such as manning depots, embarkation depots and so on, our works and buildings branch has been as busy this summer as it was in 1940. Probably the expenditure is just as great.

Apart from the joint air training plan schools themselves, there are now operating in Canada other schools and establishments manned by the Royal Air Force personnel, and utilized primarily for the training of Royal Air Force pupils.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves the joint plan, would he be good enough to indicate to what extent the sister dominions are utilizing the plan, having regard to what the previous arrangement was? Are they using our facilities to an increased extent, or is that use decreasing? Will it eventually fade away?

Mr. POWER: I am unable to say whether or not the utilization by our partners will fade away. I was coming to that later on. I might say now, however, that there is a proposal for the continuance after 1943 of the joint air training plan. As a matter of fact that was one of the matters I took up when I was on the other side. As to whether Australia and New Zealand will continue on the same basis, or whether we will carry on on a different financial basis, or whether they would prefer to do their own training, in view of the fact that perhaps to a considerable extent they have now developed their own schools, I am not in a position to say.

To all intents and purposes, they have kept up their contribution of air crew personnel. It has not been diminished. When in certain instances we increased the number I believe some of our sister dominions said that they would not send them all the way to Canada, but would send some direct, instead. But they have lived up to their commitments fully, and in an entirely satisfactory way. May I point out further that the personnel they have sent us has been most excellent and outstanding in our schools. Australian and New Zealand pupils have really made names for themselves in the way of discipline and energy, and the enthusiasm they show in their work.

Apart from these joint training plan schools there are a number of schools manned by Royal Air Force personnel and utilized for the purpose of training Royal Air Force pupils. I have no authority from the United Kingdom officials to give information respecting the location of these schools, the number of personnel or pupils. I can say, however, that these courses are under the control and administration of the Royal Canadian Air Force, and they constitute a most important addition both in schools and in the responsibilities of the department.

Then, the Canadian government facilities have been used in connection with the selection of sites for those schools, the development of aerodromes, and the construction of buildings and runways. All projects at present contemplated—and I say this advisedly—are being proceeded with expeditiously. The additional burdens placed upon the various departments, as well as the Royal Canadian Air Force, have been met without difficulty. The estimated cost of the transfer school policy to March 31, 1942, is $105,000,000. That is only an estimate, and it is on a repayment basis.

I return now to the matter of equipment in our own school. We have at least twice as many aircraft as we had last year, and they are coming in fast. But our needs are much greater than they were. The ministry of supply are honouring their commitments, but we are asking for more, and will continue to ask for more. It is a question of balance. There is no good in extending in one direction without extending in others at the same time, so that a man's training can be carried right through. Some types of aircraft are harder to get than others. They must have special qualities and performance. This applies particularly to the training aircraft in the bombing and gunnery schools.

The equipment in kind is being received from the United Kingdom. We are experimenting, substituting and modifying, and I hope—in fact I am sure—that it will be possible to modify certain types of aircraft built in Canada under the Department of Munitions and Supply so as to substitute them for those most difficult to get from the other side. I believe we shall get what we need, and if we do we shall be able to increase considerably our output of a certain type of pupils to which we are not at all committed. I refer to pupils such as the straight air gunners—tail-end-Charleys, they call them. They are the men who sit at the tail-end of the bombing planes, with all heaven above and all hell below. We could train many of these men. They require clear grit; they must have nerves of steel, and a clear eye. We have in Canada men of that kind we could train, when we get the necessary extra aircraft to do it.

I turn now to overhaul. Last year it was a headache; this year it is arthritis, phlebitis, St. Vitus dance and everything else put together. The cause of the disease is a shortage of spares. There is a world shortage of spares, and particularly of engines. Naturally it arises from the urgent demand for engines for operational aircraft. The planes we use in our bombing and gunnery schools are Fairey Battle planes powered with Merlin engines. Nothing less powerful than the Merlin engine will do.

We are carrying on thousands of hours of bombing, and our demands for spares are enormous and probably unprecedented.

In the matter of supplies of these Battle and Merlin engines we are almost entirely in the hands of the authorities overseas. They know our needs, and they must be the final judges of where supplies can best be used. It must be remembered that they have responsibilities in south Africa, Rhodesia, Australia and other parts of the world. What spares can be made here we will make, but there are limits in that regard. It is a difficult art, calling for special tools which may be needed elsewhere. The answer is to extemporize, substitute and multiply. We are doing all this. So far there has been no hold-up, and we hope there will not be. But I do not wish to disguise from the committee that the going is pretty tough, and that we shall have a hard time to keep those planes in the air.

I turn now to output of trained pilots, observers, wireless air gunners and gunners. The steady stream of pilots is more than we had hoped. It is running smoothly, and they are turning out in greater numbers than we expected when the plan was conceived. We have a right to be proud that we have gone far beyond our original plan. Anyone who has been overseas knows that our boys are there. They are not there in speeches; they are not there in the papers, but they are there in bombers, there at their stations, and there over Germany every night. They are there in Tripoli and Libya and Russia—and everywhere. Wherever the Royal Air Force is, there they are.

Last year someone asked in the house what the position was, and I said we would be judged by the results of our plans. I can say now that that hon. member need not ask me; he could ask Hitler. Hitler knows, and he is going to know more and more, as this war goes on. The other answer is to read the daily press. Only this week in flaming headlines in all the press of Canada there was an account of the daring and successful attack of Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons on German shipping. That took place under the nose of the German navy, under the guns of the garrisons of occupied France and in the teeth of the German air force itself. There is no doubt that we can say that the Royal Canadian Air Force pupil graduates are coming into their own. There were those who jeered when we began eighteen months ago with the first class of 168 men and said that we could not win wars on schedule. That class of 168 men has been multiplied one-hundredfold, and to-day I think we can safely say that the empire training scheme has won its wings.

[Mr. Power.]

Overseas we have sixteen squadrons in active operation while one was recently dispatched to the middle east. They are of all types and categories, fighter, night fighter, army cooperation, bomber and so on. Besides that, thousands of our men are in the Royal Air Force wherever the Royal Air Force is fighting. We have also supplied radio mechanics and ground crews. As yet we have not sufficient ground crews, but we are sending them over all the time and before long we expect to equip the twenty-five Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons there now and whatever squadrons we may be able to send over later with our own ground crews.

In view of this active participation of the Royal Canadian Air Force it has been thought advisable to issue a kind of communique at intervals, perhaps irregular, indicating to the Canadian people just what their own boys in the air force are doing. I have the first of these official communiques which will be released to the press to-morrow, and perhaps it might be interesting to hon. members if I were to read it. It reads:

Daylight sweeps by fighter aircraft, escort duties during bombing raids on northern France, heavy night attacks on German territory and large-scale activities against enemy shipping have been included in recent activities of squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas.

During offensive sweeps over nazi held territory, one Royal Canadian Air Force fighter squadron accounted for three Messerschmitt 109's and damaged a fourth. Another squadron, acting as escort for formations of Blenheim bombers in a successful raid on Mazingarbe, northern France, destroyed two enemy aircraft which tried to interfere. Credit for these two victories went to Pilot Officer G. McClusky of Sudbury and Sergeant G. D. Robertson of 3 Lamport avenue, Toronto.

In night fighting operations over Britain, a Royal Canadian Air Force night fighter squadron, commanded by Wing Commander D. G. Morris, Oakville, Ontario, destroyed three enemy raiders and damaged a fourth.

The three aircraft destroyed, a Junkers 88, Dornier 17 and Heinkel 111, were all shot down by Wing Commander Morris himself, two of them within half an hour on one night. The Dornier blew up in the air when hit by cannon fire from the wing commander's guns, and pieces of it struck his own aircraft, putting one engine out of action. But he managed to return safely to his base on the remaining motor.

Wing Commander Morris has been awarded the distinguished flying cross and his observer, Sergeant Rix, has received the distinguished flying medal. Credit for damaging the fourth raider is given Flight Lieutenant F. W. Hillock, 14 Walmsley boulevard, Toronto, and his observer, Sergeant L. G. Bell of Montreal.

A bomber squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Force took part in heavy raids on Stetting, Hamburg, Essen and Ostend, successfully bombing the targets allotted to it. Three veteran crews of this squadron were assigned to participate in a severe raid on Bavaria and reported that the target had been badly damaged.

In recent operations against enemy convoys off the coasts of northern France, Holland and Denmark, a Royal Canadian Air Force squadron of the coastal command scored direct hits on supply ships and tankers.

Wing Commander H. M. Tyles, commander of the squadron, scored direct hits on at least three occasions and holds the high score in his squadron. Pilot Officer Robert Wudds, of Toronto, is credited with direct hits, along with Flight Lieutenant W. A. Anderson, 12 Whitehall apartments, Osborne street, Winnipeg, and Sergeant Pilot J. K. Abbott of Toronto.

Two Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons cooperated with the imperial and Canadian armies in the recent manoeuvres, recognized as the most extensive in the history of the British army.

As time goes on and as they are prepared, it is our intention to issue similar communiques to the Canadian press.

I come now to a discussion of my trip overseas last summer. The purpose of my trip was to see and hear from our partners in the joint air training plan just how our boys were shaping up, to see the boys themselves, and as the plan was in full operation to ascertain what modifications and improvements could be made, particularly what improvements could be made in Canada. I stressed particularly the lot of our graduates, those men who are not formed into Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons. A vast majority of them are attached to the Royal Air Force.

We have taken the very cream of the youth of Canada. We have taken these youths from our schools, our colleges and our universities. I think these men are the most truly Canadian body that exists anywhere in the world. I would say that as a body they are more Canadian than even this House of Commons. There has been no great tide of immigration from the other side, from Great Britain or anywhere else, during the past twenty-five years. These boys are mainly third, fourth and fifth generation Canadians, bred in Canada, schooled in Canadian schools and with an intensely Canadian viewpoint. Their viewpoint is far removed from that of those of us who are perhaps more closely connected with the old land. They are more Canadian by far than was the Canadian army in the last war, in which was a large proportion of men born on the other side of the water. As I say, these men have the Canadian viewpoint, if it exists anywhere. They are the future leaders of this country and the destiny of Canada will some day be in their hands. Therefore, it behooves us, or any government that takes its duties seriously, to see to it that these men do not return from overseas with the same sense of disappointment, disillusionment and discontent as did the men who returned from the last war.

Perhaps it would have been better if we had been able to keep them together as Canadians, but the circumstances were such that we had to sacrifice national pride to efficiency and expedition. In order to produce more of them more quickly and get them into the fighting line, we placed them in a joint pool with the other young men of the empire. I do not think that will do them any harm. There has been no difficulty in getting them to fight alongside other men of the empire. The cause is such and the enemy is such that all sons of freedom can very well combine to fight against this common enemy. But the boys themselves, and their parents as well, like to think that they are with pals, and it was in order to keep them together as much as possible, whether in Canadian or British formations, that I made representations to the British government. May I say at once that there was not the slightest hesitation or reluctance on their part. To ask was to receive and every suggestion met with immediate and enthusiastic acquiescence.

I have been asked on many occasions since my return what we had to say about the quality of our output, and that was the first question I placed before the air ministry. And here is the answer—textually, no flattery, no encomiums—this was a business meeting:

The air member for training paid a warm tribute to the high personal quality of Canadian trainees. He mentioned that there had been many factors which might have had an adverse effect on the quality of the output from the training scheme as it arrived in the United Kingdom.

The scheme was one of great magnitude, involving much initial preparation. Some of the staffs available were necessarily inexperienced, essential equipment could not be supplied and after completion of basic training there were inevitably gaps during voyage and waiting periods. Furthermore, on account of the need for increased output the amount of training had been reduced to the bare minimum. He expressed his gratitude for the valuable assistance rendered by Canada in increasing the output during the difficult period through which we had been passing. There were factors such as acclimatization in the United Kingdom, map reading difficulties, different conditions of visibility and the "blackout" which might have been expected to make it necessary to give the J.A.T.P. pupils a lengthened course of training at operational training units. In spite of these factors, the quality of the training given in Canada and the keenness of the pupils had been such as to enable them to complete their operational training within the normal length of course.

Another matter discussed was the status of Canadians in the Royal Air Force, particularly those below commissioned rank. The Canadian government has a moral responsibility with regard to the general conditions and welfare of these men, to see that they should not be too widely dispersed and that they should have ready access to Canadian authority. These points were understood and agreed to, and to implement that policy the Royal Air Force very gladly invited the Royal Canadian Air Force to send over its own officers to work in the Royal Air Force in the posting branch, in records, in the pay office and in any other departments in which there might be contact with Canadian air crews or Canadian groups. They will also take our officers into their higher commands as soon as we can spare them. We have pointed out to the Royal Air Force headquarters in London that it is our desire to keep in closer touch with our people wherever they may be, and only this week we have sent overseas as air officer in chief, Air Vice-Marshal Edwards who has been in the closest touch with our graduates here. He knows our men and their needs and will look after their interests.

There were other matters dealt with, legal questions arising out of the discussion initiated by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) with regard to the Visiting Forces Act, questions with respect to courts martial, and others. Perhaps the committee is not aware of the fact that during the last war Australia—perhaps New Zealand, but certainly Australia—provided by legislation that courts martial involving sentence of death should not be passed by any but their own people. I have arranged, and I think the army is doing the same thing, that no sentence of a court martial involving dismissal, cashiering, penal servitude or sentence of death may be passed without its being sent to Canada for confirmation. That is with regard to the Royal Canadian Air Force and it applies to Canadian graduates who are now serving in the Royal Air Force in that the officers commanding will have no warrant to execute these sentences without reference to the Canadian government.

We also arranged for a better system of commissioning our graduates overseas in that there will be Canadian representation, a Canadian officer on all boards making selection of Canadian officers, and the chief air officer commanding overseas has been delegated authority, so that there will be no delay, to approve these appointments on probation and to cable the names over here.

We also took up the question of granting more commissions to graduates of wireless schools and air gunners. Whereas at one time commissions were not granted at all to wireless operators or gunners, and then subsequently a quota of 2 per cent was established, it has now been agreed that 10 per cent of the output upon completing training will receive commissioned rank, and a further 10 per cent after a certain amount of operational experience, and with regard to air gunners it has been agreed that 5 per cent shall be given commissioned rank on completion of training, and a further 15 per cent after a period of operational experience.

A number of other questions were taken up affecting the welfare of the men, as well as questions of training, syllabus and administration, and these were all dealt with in so far as we are concerned in a most satisfactory manner.

As time goes on, more and more Canadians will be grouped together in squadrons, at stations, in groups and in commands, and our men will assume higher and higher responsibilities.

There was also taken up the question of the continuation of the air training plan after April, 1943. As I have just said in answer to a question by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the matter was initiated then and it is now being taken up actively and will be discussed, I believe, within the next two or three weeks. Meanwhile I may say for the information of the committee that we are taking appropriate action for the purchase of aircraft and such equipment as may be required because we are convinced that so long as this war lasts, the air training scheme in some form or other, whether by training under our present system or otherwise, will go on, and therefore we are making arrangements for the provision of aircraft which will come in after 1943.

There is little else I have to say with respect to my visit. I saw the boys. I was impressed by their morale, their gayety, their brave comradeship, their sportsmanship and their keenness to get at their job. I do not know that there is anything of particular interest for me to tell the committee with respect to my visits to the different stations. I saw a very large proportion of the stations where our Canadians were congregated in any degree, and all I can say is that I hope we were in some manner successful, not in raising their morale, because that is not needed, but in impressing on our boys that the people of Canada were back of them right through to the end. There are many of them, and there will be many times more—how many I am not permitted to say. I can give the committee no figures, no statistics. I do not need to, because their deeds are written large across the blazing skies of Africa, Europe and Asia; they are being seared into the minds of the people of Germany and are being written gloriously into the pages of the history of Canada and the empire. Unfortunately they are being written, too, on the hearts of the afflicted parents of these boys who become casualties. There is little I can say to alleviate their grief, and I can promise no relief except this, that those who say the Canadian people cannot take it do not know whereof they speak. May I say that in the communications received from the afflicted parents there is a note of pride, of nobility, of patience and of strength. For the moment it is these individuals who feel the blow. It will be only after this accursed conflict has been liquidated and we have attempted to take stock of our national assets, when we shall require in our post-war struggle for existence in a newer world all the strength of will and brain inherent in our national character, that the Canadian people will be aware of the grievous blow and of the sacrifice which it has suffered through being deprived of the most noble, the most brilliant and the most able young men of this generation.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The principal part of my speech will be an explanation of the government's price ceiling policy, but before I come to that there are a few matters which may be of interest to members of the committee.

It will be recalled that in the budget it was indicated that total war expenditures would amount to something between $1,300,000,000 already appropriated for this fiscal year and the $1,450,000,000 which was the total of the departmental estimates of their requirements. This war expenditure which we refer to as the direct war expenditure of the dominion was to be in addition to the sums which it would be necessary to provide in order to enable Great Britain to purchase foodstuffs, raw materials and munitions of war in Canada. The net amount estimated to be required for this purpose for the present fiscal year was from $800,000,000 to $900,000,000. In addition to these two purposes, that is the direct war expenditure of Canada and the assistance to Great Britain, there was another purpose for which it was necessary to provide money, namely, the non-war expenditure of the government. Altogether the three amounts—direct war expenditures of the government, assistance to Great Britain, and non-war expenditures—were estimated to amount to $2,700,000,000 or $2,800,000,000, and that is the figure which I have consistently placed before parliament and before the public in any speeches which I have made upon the financial requirements of the government for the present fiscal year.

Naturally, the task of raising $2,700,000,000 or $2,800,000,000 from the people of Canada by taxes and loans is a very considerable one.

With regard to the way in which our estimates have worked out, I may say that the actual war expenditures for the first half of the fiscal year amounted to about $496,000,000. This half of the fiscal year, however, included April, which is really only about half a month from the point of view of expenditures, because much of the disbursement in that month is chargeable to the preceding fiscal year. The rate of war expenditure has been rising and is expected to rise rapidly in the second half of the year. At present I can only express the view that we shall exceed the appropriation of $1,300,000,000, but it is still too far from the end of the fiscal year to make a precise estimate of how much that excess will be. In the new session of parliament I shall have occasion to make a revised estimate.

I have been speaking about the expenditure. With regard to the revenue, I estimated in the budget that the revenue which would be obtained during the present fiscal year would be $1,400,000,000; and in some public speeches which I have made I have said it would appear that this would be exceeded, that the figure would be nearer $1,500,000,000. Always, when I have used this figure, surprise, amounting almost to incredulity, has been apparent in the faces of those to whom I was speaking, on account of the magnitude of the sum that we are raising in taxation and otherwise by way of revenue—such as post office revenue—from the Canadian people, but I am not in a position to state here with any definiteness whether the amount will be $1,400,000,000 or $1,500,000,000. No useful purpose would be served by making an estimate now; it will be only a few months before we shall know, and know exactly, but at any rate the amount received by way of revenue will be of that order.

Perhaps a striking fact about our revenues this year is this, that the tax revenues up to yesterday, with almost five months of the fiscal year yet to come, have exceeded the total tax revenue for all of last fiscal year by over $17,000,000. For the first half of the fiscal year, that is up to September 30, total revenues amounted to $696,000,000, which was $313,000,000 higher than the revenues for the same period of last year, and some $18,000,000 higher than our total expenditures for that period, excluding of course our assistance to Britain.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that suffices for a rapid and concise presentation of the revenue and expenditure position of the dominion. If there are any questions which occur to any hon. members, I shall try at a later stage to answer them.

There is another matter about which I should say something, and that is the victory loan. That was a major financial operation, and one the results of which have not been presented to the house. The victory loan campaign was in progress when the house adjourned in June. Hon members will recall the extent and nature of the campaign. A nation-wide organization was set up to promote the sale of victory bonds. The objective was at least $600,000,000. The campaign met with a very gratifying response from the Canadian people, a response which was a credit to the selling organization and a credit to Mr. Spinney, general manager of the bank of Montreal, who headed the organization. It was also a credit to the people of Canada who subscribed for bonds to an amount substantially greater than the amount of the objective which was set.

I shall now present to the committee and place on Hansard the final figures of the results of the victory loan campaign.

Total number of subscribers.....	968,259

I should like to call the attention of hon. members to that figure. It means that there was a very wide distribution of those bonds. In some provinces one person out of every eight or thereabouts of the population bought a victory bond of some kind. The average is very satisfactory indeed.

Total amount of subscriptions.....	$836,820,250
Total cash subscriptions.....	730,376,250
Total conversion subscriptions.....	106,444,000
Number of $ 50 subscriptions =	416,511
Number of subscriptions of more than $100 but not more than $500..... =	199,764

While, of course, the victory loan was the most spectacular financial event of recent months, and the main source of our borrowed funds, I should like to emphasize the importance of our continued, systematic borrowing by means of the sale of war savings certificates. The war savings organization has been operating continuously since it was established in May, 1940, and is now bringing in a steady stream of funds. It will be recalled that in February of this year an intensive campaign was conducted to increase the amount being subscribed in war savings. This campaign succeeded in bringing the monthly rate subscriptions up to the objective, but the high figures were not maintained in later months owing to the falling off in the size and number of single subscriptions. The more valuable, regular subscriptions under the payroll plan and other systematic pledge plans have continued to expand. In recent weeks another intensive campaign is being carried out, with the assistance of about forty thousand voluntary workers, for the purpose of increasing very substantially the amount of savings by these systematic methods. The activity this fall has been decentralized into the hands of provincial and local organizations, and objectives have been set for communities in terms of specific items of war supplies or weapons. It is hoped that this intensive campaign will increase the rate of subscriptions from its average level so far this year of $83,000,000 a year to a rate of at least $120,000,000 a year.

I should like to take this opportunity to express the appreciation of the government to the thousands of Canadians who are helping us with such patience and enthusiasm in this unexciting but very important work.

I come now to a brief statement of our aid to Britain. During recent months this country has continued to provide financial assistance on a large scale to the British government in order to enable Britain to obtain essential supplies she requires from Canada. Members may recall that in the budget speech I stated that Britain's total deficit of Canadian dollars from the beginning of the war up to March 31 last had been about $795,000,000, of which $250,000,000 had been met by transfer of gold, later transferred by us to the United States; $337,000,000 had been met by the repatriation of Canadian securities and other assets, through government agencies and otherwise, while the balance of $208,000,000 had been met by the accumulation by Canada of sterling balances.

In the seven months from that date to October 31 last, the amount of the British deficit has been $613,000,000. By the repatriation of its own securities held in Britain, the dominion government provided about $135,000,000 of this, while sales of other British-owned Canadian securities and other capital items accounted for about $40,000,000. The remainder, $438,000,000, much the largest part of the deficit, was provided by the dominion government in return for sterling balances placed to its credit in London and simply left there to accumulate. The total of these sterling balances on October 31 was the equivalent of about $655,000,000.

In order to enable the foreign exchange control board to accumulate sterling in this way, it was necessary to increase the fund at its disposal. This was done in July by making advances totalling $400,000,000 to the exchange fund. These advances have been charged to the consolidated revenue fund in accordance with section 3 of the War Appropriation Act passed earlier this session.

I should like to say a word about the negotiations with the provinces. The committee will recall the offer made to the provinces in the budget of last April. The leader of the opposition has indicated that he would like me to inform the committee as to the stage which negotiations with the provinces have reached. All the provinces have indicated their interest in the offer and their willingness to discuss it with the dominion. Before this discussion could take place it was necessary that our auditors examine the books of the provinces and prepare reports on a uniform and comparable basis. This was done during the summer and early fall. Then the representatives of each of the provinces came to Ottawa and I had conferences with them, and discussed with them terms and provisions which might appropriately be included in agreements to be entered into between the provinces and the dominion.

While it cannot be considered with strictness that any province is committed to enter into an agreement with the dominion, the indications are that agreements will probably be reached with all the provinces within the next few weeks. The problem of the New Brunswick municipalities, in which the leader of the opposition is particularly interested, has been given much consideration and, it is hoped, can be satisfactorily solved. Problems somewhat similar have appeared in other parts of the dominion, and it is expected that a satisfactory solution of these too will be found. I do not think I should say anything more about that. They are not solved yet, and we have not decided and cannot decide, until certain other conferences are held and certain other discussions take place, exactly what we shall do about these matters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister proposing to meet a committee of the union of municipalities from New Brunswick?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am meeting the premier and he is having representatives of the municipalities with him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the same thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: The problem presented by the municipalities is only one of a large number of difficulties which have presented themselves as the conferences have proceeded. There are a great many intricacies and difficulties in points of detail which require patience and take a great deal of time, if results fair to all governments are to be obtained.

I come now to a matter which will take some time, and perhaps I had better ask that it be called six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I stated that I was coming to a division in my speech and would be taking up another subject at eight o'clock. The subject to which I referred was the price-ceiling policy adopted by the government. This policy has been dealt with in a broadcast by the Prime Minister to the Canadian people, and it will not be possible for me to add very much, in my remarks to the committee to-night, to what the Prime Minister said in that speech. The leader of the opposition, however, invited the Minister of Finance to make some further explanation of certain phases of the price-ceiling policy to the committee when that matter was reached, and I thought it might not be inappropriate if I should tell the committee in very plain and simple language just why the price-ceiling policy was recommended to the government by myself and why it was adopted by the government.

This policy was not based on any fine-spun theories or abstract considerations; it was based upon the harsh necessities of the moment. Consider what was happening. I have before me a table showing the rise in the price level from August, 1939, to October, 1941. I shall place this table on Hansard, but before I do so I think I should point out to the committee some of the important features of the table.

Taking the average of 1935-39 as the base, and calling that 100, the index figure of cost of living for August, 1939, before the war began, was 100·8. In November, 1939, after three months, it was 103·8. In February, after six months, it was 103·8. In August, 1940, after one year, it was 105·9. In February, 1941, after eighteen months, it was 108·2.

For the following months the figures were as follows:

March, 1941	108·2
April, 1941	108·6
May, 1941	109·4
June, 1941	110·5
July, 1941	111·9
August, 1941	113·7
September, 1941	114·7
October, 1941	115·5

In October the cost of living index figure was 14·6 per cent above what it was in August, 1939. The increase in the last six months was 6·9 points of the index. The increase in the index of the cost of food from August, 1939, to August, 1941, was 23·9 and for the last six months 13·1 points, indicating that the very substantial increases in the cost of food were largely responsible for the less substantial but nevertheless substantial increases in the cost of living index. Of the 12·8 per cent increase in the total index from August, 1939, to August, 1941, the increased cost of food accounted for more than 53 per cent of the change.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the minister indicate just what items are taken into consideration in figuring the cost?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I can stop to do that; I have not the material here; it would be a long story and involve me and the committee in a great deal of detail. I think answers to questions like that should be reserved for a later stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may interrupt, does it indicate that the average of 1935-39 which the minister takes as the base was a high price level in food, or was that not a very low level?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was a low price level.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that an increase of 15 to 20 per cent would not necessarily indicate a high price level?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not necessarily. It indicated a fairly rapid rise towards the latter part of the period.

The extent of the rise itself perhaps was not the most serious feature of the situation. The most serious feature was that there were certain obviously inflationary forces at work in the country. I am not an economist and I am certainly not a "brain-truster", to use the language of hon. gentlemen opposite—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For lack of a better word.

Mr. HOMUTH: They are not in the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and probably I shall oversimplify somewhat my explanation of the inflationary forces. But there is no doubt that when the resources and labour of the country are pretty fully used, when we reach a stage of full employment, and are making more and more war materials, devoting a larger and larger proportion of our human and material resources to the production of war equipment and war materials, there is no doubt that inflationary forces of a very powerful type are at work. Now this is the way in which Mr. Henderson, head of the office of price administration and civilian supply, explained the matter. Perhaps he oversimplified it too, but it is well to make these matters as simple as possible, and essentially this is correct: if the total work done by the people of the nation is represented by eight hours, and three hours of that work is devoted to war purposes and only five hours to the production of peace-time goods, civilian supplies, then there are eight hours' wages to be spent on the product of five hours' labour. Therefore, unless something is done to channel back the wages for the other three hours, there is going to be such a disparity between purchasing power and what there is to be purchased that there will be a most powerful upward pressure on prices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, freer buying.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is far more money to spend, and less to spend it on. As we devote more and more of our goods to war purposes, that condition develops. Those are the essentials of the situation in a war such as this, and at a time when we are making such enormous quantities of goods. Surely the committee was impressed by the speech of my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply in which he showed the colossal output we now have, and indicated that it would be still larger in the future.

One will see at once that, unless curbed, forces will push the price levels up and up and up. How can that be stopped? Since the beginning of the war we have pursued a severe taxation policy. We have tried to tax as much as possible of the purchasing power back into the exchequer. We have gone all across the country and combed it for small subscriptions to war savings certificates. We have sold bonds to the people. In these ways, namely by taxing and by borrowing, we have tried to get back from the people a large amount of this purchasing power. We believed that this was a right policy and we believed that it was anti-inflationary. To a large extent it is.

But we cannot do enough in that way. The amounts we are getting, as the requirements grow, are not sufficient. As the two hours out of the eight becomes three hours, and as the three hours becomes four hours, it becomes impossible adequately to meet the situation by taxation and borrowing. We might possibly be able to do it if we placed oppressively high taxes on the people.

I have in mind, by way of example, a national defence tax of, say 20 per cent, instead of 5 per cent, or something like that. But a tax of that kind would be so inequitable, and the variation in individual circumstances would be so great, that we would have all kinds of outcries, and justifiably so, on account of the harshness and inequality of a taxation policy of that kind. It does not help the situation much to say, "Change it into a compulsory saving policy; pay back part of the taxes at the end of the war", because for the moment it is just as harsh and inequitable, and just as hard to bear.

Therefore in this war, no matter what the course has been in previous wars, so far as I know all countries have come to the conclusion that they must resort to direct measures of limitation and control of production, and price control. We had decided, of course, that we had to do the same thing in Canada. We have had certain selected price controls in force since shortly after the outbreak of the war.

Neither the house nor the country will accept a policy such as this price-ceiling policy, unless they are thoroughly convinced of the evils and the dangers of inflation. I have refrained from arguing that inflation is bad, because I can find no one to disagree with me. I have listened to the social credit group. We have argued that their policies are inflationary. The speakers in that group, to a man, do not meet that argument by saying, "What of it? They are inflationary, but it is a good thing." No, they do not say that; they deny that their policies are inflationary. They admit, and properly so, that inflation is a bad thing, and they argue that their policies are not inflationary.

Coming to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation we find that to a man they argue against inflation. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who made such a good speech the other day, never for a moment in the labour circles in which he moves, or in or out of this house, would argue in favour of inflation. He knows that inflation is disastrous to labour. The same could be demonstrated without any trouble at all in so far as its effects on agriculture are concerned.

Then, we find that the Conservative group admit and contend that inflation is a bad thing, and the same is true of the members of the party to which I belong. But sometimes I think that this ready acceptance of a principle leads us to forget the realities of the situation.

Now, looking at the matter from other than the theoretical point of view, looking at it from the point of view of governmental finance, let us consider what would happen if the price levels were allowed to go up and up and up in an uncontrolled fashion. Last spring I asked the house for a vote of $1,300,000,000 for war purposes. The house voted that sum. Then, in addition we had to have money for non-war purposes. I believe the amount was in the neighbourhood of $500,000,000. In addition, we had to raise money required for assistance to Great Britain, to the amount of $900,000,000, making $2,700,000,000 or $2,800,000,000 in all. When I come to the house next spring, perhaps in the early months of the year, it may be that the figures I shall present will be higher than that. It may be—and I do not know, because the estimates are not yet prepared—that instead of being obliged to raise $2,800,000,000, as we are doing this year, and instead of being obliged to spend $2,800,000,000 as we are likely to have to do in this fiscal year, we might have to spend, let us say, $3,000,000,000. It is, I should think, certain to be that, perhaps a great deal more than that. Let us say that the price level rises 20 points, or 20 per cent—and the price level did rise 20 points, or just about 20 per cent, in the third year of the last war. I have figures here to show what happened at that time. That condition makes it necessary for me to obtain another $600,000,000 somewhere. I do not know anywhere to get it, except by taxing the people, borrowing from the people or creating it. Borrowing from the Bank of Canada would be the equivalent of creating it. We have, so far as I know, to do one of those three things.

I do not think taxation will stand indefinite expansion. I do not believe that borrowing can be carried on indefinitely, because when the price level is rising rapidly and the value of the dollar is going down we are going to meet quite a bit of resistance from the people of the country who may be afraid that if that process continues they will be paying in good money and getting out bad. We are determined that this will not occur. We must do that in order to keep faith with the people who lend money to the government. Therefore we are going to have difficulties if we create money. If we borrow it from our own bank, which is the equivalent of issuing it, we are going to go very far toward undermining confidence in our currency, and toward pushing up the price level and creating still greater difficulties for ourselves. That very point of view of governmental finance is a question. That is the problem as it presents itself.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister answer a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish the hon. member would not try to tangle me up in social credit questions. There will be time for questions later on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is making a good statement. He ought to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member may question me later. That is the difficulty with which the government is faced, and perhaps the government's difficulties are not of as great importance as the effect a monetary scheme would have on the people.

I said something about the effect on agriculture, but I am not prepared fully to argue it at this time. In fact, if I were to argue all these points fully, my speech would be altogether too long. But in that connection I would refer the committee to what the Prime Minister said in his broadcast, because I believe at that time he put the case very well. This is what he said with respect to agriculture.

> Nor is the position of the farmer any happier than that of the wage-earner. The present war is a war of machines. Because of the heavy demands of war on industry, the scarcity of manufactured goods is likely to be greater than the scarcity of farm products. The rise in prices will consequently be unequal, if prices are left to themselves. The things farmers have to buy tend to go up in price, more than the things they have to sell.

Persons in receipt of fixed incomes are in a pitiful condition in a period of rapid price rise or at the end of such a period. Widows and children who are in receipt of the benefits of insurance policies find that the money they have received is not worth anything like what was paid in by the insured. There is an enormous amount of life insurance carried in Canada, and all this would be badly written down by inflation. Other people have annuity contracts with the government and there are many other people with fixed incomes.

The pressure upon the government to relieve these groups becomes terrific. Lobbies of all kinds develop. I am not saying anything about the merits or justifiability of the various pressures that are being exerted upon the government at the present time, but these have resulted on account of the very moderate increase of 14·6 per cent in the price level since the fairly low level in August, 1939. What have we at the moment? We have thousands of representations on behalf of old age pensioners; we have representations on behalf of the dependents of the men in the forces; we have representations on behalf of civil servants who are not in the lower grades, which grades already receive a cost of living bonus; we have representations on behalf of superannuated civil servants; we have representations on behalf of those in receipt of disability pensions; we have representations on behalf of those in receipt of war veterans' allowances and we have representations from time to time on behalf of those who have entered into contracts with the government.

Let the price level rise be not 14·6 per cent, as is the case, but 50 per cent or 97 or 98 per cent as it was at the end of the last war, and hon. members will see that many groups are going to find themselves completely out of line. They will find that their income does not go anywhere at all. The situation will be that many demands will be made upon the treasury. More and more of these groups will seek relief, but some will be left behind. I do not believe we could ever justify making payments out of the treasury to people cashing insurance policies. I do not believe we could justify making payments out of the treasury to persons who had purchased annuities and that kind of thing. A great many groups here and there throughout the country would find their incomes written down by reason of that price level rise. This matter has been summed up so often that I do not know that it is necessary to go into it again. Mr. Baruch, a citizen of the United States who took a very prominent part in the last war, gave evidence before the banking and currency committee of the House of Representatives, and I should like to read two or three sentences from his submission. He said:

> Except for human slaughter and maiming and all that goes with them, inflation is the most destructive of the consequences of war. It might double or more the cost of the war, it imposes the severest hardships on our people and, through inevitable deflation that follows, burdens the future with a constantly increasing debt and a long period of painful and bitter readjustment destroying the confidence of people in themselves and their government, leaving them open to all the old and new isms. Nor is inflation a danger which will hold back and wait for a formal declaration of a shooting war. With payrolls soaring and shortages developing, more money bidding for less goods, the danger of an inflationary price rise is imminent. If it is not taken firmly in hand in time, it may get beyond the possibility of control.

A little later on he said:

> The second point I want to raise is that price control is essential if government salaries and appropriations are to have any meaning. What will happen to the teachers, war veterans, social security beneficiaries, policemen, firemen, all the hundreds of thousands of government employees, federal, state, county, and city, if prices are allowed to run wild? Will the federal, state, and city governments advance the wages of these people to meet increased costs of living? Or do they propose to leave them victims of fortuitous circumstances?
> Again, with appropriations so much is voted for guns, tanks, and aeroplanes. Before they have been produced prices have jumped and to get the same number of tanks and guns and aeroplanes additional appropriations are needed. Many members of Congress, worried over the size of government expenditures, have been urging economies in non-defence expenditures. I say to them that no action could effect greater savings in the cost of government than to prevent inflation. Billions, 20 per cent or more of all appropriations, can be saved. There is no better form of economy than price control.

Along with those miseries and inequities one finds a certain proportion of the population who develop cunning in taking advantage of inflation. These are the inflation profiteers, they are the class of population that hedge against inflation. If they are successful, that is, if they get in at the right time and get out at the right time and make themselves rich out of inflation, they become hated, and the experience in other countries has been that eventually they are deprived of their gains by movements based upon mass indignation. In other words, the result is a state of affairs which divides the country; it is disruptive; it sets citizen against citizen; it destroys morale and unity. Labour, finding that prices are going up, becomes desperate to get more wages to meet the situation, and the result is a large labour turnover. War production is prejudiced and the war effort is injured.

These are some of the things which we have to think about when considering inflation. I am not as much concerned about the after-war effect of deflation, although it is simply cruelty when that comes, as I am about the effect upon the war effort itself. I do not think any internal development could be more gratifying to the enemy than for this country to tear itself to pieces by inflation. We must believe these things, or we will not accept the somewhat unpalatable medicine of a price ceiling. But believing these things, we will accept a great deal before we will let this condition arise. That is the reason why with great earnestness and emphasis I am placing the possible consequences before the committee. I should like to come back to the Prime Minister's speech. Certain things were pictured very clearly, and this is what he said in one or two paragraphs:

> We have heard much in recent weeks about rising prices. They have affected the budget of every family in Canada. We have heard and seen something of the dangers of inflation. But comparatively few of us, I imagine, understand those dangers fully, and what their effect may be upon our lives and our labours. By inflation we mean a rise in prices and costs brought about by abnormal conditions whereby our money is able to buy less of the things we need. Rising prices unless controlled will make it more costly and therefore more difficult to finance the war. Rising prices, unchecked, will spread confusion and uncertainty in industry and trade. They will hinder production and the proper distribution of supplies. They will make the cost of living rise more rapidly than wages and salaries. The value of savings will be materially lessened. The result would be hardship to nearly every one, and hardship in very unequal measure.

As I say, there has to be price control. All countries have it in varying degrees, but all recognize the necessity of it, and this government would not be worthy of calling itself a government if it just let the situation drift, if it did not take prices in hand. Indeed the only issue that has developed in countries somewhat similar to our own is as between two alternative policies. One is the policy of selective price control, otherwise known as piecemeal price fixing, and the other is the policy of the price ceiling. The leader of the opposition said: "Why don't we do as they do in England and the United States? Why don't we adopt the first method?"

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I said that.

Mr. ILSLEY: He did not say it in a way which was identifying himself with that method.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was just feeling my way. I do not know any more about it than the minister—a good deal less.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not say that the leader of the opposition argued for piecemeal price fixing. He was simply asking the government to give its reasons for taking one method rather than the other—and I am going to give those reasons to-night. But, in the first place, I want to say briefly just exactly what a price ceiling is and what it involves, and what the whole policy is; for it is a pretty comprehensive policy.

I take it for granted that all members are aware in a general way of the price control policy which has been announced by the government and which is to take effect a week from next Monday. I should like to emphasize, however, that this price control measure is part of a comprehensive plan involving three major elements: (1) the placing of a ceiling on the prices of all goods and rents and services, with certain minor exceptions, based upon the maximum prices prevailing during the four-week period from September 15 to October 11; (2) the stabilizing of wages by the extension of the principles of P.C. 7440 to all industries on a mandatory basis; and (3) the supplementing of agricultural income by the payment of new acreage bonuses in western Canada and by a reduction in the cost of feeds to farmers of eastern Canada.

This programme should be thought of as a whole. Price stability was its objective. We were determined to stop the continued increase in prices that was taking place, and this type of control was, we were convinced, the only effective way in which it could be done. However, it was only possible if we secured stability of wage levels and if we could at the same time assure the farmers of a reasonable level of income.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister at that point whether the government in considering and enunciating that policy had in mind the unevenness of price levels, especially with respect to foodstuffs?

Mr. ILSLEY: The unevenness is not as great as the hon. gentleman might think.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is quite great.

Mr. ILSLEY: That can all very well be taken into consideration, and I will come to that.

I should like to give briefly the reasons why we thought that a universal price ceiling was preferable to selective price control. First, it could be most quickly applied, and as I have already indicated, the rate of increase in the price level in recent months made it imperative that action be taken quickly.

Second, a general price ceiling is non-discriminatory. Where is the justice of selecting for special treatment fifty or a hundred commodities out of tens of thousands? It has been said that thirty thousand commodities can be found in the mail order catalogues and that the total number of commodities may run as high as between one and two million. I think an estimate has been made of 1,800,000 commodities.

Third, in spite of appearance to the contrary, a general price ceiling involves fewer and less difficult administrative problems. Control of only one part of the economy leaves the forces making for an upward rush of prices to operate solely on the uncontrolled part of the field. Price increases in the uncontrolled commodities would be encouraged in anticipation of and in order to forestall later control. Rises in costs would take place and other disturbances would be set up which would make it necessary constantly to revise the prices fixed in the controlled field and constantly to broaden the controlled area. But this process would never go on rapidly enough to keep up with the inflationary forces that would be at work. Such is the interrelationship of all prices that it would be impossible really to control one group while another group was left uncontrolled.

Fourth, the selective approach would require a thorough investigation of individual industries or commodities and the arbitrary fixing of prices for these individual products, while the ceiling method, subject to minor adjustments from time to time—and of course there will have to be adjustments—accepts the relationship between the prices of various commodities and services determined by supply and demand in the basic period. Under the selective method the onus would be on the members of the board first to make a thorough investigation of individual industries, and then to justify discriminatory action against them if their prices alone were to be fixed. Under the general ceiling method the onus is on the manufacturer or distributor to justify to the board concessions in his favour.

Fifth, the general ceiling on prices is the only method of price control which really makes it possible to justify the stabilization of wages and of many other payments, such as the payment of pensions, dependents' allowances, and so forth.

Sixth, and finally, the fundamental reason is this. The piecemeal method of selective control would not prevent the inflationary spiral from developing. The general ceiling method is really the only one that will accomplish the purpose we had in mind. I think at this stage I will quote again from Mr. Baruch's submission to the congressional committee because he puts it very well indeed. He says:

> While not perfect, and it is less so on account of this delay the overall ceiling plan raises fewer obstacles than any other that has been brought forward. To fix prices in piecemeal fashion one by one is to invite trouble, possibly interruptions in production, for it means you fix the return to some specific manufacturer while his costs are left to rise. It is impossible just to fix a few basic prices and let the others go free. We tried that in the last war and found we were being driven steadily to consider an enormous extension of the pricefixing field.
> Piecemeal price fixing will not halt inflation. It allows the general price level to run wild, while dealing with a few individual prices. It is like commanding a moving regiment, "Regiment halt: but all soldiers except that fellow—No. 4, that fellow in the first rank—keep marching."
> As inflation occurs, the prices that are fixed soon become out of date and must be adjusted upward. Irregular rises in prices destroy the relationships between various costs, requiring even greater adjustments.
> Since the goal of price control is to maintain a stable, balanced relationship between all prices, why not keep a balanced stability when you have it? Why permit the "norm" when the law of supply and demand was working to be disrupted and then scramble wildly to recapture piecemeal what we had in the first place? The question is, shall prices be determined by an administrator working under every conceivable pressure, or whether congress, by placing a ceiling as of a given date, shall keep prices at a level earlier established by supply and demand?
> Under the overall ceiling the price level is treated as an organic whole, with only exceptional adjustments here and there. That method stops a runaway and keeps the whole team in line. The piecemeal method submits to the runaway and then tries to keep some of the horses from running faster than the rest. The overall ceiling does not mean that the producers of agricultural commodities or labour would get less. If the cost of all things were kept down, they might get more. Everyone knows that after the war it will be impossible to maintain excessively high prices without debasing the purchasing power of the dollar. Agricultural prices and probably wages will fall further than other prices—they always do. If prices are allowed to skyrocket now, the post-war disparity between various groups will be far greater than if all prices are kept at a low level now. I have particularly in mind the unhappy plight of the farmer in the years following the last war.

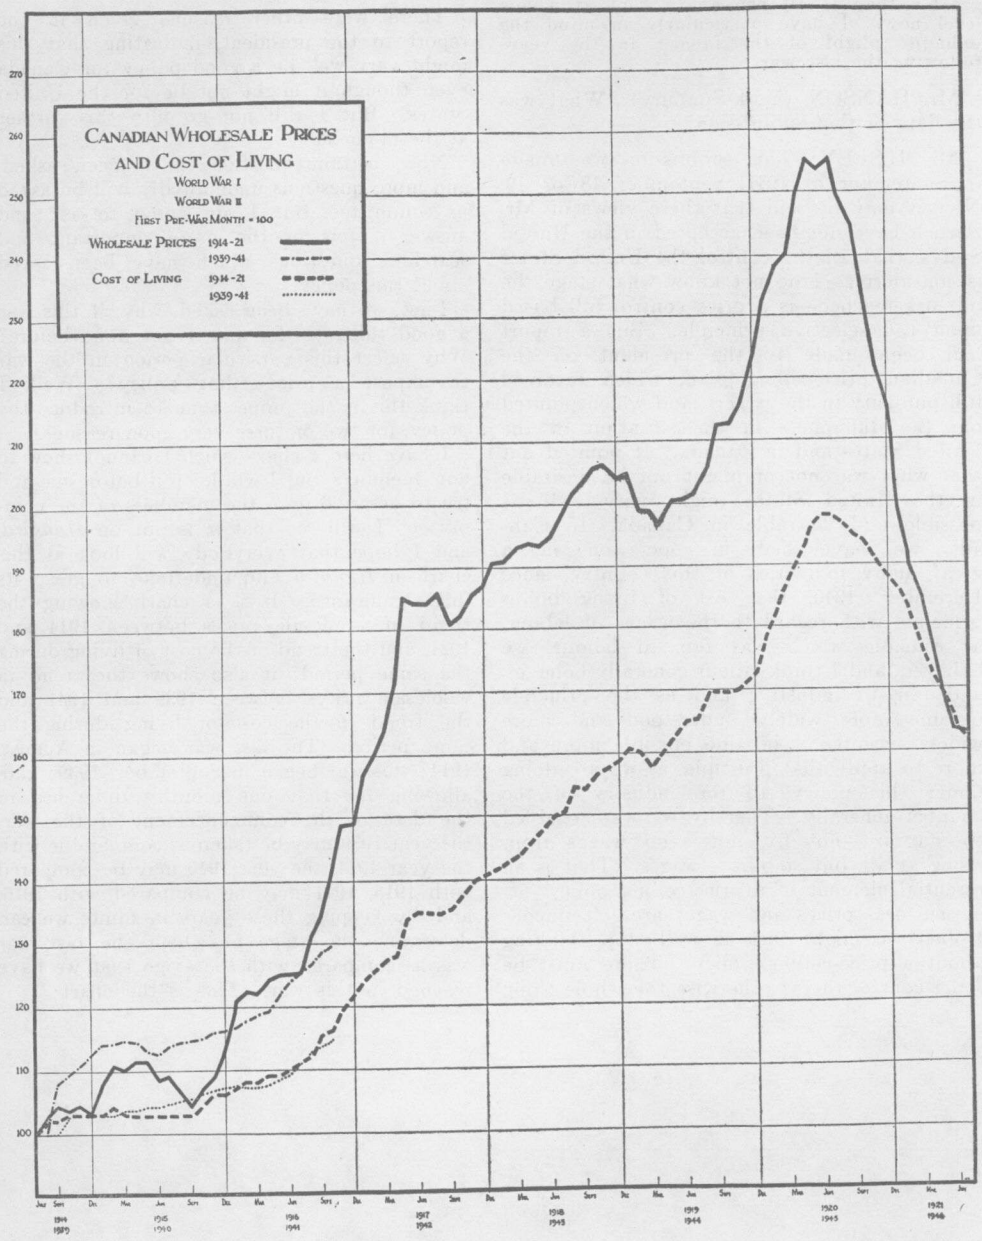
Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the date of that submission?



Mr. ILSLEY: This submission was made in September of 1941, September 18 or 19. Now it may be said that these views of Mr. Baruch have not been accepted in the United States, that all the control the United States is considering—I do not know what stage the bill has reached—is a price control bill based upon the selective principle. But a report had been made to the president on the Canadian price-ceiling plan, which received full publicity in the papers, and which pointed out the differences in the situation in the United States and in Canada. It pointed out that what was not or might not be desirable in the United States might very well be possible and desirable in Canada. In Canada we have had in operation in a great many industries of this country, since December, 1940, the cost of living bonus principle with regard to the wages of labour, a principle which was fair to labour, we believed, and I think labour generally believes, and fair to industry; and as the principle became more widely understood and more widely accepted it became possible more and more to apply that principle, as we are doing under this policy, to the industry of the country generally. Thereby we were enabled to stabilize—not fix, not keep wages from rising at all, but stabilize—wages. That is an essential element of a price-ceiling policy. If agricultural prices and wages are left uncontrolled we might just as well stop thinking about a price-ceiling policy. There must be some control there; otherwise the whole thing will just be an abortive attempt. But we had that to work on in the Dominion of Canada, which they did not have in the United States of America, and it is a basis which, as I have said, is fair, in my opinion and in the opinion of the government.

There were other reasons given in the report to the president, indicating that this might very well be a good policy for Canada even though it might not be for the United States. But I will not go into this further at the moment.

Now, certain questions have been asked, and more questions undoubtedly will be asked in committee, but I am going to ask and answer a few of the more important and searching questions which have been asked about this policy.

First, we have been asked, why, if this was a good thing to do, was it not done before? Why select this particular period in the war to impose a price-ceiling policy? Well, I think this is the proper time to introduce the policy, for two or three very good reasons.

I have here a chart which I cannot show to hon. members, but I will keep it before me and try to describe it to the members of the committee; I will see that it is put on Hansard, and I hope that everybody will look at this chart in Hansard and undertake to grasp its full significance. It is a chart showing the trend of wholesale prices between 1914 and 1921, and the trend of the cost of living during the same period; it also shows the trend in wholesale prices between 1939 and 1941 and the trend in the cost of living during the same period. The last war began in August, 1914; this war began in September, 1939; and, allowing for that one month's difference in the date of the commencement of the war, the year 1939 may be taken as comparable with the year 1914, the year 1940 may be compared with 1915, 1941 may be compared with 1916, and, by keeping these years in mind, we can determine the stage at which the last war was as compared with the stage that we have reached in this war. This is the chart:

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Now this chart shows that, at this stage in the last war, which would be the fall of 1916, the rise in the wholesale price level was about the same as it is to-day—a little, but not very much higher. I should qualify that by saying that the statement I have just made is true as of July or August of this year. The rise in the price level was about 26 per cent; the wholesale price level stood at about 126, as compared with the beginning of the war, in July or August, 1916. What happened then? If hon. members will look at this chart they will observe that the wholesale price level turned abruptly and made a tremendous rise. It went up very steeply and rapidly until by the summer of 1920 it stood at about 256, or somewhere between 255 and 260, an enormous increase in the wholesale price level. Now this was the stage of the last war at which that started—right now, or a little earlier than now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister suggests that this is the psychological moment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Undoubtedly this is the psychological moment. The same is true of the cost of living. The cost of living lags a little behind the rise in the wholesale price level. It has now risen 14·6 per cent over August, 1939. It was something like that at this stage of the last war—15 or 16 per cent—and immediately after that in the last war it took a sharp slant upwards and in the summer of 1920 reached about 198. In the summer of 1920 both levels broke, the wholesale price level and the cost of living level. They simply dropped down to the earth and ruined hundreds of thousands of people. That laid the basis for all kinds of trouble in the future, and the occurrence of that event in this and other countries was undoubtedly the cause of momentous changes for the worse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same thing happened in 1929, did it not, though not perhaps to the same extent?

Mr. ILSLEY: There was no such rise as that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not to the same extent, but there was certainly a drop.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would point out that, so far as I can see, the same forces that operated at that time are at work to-day, only in greater degree, because in that war we spent only 10 per cent of the national income, devoting one hour in ten to the production of war materials and supplies. Now we are getting to the point of nearly 40 per cent of the national income being devoted to production of war supplies, and there is no question at all that unless we take hold of the situation at this moment and deal with it vigorously we are going to be confronted by a rapid and long price rise such as took place between 1916 and 1920. In fact, it may be very much worse for the reasons I have stated, because the forces now are much more powerful. In my opinion we would have now a much higher increase than we had at this stage in the last war if it were not for the severity of our taxation policy, which undoubtedly has restrained prices, and our selective price controls, which have existed over quite a broad field. The forces at work to-day are more powerful as a result of the greatly increased amounts we are spending and the greatly increased proportion of the national income we are devoting to war purposes. For these reasons the forces to which I refer are more powerful in this war than they were in the last. That is the reason why in my opinion this is the proper time.

The second reason is that we could never have imposed a price ceiling until we had given agricultural prices a chance to rise. Agricultural prices were very low before the war; I do not dispute that for a moment. But on the basis of percentages there has been a tremendous increase in everything except wheat. I am going to give some percentages, and I want it clearly understood that I am not expressing approval of the level of agricultural prices in August, 1939. Here are the figures between August, 1939, and September, 1941, giving the prices of the commodities stated: Oats, 80 per cent; barley, 66 per cent; butter 57 per cent; eggs, 33 per cent; cheese, 51 per cent, including bonuses; cattle, 58 per cent; hogs, 40 per cent; whole milk, 14 per cent.

On the whole, with the exception of wheat and certain less important products, the former disparity between prices of farm products and other prices has been very largely corrected. Broadly speaking, retail food prices now bear about their normal relation to other retail prices. The importance of this recovery of food prices to the cost of living is shown by the fact that of the increase of 12·8 in the cost of living index between August, 1939, and 1941, over 53 per cent is due to increases in the prices of food. With regard to wheat, there has been very little increase, but it must be borne in mind that the price established in August, 1939, was a government-established price, not a market-established price. That price has increased 8 per cent and is still a government-established price, but the open market price of wheat being very low in August, 1939, has increased by a much larger percentage— something like 40 per cent. There is no point in saying that; it has no significance whatever in the matter, but I am pointing out that there was a government-established price both times, and therefore the increase in the cost of wheat has been slight on a percentage basis. We must, however, realize that wheat producers now receive a number of other payments in addition to the price paid for wheat, and these other payments are intended to raise their income to a reasonable level without adding to the wheat surplus, as a higher rate would do. That is the second reason for waiting until now to impose a ceiling.

The third reason is one to which I have already referred, namely, that the principle of P.C. 7440, that is, the cost of living bonus, a principle which is an essential feature of this policy and which would have to be an essential feature of any policy before we could ask labour to forego increases, has become fairly widely understood and fairly widely accepted.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before the minister leaves that point, will he tell us what his authority is for the statistics to which he refers? Are those from the bureau of statistics, showing increases in farm prices?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get the exact authority for them; I cannot answer the question offhand. These statistics are most carefully checked by my officials before they are given to me and I cannot say what their source is. I will, however, get that information for the hon. member. I am willing to wager that there is no mistake about them; if there were, it would be the first time. Perhaps it might not be inappropriate if I quoted, with regard to the policy and its relation to labour, what a member of the British parliament, Mr. George Isaacs, Labour member of parliament for Southwark, London, had to say. He is the president of the printers and operators union of Great Britain, and he was in Canada on October 30, when he gave an interview, in which he is reported as follows:

> Mr. Isaacs called the price and wage fixing "a courageous piece of legislation, which I would like to see enacted in Great Britain." What complaints could labour have, he asked, when prices as well as wages had been fixed? If the cost of living does go up, provision is made for a corresponding wage increase, he pointed out. "I know for a fact," he declared, "that our people would willingly accept that legislation. To-day in Britain we have ceilings on rationed goods only. This has resulted in a thirty per cent increase in the cost of living while wages have only gone up fifteen per cent."

Another question that has been asked is whether the staff required to administer this policy will not be out of all reason, it will be so large. I do not know what staff will be required. The war-time prices and trade board has been working day and night getting the organization together and is making very good progress in having it in readiness for dealing with applications for adjustments, enforcement and so forth. But having in mind certain estimates of 10,000 employees and so on, I think I should say that the requirements have been considerably overestimated, at least for the initial stages.

Then a question has been asked, what about imports? If the cost of imports goes up and the imported articles are used in the production and manufacture of goods in this country, how can we keep a ceiling over the price of the finished product? That is a matter which has been considered; in fact, all the questions I have been asked are questions which I have considered. There is not a detailed answer to these questions, but the general principles have all been considered. I do not know exactly what will be done in the case of imports, but it may well be that many of the imports will have to be handled by import boards, who may buy them at the prices they are obliged to pay abroad and sell them to manufacturers or producers in this country at a loss, which in effect would be a case of keeping the cost of goods down by bonuses or subsidies. That is and has been for a considerable length of time the procedure followed very largely in the United Kingdom; probably the leader of the opposition was told or knows about that system.

What about exports? If the price goes up abroad, are we to let all our goods go out of the country? If so, what about our own requirements? There again it may be necessary, although I do not say it will be done, to establish export boards which will have some control over exports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister say the import question has been settled, or is being considered?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is being considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is, of course, another method.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, perhaps we had better not get into that. What about increased cost? We have a great many applications now by those who submit that their costs have increased and that they have not adjusted their selling prices, and they want an adjustment. All I can say on this point is that an attempt will be made to meet and obviate real injustices. But I would say that we should not allow a puncturing of the price ceiling unless real attempts are made to reduce costs, which can, I think, be done in a great many cases.

Then, why was the ceiling imposed by order in council instead of being submitted to parliament? That question was asked here by those speaking on behalf of the Conservative party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. The answer is that we could not afford to wait; we could not run the risk of waiting. There were three dates or periods which had to be fixed with complete definiteness: the first was the base period, that is the period represented by the time between September 15 and October 11; the second, the date of the announcement; and the third, the effective date. During the period between the announcement and the effective date, which is November 17, the setting up of an organization would be necessary and, in fact, the setting up of an organization is necessary. Once you start to set up an organization, secrecy becomes absolutely impossible; everyone in the country knows what you are doing or trying to do. But if we had not fixed these dates definitely they would not have known what the base period was; they probably would have thought that when we got ready to freeze the price level, when parliament fixed it, if it were fixed by parliament, they would fix it as of the date the act passed, or something like that, and there undoubtedly would have been an upward adjustment of prices from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Everywhere people would have been putting their prices up, and the effect would not have been anti-inflationary but inflationary—and in a big way.

In parliament itself there would have been some delay—I do not say there would have been unreasonable delay—and the possibility of a long debate in parliament would have meant that the effective date could not have been fixed in advance. It is very important that there be not too long a time between the announcement and the effective date.

In short, it is one of those things that simply had to be done by order in council if it were to be done effectively. There is nothing unconstitutional or illegal about doing anything like this by order in council. The committee should not forget that the War Measures Act was passed by this parliament giving the executive authority to do what it was necessary to do to carry on the war, and this in our opinion was one of those things. It merely carried out a price policy that had been established during the last year or two; it was a very long step in advance of a selective price policy, but the powers to be exercised by the war-time prices and trade board were powers they already had.

With the Germans at the gateway of the Caucasus the situation was too serious to run the risk of delayed action or ineffective action when prompt and effective action could legally and constitutionally be taken.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the minister elaborate a little on the rent situation with regard to the setting of the ceiling?

Mr. ILSLEY: I prefer not to at the moment.

Mr. HOMUTH: Many people would like to know about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion has been made that we were bad psychologists or bad politicians, or something of that kind. I think from two or three sources it was said that the psychology of the thing was bad, that we should have gone further than we did, and from the psychological point of view, if for no other reason, it should also have applied to salaried people and executives. I did not intend to make this announcement at this time, but I should like the committee to know that for the last two or three weeks we have been working at an order to place a ceiling over all managerial and executive salaries, directors' fees, et cetera, and that ceiling, I may say, will not provide for any cost of living bonus. It will be readily apparent that there are difficulties in working out the details of such an order, but I hope to have these resolved and to be able to announce the programme in a very few days.

There are a great many people in Canada who would like to know what they can do to help make this a success. I think that should be the attitude of every member of this committee and of everyone in the country; it is the attitude of thousands and thousands of people. I cannot put my suggestions in any more concise form than I did in a speech which I made some time ago when I was asking business men for their assistance in making government control measures operative and effective. Therefore, while I dislike to quote what I said before, as I cannot put it any better, I am going to do so. I said:

> First of all, I would ask you to shun a defeatist attitude towards rising prices. Inflation is not inevitable. It can and will be prevented. It will be prevented much more easily if we all join in the effort and reject the view that resistance is useless.
> Secondly, we need your active support in our savings campaigns. A rising volume of savings will not only provide the government with the funds needed for war purposes but it will relieve the persistent upward pressure of expenditure on prices. This is its important economic purpose.
> In normal times—in peace-time—we do not try to discourage expenditure. We encourage it, to obtain employment and, if possible, prosperity. But these are anything but normal times. Now we must limit expenditure. The more we can limit it by encouraging voluntary saving, the better it will be for all concerned, including business. For example, if a business finds itself with its prices fixed and its costs being forced up by excessive expenditures in other fields, it will be vitally interested in reduction of these expenditures. You need have no fear now that under present conditions there will be too little spending. What we need to do is to reduce the pressure of excessive spending. Therefore we are asking the public to spend less and save more. We need your support. We want your support in facilitating the organization and extension of savings plans in your own businesses.

Do not be misled by the spurious argument that more expenditure is needed to swell government revenues. The harm done by the extra expenditure is far greater than the good done by the extra taxes. We need the whole dollar diverted to us, not the fraction of it which would eventually come into our hands as taxes, if it is spent. The diversion of the dollar to us is needed to make available for the war the labour and materials which the expenditure of the dollar otherwise would merely use up in civilian satisfaction.

Thirdly, we shall need your cooperation, your active cooperation, in keeping your costs of production down. Price stability can only be achieved if costs can be held in check. In the last analysis they must be held in check by those who are running the businesses concerned. Waste of labour or materials must be eliminated—the nation cannot afford it in war-time. Luxury, extravagance or just plain carelessness in business expenditures cannot be tolerated. The government and the price controlling authorities cannot permit business to enjoy at this time the luxury of a situation in which increases in costs may be automatically passed on to the consumer.

If some costs increase I hope business will find others that can be reduced—perhaps overhead, when output is large, perhaps selling costs, now that there is an almost universal sellers' market, perhaps most of all the unnecessary costs due to an excessive number of patterns, types and varieties of products.

And, fourthly, we need your help in carrying out all our direct controls not only of prices but of production, and the use of materials as well. It is the managers of business who know how materials can be saved by substitutes, by standardization and by repairs. Your assistance is necessary in working out controls in such a way that they will do the most good, and the least harm. Your cooperation is needed in putting them into effect, with a minimum of dislocation. These controls are not going to be easy or pleasant for any of us. But they are necessary, if we are going to exert the greatest effort of which we are capable in the war, and therefore I am confident that you will all support them.

I was talking to business men on that occasion, but I should like to address the same appeal to farmers, to wage-earners and consumers—indeed, to all the people. This situation is too serious to have a nation resisting or divided, or taking any steps which will render ineffective any important, carefully considered, well-reasoned government policies. I make the appeal to the people of this country to help us make our price-ceiling policy a success.

Mr. CHURCH: Price fixing is going to land business in an awful mess in this country, before you get through with it.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, before I begin my formal statement, a statement which I am afraid the committee will find much too formal, may I extend to my colleague who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ilsley) congratulations upon the magnificent address he has given. Perhaps I am somewhat selfish in offering my congratulations, because his remarks have made my task much easier, and will enable me considerably to shorten my remarks.

He has dealt with the question of the inflationary spiral and the question of managerial and executive salaries. He has dealt with many questions with which I now find it unnecessary to deal.

I should, however, like to make one further preliminary observation. A few minutes before entering the chamber to-night I had an opportunity of listening to a re-broadcast of the address by the President of the United States before the International Labour Organization. During the last week, while it met in New York, I had the privilege of attending the meetings. Incidentally may I state that in my opinion it is a matter of gratification to the committee that we have afforded a haven of refuge for that office, when it decided to move from Geneva.

There were represented at the meeting thirty-three different nations. The remarkable fact was that some of those nations had been overrun; some of them had felt the force of Hitler's heel. The impression I got, sir, was that labour is doing a great deal to keep the lamp of liberty burning in this world.

Certain questions have been asked and references made respecting individual problems with which, as Minister of Labour, I have had to deal. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) referred to one, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) to another, and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to another. I thought perhaps in view of the understanding that there will be opportunity to consider individual questions later on, I would reserve my explanations on those points until that time.

With these preliminary remarks I crave the liberty to make copious references—I believe that is the phrase—to my notes. Might I at the outset of my remarks state that I welcome the opportunity of placing before this committee a statement of the activities and policies of the Department of Labour. I was invited to do so the day before yesterday by the leader of the opposition, and the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East would, of course, make it imperative that I do so.

The difference in the viewpoints of the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Vancouver East are rather marked. Those differences are shared by many in Canada. For example, if I was correct in my inference from the remarks of the leader of the opposition, as a result of his recent visit to England he suggested that in labour disputes we should adopt a policy of compulsory arbitration. On the other hand, the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested, and suggested vigorously, a policy of compulsory recognition.

Both are agreed on one point, namely, that relations between employers and employees should be regulated in a compulsory manner. While it may be true that compulsion may be the most expeditious method of settling a labour dispute, it is not, I suggest, the true corrective method or the one that in the final analysis will prove effective in producing stability in the relationship between labour and industry.

The hon. member for Vancouver East suggested that labour should be a partner with industry. With that proposition I entirely agree. If fulfilment of that idea of partnership should come—and it will—it would render very much easier the task of any minister of labour.

But a partnership is a matter of mutual agreement. To be successful it must be the result of a desire of both parties each to co-operate with the other. Coercion is not the appropriate method of establishing it.

I mention this because recently I have been criticized for not stopping some strikes in industry by what are termed drastic measures. For example, in the slow-down strike in Cape Breton there were requests made that we "throw in the troops" and that we "intern the men". On the other hand there were demands that we take over the mines. We did neither.

I am convinced to-day that to have taken either course would have been unfortunate. I say that with somewhat more confidence by reason of the fact that the coal mines in Nova Scotia are to-day producing more coal than ever before in the history of that province.

That the policy of this government has been to some extent vindicated is evidenced by the fact that there is not a single strike in any war industry in Canada to-day. But I should like to give credit where credit is due, and I should like to-day to pay a tribute to those labour leaders in Canada who by their sincere efforts to promote industrial peace at this time have made that result possible.

An impression has been created in the public mind that in this country strikes have been rampant and that labour has not been doing its very utmost to assist in the war. This is possibly due to the fact that when 3,100,000 men and women go to work each day it is not news, but if thirty do not go to work, it is news. A great deal has been said, and properly said, about the loyal devotion to duty of workers in other lands. But what about the workers in Canada? I do not in any way wish to belittle the efforts of the workers in other countries, but in fairness to the workers of Canada I feel it is only just that I present certain figures to this committee which will, I believe, indicate that they have not been weakening or slackening in their work.

For the first six months of the present year the man-days lost due to strikes or lockouts for each 1,000 wage-earners were as follows:

In Great Britain	41
In Canada	54
In the United States	381

I have not the figures for Australia for the six months' period, but have for the first three months' period, and in that period their time loss due to strikes or lockouts was ten times greater than in Canada.

Before I proceed to a consideration of the various orders in council pased on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, may I deal with one other matter. The suggestion was made by the member for Vancouver East that this government is opposed to the aims and aspirations of organized labour. I cannot state too emphatically that this is not correct. It would be difficult for me to imagine and, what is more important, it would be difficult for organized labour to imagine that any government headed by the present Prime Minister of Canada would desire to subtract from those rights which labour has gained over the last century.

We have asked labour to surrender some of its rights, but the Prime Minister has given an assurance that those rights will, after this war is won, be reestablished and reestablished in a generous manner. If any more effective assurance is required or desired I am prepared to recommend to my colleagues in the government that such further assurance should be given, and I know that favourable action would be taken on that recommendation.

With this point in view, while it is one thing to declare a policy and another to translate it into action, in June of last year, with the full approval of representative organizations of labour and industry, the government issued an order in council, P.C. 2685, which does express the fundamental principles of our war-time labour policy. It declared that good industrial relations are especially important in war time; that no element in the community can be permitted to benefit from war-time necessities; that the needs of the community at large must be regarded as paramount; and that the aspirations of workers to the right of association and to enter into collective agreements will, under wise direction, make for the removal of prejudice and for fuller cooperation between employers and employed.

The principles set forth in the body of this order in council are, in summary form, as follows:

(1) Every effort should be made to speed production by war industries; (2) Fair and reasonable standards of wages and working conditions should be recognized and any temporary adjustments in remuneration due to war conditions might well be in the form of bonus payments; (3) Hours of work should not be unduly extended but rather increased output should be secured by the adoption of additional shifts; (4) The established safeguards for the protection of the health and safety of the workers should not be relaxed; (5) There should be no interruption of work on account of strikes or lockouts. Differences not otherwise disposed of should be settled under the procedure of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act; (6) Employees should be free to organize in trade unions free from any control by employers or their agents. The existing provisions against illegal refusal to employ or to dismiss from employment because of trade union membership and against intimidation to prevent a workman from belonging to a union were reaffirmed; (7) Employees should be free to negotiate with employers through representatives of their own choosing with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement; (8) Every such agreement should provide machinery for the settlement of disputes and should be scrupulously observed; (9) Workers should neither coerce nor intimidate any person to join their organization; (10) Any necessary suspension of established labour conditions in order to speed up war production should be effected by mutual agreement and should apply only during the emergency.

I have taken the time to read these because the order is an appeal, not a command, and it is still necessary to publicize these principles and to work for their more general and willing acceptance. Specifically, there are still many employers who are not yet genuinely willing to negotiate and sign collective agreements with trade unions.

Might I suggest that we can defeat totalitarianism at home and abroad only if we really put our trust in the democratic process, not only in our political life but in our industrial life. I believe that trade unionism is the essence of industrial democracy and that it must be woven ever more firmly into the fabric of industrial relations. On the other hand it is necessary to warn some unions that the fact that the government has declared the principle of freedom to organize does not mean that the government will conduct organizing campaigns for them, or approves any inclination to exploit the necessities of the war situation to high-pressure workers into unions which without such high pressure methods they would not be willing to join.

I have already made it clear that order in council, P.C. 2685, of June 19, 1940, setting out these principles, the general acceptance of which by industry and by labour would contribute to the success of the war effort, was not made compulsorily binding on either employers or workers. In some quarters the government has been subjected to criticism that this order was not made compulsory; in other words, the employers are not forced to enter into union agreements. The government, however, has been and still is reluctant, for reasons I have already mentioned, to introduce compulsory features into the field of industrial relations, and I am quite sure that any criticism of governmental policy in this respect is not receiving support from the more thoughtful elements in the labour movement. None of us can see very far ahead these days and it is impossible to determine at this stage what compulsions may yet have to be resorted to, but certainly in respect of industrial relations the public policy set out in P.C. 2685 has been fully justified in the very general avoidance of industrial disputes at the present time.

Another order in council affects more particularly those who, after enlisting, are discharged or demobilized. This order provides that the fullest measure of protection will be given to those who left their employment or service to enlist in the armed forces. It is known as the civil employment reinstatement order.

This order makes it mandatory for any employer, by whom a person accepted for service in his majesty's forces was employed when accepted, to reinstate him in employment at the termination of that service in such occupation or position as the order provides. It is the expressed intention of this order to ensure that this will be done under conditions no less favourable to the enlisted employee than those which would have been available to him had he not so enlisted. In the last war there were a great number of complaints from men discharged from his majesty's forces serving in Canada or overseas who were refused the positions they formerly held. In as far as the government can properly prevent such complaints, they will not ensue either during or following the present war.

The splendid men who enlist in the armed forces will, subject to what I have just said, have no justification for saying that while they were in uniforms or fighting abroad, others who might have been fighting there have taken their positions.

This order is one that will require legislation to make it effective after the war, and it is the intention of the government to introduce as soon as possible in the ensuing session of parliament the necessary legislation for enactment by parliament.

This order and the legislation which will ensue contain a penal clause and make any employer who fails to comply with the provisions of the order or the regulations made thereunder guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to substantial penalties.

May I here state that it has been suggested that the government has passed orders which require penalties from employees but that orders enjoining employers have been exempted from any penalties. I will be glad to give illustrations that will prove the inaccuracy of this suggestion.

The government has also taken steps to assure employees of firms engaged in war work minimum compensation for their labour. As members are aware, the fair wages act was passed in 1935 setting forth what wages should be paid and the hours of labour which should be worked. It was felt that the minimum compensation paid employees in war establishments should be increased and on the 4th of October last a new order was adopted making it part of the law of Canada for a contractor or a sub-contractor to pay male employees not less than thirty-five cents an hour.

By another order the Minister of Labour is empowered when he finds that a contractor or subcontractor is employing any person at less than the fixed minimum rate prescribed, to withhold payment of any amount due to such contractor. A cheque for the amount of the underpayment must be delivered to the deputy minister of labour to be held as trustee for the settlement of such a claim.

This order further provides that such contractor or subcontractor must likewise keep a true and correct record of the wages paid and the hours worked by each of his employees.

In this order provision has also been made that any contractor or subcontractor who fails to comply with the regulations contained is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction for penalties ranging from $200 to $1,000. It will thus be seen that precautions have been taken to give to workers employed in establishments engaged in war work that protection to which they are entitled.

Another order that has been passed provides for the course to be followed before any strike may be declared legally, following procedure under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Under the provisions of this statute it was required that authority to declare a strike must be obtained before any board could be applied for. When, however, the government set up the inquiry commission, to which I will refer, the requirement as to a strike vote was not insisted upon in all cases in so far as reference was provided to the inquiry commission.

But I believe that no member of this house would suggest that it is not fair and not democratic that before any man goes on strike he has the right of self-determination and the right to say whether such a strike shall take place or not. It is because of that belief that this order in council has been passed.

It sometimes happens that workers are influenced or stampeded into taking action which on second thought they may regret. It is entirely in conformity with democratic procedure that the wish of the majority should govern. Under the provisions of this order, before any strike may take place following the report of a board established under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, the Minister of Labour must be notified that it is the desire of the workers that such strike take place; and in that event he may order that the vote be taken under the supervision of the officers of the Department of Labour.

All persons affected by the dispute are entitled to vote and the vote must take place without delay—in fact the order specifically provides that it must be taken within five days.

When the order was first passed it was subject to some criticism. It was criticized on the one hand by reason of the fact that it was too inadequate and was ineffective. It was criticized on the other hand because it interfered with the right to strike.

The fact is, however, that neither criticism was justified nor correct. It is a most democratic order and gives to every man and woman the right to say whether he or she wishes to participate in any strike and to forgo his or her wages during the time that any strike might be in progress.

I believe it is fair to state that the Department of Labour has in every way sought: first, to protect every worker by establishing fair wage standards and to prevent industrial strife; second, to protect the lower paid workers against attempts of unscrupulous employers to deny them the minimum compensation to which they are entitled; third, to adjust any labour disputes as rapidly as possible; and fourth, to give workers in war plants throughout the country an opportunity to register their views, for or against a strike, after the findings of a conciliation board have been submitted.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the creation of an entirely new body in Canada which has materially aided in the prompt investigation and adjustment of disputes which might have otherwise resulted in stoppages of work involving many thousands of men. Because of the application of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act to all war industries, the number of applications for conciliation boards necessarily greatly increased. Each application had to be examined before a decision on its appointment was reached and the board itself was established.

But even after a board was applied for, the conciliation services of the Department of Labour were continued. Both dealing with the application, and the work of the conciliation board, took time. The result was that complaints were made by labour organizations of delay between the time of the application for the board and its establishment. This caused some measure of discontent on the part of workers and the feeling that the delay in setting up such boards was unnecessary.

It was felt that some action should be taken more promptly and effectively to deal with disputes in order that decisions might be more quickly obtained to determine whether the circumstances recited in the application warranted, by the nature of the dispute, the setting up of a board. The government in consequence created the industrial disputes inquiry commission.

The personnel of this commission is, I believe, one that will commend itself to this house. Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, a former member of the house, a gentleman who has been associated with the Department of Labour for several years and who has an intimate knowledge of labour problems, was appointed chairman. Associated with him are Mr. Gilbert Jackson and Mr. George Hodge. The former is an economist of international repute, and the latter has been in charge of industrial relation matters for the Canadian Pacific Railway company for many years.

This commission immediately assumed its duties, and its efforts in the prevention of disputes and in the adjustment of difficulties has more than met the expectations of the government.

Fifty-two disputes in all have been referred to the industrial disputes inquiry commission for attention since the appointment of this body in the beginning of July. In twenty-two cases settlements were arranged by the commission, resulting in a withdrawal of the applications which had previously been made for the establishment of boards of conciliation and investigation. In eight other cases inquiries made by the commission resulted in the establishment of boards of conciliation and investigation. In thirteen instances the inquiry commission found that the circumstances did not warrant the appointment of boards.

There were, in addition, two special references by the minister to the commission, three instances in which the references are still outstanding, and other cases in which the facts were brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour.

The creation of this commission has meant a tremendous saving in what would otherwise have meant lost man-hours, ill-will and discontent. This, it is fully realized, is inevitable where disputes either in being or threatening are not quickly adjusted.

Might I point out that the Department of Labour is doing everything possible to provide facilities whereby training opportunities are provided for those who wish to obtain a knowledge of the trades and crafts that will permit the production of a still greater quantity of the munitions of war.

This committee has heard something of the war emergency training programme in which the Department of Labour is engaged. We are now moving ahead of any programme and, for example, in our vocational classes are training more than 50,000 men a year.

But we are moving much further than that. The war-time bureau of technical personnel was set up under the capable chairmanship of Mr. E. M. Little. He is entitled to appreciation for what he has already accomplished. The aid which this bureau has given and will give will be substantial.

As an example, might I state that in the case of the newsprint industry, the utilities industry, the mines and in the field of chemical engineering a great many are now being trained for the express purpose of taking their place in war industry or enabling those who are already trained in those particular industries to take their place in industries engaged in war work.

This committee will, I know, not forget that Canada was forced on very short notice to embark upon a huge programme of construction and production of war equipment and supplies. This required the setting up of additional machinery and meeting not only pressing present exigencies but emergencies. These have been met as effectively and promptly, I believe, as circumstances permitted.

I believe it is a matter of congratulation that notwithstanding a situation without parallel in our history, with the good-will of labour and industry, we have been able to adapt ourselves to the new situation.

The policy of the government and of the Department of Labour in all that relates to production will continue to be that of doing everything possible to maintain harmonious relations between employees and employers.

Recently the government passed an order stabilizing wages. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that in the references I make I shall not be guilty of too much repetition of what has been more ably said than I can say it, by the Minister of Finance. I do, however, have to deal with that phase of the general policy which he has explained, dealing with the matter of wages. As I have said, recently the government passed an order stabilizing wages. That order is part of a wider programme decided upon by the government in an attempt to prevent a vicious inflationary spiral recurring in Canada.

Taxation on profits and on dividends had already been provided. The control of prices is now provided for. This stabilization of wages is not entirely new. For on December 16, 1940, the government passed an order in council which has been widely applied in war industries.

The choice faced by the government at the time it was passed was to let wage rates take their unplanned upward course stimulating that spiral of inflation, or to introduce a measure of equitable control. The government selected the second alternative of trying to minimize changes in wage rates and, to some extent therefore, of prices and the cost of living. It ordered that in the essential war industries there should be no increase in basic wage rates except where wages were found to be too low. The expression "freezing" has been used. This order is not a freezing order; it is a stabilizing order; because, if wages are too low, the board will have power to increase them.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is it compulsory?

Mr. McLARTY: On the board?

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, on those to whom it applies?

Mr. McLARTY: Oh, the order is mandatory, yes. But the point I was making was this, that wages can be increased if they are too low. The word "freeze" suggests an inflexibility that covers all.

Mr. MacINNIS: I thought from the minister's earlier remarks that he was opposed to compulsion.

Mr. McLARTY: Well, it is mandatory on both sides. I mean, it is not just on one side. As I have said, the government selected the second alternative of trying to minimize changes in wage rates and, to some extent therefore, of prices and the cost of living. It ordered that in the essential war industries there should be no increase in basic wage rates and suggested that adjustments to increases in the cost of living should take the form of a separate cost of living bonus in a flat amount for all classes of workers.

To the extent that the maintenance of current wage rates does prevent an increase in prices and in the cost of living, wage-earners and all classes in the community, including the government in its capacity of the country's biggest buyer, will all clearly benefit. The heart of the policy is not to restore some previously high level of wages, but to prevent what might otherwise be a series of "runaway" increases from present levels. The purpose is not to "protect" any one class of citizens, but to ensure the conduct of our war effort by imposing the necessary sacrifices on all classes in an orderly manner.

Since some increase in the cost of living, however, was almost certain to result from the transfer of so large a proportion of our resources to the production of war materials and supplies, it seemed necessary and proper to assure, not that labour should be completely protected from price increases or from sharing reasonably in whatever sacrifices the war may require, but that the basic standard of living of the workers should be protected. For that reason the order in council generally known as 7440 provided, not that wage rates should be "geared to living costs" but that, by a flat cost of living bonus, uniform for all workers, any impairment of the basic standard of living and of productive efficiency should be prevented.

It is to be noted that the flat bonus, regardless of the worker's wage rate, will extend a very much greater measure of protection to the low-paid than to the high-paid worker and gears to the cost of living only the wages of those workers at or near a minimum level of subsistence and that part of the wages of other workers which is spent for basic necessities.

Our present wage policy was based upon the outstanding lesson learned as a result of our experience during the last war. In that period all belligerents financed their war effort in varying degrees by inflation. In all of them, despite all efforts at war-time controls, prices and the cost of living increased more rapidly than wage rates. On the one hand this led to perhaps unintended but automatic profiteering; on the other hand, to arbitrary and capricious reductions in the wage-earners' standard of living. A few favourably situated wage-earners were able, it is true, to enforce wage increases more rapidly than the cost of living rose, but for the majority of the workers the reduction in their standard of living was very substantial.

It is a fact, so well known to this committee, that real wages never keep pace with nominal wages that I need scarcely repeat it. Money, after all, is only a convenient medium of exchange. May I illustrate this by the experience of the last war. The Minister of Finance has already given certain figures in connection with it. Those figures relate particularly to wage rates and the cost of living. By 1917 the cost of living had risen 39 per cent, wages only 26 per cent. By 1918 the cost of living had risen 59 per cent, but wages only 47 per cent. Wage rates never overtook the cost of living during the whole period of rising prices.

This economic fact was a continual source not only of industrial friction, but, for certain groups, also of genuine suffering during the war period and made the necessary post-war readjustments proportionately more difficult.

That order in council which has become somewhat widely known as 7440 was directed to and formed the basis of awards of boards of conciliation appointed under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

In the recent order respecting wages the essential principles remain the same, but changes have been made in its application and in its administration. These changes may be summarized as follows:

(1) The previous order was directed to conciliation boards appointed under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. As such it was necessarily limited to boards to which that act applied or to which its application was extended, at the request of labour on November 7, 1939, and which included all war industries in Canada. The present order extends to all industries, subject to certain limitations.

In the construction industry it applies where ten or more are employed. In other industries it applies where fifty or more are employed. The reason for the distinction is that in the construction industry a contractor while employing a large number might have few on one job. These minimum figures are fixed largely for administrative purposes and the administrative machinery is provided which will advise the government on such changes in these minimum numbers as may appear desirable.

[Mr. McLarty.]

(2) It makes the payment of the cost of living bonus mandatory, subject only to the power of the national war labour board to determine that the employer is clearly unable to pay.

(3) It provides for an accounting period as to the proper amount of the bonus each three months.

(4) It provides for the creation of a national war labour board and of five regional boards which will be charged with the responsibility of administering the order and of ascertaining that its provisions are fairly and properly carried out.

In addition the national board has power to recommend to the government such matters as it may deem necessary, subject to the principles enunciated in the order in council, to which I have previously referred, passed on the 19th of June, 1940, and generally described as P.C. 2685.

I have outlined the general principles of the order. If I were to go into more detail I could do so only by reading the order itself to this committee. I fully appreciate the fact that a more detailed discussion will ensue upon it.

The only criticism that has been voiced is the measure of consultation with those affected before the order was passed. Well, the order invades the provincial field. We invited the provincial ministers of labour to a conference that was held on October 14. We asked them if they had objections to the passing of the order—because it did invade their field. When it was realized that the dominion government believed this measure was essential in our conduct of the war, no serious objection was raised by any province represented.

The Prime Minister and I met leading representatives of labour. Details of the order were not discussed; but I believe it fair to say they felt that the general principles of the order in council stabilizing wages should not properly be confined to war industries alone, but in the application should cover all industries. The order was submitted to the national labour supply council. That council made suggestions of a number of amendments, many of which were adopted.

I wish to be fair to this committee. I would not wish to convey the suggestion that because it was discussed with the various ministers of labour, with the leaders of labour organizations and with the national labour supply council, it was either approved or disapproved by all of those participating in these conferences.

Some suggested they had not the authority from their respective organizations either to approve or disapprove. I make mention of these consultations, however, to demonstrate that the programme was not lightly embarked upon or without great consideration being given to it.

But it is, after all, a war measure. The government in the last analysis must assume responsibility for its success or failure, and having ultimately to assume that responsibility, it must do so now.

The success of this measure depends upon its acceptance and its application by both labour and industry in Canada. That it will receive such acceptance and be fairly and impartially applied, I have no doubt. As each day passes, the people of Canada have shown in an increasing degree not only a willingness but a great desire to bear the irksome restrictions and the great sacrifices which war inevitably brings. This measure may be regarded by some as one of those restrictions and as one more of those sacrifices.

The government feels that it is essential to our war effort and will add to the effectiveness of that effort, as well as to the happiness and prosperity of the Canadian people after the war has been won.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee will recall that under the arrangement made with respect to procedure, it was understood that after the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the two groups had spoken, the ministers who have been charged principally with the administration of Canada's war effort would each make a formal statement, and that when their statements had been concluded the house would continue in committee and, if so desired, discussion would follow on the subject matter of the several statements that had been made. In order to preserve relevancy and to avoid as much in the way of overlapping as possible, it was thought that it would be well to take up the discussion in committee in the same order in which the statements themselves had been presented. The formal statements of the ministers whose departments have chiefly to do with the war effort have now been made, and if we follow the procedure that was agreed upon we will now begin with the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply and have an open discussion upon any matters which hon. members may wish to bring up on matters pertaining to munitions and supply, and then follow with discussion upon the statements of the other ministers, each in the order in which the ministers themselves have made their statements.

I should like to make this clear. There is no desire on the part of the government, and I am sure there was no desire on the part of the leader of the opposition or the leaders of the groups in the house, in arriving at this arrangement, to preclude anyone from saying anything he pleases, so long as it is politely said, and to make any statement he may wish to make which in his opinion might be related to Canada's war effort. But some order will have to be followed, and I would suggest that we adhere to the one which was proposed and which is set out in Hansard of Tuesday, namely, to take the statements of the different ministers, following the order of their presentation. When that discussion is concluded, if there are other matters which any members wish to have discussed, they might be taken up at that stage. I do not wish to be a dictator, even as respects the procedure of the house. What I suggest is to facilitate orderly discussion. Perhaps we could make most headway were we to adjourn now and begin to-morrow the more general discussion, starting with the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the motion to adjourn is put, I should like to say this. At the conference to which the Prime Minister has referred, at which I was present together with hon. gentlemen representing the two other parties, I thought it was made clear that certain members of this house would like to give expression to their views after having heard the ministers and before we reached the stage of question and answer. If I did not make myself absolutely clear to the Prime Minister, that is my fault. There are members on this side, two or three—I do not know just how many—who would like to make extended remarks of their own, and I certainly suggest that it would be a great mistake if they were not allowed to do that. Therefore, I agree at once to the suggestion that we adjourn, but with the understanding that if anyone wants to speak at three o'clock to-morrow he be entitled to do so. There may be hon. gentlemen on the other side who would like to speak.

We have listened with the most intense interest to-day to three very important speeches—the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), which to me was very interesting and which, of course, I found it quite difficult to follow, and the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), which requires some analysis. I should not leave out my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence for Air whose speech was short and understood, I think, by us all perfectly. I should not like to have it even suggested that if anyone wants to make any extended remarks here to-morrow he should be shut off. I hope the Prime Minister will grant that freedom of expression which characterized the statements made at the earlier stages of this session and before we had our meeting, that there was no disposition at all to shut out anyone who wants to make any remarks at this time in this house. I hope that will be adhered to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The purpose of having the house sit in committee of the whole was to afford the greatest possible latitude to hon. members to say whatever they thought they should say with respect to the carrying on of the war by the administration. What I have said about following a particular order is according to what was my understanding at the time. There were other group leaders present, they will know whether I have interpreted the agreement reached aright or not. But let me say at once to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that if there are members of his party or of any party who desire to speak immediately and not wait to take up the statements in the order I have suggested, as far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing that they should have the precedence to-morrow and to have to-morrow's proceedings start with their speeches. The whole purpose of the government in the sittings of the house at the present time is to have the fullest possible discussion of matters of public concern and interest.

Mr. NEILL: We are dealing in a very unusual way; I do not think I ever heard or read throughout the history of Canada where a parliament sat in committee and apparently discussed everything at large, nothing before the house, no resolutions, no estimates, and apparently it is impossible for us to move a resolution or propose amendments. Might I ask the Prime Minister if it would be in order under these very unusual circumstances for any hon. member to move a motion in this committee in order to give expression to or test the feeling of the house on any particular subject?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says there never was procedure like this; there never was a war like the present. I might remind my hon. friend that the session of parliament was virtually over when we adjourned last June. This is an extra that comes at the end of the session. The government might have called hon. members together and adjourned without opportunity for discussion at all. But the last thought in our minds was to deny anyone the opportunity of discussing anything in any way he pleased so long as it was calculated to further Canada's war effort and have it fully understood. We could not think of any method that would afford more latitude than to have the house sit continuously in committee. We realized that it was a novel procedure, but one that certainly could not be taken exception to on the score of the government trying in any way to prevent full and free discussion.

However, when it comes to what my hon. friend suggests, the moving of motions or bringing in of amendments to supply and the like, I am afraid that for that procedure we shall have to wait until the next session and the government brings down its programme and we proceed again in the regular way.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Following the same idea, it was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister this afternoon that since we were last in session here there have been certain committees sitting during the recess. It would be very interesting, and I think it is necessary, that the chairman of the committee and the chairman of the sub-committees, one very important sub-committee at least, should give the house and the country the benefit of their observations on a very important matter, and perhaps we should have an opportunity to discuss what they have done and what they purpose to do, or are we going to forget all about it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I said, in reply to a question this afternoon, that I would give the house a little later on further information as to what is to be considered of the work of existing committees. Perhaps my answer to my hon. friend can stand.

Mr. MacNICOL: On Monday last I believe it was I who asked the Minister of Pensions and National Health a question in reference to the reporting of a committee in connection with pensions to widows of non-pensioned soldiers. I did not word my question properly, and the minister gave a correct answer to the question I asked, but the question I had in mind was this: Before the house adjourned in the spring we were informed by the minister that during the summer that special committee would continue to consider the question of pensions to these widows, and we would hear something about it when the house met again.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The report of the parliamentary committee recommended that the government give consideration to certain action with reference to the subject mentioned by my hon. friend. That consideration has been given by the government during the recess, and the decision of the government has been not to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act during this session or the next session, and generally the opinion that any remedy that can be given in that direction should be given as part of social service legislation and not under the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under what legislation can these unfortunate non-pensioned soldiers' widows receive consideration?

Mr. MacINNIS: Referring to the discussion that took place immediately the Minister of Labour sat down, as to procedure that would be followed from to-morrow, my understanding of our meeting in the Prime Minister's office is that what he had said to-night is substantially in accord with the agreement arrived at; that is, that the procedure will be much the same as in committee of the whole. If an hon. member wants to speak for a considerable length of time, even forty minutes or more, he is at liberty to speak, and if he wants to ask questions he can do that. But I understand that the procedure will be the same as if the house were in committee on some particular subject.

Mr. HANSELL: We have listened to very fine addresses from some of the ministers, but I do not think those addresses have covered Canada's entire war effort. Can the committee expect to hear from the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just said that it was thought advisable that the formal statements should be confined to those departments that have primarily to do with the war effort. Then, if there are other matters that hon. members wish to discuss, affecting other departments, whether they relate to the war effort or to purely departmental matters apart from the war effort, the same liberty will be afforded for asking questions and receiving answers and having discussion.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

Friday, November 7, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSED STRIKE VOTE IN KIRKLAND LAKE DISTRICT MINES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the orders of the day I rise to ask leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the taking of a strike vote to-morrow, November 8, in certain mines in the Kirkland Lake district in the province of Ontario. The vote has been ordered by the Minister of Labour under the provisions of order in council, P.C. 7307, dated September 16, 1941. The application of the provisions of this order which has been proposed by the minister in this case will, if carried out, further intensify industrial unrest in this industry and threaten industrial peace throughout the country, with consequent harm to our war effort.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member ought to state why he considers the subject matter of his motion to be of urgent public importance and therefore requiring immediate discussion by the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: The question is urgent because the vote is to be taken to-morrow. I cannot say any more without making a short speech, which I possibly am not entitled to do at the moment, and if I did, I would be taking advantage of the house. The employees who are interested in this matter are of the opinion that the order is so wide that the result will not give a true representation of the will of the employees in the plant.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, having regard to what my hon. friend has said, I am inclined to think that the point he wishes to raise could be more properly raised when the house is in committee and we are discussing labour matters. It is quite true that the vote is to be taken to-morrow, but in order to have something considered a matter of urgent public importance it should be something that has recently occurred. As yet no vote has been taken, and I submit therefore that the matter is not one of urgent public importance. The minister's action is one simply of carrying out the law of the land, and I do not think the carrying out of the law of the land is a matter of such urgent public importance as to require the house to adjourn to debate the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the question raised by the hon. member, I must decide as to its being a matter of urgent public importance. I refer the hon. member to standing order 31, paragraph 3, which reads:

> He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

My ruling must be that this matter is not of urgent public importance requiring discussion at this moment. When the house has reached the discussion stage in committee of the whole, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) is dealing with his department, the hon. member will be at liberty to bring up the matter to which he refers. I therefore rule his motion out of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, am I permitted to say a word on your decision?

Mr. SPEAKER: At the moment I do not think the hon. member would be in order, but when we are in committee of the whole and the statement of the Minister of Labour is before the committee, it would be in order for him to make whatever observations he wishes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would Your Honour grant me the privilege of asking a question of the Prime Minister in regard to the proceedings to-day?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a right to ask questions on the orders of the day, and we are still on orders of the day.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he will bring up the statement of the Minister of Labour first. If we go beyond to-day a vote will be taken to-morrow, and the consequences of that vote cannot be rectified by any discussion or action that may be taken in this house. Therefore I would ask the Prime Minister to permit discussion of the statement which the Minister of Labour made last night. That would serve the purpose as well as the procedure I suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend was one of the leaders who met with myself the other day to decide on the procedure to be followed while the house was sitting in committee of the whole to discuss different matters pertaining to our war effort. He as well as the other leaders agreed that the best procedure would be to have the different ministers make their formal statements and then have a discussion on those formal statements very much in the order in which they were presented. The danger in departing from any agreement of the kind is that one exception leads to endless requests for other exceptions. Last night I was asked to make an exception and allow hon. members at this stage to make speeches of any nature, instead of confining their remarks for the time being to the subject matter of the particular statement that might be before the committee. It appeared to me at the time that my action would be misconstrued if I were to press unduly the desirability of holding to the agreement as made. I therefore yielded to the extent of saying that if hon. members of the house, knowing what the agreement was, wished to make speeches on their own account without waiting until the procedure suggested had been complied with, that I, for my part, would not object and that they might proceed if they so wished. But I think I have gone as far as I should like to go in the matter of permitting exceptions to an agreement made to further the convenience of all. What is happening now illustrates the unwisdom of departing from an understanding or agreement once reached, and I am inclined therefore to feel that the matter should be left where it is at this stage.

[Mr. Speaker.]

COMMITTEE TO DRAFT REGULATIONS FOR BALLOTING AT KIRKLAND LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the question which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) tried to raise, there is considerable confusion in the ranks of both organized labour and those who are attempting to organize, with respect to the election to be held in Kirkland Lake. There are two points at least which I should like the minister to clarify. First, who is eligible under this order in council to vote in that election? Second, what provision is made for members of the union for scrutineers in the taking of the ballot and in the final count of the ballots?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): With regard to the question of the hon. member, and also in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, I can answer the second part of the question by saying that provision is made for the union or the proposed union to appoint scrutineers at each balloting place. In connection with the former part of the question, about half an hour ago a delegation from Kirkland Lake waited on me and made certain representations as to classes which should be entitled to vote. As to the first question, I appointed a committee of three from the Department of Labour to work out regulations which they thought would be in accordance with the order and would be fair to both parties. Certain representations have been made to me; I have asked the committee to reconvene this afternoon, and, if for a few minutes I can be relieved of my duties in the house I intend to discuss the matter fully with them. For that reason I am unable now to answer the first part of the hon. member's question.

QUESTION OF PARTICIPATION OF UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS IN FORD COMPANY ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour a question arising out of a telegram. I am sorry I could not give him notice, but I have just received the telegram. It states:

Ford of Canada announces election under labour department supervision in which only company union would be on ballot. Majority of 12,000 workers have already requested United Automobile Workers to bargain for them and will accept democratic election. Company action threatens defence production and loss of millions of allies in United States. Urge you present this national issue immediately and demand labour department protect genuine collective bargaining.

Does the Minister of Labour intend to protect the democratic rights of workers by allowing the union of their choice to take part in the ballot?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): I must say that notice of a question of this length is something I would have appreciated. I do not know at all what are the intentions of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, and it would be a little presumptuous for me to suggest that the Department of Labour would be taking any action until it is informed of the action which the Ford Motor company proposes to take.

MARITIME PROVINCE LUMBER WORKERS EMPLOYED IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is able to make a report to-day with reference to the questions asked yesterday by the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. O'Brien)?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question relating to lumbering?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): People going over to the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I should like to give later on a more detailed statement than I am in a position to give at the moment. In a word, I can say that such men as have been crossing over to the United States have received permits, not from our government at all but from the government of the United States. They have been cutting wood which for the most part, I understand, is shipped to Saint John, Canada, to be manufactured in mills or factories there in a fashion which will help to serve the war industries in Great Britain. But I will give my hon. friend the full particulars later.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO WHEAT BOARD'S OPERATIONS AND THE 1940 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he proposes before the house adjourns, presumably early next week, to make a statement with respect to the wheat board's operations and the 1940 crop? When may we expect a report with respect to the handling of that crop?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to take the hon. member's question into consideration.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Middlesex West): I should like to inquire of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the Ontario wheat grower may expect his final payment from the wheat board for his 1940 crop?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Middlesex West kindly notified me of his intention to ask this question, and enabled me to get definite information for him. I am advised that the distribution of the final payment on the 1940 Ontario wheat delivered to the Canadian wheat board merely awaits the complete returns and the audit of the processing levy. A proportion of this processing levy, of course, will be distributed on the Ontario 1940 wheat crop, and as soon as the total amount is definitely known and confirmed by audit the final payment can proceed. The board's receipts of 1940 Ontario crop have all been sold at a small profit on the sales transactions, quite apart from the processing levy, and the board expects to be able to proceed with the final payment early in 1942.

May I just mention in this connection that, with the final payment on the 1939 Ontario crop, which was announced in November 1940, there are still about five thousand of the certificates outstanding; that is, the producers who are entitled to this money have not yet picked it up.

ACREAGE BONUS—WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Can the Minister of Agriculture give the house any information with respect to speeding up payments of the wheat acreage bonus in western Canada? I am prompted to ask this question because of the numerous inquiries I have received in the last ten days as to the cause of the delay. The minister when he was out west stated that he was going to speed up payment. Would he care to say when the final payments may be expected?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): One of the difficulties in making payments as rapidly as otherwise would have been possible has been that about forty per cent of the applications for the bonus contained mistakes having to do with location, ownership, acreage or something of the sort, and that forty per cent had to be checked back in order to correct the mistakes. But the last returns indicate that in spite of all these difficulties and delays approximately half of the total estimated amount of money payable was paid out prior to the end of last week. During this week in order to make it possible for more applicants to receive payment the plan was started of paying seventy-five per cent of the total claim, retaining the other twenty-five per cent until a final check had been made to determine the full amount payable. I expect within the next few weeks, in addition to those who have already been paid in full, the others will receive seventy-five per cent of the full amount payable, and in addition all claims under $50 will have been paid. With respect to the larger claims, seventy-five per cent of the amount claimed will be paid and only twenty-five per cent retained until such time as the claims can be fully checked.

ACREAGE BONUS—ORDER IN COUNCIL RESPECTING PRICE CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Would the Minister of Agriculture make a statement concerning the recently proposed acreage bonus to wheat producers under the new order in council covering the price control set up by the government?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have made a number of statements, which have been published in the press. If it is desirable that further statements should be made before the house closes and after the discussion on the war services, I shall be pleased to answer any questions with regard to the matter.

NAVAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO NEWSPAPER REPORT RESPECTING THE NORTH ATLANTIC AND HALIFAX HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I invite the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to comment on a report which recently appeared in the Detroit Free Press. This report received considerable circulation in this country as well as in the United States, and aroused some concern particularly at border points. It is by Clifford A. Prevost, Washington correspondent of the Detroit Free Press, and the relevant parts of his dispatch read as follows:

> British warships have been withdrawn from the north Atlantic and the United States Navy has taken over the task of defending Canada and convoying American and British merchant men beyond Iceland, according to information made available in Washington and Ottawa to-night.
> It was stated reliably that Britain's greater harbour on this side of the Atlantic—Halifax—had been taken over by the United States Navy. This was neither confirmed nor denied by the navy. . . . That the United States Navy is in control of Halifax was not denied by the president. . . . Mr. Roosevelt said that of course the joint defence board had been considering joint use of defence facilities in the event of an attack. He said that he supposed the board had mentioned Halifax and Toronto and he knew they had discussed Chicago.

The report goes on:

> But this much has been reliably established: That Admiral Ernest H. King, of the United States Atlantic fleet, is in complete charge of the Halifax harbour and that the Canadian navy has been released from its obligations to convoy ships leaving the Nova Scotia coast.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): In answer to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) I would say in the first place that it would have been advisable for this reporter to consult some naval authority in the United States before making such statements. Had he done so, and had he been given permission to use the information thus acquired, I am sure the statements would not have been made. His dispatch is quite long and I do not know whether an answer should be made to it in this house, or whether ministers can be expected to deal with statements made by reporters in all parts of the world, statements obviously based on ignorance of the subject and lack of information. However, out of deference to my hon. friend who has asked the question I would say first of all that there are still British warships in the north Atlantic and there are still Canadian ships in that same area, as would appear from the remarks which I made the other night in this house.

As to the harbour of Halifax having been taken over by the United States Navy, I may say, as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has just commented, that that report, like the one about Mark Twain's death, is somewhat exaggerated; in fact, it is based on pure imagination. Halifax harbour is still as it has been for two hundred years, a British and Canadian harbour. I think that covers the question.

Mr. MARTIN: The answer is no?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The answer as to Halifax harbour is definitely no. While, as I said the other night when speaking in this house, we are most grateful here as are all British people for the assistance that is being rendered by the United States in one way or another, it is not true to say that there are no British warships left in the north Atlantic, and certainly there are a great many Canadian warships there.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

PROVISION BY BOARD FOR DISTRIBUTION OF CHEESE TO RETAIL TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the release of the make of cheese since November first, is it the intention of the dairy products board to see that a portion of it finds its way into the trade, so that the large processing firms will not buy it all up and deprive retailers of their share?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member just at this moment has referred the question to me. I can only say that the matter was discussed before the cheese was again placed on the domestic market, and the board is placing what I think are sufficient safeguards about the disposal of the cheese to make it impossible for concerns such as those referred to to get possession of any more than their proper proportion of the cheese which is going on the market.

WAR-TIME HOUSING

ACCOMMODATION FOR SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS AND MUNITIONS WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether any consideration is being given to allowing soldiers' dependents as well as munitions workers the use of the new war-time houses. I ask the question because I have letters on my desk with regard to soldiers' wives being thrown out of houses on account of landlords selling the homes over their heads.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The situation was called to my attention some months ago, and also to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. Arrangements were made that a certain number of houses would be available for wives of soldiers now overseas who were ejected from their houses for reasons that the city or municipal authority, who are really responsible for the situation, could not prevent. I believe that all the localities where housing is being provided were notified of the arrangement. Certain cities have taken advantage of the offer and are now using a few houses for the purpose mentioned. If the responsible authority in the city represented by the hon. member will make the proper approach, I am sure that similar action will be taken in Peterborough.

The house again in committee of the whole, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): During the past week the house has listened for four days to a considerable amount of window dressing by hon. gentlemen opposite who are in charge of the war. It is the desire of every good citizen to cooperate with them in their task, the greatest task with which any government could conceivably be entrusted, but if the Prime Minister will keep his ear to the ground —and he was in the west and over in England and other places—he will find that there is a good deal of rumbling all over Canada.

This is not the first government that has sought to conduct a great war on a political basis. In England the Asquith government, which went out of office in 1916, had conducted the last war along similar lines. That government had to resign because the Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, sought to conduct the war precisely in the way in which our present Prime Minister is carrying on this conflict, namely, on political lines.

Parliament has been treated during the last two years with contempt. We meet, so to speak, on again, off again, on again. The doors of the house are locked without any respect for parliamentary institutions. In the British house the other day twenty-six members of parliament supporting that government rose in their places and offered constructive criticism of their government. The Prime Minister there listened to a great many uncomplimentary remarks which were made in the course of the debate by members supporting the government in the house, sitting on all sides. He listened to remarks condemning the failure of the so-called Atlantic conference, the eight points of which reasserted a good many things, many of which cannot be carried out, though some are political and economic and will not add one iota to the fight against Hitler.

Those who criticize the party system in this country do so with some degree of justice, because the system has some defects. It sometimes leads people to forget the basis upon which political parties were formed and organized, namely, to promote the greatness of the country and the welfare of the people. But when you criticize the party system for its defects, do not forget that it has its merits and virtues too, as we can see by studying some of the great governments that have functioned there in the past, and gave England good government on the whole and free parliamentary institutions.

In a democracy such as Canada claims to be, the opposition, under the rules and regulations laid down in the constitution, must in effect share the responsibility for the conduct of the affairs of the country. It must share responsibility with the government if this is not a total war. The opposition is the alternative government, and its policy is to offset that of hon. gentlemen opposite. If the opposition make a strong case the government of the day may feel impelled to agree with them and to bring about some changes, or an appeal may be made to the people, and if the government wishes to remain in office it is bound to make such changes in its policy as are necessary.

This opposition has consistently protested against the conduct of this war as a political war. Take the members from the Toronto district. We have heard in the last few days three ministers representing respectively the air force, the army and the navy, for all of whom I have a great deal of respect. But the fact is that not a member of parliament from that district has received a single invitation to attend any meeting that would promote the successful prosecution of the war since it started, or to visit a camp, or see a parade or an inspection. Why, I do not know; perhaps it is because we are Conservatives and the government are conducting a Liberal war. At any rate, we have not received an invitation to visit a single camp. There is a certain building at the exhibition of which I laid the cornerstone, in which there are housed some 7,000 men, and although I had a great deal to do with getting that building erected I have never been invited to visit it. But people from Hollywood can get invitations galore. As a matter of fact, members of parliament should not need invitations to go on federal government property if they want to. I do not blame the ministry, because they cannot look after everything, but I do suggest that they should pass word on to their deputies that the country has federal members. Yesterday we had an invitation from the minister in charge of the army. I do not wish to add to his burdens, which are heavy enough already; I would like to help. We had an invitation yesterday to go and help in recruiting. I for one will not help restore it or be responsible for its failures and mistakes because, as I say, it has been a case of on again, off again and on again, and voluntary recruiting has been destroyed. One does not feel any great enthusiasm until the government shows signs of hearkening to the voice of the people and doing something for the soldiers and their dependents, and giving some redress of grievances. Every Tom, Dick and Harry is protected and can get a bonus, but when you ask the Minister of Finance to do something with regard to a high cost of living bonus for our returned men and for the soldiers who are fighting for us overseas, the only answer you get is, "I will give the matter consideration," the same as was said a year ago.

If anyone is entitled to a war bonus it is the dependents of the soldiers, women and children, the mothers and wives of these men. When you are spending $4,000,000 a day, surely you can afford to give a fair share of justice to these men overseas or in training to go over. If you are not prepared to do so, then do not look for recruits. You must first give some consideration to the grievances of the soldiers and their dependents and to their requests for insurance, free fares, bonus, a readjustment of pay and so forth.

The people are very much dissatisfied with the conduct of the war as it has been carried on so far. While we wish to give general support to the government and have done so, there are a great many shortcomings in the administration of the war. I have been trying to get a readjustment of wages for these men, and it took me about four months to get some information and the rates of pay. I wrote, first, an excellent official, Judge Davis and he passed it on to the army; then it went to the navy and to the air force, and it took me four months to find out what the rates of pay were in these branches of the service. Look over the sheet which the minister has been good enough to give me and you will see the various ranks set out there, with rates of pay. I am not objecting to them. Take the rank of colonel—and some of them are not going overseas, but are staying at home, some in civilian duties. Some of them, with sustenance and living quarters, get $6,500. Then you come down the list and you find lieutenant-colonel, major, captain, lieutenant, the last receiving $5 a day, with $1.70 for sustenance allowance and all that kind of thing, amounting to $2,600 a year. Then you come to the humble private who gets $1.30 a day, although some of these men are serving in England. That schedule is inequitable. This is the pay, $1.30 a day, of the privates, the men who are doing hard work, and I submit that there should be some readjustment of salaries all along the line of these low-paid men.

The same applies to the air force and the navy. With regard to the latter, there are 4,000 or 5,000 men who cannot get into the navy on account of lack of ships. Then you come to the new army which has been formed, the army of women—and dear knows they were doing an important work in the last great war. I do not know how the war could have been conducted without them. But look at the rates of pay—$11.35 a day plus sustenance and other allowances in this new war, as much as given to eight or nine privates serving in the old country, in the actual theatre of war. I am not objecting to what the women are getting, for example, wing officers, $6.70 and all that, but if that is the rate of pay for the ladies' army, the privates serving in England should have some consideration.

I received a letter from the Minister of Finance, which was written on both sides of the paper—that is about the only economy I have seen since I have been in Ottawa—with regard to this bonus for soldiers. If he would look into this wonderful information bureau he would see tons and tons of paper going to waste, just tossed into the waste-paper baskets when received. The minister said of course that with regard to a bonus for soldiers he was not in a position to reply or say whether there would be any change. Well, then, do not go round looking for people to join the army and to put up with this thing; do not ask members of parliament to ask the women to give up their husbands and sons for the country when soldiers' dependents are not paid enough to keep body and soul together, and are paid for only two children a small pittance and none for more than two. The whole system is wrong and should be changed in the interest of recruiting.

As far as the conduct of the war is concerned there are one or two things that I desire to call to the attention of the committee. The first is the accusations which were made by the heads of the legion last summer, Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Herridge. I do not know anything about the matter myself. I have a great respect for the present Prime Minister, I think I have known him now longer than anyone else in the house and I sympathize with the work he has to do, it is almost beyond any man's capacity, but I want a total war effort. I think it would be better to reply to these gentlemen instead of sending the Postmaster General to North York. I should be glad if the Prime Minister would kindly lay the papers on the table of the house so that we might know what happened, as well as all correspondence for a year before the war. I moved for this in 1940, but did not get it.

During the six months before this war broke out, this government and the whole House of Commons were saturated with the Geneva type of mind, thinking we could get on without arms or allies whatever and remain at peace. The papers to which I refer should be laid on the table now, because if the government was pacifist it was no different from any other governments, and the charges which I have mentioned could be cleared up.

There is a meeting of the Conservative party in Ottawa to-day and it is very much alive; notwithstanding criticisms, it has always stood fast to its principles of the British connection. As the late Sir John A. Macdonald said at Kingston on October 5, 1844: "It is my firm belief that the prosperity of Canada depends upon its permanent connection with the mother country, and I shall resist to the utmost any attempt from whatever quarter to weaken that union." One of the things we saw here recently was the tremendous popularity of the monarchy, and the failure of the House of Commons to deal with problems as they occur. I have often wondered at that. Canada at the colonial conference in 1937 put forward the view that we have no commitments with the rest of the empire, that parliament should decide. They might well know that if war came Canada was at war, would be directly involved. But they refused to arm or get ready.

I believe the Prime Minister would have been well advised to have a war cabinet; that it is an absolute necessity. New Zealand and Australia wanted a war cabinet; south Africa did not, and the south of Ireland is neutral and outside the empire. Instead of ministers having to go across to England by aeroplane from time to time, we should have a war cabinet to sit in and meet with the other dominions. Down to the time of the outbreak of the war there was not a single member of the cabinet on the front benches who believed in empire policies and what they stand for; they were more Washington-minded than empire-minded. The Prime Minister said in Britain that he is averse to any participation in an imperial cabinet. That is a mistake. In south Africa they want a separate republic after the fashion of the south of Ireland. We are dependent upon Britain; everything in freedom and liberty we have in this country we owe to Britain; if it were not for Britain and the British fleet, where would we be to-day? This very building in which we meet would be bombed. As I said in 1936-37 during the Ethiopian war, we needed a proper empire shipbuilding policy and a programme for training youths for the merchant marine and air empire scheme, and events have proved that the government of the day was all wrong when it did not seize that opportunity and rearm. We are dependent upon Britain for our very existence, and there is no reason why we should be reluctant to enter into closer relations with the mother country during the war and have a war cabinet for the empire in London. Canadian sentiment is like that of New Zealand and Australia, loyal to the empire ideal. It was a great mistake when the Prime Minister decided that he was against a proper war cabinet to consider the various phases of the war in London, because London to-day is the new centre of Christendom as no other capital in the world is. There was the battle of London and the battle of the Atlantic, which in some sense is a misnomer because it is also the battle of the Pacific and the Indian ocean and the seas of the world, a battle for the freedom of the seas and British supremacy of the seas. Mr. Menzies, the former prime minister of Australia, who addressed this house wanted an empire cabinet and an empire policy, and I believe the overwhelming voice of the Conservative party in this country is in favour of having a war cabinet formed right away. The war is creating a comradeship between empire troops, and I believe that comradeship should be extended for the conduct of the war by an empire council. Had that been done we would have known more about the war.

We have had hardly a single paper laid on the table of the house of a record of correspondence with Britain and the empire. I am sorry the body which meets in another part of this building has gone home for the holidays; they could greatly aid in the war if given work, but apparently the House of Commons is not wanted around here either; as far as I see we might just as well pack up and go home. Members of the government rise in their places and read to us essays about things which can be got in the public press just as well. They have made Canada restless for a total war policy in this the third year of the war. In the first year it was not to be expected that Canada could do everything it should do because we had a pacifist government which was not war-minded; many of them knew nothing about war, and it is no disparagement of hon. gentlemen who make admirable executives in peace time, to say that they have no knowledge of war problems, because peace and war administration are far apart, especially in a world war like this. Some are able and efficient gentlemen, but now what is needed is a total war effort on their part.

The battle of Canada's propaganda goes on night and day. You cannot turn on the radio without hearing all kinds of talk from members of the government, the information bureau and their favourites and radio paid agents, and the ghosts behind the scenes, as I called the unnamed spokesmen, and there seems to be a distinct United States taint about all the speeches and little praise for Britain. How does it come that we hear so little about the great fight Russia is making against the mechanized hordes of the axis powers? On the radio and from the information bureau we hardly ever hear about Russia, but we hear much about the American isolationists; in sections of our press and radio and information bureau they seem to be troubled with Lindberghitis. There is more space given sometimes in some papers to Colonel Windberg—I mean Lindbergh—and the United States isolationists than to all the proceedings of this house. The battle of the air is going on, and all these paid officers are giving their views. I believe the time is coming when we should cease having press censorship in this country and adopt the policy followed in the old country. Why not trust the newspapers, as we did in the last great war and abolish censorship? It is unnecessary. We would have very little trouble, and we would save all the money that is being spent on an information bureau which turns out literature presumably for the benefit of the United States press, and is resented over there as trying to bring the United States into the war.

Then I should like to know where the auditor general is during these times, because every department seems to be run by its own minister, who apparently is able to spend all the money he likes. We also have the celebrated joint defence board which, without the authority of parliament, is binding Canada to various treaties for the next hundred years. We have the Minister of Agriculture announcing a policy with regard to a fixed price for wheat which may cost the country from $125,000,000 to $200,000,000 with other allowances, and which is to be carried out by order in council. We have the Minister of Munitions and Supply, for whom I have the greatest respect, spending money in vast quantities. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance knows about all this, because there seems to be no coordination or central control, with the result that a great deal of money is being spent without the proper authority. Toward the end of the session in June I asked the Minister of Finance if the auditor general had jurisdiction over all these dollar-a-year men and all these boards. At that time the minister said he had, but that does not seem to be the situation, because every department seems to have its own auditors independent of a central auditor. As a result money is being spent like water by the navy, the army, the air force and everybody else, on home defence which will never win this war. Then we have the mayor of New York, who heads this defence board. He has announced expenditures running into millions of dollars, and I doubt if the Minister of Finance even knows anything about them, but this joint defence board binds Canada's future. The policy of the government seems to be, "A board a day will keep Hitler away."

In the first year of the war the mechanized hordes conquered Norway, Czechoslovakia, the low countries, Belgium, Holland and, last but not least, France. In the second year of the war they swept over Yugoslavia and Greece, and the mechanization still goes on. What is the position in Canada? We are now in the third year of the war and the government can give us no definite war programme for the next twelve months. As I said when this war began, the big question was man-power. I was told it was not, but it was food and munitions. Has there been any war in the history of mankind in which man-power has not played a major part? I say there has not; and if the government of the day had taken the right stand at the start, voluntary recruiting would not have reached the state in which it is to-day. We should have had a million men. During the first months of the war the country was willing to give the ministers time to become war-minded instead of believing in pacifism and disarmament; but two years of armed warfare should be sufficient to bring about that changed mentality. We should be taking active steps to see that in this third year of the war ours should be a total war effort from coast to coast. Now we find the government without any concerted, coordinated war planning for the coming year, to deal with the demands of the military services and the other demands in connection with production, shipbuilding, agriculture and so on. Home defence will never win any war; there is no possibility of that. We should take stock of our military position. The people want to know the facts, but they cannot get them. As I said in 1937, are we to wait until the enemy comes up the St. Lawrence by air, land and sea, and bombs the citadel and this very building? All the protection we have is provided by Great Britain, and the United States would be attacked also but for the British navy. The small nations of Europe have been enslaved by this mechanized army; they have endured the spies, the sergeant-majors, the concentration camps, the loud speaker, the tramping of feet, the gestapo, the whips, the spirit of barbarism, brutality and savagery; and but for Britain we on this continent would be compelled to suffer the same experiences. Yet we do not pay her tribute.

What are we going to do about it? Sooner or later there must be another Peninsular war on the continent, and what is Canada doing to prepare for it in man-power to aid the mother country? New Zealand and Australia were represented in Africa, Greece, Syria and other countries. Canada was not. Now we have been told by one of the ministers, within the last day or two, that no Canadian troops can be moved out of England without the authority of this government. That is just what I said in this house last June, that not a man could be sent from England without the permission of the government of this country. That is a fine state of affairs. That is not a total war effort, or coordination with Britain; that is not showing cooperation with the other parts of this empire. The time has now come when there should be a change. I think we need something more than words, something more than the essays and all that sort of thing we have been getting. The people should know the extent of our war effort and exactly what our position is.

In addition, I believe that when the government takes over private property as crown property throughout the country it should pay taxes. The Ontario government and the hydro electric system pay municipal taxes. Why, the city of Toronto spent two and a half million dollars in connection with one plant on the harbour there, doing dredging, building retaining walls, putting in pavements, sewers, sidewalks, power at cost, water supply, roadways and all that sort of thing. Now the plant has been taken over as crown property. Surely the government of the day should pay something to help meet the cost of all these municipal services, and should pay some part of all this cost to the municipalities. This war is altogether different; and I hope the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who has not been unmindful of the needs of the municipalities, will take this matter into consideration. These crown plants are getting their power, light and water, and transportation, street cars, at cost; they are being provided with sewers, pavements, transportation facilities and all the rest of it. Surely the municipalities should be helped, and all their revenue should not in this way be taken away. Since the early days of the hydro electric commission they have paid taxes on their municipal property, and I appeal to the government to take the same stand with regard to these crown property costs.

I see no change in the cardinal principles of the government's war policy, except the sending overseas of one hundred thousand men, though the Prime Minister said we would never send another expeditionary force to Europe. A few months before the war broke out, the right hon. gentleman said the danger to Canada was minor in degree and secondary in origin. In 1938 and 1939 we were told that our war policy was directed to home defence and the maintenance of Canada's neutrality in case the United States should be attacked by a foreign power. Since then we have had several agreements with the United States, one of which was announced at Ogdensburg, and we have had a joint defence board set up as a result. We have been told by the Prime Minister that Canada has no commitments, that parliament will decide. That is not so. We knew if Britain was at war, Canada would at once be also involved. Bases are given away and commitments made for the next ninety-nine years under the agreement giving the United States bases reaching from Newfoundland to British Guiana in exchange for fifty obsolete ships, some of which were useless and of no value at all, and Canada is bound by our United States-Canada defence board. Canada knew all about that agreement; it has been said that Canada was the author of that British-American Atlantic bases policy, but in any event we are bound by it for the next ninety-nine years. And whether we like it or not we are also bound by the policy of the defence board created as a result of the Ogdensburg agreement. Supposing the United States should go to war with Japan. There would be no reason why Canada should also go to war; we are in a different position, but we are bound by these agreements into which the Prime Minister has entered with the President of the United States, over the head of parliament, of the mother country and of the other dominions who should know of it and to whom in an empire sense we are connected. The defence board agreement was entered into over the head of the mother country and of our sister dominions. It was agreed to set up this defence board for the protection of America for the next ninety-nine years, and this action was taken over the head of this parliament. Nobody knows where it is going to end.

There is no time to be lost. As Lord Beaverbrook has so well said, and as was said a few weeks ago in the British house, there is no time to be lost in giving aid to Russia. To-day Russia is fighting with the mother country for the freedom of the world. The whole history of the world for the next two hundred years will be decided by the battle of Britain, the battle of the Atlantic and the battle of Russia. Russia is standing against the mechanized hordes. The Germans have lost 8,000 tanks so far in their struggle against Russia. At one time it was said that we could not turn out tanks in this country, and then we were told that we would have fifteen by the end of the year. The minister now thinks that we shall have produced 100 or possibly a few more. Germany is supposed to have 30,000 tanks, so that means that we shall have to produce 29,900 more if we are to be on an equal footing.

As I say, the history of the whole world is being decided over there in the battle of London and Russia. Were it not that Russia is now bearing the burden and the brunt of the struggle against these modern savages and barbarians with their awful mechanization, the British losses on land, sea and in the air would be terrible. These losses would be in addition to the already heavy burden being borne in this war by the mother country. The Hun has his awful mechanized hordes with their savagery and slaughter. This year has witnessed the collapse of all the ideologies of the past, and they should remain in cold storage until the axis gangsters are destroyed. After all, a kindly providence knows better than our own government. We should all face the facts and appreciate how Russia is benefiting, saving and aiding Great Britain in this struggle.

There are some who do not like this collaboration of Great Britain and the United States with Russia, and they quote General Franco. Had he said three years ago that he would not accept the military help of gangsters like Hitler and Mussolini he would now be in exile as a defeated man. But he renounced all his ideologies of the past, as Great Britain and the United States are now doing. By the use of diplomacy, Franco got both his axis partners out of Spain.

It is time for Canada to wake from her slumber. It is time for Canada to do something and not keep on talking about what will be done in 1942 and 1943. Canada seems to think that there is all eternity in which to prepare the necessary man-power, food and munitions to help Great Britain and her allies. The time has come when this government will have to come down out of the clouds and let us have a total war effort. At the beginning of this debate the Prime Minister gave the reasons why Russia went into the war, but he forgot to say anything about man-power in this country. No matter whether we like it or not, something will have to be done about man-power or else the war may be lost. Call it conscription, compulsory service, or anything you like; it all means the same.

As in the last war, I am in favour of a selective principle. In 1937 and 1938 I proposed that we should have a compulsory national registration with a view to obtaining the utmost national service from the people. That is the only way we can have equal rights for all and special privileges to none. We would not have needed it if voluntary recruiting had been properly handled from the start. Now it is too late. The recruits are not coming forward.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. Why does this country continue to permit the Vichy legation to remain open? We all know the record of that notorious government during the past year in France. We all know that it is simply a puppet government of Hitler. We all know how France suffered in the last war to preserve civilization and how all Canada wants to aid her.

Before this house adjourns I should like to know what action this government intends to take in connection with the great losses to our shipping off the coast of Ireland. Are our sailors, soldiers and ships to be lost? In one of his speeches President Roosevelt said that they were not going to stand for it, and Mr. Churchill has referred to this as well. This kind of thing cannot go on much longer. A total of 340,000 tons of shipping has been lost in one month, most of it in the Atlantic. Throughout the centuries one continuous thread can be detected running through the variegated web of British military and naval policy—the strategical indivisibility of the British isles. We are all aware of the glorious record of those two little islands from the days of Elizabeth. They leaped up and became a great world power. We are proud of the record not only as the main defender of freedom and civilization, but also in discovery, the arts and sciences, and literature.

The defence of Ireland is the defence of Britain. Elizabeth knew it; Cromwell knew it; William of Orange, of pious and immortal memory, knew it, and so did Pitt and Castlereagh. In our own time Mr. Lloyd George knew it. While prepared to give up much, he shrank from giving up all. Speaking at the Methodist conference at Cardiff in 1921, he said that he did not know what would happen to Great Britain in another war with Germany if we did not have these ports, yet later he gave Eire those very bases. In each epoch of British history her enemies have appreciated the situation in the same way. Elizabeth's struggle with Philip saw a Spanish landing in Ireland; the Napoleonic wars saw the French at Killala, and in the great war of 1914-18 Germany too made a nibble at the island on the western flank.

In the grim struggle in which Britain is now engaged only one thing can deprive her of victory. If her sea communications with the arsenal of democracy across the Atlantic are cut, the war for her is lost. Ireland lies across those lines of communications. An Ireland fighting on her side would make those communications safe, while a neutral Ireland would imperil and has so far gravely imperilled them. With Ireland in the possession of her enemies, the vital arteries would be severed. But this government does nothing about it but drift. It has a legation there as well. Apparently this government is ready to see our brave soldiers and sailors and our shipping and food for Britain lost in the seas off the coast of Ireland without saying one word of protest about these bases, instead of joining with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt in seeking the use of these bases at once.

It is from these points that the Germans got the range and lights to destroy Coventry and Cardiff, and prevented our ships from reaching shore. The result has been that Great Britain has been unable to use Portsmouth and other ports on the southern channel, as she did in the last war. We might have lost the last war without these bases. Another result was the loss of the Channel islands. The Prime Minister was asked by me in 1939, 1940 and last June about these ports, but nothing has been done. Great Britain has been forced to use the narrow northern channel, and the result is that a month or two ago the shipping losses amounted to 144,000 tons. It is time for us to think about this bridgehead in Ireland and do something about it. We should appreciate what is being done by the people of Ulster, the six northern counties. Their war effort has been magnificent and were it not for that great arsenal, Hitler would have won Ireland long ago.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): In the early days of the war we were led to believe that men were not needed. This illusion was entirely dispelled by the straightforward statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) on Wednesday last, so that there can no longer be any doubt that men are urgently needed. In answer to the question as to the government's military objective the Minister of National Defence stated that it was to be an all-out war effort.

The government's adherence to the voluntary system of recruiting is inconsistent with total war, and yet this is the only kind of war that will enable us to help defeat Hitler. Contrary to the opinion expressed by the Minister of National Defence it is the government's responsibility. It is perfectly obvious to every thinking man that Canada cannot make a total war effort without compulsory selective service, and also that if our aid is not to be a vital factor in this struggle this empire, and with it Canada, is doomed. Speaking for myself in this house on May 12 last, as I do to-day, I called upon the government to put this method into effect, adding that voluntary recruiting had reached the stage where it was slow, cumbersome and wasteful, and that selective compulsory enlistment was the only fair and efficient way to meet the complex needs of Canada. I believe now, as I did then, that nothing will strengthen national unity more than the knowledge that every section and every class of our population are bearing an equal share in the defence of our country.

I was pleased to read the report of a statement made by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Whitman) on October 8 last to the effect that we shall have conscription if and when it is shown to be necessary. Surely that time has now arrived. Every report we get from reliable sources emphasizes beyond all doubt the terrible crisis upon which we have now entered. Yet Canada allows a man to decide for himself whether he will sell goods over a counter, wave women's hair, work in a factory, vital to our war effort or otherwise, or serve in our armed forces overseas. The government must take upon itself the responsibility of putting the right man in the right place.

There is no doubt that there has been a very great change in public opinion in Canada on this subject since May last, and to give the committee some indication of the extent of this change I should like to quote from an editorial in the Montreal Star appearing under yesterday's date. In commenting upon the speech of the Minister of National Defence it says:

> The problem will not be solved by indiscriminate enlistment of men for either industry or the armed forces. That is why so many people throughout the country are clamouring for a system of selective national service that would permit the government to send men—and women—wherever their aptitudes could best fit into the war picture. There are thousands of men and women, not all of them fit for active service, who nevertheless are eager to do a war job—and they cannot always find openings. Voluntary civilian organization for war purposes is all very well in its way, and is indicative of a high spirit of willing service, but unless it is related to a general official plan, it wastes both money and valuable effort.

I should also like to give the opinion of three ministers of the church, of different denominations. Two Roman Catholic army chaplains, Colonel C. L. Nelligan and Colonel T. J. McCarthy, when speaking in London recently, warned Canadians to do away with complacency and get into action. Colonel McCarthy, recently returned from London, England, speaking to Canadian wives and mothers said:

> If your husbands and your sons are of military age don't hesitate to send them to fight your battles across the sea because then they won't have to fight them on your own doorstep.

Lastly, I would quote Bishop Renison, who has just returned from a visit to England where he went with a party of Canadian journalists as the representative of the Globe and Mail. I might remind the committee that Bishop Renison's two sons, his only children, went overseas at the beginning of the war. One son, like the boy referred to by my leader on Tuesday, paid his own way to England to join the Royal Air Force. His plane was shot down over France during Dunkirk and he was made a prisoner of war and is now in Germany. The other son went over with the first contingent. I wish to quote from a report in to-day's Ottawa Citizen. Bishop Renison said:

> It is my opinion some form of compulsory service is absolutely essential.

The report goes on:

> The young men who had joined the armed forces with the encouragement of the government have "pledged their all", Bishop Renison said, and "the Canadian government therefore cannot be less sacrificial in its attitude toward the war. . . ."

I wish to make the strongest protest of which I am capable against the practice of this government in arrogating to itself dictatorial powers and, through its ever-growing habit of legislating by order in council, destroying the rights and privileges of parliament, obtained only after centuries of strife. The last and most flagrant example is the enactment by order in council of control of prices and wages —the most revolutionary change in our economic system that has ever been made in a democratic country—and this on the very eve of the assembling of parliament. I was not impressed by the reasons advanced last evening by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for not submitting this important matter to parliament, namely, that secrecy had to be observed in respect to the fixing of prices of commodities lest advantage might be taken to do some improper thing, presumably the boosting of prices. But that same argument could be used to pass the budget by order in council, and up to the present time that has not been done. Whether or not, however, we agree with the method used or with the wisdom of what has been done, I wish to congratulate the minister upon the lucid and informative presentation he made of the subject yesterday.

We are given no opportunity of discussing any of the provisions of this control of prices and wages legislation, but, instead, we are told that, after listening to the reports from some of the ministers, we shall be permitted to ask questions, and then adjourn to reassemble late in January, because there is no legislation ready. This means that for a period of seven months parliament will not have functioned as a legislative body. Was it not the same disregard of the rights of parliament which called for the protest from the British House of Commons to King James I, on December 18, 1621, in the following terms:

> That the liberties, franchises, privileges and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the state and defence of the realm and the maintenance and making of laws are proper matter of debate in parliament and that in the handling of these businesses every member of the house of parliament hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of speech to treat of these matters in such order as in their judgment shall seem fit.

We may, perhaps, be permitted to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, from the successful politician to the sound parliamentarian, from the prime minister who destroyed the rights of parliament to the private member who once used to defend its dignity in such ringing terms as these:

> Mr. Speaker, there should be an end to government by order in council. Government must be by parliament and through parliament; it must not be by the diplomacy of cabinet councils carried on by cabinet ministers in their secret chambers, but by the free discussions and questionings of the ministry in this house in regard to public affairs.

Mr. Chairman, no words of mine could express more exactly the conviction held by every true parliamentarian and the indignation we feel, than those words spoken more than twenty years ago in this chamber by the then hon. member for North York, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He should be congratulated upon them. It is given to few statesmen to denounce with such accuracy and eloquence in 1920 the crimes against freedom his ministry was going to commit in 1941. I use the word "crimes" advisedly and in all gravity. As I read history, it records few betrayals more callous or deliberate than the betrayal of the parliamentary liberty enshrined in this house by one who knew the place, and who has been for years its most ardent protagonist.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. This afternoon the acting leader of this group endeavoured to place before the house a matter which was of some considerable importance and requested specifically from the Prime Minister the privilege of discussing first the Minister of Labour's report; but, on account of the fact that a certain arrangement had been made, the Prime Minister's decision was that consideration should be given to the reports of the ministers in the order in which they reported. Our understanding was that the report of the Minister of Munitions and Supply would be considered specifically at this time. That minister is in his seat and prepared to discuss matters pertaining to his department. The speeches which have been made to-day are very good, but in my opinion are valueless unless the ministers who will answer the criticisms made are in their places for that purpose. I just want to draw that to the attention of the chairman. If it is the intention now to ignore the ruling made this afternoon, it seems to this group as though there is rank discrimination in that respect. We were held definitely to that rule. Up to the present the speakers who have taken the floor have made absolutely no reference to the department of the minister who is in his seat for the purpose of answering questions that may be raised with regard to his report. I bring that to the attention of the Chair because we desire to discuss some matters pertaining to the report of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and to carry on as we are doing is a waste of time and, certainly, not constructive.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend who has just spoken is perfectly correct in his interpretation of the understanding that was reached. I believe that last evening the Prime Minister, in deference to a request made by the leader of the opposition, agreed that there would be one or two speeches this afternoon before we proceeded in committee with questions of the various ministers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But may I say that at the moment, I believe, these speeches are exhausted, so we shall be able to go on.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Since the Minister of Munitions and Supply is in his seat, may I say a few words which do have some bearing upon his department.

During the summer, when the special committee on war expenditures met, I gradually became increasingly aware that perhaps the departments of government in their war effort were not as properly coordinating their efforts as they might do. I did not, however, raise any serious objection, or put forth any definite proposals. I thought that perhaps I might be mistaken. But this suspicion gradually grew upon me until, towards the end of the summer, I had occasion to inquire of one department of government upon a certain matter. In relating this, I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply a few questions.

This particular incident occurred when I received a request from a certain quarter in my constituency with respect to a proposed air training school to be built in a certain section of the country. We are all aware that when the empire air training scheme was first mooted, the Department of Transport immediately sent out their engineers to survey certain properties and make recommendations so that the best possible places might be secured for those air training schools. At that time I received numerous inquiries, as a consequence of engineers coming into certain sections, whether an air training school would be built here or there. I made inquiries at that time and discovered that for the time being the air training scheme had reached certain proportions and it was not anticipated that any more schools would be built. A very few months after that other schools were built. Now this summer comes another inquiry and naturally I thought, "Well now in my part of the country we have a good many air training schools and perhaps this is another false alarm." I got in touch with an office which comes under the Department of Munitions and Supply and asked whether or not there was to be an air training school in this particular part of the country. I wish to read a part of my letter to the official to whom I wrote. One paragraph will suffice:

> Recently I have had numerous inquiries in respect to a proposed air training school being established near the town of Vulcan, Alberta, on what is known as the Galbraith property. The Trans-Canada Air Lines already have a landing field on this property.

There is no mistake about where this training school was expected to be built, but the answer I received was:

> This will acknowledge your letter of August 21, relative to the proposed air training school being established near the town of Vulcan, Alberta.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

> For your information, we have made extensive inquiries but no one seems to know anything about an air training school to be constructed at this point.

I immediately mailed an air mail letter to my inquirer. Four days afterwards, perhaps five, I arrived home—and perhaps the story is a little humorous at this point. When I arrived home my boy came bouncing in. "Hello, dad", he said, "glad to see you home. Say, dad, did you write to So-and-So and tell them that there was not going to be any air training school out here?" I said, "Yes." "Ha! ha! They are all laughing at you now," he said. "Well," I said, "that is all right; I am not very much concerned. It won't be the first time that people have laughed at me. What's on your mind?" He said, "The machinery is already out there ploughing up the runways and they are already putting in the school." I must confess that I felt a little bit embarrassed when I walked down town the next day.

Mr. MARTIN: Do you object to the school being built?

Mr. HANSELL: I do not object, and let me say this in answer to my hon. friend. I must say in fairness to those who have selected these sites that I believe they have selected them because they were the best they could select, irrespective of the constituencies in which they might be located.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Why are you finding fault with it?

Mr. HANSELL: I am not finding fault with the selection of the sites. My point to start with was that there should be a coordination of the work of the departments of government. When I made the inquiry I was told by letter that the department had made extensive inquiries and no one knew about an air training school being built at that point; yet the machinery was on the ground and the school was being built. Somebody slipped up—and I did not write to the office boy, either. I will not say to whom I wrote; I do not want to embarrass any government official. It was not the minister. I immediately wrote back and asked for an explanation. Let me read a paragraph from the reply. It seems that the Department of Transport selects the site —the minister can correct me if I am wrong— and the same department also lets the contract for the building of the runways. The Department of National Defence for Air has nothing to do with it. The Department of Munitions and Supply, on top of that, and apart from the Department of Transport, lets the contract for the erection of the buildings on the site. Here we have the Department of Transport doing one thing, and the Department of Munitions and Supply doing another, both working separately for an entirely different department, which is the Department of National Defence for Air. The paragraph giving the explanation reads:

When we made our reply to your letter we made inquiries of the R.C.A.F. and of this department and found that as yet no authority has been established to construct the school, and it is on this basis that your reply was made.

It does seem to me that when a certain project is to be erected or a certain objective is to be attained, all who are interested in that objective should be brought into consultation. That is what I would consider a proper coordination of effort. I have explained that I tried not to embarrass the government, but I must say that it has the appearance of withholding information—I am not saying that it does—until certain contracts are let, so that a certain amount of patronage can be effected. I am not saying that was done.

Mr. HOWE: May I discuss that statement before the hon. member gets on to something else?

Mr. HANSELL: I shall be through in a moment. At any rate, that would be the impression people would get, that the information was not given so that there could be a certain amount of patronage. I might give an illustration. Certain people came to that town from an outside place. Nobody knew them. They proceeded to rent a small building to put in a coffee shop. Some of those who knew this building said to them, "Are you sure you will make good on this coffee shop?—because there have been one or two in this town that have gone broke." They replied, "We will make good." They were asked what made them so sure and they replied, "Why, an air training school is to be built out here."

Nobody in that town knew anything about it. I repeat that I am not saying that the information was withheld for purposes of patronage, but it has all the appearance of it. Either that or you have to come to the conclusion that there is not proper coordination. Here is one department which evidently did not know there was to be an air training school at this point when at the time the machinery was ploughing up the runways. Could the minister give us some statement on that, because other hon. members may find similar occurrences. We do not want these embarrassments. In this time of war, even though we may be members of the opposition we are not going out to brand the government as this, that and the other thing. We have to attend Red Cross meetings, salvage meetings, all kinds of meetings; we are called on to explain this and that, and we want to help the war effort as much as possible. Therefore let us get some of these things cleaned up.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend considers this matter fairly I think he will see that the fault is entirely with himself in having addressed his letter to the wrong person. He did not say to whom he addressed it, but obviously the right person is the minister in charge of the department. I get dozens of such letters every day and I can either give the answer, if it is in my department, or send the letter to my colleague in the proper department, who answers directly and advises me. I dare say my hon. friend wrote to an official thinking to save my time.

Mr. HANSELL: Exactly.

Mr. HOWE: We have private secretaries who are trained in that sort of work. Naturally if I sign a letter on a matter of the kind I must be sure the information is correct—or reasonably sure; I suppose nothing is infallible. Had that letter come to me my hon. friend would have received his answer. He may have written to someone in the Department of Munitions and Supply who would know nothing about it, because the air branch of the Department of Transport, while it reports to me as Minister of Munitions and Supply, is not a part of the Department of Munitions and Supply. He may have written to an officer of the air force, who would naturally look up the financial encumbrances of the air force and, finding that no financial encumbrances had got back to his file, would therefore assume that no such thing had taken place.

I would ask my hon. friend to address letters of that kind to a responsible minister, in which case the government will take the responsibility for the reply. I dare say the man who answered the letter did so in the best of good faith and to the best of his knowledge, but he would not have the knowledge which the minister would have.

The responsibility for spending any money for a war department rests with the Department of Munitions and Supply. It was placed there by the munitions and supply act passed by parliament. The only exception, apart from small sums which are spent by a department by arrangement with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, is that as a matter of convenience the Department of Munitions and Supply segregated to itself the air services division of the Department of Transport, because there was in the former department a staff highly skilled in selecting and improving airports. It was felt that to duplicate that staff would be a waste of effort. It would be impossible to duplicate this skilled staff in this very highly technical operation. The selection of an airport is not an easy task. The skill with which it is done depends greatly upon the experience of the men doing it, men who know both topography and problems of aviation, because there must be a relation between the two in the selection of an airport. It is true that surveys for airports are made by the air services division of the Department of Transport. The preparation of plans and specifications and the awarding of contracts is carried out by the air services division of the Department of Transport, and the work of building the runways and developing the field is supervised by the air services division of the Department of Transport. The selection of the sites is a matter for the user. The user in this case is the Department of National Defence for Air. The need for a site is determined by that department. The air services division of the Department of Transport is communicated with, told that a site is needed in a certain area, and asked to bring forward surveys. The division tries to anticipate those requests and makes many surveys of sites without a requisition. In this way information is had in advance as to where sites are available so that prompt service could be given to the air force. The air services division submits plans and estimates of cost of development usually on three or four alternative sites. These are placed before a special technical committee, and the choice of a site is made with one or two technical men from the air services division sitting in. I can say with full knowledge that they are invariably made on the basis of merit. I never concern myself with the selection of any site for an airport, and I know that my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air is in exactly the same position. We decided when we undertook our work that the selection of sites, the location of air training schools, was a technical matter which we would leave entirely to our technical men, and that policy has been carried out.

I do not know whether I have covered the field; if not perhaps my hon. friend will ask a supplementary question.

Mr. HANSELL: I think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves the matter of selection of airports will he tell the house if there have been sites selected for airports which have been promoted, shall I say, on local considerations, condemned as being improper locations and subsequently taken up? I have in mind now the Pennfield airport. I think it was discussed in this house in the first session of this parliament. I know I had the opinion that Pennfield would be a good location for an airport in the maritime provinces. During and after the discussion that took place in this house the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill), who was very much interested in the proposition, who knew as much as or perhaps more about it than I did, urged it and ventured to stake his reputation as an engineer—and he has some reputation—on the usefulness of this site, but it was condemned out of hand by the technical officers of the minister's department. The present deputy minister came to see me; his assistant, I think a Mr. McLean, came along with him, and they convinced me with the superior knowledge they had that they were right. I was therefore astonished when in the following year Pennfield was decided upon for development as an airport for the British trainees, and millions, I was going to say, have now been spent upon it. Perhaps the minister does not know about that situation, but it is one of which I have some knowledge.

Mr. HOWE: I know nothing about it. Of course airports are required for various purposes. At first we were selecting ports suitable for Trans-Canada Air Lines. Then at the same time ports were being chosen which were considered suitable as operational ports. The number of training schools has been steadily increased. We had a programme to start with that called for certain airports. We have since had a number of calls to provide additional airports. I believe the British schools required some thirty airports that were never dreamed of when the original programme was drawn up. Naturally the best airports are selected first. We have conducted surveys of locations; I know there are at present dozens of these surveys on file in the Department of Transport. As I say, the best, those that were cheapest and obviously most satisfactorily located, were chosen first. As those were taken up, the next most satisfactory had their turn, so it is quite possible that an airport might have been passed over when the first choice was being made, but that the time would come when it would be the best of those still available.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By the process of elimination.

Mr. HOWE: By the process of elimination, and it is also possible that further information, not available at first, might have something to do with the matter. I think the first objection to Pennfield was that it was fog-bound. Then I believe accurate records were kept, and it was found that it was not so fog-bound, or perhaps it is; I do not know. In any event the technical officers came to their own conclusions, though I should be glad to look up the file if my hon. friend is especially interested. I think that is the explanation. I believe the first choice was Moncton; the second choice was somewhere up in the north, and then Pennfield seemed to be the next best place available.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not desire to prolong the discussion, but I should not like it to be thought that I am complaining about the selection of these fields. I am not. I believe the government have selected them because their engineers have considered those selected to be in the proper places. I know this, that if you drive from the southern part of Alberta north to Edmonton, which is in the central part of that province, you pass from ten to a dozen air training schools. I believe these were located in that part of the country because the prairie is flat, the air is clear, the altitude is high, the sun shines, it is near the mountains, and the climate is healthy. I am sure the engineers took all these matters into consideration. With regard to writing the minister let me say, in connection with the complaint I made a short time ago, that I really thought I was doing the minister a tremendous favour by not bothering him, so I wrote to what I would consider a rather high official of his department. I thank the minister, however, for his suggestion that I write him personally in future.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that phase of this matter is out of the way, I understand that some of the minister's officials have been waiting here for an hour or more; and, since I believe their time is valuable, it might be well if the minister, at this stage, would make the statement which I requested of him with respect to the whole gasoline situation, and in particular with respect to the charges made against the controller, or whoever they were made against, by the Joy Oil company. I should like to say this, that I have no idea in the world who the Joy Oil company are, or what they represent, or what they are, or whether they are right or wrong. I have never been approached by anyone in this connection; I do not know what their case is, beyond the contents of the paid advertisement which I saw in the newspaper. But I should like to have the gasoline position clarified; if we are not saving enough gasoline in this country for war purposes, then I suggest to the minister that he exercise the power which he possesses, and I am sure the Canadian people will cooperate.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to place before the committee a rather complete statement of the oil situation. I feel that the situation has been misunderstood; the cooperation extended to the department when we asked for the conservation of oil was very willingly given, but the statement made by the Joy Oil company has shaken the confidence of the people. Therefore I feel it is only fair, both to those who have been cooperating and to those who have not, to state the position as a matter of record. Accordingly I will give the oil position in Canada, with statistics which we have regarded as confidential but which I have ascertained can be placed on record here.

As nearly as we can anticipate war demands upon us, there appears to be no doubt that our requirements for crude oil and finished products without conservation in the coming year will be at least 64,000,000 barrels, an increase of approximately 10,000,000 barrels over the year 1940. This total requirement must be provided for in the following refinery areas:

	Barrels
Maritimes	10,500,000
Quebec	16,000,000
Ontario	20,500,000
Prairies	9,500,000
British Columbia	7,500,000
Total	64,000,000

It is difficult to estimate at this time what the Canadian production will be over the coming twelve months, but it is doubtful if it will exceed in volume that of the year 1941, namely, 9,500,000 barrels. Thus 54,500,000 barrels must be brought in from the outside. Having regard to our tanker position and the importance of getting along with the minimum of ocean tanker tonnage, the pipeline into Sarnia and tankers on the inland waterway must be operated to capacity. The plan proposed is as follows:

	Barrels
Import via the Sarnia pipeline	10,700,000
Import by lake tanker	13,800,000
Import by ocean tanker	30,000,000

Imports by the Sarnia pipeline amount to the full capacity of that line, while imports by lake tanker come from other points on the great lakes which are supplied by pipeline, such as Buffalo, Toledo, and one or two other points.

Having regard to the geographical locations of refineries in relation to available sources of supply, there appears to be no alternative plan but the following:

Refining area	Canadian production Barrels	Via pipeline (Sarnia) Barrels	Via lake tankers Barrels	Via ocean tankers (including via Portland-Montreal pipeline) Barrels	Total Barrels
Halifax	.....	.....	.....	10,500,000	10,500,000
Quebec	.....	.....	4,000,000	12,000,000	16,000,000
Ontario	.....	10,700,000	9,800,000	.....	20,500,000
Prairies	9,500,000	.....	.....	.....	9,500,000
British Columbia	.....	.....	.....	7,500,000	7,500,000
Total	9,500,000	10,700,000	13,800,000	30,000,000	64,000,000
Percentage	14·8	16·7	21·5	47	100

The Sarnia pipeline is the only pipeline feeding Canadian refineries direct from United States crude-producing areas, namely the mid-continent and Illinois fields. This pipeline operating to capacity is capable of handling the 10,700,000 barrels hereinbefore referred to. This pipeline serves the Sarnia refinery only, yet it has not sufficient capacity to take care of the entire needs of this refinery. The remaining requirements of the Sarnia refinery, as well as the requirements of the other refineries in Ontario total 9,800,000 barrels, which must be brought in by lake tankers. In addition to this movement of crude, it is planned to move 4,000,000 barrels of crude from Toledo to Montreal by lake tankers, to save ocean tanker movement. Thus we shall have a total contemplated movement of crude by lake tanker to the extent of 13,800,000 barrels.

With regard to the question of lake tankers, it must not be overlooked that these same vessels back-haul to various marine terminals over 20,000,000 barrels of finished petroleum products. In order to bring in the 30,000,000 barrels to the refinery areas where this product is needed, we will require the equivalent of 16·8 ocean tankers with a capacity of 100,000 barrels each. The ocean tanker capacity required for this movement is as follows:

Halifax	10,500,000	680,000	6·8
Montreal refineries	12,000,000	750,000	7·5
British Columbia	7,500,000	250,000	2·5
Total	30,000,000	1,680,000	16·8

We have available to-day eight Canadian-flag and six Norwegian-flag Canadian chartered ocean tankers having an average capacity of approximately 95,000 barrels each, or the equivalent of 13·3 vessels of 100,000 barrel capacity each. Therefore, the total ocean tanker capacity at present under Canadian control amounts to 1,330,000 barrels. Assuming that we shall be able to hold all these vessels, particularly the Norwegian, and experience no sinkings, we are short ocean tanker capacity of 350,000 barrels, or 3·5 vessels of 100,000 barrel capacity each.

As before stated, it is planned to move 4,000,000 barrels of crude from Toledo to Montreal by lake tanker in order to relieve the pressure on ocean tankers. In order to do this we will require 10·2 additional lake tankers of 21,000 barrel capacity each over and above the lake tankers owned or controlled in the Canadian service. It is possible that by an exchange of products the refiners may be able to reduce the requirements of 10·2 lake tankers to 7·2 lake tankers. If the American flag lake tanker tonnage now on the great lakes and available to Canadian companies in the past remains available in the future, it may be possible to overcome this lake tanker tonnage by chartering American vessels. The fact, however, remains that we are short 3·5 ocean vessels having a capacity of 100,000 barrels each, and at least 7·2 lake tankers over and above those owned or at present controlled in the Canadian service in order to bring in the 43,800,000 barrels which must be provided by ocean or lake transportation.

It must also be borne in mind that six of the Canadian chartered tankers are Norwegian flag. By arrangement between the sovereign government of Norway and the government of Great Britain, all Norwegian tanker tonnage is earmarked for the battle zone. Two Norwegian tankers which were in the Canadian service earlier this year were taken at the time Norwegian tanker tonnage was turned over by the United States government. Should sinkings again become excessive and/or should Britain require additional tanker tonnage over that which she now has, there is every likelihood that these six Norwegian tankers would be taken. In any event there is no certainty that they can be held in the Canadian trade for the duration of the war.

It must be noted that the refinery operations and supplies required at Halifax are almost entirely war effort. The refinery at Halifax is being operated to capacity on a heavy crude in order to produce the maximum yield of heavy oil. Strange as it may seem, gasoline is a by-product. Although operating this refinery to capacity, it will be necessary to bring in at least 800,000 barrels of diesel oil as such to meet our war demands.

It must also not be overlooked that a substantial part of our requirements on the Pacific coast are also war effort. The storage on the Pacific coast must at all times be filled to capacity, and as the fuel oil is drawn from the storage it must be replaced without delay. In addition to the requirements on the Pacific coast for war effort, our railways must have at least 2,600,000 barrels of fuel oil in order to provide the service expected of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the building of the pipeline from Portland to Montreal change the position? Perhaps the minister intended to deal with this later.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it does affect the position in that its use will cut down the required number of tankers. I believe it saves about two tankers by shortening the distance from the source of the crude to the end of the pipeline. Of course, without this pipeline we would be in a most serious position indeed.

The following table gives Canada's inventory position as of October 1, 1941, as compared with October 1, 1940; following also is Canada's inventory position as at July 1, 1941, as compared with July 1, 1940, in barrels:

One of the net results is that we are over in aviation gasoline. For obvious reasons we are using aviation gasoline at a much greater rate than ever before and we must have stocks in excess of stocks carried in previous years. For the period October 1, 1941, as compared with October 1, 1940, the refinery inventories are down 1,422,721 barrels and for the period July 1, 1941, as compared with July 1, 1940, we are down 872,449 barrels. There was a great drop in inventory after July 1. During the months of July, August and September, there were the following imports by Canadian refineries, exclusive of the prairies, in barrels:

	Crude receipts, July, August, September
	1940	1941	Increase
Maritimes	1,651,374	1,930,055	278,681
Quebec	6,087,135	6,266,093	178,958
Ontario	4,895,970	5,756,710	860,740
British Columbia	1,574,495	1,385,804	*188,691
	14,208,974	15,338,662	1,129,688

* Indicates decrease.

It is interesting to note that refinery inventories in the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia as of October 1, 1941, are 1,422,721 barrels less than they were on October 1, 1940, and that total refinery and marketing inventories in the same areas are 1,005,761 barrels less than they were on October 1, 1940, notwithstanding the fact that refineries in the three months ending October 1, 1941, received 1,129,688 barrels more than they received during the same three months of 1940.

While the shortage of supplies is more pronounced in the Quebec area—in fact in comparison the inventories are down 902,404 barrels—the fact remains that the Portland-Montreal pipeline will be in operation within a few days. While this pipeline will not be operating to capacity until next spring there should be no doubt about our being able to take care of the needed demands with the assistance of supplies from Ontario refineries.

I should like to go back for a moment to Canadian production. The production of crude petroleum in Alberta in the year 1940 amounted to approximately 8,700,000 barrels. This production fell substantially short of the consumption in the prairie provinces, and necessitated importations as follows:

	Barrels
Crude oil, as such imported from the United States	682,707
White products, as such, imported from the United States	198,520
White products, brought up the lakes by lake tanker in the summer time and stored at the head of the lakes (refined in eastern Canada from imported crude)	842,622

In other words, the production in the west fell short of supplying the consumption to the end that refiners in the west imported 682,707 barrels of crude as such, and marketers and wholesalers imported in addition 1,041,142 barrels of white products.

The comsumption hereinbefore referred to relates to the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the western edge of the province of Ontario and the eastern fringe of the province of Bristish Columbia, all of which territory is within the economic orbit of Alberta production.

In October, 1940, all refineries in the west were required to make their nominations for the coming year in advance, that is, from 1st November, 1940, until 31st October, 1941. Further, the refineries were requested to build storage at their plants in order to take care of their requirements on a week to week basis. This they did. Further the producers responded to the call for new wells. Fortunately we had a healthy drilling programme. Fortunately we got some good wells. On 30th September, 1941, we had 167 producing wells. On September 30, 1940, we had 126. In the yearly period referred to, forty-one new wells were brought in, and since that time there have been one or two more. In the period January 1 to September 30, 1941, production in Turner Valley field, as the result of new wells and the day to day regular operation, shows an increase of 20·7 per cent over the same period of last year. From January 1 to September 30, 1940, the production amounted to 5,869,648 barrels, and from January to September, 1941—the same relative period—it amounted to 7,084,910 barrels. In the 1940 period, production averaged 21,422 barrels per day, and in the 1941 period it averaged 25,952 barrels per day. It would appear that we are assured a total production of 9,500,000 barrels this calendar year.

This year there have been importations of gasoline from the United States in the same manner as before. Substantial quantities of refined products have been sent up the lakes for distribution in Manitoba and further west. Having regard, however, to the increased production of crude, practically no crude imports have been in evidence this year.

We have had the largest exploratory programme this year in the history of the west. Many structures have been seismographed. There is no question that drilling in new areas will be in evidence next year. There is no doubt also that further new areas will be explored.

We must bear in mind that an oil well is a depleting asset and that we must have new wells and we must find a new Turner Valley. Every effort has been put forward to find this new field.

Many do not realize the extent to which the war effort makes demands upon petroleum supplies.

It is estimated, in any event, the oil controller has been asked to cause refiners to provide for war uses at least 110,000,000 gallons of aviation gasoline over the next twelve months, more than one-tenth of our normal consumption of gasoline. The possibility of obtaining this aviation gasoline outside of Canada has been carefully surveyed and studied. Having regard to the demands on the United States by all countries at war, and the possibility of our not being able to obtain aviation gasoline in the event of any change in war conditions or a further crisis, it is absolutely necessary that we provide for our own aviation gasoline requirements. In order to do this we first must take a cut for this purpose out of the crude that we refine. While we have not as yet taken a cut out of all of the crude produced in the west, it is quite likely that we will have to do so before a great while. After we take a cut for aviation gasoline, we then must provide for heavy and light fuel oil, our next if not equally important war demand. A careful estimate of the present market for fuel oil has been made. A survey has also been made as to ways and means to meet this demand. As you are aware, our industrial war effort, to say nothing about our requirements on the two coasts, depends upon an ample supply, particularly of heavy oil. When the market demand and the available supply is balanced, there is no surplus.

I shall now place on Hansard, if I may, the petroleum inventories of the various refining districts for different periods, showing the shortages that have been built up over the last several months, in barrels:

I now come to the advertisement of the Joy Oil company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not able to follow all the figures, but has the minister adequately shown that the position contemplated will be taken care of? Will he give us that assurance, or can he? Maybe he cannot.

Mr. HOWE: As I go on with this explanation I shall show the recent developments. We were very much concerned about it in the spring. We did not know how far the demands of Britain would go. We were told the situation and asked for a certain tonnage. We suggested we could obtain replacements in the United States, but since the crisis developed, I think last June, we have not as a matter of fact received a single tanker load of gasoline or oil products of any kind in United States bottoms. Should we be allowed to keep our present tanker space, in British and Norwegian bottoms, we would have to consider how we should get along, but we believe that with Britain's present situation and the return of certain tankers to the United States we are reasonably assured of fairly adequate supplies for the winter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That answers my question.

Mr. HOWE: However, as I say, considering the heavy war commitments, particularly of the navy, the mercantile marine and the air training schools, we must retain sufficient grip on the consumption of gasoline to enable us if shortages develop to make up these shortages from gasoline for pleasure driving and other non-essential uses, rather than have the war effort crippled.

I will now discuss the advertisement of the Joy Oil company, which I am sure everyone has read. It is regrettable that in times like the present, when it is so essential that all effort and thought be directed towards the winning of this war, those engaged in this work must find it necessary to lay aside their tasks to answer gross and calculated misstatements made to the public.

Perhaps I should first answer the question of the leader of the opposition as to what the Joy Oil company is. It is a company owned in the United States, the only officer of the company I have met, Mr. Austin, who signed the open letter in the form of an advertisement, being also a resident and citizen of the United States. The company distributes gasoline in only three areas in Canada—the Montreal area, the Toronto area, and the Sarnia area. Its total imports represent about one-tenth of one per cent of the total petroleum products brought into this country.

The Joy Oil company has no assets in this country except distributing stations and storage tanks. It has no refining equipment. It owns no tankers. It has no facilities other than those for distribution. It has been operating through the past several years by buying gasoline in any part of the world in which it can be bought, renting tanker space to bring it to Montreal, and distributing gasoline from there. In the past several years, of course, gasoline was a drug on the market, particularly in north America, and it was easy to buy gasoline as such, I dare say even at bargain rates, and very easy to rent tankers because there was then a surplus of tankers, and charter rates were low. The result was that the Joy Oil company was able to bring in gasoline and to undersell Canadian refiners who had a heavy investment in refining capacity and reliable sources of supply.

Mr. MacNICOL: Except for the Turner Valley their supply sources were outside of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The Joy Oil company?

Mr. MacNICOL: No, other companies. I thought the minister said importations.

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian refiners have had facilities for bringing in gasoline from wells controlled by Canadians or from other sources of supply that were reliable. They had facilities for bringing in oil for refining by themselves.

Mr. MacNICOL: I beg the minister's pardon. Perhaps I misunderstood him. He was speaking about importations, and I interjected to ask him if the supply, for the most part, did not come from outside Canada; that is, apart from Turner Valley.

Mr. HOWE: Yes,—entirely. It comes in as crude and is broken down into all the components we use. From the crude we get fuel oil, gasoline, heavy lubricating oils, and all the various components of crude oil, as Canadian products.

In the Joy Oil open letter to the Prime Minister of Canada, as published in the form of an advertisement in certain Toronto newspapers, an attempt is evidently being made to create the impression that Canada at no time faced a shortage in petroleum products, that the shortage in ocean tank tonnage was not real, and that it was simply a scheme of major oil companies to gain their own ends. Nothing is farther from the truth.

The President of the United States, directly and indirectly through various government bodies, ordered the oil companies owning and operating tankers under charter to deliver tankers to Britain under the lease-lend arrangements. The oil companies of the United States had no alternative, and they had nothing to do with it, other than to comply with the demands which were made upon them. I have before me a copy of a memorandum in regard to a meeting held in Washington on May 14, between Sir Arthur Salter, head of the British shipping mission in the United States, and representatives of the United States maritime commission, and Mr. Wilgress of the Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. A. L. M. MacCallum of the Canadian shipping board, at which time the supply of tankers to Britain from the Canadian service was discussed. I have also before me a memorandum setting forth Britain's petroleum supply position and tanker position, which was left with me by Sir Arthur Salter just about the first of July. This memorandum sets forth in detail, with supporting documents, Britain's petroleum stocks, tanker losses and urgent needs. I have also in my hand a copy of a letter written by Sir Arthur Salter to the oil controller for Canada dated July 2, 1941, in which Sir Arthur on behalf of Britain requested the following:

1. The immediate release for United Kingdom service of eight Norwegian tankers then chartered to Canadian oil companies.

2. The release of eight Canadian flag ocean-going tankers for service as soon as the St. Lawrence was closed to navigation.

These sixteen tankers, I may say, were all of the tankers owned or then under charter by Canadian companies.

3. The release to Britain of as many lake tankers as possible, said lake tankers to be used in the coastal service around Great Britain with a view to relieving ocean tanker tonnage which at the time was being employed in this coastal service.

In other words the urgent request which came at that time was for all of the tankers that Canada owned or had chartered, with a number of tankers that had never been previously operated other than on the great lakes. In fact it was suggested that arrangements might be made immediately to replace the eight Canadian-flag boats with United States-flag boats which were then in the shuttle service under the first arrangement made with the United States by Britain for the supply of tankers. We were asked immediately to change our boats for United States-flag tankers and to send all our fleet to Britain.

Following delivery of this memorandum of the facts by Sir Arthur Salter, and realizing the seriousness of the situation as far as Britain's supply of petroleum products was concerned, I immediately conferred with the oil controller, and it was decided to direct the companies having Norwegian tankers under charter to turn them over to Britain without delay. It was further agreed with Sir Arthur Salter that the eight Canadian-flag tankers could go into the United Kingdom service as soon as navigation in the St. Lawrence closed, provided of course that we would receive in return equal replacement tonnage out of the shuttle service.

As I have before stated, these sixteen tankers were all that were owned or controlled by Canadian importers. Nevertheless we figured that we could depend on replacements out of the shuttle service for our war needs.

To make the statement, therefore, or even cast the reflection that this tanker situation was the instrument of anyone other than the urgency of Britain, is an entire misrepresentation of the facts, is misleading, and damaging to our war effort.

Further, in the advertisement reference is made to the ocean and lake tanker tonnage available, that is, the Canadian-flag ocean tankers in the Canadian trade and the Canadian tanker tonnage available for ocean service. Associated with that statement is one setting out Canada's requirements, following which there is a definite statement that there is an excess of ocean tanker space over and above the requirements.

While an order in council was passed prohibiting the advertising by anyone of ships in the Canadian service, the Joy Oil company proceeds to give the information in a public statement. Neither the statement as to Canadian-flag ocean tankers nor the one in regard to small Canadian-flag lake tankers is correct. In the first place, the ocean tanker Canadalite is listed as available ocean tanker tonnage. This ship was lost in the battle zone in March of this year. Further than this, the advertisement incorrectly places the Trontolite. This tanker is listed with the lake tankers and is left out of the ocean figures. Even however, if the Trontolite were included in its proper category there is a discrepancy of 210,592 barrels, or the equivalent of two large ocean-going tankers. In other words, the cargo-carrying capacities of ocean tanker tonnage which remained available to us total 1,336,600 barrels and not 1,547,192 barrels as published. The figures shown in the advertisement indicate the deadweight capacity of each vessel and not the cargo carrying capacity. Fuel, water and ship's stores naturally reduce the deadweight capacity.

As regards the small Canadian-flag lake tankers referred to in the advertisement as available for ocean service, this list is not correct, neither is the tonnage correct. As before stated, it includes the Trontolite; further, however, it leaves out three small lake tankers of an aggregate capacity of approximately 56,000 barrels. The aggregate figures are wrong inasmuch as the Trontolite, which was included, has an aggregate capacity of 73,000 barrels; further, the inclusion of the Britamette as having a capacity of 21,000 barrels, when this ship's capacity is only 2,200 barrels. Regardless, however, as to the total tonnage of lake tankers available to us, it is an accepted fact that the majority of these vessels are not fit for ocean service. While they might be used in the Caribbean, there is grave doubt that they could be used in the north Atlantic winter run, as suggested.

Reference is made to ocean tanker requirements at 1,380,000 barrels. What period these requirements refer to is not stated. In the light, however, of the information I have already given, the statement can only be looked upon as intentionally misleading. You will recall that the tanker requirements by ocean tankers was 30,000,000 barrels. I do not know what the allusion to 1,380,000 barrels was intended to refer to.

As I have before stated, there is no excess ocean tanker space. There is a shortage, and that shortage is becoming greater every day, as was also shown in the inventory figures which I have given.

The letter to the Prime Minister as published states that unless the Joy Oil Company Limited can get its share of tanker space allocated to it by the government, its stations will run out of gasoline and it will be forced either to close down or to buy from the big oil companies and raise its price to the public four to five cents a gallon. It is clear from the figures I have given that there are no tankers to be made available from those in the Canadian service, unless we place the business of the Joy Oil company in three congested areas, selling motor gasoline to the motoring public, ahead of our national requirements. The Joy Oil Company Limited and/or anyone claiming to be associated with it has never been refused a permit to bring gasoline into Canada. It is free to buy gasoline wherever it wishes. If, on the other hand, gasoline is not now available at prices which will enable these companies to retail their gasoline at cheaper prices, that is no fault of ours.

That no doubt is a condition arising out of supplies of gasoline in the western hemisphere —in other words, arising out of war conditions.

The oil controller, or anyone associated with him, has at no time objected to the petroleum coordinator or the maritime commission of the United States supplying the Joy Oil company with tanker tonnage, excepting that the oil controller has refused to permit the requirements of the Joy Oil company in the way of tanker tonnage to take precedence over tanker tonnage which was being requested by him to take care of Canada's national war effort. The requests by the oil controller for tanker tonnage to build up reduced inventories have not as yet been satisfied, and in the light of the figures I have given the committee, it would not be otherwise than criminal to give the supply of motor fuel for the Joy Oil company precedence over that which we require in order to carry on our war effort.

Having regard to the gasoline purchased by the Joy Oil company in Trinidad, on the 24th June of this year, the office of the high commissioner for the United Kingdom in Ottawa informed the acting under-secretary of state for external affairs, by letter, that owing to a shortage of tankers it had become necessary to draw all supplies for the United Kingdom from the nearest sources, and sterling oil, which formerly came from Iran et cetera, had to be replaced by supplies from the west. I read the letter as follows:

My Dear Mr. Robertson:

The high commissioner has received a telegram from the secretary of state for dominion affairs on the following subject.

The petroleum department have stated that Trinidad Leaseholds Limited entered into negotiations with two Canadian companies, Austin of Joy Oil Company, and Sun Oil Company, to supply them with motor spirit from Trinidad.

Owing to the shortage of tanker tonnage it has become necessary to draw oil supplies for the United Kingdom from the nearest sources, and sterling oil, which formerly came from Iran, et cetera, has had to be replaced by supplies from the west. As a result Trinidad's former surplus of motor spirit has been absorbed and Trinidad Leaseholds Limited are now unable to implement their arrangements with the two Canadian companies.

The high commissioner has been asked to explain their position to the Canadian authorities and to stress that the offer of supplies made by Trinidad Leaseholds Limited was made in good faith, that their inability to implement it has arisen out of circumstances over which they have no control, and that they are in no way to blame for the present difficulty.

Yours sincerely,

W. C. Hankinson

One other Canadian company not negotiating with Trinidad Leaseholds Limited had arranged for their total supply of aviation base stock in Trinidad, aggregating more than eight million gallons. This supply was also cut off by the petroleum department of Great Britain.

Hon. members will therefore see that it was not the oil controller who denied the Joy Oil company the Trinidad gasoline; it was the petroleum board of Great Britain. They will see that the Joy Oil company was not the only company affected by this act. Two others operating in Canada were also affected.

Reference is also made in the advertisement to increased costs to the public and the government. I have been wholly in accord with the controller's policy to bring in our petroleum requirements even at increased costs, using every form of transportation that was available, and also in favour of the increased cost being added to the cost of the product. Had it not been for this policy, the inventory position of Canada, as I have already quoted, would not be as good as it is to-day. I approved the increase of one cent which was put on in July. This increase applied to all Canada, but as far as the prairie provinces are concerned, this increase went back to the producers of Alberta oil. In other words, in order to stimulate production, an increase of 27 cents a barrel was approved to the producers of Turner valley crude. A further increase of one cent as of October 1 last was made with the concurrence of the war-time prices and trade board. This was based on statements supplied by the distributing companies showing their increased costs. These statements were checked up by the oil controller's office.

Reference is also made in the Joy Oil letter to the loss of gasoline tax to the federal government through gasoline rationing. This cut applied only to service stations and certainly did not, as suggested by the letter, cover all the gasoline sold in Canada.

Reference is also made to the loss of customs duties through excluding imports. This statement is characteristic of the whole advertisement. It is entirely misleading, because there has been no prohibition of imports that I know of.

While I am on the subject, I should like to say something about the price of gasoline. It has been suggested that every move made by the oil controller has put money into the pockets of the oil companies; that is, by stopping credit cards it was a saving to the oil companies—a fairly large saving. As I have said, there have been two increases, one in July of one cent a gallon and one in October of one cent a gallon. But I would point out that the increase on gasoline at the gulf, where all the gasoline comes from, has been more than two cents—that is, two cents based on the small United States gallon, which is somewhat more when translated into cost, in Canadian money, of the Canadian gallon. The price in New York city, which is a very large retailing centre, both tank wagon price and retail price have been advanced two and a half cents a gallon. We have kept rigid control of gasoline prices since the institution of the office of the oil controller. The refiners have had to contend with a very sharp rise in the price of crude oil, and they have had to contend also with greatly increased transportation costs. Strangely enough, the cost of obtaining oil from pipeline is considerably more than obtaining it by ocean tankers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By water.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; and, of course, tank cars have had to be used to a much greater extent than formerly, which greatly increases the cost of the industry. What has been done has been to calculate carefully the additional cost as against the additional saving that has been made by the methods of the oil controller.

We have a staff of accountants engaged constantly in studying the problem. We have not granted the increases which the figures seemed to demand. We have said that the oil companies must share some of the hardships with the Canadian public, but we have insisted that the oil companies obtain crude oil from every source from which it can be obtained and in the largest volume in which it can be obtained, more or less regardless of cost; and we have tried to adjust the cost over all the users of the product.

I do not think anyone can say that the oil controller's office has not been well administered. As I say, increases in cost that have been authorized have been less than those that have prevailed in the large markets to the south of us.

We have asked for the cooperation of the people in cutting down pleasure driving. The effect of that was to cut down the increase that had occurred in 1941 over 1940. Whereas the July, 1941, figures of consumption were twenty per cent over the figures for July, 1940, the September figures, I am happy to say, were just even with the consumption for September, 1940. That much we have done and I think it was a great step in advance. Now, what about the future?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves that, apropos of the increase of two cents to the consumer of gasoline, and the minister's previous statement that in some areas of Canada crude for the navy and war requirements and the merchant marine was the main objective, and that gasoline had become a by-product, is he able to assure the committee and the country that, with regard to the two cents a gallon which the public are now paying for gasoline, over what they were paying, and having regard to the factor that crude is in some important centres the main requirement, the Canadian public is not being asked to assume an undue burden? How about the distribution of the increased cost as between gasoline and crude? Is it all being passed on to the Canadian consumer? If the minister had an audit, as he said, it would be some reassurance to the Canadian public that they were not being asked to bear an undue proportion of the increase in the price of gasoline. I do not know anything about it, but I am looking for light and I think the minister should give the public these figures in the form of an auditor's certificate. Has the price of crude to the navy and the merchant marine and the government of Canada, whoever is the purchaser, been kept stationary, or has that had a relative increase also? Only part of the story has been told. I have no attack to make on anyone. I think the minister has answered the charge of the Joy Oil company perhaps fully, but I think the whole story of the increase of two cents in the price of gasoline to the ordinary consumer has not yet been told.

Mr. HOWE: Every effort has been made to assess the increase in the cost of crude evenly over the products. Of course the same crude makes the fuel oil and the gasoline.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been the increase on the diesel fuel?

Mr. HOWE: There has been an increase; we are, I suppose, the chief buyers of fuel oil. I am assured by my officers that it is in proportion to the yield of crude oil as against gasoline.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been the increase?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say. I shall be glad to place a statement on Hansard showing the increase on all by-products.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the minister proceeds, may I ask a question? The minister spoke about control over the sale of gasoline. Here is what I went through one afternoon, which I do not think should be described by the word "control." My gasoline was running low, and I drove to the first gas station I came to on St. Clair avenue in Toronto. The attendant said, "Sorry, we are out of gas." I said, "Have you no gas in your tanks?" "Oh, yes, lots of gas in the tanks, but we have sold our quota for to-day." I drove to the next gasoline station and was told the same thing. I drove to a third and was told the same. I asked the same question in each case, and the answer was, "Yes, we have lots of gasoline but we have sold our quota for the day." I drove to another station and before I had time to ask the young man said, "Shall I fill her up?" I said, "Yes, fill her up."

That is not gasoline control. Had I been on a serious errand of life or death and run out of gasoline and they had told me, "Yes, we have lots of gas but have filled our quota for the day and cannot give you any more," what would have been my position? That is not control. I should like the minister to tell us whether the rationing system has been properly surveyed. For instance, all this week my car is standing in the garage, I am not using any gasoline. When I go away for a month my car is in the garage. But when I come back, not having used any gasoline for some time, I am told, "Yes, the tanks are full, but we cannot sell you any." That kind of control is a farce. Surely there is some sensible way of rationing gasoline.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend says it is not control, but it is one kind of control. It is control of consumption. If we cut the sale of gasoline by twenty per cent we have saved that twenty per cent. I admit at once it is a crude way, but it is a quick way; it was adopted by the United States on the eastern seaboard and was adopted in Canada to consolidate our gains. We wanted a reduction in gasoline consumption; we achieved it in that way; it has worked from the government point of view, but perhaps not so well from the point of view of the public.

Now we are working towards a rationing system for gasoline. In due course it will be necessary to have a coupon book in order to obtain gasoline. Why have we not done it before? It is a very complex problem. First you have to determine the classification of users; then you have to decide the relative amounts that should be given to this and that user. It is not easy; it took England eighteen months to put her rationing system in operation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is operating there now.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, definitely, but it was a difficult problem. It was not working well when I was there; they were still making adjustments. In Canada, which is more highly mechanized, more dependent upon internal combustion engines, it is much more difficult. The mere printing of the coupon books is no small task. That work, however, is well under way. It is the only fair method. Each man is given so much gas per month, according to his needs; if he wishes to use it all in a week, that is his affair.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Could the rationing not be done through the provincial governments in connection with the licensing system?

Mr. HOWE: As a matter of fact that is what we have in mind, we hope to have the two issued concurrently. The purpose of the control is to save gasoline and nothing else. It has been the purpose of the oil controller to bring into Canada every gallon of petroleum products he can bring in. I notice editorials are beginning to appear stating that the real reason behind this control is the saving of United States exchange. It is true that petroleum products do constitute the greatest single drain on our United States exchange. But the purpose of oil conservation has not been to save United States exchange. We have been conserving gasoline because if we give it to the pleasure driver we go short in the war effort.

The United States furnished a large number of tankers to the British government and Canada furnished its share, a fair number of our Norwegian flag tankers. The United States is getting a number of its tankers back; we are not getting any of ours back. At the moment the situation in Canada is no better, because we have no more new tanker space; our stocks to-day are lower than they have ever been since the war started.

But we have the Montreal pipeline coming into operation, which will help somewhat, and we know that as soon as the situation in the United States is squared away they will give us some help. We hope the situation this winter will be better. We are going to put in a flexible system of rationing, and we are going to make the rations just as liberal as our supplies of gasoline will permit. At the beginning of each month, or perhaps earlier, the oil controller will announce how many gallons of gasoline a coupon will entitle a person to obtain, and we hope it will entitle a driver to as many gallons as he will want to use. If it does not it will be because the gasoline is not available; but we shall be in a better position to deal with another shortage if one should occur. And it is very likely to occur. The submarines are out again; winter is coming on, and the prospects are not too bright. If there are sinkings in anything like the proportion of last winter, there will be another shortage in the spring. Through a system of rationing, we shall be able to distribute the gasoline not required by the war effort, to the citizens of Canada for non-war purposes as equitably as possible.

There is everything to be said for a rationing system. The public are, I think, more or less demanding it, and we believe that it is the fairest and best system to adopt. The reason why it is not in effect to-day is that it has not been found possible to organize its administration so quickly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear the minister say that at last the government are becoming realistic in connection with the matter of rationing in the present gasoline situation. An ordinary member of parliament cannot visualize the difficulty of putting into effect a system of this kind, but such a system is in operation in England and it is just too bad for anyone who does not take care of his position over there. As far as I know anything about public opinion, I believe the public of Canada will welcome any decent system of rationing if it is in the interests of the war effort of this country. I do not believe there is any sacrifice the loyal people of Canada are not prepared to make, and surely this is one of the least that could be asked.

Under the system of moral suasion and appeals to save gasoline I do not think our people have taken the matter very much to heart. I heard of the case of a gentleman in the city of Toronto who put up his cars and walked. Yet one day he was confronted with the spectacle of hundreds of cars coming away from the Woodbine race track, each one with a V for victory on the windshield. That is the sort of thing that makes one sick to contemplate, the thoughtlessness of people.

Mr. HOWE: Nevertheless the saving was very considerable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that there was a saving, but it was brought about by the conscientious people of this country rather than by those who were thoughtless, and I am not going to characterize them in any other way.

I should like to throw out this suggestion to the minister for his consideration when he comes to deal with this question of rationing. I suggest that those who are careful to keep their consumption of gasoline as far as possible under the limit might be given credit for being so careful, so that, if an emergency should arise during a succeeding month, they might be able to take advantage of what they had saved previously. What I mean is that a credit created by a non-user in this way might be stored up, to be used by that person in case of an emergency, so that the gasoline represented by the coupons not used would not be wiped off the slate at the end of the month. It may not be possible to adopt that suggestion, though I do not see why it should not; but I commend it to the minister and his advisers when they come to consider this rationing system.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the basis of the allotment when the supply to distributors was reduced this fall?

Mr. HOWE: I do not remember the exact figure; it was either fifteen or twenty per cent, based on the records of the previous year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For any particular month?

Mr. HOWE: Month by month; that is, each month was compared with the same month of the previous year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It was not based on the July consumption, for instance?

Mr. HOWE: No; I think July was based on July, August on August and September on September.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Of the previous year?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I spoke of two increases, each of one cent, in the price of gasoline. So far as the prairie provinces were concerned, there was only one increase, for the reason that the cost there was largely local cost. The only lift in price to the refineries there was the 27 cents a barrel which brought about the first increase of one cent a gallon.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister the figure with regard to the increase in consumption in June, 1941, as compared with June, 1940? He gave the figure for July as twenty per cent.

Mr. HOWE: It is practically six o'clock now, so perhaps we might resume this discussion on Monday when all the figures will be available. Would it suit the hon. member to ask that question at three o'clock on Monday?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it contemplated that there will be any necessity for the rationing of gasoline used for agricultural purposes?

Mr. HOWE: No. That is regarded as a war need and will be protected. Just how it will be protected I could not say, but it will be done.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, November 10, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

Mr. DESMOND:

1. How many permits have been issued by the Minister of National Revenue for the importation into Canada of goods from Japan, the Japanese empire or Manchuria since the passing of order in council P.C. 7473?

2. What was the nature of each commodity, the importation of which was provided for under such permit, and what was the total monetary value of the importation under each such permit?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. None.

2. Answered by No. 1.

REFUNDS OR REMISSION OF CUSTOMS DUTY

Mr. DESMOND:

1. How many refunds or remissions of customs duty and taxes have been granted pursuant to order in council 86/7474?

2. What is the total amount of such refunds or remissions?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Refunds 1; remissions 27.

2. Refunds, $101.35. It is impossible to state the amount to be remitted until the articles imported for temporary use are duly exported, inasmuch as the articles are in Canada for varying periods of time and the duty and taxes on a proportionate basis are collected monthly.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—ADDRESSES OVER UNITED STATES SHORT WAVE STATIONS

Mr. REID:

1. How many addresses were contracted or arranged for by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over United States short wave radio stations during the year 1941, to the end of October?

2. What amounts of money were paid by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for such short wave addresses to countries other than the United States during this period?

Mr. THORSON:

1. Six broadcasts in the series "Canada parle a la France" were broadcast over short wave station WRUL, Boston, during 1941 up to the end of October. Each broadcast contained addresses by three individuals.

2. The cost of the necessary wire lines to the American border required to feed these programmes to short wave station WRUL has been $90. No fee was paid for the talks.

EXPORT OF STEEL SCRAP FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

1. How many permits for the export of steel scrap from the province of British Columbia were issued during the past five months, and for what tonnage in each case?

2. To whom were these permits issued?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Sixteen permits were issued.

Date	Tonnage
July 28	5,600
August 1	1,500
August 1	2,000
August 6	5,000
August 14	150
August 18	250
August 27	250
August 27	6,000
September 3	1,000
September 6	100
September 16	500
October 9	200
October 16	300
October 16	1,500
October 31	300
October 31	6,000

2. It is contrary to government practice to table any information which would reveal the private business of individual concerns.

SALVAGE CAMPAIGN—STEEL FROM SCRAP METALS

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. How many organizers have been appointed for the salvage campaign?
2. What salary or allowance is being paid to each organizer?
3. Is the Department of Munitions and Supply in need of the steel produced from the scrap metals so collected?

Mr. THORSON:

1. Six.
2. Salary: $2,880 per annum.
3. The chairman of the war-time industries control board and the steel controller, Department of Munitions and Supply, advise that scrap iron and steel in all forms is urgently required.

WAR-TIME MORATORIUM

Mr. CHURCH:

Will consideration be given to a national moratorium on all mortgages on land, including homes and other buildings, under the War Measures Act, for the period of the war and two years thereafter on, (a) property owned or leased by civilians, (b) property owned or leased by members of His Majesty's forces?

Mr. ILSLEY: This question relates to a matter of policy and it is not usual for the government to make statements on matters of policy in giving replies to questions.

PENSIONERS OF GREAT WAR NOW SERVING IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

Mr. FAIR:

Does a pensioner from the last war who is now serving in his majesty's forces receive his full pension, as well as pay and allowances according to his rank?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Serving members of his majesty's forces receive any pension, payable under the provisions of the Pension Act, on account of a disability related to service in the last war.

TRADE WITH GERMANY, 1933-39

Mr. FAIR:

What was Canada's balance of trade with Germany in the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Calendar Year		Excess Imports for consumption (i) or Total Exports (e)
1933	(e)	$ 705,767
1934	(i)	4,017,289
1935	(i)	6,084,193
1936	(i)	4,403,388
1937	(i)	183,932
1938	(e)	8,399,446
1939	(i)	1,053,542

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR-TIME MERCHANT SHIPPING BOARD

Mr. REID:

1. In what city is the headquarters of the organization known as the "War-time Merchant Shipping Board"?
2. What are the names of the directors and who is the chairman?
3. How many offices have been set up by this organization and where is each located?
4. What are the names of the staff and personnel connected with the War-time Merchant Shipping Board in, (a) Montreal; (b) Vancouver?
5. What were the occupations of the directors and staff previous to their appointment or attachment to the said board?
6. What has been the total expense to date of this board?

HOUSING PROJECTS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many staff houses have been completed by War-time Housing Limited?
2. How many people are housed in the staff houses?
3. How many are employed on the staff of War-time Housing Limited and what has been the cost of its administration to date?
4. How many houses is it building in Wrightville and what war industries are they to serve?
5. What control has the Department of Finance over types of construction used?
6. How much money will be required to complete war-time housing projects which will have been started by December 31, 1941?
7. What is the total value of contracts awarded to Pigott Construction Company to date?

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CROWN PROPERTIES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many crown properties have been established by the Department of Munitions and Supply during this war, and where are they located?
2. What was the total cost of any such properties which have been purchased, on what terms were they acquired and where are they located?
3. Are any municipal taxes paid after acquisition by the government, (a) for general tax rate, (b) for local improvements?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

APPOINTMENTS TO PUBLIC SERVICE SINCE SEPTEMBER, 1939

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a return showing:—1. The total number of employees of the government of Canada, including employees of boards and commissions, appointed by federal authority, as of the following dates, viz:—September 1, 1939; September 1, 1940; September 1, 1941; November 1, 1941.

2. The total amount of salaries, wages and allowances paid to such employees in each of the following months, viz.:—August, 1939, August, 1940; August, 1941; October, 1941.

3. The total number of employees who have been appointed since September 1, 1939 (a) for work not directly associated with the war; (b) for work directly associated with the war.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO ADJOURN TO JANUARY 21, 1942, AFTER FINAL SITTING OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns after the final sittings of the committee of the whole it stand adjourned until January 21, 1942, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with His Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

Motion agreed to.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY

QUESTION AS TO FURTHER ARRESTS AND INTERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one or two questions were asked last week to which I promised to make reply at an early date. One was a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) who in the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) drew my attention to a newspaper report of the interment of a native of Kitchener, named Harvey Murphy, as a communist. He asked whether in view of the fact that Russia is now our ally it is the intention of the government to continue with the arrest and internment of persons in this country because of membership in the communist party. I may say in reply to my hon. friend that the communist party was declared to be an illegal organization not because of any relationship to Russia, but because of its subversive attitude towards Canada's war effort. The entry of Russia into the war is therefore in itself irrelevant.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MARITIME PROVINCE LUMBER WORKERS EMPLOYED IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A question was asked on Thursday last by the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. O'Brien) in reference to the movement of Canadian lumbermen to work in the Maine woods. My hon. friend asked why permits had been issued to these young men to cross the border, and what action would be taken to stop this drain on Canadian man-power. I informed my hon. friend the leader of the opposition on Friday that I would give later on a more detailed statement than it was possible to give at that time. The facts, I am informed, are as follows:

Some 4,400 lumbermen, living for the most part in villages along the Maine-Quebec border, have been permitted by the United States immigration authorities to enter the United States temporarily and under bond to work in the Maine woods during the next few months. In view of the bonded guarantees that the individuals concerned will return to Canada before March 1, 1942, the United States authorities have waived the usual passport and visa requirement for this seasonal border movement. No question therefore arose of issuing Canadian passports to the individuals concerned.

The lumbering operations in which these men are employed are essential for the manufacture of high quality alpha pulp required by the defence industries of the United Kingdom and the United States. A good proportion of the Canadian lumbermen whose temporary entry into the United States was permitted, subject to the above conditions, are cutting pulpwood which is floated back to Canada down the St. John river, for manufacture into alpha pulp for export to the United Kingdom. A substantial part of the United States output of this product is also under contract to the United Kingdom.

The men taking this winter employment in Maine are of course all subject, within their respective age groups, to the proclamations issued under the national war service regulations.

In reply to the second question, I might add that consideration is being given at the moment to the whole problem of border control, of which this particular movement is but one aspect.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISCUSSION OF PROPOSED STRIKE VOTE IN KIRKLAND LAKE DISTRICT MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish again to ask the Prime Minister if he will at to-day's session allow a discussion of Department of Labour matters, provided that the Minister of Labour is later on present in the house. The strike vote at Kirkland Lake to which I referred on Friday was taken on Saturday; and I am informed that if negotiations looking to a settlement are not opened the men will strike on Wednesday or Thursday of this week.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Labour has unfortunately been obliged to attend the funeral of one of the leading members of his department who passed away on Saturday and for that reason is not in the house at the moment. With respect to affording an opportunity for discussion when the minister comes in, I believe the house will wish me to hold to the arrangement as made and understood last week, namely that we take up a discussion of the subject-matter of the different reports that have been presented by the ministers in the order in which the reports themselves were presented. I would hope that the statement of the Minister of Labour will be reached either to-day or, at the latest, to-morrow.

PROCEDURE IN DISCUSSION OF MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): On Friday afternoon the question arose of procedure in dealing with the statements of ministers on the war effort. I wish to call the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that it is impossible to confine the discussion to one department alone. The activities of the departments are so intermingled that in response to a question bearing upon the affairs of one department the minister might well say, "That matter belongs to another department and will have to be answered by the minister of that department." So that you have to deal, in committee of the whole, with more than one department at a time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that it is, I believe, understood that the chairman should afford to hon. members all reasonable latitude in the matter of discussion. But my hon. friend will realize that it is desirable to hold as far as we can to some order.

WAR EXPENDITURES

WORK OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—FURTHER SITTINGS AND EXTENSION OF POWERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Certain questions were raised by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) and the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) with respect to the special committee on war expenditures. I might give the house a brief statement as to how that matter stands and as to the powers of hon. members of the house to have a very full discussion with regard to these expenditures.

On June 10 last, the special committee on war expenditures was authorized by order of the house to sit, notwithstanding the adjournment of the house.

The committee met on July 7 and resolved itself into three subcommittees to inquire into various subjects, set out on page 549 of the Votes and Proceedings of Monday, November 3. These subcommittees sat for approximately seven weeks during July and August and held altogether eighty-three sittings and examined eighty-nine witnesses.

The reports of the subcommittees were carefully considered by the main committee, which agreed upon seven reports. These were all presented to the house on November 3.

In the fourth report the committee stated that in view of the importance and scope of the inquiry referred to the committee, it was recommended that the inquiry be continued and that for the said purpose a committee be appointed at the next session.

With regard to the inquiry made by the hon. member for Yorkton, it should be pointed out that the government has no control over the committee which was appointed by the house and responsible to the house.

Furthermore, there is no need of extending the powers of the committee to enable it to investigate contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply. The committee has already the fullest possible powers in that regard. Indeed, there are no restrictions of any kind upon the powers of the committee to examine into any war expenditures. The whole field of inquiry into all war expenditures is open to the committee. It is, however, obvious that the committee cannot complete its examination into all subjects of inquiry at the same time.

An examination of the subjects of inquiry assigned to the various subcommittees will indicate that the committee has been concerning itself in the main with subjects relating to activities which have their origin in the several branches of the Department of National Defence. It might be noted that in respect of contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply, the latter department lets such contracts after it has received a contract demand from one of the Departments of National Defence. The committee has already made a considerable study of the operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply, but there is no doubt that a full inquiry into the subject of war contracts will be made by the committee when a new committee is established next session. The committee will be free to make the fullest possible examination into the subject of war contracts.

With regard to the questions of the hon. member for Danforth, it might be pointed out that subject to the arrangement that has been made between the leaders on both sides of the house, there is nothing in the way of procedure to restrict the right of any member to discuss the reports that were presented last Monday. It is suggested, however, that these reports are voluminous and contain a great many recommendations. It would seem desirable that there should be an opportunity of careful study of the recommendations by the departments concerned.

When the next session takes place it is the intention of the government, if the house agrees, to establish a committee to deal with the subject of war expenditures and on the motion made for the establishment of such a committee, there will be the fullest possible opportunity afforded to every member of the house who is interested in the subject of discussing the reports, the recommendations contained therein and indeed, the subject of economy in war expenditures in every possible phase. It would seem preferable that the debate on these reports should take place on such a motion.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE—TRANSFER OF FUNDS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): In view of the publication of a letter from the Prime Minister in the Canada Gazette of October 25, 1941, informing the International Labour office at Montreal that they may transfer funds from their Canadian account to the United States without being subject to foreign exchange control regulations, may I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance if this covers Committee of Industrial Organization remittances between Canada and the United States? If so, are organizations of this type entitled to preferred treatment?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to send me a copy of the question but I did not receive it until I came into the house. He has referred to a letter published in the Canada Gazette, which was in the nature of a communication to the International Labour office at Montreal. That office, my hon. friend will realize, is an intergovernmental body, and such rights and privileges as it enjoys were accorded it on that ground. I cannot say offhand what the rules of the foreign exchange control board are with respect to remittances, and particularly those to which my hon. friend has referred, but I will give him an answer later on, unless my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is in a position to make a statement at once.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be a good thing indeed if we could have some information with regard to the position of the foreign exchange control board as to the question raised by my colleague, namely, remittances from Canada to foreign organizations other than governmental bodies—I will not limit it to one.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will find out about that.

PENSIONS

QUESTION AS TO DECLARING NOVA SCOTIA A THEATRE OF WAR UNDER AMENDMENT ACT OF 1941

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. B. ISNOR (Halifax): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question of which I sent a copy to his office. It is based on an observation which was made by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services with regard to submarine attacks off Nova Scotia. In view of the danger of enemy attacks, has the government considered declaring the province of Nova Scotia a "theatre of war" as defined in Bill No. 17, "An act to amend the Pension Act"?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The answer, in so far as anything decided up to the moment is concerned, is no. I may say to the hon. gentleman that the government has been giving the most careful consideration to everything pertaining to defence in the maritime provinces.

THE WAR

The house again in committee of the whole, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941—CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to bring before the committee a couple of matters, but before doing so I should like to go on record as registering my protest, which is all I can do at the present moment, against further restrictions on the rights of individual members by the announcement made last week that private members would not be allowed to follow the ordinary course in committee of the whole by moving motions or amendments, and so on. All of us, except the most recent members, are aware that in the course of the session we go into committee hundreds of times, and the procedure always is to discuss one specific item. We discuss a resolution on which some bill is to be founded, or we discuss the bill itself, and when we are in committee it is the option of anyone to move an amendment, to move to insert a new section, or anything of that kind.

I feel strongly tempted to ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether there is anything before the committee now, and I rather think that if I did your answer would be no. It is well known that when the Speaker is in the chair, or when the chairman of committees is presiding, there must be something before the house or the committee, as the case may be. If there is nothing before the chair the presiding officer immediately turns to the leader of the government to ascertain the next order of business to which the house or the committee shall proceed, and when the order paper is exhausted the house must adjourn. That, however, has not been done on this occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend a moment? I think it was understood at the time, in fact it was specifically stated, that the course which the house was pursuing could be taken only by unanimous consent, and consent at the time was given by all present in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The whole thing is on the basis of consent.

Mr. NEILL: The whole thing may have been intended to be on the basis of unanimous consent, but actually it was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not intended but was.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. NEILL: I have before me Hansard in which the Prime Minister is reported. After certain remarks he said:

To that end I move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair.

The procedure, when it is done by unanimous consent, is invariably for the member of the government making the motion to say, "By unanimous consent", and the Speaker then says, "By unanimous consent it is moved," etc. That was not done here, and I submit that there was no unanimous consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but if he will look over the earlier part of Hansard he will find that when the matter was discussed it was stated then that whatever was done would have to be done by unanimous consent, and I remember the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) making the observation that it would have to be by unanimous consent. The house concurred therein at the time. It was understood, before the Speaker even put the motion, that it would be passed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEILL: I remember the leader of the opposition saying that it would have to be done by unanimous consent, but my submission is that it was not so done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend object?

Mr. NEILL: Absolutely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not hear him and he is not so recorded.

Mr. NEILL: I did not object at that time because unanimous consent was not asked, and I must admit I was perhaps innocent in the matter; but I never dreamed for a moment that the ordinary procedure in committee would not be followed. I submit that we were to some extent led into a situation that has never happened before. However, I do not want to delay the committee or to argue about it. We are in a rather ridiculous position apart from being more or less unconstitutional. When we were young and went into the pantry we were told by our mothers, "you may look but you must not touch." The position here is, "You may talk but you must not act." We shall be known as the parliament that did nothing and could do nothing.

The leader of the opposition the other day seemed to have the same idea, that everything was not according to Hoyle, when he said that members would be reduced to the position of a debating society. I differ with him in that regard; I think we are below the status of a debating society. In the debating society of our young days we used to meet to debate some very abstruse question, such as whether the pen was mightier than the sword. It might not have had any great effect on our day and generation but we did decide in favour either of the pen or of the sword. When the Ladies' Aid meet to discuss whether they shall lay down linoleum in the vicarage or in the manse, they come to some conclusion; they decide either to lay it down or not to lay it down. At any rate, they do something; they come to a definite decision. Never before have we been in such a situation as this and I cannot help asking myself why. Is the government afraid? What is it afraid of? Hon. gentlemen opposite have a huge and loyal majority behind them and if anyone moved a vote of want of confidence I am sure he would have the greatest difficulty in getting a member to second it. There is no question of defeating the government or of going to the country. What is the trouble? Is the Prime Minister afraid of private members? We are the representatives of the people of Canada. Already we have had cut off—and we all agreed to it in all loyalty—the opportunity of moving resolutions in this house during this session. We were told that it was necessary to save time. We agreed to that. Now we are to be allowed time but we must not have any action; we are not to take any action at all.

Now, dealing with the two matters I wanted to bring up, the first is the gasoline situation. It is an illustration of the curious policies the government seem to adopt not only in this matter but in others; they begin by trusting the people too much and end by trusting them too little. The result is a middle-of-the-road wishy-washy policy that results in small achievement and a great deal of irritation. But in saying this I exempt the Minister of Finance. Anyone who listened to his very able speech the other night setting forth his policies must have realized that we were listening to a man of great ability. I congratulate him on having the brains to conceive such a policy and the courage to present it, a far-sighted, bold policy with great potentialities, I only hope that when it gets into the hands of the officials it will not be smothered in the red tape in which bureaucratic people always seem to love to envelop anything

As I say, the government started by trusting the people too much; they thought that if they told the people that gasoline restriction was necessary they would all voluntarily submit. But that turned out a complete failure. Then they went to the opposite extreme; they saw that compulsion was needed but they got scared, thought the people would not accept the government's statement that it was necessary, and might be dissatisfied and express their dissatisfaction by their votes. So the matter was held off for months and much precious time was lost. The result of it all was a very small saving made by a very few instead of a large saving made by a great many people, and in addition there was a great deal of dissatisfaction and ill-will. The minister said the other day he thought they had done very well because in a certain month the restriction had produced, not a reduction in consumption, but a non-increase. That is, whereas the previous month's consumption had exceeded that of the corresponding month a year ago, this month it remained the same as the corresponding month last year. He thought that was substantial progress. Well, if the war situation needs gasoline-saving I think it is hardly satisfactory to record that we did not do any worse than a year ago. It reminds me of the man and woman who by dire necessity were compelled greatly to reduce their expenditure, and after much discussion and argument and a few tears they decided that the woman had to go without a sewing machine, whereupon the man went out and bought an expensive set of golf clubs, and the net result was that the common purse was no better off.

We have lost much precious time by following a circuitous route and have not got anywhere yet. They made a general appeal to the public and it proved to be as futile as any suggestion would be that we should pay our taxes without compulsion. Anyone with a knowledge of human nature would have expected just this. About ten per cent of the people—I do not give that as an exact figure, because I do not know, but a certain proportion, say ten per cent—can always be trusted to do the loyal, the right and the decent thing. Another ten per cent are so utterly and intensely selfish that they will do nothing that they are not compelled to do. It does not matter to them that they see their neighbours making the necessary sacrifice. In between there is the great mass, call them eighty per cent, who are anxious to do the right thing; they only need to be told, but they have a sense of fairness and proportion which causes them to say: "I am willing to do it, but it has to be done all round. I am not going to do it and see Tom Jones, who is better able to make the sacrifice, evading it." So the government saw that compulsion was necessary, but they were afraid the people would dislike it; therefore they adopted a middle-of-the-road policy, prohibited buying on Sundays and in the evenings. That smelt very strongly of discrimination, because we all know the rich man does not generally travel on Sundays. Sunday is the poor man's only opportunity of driving out with his family. It resulted in a few careless people being caught away from home without gasoline, but they soon learned to stock up on Saturday. Meantime it meant in some cases using more gasoline, because if a man got stuck ten miles from home he could not have gasoline sent out to him; he had to get a towing car sent out to bring him home, which meant a double trip and the use of more gasoline than if he had been allowed, perhaps on payment of an extra fee, to get an emergency supply.

There was no give and take whatever. I took it up with officials of the board in my district where men were working in a war production plant or a plant producing a product needed in the war. Naturally they wanted to go home Saturday nights, because there was not enough accommodation at the plant. They had to go about fifteen miles by water, did not get home until late Saturday night, and had to leave Sunday afternoon, consequently they could not get any gasoline at all. I suggested they might be allowed to get gasoline after hours on Saturday and Sunday, but I was told it could not be done, and the suggestions made to meet the situation were absolutely ridiculous. There was no provision to deal reasonably with an emergency.

Then the government, finding that policy was not successful, tried rationing the gasoline stations. As the minister himself said, this was at best a crude method. The obligation to restrict the sale of gasoline fell on the retailer. What would hon. members expect him to do? To say to the rich customer who wanted five gallons: "No, I will give you only two?" Then he would come back the next day and get more. Or was he to say to the rich man: "I will not give you any; I am going to keep it for this poor man who has to drive miles to work?" Where I live men club together to drive ten miles to work; they cannot get accommodation where they work and they fill a car. One hon. member said he went to a gas station and was told the quota for the day was exhausted. But where I live they did not take that attitude. They said: "We are not going to make bad friends all round; we are going to sell gasoline to everyone who comes while we have it, and if towards the end of the month, say the 25th or 27th, there is none left, we will simply put up notices, "No More Gas." But what about a traveller or the head of a business, who is stuck fifty miles from the nearest town? What is he to do? He would have to send for a towing truck; would that save gasoline? Or what about these men going to work; were they to remain idle three or four days at the end of the month? I have known of times when these "no gas" notices were up three or four days at the end of the month.

I took this up also, and was told I should appeal to their loyalty. I suggested that was an insult. People have no objection to gasoline restrictions; I have not heard one man object to the restriction, but everyone I spoke to objected to the foolish way in which it was done. That was the point. Provided the method was effective and universal everyone would have been satisfied. Some official told me that we must remember that a very considerable cost will be involved in printing these ration books. There is no doubt this would cost a good deal, but I remember January a year ago when a great deal of money was spent to bring four hundred people here for a three-hour session of parliament, after which we were sent home and an election was brought on, at enormous expense, though at that time it was not immediately essential. So that I do not think the question of expense should be considered so important.

This thing has been dragging on for fifteen months. It will be eighteen months before we are through with it. Until now we have had very little success, but at long last we are going to adopt the principle of compulsion, or should I use that dreadful and fateful word, "conscription", in the matter of gasoline. At last we are going to do something, and the government will find that the people will accept it if the scheme is effective and if it applies to all. The government can trust the people if they tell the absolute facts. Let me quote this sentence, without for the moment giving its source:

> The people are not afraid of strong, effective, action—they want action. Listen to discussion in any public place in Canada to-day about the gasoline restrictions. People shrug their shoulders and say, "Well, if it is necessary, I suppose we must have it." Then, in a burst of exasperation, they usually add, "But if rationing is necessary, in heaven's name why don't we have it without all this pussy-footing?" One minister of the crown says that the situation is "very, very serious." And on the street one hears, "All right, if it's as serious as that why don't they ration us: What are we waiting for?"

That does not come from the journal of the chamber of commerce, or anything like that; it is from the publication of a very prominent labour organization in Canada. That is the way they look at it.

I hope the rules governing this rationing, when they are made, will be just, and without too much red tape; and I hope provision will be made for prompt action in any real emergency. There is no such provision now.

To-day if you need an emergency ration you have to communicate with Ottawa, which in my case is three thousand miles away. A woman waiting to go to a maternity hospital, or a man with a broken hip, has not time to communicate with Ottawa, particularly in view of the fact that if the emergency arises on a Saturday afternoon, no answer could be obtained until Monday or Tuesday. I hope there will be some local provision made to meet emergencies of this kind, perhaps through the chief of police or the local magistrate. These are responsible people, who would not abuse their power.

I also hope that local conditions will be taken into consideration when the actual rationing is put into effect; and above all I hope the government will remember that in British Columbia distances are much greater than in the thickly settled regions of the east, and make provision accordingly. And let the arrangements be made for some definite period, not just for a day, a week, or a month. At certain intervals I have occasion to take a trip of some two hundred miles. If I am limited to only a couple of gallons per day I cannot take that trip, but if I am rationed over some length of time I can arrange to save my gasoline when I know this trip has to be made.

There is one other point I should like to mention to the minister. I do not expect an answer at the moment, but perhaps he would be good enough to look into the matter and advise me later. Has he explored the possibility of using charcoal? I understand this has been tried in Australia, and I believe the cost of converting a car to use charcoal is not very considerable. The only trouble seems to be in making provision for stations to provide charcoal at suitable intervals. There is one other matter I should like to bring to his attention also. Australia has made a very full investigation of the possibility of producing alcohol from the refuse of sugar, molasses, wheat, and I think potatoes. They have found that they can produce an alcohol which can be mixed with ordinary gasoline in the ratio of twelve and a half gallons to twenty; and while the resulting mixture is a little more expensive than ordinary gasoline—and gasoline is very expensive in Australia anyway—they are going ahead with the proposition on a very considerable scale. We might be able to do something of the sort here.

There is another matter I wish to discuss, and I hope I will not be called to order. The hon. member for Parkdale was allowed to discuss it last Friday, and if he can discuss it surely I can discuss it also.

Mr. BRUCE: Before the hon. member leaves the subject of rationing, may I ask this question; would not the arguments which he has advanced so splendidly, and with which I entirely agree, apply with equal force to the present method of securing recruits?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Going to ration them, too?

Mr. NEILL: I was going to deal with that point later, but in a general way I should say my answer is distinctly yes. I endorse everything the hon. member said, except that I would not limit it to compulsory service for men alone for overseas service; I would extend it to both men and women and for all war service. I would have it apply to everybody, and to every form of war work. Probably it would take quite a few men out of the army, men who would be far better in some civilian capacity, while it would put in the army other people better qualified for that kind of service.

I am not going to argue the need of conscription. The government have admitted it; the minister spoke of that need the other day. Innumerable resolutions have been sent to the government by the Canadian Legion, associated boards of trade, public meetings, and so on. I should like to read one such resolution which was passed in my own district, when the proclamation in connection with speeding up recruiting was read. Upon my soul, I honestly thought that proclamation was going to say the government had decided to come out for conscription, but when it was read it contained only a stereotyped appeal for recruits. Then and there that meeting passed the resolution I am about to read, and it was not the only gathering of the kind that unanimously adopted a resolution of this sort, though I believe at one meeting there was one dissenting voice. This is the resolution:

> That this meeting of . . . citizens, having heard read the proclamation of the Hon. Mr. Ralston, Minister of Defence, do entirely endorse and support the appeal made for increased recruiting, but we are of the opinion that the needs of Canada and of the British empire today call for conscription of men and of money, and for control of industry.

Almost everyone who has been over to England and who has seen the conditions existing there comes back and talks along the same line. There was a very good article in the newspaper only the other day by Mr. Grattan O'Leary, the well-known journalist, who is a very able man. The Minister of National Defence knows it is necessary.

What I said about gasoline also applies in this case. There is a small percentage of our people who will go and do their duty if it is only hinted that their services are needed.

There is another small percentage who will go only if they are forced to go. Then there is the huge majority who are anxious and willing to go but who will not go unless it is made universal, and I agree with them. Why should they go and make Canada safe for some foreigners who are taking their jobs while they are away? If paying taxes were made optional I would not pay a cent. I pay taxes now because I know it is universal, and everyone is treated in the same way. Increase taxes if necessary; I will not object. Have forced loans if necessary, as was proposed in Australia; they will apply to all. After all, what does conscription mean? It means that we must all do our best, according to our ability, for the common good. That is loyalty; that is democracy; that is necessity and above all it is plain common sense. It is not patriotism; it is common sense, because if Germany wins what are our bonds or properties worth? If Germany wins we will not talk about liberties, because the liberties will be non-existent. Universal service will take many men out of jobs that could be handled by women; and government control, if it took active, vigorous steps, could release many more men.

Go round this town—it is a comparatively small one—and count the number of milk routes. Count how many milk men go into any one apartment house. There may be fifteen or more, when one would do the work equally well—and a great deal cheaper. Look at the delivery trucks operated by gasoline and driven by men—sometimes two men—which have to go a quarter of a mile to deliver a pound of butter to some careless housewife who did not think of getting butter until an hour before meal time.

All these things could be applied to release an enormous number of men for service, universal service—I do not say overseas service, necessarily, because many men are needed in industry. There is universal service in England, Australia, New Zealand and the United States, but not in Canada. Why not? The anti-British element in the United States, the Lindberghs, are taking advantage of the situation, and are pointing out that while they are being conscripted Canadians are not.

At present we have in Canada a large standing army in training—standing looking at each other. If the service were universal they would be satisfied to go where they are most needed. A moment ago I quoted from a labour paper, and I shall quote from it again.

[Mr. Neill.]

The writer was speaking about gasoline, and asked what we were waiting for. Then he wrote this further sentence, which will be appreciated by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce):

> With conscription it is the same; the people are prepared to go twice as far and three times as fast as their government has up to now demanded.

This is published by organized labour. I quote again:

> The question of conscription involves the larger and much more vital one of using all our resources to the best advantage.

"All our resources"—men, machinery and so on. Then again:

> .We want to survive as a people. We are fighting this war to be able to settle our own affairs in our own way, we and our children after us. We are willing to pay the price—any price. Why are our leaders afraid to ask the price that we, the people, are willing to pay? Let us have conscription by all means: all-out conscription for an all-out effort. . . . We want conscription of men for war; and we want them to have the tools to work with. We want conscription of those tools along with the men. We do not see why the tools should be exempted when our boys are taken.

As I say, this is not alone the opinion of some soldiers' body; or of big industrial concerns; it is the opinion also of the working people of Canada who are in organized labour. They so express themselves. If this rule—it was not a rule, but rather an ultimatum—by which we talk, but may not move anything in this committee, had not been enforced, I would have moved a resolution to test the feeling of the house. But as it is being enforced, the hon. member for Parkdale and myself will have to be content—very poorly content—by simply expressing our views in the matter. I suppose we will have to leave it to a larger parliament, a larger expression of the people. It is regrettable however that in a matter of so much importance we should not be allowed to take action. It is idle to suggest that it is not a prominent and vital question today in Canada. Go to any street corner, or to any place where a body of people is meeting, and we find that the question is discussed. They are ready for an all-out effort, and an all-out effort can be obtained only by universal conscription of us all—as this article said, of us all—working for the common good.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Chairman, it seems that as a basis for the discussion of this important problem we should consider the three Canadian acts of parliament concerning conscription.

First there is the Militia Act, chapter 132 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. Section 64 of that act reads:

> The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

This is the Cartier act, which was amended by Sir Wilfrid Laurier after the Transvaal war by adding the words "for the defence thereof" in the third line.

Since then the only amendment to the act, although the present act does not specifically mention the Militia Act, is chapter 21 of the Statutes of Canada for 1932-33, the title of which reads as follows:

> An act to make provision with respect to forces of his majesty from other parts of the British commonwealth or from a colony when visiting the Dominion of Canada; and with respect to the exercise of command and discipline when forces of his majesty from different parts of the commonwealth are serving together; and with respect to the attachment of members of one such force to another such force, and with respect to deserters from such forces.

This act was passed when Mr. Bennett was in power, and was given royal assent on April 12, 1933.

The second conscription act, known as the Military Service Act, 1917, was passed by the Borden government. The purpose of that act is approximately the same as that of the preceding one, with the exception of an inversion of phraseology respecting the aim or purpose of the act.

Then, the third conscription act is the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, assented to on June 21, 1940. Section 2 of that act is as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

Then, section 3 states:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

The marginal note for section 3 reads: "Limitation in respect of service overseas."

When the resolution preceding the bill from which this act followed was submitted to the house I remember well that the leader of the opposition then said it constituted one of his suggestions which had been adopted; therefore at the time he was satisfied with the legislation, and believed that it was a step forward. I am not quoting him verbatim, but I believe that is the effect of what he said.

It would seem therefore that there are three conscription acts on the statute books of Canada. The first two, namely, the Cartier act, as amended by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the Borden act, are altogether different from the one passed last year for the defence of Canada. That is evidently the reason why the mobilization act was passed. The aim and purpose of that act is the defence of Canada, and everyone agrees with that principle.

There is another feature which must be considered, namely the exemptions which appear in each of the acts. Section 9 of the Militia Act enumerates the following exemptions:

> 9. The following persons only shall be exempt from liability from service in the militia:—
> Members of the King's Privy Council for Canada;
> Judges of all courts of justice;
> Members of the executive councils of provinces;
> Deputy ministers of the federal and provincial governments;
> Clergy and ministers of all religious denominations;
> Telegraph clerks in actual employment;
> Officers and clerks regularly employed in the collection of the revenue;
> Wardens and officers of all public prisons and lunatic asylums;
> Members of the naval militia;
> Members of the police force and fire brigade permanently employed in incorporated cities, towns and villages;
> Professors in colleges and universities, and teachers in religious orders;
> Persons disabled by bodily or mental infirmity;
> The only son of a widow, being her only support;
> Pilots and apprentice pilots during the season of navigation;
> Persons who, from the doctrines of their religion, are averse to bearing arms or rendering personal military service, under such conditions as are prescribed.

That last exemption I find absurd.

But there is something else, which I find in section 24, subsection 2, which reads:

> If there are inscribed on the militia roll more than one son belonging to the same family residing in the same house, only one of such sons shall be drawn, unless the number of names so inscribed is insufficient to complete the required proportion of service men.

There is a further provision in section 25 regarding the regulations. Subsection 2 of section 25 provides:

Any man balloted and notified for service, may, at any time, be exempt until again required in his turn to serve, by furnishing an acceptable substitute, on or before the day fixed for his appearance.

We heard some time ago about the selective draft, selection by ballot. But here an opportunity is given to a man to provide a substitute for himself in the army. This is unjust, because it gives a privilege to the rich man over the poor man. It is unfair, and it is probably the reason why some well-to-do people are advocating the selective draft. It gives an advantage to the rich over the poor.

Now I turn to the Borden act, the conscription act of 1917. This is based on the British military service act of 1916, chapters 5 and 6, George V. The phraseology of the two acts is precisely the same as respects exemptions. Section 11 of the Canadian act of 1917 is as follows:

At any time before a date to be fixed in the proclamation mentioned in section four an application may be made by or in respect of any man in the class or subclass called out by such proclamation to a local tribunal established in the province in which such man ordinarily resides for a certificate of exemption on any of the following grounds:

(a) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should instead of being employed in military service be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged;

(b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should instead of being employed in military service be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications;

(c) That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained;

(d) That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;

(e) Ill health or infirmity;

(f) That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect on the sixth day of July, 1917, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs; and if any of the grounds of such application be established, a certificate of exemption shall be granted to such man.

That is the Borden law, and I object to paragraph (f) just cited for the same reason that I objected to the last exemption provided by section 9 of the Militia Act. I do not believe that Doukhobors, Mennonites and conscientious objectors should enjoy exemption from military service. This may be the feeling also of quite a number of members, although I do not speak for them; I am speaking for myself alone.

The main difference between the mobilization act of 1940 and the two previous acts which I have cited is that there is no provision in the mobilization act of 1940 for exemption, but a free hand is given to the governor in council to pass regulations enumerating possible exemptions. Parliament did not legislate upon these exemptions, which by virtue of the act itself were to be framed by the governor in council. What are the exemptions provided by virtue of the regulations that were passed by order in council some time after this house was adjourned and when there were very few members of parliament in this city? Section 6 of the National War Services Regulations, 1940 (Recruits) provides:

The following persons shall be excepted from being called out:—

(a) Judges of superior, district or county courts of justice;

(b) Members of the clergy or religious orders;

(c) Regular clergymen or ministers of religious denominations;

(d) Members of the naval, military or air forces of Canada on active service and cadets entered at the Royal Military College of Canada;

(e) Permanently employed members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of provincial police forces;

(f) In the discretion of the board, permanently employed members of police forces and fire brigades, wardens and officers of penitentiaries, prisons and lunatic asylums, or mental hospitals.

Those are the only exemptions. The exemptions provided for by the Borden act are not mentioned in these regulations. They were completely set aside.

There is another exemption, although it is not mentioned in section 6 of the regulations, and that is that when a man is suffering from ill-health or is unfit for service he may be put in a class where he will not have to serve or will serve only in this country.

There are four classes of exemptions provided in the regulations against which I strongly protest. Three of them are not mentioned exactly as exemptions but are spoken of as adjournments. The first exemption is not even mentioned as an adjournment. But the phraseology of the regulations gives a certain advantage to a certain class of British citizens who have not to comply with the regulations as every Canadian-born or Canadian-domiciled citizen must do. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said rightly, speaking in March and again in September, 1939, that a British citizen enjoyed the same rights in England as in Canada. I have a French translation of his remarks here, but I will give in English the substance of his remarks. He said that we have the same national status as England; a British subject in Canada is also a British subject in London and anywhere else in the British commonwealth, and a British subject in England is also a British subject in Canada. I fully agree. That is true.

There is something else. It is that the regulations apply to all British subjects who reside ordinarily in Canada, and the regulations are so drafted that the interpretation will be that they apply only to Canadians who have their domicile here and not to those who come here for the duration of the war. It means that all young English babies, blonde and beautiful, of military age, twenty years old and over, who come to Canada are not supposed in virtue of these regulations to get into military service. Apparently it means that it would be bad manners to enlist them as conscripts, as draftees; and they may come here—I do not speak of guest children, I refer to those of military age—they may come to this haven of security, Canada, those who are British citizens and to whom these regulations should apply, and they can get any jobs because they are not ordinarily residents of Canada; they are here only "for the duration." They can take the jobs that the young boys who are domiciled in Canada have to leave when the time of enlistment comes. A young man who is born in Canada and who does useful work here has to get into the army, while a young Englishman who is fortunate enough to find passage on a clipper or boat and come here has no trouble at all. It is well known what happened in Montreal in a store not long ago, when an aged mother who had two sons in the army, one of whom is now missing, was served by a young "bloke": she asked him where he had come from, and he said, "I have come from England, and I have fine connections." She threw her parcel in his face and left the store, very indignant. I do not know why we do things like that. If we are all British citizens we should be under the same law, and there should be no exception for those of military age who come here from the British isles for the duration of the war. That is my first point.

Mr. BROOKS: And a very weak one.

Mr. POULIOT: My second point is that there should be no exemption for Mennonites and Doukhobors. They came here some years ago and were granted privileges through orders in council passed in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But there was then no thought of a war like this. When we speak about the difficulties that some people may have, we are answered that these are not ordinary times. If these times are not ordinary times for Canadian-born British subjects, I do not see why they should be different for Mennonites, Doukhobors, and conscientious objectors. After all, the same law should apply to all, except when it is a matter of public interest to give exemption to some Canadian citizen who otherwise would suffer a serious handicap because of this draft —as was specified in the Borden act.

The fourth class of exemptions against which I protest very strongly is that of conscientious objectors. I do not see why a man should be exempted just because he says, "My conscience forbids me to abide by the law." It is one of the absurdities of the English legislation as well as of the Canadian legislation. Why should a man have the right to defy the law in such a fashion? I wonder if there is a single hon. member of this committee who would seriously say that, because England has given that privilege to conscientious objectors, we should give it to them here. If a man within a certain period mentions to the registrar that his conscience forbids him to get into the army and carry on, he may be exempted during the entire period of the war. I cannot understand it.

There is another thing that I cannot understand. It is that, in virtue of the first draft of the regulations which I am discussing, Doukhobors, Mennonites, and conscientious objectors were entitled to an indefinite postponement of their draft; and now the word "indefinite" is left out; but they enjoy the indefinite postponement just the same. As a consequence, if a man is a Doukhobor, a Mennonite, or a conscientious objector, he will not serve in the army for the whole time of the war. Is it fair? No sir, it is not fair.

There is something else. It is that, for that privilege, that exemption—I call it an exemption because it can be given by only one of the commissioners—for Canadian-born citizens who are neither Doukhobors, Mennonites, conscientious objectors, or the Canadian who is not a "bloke", a quorum of two commissioners of the three is required for a short postponement not exceeding six months. To my mind that is unfair and unjust.

It is unfair that Mennonites and Doukhobors are exempted, not because they are good farmers—it has to be proved that they are good farmers—not in the public interest, but just because they are sectarian. They do not belong to a religion; they belong to a sect. As to these Mennonites who were called at one time "the peaceful Anabaptists", theirs is a long story. I will cut it short. But do you not think that there is discrimination in provisions like that?

I find another absurdity in the first draft of the national war services regulations of 1940. It is this:

Seasonal employees. In the case of men engaged in—

Fishing, lumbering, trapping or——any seasonal occupation, the board may make advancement orders or postponement orders as may seem best in the public interest. Provided however that every man in an age class called out for training in the twelve months period shall, notwithstanding any postponement order, be called out for training during some one of the training periods held during the said twelve months period.

What I find absurd is that in this first draft farming is regarded as a seasonal occupation, whereas everyone knows that, in our part of the country at any rate, it is work that lasts the year round. The farmer has to begin his work each day before the sun rises and he does not stop until after sunset. Therefore the first draft of these regulations shows complete ignorance of the life of the farming communities in eastern Canada. Of course, in our part of the country farming is entirely different from what it is in the west. In the west the mechanics who grow wheat put gasoline in their tractors in June and take off the tractors in September and then they may grow oranges in California. That is not the sort of farming that eastern Canadian farmers engage in, and probably this is true also of British Columbia. I know they work hard in British Columbia. I honour that province by putting it on the same footing as eastern Canada in this regard.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the hon. member ever spent any time in the west, either during the summer or in winter, so as to understand the real conditions under which the western farmer works?

Mr. POULIOT: I will say to my hon. friend that if the western farmer does as much as he does in the house he must have lots of leisure.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He does not get much for it.

Mr. POULIOT: The west is now following the good example of the east by engaging in mixed farming. That shows great progress and I congratulate them. If my hon. friends have anything else to say in reply I shall be delighted to hear them in due course, though they know very well that I have no wish to say anything offensive to them.

There is a change in the phraseology of section 14 of the consolidation. I quote:

14 (1) Each divisional registrar shall deliver to the board in his administrative division copies of all registration cards in his possession upon which it is indicated that the men registered are engaged in farming, fishing, lumbering, trapping, mining, placer mining, gold prospecting, seafaring, railroad transportation or other seasonal occupation.

My western friends may be under the impression that in the east and in British Columbia the farmers who have cattle and horses put their animals in the trunks of trees to hibernate as bears do in the winter, and leave them there without caring for them. They may think that the animals spend the winter the same as bears and other wild creatures do. That is not so. These hon. gentlemen do not know the problems of the east—and again, I do not say that in any offensive spirit. I make that statement to inform them that my care has been to keep the ministers in touch with conditions by sending to each of them certain articles that were published each week in a publication put out in my home town, in order to inform the ministers of the situation so far as agriculture is concerned, and of the deficiencies in the regulations with respect to farmers.

The farmers have a good deal of work to do in winter. They have to do the fall ploughing, they have to look after the grain, they have ditches to dig and wood to cut—not only kindling for the house but wood for buildings and repair purposes; they must put manure on the land, and so forth. All that is done in the winter. Sometimes they have to carry milk long distances to the butter or cheese factory, and they have to look after fences and maintain the roads in the winter. They have all these things to do. I find it strange therefore that farming should be regarded as seasonal employment. It is also strange to find railway transportation treated in the same way. The railways are working at capacity, both the large companies, as well as some of the smaller lines, in order to carry freight, passengers and soldiers to eastern or western ports, not only in winter when navigation ceases but all the year round. Often conditions are aggravated by war traffic, and never before has the work of the railway men been so heavy. I do not know how it can be called a seasonal occupation. That is why I wish to congratulate the present Minister of National War Services on the timely change he adopted on October 4, by order in council P.C. 7680. These occupations are no longer referred to as seasonal occupations; they are mentioned as seasonal and essential occupations. Subsections 1 and 2 read:

(1) When considering any application made in accordance with section 10 hereof, the board before which the application is made shall have power to grant an advancement or postponement order when it is of the opinion that it is in the national interest to do so and, in granting such order, the board shall state the reasons for such opinion. No postponement order may be made for more than six months, but, upon reviewing the application, the board may grant one or more extensions; provided that the board may cancel the order at any time for military reasons or for cause: Provided further that there shall be no exemption and no indefinite postponement of military training or service.

(2) When considering an application for postponement order by a man engaged in farming, fishing, lumbering, trapping, mining, placer mining, gold prospecting, seafaring, railroad transportation, public utility, or engaged in an occupation which the minister has declared to be a seasonal occupation or one essential to the successful prosecution of the war or in the national interest, the board shall take into account the supply of labour available, and the importance of the particular applicant's occupation to the national economy.

This is important, because what I understand by conscription is mobilization as defined by the Prime Minister and by members of the cabinet when the bill was before the house last year. It means total war, a total war effort; that is to say, that each one who makes an effort that serves the country best should be in the right place to make that effort. And nobody should have any objection to it, provided that the necessary distinctions are made in due course. What I complain of bitterly is the kind of propaganda that we have from the information bureau. There is one kind for English-speaking Canadians and another and altogether different kind for the French-Canadians of Quebec. I cannot understand it. We are all Canadians. I am not strong for the word "unity"; I rather think the word "union" is better. It means union of souls, union of human beings, union of minds for a common purpose, but "unity" is used of inanimate things. As it is accepted now and as we speak of national unity, national unity would be much better served if there were no Chinese wall around the province of Quebec in regard to propaganda. I fully agree with what was said by the hon. member for Broadview last Friday; it would be much better to dispense with such propaganda.

I am not a communist and I take the Russian propaganda with a grain of salt. Nevertheless the propaganda we have just received from Russia about fascism is the best propaganda I have ever read since the beginning of the war. It puts us to shame that the Russians are writing better war propaganda than our information bureau. I would like that bureau to be abolished. My idea would be to have all speeches delivered in both languages, and for those who cannot speak one of the official languages of the country a translation of the speech should be given on the French network at the same time the talk is given over the English network.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Why not broadcast the speeches of the house?

Mr. POULIOT: I regret I did not hear the hon. member.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): I have to inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Like many others, having come to Ottawa after four and a half months' adjournment I am very much disappointed with the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in which he did not mention Canada or our war effort at all. We are certainly being reduced to government by order in council; in fact parliament has been reduced to a sounding board for the government. Last spring a committee on war expenditures was set up. A very grave charge was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) with reference to the heating plant in a cordite factory there. The minister said the place to make these charges was before that committee. But the terms of reference were not broad enough for the committee to consider the matter. The hon. member charged that this heating equipment would result in a waste of $200,000 a year, yet the question could not be investigated by the committee. That makes the committee a complete farce in the minds of the people of this country.

Referring to gasoline, it is evident that little thought was given to the agricultural population of western Canada when that order in council was passed. Imagine in harvest time the people of western Canada, to whom the former speaker referred as mechanical producers, having to stop their harvesting operations on a sunny afternoon in order to go to the nearest trading centre to obtain gasoline. Surely that was not in the interest of the national effort, to say nothing of the hardship to the individual.

In connection with gasoline I have received a letter from a man at Castlegar, British Columbia, in which he said:

With the new gasoline restrictions in effect it has brought to my mind the fact that the Toronto Star Weekly several months back ran a series of articles on a carburettor that was capable of delivering up to three hundred miles to the gallon of gasoline. This carburettor, invented by a Winnipeg man, according to the Star was proved out on a run from Winnipeg to Vancouver and was very successful. As I understand it the rights to this carburettor were purchased by some large oil company and retired from the public eye, to the financial interest of the oil company concerned.

My idea is that if the present administration was to introduce legislation compelling individuals or companies who hold patent rights on inventions that can be used to the advantage of Canada, to release these rights to the country for whatever remuneration a board of arbitration should decide.

In the case of the above mentioned carburettor, it would make the present gasoline restrictions unnecessary, or if it was used only on our war machines it would be a wonderful contribution to our war effort. Don't you think so?

I know something of a carburettor invented in Winnipeg by a Mr. Pogue. I witnessed some of the experiments there. I do not know what became of it, but rumours were rife that some large oil company had bought it. I trust the minister will look into that for the benefit of this committee.

Like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I am sorry that we have not the opportunity to move resolutions in this committee. Certainly our efforts have been very much circumscribed. The discussion of national selective service would be timely, and I cannot understand the Prime Minister's interpretation a little while ago that discussion must be confined to one department, because certainly the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Minister of Agriculture and the ministers of national defence are vitally concerned in this matter and should be working together in close coordination.

I was elected as opposed to conscription, but I was careful at that time to point to my experience in the last war and to say that if the unexpected happened we should then give the matter further consideration. I do not think there is any hon. member who will not admit that the unexpected has happened since March, 1940, with the fall of France and many other countries.

We have heard much about an all-out war effort, but I venture to say that not fifty per cent, probably not over thirty-five per cent of our possibilities are being exerted in an all-out war effort.

I believe there is a great deal of misunderstanding of what national selective service means. It is not a matter of taking all the men off the farms. Many men who have enlisted from the farms would under this scheme be left on the farms where they properly should be. Key executive men have been taken from industry who should have been left there. I doubt whether many of us appreciate the brief placed before the government by the Canadian Legion. I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune:

The Canadian Legion and Man-Power

Attempts have been made to show that proponents of an all-out war programme for Canada want to conscript vast numbers of soldiers at the expense of Canada's industrial effort. This is nonsense. . . .

In particular, the Canadian Legion does not propose mobilization of Canadian man-power simply to increase the armed forces. It demands, rather, that mobilization of man-power should be undertaken immediately in order that our resources of man-power may be used for our needs, whether in the field of agriculture or industry or in the fighting services.

Here is the main plank in the legion's call for "total war". It takes the form of a statement presented to Prime Minister King by the dominion executive of the legion on October 21, calling upon the Prime Minister to institute all necessary measures to place Canada on a total war footing. The legion specifically said:

By "total war" the legion means:

(a) Immediate, complete and scientific mobilization, organization and utilization of all our resources—spiritual, intellectual, natural, financial, agricultural, industrial, man-power—in such manner that Canada may be geared to produce essential foods and munitions and to wage war to her maximum capacity.

(b) The services of all men and women to be employed to the best and most useful effect, according to the age, training, physical capacity and ability of the individual;

(c) By an intelligent extension of the principles contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act and by the elimination of the provisions restricting service to Canada only—our armed forces in Canada and overseas, including reserves and reinforcements, to be maintained at the highest possible strength, consistent with our industrial and other requirements;

(d) An equitable division of the burden of service, sacrifice, contribution and effort among all our people to be the basic principle underlying this "total war" policy;

(e) The cumulative results of this "total effort" to be devoted to the single purpose of destroying the enemy.

That is a reasonable programme. It is also one which the public of Canada at large can support.

As The Tribune has said, again and again, the issue . . . is the issue of mobilizing all our man-power—not simply a matter of sending men overseas. The Legion clearly recognizes this. The public feels it instinctively and is coming to recognize it more and more clearly. The chief laggard is the dominion government which still refuses to face certain realities that the man in the street has long accepted.

There was some difference of opinion between our various ministers of defence the other day; but I was very sorry to see the presentation of the Minister of National Defence made the subject matter of an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of November 7, headed: "Mr. Ralston's Proud Speech; Mr.

Ralston's False Speech." Those of us who are returned men have a very great respect for the Minister of National Defence as a fine soldier. This editorial goes on to state that the minister was not speaking his own mind, that it was a matter of cabinet solidarity. At this time, after all that has happened, as one soldier to another might I suggest that he shake off the cloak of political expediency and cabinet solidarity, and really face the critical national situation in which we find ourselves. This is not a matter that affects his department alone. He made the suggestion that some consideration was given to industry in connection with men enlisting in the army. The minister for air, who followed him, said he did not agree with that statement, that he made no exemptions whatever but took holus-bolus all those who offered their services.

I believe the situation overseas is much more critical than many people throughout Canada realize. I am sure everyone who has gone overseas, who has had free access to industrial centres throughout the British isles, who has spoken off the record with that great inspirational leader, Mr. Churchill, agrees that the situation is so critical that it should not be made a matter of political expediency at this time. We are all vitally concerned with this matter, and I am sure we have all received wires and letters during the last few days from many of the most outstanding organizations in the country, from town councils, rural municipalities, boards of trade, the Canadian Legion, all urging this government to take some action before the end of this session of parliament. Certainly the step we are urging is most timely, and I think will be supported by all the citizens of Canada once they properly understand it. I know many young men who feel they should be in the armed forces but who make the plain statement that if this government has not the courage of its convictions, why should they offer their services. These men reason that the government knows more about the situation than they know; and, while I cannot give you the exact phrases they use, they say if the members of the government are prepared to do what is required of them, in the office they hold, then the young men are prepared to make any sacrifice that may be necessary.

I hope therefore that due consideration will be given by the government at once to instituting national selective service at this time, in the interests of people in all walks of life; for I am sure many ministers realize what their duty requires of them in the present situation.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Chairman, together with all other hon. members I listened carefully as the ministers made their reports; and those I did not hear I have read. While in the main they give a very good story of what Canada is trying to do, I am sorry to say that we have no yardstick with which to measure what we are attempting as compared with what is being done in other parts of the empire, in order that we may convince ourselves that we are doing our fair share. Certainly the general public throughout Canada are convinced that we are not doing our share. I cannot say whether or not we are, unless I compare our efforts with those of other parts of the empire.

I listened attentively to the report of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). He is the one man in the cabinet, I believe, who really knows—I should not say anything—very much about manufacturing, and he tells a very good story of what is being done in the manufacturing plants of Canada. I should like to refer briefly to some things I have observed myself; for I, too, have visited perhaps fifty to seventy-five of the large plants of this country. I need refer only to one or two items to which the minister also referred. He spoke about guns and shells. As Canadians I believe we should be proud of what has been done by certain manufacturers in this country in the production of lathes to make shells. I am told that the John T. Hepburn company of Toronto, which now employs about four thousand men in several plants, has produced lathes which are now used in the manufacture of more than half the shells used on the British side. I have frequently seen ten to fifteen carloads of these great lathes being shipped to Australia, south Africa, India, Egypt and elsewhere. As a Canadian I am proud that such a genius as John Hepburn is a resident of this country during this great war. I know he has received commendation from the British government; I do not know whether he has received any commendation from the Canadian government. Recently he produced what is said to be the first satisfactory lathe in the world capable of drilling gun barrels from both ends at the same time, which enables these gun barrels to be produced in much less time than is required in other plants throughout the world. These lathes are now being produced in quantity and are being supplied to Canadian companies making various sizes of gun barrels.

The minister also said something about tanks and ships. I think he should have given the official opposition some credit for spurring the government into the production of tanks in this country. I remember that when the subject was under discussion a year ago, as one who was connected with steel and iron manufacturing for many years I said this country could produce every component part required in the production of tanks. We can do what the Australians can do. They have produced tank manufacturing plants. Not only that, they have had to produce their own tools with which to make their tanks. On the other hand Canada had to the south of it a great republic from which to purchase machine tools, and could obtain a supply in addition to the vast number we make ourselves.

Whether the minister gave credit or not, as a member of the official opposition I am going to take some credit to that group for the fact that we are now producing tanks, guns and steel ships in Canada. In doing that I do not detract from the minister, nor do I suggest that he has not exercised his best efforts to see that these things are being done. My only point is that the official opposition had a good deal to say about each of those products before they were made in Canada.

I am going to speak briefly concerning what was said by each of the ministers, because I do not expect to be here to-morrow or the next day. For that reason, if I may be permitted I should like to make a statement at this time. Some observations have been made respecting labour. Having been connected with labour for at least a quarter of a century, I do not yield to any member of the house, no matter what his party may be, or no matter where he comes from, in my loyalty to labour and its rights. I, myself, was a labour man—not with my tongue but with my hands and head.

I was disappointed in the report of a recent speech by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) as it was reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of October 8, 1941. The minister is reported as follows:

> Speaking of labour Mr. Crerar said there is a widespread feeling in Canada that responsible Canadian labour leaders failed in leadership.

The responsible labour leaders I know are Tom Moore, A. R. Mosher, R. Y. Menary, Raoul Trepanier, John Kelly and John Noble. These are outstanding labour leaders, and I have not read anywhere that those leaders have done anything less than their utmost to maintain order in the unions throughout Canada. There may be the odd one who could be placed in the class referred to by the minister, but he would not be as outstanding as the men whose names I have mentioned.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacINNIS: It is the government that has failed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well—

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member need not agree.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am only commenting on a statement made by the Minister of Mines and Resources. Perhaps he did not mean to make it—I have said things which I would have withdrawn, had I been given the chance. I try, however, to be as careful as I can.

I worked at arduous labour for many years, and stated long ago the rights to which I believed labour was entitled. I am conversant with what this country undertook when it signed the treaty of Versailles, which is now "washed up". Nevertheless, the labour articles adopted under the Versailles treaty were good. Their principles were, in brief, (a) that labour should not be regarded as a commodity or article of commerce, and (b) that there should be a right enjoyed by employers and employees to set up associations.

I believe that those are proper principles, and I cannot for the life of me understand why those associations, under proper guidance, could not sit down and iron out their disputes. Both employers and employees have rights. Many people take objection to the term "collective bargaining", but I do not look upon the procedure as one of collective bargaining. Rather, I consider it collective representation. If sincere men representing labour and sincere men representing industry sit down round a common table, as is taking place all across this country to-day in many shops where disputes have arisen, I believe many of our troubles could be ironed out. In my opinion it is the duty of the government to wash out those troubles.

Without casting any reflection on any member of the cabinet, I cannot help thinking that if in Canada we had a minister of labour like Bevin in England, a man since the beginning of his life seized with the rights of labour, we would be able to iron out our difficulties in a more satisfactory manner.

It will be understood that in what I say I am not singling out that estimable gentleman who is at present responsible for the Department of Labour. I am pleased that the department has seen fit to employ a man who formerly sat in the house. I refer to Mr. Humphrey Mitchell. I met Mr. Mitchell in different places across Canada during the past summer, when he was engaged in the adjustment of labour disputes. When I met him last, in the city of Winnipeg, he and others associated with him were successful in bringing about a settlement. I would expect that of Mr. Mitchell, because he has been a labour man—and I do not refer to "labour" in the political sense. I am referring to Mr. Mitchell as a worker, one who has worked hard all through his life. As a matter of fact, I believe he was in a line of business similar to that in which I was engaged.

During the past summer I made some investigations in respect of plants where they were having trouble. I am convinced that in some of the plants in Toronto in which there have been strikes the cause can be traced to the government's own plant in that city. In Toronto the government has a large plant employing several thousands. I believe the employees in that plant are treated exceptionally well. I am informed that cost of production in the government plant is not all important, because the operators receive a certain percentage above costs. On the other hand a private plant cannot operate on that basis. It has not the government behind it to guarantee that there will be no loss. It must sharpen its pencil, and figure out costs. Government plants do not have to do that. While I am in hearty accord with the government's setting an example of good wages, reasonable hours, and so on, it must be understood that every other plant cannot operate on the same basis.

Therefore, if the government intends to prevent strikes in other plants which cannot operate in a similar manner, certainly it should try to prevent strikes by providing a sufficiently large cost of living bonus for the men and women working in private plants. I am strongly in favour of adequate return for adequate service. If privately owned companies could operate on the same basis as government plants, they would be able to do what those government plants are now doing.

Something has been said about oil. I am not going to speak at length at this time on that subject, but I purpose doing so at the next session. On that occasion, after travel during the summer which extended over fifteen thousand miles, I intend to set out a programme of national rehabilitation. I should like, however, to make one or two observations in advance about oil. The minister presented the problem clearly. I cannot forget one salient circumstance, namely that several million German soldiers are hastening as fast as they can toward the Caucasus, the Russian oil fields, principally centred round Batum. In that area about 218,000,000 barrels are produced each year. If the Caucasus are taken, what is to stop the Germans from taking Iraq and Iran, where about 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 barrels are produced? They already have the Rumanian fields, where about 40,000,000 barrels are produced. If they were successful in obtaining the three other fields I have mentioned, they would have all the oil required to fight a war for any length of time they might wish to fight it.

The largest producer of oil is the United States, which produces more than all other countries of the world put together. The United States produces 1,350,000,000 barrels of oil a year. Canada produces just a little over 8,000,000 barrels a year. I remember, before the war broke out, hearing or reading, or both, that the German government or someone associated with it had applied to Canada—I do not remember how—for the right to run a pipeline from an oil field in Canada to the Pacific coast. I cannot think for one second that they had the Turner valley oil field in mind. The Turner valley is a really fine oil field, well managed and with an excellent plant, as good as any in the world. I was through it and was greatly pleased with what I saw. But its capacity is limited. I remember last session asking the Minister of Mines and Resources if it would be worth while running a pipeline from Turner valley to the Pacific coast, and as I remember, he replied in the negative. Then what part of the country did Hitler or the German government have in mind to run a pipeline from? After a thorough investigation I am convinced that what they had in mind was running a pipeline from the Athabaska river near McMurray at the junction of the Athabaska and Clearwater rivers.

I am quite aware of the fact that there can be an improvement in the method of extracting oil from the oil sands. I also know that the McMurray oil fields are not too far away to run a pipeline from there to Edmonton. On the Athabaska river we have by far the greatest potential oil field in the world. It is said that Canada could produce from there one hundred billion barrels of oil, and United States geologists have put the figure at two hundred and fifty billion barrels of potential oil. There can be improvements made in extraction, although they are doing a very satisfactory job there now. They are producing and shipping oil—I saw it at various mines—seven or eight hundred miles north, and I heard it pronounced as good as the best in the world. If those statements are true, and I know that they are true, and that they are producing oil and doing it fairly rapidly—it takes only three minutes to extract the oil, twenty minutes to get it into the tanks, and seventy minutes to turn it into finished oil; it is said the system of extraction can be improved—therefore I am going to ask the minister between now and the next session of parliament to have his department investigate the possibilities in that region. Oil is perhaps the most important of our munitions requirements, and next year we may have to be shipping vast quantities of oil for the use of the British navy; for it may be—I hope it will not be—impossible for them to get the oil from Iraq or Iran, and there is no other source except the Dutch East Indies, which produces only about sixty million barrels a year; Venezuela, which produces about two hundred million barrels a year, and the United States. Therefore I am going to ask the minister to have his engineers survey that oil field, and if it is found that vast quantities of oil can be produced rapidly, to bring a bill into this house, if necessary, to erect refineries, or support companies that will do it, in the Athabaska river valley or the Peace river valley, for they have a lot of oil there too, with a view to our producing the greatest possible quantity of oil. I quite realize that to do so might result in our having too many refineries after the war. But that is not our problem now. Our problem to-day is to win the war, and then deal with these other problems after the war. If the minister with his energy will undertake to have that field surveyed and the possibilities explored, I hope that he will have something to present to the house next session, when I propose to deal with this question in a much more extended way.

I wish to speak for a moment about maintaining harmony in industry. The government has granted a cost of living bonus—and I am heartily in accord with that step—to certain classes of the civil service which it believes should be granted such a bonus. Certain municipalities have done likewise, also some industrial plants. I hope that some method may be worked out whereby all workers in industry will be granted a cost of living bonus. I should like the present scheme to go further, for the sake of maintaining harmony in this country. I should like to see a cost of living bonus granted to pensioned returned soldiers of the last war and to the dependents of soldiers of this war and the great war, and further I should like to see a cost of living bonus granted to those receiving old age pensions. I know that would make a long list, but harmony in war time is essential, and you cannot have harmony if you give a cost of living bonus to this class and that class and leave out other classes. It should be uniform and apply all round.

Mr. FAIR: To the farmers, too?

Mr. MacNICOL: I certainly believe that the farmers are deserving of consideration and I have always been an advocate for them. In fact, I have come to the conclusion, after travelling extensively in the farming areas of the west, that there are places where the farmers should be given a pension for staying on the farm. They do the very best work, and farming is an essential part of our war effort.

I have made a bit of a survey in our retail stores, and I know that when the average working man's wife goes to a merchant on St. Clair avenue in Toronto, the part of the city where I live, but it applies everywhere else, she finds, as I found when I made investigation, that the cost of what she has to buy has gone up on many commodities from forty to sixty per cent. I know that some classes are receiving a small cost of living bonus, but certainly it is not the equivalent of a forty to sixty per cent rise in the price of the necessaries of life which the average housewife has to pay.

I wish to refer to something the Minister for Naval Services (M. Macdonald) said the other day. He said that submarines had been sighted off the coast of Labrador. Last year when I was making a survey along the shores of Hudson bay I talked at Churchill with some of the old residents there, and they told me that when the Eskimos came to Churchill in the summer they had reported seeing igloos floating on the water with a stovepipe sticking out of the top of the igloo. If the Eskimos really saw an igloo with a smoke pipe, if that was not the product of their imagination, it was not an igloo at all but a submarine. I do not for a moment say that submarines have been in there, but on the other hand I see no reason under the sun why they could not get in there. For a submarine to get into Hudson bay, all it has to do is to come west of Greenland, enter a very deep and wide strait—from forty to a hundred miles wide—pass between a few islands at the mouth of Hudson bay, and then it is in that great bay which is almost an ocean by itself. No one can predict what will have happened by this time next year. I have read that in Germany they are producing very large submarines, which will carry aeroplanes, and I have been saying to myself, what will happen if a submarine gets into Hudson bay carrying high-powered bombing planes and releases them somewhere near the south end of the bay? That, I believe, Mr. Chairman, is in your own bailiwick, or not far from the constituency which you represent. A submarine arrving in Hudson bay might release an aeroplane which could make a round trip of a couple of thousand miles and might blow Winnipeg right off the map; the city would have no defence beyond, perhaps, a few anti-aircraft guns. At least I do not know; I hope it has a good many. For that matter, perhaps German submarines might send aeroplanes down to Toronto and blow it off the map; it is not more than 900 to 1,000 miles from the south end of Hudson bay. I hope that the government has provided against events of that kind. I am told that there are aeroplane fields up in that country; I hope there are, and that there is adequate defence of our back-door. But this summer, when I was travelling in that million-square-mile area north of Edmonton, up around the 63rd parallel, I inquired from those who should be informed as to how many mounted policemen were up there, and was told that from the 63rd parallel north there were approximately thirty. I hope there are more than that, in view of the danger from high-powered aeroplanes. Our back-doors in the north are, I trust, properly provided with equipment to shoot off any aeroplanes coming from that direction.

I have just a word or two to say about recruiting. I have travelled a great deal this past summer. I visited various towns where there are military camps, and saw some things which I did not like, and which might be expected under the system under which we are now recruiting men for the army. I was rather alarmed when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made the statement the other day that recruiting had fallen down. I noticed that on Friday last the Hon. Charles Dunning, who sat in this chamber for many years, referred to the matter in these words:

> This is our war. Waiting for it to come to Montreal is the surest way of letting it reach our shores.

On the same occasion, Brigadier-General Panet mentioned the statement of the Minister of National Defence that recruiting in the past months had dropped. That is a serious circumstance. It is not for me to tell the government how it is going to get recruits; that is their responsibility. But I want strongly to emphasize my belief that the government should tell us before we go home how they expect to get the necessary recruits without some system of national compulsory service. I am not going to tell them the system. There are different systems. I am not familiar with the one in use in the United States, nor can I say that I know how the British system operates; but there is a method whereby governments can get recruits, and it should be selective; the men should not be taken holus-bolus. As an industrialist I realize that there are many good men in tank plants, gun plants, screw plants, and factories making all the components which enter into the construction of war munitions who should not be taken into the army. Well, how are you going to keep them out of the army unless you have some system of selection? The same consideration applies to agriculture, in the case of farmers' sons and the like. My investigation showed me that there is something which is not quite right. The Minister of National Defence was quite emphatic the other evening as to the government's objective; he said that the government of Canada is pledged to an all-out war effort, and he then stated that that effort at the moment amounted to the following:

> At the present time we have overseas—

I assume, in England.

> —the first and second divisions, the third division which went overseas in July; the army tank brigade, and thousands of corps and army troops,—

To which, he said, he would refer a little later. Then he added:

> We have in Canada the fifth armoured division, which according to the programme is to go overseas before very long.

Upon being questioned, he added that the total number of men now overseas is 110,000. I have been trying to read up what is being done by other parts of the empire and to make some deductions therefrom, and I found a statement as to the recent campaigns in Greece and Crete. I have not so far come across a statement about the campaign last winter in Libya. But, regarding the Greek and Cretan campaigns, I find that Australia and New Zealand had, in Greece, 33,657 men and in Crete, some 13,550 troops, or a total of 47,207.

Mr. POWER: You did not add the two together, did you?

Mr. MacNICOL: The troops engaged in Greece and in Crete were partly, but not wholly the same. The Crete totals at the start of the fighting included men evacuated from Greece but not reevacuated to Egypt before the Crete operations. I have not been able to separate the numbers who were taken out of Greece into Crete; certainly not all of them were, because the numbers in Crete were very much smaller than those engaged in Greece. At all events, taking the situation of Greece alone, it is clear that there were 33,657 Australians and New Zealanders, of whom 5,234 were killed, wounded, or missing—captured or otherwise. Then, of the numbers of Australian and New Zealand troops who had been in Greece and went to Crete, plus any others, the loss in Crete was 6,100; a total of 11,334. If you deduct those as casualties from a total of 33,657, the losses amount to approximately thirty-three and a third per cent.

Mr. POWER: Is it the purpose of my hon. friend to show that we should have casualties?

Mr. MacNICOL: No, no. I might ask the minister the same question; is it his purpose in enlisting young men to go into the air force to have casualties?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knows it is foolish to ask questions like that. I agree that he is just as much interested as I am in seeing that the war is conducted as it should be; perhaps his concern is greater because he knows so much more about the responsibility.

Mr. POWER: But why the comparison? The comparison seems to be intended to show that there is something wrong with us because we do not get our men killed.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister will just possess himself in patience for a minute or two, I shall ask him a question based on these figures. If we take the figure for Greece, there were 33,657 Australians and New Zealanders there, and of those who were in Greece and in Crete, according to this statement published on August 7 by the Canadian Press, from London, the total loss was 11,334. Let me ask the minister this question. If these had been Canadian troops, by what method would the government have provided the men to take the places of those who were lost?

Mr. POWER: Probably by the same method that is followed in Australia. It is exactly the same as we have here.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister makes that statement, then I will ask him why it is that in Canada the men recruited are so much less in number comparatively than in Australia.

Mr. POWER: I am not prepared to admit that either.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am prepared to prove it.

Mr. POWER: I wish the hon. member would.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will prove it by quotations. I do not know that it is true, but on November 8 the statement appeared in News of Toronto that in Australia there were 532,000 men under arms and 250,000 more at home, or 782,000. They have 170,000 in munition plants.

Mr. POWER: Is my hon. friend able to break down those figures?

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will try to make out that we are doing the best we can, and I have not said that we are not.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. POWER: I am asking the hon. member to break down the figures and tell us how many there are in home defence.

Mr. MacNICOL: The statement is that 532,000 men have enlisted for active service.

Mr. POWER: Overseas?

Mr. MacNICOL: How otherwise does the minister suppose that they had troops at Singapore, in Iran and Iraq, and in Libya, as well as in Greece and Crete? I am surprised that the minister should try to belittle their effort.

Mr. POWER: I am making a distinction between that and fouling our own nest.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not said one word against our own effort. I am as loyal a Canadian as the minister is and I have not said a word to disparage what we are doing, but I do not know how good that effort is or whether it should be better because there is nothing by which a comparison can be made. There is nothing to go on except what we read in the press. I hope that at the next session when the minister makes his statement with regard to Canada's air force he will be quite explicit. Let me say here at once that there are no better aviators in the world than the Canadians and I am sure they will give a good account of themselves wherever they go. Their efforts will shine with glory. I want the minister, however, to tell us next session, if it is in order, how we compare with Australia or with New Zealand in the air.

Mr. POWER: As soon as I get permission to give the official figures from Australia I will give them, but I can tell my hon. friend that they are nothing like those he quoted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not responsible for these quotations; they are dispatches to the press.

Mr. POWER: Why does the hon. member argue on something he knows nothing about?

Mr. MacNICOL: I will say at once, however, that so far as the Canadian Press is concerned, I believe any dispatch it sends out is correct as far as it has the facts. Now that the recruiting effort has been mentioned, may I make this statement after what the Minister of National Defence said. He told us that there were several committees—the civilian committee, the agriculture committee, the industrial committee—all of them working as best they can to persuade young men working in various plants and on farms to enter the service. Let me tell the committee what I saw in connection with this system.

I travelled a good deal last summer, and one evening I saw in front of a hotel in the west two stout, well built men, far beyond the fighting age—they were as old as I am—bulldozing a young man about joining the army. I did not wish to reveal who I was because I thought I might get into trouble, but I certainly do not agree with that system of recruiting. I do not agree with the bulldozing of young men in the street. I cannot endorse that method of intimidation. Young men have a great responsibility, and if they want to enlist, if it is in their hearts, I assume they will volunteer. That has been the British spirit at all times, but I do not believe in the intimidation of young men. May I mention what I was told in one recruiting camp. I do not believe this, but I will tell the committee what I heard. I hope it is wholly untrue. At any rate, I heard that three pieces of paper were handed to a young chap and they would ask him to choose the one he wanted. The blue one said that he would enlist; the white one said that he would consider it and think it over; the yellow paper declared that he was not going to enlist for overseas service at all. I hope there is not a word of truth in that, though I have heard it and I believe others have. If it is true, I am not in accord with it.

I am not going to back up the statement about recruiting falling down. I have here a good many clippings from Pembroke, Winnipeg and across Canada. I am going to take the minister's statement in this regard. The state of affairs being what it is, and taking the loss of our troops in wastage, through sickness, through men being sent home for one reason or another, I would ask this question.

Mr. WARREN: The hon. member has referred to Pembroke. Has he read in the newspapers that the enlistments in the Pembroke district to date are equal to the enlistments in that district for the four years of the last war?

An hon. MEMBER: How does the population compare?

Mr. WARREN: The population is about what it was.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not finding fault with what was done in the Pembroke district. I have no doubt the young men there will enlist as loyally as in any other part of Canada, but I have this statement from the press:

> Pembroke, Oct. 17—(staff)—Concern over a heavy decrease of enlistments in the counties of Lanark and Renfrew during the past week was expressed to-day by Lieut. Purvis, district recruiting officer.

That gentleman may not have had the facts, but that is his statement.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I understand that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) does not wish to speak at this time. I am going to be as brief and as explicit as possible in what I have to say. I rise after listening to the last speaker in his references to recruiting, labour and so on, and I wonder, as I often wonder, when I hear discussions in the house, whether we expect to win the war here; for, as far as I can see, travelling across the country, this is where most of the war effort is being made. One thing that most members fail to recognize is that Canada's largest army to-day is in overalls.

Our greatest requirement is production. While what I have to say may not come directly within the province of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), his department is eventually affected. I wish to call attention to something that I had the privilege of seeing yesterday for myself. From time to time hon. members rise in their places and talk about democracy and the necessity for its preservation, and our democratic way of life, and fine phrases like that, but as far as that army in overalls is concerned anything but democracy is being practised. It is no mystery to me why we are not getting recruits voluntarily. In order to get men to fight they must be assured that they have something to fight for, and for hon. members to rise in their places and use all these fine phrases about democracy does not make it a reality, because democracy is something that is supposed to work in the lives of the people. I draw this to the minister's attention, that there is now developing in the Kirkland Lake area a situation which, if allowed to continue, will have serious repercussions not only in that area but perhaps all across Canada, and will eventually ramify into the Department of Munitions and Supply, because the same situation is developing at the Ford Motor company in Windsor where the machines are made that are so necessary to our war effort.

I remember the efforts of the workers at Kirkland Lake to accept the principles laid down by the federal government, the right to organize and bargain collectively with their employers. These men have been patient and long-suffering; they have gone along for the past fifteen or sixteen months through all the legal processes provided by the government with respect to exercising that democracy about which we talk so much. A commission made inquiry into the situation in that district and recommended a company union. The men still carried on negotiations with the government through the Department of Labour and were successful in having another conciliation board appointed. This board unanimously recommended recognition of the union in that district. The operators refused to obey that mandate of the conciliation board. The operators refused to obey the laws of the country, and their only excuse for refusing to accept the decision of the conciliation board was that they would not do business with the C.I.O. I know something about the C.I.O. and I say that the C.I.O. does not exist in Canada at the present time. To begin with, the C.I.O. is not a trade union, it is a trade union centre. The C.I.O. does not sign collective agreements, does not negotiate wage agreements. The C.I.O. is a legislative centre for the unions in the United States; when the Canadian Congress of Labour was set up in Canada it replaced the C.I.O. in Canada, and the Canadian Congress of Labour is now the legislative centre for the industrial unions in Canada. Therefore the mine operators are very badly confused or misinformed or else are deliberately ducking the issue when they give as a reason for not accepting the mandate of this board that they will not do business with the C.I.O. They will not have to do business with the C.I.O. but will do business with their own workmen in that section once the organization is set up.

Speaking again of democracy, I consider the franchise to be the very basis of democracy. But the machinery provided by the Department of Labour for taking that vote in Kirkland Lake was a disgrace. Whoever was responsible for it made a complete mess. I was there on Sunday, attended three meetings in the afternoon, and I say that there is as well developed and as well led a trades union movement in that section as in any other part of Canada, sensible men who know where they are going and who are patient and long-suffering. Some eight or ten men from the Department of Labour went in there and conducted that vote. The men were given no opportunity to see the form of ballot that was to be used; they were given no list of those eligible to vote. Let me read the ballot; if this is not a deliberate attempt to take the franchise from the men on that question, then I am no judge of ballots. It starts off with some straight propaganda for company unionism. It reads:

Your employer agrees to negotiate with a committee elected by the employees of the company but not with local 240 of the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers' Union.

Are you in favour of a strike unless the company is prepared to negotiate with local 240?

Yes
No

That ballot is handed to these men with no opportunity given to understand it; it is a deliberate attempt to propagandize against the legitimate rights of the men in that section.

This is what I am concerned about; the main concern of any responsible executive of a trade union is to avoid trouble or head it off. Hon. members know that since I have been in this house I have continuously given warning against what would happen. For five and a half months last summer we went through a mess in Nova Scotia that would not have arisen had attention been paid to some of the things I said here. Now I see developing a similar situation in Kirkland Lake. According to the figures I see in the press the men voted in favour of a strike. Some 4,500 men are affected; an entire community is affected, and if that strike develops it is a shame and a crime on the part of those responsible for handling the situation. The men could legally have gone on strike this morning, but they postponed it until Thursday in order to give the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) an opportunity for further negotiation to make the mine operators see what is fair and just.

A strike is an easy thing to call, but a hard thing to settle. The workers there have canvassed all their legal rights; if a strike takes place it is going to affect the entire labour movement in Canada, because there has been so much injustice and disregard of regular procedure in that area that the entire labour movement in Canada will take it up, and perhaps we shall have trouble from coast to coast, while all that is necessary to head it off is that someone with authority, realizing what should be done, shall settle the matter on the basis of that vote.

I bring this situation to the attention of the committee now because I know that if this continues until Thursday morning without something being done to assure the men there that their democratic rights are going to be protected, there will be trouble and that trouble may spread all across Canada. The people in Windsor sent a telegram which was read here the other day and we have had several letters, making the same objection to the same form of ballot. Instead of the matter being decided on the majority basis, the same basis as that on which hon. members are elected to this house, the eligible vote at the mine is taken and every vote not cast is counted as a vote against the union. Yet even on that basis the union won with quite a large percentage.

In rising it was not my intention to waste time or to make a long speech. I simply wished to direct the attention of the committee and of the Minister of Munitions and Supply —because he is going to be affected sooner or later if this is allowed to continue—to the situation that exists. Instead of criticism I am presenting an appeal to those in authority to stop this, to do something about it before it goes too far.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On Friday afternoon the minister requested that I should repeat my questions to-day, with regard to the increase in the consumption of gasoline in June, August and September of this year compared with the same months of last year.

Mr. HOWE: I have the information requested by my hon. friend, but I think, to give it fairly, I should give it month by month from January on, because in April there was an increase in taxation which affected the figures considerably. The statement is as follows:

1941	Increase per cent
January	10·6
February	12·8
March	22·5
April	45·0
May	7·7

Average, 18 per cent.

My hon. friend will recall that there was a three cent increase in the tax on gasoline in April, so a large part of the increase in that month was due to people who stocked up in anticipation of that increase.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do these figures show the value of the gasoline?

Mr. HOWE: No; this is the percentage increase in the number of gallons used.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What has been the increased production in Canada, say in the last six months or year?

Mr. HOWE: I gave the figure; it is in Hansard.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I mean the Canadian production.

Mr. HOWE: I think I gave that figure.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand the July increase was about 20 per cent?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister the figures for August or September?

Mr. HOWE: There was a sharp reduction, as a result of the rationing. I think the August figure came very close to the figure for August last year, while the September and October figures were arbitrarily set at 20 per cent below the corresponding figures for September and October of last year.

Mr. MacINNIS: When rationing went into effect this autumn I believe there was an increase of one cent a gallon in the retail price of gasoline. What was the reason for that increase in price? Did the companies provide the department with information indicating that an increase was necessary; and, if that information has been supplied, will the minister give it to the committee?

Mr. HOWE: The increase in the price of gasoline came after some months of control, as a result of the steady increase in the price of crude. I mentioned on Friday that during the same period the price of gasoline at the gulf, which of course is where all our gasoline originates, and where transportation charges do not have to be considered, had risen two cents, while the price of gasoline in New York, where the transportation charges are much lower than to Canadian points, had risen by from 2·4 to 2·6 cents. The increase of one cent in August was looked into very carefully. All the savings that had been made possible by the oil companies through the regulations of the controller, such as cutting out the use of credit cards and similar savings, were assessed, and the companies were given considerably less than they asked. Subsequently they took their case to the war-time prices and trade board, and the situation was carefully reviewed by that board which at that time was responsible for all prices. A further increase of one cent in the price of gasoline was granted in certain areas, I think in the maritime provinces, Quebec and eastern Ontario. It was not granted in western Ontario, the prairies or British Columbia.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to ask whether we shall be given a statement on what is being done in the way of reclaiming lubricating oil. I understand a process has been perfected by which they can take lubricating oil that has been used in aeroplane engines for a certain number of hours and, by heating it and putting it through pressure, can filter and reclaim that oil to a very high standard, at very little cost.

Mr. HOWE: I think every militia camp has an oil reclaiming unit. It is my understanding that oil from the airports, as well as the oil used in the military vehicles, is sent to these militia centres, where it is reclaimed and used over again. Of course, my hon. friend will understand that it could not be used for aeroplane engines; it is not brought back to its original grade, though it is not a bad grade after being reclaimed. It can be put through this process once or twice with good results, and I believe pretty well every army vehicle is using reclaimed oil.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: My information was that in large areas of the west this was being done by private firms, that the militia units were not doing it.

Mr. HOWE: I know there is one of these units at Camp Borden, because I have seen it, and I think we have purchased reclaiming outfits for all the military camps. I doubt very much if oil from either military aeroplanes or military vehicles is being refined by private firms; I should be surprised if that were the situation. I do not see how they could acquire the oil to refine it.

Mr. FAIR: I wonder whether the minister or the oil controller has considered giving the farmers the right to purchase gasoline in barrels for their cars. As a rule farmers do not live within a few blocks of a service station. In many instances they are twenty, thirty or even more miles from a filling station, and in order to buy what gasoline they can afford they are compelled to use one, two, three or perhaps more gallons of gasoline to make the trip. In my particular area the price of ethyl gasoline by the barrel is 34 cents a gallon. At the pump the same gasoline costs 39 cents a gallon, or almost the price of a bushel of wheat. I wonder whether some step could not be taken to give the farmer a small break by allowing him to buy gasoline both for automobile and truck use by the barrel, instead of compelling him to go to the pump and needlessly waste gasoline.

Mr. HOWE: I think farmers have been given certain concessions that have not been extended to owners of ordinary pleasure cars. I believe a farmer is allowed to purchase gasoline in cans, is he not?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No, not for a car.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps he can purchase it in cans for his farm machines, but not for his car. I believe all this will be corrected as soon as it is possible to put in the coupon books. Then the farmer will have a coupon book which he can use at all times, and the present restrictions, which were designed to cut down the use of gasoline, of course will not apply. I dare say that at that time some arrangement can be made such as my hon. friend suggests. The ethyl gasoline to which he referred would be used for pleasure driving.

Mr. FAIR: It is also used in a number of new trucks now being produced, because it gives better performance. If we were allowed to purchase in barrel quantities we would save five cents a gallon. We now pay $17.55 per 45-gallon barrel for ethyl gasoline, when purchasing locally. That is a condition which should be corrected.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member's observations illustrate the difficulty of having uniform regulations in Canada. This is a most difficult country in which to ration or control gasoline, because different areas present different conditions. I am sure, however, that the oil controller is constantly obtaining new information and solving new difficulties. The reason why we did not ration gasoline months ago is that we had to acquire a great deal of information respecting the requirements in different areas across the country. I am hopeful that when a complete rationing system comes out, it will be possible to take into account all conditions, including the ones mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I believe what has been said exemplifies the lack of foresight the government has shown in respect of its handling of oil. The hon. member for Davenport pointed out the necessity for the government immediately considering the possibility of utilizing the Alberta tar sands. I recall speaking particularly about the Alberta tar sands immediately after the outbreak of the war. On that occasion I pointed out that a German syndicate had offered to install a pipeline. On that occasion the Minister of Munitions and Supply answered me.

It is now evident that there is a shortage of gasoline. While in my opinion the time is long past when this matter should have been looked after. I would urge that it be done now. The government should do everything possible to increase production. It goes without question that there is a tremendous supply of oil products in the tar sands of Athabaska.

Some money may be required to develop production. If, however, we want gasoline, then why do we not go out and get it?

It is now said that gasoline is to be rationed. I am completely mystified, because when price control was discussed some time ago the government told us that rationing could not be carried out. Yet it is now undertaking to do so. The only difficulty is that it is about two years too late in beginning. A year ago in the house I pointed out that if there was a scarcity of any commodity it would not be proper to allow the price to increase, as has been done with respect to gasoline. The proper procedure was to enforce rationing. If we are short of gasoline, let us not just fool round with the idea of rationing; let us have a strict rationing system. If we are really in need of gasoline, every pleasure car in the country should be put off the road.

At the same time I believe the present system of gasoline control is wrong, and the government is losing the confidence of the people, not only through the operation of the control now in effect, but because it is not making every endeavour to increase production. The minister has said that he placed production figures on Hansard. I looked for them this morning, but did not succeed in finding them.

I have in mind particularly the Turner valley, and the tar sands in the north. I believe that in those fields the government has done nothing more than a small amount of surveying of possibilities. I am concerned chiefly with the actual increase in oil production. I am convinced that in the last six months or the last year oil production in Canada has not been increased to any appreciable degree, certainly not to the amount it should have reached, if we really wanted to obtain gasoline.

The statement published by the Joy Oil company is astonishing. I do not believe the minister has answered it fully. One paragraph reads:

> During September, 1941, we were promised tankers by the United States tanker pool, providing we secured the recommendation of Canadian oil controller, G. R. Cottrelle. Despite our repeated efforts, Cottrelle refused all our requests, and we were advised to buy our gasoline from the big Canadian oil companies.

That is a serious charge. They were short of gasoline—and I have no doubt the Minister of Munitions and Supply is right when he says there is a shortage. If we are short of gasoline, then why force this large oil company to buy from Canadian companies, when it could buy from the United States? It must be remembered, too, that this company is underselling other Canadian companies. If I am to be robbed, I do not care if it is done by a Canadian or an American. My only concern is that I am being robbed. Surely the Imperial Oil company could sell gasoline just as cheaply as the Joy Oil company? If I am correctly informed, the Imperial Oil company is only a subsidiary of the Standard Oil company of the United States.

I can see where oil companies might gain great advantage by rationing present supplies, even to the extent of eliminating civilian consumption. I believe it would be more to their advantage to have such rationing than to have an increase in production which would take care of both civilian and war-time needs. After the war, in the event of increased production we would have an abundant supply of gasoline, and prices would naturally decrease. The oil companies which have practically a monopoly of oil production in Canada would have a tendency to keep the price up, and to cut down the supply.

I believe the government is negligent almost to the point of—yes, someone has whispered "sabotage"—when it neglects its present opportunity to increase our oil production to the maximum. The minister may say, as he did once before, that the government is not going to put money into oil production. If he does reply in that way, then I say to him, as I did before, that it is the government's business to get the gasoline. I do not care how they get it, but certainly it is their business to get it. With our potentialities there is no reason for a shortage of gasoline. The tar sands in northern Alberta are estimated to be the largest potential oil fields in the world. Not one solitary thing is being done so far as actual production is concerned. Some surveys may have been made—but that is not production.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything to the committee, but I received a letter this morning from the secretary of the Thunder Bay Milk Producers' association. This letter draws a picture of what the farmers of that district have been going through. Their second crop of hay was lost; their wheat, oats and barley were rotting in the stook, and they have not been able to harvest their potatoes on account of wet weather. The story is told of one man with sixteen acres of potatoes who had to go out in top-boots and dig enough for his own use; he lost his crop. The milk producers of the district want an increase of twenty-five cents per hundredweight for milk and an increase of five cents a pound for butterfat, for cream used in the fluid trade. This application, of course, has to go before the milk control board at Toronto, and the board's decision will have to be approved by the war-time prices and trade board. The milk producers certainly are deserving of consideration. I hope also that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is considering the bonus question he will not forget the farmers in the Thunder bay district who have lost everything.

I hope, too, that the dependents of soldiers will receive first consideration when the bonus question is considered. The young man who has volunteered for service overseas and left his wife and children behind in Canada has certainly a better right to a bonus than the man who takes his place in civil life. Old age pensions should also be bonused.

I am sure, too, that this house will be grateful to the Minister of Finance for not adding a bonus to the salaries of the members of parliament. If such a bonus were suggested, I believe there would be a revolution in this house.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who was a storm centre last year because he advocated growing less wheat and more feed. The farmers of Ontario must be wishing that he had got better support then, because they are very glad now to get feed from the west.

I also want to congratulate the government upon what it has done under the war-time housing scheme at the head of the lakes. We needed houses very badly at the head of the lakes, and the government came to our assistance. A local committee was formed, consisting of A. F. Hawkens, superintendent of the Canadian Pacific Railway; C. E. Chapple, of Chapple's Limited; E. J. Saulsby, manager of Canadian Car, and P. E. Doncaster, district engineer of the public works department. That committee got to work, and the result was that forty four-roomed dwellings were constructed renting at from $22 to $25; ten six-roomed dwellings renting at $30; and two staff houses for male workers, each housing eighty-eight men, or one hundred and seventy-six altogether. In those houses the rent for a single room is $4 a week, and for a double room, $3.25 for each occupant. The people who have been able to get into these houses have expressed their delight at these comfortable homes. I believe that thirty-six other houses are now under construction under this scheme.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) the other day state that in future trades unionism must be interwoven with industry. I heard the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) speak to-day of how he rose from the ranks of labour, and he will take second place to nobody except perhaps myself in understanding labour men from the ground up. The government that gives the right to the worker to organize and to join any union of his choice, and ensures that it is not made a criminal offence for a man to belong to a union, is going to stand behind labour through thick and thin, and there are many of us in all groups in this house who will stand behind the government if they will carry out that policy, and who will criticize them if they do not. When I was belabouring the C.I.O., my brother-in-law, who is a doctor of sociology in the university of Michigan, said to me, "You are criticizing an organization about which you know very little," I said, "I know some bad things about it, and the way to help is to advertise the bad in it." He said that those who were responsible for the C.I.O. were the craft unions because they did not organize completely and include everybody in the industry. I found it to be true in the case of the Great Lakes Pulp and Paper company at Fort William, that they included everybody in their union without the C.I.O. The man who works with a shovel and does ordinary labouring work has just as much right to protection as any other man. I know there are things in the C.I.O. that are not very good. We shall have to watch the organization closely. Nevertheless any man who toils has to fight for his own good.

Turning to another matter, I would suggest to the government that we arrange for an exchange of ministers with Russia, for two reasons: First, the change that Russia has undergone and the change in our own attitude towards Russia. I can well remember the time when Russia wanted total disarmament by all countries, but got very little support. That was the day when the League of Nations began to slip a bit. Second, our own attitude to Russia changed completely when they announced freedom of religion and that they would allow a man to worship God as he pleases. That is what we appreciate in this country. Our attitude toward Russia also changed when, instead of being a potential enemy, she became an ally. Therefore I think it would be a wise move on the part of the government to arrange for an exchange of ministers with Russia.

I am not going to say much about what is going to happen after the war, but it is most hopeful when minister after minister, led by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, says that after this war things are not going to be as they were after the last war. I can well remember when I struggled hard going about in my Ford car to try to find a returned man work at twenty-five cents an hour and could not find it. I do not think that day will ever come again. I hope we have learned a great deal since then, and when minister after minister rises in his place and says that we shall have a new social order after this war, a Christian social order, it gives us a good deal of hope. There are two things that I should like to see in this new Christian social order when it comes. I should like the Sabbath day to be a day of rest when a man can go to worship where he pleases. The other thing is this. We have heard a great deal about the control of gasoline in one way and another, but I have not heard a word said about the control of another liquid that is used by far more people than use gasoline. That is a matter which should be given consideration by the government.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply whether any plans have been made for the operation of the merchant ships and for their manning. The minister announced in the house the other day that we would have approximately one hundred merchant ships in operation by the end of next year, and I believe there are to be fifty more in the following year. Large crews will be required to operate these vessels. I am not aware that any men are now being trained for that purpose, and I would ask the minister to explain to the committee just what the situation is at the present time with regard to crews.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Transport has taken in hand the task of training crews for merchant ships. Manning pools have been established at Halifax and Montreal and are now in operation. Training schools are also being built in connection with these manning pools. It is the intention to pursue an intensive programme of enlisting and training candidates for the merchant marine.

Mr. GREEN: Will there not be schools on both coasts?

Mr. HOWE: I assume that there will also be a school on the west coast. I am not sure what the plans are for that. This is a new activity; it is just getting nicely under way. But I have no doubt that there will be training schools on the west coast as well. Of course, the advantage of working in connection with manning pools is that every man graduating from a school can be assured of being placed.

Mr. GREEN: How are they to be operated? By War-time Merchant Shipping, Limited, or by the government, or by private companies? That is, once the ships are actually carrying cargo?

Mr. HOWE: There again, I assume that the ships being built for Canada will be operated by the Canadian government merchant marine which was organized for that purpose in the last war and is now operating ships that have been seized as prizes of war in Canadian waters. I should imagine that would be the method of operation. But of course, the recruiting and training of merchant seamen constitute an operation which is carried on in connection with all British ships. Some of our ships are being built for Great Britain, on order from Great Britain, and some are being built on Canadian orders.

Mr. GREEN: Would it be against the public interest to disclose how many are for British order, and how many for Canadian?

Mr. HOWE: I believe that either twenty-six or twenty-eight ships are on British order, and the balance are Canadian.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently there is a shortage of steel. I see by a press report in the Vancouver Sun on November 3, that Mr. MacMillan, head of War-time Merchant Shipping, Limited, is quoted as saying:

> Shortage of steel for the ships has been and still is a serious problem. It has slowed up the programme considerably in all parts. There is not enough steel produced in Canada for all war purposes and the United States defence programme, now gathering real momentum, has cut down the amount that can be got from there.
> Mr. MacMillan said that experts have assured him that there will be plenty of steel by late next spring. He hopes they are right.

Could the minister tell us whether or not that report is correct?

Mr. HOWE: I would say that the shortage of steel is not as severe as is indicated in the newspaper extract which my hon. friend has just read. Steel, of course, is short in Canada. We have doubled the production of steel in Canada since the war began, but we have always imported steel from the United States, and we still do, and in about the same relative proportion to our own production as formerly. Usually, I believe, steel for about one-third of our Canadian production is imported from the United States. One difficulty was that we started a shipbuilding programme at several yards at exactly the same time; each yard required the same type of steel at the same time; and we had a limited capacity for the individual ships. Another difficulty is that certain structural shapes which go into the ships have to be imported; they are heavier than any mill in Canada can roll. Just at the time we required them, the United States changed its system of priorities, and it has taken some time to get the system established. But the steel position in November is going to be very much better than in October, and I should say that by the end of the year no shipyard—at least, on present indications—will be short of steel. We have had, however, to curtail the amount of steel moving into domestic uses. We are letting the very minimum quantity of steel go into non-war uses at the moment. Practically every ton of billets that is being manufactured in Canada is being rolled into plate for ships or armour-plate or gun-barrel forgings or some use of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: Have we not now reached a time when wooden ships could be used to advantage? If steel is scarce, would it not be wise for War-time Merchant Shipping, Limited, to undertake also the building of wooden cargo vessels? I understand that this can be done, that there are men available who have had training in building wooden ships. Would it not be well for Canada now to branch out into the building of wooden vessels as well as steel ones?

Mr. HOWE: The question of whether or not wooden ships should be built received very careful consideration. Speaking personally, I became less and less enthusiastic as I studied the situation. The plain fact of the matter is that the cost per ton of the wooden ship is at least as great as and perhaps somewhat greater than the cost per ton of the steel ship. Operating costs are considerably higher for wooden ships than for steel ships. It must be quite obvious, I think, to all hon. members, that a timber ship would have no post-war value, and that the same man-hours put into a steel ship would produce much more value, even for war time, than the same man-hours put into a timber ship.

It may be said that a different class of labour is used in the construction of a timber ship. That is true to only a limited extent. The hulls of ships are, of course, a great deal less than half the cost of the ship; they are, perhaps, no more than one-third of the cost; and it is only the steel hull as against the wooden hull that we are discussing. For the interior fittings we draw on the same manufacturing resources for the steel ship as for the wooden ship.

As far as the Department of Munitions and Supply is concerned, and viewing the matter solely from that point of view, we of course build on order from someone. We usually have a customer for the gun or tank or ship or whatever we build, before we build it. We have no appropriations of our own excepting for ordinary running expenses. If the Department of National Defence for Naval Services want a corvette, they come to us with a certificate of encumbrance, plus the order for the corvette, turn over the money to us, and we build the corvette and deliver it to them. That applies to everything which we build. While we have had no customer for a wooden ship, we have had many people come forward quite willing to build those ships; we have had nobody come forward to say that they want them.

Mr. GREEN: Who would order the ships? The navy, or the Department of Transport?

Mr. HOWE: It might be the merchant marine, or it might be the Canadian shipping board.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who is the Canadian shipping board?

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian shipping board is a board that operates under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Under the instructions of the government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, then, we can tell them to buy them. Am I to understand—if I may ask a question in connection with this matter of the wooden ships—that the urgency of the situation is surmounted by the dollars and cents point of view? Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: No, I would not say that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understood the minister just now to say that.

Mr. HOWE: We have tried in our war manufacturing to turn out a good article, and I think we have succeeded very well. If we build a ship, we build a ship which is a good ship compared with any on the ocean. If we build a tank, it is a good tank; if we build a gun, it is a good gun, equal to any. I think that when you turn out a wooden ship in this day and generation, you are turning out a second-class article, and one which hardly justifies the man-hours and the material which you put into it.

Mr. GREEN: Do I understand that the minister's point is that the building of wooden ships would interfere with the construction of steel ships?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Of course the engines for wooden ships come from the same factories which build engines for the steel ships.

Mr. GREEN: I have in mind that it should be possible to increase the number of ships which Canada can build, by building these wooden ships in addition to the steel ships. That is the argument, I believe, which is being advanced.

Mr. HOWE: Of course you can build wooden hulls without competing materially with the steel hulls, although there is a good deal of steel even in a wooden hull. When you come to all the fittings of the ship you are stepping into the same factories that are building interior fittings for the steel ships, and with a little greater effort you could get a steel hull as well as you could a timber one.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Where are you getting the steel?

Mr. HOWE: We are getting it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understood the minister to say he could not get sufficient steel.

Mr. HOWE: We are doing all right so far.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Am I to understand the minister to say that we are building a sufficient number of ships to meet the emergency?

Mr. HOWE: We look upon Britain as a great shipbuilding country and it has been building ships for a great many years. It is still building ships; every yard is full

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: England is still being bombed, too.

Mr. HOWE: In the next year, 1942, we expect that Canada will turn out about the same tonnage of merchant ships as Britain will, which I think, for a country that was building no ships prior to the war, will not be a bad effort. In addition, we shall have a large naval programme which will also be turning out ships in our yards. There is, however, a limit to the extent of our effort in any direction, and I doubt whether we can go into a big programme of building timber ships without crippling our efforts in the direction of steel building.

Mr. GREEN: I would urge upon the minister that the question be considered very carefully. In the war effort, we have been inclined to think we could not do certain things and then the next week, by the pressure of events, we have found that we can do them. I fancy that the building of wooden ships will sooner or later exemplify that truth. I urge that he have his department or whoever is responsible for the decision review the whole position again. It may be that we are missing something that would be of great help in the war effort.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Wooden ships at present are being built at Shelburne and Yarmouth, N.S. I understand that there are three under way. They are, I believe, going into the merchant marine service.

Mr. HOWE: Those are Fairmile ships. They are of the mine-sweeper type and are being built for our own navy and the British navy. That is a highly specialized timber ship built of mahogany and to naval specifications. It is a naval vessel.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There is very little steel in these ships, and their construction certainly gives work to those skilled in this art in that part of Canada. It seems to me that if there is a shortage of that class of craft there is an abundance of room for immediate expansion of work. I have seen the work going on. At the very most there were only ten men working on one hull and probably six or eight on another, and the mill which was operating the band-saws to turn out cribwork and what-not did not have a staff of sawyers of more than a dozen. I do not believe that there was more than 150 horse-power in use, and a few ox teams for hauling in the logs, at a speed of two or three miles an hour, did not strike me as adequate. I do not wish to criticize, but I would point out that the lumber is there, and the people who have lived in that area on the Atlantic coast for many generations are accustomed to that class of work. I repeat, therefore, that there is certainly an abundance of room for a little more energy being put into that work. If, as the minister says, these particular wooden ships are efficient for a certain class of work, I should be glad if he would answer my question. I should like to have him outline the policy to show what is being done, not only in these two small yards but in many others in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend is getting rather mixed up between two programmes.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, during the discussion on wooden ships I recited a case that is actually being discussed under this item, and properly so, and the minister rises in his place and says that the hon. member is getting mixed up. If he sees fit I would ask him to withdraw that remark. I think he is out of order in saying that I am mixed up.

Mr. HOWE: I withdraw. I will put it in another way. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was speaking, I believe, about quite another programme of ships than that to which my hon. friend was referring. My hon. friend was discussing the small boat programme which is being carried out in fifty-four yards from one end of Canada to the other. We have built nearly 800 ships in these shipyards and we are still building them. Wooden ships are being built all along the Atlantic coast and on the great lakes as well as on the Pacific coast, but these are small-boat programmes and the boats are being built in yards suitable to that type. The hon. member for Vancouver South was referring to cargo boats which would have to be built in yards of the type suitable for steel ship construction, or new yards would have to be established of that general nature for the building of merchant ships. The programme to which the hon. member for Vancouver South was referring was not the same as the programme which my hon. friend was discussing.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I wish to direct a few questions to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but before doing so, I should like to make one or two remarks with regard to war-time housing. A dispatch from the minister's office points out that on October 27 there were twenty-seven cities and towns from coast to coast where war-time housing had been under way. According to this information we have appropriated $15,750,000 to complete projects that were authorized up to that date. We have provided for 4,427 houses, thirty-five staff houses and four dining halls. The sum of money mentioned might appear to be a large commitment, but if one thinks of it in terms of the entire appropriations for the Department of Munitions and Supply, it will seem small. According to the information the minister gave the other day, he has authorized to date contracts totalling $2,600,000,000. It is difficult for most of us to think in terms of such vast sums. I was examining the public accounts over the week-end, and I noticed that our entire war expenditures—demobilization expenditures included—during and since the last war totalled $1,695,000,000. In other words, this one department has awarded contracts for nearly $1,000,000,000 in excess of our entire war bill and costs since the last great war. If we add all our dominion government expenditures since 1868 chargeable to consolidated revenue fund, to capital, for railway subsidies, for war and demobilization, and for other charges until 1935, as reported on page 62 of the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1941, we find a total of some $11,704,150,309, or about five times the amount of the expenditures in this one department.

When hon. members consider the tremendous development all across Canada in order to carry out the programme outlined by the minister, they will see how closely the supply of housing for the men working in the various industries is tied up with our whole industrial output. During the last great war it was not until 1918 that the matter of supplying housing was recognized as a national war emergency. But the situation during the last war was very different from what we find to-day. At the commencement of the last war we had a surplus of from 7 to 15 per cent of vacant houses in Canada. At the commencement of the present war it was less than one per cent. In addition to this, during the ten years preceding the outbreak of the war little was done in Canada to replace obsolete houses that were wearing out. It is estimated that we have about 2,500,000 housing units in Canada, and assuming that the life of the average house is fifty years we should be building 50,000 houses each year to provide for normal replacement, without making any provision for the new houses required as a result of shifts in population and the establishment of new families. But instead of building 50,000 houses a year, according to the information in Maclean's building reports we built in 1940, 20,933 houses; in 1939, 21,946; in 1938, 18,565; in 1937, 18,284, and for the years 1932 to 1936, an average of less than 12,000 a year. Thus it can be readily understood that we entered this war with a serious shortage of housing.

In peace time, with a large number of people unemployed, it is possible for two or three families to be housed together in one building; but when the men go back to work, start receiving wages, coming home from work at all hours of the day or night, it is only natural that families desire to have individual houses. It is not conducive to efficiency to have several families living in one house and the sleep of the workers disturbed by men coming and going. Therefore we find large shifts in our population, large military and naval encampments about the country where people have brought their families and are finding great difficulty in securing accommodation.

I am very glad that early in the war the government recognized that this was becoming a national problem and appropriated a sum of money. I am not, however, satisfied with the administration of war-time housing as I see it. I was asked by our caucus to make a special study of this problem, and I have received letters from people all across the dominion. I explained to the minister last session that in taking up this problem I had no desire to discover any scandal; that is the last thing I would wish. The minister was very kind in his attitude. There should, however, be someone in Ottawa in a position to discuss with any hon. member the activities of war-time housing, who could satisfy us that the taxpayers of Canada are receiving good value for the money spent. I felt that the set-up we had for national housing should have been used for the supervising and organizing of the war-time activities.

In 1935 the Dominion Housing Act was passed; since 1938 we have had the National Housing Act, and I am sure hon. members are pleased with the progress made by this fairly new branch of government administration. We have spent a large sum of money in making it possible for quite a large proportion of the Canadian people to have much better housing than they could have without this scheme, and this has been done at a very low monetary outlay. We had men in this administration who were familiar with housing programmes in the United States, in Europe and in all countries where really progressive work has been done in providing housing for the people. But instead of using the government administration we brought in Mr. Pigott, one of the dollar-a-year men. I say nothing against Mr. Pigott; he has to his credit some of Canada's very finest buildings, but being able to place one's services at the disposal of the country for a dollar a year does not necessarily qualify one to do a job such as that of president of War-time Housing Limited. Mr. Goggin, the general manager, must also be a very good man because we are paying him a very good salary, $10,000 a year, enough to secure the services of the best men in the housing field. I feel, however, that we are not using the personnel or the research work which has been available under our national housing administration.

I have not been able to secure the information that I think I am entitled to as a member of parliament. I wrote to War-time Housing Limited early in the summer saying that since I had been assigned to this work I should like to be supplied with as full information as possible regarding the activities of war-time housing all across the country. On August 7 I had a reply from the general manager giving the names of places where war-time housing was active and the number of houses in each place. It did not give any information regarding the type of buildings, terms of contracts, rentals charged, or information from which to judge whether they were really dealing with the problem as it should be dealt with. While I have not had a great many complaints, the information I have is that there is much to be desired in connection with the operation of war-time housing. A letter from St. Catharines makes complaints regarding an unusual clause in the lease. They rent only on a month-to-month basis; a tenant must give one month's notice when leaving, but it is stipulated that a tenant may be asked to leave on only three days' notice. The argument advanced is that war-time housing want to prevent the area becoming run down or houses being used for bootlegging or prostitution. No doubt their objective is worthy, but it seems to me that asking people to vacate on three days' notice is unreasonable. The rents charged are not especially low, $22 to $30, similar to the rents mentioned in Fort William. I believe this parliament is entitled to more information regarding the activities of war-time housing.

If the minister had time at his disposal to supervise work on housing, no doubt it would be very well done, but with $2,600,000,000 being spent by the Department of Munitions and Supply, it is almost impossible for him to be in close touch with all that is going on in the hundred and one different branches under his supervision. I believe there should be in his department in Ottawa some civil servant who is familiar with everything that is being done by war-time housing. I think in the Department of Finance there should be some official with complete information as to the types of construction, the nature of contracts and so on, who would be in a position to assure members of parliament that the people of Canada are getting good value for the money that is being spent.

May I conclude with five or six questions which I should like the minister to answer if he can do so. First, would the minister tell the committee why the staff of the national housing administration could not have been extended and used to carry out whatever war-time housing building programmes were necessary. Second, what check is there by the Department of Finance and/or the Department of Munitions and Supply on the types of construction and materials of war-time housing projects? Third, what has been the cost per unit for the housing units completed in any of the centres where houses have been completed? Fourth, what is the largest number of pre-fabricated houses constructed by any one firm? Fifth, what are the estimated expenditures in connection with the entire building programme as at present contemplated by War-time Housing Limited? Sixth, what policy has been followed in connection with the purchase of materials in general, and heating units in particular, by War-time Housing Limited for the 4,400 houses which have been built? I am not sure that the minister can answer these questions at the moment, but I would appreciate it if he could.

Mr. HOWE: I think, when my hon. friend has time to investigate more closely, he will find War-time Housing Limited to be a very efficient operation indeed. About a month ago I had the pleasure of going to Hamilton to take part in the opening of a staff house. While there, I investigated a number of housing projects in that neighbourhood. One thing that struck me was the very attractive appearance of these houses. In any block of them, out of five houses not one will be exactly like any other; they are well spaced, and so on. I was particularly interested in the reaction of those who had just moved into the houses. I had a talk with one man and asked him how he liked his house. He spoke in very high praise of it and said, "I will put it this way. A few years ago I built a brick-veneer house that cost me $5,200. If I could swap even for this house I would be delighted to do so." The house to which he was referring was one of the smallest of the war-time housing units, a four-roomed house which cost about $1,800 or, with plumbing, local improvements and so on, perhaps $2,000 or $2,100. Getting that reaction, which I got almost everywhere I went, it struck me that we had built something the public were receiving favourably, and that a good job had been done.

Mr. LOCKHART: Was that a $5,200 house which was used as a comparison?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Compared with the smallest unit in this housing scheme?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I am simply repeating what this man told me. I am not suggesting that the trade could have been made, or anything like that, but that was what he told me.

My hon. friend referred to the huge amount my department has spent. Well, we have placed a great many contracts and spent a tremendous amount of money, and the reason why we have had no scandals and no great difficulties is that the department is very highly organized. We have chosen the best men in the industry to carry on this undertaking. We have had a very good treasury staff; and while I read in the papers that we have made mistakes, frankly I do not know what they are. Perhaps some day those who say we have made mistakes will tell us what they have been, but in the meantime it seems to me we have been getting on very well. We organized War-time Housing Limited very carefully. We chose Mr. Pigott to head the company because I think he is at the top of his profession in that particular type of construction. We had associated with him a Canadian architect who all his life has specialized in that type of housing, and on the board of directors we placed men who took a very great interest in that type of work.

The first question my hon. friend asks is why the national housing administration staff was not extended to handle the work. The reason, of course, is that their work is along quite a different line. The national housing staff administers the government's responsibility largely in private construction; in other words, the houses over which the national housing staff have jurisdiction are largely built by private owners, to standards and specifications fixed by the national housing administration, but the main job of the housing administration is to see that the loan guaranteed by the government on those houses is properly secured. War-time housing had a very difficult task. It had to go into heavily congested industrial areas and build houses to take care of a temporary situation. It was concerned with a type of house that need not be a permanent affair, in case there should be another shift of population away from that area.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice that in the September 11 issue of The Lachute Watchman it is stated that the national housing administration supplied the plans and specifications for the very large project at Sorel, Quebec. It seems to me they have already done a good deal of work in preparing plans and specifications for the very sort of work that War-time Housing Limited has done.

Mr. HOWE: I can explain why that is so. The Sorel gun plant and shipbuilding plant, as my hon. friend knows, were privately owned at the beginning of the war. The government has made some investment in the gun plant, in its programme of expansion, and the houses are more or less a joint operation, partly privately owned and partly financed by the government. The housing project there was undertaken before War-time Housing Limited was organized, and at my suggestion the national housing administration did take charge of that programme for both private and government interests. They designed and supervised the construction of the houses at Sorel, but so far as I know that is the only case where the national housing administration has actually designed and supervised the construction of houses as a complete job.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why could they not have extended their operations all across Canada?

Mr. HOWE: They could, but we decided to do it in another way, and I think we were wise. We organized a staff which I do not think could have been organized under the national housing plan. In any event, the national housing administration has a very large programme of its own. The houses that are to be built by War-time Housing Limited are very few in number compared with the houses being built under the national housing plan, even at the present time.

Then my hon. friend asks what check there is by the Department of Finance and/or the Department of Munitions and Supply on the types of construction and materials in war-time housing projects. There is the very closest check. Officers of the Department of Finance check every item that goes into any war-time housing project. The treasurer of War-time Housing Limited is an officer of the Department of Finance. The auditor is the auditor general of Canada, and every dollar spent by war-time housing is handled by the Department of Finance. The buying for War-time Housing Limited is supervised by the purchasing branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply, which is aware of the price paid for everything that is bought and which makes sure that every discount to which the government is entitled is secured, and that the lowest price obtainable by the government is obtained by War-time Housing Limited.

Mr. TUSTIN: Are tenders asked for?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, they are always asked for.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are the municipalities protected in so far as taxes for school purposes are concerned?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I will explain that.

The next question is: What has been the cost per unit for the housing units completed in any of the centres where houses have been completed? From one end of Canada to the other, I would say that the houses themselves, including plumbing and heating, cost between $1,800 and $2,100 per unit.

Mr. GREEN: Without the land?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and without furniture. That includes only the house itself, which may be built on posts. In many instances we take an undeveloped lot and put in sewage, and all the improvements that go with the land. In some instances that brings up the cost to another thousand dollars. I should be very glad to analyse the various projects, and if my hon. friend would put a question on the order paper I will see that a return is made.

The next question is: What is the largest number of prefabricated houses constructed by any one firm? I believe the largest number is the contract with the Brookfield Construction company at Halifax. That has been a continuing contract, and runs into about two thouand houses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All in Halifax?

Mr. HOWE: I think there are 2,800 houses there altogether.

The next question is: What are the estimated expenditures in connection with the entire building programme as at present contemplated by War-time Housing Limited? The total amount authorized to date is between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice there have not been any projects undertaken in any of the prairie provinces. We have an acute shortage in many of our cities, and I wonder whether the plan as at present contemplated does not envisage an extension in many centres where the shortage is acute.

Mr. HOWE: These houses are entirely for the purpose of housing munitions workers.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about Winnipeg?

Mr. HOWE: Winnipeg was a city where there were many vacant houses. I suppose before the war there was no city which had as large a number of vacant houses as had Winnipeg. I have heard of no shortage there, but if a shortage occurs we will meet it. We have been building only in cities where there is a shortage of houses. I believe I have answered the last question as to the policy followed in purchasing materials in general, and heating units. Those are being purchased under the supervision of the purchasing branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are prices asked for?

Mr. HOWE: We buy in large units. We buy for the whole project.

Mr. BRUCE: I rise, not to ask a question of the minister, but rather to correct what appears to be a wrong impression in the mind of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), when he referred to the status of Mr. Pigott, president of War-time Housing Limited. I think the hon. member's understanding could arise only from his not knowing Mr. Pigott, or the reputation he has throughout Canada. I can say from personal knowledge that Mr. Pigott is a man of the highest integrity and ability. He has a reputation of doing his work thoroughly and well, and is to be entirely relied upon in any of his undertakings. He has had a long experience in one of the leading contracting firms in Canada, and I do not think anyone better qualified could have been appointed to the job.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member is imputing to me motives I had no intention of expressing.

Mr. BRUCE: I am not imputing motives at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member has drawn the inference that I cast some reflection upon Mr. Pigott's integrity. I did nothing of the sort.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about school taxation?

Mr. HOWE: An arrangement has been made between War-time Housing Limited and the municipalities in which it builds. The arrangement has been ratified by all the provinces in which these houses have been erected. The government pays to the municipality a flat rate per house sufficient to cover school taxes and, I believe, a small amount in addition. I am not familiar with the exact details, but I know that each province and each city in which houses have been built have approved the arrangement.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not interested in what each of the provinces may do, because we have had certain experiences in British Columbia. They will approve anything in connection with school costs.

I must apologize for reverting to the subject of shipping, but I did not have the privilege of being in the house when the minister was speaking in this connection. During the last twenty-four hours I have had to stay near a telephone. A certain convention is being held, and I have been holding myself in readiness to accept any nomination which might come my way.

To return to the subject of shipping, I understood the minister to say there was a shortage of oil, and he gave as a reason a shortage of tankers. In that connection I would quote from possibly the best paper in the Dominion of Canada, namely, the Vancouver Daily Province of February 22, 1941. I hope the reporters in the gallery hear what I said about that paper. Speaking in British Columbia, the minister said:

> It has more ship orders than any other province. The yards are filled to capacity until the end of 1942.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Since that time many orders have been given in British Columbia. We have since launched our first steel cargo ship. And yet, according to what the minister is recorded to have said, as reported at page 4192 of Hansard, when he was speaking about oil, we still have not enough shipping. He said:

> The refiners have had to contend with a very sharp rise in the price of crude oil, and they have had to contend also with greatly increased transportation costs.

I presume the minister meant that increased transportation costs had been brought about through a shortage of shipping. He has stated before that it is not practicable to build wooden ships, and that because of their longer life steel ships are more practicable. Yet we are short of oil.

I must apologize again for reverting to the subject of oil, but there may be some explanation for the question which is in my mind. I know the people in the constituency of Fraser Valley and in the city of North Vancouver want to have the answer. May I repeat what the minister said:

> The refiners have had to contend with a very sharp rise in the price of crude oil, and they have had to contend also with greatly increased transportation costs.

I do not expect an answer right away, but I should like the minister to state what these increased transportation costs are. So far as I know, there is no increase in transportation costs between California and Vancouver. Much of our oil prior to the war came in, not by tanker but by tank car. I have yet to learn that there is a shortage of tank cars.

Again, as reported at page 4192 of Hansard, the minister stated, in his explanation as to the increase in price:

> —that is, two cents based on the small United States gallon, which is somewhat more when translated into cost, in Canadian money, of the Canadian gallon.

All hon. members know the difference in size between United States and Canadian gallons, but we also know that every major oil company operating in Canada is controlled in the United States, and they enjoy a benefit of approximately ten cents on the dollar.

I do not expect an answer right away, but I would ask the minister to state at his convenience what the increase in cost of transportation of gasoline delivered to British Columbia amounts to. I would also ask why these oil companies, with a ten per cent exchange advantage, are entitled to an increase of one cent a gallon. Each and every major oil company operating in Canada is controlled in the United States and, as one hon. member has stated, they are actually selling oil to themselves.

There may be a shortage, but with all due deference, I suggest there is no shortage in British Columbia. If there is a shortage, we are willing to submit to rationing to-morrow or any day. At present, however, I do not think there is a shortage. One oil company in California selling oil to its own subsidiary company in British Columbia receives an increase of one cent a gallon, plus the figure mentioned by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) of a certain amount in lieu of credit cards. Yet they pass none of that on to the little distributor. Nobody can tell me that the big oil companies have not had a wider and more profitable market for their gas since the war. Now, instead of selling to the small distributor, they sell by the hundreds of thousands of gallons to the dominion government and the Department of Munitions and Supply. They are selling more gasoline than they ever sold before in British Columbia, and they get an increase of one cent a gallon, which is not passed on to the little distributor, but is kept by the big oil companies themselves. I do not want to be critical, but that situation does not make sense to me. Nothing has caused more dissatisfaction in British Columbia.

I accepted the explanation of the minister in connection with the Joy Oil company. I did not know there was a Joy Oil company. It certainly has not caused much joy in British Columbia. Rightly or wrongly, we in that province think the oil controller is playing into the hands of the big companies and is operating in their interests. The minister can dispel that idea in so far as my riding is concerned if he can show me that the cost of transportation from California or Texas or Oklahoma to British Columbia has increased, and if he can show me that these companies in California, Texas and Oklahoma are not selling to a subsidiary company in Canada, thereby getting the benefit of the ten per cent, and in addition one cent a gallon increase. I think I am entitled to an explanation. Personally I do not know anything about the oil business, but I do not believe there is a particle of shortage of gasoline in British Columbia, in spite of the figures that have been given by Mr. Cottrelle. With all due deference to Mr. Cottrelle I do not think he realizes the situation in western Canada or in western United States. We see in the papers to-day that the United States has lifted all gasoline restrictions on the eastern coast. Yet in spite of everything the long-suffering poor Standard Oil company has to have one cent a gallon increase, plus all the credit charges, and the only justification given is the vague statement that the increase is due to transportation costs. If the minister can explain the situation satisfactorily to me, I may be able to explain it to my constituents, but he is going to have a hard time explaining to me that the oil companies are suffering as was intimated in that statement. Will the minister give me an explanation?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot at this moment discuss transportation costs on the British Columbia coast, and my hon. friend was fair enough to say that he did not expect me to.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But the minister will in the future?

Mr. HOWE: I said it was partly due to the increased cost of crude, which I know to be a fact. I do not know exactly what the increase has been in the Los Angeles area, where British Columbia oil comes from in the main, or how much tankers have gone up. My hon. friend says that in British Columbia they have been accustomed to get their gasoline in tank cars. I venture the statement that not two per cent of the gasoline used in British Columbia has come in there in tank cars in the last ten years. You would have a very sorry situation if you had to depend on any considerable movement of oil in tank cars. If my hon. friend will put a question on the order paper for exactly the information he wants, I will try to get it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thank you. Shall I get it this session or have to wait until January?

Mr. HOWE: It depends upon how complicated the question is.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is a simple question.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask a question with respect to the shipbuilding programme.

The discussion is getting mixed up with housing and oil. I would ask the minister what progress is being made in reconditioning the big steel mill at Sydney, Nova Scotia, to roll plate for shipbuilding. It is felt in our part of Canada that this work is very much behind, in preparing for this very necessary programme of shipbuilding. I should like to know when it is expected that plates will be rolled, also what outlay is being made by the department to enable these plates to be rolled, and what assured use there will be for these plates.

I should also like a statement from the minister as to the steel shipbuilding programme in Nova Scotia. We have been much disappointed that up to the present there has been only what I might call a political promise that shipbuilding will be undertaken at Pictou, Nova Scotia, while on the western coast, in Montreal, and on the great lakes ships are actually being launched; but in Nova Scotia the steel shipbuilding programme is only being projected, though it is recognized by practically everybody that Nova Scotia should be in the very forefront and be given a preference in a programme of this kind.

I should also like a statement from the minister as to what yards are projected in Nova Scotia to carry on this shipbuilding programme?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend speaks of a political promise of shipyards. I may say that my hon. friend himself is the one man who can never forget politics when asking any question.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That statement is not fair. The minister himself is the one minister who made a political promise with respect to war expenditures on aeroplane factories. I think he was the only minister who in a political campaign sent a telegram to be read at a political meeting, stating that if so-and-so were done, an aeroplane factory would be built at Amherst.

Mr. HOWE: And was it?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It was a political promise of public money provided for war purposes by all the people of Canada, and the minister made it a political issue on the platform.

Mr. HOWE: On what platform did I say anything about it?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister's telegram was read from the platform in Amherst in the last federal campaign.

Mr. HOWE: I am not responsible for what is read on a political platform. I certainly never mentioned Amherst in any political speech that I made in any part of the country. If my hon. friend will forget politics for a moment and talk about the war, we shall get on faster.

So far as the plate mill in Sydney is concerned, it is being brought into production as rapidly as possible. I understand that the date on which it will be put into operation depends upon the delivery of some heavy motors which are being manufactured at the present time. They are somewhat behind schedule, but I hope the mill will be in operation in February or March of next year, contingent on the delivery of those motors.

We are somewhat short of plate capacity at the present time; not unduly short, because we are rolling every billet we can manufacture. Our billet capacity is increasing, and the plates from Sydney will be needed.

As far as new shipyards are concerned, we have only two new ones in contemplation at the present time, one in Vancouver, which is now laying its first keel, and one at Pictou, which is suitable for the present programme of ships. I do not know what other questions there were.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I asked the minister what commitments have been made and what outlet there will be for the projected production of the rolling mill at Sydney; also, what its expected tonnage output per year will be.

Mr. HOWE: I rather think the capacity of that mill when it is in operation will be about 12,000 tons a month. I judge that from what I know of the capacity of the mill. Getting back to the matter of the distribution of the billets which can be produced at the mill, I may say that every billet is being used now, and if we had the mill in operation now it would be used pretty well to capacity. I daresay that condition will continue.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There is additional blast furnace capacity, is there not?

Mr. HOWE: Additional blast furnace capacity is being brought in, and there is a plant under way at the present time to increase the production of pig.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is that being financed by the minister's department or by the government? I refer to these additions and new facilities.

Mr. HOWE: Partly by the company itself and partly by the government. I believe the total expenditure under way runs to about five and a half million dollars, of which four million dollars is represented by a loan from the government.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I did not like the retort of the minister, in his political reference to myself.

Mr. HOWE: Just why did the hon. member need to mention "political promises"?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): My basis for that is that, while ships are being launched in other parts of Canada, it was during the political campaign in Nova Scotia during the past few weeks that the announcement was made by the minister of industry and publicity and the premier of Nova Scotia that a shipyard was to be started in Pictou. That was the first public notification we had that such a programme was to be carried out. I think it is unfortunate that it should have been announced in that way. I ask the minister to advise me or advise the committee why the announcement with respect to the programme in Nova Scotia has been delayed, while ships of a similar nature are being actually launched in other parts of Canada. It is a matter of discrimination, or was so interpreted in Nova Scotia. I think it is reasonable on my part to ask the minister why the programme in Nova Scotia has been delayed. I think we should have this information.

The programme of shipbuilding was discussed in this chamber in previous sessions by hon. members from the maritimes. The contention was made, and was supported by hon. members from Toronto and other parts of Canada, that Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces have not had a fair share of the distribution of moneys for government works having to do with the war. In shipbuilding, for which above everything else they should have had the preference, they are the last place in Canada to receive recognition. Nova Scotia is the last place where a programme for building steel merchant ships has been announced. It was announced for political advantage during an election. It does not seem to me that sort of thing creates a good atmosphere wherein to carry on the war. There should be no political pressure or political advantage in order to carry out programmes of this kind. As I have said, it is not my intention to be critical of the minister, but I believe we are entitled to some explanation with respect to the shipbuilding programme in eastern Canada.

Mr. HOWE: The remarks of my hon. friend illustrate exactly the point I made a few minutes ago. What he takes exception to indicates the fundamental difference between my viewpoint and his. My viewpoint about ships is that I want to get the maximum number for use during the war period. My purpose in building ships is not to enrich any one section of this country or to glorify any particular town, or city, or province. My object is to get ships where I can get them most quickly and cheaply. The reason why we built ships where we have built them is that there were organizations there which understood how to build ships, and slipways which would take ships. We filled those first. Then we looked round to see where we could increase shipbuilding capacity, and we found that the places where we could increase it reasonably were very few; in fact, there were only two. We found in Vancouver two steel companies which were in a position to combine and build slipways and launch ships, without the necessity of robbing existing shipyards of their skilled personnel.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister say which firm that is?

Mr. HOWE: That is a combination of, I think it is, Vancouver Engineering works and one or two steel companies there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is quite a good riding, anyway.

Mr. HOWE: I do not even remember the name. The other place we found was at Pictou. What we found at Pictou was not, by any means, a readymade shipyard, but a certain amount of skilled personnel was available there. I may say that we searched Nova Scotia and New Brunswick from one end to the other to try to find the nucleus of an organization which could handle a steel shipbuilding project of this magnitude. We found it at Pictou. After a good deal of discussion and negotiation, including considerations of capital assistance and additional skilled personnel which had to be furnished, the project reached the point where an announcement could be made. Now my hon. friend says it was announced during an election. I do not think he could expect us to stop the war for three or four weeks so as to get that election over.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): My complaint is that the announcement was not made by the minister or by the federal government; it was made by a provincial minister while running an election in that province, and on behalf of the premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOWE: I do not suppose that one could keep it very much of a secret. Negotiations were going on between this group at Pictou and war-time merchant shipping, and I assume that the premier had ways of finding it out in the natural course of events. I daresay he knew when the deal was closed, and announced it accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an awfully innocent statement. Does the minister not know that the whole thing was done to have the effect that the provincial government of Nova Scotia had paved the way for this new industry?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. gentleman says so, but certainly I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why was it announced in that way?

Mr. HOWE: Why was it announced in that way? I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why was it not announced by the minister of munitions?

Mr. HOWE: Our announcements come through the publicity branch whenever we sign a contract, and I suppose this one went through in the usual way. I like to be accused of playing politics by hon. members who seem to think of nothing else; all I have heard from this section is, "Why don't you put something in the maritimes?" I have said repeatedly that I do not care where I put these things so long as I get the materials of war.

Mr. HANSELL: After discussing steel and ships and housing, I wonder whether we can come back to the matter of steel. I am not certain that I understood correctly the minister's statement with regard to whether or not there is a serious shortage of steel in Canada. I wish he would make himself a little clearer on that point. We do know that we have a steel priority in this country, and I assume that it is necessitated by shortage of steel. In that connection might I suggest something which will be of some little benefit to the western farmer. The suggestion comes to me that, on account of the present priority method of distributing steel, the men who run the small engineering shops experience tremendous difficulty in getting any. That has caused a serious situation for the farmers of western Canada during the time of harvest when they need repairs. I know for a fact that many have been held up in their operations because the local machine shop would not take care of their repairs, being unable to get a reasonable amount of steel, even though only a small bit was required, the shop being a small one. Of course, we in this corner realize that the farmer has been handicapped time and again, and it is another reason for dissatisfaction when he discovers that he cannot get repairs for machinery. It is a little late now to talk of that in connection with farming operations; nevertheless it seems to be true that the small shop is unable to get a reasonable amount of steel. Would the minister throw some further light on the priority arrangement in Canada with regard to steel?

Mr. HOWE: This continent as well as every country at war is short of steel; in other words, we could use a good deal more than we can make. I believe we are getting along fairly well with our war programme notwithstanding that we are short on steel. If we had more forgings at the present time we would be making more guns, and if we had more plate we would get on faster with our shipbuilding programme. We are, however, bringing new capacity into production each month, which will tend to ease that situation, and as far as the war is concerned we have a reasonably balanced programme as between steel production and such imports of the finished product as we can count on from the United States. As far as non-war use is concerned, at present no steel is being allocated for such purposes. We have shut off a great number of types of manufacturing that depend upon steel, not because we wish to do so but because we cannot afford the steel. I daresay the farmer has been considerably inconvenienced on that account. We hope to be able by the spring to relieve the shortage in machine shops doing non-war work. At present we cannot do so because we are trying to allocate steel as carefully as we can in order to make it go as far as possible for essential war purposes in Canada.

Mr. POTTIER: I should hate to have the words of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) go unnoticed, and I wish particularly to meet two impressions which he left. The first is that we have no shipbuilding in Nova Scotia, that all that we have is a projected shipbuilding programme at Pictou. There is shipbuilding in Nova Scotia in mine sweepers, Fairmile vessels, scows, and the like, and they are building slips in different places on the shore for ship repairing. Repairs are going on in Halifax as well, and their yards are working to capacity. It is not fair for anyone to rise in his place in the house and leave the impression that Nova Scotia is forgotten altogether. I cannot let it go at that; I cannot allow the impression to remain that there is merely a projected programme at Pictou. There is considerable shipbuilding going on in my constituency, and at Weymouth, on the border of my constituency, we have one of the best Fairmile ship yards in Canada. At another place we have a number of mine sweepers and the like. Moreover, the hon. member made reference to political reactions that might arise and that were hoped for by the announcement of the projected plan of shipbuilding at Pictou. The only constituency in Nova Scotia that lost a Liberal to a Conservative was Pictou, so that it is plain to be seen, if one follows that suggestion to its logical conclusion, that any announcement that was made did not have the effect suggested. If anything, it worked the other way. The hon. member should be the last one to give the impression to the committee that in a particular declaration benefit was sought. As a matter of fact, the results went the other way.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I was referring to a principle in the announcement. I was referring to merchant steel shipbuilding.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister in his report last Tuesday said, as reported at page 4082 of Hansard:

> Capital assistance to industry for the extension of existing plants and for the construction of new plants, instalment of equipment, et cetera, aggregated a total of $550,000,000, partly for Canada, partly for the United Kingdom and partly for joint account.

Will the minister break down these figures and tell us when he can how much of that amount was for Canadian account, how much for United Kingdom account and how much for joint account? Will he also break down the figures so as to show how much was allotted to each province in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Just before the last adjournment of parliament I gave a break-down with regard to Canadian, British and joint account. It runs pretty well in the same proportion. I will bring that up to date later on; I have not the figures before me. As regards a break-down by provinces, that is a purely political question which we have refrained from answering, and I do not think I should care to compare expenditures province by province.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say that the government was financing some of these shipyards. Earlier in the year the policy announced by the minister was that all that financing was being left to private industry. Has the policy been changed? If so, about when was it changed, and how many shipyards are now being financed by the government?

Mr. HOWE: There is no shipyard that is really being financed by the government. That is rather a misstatement. In connection with the merchant shipbuilding programme, it was necessary to build a number of new berths. The general policy was to include the capital expenditure in the contract and to allow that to be written off for the first five boats with the understanding that when they were built the cost would be dropped accordingly. I think in one or two instances the capital sum was advanced to cover the improvement. In any event it was allowed to be written off over a certain amount of work, or advanced direct. I think that was done for practically every shop where an expansion of programme was involved.

Mr. GREEN: The same question comes up in connection with power. The minister, speaking to the Canadian Manufacturers' association on June 10 of this year, said:

> We are accustomed to think of Canada as a country of large reserves of electric power. To-day every kilowatt that can be generated is being used.

He went on to explain the attempts being made to overcome the shortage. Is that still the position? Are we short of power right across Canada? If so, has consideration been given to the government financing the development of further power? Is that a government policy?

Mr. HOWE: We have not financed any power development in Canada since the beginning of the war.

Mr. GREEN: Is the position that we have now reached the limit of our available power in Canada, that all power that has been developed is in use? If so, it would seem that some step should be taken to develop further power either by private industry or by the government, because the water and the power sites are there; it is simply a matter of harnessing the water.

Mr. HOWE: Power is being developed privately, and while every kilowatt available is being used, we are not exactly at the end of our resources, because we can cut off peace-time use to some extent and convert it to war-time use. We are about on the borderline now. Of course this is the time of year when the domestic load is the heaviest. I think there will not need to be much diversion; there have been some instances in Ontario where peace-time loads have been cut off for certain parts of the day, but I do not think it will be serious this winter. A year from now it may be more serious. On the other hand, nearly a million horse power will come in between now and perhaps a year from now, which will relieve the situation.

Mr. GREEN: For example, at the Bridge river site in British Columbia there is a partial development, but I think there is a potential of several hundred thousand horse power. Is there not some way by which the government could have that developed? Surely the power controller, or some department of government could have that done, or are we just to be bogged down waiting for private industry to move?

Mr. HOWE: The government decided early not to develop power. We had to decide what we would do and what we would not do. We decided we would not develop power, drill oil-wells—

Mr. GREEN: Oil-wells are different; that is speculative; but the power site is there, it is only a matter of putting in the plant.

Mr. HOWE: The owners of that site are well able to develop it if they can sell the power.

Mr. GILLIS: I was pleased to hear that there was so much shipbuilding going on in Nova Scotia. As I remember the last discussion, there was an appropriation of $50,000,000 for shipbuilding, and one per cent of that went to Nova Scotia. At that time we discussed the possibility of utilizing, I think, some twenty-five shipyards in Nova Scotia that were too small to handle the type of ships required. The minister stated that there was considerable activity in the building of lifeboats and small craft of that kind. To what extent are the shipyards in Nova Scotia being used for that purpose? As I go through the province I see very little shipbuilding activity.

Mr. HOWE: I know that a large number of the ships are being built there; I would think every shipyard that wants a government contract and is able to do the work efficiently has all the work it can do. Of course there are yards that prefer to keep to the ordinary peace-time work rather than take war work. I cannot give the number of boats being built in Nova Scotia under the small-boat programme, but it is a large number; we have let contracts for some seven or eight hundred boats of that type to date.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has consideration been given to taking the boats from Churchill? There are four that have been laid up there for the last three years, steel hull boats in good condition. Two of them at least could be used.

Mr. HOWE: Consideration has been given to that. I know those boats very well. The tug at Churchill is of a type of which there is no particular shortage; it is not an ocean-going tug. As to the other equipment there, we have not been able to see value for taking it out of Churchill and having to take it back later when it will be required.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When will it be required there?

Mr. HOWE: Dredging has to be done there from time to time, and we cannot operate a dipper dredge without a tug and three or four scows.

Mr. McNIVEN: What progress has been made with regard to the "bits and pieces" programme? In western Canada, and particularly in Saskatchewan, there are many machine shops tolerably well equipped, many of them with machine tools and having a nucleus of anywhere from four to ten skilled employees, and particularly at this season of the year there is a dearth of employment for shops of that kind. These shops are anxious to render service at this time. It is true they have been inspected from time to time, their tools listed, their equipment checked over, and their personnel passed upon. We who live in the west have regretfully come to the conclusion that the eastern industrialist who has a war order practises the British maxim, "What we have we hold," and is unwilling to pass out to other shops the right to manufacture component parts of the completed product. Could the minister indicate to the committee what organization has been set up for the "bits and pieces" programme and what hope our shops in western Canada may have of participating in the war programme in the months to come?

Mr. HOWE: Our "bits and pieces" programme is well organized and is, I think, meeting the needs of industries of the kind to which my hon. friend refers. We have a district office in Winnipeg, and I think in Calgary, as well as in the eastern centres. Of course there are two sides to this question. I know the aeroplane plant at Fort William was carrying its "bits and pieces" as far west as Calgary in an endeavour to place contracts. My experience leads me to believe that the difficulty is more concerned with the little shop looking for work than with the larger plants trying to place work. One can hardly expect a large plant to distribute its work to every machine shop in the province; one might more reasonably expect the owner of the small machine shop to come to Winnipeg, discuss the matter and see what work is available. The "bits and pieces" programme is, however, succeeding as the small manufacturer becomes sufficiently interested to do what the large manufacturer has to do in obtaining an order, namely, come where the order is being placed and "sell" his capacity. I think we are educating the large manufacturer to break down his orders. There is a large contract just getting under way in Regina which I think can be very easily broken down into "bits and pieces"; but there again it will be necessary for the operator of the small machine shop to go to Regina and show what he can do, in order to obtain the work. I do not think anyone can sit back and expect the "bits and pieces" programme to bring him work.

Mr. McNIVEN: Just what function is the office in Winnipeg supposed to perform? Does the contract holder or the manufacturer list with the Winnipeg office those component parts which he desires manufactured outside the plant? It is exceedingly difficult for the operator of a small machine plant, say at Wynyard, Saskatchewan, to know what component parts are required in connection with the production of an aeroplane, let us say.

What he desires is some central place where he can obtain that information and where the size of his shop, his equipment and his personnel can be listed.

Mr. HOWE: That is exactly the purpose of the Winnipeg office, to obtain from the manufacturers the components they would like to place, and to obtain from the small machine shop the type of work it is capable of doing. I think that programme has been carried farther in Quebec than in any other province, because there seem to be more small machine shops in Quebec than in the other provinces; and through the "bits and pieces" programme I think we have pretty well filled the entire field there. A programme of education is being carried out on both sides, with the large manufacturer being educated to break down his production and sublet, while on the other hand the operator of the small machine shop is being educated to sort out what he is capable of doing and what he cannot handle.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What protection have the subcontractors with regard to receiving payment? I ask this question because a contract was let down on the lake shore in 1940; lumber contractors sold lumber to the man who had the contract, and they have not been paid as yet. What chance has a subcontractor of being paid? Does the government check on that?

Mr. HOWE: As one who has had to do with government contracts over a great many years, I can say from experience that the government never pays a contractor in full as long as there is any claim or lien outstanding. If the suppliers of that contractor failed to notify the government that they had claims, I am afraid their recourse against the government is gone.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The government did hold back $7,000 on this contract, but I believe the contractor was paid $70,000 and he owed his subcontractors over $20,000. I believe one of those subcontractors has received about $1,200. Another lumber man is minus twelve or fifteen hundred dollars, and as far as I can see there is no chance of these men getting paid, because the contractor would be better off not to try to collect the $7,000 from the government.

Mr. HOWE: How about the contractor who got the contract; is he bankrupt?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I believe he is pretty close to it.

Mr. HOWE: Unless a man protects his position on a government contract, I do not think he can be any better off in selling to a contractor who has a government contract than in selling to anyone else. The nature of contracting has not changed over the years, and ordinarily a person supplying a contractor must protect his position or he has no position.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): My question has not yet been answered. I think the government should look after the subcontractors.

Mr. HOWE: What relation is there between the government and a subcontractor?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The subcontractors believed this man, having a government contract, would pay them; they thought he was honest and that the government would see that they got paid. In this instance they are holding the bag, while these other fellows are profiting by it.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps they had better see their lawyers, but certainly I can say that if the government is notified of a claim, sufficient money is always held back before final settlement, provided the claim can be shown to be proper.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The government has been notified about this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think we have had a very exhaustive discussion concerning the Department of Munitions and Supply, and I wonder whether we could not proceed to the next department.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before we do that, I should like some further assurance from the minister with respect to the breakdown of that expenditure of $550,000,000 to build plants, partly for Canadian and partly for United Kingdom account, requested by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. The information was promised by the minister, and I should like to know if we might have it before this part of the session ends. On February 25 the minister submitted an appendix to Hansard showing a total expenditure of $268,499,894. The expenditure under this heading has reached $550,000,000, and the information concerning it is of the greatest importance. I would support what was said by the hon. member for St. John-Albert in requesting that this information be placed on Hansard in the same form that was followed last February.

Mr. HOWE: I will have that information prepared just as quickly as possible, and will try to get it on Hansard this session.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister will remember that last session we discussed the possibility of extending the air lines, both passenger and mail, to the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia. At that time the minister said there was a possibility that this service would be so extended by August of this year. Has any progress been made in that direction, or has the matter been forgotten?

Mr. HOWE: No, it has not been forgotten; as a matter of fact, it is very close to coming into being. I think the difficulty was that we had so many urgent demands for the beam equipment that we intended to use there. We had to obtain emergency beam equipment in connection with the Newfoundland airports, and we are a little behind in that programme. I hope that by the new year we shall be flying planes to Sydney, but again that is subject to new calls for equipment. We are, however, doing our best.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you. We are beginning to get linked up with Canada at last.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): On November 4 the minister was discussing what he called the "bits and pieces" programme. He will recall that I asked a specific question, and I hope in the intervening six days he has had an opportunity to prepare a specific answer, or in any event to give the country a general statement as to the policy which his department intends to pursue in that regard. Only to-day an example of what I had in mind at that time came to my attention; I will recite the instance in order that the minister may give us any policy he may have with regard to the question I asked.

The question I asked on November 4, was: In respect of capital assistance is it the policy of the Department of Munitions and Supply to extend liquid capital or working capital to those industries which find themselves with a backlog of orders for ordinary business? If I may amplify my question, I would say that manufacturing institutions find very large priority orders coming in for munition manufacture, business which has to do with the Department of Munitions and Supply. Of course they must give first attention to those priorities, with the result that the normal shipments of commodities have to stand back until the priorities are filled. What is the position with regard to these small concerns about which the minister spoke on November 4, and concerning which I asked that simple and easily answered question?

They find, in connection with their capital structure that it is taking more money even in their normal business procedure to carry their accounts receivable, to carry their inventory, to carry their raw materials, and to carry any stock they have ready for sale in the ordinary routine of business. The net result is that they are short of working capital. While they are in that position, a demand is being made on them to extend their plants, and they are anxious to answer those demands. Arrangements are made at present within the Department of Munitions and Supply to take care of that fixed assets cost, or capital assistance. But the policy as to what might be done with regard to working capital ought to be brought up to date by the minister, so that they would know what they are to do.

Many of these small industries have been established for two or three decades, and in taking on this war business, business which may be here to-day and gone to-morrow, they do not want to lose their old established lines. I have in mind an instance in Toronto which has to do with sandpaper. Sandpaper and buffing wheels are required for the polishing of rifle butts, et cetera. In this particular instance all other orders had to wait until that priority war order was turned out. In the meantime, furniture factories, and other plants throughout Canada which required sandpaper, could not be supplied. Some of the sandpaper may have been supplied for what might be described as semi-war work, but a good deal of it was for ordinary routine business. I use sandpaper only as an example. The people in question find themselves without the supply they require. Those who are charged with the responsibility of seeing to it that Canada has a sufficient supply of their commodity would be quite anxious to help out by building a temporary plant to take care of the condition which has developed.

I would ask the government to recite its general policy with regard to a problem of that kind, in respect of the capital structure of the extension which would have to be built. I would ask that in answering that question, particular attention be given to the write-off. In other words, if a building were of temporary construction to last for five years, would there be an increase in depreciation write-off on such building? I would not suggest that it need necessarily be 20 per cent, because there would, no doubt, be some reclamation. If an answer could be given, people who are having difficulties in that connection would have some peace of mind with regard to actual capital expenditure.

We may have to go a good deal further in extending working capital to take care of the three items I had in mind. My purpose in rising at this time is to ask the minister if he will answer the question I asked him in good faith on November 4. I ask him to recite the policy so that those who are trying to do a job on behalf of Canada in respect of our war effort will have some confidence that they may receive reasonable assistance from the government with regard to the war section of their business, and so that they may see to it that priorities are not dodged, and are given the right of way during the war.

Mr. HOWE: The policy of the government in relation to capital assistance is that it extends capital assistance to its own contractors. That is, if a firm takes a large contract from the government, and requires building accommodation and/or machinery which it has not at present installed, under certain circumstances the government will provide the building and install the machinery, provided that the company will transfer the property on which the building stands, and the title of ownership, and the government will retain ownership of the building and the machinery. This type of assistance is extended only to prime contractors. I believe my hon. friend is referring to subcontractors, and to a case where a subcontractor is responsible to a main contractor.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am referring more particularly to "bits and pieces."

Mr. HOWE: "Bits and pieces" usually involve the breaking down of a main contract into subcontracts, which represent the "bits and pieces." Therefore there is no advance directly from the government to the "bits and pieces" man. We never advance money to a subcontractor, although sometimes we do advance money to a main contractor which will be spent with a subcontractor. That is an advance to the main contractor, because it must be his responsibility, which he passes on to the subcontractor. That is the policy with regard to capital expenditure.

In respect of our general policy, each case is examined to see whether an advance is justified, or whether it is a situation which a contractor should take care of by himself. Of course, if the contractor spends his own money, he has the privilege of appearing before the war contracts depreciation board, upon which occasion Mr. Justice McTague and his colleagues decide the post-war value of the improvements to be built. They determine the amount of the write-off and the period over which the write-off can be made.

In the matter of capital advances, it is against the policy of the department to make advances for working capital. Sometimes it has to be done. We may find that a firm taking a contract does not appear to have adequate working capital, or for one reason or another may find itself short of working capital. In that event it is always our practice to put a controller into the company to watch income and expenditures. Under such circumstances we do advance money. We have controllers in twelve or fifteen businesses in Canada to-day to watch working capital. But it is a difficult business to follow, and we avoid it as much as possible.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Will the minister bring up to date the statement given by his deputy before one of the committees which sat four or five months ago with respect to the amount of working capital advanced by his department?

Mr. HOWE: I shall place that figure before the committee.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I have one further question, which is not entirely confined to the Department of Munitions and Supply. Due to the placing of ceiling prices on large numbers of commodities, a condition has arisen whereby raw materials for such commodities still being exported to the United States are finding a market in the United States ranging anywhere from 10 to 50 per cent higher than the market which prevails at the ceiling rate in Canada. For example, manufacturers for years have tried to make their contracts for one year, but latterly it has been for six or three months. The raw material for the commodity they manufacture is under contract to December 31, 1941; the producer of the primary product now finds himself under the September 15 ceiling, and the man who buys from him is unable to increase his price to meet the competition which comes from the United States. The goods are exportable to the United States. The net result of it all is that before 1942 is over, there is going to be a large shortage of raw material. Certainly it is going to be very difficult to contract for raw material for the year 1942. Those supplying raw material who have in days gone by intermittently exported their commodity to the United States have latterly, due to business being considerably improved in the last year, found their market in Canada during the year 1941. Naturally they will want to revert to the high United States market again. General market conditions in the United States, as the minister well knows, are anywhere from 10 to 50 per cent higher than in Canada, and in the instance I mentioned, the market is from 90 to 100 per cent higher. The quantities I am thinking of run into millions of pounds.

Contract time is fast approaching, December being the month when contracts for the year 1942 are made. There has been no announcement of policy as to how the government proposes to hold and maintain this ceiling. Priorities on supplies for war contracts must be taken care of. Certain industries will find themselves denuded of their supplies of raw material. The problem is approaching dimensions which may give our government some concern.

One way out, of course, would be to lift the ceiling on the finished product. But we do not want to do that. There will probably be no ceiling for that portion of material which goes into war products, but one cannot reasonably sell a product at one price to a customer who has been on your books for twenty or thirty years and is operating a necessary industry, and sell the same product to some other industry which is engaged on "bits and pieces" or any sort of munitions work and expect that one will have anything but chaos in that particular industry. I admit that the problem is a difficult one, but I think the Department of Munitions and Supply should be apprised of what they are going to be faced with during the year 1942, and I would appreciate it if the Minister of Munitions and Supply or some other minister would make a statement on the matter before the house adjourns until January, so that the year 1942 will not find the entire situation upset.

To follow it along a little further, what actually happens to-day is this. Many large United States industries have branch plants in Canada, and these branch plants interchange raw material between the branch plants and the main plant in the United States. The branch plants try to concentrate on one line of manufacture, and they may gather up in Canada the raw material for half a dozen lines of manufacture of similar commodities. There may be as many as twenty factories between Canada and the United States using probably twenty different kinds of raw material. In one city they would concentrate on the manufacture of one grade of raw material, another in Buffalo, another in Chicago, and so forth, and concentrate on another manufacture in Montreal, another in Brantford, and another in Toronto. Thus the raw material is flowing back and forth all the time. My question is, where is it going to flow to? If the prevailing market in the United States has no ceiling on it, which is the condition that obtains to-day, it offers a much better market, and are we going to be handicapped and embarrassed to a degree by the manufacture of munitions and the hundreds and thousands of supplies of all sorts which come under the purview of the minister?

Mr. HOWE: The problem put forward by my hon. friend the member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) is not a new one. Exports are controlled by export licences in lines where there is a threatened shortage for Canadian purposes. At the present time licences are required for the export of any steel product, and licences have been required for a good while for the export of certain chemicals. It is the practice of our department, whenever a material gets in short supply, to place that material under the necessity of export licence.

In the matter of lumber we have a situation where we have no export licences because it has not been thought necessary. About fifty per cent of our lumber is consumed in Canada, I suppose, and about fifty per cent is exported. What is exported brings prices anywhere from twenty to forty per cent higher than can be obtained by sale in Canada. One might say that that is a case where we must exercise export control, but as a matter of fact the industry is regulated by a controller, and the controller, by agreement with the industry, has provided that as long as the industry will supply to Canada at pegged prices the lumber required in Canada, it is quite welcome to export the remainder. The trade have played the game; there has been no shortage of timber in Canada, and the industry has been able to market about fifty per cent of its product in the United States.

The steel situation requires control. If a dealer in Canada could buy a keg of nails and get an export permit,. he could sell it to any south American country for twice what he paid for it and never see the keg of nails. There, of course, is a situation which requires control, and we have control of the steel industry. Unless it can be shown that a manufacturer of steel products is supplying an old customer in a market that has always been his, he is not likely to get a permit for the export of steel from Canada to-day. That will be extended perhaps to all products in Canada as the pegged price in Canada tends to spread from the prices abroad.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps I should take the time of the committee to put on the record this letter which came to my attention only this morning. I have not been given permission to use the name of the writer, and therefore I shall omit that. The letter is dated November 5, 1941. I asked my question on November 4, the day preceding. The letter reads as follows:

We have been offered extremely good prices for shipment of . . . to the United States.

We realize and appreciate the fact that we have been shipping to you for some time at prices that were established in January, 1941, but in view of the present price ceiling we are unable to ask you to quote prices that would compete with our American buyer.

We would ask you, however, if you are willing to allow us to ship certain quantities of this raw material to the above-mentioned buyer in the United States. . . .

I am not going to mention the name.

. . . and if you would consider this would you kindly advise what proportion you would consider releasing for the American market?

Unfortunately we did not review our prices earlier and hence we are saddled with fixed prices which we do not believe are in line with what was readily obtainable in the basic period, September 15 to October 11.

We know that a number of people are in the same boat and of course it will take some time before adjustments are made to take care of this ceiling price.

We hope you will consider what we have requested and trust that you can give us an early reply.

That particular contract represents fifty-two carloads of material, and that is only a portion of a total of 19,000 tons. This firm which is in the same boat happens to be connected directly with the sandpaper industry. All I ask is that some recital of policy be given, so that the relationships between contractors, manufacturers and their sources of supply will not be disrupted too much.

Mr. HOWE: I think I can say with confidence that if my hon. friend will notify the proper controller, either in the Department of Munitions and Supply or in the war-time prices and trade board, of his request, an export licence will be required for that material. The government will require to be convinced that there is sufficient for Canadian needs at the pegged price before any export whatever is permitted.

Mr. FAIR: If I may return to the question of gas, which seems an appropriate subject here, I wonder whether the minister could tell us what has become of the Pogue carburettor—whether it is in the process of being put on the market?

Mr. HOWE: I shared my hon. friend's interest in the Pogue carburettor at the time it was a subject of interest, and I know of the so-called experiments carried out with it in the west. The inventor of the carburettor finally found a wealthy sponsor in the person of Mr. J. E. Hammell, one of Canada's great mining men. Mr. Hammell moved Mr. Pogue and the carburettor into his own estate near Toronto, fitted up a workshop for him, and took pains to see that the development was carried out by proper experts. Mr. Hammell has never been willing to quite say what happened to the Pogue carburettor, but he did say that he spent about $40,000 or $50,000 and decided that it could not be made a financial success. I can assure hon. members that there was no sinister influence from either the big oil companies or the automobile companies; they had nothing to do with it. Mr. Hammell took the thing in charge because those accusations were made and he wanted to have an independent inquiry and see what could be developed from it.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise at this hour of the evening, a quarter past ten, because at the present time there is a black-out in several cities of the province of Quebec, which are protected by adding darkness to darkness, by making the night blacker. The modern Joshuas do not stop the sun, as happened in the olden time, but they prevent the moon from shining—and it means that this country is well-protected!

What is the purpose of this black-out? It is to prevent the enemy from seeing military secrets which do not exist. If you remember, Mr. Chairman, last year, when I asked what kind of protection was accorded to the county of Témiscouata against any attack by land or sea or air, I had from the Minister of National Defence this insolent reply, "It is a military secret"—when there was no defence at all.

I find that this black-out business is a sinister joke on the Canadian people. What, sir, a black-out! And all that light shining on the St. Lawrence river? A black-out from here, a black-out from there, a little space of darkness on the lights of my province or on the lights of any province in Canada!

The Minister of Munitions and Supply gave us figures about the production of armaments in this country. I do not believe what he says; I believe what I see, and I see nothing. Let us go up the tower of this building and look round the roof of this building, or the roof of the east block, the west block, the confederation building, the justice building, or any other of hundreds of buildings round here; how many anti-aircraft guns are there? None. They are well hidden; it is a military secret; there are none. Where is the member of parliament who has seen one anti-aircraft gun in Ottawa or in any other city of this dominion? There are none. Yet we hear of millions, hundreds of millions of dollars being spent for munitions and supplies; we hear of this from the mouth of the minister, and on paper, and in the stupid propaganda of the bureau of information. As a Canadian I am fed-up with that. "Black-out" means protection against the enemy who is coming to invade this country, and what protection have we in Canada? None. All our munitions are going abroad—meaning that Canada does not need to be defended, that eastern Canada where I live and where many people live, does not need to be protected. I submit it is an absurdity.

What about these corporations à l'italienne and these commissars à la russe that infest the Departments of Munitions and Supply? During the last war, when Sir Robert Borden was in power, at the time of the union government, there was only one man handling all the business in which there is now such a mix-up. That man has been honoured by the king; he is a former colleague and a very dear friend of mine; he is the lieutenant-governor of the province of Quebec, Major-General Sir Eugene Fiset, formerly deputy minister of national defence, at a time when there was no such mess as the Department of Munitions and Supply, against which I protested at the start. He alone handled all the business. How is it that at that time one man from Quebec, Major-General Sir Eugene Fiset, whom we all respect, could do the work of all those nonentities who are now in the Department of Munitions and Supply, and who never cease to pass regulations which swear at each other all the time? The minister cannot say anything against General Fiset because he saved his skin in the committee of railways, canals and telegraph lines when he replaced the deputy speaker, the chairman of the committee of the whole. Sir Eugene Fiset was a good man; he is still a good man; he is lieutenant-governor of Quebec. It took hundreds or thousands of people to replace that man. During the time of the Borden government and the union government, Sir Robert Borden was strong enough to put Sam Hughes out and to replace him with General Mewburn, which showed his strength, his determination and his firm will to have an able man at the head of the department.

I am a Liberal; I have never been a Tory and I never will be, although I have many friends on the Conservative side. But in time of war there should be freedom of speech and one should never be afraid to tell the truth. As a Canadian, I should be ashamed of myself if I took for granted all that is said by the minister. My eyes cannot deceive me. Where is the member of parliament who has seen aircraft here in action over parliament hill? There was a display of floodlights some time ago, but none of those who were operating those lights could find the aeroplanes that were in the sky, and an aeroplane had to come into the middle of the beam of light, it had to expose itself, in order to be seen.

The law of the land is the mobilization act, which provides for the defence of Canada. We should be defended, but we are not now. All sentimentality should cease. I have had enough of bed-time stories. I want to see some of these guns, some of that ammunition that we hear so much about and never see. I want to see every part of the country well defended; I want to see the Department of Munitions and Supply serving some purpose. I do not want it only to give an opportunity to some capitalists to receive subsidies that are so high, higher even than the amount issued to the public for the building of a dry dock or anything of that sort.

I will not "dot the i's" to-night. It will be enough to mention some schemes floated along at the expense of the public for the building of a dry dock, a ship, or plants adjacent thereto. The issue was so much and they received from the Department of Munitions and Supply a subsidy so high that not only did it cover the issue but there was a surplus; and those who received such subsidies were embarrassed. They did not know whether they were to distribute the surplus as dividends to shareholders of the company, or remit it to the public treasury. Moreover, there was a depreciation of fifty per cent per annum which was supplied to that company. It is not surprising that we have a lot of expenditures now. What amount is spent for England; what amount is spent for Canada; what is protected by the black-out? We have a right to know, and if the minister cannot answer in public but repeats again the eternal story that it is a military secret, then let us sit in camera. Let us clear the galleries and let us get true information.

Members of parliament should be relied upon as much as any business man who comes here to make money in the Department of Munitions and Supply and to organize trusts. I said—and it was not denied either by the Minister of National Defence or by the Minister of Munitions and Supply before the last adjournment—that on the treasury benches there were men who wanted to organize Italian corporatism, Italian fascism in Canada. I am for democracy, and I regret that my hon. friend from Parkdale is not in his seat. But members must recollect that when it was desired to have the hon. gentleman who was in the chair—he was not you, sir—prevent the hon. member for Parkdale from speaking, I said: "Let him speak; I will answer him afterwards; but both of us must be given freedom." That is what I understand by Liberalism, and my freedom of speech shall not be curtailed by anyone in this house. I was here a long time before the pontiffs of materialism who are now handling the business of this country in certain departments, and what I think is that the human lives of my constituents and the lives of other citizens in Canada are worth more than any pile of money, worth more than any of those earthly treasures that some people seem to appreciate so much. If the people of Canada are ready to make the supreme sacrifice in the defence of this land, there should be a general clean-up in the Augean stables of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not quite agree with the Minister of Pensions and National Health when he says that we have exhausted this department. I do not think that we can exhaust that department or exhaust the minister even though some of us would like to exhaust the whole government. I wonder whether the Minister of Munitions and Supply would give the committee the procedure that is followed when the government buys land on which to establish an air training school. My understanding is that the government have their agents out looking for desired sites. The agent will go to the owner of the land, who may be a farmer. I suppose most of the land is owned by farmers, and the agent will dicker with the farmer. He will tell the farmer that the government is going to establish an air training school here, that this particular property has been chosen for the school and that the government must have it. Perhaps he asks the farmer how much he wants for his land. The tendency may be for an individual to say then, "Well, now, here is a chance to make a little money." I suppose that is sometimes done. Anyway, the farmer will quote his price; the agent will say, "Oh, that is much too much," and the agent then will suggest how much the land is worth, which perhaps is about half what the farmer asks for. Then there will come bargaining one with the other. I am told that these agents will say to the farmers, "Well, now, there is no use in your bucking the government; the government is going to take the land anyway. Of course, if you want to go to court about it, that is your own business." But no farmer wants to go to court against the government; he thinks he will not win the case anyhow, so eventually he is brought to a place where he will accept what is offered. The agent reports to his superiors and the deal is closed. Would the minister tell us just what happens when an agent reports to his superiors what the land has been offered for? If there is a board of arbitration has the minister any record of the board raising the ante on the farmer and giving more than he asked? Perhaps it would be in order on some occasion to ask for a return of the amounts paid for these parcels of land; however, I am not interested in that for the moment. Would the minister tell us exactly what the procedure is? I have in mind the case of a man who claims to have been paid half what his property was really worth.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Munitions and Supply arranged with the Canadian National Railways that the experienced land department of that railway would acquire the lands needed by the department, and that practice has been followed in all our land purchases. Mr. Clark, the head of the land department of the national railway, with his staff, has made all the arrangements. My hon. friend gave the procedure. Of course, before any land is purchased, the government is free to act, and the usual practice is, I think, to test out the value of land in that area by endeavouring to make actual purchases. If that is done and it is not possible to complete the purchase by offer and acceptance, then expropriation is proceeded with, and the reluctant seller has the choice of going before the exchequer court and taking the value placed by the court or settling with the government. Sometimes one course is followed, sometimes another. I have heard many criticisms of prices paid for land, but as far as western Canada is concerned the criticism has seldom been that the price was too low. I think my hon. friend will find that usually it is well above the normal price in the area.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is it necessary that plans be signed by the Minister of National Defence for Air and the commandant in that area before an airport is constructed?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is it never done otherwise?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: Have any steps been taken to set up a steel rolling mill in British Columbia? As I understand, there is no way of disposing of scrap iron there unless it is sent to the United States; yet many cargo vessels are being built for which steel has to be imported, and steel will be needed there for a long time. Would it not be worth while for the government to put in a rolling mill or whatever plant is necessary to make use of that local supply?

Mr. HOWE: The government never builds mills of that kind itself. It will assist in the financing of a mill, and I have offered to do that on one or two occasions with those who take an interest in the situation at Vancouver, but the matter has never been followed up. There are difficulties; Vancouver is ordinarily a sort of dumping ground for the eastern mills. Ordinarily the price of steel products in Vancouver is lower than in Sydney or in Hamilton where the steel is made, and all the companies seem to compete in that area. It is very doubtful whether an industry put there at this time could succeed in peace time.

As far as building steel ships goes, the contribution of an electric furnace would be of very little use, only to make castings suitable for bolts and nuts and foundry work of that kind. It could not make ship plates or ship shapes or any of the highly finished products. The small capacity furnace that would be warranted by the amount of scrap available in British Columbia would be neither here nor there. We would like a small supply of that type of steel on the west coast, and my offer is still open if we can find anyone willing to risk their own money in the venture and supply the management.

Mr. SHAW: In connection with land purchases, is the actual contract negotiated with the assistance of officers of the crown, or has the department lawyers in the employ of the government in the various provinces?

Mr. HOWE: The actual negotiations are carried out by the land department of the railway. In acquiring the title we apply to the Department of Justice for legal assistance, and if they have an officer in the area they usually refer it to that officer; if not, they choose a solicitor, usually convenient to the area, who conducts the search and certifies the title.

Mr. HANSELL: Is there a board of arbitration at all?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. McNIVEN: The other day when the Minister of National Defence for Air was speaking he described the repair and overhaul of aeroplanes as a troublesome problem. What facilities are available in western Canada for the repair and overhaul of aeroplanes? What policy is pursued? If it is done in large centres or central plants, where are those plants located and what capital assistance has been given towards their construction and equipment?

There are a number of aerodromes in western Canada, a number of schools being operated, and I understand there is a staff in each of those aerodromes, varying from twenty to perhaps seventy mechanics, more or less proficient, who make minor repairs and who in course of time become so skilled in these repairs that they tell me they could take care of anything except the repair of a crashed plane. Does that come under the Department of Munitions and Supply, and would the department consider the extension of the plan, supplying each aerodrome with some additional equipment so that even more extensive repairs could be undertaken?

The other day the minister stated that the shortage of parts was a serious problem. What provision has the department made with regard to furnishing parts, and to what extent could the smaller machine shops throughout western Canada be used in the making of these repair parts? We have, as I said before, a large number of skilled mechanics in the west, I should have said still in the west. From week to week these men are being drained into industry in eastern Canada. Only some three weeks ago an advertisement appeared in all the western papers asking lathe men, grinders, borers and other skilled operators to apply to the employment agency, stating that their expenses would be paid to points in eastern Canada. I realize that the Minister of Munitions and Supply is most anxious to obtain a completed product, but we who live in the west dislike this continued migration of our skilled workers to other parts of Canada. Therefore I would once more urgently call to his attention the desirability of bringing industry, and a greater part of Canada's war effort, to the point where the labour can be found.

Mr. HOWE: As far as the overhaul of planes is concerned, the Royal Canadian Air Force maintains an overhaul staff at each airport. A plane, of course, is overhauled almost every time it lands. It is checked out each morning after an inspection, and any minor repairs are made by the staff. The air force can expand these staffs as much as it wishes, but I think it has been found economical to have them do only the minor repairs. Any major overhaul, such as the tearing down of an engine, the repairing of a wing, or anything of that sort, is sent to one of the overhaul centres which are operated by the Department of Munitions and Supply. Each type of engine has its own overhaul plant, one in western Canada and one in eastern Canada. The engine would be sent to that plant, which has facilities for tearing it down, replacing any defective parts, rebuilding it and testing it for use. Similarly the planes are sent to certain major overhaul depots where they are stripped down and where defective parts are replaced. There are a number of these depots in western Canada; two at Vancouver, one at Edmonton, one at Prince Albert, one at Moose Jaw and one at either Medicine Hat or Lethbridge. There is a very large one at Winnipeg.

Certainly the intention has been to repair in western Canada the planes used in western Canada. The plan we have followed in locating the major overhaul bases has been to expand existing industries. In Vancouver we had two pre-war repair industries; these have been expanded. We had an overhaul plant at Edmonton, which had been in existence for a good many years; that was expanded, and the same thing was done at Prince Albert and Moose Jaw. In Winnipeg we had MacDonald Brothers, which plant now has been expanded into a very large overhaul project. As my hon. friend has said, the repair of aeroplanes, both major and minor, is a very large and growing problem. I think I said in my statement that the major overhaul plants would handle about five thousand planes this year. Of course some planes would be handled two or three times, but nevertheless the number of planes requiring overhaul this year will be about five thousand. We estimate that next year the number of planes requiring overhaul in all Canada will be ten thousand, so this in itself has become a major industry.

Mr. REID: There was a return brought down to-day showing the exports of steel scrap from British Columbia. Does the minister think it is good business on our part to allow steel scrap to be exported from British Columbia when it is so greatly required for the manufacture of steel in Canada? In answering that question, could the minister tell us what has become of the shipload of steel scrap that was on the ss. Boris, tied up at the Vancouver dock? My view is that no steel scrap should be exported from Canada, because every pound of it will be and is required for the manufacture of our steel.

Mr. HOWE: It is all very well to say that not a pound of steel scrap should be exported from Canada, but we must remember that on balance we are importers of steel scrap to the extent of about five hundred thousand tons a year. There is no steel industry in Vancouver at the present time; in fact, to my knowledge there never has been a steel industry there. We have scrap in British Columbia, which is not an economical area for any steel consuming furnace. When we are asking the United States to give us scrap in the eastern area to the extent of about five hundred thousand tons a year—and I may add that without this scrap we would not be able to conduct our steel operations at Sydney, Hamilton or Sault Ste. Marie at the present rate of production—it is very difficult for us to refuse to export to the United States scrap which is needed there and which is in an uneconomical area in Canada. You may say provincial politics will prevent it, if you like; nevertheless this is a national problem of great importance, and we are meeting it as we should meet national problems. In other words, we are allowing the scrap to move out of an uneconomical area for the sake of getting a very much larger tonnage of scrap in an economical area, where the scrap can be used for war purposes.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information regarding the 7,500 tons of steel scrap tied up in the Greek ship ss. Boris?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I think the ship and its cargo of scrap are still at the dock. Our department is very much interested in both the ship and its cargo, but so far no means has been found of acquiring ownership. Greece, of course, is not an enemy of Canada; it is an ally, and as yet we have not been able to find a Greek government which can release the ship to Canada. We are hardly justified in seizing it from a friend, and we cannot buy it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to put on record an observation with regard to the matter discussed a moment ago by the hon. member for Regina. Perhaps the minister will be able to give some thought to it, or possibly he may be able to reply. In my opinion one branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply has not been given sufficient consideration; that is the branch having to do with the salvage, for example, from the five thousand planes the minister mentioned a moment or two ago. Quite a number of planes are not overhauled. As the minister knows, badly crashed planes are thrown into the corner until after the inquest and whatnot. They remain there for a considerable length of time and eventually find their way into ordinary scrap, aluminum, steel, or whatever it may be. I would not suggest for a moment that some branch of the air force, taking its advice from the Department of Munitions and Supply, should try to reclaim those parts to put in other planes, but I do believe that a very large quantity of parts of considerable value might find their way into the ordinary plant repairs and maintenance requirements of industry. They would be worth a good deal of money, much more than would be their value for salvage. On account of freight rates it is difficult to move large quantities of salvage to points of consumption, but a large number of parts used in industry—because, after all, they are standard goods—could be put to useful purposes, and add to the general economy of Canada.

I believe, if the minister would have an investigation made at Uplands, he would find motors which may have been in crashes, and other parts of planes, left out so that they are rusting and spoiling. I would ask the minister to answer this portion of my question: Is there any branch in his department giving attention to the matter of salvage? Do not let there be any misunderstanding, I would not for one moment ask that the spare parts be put back into aeroplanes which are carrying people 10,000 feet up in the air. I would not ask that such a chance be taken. At the same time there is a market for those parts, and it seems to me that with the elaborate inspection system in the Department of Munitions and Supply they could be reclaimed and put back into service in industry, if not within the Department of Munitions and Supply itself.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Munitions and Supply has a scrap disposal division, but it deals more particularly with scrap from our own industry, such as turnings from shell castings and gun forgings. Crashed aeroplanes, however, are the property of the Royal Canadian Air Force. My hon. friend may know of instances where engines have been left out in the open. I would not question his knowledge, but I would assume that parts of engines are so badly needed as spare parts for the Royal Canadian Air Force that an engine would be reclaimed very quickly and stripped.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is not being done to the extent it should be.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to take the matter up with our own aircraft department, and with my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air, and we will see that it is done. I fully agree that it should be done. Of course, no property of the government can be sold, except through the salvage officer in the Department of Finance. That office is functioning. Any reclamation or sale of government property is carried on through it.

Mr. ESLING: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the matter of real estate, and I do so because I would expect him to be in ignorance of the case I shall place before him. After, however, I relate the circumstances, he may wish to have a chat with someone in his department entrusted with the erection of buildings. In the Slocan valley at a point called Crestover there is a beam station. Two residences were constructed for those looking after the station. Each of those residences cost $9,000, and the director of housing in Ottawa told me that the average price for a six-roomed residence under the government plan is about $4,500.

The blue-prints and specifications in this instance constitute a huge volume more than an inch in thickness. Who the architect was, I do not know, but I would ask hon. members to follow the plans. Downstairs there are two bedrooms, a bathroom and a kitchen. There is also a combination livingroom and diningroom. Upstairs there are three bedrooms, but no bathroom. The joke is that the specifications call for a waterproof concrete foundation. The fact is, however, that two or three wells have been drilled to a depth of over 400 feet, and water has not been found.

I know the minister resents any suggestion of politics, but I must point out that within thirty miles of these buildings there resides a Montreal architect who moved to Kootenay West for the purpose of supervising and planning the construction of a $100,000 residence. His further capabilities were indicated by the fact that he was awarded a prize for the construction of the Canadian building at the world's fair. Nobody in the interior was given an opportunity either to review or to tender on the buildings. But the one who did get the contract was a man who had done most of the Liberal contracting in Kootenay West for the last twenty years, and he resides in Vancouver, 500 miles away.

This means that $9,000 was thrown away on those buildings. The two buildings could have been constructed for $9,000, instead of only one of them. The people resent this, when they stop to think that they are striving to meet the government's appeal for the purchase of war savings certificates and victory bonds. Surely the minister would admit that any repetition of such reckless and useless expenditure should not occur.

Mr. HOWE: Houses of that type are built by the Department of Transport. They build a great many of them. I recognize the layout of the house described by the hon. member, because I have been in many of them.

Mr. ESLING: The man upstairs could not take a bath, I suppose.

Mr. HOWE: There is a full basement in those houses. They contain first-class heating plants, because they are usually built in remote areas. Of course they have complete plumbing. Because they are built in remote areas they are of fireproof construction. I believe my hon. friend will agree that they are of either concrete or brick construction.

Mr. ESLING: No; they are frame.

Mr. HOWE: I would be surprised to find that. The ones I have seen are of fireproof construction. I shall, however, look into the matter. May I point out that tenders are usually let. The plans are advertised in local papers. That is the procedure which has been followed by the Department of Public Works for many years, and I cannot imagine that the contractor would obtain very much more than the fair cost of the building. The plans may be extravagant, but, as I say, they are plans which have been adopted as being suitable for similar buildings in other parts of Canada. My hon. friend has, however, pointed out that this is a frame building, and for that reason I would be pleased to look into it, and perhaps give him some information with respect to it later.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I would ask for a reply to-morrow to the question I asked on November 4.

Mr. HOWE: I will give it.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 11.03 p.m.

Tuesday, November 11, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR APPOINTMENTS TO BE MADE THIS WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Labour when it is anticipated that appointments will be made to positions on the national war labour board?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): It is anticipated that these appointments will be made almost immediately. May I explain that any delay in the appointments is not due to any action of the government. The recommendations have to come from the national labour supply council, and practically all the representatives of labour on that council and a great many representatives of the manufacturers have been attending the International Labour Organization meeting in New York. They returned only on Monday, and we expect to get their recommendations on Thursday.

FISHERIES

REGULATIONS WITH RESPECT TO EXPORT OF HERRING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries in relation to the order in council, passed in August last, under which the fisheries regulations were amended in so far as they relate to the province of New Brunswick, and which provided for the banning of the export of herring between January 1 and April 15 in each year. As he is aware, the matter has been under reconsideration—if that is a proper term to use—and I was informed that a meeting was held in the United States recently—this very last week. I want to know if it has now been decided to rescind the regulation, or what the position is.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): The matter is still under advisement. Negotiations are being carried on with the United States authorities with a view of satisfying all concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Satisfying all concerned"! That means that you are going to rescind it; that is the only way to satisfy them.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BALLOT IN FORD MOTOR COMPANY PLANT—LETTER OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour if his attention has been drawn to an advertisement which appeared in, I believe, the Windsor Star on the seventh of this month. A copy of the page has been sent, I understand, to hon. members. I am not going to read the advertisement, but I wish to draw attention to a copy of a letter which has been inserted in the advertisement, and which has been sent by the president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada to each employee of the company at Windsor. The letter has to do with the organization of the employees in the plant. It begins:

> Let's discuss this organization question, man to man.
> You have been approached, or will be approached, by organizers urging you to sign up with a certain union.
> Everyone knows what they promise.

Then it says that this will cost the employees $150,000 a year. Further on in the letter, as it appears in the advertisement, it is stated:

> The impartial services of the Department of Labour of the dominion government are available for just such a purpose. Under their supervision a committee of employees can be nominated and elected by secret ballot. This ballot would give every man a chance to express his real opinion on this question.

Has this been drawn to the minister's attention, and if it has, does he not think that it violates or contravenes paragraph 6 of order in council P.C. 2685, which states:

That employees should be free to organize in trade unions, free from any control by employers or their agents.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I did not see the advertisement. I do not know that it is necessary for me to go into it in any great detail at the present time. The reason is this. Both employers and employees agreed that they would hold a ballot under the auspices of the Department of Labour. Those auspices have been provided. The form of the ballot has been agreed upon. I believe that every detail in connection with the vote has been agreed upon between the employers and the employees; if there is any detail outstanding it is a very small one. The vote is to take place on Thursday. I do not think that I can go further than to say that those representing the union to which the hon. member for Vancouver East has referred have expressed their complete approval of all the arrangements that have been made; and so has the company.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister did not answer my question. I asked him whether this did not violate or contravene P.C. 2685—interference with the employees in forming a union of their own choice.

Mr. McLARTY: The suggestion was made by the company that a vote be taken to obtain the wish of the employees of the company as to whether or not they desired to join a particular union. The union said, "That is perfectly fair; we are willing to have a vote taken to determine whether or not the majority of the employees of this plant wish to join this union." Surely there is no violation of order in council P.C. 2685, or any other, in a mutual agreement on the part of the company and the employees, who decide that this is the fairest method of determining the wishes of the employees themselves.

MARITIME PROVINCE LUMBER WORKERS EMPLOYED IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. O'BRIEN (Northumberland, N.B.): Yesterday the Prime Minister was good enough to reply to a former question of mine with regard to the passage of woodsworkers across the international boundary. His reply specifically mentioned the product of "a good proportion" of such workers as eventually reaching Saint John, New Brunswick. I wish to ask the following questions: (a) How many workers are actually so engaged in connection with Saint John, New Brunswick, industries? (b) How many are so engaged the product of whose labour does not return to Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Obviously I cannot give an answer at the moment, but I shall try to secure the information.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE—TRANSFER OF FUNDS TO THE UNITED STATES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) asked a question with regard to remittances of funds by representatives of labour unions in Canada to head offices or other offices of labour unions in the United States. The question was connected with one relating to the International Labour Office, and that part of the question may have been completely answered by the Prime Minister. However, I have here a complete reply which I will now give.

As the Prime Minister stated yesterday, the International Labour Organization is an intergovernmental body and the arrangements regarding the operations of its bank accounts as set out in the Canada Gazette of October 25 confirm the international status of these accounts and in general place them on the same basis as the accounts of diplomatic representatives of foreign countries. As the members of the house are no doubt aware, the International Labour Organization is a part of the League of Nations which formerly had its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. When it became impossible to carry out the important duties of this body from Geneva the director of the International Labour Organization accepted in the summer of 1940 an invitation from McGill university to establish a working centre in Montreal.

As a matter of interest to the house, I would mention that the budget of the International Labour Organization is established in a hard currency, namely, Swiss francs. Their expenses in Canada over and above the portion covered by the regular annual contribution of the Canadian government are met from the proceeds of the sale of hard currency to the foreign exchange control board. This is in effect a transfer of United States funds to Canada. The establishment of a working centre of the International Labour Organization in Montreal therefore has the incidental effect of bringing United States exchange into the country.

The hon. member for Parkdale will realize that the arrangements made for the International Labour Organization do not grant any privileges or concessions to the Committee for Industrial Organization or other similar labour bodies.

The government's policy is to provide foreign exchange for the payment of fees, dues or other normal contributions in connection with membership in all recognized international professional, occupational or fraternal organizations. These include such organizations as international service clubs, fraternal societies, trade and professional associations as well as international labour unions. All these various types of international organizations are treated on exactly the same basis and no preferred treatment is given to any one of them.

FEED GRAINS

POLICY AS TO FREIGHT RATES ON SHIPMENTS EASTWARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Will the Minister of Agriculture make a statement before the house rises regarding the policy of the government in the payment of freight rates on western grains moved eastward for feed purposes? What safeguards are being provided to ensure that the farmers will get the benefit of this payment of freight rates; to whom should they make application, and so on? Will the minister give a brief outline indicating what the policy of the government is?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): What I said the other day will apply very well as an answer to the question. Just as soon as the departments which are now under review have finished answering questions, I shall be here, prepared to answer any questions with regard to such matters as distribution of feed grain. I shall give such information as may be deemed necessary.

PRIVILEGE—MR. ILSLEY

PRESS REPORT AS TO TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I rise to a question of privilege. A press report published on November 4, purporting to set out the travelling expenses of various ministers of the government, gave the travelling expenses of the Minister of Finance for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, as $17,257—that is, for the Minister of Finance and secretaries. For the previous year ended March 31, 1940, the amount given was $544. So far as I am concerned—and I was Minister of National Revenue part of the time and Minister of Finance for another part—the figures are as follows: For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940, for myself and two secretaries, $1,743.62; for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, $585 for myself and nothing for secretaries.

This information is contained in sessional paper No. 335. I mention this merely because the statement is receiving some circulation, particularly in my province, and it has been suggested that unless it is corrected it might possibly have some detrimental effect on the war savings campaign.

THE WAR

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941—CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The house again in committee of the whole, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): As I came into the chamber I saw staring me in the face "November 11", and I thought back some twenty-three short years ago to another November 11. What a change, what a difference, Mr. Chairman, in two decades! Did we go far enough twenty-three years ago? I doubt it very much. Are we going far enough to-day? I say, nay; we are not going far enough. We are not doing all that we are capable of doing. In the last decade there have been voids, not of a day or of a month, but of a year when we were not at our task in furtherance of the things we hold dear. I do not purpose to sound a note of criticism or say anything to belittle the effort that is now being made. I do not purpose to recite history or geography; we have had enough of that. But we have not had nearly enough about what we are going to do in the present emergency. We all know that we failed during the last decade. We all know where the responsibility lies; I am not going to recite it. We all know from our press and other sources of information what has taken place. When I think of the state of Europe I am impelled to say a word on the state of our nation, the state of democracy, the state of our empire. But first let me deal for a moment with Europe.

The first minister of the crown gave you the history and the geography up to the present, and then he stopped. It has been my privilege to know something of Europe. A dozen of the capital cities of former independent states are to-day under the heel of Hitler. From the Arctic to the Aegean, from the walls of Moscow to the Pyrenees, the people of Europe are under the heel of Hitler. Who are the people who are under that heel? We know them—broad-backed, short-legged men and women who have known nothing for many generations but hard work; two hundred million of them enslaved to a hundred million slave-drivers. Yet on all sides we see signs in our land of a lack of continued effort. We find the power of this chamber not harnessed to-day, this chamber which is the detonator or sounding-board of the nation, this chamber which is the only free expression of opinion in Canada. Sitting here to-day many hon. members feel that they ought to be out of here, ought to be at home, that they are not doing any good here. They feel that perhaps this is not the way to inspire the nation. That sounding-board in the fourth estate cannot refuse to disseminate what is placed on the record of Hansard. It will not be censored; it will be recorded freely in a censored press. It may be repeated over the radio and it may be of some consequence in helping us to call for an all-out effort. I do not criticize too much the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); I know he has to be away from this chamber a good deal. As I said some years ago, the ministers of the crown should have some kind of organization that would relieve them of the necessity of sitting here long hours; they should have deputies or undersecretaries to carry out the little duties so that the ministers themselves could come in to attend to the big duties.

Sitting opposite me to-day is the Minister of Munitions and Supply, operating the biggest industrial enterprise that Canada ever knew; indeed I am of the opinion that the industry of which he is managing director is the greatest on the north American continent. Why should he have to sit here and listen to speeches such as he had to listen to yesterday? I take full responsibility for what I found it necessary to say, and more and more is going to be said. But the responsibility for such a set-up as we have is on our present organization. I say to the Prime Minister: there are men within your own ranks, and hon. members on this side, who are well able and anxious to do something on behalf of Canada. Inspire them; use them; put them to work. The Prime Minister, speaking of a certain committee, said that it afforded an opportunity for hon. members of the House of Commons to do some useful work. In the operations of the war expenditures committee, what opportunity was given? None. Was it fair; was it set up in such a way that it could be of real service? It did some good. What took place during those hot days of June, July, August and September? What was being done in the supposed centre of all activity in Canada—Ottawa? I said on one occasion, and I reiterate it now, that Ottawa was like a morgue. Who was chairman of that committee? A member of the government. First they thought of subdividing the committee into five; then when it was apparent that four members of the official opposition could not be divided into five parts they made it three, so that we had one member on each subcommittee, except one on which we had two. So that a member of the official opposition could move a motion, but was often unable to find a seconder. The committee was improperly formed; the electorate of Canada was not equally represented, and we did not have the opportunity of doing all the work we would like to have done. But I shall have more to say on that a little later.

On this occasion I want my remarks to be more appropriate to the day—this sacred day, Remembrance day. I point out to the Prime Minister and the government that our people are looking for more leadership, not only from the Prime Minister but from all of us. It seems to me that we in Canada and in this house are acting like people in the bleachers at a football match. We are watching the game. We are watching Russia, watching Germany; our spirits go up and down; we do not seem to realize that we ourselves are in the game. We are coming to the semi-finals. One by one those opposed to totalitarianism have been defeated. To-day with our wishful thinking we are hoping that Russia will hold out. Very shortly the finals are coming. Where are we going to be then? Will our people be so firmly joined in a united effort that we can give a good account of ourselves? Those of us who are gathered together in this chamber have a direct responsibility to see to it that our people are doing everything possible. But you cannot discharge that responsibility if you go to your homes and let this House of Commons sink back into the moribund state which existed here between the close of June and the beginning of November. We have no right to go home until we point the way in all our activities, and until our people feel that we are doing everything we possibly can do.

When I think of the strength of those opposing democracy it frightens me, and I am not one who is easily frightened. When I think—and I say this in all kindness—of the weakness of our national effort, led by the present administration, it frightens me. Why do I say that? Not because the Minister of Justice is ill and absent from his place; not because the Minister of Transport is ill. I have a profound respect for those hon. gentlemen; I am sorry they are not here, but because they are ill Hitler has not stopped the war. Someone should be found not to replace them but to take charge of their departments; and I would not limit it to that. I am thinking of what these two hon. gentlemen mean, and what they represent, to one quarter of our population, people who were citizens of Canada long before many of us were Canadians, whose families have been in this country for many generations. What they feel in their minds and hearts is not being fully represented in this chamber. In all possible kindness I say to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot): You may reflect some of the sentiment in your province, but you are only human and you cannot reflect it all. We need all the inspiration it is possible to get during these very difficult and trying times.

Let us to-day, then, rededicate ourselves one and all to the cause which concerns us day and night. Let no word of mine be regarded as of a pessimistic nature. I want to be realistic all through this difficult time. I want to know what is happening. Several hon. gentlemen opposite have been in England. All those who have been there should tell those of us who have not had that privilege exactly what is in their hearts. To-day I speak from my heart, from my head, and from the very depths of my soul, just rambling on trying to tell you how I feel about the state of our nation. If we must have a closed session in order that those who have been there may tell us what is going on, let it be a closed session. I take second place to no one in this chamber in my desire that everything for the good of the nation should be discussed in open session. I have had some experience during the last few months in that regard, and I have not altered my point of view; but if the Prime Minister in his judgment says we should have a closed session if we are to have the truth, then let us have a secret session. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, are the men in this chamber my colleagues or must I listen to their stories told in whispers, and draw my own conclusions? During the twenty years I have sat here I have thought, and still think, that the members of this house are my colleagues. What I know that is in the interests of the nation, they should know; what they know that is in the interests of the nation, I should know. Otherwise I am not able to serve to the best of my ability. I do not want to listen to scandalmongers on street corners as to what is happening over there. I want to listen to those who have been there; and I demand of the administration now that my request be given consideration.

We get information from other sources, of course, and we reveal that information in this chamber so that the nation in turn may know what is going on. I received a letter only last evening from Welwyn Garden City, Herts, England. This letter is from the managing director's office of a very large concern in London; it is dated 21/10/41, and is postmarked Ottawa, November 10. It reached Ottawa last night. This is what the writer says:

> And so this wretched war drags on! The feeling here is just this. We would far sooner die than yield to a tyranny that we think would be far worse than death. But we just don't intend to die quietly at the hands of the hun. We shall fight him if he comes, and we shall beat him. He will never, no never, take this island home of ours. I am, my dear Joe, assured, as you say, that you are all with us in this fight, to a man, and this is a great inspiration to us. God bless you and yours.

A quarter of a century ago the battle was raging at Vimy. Where will it be raging soon; on the Sussex downs? If we fail, all fail; if we fall, all fall, according to some of our great statesmen. Therefore, speaking as an ordinary member of the Canadian House of Commons, and guaranteeing all the cooperation I can give at this time, I say: recognize us; acknowledge us; inspire us; shame us; enthuse us; exalt us; employ us; drive us; order us; command us; criticize us; approve us; disapprove us; chastize us; listen to us; possess us; dispossess us; control us; charge us; bankrupt us; pauperize us; cheer us; free us; prepare us; dedicate us; rededicate us; bereave us; conscript us, and for God's sake lead us.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Chairman, yesterday I drew the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the fact that it was rather difficult to deal with the various departments as single units. We are now dealing with the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Knowing something of the manufacturing industry in Canada, may I say that I do not know of any minister who has a more difficult job, or who is getting more cooperation from the manufacturers and workmen in Canada, than the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). He has a tremendous task, a task which is not particularly associated with government policy. His job is to get munitions and more munitions. The only part of it connected with the general administration of the government is the effect that the Department of Labour, Department of Finance or the Department of National Defence may have on the production of the munitions he requires.

So that the Minister of Munitions and Supply is not particularly concerned with government policy, except as it may affect him. I repeat, he has a tremendous task. He has many able men surrounding him. Sometimes I wonder how they handle the task which has been given them. On many occasions I have had to appear before officers in that department in connection with difficulties arising in industries in my own constituency. Waterloo county is a highly industrialized section of Canada. I have found those officials anxious to do everything they could to help the minister, and to help in our war effort.

But in dealing with his department we must also deal with the departments of labour and finance. Let me give an example of how those departments are dovetailed. When war broke out most industries realized that there would be an increase in the cost of living. Heads of industries who were fair to their employees—and most of them are—immediately put into effect either a bonus system or an increased basic rate of wages. Later on an order in council was passed by the Department of Labour making it mandatory that industries dealing directly with the government give a cost of living bonus. The plea went out to industries which were not dealing directly with the government that they also give a cost of living bonus, so as to avoid strife between industry and labour in Canada. Most of the industries responded to that request.

What happened? During the last session, when the increase in the national defence tax became effective, pleas were made by hon. members on this side of the house that in levying the national defence tax, and in the compilation of income tax, exemption up to a certain amount should be allowed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) accepted the idea that married men without children should be exempted up to $1,200. Then the Department of Labour issued the plea that a cost of living bonus should be paid. Hundreds of employees in my district were granted the cost of living bonus, at that time computed at the rate of five per cent. On the basis of that percentage a bonus of $60 a year was to be paid to married men earning $1,200. That was done because the Department of Labour pointed out that it would cost those people $60 a year more to live. Then the Minister of Finance came along and said, "Now that you are getting $1,260 a year I shall have to levy on you a tax of five per cent." And so the Department of Finance took from the man who, on the plea of the Minister of Labour, had been given a cost of living bonus, the bonus which had been given to him. Actually the tax would have amounted to $63, but the Department of Finance could take from an employee only an amount sufficient to bring him back to his $1,200 basis. The same principle applies to single people.

It appears therefore that we have two departments acting differently. One department pleads with the industries in this country to treat its employees fairly, and when they are about to do so the Department of Finance comes along and takes from them what the Department of Labour has asked industry to give them.

I had thought that when the house reassembled, in view of the fact that so much had been done by order in council—and I realize the necessity for it—we would have prorogued and begun a new session. These measures had been tried out for a year or more, and, from the experience we have had in their operation, they could have been amended so as to give the people some assurance that members of the House of Commons are trying to treat them fairly.

Employees have come to my office—and they come to the offices of all industries in my district—and have said, "We do not want your cost of living bonus, because the government is taking it away from us anyway." If the government is taking $60 from a man, does not that deduction constitute an increase in the cost of living? Is that not one more of the factors which cause inflation? We are attempting to put a ceiling on prices and on wages, and to stop inflation. Yet this very lack of cooperation among departments is doing much to bring about inflation. When the Prime Minister stated that we would sit for a week or two to give members of the cabinet an opportunity to present prepared statements, which would be laid open for discussion—despite the fact that, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, although we can discuss them we can get nowhere because we cannot move resolutions or amendments—he pointed out that, having regard to the convenience of members and the difficulties of obtaining accommodation in the city, we should then adjourn to meet again in January. When any man offers himself as a candidate for the House of Commons he ought to know something of what his responsibility will be. He knows what his indemnity is going to be and if he does not know what call is to be made upon him when he tries for a seat in the House of Commons he should be prepared to make whatever sacrifice may be necessary. It does not matter whether we sit here three months or six months or twelve months; we are at war and we ought to be here attending to the business of the country.

As I say, we have had an opportunity of studying the working out of many of these laws. We have been able to see something of what lack of foresight on the part of the government is doing to industry and to recruiting in this country. A national registration was taken. True, that was long months after it had been urged in the house, but eventually it was done. If the cards are checked carefully it will be found that hundreds of outstanding machinists are to-day driving bakery and milk wagons or doing other types of less strenuous jobs. If we had taken full advantage of the national registration act and had gone carefully over the answers given to the questions asked, we would have found that hundreds of thousands of young men could be placed in industry where they are vitally needed. But the only advantage we took of that registration was to call men up for war service.

Let us see what happened to the recruiting campaign in this country. When war was declared a fever of loyalty swept across the country and tens of thousands of young Canadians came forward to offer their services. But the government could not take them; they had no means of training them, they had no equipment, and there were no places in which they could be trained. They were sent home and told to come back. They were told, "We will call you when we want you." The feeling of loyalty which had swept across the country was dampened and died down. We then went on and recruited as we saw fit and as we were able to handle the men.

Finally the national war services act was passed, giving the government of the day the power to call men for service in Canada. Then the thirty-day training period was started, one of the worst money wasters we have had in this war effort. Men who were called up for this thirty-day training period have not been called up since and likely will not be called up to take further training. This represented a waste of millions of dollars, but it was an experience. Then the government decided that we should have a four months training period. Before the first four months training period was concluded the government, realizing the dangers and difficulties ahead, decided that they would conscript the men for home defence for the duration of the war. Enlistment fell off. We listened to a great many speeches by members of the government who, on the one hand, said that plenty of men were coming forward, that there was no dearth of soldiers or air force or naval men, and, on the other hand, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and high ranking officers of the army pleaded for men to come and fill up the ranks. They told us of the necessity for more and more men in order to defeat Hitler. In the meantime the papers were publishing stories of how the whole personnel in various training camps had enlisted, and there was on the part of the people of Canada a sense of security and a feeling that everything was all right.

During the summer months the Prime Minister went on a speaking tour in western Canada. While that tour was in progress, from many parts of the country came a cry for conscription, and from other parts of the country came a cry for selective service. The cry became so vocal that of necessity the Prime Minister had to answer it. On platform after platform in western Canada he said, "I have given my pledge to the people of Canada that I am opposed to the conscription of the men of Canada for service overseas, and I intend to abide by that promise."

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do not yell "hear, hear," too soon. Speaking in Calgary the Prime Minister said:

> Those, however, who could serve, and who do not answer the call, will bear through life the stamp of that failure. Their neighbours will know; and, what is far worse, they themselves will know, in their hearts, that they have failed to seize the greatest opportunity which is likely ever to come to men to serve their country and their fellow men.

In other words, "Unless those of you who are physically fit and of military age are prepared to offer your services for overseas in this crisis, the finger of shame will be pointed at you." Regardless of what our families may have done, regardless of what many of our loved ones may have done, there are many sitting in this chamber who did not serve in the last war. I did not serve in the last war, and other members of this party did not. The Prime Minister did not serve, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) did not, and there are other members of this house who did not. But we have since been elected to the House of Commons, to an important position in the life of the nation. We did not serve in the last war, but the finger of shame was not pointed at us because we did not. Surely that is not the way to stir up the loyalty and enthusiasm of the young men who we feel ought to be serving overseas in the fighting forces of this country.

Later on in the same address the Prime Minister said:

> Let us keep these truths ever before our young men; explain the need and the greatness of service, and no compulsion will be required to fill the ranks of Canada's overseas army.

We have the Prime Minister living up to the promise which he made to the electors, and we have him saying to the young men of this country, "If you do not enlist, all the rest of your life you will be ashamed of the part that you played."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he is reading the text of a speech of mine, or is he placing his own interpretation upon what I said?

Mr. HOMUTH: I am reading a report from the Prime Minister's own newspaper, the Toronto Star.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to say to my hon. friend that with respect to men enlisting for service overseas I made no reference of the kind to which he refers. I have said repeatedly that any young man in this country who does not recognize the seriousness of the existing situation and play his part in helping to meet it is going to suffer for it in one way or another during the rest of his days.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do not cheer too quickly. Let me say to the Prime Minister that so far as service for the defence of Canada is concerned you have provided that by your conscription act, which conscripts men for service in Canada. What other meaning can anyone take from it than that those fellows whom you wanted to enlist were not for service in Canada but for service overseas, so that we would not have to have conscription in Canada—there would be no "coercion". In spite of what the Prime Minister has said, that he was against conscription for overseas service and that there was no need for coercion, we have in Canada to-day the most cowardly, vicious, coercive method of trying to get men in the army for overseas service that was ever conceived by any government in the history of this world. I have had young men come to me who were conscripted to go to these training camps; I have had fathers and mothers come to me and tell me of what is going on in some of these camps where men are being shamed, humiliated, and browbeaten into enlisting for overseas service.

It does not take any courage for a government to deceive the people as to their intentions or as to their activities. It does not take any courage on the part of officers and men or others to shame and humiliate their fellows into going into the active army. But it does need courage on the part of the government and its supporters to stand up in this chamber and admit that those things are being done. I have not seen one public statement by any member of the government, or by any private member supporting the government, protesting against this method of trying to fill the ranks for overseas service. Perhaps nothing could give us more occasion for serious thought than what was said the other day by the Minister of National Defence. In the closing paragraphs of his speech he painted a picture of what this country is facing. He said, as reported in Hansard, page 4134, on November 6:

> But I do want to emphasize the fact that resistance is not enough and will not bring victory; that so long as the forces of destruction continue to rage there can be no security and no peace in any corner of the world. The way to shorten the war is to have the free world with its whole resources and its total energy concentrated on the supreme task of being able to deal with Hitler in the only language he knows, and that is the language of force. Canada has its place in that great undertaking.
> I am no defeatist. I believe we shall win, not simply because we say so, but because Canada along with the other democracies will stop at nothing which can effectively be done to ensure that the forces of evil shall be stamped out, that the menace of slavery shall be banished, and that free men and their families may enjoy the liberty which until this struggle began we in this dominion had somehow taken for granted. We cannot take it for granted any longer. The menace is against Canada as well as against the rest of the world.

That was the statement of the Minister of National Defence. They are sentiments with which I heartily agree, with which the people of Canada agree. Yet, with the cry which went out even yesterday and is going out every day, that we must have men and women to do this, to do that, surely we have the right to expect, with the crisis as it is, that at this session of the house there should be some statement of policy; that the government would say to us, "There is a job for every man, woman and child in this country to-day. This is your job; this is yours." That has not yet been done. The Minister of National Defence says, "I expect you men to go out and help recruiting; I look to the civilian recruiting committees throughout this country to assist the recruitment of men for the army." Every hon. member is willing to help in any possible way.

But let me add, there are many considerations which enter into this whole question. I have in my desk the facts about men who in the early days of the war enlisted for overseas service and were placed in the highest category after one or more medical examinations; after six to eighteen months' service something happened, they were declared medically unfit and sent, not back home, because they were too sick to go, but into the military hospitals and sanatoria of this country. These men came home helpless and unfit to work, as was demonstrated by two, three, and four medical examinations. Yet the government now says to these men, and through them to their wives and their children, "You are not a casualty of this war; you are not entitled to pension, you are entitled to hospitalization, but your wives and your children can go home and live on their parents or on the charity of their neighbours or the municipality." Surely if we are going to recruit men for active service we ought to be able to give them at least some assurance that their loved ones will be looked after, and that if, between their training centre and the Atlantic ocean, they become casualties of this war their loved ones will be looked after as though they had gone overseas and suffered there. Surely it is fair to ask that, because the only distinction is that they did not cross the ocean; the spirit, the loyalty, the desire to serve were all there. When we clean up these things; when we say to the wives and dependent mothers of this country what the Department of Labour has said to the industrial workers of Canada—"You are entitled to the cost of living bonus, because the cost of living has gone up"—I say, when the wives and children of those who enlist for active service are treated in that way, then we shall feel as though we can go out and honestly and conscientiously say to men, "It is your duty to serve your country, and those who stay behind are going to see to it that you and your loved ones are fully protected."

For eighteen months, Mr. Chairman, we were regaled with speeches, radio addresses, pamphlets and newspaper articles on the theme, "Let's Face the Facts". Well, let us face them. Let us not do it as Liberals or Conservatives or C.C.F.-ers or Social Crediters, but only as Canadians, from a Canadian point of view, realizing, as the Minister of National Defence says, that every decent thing there is in the whole fabric of civilization is threatened. If we are prepared to face the facts as we ought to, there is much more we can do, just as there is much more that ought to have been done before now.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). He is a likable gentleman, although he has not always been as much appreciated by his party as he should have been. He was very generous in offering his seat to his new leader, but I am sure that if his new leader accepts that gracious offer he will not fill the gap caused by the absence of my hon. friend. I do not doubt his sincerity, but it is always dangerous for an hon. member on the other side to point his finger at the member for Témiscouata because I may rise at once and reply. I did not intend to speak long to-day, but now I feel it my duty to do so in order to answer some charges, some insinuations that have been made about the leadership of my chief, the Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of the Liberal party.

I have listened to the sermon given by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). He is always eloquent and is always listened to with a certain degree of interest, but to-day he should have told the house about the intrigues that are made in the army by Tory officers against the present government. There is something that has not been said either over the radio or elsewhere about the recommendation made by my chief to the commander of the Canadian army in England. It was this, that he should do his best to spare the lives of his soldiers; and the young fools that made some noise when the Prime Minister visited them ignored the fact that if they were still alive, if they had not been killed in the Dunkirk retreat, it was because of the very wise and patriotic recommendation of my leader, the chief of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister of Canada. It is time to say that.

And now, what about leadership, and where are those who advocate conscription in the press now? There is a man in Toronto who wore out more boot soles parading in uniform on King street, before he was declared unfit, than any man in a military camp. There is another one in the house who was fired by the Canadian High Commissioner in England —fired as chief of the medical staff in England. He is advocating conscription. And who is the other one in Montreal? He is the former private secretary to Sam Hughes. He went overseas with his minister on a Cook's tour during the last war. I do not think that the members on the other side of the house will be so proud of these people who make a fuss in the press about conscription.

What is conscription? We have conscription now, although some people are afraid to call it by its name. We have conscription for the defence of this country which I think is fair.

The hon. member for Danforth says that the member for Témiscouata speaks only for his own constituency. Well, each of us has a double duty in this house. The first duty of every member is to represent the constituents who have honoured him with their confidence and honoured him by listening to his speeches during election time, and also by taking the trouble to go to the polls to mark their ballots in his favour. But members also represent Canada at large, because each member of parliament must realize that every time he discusses legislation, every time he gives his vote, he must do so not only from the parochial point of view of looking after his constituents, but also from the broader standpoint of the welfare of all Canadians. That is the point of view that members should take, and I am sure that my hon. friend the member for Danforth, as well as other members on either side, have such a point of view when they address the house or speak in committee, or whenever they rise to give their vote on any measure that is submitted to us.

There should be a general understanding about conscription, provided that necessary distinctions are made. We hear people say that we must have conscription, and by conscription they mean only conscription for overseas service. They do not regard the taking of men for service in Canada as conscription; conscription, according to them, is only for service overseas. I remember in 1939 at the special session I made a certain remark and one of the war ministers smiled. I said that I never conceived—and I cannot conceive it now—how it was that whereas the area of Canada is so large and that of England is so small, and whereas the population of England is so dense and that of Canada so small, we cannot keep our men in Canada for the possible eventual defence of this country, but that, as a matter of patriotism, we must send them overseas. I cannot conceive it. I think it shows a complete lack of proportion and is an insult to the courage of the British people. In fact, an outstanding publisher in England, a man who ranks very high in politics, once made this statement to me: Do you not think, you Canadians, that we Englishmen can look after the defence of our own island? We are just as brave as you are, and although we do not wish to offend you by telling you to return home when you come in the Canadian army, we do not need you here. We have enough valiant men among ourselves to defend our shores, to defend our island, just as we see to the defence of British trade on the high seas. Your duty is not to come here to share with us the food that is convoyed at such high cost; your duty is to stay at home and save us the trouble of having to defend Canada, which is so large a country. And he added these words, which should be remembered by every member of this house. He said: Your duty is not in the British isles, your duty is in Canada; look after Canada and we can look after the British isles. That man was a great Englishman, and his words put to shame many of the fake patriots who think only of sending the cream of our youth to England, causing embarrassment rather than helping.

Now, there is something else. All those who are in favour of conscription are not angels. I do not mean by that bad angels or good; I mean they are not spiritual beings. They need food to sustain them. That food has to be carried to their homes, sometimes from far distant places. What is the duty of the farmer in that instance? The duty of the farmer in time of war as well as in time of peace is to assure by his work that every Canadian and everyone in this country shall receive the food necessary for his subsistence. And of course when a man holds a rifle in England or is assigned to certain duty in England he cannot fulfil that great work here in Canada. Not only that; I am all for the National Resources Mobilization Act; I am all for total war effort, provided that everyone is assigned to his own proper post to ensure a complete and a quick victory over our common foe. Therefore why disturb the economic and social structure of this country? I cannot understand it.

The Union government promised the farmers that they would be exempt from conscription, not because they were cowards, as I have said before, but because they had an important work to do, the work of feeding both the army and the civilian population, and also of exporting food to the British isles—and now to Russia. That is the duty of the farmer. The fisherman has a similar duty. Why not exploit our fisheries in time of war as well as in time of peace? What is the duty of the railway employee, the man who has charge of a train, whether freight or passenger? His duty is to be here.

This, sir, is what I have said repeatedly; that the war should be carried on not on the basis of sentimentalism but on the basis of reason. The successes that the Germans have achieved in some parts of Europe are not due to sentimentalism, although they started their propaganda that way; they are based on strict reasoning. I appreciate the stand taken by my chief and by his government, to look after the defence of Canada; nothing too much can be done in that regard.

I have a word to say to my English-speaking friends. I as a French-Canadian have never uttered a word about religious or racial differences in the house. I respect the religious views of my colleagues, I respect their opinions, I respect them as men, and I want to enjoy the same respect myself. But there is one thing I will tell them; that is the only way to ensure national unity. We shall have national unity in this country only when our English-speaking fellow citizens will have the same sentiment and the same feeling for Great Britain as we have for France. There may be cultural relations with other lands, but we must think first of Canada, our common country, and our north American civilization, which does so much for the development of the mind as well as for the comfort of the body. Our American civilization now is much higher than the civilization of Europe, although Europe has led us in the past.

The very best and most stable element we have in this country is not found in the cities. It is the rural population, and so long as the rural people do their work in the future as they have in the past by helping this country to carry on the war, doing work which is just as useful as the work done in the munitions factories, then they should be considered as a class that must be kept at work without being disturbed or perturbed. I do not say that because I am a fifth columnist. Hon. members know what offers I made to the government, although they were not accepted at the time, but I am not grouching because I was refused. I want this country to win the war, and I want the people of this country to be healthy enough to do the very best job that can be done. That is why I do not want only unfits to be in charge of very important and very strenuous and difficult work. Should we send overseas only those who are healthy while men who are in bad physical condition, who are sick, who suffer from tuberculosis, hernia or goitre, will take their jobs? What happens? I speak very seriously through you, Mr. Chairman, to hon. gentlemen opposite as well as to those on this side of the house. It means that the health standard of this country will go lower and lower, and our war effort will decrease in the same proportion.

I took the trouble, at the request of the federation of mayors, to go to various cities of the United States to study the admirable work that has been done by the WPA under that great man, President Roosevelt, for the betterment of the health of the working classes. I reported to the mayors of the principal cities of my country and summarized that report in the house. But some hon. members, even including the leader of the opposition, said they did not see why I was giving so many figures. I praise very highly the Minister of Pensions and National Health for the new policies of his department, the purpose of which is to improve the health of our people. Of course they still suffer privations, and what may surprise you, sir, is that in the rural districts the people abide much more strictly by the regulations to save bacon and other foods to help our allies in this war than the people do in the cities. I commend the minister for giving a new direction to his department to improve the health of our fellow citizens.

There is something else also. In past years I obtained from the Department of National Defence some used clothing which was distributed to settlers and unemployed people in the outlying districts of my constituency. Some of these clothes were cut down for younger children, in order that they might be warmly clothed during our Canadian winter. This year, unfortunately, because of certain misunderstandings and because some hon. members who were sitting on a committee did not know what was done with this clothing, I have been unable to obtain any of these articles. It was my idea to start with the youth, to provide young Canadians with warm clothing in order that they might enjoy our healthy Canadian winter, and I hope those concerned will understand better in the future. I must also express my thanks to the deputy minister of the Department of National Defence for the assistance he has given me in the past in this regard. This clothing was not used for political propaganda; it was given to Tories as well as Liberals, to all those who needed help. We are all Canadians in this country.

It is no use talking about leadership. I could mention a good many jokes about the new leader of the Conservative party, and perhaps a few about the present leader, but I shall refrain from doing so on a day such as this. I am always ready to meet my hon. friends opposite in any constructive suggestions looking to the welfare of this country, but up to the present we have had nothing of the kind from that side of the house. I do not complain about that. It was the idea of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that the session should be adjourned instead of being prorogued, as I suggested. He won his point, and we are meeting here again at this time. Of course speeches are necessary, and many have been delivered by high ranking orators on the other side. But, Mr. Chairman, is it not possible for hon. gentlemen opposite to cease their insinuations and propaganda about leadership? We have a leader. He is the Prime Minister of Canada, who has headed the government of this country for perhaps longer than any other man in our history, including Sir John A. Macdonald. He has had remarkable success, and while I do not agree with everything that is done by the government I find that on the whole the Liberal party is alive while the Conservative party is dead. That is the principal difference.

Now that the Conservative party is to have a new leader I am reminded of the story of a king of Portugal named Pedro, who had a sweetheart called Inez de Castro. She was a very beautiful woman, but fell ill and died a long time before King Pedro was crowned. But at the time of his coronation he had her embalmed body mounted on a horse and paraded through the streets of Lisbon. That is the sort of parade we will have when Right Hon. Arthur Meighen becomes leader of the Conservative party; he will be parading with a corpse.

I believe we are coming to the time when there will be reciprocity between the parties, with a mutual exchange not of prisoners but of members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand it my hon. friend is chivalrously speaking on my behalf, so perhaps my motive will not be mistaken if I intervene at this stage to say just a word to the committee. In my position as leader of the house I have a duty which the country will expect me to perform; it is to see to it that as far as possible the house conducts its proceedings in a manner worthy of the House of Commons, taking into account the very serious situation which exists in the world at the present time.

Through the leaders of the different parties and groups, all hon. members have agreed upon a certain procedure while the house is in committee. The purpose of the house sitting in committee was to afford every possible opportunity to hon. gentlemen on all sides to question the ministry with respect to Canada's war effort. I have been listening to the speeches this afternoon. Last night I was not in the house, because during the course of the evening I had to give consideration to some very important matters, but I have glanced over Hansard, and I must say it does not appear that many questions were directed to the minister, bearing directly on the affairs of his department, which he was here to discuss with hon. members.

I am in this difficult and embarrassing position, that the moment I suggest it would be well for hon. members to follow the order that has been agreed upon, and to refrain from making irrelevant speeches, I am immediately charged with trying to shut off discussion, and trying to prevent freedom of speech in the House of Commons. Notwithstanding, having heard so many speeches entirely irrelevant to the matters directly under discussion, I believe the government will have to conclude that hon. members have finished with that portion of the proceedings relating to the questioning of the ministers, and have reached the point where all hon. members will be free to speak on anything they wish in regard to public affairs. I was careful to say that in the latter part of the discussion time would be especially reserved, after the ministry had reported on the war effort and questions had been asked; that when an hon. member wished to speak on other matters ample opportunity would be given to do so. If at this stage hon. members are going to continue to speak on subjects wholly apart from departmental statements, then there is nothing for the government to do but to assume that we have reached a point where at least for the time being hon. members generally feel that the specific questioning of ministers is over.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that while it is understood by all that you should not seek to be other than generous in the way of giving hon. members the fullest possible latitude in matters of discussion, at this stage of the proceedings at any rate you should see to it that hon. gentlemen are reminded that the discussion should relate primarily to the department whose minister has his statement before the house at the moment. The Minister of Munitions and Supply has been here for some time. He has very important matters to which he must give attention. Now he has left, believing the committee are finished with him. At the moment the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services is here and we are ready to proceed with his department. I would ask hon. members please to join with the government in helping to expedite this part of the proceedings by reserving such general statements as they may wish to make until a later stage of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN: The procedure has been unusual from the beginning of this discussion, but by unanimous consent a rule has been established, as set out by the Prime Minister; and that rule is as binding on us in the course of this debate as any other rule under the standing orders of the house. Therefore I shall, in directing debate in the committee, adhere to the direction which has just been given and which, I understand, received the general assent of the committee.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I merely wish to be quite clear upon the point. There are certain things about which I wish to speak. I wish to deal with the foreign policy of the government, and would relate my remarks to numbers of departments. But if I understand the Prime Minister to say that private members will have an opportunity to speak later on matters of general interest, then I shall be most pleased now to do as the Prime Minister suggests, and wait until the various ministers have been before the committee. Is that the understanding?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite correct.

Mr. POULIOT: May I have some idea in what order the ministers will be asked their questions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are here now.

Mr. POULIOT: Other ministers will follow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Other ministers are waiting, and will be prepared to answer questions in the order in which they made their respective statements.

Mr. POULIOT: The Minister of National Defence will come too?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the Minister of National Defence may be able to be in the house to-morrow. He has for the last two days been confined to his house with a cold, and I think very wisely has sought to run no risk at this time.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and I wish to take the strongest exception possible to the remarks which he made when he alluded to Canadian soldiers overseas as young fools. I submit that no one in Canada, least of all—

Mr. POULIOT: Not all of them.

Mr. WHITE: Please do not interrupt. I say that no one in Canada, least of all an hon. member in this chamber, has any right to refer to any member of the Canadian forces wearing the king's uniform, and serving in England, as a young fool. I would ask the hon. member for Témiscouata if he has ever worn the king's uniform, or rendered any service to his king. What right has he to speak?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The form of the hon. member's speech is not according to the rules. He cannot ask a question as in a cross-examination in court. I suggest the hon. member should make his statement, or his speech, without putting questions to hon. members who have not the floor.

Mr. WHITE: Thank you. But the circumstances are very exceptional. The hon. member for Témiscouata also referred to intrigues by Tory officers in the army. I would remind hon. members that all officers who serve in the army are subject to the strictest military discipline, and they are not permitted or allowed in any way to reply to charges against them.

On the day of the opening of the house I heard over the radio an announcement to the effect that the speech to be delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the beginning of the session would be the most important announcement made since the war started. Yet when I read his speech in Hansard I find no information as to what he saw or heard on his trip to England. Neither did I—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word with regard to this matter. In the first place I do not think I am responsible for anything that is said over the radio. In the second place the speech I made at the opening of the house did not purport to be anything other than a statement of the international situation. I have made such statements each time when the house has reassembled, either at the beginning of a session or after an adjournment, and I was following that procedure. Similarly, on occasions when the house has met, either at a new session or after adjournment, after I have made such a statement the leader of the opposition has been the first to speak. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) expressed to me his desire to speak following my statement on the international situation. My hon. friend made his speech, and it was arranged by agreement that we would then follow the usual method with regard to other leaders in the house making their addresses. But what I myself said was nothing more, and purported to be nothing more than a statement on the international situation. As Prime Minister, if I have any statement of national policy to make I will not choose the end of the session to make it, but I will make it at the time of the session when it can be debated in the regular way, and when, in accordance with the rules, amendments can be made to any motion which may be based upon it.

Mr. WHITE: I realize fully what the Prime Minister has said. But at the same time, as Prime Minister of this country, when he visited England, and was in consultation with the most important men in the world to-day, he saw with his own eyes what was going on. He was told, or must have been told, what we needed to do in this country. Surely, then, this parliament would have the right to expect, or would have the right to hear at the earliest possible moment, a review or report from the Prime Minister. If he chooses to wait, it is quite within his own power to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not choose to wait, even for parliament to meet. I made a broadcast to the country within a week or ten days after I returned, and that broadcast has been distributed to all members of parliament, and pretty generally throughout the country. I went very fully into the matters I regarded as most important in connection with my visit overseas.

If the house expects to hear from me the confidential discussions which took place between the Prime Minister of England and myself, and between other British cabinet ministers and myself, or between myself and those who have to do with matters of military strategy, then I am afraid I shall have to disappoint hon. members in that regard, because I do not regard my conferences overseas as intended to serve any such purpose. Unfortunately I cannot make public what it is necessary to conceal from the enemy.

I should like to make perfectly clear that I have not had the opportunity since I came back to discuss with some of my colleagues to the extent I should like, some of the matters which were taken up overseas. The Minister of National Defence, as hon. members know, left for the old country almost immediately after the time I came back. I have not had the opportunity to discuss with him, nor have my colleagues, the results of some of his conferences on the other side. And until we have that opportunity I do not propose on behalf of the government to make any premature statement with respect to what further step we will take as a result of our conferences.

Mr. WHITE: Certainly I would not even suggest to the Prime Minister that he should discuss any of the confidential conferences which took place. But I do say that this house is entitled at least to a report and a true picture of the present situation overseas, and what is expected from Canada which, the Prime Minister says, is going to make a total war effort. Surely, then, the Prime Minister can tell us, after being over there, what is expected, and how Canada is to make a total war effort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not need to go overseas to tell that. I told the house that at the beginning of the session, and I have told it time and again in the speeches I have made. Everything I saw in England and heard in England, and everything said in conference in England confirmed what I had said were my convictions respecting the war, and as to Canada's part in the war, and above all caused me to feel an even greater pride in Canada's war effort than would have been possible if I had not been over there.

Mr. WHITE: Would the Prime Minister care to say if in his opinion to-day Canada is making a total war effort?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say Canada is making a magnificent effort, and that everything considered, compared with the effort of any other country it will compare favourably. I will say to my hon. friend, when he speaks of total war effort, that I do not mean that the war effort of Canada is to be only in one direction—and that in the direction that is going to cause, in the matter of public discussion in this country, the most by way of embarrassment.

Mr. WHITE: The Prime Minister apparently refers to the question of man-power. We heard the other day from the Minister of National Defence that the matter of man-power was most urgent and important. He admitted that we were not obtaining to-day, on the voluntary system of enlistment, the required number of recruits. He also admitted that the government quotas were not being obtained. I am informed that in some military districts the number of discharges on some days exceeds the number of enlistments. Perhaps when the minister is in his seat again he will tell us if that information is correct.

No doubt voluntary enlistment has produced many men, but in my opinion this form of enlistment is not sufficient. I have said before in this house, and I repeat, that selective compulsory military training is the only method that will meet the present emergency. At times in this house and out of the house and in the newspapers we hear and see the phrase, "equality of service and sacrifice." Is there any member of this house who will differ with me when I say that the only people of Canada who are making a sacrifice to-day are the men who are serving the empire for $1.30 a day? Do hon. members believe that the young men who stay at home and are in receipt of increased wages, who have the best of meals and all the comforts of civilized life, are making the same sacrifice as the boys in the armed forces? I repeat that the only men who are making a sacrifice to-day are those who are getting $1.30 a day. Yet this government passed regulations providing for a cost of living bonus to be paid to many thousands of Canadian citizens.

It is true that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated a few days ago that the question of increased allowances for soldiers' dependents was being considered, but these allowances apply only to three dependents—the wife and two children. These allowances were set, probably on some proper scale, in August and September of 1939, but according to the figures of the government the cost of living has increased by some 14 to 15 per cent. In the important essentials of life I think everyone will agree that the increase has been more than that, probably between 20 and 25 per cent. Surely a country that can raise billions of dollars for war can provide proper allowances for soldiers' dependents. In the Globe and Mail of to-day appears a report of an interview between a number of ladies and the Minister of Finance. The minister is reported to have said:

> The man who enlists makes a sacrifice, and I am asking whether it is ever possible to make up in money the difference between the man who goes and the man who stays at home.

Later on the minister is reported to have asked:

> The question is, can the country pay it?

Surely the Minister of Finance does not question the ability of this country to provide properly for the dependents of our soldiers overseas. The adoption of some system of selective compulsory training would have the effect of placing every man and woman of Canada where he or she could serve best in a total war effort. Until such a method is adopted I submit that we are not making anything like a total war effort. The time for this is not to-morrow or next week or next session; it is right now. I sincerely hope that this house will not be permitted to adjourn without some announcement being made by the Prime Minister. I hope we shall be told how Canada is going to make a total war effort and how the necessary man-power will be secured.

Speaking a few days ago in this house, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that the responsibility for obtaining men for the army rested upon the members of this house and the people whom they represented in the constituencies. I disagree with that statement. The responsibility for obtaining the necessary men rests upon the shoulders of the Minister of National Defence and upon the shoulders of the government which he represents.

The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) dealt in detail with certain regulations which had been passed by his department. He referred to the fact that a recruit could be examined by any doctor he wished, and he said also that there had been a large number of rejections. I should like to ask him if any further examination is made besides the first one, and whether or not any complaints have been made about this method. One hears various stories about the methods which have been adopted in some training centres to induce men to enlist for active service, often referred to as press-gang methods. As long as it is felt that there should be only voluntary enlistments, the method of inducing men to enlist which has been adopted in certain training centres should be stopped.

These are probably the most important regulations which have been passed in years, and yet they were passed by order in council. They affect several hundred thousand young men, and yet they were not considered of sufficient importance to be brought into this house for debate. The minister made it quite clear that there were no total exemptions. I should like to draw to his attention, as I have done before, the fact that many young farmers have been called up, in many cases only sons. The government have been urging increased production of bacon and other farm products, and yet in many cases they take away the only help left available to the farmer. Many farmers are reducing the number of cattle, sheep and hogs on their farms and cutting down in other production. Only ten days ago I was in a small country store in the township of Rawdon, one of the largest cheese-producing centres in eastern Ontario. I found seven farm sale bills. Upon inquiry I found that in every case the farmer was disposing of all his stock and assets because he could get no help. Some of these men had sons who have been called for service, while others had found that they could not compete with the prices paid for labour in the industrial centres.

I suggest to the Minister of National Services that he try to work out some scheme whereby young farmers and the only sons of farmers should be granted some form of exemption. If I understoood the minister correctly, he stated that such men could apply for exemption or an extension up to six months, and then at the end of that period a second exemption could be applied for but that that ended it. A farmer must plan ahead the same as anyone else. Many farmers have pointed out to me that if they are going to lose their help next summer they want to know ahead of time in order that they may reduce their stock and make other necessary arrangements.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. gentleman and the committee that the special rules established for this debate are that we should debate the statement of the minister which is at the moment before the committee. The statement now before the committee is that of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). It will be very difficult for the chair to carry out the instructions of the committee if hon. members do not cooperate and confine their remarks to the department whose affairs are now before the committee. In discussing the affairs of the Department of National War Services the hon. member is anticipating, because the statement of the minister of that department will come before the committee after it has finished with the Department of National Defence for Naval Services. I shall certainly try to be broad in my rulings, but I am afraid that the hon. gentleman is going beyond what is reasonable.

Mr. WHITE: I understood the Prime Minister to say that the Minister of National War Services was here in addition to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes; but the business before the committee now is the statement of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. After that we shall take up the affairs of the Department of National War Services.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to ask one question.

Mr. WHITE: If I can have just a moment I will finish, and defer the further remarks I wish to make regarding matters which pertain to the Department of National War Services. I wish just to refer to the little blue pamphlet issued by the department in which there is a brief quotation which applies to the 11th of November; it is from the immortal poem of John McCrae:

> Take up our quarrel with the foe!
> To you from failing hands we throw
> The torch—be yours to hold it high!

This is Armistice day, and I would remind hon. members that those two words "to you" apply to every one of us. That is the challenge from the comrades who sleep in Flanders fields. I hope and trust that we shall not fail them.

[Mr. White.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services what is the position with respect to over-recruiting for the navy. Representations have been made to me that in the city of Halifax alone are 2,000 recruits who have not been called for duty; they have been termed by some people—not by me—"the penguins"; they sit and wait. Perhaps the minister has heard that term. It is evident, I think, from the information which comes to hand that there has been over-recruiting for the navy having regard to the facilities available for their training and to their usefulness on the seas. What is the position with respect to the whole situation, not only that in the city of Halifax, which I assume is the centre of the greatest naval activities, but elsewhere in Canada?

Hon. A. L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): A distinction, I think, must be made between the number of men who apply to serve in the navy and the number of those who are actually enrolled. When I said the other day that there were 4,000 men on the waiting list, I meant men who had not yet joined the navy but who had expressed willingness to join and whose applications to that effect were on file in the department. So far as I know at this time, there is no such condition as my hon. friend has heard of, in the city of Halifax or elsewhere. There are no 2,000 men there who should be at sea and who are not at sea. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition and my hon. friend the member for Yale will understand what is the situation. A very considerable number of men is required at bases established on shore—a number at least equal to the number afloat; and in Halifax, Esquimalt and other cities we have a considerable number of men ashore, but that by no means implies that they are doing nothing, that their time is wasted. I shall be glad to look further into the matter, but at this time, so far as I know, there are no such conditions as those to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. STIRLING: I did not quite follow the minister's answer, because it seems to me to imply that there are none waiting to get into the service—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Oh, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: —but there are those in the service now who are being employed on shore.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No. It is the reverse. There are, as I said the other day, 4,000 waiting to get into the service.

They are as yet in civilian life, but their applications are on file, and I assume that most of them would be available if called upon. They are those who have written in at one time or another expressing a desire to join the navy. That is the waiting list.

As to the men on shore, of course there are men on shore—there always will be—for the navy, a number at least equal to the number at sea. Reinforcements are needed, and the depots must be kept up. But to say that there are 2,000 in Halifax who are more or less wasting time, idling, is to say what is not so. There are a number in training there. Some of them will go to sea shortly. But I know of no case where time is being wasted and men are merely loafing.

Mr. STIRLING: Then, what will the policy be with regard to these youngsters who for several years past have had their eye on sea service, and are anxious to enter that service when they attain the proper age? Will they be given any sort of preferred consideration, or will they have to wait until this two, three, or four thousand waiting list has been disposed of?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The class to which my hon. friend refers is a very desirable class for the navy. It is known that those young men who have been training as boys in such organizations as the sea cadets are able to take their places in the navy with less training than men who have had no such experience. I should say that those who belonged to the sea cadet corps in one part of the country or another have an excellent chance of getting into the navy. They are all young and keen, and their services can be put to use more quickly on account of their training.

When I gave the figure of 4,000, my hon. friend will understand, of course, that some of those are probably unfit; some may be a little over-age, but that is the number of applications on file in the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister indicate in a general way how many are being taken on per month in the navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In the last year the number has run at the rate of something over 1,000 per month. It varies from month to month, but that is about the average since November last.

Mr. MUTCH: To go back to the question of these chaps who have expressed their desire to enlist in the navy; in the district which I represent there is a considerable number, included in that 4,000, who want to join the navy, and it has been necessary to tell them, and they have been told, that for some months at least there is no prospect of their being able to get in on the quota for that particular station. Is it a matter of policy to encourage those young men who are among the more desirable to become recruits in another branch of the service, and not to wait until next April or whenever they are likely to be called upon to join the naval services?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It would be asking a great deal of me to ask that I should urge the most desirable class of recruits to join other branches of the service. I have not done that. I do not know whether the Minister of National Defence, or the Minister of National Defence for Air has endeavoured to attract these men. I have no doubt men have joined other services because they are afraid it would be too long before they could get into the navy.

Mr. STIRLING: May I take it that the men on the waiting list whose applications have been received are awaiting entry into the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is the great feeding ground for the navy now. It is difficult to say exactly what the percentage is, but by far the overwhelming majority of those who come into the navy come in through the volunteer reserve divisions. They are really now the back-bone of the recruiting system.

Mr. STIRLING: That being the situation, there may be a different category. There is the old category of boys attaining a certain age and entering the Royal Canadian Navy itself, not via the volunteer reserve. Is that so?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Is there such a category now?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are not taking boys into the Royal Canadian Navy now.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the minimum age at which they will be accepted?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Eighteen.

Mr. LOCKHART: Following on the suggestion of the minister about the preferment that might be given sea cadets who had training, boys who had received training for three or four years in sea cadet corps, are these young men, as they become eighteen, given preferment over those who have had no training and no inclination for such training up to the present time, or must they take their place definitely with the others?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is a difficult question. I should say that in recruiting, if there were twenty-five candidates before a recruiting officer, five of whom he knew to be excellent material, he would take those five first if he could. That is almost inevitably the course that would be followed.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the policy outlined by the department?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No, it is not outlined. No policy has been outlined of giving preferment to anyone, but recruiting officers take the best men available.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not wish to pursue this point very far, but in my district there is an active sea cadet corps and we have young men who have grown up in that sort of work. We have had one of the greatest developments there in the past few months, thanks to one of the service clubs and other public-spirited citizens. We have a great many groups of young men who have been in training for three, four and five years. There seems to be a feeling that they have to mark time and take their place with the others just as if they had never had the advantage of this training. That is the point I want to have definitely cleared up, so that these young men will feel that their training is not lost, and that they will not have to take the usual place in line with those who desire to enlist in the Royal Canadian Navy. I am anxious to have that point cleared up. Will the minister indicate whether these boys will have preferment, having attained the age of eighteen, if they wish to offer their services? Are they not given some preferment as a matter of policy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is not a matter of policy in the department to give preferment to anyone, but I put this to my hon. friend. If he were recruiting and he had the opportunity to take twenty men of the type he has been describing or twenty men who were absolutely green, he would undoubtedly take the twenty who had training. I presume the naval recruiting officers will do the same. These men can be made ready for the sea more quickly than the others, and there are some things that they know already; consequently it is desirable to take them, and that is the practice. But it would be a great mistake for the department to order that a certain class or group should be given priority or preferment as a matter of right. That would be a mistake and it has not been done, though in practice I have no doubt that what my hon. friend says does happen. He will understand, of course, that recruiting for the Canadian navy is now done chiefly through these volunteer reserve divisions which are in eighteen different parts of Canada. If a sea cadet corps is not near a division, the boys may have a little problem in that way. If the sea cadet corps the hon. member has in mind is not so situated, there may be some difficulty on that account. The boys have to go to the nearest volunteer reserve division to enlist, and that might put them to some inconvenience. But we cannot undertake at this time to establish any more volunteer reserve divisions because we are short of the trained officers to command them.

Mr. BROOKS: I quite agree with the minister that he can hardly give preference to sea cadets. I know from my own experience that in the maritime provinces there are a great many young men who have spent their whole lives on the sea. While they have not had an opportunity of training as sea cadets, they have had very practical training on the sea, and these men do wish to get into the navy. Unfortunately, in recruiting, we have had to turn them down recently, and it has been a great disappointment to men on the southern coast of New Brunswick and along the Northumberland straits, as well as in other parts where they have followed the sea all their lives. The men in our part of Canada seem to have a great desire to enlist in the navy, and it is unfortunate that we cannot take more men of that type. They prefer it to the infantry, the air force or other services.

Will the minister answer a question with regard to the Royal Naval college? He mentioned the other day that the college would be opened in the fall of 1942. I should like him to explain the method of selecting students for this college, the age, and whether they will be selected proportionately throughout Canada —I mean whether there will be a quota for each province the same as for the Royal Military college at Kingston. He might also tell us the number they propose to train at the college when it opens in the fall of 1942.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am glad to give that information. For the naval college the number of students will be 100. The method of selection will be somewhat the same as in the Royal Military college, namely, by provinces. As far as possible we shall try to give cadetships in proportion to the number from the particular province who apply. That seems to be the fairest way of doing it. As regards the other conditions of entry, educational qualifications and so on, broadly speaking, the boy must have junior matriculation at least. There will be one-year courses for the older boys and two years for the younger. The prospectus will be issued shortly setting forth all these details.

Mr. POTTIER: In connection with the preferment mentioned by the hon. member, I never agreed with the policy of trying to get a large number of men in the navy or naval forces who are inland men and have never seen a tide or high or low water. If preference is given to those men simply because they are in thickly-populated centres where they can form into groups, whether of sea cadets or otherwise, thus setting back men who have lived all their lives by the sea and know the things peculiar to the sea, it would be doing a great injustice. I have always thought there should be more facilities for taking advantage of the experience of young men who have lived all their lives on the seashore. There are some things that they do not have to learn. It is a misfortune that we have not some organization which would enable groups of such men even in small centres to be trained in the same way that they are trained in central Canada. We are not making the best use of the valuable material available on our coasts. I do not want to discourage enlistment in the army, but we have men in the army who have lived all their lives by the sea, and it is a pity some system is not worked out to make the best use of their experience.

Mr. LOCKHART: I just want this clarified. The impression is abroad among these young men that they just had to take their course and they had some preference. I rather agree that young men living by the sea are good material for the naval services.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently Canada will soon be faced with the necessity of recruiting several thousand men for the merchant marine because a hundred cargo ships are to be completed next year. What plans have been made for recruiting these merchant seamen and what training will be given them, also what rates of pay, and will they be eligible for pension? I do not think it is possible to raise this number of men in a hurry; plans will have to be made quite a while before the men are called for. There should be something under way now in that connection.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is a question which perhaps my hon. friend should direct to the acting Minister of Transport. I think the minister made some reference to that point the other night and indicated that a manning station is to be established where merchant seamen would be trained. The Department of Naval Services is not directly concerned with that problem, but has on many occasions discussed it with the Department of Transport and volunteered to do anything asked by way of assisting in or supervising the training, in gunnery, for example, and that sort of thing, of these merchant seamen. That is purely voluntary on our part.

Mr. GREEN: I asked the Minister of Munitions and Supply last night, and he said it was a matter for the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. Surely some one should know something about this policy. On page 4093 of Hansard the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs is reported as saying:

> The protection of merchant shipping is one of our tasks, but the provision of merchant ships and of merchant seamen is in other hands. The Canadian naval staff, however, have taken a deep interest in the training and supply of merchant seamen and have cooperated with the Department of Transport in the provision of manning pools in this country, where merchant seamen may register and remain while awaiting employment on a merchant ship.

Surely someone in the ministry can give more information about these plans, if there are any. It may be that it is still just talk.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The statement read by my hon. friend bears out what I said to-day. We are to protect merchant shipping by escort vessels, yes, but we are not charged with the duty of providing seamen or ships. I did go on to say that we have taken an interest in the matter through some of our officers. We have cooperated with the Department of Transport in establishing manning pools and drawing up schemes for the training of merchant seamen, but that, as I say, is a purely voluntary effort on our part. My department has nothing to do with providing merchant seamen, that is for the Department of Transport. I think the remarks of the acting Minister of Transport last night cleared up the question the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Munitions and Supply said, as reported on page 4223 of Hansard:

> The Department of Transport has taken in hand the task of training crews for merchant ships. Manning pools have been established at Halifax and Montreal and are now in operation. Training schools are also being built in connection with these manning pools. It is the intention to pursue an intensive programme of enlisting and training candidates for the merchant marine.

It may be that is as far as the matter has gone. But the committee should be told whether that is the situation, or if the plans have been developed further we should know.

For example, are young men to be recruited for the merchant marine, or will they be older men not eligible for the navy or the other fighting forces? Must they be in A category, and will arrangements be made to protect their wives and children? All these details should be given at as early a date as possible so that right across the country men who are interested in the merchant marine may be able to make plans to enlist; otherwise we may find ourselves with a lot of ships and no one to man them.

Mr. HOWE: The manning pool is something more than my hon. friend suggests, merely a place for seamen to register. It is a place where seamen can really sign on for service and go on pay. A ship discharges a crew on this side. These men can immediately go to the manning pool, be provided with housing, if they stay in port, and remain on pay until such time as they are assigned to another ship. Similarly any Canadian can register at the manning pool. If he requires training; if he is not up to the standard required for merchant ships, there is a school which will give him that training, and of course throughout the period he is on pay.

As acting minister I have not the intimate knowledge of the situation that perhaps I should have, but I shall be very glad to consult with my deputy and give my hon. friend any further information that may be available. We have an organization in charge of exceptionally well qualified men, and we believe that the manning pools and the schools for merchant seamen will make a real contribution.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that these manning pools should be opened in other parts of the country. Apparently at the present time there is one in Montreal and one in Halifax. I think there should be one or perhaps two on the west coast.

Mr. HOWE: I believe that is contemplated.

Mr. GREEN: It may be that there should also be manning pools at the great lakes ports. How many men make up the crew of one of these 10,000-ton merchant ships?

Mr. HOWE: When I was in charge of the Department of Transport I was well versed in these matters, but since I have been devoting my attention to the Department of Munitions and Supply I have forgotten many of the details. I would not attempt to give information of that sort, which might not be reliable. I will, however, obtain a memo on the whole subject and be prepared to give the information later in the session.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What provision is being made for the training of navigating officers? I think the minister will find a great dearth of these men.

Mr. HOWE: I should think the school would certainly give instruction of that kind, leading to officer's papers; but, as I say, I should prefer not to go into detail with regard to these schools until I find out more about them.

Mr. GREEN: Then I should like to ask the navy minister a question having to do with rates of pay of men in the navy. My understanding is that men in the navy receive less pay than men in the other fighting forces. That understanding may be incorrect, but if it is correct perhaps the minister will tell us why that should be the situation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No, that is not correct, to answer the question generally. There is some difference, which has existed for a long time, between certain ranks in the navy and corresponding ranks in the army, but to say that generally men in the navy are paid less than the others is not correct. One may be able to take one rank in the navy and find some difference when one compares it with the corresponding rank in the army or air force, but as a general rule the pay runs about the same.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister mention the ranks in which there is a difference? I understand, for instance, that there is a difference between the pay of a lieutenant in the army and the pay of a naval officer holding equivalent rank, and it may be the same as between non-commissioned officers in the army and petty officers in the navy. Is there any reason for this situation? Are we simply following an old British custom instead of paying men on a Canadian basis? If so, it does not seem the fair thing to do.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think this question was discussed in the house at considerable length last session. At that time I stated that when it is said that a man in the navy is paid so much a day, it must be remembered that in many instances there is some extra pay. There is hard-lying money, and there are various other extras which the men in the navy may receive. Until recently sublieutenants in the navy were receiving less than lieutenants in the army, which would be the corresponding rank. That situation has been rectified, however, within recent months, so that now a sublieutenant in the navy receives the same pay as a lieutenant in the army. I cannot undertake, at the moment, to give my hon. friend a comparison between all ranks in the three services. I have that information, but it is not here. I can get it and table it to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why they should not be all on the same basis?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There is the one reason which I just mentioned, namely, that in the navy there are little odds and ends that are sometimes tacked on to a man's pay, or even an officer's pay, which may make the total emolument equal to that received by a man in the army or the air force. It is true that if one considers the basic pay, $4 or $5 a day, he may think there is a difference; but when one works it out, he finds that it is pretty generally the same. I admit that there are some differences. Some men in the navy get a little more than those holding corresponding ranks in the army, while some get a little less.

Mr. GREEN: I raised the question because I know there has been a certain amount of discontent by reason of that fact, and I think the situation should be rectified as far as possible.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The whole question is being inquired into now by an interservice committee on pay. I agree with my hon. friend that perhaps some of these extras which are allowed in one way or another should be dispensed with and that there should be a uniform rate of pay for similar ranks in all three services. As I say, that question is being studied by a committee. In the meantime I have tried to rectify some cases in the navy where I thought increases were justified, and the case of the sublieutenant was one of these.

Mr. BROOKS: We were pleased to hear of the expansion of the navy, as outlined by the minister the other day. I think at that time he said the personnel had been increased to 27,000 officers and men. We know that increase has been brought about over a very short period of time, and I should like to ask how the navy has been able to train officers to take charge of so many vessels and such a large number of men, whether we have been able to do it all here in Canada or whether we have had to bring in officers from elsewhere. In the army we know there were a great many militia units with trained officers, so that it was easy to expand the army; but for the navy to expand so quickly and still have competent officers seems to me to be something phenomenal, as the minister has said, unless some of these officers were brought from somewhere outside Canada, because we had so little in the way of training facilities in this dominion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Of course for the last fifteen or seventeen years we did have a naval militia, the volunteer naval reserve, which in a sense would correspond with the army militia. They trained at certain times, and they were of great value when war came and the demand for officers and petty officers became so pressing. Apart from that, and other Canadian sources, we have not relied on any other quarter for our officers and petty officers. I think within the last year we may have had from England one or two officers with very special training of one kind or another; I do not think there were more than perhaps two. The rest have come from our own ranks. While it has been difficult to train officers and petty officers of that kind, it must be remembered that these men who are now undertaking training receive, in perhaps one year, the training which in peace time would require three or four years. They gain by experience which, in peace time, would require years and years to acquire.

We try to break them in with experienced officers. There is splendid material in the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, which includes those men who have come up from the merchant shipping lines. These are men who are skilled at sea. The same problem is being faced in the old country. They have expanded their navy, and they have had to hurry up their training as best they could, and entrust young men with heavy responsibilities. But there is no other way it can be done.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the naval college be located in the east, the west, or the middle?

Mr. GREEN: Possibly up at Churchill.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is almost certain that the college will be located in the west. That is the opinion of the experts who have studied the question. Climatic conditions out there, the possibility of doing sea work at all times of the year, make the west more desirable in their opinion.

Mr. BROOKS: We do not want fair-weather sailors; we want men who can take it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In the opinion of the naval officers it is easier to train men at the west coast in the winter months. It is colder in the east, and that fact offers some difficulty when men are asked to get out in open boats to do boat work in December, January and February. The weather is more favourable on the Pacific coast. For these reasons we believe better training can be given on the west coast during the college term.

Mr. GREEN: About a year ago the government announced that it was planning to build destroyers and light cruisers in Canada. The other day the minister said we were about to begin the construction of destroyers. Has the plan for building light cruisers been given up, or are we to build them eventually?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not believe I ever made any announcement about light cruisers. Certainly they will not be built in the immediate future. At the moment there is no plan to build such craft in this country. The plans for building destroyers are well in hand, and we hope to begin that work very soon. This time it will be done on the east coast, at Halifax.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that this concludes the debate on the statement by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It concludes the questioning, unless someone else wishes to speak.

The CHAIRMAN: Then the Department of National War Services will be before the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may have permission I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) some questions which should have been asked earlier in the afternoon.

Mr. HOWE: I have no objection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I refer particularly to the minister's remarks respecting aircraft production. At page 4082 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> Our aircraft industry has manufactured in Canada and placed in service since the outbreak of war, or has assembled in Canada, 3,749 aircraft.

How many of those aircraft were actually manufactured in Canada? Then, has aircraft production in Canada met the expectations expressed by him to the committee in March and April last?

Mr. HOWE: I have not the break-down as between planes manufactured in Canada and those assembled here, but I shall obtain that information. As to expectations—yes, I believe all our plants are manufacturing pretty well to the output we anticipated. The programme has been changed to some extent in that there has been a definite move toward larger planes, and away from trainer and operational planes. Therefore the numbers may be out a bit. Certainly, however, from the point of view of man-hours and output I believe our programme is all we ever intended it to be.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How is the manufacture of parts proceeding, as far as elementary training planes are concerned? During the past summer the committee on national war expenditures visited the various elementary flying training schools in eastern Canada. Generally speaking, one of the chief complaints made by those operating the schools had to do with the failure on the part of the aircraft industry to supply the necessary parts. Almost without exception we were advised in the training schools that for periods of two or three months at a stretch often as many as 20 per cent of the number of planes allotted to a particular school could not be put into the air by reason of the failure of Federal Aircraft. It was criticized, in certain instances. Then there was mention of failure by some of the private manufacturers to supply parts.

Mr. POWER: Is my hon. friend talking about elementary schools?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Federal Aircraft is not building anything for them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am wrong in that connection, as far as the elementary schools are concerned. The minister is right when he says that the parts do not come from them.

Mr. POWER: They are not for elementary schools, then?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is correct; I should not have used the word "elementary". But, in so far as elementary schools are concerned, is it a fact to-day that planes are being kept on the ground on account of the failure of manufacturers to supply necessary parts or is that condition improving, and are the necessary parts being supplied as required?

Mr. HOWE: I believe any country which must take care of vast fleets of aeroplanes find a difficulty with respect to parts. The difficulty is not so much that of having the parts in the country as it is that of having the right part at the right place when it is needed. There are standard lists of parts made. When aircraft are produced, about 20 per cent are made of spare parts, and these are stored at strategic points to take care of overhauls. The difficulty is that there can be no certainty as to whether a spare list will be correct for a certain area. It may be correct for the whole of Canada, but it often happens—in fact it happens regularly—that in a certain area there may be a run on spare parts of a certain type. When that condition arises we, of course, turn in and make more spare parts.

The greatest difficulty has come from the British type of planes which we received early in the war, and for which we did not receive an adequate supply of spare parts. Due to shipping losses, and due more particularly to the fact that it is only natural that one takes care of his own needs first, we have had difficulty in obtaining spare parts for those planes. The spare parts problem is just as acute in England as it is in Canada. We ordered very liberally of spare parts, and I think my colleague will agree with me when I say that the situation is better.

Mr. POWER: There are some parts that cannot be made in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: That is true. The British parts that cannot be made in Canada offer one great obstacle, but we are making certain British parts here to take care of some of the British planes that we have. We are gradually catching up with the situation. I may say that as long as we have the heavy overhaul programme that we have to-day there will be difficulty with spare parts. The problem in connection with spare engine parts is more difficult because the engines are not made in this country. But I do not think Federal Aircraft should be blamed. It is the British type of Anson that is giving us the trouble.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I heard that the aeroplane industry is progressing so rapidly in a scientific way that aeroplanes which were considered modern a year ago are obsolete to-day.

Mr. POWER: That would apply largely to fighters, but not to trainers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not apply to the class of aeroplane that we have been making or assembling in Canada. I can appreciate that that might be so in view of what I heard in the old country. I was wondering how it would have affected our own production if we had set up factories to make a certain type of aeroplane and then found it to be obsolete in a short time.

Mr. HOWE: It all complicates the spare parts problem. We have four types of Anson aeroplanes, and each type requires certain spare parts. As one type goes out of production we must make ample provision for spare parts. The planes which were bought in the earlier stages now present an overhaul problem as, in some instances, spare parts have gone out of production. As I say, we have met this problem by organizing production in Canada

Mr. POWER: We have had to replace some of the older types of planes with a type which could be produced in Canada, even though they were more expensive.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are we doing anything at all to get into the production of aeroplane engines?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems to me that that is likely to become a bottleneck in the future. If all engines are produced in Great Britain and the United States, I think it ultimately will become a problem. Has any research work been done, or have any investigations been made by the department with a view to getting into the production of aeroplane engines?

Mr. HOWE: That problem has been considered carefully. We inquired into the source of engines, both on this continent and in England, and an adequate supply was assured to us. It certainly would be more convenient if we could manufacture engines here, particularly in meeting the spare parts problem, but that cannot be done. Certain engines have become obsolete and we have a spare parts problem. The production of engines required by Canada would create a tremendous problem, and after a most exhaustive study it was decided that we had not the man-power or the machine-tool capacity to meet this problem in full.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a tremendous problem in war time.

Mr. HOWE: Terrific. Australia manufactures aeroplane engines in a small way, but we should bear in mind that Australia has never undertaken the production of automobile and truck engines as we have. It would be most difficult to undertake an intricate task of that kind and do it well, and we thought we would be well advised to leave this field to those countries that are better organized to undertake it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Australia is so far away from sources of supply that she is practically forced to manufacture her own engines.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The President of the United States has indicated that that country will have a production of 50,000 planes a year and they will take care of their own engine needs. After the war aviation in this country will certainly grow, and at some time or another Canada will have to get into the production of aeroplane engines. It is to be hoped that the government has some plan for the future production of our own aeroplane engines.

Mr. HOWE: We must realize that after the war there will be engine capacity beyond all dreams of possible use. The engine capacity that is being created is tremendous. My hon. friend refers to the aeroplane production that is being planned in the United States, but I would tell him that engine production is being kept in step and our requirements are being considered in that programme. I think we may expect to have adequate supplies of engines during the war and a great glut of engine-making capacity after the war.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, the minister may remember that some months ago I drew his attention to the fact that Canadian news in south Africa did not seem to compare, in volume at least, with news from the other dominions. There are in the mining sections of south Africa a very large number of Canadians, and they are disappointed at listening so continually through the British Broadcasting Corporation, with messages emanating from Daventry, to descriptions of the war effort of the other dominions, and wonder what Canada has been doing. I drew the minister's attention to the matter at the time, and he told me that he would see what could be done with regard to it. Is he in a position now to describe further broadcasts of purely Canadian news in the other dominions?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): The subject of building a shortwave broadcasting station has been receiving careful consideration, but no decision in the matter has yet been arrived at. That will, perhaps, answer my hon. friend's question as to the point of broadcasting from this side.

Mr. STIRLING: Not entirely, because evidently the other dominions are able to make considerable use of Daventry; and I have always wondered why Canada should not place herself in the same position as, for instance, Australia and New Zealand with regard to news in south Africa.

Mr. THORSON: We have not taken any steps in the direction of broadcasting Canadian information from Daventry.

Mr. STIRLING: But is the minister not prepared to do so? If Australia can do so, and if New Zealand can do so, surely, for the benefit of our Canadians in south Africa, it would be desirable to give them information with regard to what Canada is doing. Otherwise, these Canadians believe that Canada is slipping behind.

Mr. THORSON: We have not done anything in that direction from the point of view of broadcasting. Of course, a number of copies of our other public information publications such as the one on Canada's war effort do go to south Africa. I would, however, be glad to give further consideration to the suggestion made by my hon friend.

Mr. STIRLING: To whom do these pamphlets go? As I have explained, these Canadians in south Africa are spread all over those very considerable areas where mining is the principal occupation; and it is inconceivable that these publications can be sent by post to such of those Canadians of whom the minister may be aware. Where they are in isolated situations—mining camps, mining towns and the like—it does tend rather to disgust them if they hear continuous descriptions of what other dominions are doing in this war effort, and they do not get their own Canadian news.

Mr. GREEN: Probably there is the same situation in other parts of the empire. Have any steps been taken so that Australia, New Zealand and India may have some information as to what Canada is doing in the war?

Mr. THORSON: The same method is in use. We do distribute to many portions of the globe leaflets giving particulars and facts relating to Canada's war effort, but we have not been broadcasting to the other dominions.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to make some arrangement with the British Broadcasting Corporation so that at times such information would be given by them?

Mr. THORSON: I replied to the hon. member for Yale that I would be glad to give further consideration to broadcasting from Daventry. If that is done, broadcasting can be arranged to all the dominions.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On this question, I should like to mention that African news comes over the German shortwave station, that is the 25-metre band, and we get it here quite plainly. They also have the 19, 20, 25, 31, 221 and 263 millimetre bands, over which they are broadcasting. Is anything being done in Canada to try to stop those shortwave broadcasts from coming here from Germany, because they do not say very nice things about Canada or the British empire?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How can we stop them?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The British government have stopped the Germans from broadcasting into England from their Norwegian stations. Is there not some method we can work out here, perhaps in conjunction with the United States government? This broadcast comes in during the morning from 10 to 10.30, and it is as clear as a bell; I am informed, in fact, that it is probably rebroadcast either in this country or in the United States.

Mr. THORSON: I am not aware that Great Britain has stopped shortwave broadcasting from Germany—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): From the northern part of Norway.

Mr. THORSON: —or from northern occupied countries. I hardly see how she could do that. I do not know how we could stop shortwave broadcasting from Germany or from German-occupied countries to this continent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That station in Norway broadcast for some months before the British stopped it, but they have now, I understand, two stations in England interfering on it to stop it.

Mr. THORSON: We have nothing of that sort in Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That particular matter was brought up in the British House of Commons.

Mr. THORSON: We have nothing of that sort here.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): On the subject of publicity generally, I should like to make a suggestion to the minister, and there are a couple of questions I wish to ask him.

The only way I know of to deal with information coming in such as we have been just discussing is to blot it out with a little broadcasting of our own. I am not particularly interested in the subject of shortwave radio broadcasting at the moment. I am interested in the dissemination of proper information about Canada's war effort, in Canada primarily, and then in the United States. It so happens that a large percentage of the Canadian people do not yet know, in spite of all that has been done, exactly what is going on; and certainly, if I may judge from the considerable numbers of United States citizens who pass through my own hands as recruits for the Canadian army, if one may assume that their knowledge is in any degree indicative of the general knowledge in the places from which they come, we are greatly mistaken if we imagine that much is known over there about our war effort.

I was encouraged by what the minister said the other day about the sending out of leaflets and pamphlets containing factual information, but even that is not, I think, equal to the sort of top-flight reporting to which the United States public is accustomed. There is no doubt that our well-wishers in the United States are hungry for information about what we are doing, for two purposes—the encouragement it gives them in combating sentiment which is not friendly to us, and the inspiration it provides to their own people. I doubt whether the average United States citizen, any more than most Canadians, goes in much for either reading or listening to speeches, no matter how effective they are.

I might except the fireside chats of the president, though competent radio statisticians tell us that even he, who has perhaps the second largest radio audience in the world, does not begin to reach everybody. The minister might well consider encouraging those responsible for the dissemination of knowledge of our war effort to throw away their typewriters, give their voices a rest and invest in more cameras. We are a lazy people, accustomed to getting a good deal of information through our eyes. There is hardly a decent publication on the American continent that would not use a good picture, particularly if it could get it for nothing. The newsreaders have become accustomed to it, and I should like to know whether the minister would consider a wider use of pictorial news, particularly on the other side of the line.

I want to say a word with respect to the present utilization of quotas, but someone else may want to say something with regard to publicity and I will let that stand for the moment.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): I do not intend to speak at any length or to analyse in detail the reports before the committee, one specific item relating to the question of publicity, about which my hon. friend has spoken, I should like to discuss, namely, the publicity given by the United States press to our war effort. I trust I may be permitted at this stage to make a few remarks on this subject.

On November 4 the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) spoke of "the importance of having Canada's war effort made more widely known in the United States than it is at the present time". Later on, in the course of the same day, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked for a "report on the work of the legation in Washington and what it had accomplished to counteract the sinister influence which has been depreciating Canada's war effort in the United States."

If I may be allowed to be personal, I may say that I made it my duty, after the summer sessions of the war expenditures committee, to visit the United States, mainly Washington and New York, in order to acquaint myself better with the development of the defence programme there as well as with the opinion of our neighbours concerning the situation facing the world at large, and the grave decisions that will have to be taken by them at some time or another in the future.

It is not my intention to burden the committee with a recital of the conclusions I have reached on many important and interesting topics as a result of that trip. I reserve for some other day any observations I may wish to make as to the workings of the United States form of government as compared with ours, as well as the democratic control of government by the duly chosen representatives of the people even in time of war. Such more or less academic questions may just as well be treated later on, coupled with a study of the workings of our new extra-governmental set-up in the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Bank of Canada and its ramifications, and the other control agencies created since the war. I feel, however, it is my duty, since this question has been raised concerning one of the points I investigated while in the United States, to give the committee my humble opinion on the matter.

As to the publicity given our war effort by the United States press, I will admit that the impression I had after a few days in New York was that it was inadequate because it did not seem to reach the man in the street. I was astonished at the little that was known concerning what we were doing. It appeared to me, from this more or less elementary survey, that Canada's war effort was not only not front-page news but did not seem to have that news value there which we might have expected it to have. I must say, however, in all justice, that I have since then received a statistical survey by an agency dealing especially in inquiries of that sort, that reports that the United States press in July and August contained more items than appeared previously with regard to Canada, and that in September the condition was a little better. There is, however, still a lack of knowledge on the part of the public at large with respect to our contribution to the present conflict. Apart from the European war, apart from the far east question, the important international news which we find in the United States newspapers generally has to do with south American republics. Our cousins of the other America who were never heard of in the United States press until a few years ago except when they overthrew a president are now front-page news, and Canada's main claim to fame for a large number of Americans is to have given its name to a ginger ale and supplied Madison Square Garden with hockey players.

[Mr. Picard.]

Apart from some well-intentioned but not always outstanding articles on the question by some visiting reporters; apart from some articles by the representative of the New York Times in Ottawa; and apart from some of the more or less distorted reports by the rewrite men on the editorial staff of Time magazine, the only items of note which we find are reproductions of the criticism of our war effort as contained in the Tory Gazette and the Globe and Mail, and I do not think this is calculated to keep the people of New York well informed. I might also venture to say that while I was in New York some sort of exhibition was given which did not contribute to a fair understanding of our position. I am bound to say that it was given by the premier of Ontario in the course of speeches and statements during his last trip there. It is comforting, however, to see that in many other cities than New York editorials and reports have appeared about conditions in Canada giving a better impression and a better view of what is being done.

I have before me a report from the Cincinnati Inquirer of July 19, which states:

> Every facet of the Canadian war effort is well planned and being well executed. Together, they constitute a splendid tribute to the courage, determination and ability of our friends across the border.

Later I came across an article that appeared in the Detroit Free Press in August, from which I quote:

> Compared with our own war effort, Canada's is highly creditable. Stories to the contrary may have sprung from a misinterpretation of criticisms of the Canadian government's conduct of the war by certain Canadian newspapers.

I hasten to say that the situation as I found it in Washington was far different from that in New York. There I found government officials, members of the senate and of the house of representatives, generally well informed on all our doings, and the credit for that should be given to our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), because the persons more directly responsible for this better appreciation of Canada in Washington are working under his personal guidance. The first is our minister to the United States, Hon. Leighton McCarthy. I wish to take this opportunity to reassure any whom I have myself heard criticizing this appointment on the ground of the age of the appointee. I have seen our minister at work, and I wish to state that his keen mind, untiring energy and personal friendly connection of long standing with the president and many of his advisers, make him one of our most valuable assets and a contributing factor to a better understanding between our two countries. Also, while not overlooking the ability and usefulness of the staff of our legation, I wish to single out in connection with this matter of publicity the press attaché who was selected four or five months ago and sent to Washington. I thought until a few minutes ago that he was under the ministry of information; I am now aware that he is directly under the Department of External Affairs. I may not be an expert in the matter, but when I compare the situation in Washington with that in New York and even between the New York press recently and in a period prior to the appointment of Mr. Reading, I would say his appointment was more than timely and seems to be proving a good one. This courteous, mild-mannered and apparently unassuming man seems already to have accomplished a good deal; his methods appear to have had a happier result in Washington than the blatant noises of more aggressive men.

Perhaps a different but just as efficient type of man might be needed by the ministry of information to handle the New York press boys if such an appointment were contemplated by the Prime Minister when he spoke in the house of the best possible methods being adopted by the Canadian government to supplement the actual sources of Canadian news in the United States. I have confidence that the Prime Minister as well as the ministry of information will deal with the New York situation and will bring about there as good results as have been achieved in Washington. May I emphasize at this time what the Prime Minister said in answer to the hon. member for Parkdale. He said that there is no "better means of making Canada's war effort known in the United States and elsewhere than to have our own press give a full appreciation of it," because most of the newspapers in the United States "obtain their information with respect to Canada's war effort from what appears in our own press."

When the leader of the opposition worries about the "sinister influences which have been depreciating Canada's war effort in the United States," he has only to think of some of his own friends, particularly of the Montreal Gazette and the Toronto Globe and Mail, because any criticism of the Canadian war effort in the United States is not derived from opinion in the United States but is commented upon by that press as a result of the criticism seen in Canadian papers. Each outburst of unjustified criticism of the quality or extent of our participation is meat for the United States isolationists and their propagandists, and works ultimately against the interest of the British cause.

The same comment might apply to the harm done in this country by the unwarranted cries of the Tory press and Tory speakers concerning union government and other methods of carrying on the war. It appears evident that these apostles are not thereby so much helping the war effort of the country as furthering the political efforts of their party to blur the issues, alarm the country and divide the Liberals in order to gain power, or at least a share of it. I shall not at this moment discuss these questions because they are not so much in the public mind as the blatant noises of a few Tory newspapers and a boisterous minority would have us believe.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member has learned his lesson in a good school.

Mr. PICARD: I am glad of the compliment; I take it as such. The people of Canada have given a mandate to the present government to drive the car, and the Conservatives are thumbing to hitch-hike—

Mr. HOMUTH: We do not want to hitch-hike, but we want some decent driving.

Mr. PICARD: They are not in the car and they already act like back-seat drivers.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind hon. gentlemen that when the Chairman stands, hon. gentlemen should sit down, and furthermore when the Chairman is addressing the committee, hon. gentlemen should have respect for the Chair, if not for the Chairman. That makes for orderly discussion. The hon. member for Bellechasse has the floor.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let him keep it on a higher plane.

Mr. PICARD: I must apologize to the Chair; I evidently have not learned well enough yet from "that good school".

The people knew well what they were doing when they selected the present government in an election held more than six months after the beginning of the war.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member for Waterloo South to keep order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I bow to your ruling.

Mr. PICARD: The people of Canada remembered when they chose this government, what kind of drivers they had during the last war, and they did not want to have the same experience again. They knew in what condition that crew left Canada after governing from 1911 to 1921, wrecking the unity and harmony of the country by a false interpretation of the nature of our participation in the war. When the people of Canada realize what has already been accomplished and what is in process of execution in the way of training as well as production; when they grasp the facts contained in the clear and frank statements of the ministers charged more directly with the conduct of the war effort, they will know that Canada up to now has done more proportionately than any other country, except some of those in which the war has been waged actively.

It is imperative, however, that these facts be kept constantly before the public. The ministry of information has issued an illuminating booklet on the matter, but that is not enough; these facts should be repeated time and again so that our people may understand the magnitude of our accomplishment and derive from that the pride of duty well done. There is nothing for a Canadian to be ashamed of when a country with a population under 11,500,000 has already over 520,000 men under arms—

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, now, wait. Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. member a question? I think he should divide that 520,000 up as to where they are and what they constitute; otherwise we get a false impression throughout the whole country.

Mr. PICARD: If my hon. friend will be patient, the division is coming in a moment. Of this number, 357,000 are enlisted for service overseas; 240,000 are in the active army, 90,000 are in the air force already blazing the skies with their exploits or in process of training, 27,000 are in the navy, convoying ships to Britain, patrolling our shores or getting ready to do so, and 170,000 are in our own territorial army manning the outposts of our home defences or training to play their part in the protection of their country.

Mr. HOMUTH: Even the Liberals laugh at that.

Mr. PICARD: There is nothing for a Canadian to be ashamed of when the industrial energy of his country has been geared in such a short time to make it one of the largest arsenals of the democracies, when its unending flow of munitions and war supplies is feeding the armies of our allies, when the products of its agriculture are feeding the British isles. There is nothing for a Canadian to be ashamed of when this country is waging war to the tune of $4,000,000 daily, when it has lent to Britain in recent months nearly $1,000,000,000—

Mr. WHITE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Just before the dinner recess the Chairman ruled that I must stop my speech and confine myself to asking questions. I ask what the hon. member is doing now? He is reading a speech right through.

Mr. PICARD: On the point of order I wish to remind my hon. friend that I have dealt first with the question of publicity under the ministry of information, and I am now dealing with the question of man-power, which is under the Department of National War Services, because it is they who call to arms the territorial army. It is all relevant. At any rate I shall have finished in a moment.

Canada, true to its historical traditions, is doing its duty towards itself, towards its allies, and towards the sacred cause of liberty and democracy. It is doing it under the guidance of a trusted government, elected in time of war, especially for the conduct of the war, and it will continue doing it despite the intrigues and the alarming cries of the Tories.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister given attention to the questions which I directed to him during the course of his remarks, with respect to the medical examination of those called for training purposes, and the position with respect to the numbers examined?

Mr. THORSON: When I spoke the other day the leader of the opposition and some other hon. gentlemen asked me a number of questions, some of which were repeated to-day by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. With regard to medical examinations, when a person receives notice that he is to be called up for training under the regulations he is notified to report for medical examination and may go to any doctor of his own choice. That is the first examination. That doctor is supposed to examine him in accordance with the standards that are set by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have all doctors those regulations, and do they know the requirements?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are all informed?

Mr. THORSON: Yes; they also receive a detailed examination form which they are required to complete, which form is sent in to the divisional registrar's office. Then there is a medical adviser attached to each administrative division, who can check these forms and the findings of the examining physician. If he feels there is any doubt about the category in which the man has been placed, he can order the man to report to any other doctor whom he may name.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to interrupt unduly, but the minister says this medical adviser can check the forms, can do this and can do that. Does he?

Mr. THORSON: Yes; all the forms are most carefully checked in the light of the answers given by the first examining physician. Then, if there is still doubt, the man can be sent to a revision board. These boards consist of three doctors, and we are setting them up in different parts of Canada. Then, when the man is turned over to the training centre, he is examined again, this time by a military medical board in that centre. Once the man is delivered to the training centre he ceases to come under the jurisdiction of my department and comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister give us some data, some figures, as to how many have been reexamined by other doctors, for instance, or by the board in each military district?

Mr. THORSON: I do not know that I could give the number of reexaminations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is exactly what was asked.

Mr. THORSON: The prime concern thus far has been to find men in the required categories, and there has been no difficulty in doing that. Up to now there has not been any object in reexamining all the rejects.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many have been reexamined in each military district?

Mr. THORSON: Not a great many of the rejects have been reexamined.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Naturally those who had been accepted would not be reexamined, except when they came to the training centres. No one but the rejects would be reexamined. Those who are accepted and automatically called up are examined at the training centre, as I understand it. I want to know how many of the rejects have been reexamined.

Mr. THORSON: Not many of the rejects have been reexamined. It is only when the examination by the original physician indicates that perhaps an error has been made in the category, or where there is any doubt as to the category, that the man can be asked to report to another doctor. A further check has been made along these lines. In some instances reports have come in that a number of men were being rejected in a certain area by a certain doctor. These reports have been checked, and I am happy to say that I do not recall any instance in which it was found that a doctor was deliberately rejecting men or giving false information in these returns.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give us information with regard to the men rejected, giving the percentage in each category, A, B and C?

Mr. THORSON: Yes, I have that.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Could the minister give that by provinces, instead of for the whole of Canada?

Mr. THORSON: It is given here by administrative divisions. I have quite a long table, showing the number of men examined by civilian physicians, with the number and percentage in each medical category, for the first nine military training periods, given by administrative divisions. With the consent of the committee I could place this table on Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it very long?

Mr. THORSON: It is quite a lengthy tabulation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before placing it on Hansard, would the minister tell the committee the gross number of men examined by the civilian doctors, the number placed in each class, and the number rejected in each class? I think the desire is to get the number rejected in each class, in the first instance, to see just how bad or how good is the health of these young men.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, I can give that. The total number of men examined for the first nine military training periods was 209,298. Of these, 116,800, or 55·9 per cent, were found to be in category A; 21,651, or 10·4 per cent, to be in category B-1; 8,265, or 3·9 per cent, in category B-2; 9,341, or 4·5 per cent, in category C-1; 11,575, or 5·6 per cent, in category C-2; 5,909, or 2·8 per cent, in category D, and 35,587, or 17 per cent, in category E.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many of those are unsuitable for military service? I do not know the technicalities well enough to know how many would be called.

Mr. THORSON: My understanding is that the only ones taken for military training are those in category A.

Mr. CASSELMAN: That is right.

Mr. THORSON: But I am not absolutely sure of that, because I have a recollection that some Bs and Cs were in the early months called for training. My recollection is—and I think I am correct—that at present we are taking only category A men for actual training. They constitute 55·9 per cent of those examined by the civilian doctors.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The table to which the minister has referred is made out in divisions A, B, C and so on?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Could the minister give the key in relation to military districts?

Mr. THORSON: They do not absolutely check, but I could give a key which would be helpful. The divisions are named by letters of the alphabet. Division A has its headquarters at London, Ontario, and division B has its headquarters at Toronto.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the minister give the information also according to military districts? Can he do that? If he has not that information, I have it upstairs in my office, and could let him have it.

Mr. THORSON: I could give the information respecting headquarters, and they check, roughly, although not exactly, with the military districts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What number is A?

Mr. THORSON: It is No. 1. Division B is Toronto, No. 2; C is Kingston. They do not check actually with the military districts, because division D has its headquarters at Port Arthur, and division E has its headquarters at Montreal. Division F is at Quebec, G at Halifax, A at Saint John, I at Charlottetown, J at Winnipeg, K at Vancouver, M at Regina and N at Edmonton. The complete table is as follows:

Mr. GREEN: As the minister has stated, it is alarming to think that there should be such a large percentage of young men unfit for service. He went on to point out that plans were in contemplation for conditioning some of these young men who had been rejected. He should tell the committee just how far those plans have gone. For instance, are the men who have been rejected eligible for treatment in hospitals of the Department of Pensions and National Health?

Mr. THORSON: No.

Mr. GREEN: May they go in there and have operations which will enable them to qualify for the forces?

Mr. THORSON: No, not yet.

Mr. GREEN: What steps have been taken. It seems to me it is of vital importance to the nation that no steps should be spared which would enable those young men to qualify for the forces. It is not good enough to sit back, wring our hands and say that there is a heavy percentage who cannot qualify, and that we can do nothing about it. The health of many of those young men can be improved, and such improvement would be greatly to the benefit not only of the forces but also of the young men and their families, and of the nation at large. I would ask the minister to give a more detailed explanation of what the government has in mind in this connection.

Mr. THORSON: I quite agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South. The plans are just being formulated. I indicated that an interdepartmental committee was being set up, consisting of representatives of the Department of National Defence, the Department of Pensions and National Health, and the Department of National War Services.

With regard to the other question raised by the hon. member, these persons are not as yet entitled to any hospitalization or treatment. As he will appreciate, these men are still civilians who have not been turned over to the Department of National Defence. Therefore they are not yet soldiers. I assure my hon. friend that every effort will be made to study with the greatest possible care the plans necessary for the reconditioning of these men. I believe we shall be able to recondition quite a number, because a number of persons may be thrown into a category lower than that desirable for training, on account of some minor imperfection which could be remedied with comparatively little treatment. As is well known, the requirements for category A are quite severe.

[Mr. Thorson.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): When the minister is formulating his plans, would it be possible to include not only the men who come under the war service regulations but also the men who, although they do not come within the regulations, would be anxious to join the active service forces. I know a number of young men who have tried to join active service units, but who have been rejected as category E. For instance, some may require operations for hernia. In some instances the parents have been able to pay for operations, and the young men affected have gone overseas. In other instances young men in the same district remain in category E because they could not afford those operations. They may not come within the large group who would receive the reconditioning services outlined by the minister, but I believe they would have a claim to such reconditioning, even more than the men called under the regulations. When the minister is formulating his plans, could this point not be kept in mind?

Mr. THORSON: Is my hon. friend thinking of persons who have applied for enlistment but have been rejected?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. THORSON: We would be glad to give consideration to that suggestion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I know there are a large number.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have a soft spot for the minister, because he has to take charge of all the matters his colleagues try to get rid of. That is a very hard problem for him, and I take this opportunity to pay him a well-deserved tribute by saying that he is equal to the occasion, and by pointing out that he is assisted in his work by two excellent deputy ministers, Mr. Justice Davis and Major-General LaFleche.

Very often young men try to enlist when they are unfit. They may be passed as class A by the local board and by the army medical board in the district. I see many people in my constituency, and I took the trouble to question some of these boys who had been placed in category A. To my great surprise I learned that men who had been placed in category A by two boards were suffering from such disabilities as ruptures, internal goitres and chronic appendicitis. This matter was referred to the board which found that these men should be in category E on account of disabilities which they possessed when they had their first examination.

This shows two things. First, it shows that many French-Canadians are willing to enlist even though they are not physically fit and, second, it shows that the doctors are not always as careful as they should be. Apparently the local board relies upon the army board, while the army board thinks the local doctors, who know the family history from the medical point of view, are well informed. The result is that no one pays any real attention, each relying upon the other. There has been considerable improvement in this connection and now more care is paid to the examination. I do not see why the dominion government should waste money in training soldiers who are physically unfit. We all regret that such a large proportion of our soldiers are below standard as far as health is concerned and it is to be hoped that there will be an improvement in the near future.

I have only one question to ask the minister. There is one thing upon which I should like to congratulate him, something that I mentioned yesterday afternoon. I refer to the regulation passed by his department providing that those engaged in agriculture and the operations of railways shall be considered as being in seasonal occupations. Many of us know the necessary work that is being done by these workers, and I am glad to note that in an amendment dated October 4 of this year these occupations are listed as seasonal and essential. This should have been done in the original regulation, but the correction has been rightly and aptly made by the minister.

According to subsection 1 of article 14, as redrafted, it is provided that no postponement order may be made for more than six months, but upon reviewing the occupation the board may grant one or more extensions, provided that the board may cancel the order at any time for military reasons or for cause. If it is established to the satisfaction of the commission that a man is serving the state by doing agricultural work or working as a railroad man, will a postponement be granted for a further six months, at which time he can report to the commission or to the registrar? Also, if the conditions are not changed at the end of six months, is a renewal of the postponement order authorized by the new regulations?

Mr. THORSON: I think the regulations are quite clear in that regard. My answer will be in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White). No postponement can be for longer than six months, but when that six months period is over, another postponement may be granted. The jurisdiction of the board is not confined to the second postponement; the board may grant one or more extensions of the original postponement, but each postponement must be for a period of not longer than six months. In each case the board looks at the application from the point of view of the national interest and deals with each case upon its merits. It has complete jurisdiction in granting or refusing an application for a postponement order.

Mr. McGREGOR: Will the minister place upon the record the number of postponements granted in the different divisions?

Mr. THORSON: I can do that, although it is quite a lengthy table.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister said that each case discussed was considered by these boards on its merits, and that the sole disposition of cases lay with the boards?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Under this new regulation, national war service regulation No. 14, there is no longer any appeal to the minister, and, as I understand it, the sole disposition depends now upon the board in question.

Mr. THORSON: Quite right.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the minister elaborate that to the committee, and explain what is done to arrive at some degree of standardization among the different boards. May I point out, for instance, a glaring example which was reported in the press some time ago. In Manitoba certain hockey players made application for postponement because they wanted to go to the United States to play hockey. Their applications were rejected, but in one of the other provinces—Ontario, I believe—some hockey players applied for and received their permission.

It seems to me that the former regulation was preferable. This is a tremendous responsibility to leave in the hands of what is, after all, a quasi-judicial body not directly responsible to this house. It is possible that, if the personnel of a board were not of the right type, a state of petty tyranny might exist in a province. A person has no appeal to the minister or to any other body. If the men on the board are unsympathetic or have not the proper approach to the problem, a very difficult local situation might arise. At the other extreme, in another administrative area there might be a very lax board and consequently an unsatisfactory situation. To confer sole jurisdiction and the unfettered disposition of these cases upon what should be only an administrative board is to set up a series of boards which have no standardized system of interpretation, can deal with each case in their own way, and may deal with these cases entirely differently in different geographical sections of the dominion. I wondered what system the minister had for standardizing the work of the boards right across the country, or is each board to be a law to itself, applying these regulations as it sees fit to each case that comes before it?

Mr. McGREGOR: I think we should get one thing cleaned up at a time. We have asked for the numbers of applications and exemptions from each province. If the minister will put that information on the record, it will clear up that point.

An hon. MEMBER: That has been done.

Mr. McGREGOR: No. He stated the number of exemptions in each province; he has not given the number of applications—

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member is quite correct.

Mr. McGREGOR: —and also the number of men called.

Mr. THORSON: I do not know to what extent hon. members want tremendous tabulations put on Hansard. I have no objection to putting on the record anything the committee wishes to have, but these tabulations are quite lengthy. What tables does the hon. member wish to have?

Mr. McGREGOR: We want to find out, for each of the different provinces, how many applications have been made for exemptions and how many applications have been granted.

Mr. THORSON: I am sure that the hon. member is referring to applications for postponements.

Mr. McGREGOR: Yes, postponements.

Mr. THORSON: With the consent of the committee, I will put on Hansard tables giving all that information.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I have a statement from the minister with reference to the standardizing of the work of these different boards?

Mr. THORSON: The question which the hon. member for Weyburn has raised might also be raised with regard to our courts of justice when they are trying questions of fact, because the human element comes in there. I would remind the hon. member that each one of these administrative boards consists of three persons, and is headed by a judge of a superior court or other court of the province. In addition, there are two other representatives, and I think I can properly say that they are responsible men in their communities. Also, a representative of the Department of National Defence, and a representative of the national labour supply council, have the right to be present at the sittings of the board, and each of them has the right to make representations to the board. I believe I can safely say that the board deals with these applications for postponement carefully and judicially; I might go even further and say, sympathetically.

The hon. member for Weyburn asked about some hockey players, and the leader of the opposition also made some reference to them. I think this subject has received in the sports columns of the newspapers a great deal more attention than it deserves. I was in Toronto when the first announcement was made of the decision made by Mr. Justice Adamson, of administrative division J, who had had a number of young men appear before him to ask for his authority to leave Canada so that they might play professional hockey in the United States. He rejected those applications. I was asked what my opinion of the matter was, and I expressed the opinion generally—I hold it yet—that the needs of the war supersede those of sport. I was also asked what would be the effect of that decision. As I have pointed out, in respect of these particular matters the chairman of each board has jurisdiction, and he may deal with the case in accordance with his views on the subject. The section which is involved in these applications by hockey players is section 4, subsection 2. I should like to put it on the record so that there may be the fullest understanding of this situation. It reads:

> No male British subject who is liable to be called out for military training under the next preceding subsection shall, after his age class has been called out by proclamation, as provided by subsection 1 of section 5 of these regulations, leave Canada for any reason whatsoever, unless and until he has been so authorized in writing by the chairman of the board to whose jurisdiction such man is subject.

Therefore anyone who is under twenty-one years of age does not have to go to the chairman of the board for necessary authorization in writing, nor does anyone who is over twenty-four, so that the chairman of the board deals only with applications coming from young men who are in the age groups that have been called up by proclamation, that is to say, young men of the 21, 22, 23 and 24 age classes.

The respective chairmen of the boards have dealt with this subject in a manner that is not altogether uniform, but I should point out that it is the chairman of the board who deals with these applications for written authority to leave the country. It may be of interest to know, in view of the fact that so much publicity has been given to this matter in the sports pages of the newspapers, that altogether there are sixty hockey players who have been granted permission to leave Canada by the chairmen of the divisional boards: seven from adminstrative division A, London; twenty-two from administrative division B, Toronto; six from administrative division C, Kingston; four from administrative division D, Port Arthur; five from administrative division E, Montreal; one from administrative division F, Quebec; none from administrative division G, Halifax; one from administrative division H, Saint John; none from administrative division I, Charlottetown; none from administrative division J, Winnipeg; none from administrative division K, Vancouver; one from administrative division M, Regina; thirteen from administrative division N, Edmonton. I understand that the chairmen, in granting this written authority, to leave Canada in order to play hockey, to the young men who are going over to play in the United States, receive assurances from them that they will be immediately available if they are called. There is the situation.

Recently there was a little press item about fourteen hockey pros leaving from Winnipeg, and some concern was expressed as to how they could do so in view of the fact that the chairman of the board at Winnipeg had granted no written authority. On checking that up, I find that ten of the fourteen men were either under twenty-one or over twenty-four and that one was marked "category E." I have not the full particulars with regard to the other three, but the chances are that they got their written authority from some other chairman.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister's statement fully substantiates the point I made, namely, the total lack of uniformity.

Mr. THORSON: I do not know how one could get uniformity on questions of fact from administrative boards any more than one could get uniformity on questions of fact from courts of law. We are seeking as best we can to get uniformity in the matter of dealing with all those persons whose cases are considered by the board as individual persons, each person having his own case before the board. We have had conferences here at Ottawa by the chairmen of the boards, and that sort of thing has been helpful. I do not recall when we had the latest conference, but it was before I took charge of the department, and I think it might be useful to have another conference for the purpose of bringing about further uniformity of administration. I believe, however, I can say to the hon. member for Weyburn that where the human factor comes in, I do not see how one can eliminate differences altogether any more than one can in a court of law or in cases before juries. One jury might convict a man whereas another jury might acquit him, and they are trying questions of fact and dealing with individual cases. I can say this, however, that the boards have sought to deal with these applications for postponement in a careful, judicial and sympathetic manner, and that, by and large, the regulations, from that point of view, have worked fairly satisfactorily.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not want to find fault with the regulations, but I do suggest two things. While it may not be possible to have complete uniformity, it is possible to have a greater measure of uniformity, because it is not altogether a fact-finding matter. As far as the public are concerned, here were men who had identical cases to present. The minister himself has said that in Winnipeg men are rejected, whereas in London or Toronto men are given permission to proceed across the line. The difference was not in fact; it was in the interpretation given by the chairmen of the boards. It seems to me that if we want to have the public regard this as fair administration, we shall have to have a greater degree of uniformity; otherwise a man will feel that someone else living in another province with a different personnel on the board will get different treatment from what he gets in his particular district. The second suggestion I make is this. I still think the first regulation which allowed some court of appeal—either the minister or some official here—would obviate much of the feeling of uneasiness which has arisen in consequence of these different decisions that are handed down by the respective boards in identical cases.

Mr. McNEVIN: If I understood the hon. member for Témiscouata correctly, he said that agriculture was included with lumbering as a seasonal occupation. Is that the view of the department?

Mr. THORSON: Farming is dealt with under section 14 of the regulations, the heading of which is "seasonal and essential occupations." Therefore I think the interpretation placed on the matter by the hon. member for Témiscouata is reasonably sound, because farming is also named in the operative part along with a number of other occupations also of a seasonal and essential nature. I put the whole section on the record when I was before the committee previously.

Mr. McNEVIN: In that connection I would point out that there may be sections of Canada in which agriculture could be properly classified as a seasonal occupation. Nevertheless there are wide areas where the word "essential" would be the proper description, because in large areas in Ontario, due to the care and feeding of live stock, the winter season is practically as busy on the average farm as the summer season.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the members of these boards which have had thrown upon them the responsibility of making the selection of those to take this military training. I think in some respects the considerations that have entered greatly into these decisions would be where dairy farms and farms where there is a heavy hog production may properly be classified as essential to our war effort. But I would point out that the beef cattle areas represent an equally important item of production as far as our war effort is concerned, because wherever we have had a curtailment of consumption of pork products, beef is used to a greater extent as a substitute than any other commodity. Special attention should be given to that point.

Beef is important from another point of view. It is a staple commodity that enters into the diet of our army and our civilian population. Then, if we happen to have any surplus, there is ample provision for export to the United States, thus providing the much needed United States dollars to purchase vital commodities for the building up of our mechanized forces. Therefore the production of beef should be on a par with districts producing pork products and dairy products.

Mr. THORSON: By this section the occupation of farming is put in exactly the same position as any occupation that is essential to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. FAIR: I should not like to have this committee think that in provinces other than Ontario live stock can be grown without having help to feed it. Ontario is not the only province in Canada. While in Alberta we have very bright sunshine, we still have to do a great deal of work to raise that vastly increased crop of hogs that we have there at the present time. While in Alberta we raise four-legged hogs, I am sorry to say that in some of the provinces they raise the two-legged type.

Mr. HANSELL: A little while ago we were discussing the matter of men being rejected on account of being physically unfit. I notice on page 4100 of Hansard the minister is reported as saying:

> Out of a total of 217,588 men examined up to October 2, 1941, only about 56 per cent were placed in category A, the only category accepted for training at the present time by the Department of National Defence. This is a serious situation, and the plans for the reconditioning of these men who have been rejected are under consideration.

For over 50 per cent of our young men in the prime of life to be physically unfit is indeed an alarming state of affairs. I do not think the minister would tell us this 50 per cent were physically unfit by reason of having ruptures, or appendicitis, or something of that kind. The old adage that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure" still holds good. I am wondering whether something cannot be done to prevent the teen age boys who are coming along and who, if the war lasts two or three years more, will perhaps be called into service, from being also found physically unfit.

The minister said that plans for reconditioning these young men are under consideration. I would implore the minister not to use the term "reconditioning".

An hon. MEMBER: It sounds like an old car.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes; men are not made of tin.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. member suggest a better term?

Mr. HANSELL: We talk of reconditioning machinery after it has been used. The term might be in order if we could say that these young men are physically unfit because they have been giving such strenuous service to the building up of Canada. I think, however, I am right when I suggest that the reason why 50 per cent of our young men cannot pass the physical tests when they are called up for training is that for ten long years we have gone through a state of poverty and destitution which was deliberately imposed upon the country. We may say that times are better now, that people are earning more money, but can we say that is going to continue? I should like to ask the minister if he agrees with my diagnosis, that it is on account of the depression of recent years that these young men are not physically fit. I think the subject of malnutrition in these past years is worthy of attention.

I do not want to be jumping up and down, so, while I am on my feet, might I refer to another matter? The minister can keep in mind the question I have asked him so that he can answer later. The subject of broadcasting was brought up some little time ago, and some discussion took place. On August 20 of this year I was very much alarmed to discover, in a newspaper which I picked up, that in a radio broadcast over the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a private member of this house had read a secret document that was in the hands of the intelligence service of this country. I say I was seriously shocked to read that in the newspaper, because I happened to be a member of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations before which that document was read. It was not shown to the members of the committee, which met in camera; it was read by an officer of the Department of Justice, and we did not even see it. Due to the fact that those sittings were held in camera I felt, as I believe other members of the committee felt, in duty bound to keep secret such matters as I have just mentioned. The committee concluded its work; we went to our respective homes, and then along comes a private member of parliament—who was also a member of that committee—who has been given access to these secret documents of state, who can take them out of the files and read them in a radio speech over a national hook-up.

I am not seriously complaining because the document was read. What I am complaining about is the fact that this was a secret document, read to a committee sitting in camera, and the members of that committee felt in duty bound to keep everything of that kind confidential. Then a private member is given access to it. I should like the minister to tell me by what authority this private member was given permission to obtain this document and read it over the radio. There is another question: if a private member of another party in this house should ask for the same privilege, would that request be granted? I think I have made myself clear. I protest against that sort of thing, and as a member of that committee I think I have a right to do so.

Mr. THORSON: With regard to the second matter mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod, I should be glad if he would give me the particulars of what he has referred to, and I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not know about it?

Mr. THORSON: No, I do not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We all heard the broadcast.

Mr. THORSON: I did not hear it, and I do not know to what the hon. member refers.

Mr. HANSELL: I can give the minister the particulars now. I did not want to embarrass any hon. member, but I might read part of this newspaper article:

> Ernest Bertrand, Liberal member of parliament for Montreal Laurier, read in a broadcast address to-night a document which he said contained orders from an enemy government to its agents in Canada, and revealed with what "thoroughness and detail the secret plotting" was contrived.

Later, the news dispatch says:

> . . . Mr. Bertrand said in his address, in which he discussed the defence of Canada regulations over the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.
> Dated 1937, it was addressed to an agent working in a large Canadian city, said Mr. Bertrand, adding that this was the first time it had been made public.

Mr. THORSON: I am not aware of the facts with regard to the broadcast and could not possibly reply to this question at the moment.

The first question asked by my hon. friend had reference to the very large number of persons who were rejected when they presented themselves for medical examination after being called up. While I appreciate that the situation is a very serious one, I should not like to go so far as to say that it is the result of the depression years. Those may have had their effect on some of these men, but I should like to point out that the standards set by the Department of National Defence are very high. I should point out also that some of the ailments on account of which men were placed in categories lower than A were slight in themselves, but sufficient to exclude these men from the highest category, without in any way affecting their ordinary health. I wonder how many members of this house could get into category A.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are not twenty-one year olds.

Mr. THORSON: Even so, men may not be in category A and yet be in excellent health to all intents and purposes, without being able to undergo the very severe strains that must be undergone by soldiers. When I point out these things, of course I am not minimizing the grave nature of the problem.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What fee is paid to civilian doctors for these preliminary examinations? I undertsand that at the outset the fee was $1.

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If that fee is still paid, it seems to me that a very thorough examination cannot be expected for it. Have the doctors across Canada agreed to do this work for this small fee as part of their contribution to the war effort?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are they really conducting a $5 examination and thus making a contribution of $4 to the cause, or is only a superficial examination made? Perhaps the minister would enlarge upon the nature of the examination.

Mr. THORSON: I think we can safely say that in a great many cases the doctors are doing this work as a contribution to the national effort. The fee they receive is $1 per examination, which is a great deal less than one would have to pay ordinarily for an examination of this kind. I believe they give a fair physical examination.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the discussion which took place a short time ago with reference to the chairmen of the various boards having authority to permit persons to go to the United States, mention was made of the situation with regard to hockey players. We have no information as to the number of people in Canada between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-four who obtained authority to go to the United States during the past year. I would ask the minister to give that information. In addition, as I understand the situation, on October 7 the regulations dealing with the granting of postponements were altered. Up until that date a postponement, whether granted or refused by the provincial board, was subject to a form of appeal to the minister. That was the condition prior to October 7.

Mr. THORSON: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is my interpretation of the remarks of the minister as reported at page 4099 of Hansard, when he referred to section 14.

Mr. THORSON: No; that had nothing to do with the matter of appeals.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That had to do with the question of postponement?

Mr. THORSON: Yes, but it had nothing to do with the subject of appeals.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister stated on that occasion, as I summarize his words, that an alteration was made in the regulation on that date, and that since that time the decision of the provincial board has been final. Is that not correct?

Mr. THORSON: I was about to read the old regulation as it stood and, if I recall what I said the other night, it was that under the old regulation certain directions from the minister were contemplated. I had not in mind the subject of any appeal from the boards. I do not think there was any appeal from the boards, even prior to the new section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then, are there any cases where the minister or his predecessor directed any of the provincial boards to alter decisions which any or all of those provincial boards had made?

Mr. THORSON: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I direct the minister's attention to a somewhat wider aspect of this question of man-power. He will recall that in the course of the remarks I made in the house a week ago to-day I referred to the question of Canada's potential man-power capacity, and to the national registration of August, 1940. I believe I have served sufficient notice, and I should now like to have a specific statement of Canada's potential man-power capacity as disclosed by the national registration, not only for the armed services but for other classes of service as well. If the minister is not in a position to make the statement to-night, perhaps he would be good enough to make it to-morrow.

Does he agree with the statement made by his predecessor, as reported by the press, that Canada can muster a million men for the armed forces, and still attain the necessary production in farm and factory? I do not know whether or not that is possible, but I hope it is. There may have been a little bit of optimism on the part of the minister's predecessor, but I have no doubt that he made the statement in good faith, believing in the truth of it, because one would not suggest anything else from the present Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement is not word for word what I said. I read it, of course, and I have it in writing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The words I have used may not be the exact words used by the minister, but they are taken from the lead of the Canadian Press, and if they are in error, the Minister will correct them. I believe, however, that I have given the substance of what he has said. That is what the public understood him to say. I am not disagreeing with him; I am asking him for information.

The Canadian Press dispatch dated at Ottawa, September 13, states:

> Canada can muster 1,000,000 men for the armed forces and still attain the necessary production in farm and factory, agriculture minister J. G. Gardiner said last night in a reconsecration week speech on the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Then he goes on to say:

> If 1,000,000 men were called to arms, he said, there would still be 7,000,000 persons over sixteen years of age left and these properly organized and determined to stand behind the armed forces can operate all our farms, our factories and places of business in a manner which will give us the production required.

Mr. GARDINER: The last sentence is what I said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not rise to attack that statement. It may have been a slight exaggeration, but I should think it was at all events within shooting distance of being correct. I should hope it would be. This country paid a good many hundreds of thousands of dollars for the national registration, and it would have cost a great deal more had it not been for the voluntary services of a large number of citizens, who worked free of charge in order to keep down expense. I would ask the minister to give a specific statement of Canada's potential man-power capacity, as disclosed by that registration.

In that statement I should like to have the total number of men of military age in Canada, between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five. I take those ages, because they are the ones liable to call under the mobilization act. If possible, I should like to have the statement broken down broadly into the various occupations of the persons of military age.

I have one other request to make. From time to time proclamations have gone out calling the classes of 21 years, 22 years, 23 years and 24 years. How many are there in each category of those four ages? I want that information so as to have a broad picture of the potential man-power of Canada. I ask for the information, not to test the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, but to learn the true picture with relation to man-power. I do not believe many people in Canada really know about it. There are very few who know that one of the purposes of national registration was to let us know what the exact situation was. Unless we can get those figures and have them properly tabulated in some intelligent form, then there was not much use of national registration.

So far as I recall, up to a certain time the only use of the national registration was a basis upon which to issue a proclamation for the call of the 21-year-old and following classes. The registration cards, or applications—whatever their proper designation was—were segregated so that they could be handled quickly. On the basis of that registration the first call for training was sent out. Have I made myself sufficiently clear with respect to the information desired? If the minister has not the information to-night, I would be content to have it at three o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CASSELMAN: When the minister is giving the numbers in the 21-, 22-, 23- and 24-year-old classes, would he also give the number in each of those classes who have been notified to report for examination?

Mr. THORSON: Yes. A number of questions requiring considerable break-down have been asked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That information must be tabulated now; it was secured fifteen months ago.

Mr. THORSON: I have a good deal of the information for my hon. friend. Before answering him, however, may I reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre. The figures for the persons who have been authorized in writing by the various chairmen to leave Canada will have to be obtained from the chairmen. I shall be glad to obtain that information from them because I do not have it in tabulated form at the present time. That is the function the chairman exercises. When a man leaves the country he must have a passport, and a passport is not issued unless there is the necessary authorization in writing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How often do the chairmen furnish the minister with information as to the number that have been granted?

Mr. THORSON: I do not know that we have asked the chairmen to give us any regular break-down with regard to the different kinds of requests, but I shall be glad to obtain that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have to have passports, but what about these woods workers who did not have to have passports?

Mr. THORSON: I think that situation was explained by the Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Special provision was made for them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Were these 4,000 or 5,000 lumbermen exempted by the board before they went across?

Mr. THORSON: If the passport regulations were waived, it is quite likely that a considerable number went across under the general waiver. I should not be a bit surprised if some of them were within the age group of twenty-one to twenty-four years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No doubt.

Mr. THORSON: No doubt about that. With regard to the number of men in each class actually called up; I shall have to get this detailed information from the divisions. As far as I recollect, we do not have the break-down in that detailed form.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We know how many men there were twenty-one years of age as of July 1, 1941.

Mr. THORSON: I shall get that information as rapidly as possible.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Do I understand the minister to say that men subject to call are allowed to leave the country as the result of an authorization given by the chairmen of the provincial boards and that he has no record of them?

Mr. THORSON: The records are all there

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know what the minister means by "all there."

Mr. THORSON: The information can all be obtained.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister not have those records in Ottawa?

Mr. THORSON: I should not like to say "yes" or "no" to that, but I do know that the information can be obtained. That is the function of the chairman, not the function of the board as such, and for the time being it really does not touch the subject of the calling up of these men because the quotas have all been filled. Of course it does touch the question in a way because these men are subject to call, but the chairman of the board, who is a judge in each case, looks into the facts. All these men must have the necessary forms from the foreign exchange control board. I do not think there has been any wastage or leakage of manpower as a result of these operations. I can get from the chairmen of the boards information as to the total number of authorizations which have been given. I do not think we have that information at present available in the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think the giving of these authorizations constitutes a preference which the ordinary man would not get?

Mr. THORSON: Not at all. The judge considers each of these cases upon its merits. In many cases the authorization is given to a man who of necessity must cross the border for some reason or another, on account of sickness, for business reasons or for a multitude of other reasons. He cannot obtain a passport without having a written authorization.

Mr. POULIOT: When one is not speaking in his native language he is under a rather severe handicap, and I should like to say a word or two about what I said this afternoon concerning the young soldiers who made a commotion when the Prime Minister visited them in England. I used the words "young fools" in the sense of gaminerie. I could not find an exact translation of this word as we would use it in ordinary conversation. The nearest is boisterous or turbulent. I want to make this explanation in order to keep the record clear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister in charge explained that one of the objectives of the national registration which was taken last year was to make it possible for people who were unemployed in one part of Canada to move to other areas where employment might be available. There are a great many men in the prairie provinces who were machinists or mechanics before they took up farming. These men now find that they are producing what is often described as a drug on the market; they are producing wheat, which is apparently not needed at the present time. Many of these men are anxious to make some other contribution in the way of producing necessary commodities. So far, I have not met one who has been encouraged to move from western Canada to eastern Canada to find employment in industry. On the contrary, I know of men who are well qualified and who have written many letters in the hope of finding employment, but they have received no encouragement.

I should like the minister to explain just what use has been made of the national registration which was taken last year. Are the files kept up to date? Has the government information as to the number of toolmakers who are living in the prairie provinces and whose services could be used in eastern Canada?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister was to give me some information.

Mr. THORSON: Questions have been coming from all quarters. Before I deal with the questions put by the leader of the opposition, I should like to put on Hansard a table showing comparisons between the administrative divisions and the military districts, along with the table I referred to when that question arose. The table is as follows:

Administrative divisions	Military districts
C	3
D, J	10
E	4
F	5
G, I	6
H	7
K	11
M	12
N	13

I should like to deal in a general way with what has taken place with regard to the national registration.

I brought to the attention of hon. members the other evening, when I first spoke to the committee, a certain publication entitled "Specialized Occupations, National Registration, 1940", issued by the Department of National War Services and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. All or practically all of the information requested by the hon. member for Mackenzie is contained in this particular book. Last year there was given by my predecessor a fairly full description of the manner in which the national registration had proceeded across Canada. When the cards came in to the Department of National War Services they came in by tons. The work of tabulating, compiling and getting the necessary statistical information together was assigned to the bureau of statistics. The bureau has been working on that, and this spring, I believe, was responsible for the publication of this book which I have mentioned. Perhaps the best thing I can do is to read the preface, which is brief, and then indicate the kind of information which is found in this book. The preface, written by the dominion statistician, Doctor R. H. Coats, is, in part, as follows:

> The national registration was conceived and carried out primarily as a register of the military and labour potential of Canada. In accordance with this conception, the main tasks assigned to the dominion bureau of statistics, in addition to the revision and permanent filing of the registration cards as received from deputy registrars, have been:
> 1. The selection of single males of military age.
> 2. The listing of persons in some 1,250 specialized occupations.
> 3. The listing of persons with training in agriculture.
> 4. The selection of certain classes of aliens, and
> 5. The compilation of a general conspectus of the ages, birthplace, nationality, education, etc., of the Canadian adult population.
> The first of these involved the transfer of some 1,050,000 cards for the use of the Department of National Defence.

These are cards that came back to our department and are available to be sent out to the various administrative divisions, so that when we issue a proclamation calling out a particular age class or a series of age classes, all of the cards relating to those persons are sent to the administrative divisions and are there in the custody of the registrar.

> The second and third and fourth were made by the construction of lists giving the addresses and various personal and occupational information for about 2,200,000 names. These have been placed at the disposal of the departments and others requiring such information.
> The first four objectives have now been achieved. In addition, preliminary tabulations concerning the fifth part, which was not undertaken until the listing process above-mentioned was completed, have now been published in bulletin form.

In this publication to which I have made reference there is an introduction which explains the set-up of the various tables and deals with this subject of 1,250 specialized occupations. The persons who are in those specialized occupations totalled about 1,800,000 across Canada. There are a number of tables in this publication which will give a good deal of the information asked by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Mackenzie.

I think I may also say that the subject of man-power generally is being carefully studied.

Another publication to which I made reference is entitled "Statistics Relating to Labour Supply under War Conditions." That was issued by the social analysis branch of the dominion bureau of statistics.

Since registration took place, there has been a continuing registration of all persons who have reached the age of sixteen, who are required to register as soon as they do reach that age. Then, all changes of address and of matrimonial status are recorded. The system of keeping track of these cards and of this information is such that, I think I can say to the committee that if I were asked to locate a certain man or woman who had registered, it could be done, by the system which they have there, in just a few minutes. The records are in excellent shape.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for Mackenzie as to the moving of men from one district to another, thus far that has not taken place under government direction except in an indirect way. Nor does it take place in the old country, where they have a system which enables them to send men to one industry, or away from one industry to another. Although the power of compulsion is there, they have not exercised it. They have directed labour, and they have done that largely through the operations of the employment offices. As hon. members will recall, we did not have dominion government employment offices set up until recently, and we are of opinion that, if any movement of labour is required from one area to another to meet the needs of industry in any locality, the establishment of the new employment offices will be very helpful to us in directing that flow of labour from one place to another.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I followed the minister closely, and I am aware that there is a great deal of valuable material available, but I do not think members of parliament have received this report which he mentioned. If that is so, then I wonder how many firms in industry are making any use of the information which has been compiled. I might remind the committee that so far we have had practically no expenditures for capital equipment in connection with the providing of any war industries in western Canada—certainly, in the province of Saskatchewan. I know that a great many people have come to the east from Saskatchewan, but men who wait for encouragement or for advice as to the possibility of getting employment should they come east, simply never come. I realize that there are many difficulties, but it seems to me that so far nothing has been done except to discourage people from coming. The hon. member for

Weyburn has handed me a clipping from a western paper dated October 23, a dispatch from Windsor by the Canadian Press which reads:

Stay west, young man, says mayor. Windsor chief magistrate warns prairie folk to keep away. No work available. Bad advice being given by social service agencies.

Canadian Press. Windsor, Ont., Oct. 23—Premiers of the three prairie provinces will be asked to warn residents of their provinces that there is no employment available here, Mayor Arthur J. Reaume said Wednesday following receipt of reports from industries here that large numbers of men from western Canada were seeking jobs. Forty-five in one day.

Mayor Reaume said 45 Saskatchewan men appeared at one large plant seeking work Tuesday. Industries throughout the city have reported four and five men from the prairie provinces have appeared at their employment offices daily during the past week and had to be turned away, the mayor said.

"I am told that they said they were advised by social service agencies in Saskatchewan and the other prairie provinces that there were jobs to be had here," Mayor Reaume said. "This is not the case and it is time the people of the prairie provinces were warned that they were wasting their money by coming to Windsor looking for work . . ."

Letters will be sent to the mayors in the leading cities of the three provinces as well as to the premiers, the mayor added.

I understand that letters covering the same information have been sent to the municipalities in western Canada. I suggest it is time now that some machinery be made available so that men who are trained or who are willing to be trained may have an opportunity to make some contribution apart from that which they are making in producing wheat or by being on relief. In large areas in the west there have been crop failures and there are many men who will have to depend upon the government for assistance. We should be making use of the labour power that is available. I had expected that the minister would have something more hopeful to say in connection with the employment of men who are well trained and who could make a contribution in industry.

Mr. WHITE: I have one or two questions to ask the minister. A short time ago when he was giving a summary of the various exemptions that had been granted, he classed them under farming, lumbering, fishing, and so on, and I understood him to say that under the head of "miscellaneous" there were some 7,000 or 8,000. May I ask under which class university students are included? In putting that record on Hansard, could he indicate the number of university students who have been granted exemptions? Would he also give the committee a brief statement indicating what constitutes a university student? Does it mean a man who is attending university so many hours each day, or does it mean that he may be taking one or two lectures a week, or would it include any man who is taking a course by correspondence? Would such a man be classed as a university student and be given exemption? Would the minister care to express an opinion as to whether exemptions such as these are class legislation?

Mr. THORSON: The number of postponements in connection with university and college students, requested for the first three periods, is 971; applications granted, 892. Then, for the remaining periods, four to nine, the postponements requested number 1,371 and those granted, 1,236. Section 17 of the regulations contains the following subsection, 10:

The board may grant a postponement order to a student who is registered at a Canadian university or college to follow a course leading to a degree or diploma and who has been accepted by the university or college authorities.

There are a number of other regulations regarding students, but I do not consider that as preferred treatment. I think it is desirable that bona fide students should be entitled to have postponement of military training during the terms of their college years. Many of them belong to other compulsory military training units in their universities or in the Canadian officers training corps, and I do not think any preferential treatment is given to these persons.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that in the 21-year-old class, owing to lack of accommodation, between 40 and 60 per cent of the young men available have been called. If that is correct, will the minister state clearly to the committee how the registrars make the selection and who would be picked in the 40 or 60 per cent of the young men called.

Mr. THORSON: That was the question which the leader of the opposition put to me and which I have not yet had an opportunity of answering. I should be glad to try to answer it. The Department of National War Services receives a requisition each month from the Department of National Defence indicating the number of persons whom the Department of National Defence requires for the next training period. That is broken up by the Department of National Defence into the number who are required from each administrative division. The registrar of the administrative division gets these instructions, and his duties are to distribute the number of notices to the various parts of his division, as fairly and equitably as he can. He proceeds in this way. He starts first of all with the lowest age group. He takes the 21-year class and, going still further, he takes first of all the persons who were born earliest in that particular year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It goes by seniority.

Mr. THORSON: Or juniority, if I may say so. In addition to that, an attempt is made to work out an equitable distribution between persons who have never been called up for any period of training and persons who either did their thirty-day training and are called again or persons who had become twenty-one previously and whose applications for postponement were granted. In that way an effort is made to place the men who are subject to call as equitably as possible over the whole administrative division over which the registrar has jurisdiction. It is done on the basis of age groups and working out an equitable division between the new twenty-ones and the old twenty-ones. The system is not perfect, but an effort is made to work it out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under that system no one should escape being called?

Mr. THORSON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Everybody in the 21-year-old class so far has been called?

Mr. THORSON: I do not think so. I do not think we have exhausted all the twenty-ones even yet. But I do not think there is any likelihood of any escaping being called, because the cards are all there in the administrative divisions.

Mr. MUTCH: This point of the call brings me to something on which I desire to make an observation and to ask the minister whether he thinks anything can be done about it; that is the practice of calling the twenty-one year olds, the twenty-twos, and I understand the proclamation now includes those up to twenty-four, but only the twenty-ones and the twenty-twos have been called up.

Mr. THORSON: They are all subject to the proclamation.

Mr. MUTCH: I would suggest to the government through the minister that while the idea of calling them by age groups one year at a time beginning with the twenty-one year group was perhaps valid when we conceived the idea of thirty-day training, so that the matter would go on progressively and everyone between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five who was eligible would ultimately get training, yet that practice lost its validity, I think, when we switched to what is virtually training for the duration. I have some recollections of what happened to the generation of boys of that age in the last war, and I am fearful that if we proceed in this way we are again going to denude the country of the young men of a generation. It is simple to say that taking them for a period of training for the defence of Canada —and for the moment Canada is not in immediate danger of attack—causes less disruption to the general life and industry of the country. But I do not think that is sound either from the point of view of the army or, what is perhaps more important at the moment, from the point of view of the country now or in the time to come.

I would suggest that the minister consider the idea of turning the list upside down; at any rate, if they will not go to the top, that they push up men from, say twenty-seven, twenty-eight, twenty-nine to thirty-five or thirty-seven, even up to forty if not forty-five, and begin to take in not only single men but married men, taking at the beginning perhaps only married men with no families or with small families. When I think of the days when this thing will be over, I am sure that we are making a mistake in not dividing the responsibility over a wider group. I am perhaps selfish also in my thought that we should go into these higher brackets. If there is any group of men in Canada to-day who are "dodging the column"—it is not my duty to say at this time and place that there are—it is the men who were just too young for the last war and who to-day are comfortably employed, perhaps have homes partly paid for, small families, men who, as a rule, are in a fairly good income group and, in most instances, doing useful service. With a good conscience and the best will in the world thousands of them have hesitated to volunteer and put off on the shoulders of their wives and families the financial responsibilities that they have assumed. They are perhaps waiting until the day comes when they will be urgently required and these things will not matter. I think we might help some of these men to make a decision by expanding instead of restricting the groups called up under this proclamation. I think we should distribute the call more fairly across the face of the country and across the age groups.

As far as I am personally concerned I regard as of primary value in this training programme the fact that it does bring to the active service of the country a class of men who are highly desirable, in most instances, for active military service wherever they may be sent. I am of opinion that the sense of responsibility engendered in those older people would be of great value. I do not wish to suggest that any lack of responsibility is felt by the younger groups, because I say quite frankly that very many of the men who passed through my hands in the last two and a half months have been nearer eighteen than twenty-one. We do not ask for a birth certificate. I am not in the recruiting business anyway, but I see them shortly after they are in. We can now take a man in at eighteen; he likes to be a man at eighteen, and most of them are manly men, but in my opinion the distribution is not fair, neither is it wise, nor does it get the result for which, as far as I am concerned, we are looking.

No doubt the minister will say that the number called is the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence, and his job is to get them when they are wanted. I hope, however, the minister will not be satisfied merely to do his full duty, but will bring to bear whatever weight he can on the Department of National Defence to emphasize the necessity of getting, not a lesser number into training, but more.

If you come to the ultimate position and the Department of National Defence answer that they do not know what to do with those who do not become absorbed into the active service forces after they are trained, perhaps we are not too proud to take a leaf out of Hitler's book. We are told that he has a force of over half a million who, when he gets into a tight spot, he calls from industrial pursuits and puts into uniform. I am told that there are groups who have been so called out two or three times, and later returned to duty in industry; if it is only a story, there is the germ of an idea in it.

The training of men for this war cannot be left until three months before they are needed. I do not believe it is possible to train a soldier for the technical warfare of to-day in less than nine months and give him a Chinaman's chance for life. If we continue to carry on for a time without casualties as we have done so far, if the war does not break into an active campaign, perhaps by adding to the numbers in training we might train men in relays and reabsorb some into industry. In any event, however, it seems to me that we are not taking the full opportunity to use this service.

I am tempted—but I shall not yield to the temptation—to enlarge further on the question of general training in connection with the active service army, but I again urge on the minister that with which I started, namely, that the country be not denuded of the 20-, 21- and 22-year-olds, without taking a fair mixture of those in the higher ages, and I suggest that the government seriously consider the policy of taking some married men.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): I listened to the hon. member expounding his theory of calling up men. I do not know whether he has had to do with the training or simply the calling up of the men. But as one who has had something to do with the training of men, I must say that the idea of calling up men of the ages of thirty-seven to forty-five, with the strenuous training they have to go through, is absolutely out of the question. I have had a number of men, even in their early thirties, who could not stand the training that is required. We all know that this is a young man's war. I think we all agree that it is not a good thing for the country to have our young men spending the best years of their life in the army, but in a situation like this it has to be done; no one else can take their places. Men who are forty-five or forty-two or thirty-seven years of age cannot take the places of young men of nineteen, twenty or twenty-one in a war of this kind. It is not an old man's war; it is not a war of middle-aged men. Of course, as a last resort, I suppose men in the older brackets could be called up later on; I presume that is why the age limits were fixed at twenty-one to forty-five. These men might be called up for home defence, or something like that; but while my hon. friend's idea is very good in theory, I am sure it would never work out in practice.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not think I am discussing an abstract theory, but I am not going to engage in a contest. I did not suggest, however, that we should turn the list upside down and take all the men from the top instead of from the bottom. I do know that there are thousands of jobs, even in this army, which can be filled by old men of thirty-seven years of age. I would not put them in the mechanized forces, and I could not get them into the branch headed by the air minister, but there is a place for them. My thought is that we are not beginning to utilize their services but are robbing the other age groups. I have some knowledge of what people in their thirties can stand; I know better than to urge that they should be placed in competition with young men of nineteen, twenty and twenty-one years of age, but even in a young army I believe there should be a little adjustment of the scale. Let us not shift the burden quite so heavily to the shoulders of the boys; let us not only give the others a chance but see to it that they take that chance.

Mr. THORSON: I am glad to hear this exchange of views between the hon. member for Winnipeg South and the hon. member for Royal. I believe the general view was that it would be preferable to call out the younger men because this would cause the least dislocation in the economy of the nation; but following this interesting exchange of conflicting opinions I should like to give the matter careful consideration. Would the hon. member for Royal mention the ages up to which he believes the proclamation might be extended, if that should be thought wise? Do I understand his view to be that young men and older men might be mixed in the calling up?

Mr. BROOKS: As the minister knows, there is a certain syllabus of training that has been laid down, covering physical training, rifle exercises and drill for long periods. Naturally the younger men would stand up to it, but if a class of men from thirty-five to forty years of age should be called out at some later date, the syllabus of training could be changed in order that these men might be used for home service.

Mr. MUTCH: Men of thirty-five years of age are at present exempted from physical training.

Mr. THORSON: Would the syllabus have to be changed to make it suitable for the older men?

Mr. BROOKS: Yes; the syllabus would have to be changed. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South when he says that older men could take the places of many younger men, particularly in office work. I believe here in Ottawa there are hundreds of young men of military age who should be released for overseas service, while older men of thirty-five to forty-five years of age could be used here and in every district throughout Canada. They could serve as cooks, clerks and so forth. I understand that the women's auxiliary army is to be used for these purposes, but the older men could be used as well. Then the young men could be relieved for service overseas or active service in Canada—frankly I do not think very much of this active service in Canada, though I am not going to elaborate on that now—and the more strenuous work of fighting. I believe some scheme could be worked out by the defence department and the war services department whereby we could utilize the services of the younger men for the more strenuous work, while the older men could perform the less arduous duties. I believe training could be adjusted to suit the age of the men called up; this should be a simple matter.

Mr. FULFORD: As one of those in the so-called awkward age, who was too young for the last war and apparently is too old for this one, it hurts a bit when, in a conscientious endeavour to do what one can for his country in a military way, he is told flatly either that he is too old or that he lacks military experience. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South that a place should be found for men in what I can only call the awkward age, whether it be doing office work or whether it be in the specialized branches of the army such as the ordnance or the paymaster's corps. I know a great many men object to going into those branches. One hon. member suggests "the kitchen," but I think our army is pretty well equipped in that respect. The fact remains that there are many, many men between the ages of thirty-five and forty-two, we will say, who want to do more than they are permitted to do under the present regulations, and I think the minister would be well advised to take into consideration some of the suggestions that have been advanced to-night. I for one heartily approve them, and I believe the result of getting such men in the army would be most encouraging.

Mr. GREEN: What is the position with regard to young men who are not British subjects? There must be many thousands of young men domiciled here, earning their living in this country and probably intending to remain here all their lives, who are not citizens. Are they not subject to any kind of call?

Mr. THORSON: Of course they were all subject to registration, but they have not been made subject to call for military training, even for home defence. The regulations apply only to:

> . . . every male British subject who is or has been at any time subsequent to the first day of September, 1939, ordinarily resident in Canada while he is of the ages of twenty-one years to forty-five years inclusive, and who was, on the fifteenth of July, 1940, unmarried or a widower without child or children.

Therefore aliens are not subject to these regulations. I have checked this particular matter with the similiar provision in the United States draft law, and while in the United States everybody whether an American citizen or an alien, must register—and that provision is the same as we have in Canada,—in the United States they make subject to their draft law only American citizens and aliens who have indicated their intention of applying for American citizenship. I believe that is the language of the statute in the United States. Therefore even there they have gone perhaps a little further than we have in calling upon persons who have indicated their intention of becoming United States citizens. But they do not call aliens, other than the ones I have mentioned, any more than we do.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that this is one policy which should be changed, particularly because here in Canada we are trying to recruit our army for overseas on a voluntary basis. We are asking young men to enlist, and quite often we are met with the answer, "Why should I enlist, and a young chap who is not a British subject be in a position to take my job?" Here are these young men who are not British subjects, but who earn their living in this country, and they are not even called up for the defence of Canada.

Surely they could be called up for that. If not that, then at least they could be called to do road work, or something of that kind to help the nation. How can we ever expect to raise a large volunteer army if these other men have to assume no burden whatsoever for the defence of the country in a time of crisis like the present? Can the minister say how many thousands of these young men there are?

Mr. THORSON: I think that information is available somewhere. I cannot find at the moment the information as to the number of aliens, but I can assure the hon. member for Vancouver South that the question of whether aliens should be made subject to these regulations has received careful attention. It is quite clear that the argument advanced by the hon. member this evening, that British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada are called for military training while aliens are left free to make big wages in the factories, has been made.

I am inclined to think that if we applied the regulation to aliens, we could apply them only to friendly and not to enemy aliens. No one would think for a moment of making enemy aliens subject to the regulations. Then, if we made the regulations applicable only to aliens who are not enemy aliens, we would not have a satisfactory condition. If only enemy aliens are given the opportunity to stay at home and earn big wages, while the others are subject to military training, there would be dissatisfaction. We have not thus far made the regulations applicable, except to British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada, and I am inclined to think that on balance the argument is in favour of the course we have adopted.

I have here the statement showing by nationalities and by provinces the number of non-British subjects between the ages of 21 and 45, both inclusive, who registered in Canada in August.

Mr. GREEN: Single, or widowers without children?

Mr. THORSON: Yes. Between the ages of 21 and 45.

Mr. GREEN: It includes married men.

Mr. THORSON: According to the heading I have here. From European countries, the total is 19,481; from American countries, 7,122, and from Asiatic countries, 1,126. The table is as follows:

Statement showing by nationalities and by provinces the number of non-British subjects between the ages of 21 and 45 both inclusive, who registered in Canada in August, 1940.

Department of National War services.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why could enemy aliens not be used on road work? In Saskatchewan at the present time Doukhobors, Mennonites and other conscientious objectors are use in the Prince Albert national park to build roads. Why could enemy aliens not be used for that purpose, if not in the army itself?

Mr. THORSON: I suppose it would be possible to use them, if we put them under a guard. But whether that would advance the war effort is quite another matter. They could be put to work, but whether it would be economical to do so is another matter.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think the minister appreciates the seriousness of the question.

Any enemy aliens who are dangerous to Canada should be interned, if they are not already interned. The others are not dangerous to Canada, and surely could be used to do road work. Aliens who are not enemy aliens could surely be used for home defence or, if necessary, they, too, could be used for road work. But I do not see how the government can sit back and be complacent about this subject. Out in the ridings we are meeting it every week. The complaint is made time and again: "Why should my boy enlist when an alien does not need to do anything? Why should my boy have to lose his job, only to come back here to find an alien in his place receiving an increased salary, and leaving no chance for my son to get work?" Those things are happening in the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No doubt about it.

Mr. GREEN: The ministry should not sit back, wash their hands of the question and say, "Oh, everything is all right, on balance; we think it is as well to carry on the way we are doing." It is for reasons like that the government is having trouble in getting recruits, and it will never get them in greater numbers until it tackles questions such as this with a great deal more determination. Here is one way in which recruiting across Canada could be helped. I do urge that the minister ought not to be satisfied to argue himself or to permit himself to be argued by the other ministers into the position of saying, "Oh, well, this question is taken care of well enough; just leave it alone, and carry on the way we are doing." The ministers are living in a fool's paradise if they think they can raise recruits while things like this are going on in Canada.

Mr. FULFORD: What was done in the conscription act of 1917? Were non-British subjects called to the colours, or called to do any other service for Canada at that time?

Mr. THORSON: I do not think so.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think we can liken this war to the war of 1914-18, because this is not a war where national boundaries have played the same part as they did at that time. There are persons here from enemy countries who are as much anti-nazi and anti-fascist as Canadians could possibly be. Until the nations fighting fascism and nazism learn to utilize the services and the will to destroy nazism of all those people who are opposed to it, we are not going to succeed very fast. We are doing that, of course, in the countries overrun by nazis, and possibly in the nazi and fascist countries themselves.

I think there are various means that could be taken to protect foreign persons who are not naturalized Canadians and bring them to the point where they would be at least potential Canadian or British subjects. After they had been in the country for some time they should be compelled to indicate their intention of becoming Canadian citizens, and after they had indicated their intentions their services could be used.

I should like to draw the attention of the committee to a situation on the west coast. There we have many Canadians of oriental or Asiatic origin, many of whom have indicated their desire to enlist in the armed forces of the country, to serve wherever they could be used, and their offers have been refused. Why should the services of these people not be used? They wish to give their services, if necessary their lives, in defence of the country which is theirs either by birth or by naturalization.

Mr. THORSON: I suppose that would be because they would not come within the definition I mentioned a moment ago, namely, British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are British subjects; they were either born in Canada or have been naturalized.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the hon. member want to give the Japs the vote?

Mr. THORSON: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would like to make a statement, and I wonder if we could have a recess in this question period.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

MAXIMUM PRICE REGULATIONS

POSTPONEMENT OF EFFECTIVE DATE FROM NOVEMBER 17 TO DECEMBER 1

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that on the recommendation of the war-time prices and trade board the government has decided to postpone the effective date of the maximum prices regulations from November 17 to December 1. The reason for the postponement is to ensure the most effective possible administration and enforcement of the regulations from the moment they come into operation. No change in policy is involved. The board is anxious to have a complete organization equipped and ready to deal with any kind of problem or difficulty which may arise when the new price policy goes into effect. Considerable progress has already been made, but there remain some important appointments of necessary commodity administrators to be made, and the organization of staff is not yet complete.

Mr. Hector McKinnon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, informs me that careful consideration is being given to the many questions which have been raised by all sections of the public. The board regards it of the highest importance that the new policy should come into operation in a manner which will enable the public, both buyers and sellers, to be given promptly all necessary information, answers to questions, and decisions with regard to the many problems which are bound to arise. The board has accordingly made the recommendation to the minister to defer the date of commencement to December 1.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, November 12, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

STATISTICAL TABULATIONS AND TABLE OF SPECIALIZED OCCUPATIONS

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I desire to lay on the table a copy of preliminary statistical tabulations of the national registration of August, 1940, and also a copy of "Specialized Occupations, National Registration, 1940."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will copies of these be sent to hon. members?

Mr. THORSON: I believe that any hon. member can obtain them either from my department or from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PURCHASES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA PLYWOODS FOR MILITARY PURPOSES

Mr. REID:

1. What have been the total quantities of plywoods purchased for military purposes during 1940 and up to September 30, 1941, from firms in British Columbia?
2. What price per thousand was paid for same?
3. From what firms in British Columbia were such plywoods purchased?
4. What was the market selling price for plywoods in British Columbia during the months of October, 1939, January and September, 1940, and September, 1941?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HOWE:

1. By the Department of Munitions and Supply—1,220,720 square feet.

A large quantity of British Columbia plywood, used for military purposes, was bought direct by contractors from manufacturers and no record of this is available. The timber controller arranged, however, for this to be supplied by the manufacturer direct to contractors on war projects at controlled prices, the same as government purchases.

2. 5/16 wallboard—$28 per m. square feet, f.o.b. mill carload lots; 5/16 weatherboard—$42.50 per m. square feet, f.o.b. mill, carload lots.

All purchases of plywood made by the department are direct from manufacturers, eliminating distributors' or dealers' profits.

The price paid for all plywood bought by the Department of Munitions and Supply was, and is, a controlled base price set by the timber controller in August, 1940. This controlled price was on an f.o.b. mill basis for standard items, plus actual freight to destination for carload lots, and uniform for all manufacturers. Arrangements were also made for the supply of less than carload lots at the carload rate from points where stocks were held, with the addition of local freight or trucking charges only.

3. The Canadian Western Lumber Company, Fraser Mills, B.C. B.C. Plywoods Limited, Vancouver, B.C.

4. See answer to No. 2. There has been no change in the market selling price of plywoods in British Columbia during the months mentioned, with the exception of the addition of sales tax imposed April 28, 1941.

WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES

Mr. CHURCH:

What sum has been spent on war savings certificates campaigns to end of October, 1941?

Mr. ILSLEY: $1,244,129.11.

CONTROLLER OF SUPPLIES

Mr. REID:

1. Has a controller of supplies been appointed? If so, what is his name?
2. What position did he occupy in business at the time of appointment?
3. What company or companies was he a director of or associated with at the time of his appointment?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Alan Holmes Williamson.
2. Vice-president, Wood, Gundy & Co. Ltd.
3. British Columbia Packers Limited (Vancouver).
   Federal Grain Limited (Winnipeg).
   Wood, Gundy & Co. Ltd., Toronto.
   Wood, Gundy & Co. Inc., New York.

1941 WAR LOAN

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What was the total amount subscribed in the 1941 victory loan?

2. What were the expenses in connection with the floating of the loan for, (a) advertising; (b) commissions; (c) other expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. $836,820,250.

2. Expenditures incurred in connection with the sale of the 1941 victory loan to October 31, 1941:

(a) Publicity expenses:
Newspaper and magazine advertising	$476,677 00
Posters, including billboard posters and posting	79,565 83

First War Loan—$250,000,000
Total expenses incurred in connection with the sale of the loan	$2,170,920 14
Second War Loan—$324,945,700
Total expenses incurred in connection with the sale of the loan	$2,735,645 28

HOUSING PROJECTS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many houses have been built by the national housing administration to date?

2. What was the total cost of the national housing projects to the federal treasury?

3. How many are employed on the staff of the national housing administration?

4. What has been the cost of administration to date?

5. What is the average cost of national housing administration houses with full basement and permanent structures, built during 1941?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. As at October 31, 1941, 17,966 loans providing 22,450 family-dwelling units have been approved under the National Housing Act, 1938, and its predecessor act, the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, in the amount of $75,053,658.

2. Advances aggregating $16,446,023 have been made by the dominion to October 31, 1941, representing its share of approved loans disbursed to that date.

3. As at October 31, 1941, there were 45 employees on the staff of the housing branch of the Department of Finance which administers the National Housing Act and the Home Improvement Plan.

4. The expenses of the housing branch from its inception in 1935 to October 31, 1941, total $355,120.42.

5. In the period January 1, 1941, to October 31, 1941, 4,390 loans in the amount of $13,712,458, providing 4,390 family-dwelling units have been approved. The average loan was $3,123, the average appraised value of the houses constructed (including land) was $3,750 and the average estimated cost of the houses constructed (including land) was $4,000.

*PURCHASE OF EELS, ISLE OF ORLEANS, QUE.

Mr. ROY:

1. In or about the month of October, 1940, did the government purchase or cause to be purchased or sold through the intermediary of a Mr. Britton or any other person, a quantity of eels from the Eel Fisheries Cooperative Association of the isle of Orleans, Quebec?

2. If so, was this fish paid for, and (a) by whom; (b) to whom was payment made; (c) upon what date?

3. If not, does the government possess any information on this or any similar transaction?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No.

2 and 3. No information.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. REID:

How many of the ships built or being constructed in Canada have been or are being built for, (a) Great Britain, (b) United States, (c) Canada, and at what cost in each instance?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ENGLEFELDT, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. MacINNIS (for Mr. Coldwell):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, recommendations, reports and other documents, in the posession of the Post Office department, relating to the resignation of the postmaster at Englefeldt, Saskatchewan, and the appointment of a successor.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—PRICES AND CONTROL

Mr. MacINNIS (for Mr. Coldwell):

For a copy of all correspondence, communications, orders in council and other documents in the possession of the government, relating to authorizations for increases in the prices of oil and gasoline and control of the oil industry and service stations.

Mr. HOWE: I would like to point out to hon. members that the request for a copy of all correspondence, communications, etc., represents a tremendous volume of inquiry. I am told that it would take a staff of stenographers at least six months. It means copying almost every file in the possession of the oil controller. If the motion could be limited to orders in council and pertinent documents, perhaps the mover could obtain all the information he desires, and it would then be in practical form for an earlier return.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that will be satisfactory.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

RESULTS OF VISIT OF THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE TO CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it is his intention to make any statement to the house on the results of his recent visit to central and south America, and will there be any place for discussion of the matter in the order of business of the house?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The present intention is to submit the treaties formulated between the various countries of south America and Canada to the next session of the house, at which time there will be opportunity for full discussion and a full report on the negotiations in connection with the treaties.

THREATENED STRIKE IN KIRKLAND LAKE DISTRICT MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): In view of the fact that the Kirkland Lake situation has developed to the point where a strike will be called to-morrow morning if there are no negotiations with the operators by seven o'clock this evening, would the Minister of Labour care to inform the house what steps have been taken by the government since the taking of the vote to offset a strike in that section?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question. As he knows, on Monday last a communication was sent by the union to the mine operators asking for a conference, and a time limit was put at seven o'clock to-night. I have not had an opportunity of learning what reply, if any, has been given to that communication. But to-day I telegraphed the representative of the mine operators and the representative of the union asking that they send representatives to Ottawa next Monday to give consideration to the whole matter and see whether or not some formula can be worked out to avoid a strike. I have requested that in the meantime no strike action be taken.

DECENNIAL CENSUS

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF ENUMERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question with regard to the census taken last June. I learned to-day that at least some of the enumerators who helped take that census have not yet been paid in full. Could the minister tell the house when such payment will be made? I believe some of these men are badly in need of the money.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am advised that there are some 17,000 of these enumerators' accounts. The accounts reach my department through the census commissioners. There is considerable necessary delay in the compiling of these accounts by the enumerators and the census commissioners. As soon as they are received a cheque for sixty per cent of the bill is issued from this department, and the balance of the amount goes forward as soon as the account is checked. In many cases considerable correspondence is required before the accounts can be passed for payment. I am told that correspondence is necessary in connection with a large percentage of these accounts; this has always been found to be the case. Most of the accounts, however, are now in, and I am advised that cheques are being issued at the rate of over six hundred a day.

WHEAT

REPORTED SALE OF 150,000,000 BUSHELS TO THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I know he is very anxious to make a statement about the sale of wheat. My question is based on a report appearing in the Winnipeg Tribune of November 1 from Charles Bishop, press correspondent. It states that the Ottawa Journal carried a story that on the preceding Friday the biggest transaction in the history of Canadian wheat took place, namely, sale by the government to the British government of 150,000,000 bushels of wheat. The reporter said that when he interviewed the minister the minister declined at the time to make any definite statement, but said he would have something interesting on the subject very soon. Twelve days have since passed. Would the minister care to make that interesting statement now, or if he is not prepared to-day, to-morrow?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No sale by the Canadian wheat board to the cereals import commission of the British government has been completed. I think it is in order for me to state that negotiations are in progress at the present time, but no sale along the lines of the press dispatch referred to or any other lines has so far been consummated.

HOUSING

SEGREGATION OF WAR CONSTRUCTION COSTS FROM OTHER EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if he will be good enough, when submitting the information in connection with wartime housing, to segregate the construction costs of housing from such expenditures as roadways, playgrounds and the like?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to do that.

THE WAR

MR. CHURCHILL'S DECLARATION OF BRITISH POLICY IN THE EVENT OF POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of Prime Minister Churchill's declaration of British policy on Monday last, when he said:

> I take this occasion to say—and it is my duty to say it—that should the United States become involved in war with Japan the British declaration will follow within the hour.

Will the Prime Minister state if it is the intention of the government to subscribe to this declaration of British unity with the United States?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the government of Canada towards Great Britain and towards the United States and towards British-United States relations is well known throughout Canada, throughout the United Kingdom, throughout the United States, and I think I might add, throughout the world. More than this I do not think I should say at this time.

MOBILIZATION OF CANADA'S RESOURCES—REPRESENTATIONS OF CANADIAN LEGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On October 22 the dominion executive council of the Canadian Legion appeared as a delegation before the government and requested a complete mobilization of Canada's resources on a total war footing. Would the Prime Minister inform the house what is or has been the answer of the government to such representations, and if no answer has yet been given will the Prime Minister give a statement of the government's present position with regard to the question of a complete mobilization along the lines of the memorandum submitted by that delegation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend will have to ask the members of the delegation as to the reply I made to them at the time. As I recollect it, it was to the effect that their representations would be carefully considered by the government. As to any statement of major policy on the part of the government, as I intimated yesterday a statement of the kind will be made, not at the end of a session but at the beginning of a new session of parliament, and will be made in a way which will permit of the fullest debate and discussion in this house.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941—CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The house again in committee of the whole, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With the leave of the committee I should like to ask for an answer to the question I asked yesterday of the Minister of Munitions and Supply in regard to the aircraft manufactured or assembled in Canada. I believe the minister is in a position to answer now.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have the information. The number of aircraft manufactured in Canada from September 3, 1939 to November 1, 1941, is 2,228. The number of aircraft assembled in Canada during the same period was 2,243, which figure I believe includes planes from the United States as well as planes from England. This makes a total of 4,471 planes.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Could the minister of National War Services make a statement with regard to the coordination of the activities of the many war charities now carrying on in this country? Perhaps before he answers that question I might make one or two observations.

Splendid work is being done by the many women's organizations, who give of their time, energy and money to a most remarkable degree. But it does seem in many cases that they do not have sufficient guidance as to the results of their efforts, or as to whether they are doing the most economical and most satisfactory type of work. For example, only a day or two ago Miss Macphail, formerly a member of this house, made the statement in the press that ladies in the district around the town of Durham, I think it was, might better be employed making children's dresses instead of knitting socks, which can be turned out by machinery so much more quickly and more cheaply than they can be knit by hand. In Toronto the same condition exists. I wonder if the minister's department could not indicate to these organizations the sort of work they might do to the best advantage. If there were someone in each district as a regional officer, if you will, charged with responsibility directly from the department, who could find out from the department the type of work that might be done to best advantage, it would be of considerable help. Even if that information could be circulated in the press it would be of some assistance.

There is another point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. In most areas this work is carried on by groups of ladies who congregate in church basements, private homes, or, as in the case of Toronto, in vacant store properties, which they turn into a sort of headquarters. Perhaps the minister's department might give some consideration to this suggestion. Where a store property has been turned over to an organization of this kind, entirely without charge, could the owner be exempted from payment of income tax on the amount of property tax he has to pay on that building, or even to the extent of the carrying charges on the property? If that could be done I believe many desirable centres would be opened up in various communities where this work could be carried on in a much more efficient manner. Then there is the further point that when these groups meet in private homes there is a tendency on the part of many people to entertain perhaps a little extravagantly. If these activities could be organized more efficiently much better results might be achieved.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): When I first appeared before the committee I referred in a very general way to some of the points which have been mentioned by the hon. member for Danforth, and at that time indicated that my department was coming to the view that the time had arrived when we did not wish any increase in the number of war charities or in the number of war activities of a charitable nature, but that we were hoping that the men and women of Canada would give consideration, in respect of their various war charities, to the coordination of their efforts rather than to any expansion of the field of activity.

As hon. members are aware, every application for permission to engage in a war charity must be made to the war charities division of my department in order that a permit may issue under the provisions of the War Charities Act. Every application for such a permit is carefully considered by the officers of the department before a permit for the registration of a war charity is granted under the provisions of that act. There are a number of activities which are of a more spectacular nature, shall I say, than others. Certain activities make a very attractive appeal to the men and women who are engaged in them, but it does not necessarily follow that these activities are the most desirable, or that the men and women taking part in them are thereby making their greatest contribution. If I were to make one general observation in reply to the question asked by my hon. friend it would be this, that the men and women of Canada should get behind the great national drive that will take place in the spring of 1942. I refer to the joint drive in which the great national war auxiliary services organizations will take part, and in which the Canadian Red Cross society also will participate. I could discuss the activities of these services, but the general observation I would make would be that instead of multiplying the number of separate activities of this kind, the men and women of Canada might well get behind the national drive that is to take place this coming spring.

The national war auxiliary services organizations such as the Canadian Legion, the Knights of Columbus, The Salvation Army, the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., and another which is going to take part in the next drive, the Navy League of Canada, are in the main performing auxiliary services for our troops both in Canada and abroad. On the other hand the Red Cross society is performing its splendid services in accordance with its traditional position as an instrument of mercy in time of war. Its activities have been tremendously increased. Up to recently, for example, it was packing 10,000 parcels a week for prisoners of war. That activity has been increased to 35,000 parcels per week. In addition, it is engaged in activities of a nature which give aid to the bombed victims of Great Britain. It has been performing a splendid service in its blood donor arrangements. All these activities are of a great and humane kind. The operations of such an organization deserve the support of every man and woman in Canada, and I should like to see the men and women of Canada who are anxious to make some kind of contribution to the war effort make it in that field and in support of that drive, rather than in a multiplication of war charities of one kind and another. I shall have more to say about the national drive later when we have fixed upon the date and our plans for its success are further advanced.

I do take this opportunity however to urge upon the men and women of Canada that they must make an absolute one hundred per cent success of the approaching drive. It will be a large one, in the field from $17,000,000 to $20,000,000. That is a large amount of money, but the Canadian people have never failed to respond to a single appeal that has been made thus far, and I devoutly hope—indeed, I know—that they will not fail to respond in this instance.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): As the minister has pointed out, these moneys are pretty well regulated and governed by the government. It arranges for the work to be done by the organizations to which he has referred. Since it is work to aid our soldiers, could the money not be taken from the national revenue rather than through a national drive? The people are heavily taxed and regulated as it is; could we not avoid the canvassing which is done repeatedly across the country? With all the safeguards and regulations enforced by the government on the expenditure of this money, which is to be used for the assistance of our troops, it strikes me it would be better to take the money out of the national revenue.

Mr. THORSON: No, that is not my view. It may be necessary for the government to undertake the financing of some of the auxiliary services now rendered to our troops by the national organizations I mentioned a moment ago. I am definitely of the opinion, however, that there is a tremendous value in having the thousands of men and women identified with these organizations engaged in the task of assisting in the auxiliary services. The services of the Red Cross, by reason of its inherent nature, must be voluntary. So far as the auxiliary services are concerned, I see a great advantage in having thousands of men and women across Canada actively associating themselves with the promotion of these services to our troops. It would be much easier for the auxiliary service organizations to get their money direct from the treasury, but I am satisfied the country would lose something of incalculable value if this voluntary effort were replaced by putting the whole burden on the federal treasury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister in a position to make a statement in reply to the observations made last night with respect to the potentialities of our man-power, broken down in the manner I indicated?

Mr. THORSON: Yes. I had intended to reply as soon as possible to the questions asked yesterday by the leader of the opposition. He asked me to give a specific statement of Canada's potential man-power capacity as disclosed by the national registration. At the opening of the house to-day I tabled a preliminary statistical tabulation resulting from the national registration of August, 1940. I also tabled a publication entitled Specialized Occupations, National Registration. This latter document breaks down the results of the registration in a variety of ways. There are a number of interesting and useful tables in that publication.

The first of these tables shows the numerical and relative distribution by provinces of persons reporting specialized occupations. There are some 1,250 of these specialized occupations. The second table indicates this distribution according to age groups for each province separately, and for the dominion as a whole. The third table is similar to the second one, except that the classifications are by present status—that is, as employer, own account, employee, and so on. Table No. 4 classifies some thirty main occupational headings according to ten-year age groups. These are shown only for the dominion.

Table No. 5 is similar to No. 4, but shows this classification arranged according to present status. Table No. 6 is a most complete and detailed one. It represents the principal tabulations of the report, and classifies the registrants according to some three hundred main occupations, stating sex, and giving the information for Canada and for each of the provinces. The basic information and results respecting the national registration, so far as specialized occupations are concerned, are shown in this publication.

Then my hon. friend asked me to table a statement of the total number of men of military age in Canada between the ages of 21 and 45. This statement shows the numbers of single men and widowers (without children) between the ages of 19 and 45, classified by provinces. The total is 989,739. With the consent of the committee I should like to place this table upon Hansard:

NUMBER OF SINGLE MEN AND WIDOWERS (WITHOUT CHILDREN) 19 TO 45 YEARS OF AGE CLASSIFIED BY PROVINCES

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister a summary which could be placed upon Hansard? I assumed that his departmental officials would have given him a summary which we could take as a general statement and then have the tables to come and go upon.

Mr. THORSON: I am trying to respond to the questions asked by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I have not approached the matter in the right way.

Mr. THORSON: I think the information given in this table is what my hon. friend desires. With the permission of the committee I should like to place upon Hansard a table showing the number of single men and widowers (without children) 19 to 45 years of age, classified by administrative divisions. I think this table will answer specifically the question to which I referred a moment ago. The table follows:

Mr. THORSON: The leader of the opposition asked that this information be broken down in order to give the various occupations of persons of military age. To comply strictly with that request would involve an enormous tabulation, but I may say that essentially this information is contained in table No. 4 of the publication, "Specialized Occupations, National Registration 1940," which I tabled this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have those documents been distributed?

Mr. THORSON: I shall make inquiry, and if not, I shall try to arrange for their distribution.

The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) asked me to give the numbers in the 21, 22, 23 and 24 year old classes, and also the number in each class that had been notified to report for examination. I have a table giving the number of notices to report for medical examination by administrative divisions and covering the ten monthly training periods. The grand total is 270,114. I have not this information broken up into the different age groups. That is kept in the divisions, but if necessary it could be obtained. With the consent of the committee I should like to place this table upon Hansard:

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the minister arrange to obtain that information from the divisions and make it public in some way at a later stage? I think that information is essential.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, that could be done; the information could be obtained from the divisions and the total given here could be broken down into the different groups.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the minister tell the committee how many men this year have come within the age groups that might be called under the regulations? As I remember, the estimate last year was that 90,000 men had reached the age of 21 years, and estimates were given for those who had reached 22, 23 and 24 years. The minister gave us a figure of 270,114 as the total of those who had received notices. I should like to get the total number of those who have been called and the total number who have actually gone into training during this last training period.

Mr. THORSON: I gave that information when I made my first presentation to the committee. I gave the number of men who had actually reported to the training centres.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As related to the total number who were available within the age groups?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister the percentages?

Mr. THORSON: Yes, I gave that.

Mr. McGREGOR: Yesterday the minister placed upon Hansard, page 4281, a table which shows the postponements according to provinces and occupations. We asked, however, for the number of applications in each province and the number of men called from each province. If the minister can furnish such a table it will cover the situation.

Mr. THORSON: I appreciate that the hon. member asked two questions and that I gave an answer with regard to only one of them, the number of postponements that had been granted. I have not before me the number of requests which have been made in each division. As one will readily appreciate, we have been getting this statistical information together as rapidly as we can. We would have to get that information from the divisions.

Mr. McGREGOR: Can the minister give us the number of men called for training in each province?

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member means a division of the requisition that we get from the Department of National Defence?

Mr. McGREGOR: I suppose that is where you get it.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member means the number of notices sent out in each province?

Mr. McGREGOR: Yes.

Mr. THORSON: That can be obtained.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Referring to the table which appears on page 4281 of Hansard, I should like to direct attention to the figures under the heading "All other reasons except conscientious objectors." The figures for Ontario and British Columbia seem to be quite large, being 2,752 for Ontario as compared with 449 for Quebec and 1,682 for British Columbia as compared with 94 for Saskatchewan and 579 for Alberta. Could the minister give us some further information as to what groups are included here?

Mr. THORSON: I suppose that information could be obtained. This column covers a multitude of special cases.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What, for example?

Mr. THORSON: At the moment I cannot think of any large group of cases. There might be persons in cities, towns and villages who do not come under any one of the specific occupations such as farming, lumbering, trapping, fishing, and so on. They might be employed not in war-time or other industry, but in any one of a number of other occupations of a civilian nature.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there any reason for those two provinces having such large percentages under that heading. This is a pretty comprehensive table, including farming and other industries, and the number of postponements for two provinces is very large as compared with the other provinces. I think some explanation should be given.

Mr. THORSON: There might be mining, for example.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Other industries?

Mr. THORSON: Not necessarily.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would that not be an industry?

Mr. THORSON: I would not like to say, but this covers a multitude of civilian occupations. This total of which we have been speaking covers 1,250 specialized occupations, many of which would not be included in war-time or other industries. Nevertheless it might be an occupation, without being employment in an industry. The final heading would cover a multitude of occupations. But if it is desired to have a further break-down in respect of these figures I shall be very glad to try to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister will admit that there is a very wide difference between the numbers granted postponement in the different provinces. The number is 94 for Saskatchewan, 1,682 for British Columbia and 579 for Alberta. It would seem to indicate a wide difference in the attitude of the various boards granting postponement.

Mr. THORSON: There is nothing of the kind. The boards deal with all applications in the manner we discussed yesterday. I would emphasize again that every single application is dealt with on its merits by the boards. Every board is headed by a judge of a court and has on it two responsible citizens, and in addition the Department of National Defence and the national labour supply council have a right to appear before the board.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am not questioning that at all, but I am saying that the very wide difference in the numbers granted postponement seems to indicate a difference in the attitudes taken by different boards.

Mr. THORSON: The chances are that in some provinces fewer persons applied for postponement.

Mr. NICHOLSON: According to the 1931 census British Columbia's population was 694,000 as compared with Saskatchewan's 921,000. Yet I find from this table that the total number of postponements granted in British Columbia is nearly three times the number granted in Saskatchewan, where agriculture represents a very large industry. I would think that those engaged in that industry should be given consideration in connection with postponements. There must be some reason why this particular category should show such a wide difference between the provinces and such a large figure for Ontario and British Columbia. This category has not been broken down. I think the point made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr Douglas) yesterday should be stressed and that there should be some way of unifying the procedure so that you would not have such wide differences as, for example, 1,682 postponements granted in British Columbia as compared with 94 in the last category given in the table for Saskatchewan. I think there should be some break-down of these figures.

Mr. THORSON: I have not the slightest doubt that the percentage of requests granted in respect of applications made is about the same in all the provinces and that there were fewer requests for postponement made under that heading in Saskatchewan than in the other provinces. The percentage of applications granted in respect of requests made under this heading is 83·1 per cent for the nine military training periods.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister those percentages for British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. THORSON: Saskatchewan is division M, and in Saskatchewan in the first three training periods 32 people made application for postponement under this heading and 25 of them were granted. In the remaining periods, from four to nine, 141 applications were made under this heading and 64 were granted. In British Columbia, which I think is administrative division K, in the training periods from four to nine, 1,317 applications for postponement were made under this heading and 1,256 were granted.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That shows a very wide difference. Less than half of the applications in Saskatchewan were granted, and over ninety per cent of the applications in British Columbia were granted.

Mr. THORSON: We do not know what the nature of the occupation was in respect of which applications for postponement were made. You must have all the facts before you, before you can make comparisons.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was just taking the figures which the minister gave.

Mr. HOMUTH: The table shows postponements in various industries, farming, lumbering, trapping, fishing, war-time industries, and other than war-time industries. What else could there be?

Mr. THORSON: I think I have already dealt with that question. I have pointed out that in the table to which I referred earlier this afternoon there are 1,250 specialized occupations in Canada, and these other categories might include a multitude of occupations. But if it is desired to have a further break-down that can be done. It would only be illustrative, but if the committee insists, I will have it broken down. That heading would cover a multitude of occupations.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think it is important that there should be some uniform system. Last night, for instance, a good deal was said about hockey players in Manitoba being refused permission to leave Canada. They thereupon established residence in Ontario and in a very short time got permission to leave Canada. Again, I cannot imagine that the difference between Ontario and Quebec is so marked that seven times as many postponements should be granted in Ontario as in Quebec, under the same heading.

Mr. THORSON: Probably because seven times as many were asked for.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It seems to me that, in view of 2,752 being granted in Ontario as compared with 449 in the province of Quebec, there must be some difference in the policy which is carried out in the two administrations.

Mr. QUELCH: Could the minister say whether or not boys born in this country of alien parents are subject to military service at the age of twenty-one?

Mr. THORSON: He is required to register upon attaining the age of sixteen; they all have to register. They are subject to being called if they are British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Isn't that a legal question?

Mr. THORSON: That becomes purely a question whether they are or are not British subjects.

Mr. QUELCH: Are they?

Mr. THORSON: Well, I am not going to answer without having the facts with regard to each particular person. I should not like to express offhand a legal opinion on that subject. While we are on the subject of aliens, I put on Hansard yesterday a table relating to aliens which indicates that there are far fewer aliens in this country than most people think.

Mr. GREEN: Does that table include the married aliens?

Mr. THORSON: No.

Mr. GREEN: The table itself does not make that clear.

Mr. THORSON: No. I think that that table includes the single men and the unmarried men, because these were the cards that were sent by the registrars of the national registration to the divisional registrars, and the table comes from them. I therefore assume that it includes only the single and unmarried men.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not understand why the minister cannot answer the question I asked. It is quite a simple one, and I will tell him why I asked it. In the district in which I live there are a number of foreigners. Apparently they have never taken out naturalization papers. They have sons of the age of twenty-one who apparently are not being called up, and these boys are continually ridiculing the lads who are called up, saying, "Oh, you should be of our race and then you would not have to serve your country." I think the minister should answer whether or not those boys should be called up. I have been told that every man in this country who is born of alien parents becomes automatically at the age of twenty-one a British subject.

Mr. THORSON: I do not express an opinion one way or the other.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister is a lawyer, and also he is in charge of the department. He should know the answer, and if he does not, evidently the matter is debatable.

Mr. THORSON: I have no intention of expressing a legal opinion on the subject.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister will admit that the United States have already gone farther on this question than we have. They are calling up aliens who have expressed their intention of finally becoming naturalized. Surely we can go at least that far.

Mr. THORSON: We have not the same system as they have in the United States.

Mr. QUELCH: There is no reason why we could not change our system. At the present time, as the hon. member for Vancouver South has stated, there is a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the country. One finds it very much on the prairies where there are numbers of alien farmers whose sons are not enlisting, and I believe this condition is proving very harmful to recruiting. Surely when a person comes to this country and gets all the advantages of Canadian citizenship he should be prepared to accept the responsibilities involved. It may be necessary to have a thorough overhaul of the matter of naturalization. I am of the opinion that after a person has been in this country for a number of years he should be given the option either of becoming naturalized or of getting out. Why should we allow people to live indefinitely in Canada, obtaining from it every benefit they possibly can, and then refuse to accept their fair share of obligations? This is not a light question; it is one which is coming very much to the front at the present time, because present conditions are doing, as I said, much harm to recruiting. I cannot yet understand why the minister cannot answer a simple question.

Mr. THORSON: Just a moment. I was in the course of replying to the hon. member for Acadia when the hon. member for Vancouver South asked a question—

Mr. GREEN: I beg the minister's pardon.

Mr. THORSON:—with regard to the table which I put on Hansard yesterday. I was about to say that that table indicates that the number of aliens in this country is much smaller than a great many people believe. I believe we are still being unjust to a number of persons of alien origin who are Canadians although they are being grouped with the aliens. Let me say one or two things with regard to that. Some persons whose origins are not alien are saying, "Well, we are not going to enlist until Canadians of alien origin enlist." My information is that many Canadians of certain alien race groups are enlisting in the forces in as great numbers as those of any other racial origin. For example, I am informed that in some parts of Saskatchewan the men of Ukrainian origin are enlisting to a greater extent than men of other origins.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are they enemy aliens?

Mr. THORSON: No, they are not. Although many people are confused and group them all as foreigners, they are not foreigners.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How were they treated in the last war?

Mr. THORSON: In the last war there were racial groups of alien origin in which the percentage of enlistments was greater than from the whole Canadian native-born population. People say that the Jews do not enlist. Well, the Jews are enlisting in quite remarkable numbers.

Mr. McGREGOR: Where?

Mr. THORSON: For active service anywhere in the world. The number of Jews in this country is about 170,000. The number of Jews who have enlisted for active service anywhere in the world is somewhere between three and four thousand. It is not a bad average.

Mr. McGREGOR: Is that in Canada?

Mr. THORSON: In Canada, yes. There is a lot of confusion about the term "foreigners", and hon. members ought to try to clarify their views in this regard. The number of aliens in this country is quite small. The number of good Canadians of alien origin is very large; there are two millions of them in Canada. Although people may forget this, they are just as much a part and parcel of the Canadian nation as Canadians of any other origin.

Mr. HANSELL: We are told that only the young men who pass the physical tests and are placed in category A are called up under the mobilization act. If these young men who pass as category A are called up and are later found not to be physically fit, are they put in a lower category and retained in the army? Assuming the answer is yes, I submit that is unfair and irregular. If a young man is called up, and does not pass the tests, he is not in the army, but if a young man is accepted and eventually is put in a lower category, he is in the army. So that one man in category B may be in the army while a thousand other men in category B, of the same age, are not in the army. Let us not fool ourselves; of course, we have conscription in Canada to-day for home defence. Everyone knows that. But if we are going to conscript some in certain categories and leave others of the same age and the same category not conscripted, it is unfair and I would say highly irregular.

Mr. THORSON: Would the hon. member state the specific question he has in mind?

Mr. HANSELL: When a young man who is called into the service and passes his medical test as category A—which I understand is the only category that is called—is put in a lower category, after he has been in the army perhaps for some weeks, is he still retained in the army under the mobilization act? I have a definite case in mind.

Mr. THORSON: I think I indicated that the only persons who are received for military training at the training centres are those who go into category A. When they become attached to a training centre they come under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. They are held by that department for the four months' period of basic training, and so on, and then are held for active service in the Canadian army for service only in Canada for the duration of the war unless otherwise required. The man has become a soldier when he reports to the training centre, and is in the same position as other soldiers. In the active service force there are men in category A, category B and category C, I think. I do not know at what category they start discharging them from the army.

Mr. HANSELL: The position is simply this: you may have a young man called up under the conscription act—that is not what we call it, but that is what it actually is—at the age of twenty-one. He is in the army and in category C or D. Yet there may be thousands of young men twenty-one years of age who are not in the army but might be in category B.

Mr. ESLING: In connection with exemptions, will the minister tell the committee whether the government has been able to cope with the situation arising by reason of the refusal of Doukhobors of military age to respond to the call for training? The minister may remember that to meet this situation it was proposed to put these young Doukhobors to work on road improvements. They were to receive fifty cents a day and their board. But they simply refused; they would not do it. They are not in training and they are not on the roads. Now, that is a poor incentive or encouragement for young men to enlist, when the Doukhobor element simply flouts the dominion government. What steps are being taken to meet this situation?

Mr. THORSON: I am astonished that the hon. member should ask this question, because he and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) are perhaps more familiar with this situation than any other hon. member. Admittedly the situation regarding the Doukhobors is difficult. It has been met in some degree in Saskatchewan. There, as hon. members know, the Doukhobors were gathered together into a community which held its lands through a corporation which, if I recall rightly, was called the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood. The corporation got into difficulties and heavily mortgaged its lands. The corporation did not pay the mortgage when it fell due, and the holders of the mortgage began sale and foreclosure proceedings. At that time, as I recall, the government of Saskatchewan stepped in to save the persons who were in the community from losing their interest in their holdings, which had been corporation holdings and not holdings by individuals, and permission was given to individual Doukhobors to redeem lands from the mortgage. Thus the holdings of the community, which had been previously in the hands of the corporation, became individual holdings, and the community broke up to that extent.

We have had some difficulty with the Doukhobors in Saskatchewan, but in the main they have complied with the provisions in our regulations for alternative service of a non-military nature. In British Columbia the situation is not as happy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They just defy the law?

Mr. THORSON: The situation is not happy at all. In that province a particular sect of Doukhobors, called the Sons of Freedom, are objectors to everything. They have constituted a grave and serious problem. I may take the house into my confidence to this extent: I must confess that I find it difficult to see any solution to this problem of the Doukhobors. This is not the first administration to come up against these difficulties. You may say, "Yes, put them all in gaol; intern them all." Well, I believe the number of young men liable for military training belonging to this particular sect is about 2,500.

Mr. DUPUIS: Of military age?

Mr. THORSON: Yes; about 2,500 of military age. I do not think anyone here would suggest that they all should be placed in an internment camp. The hon. member for Yale understands this situation. He will remember the difficulties which beset the former administration in dealing with these self-same people. An attempt was made, I think in 1931 or 1932, to deal with this troublesome sect, the Sons of Freedom, in a wholesale way, but all the efforts of that administration proved abortive. I am reluctant to confess it, but I see great difficulties in the way of any solution to this problem, and certainly I would hesitate to intern 2,500 of these people, particularly when this administration has before it the experience of the previous administration in that regard.

Perhaps I have told the committee more than should have been told, but I wanted to take hon. members into my confidence and admit the extreme difficulties which both this and the previous administration have had in connection with this unfortunate sect, the Sons of Freedom.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Perhaps the minister would say what guarantee these people were given when they first came to Canada. I should be interested in learning a little more about that.

Mr. THORSON: I am very glad the hon. member has asked this question. We have a special section dealing with the Mennonites and Doukhobors; and just here I should like to say that we have had very little difficulty with the Mennonites who in the main have been a grand people in this country. Section 18 of the regulations deals with Mennonites and Doukhobors.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary): What regulations are those?

Mr. THORSON: The national war services regulations. Perhaps I might place on record subsection one of that section, since this question has been raised:

> Members of the denomination of Christians called Mennonites and members of the community of Doukhobors who immigrated to Canada pursuant to the arrangements evidenced by the order in council of August 13, 1873, and by the order in council of December 6, 1898, respectively, or the descendants of such immigrants who have continued without interruption to be members of the aforesaid sect or denomination of Christians or of the aforesaid community of Doukhobors and who have resided without interruption in Canada, shall be entitled, subject as provided in these regulations, to the postponement of their military training.

The order in council of August 13, 1873, dealt with the Mennonites; the order in council of December 6, 1898, dealt with the Doukhobors. I have not the two orders in council before me, but their general tenor, as I recall it, was that these persons were admitted to Canada upon the assurance of exemption from military training. In respect of the Mennonites, that is an engagement that was entered into in 1873. They were the first people of foreign origin to come to Canada in any numbers and are therefore perhaps the oldest of our immigrants of alien origin. That engagement has been lived up to and is incorporated in these regulations. The order in council of December 6, 1898, had to do with the Doukhobors, who came to this country from Russia; and we have sought to live up to the engagements into which the government of that day entered with those people.

Mr. ESLING: The situation referred to by the orders in council which the minister has mentioned is rather different from the situation to which I refer. Here are strong, able-bodied young men, born in Canada—as was every Doukhobor now under the age of forty-two—who refuse to take their training. Very well; the government says, "Instead of going to this military camp we will put you to work on roads." Mind you, the Doukhobors are quite willing to go to work on the roads when they are paid the same as other Canadian citizens; but when it comes to working on the roads in lieu of military training, they simply refuse. The whole programme was set out. These Doukhobors were enumerated; they were told to report for work on a certain section of road, under the control and direction of the provincial government. They were to receive so much a day and their board, but they have simply said, "We will not do it." Does not the minister think it time the government should try to cope with this defiance of the law by the Doukhobors? They are masters of the situation; they know it, and they propose to remain such.

Mr. THORSON: I should be very glad if the hon. member for Kootenay East would suggest a solution to this great difficulty. He knows very well the trouble the previous administration ran into when they tried to deal with the problems that arose at that time. I should be very glad to have any suggestion from him as to how the matter might be dealt with, because I assure hon. members that we have been giving our utmost attention to this question. I must admit that I find it difficult to arrive at any solution.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): To come back to the discussion of aliens, even though there are only some 27,700 aliens of military age, or perhaps only 100,000 aliens all told in the country at the present time, that is no reason why we should shut our eyes to this situation at a time like this. I think the minister's department should see that these people make some contribution to our war effort.

Let me give him one or two concrete examples. Out in my part of the country we have a small industry from whose employees some twelve young men offered their services to the armed forces. They have not all been called yet. An alien went in there and asked the manager of the industry when someone would be called, because he was waiting to take his job. I do not have to tell hon. members about the high feeling which has been running in that community. That sort of thing, prevalent throughout Canada, certainly does not tend to assist recruiting.

I know of another man who has enjoyed citizenship in Canada for the past twenty-five years, and has made a lot of money in this country. He has done nothing for the war effort, financially or otherwise. At times such as this I have always thought that any alien, after so many years' residence in the country in normal times, should be forced to become naturalized. Probably that could not be done at present. But irrespective of that, I do suggest the minister's department should insist that these people make some contribution to the country at the present time. They have enjoyed residence here for some years; they have enjoyed our citizenship and our freedom. It is not fair that our own boys, born in this country, should fight for their protection; and I suggest the minister's department should see that they are called upon to make some contribution. It would have a good effect on the recruiting campaign, and surely that is the least that should be done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister's reply to the hon. member for Kootenay West was in effect an admission of defeat.

Mr. THORSON: An admission of very great difficulty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister think that that is good enough, at this point in Canadian history? If these men will not go to work on the roads, why should they not be conscripted? If a young Canadian in Fredericton who is twenty-one years of age is called under the mobilization act and does not respond, what happens to him? A guard comes along and takes him away, and he is put into the ranks. That is what happens to the boy in Fredericton or in any other place in Canada. But in Brilliant, we will say, that may not happen; is that sort of thing to be tolerated in Canada? I put it to the minister: it will not do for him to say to the hon. member for West Kootenay that if he has a policy he ought to advance it. The responsibility is the minister's, and the minister cannot get away from it. I hope he will not try to get away from it. Let the minister grapple with these problems by adopting one course or another—and, as I see it, there are only two courses. Either he must put that man in uniform, or put him on the road, and let the majesty of the law be vindicated. Do not let it be said that these men defy the government of Canada in war time. If the minister would take that stand the whole country would support him.

Mr. REID: Or any other minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: Yesterday I stated in the house that on two occasions a ruling has been given by the Department of Justice that these two orders in council apply only to the original settlers coming to Canada, and not to their descendants born in this country. I believe that is the correct interpretation

I feel, as do many others, that if these men who enjoy all the freedom and privileges of the country are not obliged to play their part in the war, why should I? Why should any other man? That may be a low attitude to take; it is not a loyal attitude, but nevertheless the feeling is there. It would seem that the government was trying to save face when Mr. Justice Davis called all members of the house together to discuss this war service act. On that occasion I said, "Are there any exemptions?" And he replied, "No; there are no exemptions under the act." Finally he did say, "There are exemptions from war services for Doukhobors and Mennonites." The feeling went out through the country that this was unfair. The thousands of young Mennonites and Doukhobors born in Canada enjoy all the privileges of entering industry—because they certainly do not all stay on the farms. They receive good wages, and they are exempt from war service, not because of any law on our books, but because the administration says, "We will consider the same law applies to them as applied to their parents and grandparents, when they came out here."

The government then said, "Here is what we will do: we will take them into camp we will show the people of Canada that these Mennonites and Doukhobors are to be conscripted"—not to fight for the country, but to build more roads so that tourists may drive over them years hence. It is a profitless waste of energy and money. In the county of Waterloo and the surrounding district, young Mennonites have been taken off the farms, and they have been told by the government, "You are not to be conscripted for war service." All right if that is the government's attitude, we will abide by it. But those boys have been taken off the farms and sent to the camps to build roads—useless roads—while the crops have been left lying in the fields. We cannot get exemption for those men. It is a strange policy. It seems that we want more food and are telling the farmers to produce it, but in order to save the face of the government, in connection with granting exemption to those who, under an old agreement, ought not to be entitled to it, these men are being taken off the farms and sent into camps to build useless roads while the crops lie wasting in the fields. I know of farmers working 200, 225 or 250 acres of land. A man holding an acreage of that size, and doing mixed farming, has a great deal of work to do. He would have 20, 25 or 30 head of cattle to milk every day, and certainly he could not do it alone. Some of those farmers are selling their herds and giving up their farms. Pick up any weekly paper and we find that there are more auction sales on farms to-day, in the third year of the war, than there were during the depression. Those farms are being sold, not because the farmers could not make farming pay if they were given an opportunity, but because the government is taking the men off the farms and sending them to do useless work.

Surely the whole picture should be reviewed. It is not conducive to our war effort. True, postponements for from three to six months may be obtained. But last week I was told about two farmers who had applied for postponements for their boys who had been helping them on their farms, and they were told, "You may have a postponement until January, but then they must come in." Cows have to be milked in January just the same as in June. Perhaps we ought to get down to earth in this matter and distribute the work according to the jobs the men are going to do, so that we may have better service than we are now getting.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not believe the minister has taken a firm enough stand in regard to Doukhobors. One hon. member has asked the specific question why Doukhobors should not be conscripted and compelled to engage in military occupations. Last year a book entitled "Slava Bohu," by James Wright, of Saskatchewan, was published; I suggest that the minister read it. The Doukhobors to-day are in exactly the same position as they were when they were exiled from Russia. They are stating that they are persecuted because of their religious beliefs. According to my understanding of the story revealed in the book, these people were brought to Canada for the purpose of providing cheap labour for the Canadian Pacific Railway. That at least was the original idea.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, no.

Mr. GILLIS: That was the original project in which they were engaged.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Canadian Pacific Railway had nothing to do with bringing them out.

Mr. GILLIS: Anyway they built it for practically nothing. At that time the Canadian government gave a solemn undertaking—

Mr. THORSON: They came in as part of a movement from the old world to the new by people who were filled with the hope of opportunities in the new world that were not open to them in the old world.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were brought in by the Sifton colonization scheme.

Mr. THORSON: He was personally responsible for bringing in the Doukhobors, and he brought in a lot of other people. The experience has been good and their value to this country has been great.

Mr. GILLIS: Some people in this country made a lot of money out of them.

Mr. THORSON: Many of them have done very well.

Mr. GILLIS: At that time the Canadian government gave a solemn undertaking that their religious beliefs would be respected. That is the point I want to make. Unless we want to go farther than we have gone in imitating Hitler we should not start off by tearing up these obligations.

Mr. THORSON: The government has not the slightest intention of dishonouring those obligations; the government is honouring them both according to the letter and according to the spirit. These men have conscientious objections upon religious grounds, they believe that it is their duty to their God, as they see it, not to bear arms. While we may not be able to see alike with them, nevertheless that is their point of view and this government intends to honour its obligations to them.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What about Jehovah's Witnesses?

Mr. THORSON: They are members of an illegal organization. They are in quite a different category.

Mr. BROOKS: Compel them to do some war work; that is the point.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister has admitted that this is a problem and that he did not know just what they were going to do with them. I do not think there should be any doubt in the mind of any minister of the government in this matter. We guaranteed certain rights to these people and we should stand behind that guarantee. As I remember the story, the building of a road is considered to be work of a military character as far as the Doukhobor's religion is concerned.

Mr. THORSON: I think the hon. member is in error in regard to that. The regulations contemplate alternative service of a non-military character in the case of persons who have been found by the boards to come within the categories covered by the regulations.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree that those are the regulations, but that is not the Doukhobor's conception of his religion. Not only does he believe that he should not bear arms; he believes that he should not engage in any military project.

Mr. THORSON: Propaganda has been spread through some parts of the country to the effect that the Doukhobors are being ordered into military projects in breach of our engagement to them. An effort is being made to have the Doukhobors not comply with the provisions of the regulations relating to alternative service. These regulations are administered by a civilian department. Alternative service in the main is performed in camps operated by the Department of Mines and Resources and is carried on largely in the national parks. The Department of National Defence has no say whatever in the matter of alternative service. Those who put out propaganda that this alternative service is a breach of the engagement which Canada entered into with these people are guilty of subversive action and strong efforts will be made to stop this propaganda.

Mr. GILLIS: I only wanted to make it clear that we have an obligation to the Doukhobors with respect to war service. Am I right in assuming that some of the men called up for road work and paid at the rate of fifty cents a day are already employed? Is it proposed to take some of these men from employment and put them at road work at fifty cents a day?

Mr. THORSON: No. However, I would not want to generalize. Persons have come before the board and have claimed the right to a postponement of their military training upon the ground that they are either Mennonites, Doukhobors or conscientious objectors. The board then determines whether such persons come within any one of these categories, and, if so, directs the alternative service that they shall be called upon to perform. At the present time this alternative service is being performed in the main in our national parks under the direction of the Department of Mines and Resources. This is pursuant to an agreement relating to the matter between the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of National War Services.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why should not they receive the same treatment they would be given if called for military training? For instance, the Doukhobors in Saskatchewan have cooperated most commendably in the matter of alternative service.

Mr. THORSON: Not too well, but better than their brothers in the province farthest west.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I know something of the men who had a part in persuading the Doukhobors to cooperate in this regard, and I know they have cooperated much better than some of these men thought they would, even in their most optimistic moments. But that spirit of cooperation has not been helped by paying men fifty cents a day for what is fairly hard work. I have been told that in some cases they are not being supplied with the necessary clothing and equipment. I have in mind a young university student who made application for postponement upon the ground of conscientious objections and who was sent into a camp for alternative training. Ordinarily he would make sufficient money in the summer months to put him through university in the winter, but this summer he received about $30 a month for doing very hard work. I do not think we are helping this spirit of cooperation by paying little better than slave wages for manual labour. These men ought to get the same pay and receive the same treatment as if they had taken military training. If that were done, I believe we would receive better cooperation.

Mr. REID: Are the Doukhobors of British Columbia registered? My information is that they are not.

Mr. THORSON: The Sons of Freedom are not registered.

Mr. REID: I think that important fact should be placed before the committee. In British Columbia we believe that these people should be made to obey the law. They have defied the law and have not been registered.

Mr. THORSON: Many of the others have registered but this sect has not.

Mr. McNEVIN: I understand this agreement was made in 1898. Were the Doukhobors forced to take military training during the last war?

Mr. THORSON: No, they certainly were not. I should like to say something more about this question of conscientious objection and give the reasons why the government adopted the attitude it did toward Mennonites, Doukhobors and the general class of conscientious objectors to which I have not referred thus far. The spirit of one order in council governs the Mennonites, while the spirit of another governs the Doukhobors. There is another section relating to conscientious objectors and covering all such persons who do not come within the category of Mennonites or Doukhobors. A number of Quakers—The Society of Friends—for instance, have somewhat the same view with regard to bearing arms. I do not think anyone should express hasty views on this subject. The experience of Great Britain in the last war with regard to conscientious objectors was an unfortunate one. At the beginning they did not recognize that viewpoint, which to perhaps all of us is an incomprehensible one, and they filled Dartmouth prison to overflowing with conscientious objectors. Then they receded from that original policy and embarked upon a policy of service of a non-military nature for conscientious objectors. Anyone who has made a study of the unfortunate experience of the British government with conscientious objectors in the last war will realize the lessons that were learned by that government as a result, and they have not in this war repeated the experience. I do not think we ought to throw away the value of the lessons which the British government learned as a result of their dreadful experience of the last war with conscientious objectors. Let me assure the committee that this subject has received most careful, sympathetic and humane attention. I do not think the fact that we have dealt with these people in this humane manner has interfered with or lessened the war effort of Canada; not at all. I think people holding these views are giving great service to this country in many ways. They hold the view that they will not bear arms against their fellow men.

Mr. REID: One of the objections we have is that they did not register.

Mr. THORSON: It is only the Sons of Freedom who did not register.

Mr. REID: We are confusing two questions. So far as British Columbia is concerned one objection we have is that these men have not registered, but all the talk this afternoon has been about conscientious objectors and orders in council. An anomaly arose this year when farmers were fined for engaging these men who had not registered. No explanation has been given the committee of why these men have not been registered. The question of conscientious objectors can come up later. I say that no one should be allowed to defy the law. It only causes disunity in Canada to have one class of people powerful enough to defy the government of the country.

Mr. THORSON: It is not a class at all. It is a group of members of this community, the Sons of Freedom, who did not register, and who have gathered together by themselves in the wilderness in districts in the extreme eastern part of British Columbia. They have camped there and will not do anything. Faced with that situation, are we going to put them all in gaol? What good would that do? Are we going to put them all in internment camps? What good would that do? There is a realistic situation to-day. It is that one group, and they are the only group.

Mr. DUPUIS: They do not work?

Mr. THORSON: They do not do anything; they are passive resisters to everything. They are a headache, I can assure the committee. They do not have votes. British Columbia does not give them votes.

Mr. REID: Why should it?

Mr. THORSON: I quite agree. I do not see why they should have votes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why should they not register?

Mr. THORSON: The Sons of Freedom have not registered. They are just camping in the wilderness. They did the same thing in 1931 or 1932, I forget which year it was, and the previous administration picked them up lock, stock and barrel, men, women and children, and took them out to an island in the Pacific. They would not do anything there.

Mr. REID: Maybe they will go back to Russia?

Mr. THORSON: The government of that day, even though these people took the attitude that they would not do anything, said: "We are not going to let them starve." Therefore they brought them back. They had their unfortunate experience, and we are having ours. It is a very difficult question, but for heaven's sake do not let the thing get out of its proportion. There is a problem there, and I have put it frankly and squarely before this committee, explaining the difficulty. It was an insoluble problem in 1931, and it is close to being an insoluble one now. I do not want my remarks to be taken as applying to all the Doukhobors—not at all—and they do not apply to the Mennonites in the slightest degree.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to support the general position which the minister has taken before the committee. I would remind hon. members that the minister did not bring the Doukhobors to Canada, and he is not personally responsible for all the views they hold. We are living in a democracy, in a country where ever since we have had a Canada we have welcomed people from different countries of the world with different points of view. Those of us whose parents came from Scotland think that the only people are the Scots.

Some hon. MEMBERS: So they are.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am very glad I have such unanimous support. Our colleagues from the province of Quebec have another tradition. People who, like the minister, came to this country from Iceland have also made a valuable contribution to our national life. From all the four corners of the world people have come here and have pooled their opinions and made their contribution to building up Canada.

May I remind the committee that while the Doukhobors have in our view, a great many queer ideas, they have one fundamental idea: "Thou shalt not kill." I know there are a great many Doukhobors of the younger generation who in the past ten years have acted as if they did not prize that tradition of their forefathers.

Mr. REID: Thou shalt not be registered. That is another of their traditions.

Mr. THORSON: The Doukhobors except the Sons of Freedom registered.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I might explain that the national registration was interpreted by many of the Doukhobors as a first step in the breaking of a solemn agreement entered into when they came to Canada in the late nineties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was no agreement. It was an order in council. It was unilateral.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, an order in council executed by the government of the day, a government elected in the usual democratic way and representative of the people. As a result, large numbers of Doukhobors came to this country on the understanding that the terms of this agreement would be lived up to. They and their parents and grandparents had been persecuted in Russia for the religious views which they held, and they decided to come to a country where their religious views would be respected. May I remind the committee that during the last war the government of the day, which was not a Liberal government, considered it in the best interests of Canada to respect the terms of this agreement, and in all the years that have passed very little has been done by Canada to abrogate that agreement.

I know there are people in Canada who say that if Hitler came here there would not be any conscientious objectors, or, if they were in Germany, they could not do this and they could not do that. We are engaged in the most important struggle in human history to prevent Hitler from doing the things that he is doing, and the minister states the case very well when he asks the committee, "What would you do if you were in my position? Would you proceed to put, not twenty-five hundred but twenty-five thousand Doukhobors in prisons or in internment camps across the country?" There are people in Canada advocating policies which would lead to that step. I cannot see that it would help the struggle to defeat Hitler if we put thousands of Doukhobors in internment camps—where many of them are prepared to go. It was mentioned that there was difficulty in getting young Doukhobors into the national parks. I know the minister has experienced some trouble in Saskatchewan in that connection. One young Doukhobor who came to see me said he would go to gaol because the transportation for him was by a ticket which was endorsed "military". I urged him to reconsider the matter and to report for duty, pointing out that this was not military training; but he said, "It is a military ticket, and I will go to gaol rather than travel on a military ticket;" and he has been in gaol for the summer. There are things which Doukhobors will do and can do. The production of food is a very important contribution to the war effort, and it seems to me that those who say, "Let us put the Doukhobors in gaol and keep them there", might well consider for a minute the contribution they can make if they are permitted to produce large quantities of food. In seeking to preserve democracy we must profit by the experience of the last war in the United States and in Great Britain, and refuse to put people in gaol because they believe "Thou shalt not kill" to be a divine command.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we have disposed of the Doukhobors, or agreed not to dispose of them—and I do not think that if we argued this matter from now until the end of the session we could usefully carry the discussion very much further at this time—

Mr. THORSON: I quite agree.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the minister will bear in mind that the opinion of the committee so far as it has been expressed is that he should not take this situation lying down, that something should be done to have these people conform to the law and to make some contribution to the war effort. I am content to leave the matter there, because I know the difficulty.

I should, however, like to make this one observation, that I have read the orders in council with respect to both the Doukhobors and the Mennonites. I am not making any reflection on the Mennonites, because I understand that their disposition has been to accept the alternative and to make their contribution in that direction, and that there has been very little difficulty so far as they are concerned. But there is in my view no legal interpretation which binds this government to release from military service the descendants of those who came over here in 1898.

Mr. THORSON: That may be only technically correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not binding upon the government with respect to their heirs.

There is one matter I want to bring to the attention of the minister before he rises—and I suppose he is hoping he will rise pretty soon; I know that another minister is anxious to get on, and I want to help—and it has reference to the travel bureau. The minister should tell the committee exactly the cause of Mr. Zeller's resignation. I do not accept the statements contained in the correspondence which passed between the minister and Mr. Zeller. There is something more behind it than that.

Then, passing from that, I should like to refer for a moment to the present position of the Canadian travel bureau. When this bureau was established in 1934, it was attached to the Department of Railways and Canals, which subsequently became the ministry of transport. There it remained until the present Minister of National War Services was appointed to his portfolio, and then, for reasons which appear to me to be not very logical, it was transferred to the present minister. I am not suggesting that the present minister is not qualified to handle the work of this bureau as the political head, but I do suggest that, as the ministry of national war services is essentially a war department, the transfer of this peace-time bureau to a war department was psychologically a mistake. That is my first submission. I do not believe—and I have heard this view expressed by those better qualified to judge the matter than I am—that the travel bureau should be associated with a war department. They have nothing in common. I suggest to the minister that the tourist industry has suffered greatly since the very outbreak of the war from propaganda which has been spread in the United States in the attempt to keep their nationals within their own territory, to the effect that tourist activities in Canada may be and are interfered with as a result of this country being at war. Fantastic stories are reported to me to have been spread in the United States, to the effect that, "If you come up to Canada, your car will be taken away from you", and also that "you will be conscripted." Those responsible for those stories have an ulterior motive, namely, they want to keep their tourists in their own country; and the very fact that Canada is at war and that the operation of this bureau is under a war service ministry has had a distinct effect in keeping out of Canada people who are desirable tourists. I believe that the association of the bureau with this ministry lends credence to the fantastic views which have been expressed in the United States.

I have here a letter from the travel bureau. It is entitled, "Canadian Government Travel Bureau, Ottawa, Canada. Department of National War Services." That is on the letterhead. I assume that hundreds or even thousands of these letterheads go to the United States. Thereby the government is disseminating information among would-be tourists in that country that the travel bureau is a war service. There is an association of ideas which we just cannot get away from; it is wrong, and it has had a detrimental effect on the tourist bureau.

I suggest to the minister, not with any intention of disparaging his activities or his capabilities, that this travel bureau should be dissociated altogether from the idea of war services and be put into the Department of Trade and Commerce, or somewhere else, so that this bad psychological effect may be obviated. There is no doubt that we want these people to come into Canada. There is no doubt that the coming of the normal number of tourists into Canada would be a great help to us in connection with the foreign exchange problem.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

By the same token the restrictions on the issue of Canadian currency for travel in the United States have had a bad effect upon the reciprocal action of United States nationals coming into this country. If the minister wants any confirmation of that, I would ask him to consult with our Canadian minister at Washington; I think he has views on the subject. I have no authority to quote him, but I suggest that the minister find out what our highest ranking official in the United States has to say about this matter, and then see if something cannot be done. I am satisfied that if there were greater provision for Canadians to visit the United States and mingle with the people there, they could become good missionaries for Canada, enlightening the United States public as to Canada's war effort, and there would not be the slurs that we sometimes hear and read as to Canada's war effort.

I offer these suggestions in good faith. As long as the Canadian travel bureau is associated with a war service, that fact will be used by those who have ulterior motives, and the very object for which parliament is voting money, namely, getting United States tourists into this country, will be defeated. I commend this suggestion to the minister with all the earnestness at my command: let him get the tourist bureau out of his department, get it into Trade and Commerce or some other department, so that the wrong impression will not be drawn by those who want to draw wrong impressions for an ulterior purpose. Do not let the minister forget to ask the Canadian minister at Washington what he thinks about this interchange of travel. We cannot have it a one-way business. If we want tourists to come to Canada, ten to one, fifty to one perhaps, spending money in amounts relative to their numbers, on balance we shall be ahead notwithstanding the opinion of the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. THORSON: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the leader of the opposition and should like to express my appreciation of many of them. There is no doubt that our restrictions on pleasure travel in the United States have had an adverse effect as far as the tourist industry is concerned. I think there is general agreement on that. But the whole question of pleasure travel abroad is debatable and difficult. The restrictions are foreign exchange control restrictions. They have been put into effect not as a matter of choice but as a matter of necessity, to safeguard our United States dollar exchange position. We have been doing our utmost in this country to safeguard that United States dollar exchange position. Those regulations, I am certain, were not put into effect as a matter of choice. The situation as far as United States dollar exchange is concerned may improve as a result of the operation of the Hyde Park agreement, and it may be possible to modify the restrictions relating to pleasure travel in the United States to some extent. But that will depend on our United States dollar exchange situation.

The leader of the opposition referred to the association of the Canadian travel bureau with a war-time department. I have heard that argument put forward. I have had no indication that that association has had an adverse effect on the coming of tourists to Canada. If it has had such effect, it has not been brought to my attention.

The reason for assigning the Canadian travel bureau to my department was that my department has charge of public information, and with public information are associated organizations such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, so far as broadcasting is concerned, for which I am the minister responsible, and the national film board. Both of these agencies are capable of working in cooperation with the Canadian travel bureau to promote tourist travel to this country, and that grouping together was for the purpose of coordinating these activities.

I said the other evening that I was not altogether satisfied with the Canadian travel bureau. I think there can be improvements in its organization, and I am hopeful that some improvements will be made. I am giving careful study to that whole situation, and until that study has reached a further stage I should prefer not to add anything to the interchange of letters that took place between Mr. Zeller and myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means that the minister just will not give the country the information to which it is entitled. Now there is something more behind this. I do not know what it is, but I think the public are entitled to know. I shall leave it at that.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to prolong this discussion. We have been engaging the minister's time for quite a while, and I think he has stood up to the discussion very well. I believe we are all conscious that his department is a very large one and a very young one. I do not know how extensively it was organized when the minister took it over, but we know that previously it was held by a minister with two portfolios.

I do not know much about the internal organization of this department, but there are two other subjects which I think should come up for some discussion. One is the bureau of public information and the other the matter of salvage. I am not entirely satisfied that the bureau of public information is making the very best of its possibilities. We call it a bureau of public information; it could well be called a bureau or ministry of propaganda, for, after all, that is what it does. I believe we have a good deal to learn as to more effective methods of propaganda. The bureau of public information has been giving out a good deal of information concerning Canada's war effort. That is all acceptable, and I suppose there is some reason for the people being informed as to what Canada is doing. But from the point of view of propaganda, from the point of view of stirring up the public, it seems to me that a little more attention might be given to the nearness of the dangers presented by the enemy. Perhaps we have to be a little more definite and specific with certain information.

I attended a theatre the other day, though it is not very often I do so. There was a newsreel shown on the screen, and when a picture was shown of the President of the United States delivering an address I could not help thinking what a powerful piece of propaganda that was. He said something to this effect: "I have before me a map of the western hemisphere which has been obtained by the intelligence branch of our government. On it appear specific plans for nazi aggression, for the occupation of south and central America." I said to myself, "that is powerful stuff." I think we could be a little more powerful along similar lines. The raft of material put out by the bureau of public information does not seem to me always to click. We read about certain appointments being made; a certain individual has been appointed to a certain position. Then his biography is given. He was born in a certain place, in England or some other country; he obtained his public school training here and there, and all the rest of it, and I doubt very much whether the people care where he came from or what he knows. As the hon. member behind me says, they are more anxious to know where he is going than where he came from.

In his address the other day the minister stated that the director of public information was gradually building up his staff. Might I suggest to the minister that what is required in the building up of that staff is a number of competent journalists. When I say that, I am going to suggest that journalism is a very highly specialized profession. A journalist is not merely one who can write good English, or articles of perfect composition. A good journalist knows how to persuade the public I do not think Canada lacks good journalists;

I believe we have in this country men who know how to write the truth, how to put punch into it, how to write it in such a way that the people will recognize the truth and at the same time be persuaded. I offer this suggestion to the minister because this matter is vital. We are spending a great deal of money, and if we do not get the very best possible return for that money, then it is spent uselessly.

In his remarks the minister also referred to a possible speakers' branch. I did not quite understand what he meant by that. Just what is in the mind of the minister? Are these to be paid speakers? If they are, we have 245 members of parliament who might be able to get good jobs. There may be a need for such a branch, but let us not spend money foolishly. Just what has the minister in mind in that regard?

Mr. THORSON: I greatly appreciate the constructive suggestions of the hon. member for Macleod. No good public information bureau or publicity department ever is of the opinion that it is doing as much as it is possible to do. Once any such bureau thinks it is perfect in the matter of publicity, then it is time for it to fold up.

With regard to the speakers' branch of the bureau of public information, to which I made reference in my opening address, I have in mind a branch of our bureau which would have to do with the matter of public information by the spoken word. We are continually receiving requests from various parts of Canada, as well as from the United States, for speakers. We have had voluntary offers from a great many people to assist by making speeches, and I am sure they would be very helpful in accomplishing the real purpose of the department, which is to bring the Canadian war effort and the Canadian people as close as possible to one another. We have been operating through the newspapers. Our association with the daily newspapers is much less important than our association with the Canadian weeklies, which rely upon us for a very great deal of information. We have been operating in the motion picture field in a more successful manner than Great Britain, the United States, or any of the British dominions, through the national film board. We have been operating by means of the radio, as well as in a variety of other ways including posters, leaflets, pamphlets, booklets, and so on. The purpose of the speakers' branch of the bureau would be to extend the activities of the bureau by means of the spoken word, for the spoken word still has its powerful appeal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Before we finish with this department, I should like to bring up one question in connection with the salvage campaign. I do so principally because last year, when I was dealing with this subject of the picking up of scrap steel and so forth, I said I was not going to have anything more to do with the collection of scrap iron unless I was quite sure the country needed it. Then, on October 20, the Minister of National War Services sent out a letter to all hon. members. In part, the letter read:

> In order to intensify the collection of secondary raw materials and to promote the organization of more voluntary salvage corps, also to stimulate salvage corps presently operating, we have now obtained authority to employ experienced organizers and inspectors.

It will be recalled that when this project was first undertaken it was to be on a voluntary basis, and at that time hon. members were asked to assist in the salvage campaign. People throughout the country were desirous of helping. Schoolteachers' organizations agreed to do it by themselves, free of charge. Scrap iron and scrap steel were coming in, but they could not get rid of the stuff.

After all that voluntary work was done, to no good—at least not to the best advantage—it seems there is to be a reorganization, and salaries amounting to $2,880 are to be paid to organizers. These are only the salaries. There appears on to-day's order paper a question in my name requesting a little more information along these lines. The sum I have mentioned includes only salaries. Will these men receive travelling expenses in addition to salaries?

Mr. THORSON: Yes, they will be paid necessary travelling expenses.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That will amount to a good deal of money, and it seems unfortunate that such an expenditure should be necessary when we realize that the work was done previously by voluntary help.

There have been occasions when salvage collectors have done wonderful work, but when very little return has come from that work. In some instances they could not even get rid of the scrap. The result has been that the enthusiasm has died down. My suggestion is that the government is entirely to blame for this state of affairs. I have in mind a particular incident which took place at High River, Alberta. I hold in my hand an excerpt from the High River Times, which reads as follows:

> Sale From Scrap Iron Returns a Sad Story
> Net proceeds salvage drive brings $29.93 to bombed babies; railway gets $243.36 for hauling
> Never was so much done for so little
> Theme song on elevator row "we've been working for the railway." Donors swell chorus

> The sum realized out of the scrap iron collected by the High River elevator agents from farms of the district, has brought $29.93 to the fund in aid of bombed families of Britain. There were 31 tons assembled and shipped out by railway from this point. The freight charges on the shipment to Winnipeg were $243.36.

This net result of all the labour on behalf of the refugee fund, has set the elevator agents, the contributing farmers and other donors back on their heels. The letter of appreciation from the Patriotic Salvage Corps at Winnipeg, acknowledges the receipt of the $29.93, as "the net proceeds of the carload of scrap metal." The same letter congratulates the agents on their splendid work, and suggests that they now go after the salvaging of rags in the district.

Just ask the boys who sweated over the scrapiron, how soon before they are going to start after rags, and you may get a black-eye out of it. It is safe to say they won't start immediately. Never was salvaging enthusiasm at lower ebb amongst these patriotic citizens.

The letter received from the Patriotic Salvage Corps attempts to shed a little brightness by saying, "While in view of the total value of the metal shipped, the net proceeds of $29.93, appears very small, we must bear in mind that freight charges from your point to Winnipeg are extremely high, and in this case amounted to about $250. However, there is one compensating feature of this shipment and that is that you have made available for the defence industry a very much needed shipment of raw material."

It is realized grimly that if the scrap had been trucked up to Calgary (even if they had paid $1 a ton for trucking) the refugee fund would have been boosted by $200 or more. But the instructions were to ship to Winnipeg as the headquarters for the disposal of the metal.

It is doubtful if history can record such small net result from such an amount of combined labour, cheerfully and generously given. Every person participating, including the seven elevator agents, 35 or 40 farmers, two or three truckmen and a wrecker from town (and one musn't overlook free publicity in the Times)—all of these gave something of commercial value in material, time, labour, transportation or news space. Incidentally some pretty good clothing was also worn out in the cause. This was given mainly out of sympathy for the fund for bombed families. All this, to raise the sum of $29.93.

In the letter the minister sent out on October 20, he used the expression, "although we have been unsuccessful in obtaining any concession from the railways".

We are going out again to ask the farmers to contribute scrap metal. We are going to ask them to give their labour for nothing, and to give organizers well over $3,000 to organize those campaigns. We shall have instances like those we had before. In reply to the question: "Is the Department of Munitions and Supply in need of the steel produced from the scrap metals so collected?", the minister said, in the return filed:

The chairman of the war-time industries control board and the steel controller, Department of Munitions and Supply, advise that scrap iron and steel in all forms is urgently required.

I assume that is correct. When I spike on this matter last year one of my chief concerns was that of obtaining scrap steel for our war effort. On that occasion the Minister of Munitions and Supply told me definitely that his department did not need the steel produced from that scrap metal. Only the other day I had a call from an organizer asking me to go out to help him collect. I am not going to waste my time, or that of the people in my constituency, for nothing. If the scrap metal is needed, our attitude will be entirely different; but I want to have the question settled.

No longer ago than June 11, 1941, as reported at page 3812 of Hansard, the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated definitely that his department did not need the steel produced from that scrap metal. I was amazed that this was the condition, and it will be recalled that I was one, and only one, of those hon. members who persisted in having the Calgary rolling mills opened, in order to have that scrap steel handled. A short time ago I visited those rolling mills to see how the work was progressing. Well, I saw. I could not help this morning contrasting what I saw in the moving picture made available to us by the minister's department—or possibly one of the other departments. I refer to that moving picture showing the English people working day and night, not even stopping for meals, on account of the urgent need for guns. They did not take time off for dinner; it was brought to them. The plants were operating twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. There was no whistle blowing and no time off for lunch periods. I suppose that this scrap iron is urgently needed.

Mr. THORSON: It is.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I certainly hope that we are not carrying on a salvage campaign if the scrap metal is not needed. I visited the rolling mills at Calgary one afternoon, getting there at a quarter after five o'clock and I found them closed. It would seem that we do not need steel. Talking to a man at that place I was informed that they were running only one blast furnace and working only one shift. The Prime Minister has said that this is a one hundred per cent war effort, but this man told me that if the government or anybody else would take the steel, they were ready to work twenty-four hours a day. I asked if there was not a demand for their product, and he told me that they could not get orders. He said that as quickly as they got orders they would produce more steel. Linking that up with what the Minister of Munitions and Supply said last year to the effect that that steel was not needed, I am at a loss to know why we are spending $3,000 and more for salaries, wages and expenses in connection with organizers of this salvage campaign. Our effort and money should not be wasted. If we need the scrap metal, let us get it by all means, but I do not think we should pay out $2,880 for salaries, with expenses in addition. I am quite sure that if the people get a decent break in connection with this salvage campaign, they will provide more scrap steel than the department will know what to do with, and they will not have to pay organizers.

Mr. THORSON: I shall be glad to clear up that point in as few words as possible. First, I should like to correct an error. I am reported in Hansard as having said that the Canadian Red Cross benefited from the aluminium campaign to the extent of $7,000,000; what I did say was $75,000. Earlier this year there was a difference of opinion in connection with scrap iron and steel, as to both the amounts available in the west and the advisability of bringing it down from the west. The steel controller at that time was of the opinion that there might be perhaps 100,000 tons of scrap iron in the west, although we thought there was a great deal more. If there was a limited amount of scrap iron available in the west, it was thought unwise to move it. There was one rolling mill in Manitoba and another in Calgary, and it was thought that this scrap would be needed to meet the requirements of these two mills.

The situation is different now. The steel controller and the material controllers of the Department of Munitions and Supply are very anxious to have scrap iron and steel. It is true that we had the incident at High River to which my hon. friend has referred where the persons who gathered the scrap together got only a small return for the patriotic effort they had made. We are hopeful that we can make arrangements for the better moving of the scrap which has been gathered in many towns in western Canada and make progress in ensuring that the mills operating in the west have sufficient for their requirements. Anything in the way of scrap iron and steel in the west over and above these requirements can come down here in a regular flow. It is desired that the activities in connection with the collection of scrap iron and steel should be increased and the department would like the assistance of all volunteer salvage corps in this regard. Some of the salvage corps have operated exceedingly well, while others have operated indifferently. The Winnipeg salvage committee has collected about $30,000 in its salvage operations for war charitable purposes.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They did not have to give it all to the railways as the people at High River had to do.

Mr. THORSON: I quite agree that there have been difficulties, but I can assure my hon. friend that we do want to get all the scrap iron and steel that we can get together. It is desired also to promote the salvage campaign in connection with other commodities, and the purpose of these appointments is to increase the activities of the various volunteer salvage corps across the country. As I say, some of these have been working very well; others have been working indifferently, and some have had no success at all. The purpose of making these appointments is to attempt to clear channels, to promote the activities of the corps and to increase the cooperation between all those engaged in these activities with a view to making the campaign more successful than it has been.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why have salaried men for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I believe a question of privilege is in order at any time. I have just seen in the evening edition of the Ottawa Journal an article headed:

No Conscription Under Mr. King Caucus Told. Premier Discussed Problem with Winston Churchill.

This is a communication by the British United Press, and the first paragraph reads as follows:

Prime Minister Mackenzie King told a Liberal caucus last week that so long as he was head of the government there would be no conscription in Canada, it was learned on highly reliable authority to-day.

Another paragraph further on reads:

Informants said that Mr. King had told his followers that he discussed the problem of conscription with Prime Minister Winston Churchill during his visit to Great Britain. The effect of his conversations with the British Prime Minister was to confirm his own view that Canada, a country of less than 12,000,000 people was consequently limited in its available manpower for military purposes, the Prime Minister was quoted as telling Liberals.

While it is not customary to disclose matters that are discussed in caucus, speaking in the presence of members of the party who were present at that Liberal caucus I wish to say at once that I never mentioned the name of Mr. Churchill in connection with any discussion on conscription at any party caucus held at any time. The statement is false and, what is more, I believe it has been inserted not with a view to helping Canada's war effort but to make the war effort of Canada as embarrassing as it can be made at this time. I think an apology is due from the British United Press for publishing a statement of that kind before inquiring of the Prime Minister whether or not the statement was correct. I cannot protest too strongly against a misrepresentation that could not be grosser than the one appearing here.

There has been a great deal of talk lately about conscription. I want to make perfectly clear what is in my mind when I speak of conscription so that there will be no misunderstanding as to my attitude in relation to it. So far as conscription stands for compulsory selective national service, that is a principle which this government has embodied in its National Resources Mobilization Act passed at a previous session of this parliament. As to how rapidly that principle should be applied and how far it should be extended is a matter which the government must decide and will decide in the light of all the knowledge which it has with respect to the needs of our war effort and the position of the country in meeting them.

I want it to be distinctly understood that so far as the principle of compulsory selective national service is concerned for Canada, in Canada, I stand for that principle. I have never taken any other stand. It is the position that I have held all along. It has been applied in connection with military training and applied in a number of other directions I might mention. How much further it will be applied the house will learn as the government takes its decisions on that matter.

But so far as conscription for service overseas is concerned in the armed forces of Canada, that question was submitted to the people of Canada at the last general election, an election which was held in war-time, and in which the leaders of all political parties made their statements to the electorate, and the people of Canada decided against conscription for overseas service. So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

Mr. HANSELL: Just one more question, and I am sure that what I have to say will sink into oblivion following the forceful statement which the Prime Minister has just made. My question has to do with railway freight rates on salvage. When farmers bring in their scrap iron or other salvage material to a town they usually use their own trucks, spend money for their own gas, do their own labour and do the whole thing voluntarily. But somehow or another the railway companies seem to pick the plums when it comes to freight charges. My suggestion is that the railway companies bear a share of this voluntary service by donating one car out of every freight train that moves across Canada or to the centres where the salvage is needed and charge no freight on the salvage that goes into that car. I do not think the railway companies would lose anything by that. They would just hook the car on to a train here and there and shunt it off at its destination. If the railway companies would do that, it would mean that we would get a lot of salvage moved free of freight charges, and the people of the country would donate even more liberally and enthusiastically to the salvage campaign.

Mr. GREEN: One other question with which the minister dealt the other day and which I think should be cleared up, has to do with sending Canadian firemen to Great Britain. It was not clear from the minister's statement whether these Canadian firemen would be split up among British fire brigades on reaching Britain or would serve together as a Canadian fire brigade. I think it is of the greatest importance that they should not be scattered around in different centres in Great Britain, and if it can be arranged at all, I suggest that our Canadian fire-fighters be kept together, certainly as much as possible.

Mr. THORSON: I have not immediately before me the establishment of these fire-fighting units, but my recollection is that they are organized into what are called "stations," with about twenty men to a station, and that each station operates as a fire-fighting unit.

Mr. POWER: If I may interject, there is a central reserve from which the fire-fighters are sent out, and my impression, when I was over there, was that the number was fifty to a station rather than twenty. They are kept in a central reserve to be sent to whatever district they would be most needed at.

Mr. GREEN: Would they all be kept in one or two cities?

Mr. POWER: The thought was that there would be a central reserve. I do not know just where it would be located, but from that reserve if fire-fighters were required in Liverpool they could be sent there in a hurry, or if they were needed in a section of London they could be sent there in a hurry. They would operate in mobile units. My colleague says twenty men to a station, but my recollection is that they were talking in terms of a unit of fifty when I was over there. I have not heard anything about it since my return.

Mr. GREEN: They would operate from one central base?

Mr. POWER: From one central British base to which this group of Canadian fire-fighters would be attached. The thought was that there should be quite a concentration of fire-fighters in some central place, and the Canadian firemen would be there.

Mr. THORSON: I hope in a very short time to be able to announce a good deal of progress in connection with the raising of Canadian fire-fighters for service in the United Kingdom.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What has been done about freight rates on salvage material? Could something not be done along the line the hon. member for Macleod suggests.

Mr. THORSON: I shall be very glad to bring his suggestion to the attention of the railway companies. We are still struggling with that question.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Bring it forcibly to their attention, too.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What has been accomplished in the voluntary services branch of the department?

Mr. THORSON: A new division of women's voluntary services was just recently set up, and I hope to be able to make some interesting announcements with regard to the operation of that division in the very near future.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What has been accomplished up to date?

Mr. THORSON: I have given quite an elaborate report with regard to the former division of voluntary services, which is now the war charities division of the department.

Mr. STIRLING: We understand that this evening the committee will discuss the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and that in his regretted absence the associate minister will reply?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that that is the agreement which has been reached between the whips.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give the names of the units which comprise the fourth division, and indicate to what strength they have been enlisted?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): I do not think I could give that at the moment, but I will get it. Perhaps I could give it now, but I should not like to trust my memory.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister also explain exactly what the phrase, "these three brigade groups of the sixth division" means?

Mr. POWER: They would be, I take it, the three infantry brigades which have already been authorized. I have not the figures; I know they are not recruited up to strength at the moment. That will be the infantry brigade groups without the divisional troops.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps the minister could also give the information of the extent to which they have been recruited.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National Defence gave a definite statement of the number of men who have been sent overseas. I believe the number he mentioned was 110,000, although I have not the reference in front of me.

Mr. POWER: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many of those who have been sent overseas have remained overseas? What is the net number overseas, having regard to that figure of 110,000?

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend placed on Hansard certain questions. I have the answers to the questions here; this is one of them. The first question asked is:

> The total number of men now serving in overseas theatres of war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. POWER: The answer is: As of October 25, 1941, 110,209 in all theatres beyond Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the net number?

Mr. POWER: I take it to be so, as of October 25, 1941, in all theatres beyond Canada. The next question asked is:

> A statement as to the number of rejections of enlisted men sent overseas, men whom this country trained in Canada, then took overseas and trained them there, and then rejected as medically unfit or likely to become unfit for service; and the reasons for their rejection. How many were rejected because of bad discipline records?

The answer is: number of men returned from overseas as category E—after medical attention, many are reboarded to a higher category after return to Canada, and are retained—3,080.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many were re-categoried? Does that include the number re-categoried?

Mr. POWER: No. I would say that the number of men returned from overseas in category E, that is men definitely put out of the army, is 3,080. The number of men returned for adjutant-general's disposal as unlikely to make efficient soldiers, disciplinary action, or compassionate leave, or discharge, 253; making a total of the two categories, 3,333.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the 110,000 be reduced by that number?

Mr. POWER: I would say that the 110,000 are what we had there as of October 25, 1941.

I have a partial reply with respect to the fourth division. The tenth brigade consists of the British Columbia Regiment, the South Alberta Regiment, and the Saskatchewan Horse; the eleventh brigade—the Grey and Simcoe Foresters, Lake Superior Regiment and Irish Regiment of Canada; the twelfth brigade —Governor General's Footguards, Canadian Grenadier Guards and the Elgin Regiment. I have not the other figures.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has not the strengths?

Mr. POWER: I have not the strengths, but I will get them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not cover all the information asked for.

Mr. POWER: I will go right ahead. I have been furnished with a memorandum containing the answers to the questions of my hon. friend, and I am told that the figures it contains have already been furnished privately by my colleague the Minister of National Defence to the leader of the opposition.

The first question was:

(a) the total number of men enlisted in the Canadian army in all its branches since the outbreak of war.

The answer is, 276,088 for the active army. The records are not available at National Defence headquarters of enlistments into the reserve army. The actual increase, since the war began, in personnel attested into the reserve army is 21,520; a considerable extra number have, in this period, enlisted, turned active or been discharged.

Then:

(b) the total number of men serving in all branches of the Canadian army.

The answer is: as of October 25, 1941, 241,530. This includes Canadian Active Army, overseas and in Canada, and 4,380 members —home defence—now serving with units of the Canadian Active Army in Canada; also 9,807 "R" recruits in training, 147,683 Canadian reserve army, including 70,163 30-day National Resources Mobilization Act recruits attached.

Then "(c) the total number of men attested for service overseas." The answer is: as of 25th October, 1941, 276,088; that includes subsequent discharges.

The next question is:

3. We should like to know from the minister the result of the recruiting campaign of June and July, and the results of the monthly recruiting campaigns, and specifically:
(a) the method by which the quota for the general recruiting campaign and for the monthly campaign was settled. Was it based on population figures in a given military district?

The answer is: Recruiting campaign: 32,434 required, 34,625 enlisted. Approximately 48,000 offered themselves for service.

In answer to (a), before I deal in detail with the method adopted in the general recruiting campaign, the following general observations may be helpful.

The mobilization scheme was based upon the structure of the non-permanent active militia for obvious reasons, the chief being that this organization was capable of the speediest expansion. Experience of the last war in connection with records and maintenance of continuity of the non-permanent active militia units made adoption of this scheme advisable. In mobilizing the non-permanent active militia units for active service due regard was paid to equitable territorial distribution, consistent with the availability of the arm or branch of the service required.

The objective of the campaign was 32,434, of which a portion was to bring units up to strength, and the balance as reinforcements for existing active units, including deficiencies of previous quotas. Only ten per cent of the above figure was for infantry, and the remainder for the technical branches, such as artillery, engineers, et cetera. These latter are mostly English-speaking and require a large proportion of tradesmen. Accordingly, whilst regard is had to estimated population in fixing quotas, it was necessary in the last campaign to take into consideration the geographical origin of the units to be strengthened or reinforced and the location of their reserve counterparts, as well as the availability of tradesmen and suitable personnel for the various purposes for which they were required.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right there may I suggest that the potential man-power in the various military districts was not the basis of the mobilization scheme at all.

Mr. POWER: I would say not. It was a factor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To a limited degree.

Mr. POWER: But it was not the fundamental factor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The fundamental factor was the presence of non-active militia units in the various military districts.

Mr. POWER: And active units also, the necessity of reinforcing active units.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the mobilization scheme was based upon the structure of the non-permanent active militia. That would indicate that, say British Columbia, where there were more non-permanent active militia units than in other provinces, would be called upon to produce a greater number of recruits? I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. POWER: I think that is fair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And population had nothing to do with it.

Mr. POWER: I will not admit it had nothing to do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, very little.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not seeking to make any point against any one, but seeking to understand the position, and since I have received this memorandum I do understand it in a much greater degree than before. Was it not also in a measure based upon the theory that a given military district had in the past supplied a given number of recruits, and the theory was that the district which had produced, say four men was more likely to be a more fruitful source of recruits than a district which had produced only one?

Mr. POWER: I think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a terrible discrimination against certain provinces. Take British Columbia. British Columbia had produced, say three men to one from some other military districts, so it was asked to produce three to one in this recruiting campaign of June and July. But the available volunteers had gone, so British Columbia did not attain her objective. That is the situation which resulted. The whole set-up was based on unrealities. The reality upon which it should have been based was the potential man-power of the military districts as shown by the registration of August, 1940. But that was not made use of; on the contrary they proceeded on another basis altogether.

The Minister of National Defence said they had had a preliminary survey of man-power. Was there no survey of the potential man-power available when the June campaign started, or did the adjutant-general just proceed along the lines of least resistance, looking for recruits from those portions of the country which had responded most nobly in the past? I think that is the situation. The minister's statement to-night rather bears that out.

Mr. POWER: I will not altogether agree with that, but there is something in what my hon. friend says. My hon. friend knows, however, that certain districts were extremely eager to have their units mobilized. Also there was prior to mobilization a war plan, I suppose one might call it; or, in other words, a distribution of militia units across the country. Some districts were more fully mobilized than others. There is a natural pull in any district towards the mobilized unit, the unit that has gone overseas; men like to be with pals, and there was the thought that possibly more recruits could be obtained in the districts from which certain units came than in other districts where there was no unit at all or where the unit covered a very large territory.

Whether or not at the time the recruiting campaign started there was an actual analysis made of the figures of the national registration I am not sure, but I know that there is overlapping. My hon. friend knows that also. The Minister of National War Services explained yesterday that in military districts Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 10 the boundaries of the registration districts do not coincide with the military district. In fact, in some instances, they do not even coincide with the boundaries of the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But generally speaking they are about the same?

Mr. POWER: I do not know how wide the divergence is. If I am not mistaken, Hull and a considerable part of the province of Quebec is in military district No. 3, Kingston, unless there has been a change. Probably districts Nos. 5 and 4 are a bit mixed up with respect to the eastern townships. I think No. 5 goes about through the county of Megantic; it is in the provincial county of Frontenac, and does not take in Three Rivers. Therefore there are divergencies, but I would not say it was a major difference.

Mr. TURGEON: I wish to take this opportunity of recording one fact in connection with that phase of recruiting of which the minister has just been speaking. The Peace River block of British Columbia is not in the military district whose headquarters are at Victoria. It belongs to military district No. 13, with headquarters at Calgary, Alberta. During the recruiting period, when records were being kept, those who enlisted from the Peace River block—and the enlistment from there was very heavy—were credited to Alberta and not to British Columbia. At that time there was some criticism of British Columbia because the enlistments had not come up to the quota which had been allocated to that province, so I wanted to clear the record in that regard, because British Columbia was not credited with the heavy enlistment which occurred in the Peace River block of that province.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present system? Is the government still working on the same old quota basis, or has any change been made?

Mr. POWER: From the quota basis? Apparently this is covered in part at least by my reply to the leader of the opposition, which I might repeat. No actual monthly campaign has since been conducted, though reinforcement requirements allocated to military districts, primarily on a population basis but considering the other factors already mentioned, including enlistment trends, have been issued monthly. The mobilization of new units has taken place for several months, but no combined figures of requirements each month have been issued.

Mr. GREEN: Is there not an allotment made to each military district now? In other words, is each district not asked to raise a certain number of recruits?

Mr. POWER: I am under the impression that they are, but I cannot say for sure.

Mr. GREEN: I think it is of the utmost importance that the quota system should be revised. There has been a good deal of hard-feeling in British Columbia about our quota being so high during the drive last summer, because it created a very unfavourable and unfair impression. I suggest that the quota should be based not on the number who have already enlisted in each district, but on the number who should enlist.

Mr. POWER: I have some figures that I should like to place on Hansard, a table which I think pretty fully answers that point and which, I believe, will do justice to any districts that have had cause for complaint. For instance, I am sure the leader of the opposition will be delighted to learn that New Brunswick, which is military district No. 7, has the highest percentage of any district. This is quite a lengthy and complicated table, but if I may just pick out one figure, military district No. 7 has a percentage of 5·53, while military district No. 11, which includes British Columbia, has a percentage of 4·08.

Mr. GREEN: Do these figures include the men who have enlisted in the air force and the navy?

Mr. POWER: No. No one seems to have bothered about the air force until I mentioned it last week.

Mr. STIRLING: The point made by the hon. member for Cariboo, it seems to me, makes the situation and the figures with regard to British Columbia all the more difficult to understand. Southeastern British Columbia also is attached, for military purposes, to military district No. 13. If you deduct the number of recruits obtained in the Peace River district and the number of recruits obtained in southeastern British Columbia, it makes the figures and the quota asked of British Columbia seem all the worse, bearing in mind, as has been mentioned, that a very considerable amount of recruiting already has taken place in British Columbia. That merely makes it worse.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give the quota and the enlistments for military district No. 12?

Mr. POWER: I cannot give the figures as to the quota. I have a long table here, to which I referred a moment ago and which perhaps would be more intelligible if it were placed on Hansard, though if my hon. friend wishes I can give him the comparable figure I have given already with regard to military districts No. 7 and No. 11. That figure would be 3·55 per cent, as compared with 5·53 per cent in military district No. 7, and 4·08 per cent in military district No. 11. The complete table is as follows:

QUOTAS AND, IN BRACKETS, PROPORTIONS OF QUOTAS TO ESTIMATED MALE POPULATION AGED 19 TO 45 IN EACH MILITARY DISTRICT

M.D.	Recruiting campaign					Subsequent to recruiting campaign				Total	Grand Total
	As stated in answer to question (a) above, whilst regard is made to estimated population in fixing quotas, it was necessary to take particularly into consideration the geographical origin of the units to be strengthened and reinforced and the location of their reserve counterparts, as well as the availability of tradesmen and suitable personnel for the various purposes for which they were required.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Has any thought been given to basing these quotas on population? I was not in the chamber when this discussion began, but I understand that the quotas have been based on previous enlistments.

Mr. POWER: I would not say so much on previous enlistments. They were based on the mobilization plan and the non-permanent active militia units. That was one factor. A second factor was the mobilized units and the desire to fill up the mobilized units from those particular districts. These were factors, as well as the question of population.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There are many areas where there were no mobilized units, or where such units were not recognized, and in many ways this system seems rather unfair. Would it not be much better to base the quotas on population? Would that not give a fairer picture for the future?

Mr. POWER: All I can say is that at the time these quotas were set that was not done on a straight population basis; all these other factors came into it. To what extent the population of military age entered into it I am not able to say; that was a factor, though perhaps not the predominant factor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As a matter of fact, the population data was one of the smallest factors, according to the previous statement of the minister. The quotas were based on the presence of the non-permanent active militia units plus the record of previous enlistments, and population had practically nothing to do with it. That was the answer of the government.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to arrive at a quota by taking into account the numbers who have enlisted in the three fighting services, together with the national registration which showed the number of young men who were available in each district? Would that not be the only fair way to strike a quota?

Mr. POWER: I should say it would be possible, though, as I said before, I have not gone into this question in detail. Up to the present no one in this house, and very few throughout the country—and I say this seriously—have taken very much account of the fact that the air force is taking a great many recruits. As a matter of fact, as the Minister of National Defence said here the other day, within a period of six months, taking the air force, the navy and the army, we enlisted 105,000 men, which is a very reasonable number of enlistments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister spoke about the situation in New Brunswick, and I am glad he did so. I should like to tell him that the New Brunswick enlistment has been good from the beginning; we have never been behind in our quota. This has been due primarily, I hope and suggest, to the patriotic attitude of our people. Second, it has been due to the patriotic attitude of those who have tried to bring in the recruits.

I should like to give the committee an illustration of what was done in my own city during the June-July recruiting campaign. They organized an active recruiting committee, calling themselves the York minutemen. They combed the constituency from one end to the other with public meetings and personal solicitations, and they got the recruits. But the reason why recruits were available, after giving due effect to the first principle I tried to enunciate, is primarily the fact that there is no industrial life in the country to take in these young men. That I believe is a true statement. I tried to analyse it as well as possible, and I am satisfied that all those factors caused the result in New Brunswick.

But that time has now passed. The men have gone, and the minister cannot look for the same results in the future. The men who constituted themselves the minutemen of York, led by my own partners, who are both returned soldiers, say they cannot repeat that performance on any quota. I just wish to leave that fact with the minister.

Mr. POWER: I think my hon. friend will agree that there was a feeling in industrial centres that young men who had good jobs, and who were earning $5 or $6 a day, did not want to join the army to walk round Canada for $1.30. There was not enough action in that, and I believe that fact would account for the large number of recruits we obtained in the air force. There was not enough action in the army for a great many of the young men, I have been told by a number of hon. members and others interested. In the industrial cities of, let us say, Ontario, a great many young men said, "Why should I go and work for $1.30 a day, and probably spend a year marching up and down the country in Canada, when I am earning $5"—or possibly $6— "a day at the present time. If there is any action, I will join up." That may have been the feeling. I know I have been told that, and I can understand it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one other point I wish to make for my own province. I should like to pay a tribute to the Acadians of New Brunswick. They did their duty by enlisting, once they got the opportunity to do so. But the military authorities gave those young men no opportunity to recruit for at least the first nine months of the war. There was no opportunity to recruit in the districts from which the most of these young men came. The only opportunity offered was in the county of Madawaska, represented by the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. POWER: What about the North Shore regiment?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall come to that. In May, 1940, after the election, when I took this seat, I called the attention of the late Minister of National Defence to the matter, but it was not until June or July, 1940, that these young men on the north shore, out of whom the North Shore regiment was subsequently recruited had the opportunity of enlisting anywhere near their own homes. They were told that if they wanted to pay their own expenses they could go to Fredericton, but Fredericton was a couple of hundred miles away from their homes.

The recruiting officers in the military district were to blame; I am not blaming the government. Those officers were to blame because they did not make available to these young men the opportunity to recruit in the vicinity of their own homes, or in the military unit in that part of the country, namely, the North Shore regiment. I take some credit for having arranged with the minister to have that position remedied. Men from the counties of Restigouche and Gloucester had to go to the city of Quebec to enlist, and many of them did so. That position was reversed, and the whole programme was covered in the proper way.

I wish to pay tribute to the young Acadians of New Brunswick. There is just one unfortunate fact in that connection, namely, that the number of physical rejections among them was higher than among their English-speaking compatriots. That was a misfortune, but it was not their fault. It showed that those young men had not had the proper opportunity for development, and had not received, during the years of depression, the standard of nutriment they should have received. Undoubtedly that is somewhat of a reflection on my own province.

Mr. POWER: And there is another factor, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is unfortunate that we must admit that the number of rejections from those communities were much higher than from the English-speaking communities. Surely that is something which ought to be prevented in future. This country must deal with a condition like that. It is a very big problem, but we must do something to raise the standard of living in certain sections of Canada.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. POWER: There is another factor which I noticed in connection with air force recruiting. The probability is that the young men in that northern section of New Brunswick, very much like the young men of certain parts of Quebec, do not engage in sports to the same extent as obtains in other sections of the country. Therefore they are not as well developed physically. I have been told that that was so in connection with recruiting for the air force. We found a large number—and I am speaking particularly of the air force—who were just a little below standard or underweight, or who were not quite sufficiently developed, owing largely to the fact that they had not taken physical exercise, or had not been given physical training in their schools. I am making arrangements as well as I can to feed those lads, to set them up and give them physical exercise. I believe that with two or three months of regular living, good feeding, physical training and rest, we shall be able to bring quite a number up to the required physical standard in the air force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Good. I think the hon. member for Royal could tell the minister an interesting story along that line.

Mr. POWER: Does he agree with me?

Mr. BROOKS: Absolutely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The young men who came from Acadian centres in New Brunswick were not accustomed to playing games, as the minister has said. I will say this for them, that as soon as they see how a thing is done they enter into it with great zest, put their spirit into it and come through.

Mr. BROOKS: Since my leader has asked me to explain, and then taken it upon himself to do so, I do not believe there is much for me to say, except to agree with him. In all the training schools, as the minister knows, we have sports. That is one of the main features of our training. I had noted that the Acadian boys who have come to our centre in large numbers, in both the active and reserve units, are not very familiar with sports, when they arrive. But they acquire a liking for sports, after they learn how to play the games.

There was one question I wanted to ask the minister, and it arises from the statement by the leader of the opposition. A great many young men from northern New Brunswick did go over to Quebec to enlist. I was wondering if they were recorded as enlisting in New Brunswick, or was a certain district in Quebec receiving credit for those enlistments? The numbers were supposed to reach 2,000 or 3,000. To my mind that is probably more than actually went over. Did New Brunswick receive credit for those men, or did the military district in Quebec?

Mr. POWER: I have not all the information on that, but I do know of at least three units which were affected. There was the 57th Battery, which formed in Quebec and enlisted a goodly portion of its recruits from Gaspe, and the vicinity of Campbellton. But they would be English-speaking recruits; I believe that was an entirely English-speaking unit. Then, there were the Royal Rifles of Quebec. They also recruited extensively in Gaspe among the English-speaking residents, and to some extent among the French-speaking people of the Matapedia valley, and along into Campbellton. Then I believe the Chaudière Regiment is entirely French-speaking, enlisted in the Matapedia valley, going through into Campbellton, and through to St. Leonard. I would not be sure, but I think it would go along that highway, reaching Bathurst, and generally through that district.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe many of the Acadians from Madawaska went into the Carleton and York Regiment.

Mr. POWER: Probably. I believe, however, that from the shores of the Baie des Chaleurs, there were quite a few who came to Quebec.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think it is my duty to try to throw a little light upon the matter brought up by the leader of the opposition, which the acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) has attempted to explain. Recruiting in New Brunswick has been based more upon geography than anything else. The oldest infantry regiment in the province, the York and Carleton Regiment, recruited for the first division. Naturally those who were already in the ranks of this regiment were among the first to sign up with the colours. It just happened that this regiment was recruited largely along the banks of the St. John river. Then recruits were taken from Madawaska, Victoria, Carleton, York and Charlotte. Those living in the French-speaking section of Madawaska and Victoria counties naturally joined up with that regiment. Before the regiment was recruited to full strength, I believe a campaign was carried on in the counties of Restigouche and Gloucester. The number recruited from these sections was quite limited, but they helped to fill the ranks of the York and Carleton Regiment, first division.

When the second division was mobilized, men from the districts along the north shore formed the nucleus of the recruits in the infantry division from New Brunswick. More recruits were obtained from the northern or French-speaking section of New Brunswick than when the first division was mobilized. At that time, however, a number of boys who lived adjacent to the province of Quebec had enlisted in the Gaspé and Matapedia valley regiment which had been mobilized for the first division. Credit for those enlistments was not given to New Brunswick. These boys were French-speaking and they joined up with Quebec regiments.

In connection with the physical condition of those who joined, it is an unfortunate fact that the men from the northern section of New Brunswick were not as physically fit as those from the lower part of the province. I shall not attempt to explain this, but there are two main causes. These people have to work hard for a living. Many of them are engaged in lumbering, and they do not have much time for sports and games. They work from daybreak to sundown. Many of them are fishermen, and the life of a fisherman does not tend to produce a strong and robust man. Social workers will tell you that people who spend most of their time in a fog on the high seas, who are not working as strenuously as a farmer and who, therefore, do not require the same nourishment, do not tend to develop bodily to the same extent. Furthermore, they do not have time to practise physical culture, to go to doctors, and to carry out modern methods of hygiene. The war will have one good effect: it will enable us to remedy this condition as quickly as possible.

Mr. PURDY: Is it the intention of the minister to take any action in connection with the barring of private soldiers from the three leading hotels in Truro? My opinion is that if these men are good enough to fight for us, they certainly are good enough to eat with us.

Mr. POWER: I noticed that in a Montreal paper this morning, and I got after it immediately.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is that?

Mr. POWER: The paper contains an interview by the Canadian Press with Hon. Michael Dwyer, former minister of mines of Nova Scotia and now general manager of Nova Scotia Steel and Coal company. He asserted that at Truro the hotels are barred to the non-commissioned ranks, to private soldiers. He relates that while he was endeavouring to enter a hotel with some private soldiers, he was barred by soldiers with fixed bayonets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have the story now. When he went to the hotel with his friends, two soldiers barred the entrance with crossed bayonets. He goes on to state that the same thing occurred at the entrance of each of the three leading places. That would be an action by the military authorities, not by the hotels.

Mr. POWER: I immediately asked the officers of the department to get in touch with the commander at Debert. May I say by way of explanation that certain districts or localities and even certain institutions or establishments are quite often barred to soldiers. I must say, however, in justice to the two hotels in Truro, that they are not of the class that would normally be barred. I want to make that quite clear. As the result of a long distance conversation with the assistant adjutant quartermaster-general of Debert camp I ascertained that there are two hotels in Truro, the Stanley house and the Scotia.

Mr. PURDY: What about the Belvedere? This article refers to three places.

Mr. POWER: They spoke only of two. The Scotia hotel is apparently out of bounds at the request of the manager on account of a disturbance which had been created in the hotel by soldiers a year ago. That order was issued in October, 1940. The Stanley house is in a different category. Apparently it has been reserved to officers on the grounds that they cannot or do not go anywhere else. During the last war I was a private soldier for a considerable length of time, and there was not a hotel in London into which I did not go even though there were generals and so forth there. Needless to say, my view was that the sort of thing which has been mentioned should not be tolerated in the army. We are, however, making further inquiries, and perhaps I shall have to consult with my associate and colleague before giving a definite order.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of National Defence put the situation with regard to recruiting very clearly last Wednesday. Referring to the recruiting campaign in the summer he is reported at page 4115 of Hansard as follows:

> The assumption was that if we could enlist men at the rate of 12,000 or more per month in the campaign, there ought to be no difficulty in enlisting 7,000 or 8,000 under the influence of the momentum which had been generated. But there was a definite falling off. As the figures show, in the last four months, since the campaign, we have asked for 37,000 odd, and something over 24,000 have actually enlisted.

This means that the recruiting campaign at the present time is not a success, and that is perhaps the most vital question facing this house at the present time. I would ask the minister to tell us what plans the government have in mind to make recruiting a success. We should be told what plans are in mind.

I should like to make two suggestions, and no doubt there are many others that could be put forward. First, it seems foolish to rely largely upon sending around bands all the time. I do not know what the practice is in other parts of Canada, but in Vancouver a band parades up and down the street two or three times a day, and there is a recruiting station or perhaps several of them. I think it would be much better if, in addition, we could have stationed in the city a tank or some other type of the most modern military equipment. I am quite sure that it would be of interest to our young men because they are all mechanically-minded anyway, and the army is continually calling for mechanics and tradesmen. I suggest that it would be very much worth while to change the present method and send some modern tanks to different parts of the country to give the young lads a chance to examine them and see how they go. In that way far more enthusiasm would be stirred up than is aroused at the present time.

My other suggestion is this. I think the government misses a grand opportunity by not doing something without further delay with respect to dependents allowances. When the war broke out the policy was adopted of paying an allowance for only two children of the enlisted soldier, no matter how many children he actually had. We were told at the time that it was done in order that men with more than two children would not enlist. But despite that fact, men were taken on who had more than two children, and there are many men in the forces now who have more than two children, yet their wives receive an allowance for two children only. I daresay nothing does more to hamper recruiting than to have that condition exist to-day all across this land. Here is the wife of a soldier with five children drawing only the allowance that goes to the wife with two children. Not only is there bound to be insufficient food for the family, but they cannot get proper living accommodation or proper medical treatment, and it is almost impossible for the family to live under decent conditions unless they have other means. I am sure that practically every member of the house has run into that difficulty, and I suggest that provision should be made at once to pay an allowance for all the dependents of a man who is overseas.

Furthermore, I think these dependents should get a cost of living bonus. As it is to-day, they are pretty well forced to live on a minimum scale, which is not good enough for the dependents of the men of the fighting forces. I suggest that these women and children should be granted a cost of living bonus. The same applies to the men of the last war who are on war veterans' allowance, and to the pensioners, who are in a most difficult position. The young man who has not enlisted sees these veterans of the last war and says to himself, "Well, if I enlist, am I to be treated in that cavalier fashion when I come back from this war? What is the use? Why should I enlist and have to come back and fight the government in order to be able to live?" Those are the arguments with which we are being met in the ridings day after day. These men should get the cost of living bonus. Old age pensioners are in the same category. They are drawing only $20 a month and that simply means semi-starvation. They are on the government payroll just the same as civil servants, and yet, although they are given an extremely small amount to live on, they are not considered in the cost of living bonus scheme at all. Things like that are hurting the recruiting campaign, and until the government wakes up and realizes that these are the conditions across Canada to-day, do not expect very much in the way of recruiting. The government cannot get the men unless it remedies these conditions, and I urge that there should be no further delay in meeting them.

Mr. POWER: Answering my hon. friend's first question dealing with the shortage in recruits during the past recruiting campaign period, if I may use his own argument of a moment ago, I would call his attention to the fact that during that period there were at least enough men enlisted in the air force and in the navy more than to make up the quotas required.

Mr. GREEN: But the government needed the men in the air force and in the navy besides those who were required in the army.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend was lumping them together to get a true picture, and so I say that the recruits for the navy and air force must be lumped together as well.

Mr. GREEN: But the Minister of National Defence stated that the army was 13,000 men short.

Mr. POWER: That does not mean that the man-power of Canada did not come forward to do its duty. It did not come forward to the army because the army has not the same attractions for them.

Mr. GREEN: The army did not get the number of men they wanted.

Mr. POWER: With respect to my hon. friend's next point, bands for recruiting purposes, this is the first time I have ever heard any member of this house say that such bands were useless.

Mr. GREEN: I would not say they are useless. I think they help, but I suggest using the other method too.

Mr. POWER: This whole country went crazy over telling us to get bands, and for a while, when I was acting Minister of National Defence a year ago, after the death of the late lamented Norman Rogers, I kept on authorizing bands as fast as I could to put a little more colour and glamour into recruiting.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A good idea, too.

Mr. POWER: I think everyone agrees that a band helps to do that. I am not quite sure, speaking for myself personally, that a parade of tanks or the use of a dug-out or other paraphernalia is of great effect in getting recruits. I know that the officers of the department and civilian committees interested in recruiting have thought they were of some effect. I do not know myself but I shall be only too glad to pass my hon. friend's suggestion on to the proper authorities.

With respect to increasing the dependents' allowance, it has been stated in the house by the responsible authority, by the Minister of Finance, and, I think, by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, that this question is being studied by a committee of the cabinet, and I believe a decision should be arrived at very shortly.

Then my hon. friend came back to the old problem of the rehabilitation of the ex-soldier. I am under the impression that the rehabilitation programme as laid down by the present minister of pensions is something which, when it comes to be studied, will appeal to the returned soldiers of the preceding generation as well as to the returned soldiers of this war. There is ample assurance that they will be looked after, perhaps not to the extent that they would wish themselves, but looked after in a way that will obviate the necessity of constant requests and petitions to the government. Decisions have been made, and rules and regulations laid down by order in council, which assure them of far greater benefit than, possibly, those who served in the last war were able to obtain.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not deal with my main request, which was for some information as to the recruiting plans of the government. How does he propose to get these men?

Mr. POWER: The answer to that is very simple. My colleague the Minister of National Defence stated, when he was speaking in this chamber last Wednesday, that he had only recently returned from the old country. He returned on the day the session opened. He had not had time to consult with his colleagues. Certainly he has not had time this week; for, as my hon. friend knows, unfortunately he has been confined to his room on account of illness; and he has not had the time to consult with his colleagues in the war committee and in the cabinet with regard to his future plans. Those plans will be developed within as short a time as possible and will be announced to the country.

Mr. GREEN: Then there is no plan at the present time?

Mr. POWER: We are still recruiting.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): This is, perhaps, an unusual opportunity—to be able to direct a remark to the minister to-night in both his capacities, upon this subject of recruiting. I should like to mention to him one matter which has caused a good deal of heart-burning, and to make a recommendation in connection with it.

The high percentage of rejections through medical examinations is due to either one of two things. Either the national health of the country and particularly of our young men is more deplorable than I think it is, or a wrong emphasis is being placed on the system of medical examination. We are in the unique position—I speak now of the army, of which I know, not of the air force and the navy—that the Canadian Army is a creation of the medical profession, that profession being composed of people who understand the art and practice of healing and on that account are entitled to respect. But this profession is in the rather odd position, not of its own choosing, of saying who shall serve and who shall not serve, with the result that, I believe, a great many of these medical officers, being young men without practical knowledge of what is required of the service in its various branches, are forced to decide whether or not a man shall serve, according to a routine order and a little book, a book which anyone who has been turned down for service will probably remember having seen. It is not, I say, of the medical profession's own choosing, and it seems to me and to many others in the service that the time has come when recruits should be examined by soldiers, their capabilities assessed and the decision made as to where in the varied services of the Canadian Army they would most likely be valuable, and then, when that has been decided, the medical officer should be called in to perform his true function, that of an expert witness who, having been told what is required of the particular man in the service for which he is destined, can state whether the recruit is physically fit for it or not.

Some of my colleagues may quarrel with that point of view, but I doubt very much if it will be seriously objected to by any of the medical profession. Under present conditions, in my opinion, there is wastage. I come back to the point I mentioned last night, namely, that we are judging every one of our prospective soldiers by the highest standard which would be required of any of them. In an army which comprises even six divisions or less, there is a place for those who, being willing and anxious to serve, do not qualify by the highest standards.

I put this suggestion to those of us who cheered when we heard the then Prime Minister of Australia say in this chamber:

> What does it matter if we come out into that world bankrupt? What does it matter if we come out into that world with lower standards of material living than we have now? What does it matter if in that world the rich are not so rich? What does it matter if in the last resort the business of statesmanship in that new world becomes the business of sharing justly a new and honourable poverty?

We cheered that; did we subscribe to it? We gave at least lip-service to it. But I suggest to the minister and the government that our attitude with respect to the sub-standard cases is prompted at least in part by the thought of the pensions yet to come. At any rate, I should like to see a reconsideration of the system of medical examinations.

Before I leave the subject, may I suggest to the Minister of National Defence for Air that the problem of recruiting, in so far as it is a problem, has been bedevilled somewhat by that which is in the nature of a contest between the services. I am one of those who think that recruits for all branches of the service might well be pooled and then, according to their various qualifications, assigned to that branch for which they are best fitted. Perhaps I would not give even the volunteers who come from our training scheme quite as much latitude in that respect as they already enjoy. I can understand the Minister of National Defence for Air getting enthusiastic about the fine body of men he has. We are all equally proud of them; most of us have boasted about his air force, and—some of us—about his own part in creating it. Perhaps he will not take it as unfriendly if I say to him that, in the opinion of at least one member of this house, it does not lie in his mouth to assert the superior Canadianism of any group of men in service in Canada, even the men in the force of which he is so proud. I suggest to him—I think he agrees with me—remembering those men who serve in the army under less happy conditions, in particular, though not so much recently, still to some extent in the matter of pay, and certainly in matters of comfort, including the comical clothes in which we train our soldiers—that perhaps the test of sincerity of Canadianism and loyalty in the service was laid down long ago by One who said, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life." I believe that the Canadianism of the men in the rougher khaki will stand the test, even though some of them may have to pass out without "benefit of matriculation."

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Following what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said as to the necessity of removing all sources of dissatisfaction among service and ex-service men, there is a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the committee, arising from a letter which I received this evening since coming into the chamber. I am going to read all material portions of the letter, which is from Earl Grey, Saskatchewan, and dated November 10, 1941:

> I have received a letter from the Department of Pensions and National Health, together with income tax forms, and I enclose their letter which is self-explanatory, and which I thought you might like to read, the forms I am returning, completed, to the proper department.
> I find it difficult however to reconcile the government's action in taxing the soldiers' pensions, especially when, owing to the increased cost of living, bonuses are now being paid to workers who are earning at least $25 a month more than my pension of $75 a month.

And this particularly, Mr. Chairman:

> My pension is for the total loss of sight in the last war, and this handicap, which necessitates paying out for everything that is needed by me, is an added burden to the increased cost of living.

In the last session I made an appeal—and I know it was sympathetically received, although not acted upon—that pensions should not be subject to income tax. Up until the present time they have not been subject to the national defence tax. Attached to the letter is a notice received by this pensioner, a letter that apparently has been sent out to all pensioners in Canada, which reads as follows:

> To all pensioners whom it concerns:
> Subject: National defence tax.
> A ruling given by the Department of National Revenue, income tax department, some months ago, to the effect that total disability pension was not regarded as income and therefore not subject to national defence tax has now been repealed.

I do not know the meaning of the word "repealed" there. The ruling in effect until recently was apparently that these men who are to-day receiving pensions by reason of the last war for total disability should not have imposed upon them the national defence tax. The word used is that that ruling has now been "repealed". I presume the word meant is "revoked".

> It has been ascertained that there is no statutory authority in the Income War Tax Act for the exemption from the provisions of such act of total disability pension.
> In the circumstances, this department will be obliged to make the necessary tax deduction from pension commencing January 1, 1942, in all cases where this action is indicated.

At a time when we are endeavouring to get recruits and every effort is being put forward to that end, even now at the end of this session we ought, in the interests of these men who to-day are in receipt of total disability pensions for their services in the last war, to remove that cause of dissatisfaction. I suggest that the act should be amended at once if there is any doubt, as apparently there is, whether the income war tax act provides for such exemption.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): May I commend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) for bringing up one matter which is near to my own heart. Nevertheless I would not have it thought for a moment that the interest which he has shown in soldiers' dependents is confined to the group to which he belongs. The sentiment is widespread not only in, but outside parliament, that an increased allowance of some kind should be made to the wives and children of soldiers who are in the army, whether abroad or still in Canada. The amount undertaken to be paid to the dependents of soldiers was calculated in 1939, and no doubt was calculated with care in order to give a living allowance at that time. If it was the right amount at that time—and I do not say it was or was not, but let us assume it was—it is the wrong amount now, because in the meantime the cost of living has advanced an amount which it is hard to state. It is easy to look up the cost of living index and see that it has risen 10, 15, 20, or 30 per cent; a little over 14 per cent is perhaps the general figure, but that figure is not quite applicable, because the style of living of these people is special, and one would have to calculate food and clothing specially and make due allowance for the kind of houses they live in and the rents they pay. The cost of living to them has probably increased more than it has in a general way. The likelihood is that the amount we are now paying to them has decreased in buying power by more than 15 per cent over what was paid to them in 1939. I want to associate myself strongly with what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South in the interests of these poor people. We have had representations made here in Ottawa as to children without shoes, children improperly and insufficiently clothed, and most important of all, children who are not receiving sufficient nourishment, who are underfed. That should not take place in Canada.

I have thought that one of the really statesmanlike conceptions which has passed into actual law in the last two and a half years while we have been at war is the cost of living bonus. I think the Minister of Labour is to be commended for that very sound provision which raises wages proportionately to the increase in the cost of living, and which will probably in due season decrease the remuneration as the cost of living falls. That is a statesmanlike provision and has had a marvellous effect in our industrial centres, because it has removed the fear that increases in the cost of living would so whittle down the standards of life that our people would be in a much worse condition than they are now or have been. It has removed fear, and in doing so has settled the minds of the people, and they have gone to work forgetting for the moment about their financial troubles. It would do the same with regard to the dependents of the soldiers if they knew that as the cost of living increases in the future, payments would be made to them increased proportionately with the increase in the cost of living. There would be found very much less discussion of this matter; these women would take care of their children, look after their homes, devote themselves to their domestic duties instead of feeling impelled to take part in public movements to save their standards of living.

I am glad to learn from the minister that a decision on that matter will probably come down in the near future. I hope it will be a favourable decision, and I would say a generous decision would be welcomed by the people of Canada. It would be a statesmanlike provision if a cost of living bonus is paid to these dependents. I took part with the city council when the matter was brought up in Toronto; I came down with the delegation to press it upon the government; I have taken every possible occasion of a private nature to advocate this measure, and I want it to be written in the records of this house that I am in favour of it. I hope not only that a favourable decision will be made with regard to the soldiers' dependents, but that this bonus will be extended to all those people who are dependent upon the government for set amounts, so that the fear of the increasing cost of living shall be removed. They will know that no matter how high it goes, compensation will be given to them. The name of the minister who signs that recommendation will be blessed in this country.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): I wish to make one or two observations in support of what has been said with regard to granting adequate allowances to soldiers' dependents. I do not think there is anything that would add more to the morale of our troops than to know that their dependents at home are being looked after. I do not know of anything that would stimulate recruiting more than to know that if our boys enlist their dependents will be adequately looked after.

I want to give two examples which have come to my notice in talking this matter over with my constituents. I have had several cases of boys who enlisted expecting to get an allowance for their mothers. In one instance this has been denied the mother, for the reason that she is not living with her husband. They are not legally separated; they have been living apart for many years; yet, because she has a husband living, she is denied the allowance in respect of her son who has volunteered his life in defence of his country. As I say, I have had several cases of that kind.

Then there is another instance I should like to cite to the committee. This is the case of two old age pensioners, each receiving $15 a month. They have a little property, which has been willed to the son who is now overseas fighting for Canada, who served during the last war and who volunteered once more for active service. I am informed by these old people that in the course of two or three years their equity in this little house will pass to the old age pension board, and I was asked if it would be possible to have the Old Age Pensions Act amended so that in such cases, where the son enlisted, the board would not exercise the lien which it held on the property.

I want to submit that case to the acting minister to-night. About a week ago I wrote a letter concerning this particular case to the Department of National Defence. I do not know whether that letter has come to his attention, but I should be glad if he would give careful and favourable consideration to the two matters I have submitted.

Mr. POWER: So far as they relate to the Department of National Defence I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Vancouver South in urging the government to extend the cost of living bonus to old age pensioners and dependents of soldiers. My understanding of the cost of living bonus, as it has been applied by the government, is that instead of being a cost of living bonus it is a steady-work bonus, because one must work six days a week in order to get it, and it is based on one's daily earnings. That may be why it has not been extended to pensioners and dependents of soldiers, because it has not been worked out as a cost of living bonus. If it were, perhaps these people would be entitled to it, but as it stands it is a steady-work bonus.

In my opinion there are many things which are tending to retard enlistments. I believe one great factor is the length of time it takes soldiers' dependents to get their allowance after enlistment. During the past three months I must have written two hundred letters to the dependents' allowance board seeking to help these people. Some of them have had to go without their allowance for as long as three and four months, running round, writing letters, appealing to everyone. I think the minister would be doing something worth while if he could devise ways and means of speeding up the machine that handles dependents' allowances.

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I am rather astonished to hear that statement. I have not looked into the question of dependents' allowances for some little time, but something over a year ago I did a special job of work on it, and at that time I think the allowances were coming through with fair expedition. I should be very glad if my hon. friend would let me have any instances in which the allowance which was due under the regulations was held up for two or three months; I will take the matter up personally. I should be very glad to get it, because I was under the impression that this particular board at the moment was functioning with fair efficiency and expedition.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to assure the minister that in the part of the country from which I come the situation has been terrible for the past five months. These have not been isolated cases, either; it seemed to be a general thing.

Another complaint that we hear very frequently is with respect to the treatment of the soldier in camp who happens to become sick. This has been reported to me personally not once, but several times; a soldier reports sick; he is sent to his battalion medical officer. Invariably he gets medicine on duty, with practically no examination, and in some instances is fined 25 cents for reporting sick. When soldiers who have volunteered come home on leave and discuss these matters freely on the streets, there is not very much encouragement for the men whom we are trying to get to enlist voluntarily. That story is true; I have checked it, and I believe that situation should be remedied also.

There is still another matter with which we are concerned in Nova Scotia, at least; that is, the question of employment for men now unemployed. When they seek employment in the coal mining industry particularly, which is the basic industry of that province, the first question asked is whether they have medical certificates certifying that they are unfit for military service. If they do not have such certificates they are not taken on. On the other hand, a boy who is hired in that industry to-day is told definitely when he signs his employment card that he is hired for the duration of the war, and that when the war is over he will be relegated to the ranks of the unemployed. One hears it said quite freely on the street that if this is the programme of the government with regard to rehabilitation after the war, there is not much incentive for men to enlist voluntarily. In the first place, a man must be unfit for the army, and down there they construe that as equivalent to economic conscription. If a man is not fit for military service but is fit for employment, when he takes that employment he is told that it is only for the duration of the war.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, which I think works a great deal of injustice and hardship. A man enlists in Nova Scotia and is sent to Ontario. He has a family of five or six children, though his wife receives an allowance for only two children. Then the husband goes absent without leave for perhaps twenty-one days, and the wife's allowance is discontinued for perhaps two or three months, depending upon how long he was absent without leave and how long he was kept in detention after being caught. The family are not responsible for the actions of the man. When he goes into the army his sergeant-major is responsible for his discipline; and if the man gets away and commits infractions of military law, he should be punished, not his family. It is a sad spectacle to see a woman who has waited a month or two for her allowance, only to be notified by the department: "Your husband was absent without leave, and as a result your allowance is discontinued," effective on such and such a date.

Mr. POWER: I do not think the allowance is touched.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; I definitely know it is. I have had many cases of that kind.

Mr. POWER: The assigned pay may be stopped, though I am not even sure of that. I know most certainly, however, that the dependents' allowance is not touched.

Mr. GILLIS: It may not be according to the regulations, but certainly it has been done. I have had many cases of it, and not only in Canada. I had two cases where the husbands were absent without leave in England, and the wives were some three months without their allowances. After some correspondence with the department at Ottawa an adjustment was made. Nevertheless they were without that allowance for some months.

Mr. POWER: Would my hon. friend send me the facts of that case?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I will; there are two of them. These matters tend to retard enlistment.

Then, with respect to rehabilitation, there are some points I should like to make. I know the minister has written a first-class order in council—at least it is good on paper. But my concern is this: when will it become operative? I have met many men who have been in the army, some of whom have served eight or nine months, and who have been invalided out for certain disabilities. Upon their return they find it impossible to obtain employment. They are on the street. They are unemployed. Industry does not want them, and they are not physically fit. I have known some of them, and I have had to buy shoes for at least two of them.

Those men circulating round do not tend to support voluntary enlistment. I am wondering whether the minister saw the article which appeared in the Times-Review of Fort Erie, Ontario, on Thursday, November 6. The article is headed "Armistice Day, 1941," and is written by Judith Robinson. If the minister has not read it, I suggest that he should. I shall not read it to the committee, but I would say, having read it, that it is the worst indictment thus far, in my opinion, against the government on the question of rehabilitation. It sets out the views of a party of returned soldiers from overseas, after serving twenty-two months in England. They received no pay leave in England and no pay on the boat. They did not have enough to purchase a package of cigarettes. There were some Americans among them, and the story told by one of the Americans certainly is not going to help our war effort in the United States. I would suggest that the minister investigate this matter. If it is not correct, then a correction should be made. If it is correct, then someone should answer for the treatment these men got upon their return from overseas. There is no doubt about it, it is a terrible story.

Mr. POWER: Hand it over.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South that the cost of living bonus should be applied. As I said, however, I am skeptical as to whether it is a cost of living bonus, because it is not being applied in that way. It is based on the number of days a person works, and has nothing to do with the cost of living. If the government is interested in voluntary enlistment, I would strongly urge that some of these matters which appear small and isolated should be given consideration. If one may judge from the discussion, the opinion seems to be general from coast to coast. The treatment the boys are receiving in the camps, according to their own story, is certainly not encouraging to voluntary enlistment.

Mr. POWER: Just a word to my hon. friend. I have read only a paragraph of this article. It seems to me there is a certain amount of vituperation in it. The places to which the man interviewed assigns the army, and the adjectives he utilizes with respect to pay, could scarcely be put on Hansard; but, after abstracting the adjectives and the invective, I shall try to see what there is in it.

With respect to rehabilitation, my hon. friend knows that the order in council provides that from the time the Unemployment Insurance Act came into force, namely on July 1, men discharged from the army profit from that act, just as if they themselves had contributed to it. They are placed in exactly the same position as persons in civilian life, except that they do not have to contribute out of their own money. That is the broad outline of the order in council; I have not the details of it.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Vancouver South and other hon. members who have spoken on behalf of the dependents of those who are serving in the armed forces. They should receive the cost of living bonus. If there is any class of people in the community who should receive that bonus, then surely it is the dependents of those men who are serving in our armed forces.

I can substantiate some of the observations of previous speakers respecting conditions in recruiting. The wife of a soldier came to me last fall to see if I could do anything about her receiving her dependent's allowance. She had not received her cheque for three months. I had the matter straightened out finally, and it was explained to me by the dependents' allowance board that the allowance had been held back because her husband had been reporting out without leave. She had to get along as best she could for those three months. I could give the minister the name, if he cared to look into the matter.

Mr. POWER: I should be glad to.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We listened to a speech yesterday, and the matter was dealt with in an article in the Globe and Mail of October 10, with respect to the system of bulldozing draftees into offering their services for the armed forces. I do not suppose the officers responsible have authority from the minister's colleague, but that is a matter which should be checked up. It does not seem the proper procedure.

Mr. POWER: I know instructions have been issued that there is to be no coercion. I have seen the instructions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am glad to hear that, because rumours are prevalent that that has been carried out in the training centres. I am also of the opinion that there should be more selection in connection with these volunteers. When the war is won I am convinced that it will be the old army which will be up there holding the fort. I say that with all due respect to the air force and the navy, each of which is doing a wonderful job. It is true that they are important branches of the forces. I suggest, however, that our army will have to be provided for, because it will be in there at the finish. These volunteers should be pooled to some extent, and I believe the Minister of National Defence for Air should change his ideas a little bit. He said the other day in the house that there was no selective basis, so far as he was concerned, and that he wanted all the volunteers he could get, and more. I believe that is the statement he made. While I agree with him, I suggest that there should be more coordination among the three defence ministers, and a greater division of the men. They should be given the duties for which they are best fitted.

Mr. POWER: Does my hon. friend wish me to give up the boys who have matriculated from high school and are fit for air crew?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

Mr. POWER: Does he wish me to give them up to the army?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

Mr. POWER: Because I am not going to.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I did not make any such suggestion, and I quite agree with the minister that he should not do that. But there are many other young men who do not happen to have the educational standards, and so on, but who would make fit soldiers. I agree with him that all of us desire to have a fine air force, and a fine body of men, but we must go at this in a different manner, so as to provide for other forces which are not getting the recruits to the same extent as the minister is getting his.

Mr. HANSELL: We have heard from every group in the house with respect to the granting of the cost of living bonus to old age pensioners and soldiers' dependents. In fact, to-night we have been privileged to hear all parties associating themselves with one another. That is a happy feature of to-night's discussion. But our associating with one another does not pay the bonus.

There is a principle in connection with the cost of living bonus which hon. members in their speeches to-night have not recognized. The hon. member for Trinity congratulated the Minister of Labour upon his humanitarian act in bringing down regulations whereby the cost of living bonus would be paid to wage-earners, and the hon. member urged that the minister do the same thing in connection with old age pensions. The principle is this: The government is not paying any cost of living bonus, but if it were to increase the old age pension or give a cost of living bonus to soldiers' dependents the government, that is the country or the taxpayers, would have to pay it or we would have to borrow the money. The cost of living bonus to wage-earners is paid by industry. The Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) can pass regulations covering the payment of a cost of living bonus to wage-earners, and yet he is not able to pass regulations in connection with bonuses to these other people.

I wish to associate myself and this group with what has been said. I think it will always be found that this group is willing to spend money. As a matter of fact, the social credit philosophy is one of spending, but not spending other people's money or the taxpayers' money or money which would have to be borrowed. We have another way of doing it, but I am not going into that to-night. I quite agree with the principle of a cost of living bonus. The complaint I have from wage-earners is that the bonus is not commensurate with the increase in the cost of living. They claim that the bonus should be higher. If industry must pay this cost of living bonus, they must get it from somewhere. If it is not to affect their profit, they must write it into the cost of the goods they sell. The effect of this is that they retrieve the amount from the consumer of the goods, so in the end the people pay it just the same.

Mr. MAYHEW: What about the price ceiling?

Mr. HANSELL: I am assuming that the cost of living bonus was paid before the price ceiling came into effect. I am glad my hon. friend brought that up. We are to have a ceiling placed upon prices. If the cost of living bonus is increased—and I think it should be—it will work a hardship upon industry if it has to pay that increased bonus without increasing the price of goods. I have no particular argument to offer either for or against the policy of the government. A price ceiling or rather the control of prices is something that we have advocated in this house for many years as being one of the things that would prevent inflation. We might not want to do it in the same way as the government is doing it, but in principle the method adopted by the government is what we have been advocating for a good many years. I say again that we believe that old age pensions and soldiers' dependents allowances should be increased, and that the responsible ministers should create some plan whereby this can be done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I call the minister's attention to three matters about which I spoke to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). He may have intended to deal with these, but he did not. I referred to the potential man-power of the nation. The minister said that a preliminary survey had been made and I wanted to know the results of that survey. The next question was dealt with in part by the minister, but he said that he wanted to see what he had said previously before giving a complete answer. This question referred to the disposition of our troops overseas. The minister made it quite plain that so far as service out of England was concerned, the final say was with the government here. The third question had to do with the government's policy of refusing to accept voluntary enlistments for the home army. I asked the minister to elaborate upon that policy and he promised to do so. Perhaps the minister will clear up these three matters in the order in which I have mentioned them.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. POWER: With regard to the first question, I am under the impression that my colleague said he knew that such a survey had been made but was not in a position to speak of the preliminary figures. I do not remember just what figures my hon. friend asked for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have not had any action in that connection. This question of the potential man-power of the nation is most important. Unless its disclosure is considered as being contrary to the public interest, this information should be revealed. If the minister can satisfy me that it is not in the public interest to reveal it at this time, I shall not press the point now but I will later on.

Mr. POWER: I do know that that has been looked into. I have not seen the figures. I was under the impression that the Minister of National Defence had asserted that he was proposing to look into these figures and that based upon the figures he would announce some policy or give some further information. I am under the impression also that he did not undertake to furnish the figures to the committee. After all, they come from another department.

With regard to the second question, that dealing with the authority of General McNaughton, the Minister of National Defence made it quite clear that in the final analysis the government would have to take the responsibility for the disposition of Canadian troops. While General McNaughton has considerable authority and while his advice would certainly be heeded, when it came to the disposition of troops, the moving of them outside England, not based on England, the government would have to take full and entire responsibility.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has that position obtained from the beginning, or was there another position which was changed at some stage?

Mr. POWER: I am not sure if any other position was assumed, but I think it was always understood, as I think it would be with any government, that apart from actual operations, if the question arose of moving any large body of troops to start a new campaign or open up a new front, that would be considered a matter of government policy. I do not think there was ever any other view which would go beyond that. For instance, to say to General McNaughton that he could take troops to Africa would, I think, be divesting the government of a responsibility which it owed to the Canadian people. I do not believe there has ever been any other theory. There would be the other question of what disposition and use General McNaughton could make of his troops as long as they were based on England and were not opening a new front. If his troops were in France and there was some discussion, as there was in the last war, about opening a new front in Italy, under the circumstances I do not think the government would permit any military officer, no matter how high his rank, to move those men without consultation with the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the statement of policy that the government should have the say as to the final disposition; I am not quarreling with that policy at all. I had the understanding that at one stage there was a different view held—I will put it in that way.

With regard to the position of the troops in England, it is quite clear now, is it not, that they come under the general authority of the British high command in England without reference to the government of Canada?

Mr. POWER: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is as it should be. May I ask another question? At the time of Dunkirk or just before, when Canadian troops were about to board or were actually on board ship, was the permission of the government of Canada sought and obtained for that movement or proposed movement of our troops?

Mr. POWER: I have a recollection of dispatches from General McNaughton—they have been made public since so there is nothing hush-hush about it—in which he stated that he had gone, I think, to Calais or Boulogne to reconnoitre the ground and ascertain whether it would be advisable for Canadian troops to be sent. If my recollection is correct, he was almost cut off from communication with Great Britain, and he came to the conclusion that it would be most inadvisable to send Canadian troops to Dunkirk.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is hardly the question I asked.

Mr. POWER: I think I am coming to my hon. friend's question. As to the brigade or part of a brigade of Canadian troops which actually landed in France and after a very short stay returned, my recollection is—and I think I was acting minister at the time—that General McNaughton advised the Canadian government of his plans.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they gave consent?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to my first question, I have now been handed the reference, page 4118 of Hansard of November 5, second column, where the Minister of National Defence makes this statement:

> A preliminary study of the man-power situation in Canada has just been made. The chief of the general staff and I have returned from England after consultations with the general officer commanding the corps, and our friends in the United Kingdom. I have had no opportunity as yet to report to my colleagues. The war committee of the cabinet will be examining the situation thoroughly in the light of Canada's potentialities, and in the light of the needs, to determine the most effective ways in which the army can act and in which the army programme for 1942 can be developed as part of our war effort; and that, of course, will take account of the other calls on our resources of man-power and of materials. Therefore I say to my hon. friend that that is our objective—an all-out effort to the utmost of our strength based on a study of the situation and in the light of other calls which are necessary upon our resources.

I want to know what that preliminary study of the man-power situation revealed. If the minister is not able to reply just now—

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —perhaps he will do so at some later stage.

Mr. POWER: I cannot answer my hon. friend's question, but I can say that I cannot express myself better with respect to it than my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, has already done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But these are very general statements. They do not give us any information.

Mr. POWER: Apparently my colleague was not prepared to lay down any policy until he had had an opportunity to study the figures with his chief of staff and his colleagues in the war cabinet, and then formulate some kind of policy. Therefore I am bound by that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the minister is not able to go beyond that?

Mr. POWER: I should not like to go beyond that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National Defence answered my question as to not accepting voluntary enlistments for service in the home army, and said that that was the policy.

Mr. POWER: I think that is the policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to know what it is based on. I am not now dissenting from it, but I would like to know the reasons for that policy.

Mr. POWER: Possibly because through compulsory military service we are getting enough trainees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the answer?

Mr. POWER: I do not know of any other reasons offhand, but there may be others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; I will not press that.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I was very glad to hear the question of soldiers dependents allowance and the cost of living bonus brought up. The cost of living bonus has been granted to other classes, and I trust that the minister will give the suggestions that have been made him to-night serious consideration.

I wish to lodge a protest against the treatment which some soldiers' wives have received since their husbands enlisted and went overseas. Since coming to Ottawa I have received three or four letters, and before leaving home I have on different occasions had people come to me, protesting against a deduction amounting in some instances to as much as $8 or $10 a month which is made from the allowance provided for dependents of soldier settlers in Saskatchewan, which deduction is made to pay interest due on soldier settlement contracts. I am sorry the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) is not in his seat because it refers to cases under the soldier settlement board and to action taken by his department. These cases have been brought to my attention; I have reviewed them, and I think it is most unfair to make this deduction in view of the present cost of living and the fact that these soldiers of the last war have enlisted and gone overseas and left wives and families behind them. But evidently the soldier settlement board has persuaded the minister to deduct from $8 to $10 a month from their dependents' allowance to be applied as interest due on soldier settler contracts. I wish to lodge my protest against that action. The matter also concerns the Minister of National Defence because many of these men who went through the last war are overseas, and I hope the matter will be given his attention. These men are not in the air force.

While I am on my feet I would ask the minister to give us, if he can, figures with respect to the cost of each recruit obtained in the last recruiting campaign.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend means the cost to the government—

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. POWER: —I am under the impression that that information has been put on Hansard. If not, I will get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. PERLEY: If so, all right.

I was interested to hear the minister review the recruiting campaign and the results achieved in the different military districts. As to district No. 12 in Saskatchewan, part of which I represent, if the present recruiting campaign has not measured up to expectations, it is only fair to say that in that district the early enlistments on the outbreak of the war were most favourable compared with those in any other part of Canada. In the constituency of Assiniboia—I do not see the hon. member for that riding in the house at the moment—there are one or two towns, and I also mentioned one or two towns in my own district last year, which before this latest recruiting campaign was started had enlisted every physically-fit man under thirty-five years of age. It was a very creditable showing, and naturally one cannot expect similar results now when the enlistments in that district a year ago were up to that high standard. I just wanted to put on record that if military district No. 12 is not making a favourable comparison with certain other districts mentioned here to-night, certain parts of that district last year held the record for recruiting for almost the whole of Canada.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member for Vancouver South is receiving a response to his suggestion to-night which he is not used to receiving from this side of the chamber. He is a very agreeable gentleman, and belongs to a party which is just looking for a man of his type now. I hope that we are not hurting his chance to-night.

I wish to say just a word about the allowance given to the soldiers for their children. It is a most important question, especially for the province of Quebec. I am quite sure that if the allowance, instead of being restricted to two children, were raised to provide for four or five children, the percentage of enlistments in my province would increase considerably.

Mr. MARTIN: Why stop at four?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am glad to know that there are hon. members from other provinces who say the same thing. It is a serious matter. In my province and in my town young men marry as early as around twenty years of age. At thirty a man might have four or five children. He cannot enlist on the basis of an allowance for only two children. I am entirely in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver South that this question will have to be seriously faced if the government wants to increase enlistments under the voluntary system.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): I notice in the Ottawa Citizen this evening, on the front page, an item with the heading, "Reserve units get orders to recruit full complements." No doubt this is a move intended to further recruiting, but I am just a little afraid that certain difficulties will be encountered, in units especially that are not mobilized and are not associated directly with any unit serving overseas. I happen to belong to such a unit, and in spite of the fact that we furnished one of the companies for the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders, the fact remains that it is a battalion which lacks the local colour and the local associations on which our unit was founded. We have many fine traditions, including, a brilliant record in the last war, at Cambrai, Amiens and other places; but we see units all round us being mobilized, while we are left, as it were, holding the bag. We have lost thirty officers to other units, as well as 150 riflemen and non-commissioned officers, and at present we are finding it difficult to get men to turn out for drill.

It might be interesting to the committee to hear the results I had in interviewing all the men in the company to which I happened to be attached, with a view of getting them to sign up for active service. This was when we were in camp at Connaught ranges last July. I am glad to say that very few men signified unwillingness to sign up for active service. Many wanted to join the air force immediately and have subsequently been enrolled in that branch of the service. Others signified their intention of joining the navy. By far the largest number said that they would sign up the minute the unit was mobilized for active service. This applies to officers and men alike. Since our return from camp, however, it has become increasingly difficult to get the men to turn out for drill, in spite of the fact that there is a fine of $5 in the civil court if they do not put in the thirty days which are required of them.

I would suggest, in this matter of trying to bring the reserve force units up to full war strength, that one company at least be composed of veterans of the last war, and that the age limit for these veterans be increased from forty-five to fifty, provided that they are in the proper medical category. I venture to say that if that were done, in a matter of weeks this company would be the smartest company in any reserve force unit; it would be an inspiration and an incentive to the other companies; and in the event that they were needed for home defence, there would be none better to serve in that capacity. I know a great many returned men who on account of their age have been turned down, yet would make excellent recruits for a reserve force unit.

There is one other matter I wish to bring to the attention of the committee, namely, the number of officers from the last war who, since the outbreak of this war, have moved heaven and earth to get back into the service in some capacity. I have in mind two men, one of whom, especially, had a distinguished record in the last war and has vast military experience. In spite of trying every known means at his command, he has been systematically and consistently turned down. It seems to me that to leave a man of that type in civilian life is a great loss to the army. I feel sure that there are many others in the same position as this man, and I would heartily commend to the Department of National Defence that great consideration be given to utilizing this type of man, who wants to serve his country, who has the ability to serve his country, and above all, who has the experience.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Before we get too far away from this question of dependents' allowances, there is a little information I should appreciate having, and one or two observations I should like to make. My remarks apply particularly to the matter of the dependents' allowance as it applies to the parents of one who has enlisted. I have been informed on more than one occasion that there are regulations covering the payment of allowances to parents. On the other hand, I have been told from time to time that there are no such regulations. I would ask the minister, therefore, in the first place, if he would comment—I will put it in that way—upon the regulations regarding the payment of these dependents' allowances. In the second place, I should like to know whether such allowances are paid in cases where a condition of total incapacitation does not exist. I refer to this condition of total incapacitation by reason of the fact that in certain cases which have been brought to my attention the amount of allowance has been determined by the degree of incapacitation. I have in mind particularly one case wherein the dispute between the board and the individual had to do with whether this man was or was not 50 per cent disabled. It was finally decided that he was not 50 per cent disabled, and allowance was paid.

In the second case another applicant was turned down because he was not totally incapacitated. I do not particularly care about bringing these matters up on the floor of the house, but it seems that all other ways of securing information have failed as far as I am concerned.

About a year ago a certain man residing in my vicinity whose only son is in the service was rejected by the board because he was not totally incapacitated. After about a year he made application to have his case reexamined. When that application for reexamination was made, a certificate of a reliable physician was submitted. I was informed that a board would be set up to reexamine this applicant. According to the letter which I received from the applicant, a certain individual in the town concerned was communicated with by the dependents' allowance board and asked to set up a board to examine the applicant. Before, however, he had time to set up the board, the dependents' allowance board informed the applicant that a report had been received and that his claim had been rejected, the grounds being that he was not totally disabled from a physical point of view. Furthermore, it was stated that this man was capable of doing a day's work in the harvest field and therefore was capable of supporting himself. I should like to know exactly what steps are taken when a board is set up for the examination of a person who applies for dependents' allowance, and if the reports submitted to the dependents' allowance board have to be concurred in by all the members of the examining board. I intend submitting the particulars of this case to the minister, but I should like to have one or two comments.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to get the full particulars. I am not aware of the system of setting up boards in districts to adjudicate as to the dependency of the person claiming. I thought that through the ordinary social agencies and possibly through the inquiry agencies of the Department of Pensions and National Health it was possible to obtain the information for the use of the dependents' board which would enable it to judge whether or not an applicant was a dependent. The procedure outlined by my hon. friend is new to me. Of course the broad principle is that in order to obtain dependents' allowance one must be dependent, and it is, I presume, only a question of proving dependency. But I shall be glad to look into that case. I was not aware of local boards going into this matter.

Mr. SHAW: Throughout the correspondence there has been repeated reference, not to the question of dependency, as I thought there would be, but to the question of the physical condition of the applicant.

Mr. POWER: That brings about the dependency, I presume?

Mr. SHAW: He was certainly dependent, but they did not seem to regard it from that point of view.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I desire to bring to the attention of the minister a certain case. I mention only a number, I will not give any name. It is E-29327.

A lady who was alone at home received a visit from three military police armed to the teeth who said they were searching for her husband who was supposed to be a deserter. She said, "I find it strange because he passed here on June 18, 1941, and landed in England on July 1, 1941." That man was serving in England, and the military police were going to his home to arrest him as a deserter. This lady writes asking me for an explanation, and I think the least that can be done is that the brigadier of the Quebec district should write her an apology of some kind. Some hon. members may smile, but I find it rather tough. Here is the wife of a man who is serving overseas, and she receives a visit from three men she does not know saying that her husband is a deserter when he is serving in England.

Mr. POWER: This is really a most extraordinary case, it is only my hon. friend the member for Témiscouata who would discover one like that.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not discover it; it came to me.

Mr. POWER: Having the letter, I shall certainly make inquiry.

Mr. POULIOT: I will send the original letter to the minister.

There are other extraordinary cases. I have some correspondence regarding a young man aged fifteen who had enlisted without his father's consent. I wrote to the army asking some information about him, giving his number. The correspondence with the regiment lasted over two months, and finally I received one morning a letter stating that it was not possible to find that man. I was just reading that letter when I saw his face in the door of my office; he was coming to see me. I asked him, "What regiment do you belong to?" He mentioned the name of the regiment, and he gave me the number of his company. Therefore I could immediately dictate an answer to the letter telling me they did not know anything about him by saying that he was in my office and that the number I had given was the right number, and stating also what company he was in.

There was another young fellow, fifteen years old, who had enlisted without his father's consent. I sent a certificate of birth and a letter from the father saying the boy was too young to be in the army. He was in the ordnance. I wrote and wrote and wrote, and it was not possible to locate that man. The man existed. In the first place they knew nothing about the number; in the second case they knew the number fitted the man, but they did not know where the man was. I wondered whether he was a deserter, but he was not; only they did not know where he was. Finally, after two or three months, I discovered that he had been transferred from one unit to another and was in England. Then the army quite properly cabled to England to send him back here. I do not complain of headquarters with regard to that.

There are other extraordinary cases. There is one that I mentioned in the house in May or June of last year, which has been settled satisfactorily. It was most incredible, but the records are here in the department. The man has an English name although he does not speak much English, he speaks mostly French. He is a nice little fellow, a married man. First he was in Quebec city; then he was transferred to Camp Borden or Peterborough, or some camp in Ontario. I tried to get him a separation allowance; there was some correspondence, and I was told by one of the deputy ministers—the one who has resigned to enlist in the army—that this man was mentally unfit for the army. This soldier came home to visit a sick relative; while there, he had an attack of appendicitis. Following that, the next news I had was that he was a deserter. At the time he was arrested in Quebec city as a deserter he had in his pocket the original letter from the deputy minister stating that he was mentally unfit to remain in the army. I had to call Ottawa by long distance, and Ottawa had to call Quebec by long distance, in order to have this man released.

That is bad enough, but I read something worse in the Montreal Gazette, reprinted from the Toronto Telegram. For me there are no Jews or Gentiles, and I am quite eclectic in my appreciation of newspapers. This report stated that in an Ontario military camp there was high pressure when there was low pressure in other camps. The high pressure amounted to this: If a man signed his agreement to go overseas, he might enjoy leaves, passes and so on, and would be treated much better than the draftee who would not do so, though our mobilization act is for the defence of Canada. Then there are certain commanding officers who want to have 100 per cent of their effective strength go across with them, and those who do not sign up to go are penalized by being made to do fatigue work until they do sign. Thus, while the others have a certain amount of freedom, and can enjoy leaves and passes, these men must wash the floors and do that sort of work. It does not seem fair.

I should like to acknowledge my high appreciation of the kindness of the deputy minister and his secretary, who is just as efficient as the secretary of any executive—I need not mention names, but the minister knows of whom I speak—who have done their best to help me give all possible assistance to soldiers who are in trouble. That is the job we do. A friend of mine from across the floor mentioned that I had not been over there in the last war. I do not feel the need to speak of what has been done by anyone close to me; I do not like to boast of what has been done by others, but I am doing my very best in this war. I am trying to help those who want to enlist, by clearing away all possible difficulties in their way; but on the other hand I try to help obtain fair treatment for those who have a right to be exempted. It does not seem fair that men should be treated in the way they apparently are in our army.

I know of young men who have completed their courses at army schools, particularly at Vimy barracks, near Kingston. They were supposed to have learned trades, but instead were kept in the kitchen doing fatigue work, washing floors and so on. Some of these men were sent to Ottawa, but when they came here they were of no use; the officers here could not understand why men were sent here when they were not trained for the work they were supposed to do.

One day I was in Ottawa and needed some guidance with respect to certain correspondence. I telephoned the army, who told me to telephone national war services. I telephoned national war services, who told me to telephone the army. I said, "Well, I do not want to go from pillar to post; I want this information. The army directed me to you; now you return me to the army. I want to know where I must write." Then I called the army again; the army called the person who had drafted the regulations, and finally I was told that I must write to the registrar under national war services. In another case, with regard to an exemption that had been obtained by a certain man, I was directed by the army to get in touch with the chairman of the commission in Montreal, which I did, only to be told by this gentleman that it was none of his business. We do not know to whom we should address our requests, and that situation certainly should be cleared up.

There was something else I read, this time not in the Toronto Telegram but in the Ottawa Journal of September 24, stating that a census of the religious beliefs of the troops was being taken. I do not see how it is possible to do that when it is not possible to learn how many French-Canadians have enlisted in a certain regiment. All that information should be available.

Mr. POWER: It is on the attestation card. The man states to what religion he subscribes, and usually it is on his identification disc as well.

Mr. POULIOT: That is fine, but I should like to know the number of French-Canadians who are serving in regiments such as the Black Watch, the highlanders, and so on.

Mr. POWER: I believe that information can be obtained.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. On the slope of Mount Royal, at the door of the new armouries, I noticed a bilingual invitation to young men to join the Black Watch, and this despite the fact that three French-Canadian regiments have not as yet been mobilized. These are the Joliet, St. Hyacinthe and Chateauguay regiments. Let me explain the point to my English-speaking colleagues. In the first place, French-Canadians were supposed to enlist in the old French-Canadian regiments, but if the doors of those regiments were not open to them, they had to swell the ranks of the Black Watch, the highlanders, and so on. Therefore these English regiments received credit for the enlistment of these French-Canadians. I do not think it is fair or just, and I had to bring to the attention of national defence headquarters the fact that French-Canadians sometimes were placed in regiments where the non-commissioned officers and officers did not speak a word of French, while they, the soldiers, did not speak a word of English. That is an absurd situation. They are alone and miserable in those circumstances. But when they are given an opportunity to be with men speaking their own language they are more at ease in military life.

I give credit to the deputy minister of national defence for having helped me transfer one of those boys who was stationed in the woods about twenty miles from Halifax. He was in an English-speaking unit, and was transferred to another one. Those are matters of fairness. It is a matter, not of religious or racial prejudice, but merely one of giving to those boys the opportunity to serve under the best possible conditions.

Although I must praise highly the excellent work done by Protestant as well as Roman Catholic chaplains in the army, it is essential that those boys keep their religious beliefs, whatever they may be. One day I had a conversation with Mr. Hocken, who was at that time leading the Orangemen, and who spoke a great deal against Roman Catholics. He told me that it is much better for a young man to be a Roman Catholic than to be an atheist. Those young men should keep their beliefs, and should be given an opportunity to worship as they have been taught.

I have in my possession a letter sent to me by a priest at Pennfield Ridge. It states the case of a young man who complained of the way in which he was treated. He points out that a Protestant service was held in the camp in the morning, and that while a truck was standing idle, and there were several Roman Catholics present, those boys could not have the truck to travel only a few miles to attend mass. They were told to attend the religious services at the camp, and they were not permitted to go to their own church. In the letter only the first name of the soldier is given, but I shall be pleased to hand it to the minister. It was given to me by the parish priest.

I hope that those conditions will be changed, and that French-Canadians in the army will not be considered inferior. In Canada we are at times given an opportunity to hear fine, patriotic speeches. We must always understand that we are all brothers, and ready to do everything to help each other. But a French-Canadian should not be considered in the same category as the negroes of the southern United States. The sidewalk belongs to all. The way in which some French-Canadians are treated at Vimy barracks, Petawawa and even at Cornwall is shameful and unworthy of our country. I hope it will soon be corrected. I leave it to the Minister of National Defence to discuss it with the proper authorities. I know they are people of good will, and they are not always responsible for the wrong things that happen. But the finger must be pointed at them, so that the correction shall be made.

I should hope that between now and next spring Canadian defences would be improved. This is the time to do that, so that we may not be taken by surprise early next year. Some people may laugh at the suggestion; some may jeer, but let them remember that an ounce of caution is better than a pound of cure.

Before taking my seat I would ask the minister to state on what authority training was extended, first from one month to four months, and then from four months to an indefinite period.

Mr. POWER: I am not sufficiently familiar with the regulations, but undoubtedly the extension from one month to four months was made legally, and I believe it was done by order in council, and probably under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act. I would be glad to find the order in council for my hon. friend, if he wishes to have it.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister. If he is good enough to-morrow to tell me whether it was done by order in council, or done under the minister's signature, by virtue of the regulations, that will be sufficient.

Mr. POWER: All right.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): It would seem that the Minister of National Defence for Air is leading the government to-night, and is looking after the interests of the Minister of National Defence. It was the Minister of National Defence for Air who originated a letter of December 5, 1940, which had for its purpose the bringing about of some co-operation or coordination in connection with the many medical services in the Department of Pensions and National Health, with which the minister is well acquainted, the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services.

In that letter of December 5 the minister asked that an interdepartmental committee convene to discuss, among other matters, national economy. In any event, heads of the different services were to sit round a table, discuss their problems and work out something sensible and practical. Perhaps the minister will agree that his success was not what he had hoped. The records will reveal that during the past summer the matter was discussed by some very ordinary members of parliament and, as a result of those discussions, I should like to place a few observations on record. It must be borne in mind that my only interest is that of having an all-out war effort based on practical experience. If the committee will permit me to say so, it has been my privilege during the last decade to establish a hospital at a cost of $800,000. To-day it is entirely out of debt. In that hospital there are to-night probably 160 patients, fifty doctors and ninety-eight nurses. I admit, of course, that it is a civilian hospital. We know something about medical services. If that is not sufficient evidence, then I would ask any member of the war expenditures committee to give his views with regard to what we found out about the present set-up.

Before I proceed may I say that all this is somewhat in the form of a side-light. Perhaps it should not be brought to the attention of the committee to-night, but this seems to be a kind of a slow-down period, and I am taking advantage of the last ten or fifteen minutes and the fact that the minister knows a good deal about this problem and has shown more initiative in connection with it than any other hon. member. What is the situation? We have a set of medical services in the Department of Pensions and National Health with twenty years of experience behind them. The sound organization to be found in that department is a credit to the minister who is leading the house to-night. He was followed by the present Minister of Pensions and National Health who had experience in the other field before coming to that department. I have a high regard and respect for the work which he has done. These two ministers have built up an organization which is a credit to Canada. I was going to say "sound organization", but sometimes it is difficult to use the word "sound" when talking about organizations of a civil service variety. It so happens that in the Department of Pensions and National Health we have had these able ministers who have developed something really worth while. I am not saying for one moment that the medical services of the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services are inadequate. The interdepartmental committee which has charge of these services is not functioning as the Minister of National Defence for Air had hoped it would when he originated the letter of December 5. I am not making any charge with regard to that.

Mr. POWER: They have done reasonably well; they have made a survey of each locality.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): They have not sat in at the regular meetings.

Mr. POWER: In regular meetings?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Which were asked for.

Mr. POWER: Who asked for them?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The letter of December 5. There is no record or minutes of the meetings which they did hold, and no real report has been made to check overlapping and duplication in each of the services. This is not criticism, it is simply stressing the need for cooperation between these departments. In the city of Ottawa we find four different buildings where supplies of a like kind are sent out to citizens who have had to be hospitalized, some of the supplies being sent out by the Department of Pensions and National Health, some by the Department of National Defence, some by the Department of National Defence for Air and some by the navy.

My appeal to-night is that we should endeavour to get more cooperation. Perhaps "cooperation" is not the right word to use; we should have more coordination of the efforts of these different departments of government. For instance, in the Daly building will be found a laboratory set up by the Department of Pensions and National Health. Here is an efficient staff making up cough mixtures and other standard drugs and medicines required for the hospitalization and care of patients under the charge of this department. Then on Kent street we find a duplication of the same service, another laboratory mixing up cough mixtures and medicines of one kind and another.

What happens to these products after they are made? They are shipped out to the different medical centres of the different departments. The quantities are small, but they may go to the same destination. In Toronto will be found patients from the Department of National Defence and in the same hospital, patients from the Department of Pensions and National Health. Two separate shipments may be made. There is not sufficient coordination between these different services, and the result is that this duplication is costing us money.

Mr. POWER: If I understood the hon. member correctly, he refers to the Christie street hospital and intimated that in that hospital there might be a patient belonging to the Department of Pensions and National Health, one belonging to the army, and possibly one to the navy or the air force. The fact is that the Department of Pensions and National Health takes charge of these patients at a contract rate at so much a day. Therefore, it would not stand to reason that drugs would be sent to this hospital from the different distribution depots in Ottawa. In that instance I do not think my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth). I used the city of Toronto as an illustration because I happen to know something about it. The main point is that these services should coordinate and not duplicate their efforts. Let us go further afield and take Macleod, Alberta. If goods are shipped from Kent street and similar goods are sent out from the Daly building—

Mr. POWER: As far as I know, there is no unit of the Department of Pensions and National Health in Macleod, Alberta.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Go still further afield; I will take my hon. friend to British Columbia.

Mr. POWER: Go to Calgary.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What I am trying to say is that the movement started by my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence for Air to get some coordination should have been carried through, but it has not been carried through. I ask him to read the recommendations of the war expenditures committee.

Mr. POWER: The recommendation is only that this board be made a kind of permanent board. It was set up as an ad hoc board to deal with certain cases in certain districts, and it did deal with them. But as I understand it, the war expenditures committee has recommended strongly that it be made a kind of permanent board. Am I right in that?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I do not think it will do any harm to put it on the record. I quote from page 615 of the proceedings of the war expenditures committee:

> Interdepartmental committee:
> By letter dated December 5, 1940, the Minister of National Defence for Air indicated his desire that the whole question of medical and hospital services be thoroughly explored.

That was not done.

Mr. POWER: Oh, yes, certainly. I do not like to contradict my hon. friend, but a survey was made of each military district and a statement given indicating the number of beds belonging to the army, pensions, the air force and the navy, and there was a recommendation, I believe—I would not be sure about this—as to how many beds would be required. I have that somewhere in my possession. Therefore a survey was made, and only this week I referred another survey in the city of Halifax to this very committee to ascertain whether certain required expenditure in the way of hospital beds was justifiable, and they recommended that it was.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I have great respect for what the minister says, and I am rather prone to take his answer—

Mr. POWER: I have a good memory.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): —but the answer of the committee itself, which was dominated by and predominantly made up of friends of my hon. friend—

Mr. POWER: I have no friends in this game.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Oh, yes. The answer of the committee itself was that "the above committee has met infrequently—"

Mr. POWER: It was not supposed to meet otherwise.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): "—since and from the evidence adduced before the subcommittee we are of the opinion that the greatest possible use is not being made of this interdepartmental committee." That report was signed by J. T. Thorson, chairman. I am almost commending my hon. friend for having the initiative eleven months ago to originate this committee and I am endorsing what he has done. But if he does not want any assistance, if this house does not want any help from hon. members—

Mr. POWER: I am only too glad to get help.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): —I submit it is time for the Prime Minister to rise in his place and say so.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend misunderstands. I said that this body was set up as an ad hoc body, never as a permanent body, but I am very glad that the war expenditures committee confirms my judgment and makes it a permanent body. But my hon. friend has no right to blame anybody because it did not meet more frequently. It was not asked to meet. It did make a survey of all the military districts across Canada. From time to time it has been asked to make a survey. One such survey was made last week, as I have just told my hon. friend. If the war expenditures committee thinks this committee should be set up as a more permanent body, I am inclined to agree; I have no objection. As a matter of fact, I agreed with my hon. friend right from the start of the war. I felt that the Department of Pensions and National Health should do all the purchasing of drugs and medicines required because they have had twenty years of experience while the air force have none.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I do not want to get into any controversy over this matter. The member for Danforth is of the same opinion as the minister, and why? Because we find in that department men in uniform —I have the highest regard and respect for them, and I know they are trying to do the very best they can—who have been drafted into this work in which they have had no training, men with sergeants' stripes accustomed to being warehousemen and shippers. They are gathering together equipment here in the National Grocers' building on York street, and they do not know the difference between an X-ray machine worth $5,000 and a bathtub worth $5. They are packing this stuff on trucks and shipping it out. They are men in uniform. They are doing the best they can, but they simply have not had the necessary experience. What is the result? I did not purpose putting this on the record, and when I do put it on I put it on because the minister has raised the point and with the idea of helping out a difficult situation.

With regard to equipment and the shipping of supplies across Canada by the medical services branch of the Department of National Defence, what do we find? First, with regard to the records, scores of thousands of dollars worth of goods bought, and properly so, to take care of these men, bought through means of indents made on the Department of Munitions and Supply, and properly so, and then brought into warehouses under the supervision of men in uniform, anxious to serve their country but inexperienced in the work that has been handed to them. The result was that the stockkeeping records on Kent street in July of this year showed thousands of dollars worth of goods supposed to be in store, and perhaps they were, supposed to be on the record as at the end of Canada's fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, and in July those records had not the official approval of the auditing service of the Department of National Defence. This is no charge, Mr. Chairman. This is a condition we are all anxious to remedy.

Mr. POWER: There is no accusation that the goods disappeared. We do not know whether they are there or not. That is the point?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): This work was sprung on them by reason of the war. I am commending this idea of an interdepartmental committee. These records were in lead-pencil figures. The balance on that ledger brought down as of March 31 was in lead pencil. Why were these figures not in ink? Because they had not been audited. In this muddle they said: "We will start off with a new bookkeeping system but will continue with the lead-pencil figures until such time as the audit is made for the financial year." They carry on for April, May and June with a new set of books. In July the books are still not audited, and we asked the head of that service, "What about it?" The auditors were there in May, but the head of that service did not know whether these books had been audited up to the end of the fiscal year March 31, 1941. He admitted that frankly when he was asked what might be done to clear up the muddle and the mess they were in with regard to thousands and thousands of dollars worth of stock in medical stores for the whole of the army service. Mark you, Mr. Chairman, he had one system prior to March 31, and a new one after March 31. The deposition on the record says, "I think perhaps we should start a new system altogether." The result is that the books were not audited. What I am trying to say in my last sentence, is that the initiative which was inspired by that letter of December 5, 1940, should be carried through in those services.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 11.04 p.m.

Thursday, November 13, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. HARRIS (Danforth)

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I rise to a question of privilege. While the Speaker was still in the chair at 11.05 last night, the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Taylor), who functions as the whip of the private members at least of the government party, representing the golden silence in this house of the Liberal members, rose in his place and made some observations which do not appear on the record. The observations that I made in reply also are not on the record.

My opinion is that this golden silence on the part of the hon. members, and which is maintained by the whip of the party, is at least the kind of obmutescent aphony of the mummified mummery of intellectual void that we get when we do peer into their intellects. When something emanates, it should go on the record. I ask that the record be completed.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am bound to say to my friend the hon. member for Danforth that certain words he uttered were uttered when the mace was being lifted from the table.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It was not on the table.

Mr. POWER: I have no recollection of the incident referred to.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): With the indulgence of the house, if I have unanimous consent, I will repeat the words as nearly as I can remember them, if the whip of the government party does not feel disposed to rise in his place and reiterate them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): They were: "You have no right to close off discussion; as long as this war is on we should stay and complete our business in an orderly manner."

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in the unfortunate position that I was not in the chair and therefore am not aware of what happened last night. I would ask the hon. member if he was on his feet when he was making the remarks to which he refers.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Yes, I was on my feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: But was the other hon. member on his feet?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Yes, or at least in the rising position which passes for that. To my knowledge he has never been on his feet since he has been in this house.

ALASKA HIGHWAY COMMISSION

TABLING OF REPORT ON PROPOSED HIGHWAY BETWEEN UNITED STATES PACIFIC NORTHWEST AND ALASKA VIA BRITISH COLUMBIA AND THE YUKON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I lay on the table the report of the British Columbia-Yukon-Alaska Highway commission, together with the evidence.

I have a statement of the main features of the report. It might be of interest to the house to have that statement on record. If it is agreeable I ask that it be placed on Hansard. It simply sets forth the main features of the report.

Report of British Columbia-Yukon-Alaska Highway Commission (Canada)

This commission was appointed by order in council of December 22, 1938. It was instructed to inquire into the engineering, economic, financial and other aspects of a proposed highway to connect the Pacific Northwest of the United States with Alaska by way of British Columbia and the Yukon.

This project had been under consideration by various official and unofficial bodies in Canada and the United States for some twelve years or more, and reports had been made by a United States commission in 1933 and by a Canadian interdepartmental committee in 1938. This latter report was not published. In 1938 representations were made to the Canadian government by the government of the United States with regard to the desirability of providing for the construction of such a highway, and the Canadian government was informed that the president of the United States had appointed a commission of five members "to cooperate and communicate directly with any similar agency which may be appointed in the dominion of Canada in a study for the survey, location and construction of a highway to connect the Pacific northwest part of continental United States with British Columbia and the Yukon Territory in the Dominion of Canada and the Territory of Alaska."

In the spirit of these instructions to the United States commission by the president, the Canadian commission which also consisted of five members, was instructed by the Canadian government "To meet for the purpose of discussion and exchange of information with the United States commission appointed for that purpose."

The Canadian commission, which consists of the Hon. Charles Stewart, Major General Thomas L. Tremblay, Mr. J. M. Wardle of the Department of Mines and Resources, Mr. Arthur Dixon of the Department of Public Works of British Columbia and Mr. J. W. Spencer of Victoria, with Mr. Stewart as chairman, held a series of public meetings in British Columbia and the Yukon in the summer of 1939, and, under its direction, reconnaissance surveys were carried out by the dominion and provincial engineers, both by air and on the ground.

The substance of these hearings and surveys was communicated to the government in a preliminary report in April, 1940. The commission at that time felt that further ground work by engineers would be necessary before it would be in a position to give a reasoned opinion on the respective merits of different routes that had been proposed for a highway. These additional surveys were carried out in the summer of 1940, and when the reports of the engineers had been received the commission proceeded to consider and digest all the available information. It also, in accordance with the instructions of the order in council, held meetings from time to time with the members of the United States commission, and discussed with them various problems arising out of their respective investigations.

The commission, having completed its investigation and deliberations, prepared for the information of the government of Canada the very comprehensive report which has now been tabled. This report, after surveying the results of previous inquiries, and summarizing the evidence obtained at the public hearings, describes in detail the various routes investigated by the commission, and analyses the information collected on the natural resources of the regions traversed by various proposed routes, the character of the country, its climate, snowfall, and so forth.

The commission has embodied in its report a great deal of relevant data, including estimates of costs. The commission itself reports that either of the two main routes investigated, known as the "A" and "B" routes, is practicable from an engineering point of view. It is understood that the United States commission concurs in this conclusion.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

These routes, the former nearer the sea and the latter nearer the mountains, are shown on the map accompanying the commission's report. The "A" route runs roughly from the vicinity of Fort St. James, in northern British Columbia, and by way of Atlin, near the British Columbia-Yukon border to Whitehorse, and from there to the Alaskan boundary. The "B" route from Prince George extends north through what is known as the Rocky Mountain Trench to Liard River and down the valley of the Pelly to the Yukon and from there to Dawson and the Alaskan boundary. The commission, after balancing the advantages and disadvantages of each route, concludes that the "B" route would best fulfil the purposes of the proposed highway.

In its consideration of the proposed highway the commission has assumed that the existing roads of British Columbia from the international boundary north to Prince George and Fort St. James would form part of the highway whatever route might be adopted, and confines its consideration of these existing roads to an estimate of the cost of bringing them up to the suggested standard of the highway.

The commission finds that the length of the highway from Vancouver to the Alaskan boundary would vary from about 1,700 miles to about 1,900 miles according to the route adopted.

The commission estimates the cost of a highway completed to the required standard, but exclusive of paving, at from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, but as these figures are based upon reconnaissance surveys they are only approximate. The "B" route would be somewhat shorter than the "A" route and would cost less both to construct and to maintain.

The commission expresses its appreciation of the cordial cooperation of the government of British Columbia in placing all relevant maps and engineering data at its disposal and in authorizing at considerable expense additional field surveys by its engineers.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. GILLIS

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE" OF NOVEMBER 12

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Montreal Gazette of Wednesday, November 12, in the column written by Mr. F. C. Mears, the Gazette's parliamentary correspondent, the following statement appears:

Labour has its mouthpieces in the house, Angus MacInnis and Clarence Gillis. The latter yesterday in the house sought to tell fellow-members that there would be trouble in the mining area if labour's demands were not heeded. Then he coolly informed them that he foretold to them what happened in Cape Breton. But Gillis was not just an innocent onlooker of the disruption of coal production in Nova Scotia. It wasn't that he feared there would be trouble down there; he was closely associated with those who caused the trouble.

But how long is the government of Canada to submit to the humiliation of having to listen to people who would have the world believe they are just onlookers, even shocked at what is happening, or assuming the role of the prophet and seer and telling fellow-Canadians they told them so.

I strongly resent the insinuations contained in this article, and I think the correspondent has violated his parliamentary privileges in classifying the elected representatives of the people as mouthpieces, a term which in the public mind is associated with those who specialize in the defence of criminals. I want to state emphatically that I am the mouthpiece of no one in this house. I am the elected representative of a constituency that is largely labour, and at all times I endeavour to represent my people as best I may.

With reference to the insinuation that I was a party to organizing the disruption of the mining industry of Nova Scotia, I should like to point out to the Gazette and its correspondent that this dispute was going on for two and a half months while I was attending the sittings of this house in Ottawa. Therefore I desire to make it publicly known that I had much less to do with those responsible for the slow-down in Nova Scotia than the newspaper for which the gentleman in question is writing had to do with some of the financial interests who have been responsible for the economic conditions that bring about labour disputes which to date have frequently disrupted industrial relations in Canada. It ill behooves any man who has already sold his pen to the financial jackals of St. James street to refer to any of his majesty's elected representatives as mouthpieces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am answering the insinuations contained in this article; and the language I am using is exactly the sort of language used by the writer of this article, who has referred to his majesty's elected representatives as mouthpieces.

In the last paragraph the writer in effect recommends to the government the suppression of any minority opinions in the house and he who thinks along these lines is not too far removed from Hitler. We endeavour to avoid industrial disputes by pointing out to the government the economic injustices that exist among the common people. We do not set ourselves up as prophets or seers. We represent the broad masses of the people, with whom we are closely in touch in their every-day life. We intend to continue to expose the manipulations of the financiers and industrialists of this country who, if allowed, will travel the same road that was travelled by the ruling classes of other countries who are responsible for Hitler's domination of Europe to-day. If trouble develops at Kirkland Lake it will not be the responsibility of the common people in that area, but the responsibility of a small group of profit-mad mining magnates who place profits above patriotism at this time.

BUTTER AND MILK PRICES*

Mr. LECLERC:

1. Is it the intention of the government to set a minimum price for butter this month and during the winter season?

2. Will the government control the price of milk in the different municipalities?

3. If so, will the winter price be fixed soon?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a question as to the intention of the government, having to do with a mater of policy. I am not sure whether it is a matter with which I should deal or with which the Minister of Agriculture should deal, but in any event I think there could be only one answer, that the intention of the government will have to be made known in due course.

OIL CONTROLLER

Mr. FAIR:

1. What is the name of the oil controller?

2. What position or positions did he hold at the time of his appointment?

3. Is he a shareholder in any oil or other company?

4. If so, what company or companies?

5. What remuneration does he receive as controller?

Mr. HOWE:

1. George R. Cottrelle.

2. President, Western Canada Flour Mills. Maple Leaf Gardens. Sawyer-Massey Limited of Hamilton. Director, Canadian Bank of Commerce. Asbestos Corporation, Limited. Foster Wheeler, Limited.

3. Mr. Cottrelle is not now, and never has, been a shareholder in any oil company. No information on Mr. Cottrelle's investments in other companies.

4. Answered by 3.

5. No remuneration. Mr. Cottrelle receives actual out of pocket expenses incurred in his duties as oil controller.

SALVAGE CAMPAIGN

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. What are the names, addresses and occupations of the six salvage campaign organizers?

2. How much is paid salvage organizers as, (a) per diem allowance, (b) travelling allowance, (c) remuneration other than salary?

3. Are any others employed in connection with salvage campaigns?

4. If so, who are they and what are they paid in, (a) salary, (b) per diem allowance, (c) travelling expenses, (d) other form of remuneration?

Mr. THORSON:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FARM LOAN BOARD

Mr. REID:

1. How many applications for loans were received from each province by the farm loan board during each of the past ten years to the 31st March, 1941?
2. What number of such loans were granted and to what amount in each province during each of the above years?
3. What was the percentage cost of administration of the said board, each year during the above period, according to amount of money loaned and collected?
4. What was the cost of operation of the board's offices in British Columbia each year, from its inception to the end of March, 1941?

H. R. MACMILLAN

Mr. REID:

With what companies or firms is Mr. H. R. MacMillan, chairman of war time merchant shipping board, connected or director of?

WHEAT

QUESTION OF APPLICATION OF ALL SALES TO THIS YEAR'S CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) intimated that discussions were under way regarding the sale of wheat to the cereals import commission of Great Britain. Some time ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking in western Canada over the radio, said the government had under consideration the possibility of applying all sales of wheat to this year's crop. In view of the fact that the minister has intimated that a very large sale may take place in the near future I would ask him if he can tell the house whether the government has finally decided to apply all sales to this year's crop.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government has not so decided.

AIR TRAINING SCHOOLS

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF ADDITIONAL SCHOOLS IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Is it the intention to establish any additional training schools in Saskatchewan within the next two months? As no doubt the air minister knows, several surveys have been made in that province and, since the accommodation and all other factors seem to be satisfactory, perhaps the minister would care to make a statement.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): I thought that point was made fairly clear to the house in the statement I made the other day. So far as the empire training scheme is concerned, it is complete and there is no immediate probability or even possibility of further aerodromes being constructed in connection with it. It is to be looked upon as a whole, and the whole scheme is complete.

With regard to other schemes, transferred United Kingdom schools, a programme has been laid down, and I think it is pretty generally known in which localities these aerodromes are to be constructed. So that at the moment there is nothing else in prospect, nor is there likely to be so far as we can tell. But of course I cannot tell, any more than anyone else in this house can tell, what developments may come about as the war progresses.

The hon. member mentioned surveys which had been made. During the last two years the Department of Transport has been constantly making surveys of localities which might make good aerodromes. I do not know that they are continuing at the moment, but it is possible that they are. It is not that we have anything in prospect, but we might as well be prepared against some future contingency.

THE WAR

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941 —CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The house again in committee of the whole, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, when the house rose last night I had completed a series of questions in the interests of national economy, more particularly with regard to the duplication of services to be found not only in the war departments, but in other departments as well.

In the form of some further queries I should like as precisely as I can to make a few more observations which to my mind are in the economic interests of Canada. I shall not refer to the work of the war expenditures committee, in deference to the Prime Minister's suggestion that that should be left until the next session—although I disagree entirely with that suggestion. At the same time I chafe under the inactivity resulting from lack of opportunity to do anything to help the general situation.

I have dealt with the matter of medical supplies and services. I come now to the hospitalization of our citizens, no matter what vocation they may be following, and I ask the administration to watch carefully that there is a minimum of duplication. When I make that request I have in mind that the government is charged with the responsibility of operating hospitals for the Department of Pensions and National Health, military hospitals, hospitals for the Department of National Defence for Air, and those for the naval services. I admit that these services call for specialization in taking care of patients in those different classes. At the same time we have in Canada also a considerable number of civilian hospitals recognized as class A on the north American continent. When I refer to class A hospitals I have in mind institutions which have the approval of a body known as the American College of Surgeons. Hospitals have as their objective that of being known as class A hospitals. I suggest that the policy advocated—not strongly enough, to my mind—of using, by contract or otherwise, space in the civilian hospitals, should be pursued.

I suggest that soldiers in the national defence forces who require hospitalization could be treated in civilian institutions, and the same would apply to patients from the Department of Pensions and National Health. There would be facilities in those civilian institutions to take care of all and sundry, thus obviating the expense of building new hospitals in different centres throughout Canada. That would seem to be the proper course, when hospital equipment of one kind and another is already available.

Secondly, it would be sound business, and in the interests of national economy, to canvass the possibility of extending the organizations at present giving hospital service, and make those increased facilities available to the military organizations, whether the air force or the army.

I am sorry to see the attitude of those charged with the responsibility of giving medical attention to the men in their charge. For example, depositions were given that it was difficult for the medical branch of the Department of National Defence for Air to treat men hospitalized from the army, because it was hard to become intimate, one branch with the other. The impression was left with us that it was necessary to have medical men from the Department of Pensions and National Health to look after the patients from that department, those from the Department of National Defence for Air to look after the patients from that branch of the service who were hospitalized, and in like manner those from the Department of National Defence to look after the men in khaki. I can visualize that in small centres there may be one, two, three or four set-ups of the kind. An organization of medical men looking after a hospital is a big organization. The ordinary 200-bed hospital requires a staff of fifty to take care of the different branches. It should not be said that it is difficult for a man in blue to look after a sick soldier in khaki, and we should strive to get more cooperation in that regard. Particularly it should be our aim to encourage the civilian institutions to extend their services permanently, where it appears sensible to do so, and make themselves available by contract or otherwise, for the care of patients from the armed forces.

That is one point I should like to leave with the committee, in view of the fact that we are not to discuss the results of the war expenditures committee. I move from that point to another duplication which seems to be springing up in our midst, and which is not in the interests of national economy. I have in mind the question of salvage. At present there is a most competent salvage officer looking after the salvage operations of the Department of National Defence, and in like manner there is a salvage officer in the Department of National Defence for Air. The navy, following the English system, which is perhaps more than a hundred years old, have their own way of doing things. Then, in addition, the Department of National War Services handles a salvage problem. In my view there is a duplication of effort which is not in the interests of the country. There should be coordination among the different departments in respect of salvage. In his letter of December 5 the Minister of National Defence for Air made a good move when he asked an interdepartmental committee to sit around a table and thresh out some of their differences. Such coordination of effort should take place in the interim between now and the next session. It should not be delayed until the next session opens.

In the Department of National War Services are found some first-class men who are trying to do a job. Mr. Knightley, borrowed from the Department of Transport, is a man who can stir up the public imagination and public opinion as to what might be done with salvage. We know that in that organization there must be someone who can tell them what can be done with the salvaged material. Mr. Mark Cohen has been conscripted to see to the conservation of these secondary materials. He is located in the central part of Canada and is doing a really good job.

The difficulty has been that there are not enough materials in the different centres to warrant establishing an industry to convert these secondary materials into manufactured goods which can find their way on to the market. Another difficulty which has been referred to several times is the fact that quite often freight rates represent more than the value of the materials. It was disappointing to me to hear the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) say that 200 organizations had gathered salvage material to a value of $253,700, or an average of $1,270 each. That is not enough. I can point to one organization in Montreal which is doing that much every day, and there is a similar organization in Toronto. However, these are both large centres of population where the problem is not as acute. I know of an organization in Quebec city which is doing at least $400 worth a day, and another one in Chatham which is doing $600 or $700 worth a day. There is still another one in Brantford doing $1,000 a day. Instead of each one of these organizations doing $1,270 a day, they should be doing ten times as much.

I do not want to be critical; I simply want to encourage these men to go further in this regard. In this connection I should like to offer a constructive suggestion for all who will read. As I said, in Chatham, Brantford, Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal and Quebec city there are industries which help to conserve these secondary materials and turn them into merchandise which is readily marketable. Large quantities of these finished products are being imported. At the present time there is a shipment in Montreal valued at $31,000 which was damaged by enemy action on its way from England. Other shipments come in from Australia. We do not object to importing from the sterling countries, but over and above these importations are the importations from the United States, and these take up United States exchange.

The constructive suggestion I have to make is that the activities of all the salvage organizations which work under the different departments of government should be coordinated. An inventory should be taken of everything available, and the industries already established should be given every encouragement. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will come into the picture now. He knows something about the salvage operations carried on under the treasury branch. These industries already established could be encouraged. If they were willing to extend or expand their facilities to take care of everything that came to their factory the government could then consider assisting them by allowing them to write off a substantial depreciation. We should not forget that the men operating these industries would have to make a substantial capital expenditure to expand their plants. This depreciation allowance could be 25 per cent or even 33⅓ per cent, but all returns over and above five per cent upon the capital investment might be returned to the government of Canada. This suggestion applies to the highly populated centres or areas in which an industry is operating at the present time. I might mention here that one is operating in British Columbia.

There are other places in Canada which present some difficulty because of freight rates. I refer to the three western provinces. Such an industry might very well be established in Moose Jaw. It would require coal, power, naphtha otherwise known as gasoline, and so on. The process is really a dry-cleaning process where gasoline is used to extract all matter which is of no value and thus place the product in condition to be finished. Fifty thousand dollars would be required for land and buildings, about $100,000 for machinery and $50,000 as working capital, a total of $200,000. Assurance would have to be given that the necessary priority orders would be given for the steel required and to permit the importation of the necessary machinery.

A similar industry could be established in the maritime provinces where at present there are no facilities to take care of these products. This plant could be established at Moncton or Sackville or Amherst at a similar cost. If $200,000 could be found in each of these places to establish such a plant, another $200,000 would be needed for the extension of plants already in existence in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec. This would mean a total investment of about $600,000. The return on the investment by saving these products which are being wasted to-day would gross about $1,000,000 per year. Perhaps I could break up these figures.

The cost of the materials necessary to produce that $1,000,000 worth would be $500,000. This means that by salvaging this waste material we would be putting into the treasury of Canada or into the national economy an amount of $500,000. The cost of production would be about 20 per cent, or $200,000. The management would cost about five per cent, or $50,000. Interest on the investment at five per cent would be another $50,000. Depreciation charges on the fixed assets at the rate agreed upon—I suggested 33⅓ per cent—taking the first asset of $500,000, would work out at about $150,000. This gives us a grand total of $950,000 on the cost side of the balance sheet versus $1,000,000 or even more on the sales side. The other five per cent or $50,000 could be taken by investors or returned to the administration. The common shareholders, those who had put up the original $500,000 or $600,000, could gamble as to whether or not they were making a few dollars for themselves.

I throw out this suggestion in order to bring it to the attention of citizens in the maritimes and the west hoping that they may see the possibilities of establishing an industry of this kind in their particular centres. What obtains in the civil life of this country with regard to salvage obtains in a greater degree in army camps. We all know that war is wasteful, and that there are no facilities of any real consequence to guard against waste in the particular areas that I mention.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that we have to bring the Minister of National Defence for Air back to the chamber to-day because in common with many of us he is suffering from a bad cold. But when I make these remarks I do so in the interests of our national economy and in anticipation of the discussion which will come on the report of the war expenditures committee.

When we make inquiries into the departments, please let it be understood that we are not criticizing these men who are in uniform. We are not trying to stir up something of a political nature. I do not like to be called a politician working for politics alone while there is a war on. I have a hide like a rhinoceros and I can take it, but it is all so unnecessary, and I am sure that not one of the twenty-four members of the committee will rise and say that during all the time I have been on the war expenditures committee I have ever mentioned politics. I know that politics is the science of government and all that eyewash and humbug. But there is a war on now; let us do all we possibly can to win it. I say that these gentlemen who are sometimes called, although I do not like to hear it, members of the Penguin club or of the fraternity of brass hats, should not be almost belligerent, as one member put it, when we ask them questions pertaining to their departments or inquire into what they are doing. If I go with a group of members of parliament to Petawawa camp to look into the situation there and see what we can do to help out, I do not want a brigadier to say to us, "What are you doing here?" And when I say, "We want to see this camp," I do not want to have him say, "You cannot do so now. The place is not so tidy." I think members of parliament should have some freedom to move about and see conditions, with a view to helping out the situation. I say to the Minister of National War Services that when I made a humble request to get some sort of pass to permit me to pass the guard at the gate so that I could go into these camps to see if I could be of service to them—not to snoop around and find out what was not right—I got this letter from the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) chairman of subcommittee No. 2—and as it is not marked "personal" I might as well read it. The request had been made that we members of parliament who were members of the committee might be permitted to go and visit the camps and look things over with a view to carrying on our war work as best we could. This was the reply I received under date of August 9, 1941:

I discussed with Mr. Thorson last evening your request to secure a pass that would enable you to enter certain buildings, camps, et cetera. He was of the opinion that no general pass can be secured.

I am sure that the Minister of National Defence for Air would give me a pass to go anywhere to look into anything.

Mr. POWER: Absolutely.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): But we do not know what needs remedying until we are permitted to see what exists. We are not trying to dig up anything of a scandalous nature. If I happen to be in his fair city of Quebec—and I am there very often—and have a few hours on my hands, surely I do not have to wire to Ottawa to get a military pass to go and see a camp at Quebec, and the same with every member of the House of Commons who is interested in any particular subject. Surely we are the brigadiers in this brigade. Well, if we are, let us function as such.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I wish to congratulate my good friend the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) upon his constructive speech. He and my hon. friend the member for Broadview (Mr. Church) have made eloquent speeches at this session. I particularly appreciate what the hon. member who has just spoken has said, also one of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Broadview regarding the information bureau.

There is another thing which should be said from the point of view of national defence, and it concerns the mobility of our defence. The air training plan from that point of view will prove very valuable to this country by permitting airmen to go quickly from one part of the country to the other. Of course our railways are operating at full capacity, but all communications between the various parts of Canada should be improved, and I may mention particularly communications between the St. Lawrence river and the United States.

Frequently I have urged the repair or reconstruction of that section of route 2 between Rivière du Loup and Edmundston, New Brunswick, and from Madawaska to Maine, on account of the necessity of improving our communication facilities between the St. Lawrence river and the United States. We have now three main highways: the Montreal highway, what is called the Sir Wilfrid Laurier highway; the Levis-Jackman route, and the Madawaska-Rivière du Loup-Edmundston route. So important is road communication that the province of Ontario has received in past years $14,500,000 from the dominion government for the trans-Canada route, while up until last spring the province of Quebec had received only $400,000. It is only fair that the province of Quebec should have its share of the amount granted by the dominion government to the provinces for the construction of that route. Of course it may be said that expenditures have to be curtailed during the war. But this is strictly a war proposition. It is essential that we have as many avenues of communication as possible. We shall need material from the United States not only for ourselves but also for Great Britain and our allies, Russia, for instance, and we shall need many first-class highways for that purpose as well as the railways.

I regret the establishment of two military camps, one at Montmagny, thirty miles from Quebec, and one at Rimouski, a considerable distance from Quebec. It would have been much easier to establish a military camp at Rivière du Loup, where there were a number of most suitable locations. It would have served a better purpose at much less expense, and it would have been much more convenient for the boys, too.

With regard to what the hon. member for Danforth has said, I must remind the members of the government that it is not only the large cities in this country that should have something to do in connection with war industries. In the rural districts you will find men who are skilful workers, but they are not considered as tradesmen just because they do not belong to some labour union. But hon. members who live in the country know that in the rural districts there are many men who can do wonderful work with metals and woods, and they only need the opportunity to be of service. The situation is difficult for rural people to-day. Many of them have had experience which they could turn to good account in our war effort but they have not the opportunity now to do what they would like to do for their country. Some are over military age but still in good health, and they are experienced workers. I think it would be an excellent thing for this country if our industrial war effort were decentralized. That would give these men who have leisure an opportunity to take part in our war effort.

At the same time it would give an opportunity to men who work all the time in cities to enjoy a little rest from their ordinary work. Of course there should be consideration and discussion between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the various war departments before coming to that conclusion. There are very important data in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Information should be obtained from there; it would prove extremely helpful to the war effort, by enabling skilled mechanics—carpenters and others—to do their share in this war effort at an age when they could not be accepted in the army. It would also give similar opportunities to young men who are not able to get into the army.

There is another thing. It is pretty difficult to establish a strict division between those who are healthy and those who are not. I understand that it is a main requirement of those who would enlist in the army that they must be healthy. That is only reasonable, because their task is hard, and they have to live under difficult conditions. But in industry also, including farming and the railways, we need many who are physically fit. I mentioned that the other day, and I will not enlarge upon it; I just repeat it in order that hon. members may have another opportunity to think about it. What do you think of having men who have passed the military age, or who are unfit physically to be firemen on the railways, to work in the metal industry, or even in the lumber industry? That could not be always satisfactory.

Before concluding, may I, in mentioning another subject, quote two speeches which were made on Friday last at the opening of the war relics exhibition. They express two different points of view. One was voiced by a layman; it reads thus:

> I can think of nothing more inspiring than to see these relics, in order that we may reach in ever-growing measure the conclusion that this is our war, that waiting for it to get to Montreal is the surest way to guarantee that it will come to Montreal, and that meeting it as Canadians want to meet it with everything we've got is the surest way of making certain that the kind of damage which is exemplified will not be done here.

That is one point of view, and it was expressed by a layman, Mr. Dunning. On the other hand, there was another speech made on the same occasion, by the officer commanding the military district of Montreal, which was diametrically opposed to that. He said:

> Menace Closer
> Speaking to the French audience, Brig.-Gen. E. deB. Panet, officer commanding military district No. 4, drew attention to the reports of submarines along the east coast of Canada.
> "The nazi menace is geting closer and closer to our shores", he warned.

This is a serious matter, and it is brought forward by one who has technical experience in the army. Of course, all army matters, like everything else, may be considered from the point of view of logic and common sense. The man in the street may pass his own judgment about what he finds, in any matter, not in conformity with logic and common sense. That is why judges at times have occasion to decide upon such purely technical matters as electricity, although the judges themselves are far from being electricians.

That being so, I hope that the minister will take careful note of what has been said by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) and myself regarding the establishment of industry, and that he will take note also of the suggestions regarding the necessity of improving the mobility of our defence, and that in due course they will prove helpful to this country. We cannot wait to organize the defence of this country. There are many things lacking in many respects. I will not enumerate them, because this is not the place to do so, and I did so privately the other day. I do not want to create trouble or anything of the sort, but I want this country to be well defended, and I can point my finger to many things which are deficient. This country must not be exposed in any respect. We—all the people of Canada—must be well-protected. That is the first duty of the Department of National Defence. This is the Department of National Defence of Canada, it is not a department of international defence of the world; it is a Canadian department for the defence of Canada, and whatever we can do after that for Great Britain and other allies, we will do it with great pleasure.

I would ask the minister to be kind enough to answer the question I put to him yesterday, namely, whether the extension of the training from four months indefinitely has been done by order in council or by the minister himself under his signature.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): If my hon. friend (Mr. Pouliot) will permit me, I will first refer to the observations of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). I appreciate his good-will and good intentions in saying what he did. I would be the last to assert that any of the defence departments were above criticism; and I entirely agree with him that, when hon. members criticize expenditure, waste, and duplication, they are not only within their rights but are only performing the duties for which they were sent here.

With respect to the salvage question I am fully aware that no one in this chamber is more familiar with the matter than my hon. friend. I have always felt personally that there was a great deal of waste in all military camps or camps of a military nature. That is almost inevitable; and anything which can be done to stop that waste will be to the best general interest of Canada.

Now, with regard to visiting the camps, let me put the other side of the case to my hon.

friend and to this committee. Personally I feel that any hon. member should be entitled to visit the camps whenever he pleases. But we ran into this kind of difficulty. Hon. members would go to see our air training camps, or perhaps our operational aerodromes on the coast, and bring with them a party of ten or fifteen women and children. That involves an officer or more, a staff, really, at the station having to be detailed to look after them and see that they do not run into propellers, and so on. If we were always certain that the member would go by himself or with a small party, or accompanied only by persons of whom he could take full charge and responsibility, there would be much less difficulty. But we have had that kind of trouble, and the officers of the air stations particularly, where we have been up to the present and still are in a bit of a hurry to get our men out, and do not like to have the training interrupted, sometimes felt that it was perhaps a bit too much when we must detail someone to look after tourists. But as a broad general principle I entirely agree with my hon. friend that the members of this house are the representatives of the people, they have their responsibility, they should know what is going on and they should certainly have fullest permission to visit any station, any training camp, and, as far as the limits of safety permit, any of the munitions plants we have.

The hon. member for Témiscouata yesterday asked me some questions. He asked me with regard to the religious service for the Roman Catholics at Pennfield Ridge. I inquired and have a report from Rev. Monsignor Charest, the senior Roman Catholic chaplain in the air force, which I forwarded to my hon. friend personally. The sum and substance of it is that there is a shortage of Roman Catholic chaplains in that particular district, but we hope to overcome that shortage within a short time.

A further question asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata was on what authority training was extended, first from one month to four months and then from four months to an indefinite period. The hon. member said:

> If he (the minister) is good enough to-morrow to tell me whether it was done by order in council, or done under the minister's signature, by virtue of the regulations, that will be sufficient.

The enabling statutory authority for the calling out of men is contained in section 2, chapter 13, statutes of Canada, 4 George VI, assented to on June 21st, 1940:

> An act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council for the mobilization of natural resources in the present war.

[Mr. Power.]

Section 2 reads as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of section three hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

Section 3 of the act states:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

Under the authority of the act and under these regulations, order in council 4904 was passed on September 17, 1940, and published in the Canada Gazette on September 21, 1940. The period of thirty days' training is referred to in clause 5 (f), which states:

> Upon his being so posted to a corps of the non-permanent active militia, a man shall forthwith undergo training for a period of thirty days, or for such other period as the Minister of Defence may from time to time prescribe, unless he is required for service or duty. Thereafter, so long as he remains a member of the non-permanent active militia, he shall be liable to perform such training, service or duty, but only within Canada and the territorial waters thereof, as the minister of defence may from time to time require.

It will be noted in the above and following clauses that the minister of defence is empowered not only to prescribe or amend the period of training, but also to prescribe the liability of each man so called out to perform such training service or duty as the minister may require, within Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

By order in council P.C. 1910, dated March 18, 1941, clause 8 (f), the thirty-day period was amended as follows:

> Upon so becoming a member of the active militia each "R recruit" shall forthwith undergo training for a period of four months, or for such other period as the minister of defence may from time to time prescribe, unless in the meantime he is required for service or duty.

In pursuance of the authority granted to the governor in council by the statute and of the delegation of such authority in the two orders in council referred to above, the Minister of National Defence issued the following order, which was signed at Ottawa on July 2, 1941, and published as an appendix to Canadian Army Order No. 132 of July 10, 1941:

> Requirement for service, duty or additional training in respect of men called out in pursuance of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

In pursuance of the powers vested in me by Section 8 (f) of Reserve Army (Special) Regulations, 1941, as made and established by order in council dated March 18, 1941, P.C. 1910, and amendments thereto, I, the undersigned Minister of National Defence, do hereby require all men now undergoing training in pursuance of the said section 8 (f), and all men who hereafter may be called out for training pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and who, under and by virtue of section 8 (d) of the said Reserve Army (Special) Regulations, 1941, have become or will become members of the active militia, to perform service, duty or additional training on the completion of such training for which they were called out, or on the termination of any postponement of such service, duty or additional training, but only within Canada and the territorial waters thereof, and for the period of the duration of the war existing on the 21st day of June, 1940, except when from time to time during such period I may not require them to perform such service, duty or additional training.

Dated at Ottawa, Ontario, this second day of July, A.D. 1941.

(Sgd.) J. L. Ralston,
Minister of National Defence.

Also published in Canadian army order No. 132 is the following order of the Minister of National Defence, concerning the further training, service or duty of thirty-day recruits:

Requirement for training, service or duty in respect of men called out in pursuance of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Thirty-day Recruits

In pursuance of the power vested in me by Section 5, subsection (f) of Militia (Special) Regulations 1940, as made and established by order in council dated September 17, 1940, and amendments thereto, I, the undersigned Minister of National Defence, do hereby require those men who were called out under The National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, being Chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada 1940, and now enrolled in the active militia, and who have undergone training under and by virtue of Militia (Special) Regulations 1940, to perform further training, service or duty in such numbers and at such times as I may from time to time require for the period of the duration of the state of war existing on the 21st day of June, 1940, but only within Canada and the territorial waters thereof, except when from time to time I may not require them to perform such training, service or duty.

Dated at Ottawa, Ontario, this 30th day of June, A.D. 1941.

(Sgd.) J. L. Ralston,
Minister of National Defence.

The Canadian army order No. 132 and appendix were approved by the war committee of the cabinet at its meeting held on April 23, 1941.

Mr. POULIOT: Was it published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend asked me if I recollected by what machinery the period of training became four months. That machinery was an order in council published in the Canada Gazette. Subsequently, under the powers conferred upon the minister in pursuance of the authority granted to the governor in council by the statute, and the delegation of such authority by the two orders in council, the minister issued an order which was published as a Canadian army order. I could not say offhand whether that appeared in the Canada Gazette or not.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not think so. The Minister of National Defence told me that the orders are not available to hon. members, although they could get them at any bookstore. I find it very strange, because there is an order in council to the effect that each member is entitled to a French and English copy of all publications. But I am delighted that the text of the order has at last been made public. But what I cannot understand is that the principle delegatus non potest delegare has been overlooked. The government has been delegated some powers by parliament, and therefore under the militia act and the Borden act, every regulation of the kind is made by order in council. Of course the minister is in charge of the department. I find it hard to think that the minister could change by his own signature and under his own authority what has previously been decided by order in council, and though the order in council gives him a free hand—

Mr. POWER: For service or duty. He has always had authority under all acts to call the militia out for service or duty.

Mr. POULIOT: But it has been done in a strange way, the minister will probably admit. If the principle that the delegate cannot delegate is overlooked to that extent, then the minister will be able to transfer his authority to someone else, and what will be the end of it? The only way to save the situation would be to make public, by inserting them in the Canada Gazette, all orders of the kind made by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the minister tell us how many of the 110,209 men who were serving overseas in various theatres of war as of October 25 last were in the army, how many were in the navy, and how many were in the air force? Would he tell us also, if he can, how many of those men were serving in the British isles in the various branches of the service?

Mr. POWER: The 110,209 men were all in the army. I will not tell my hon. friend how many I have in the air force overseas; I am not allowed to do so. I will not tell my hon. friend how many of the overseas men are in the British isles, in Newfoundland or elsewhere; I am not allowed to tell him that either.

Mr. HAZEN: This is all the army, then?

Mr. POWER: The 110,209 men are all the army. The navy and air force are separate and apart from that.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to ask the minister a question having to do with leave for trainees. As I understand the matter, when a man is called up for training the divisional board has power to grant him at least one postponement, for a period not exceeding six months. After he is called up and starts his training, however, the divisional board has no further jurisdiction; the man then comes under the military authority.

The circumstances of a man may vary greatly from the time he is called up until he completes his training. I have in mind an instance of this kind. A man may have been on a farm with his father; they were working the farm between them. During the course of his training his father dies. There is no help employed on the farm; the soldier is the only one who can take charge, but he is now under the authority not of the divisional board but of the army. In these circumstances how does he go about applying for leave? Does he apply to his commanding officer; and, if so, does the commanding officer have to forward that application to a higher authority? A further question arises: does his commanding officer or any higher authority have to regard the matter in the same rather judicial light as that in which the divisional board would examine it? Would they take into account all the facts underlying the application and give them full consideration, or would they perhaps be activated or influenced more by their desire to have another man added to their strength? Is that matter being considered?

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether this is simply a hypothetical case, but if it is a case of which the hon. member has knowledge I should like to ask the officers of the department to have a look at it. Broadly speaking I would say that as soon as the man is ordered by the registrar to report he comes under the jurisdiction of the army. Then so far as I know there is nothing to prevent his commanding officer from granting him compassionate leave. As to what attitude the commanding officer will take with regard to the man under his control, again that depends on the commanding officer. I see sitting opposite me the hon. member for Royal. I should say he might allow his compassionate feelings to sway his judgment; and in all probability if he were the commanding officer in a case like this the application would be granted. I know other men who would not do that, but I think the same argument might be applied to the divisional registrar. I do not think a man would become more hard boiled just because he happened to put on a uniform. Each case would have to be judged on its merits. I am sorry I cannot give any better answer than that.

Mr. BROOKS: Just before the minister rose I made a note on my pad that the man would be granted leave on compassionate grounds. That is the usual thing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last evening I directed a question to the minister in regard to the imposition of the national defence tax on pensions. I should like to ascertain now from the minister what is the attitude of the department.

Mr. POWER: I did intend to answer my hon. friend last evening, but so many hon. members were interested in discussing other matters that I never got round to it.

I will say that the statement made by my hon. friend is correct. At one time, for some reason or other—I do not think a ruling was ever given by the income tax branch to the effect that the defence tax would not be collectable from pensions—certainly the intimation went out pretty well all through the Department of Pensions and National Health to people interested that pensions would be exempt from the defence tax. As a matter of fact the national defence tax is deducted when the pension of a single person is $660 a year or more, or in the case of a married person when it is $1,200 or more. The pensioner is required to declare his pension as part of his income, and it is taxed the same way as any other income.

I happen to know something about how this question bears on income tax. It has rather a peculiar history. When the income tax act was introduced in 1917, military pensions and workmen's compensation payments, which really resemble military pensions to some extent, were exempt from tax. That situation continued down through the years. In 1933, however, as the result of some agitation in the country to the effect that the pension bill was a heavy burden on the people of Canada, in discussions between the government of that day and the returned soldiers' organizations it was pretty well agreed that pensions should be made subject to income tax. That did not affect very many people, practically only those who had other income which brought them into the taxable brackets, which in those days were pretty high. I remember making strenuous efforts with various ministers of finance to have what I thought was something iniquitous and perhaps incongruous removed from the statute book. As a matter of fact the amount of money collected was insignificant. According to the figures I obtained from the income tax branch, during 1935, 1936 and 1937, when I was Minister of Pensions and National Health, it amounted to only some $30,000 or $40,000 a year, which was hardly worth while when compared to the immense amount of money then collected in income tax. Strangely enough, persons in Canada drawing British pensions, such as Canadians who had served in the Royal Air Force in the last war, did not have their pensions subject to the Canadian income tax. It was a peculiar situation; if I am not mistaken they were not subject even to the British income tax. It was an anomalous position, but perhaps because of negligence the matter was never remedied and we entered this war with that income tax provision still on the statute book, which I presume would apply also to the defence tax.

I agree with my hon. friend that if at all possible this situation should be remedied. I promise to use whatever influence I can exert on my colleagues, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance, to see if that cannot be done. It really is not a very sensible tax, to pay out with one hand and take away with the other, particularly since the basis of pension is compensation for the loss of earning power through disability. When a person gets forty per cent pension, it is because he has lost forty per cent of his earning capacity. He is in exactly the same position as one receiving workmen's compensation, and should be treated in the same way.

Perhaps I can answer some of the questions put to me last night, which I was not then in a position to answer. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke of the treatment received by soldiers in camp who happened to become sick. He said that when a soldier reports sick he is sent to his battalion medical officer, that he gets medicine on duty —probably the hon. member meant medicine with duty—that there was practically no examination, and that in some cases there was a fine of twenty-five cents for reporting sick. The answer is that there is no regulation which authorizes any fine for reporting sick. If particulars of the case met with can be given, action will be taken at once to investigate the irregularity.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) made the suggestion that the age limit of veterans be increased from forty-five to fifty years. I have a reply here, signed by the adjutant general, that on October 23, 1941, approval was given to increase the age limit to fifty years, and to lower to C the medical category required for enlistment in the reserve army.

Then, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who is now leading the opposition, asked certain questions. He wanted to know what composes the fourth and sixth divisions, and in how many personnel they are deficient. It is suggested that the following answer be given:

The nominal establishment strength of the fourth division, together with the three brigade groups of the sixth division, is 29,122 all ranks. As of the 18th October, 1941, the total deficiencies in personnel of these two formations together amounted to 5,250 all ranks.

Then, I take it this is a slap on the wrist for me:

In view of standing orders concerning security, which apply to United Kingdom forces as well as to our own, it is not considered in the public interest to reveal (a) the order of battle of any formation; (b) the number and character of units in any operational formation and (c) the establishment strength in officers and other ranks of any operational formation.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) referred to deductions from small monthly payments by the soldier settlement board. The answer is, referring to the question asked by the hon. member, that deductions for small monthly payments to the soldier settlement board are provided for under privy council order No. 138, 1936, which provides that compulsory deductions are only allowable when the dependents are occupying the farm or house.

This matter was investigated recently, and it was found that there were only thirty-eight such deductions. The average amount of $15 was considered reasonable when looked upon as rent. This is the only compulsory deduction which is allowed against dependents' allowances.

Mr. PERLEY: They must be all in Saskatchewan.

Mr. POWER: I believe that completes the list of questions. There may have been others, but I believe they have been answered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one anomaly to which I suggest consideration should be given. I have in mind the provision I have already brought to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. The provision now in effect is this: A soldier discharged prior to July 1, 1941, may make application for pension, and his application may be turned down. He may then launch an appeal, but he will receive no gratuities or assistance during the time he is awaiting the outcome of the appeal. Similar cases have now come to my attention respecting men who returned from overseas service, arrived in Canada prior to July 1, 1941, and have been discharged and denied a pension. The instance I have in mind at the moment is that of a man resident in my own constituency who returned from overseas prior to the date mentioned, and who to-day is living in a state of destitution because he can get no assistance whatsoever. He cannot obtain relief because of the attitude of the municipal authorities, who take the view that he is a charge on the federal government.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Is he pensionable?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: His application for pension was turned down. The circumstances in connection with his case were these. He went on leave at Christmas, 1941, while in England. The pension authorities take the position that he was injured at that time. His claim is that he was injured on service on November 11, 1939, in England. He has returned to Canada, and to-day he is living in a state of destitution.

I know about the sympathetic attitude of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, but here is an arbitrary position that is doing harm to recruiting throughout my constituency. It is only one instance, but I suggest that consideration should be given by the government to the removal of that anomalous provision. Why should the date have been set as at July 1, 1941? Why should it not have been set earlier, so as to cover every possible contingency? This man cannot get work because he is unable to work, and he cannot get relief because of the attitude of the municipal authorities that he is a charge on the government of Canada. There he stays, with his wife and family, living in the town under circumstances which will constitute a detriment to recruiting, and which are most unfair to a man who tried to give his best services, but who has been returned to Canada as a result of circumstances over which he had no control.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I presume my hon. friend is referring to the case he brought to my attention yesterday. It is being thoroughly investigated.

The date of July 1, 1941, was inserted in the order in council of October 1 to make its operation parallel with that of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That, of course, deals with a separate phase of reestablishment, in various instances.

Those awaiting decision with respect to pensions are, so long as they are in hospital, entitled to pay and allowances for their families until pensionability has been determined. This applies to the first hearing. I do not believe provision has yet been made as to pensionability while they are awaiting the second hearing. We are now considering making a provision for pay and allowances to families over a period of four months, and I believe that would meet the case mentioned by the hon. member. This, however, has not yet been approved by council.

Mr. DUPUIS: The instance referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) brings to my mind a number of cases I have been in a position to study. I have in mind particularly one which came to my attention recently. It had to do with a soldier who enlisted in the early days of the war, went to England and came back disabled. It was impossible for him to work, because his health was completely ruined. The report shows that his request for pension was refused on the ground that his disability was caused by a defect which existed prior to enlistment. I wonder if the government and the department would study this point and consider adopting the principle that when a recruit is accepted it is presumed he is in good health. There are many cases in which the pension board refuses a pension on the ground that the disability had its origin before enlistment. I have pleaded many cases before the boards and at all times the onus of proof is upon the soldier; he must prove that he was in good health when he enlisted. The particular case I have in mind covers a soldier who told me that he was placed in category A-1. A man placed in that category should be considered to be in good health, and it would be good policy for this government, or for this country—it is not a question of party; it is something that concerns the country as a whole—to decide that as soon as a man is accepted it is presumed that he is in good health.

Mr. ROWE: I want to add a word or two to what the hon. member has said. I am in full agreement with his suggestion that when a soldier enlists he should be assumed to be in good health. I have long felt that the responsibility should not be upon the returned man to prove his case when applying for pension. Nothing will do more to deter enlistments than a continuation of the treatment which has been given in many cases.

It is a long time since the last great war, and quite often it is difficult for a soldier to produce sufficient evidence to support his claim. He may have lost some papers, or he may have been in poor health for years before deciding to put in a claim. Often a man was too proud to put in a claim for compensation and he goes on for years until his health is ruined and he finds himself unable to provide a living for his wife and family. In many cases men have passed on perhaps fifteen and twenty years sooner than they otherwise would.

The government should consider making a change in the treatment of returned soldiers, not only those who came back from the last war but those who will return from this war. I hope the government will carry out its announced intention of granting a cost of living bonus to the pensioners of his majesty's forces. If we are to have equality of service all down the line it is high time we realized that if the man getting $5, $6 or $7 a day is entitled to a cost of living bonus, the dependents of the man receiving only $1.30 a day should receive a similar bonus. This is only fair if we are to have equality of service and the unity of which we hear so much. If we are to have the all-out war effort we are aspiring to, we must pull in the loose ends and realize that, even though there may be strong groups or associations which do not like this idea, even though it may be politically unpopular here or there, even though there are those who say that the returned soldiers' dependents and other pensioners are getting enough now, we must look at the picture as it is. If we are to have equality of service and an all-out war effort we must give fairness in treatment and an all-out square deal to those who are winning this war.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want to associate myself with the remarks which have just been made. I should like to have some information as to the connection there may be between men who are in the category outlined this afternoon and unemployment insurance. There seems to be an impression about that these men are to be taken care of—that is, those who are not able to establish their right to a pension.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not the full tabulation under my hand, but it will be recalled that after this session convened a copy of the order in council itself, along with an explanatory memorandum, was sent to every hon. member. The basic and fundamental reason for this order in council was to establish the principle that anyone who enlisted for overseas service would not lose as compared with the civilian who was engaged in an insured occupation. The time spent by a man in the forces will count, and there will be a contribution by the treasury. As my hon. friend will recall, benefits were also provided for occupational training, for industrial training, for university or professional training, and also for those who could not get into insured occupations. These might be termed out of work benefits. The men would be given credit for their service and would draw benefits while awaiting employment. There is a further provision in the order in council covering those who might come back from overseas and who in the opinion of those who were supervising the provisions of the order in council could be reconditioned—someone objected yesterday to the use of that word, but that is the only one that I can think of—made over again for industrial life. These men would be given benefits while they were being reconditioned. Briefly speaking, these are the important provisions of the order in council.

Mr. LOCKHART: I suggest to the minister that these provisions be put into effect as quickly as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are in effect now. That is why we passed them by order in council.

Mr. ROWE: Has the government considered giving special preference in the civil service to men who enlist voluntarily for overseas service as compared with those who might be conscripted for home service where there is not likely to be any fighting?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a preference clause in all government contracts covering ex-service men of the old war or of the present war. During the second or third day of the present session I tabled an order in council which extended the provisions of the Civil Service Act having to do with ex-service men of the great war to ex-service men of this war, with the limitation that they must have resided in Canada before enlisting in the present war.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I hear many rumblings about me; members are asking how long this is going to continue, how long they are going to be kept here. I have been sitting here since November 3, wondering just what benefits the country and the government itself have derived from what has taken place in this house. What have we learned, I would ask, that we did not know before from the press releases furnished by the information bureau? We get them every other day or so, and incidentally I think there is a considerable waste of money there.

Frankly I think this parliament should have prorogued and we should have entered upon a new session. It would have saved all this discussion which is going on across the floor of this house and which will all be gone over again next January. As it is now, private members have no rights, no resolutions to discuss, and there are no bills before the house. True, we have the privilege of questioning members of the government, and we have had five pretty fair statements from five members of the cabinet. Some of them were quite lengthy. They gave some information, but a lot of it was in our possession already through the press releases from the information bureau.

I deem it my duty to make one or two observations on our war effort, and I shall try to be constructive. We often hear the phrase repeated, "an all-out war effort" or "a 100 per cent war effort." I believe the Canadian people are not all convinced that we are having an all-out war effort, and to prove that the Canadian people are looking for a greater effort I should like to quote from resolutions I have here. One is from a large organization in the west. In a letter which I have just received they state that they passed a resolution asking that members of parliament insist forthwith the passing of the necessary measures to place Canada on a total or all-out war effort. They go on to state what they mean by that. They mean the complete mobilization of all industry and everything else, even the intellectual resources of Canada. The Canadian Legion is already on record for an all-out war effort. Before I came to Ottawa this session I was put on the spot by the branch of the Canadian Legion in my constituency, and I did not hesitate to agree with some of the things which they advocate should be done in order to have an all-out war effort in Canada.

Let me review our war effort as I see it as a lay member, so to speak. Since we entered the war in 1939, our war effort has developed in three phases. The first two years of the war were the development period. We were building factories, developing plant capacity. That required a lot of men, a lot of work, a lot of complicated machinery and tools. We now have these factories, some of which have received large financial assistance from the government, running in the aggregate into hundreds of millions of dollars. These plants are all interlocked, so to speak. Not one of them is producing a complete tank or aeroplane, for instance, but is engaged in manufacturing component parts. They are all interlocked, and as I said a moment ago, the government has contributed to their establishment hundreds of millions of dollars. There may have been mistakes made and waste in many instances. We had a committee of this house set up to inquire into government expenditures. I shall not comment upon its report, but it is only fair to say that under no government could all this development work have been done without mistakes and some waste. It is the duty of parliament and of the government now to tighten up on waste. That was the development phase.

The second phase is production. It is now necessary for the government to see that all these factories engaged on war work click, work in unison, work together as a unit. I have heard rumblings as to what is going on, that there is not the unison there might be. It is the duty of the government to see that these war plants click. The Minister of Munitions and Supply referred to that matter the other day. He said that the production of one gun or one tank might take one month, that in the second or third month six might be produced, in the fourth or fifth month, thirty-six, and I believe we have now reached the stage where we might produce 336 in a month if the government would see that these plants are clicking.

The third phase is the output of materials and a system of priorities. Tremendous production capacity has been provided. I think it is only fair to the government to say that. But now it is up to the government to see that the materials required are provided. I have in my hand a little pamphlet entitled, "Priorities and Controls in Canada" which I think it would be well for every hon. member to read. We are now at the stage where there is a strain on the capacity of the organizations which are producing materials such as steel, brass and copper. We are now in this third phase, producing the materials which are necessary. But we must have coordination so that one plant will not hold another one up.

Since the start of the war training schools have been set up. I think that is right, and a great deal of good work has been done by the schools. The men are now ready to come out of these training schools and go into factories wherever they may be required. I believe it is the duty of the government to enrol and train more men in these training schools. But the government also has a responsibility to see to the proper distribution of these men.

At this stage surely there should be no more strikes in Canada. We are at war; it is a very serious war, and strikes should not be permitted to interfere with our war effort.

Since the war broke out, we of the opposition in this house have been responsible to a considerable degree in bringing our war effort up to its present stage, by pepping up the government, jacking them up by constructive criticism. At the very outset of the war our leader said that as far as he and the group he represents were concerned we would support the war effort at all times and give constructive, helpful criticism, and I believe that considerable credit for what has been accomplished is due to the opposition and the constructive suggestions they have offered.

Mr. MARTIN: Why don't you keep your good leader? We all like him.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member can speak after I have finished. I have said very little during the last two weeks, and I am trying to suggest something that might be helpful to the government and its war effort.

From what we have heard from different ministers, there has been a shortage of recruits for the armed forces. Men are not available. By all military authorities whom I have heard or have seen quoted it is agreed, I believe, that we must have more men in the forces both to attack and to hold the ground after the attack. Those who have had the opportunity and privilege of going overseas and seeing what is going on there say that men are needed. All of them may not have said so publicly; there is a lot of secrecy in connection with this business: maybe the delegation which is now on its way back will have something more to tell us.

It is the government's responsibility to protect the projects which they have assisted, the factories and industrial organizations which they have helped to bring to the point of production, by providing them with the men needed to do the job in the factories. The other important job is to provide for the needs of the armed forces. I believe there are enough men in Canada to take care of both, but the situation now is rather like this, that if ten men who are roaming the streets have it put up to them that there are two great jobs to be done, what is going to happen if all of them say, "We will go into the army", or if they all say, "We will go into industrial plants to make good wages"? I say, therefore, that it is up to the government to protect both these two great activities by seeing that there is a proper distribution of men.

That brings me to the point that I think there must be some plan and some direction given by the government. Those men who are not now in the forces or even in the trainees' camps must have direction. Let me illustrate. There is Mr. Jones out in Saskatchewan; he is a farmer and he has a crop to take off; he has five or six new binders, and there are five or six men for the job. Suppose he had not the power of direction, to say to the six men, "Get on these six binders and complete the job". The men might say, "Oh, the heck with it"; perhaps three would say, "We are not going to get on the binders," and the others might decide that they would wait for the threshing season, or one or two might make up their minds to wait until the farmer was trucking it out, because that is where the money is. If he were without power of direction to put the six men to work at the right spot, the crop would be ruined, perhaps by snowstorms—we have had a lot of them this fall. But if he had the power to say, "You get on to that job", the job would be completed properly and in time. I say that that is what the government should do now. They have the power. To my mind the only way in which it can be done is by a system of selective national service.

We have arrived at the point that the government have the responsibility to protect the industries which they have assisted with millions of money and which are now tooled up and ready to go. They are the only ones who can give the direction we need in Canada to-day. I for one do not care how it is done, or whether it is done by this government or some other government. This is the suggestion that I have to make: use selective national service and get to work on the job.

Mr. MUTCH: It seems to me that in the last little while we have wandered a long way from the Department of National Defence. Is the minister now in a position to answer questions in his capacity of minister for air? If he is, I would recall the statement which he made the other day, when, speaking in this chamber, he mentioned the unconditional nature of enlistment in the Royal Canadian Air Force, and referred to the fact that all those who enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force enlisted for service wherever they were sent. Would he care to expand that statement a little bit about the liability of ground crews, and many others in the service, for service anywhere? I do not think that is generally understood.

Mr. POWER: In the air force there is not any such thing as enlisting for home defence or for the defence of Canada. Just by way of digression, at one time there was a suggestion that certain Free Frenchmen would like to enlist on the condition that they should not fight against their own country. I did not think that was advisable. I said that if they enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force they would go wherever they were told and fight wherever they were asked to fight. I can quite understand their feelings in the matter, and I do not think those who did feel like enlisting were deterred by that reply.

Some time last summer it was decided that, instead of sending overseas only aircrew, that is those who man the aircraft on actual operations, we would also send over a number of men to carry on ground duties, to maintain the aircraft and do work as aero-engine mechanics and all the various duties that go with the care and maintenance of aeroplanes. We have been sending such men overseas and shall continue to do so. In view of the number of our squadrons overseas, I expect that before long there will be several thousand ground crew also over there, and any one in the Royal Canadian Air Force, in any one of the categories, is liable to be called upon to go overseas at any time.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to make a few remarks at this time. The city of Toronto is in military district No. 2, and a number of regiments are there. One battery of artillery is being formed by our famous former manager of the hockey team, Connie Smythe, and he is doing a magnificent job, but he is finding it very difficult to get men. Great efforts are being put forward to get recruits, and many people are helping, but the thing which disturbs me more than anything else is, what will happen when we cannot get them? Yesterday I listened with great interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he made his statement to the House of Commons, and I was very much disappointed at his closing remarks, when, speaking of conscription for overseas service, he said:

> So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

The Prime Minister has told us that he has a mandate from the people to lead this country during war time. He has told us that we must fight an all-out war and that we must have an all-out effort. The Prime Minister must take the full responsibility for fighting this all-out war and exerting this all-out effort. He must take such steps from day to day, even from hour to hour, as may be necessary for the safety of the state. Now is the time for the Prime Minister to lead this country in the light of all the information which he has and the information which he has obtained from the Prime Minister of Great Britain and from Mr. Roosevelt. The members of this house should in some way be enlightened as to what information he has so that we can understand why he still takes the stand he does. Does the mother of parliaments not have closed sessions every three or four weeks where information is disclosed to the members? Is it not better and more helpful if such information is disclosed to the members of the house? We are in dire peril these days; I think the Prime Minister knows that. We ought to be told how dire the peril is. We know what Hitler proposed to do; we know how he has carried out his plan. Do we believe it?

The defence of Britain is the defence of Canada, and our Canadian soldiers are taking part in that defence. We cannot let them down. How can a population of forty to fifty million people provide the men for ultimate victory? That is the population which Great Britain has to draw on. The combined efforts of all the nations of the commonwealth as well as all the democracies of the world are going to be needed to do this job. We must do our part. It is not a party matter; it is not a political matter; it is a national life and death struggle. The Prime Minister must put into force fearlessly and regardless of criticism and of party those policies which will be best for the preservation of Canada, knowing full well that the Canadian people and this parliament will back him up.

He has been urged from time to time to form a national government, but has refused and has given his reasons. He has taken into his non-parliamentary ranks many prominent men of varying and non-political views, and a certain amount of satisfaction has been obtained from that. The public have been satisfied to a certain extent. But party lines are different now. Old differences such as tariffs, et cetera, mean little to-day. The major differences can be only between those who are for an all-out war effort and those who are not. The knowledge of the truth will come to all eventually, but if the Prime Minister waits for it to come to all before acting, it may be too late.

Are there any who still disbelieve Hitler's programme laid down in Mein Kampf? Many thought he was a mad fool in 1936, 1937, 1938, even up to 1939, but he put into practice the plan set down in his book. The conquest of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Norway, Yugoslavia, Greece, Roumania, almost all on time. It is true his time-table was held up by the valiant Poles and Greeks and some of the others to a certain extent. The Russians are doing the job now, and we cannot let them down.

I ask the question, who comes next? There is no doubt he will attempt an invasion of England. It will fail. Then the forces of right, including those of Canada, must be prepared to invade Hitler's domain, fight him to a finish and smash him once and for all. We must prepare now. Mr. Churchill yesterday told us that by 1943 we shall be able to invade the continent. We must be ready. What is the alternative, if we do not go on and smash this man Hitler? The axe will hang over our heads until it is done. Are we not in the same position as Great Britain? Are we to be outdone by that great, indomitable leader, Winston Churchill? He said:

> If the battle is to be won we must provide our men with ever-increasing quantities of weapons and ammunition. We must have quickly more aeroplanes, more tanks, guns, shells. There is imperious need for these vital munitions, and then in the emergency we shall not hesitate to take every step, even the most drastic, to call forth from our people the last ounce, the last inch of effort of which we are capable.
> The interest of property, the hours of labour, are nothing compared with the struggle for life and honour, for right and freedom, to which we have vowed ourselves.

Have we not vowed ourselves to the same principles? Are our interests any different? I say now that we as Canadians must not hesitate; that the Prime Minister can and should lead this country and that the people will follow him, regardless of how drastic the action required. There has been no hesitation on the part of the government in bringing in drastic legislation, in fact revolutionary legislation, by order in council. I have no doubt that the people would have accepted this legislation perhaps a little better than they have—they have accepted it very well, but it would have been better to bring it in as legislation on the floor of the house so that it could be discussed. There might be useful information brought out and possibly a few changes made.

There must be equality of sacrifice and service in this mobilization of our full human and material resources for whatever eventuality, each man in his right place. The welfare and safety of Canadians, of the British commonwealth of nations, yes, of the whole world, are at stake. This must override our traditional individual choice of action.

I have hesitated to speak before, feeling that the Prime Minister, by reason of his words spoken so often in his appeals to the people that he intended to have a total effort, that we must have a total effort, must fight a total war, would, when the time came, make good these words with action. I cannot say how disappointed I am that the Prime Minister is not willing to take the full responsibility for this total effort, as he told us yesterday.

Hon. PIERRE FRANÇOIS CASGRAIN (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but after listening to some of the speeches that have been delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite I feel it my duty to express my views to this parliament and the country.

A great many members of this House of Commons are advocating a total war effort and are seeking, both within and without this house, to promote the idea of conscription for service overseas. Let them not contradict me; that is what they want. We are in this parliament as representatives of the people of this country. During the campaign preceding the last general election the Canadian people were made acquainted with the aims and aspirations of every party. At that time the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific were told that no party, including the Liberal and Conservative parties, was in favour of conscription for service overseas. Therefore the mandate given the Liberal party to govern the affairs of the country during this war was given on the principle of voluntary service. Parliament has no mandate to change this policy now without consulting the people. Canadians have not changed their minds; they still approve the present programme of the government. There have been several by-elections throughout the country, at which Liberal candidates have been elected by large majorities, which proves that the policy of this government still has the support of the people. At the last by-election held in Alberta the hon. member for Edmonton East received a real mandate from the people of that constituency; and her campaign was conducted on the slogan, "No graft and no partisanship." That showed a real approval of the actions and policies of this government.

Hon. gentlemen opposite now seem to want compulsory enlistment for overseas service. I say the great majority of the Canadian people do not want it, and I know the vast majority of the population of the province from which I come are against it. The other day I listened with great attention to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who referred to the absence from this house of the right hon. leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, the gallant hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who at present is ill, and also to the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who is away for the same reason. I am not going to try to speak for those hon. gentlemen, but I am going to speak as one representing the province of Quebec. I can say that the entire population of that province is as one in supporting the policies of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The feeling of the province of Quebec is that we should follow the provisions of the mobilization act that was adopted about a year ago; and my compatriots in Quebec are ready to serve anywhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific in the defence of our country, which is a sacred duty and obligation which all decent Canadians understand. Up to the present that mobilization act has done all that it was expected to do; according to the speeches of the ministers of defence, within the last six months 105,773 men enlisted in the army, the navy and air force, which I think is a very good record. In addition we have some 110,000 of our compatriots serving in England, ready to go into action whenever their services may be required. The right hon. Prime Minister was in England only recently; he saw our men over there and has reported, as has been stated in the press throughout Canada, that at the present time there is no body of men in England better equipped than the Canadian corps. At the time of Dunkirk in 1940 the only corps in England equipped and ready to face the enemy was the Canadian corps.

These are facts of which we should be proud. Under the policies of the present government, since the beginning of the war we have been able to bring about these results and it has been made known throughout the world that Canada is doing its full share and will continue to do so. Under the mobilization act the government has at its disposal adequate forces for the defence of the country, wherever they may be required and provision has been made whereby those who of their own free will wish to serve overseas, for the defence of the empire at large, are permitted to do so.

Before it could be agreed that the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite were true and ought to be considered seriously, it would have to be shown that the mobilization act and the laws of the land had not brought about the results which were expected. Far from that being the situation, I say, and I do not believe I can be contradicted, that at the present time we have in England an army consisting of four divisions and one tank brigade. With all the Canadians who have enlisted in the air force, the navy and the other services, I believe we have about twelve divisions compared with the four divisions we had in the last war. I think that is a brilliant record, of which we should all be proud.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely the hon. gentleman cannot say we have twelve divisions, if he knows what a division is.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is another point I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members. Sometimes people wish to make it seem that the province from which I come has not done its full share. I do not say that these people point directly at us and single us out, but they claim that if recruiting is not as active as they would like it, that has been due to lack of interest in the affairs of the country and because our people have not done what they should. I wish to say most emphatically that the people of Quebec have responded to the call to the best of their ability; and if some changes had been made and improvements brought about, the response would have been even better. Only yesterday I read in one of the Ottawa newspapers a letter signed by a former member of this house, Mrs. George Black, who said:

> With extreme regret, as well as great annoyance, I have noted a growing habit of accusing Quebec of lack of loyalty to Canada and the empire, because of an aversion to compulsory military service.
> Probably no member of parliament, with his wife, does of necessity cover more of Canada from the far north to the east than do George Black, M.P. for Yukon, and I. In our many trips across Canada, we have observed as much apathy and lack of enthusiasm for active service in the armed forces of Canada in other provinces as in Quebec.
> Let us of the other parts of this dominion forget our smug complacency and force ourselves to realize that Quebec is as loyal as the other provinces.
> We are component parts of a great empire. Let each one do his, or her, part to unite Canada in support of that empire, forgetting petty racial and religious prejudices. We must work, we must fight for the right to worship one God, to be loyal to one king, and to hold a united empire, that our children's children may enjoy the freedom we hold so dear.

There is a great deal in this letter over which some hon. members in the house, and other people outside, should ponder. I do not wish to carry on this debate much longer. We have heard in the house many speeches from quarters directly opposite the government. They have pointed out that the government has been lagging and derelict in its duty. I want to ask hon. members if there was foundation for any of those criticisms.

The government of the present Prime Minister has at all times been able to handle the situation with one thing in view, that of maintaining unity in this country—unity of the various races in Canada. Without that we would not be able to carry on this war. I do not wish to attribute motives to any other persons, but some who are facing me to-day, and others in other parts of the country, are carrying on certain propaganda in the press. I say to them, and to all those who hold such views, to consider that they are not giving good service to the Canadian people and the empire at large.

In all the provinces of Canada are to be found peoples of various races, creeds and religions. It is the aim of the country to keep all those various elements united together in order that we may present a united front, and be able to carry the burdens of the day and to give to this dominion of ours and to the empire the greatest service possible. It is helping the empire to defeat Hitler, and that is the aim of this country. It is the aim of this government, and it is the aim of all British countries.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain). I, like him, do not rise more often than many other hon. members who have not been here as long as the minister or myself. With much of what he has said I can agree. I join with him in wishing for this country national unity of the highest order. There is no greater purpose that any member of the house, or any elector in the country, can have than that of national unity.

But, Mr. Chairman, may I draw your attention to the fact that consideration must be given to a great section of this country if we are going to maintain the necessary unity, and bring about that all-out war effort about which we are all talking. I have every respect for the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He and I have sat in the house for many years. I know he bespeaks at least the feeling of those who elected him. But when he speaks of pre-election pledges, may I point out to him that I am not going to indulge in them to-day, because he knows them better than I—and I know them better than I am going to tell the committee now.

I do not believe that to-day this government has a mandate from the people of Canada for many of the things it is doing. It is all very well to say that it has no mandate for selective conscription; but when I hear the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) on the one hand, saying that we are out for an all-out war effort; that the Canadian front is on the English channel, and that the defence of Canada is over there, and when I hear on the other side someone saying that he has election pledges, and that we cannot have selective service for overseas, but that we will adopt conscription or compulsory service for Canada, then I begin to wonder where the front line really is. This government has inaugurated conscription. Did they tell the electors of Quebec or of Ontario that they were going to inaugurate conscription? Did they say to the farmer boys throughout the country that they would take them off the farm, whether their fathers were ill or their mothers in hospital, whether the farm went idle, or whether they had to have auction sales? No—silence gives consent.

My hon. friend who once followed the views of the farmers in another part of the house, did not talk that way. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did not talk that way, when he was travelling down the middle of the road looking for votes. The Secretary of State did not tell the electors that, when he visited Ontario, nor did the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), who is very popular wherever he goes. Yes, there are many things they did not tell. But I am not going to take time to refer to some of the things the minister did tell the electors throughout Quebec. I have too deep a conviction respecting my own responsibilities in the house, and yours, Mr. Chairman, and this parliament's, in this time of terrible crisis.

I am not going to stir up dangerous issues, but I was surprised by the statement made by the Prime Minister last night. I think he went only far enough in that regard to leave us where we are. But I do say that this government has no more mandate to conscript the boys of this country for home defence than it has a mandate for selective service where the Minister of National Defence says the front line is, namely, on the shores of Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER: A hundred and eighty to forty.

Mr. ROWE: That is all my hon. friends can think about—elections, elections. They are fearful of another election, and boasting still about the last one. They are playing politics, just as Nero fiddled while Rome burned. Let me say to them that they cannot blow hot and cold on this great issue.

Yet the Minister of National Defence says that the defence of Canada is overseas, and someone else rises in his place and says, "We will conscript men only for the defence of Canada." From the same government someone else says, "We have no mandate for conscription". Then, on the other side of the picture someone says, "We have a mandate for this form of compulsory service in our dominion". In other words, they say, "We will not tell the electors we would compel anyone to join the army, but after the election is over we will compel the men to join the army—not where there is going to be any fighting, not where the Minister of National Defence says the danger is. We will not take a chance and give it further effect without going back for a political squabble in the country."

Let us face the facts. I believe the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) said this afternoon that it was almost unnecessary to be here, and that he would like to get away. I think he is right. I wonder now why we came here. The newspapers of this country have been filled to overflowing with legislation passed by orders in council. The newspapers suggested there would be legislation when we came here, but when we arrive we find the order paper has nothing on it but a few unanswered questions and a few discarded resolutions. Talk about depending upon the people—why, this government has scarcely depended upon parliament.

I have sat in the house and listened to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other hon. members, condemning the Bennett government for legislating by order in council, condemning them for issuing blank cheques, and talking about dictatorship through order in council. Never since confederation has a government passed more orders in council than the present one.

I do not wish to be unfair to the Prime Minister, because he is carrying a terrible load. Yes, he is carrying a load heavier than he would have to carry if he would take parliament into his confidence. He is carrying a heavier load than he would have to carry if he took the country into his confidence.

I make no apologies for my own party. We hear much talk about a mandate, but neither party knew in 1939 what was going to happen. Billboards were put up all across this country when we were both seeking election. We had a similar policy on this issue as those who sit to your right, Mr. Chairman, we stated that there would be no conscription. But we are now in a crisis; we are in the midst of the flash and flame of the greatest peril this country has ever faced. An hon. member says that the government has the support of 180 members. I plead, then, with the Prime Minister of this country to face these facts that confront us. We are facing the greatest peril the British empire has ever faced. There are 180 members behind him, so surely he will have sufficient—I shall not say courage—confidence to go ahead; surely he will not be afraid.

An hon. MEMBER: Afraid of what?

Mr. ROWE: Afraid of the ballot box; that is what hon. members opposite are afraid of.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. CHAMBERS: They will not need to come back by acclamation.

Mr. ROWE: I have come back far more often than my hon. friend, even by election.

Mr. CHAMBERS: The hon. member has a long way to go.

Mr. ROWE: This government is putting into force many orders in council. It has a right to do that in many instances because no government could face the problems that this government must face without passing orders in council. The Prime Minister and his cabinet have passed many orders in council which we all know were necessary to meet emergencies, but they have also passed many that were not necessary, especially while parliament was sitting. For instance, we had the price control or price ceiling legislation which we have heard about and which is not yet in effect.

I urge the government to take this house into its confidence. This cannot be classified as emergency legislation. This is the forum where these propositions and proposals should be dealt with. They should be brought here no matter how badly money is needed in the treasury. We met last spring; we met again this fall and yet we read about more legislation in the newspapers than we hear about on the floor of this chamber. We ask, but I have before me a list of unanswered questions. There are also on the order paper a number of discarded resolutions. These have not been reached no matter from what corner of the house they may have come. To my mind this parliament has been made an absolute mockery, more so than at any time since confederation.

The time has come when this government should take vigorous action. I should like to see the Prime Minister of this country provide by order in council for compulsory selective service and then come back to parliament and say, "I did not have a mandate to pass compulsory selective service for home service, let alone a mandate to send the boys overseas, but this is what I have done." I should like him to tell us that he had gone down to the compatriots of the Secretary of State in the province of Quebec and explained to those loyal people that the home front for the defence of Canada was overseas, that without a mandate he had brought in compulsory selective service to defend the shores of Canada and he therefore had provided for compulsory selective service for where the fighting is going to be.

Do not dodge the issue. If there is anything I can do to help this government, I am ready to do it. I have endeavoured, privately and otherwise, to make suggestions and offer proposals to this government which I believed might help. Surely we can get away from politics for a while. Talk about national unity—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." Nobody has played politics in Canada with greater success during the last quarter of a century than has my hon. friend. No other hon. member has been better recompensed for it either. This war far transcends any of our personal ambitions.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for Essex East says, "hear, hear." The front line of this country is overseas; Canada must be defended where Hitler is charging, and not upon the banks of the St. Lawrence. We have had a compulsory service which takes boys from the farms and leaves only old men to work them. I have heard hon. members to my left refer to that and to the many auction sales which have taken place because boys from the farm have been compelled to serve in defence of Canada. This service is supposed to be here in Canada, but when the boy gets in the army he finds he is bludgeoned into joining up for service overseas. He suffers humiliation and embarrassment and feels that if he does not enlist he will be like those to whom the Prime Minister referred in western Canada. To my mind this is a shameful and—I shall not use the other term I had in mind because I believe "shameful" and "cowardly" are both unparliamentary—it certainly is an inadequate and unjust means of serving the purpose which every member of the government has said must be served.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) says that this is an all-out war, and that we must have from the people dollars and more dollars. I have endeavoured to cooperate with him in every way in order that more war savings stamps and victory bonds may be sold. I say to the government that this tremendous task is their obligation. I know their purpose is to keep prices at a reasonable level in order that there may be a basis upon which they can collect this enormous volume of money which is going to be necessary to meet the most gigantic conflict in the history of civilization. I ask hon. members to pause for a moment and compare the task of to-day with the task of the last great war. Canada is not the country she was in 1914. She is not as advanced as she might have been, but she is a stronger and greater country in both materials and man-power.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And as far as government is concerned.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says, "and as far as government is conc-rned." He that complies against his will is of the same opinion still. I know my hon. friend feels quite keenly about this. While he may appear humorous in the midst of adversity, I know that when he pauses in the silence of the night he will ask himself the question: Why have we compulsory service to defend our shores where there is no fighting and yet no compulsory service to defend our shores where our only defence lies? Think it over. We speak about national unity, but I see no reason why we should have disunity in this country on this issue. If there is reason why we should have disunity on this issue, it is not on account of the great French people of the province of Quebec, those people who were the earliest settlers of this dominion, those loyal, conscientious people who sent thousands of sons to the last great war.

The Liberal party has played politics with this most dangerous issue. I plead with them not to play politics again in this grave hour, but to go to the people of that great province, many of whom bear upon their breasts decorations from the last great war and many more of whom will be decorated overseas in this conflict; let the leaders of this government go to the people of the province of Quebec and say, "You people who were in this country first, and who love Canada, you who know that our most sacred freedoms were achieved under the union jack, we ask you to join us now in protecting not only the shores of the Dominion of Canada but the very shores of our freedom, the shores of Christian liberty, the shores of every right we have enjoyed for so long." If the government will do that, I ask the people of this country who are harping so much on unity to say whether such an appeal would not unite other great forces in this country, and who can doubt that the great province of Quebec would march on with all of us together?

There is and has been for many years another vital part of the defence of Canada—the British navy. The United States of America realizes that very keenly to-day, and we can unite with this great force with greater hope of success than we can ever hope to achieve by standing alone until Hitler takes us one by one.

It is all very well to say that we are going to have our men employed in their proper place, that we are going to produce aeroplanes and tanks. It is not so long ago that we were told we could not produce tanks in this country, but to-day we are producing tanks, aeroplanes, and guns, and our war industries are humming all across this country, playing the game and doing their best. The challenge is up to the government to work along with them.

Name a national coordinator, if you will, who will cut the red tape that is strangling our war effort at the present time, who shall also rip off the strait-jackets from these dollar-a-year men and let them go to work. We are facing the greatest crisis in our history, and before I conclude I would urge this proposal upon the government. I do so now because this is about the only chance we get to debate issues of vital importance. All we can do, the way this government carries on the administration of the country, without consulting parliament, is either to express our thoughts in advance or to criticize after action has been taken by order in council. Otherwise we come back to parliament and find that all we can do is to criticize what has been passed. Therefore, before we leave we had better anticipate the new orders in council that will be passed after we go home. We do not know whether the government in its price-fixing policy will take fifteen cents off eggs and add two dollars a hundredweight to bacon, or add fifteen cents to the price of eggs and take two dollars a hundredweight off bacon. Even when parliament is sitting, orders in council are passed regulating these things under this new-fangled economy.

Let me warn this government, which will be rapidly passing orders in council in connection with this new-born system, that they beware lest they defeat the purpose for which it was created. Let the government ask themselves in fixing prices of farm products to be as sure of the costs of production as they are of the manufacturing costs of industry, which gets its costs, plus ten or fifteen per cent. Let the government ask themselves whether it is fair to fix prices on the same basis for industry and the farmer, who cannot pay off his mortgage or meet his bank overdraft, and who works longer hours for less money, while labour in industry works shorter hours for more money.

Think of the farmer in the cost of living bonus plan. No one has been stronger than I for the man who toils at a machine. No one has worked harder and spent more, politically and otherwise, than I have done to see that labour gets a square deal, and I still stand by labour. But in this price-fixing scheme I urge the Minister of Finance, who probably has not worked the long hours some farmers have, to pause for a moment and ask himself if he should fix prices for the farmer who is working twelve and fourteen hours a day, on the same basis as he fixes prices for industry working eight hours a day.

I urge the government—and I am giving advice that may have little effect—to take into the cabinet, in the interests of our war effort, more men who understand the problems of labour and agriculture, just as the government of Great Britain has done, and I say that without intending any reflection on any member of the cabinet. If you want to unite this country, have all elements in our country properly represented in the cabinet, and then tell the country what needs to be done. Tell the country that winning this war is not going to be an easy matter, that this government has a job to do, and that if it fails to do it, history will hold it forever responsible. If our empire's history is to be brightened by Canada's contribution as it was in the last war, not only must we stand united, but we must march on together to the end. There are more critical days ahead, and it is the duty of the government to spur the people of this country on to greater effort. Do not pause to ask yourselves whether you have a mandate to do what the situation demands, because nobody is going to bother you even if you go a little further than your mandate to carry out an all-out war effort. Do not think so much about mandates, and politics. Think about the challenge that faces you to-day. Think of the return of freedom and liberty to the enslaved countries of Europe, which depends so much on the efforts of Canada, the richest country in the empire, the country that is attracting the eyes of the world to-day, a country that our great neighbour to the south is watching. The United States have compulsory selective service even before they are at war. Let the government concentrate on the crisis that is facing us to-day and ask themselves whether they can afford to play politics as it has been played in normal times.

Mr. McIVOR: I am not sure whether I heard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) aright, but I understood him to say that our war effort was being hampered by red tape. Those were not his exact words, but that is the substance of what he said. That certainly is not true or fair. I have in my hand a pamphlet containing an address given by a member of this house in the last parliament, Mr. J. A. Marsh. He was a defeated candidate in the last election and now occupies an honoured position in the Department of Munitions and Supply, where he is engaged in the examination of contracts. In this address he says, "There is no political patronage in the Department of Munitions and Supply."

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I think there is just enough time before six o'clock for me to say what I desire to say. My voice is not quite so loud as that of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe; my frame is not quite so large; but I trust that my logic is as sound; and anything that I say now I do not say in defence of the Liberal party.

I agree with the sentiment which has been expressed that in the last general election the people of this country were under the impression that by voting Liberal we would not have conscription. I have searched records; I have gone back over newspaper articles, and I cannot find that anywhere any mention was made of or any distinction drawn between, overseas service and home defence; and the people themselves voted at the last election against any kind of conscription.

Coming to my hon. friend's remarks, I fail to understand how our Conservative friends could have changed their minds so quickly. The fact of the matter is that we have not heard very much about this conscription business until the last few days.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Has the war changed since then?

Mr. HANSELL: The war has not changed in the last few days; but supposing it had, I will come to that in a moment. In the last election, about eighteen months ago, this group which I represent made their stand definitely clear. They had the foresight to anticipate that we would have a long, hard battle and that the time might come when the entire resources of the dominion would have to be brought into the war effort. Our stand then was: begin the right way, by mobilizing the financial resources or—should I say?—the financial institutions of this country, that the government might take unto themselves that which they had delegated to the financial institutions and control the credit facilities of this country to aid in the war. That, we said, was the first thing to do. We went out on the platform in the election and said the same thing. Did our Conservative friends advocate conscription at all in those days? They did not go even as far as we did. But now, in the last few days, there suddenly springs into existence a cry by these hon. gentlemen for some type of conscription.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They do not say even yet what they want.

Mr. HANSELL: To-night's paper has a rather large headline:

> Arthur Meighen accepts leadership of Conservative party.
> To urge compulsory service over whole field of war.

I suppose that means foreign service as well as home service. We did not hear anything about that eighteen months ago. One can come to only one of two conclusions: either my hon. friends are indulging in political opportunism by grasping at what may be regarded in some opinionated circles as a growing public sentiment over the subject of conscription, or, they were not far-sighted enough to see what might happen eighteen months afterwards. For a party to bid for power that cannot see eighteen months ahead is—well, I would not vote for them anyway. I do not think I shall ever vote for an old-line party again.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Liberals are no better.

Mr. HANSELL: Quite true. I think we can say that the same thing applies to the Liberal party.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That does not apply to some of us. Some of us predicted what would happen.

Mr. HANSELL: Are we planning now for that which may be a year, two years, three or four years ahead?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Liberals cannot see six months ahead, and here is the evidence.

Mr. HANSELL: I said I would not vote for an old-line party again. I did so once; I voted once upon a time for—believe it or not—the gentleman who is now Viscount Bennett.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Shame on you! You should have known better.

Mr. HANSELL: I will ask the hon. member for Bow River not to rub it in too hard.

Those are all the observations I wish to make. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe may rise in his place and say, "Let us not play politics"; but if politics is played at all, it is played on the grounds of political opportunism. Let us not be political opportunists; let us be in this whole matter as statesmanlike as we can.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STIRLING: We are discussing the proposals of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes, as the Prime Minister intimated just before recess.

Mr. STIRLING: I listened with very great interest to the statement of the minister the other night in which he described the considerations which induced the government to proceed by the particular method which it has adopted. As far as my observation goes, I would be inclined to think the country has received it, as a declaration of policy, with a good deal of acquiescence. But the minister realizes, as I think the public realizes, that the government has embarked upon an undertaking the working out of which, on the administrative side, will be accompanied by intense difficulty. The minister has not belittled the difficulties. I assume the committee will wish to discuss those difficulties as hon. members see them.

A difficulty which, it seems to me, will have to be met is that the retailer finds himself in this position. Following the accustomed method of trade, he has ordered ahead. In some instances he has had to order, months ahead, the commodities which he needs to maintain his stock. In those months the wholesaler's price to the retailer has in all probability risen. The retailer has his shelves somewhat full of those articles that he is accustomed to deal in, has probably not raised his prices; the prices which he has been charging the public relate to the costs at which he provided himself with those goods. But those prices ruling through the period of September and October will no longer recompense him for what he will have to pay for the goods ordered in the months preceding the period. I wonder whether the government have given consideration to that matter, and consider it as one which must be met, and whether the minister can describe any methods by which it may be met.

It appears to me that recognition must be given to that difficulty. If it is not given, as far as I can see, it just means that the retailer is left in the position of having to take that loss. If the retailer at large through this country, be he the small man or chain-store shareholder, has to pay more to the wholesaler for the goods he has ordered prior to this period, then he will have to absorb the loss. I do not know if the government is preparing to load that loss on to the retailer who appears to me to be alone in having to carry it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not a problem peculiar to the retailer. It may apply to the wholesaler as well, or the processor. The problem is a very real one, and consideration has been given to various methods of meeting it. I am not in a position to say which of those methods or what method will be adopted. I should like to hear hon. members present the difficulties, and shall take note of their representations. But I think it would prejudice the whole working of the scheme if I were to indicate what the board may or may not do. I am not in a position to say that at the moment.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think that at the beginning at all events, no matter how much good-will there may be toward the aim which the government has in view—and I do not think anyone has disparaged that aim, at least I have not; I was criticizing the means by which it was to be achieved, not the end in view—does he not think that in a great experiment like this it would be fair to say that the whole thing will be more or less a matter of trial and error until the weak spots are found and the holes are plugged?

I have in mind the case of a manufacturer who has to bring in parts, some from the United States, if he is allowed to do so, where he thinks he can buy them more cheaply than locally, even after paying the exchange and duty. The manufacturers are fearful that their costs will be increased but that their selling prices upon which they base their bids to their customers in the ordinary course of dealing will be frozen. They send their travellers out months in advance to take orders before the goods are made, for example boot and shoe manufacturers. On a rising market a manufacturer simply cannot sell at the prices at which he has been asked to, and he just has to cancel his order. I have found that case. I assume that in a case like that, if he makes the proper representation to the board and if the board are satisfied as to the bona fides of his position, they will grant him some relief. Is it to be a case of every man applying on his own behalf, or will they be heard in classes? These are thoughts that have been running through my mind. I do not see how any hard and fast principles can be laid down to govern a position like this.

While I am on my feet may I offer a suggestion to the minister, who rather deprecated the suggestion I made the other day that these prices had been frozen on an uneven level. That may not be true with regard to the whole commodity picture, but certainly it is true with regard to certain commodities. I think it is true with respect to agricultural commodities, other than wheat, because definitely this does not govern wheat. I think it is true with respect to agricultural production in my own province. That production is not as large as it might be, but that is the reaction I get from those in the business. Take, for example, those who raise potatoes, one of the most important productions we have in our province. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) knows very much more about it than I do; and I know he holds that view very strongly.

I suggest to the minister that it must of necessity become more or less a matter of trial and error, and I am afraid that the man who pushes most strongly, who pulls the hardest, who is capable intellectually and financially of making out the best case, will win out, while the little man, who perhaps cannot make himself heard, who has not the money to present his case, may suffer.

Mr. KINLEY: He always has.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have grave fears for the safety and the future of the small dealer in this country under this project. The big chain-store man or the big department store is in a better position to sustain any shock that may come. The little fellow who marks his goods, not on the basis of the cost of replacement but rather on the basis of the cost to him on the shelves, is going to take what will be to him a very severe licking. That is my fear, though I hope I may be wrong.

On the other hand, I believe that if the government wishes to perform a national service, with which I think in principle we all agree—namely, to prevent inflation—we ought to ask for the whole-hearted support of everybody to see if this thing cannot be put over. That is my attitude at the moment; yet I do not see how it can be done by a central body here in Ottawa, in a far-flung country like Canada, where the little fellow cannot make himself heard. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite may be able to help the minister; I hope they can.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to endorse the remarks of the two previous speakers. Unfortunately it is the man who has acted from the decent point of view who is going to suffer most. A retailer, confronted with a sharply advancing price, has two alternatives; I was a retailer during the last war and I know how it worked out. When he sees prices going up he can do what the better element perhaps would do, continue to sell at the old price until his stock is exhausted, and then raise his price; or he might say, as the leader of the opposition says, "Well, I will only regard the cost of replacement," and thus take advantage of the rising market, knowing that people can not buy the commodity for less from any other retailer. In that way he could secure a greater profit than ordinarily would be the case.

That is what has happened here. The man who said, "I will not increase my price beyond the basis of what I had to pay," is going to be stung. The man who increased his price because he saw the market rising will get off, because he raised his price during the control period. The result will be that the man who did the fair thing will be stuck, not only for the immediate future but apparently for a good long time, because whoever drew up these regulations appears not to have taken account of that lag, so to speak, between the wholesale and the retail price. Some retailers buy their stuff six months ahead; but whatever the period may be, there is a lag. The leader of the opposition spoke about the small man not making himself heard. I can tell the committee that the small man in my district is making himself heard, because since this thing was announced I have received nearly a hundred letters begging me to bring the matter to the attention of the minister or the house.

As I say, this is going to be a permanent thing; it will not be only one temporary loss, for the sake of the convenience of the departmental official; it will go on indefinitely, because the merchant will be compelled to sell at the price obtaining during the control period. But the price has been raised already by the wholesaler, and even if he is not permitted to increase it any more, it remains at that level. I have a letter in my office now in which a man mentions one brand of coffee. He says he is paying more for that coffee now than he was retailing it for during the four-week period. He anticipated having to increase the price as soon as his stock ran out, but unfortunately he did not increase his price during the period in question and now he is condemned to sell at the lower price for the duration of the war. On the other hand, the wholesaler will be able to sell the coffee at the price fixed during the latter part of the four-week period, which will create a gross injustice as far as the small man is concerned, as the leader of the opposition has said.

It seems to me it should not be very difficult to take care of that situation. Any adjustment would have to be made only once; then the wholesaler would not be permitted to increase his price again, and there would be no more trouble. In the case of almost every retailer there has been some increase in wholesale prices during that period, but unless an adjustment of this kind is made, the man who was decent about the thing will be the sufferer.

Mr. MacINNIS: In saying a few words with regard to this matter I do not wish either the minister or the committee to take it that I am criticizing control in itself. I think we are all satisfied that under the circumstances controls of various kinds will have to be put into operation, and the only matter about which I am concerned is that these controls should affect everyone as equally as possible. We are not going to put into operation controls which will impose restrictions in any way without hurting somebody, but what I do wish to avoid is any grossly unequal distribution of the burden that will be caused.

In reply to the hon. member for Yale the minister suggested that the wholesaler was affected in much the same way as the retailer. To a certain extent that may be true, but I believe the minister will agree that, generally speaking, the wholesaler will be better able to carry the burden than the retailer. The man who will be concerned most of all is the retailer with a small business, because it will affect his living. There is only a very small margin between what is sufficient to keep him going and what will cause him to close up shop altogether.

The minister has made out a pretty good case; obviously he cannot say at the moment what his department will do in the matter, but if we could have an understanding that these questions will receive the utmost possible consideration, then I think we shall be satisfied. It may be said, I suppose, that many of the small retail businesses are uneconomical. I believe that is true; but until we find some method by which the people who are in these businesses, and who would be put out of business by the control, can make a livelihood in other occupations, great care should be taken to see that they are not unduly affected by the controls instituted, as has been outlined by the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): When the Minister of Munitions and Supply was introducing the subject matter which he reviewed in a previous speech, this matter was discussed with particular reference to raw materials required for war industries. That is a problem as far as his department is concerned; discussion appears at page 4241 of Hansard.

Now, on the invitation of the Minister of Finance, I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the same subject. A portion of the raw materials referred to is used in the manufacture of war materials, but a larger portion is used in the ordinary commerce of the country. In days gone by, the market for primary products was usually based on what could be obtained for the exportable surplus. Invariably, in common with agricultural products, they found the price which prevailed for the exportable surplus, especially if it were shipped to the United Kingdom, in view of the fact that, in days gone by, the United Kingdom had received their supplies from India and Europe, was considerably lower than the price on the domestic market in Canada.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

To-day, either fortunately or unfortunately, the only export market of any value that we have is in the United States, and prices in that market are riding anywhere from 10 per cent to 60 or 70 per cent higher than the ceiling price in Canada.

I arrive at the ceiling price from this deduction: through the years raw materials have been contracted for. As I said before, contracts were ordinarily made in the months of November and December for the twelve-month period following. The contract prices of December, 1940, provide the ceiling prices and the base period in this legislation. Meantime, due to industrial activity in the United States, the market in that country has risen considerably above the Canadian ceiling price.

I appreciate that the minister's problem is a very difficult one, and I am going to offer him one suggestion to which he might give some thought, and which I believe would help him with his problem.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member talking about rubber?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am speaking about hides, in particular—hide trimmings, and commodities of that kind. I refer not only to hides alone, but to split trimmings. I am afraid if I gave the minister the complete nomenclature of all primary products, he probably would not understand it all. Hides, however, constitute one commodity among a number of others.

For instance, murrain hides in Detroit are selling anywhere from two cents to six cents a pound higher than in Windsor. I know about the export situation in that connection. But in respect of by-products from split trimmings —that is, after the hides are split—a million pounds were shipped out of this country last year. The contract price in December, 1940, in the case of wet was $22 a ton, and dry, $30. The value to-day in Boston is $45 for wet and as high as $60 for dry. That is an example of the commodities I have in mind.

Of course this is not a commodity which will upset the whole economic set-up of Canada, but it is an illustration of many other commodities. The trading in this commodity amounts to probably only a thousand tons a year. But the suggestion I am going to put on record is that the minister should have access to the records of exporters of raw materials of this and other kinds to the United States for the preceding year. It may be that he would have the information for two or three years preceding. He would ascertain the names of those desirous of shipping products out of Canada, and bleeding this country of raw materials so necessary for the making of war requirements. The minister's department could take a record of the individual shippers and, before issuing export licences, could have those shippers declare what they had shipped in years gone by. In that way he may be able to hold the situation in hand.

What will happen will be that shippers who have been loyal to Canadian industry by selling their products at home will be in the unhappy position of receiving a little less for their products, if they sell them for the ceiling price in Canada. On the other hand, those who through branch plants connections in the United States still ship to that country will get the advantage of a higher market. I therefore suggest that the minister's department see to it that shipments abnormally large compared with those in previous years are not allowed to leave Canada, and in that way avoid a scarcity of raw materials to keep Canadian industry supplied.

I know the minister's department has already received representations in that respect, because I was interviewed in Toronto by a Chicago concern which made representations concerning the export of beef hides and calf skins from Canada to the United States. That is one example. If his department takes a firm stand, I am sure he will get the cooperation of Canadian industry. I realize some of the difficulties, but I hope he will give consideration to the suggestion I make.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How do these price control regulations affect the price of wheat? As I understand it, the ceiling price will be the average between September 15 and October 11, which was about 77·3 cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was the highest price.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The highest in that period was about 77·3 cents. But the minimum price would still be in effect. The price would be allowed to fluctuate between 70 and 77·3 cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is only for domestic sales, and does not apply to export sales.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I cannot help being amused at the apparent about-face on the part of the government in respect of certain matters in their financial policy. For instance, on various occasions between 1935 and 1939 we stressed the fact, when it was desirable to put certain projects into operation, that provided we had the necessary men and material to carry out those projects, it was quite a simple matter to arrange for the financing of them. In other words, we stressed the fact that anything physically possible and desirable could be made financially possible. We remember that whenever we suggested such a thing in the house we were ridiculed by the former Minister of Finance.

It is interesting to note that since the declaration of war the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) have stressed on various occasions that everything that in the physical sense can be done to win this war will be made financially possible. In other words, they are taking exactly the same stand as we took in peace time, but apparently they are not prepared to take that stand in peace time. They will take it only in war time.

Between 1935 and 1940 we stressed on many occasions that in order to develop our resources to their full capacity and maintain as high a standard of living as possible, it would be necessary to institute price control and, in certain instances, some degree of rationing. The present Minister of Finance took exception to that statement; in fact he took a very strong stand against any suggestion that we should introduce price control. May I read to the committee what he said on November 21, 1940, when the proposal was made by one of this group that we have price control. These are his words:

> Price fixing of a few commodities, indeed rationing of a few commodities, is possible and need not have a very serious effect, but price fixing and rationing on a general scale have at least two disadvantages.
> In the first place, this would call for bureaucratic interference in the private affairs of all Canadian citizens. Perhaps I am speaking a little bit figuratively here, but generally speaking there would have to be a government spy in every grocery store. The Germans did this with some success, but the Germans are experts as spies.

And then:

> The whole habit of thought of the Canadian people, the dislike of intensive and general government intervention in their personal transactions and private affairs, would make a universal system of price fixing and rationing, even if it were practicable in Canada, far more odious, I am satisfied, than a system of taxation and borrowing out of savings, which is the policy of this government.
> Every detail of our economic life would have to be controlled by someone sitting here in Ottawa.
>
> It is true that the nazis in Germany have gone nearly as far as this with their price fixing and rationing. But even they, with a dictatorship and with years of experience before the war, have had to combine this price fixing with very heavy war taxation and with borrowing enormous sums at interest rates higher than we pay in Canada.

The minister made that statement as recently as November 21, 1940. According to the minister, price control would necessitate placing a spy in every food store. If the minister is still of that opinion, I wonder whether he is starting to organize a gestapo and put spies in stores throughout the country. That is what he said in order to ridicule our proposal. I agree that his statement at that time was nonsense, but that is the language used by the Minister of Finance and the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) on almost every occasion when we made proposals to better the financial system. I agree that there is no reason of sense in that statement, that the minister went to extremes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said I did.

Mr. QUELCH: I am glad to hear the minister admit that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not now, but I did then. I said that I was speaking figuratively, that that would bring about a system of regimentation, and so it will. We are going very far in that direction.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not criticizing the minister for introducing a form of price control. I think it is necessary, but the proposal made is a clumsy one. The minister would be well advised to adopt the price control proposal suggested by Major Douglas. That is what they have adopted to a certain extent in the United States with the stamp plan, and also in Great Britain with the system of compensated prices. I shall not deal with that now, but I may at another opportunity.

In his speech, the minister admitted that we in this group had always opposed inflation. I doubt if there is any group in this house more opposed to inflation. On the other hand, the minister stated that he was of opinion that our proposal would cause inflation. Let us go back to the years 1935 to 1939. We had half a million unemployed; industry was running in low gear; many plants were closed down or running at a small percentage of their capacity, and we had a favourable balance of payments in those years amounting to around $200,000,000. In addition, there were a million people on relief. The ministers of the government were travelling all over the world in an effort to obtain foreign markets, but they were absolutely blind to the fact that in Canada there was a tremendous undeveloped market in the million people on relief and the many others who were having to accept a standard of living far below what was necessary.

Our proposal during that period was, first of all, that we should take steps to obtain effective control over the issue of currency and credit. We realized that this would be necessary before we started any other financial reform. Then we contended that a certain proportion of the unemployed should be put to work on capital projects and a certain proportion in industries producing goods for consumption. The money paid out for capital projects would help to create an effective demand for the goods produced by the consumption goods industries. But we also stressed the fact that it was necessary to maintain a certain definite relationship between the production of capital goods and the production of consumer goods. We contended that capital production should be maintained at a sufficient volume so that the money paid out in its production would be at least equal to the deficiency which existed between the total price of consumer goods available for distribution and the effective demand against them.

I think we all know that from 1935 to 1939 our capital projects were down well below normal. On many occasions we advocated that these capital projects should be increased. We advocated slum clearance, road building, reforestation and many other projects. The money paid out to carry on these projects would have created an effective demand for consumer goods which could have been produced but which were not. Every time we made such a suggestion the Minister of Finance would ridicule it as being inflationary; at times he became almost hysterical.

We said that such a programme could be financed by the Bank of Canada, but we suggested that before the Bank of Canada was used for that purpose it was most necessary that we should obtain effective control over the issue of currency and credit. We had not that control at that time and we still have not that control. We suggested also that it would be necessary to institute a system of price control. I defy the minister to say that such a proposal as that could possibly cause inflation. The effect of carrying out that suggestion would have been to maintain production at its maximum level, or at least at a level sufficiently high to maintain a decent standard of living in this country. It was not inflation; it was simply stabilizing supply and demand.

We realize too well that since the declaration of war the situation has changed entirely. To-day we have a great expansion in the production of capital goods and the money paid out in this production is causing an increased demand for consumer goods. There is no longer a proper relationship between the production of consumer goods and the production of capital goods. As the war goes on and we find it necessary to make a greater effort, we shall have to increase the production of capital goods. When we have exhausted our supply of labour it will become necessary to decrease the supply of consumer goods. We realize that it is absolutely necessary to have this relationship in war time.

The Minister of Finance says that this excess purchasing power should be drained off by a system of taxation and the sale of bonds. We agree that the people should be allowed to invest a certain amount of their money in savings certificates, to put aside a little for a rainy day, but we cannot understand why the people of this country should be forced into debt in order that certain people may have an investment, or, in other words, that we should curtail spending. We have always attacked the sale of bonds as being a dishonest and unsound system. We claim that it is dishonest because it is nothing more or less than a misappropriation of the funds of future generations. We maintain that it is unsound because we shall be building up a debt that can never be paid under the orthodox system of finance. I hasten to add that when we say that we do not mean—the minister sometimes jumps to conclusions—that the people who are buying bonds to-day are not going to be paid. Of course they will be paid, but in paying those people the government will not be reducing the debt; they will do it by refunding, just as it has been done in the past.

The minister has stated that the ideal method of selling bonds would be to distribute them as evenly as possible throughout the nation. If we could make this a one hundred per cent distribution, if everyone held an equal amount of bonds, then everyone would be taxed to pay his own interest. We would all be taking in each other's washing and we would be no further ahead. The same thing could be accomplished by taxation. But this is not the situation; we know very well that a large percentage of the bonds are held by a small number of people. I know that the figures issued by the minister show a wide distribution, but that does not alter the fact that a large proportion of the bonds are held by a comparatively small number of people. We shall be taxing all the people to pay the majority of the interest due to a small number of the people, and that is not a desirable state of affairs.

As I say, we shall never be able to pay back this debt. That must be quite obvious. If the people to-day are not able to pay for current production, then the people of the future will certainly not be able to pay for the goods they consume at that time as well as the goods we are using to-day but not paying for. If we adopted a real pay-as-you-go system, we would be paying for these goods as we used them and not be calling upon generations of the yet unborn to pay for the cost of this war. Some people will argue that we are fighting for democracy and therefore we have the right to expect the people of the future to help pay the cost. That argument has been used in connection with every war fought in the past. We are still paying for wars fought one hundred years ago. Every time we have another war our debt mounts and the problem becomes greater. The same thing will happen in the future. The people of that day will be asked to pay for this war. But I suggest that the people of the future will have sufficient troubles of their own without being asked to pay for the war we are fighting to-day.

The minister likes to hope that the tremendous revenues we are obtaining to-day will continue after the war. Why is it that we have such large revenues to-day? What is the main reason? I put forward two main reasons. In the first place we had monetary expansion to provide for maximum employment and increase the production of industry. Second, and perhaps more important, the government has become the largest purchaser of labour and commodities in the country. Is the government prepared to continue that policy after the war? If it is—and mind you, it is a complete change from the policy of the past—there is no reason why we cannot have in Canada after the war the greatest era of prosperity which the world has ever seen, because all the productive capacity for war purposes to-day will be available after the war to satisfy the needs of the people. But if we are going to be told, as we have been told already, that we shall have to tighten our belts to pay for the war, that all government projects will be curtailed and that there will be a general contraction of credit, then undoubtedly we are going to have in this country the greatest depression we have ever seen. I recall what was said of the last depression. Mr. Spinney, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, said that the main reason for the last depression was the great debt which had been incurred in the last war. Then I ask the Minister of Finance, if a two billion dollar debt for the last war caused a ten-year depression, what will the war debt at the end of this war cause? There is no question in my mind that we are headed for one of the worst depressions we have seen in this country unless the government is prepared to depart from its former orthodox financing.

There is one other question to which I wish to refer. In the past in this house we have urged and we are still urging that to the extent that taxation and the sale of interest-free certificates will not provide the necessary revenue for the government, the services of the Bank of Canada should be used. It is interesting to note that many prominent bankers and economists are showing a complete change of mind on this subject, especially as regards the sale of bonds. If anybody went out during the last victory loan campaign and suggested that the sale of bonds was not the correct method of financing the war, his patriotism was likely to be called in question and he was likely to get a visit from the police the next day. As a matter of fact the police did visit people who criticized that method of financing the war. I have criticized it inside and outside this house both in peace time and in war time because it is a racket which becomes more contemptible in time of war. Let me quote what has been said in this regard by two authorities whose word cannot lightly be set aside: first, Lord Kindersley, who I understand is chairman of the National War Savings Committee in England and a director of the Bank of England. He is quoted in the April 9 issue of the Parliamentary Debates of the British House of Commons by Mr. Stokes, M.P., as having said:

> I do not disagree with the expressed belief that it does not make a pennyworth of difference whether you subscribe or not, provided you bank your money and do not spend it.

The minister would agree with that statement because he has stated that the purpose of the sale of bonds and of taxation is primarily to curtail purchasing power. But if people are prepared to stop spending and to put their money in a bank, the same end is achieved, so far as not spending it is concerned, as if they had bought war savings certificates or bonds. The minister has stated in the house that the main purpose of taxation and the sale of bonds is not the raising of revenue but to curtail the spending of the people. That statement was also made by Professor Plumptre.

I want to quote one other authority in this regard. He goes a bit further than Lord Kindersley. I quote from the Western Producer of October 9, 1941, which has an editorial on the August letter of the Royal Bank of Canada. The editorial says in part:

The same issue of the Royal bank letter went on to quote with apparent approval criticism voiced by the London Economist. That leading periodical is cited as having said:

> "The whole cast of savings propaganda needs to be quite radically altered. The individual should be told that his duty is to reduce his consumption by every possible means. He should have the lesson driven home to him on every hoarding that every act of consumption uses shipping space and labour—the two scarcest of commodities. Once he has economized as much as he can, it matters very little what happens to the money he saves thereby—"

I draw the attention of the Minister of Finance especially to this:

> "The saving once done, it is of no advantage to the state to pile up enormous figures of subscriptions to savings certificates and war loan. Indeed it is to the state's advantage not to borrow at two and a half per cent or three per cent if it can raise the money more cheaply, and the truly patriotic citizen is he who, having reduced his consumption to the absolute minimum, leaves his spare money in the bank."

I quite agree with that statement, and I think everybody should agree that it is far more patriotic to curtail your spending and not impose a debt on the nation than to curtail your spending through a process of increasing the national debt.

The minister is introducing a form of price control. It is a blanket price control. As I have stated, we believe that a better system could be introduced; nevertheless this plan will have the effect of preventing the exploitation of the people by certain industries. At the present time we have not effective control of the issue of currency and credit. Therefore I would ask the minister this question: Why does the government not take the necessary steps to obtain absolute and effective control of the issue of currency and credit and then, instead of obtaining credit through the chartered banks or financing the war by the issue of bonds, why not use the services of the Bank of Canada? Or perhaps I should ask this question rather: Is the government intending to utilize the services of the Bank of Canada? The minister in his speech left that question up in the air. He stated that he needed $600,000,000 but did not know where he was going to get it. He thought he had pushed taxation as far as he could and he did not like issuing any more bonds. He did not state what action the government proposed to take. I wonder whether he could at this time tell us what is the government's objection to utilizing the services of the Bank of Canada, having first of all obtained effective control of the chartered banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is one of those academic discussions which the hon. gentleman is very fond of starting in this house. I have engaged in them before, but I really do not know that much advantage would be gained by entering upon another one to-night. If we are to do that, I will make some preparation, as the hon. gentleman has done, and then come back and we will have a debate of that kind if he wants it. But I do not see what is to be gained by it. He has his views as to how this war should be financed and we have our views. We have both put our respective views before the house and the country. He talks about the $600,000,000 that I was speaking of the other night. I do not admit that that particular $600,000,000 is ever going to be needed, because that was the additional amount which would be needed after the price level rose by 20 or 30 per cent, and we do not intend that the price level shall rise.

With regard to whether we intend to borrow from the Bank of Canada, there has been some small borrowing, as the hon. gentleman knows, from the Bank of Canada. The returns which have been produced in the house have set out the borrowings from the chartered banks, from the public, and from the Bank of Canada. When the hon. gentleman asks me whether it is the intention of the government to borrow from the Bank of Canada, and how much we intend to borrow from the Bank of Canada, those are questions which I should not, and indeed cannot, answer at the present time.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister care to comment upon the August letter of the Royal Bank of Canada? I ask that question because throughout the country there is a great deal of discontent at the way in which the government is financing this war. There is a feeling that we are building up a debt which is going to have the effect of causing depression and a great deal of grief after the war. The statement in the Economist is a very clear one. It is one for which people in this country have been branded as unpatriotic when they make it. I do not think that stigma can be attached to the Economist, whose statement is quoted with apparent approval by the Royal bank. If it is a correct statement of fact, unquestionably something is wrong with the government's policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: To what statement is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. QUELCH: The one which I quoted from the Economist.

Mr. ILSLEY: What part of it?

Mr. QUELCH: The one which stated that people would be just as patriotic or more patriotic if they placed their money in the banks rather than purchase bonds or war savings certificates with it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whatever the validity of the statement may be, the fact is that if the money is not borrowed from persons, they do not place it in the banks, they spend it, and that exerts an upward pressure on the price level. Therefore, from a practical point of view the only thing to do is to secure the money from the people, to channel money back to the government from the people either by taxation or by borrowing. We cannot go very much further by taxation, so we have to do it by borrowing. We have to offer some incentive to people to lend money to the government; that is why we pay interest.

Mr. QUELCH: In other words, the government feels obliged to place the nation in debt rather than allow the people to spend the money. Surely the logical thing would be to increase taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The nation is in debt to itself.

Mr. QUELCH: That would be true only if everybody were buying an equal amount of bonds. I know we are assured by Mr. Towers that the greater the debt, the greater the prosperity: "Look at central Africa—no debt, no prosperity!" But that would be true only if everybody were buying an equal quantity of bonds. We know that is not the situation. We know the situation is that a very small percentage of the people hold by far the greater part of the bonds, so that for evermore the people of this country are going to be compelled to pay tribute to that small number of bondholders. That is why I contend that the correct procedure would be to tax those people rather than sell bonds to them. After all, the minister has stressed again and again that we should have a pay-as-you-go policy. When we take into consideration the tremendous sacrifices which are being made to-day in Europe and by our own people; when we call to mind that many are going as far as to give their lives, is it too much to expect that people in this country should be content to maintain their pre-war savings entire, and to have a fairly decent standard of living for the duration of the war, but that after the war they should not be any better off than they were at the start? The person who finds himself in that position should regard himself as exceedingly lucky. No one should expect to build up, as a result of this war, great accumulations of bonds which will largely represent profits from the war. It seems to me a very unfortunate state of affairs that when certain people buy, say half a million dollars worth of bonds, we call them patriots—patriots for having invested their money at three per cent in a gilt-edged security. I do not like the use of the word "patriot" to describe a man who, as a result of good business, is able to get hold of a security which will provide him with three per cent for the rest of his life. We use the same word to honour the man who goes overseas and sacrifices his life. I should say that the correct procedure is to tax those who have the greatest amount to lose as a result of this war; they should be prepared to make such sacrifices in line with the sacrifices which are being made overseas.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that we should tax just as far as it is possible. That is the government's policy. The taxation this year, together with other revenues of the government which are insignificant compared with the taxation revenues, will yield between $1,400,000,000 and $1,500,000,000. I do not know just where to go or how to proceed to tax much more heavily than we are doing now.

When the hon. gentleman says that bonds are being bought from profits which are being made out of the war, he is in error, because profits are not being made in any great degree out of the war. A very close check is being kept on that. The profits before taxation have increased to a very considerable extent, but the profits after taxation have increased hardly at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are less.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, no. On an analysis of about 320 companies which was made by the Bank of Canada, and which did not include certain classes of companies such as railways and some others, but covered 320 representative industries in Canada, it appeared that the profits after taxation had increased by 6 per cent in 1940 over 1939—which was a very moderate increase. The Financial Post made an analysis of the balance sheet of, I believe, 280 representative companies, and the conclusion to which they came was that the profits after taxation had increased 2·2 per cent. The increase in income after taxation has not been to any extent to commercial, industrial or financial corporations; it has been in the lower income earning groups. It is very largely in the wage-earning groups that the great increase has taken place in the incomes of the people of the Dominion of Canada. Of course, we tax them, but at a so much lower rate that their net incomes after taxation have been very substantially increased.

Mr. QUELCH: I should just like to mention that I notice, from the returns of the profits of the chartered banks, that in the case of the Bank of Toronto the profit increased in 1940 from, I believe 16 per cent to 24 per cent after the taxation had been paid.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether that was after taxation or before, but I think it was before.

Mr. QUELCH: It stated "after taxation".

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about that. But that was 24 per cent upon the original capital, without rest, without reserves being taken into account; and as rest was not taken into account at all, it is open to question whether that is a fair basis. If a financial institution has been operating over a long period and has made profits in previous years and has a large rest fund, then, to take the earnings upon original capital, which may have been invested fifty years ago, is not a very sound test as to the earnings of the money actually employed in the business.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): This price ceiling order in council is a great experiment, and, as has been said, will be a matter of trial and error, but I think the minister should have the cooperation of the general public in working it out. At page 4155 of Hansard the minister is reported as saying:

> . . . we could never have imposed a price ceiling until we had given agricultural prices a chance to rise. Agricultural prices were very low before the war; I do not dispute that for a moment. But on the basis of percentages there has been a tremendous increase in everything except wheat. I am going to give some percentages, and I want it clearly understood that I am not expressing approval of the level of agricultural prices in August, 1939.

I wish to put on record some figures as to prices in August, 1939 and September, 1941. This government has for several purposes connected with the prosecution of the war used the basis of 1926-29 for organized labour and industry. To use the same basis for agricultural prices gives an entirely different picture in the circumstances in which we find ourselves to-day. I quote figures for that time also:

	1926-29	Aug., 1939	Sept., 1941
Wheat, Fort William..	1·417	0·549	0·726
Oats, Fort William....	0·603	0·273	0·493
Barley, Fort William..	0·716	0·323	0·526
Rye, Fort William....	0·971	0·376	0·547
Butcher steers, Toronto	9·04	6·37	8·79
Bacon hogs, Toronto...	11·01	7·85	10·99
Creamery butter, Montreal	0·382	0·215	0·344
Eggs, Montreal.....	0·482	0·318	0·394

There is a very great discrepancy in these prices, and on any basis of equality with organized labour and industry it places agriculture away down the list. True, something has been done in the way of an acreage bonus, but that does not begin to make the necessary adjustment.

I have here an article from the Toronto Globe and Mail of Tuesday the 11th instant, quoting the Searle index. It says:

Searle Grain Company makes the following points:

United States government has adopted the principle of 1913-14 parity, which means that agricultural products should have the same purchasing power now over the things that farmers have to buy as they had in 1913-14.

For wheat in the United States to be at the 1913-14 parity would require a price of approximately $1.22 in store Chicago. To-day May wheat, Chicago, is actually $1.19 a bushel.

For Canadian wheat to be at 1913-14 parity would similarly require a price of about $1.20 for No. 1 northern in store Fort William. To-day No. 1 northern in Fort William is 72⅞ cents a bushel.

A maximum of 223 million bushels has been set for the amount of wheat that western farmers are permitted to deliver during this present crop year.

In order to narrow somewhat the wide gap that exists between the farmers' low income from wheat and the high cost of the things that farmers have to buy, the government has given wheat growers certain bonuses which we estimate amount to 52 million dollars. (An additional 8 million dollars to farmers who grow grain other than wheat.)

Including these government bonuses the total income from wheat during this present crop year will amount to about 152 million dollars as compared with 234 million dollars revenue from wheat last year, and 441 million dollars in 1928.

This is that original basis of which we spoke.

Certainly I think the great mass of the agricultural population must receive some further consideration to put them on a basis of equality with organized labour and industry, and while, as I stated, I think the minister should have the cooperation of all the people of the country, certainly this will have to be equalized in some manner.

Mr. NEILL: It is one of the disadvantages of the system we have adopted in this committee that it is the right and privilege of every one of us to talk, as regards the particular minister whose policies are under debate, on any phase of his activities. The result is that twenty men all want to talk about different subjects, and it produces an awful lack of coherence. If the chairman had authority, once a subject is introduced, to have it threshed out and then, so to speak, pass that item, we would get along much better.

We started this evening, when there were not very many hon. members present, with a statement from the minister that he would like to hear hon. members state their views on the question of a condition which compels retailers to sell at a price lower than they are paying wholesale now, because that is what it amounts to. The minister invited expressions of opinion, but only three hon. members have spoken on that. Going back to that feature for a moment, I think the minister indicated that when he heard our views he would take them into consideration. It seems such a simple matter that for the good of the project which we all hope will be a success, namely this price restriction policy, it would almost seem impossible to have it said that a very considerable body of people are compelled to sell goods for less than what they pay for them and carry their overhead as well, which generally runs to from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. It is obvious that this is not desirable. Suppose we carry it far enough and put them out of business. Some people have the same regard for retailers as hon. members in the far corner have for banks; they think they are very bad, but we cannot do without them, and to put them out of business would be a disadvantage.

An. hon. MEMBER: They serve a useful purpose.

Mr. NEILL: They serve a useful purpose. It will hurt the success of the scheme if it is demonstrated that a certain class of people are compelled to sell for less than they pay, and these men who have written to me show, without any trouble, that to be the situation.

While I have the floor I wish to put another situation before the minister. I do not quite know how he comes to have control of this matter, but in these days one is liable to find any department under any minister. I rang up a department yesterday and asked the young lady what minister a certain branch came under, and she courteously said she did not know but she would find out. Half an hour later she told me it was under a totally different minister from the one I anticipated—which information I afterwards found to be wrong.

The minister has become heir in some way to the war-time prices and trade board, which board is responsible for the prohibition of the export from British Columbia of dogfish and soupfin sharks' livers. It has been the subject of a brief presented by the fishermen; no doubt he has seen it. To put it as shortly as possible, the board have put a prohibition on the export of these livers to the United States market. Apparently the custom was, in the early part of the war, to send them to the United States to be processed, on the understanding that the product would find its way to Britain where it is badly needed; it is a valuable source of vitamins. There was possibly some idea that this was not being done, that it was being retained in the United States, where they also have a shortage. At any rate the board put on an embargo.

The result from the fisherman's point of view is this. The price being paid by United States buyers to United States fishermen for dogfish livers is about 44 cents a pound, and for the soupfin sharks' livers, about $8 a pound, while the price to the Canadian fishermen for dogfish livers is about 11 cents a pound in the Vancouver area and for soupfin sharks' livers, between $2 and $3 a pound. They say the board has informed them that the embargo is temporary and may be lifted in the future. The result will be that the dealers who have been buying these commodities in British Columbia will make an enormous profit, and the fishermen will be out the difference between 11 and 44 cents. They suggest one or two remedies: either lift the embargo, or allow clearance for Canadian vessels so that they can fish in the same areas and take the catch to the United States, or that the government should buy this stuff at United States market prices.

It does appear to be one of those cases which call for recognition of the fact that when a man has produced or caught or grown something, he should be permitted to market it to the best advantage. The difference in price is due entirely to this embargo; in other words, our fishermen are suffering as a consequence of this step having been taken. It may be argued that it is necessary to retain this in Canada so that it may find its way to Britain; but we have only two small plants in British Columbia handling this article, one in Prince Rupert and, I think, two in Vancouver; they are processing it only to what might be called a minor extent, I believe ultimately it has to be sent east before the process can be completed.

These fishermen have made out a good case from their point of view. They say it is not fair that they should be the goats to such an enormous extent. Of course we know this is war time and we must protect ourselves and the British nation; but the idea seems to be that it is going to Britain anyway, that the embargo is going to be lifted shortly, and in the meantime these men who have been buying it up in British Columbia will reap an enormous profit. Therefore I should like the minister at least to promise to look into the matter, which is rather complicated. If he will study the brief he will see the argument they have put forward. This seems to be a fairly genuine case, and I believe the fishermen are entitled to the very best price the market will provide.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I read over the brief last night, and I have sent for some information with regard to it. There are some things about the brief which I do not understand, and in order to understand it I require some information from the war-time prices and trade board, which I have not received as yet. I will look into the situation.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): For a few moments I should like to refer to one or two features of the public policy of the Minister of Finance which have developed since the house met last June. Last night St. Paul's hall in Yorkville, where Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, a former finance minister, used to speak, was destroyed by fire. It was in the Prime Minister's old constituency of York East, and where he used the phrase, "I had to sleep on the strong-box." It seems to me that since the war started, many of the old policies of the Liberal party have been gradually discarded in favour of national socialism. We had a victory loan not long ago, with a great flourish of trumpets and the usual posters, billboards, full-page advertisements, military parades, bands and so on, which, according to a return brought down by the minister, yielded almost $900,000,000. It cost eight and a quarter million to put over. In that return, however, the minister forgot to include the cost of the troops, a huge sum all over Canada, who were used for publicity stunts at a time when they should have been training for active service. They are used also from time to time in the war savings certificates campaign, and I protest against that sort of thing.

There is no coordination between the various government departments. The minister is taking twice as much money as he should take from the pockets of the people in these victory loans, and in maintenance charges, in income tax and all the rest of it. I believe the victory loan cost the government too much, and at the same time I believe the rate of interest is not what it should be.

When parliament adjourned last June the government said they would take up with the government at Washington the possibility of applying lease-lend act to the understanding reached at Ogdensburg as it applied to Canada. They also said that during the adjournment an attempt would be made to see if the exchange regulations could not be eased a little, particularly with regard to amounts not exceeding $100, for the tourist trade. Now, after nearly four months, we find that nothing at all has been done to ease exchange or to allow Canada to come under the lease-lend act for part of its work of home defence.

I have charged that the minister is taking too much money out of the pockets of the taxpayers. Almost 45 per cent of the money he is spending on home defence could and should come under the lease-lend act, because that money is being spent to protect Canada's neutrality in case the United States is attacked by a foreign power, and is for America's defence. That is the basis of our whole defence policy. No effort has been made, apparently, to point out to the government of the United States that Canada is spending these huge sums of money on what is called home defence. Actually there is no such thing as home defence; it will not amount to a snap of one's fingers in defeating Hitler. We spend all that money jointly to aid America as part of its first line of defence were she attacked.

As I pointed out last June when discussing this department of the government, there is no coordination between the various departments. They seem to be able to spend as much money as they like and spend money like water. Where is the auditor general with his vast power? Every department has its own auditors. The auditor general is not fulfilling his functions under the Audit Act. What is the matter with the treasury board that it allows these huge expenditures? Not long ago we had the Minister of Agriculture announcing a policy which will cost the country over $100,000,000, and which is to be brought into operation by order in council. That money has to be found somewhere, and a large part of it will come from the income tax. The small taxpayer, who has to pay real estate taxes, interest on mortgages, insurance, and all that sort of thing, simply is not able to carry the load because he is taxed to death. Now that the government is taking so much more out of his pocket, with his fixed income he finds it almost impossible to carry on. I had hoped that during the adjournment the minister might work out with the treasury board some way of eliminating a great many of these expenditures, because, when all is said and done, a great deal of the money the minister is collecting for home defence will never be used to defeat the enemy. It seems that the various departments do not have to apply to the minister when they want to spend money. They simply say they are going to spend it, and it is spent. The Minister of Munitions and Supply goes ahead with a policy costing millions of dollars. He does not know how it is going to be financed and neither does anyone else. Then we have the Department of National War Services, which never should have been created, which does its work in a very roundabout way, duplicating the defence departments.

My principal point is that all the departments spending money should be brought under the control of the Minister of Finance and the auditor general. In the olden days that was the situation. I have referred to one minister of finance, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. In the old days there was some control; we had an auditor general, Mr. McDougall, who checked up on all these expenditures before a dollar was released by the finance department. There should be some central authority for all these commitments. In England it took nearly two hundred years of civil war before parliament obtained control over expenditures in peace and war alike. Now we are losing that control; we are here to-day and away tomorrow, and in the recess every minister just goes to work and spends money like water. Not by the widest stretch of the imagination could some of these expenditures be said to be for war purposes. As I have pointed out already, they are very largely for home defence, and home defence will never win this war.

In conclusion I should like to mention a matter which the minister promised to look into during the recess, because it reacts severely on soldiers and civilians alike. I refer to the question of a national moratorium on mortgages for soldiers and civilians. When I brought up the question last week, the minister replied that it was a matter of policy. I think it is about time he came down out of the clouds and obtained some control over these shark loan companies, some of which charge soldiers and others 200 per cent interest, as well as over the departments of this government that are spending so much of the money of the taxpayers.

I believe the greater part by far of the Conservative vote of this country comes from the working classes, who are paying a great share of the taxes being collected by the minister. I am one of those Conservatives who do not believe in the nationalization of our industries or of the means of production. Neither do I believe in collectivization or many of these other social doctrines which have been taken up by the Liberal party and have been expressed by the government since we met last June. It will lead eventually to the abolition of all private property once the government, through its many boards, abolish all private enterprise and thrift and retail and wholesale business with all these artificial barriers and burdens. I do not believe, once the government, through its boards and officials, control everything, we shall be better off. Nobody knows what expense has been entailed by the appointment of these various boards, and these dollar-a-year men. We have never had a return setting out the expense accounts of them all. More than that, the government's policy seems to be that a board a day keeps Hitler away. That would seem to be what is contained in the statement made to the house by the Minister of Finance, and it adds little or nothing to the war effort.

What has been the result? Hordes of civil servants and other government officials have been going round the country, and they are making a sad mess of the affairs entrusted to them and of business and private enterprise. It is high time that this house exercised its function, and put a stop to some of the things these people are doing, because they will go much farther during the recess of parliament.

Under this policy of nationalization everybody will be working for the government, the land owner will disappear and the farmer become a paid official, if the programme is carried out to its logical conclusion. Large sums of money have been spent in the name of socialism—because that is all it is. If it is allowed to continue, and if it is carried out to its logical conclusion there will be great danger, and it will nationalize the means of production, the manufacturers and the banks. Why do our opposition not oppose it? I believe a certain ceiling of prices is necessary, if regulated.

It would seem that the government hope by taxation so to discourage the owners of land that they will be willing to abandon their properties on any terms. That is the way the statements from the Department of Finance must be considered. They hope that in the end the farmer will go out of business, the land owner will become desperate, and the whole country will be under socialism. As a member of the opposition I object to the fact that this vast life and death contest, this great war we are in, is being used as a means for bringing state socialism on a huge scale to Canada. I wonder why the opposition fall for it, and why they do not raise more objection to the inequality of it. Thrift, and the hereditary principles upon which this country has become great will have passed away, while this is taking place. I should hope that in the recess of parliament the Minister of Finance would assert his rights and prerogatives, and see to it that there is some coordination and central check in respect of these expenditures, and so reduce his budgets with a large share to capital and not so much to income.

[Mr. Church.]

Not only have we the boards I have indicated, but we have a joint defence board. It is binding Canada for the next hundred years, and doing it over the head of this parliament. Things are being done by it to which agreement has never been given by the House of Commons.

What is this lease-lend act? It is just what the chairman of the United States Senate has said. It is lease and lend, and he quoted Mr. Coolidge that they are simply hiring out money to Canada, for what? Canada is financing munitions for England. There will be a day of reckoning, and they will make a demand on Canada for payment under the lease-lend act. It will be pointed out that there must be so much from Canada for this war. They will not be satisfied in Washington with payment by old, obsolete ships, but will want gold, because the United States have nearly all the gold in the world.

This opposition is not doing its duty unless it asserts the Conservative principle of conducting this war on a proper basis. It may be necessary to do some price fixing, and if properly administered that would do no harm. But it should be done only to a limited extent, and certainly not to the extent to which the minister has gone.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Chairman, there are a few observations I intend to make respecting the matter of the ceiling on prices. I believe we all agree that the minister made a most able presentation when he placed before the house and country the order in council. It constitutes the greatest single act of regimentation that has ever been introduced in this country. Similar action has become necessary in various parts of the world. A similar type of legislation was introduced in Australia on October 8, 1939, freezing the prices as at August 31 of that year. While the principle is that of controlling the operation of the economic laws, nevertheless it has worked out in that country with a reasonable degree of success.

The information I have with regard to Australia shows that in consequence of price fixing in that country, the increase in prices of foods and groceries from the outbreak of the war until October 1, 1941, was about 3 per cent compared with an increase of over 40 per cent in the same period of the last war. For the cost of living as a whole, including rent, clothing and miscellaneous items, the increase since the outbreak of this war has been 8·6 per cent compared with over 30 per cent in the corresponding period of the last war, and wholesale prices in this war have increased by approximately 15 per cent compared with over 50 per cent in the same period of the last war.

As far as the principle is concerned, I think one and all are agreed that in the interests of preventing inflation some such legislation should be introduced. But I do not agree with the minister when he contends that the proper way in which to introduce it is by order in council. He says it would have been dangerous to have the date fixed by parliament, on account of the probability of evasion being practised. To guard against such a possibility, an order in council could have been passed fixing the date when the legislation would go into effect, before the legislation was brought before parliament. Then parliament would have been in a position, with legislation before it, for the members to discuss each and every clause, each and every section, and, through debate, suggest necessary changes.

It is hard to conceive the reason the government had in calling parliament together when only two days before the opening of parliament, through an order in council the most drastic regimentation ever applied in Canada was brought into being. Was parliament not to be trusted? Could parliament not be trusted to debate the matter, point by point, if the legislation was introduced in the ordinary way? The minister says, "Well, the government could not tell just how long parliament would argue." The date fixed, namely, November 17 as the original date for the application of the order in council, and now postponed to December 1, was far enough in advance to have permitted full debate.

If this matter had been brought before parliament, there would have been a real justification for the calling of this session. We could have considered such a measure item by item. I remember well that last spring when the Minister of Agriculture introduced his order in council with respect to summer-fallowing he introduced the regulations one day, and amended them before the print was quite dry. Then a new set of regulations was presented; then he added a further amended set, and finally issued a revised edition, all because the terms had not been clarified by debate. Why did the government not place this matter before parliament and give the members of the house an opportunity to discuss the several items clause by clause? I should like now to refer to one particular clause which I think is most dangerous. Section 8 reads:

> Nothing contained in these regulations shall be deemed to supersede any provision of any order heretofore made by the board or to derogate from any power conferred on the board by the war-time prices and trade regulations and—

This is what I object to:

> —without restricting the generality of this provision, the board, in its discretion, may vary any maximum price, may prescribe other or additional terms or conditions of sale, may exempt any person or any goods or services or any transaction wholly or partly from the provisions of these regulations.

That is a terrific power to place in the hands of any board, giving it the power to discriminate between individuals.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is necessary to meet the kind of cases mentioned by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) among others.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It may cover those cases, but it goes further than that. I repeat: It permits this board to exempt any person. I suggest that if such a section was necessary to cover such cases as have been mentioned, an additional provision should have been added to the section providing that all such exemptions shall be placed before parliament immediately or be published in the Canada Gazette, to the end that the dangers inherent in that type of legislation would be obviated. I suggest such an additional provision for the minister's consideration so that any exemptions would be recorded in a public way immediately, thus avoiding any possibility of discrimination.

The minister quoted with approval from the evidence given by Mr. Baruch before the house banking and currency committee at Washington on September 19 last. I have those representations before me, and I should like to ask the minister some questions arising therefrom. Mr. Baruch said:

> As a matter of basic principle, a price control law should make no exceptions. All citizens should be treated alike as part of one nation joined in a great emergency and every segment of our economy, agriculture, labour, business, should be treated as parts of a single, living, sensitive organism.

Further on he says this:

> Prices, rents, wages, commission fees, interest rates—in short, the price of every item of commerce or service—would not be permitted to rise above the maximum on that date. They could fluctuate below this ceiling.

What control is there going to be over commission fees, interest rates and so on? I do not know whether I read the order in council aright, but I can find no reference to interest rates.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Nor to commissions. The minister mentioned in his speech that it was the intention of the government to place a ceiling upon all managerial and executive salaries, directors' fees, et cetera, and that in a few days he would be in a position to announce that policy. I ask him to make that announcement while parliament is in session.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) dealt with agriculture and the prices that prevailed between 1926 and 1929. Mr. Baruch in his presentation before the United States house committee dealt with agriculture. When the minister quoted with approval from Mr. Baruch's presentation he failed to place before the committee the representations made by that gentleman in connection with agriculture. Mr. Baruch said:

> The over-all ceiling does not mean that the producers of agricultural commodities or labour would get less. If the cost of all things were kept down, they might get more.

And further on:

> Agricultural prices and probably wages will fall further than other prices—they always do.

He is referring to the period after the war.

> The ceiling for agricultural prices can be set at "parity" which has become an accepted principle and this same "parity" relationship can be retained after the war. Thus agriculture could shift from war to peace with a minimum of dislocation.

The Minister of Finance admitted quite frankly that he could not do very much for agriculture, that he was unable to bring this order in council into effect at an earlier date because he had to wait until agricultural prices had risen to a reasonable level. What about wheat? As was pointed out by one hon. member this evening, in consequence of a question asked of the Minister of Finance the farmer will receive a price not exceeding 77 cents a bushel on the domestic market. We are not dealing with prices abroad at the moment. That is the maximum price he can get, but that is not a parity price. In his presentation before the United States committee Mr. Baruch said that the farmer should get a parity price. What is the wheat farmer's position? I notice the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is present, and I should like to have his reply to this question. How can he justify the position which he took the other day in a radio speech when he endeavoured to show that the western farmer was getting a price of from 90 cents to $1 a bushel?

Mr. GARDINER: Does the hon. member want me to repeat the radio speech?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If that is all that is repeated, there will be very little enlightenment on the subject. The minister said that the bonus of 75 cents an acre announced recently was an income, and by adding the other bonuses already in existence the farmer would be receiving a price of 90 cents to $1 a bushel for wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not use the word "price" in dealing with that matter in the radio speech.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Advance.

Mr. GARDINER: Income.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: By taking the income and dividing it by the number of bushels, the minister ultimately arrived at 90 cents to $1 a bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not arrive at a price at all; I arrived at an average income.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think any farmer listening to that radio address was convinced that his income had risen to a level ensuring a price or an income of from 90 cents to $1 a bushel. The bonus is commendable as far as it goes; it is a nice gesture, and it will mean a considerable income to western Canada, but it does not give the wheat farmer any large additional income; it does not place him on a parity basis.

Mr. GARDINER: It gives them an income of $160,000,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the minister will be able to establish that when he gets his opportunity. I do know that the position in western Canada is this: The farmer depends mainly upon wheat; the cost of living has gone up 14·8 per cent since the beginning of the war while the price of wheat is little higher than it was at the outbreak of the war. He is poorer to-day, as far as his return is concerned, than he was at the outbreak of the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: His main sales are export sales.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am dealing with parity prices. In the United States parity prices are domestic prices, and the farmer there is receiving $1.17 or thereabouts a bushel.

Mr. ILSLEY: For information, would the hon. member explain what he means by the term "parity prices" in Canada? It has a statutory meaning in the United States and relates to a specific period, but in Canada it means whatever the person using it means by it, and I want to know what the hon. gentleman means by it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The term "parity prices" has a definite meaning by legislation in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The term "parity prices" is used in Canada to indicate that the farmer receives equivalent purchasing power for what he produces compared with a certain other period.

Mr. ILSLEY: And to what period is the hon. member referring?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am dealing with the present period, and to-day the return which the farmer receives for his wheat is down to a level a little higher than it was at the outbreak of war, while the price of the commodities that he purchases, by reason of the increases in the cost of living since the beginning of the war is on a considerably higher level. In other words, the farmer is in the position where he has not the purchasing power with the wheat he produces that he had at the beginning of the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question I was putting to the hon. gentleman was this. He has been using the term "parity prices," which as he says and as I said has a definite, specific, statutory meaning in the United States, where it is related to some previous period. The hon. member for Souris seemed to be relating it to 1926-29, either the highest price or the average price during that period, and I was seeking to learn from the hon. gentleman what he meant.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The average price for the same period which was used with reference to wages.

Mr. ILSLEY: The present order in council does not make any reference to 1926-29. I was just asking for information, what period the hon. member for Lake Centre was talking about.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have given my answer. I think the minister will agree that the freezing of the price of wheat to the level prevailing between September 15 and October 11 is detrimental to the welfare of the wheat producer, and I ask that consideration be given to fixing a price ceiling for wheat higher than the price prevailing between the dates mentioned.

Mr. ILSLEY: Consideration will be given to all questions like that as the policy develops, but I do not think there is any immediate prospect of wheat going higher than seventy-seven cents on the market in Canada, is there?

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, from various ministers we had a comprehensive review of the activities of the government. Some of the government's accomplishments have been very satisfactory while others have not been so impressive, at least to some of us. From the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) we have had figures of the production of small arms and explosives that were very good, but this war is not likely to be won by small arms but rather with tanks, aeroplanes, ships and heavy ordnance, but as yet, after twenty-seven months of war, our production of these arms is not so satisfactory.

It seems to me that the government should have cut out civilian spending at a much earlier date than they did. According to the bureau of statistics, in the month of September, 1941, we were spending one million dollars more on cars and trucks for civilian use in Canada than we did in the corresponding month in 1940. Yet the minister of munitions admits that we are in need of the steel for use in our shipyards. It seems to many of us that the government is following very much the same policy as it did in peace time; that is, doing nothing until forced to it by pressure of public opinion.

Public opinion in Canada to-day with regard to our war effort is much ahead of the government. I believe that the great majority of our people are prepared to see complete mobilization of our whole wealth and resources, both material and human, for an all-out war effort, and the government has had various representations made to it to that effect by various organizations across the country. The Canadian Legion made one of the most comprehensive recommendations yet made to the government, and I personally believe that it is one which the government would do well to follow. It seems to me that in Canada to-day, instead of having an all-out war effort we are still using the wasteful methods of the voluntary approach. We are spending on advertising and salesmanship, for instance, money which could be much better spent on war materials. In every paper we see pages of advertising trying to sell the people of Canada luxury goods. On other pages will be seen advertising by the government asking people not to spend money on luxuries. On yet another page will be seen an advertisement by the Department of National War Services urging the people to save the very paper in which we are contradicting ourselves. These things seem very contradictory to the man on the street. Surely we cannot call that an all-out war effort?

During the summer I have heard many expressions like this while travelling through Saskatchewan: "Why should I buy war savings certificates and save gas? The government will only use the money to hire another inspector and buy him gas to drive round." That is not the spirit that is going to win this war.

I think remarks like that were made largely by reason of the appointment of great numbers of inspectors under the acreage bonus scheme. During the last sitting of the house the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), when he introduced this scheme, told us that they would probably use the inspectors they had working under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, approximately one hundred, and it might be necessary, he said, to hire an additional twenty-five inspectors. As a matter of fact, however, we have inspectors for every municipality in Saskatchewan, and there are over three hundred, and inspectors I believe for every local improvement district in the province. That applies, I believe, also to Alberta and Manitoba.

When this government have demonstrated by definite action that they are prepared to mobilize the wealth and resources and manufacturing capacity of Canada for an all-out war effort without profit to anyone, they need have no fear about the mobilization of the human resources of this country. If we are to have an all-out war effort, which is the objective of all members of this house, we must have in Canada much greater equality of sacrifice than we have at the present time. This year we floated in Canada one of the largest war loans in our history. Before launching the campaign the Minister of Finance did what I think was a wise thing. He called together some of the best financial experts in the country and business men with a nation-wide reputation, and they laid down plans for the campaign. They allotted quotas for the various provinces. The quota for Saskatchewan was, I believe, some $8,000,000, and for Ontario some $300,000,000. The population of Saskatchewan was between 900,000 and 1,000,000 and the population of Ontario about 3,000,000. These people realize where the wealth of this country lies. As a matter of fact, there were several companies in this country, I believe, each of which was able to subscribe more to our war loan than the quota allotted to a million people in Saskatchewan.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the hon. member this question: Are they not the big insurance companies, which represent hundreds of thousands of policyholders, whose money it is?

Mr. WRIGHT: Some of them were. Some of them were mining companies engaged in operating and exploiting the natural resources of this country. I believe the McIntyre mine was able to subscribe some $5,000,000 to our war loan. Certainly that did not come out of the small policyholder.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may interrupt, my recollection is that the insurance companies subscribed for $120,000,000 worth of bonds.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Did they resell the bonds afterwards? Did the minister say?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say, because I do not know that. I would be astonished if they had. Some may have been sold, not very much, I think.

Mr. WRIGHT: It still remains a fact that these people realized that Saskatchewan, containing a million people, could afford to raise only $8,000,000 because in that province we are engaged largely in agriculture, and agriculture during the last ten years has been the most poorly paid industry in this country. The leader of the opposition stated that it was the insurance companies which were taking out the most of these loans. As a matter of fact, I saw a report in the paper yesterday that the profits in the first nine months of this year of the International Nickel company were $25,000,000, and they had listed among their assets some $32,000,000 of treasury bills and securities. That is more than is held, I believe, by the million people in Saskatchewan. I cannot agree that there is any equality of sacrifice in this country while these conditions prevail. I believe that if, at the beginning of this war, the government had taken over every resource in Canada and had then called in the best brains of this country to plan intelligently their very best use, without regard to any private interest or advantage to any section or class in this country, we would have had a very much more effective war effort.

It seems to many of us that the war effort has been held up by the refusal of industry, in many instances, to expand their plants beyond a capacity which they believe could be economically used in peace time. After unnecessary delay, the government have had to provide the capital for the additional expansion which they require. Industry has been given charge of the building and the operation of it, and, upon the minister's own statement, has received the assurance that the use of this additional plant and equipment will be abandoned by the government after the war is over. It seems to me that if the government wish to raise money in this country to build these plants and their equipment, one of the best methods they could use would be to assure the people that when the war is over, this additional plant and equipment which the people have built and paid for will be used to produce the goods which at the present time we are being asked to do without. We could thus produce those goods and sell them to the people at a price which they could afford to pay. The government would get all the money they wanted if they would give the people that assurance.

I agree with the minister that it is necessary to prevent unlimited inflation. Nobody in this country believes in unlimited inflation. I do not agree, however, that the method which the minister has adopted is the best one. Rather, I believe that, before issuing the regulations, he should have consulted the people who are going to be most affected by this legislation. As far as labour is concerned, I understand that they were called in some forty-eight hours before the order in council was issued, and shown those regulations. As far as agriculture is concerned, they have not been consulted to this day. We have in the city of Ottawa here an office of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, established here for the very purpose that they may be in contact with the government and able to give advice to the government with regard to agricultural matters. As far as this government are concerned, that office might as well be in Timbuctoo as in Ottawa. They have not used it; they have not consulted with agriculture, and they did not consult with agriculture with regard to these price-fixing regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I can hardly let that pass without any remark at all. As a matter of fact, they have taken up at least three-quarters of a day of my time this week, from that office. They have been consulting—

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, after the regulations have already been issued. But before these regulations were issued, the office of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was not consulted.

Mr. GARDINER: The national federation of agriculture were here in September discussing the matter with the war-time prices and trade board.

Mr. PERLEY: What reply did they get?

Mr. WRIGHT: But these regulations were not discussed at that time with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: The possibility of setting a ceiling to the price was discussed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, gave a statement to the press on Monday morning, following the Prime Minister's statement over the radio, in which he said the federation had never been consulted.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not discussing what Mr. Hannam said. I said Mr. Hannam and the secretary of the federation were here and discussed with the members of the board in September the matter of a ceiling for prices.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But not to discuss these regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: These regulations would not be discussed with any organization.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is the point.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is the very point I wanted to bring out. These people represent organized agriculture not only here but over this whole dominion, and I believe that the government would have been well advised to consult them on problems of agriculture more than they are doing at the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I suggest, was there any organization they were placed before? My hon. friend is trying to indicate that agriculture was discriminated against. Were they placed before any organization?

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not know of any organization they were placed before. Evidently they were the government's own baby.

I should like to take up a little time with reference to the government's policy regarding agriculture. It seems to me that it is about as broad in its vision as the height of the minister who conceived it. Under this order in council P.C. 8527, prices are fixed at levels which have no relationship to the cost of production. In every other industry engaged in the production of goods for war purposes not only are these costs allowed, but a profit as well. I have in my hands a copy of the Economic Annalist for October, 1941, issued by the Department of Agriculture under the authority of the Hon. James G. Gardiner. It shows that, using 1926 as a base of 100, the price of farm products in August of this year stood at 72·1. Field products, of which approximately 75 per cent of the income of the western farmer consists, stood at 56·7, while farm living costs were represented by the figure 112·3. Now, according to the fall index of the cost of living, this figure has risen to 116.

I should like to give the committee the average prices of grain as compiled by the marketing branch of the Department of Agriculture, for 1926-29, compared with September, 1941:

No. 1 wheat

The average price for No. 1 wheat, basis Fort William for 1926-29....	$1.41
September, 1941.....	.72

The highest price to which it can rise under these price regulations is 77·3 cents. Other prices were as follows:

	1926-29	1941
Oats, 2 c.w.	.60	.49
Barley	.71	.52
Flax	$2.09	$1.55

This represents a drop of approximately 50 per cent. In 1926 it took 230 bushels of wheat to buy a binder; in 1941 it takes 700 bushels. In 1926-29 it took 700 bushels of oats; in 1941 it takes 900 bushels. In 1926-29 it took 610 bushels of No. 1 feed barley; in 1941 it takes 920 bushels. These are the prices at which the minister is proposing to fix agricultural products, at a time when their buying power as represented by what the farmer can buy machinery for is entirely out of line.

Not only that, but these regulations do not fix the prices of farm machinery. One of the most important items of farm machinery is the tractor. Tractors are imported one hundred per cent. If the price of these tractors in the United States goes up, the farmer here has to pay the increased price. Since the outbreak of the war, the price has already risen by about 25 per cent. If agriculture in Canada had been in a prosperous condition prior to the war, it might have been possible to carry on for a short time at these prices, but unfortunately this was not the situation. According to the Sirois report the average farm income for Saskatchewan for the four years prior to the war was, in cash, $102. If we take into consideration cash and kind, that is making allowance for the produce that the farmer uses from his own farm and rent for the house he lives in, it was $291. The fact is therefore, that agriculture to-day in practically every part of Canada is in a serious position, and in western Canada in a desperate position. The income of the grain growers has been drastically reduced. I know the Minister of Agriculture may produce figures to show that this situation is perhaps not as serious as some of us represent it to be. It may not be to the minister, who has a salary to live on as well as his farm, but I know the people of Saskatchewan, I know the conditions under which they are living, and I know those conditions are serious.

I should like, in proof of that statement, to give some cases which have come to my attention during the year. May I say that my constituency is one of the best in Saskatchewan, one in which we have never had a crop failure, have always had good crops, and in which a considerable part of our income is derived from dairy products and live stock, not all grain. This summer I went into one of the districts in which people from the southern part of the province have been re-established. I went to the chairman of the school board and questioned him regarding the school in that district. He told me they had built a new school there the year before. He showed me the register. That register showed that there were seventy-five children of school age in the district. They built the little schoolhouse themselves out of logs and made their own desks and blackboard. I asked him how many children were attending, and he told me that during the summer months they had an average attendance of about fifty, but during the winter the attendance had dropped to twenty-five. I asked why. Well, he said, the clothing allowance to the people of that district during the last winter had been $5 a head, a family of seven receiving an allowance of $35 on which to clothe the family for the year. Because of that the children could not attend school; the parents could afford to dress only a few of the brighter ones and send them. I asked what salary they were paying the teacher. He said that his own daughter was doing the teaching, that they had promised her $700 a year, the minimum set by the Saskatchewan government, but they had been able to pay her only $350 and had given her a note for the rest. To-day that school is closed, and in the constituency which I represent there are from three hundred to five hundred children who will not be able to attend school this winter owing to lack of clothing or because the school is closed by reason of its being impossible to pay the teacher's salary. The secretary of the teachers' federation in Saskatchewan made the statement that he believes that during this winter there will be probably two hundred such schools closed in Saskatchewan simply because the agricultural income in that province is not sufficient to maintain the educational facilities we should have.

Another instance I should like to relate has to do with the question of medical attention. In many districts in Saskatchewan we have no medical attention; people are thirty to fifty miles from the nearest doctor. This instance came to my attention this summer. In one of the reestablishment blocks, a mother was taken ill. In order to get her to a hospital the husband had first to see the relief officer. To do that, he had to travel some thirty miles. He went, got the order, came back, started to take the woman to the hospital, some thirty-five miles distant. They could not get in with a car. This woman was the mother of ten children and was expecting another child. He loaded her in a wagon and started to take her out to where a car could be obtained. She took sick on the way; he had to take her out on the side of the road, make a bed with some sheaves, the child was born there; he had to go home, get a manure boat with which he cleaned out his barn and take her back home on that manure boat. The child died; the mother is a cripple for life. In a country like Canada with our wealth and resources things like that are a disgrace. That is not an isolated instance. These conditions are a direct result of the prices that agriculture has been receiving in the prairie provinces for its products for the past ten years.

Mr. WHITE: You do not have to go to the prairies for that; we have it in Ontario.

Mr. WRIGHT: So much the worse. The present policy of the government with regard to the prices of grain is simply placing the grain growing industry of this dominion on relief. In effect, it says to western Canada: "You produce grain at less than cost. We know you cannot continue to do it, so to keep you from starving we will give you relief in the form of acreage bonus or summer-fallow bonus."

I have never believed in relief; I have always believed that the work and wage programme is to be preferred. We in this group were called visionaries in the years prior to the war when we suggested such a programme. We were told it was impracticable, "Where would the money come from?" That sounds rather flat to-day, and I suggest that the present position of the government with regard to agriculture is just as weak. Agriculture does not want relief; what it wants is just what is being given to every other industry in this country, namely, a fair price for its products which will allow it to live and produce the food required for ourselves and for Great Britain in the increasing quantities that she desires. A price for our products in line with the costs we have to pay is essential to efficiency and increased production. Setting a maximum price below that point will certainly lead to decreased production.

In 1926-29 the average price for No. 1 butter, basis Montreal, was thirty-eight cents. The average for the past year was considerably below that. Setting the price of butter last year at a level below the cost of production resulted in an increase in the export of dairy cattle to the United States in the first six months of this year of approximately 35 per cent. All this is taking place at a time when Great Britain is asking for more dairy products. We are deliberately forcing thousands of people out of agriculture and into industry. In the district from which I come, and all through Saskatchewan, there are thousands of sale bills displayed, and I believe the situation is the same in Ontario. Every farmer living on marginal land or on land which has not been producing is being forced into industry. I should like to remind hon. members that when a dairy herd is disposed of, it cannot be replaced overnight; it requires from five to ten years of careful breeding. I feel certain that if present prices of agricultural products are maintained, within a year we shall be faced with a distinct shortage of dairy products in Canada, and Great Britain will still be asking for more of these commodities. In any agricultural paper in Ontario this belief will be seen stated time and again.

The actions of some of the boards and controls established by this government, for which the government alone must accept responsibility, have deliberately impeded the growth and development of the cooperative movement in Canada. This year our cooperative refinery in Regina has been unable to secure sufficient crude oil for its requirements and has had to buy large quantities of refined products from the regular oil companies while its own plant stood idle. The allotment of cars to the pools during the past year is another instance. As a result of this allotment, the handlings of the pool elevators have been reduced by approximately 40 per cent.

Finally, I should like to say that if this government are anxious to secure the cooperation of all classes and sections of this country in an all-out war effort, as they wish it to appear, they have the remedy in their own hands. Let them consult labour and agriculture in the same manner that they consult industry to-day. Let them cut out the petty political patronage which is rampant throughout this country. Let them demonstrate by concrete action that it is their intention to bring about real equality of sacrifice. We have heard platitudinous phrases coming from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Pensions and National Health. These are not enough. Here is what Hon. Ernest Bevin, who next to Mr. Churchill is the greatest leader of the British people to-day, has to say:

> This war has taught us that never again can we be complacent; that it is not in platitudes or phrases that the world's solution of injustice, poverty, and social inequality can be solved, but in wise planning, thinking and action of the nations actuated by these motives.

That is what we need in Canada to-day, more action and less talk.

Mr. KINLEY: I should like to say just a word with regard to that paragraph of the order in council which is really the adjustment clause, and which has been so vigorously attacked by the hon. member for Lake Centre. To my mind that is the redeeming feature of the order in council; it is the way flexibility is given to the whole picture. The leader of the opposition said this was an adventure which would have to be carried on by the trial and error method. Well, there might be an error, but there could be no trial without that clause, which in my belief is the provision which makes this legislation acceptable to business generally throughout the country.

One hon. member has complained about the retailer suffering on account of the fact that the wholesaler might have raised his prices during the four-week period, while the retailer did not. This clause can be invoked to remedy that situation; and furthermore, I have rarely heard of retailers being hurt very much on a rising cycle of prices. It is true that without this clause they might be hurt on some items, but only the items sold during a certain period. A merchant with a shop full of goods has many articles which were bought months and months ago at much lower prices. He will be able to sell these goods at the prices the ceiling of which was determined by the prices during that four-week period, and to that extent he will benefit.

I think we all agree that the principle of this legislation is sound. To a certain extent it is a managed economy, but this provision about which complaint has been made also gives to it certain regional advantages. Men possessing local knowledge, who are well acquainted with the conditions, can be appointed to the controlling boards. In this regard great care should be exercised in making appointments to these boards. At this stage of our war effort I cannot conceive that there would be any political bias shown on a board of this kind, but there might be some interest as between various classes of people in the country. For instance, the farmers might say they should have representation on such boards, and I think they should. Then there is the great body of unorganized labour in this country, who might say they should have representation and that organized labour should not have the whole of the say, although organized labour should have the representation to which it is entitled. I believe the success of the whole scheme will depend upon the way it is managed, which means that you must have highly qualified personnel on the boards distributed all over the country, representative of the people who are to be affected. The order in council refers to employers and employees, but I believe the minister might well give consideration to having primary industry also represented on the regional boards.

If the government makes an error, no one will be hurt more than the federal treasury, because it is a partner in every business in Canada to-day. As a matter of fact, the government is a financial partner in business, in some instances to the extent of 75 per cent. While industry may make money, it is imperative that industry be required to pay back a great deal of that money to the government. We are told that to-day over 40 per cent of every dollar earned must go back to the government for war-time needs, and probably that percentage will increase as time goes on. Therefore it will be seen how we must all work together in the interests of a managed economy which will give the greatest strength possible to the nation at this time.

Mind you, Mr. Chairman, this scheme is being introduced at a time when business is buoyant, when there is an artificial prosperity throughout the country. No doubt there will be some dislocation at the start, but there never was a more opportune time for putting legislation of this type into effect. Almost every business is making more money than it has made for many years. Prices are rising, or at least prices were allowed to rise to a great extent before this legislation was invoked. Therefore I say there could not be a time when this legislation would cause less difficulty or trouble than the present moment. In any event I suggest that it is better to have a little trouble now than a great deal of trouble hereafter. If we have the difficulties now in time of prosperity, and let business adjust itself, then, after the war, when the time of depression may come, because of this managed economy business and industry will not be in the inflated, ballooned condition which brought ruin to so many people after the last war.

This legislation is not an innovation. Most of the firms in Canada who were big enough to do so fixed their prices long ago. We recall that the Imperial Tobacco company fixed the prices of tobaccos and cigarettes years ago; and although it came close to infringing the combines act, that action had its virtues. Everyone was given an equal chance, because everyone had to buy and sell at the same price. The same is true of practically every nationally advertised commodity in this country. Everyone who goes to a retail store usually knows what he must pay for a nationally advertised product, and the price was controlled by people who had power to control. That was controlled in the interests of the merchants and the manufacturers. This legislation is a measure of control in the interests of the masses of the people in order that greed or undue selfishness shall not prevail in this time of peril.

I do not believe the legislation will be difficult to administer. Every purchaser is his own auditor, and every man who purchases will protect himself as far as he can. It seems to me that audit or control will be almost automatic, because the public will be alert and will try to protect its own interests.

I do see that this adjustment board will have to give supervision under certain conditions. I have in mind some seasonal products. We will say that the price of potatoes is $1 a bushel. A farmer may have potatoes to sell, but may decide to keep them until the new year. He must store them in the meantime and then pick them over. Ten per cent of those potatoes may be rots. He would throw them out and then market the remainder. It does not seem fair that the price of a seasonal product should be the same next spring as it is now.

Then, there are the fishermen. In the fishing industry it would not be fair that prices for fresh fish should be fixed in September and October, because the winter season is the hazardous time for the fishermen. That is the time when it is most difficult and hazardous for them to operate. It is the time when the merchant can do the most profitable fish business. The climate helps him in the marketing of his fish over long distances. Furthermore, the market during the lenten season is usually good, and the highest prices for fish are usually paid between the New Year and Easter. For that reason it seems to me that there would have to be some adjustments in the fish business.

There is a clause in the regulations stating that when the seller is the exporter there can be supervision. If a fisherman who is a primary producer brings in fish and sells them to a dealer at a controlled price, and the dealer, in turn, sells them in the United States market —and many of our fish go to that market, where the exchange condition is good, and the prices are rising and uncontrolled—it seems to me there should be some provision whereby the primary producer would get his share of that profit. I have no doubt that the regional boards will see that that is done. There again we can see the advantage of the regional boards which may make adjustments. That is the paragraph in the order in council, about which the hon. member for Lake Centre has so vigorously complained.

Then, I have comments concerning interest rates, about which a question was asked. The Bank Act fixes interest rates—although they may be high. I believe the act fixes the maximum rate at 7 per cent. This legislation is not to establish any new prices; it is to fix what was in vogue before. While we may complain about interest rates—and the wages of money may be too high in Canada, and perhaps in other countries as well—the people who would be hurt the most are the small loan companies who must charge more than the amount I have mentioned, and who have special provisions with respect to the loaning of money at a percentage greater than is charged by the Canadian banks.

It must be remembered that to-day raw materials, particularly base metals, are getting scarcer. I had some business to do at the steel controller's office the other day, and was told about the shortage in steel production. I know from my personal business that it is very difficult to get the goods in order to keep men employed. It is difficult to obtain raw material. Indeed it is only through a priority arrangement, when it can be shown that the work is vital, that one can get the goods to keep his men employed.

These being the facts, one can readily see that with an uncontrolled economy the prices of raw materials would rise, and at the very beginning of business, where the primary product is going into manufacture, there would be started a cycle which would cause inflation, and which eventually would stagger and destroy business stability in Canada.

I believe it will be found that the people of Canada will say that this order in council is a step forward. I believe that is clearly indicated in the interest shown by the public. War-time legislation with respect to taxation has destroyed the incentive for greed and selfishness. Business to-day is the partner of this government except—and I say this most kindly—some combinations which claim co-operative privileges, and do not pay any income tax.

But I do say that the Minister of Finance has caught the imagination of the people of Canada. I believe the alert people of this country have decided that in this war the provisions for the protection of the public in the orderly carrying out of business in an abnormal situation are meritorious and necessary. The minister has had a big opportunity and has performed a big task. I say we should feel that he has done a splendid job.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have received a number of complaints from farmers in western Canada respecting the arrangement with regard to instalment buying. It has been pointed out that it is impossible for those who receive their principal income from the sale of wheat to meet payments on a monthly plan. Would the minister make a statement as to whether it is possible to have a 50 per cent down payment, and then have the balance paid next harvest, or a year from the time the purchases are made?

Automobiles are now a necessity in many areas of western Canada. Tractors, too, must be used. I understand they come under the regulations, and I should like the minister to make a statement respecting them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have received a number of representations similar to those of the hon. member, and I have forwarded them to the war-time prices and trade board. I am informed that the matter of the amendment of the regulations is under consideration at the present time. Perhaps I am not thoroughly acquainted with the principle underlying the monthly payments; but I should think that the important elements are, first, the size of the down payment and, secondly, the period within which the remainder of the price must be paid. If that is correct, there is an opportunity for some amendment to the present provision for monthly payments, without vitiating the principle of the order. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: My impression of the regulations with respect to instalment buying is that they are not helpful to anyone, excepting the financing corporations. They shorten the time, but as far as I know, the commodity is not reduced in price for those buying on that basis. I believe when the time is shortened, and the financing corporations are given a better deal, it should be reflected in the benefit accruing to those who buy on the instalment plan. I do not know much about these matters, because I have not bought on instalments. In my view, however, that is a point which should be considered.

Mr. ILSLEY: The object of the order in council relating to instalment buying is not that of making it any easier for the purchaser to buy. The idea is to make it more difficult for him to buy.

Mr. MacINNIS: But there should be no objection to performing two functions at the same time, if it can be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: The matter of price fixing or price control is separate altogether from the matter of the regulation of instalment buying. There was a tremendous amount of durable consumer goods being bought in Canada on the instalment plan. Small down payments were accepted; long periods were given for the completion of the payments, and people were loading themselves up with obligations. They were buying goods which were using up valuable war materials. People were running into debt and making their futures very uncertain by entering into these long-term instalment contracts, and it was considered desirable to make the payments more strict. The objective there has nothing to do with the objectives of the price control regulations.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Has the minister given consideration to the effect of these price control regulations upon what is known as "loss leader" legislation in certain of the provinces? Some of the provinces have such legislation. In British Columbia in the last few years they have developed an act known as the Commodities Minimum Loss Act, the purpose of which is to prevent chain stores in particular from advertising certain goods at a rate below the cost to them, really using that method to sell their other products. Such a practice does not necessarily mean any benefit to the consumer and it was considered an unfair method of merchandising. The passing of this legislation brought about more orderly merchandising, and in the province it was considered a step in the right direction. The retail merchants now fear that these regulations will upset that legislation, the result being that retailers, large and small, will be brought back to the position in which they were some years ago. Regulation 5 (2) reads:

> No such federal, provincial or other authority shall fix or approve any specific, minimum or maximum prices or markups in respect of any goods or services without the written concurrence of the board.

That would seem to be in direct conflict with the language of the British Columbia act, which states in section 3:

> No retailer shall offer for sale, sell, or keep for sale in the province any grocery product at a price less than five per centum above the cost of the same to the retailer.

I believe there is a similar statute in Alberta. I ask the minister to give the most careful consideration to the provincial legislation. The dominion regulations should not be such as to interfere with that act. These retailers are to be found in all our cities and towns and are generally the key men and women in their respective communities. I am convinced that they are only too anxious to cooperate in making this price control effective, and they can do it far better than any other class. I think this matter should be looked into, and the minister should make sure that these retailers do not lose their present position by virtue of the new regulations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall bring the hon. gentleman's representations to the attention of the board. Before I heard my hon. friend speak, I was not aware that there was any conflict between these regulations and the "loss leader" legislation of British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: Was it intended that there should be no conflict between these regulations and the "loss leader" legislation of British Columbia?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that it was considered. There are provincial boards, such as milk boards, which fix minimum prices, and it was considered necessary to make sure that the war-time prices and trade board would have power to carry out its responsibilities regardless of the power vested in any local body. I think that was the situation which it was thought would be covered by that particular regulation. As I understand the hon. gentleman, he is suggesting that under the "loss leader" legislation of British Columbia it is illegal to sell below cost plus a certain mark-up, and that in that sense a minimum price is fixed by the legislation, whereas the regulation referred to by the hon. gentleman provides that any fixing of minimum prices is subject to the written concurrence of the board.

Mr. GREEN: That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not in a position to say that the board would give written concurrence. If the cost plus the mark-up brought the price above the ceiling, I suppose the board might not give its written concurrence, and to that extent there might be a conflict between the maximum price regulation and the "loss leader" legislation of British Columbia. I do not, however, think the regulation was framed with a view of enabling the board to break through that legislation. That is an accidental rather than an intentional result of the regulation.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that provincial legislation should be considered as being stronger than a regulation passed by a provincial board. When the act is working successfully in the province, I think it would be unwise to interfere with it by these price control regulations, certainly without giving the matter the most careful consideration.

Mr. GERSHAW: There is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister in connection with the control of instalment buying. I refer to the sale of automobiles. In many ranching and farming districts the distance between the homes of the settlers and the market towns is considerable. Automobiles are needed, not for pleasure but to carry on the business of farming or ranching. The regulations provide that instalment payments shall be made at rather short intervals, whereas the average rancher or farmer has money at practically only one season of the year, when he sells his live stock or the product of his farm. Automobile dealers feel that this regulation will bring about a great change in their method of doing business and will prevent many people who need cars in their business from getting them. When this matter is being considered I hope that this situation will not be overlooked.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can assure my hon. friend that the matter is being given consideration by the board at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister indicate by what method a price will be decided upon for a commodity which was not on sale in the period mentioned; for instance, asparagus next May?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to commit the board, but I think it is fair to say that there are certain seasonal fruits and vegetables which may be outside this order altogether. It may be impossible to make it apply to them. But that is a matter which will have to be dealt with by the board. I say that because it is obviously unfair to apply these regulations literally to certain fruits and vegetables which have a high value in one month, a very low value in another month, and perhaps had a very low value in the base period. I hope I am not saying anything which will be taken as a commitment or any intimation of what the board is going to do, because they must have complete freedom to work these things out themselves. But from the beginning it was thought that in the case of fruits and vegetables it might be necessary to go rather far in departing from the literal terms of the order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to support the view expressed by the hon. member for Melfort in connection with the controls which will be necessary. He mentions the attractive advertisements in newspapers urging people to buy certain commodities. I followed with a great deal of interest the minister's statement the other night and I entirely agree as to the evils of inflation, but I think even further controls are going to be necessary and I think they should be introduced.

I have before me the bureau of statistics' August, 1941, report of monthly sales of new motor vehicles in Canada, and I find that new motor vehicle sales in Canada during August, 1941, excluding deliveries to the government for war purposes, numbered 7,222 new vehicles, an increase of 45 per cent in number and 56 per cent in dollar value over August, 1940. There is also another report giving a comparison of retail sales in Canada for the period January to September, 1941, compared with the period January to September, 1940, and it contains some alarming figures. Boot and shoe stores have increased their sales by 18·5 per cent; candy stores, 18·4 per cent; men's clothing stores, 21·8 per cent; women's clothing stores, 19·4 per cent; department stores, 17·8 per cent; drug stores, 15·7 per cent; furniture stores, 14·4 per cent; grocery and meat stores, 14·1 per cent; hardware stores, 18 per cent; radio and electrical stores, 17·1 per cent; restaurants, 16·1 per cent; variety stores, 21·3 per cent.

A comparison of retail sales of boot and shoe stores and jewellery stores for September, 1940, and September, 1941, shows that in the maritime provinces boot and shoe stores have increased their sales by 19·1 per cent; jewellery stores, 43·8 per cent; Quebec, 17·9 and 21·2 per cent respectively; Ontario, 15·1 per cent and 24·5 per cent; prairie provinces, 19·3 per cent and 16·3 per cent; British Columbia, 16·2 and 44 per cent respectively.

These statistics indicate that the consumption of goods has proceeded at a very remarkable rate right across the country, and therefore I think that, in addition to the controls which the minister has outlined, it is going to be necessary to control the manufacture of these commodities. When one considers the need for mechanized equipment for the army, an increase of 45 per cent in the number of motor vehicles sold indicates that we have a very large number of workers and a large amount of material going into the production of these motor vehicles which are sold chiefly or to a very large extent for pleasure purposes and using material which should be devoted to war purposes.

I have here a very interesting article on "Economic Organization for Total War" by E. F. Penrose, economic adviser to the International labour office. I might mention to the committee that this is the international organization with head offices in Geneva until war broke out, which our government have been supporting financially. Mr. Penrose in his article discusses methods of restricting consumption, and says:

> There should be no reduction but an increase in the consumption of basic necessities by those who at present consume less of them than is required to maintain health and efficiency. Next, as regards the incomes of those who earn more than is required for the maintenance of health and efficiency, the higher the income the greater should be both the absolute and the proportionate reduction of the amount left available for consumption, up to a certain level above which no further income should be left for consumption.

I know that the minister considers he has gone a long way in increasing the income tax, but I feel that he will have to go a great deal further because people with large incomes are still left in the position where they can go into the market and buy luxury goods, thus forcing up the price level and creating a serious problem with which the minister will have to reckon. That will be in addition to the schemes he has so far devised.

Mr. Penrose goes on to discuss the different types of methods that can and should be followed. He mentions the rationing of consumer goods, and says:

> Rationing of consumers' goods subject to war scarcity is essential in communities in which income is unequally distributed, to ensure necessities to the lower income groups and to prevent hoarding and remove the need for queues.
> Rationing of raw materials is also an effective weapon in the hands of the central government, for the purpose of controlling private business in war-time with a view to maximising the production of war goods and minimising the production of consumers' goods which can be foregoing with least injury to the public. This form of control is speedier and more direct than one based on fiscal and financial measures alone.

He goes on to examine the effect of taxes and loans on the distribution of the restriction of consumption among different income groups, and says:

> The distribution of the restriction of consumption has to be examined from the standpoints of equity and of the efficient conduct of the war. Voluntary loans have the advantage over compulsory loans and taxation, of facilitating adjustment between persons of similar incomes but different financial responsibilities and different future prospects. But they have the grave disadvantage of allowing less conscientious persons to continue a higher level of consumption than more conscientious persons; this is both inequitable and prejudicial to the conduct of the war.
> Voluntary lending tends to produce unfavourable results on the distribution of income after the war, since high income groups are in a better position to save than low income groups.

Regarding taxation and social justice he says:

> First, incomes below the minimum amount necessary to purchase a specified standard of consumption goods should be exempted. Second, above this minimum the higher the income of the individual, the more should his previous consumption of goods and services be restricted. . . . On grounds of equity the entire amount of very large incomes above a certain point should be taken.

There are people in Canada who are not willing to accept that, but I should like to repeat that they are the people to whom Canada has been very kind; they have a great deal at stake and should be prepared for much higher income taxes. Mr. Penrose goes on to say:

The majority of economists have held that high income taxes do not reduce the efforts of business men, since the tax is only imposed on income actually received. However, this view has been criticized on the ground that high taxation diminishes net yields to invested funds and thus reduces the advantages of investing over holding cash idle. . . .

But on grounds of equity it cannot be claimed legitimately that customs and excise duties are the best means of restricting the consumption of things which produce harmful physical effects if consumed in excessive quantities.

Then he mentions the sales tax as unfair taxation, and says:

Financial policy should aim at preventing as far as possible price rises that give opportunities for excess profits, and excess profits should be subject to a one hundred per cent tax.

The argument that entrepreneurs will relax their efforts in war emergencies unless they are permitted to make large incomes in excess of the amount they pay in taxes implies that, as a class, business men are less willing than other sections of the community to make sacrifices to save the community in the hour of need.

As I said, I think the minister is going to have to go a great deal further than he has as yet gone. I realize that there are grave dangers in giving to a board the very wide powers which have been given, but the minister well stated the alternatives, and I think we should not be unduly concerned as long as those boards are appointed by governments which are elected in a democratic way, and as long as the elected representatives of the people have controls over those who are devising and enforcing the regulations. In a democracy, although members may be critical of government policies, we have to bow to the will of the majority and hope that those who have been granted very wide powers will use them in the best interests of the democracy, and to enable our democratic country to make its greatest contribution in this very critical time.

I submit this point of view to the minister because I anticipate that he will have a great deal of pressure from other groups who are going to be constantly complaining that these regulations interfere with profits. I imagine that representations are made by thousands of people who say, "We are not going to be able to make the profits we formerly made." But sacrifices have to be made by all groups in the community in the present emergency, and those best able to do so should make the greatest sacrifices.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask the minister whether he believes that by December the first the board will be in a position to indicate fairly well their attitude, so that there will be some opportunity of planning for the future, as regards seasonal commodities such as fruits and vegetables?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so, yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: I believe that would relieve the situation.

The committee rose and obtained leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, November, 14, 1941

The house met at three o'clock.

GASOLINE

RESTRICTION OF DELIVERIES TO SERVICE STATIONS SUSPENDED

On the orders of the day.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a short statement. In my statement of November 7 to the committee I pointed out that the present system of controlling gasoline consumption by cutting deliveries to service stations, while effective from the viewpoint of reducing gasoline consumption, is not satisfactory either to the service stations or to the public. The system places the problem of rationing supplies on the shoulders of the service stations, and rationing to the public may or may not be equitable, depending on the policy adopted by the service station operator. At the same time I stated that a system of coupon rationing will be introduced as soon as necessary preparation for so doing can be completed.

The situation has been reviewed in the light of present stocks of gasoline, prospects of future deliveries, and lower gasoline consumption through voluntary conservation, and account has been taken of the fact that winter weather is in itself effective as a control on use of gasoline for pleasure driving. Fortunately, there has been no recent change for the worse in the prospect of transportation facilities, on which our supply situation depends.

Taking all these factors into account, it has been decided that regulations restricting deliveries of gasoline to service stations will be suspended, pending introduction of the coupon system of rationing. The restricted hours of sale will continue as now in force.

The present situation still demands conservation. In my recent statement I pointed out that our refinery inventory position as of October 1, 1941, is 1,422,721 barrels less than at October 1 of last year. I also pointed out that the transportation facilities necessary to meet our requirements are short 3·5 ocean tankers of 100,000 barrels capacity each, after giving effect to the savings accruing from the Portland-Montreal pipeline. It is in view of the reduction in the normal demand for gasoline for private motor cars during the winter months, and my confidence in the willingness of the public to continue to co-operate, that the decision to eliminate quota restrictions has been arrived at. The lifting of the quota restrictions is directed toward saving public inconvenience, embarrassment to station operators, and inequalities that undoubtedly arise from the rough and ready system of curtailment that was improvised in an emergency, both in Canada and in the United States.

I make the strongest possible appeal to the public to continue voluntary conservation of gasoline during the winter months. I urge that no step that has been taken in the direction of voluntary curtailment be retraced, on account of action now being announced.

HIGHWAY ACCIDENTS

REQUEST FOR SURVEY AND WIDENING OF POWERS OF TRANSIT CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply arising out of the eighty-two deaths from automobile accidents which occurred in the city of Toronto this year. The minister now has a federal transit officer in Toronto making a study of the transportation system of that city. In view of the great loss of life from this cause throughout Canada will the Minister of Munitions and Supply study the question of widening the powers of the federal transit officer, so that when parliament meets in January we may have a survey made and a report given to the high court of parliament on that great scandal in Canada? Will the minister study the matter along these lines and give a reply?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to look into that.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BERTRAND

REFERENCE TO USE IN BROADCAST ADDRESS OF DOCUMENT IN HANDS OF INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) made a statement in the house, and has asked questions respecting a document that I read in a radio speech made by me some time this summer, and I believe the hon. member's statement reflects on my character. Had I been in the house when the hon. member spoke I would have answered him immediately.

The reference was to a document I used in two broadcast speeches on the network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation last summer. I had known about this alleged secret document long before it was ever discussed in the committee on the defence of Canada regulations. As a matter of fact, as a member of that committee I asked repeatedly that the officers of the Department of Justice read the document to the committee, because I thought it was important that they should know about it. After it was read to the committee I asked permission to speak about the document on the radio, and I obtained it from an officer of the Department of Justice. My addresses before they were given on the air were sent to the mounted police, received their approval and were then returned to me. So that I did not commit any breach of secrecy or anything of the kind. After I had given the addresses, all the daily newspapers in Montreal and in the province of Quebec spoke very favourably about them, and asked that more of these documents be given to the people so that they would understand why the regulations are so strict.

I do not feel that I have committed any breach of secrecy in the matter, and I take this opportunity of making that clear to the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES OF ALLIED BRASS COMPANY, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I am informed that twenty-six men, employees of the Allied Brass company, in Montreal, have been laid off because of lack of work. I am informed that the Allied Brass company is a government-owned plant operated on a managerial fee basis by the Canada Wire and Cable company of Montreal. It manufactures brass caps for shells. Can the minister tell the house the reason for this lay-off? Is it because of a shortage of materials, or because it is considered that we have all the shell caps that are needed?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I can assure my hon. friend it is not due to any lack of material or lack of orders; but I have no knowledge of the matter in question. I shall be glad to make inquiries, and possibly give, later in the day, the information my hon. friend requires.

INTERNMENTS

PETITION OF CERTAIN PERSONS INTERNED IN HULL, QUE.

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is in order at this time to place a petition before hon. members of the house. So far as I have been able to ascertain the petition is quite in order, under standing order 68. It begins with the usual superscription to "The honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled," and then goes on in the usual manner, stating that the "petition of the undersigned humbly sheweth," and so on.

The subject matter is set out in several paragraphs, as is usual with petitions, and it concludes with the formal prayer. In this instance the petitioners are citizens of Canada now interned in the gaol in the city of Hull, Quebec. It is signed by seventy-eight men.

The material allegations contained in the petition are briefly these: That these anti-fascists have been interned for, some of them, as long as seventeen months. First they were interned with anti-fascist prisoners of war, and since August 20, 1941, in the gaol in the city of Hull, Quebec. They have sent sworn affidavits to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member is not permitted to read the text of the petition. She may present it, however, as briefly as possible.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am not reading the petition. I am simply placing the contents of it before the house in brief form. I have looked up the proceedings in Hansard, and I have found that when the petition with respect to old age pensioners was brought to the house the allegations contained therein were stated by the hon. member who presented the petition. I am doing the same thing.

The SPEAKER: The hon. member has already stated sufficiently the contents of the petition, so that hon. members may understand what it contains. I suggest that she should now lay it on the table of the house.

Mrs. NIELSEN: So far I have mentioned only one of the allegations contained therein; there are a few more. May I be permitted to proceed?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must realize that at present there is nothing before the chair. The petition should be sent in, to see that it conforms with the requirements respecting such petitions, and so that the house may have an idea of what it contains. After the petition is laid on the table there will be opportunity to decide whether it falls within the rules respecting petitions, and therefore I suggest that the hon. member lay it on the table.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you deny me the right to mention the allegations?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not denied a right. All I have said is that the hon. member, in the statement she has given, has summarized the contents of the petition to an extent sufficient to enable hon. members to judge of its contents. That is sufficient for her purposes. A petition laid on the table of the house is a document of the house which any hon. member may read in its entirety.

Mrs. NIELSEN: But I understand that I am complying fully with the regulations set out in standing order 68.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is complying with the regulations respecting the form of the petition, and I believe she has already stated its contents. That is in conformity with the rules of the house. But having made the contents of the petition known to some extent I suggest it is then the duty of the hon. member to lay it on the table of the house, so that hon. members may satisfy themselves as to what it contains.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I really am sorry to have to persist, but I see no reason why this petition should not be treated the same as the petition respecting old age pensioners, because on that occasion the hon. member who presented the petition did read a number of the allegations contained therein. Possibly they were not read actually as presented, but they were stated briefly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will have to accept my ruling, which is in compliance with standing order 68 (7) which reads:

On the next day following the presentation of a petition the clerk of the house shall lay upon the table the report of the clerk of petitions upon the petitions presented and such report shall be printed in the votes and proceedings of that day. Every petition so reported upon, not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this house, and which, according to the standing orders or practice of this house can be received, shall then be deemed to be permitted to be read and received.

I must rule that the hon. member has satisfied the requirements of the standing order in respect of the form of the petition. I would now ask her to lay it on the table of the house.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Do you mean, Mr. Speaker, that I am not allowed to quote the form of the prayer at the end of it?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is entitled to quote the prayer; that is part of the requirements in connection with the petition. But I suggest she may not read the contents of the petition.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I will proceed to read the prayer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment, please. I think it is important that we should follow the rules of the house. Standing order 68 reads as follows:

(1) A petition to the house may be presented by a member at any time during the sitting of the house by filing the same with the Clerk of the House.

That is the first step.

(2) Any member desiring to present a petition in his place in the house must do so during routine proceedings and before introduction of bills.

(3) On the presentation of a petition no debate on or in relation to the same shall be allowed.

(4) Members presenting petitions shall be answerable that they do not contain impertinent or improper matter.

(5) Every member presenting a petition shall endorse his name thereon.

(6) Petitions may be either written or printed; provided always that when there are three or more petitioners the signatures of at least three petitioners shall be subscribed on the sheet containing the prayer of the petition.

The following is a paragraph to which I should like to direct Your Honour's attention:

(7) On the next day following the presentation of the petition the Clerk of the House shall lay upon the table the report of the clerk of petitions upon the petitions presented and such report shall be printed in the votes and proceedings of that day. Every petition so reported upon, not containing matter in breech of the privileges of this house and which, according to the rules or practice of this house, can be received, shall then be deemed to be permitted to be read and received.

(8) No debate shall be permitted on the report but a petition referred to therein may be read by the Clerk of the House at the table, if required; or if it complain of some present personal grievance requiring an immediate remedy, the matter contained therein may be brought into immediate discussion.

I could read several citations that refer to the matter, but the rule is as clear as it can be. A petition must be presented to the Clerk of the House, and until the Clerk of Petitions has reported to the house that it is correct in all its form it cannot be discussed one way or the other. Your Honour has ruled accordingly, and your ruling should be respected.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should lay the petition upon the table.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I have not finished reading the prayer.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member will have to lay the petition on the table in accordance with the rules without any further comment.

(The petition was laid on the table.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Would the Prime Minister indicate to the house whether we are to sit to-morrow if we do not finish our business to-day, or adjourn until Monday?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If we do not conclude our business this afternoon, the house will sit to-night, and I would hope that the house would give its unanimous consent to sitting to-morrow if we do not conclude to-night. If that unanimous consent is not given, then the proceedings will run over to next week. Hon. members will understand that the government has many matters to which it wishes to give attention. Ministers have been constantly in the house this and last week and all of us are desirous of getting on with some of the war work in other directions. Therefore I think the more the house can expedite its proceedings, the better.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

APPLICATION TO HAVE CERTAIN AREAS IN SASKATCHEWAN DECLARED CROP FAILURE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if an application has been received from the government of Saskatchewan to have a crop failure area declared according to section 4 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and, if so, will such area be declared this year?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Some weeks ago the Saskatchewan government made application to have an area in Saskatchewan declared a crop failure area and submitted a number of townships which they believed were under five bushels to the acre. A check is now being made by the officials of the prairie farm assistance office at Regina but the final report is not yet in.

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS

QUESTION AS TO PAYMENT OF COST OF LIVING BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the Prime Minister be in a position before the session concludes to let hon. members know what is being done about the payment of a bonus to soldiers' dependents? I know of many cases where these people have no fuel.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I believe it is the intention of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, to make a statement either later this afternoon or this evening. The statement is in the course of preparation at the moment.

Mr. CHURCH: It will be given before we conclude our business?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

THE WAR

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941—CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The house again in committee of the whole, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Chairman, I regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has left the chamber. Last evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that to-day we go on with the Department of Labour, but I had hoped to ask the Minister of Finance a question. However, as the Prime Minister is in his seat I can put it to him; in fact, my question rather turns on a statement which he made over the radio some three or four weeks ago last Sunday.

When the Minister of Finance was dealing with the price ceiling a few days ago I asked him if he would elaborate upon the question of rents. There are times when the Minister of Finance shows a little pettishness and he said he could not do it; therefore I had no opportunity then to ask him about a ceiling for rents.

The situation in Canada is that only about five per cent of the territory is under the rent controller. I believe the first rent controller was appointed in September of last year. I have written many letters asking that a controller be appointed for our district, which might take in the counties of Waterloo, Brant, Wentworth and Wellington, in order that an ever-increasing rent situation might be curtailed. The replies have always been to the effect that this was a matter for the municipal councils; if the municipal councils were prepared to recommend that a rent controller be appointed, such an appointment would be made. To my mind that was passing the buck; it was simply bringing the prerogative of government down to the level of local politics. The mayors, reeves and councillors hesitated to deal with this matter, and no controller has been appointed.

When the new rent controller was appointed I wrote to him and he sent me a most gracious reply. In fact, I thought so much of that letter that I had it published in the local press. It seemed to offer the assurance that rents would be controlled. The rent controller stated that the Prime Minister had made a statement over the air and undoubtedly when the various details were worked out, rent control would be set up in our district. What do we have now? We have the Minister of Finance coming along and placing a ceiling upon prices and a ceiling upon rents. But the ceiling that has been placed on rents is the rental in existence from September 15 to October 11. In the larger municipalities where a rent controller has been appointed a rental is set that represents a fair average level for that district as of one year ago. The order is therefore very unfair to people in those districts where there is no rent controller. Many people have had their rents raised to a point that is absolutely unreasonable, but there being no rent controller for the district there was no one to whom they could appeal to set a fair rental. The price ceiling order sets all rentals at the figure prevailing in the period of four weeks prior to the making of the order, and in that period rents were thirty, forty, fifty and in some cases seventy-five per cent above the rents that would have been set by a rent controller had there been one appointed for these districts.

I do not want to delay the committee, but I do feel that if we are to set a ceiling on rents the people of my district and of other districts similarly affected should have an assurance from the government that the board which is to regulate the price ceiling will have power to say to these tenants, "You have been charged an unfair rent," and power to say to the landlords, "You have charged too much rent and we will make a retroactive order applying to the months in which this high rental has been charged." Many tenants have come to me and said, "What am I to do? I cannot move out because I cannot get another house." I have said to them, "Stay there, because I am sure the government will provide regulations to cover such cases. You cannot move out because you have no place to go. Pay the increased rent which is asked, and which you have been paying for the last few months, because I feel that eventually the enforcement officers of the government will make the landlord repay to you the extra amount you have been charged and that a fair rental will be set."

I think we should have some statement from the government. The situation is a serious one, and it concerns the Department of Labour and the Minister of Labour because rents, of course, are an important element in the cost of living.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the subject he has mentioned is one which I think should very properly come up at this time. It is simply one of the many cases of which those charged with the administration of this policy will have to take account, and I would say to my hon. friend at once that I am sure the board of administration will look into the particular matter he mentions and similar matters with a view to seeing that whatever is done will prove to be as equitable as possible.

Mr. HOMUTH: Thank you.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): When I spoke in this committee on November 4 I asked the minister a question in regard to a statement made by him to the representative of the employees of the National Steel Car corporation at Hamilton. I read a paragraph of the letter which he had written to Mr. C. H. Millard which I should like to read now—it is very short—and I would ask the minister: Is this definitely the government's policy, and if so, how does the government harmonize it with the provisions of P.C. 2685? The minister in his letter to Mr. Millard said:

> I believe that you will understand that Mr. Brunning, as controller, could not negotiate with the union as a union, or sign an agreement with a union, but the regulations which are agreed upon between all parties should form fair and reasonable conditions under which the work of the plant should be carried on.

Now I read section 7 of P.C. 2685 of June 20, 1940:

> That employees, through the officers of their trade unions or through other representatives chosen by them, should be free to negotiate with employers or the representatives of employers' associations concerning rates of pay, hours of labour and other working conditions, with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement.

I should like to know if the government will recognize the regular trade union movement in this country in the matter of collective agreements in government-owned or -controlled industries.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The question which the hon. member for Vancouver East has asked is a rather broad one. It does not apply only to the National Steel Car Corporation of Hamilton to which he referred. The situation there is this, that the controller in charge recognizes two unions. One is the steel workers' organization for Canada, and the other the employees' association. I believe that in the majority the employees' association has the advantage. My hon. friend, however, brings up a question which has given me a considerable measure of worry, and one that I intend to ask the National War Labour Board to consider at the earliest possible moment when it starts its activities. I think my hon. friend and the committee know pretty well the situation in Great Britain; no union in government departments is recognized that is in affiliation with any outside union. In the United States the situation is a little different. They do recognize in some instances, and some only, unions that are affiliated with outside unions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Whom does the minister mean by "they"?

Mr. McLARTY: I mean the government in connection with the civil service. The problem arises in this country in connection, for example, with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the national harbour board, and other organizations, and what I propose to do as soon as the national war labour board is established is to ask them to make recommendations in connection with solving that difficult problem.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many different kinds of organizations will be recognized in any one industry? It seemed to me that the policy at one time was to take a vote in the industry. I understand that such a vote was taken in the National Steel Car plant under a board set up by the Department of Labour, and that the vote was four to one in favour of the steel workers' organizing committee as the bargaining agency for the men. But on the refusal of the controller, on the advice of the government in carrying out government policy, to make a collective agreement with the steel workers' organizing committee an attempt was made—how successful I do not know—to build up with the assistance of the government an employees' council or company union in that plant. I am just wondering how many unions are going to be recognized in any one particular industry. This is really a new policy that is being adopted by the government in refusing to recognize outside unions, if you wish to call them such, as the bargaining agency in any industry in which the government is interested.

In the case of the Canadian National Railways, the post office, and a number of other organizations, the government have been negotiating and making agreements with the unions for a number of years. It was not until last May, when a question was asked in this chamber with regard to the association of technical employees and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that I became aware there was a change of policy. To me it is an astounding state of affairs: no wonder that the situation existing between the Department of Labour and the organized labour movement of this country is as it is.

When the minister spoke on November 6, he chided both the leader of the opposition and myself for suggesting that there should be some compulsion in certain relations between employers and employees. I suggested that the matter of the recognition of organized labour should not be a question for either arbitration or conciliation; that once the employees had determined by a vote the bargaining agency, that agency should be recognized without further ado. But the minister says he is very much opposed to compulsion. Yet when I read P.C. 7307 I wonder whether the Minister of Labour is really opposed to compulsion; and if he is, I tremble for what is going to happen when he favours compulsion, because anything which is more compulsory than this order would have to go a pretty long way. I doubt whether either Hitler or Stalin ever issued an order more compulsory in effect than this order.

I am not going to read the order in full. It is dated September 16, 1941—and, let me point out, it was passed without consulting the national labour council, which was formed, we were told, for the purpose of consultation with labour in matters of this kind. The minister might explain why the council was not consulted. It seems to me that the national labour council was formed under protest, as it were, by the government. It always irked them to have to bring matters to the council. It was merely an advisory body, having no power and really no functions except to look at documents which might be placed before it. But it was a link between the government and organized labour, and, weak as it was, the government could not stand for even that measure of labour recognition.

Section 2 of the order reads:

2. If it be the desire of the employees to strike or to take a strike vote, they shall before going on strike or taking a strike vote notify the minister that such is their desire, and upon receipt of any such notice if the minister is of opinion that a cessation of work would interfere with the efficient prosecution of the war, he may order or direct that a strike vote be taken under the supervision of the Department of Labour upon and subject to such provisions, conditions, restrictions or stipulations as he may make or impose.

Pretty strong language for a person who is opposed to compulsion!

3. In any case in which the minister makes an order or direction as aforesaid, all employees who in his opinion are affected by the dispute or whose employment might be affected by the proposed strike—

That is fairly wide.

—shall be entitled to vote and the voting shall take place within five days from the day upon which the minister received notice that the employees desired to take a strike vote.

It seems to me that in a strike vote, only those employees who would be affected by any agreement which would be arrived at between the employers and employees should be allowed to vote. Let me tell the committee that representatives of the miners of Kirkland Lake had to come to Ottawa in order to have the ballot which was taken last Saturday modified. On the ballot as first prepared, everyone in the employ of the mining companies, including office workers, and excepting only the directors and the management, were included among those entitled to vote. The employees' representatives had to come from Kirkland Lake to the Department of Labour at Ottawa in order to get that provision changed. I insist that a department which intended to be fair or which wanted to be fair to the workers of this country would not stoop to that kind of tactics.

4. Unless a majority of the ballots of those entitled to vote are cast in favour of a strike, it shall be unlawful for any employee to go on strike.

That policy represents a new principle. Supposing we in this house adopted that principle, so that it required a majority of hon. members to pass any legislation which was presented to the house for approval; the consequence would be that a number of members, by remaining outside the chamber, could prevent any measure, although passed by a majority in the house, from becoming law. It is the most ridiculous provision of majority rule.

5. Any employee who goes on strike contrary to the provisions of these regulations and any person who contravenes or fails to comply with any of these regulations or any order or direction made or given by the minister thereunder, or who incites, encourages or aids in any manner any employee to go or continue on strike, or any person to contravene or fail to comply with any of these regulations or any order or direction of the minister thereunder, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

And the Minister of Labour is opposed to compulsion! I ask again, what is going to happen to the workers when the minister favours compulsion, seeing how far he has gone while opposed to compulsion? But I have noted, ever since this war began, that whenever the minister has to exercise compulsion, it is never exercised upon the employers, but always in respect of the workers.

I said the other day that there was not a labour organization nor a representative or spokesman of labour in Canada that had a good word to say for the Department of Labour.

I have in my hand a statement made by Mr. A. R. Mosher, President of the Canadian Congress of Labour, on behalf of the executive committee of the congress, with reference to the passing of order in council P.C. 7307. Mr. Mosher states:

In passing order in council P.C. 7307, which virtually abolishes the right to strike, the government had demonstrated once again its inability or unwillingness to understand the purpose and function of the labour movement and the basic principles which should underlie the relationships between employers and workers. Since this order in council imposes still further restrictions upon rights which have been won by the workers after generations of struggle and sacrifice, without providing any means of removing the causes of industrial unrest, it will have the effect only of increasing discontent and distrust in the minds of the workers, and thus hindering our war effort.

There is more to the statement, but I will not read further. However, it clearly shows what the congress of labour, one of the influential bodies of organized labour in Canada, thinks of the government.

I have also before me a statement made by Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the other large national body, following the issuing of the wage-freezing order in council. Mr. Moore says:

Both in its terms and in the manner of its introduction, the government programme is the longest step yet taken by any democracy toward the establishment of a totalitarian state.

Mr. Moore and Mr. Mosher are not radicals by any standard you may apply to them. As a matter of fact, they are very conservative labour leaders; they are responsible men. And this is what each of them says about the government's labour policy. I think it is time the Department of Labour took stock of itself; it is time the Prime Minister took stock of the Department of Labour and tried to change conditions that there may be more confidence between the department and the workers who make the munitions of war which our soldiers when on the field of battle must have. The morale of the working forces of the country must be kept up; otherwise I am very much afraid for our war effort. Not only that, I am also afraid of what is going to happen when the war is over. There is now a certain degree of government control, there is some social compulsion. The employers are compelled to give some recognition to organized labour; but when the war restrictions are removed the struggle between labour and employers will begin again and with greater ferocity than ever before in the history of this country.

Labour-industrial relations in Great Britain were mentioned several times in the house during debate. In the June 23 issue of the New Republic there appears an article by William Steele McCauley, an instructor in the department of government of Harvard. He had been allocated to study Britain's industrial mobilization and labour policies. His article is entitled, "Why Britain has no labour problem." By the way, I thought the article so good that I wrote to the minister and suggested to him that he should get a copy of the magazine and read it. I have not only read it, but I have read it many times.

In the first place Mr. McCauley points out that the reason for better industrial relations in Great Britain than those found on the American continent—conditions in the United States are pretty much the same as in Canada —is that the workers in Great Britain are better organized. There are 6,234,000 members in the British trade union movement, almost as many, with a population of about one-fourth, as there are in the two organizations in the United States, the American Federation of Labour and the Committee for Industrial Organization. Members on both sides of the house when referring to this latter organization speak as if they were referring to criminals or gangsters. C.I.O. are the letters first used to designate the Committee for Industrial Organizations. Industrial organization is the opposite of the craft form of organization. Mr. McCauley points out that in Great Britain the C.I.O. principle—that is, the industrial organization principle—has gone much further than it has in the United States, and as an example he gives the membership of the transport and general workers' union, of which Mr. Ernest Bevin, the present Minister of Labour in Great Britain, was general secretary before he went into the cabinet. Mr. McCauley points out that the transport and general workers' union is an amalgamation of 36 organizations, once independent, with a membership of over one million. It is regrettable that there had to be a split in the American Federation of Labour in order to organize the workers on an industrial rather than on a craft basis, but the evolution is an historical and economic necessity, because industry to-day is organized not on the craft basis, but on the basis of mass production. The fact is that machine production has eliminated a good deal of craft skill.

An agreement was entered into between organized labour and the government in Great Britain to end strikes. Perhaps I might read this paragraph to show what was done:

> It must be remembered that in England strikes were not outlawed by an impatient parliament overriding the opposition of labour. In effect, the workers, acting through the Ministry of Labour's advisory council, and Ernest Bevin, formulated and imposed the ban on themselves. As the British law has not yet been enforced, it is in fact merely a declaration of industrial policy.

Strikes are continually going on in Great Britain, but they are not strikes for the recognition of a union or strikes for the right of this or that organization to make a collective agreement with an industry. Mr. McCauley shows that in the first few months of the war there were five important strikes in aircraft factories, involving nearly twelve thousand persons. Four of these disputes resulted from demands for wage increases, and in no case did a strike last more than four days. In two instances they lasted only one and two days. I should like the committee to note this: in the fifth case nearly 1,200 workers struck for four days to enforce their demand that they be permitted to stop work in mid-afternoon to make tea.

Supposing that happened at the National Steel Car plant. What a cry would go up from one end of this dominion to the other! Why, I am afraid every member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association would have died of a stroke of some kind. But in Great Britain they find solutions for these things. A compromise was reached in this case, when the management agreed to send tea tables around the assembly line. What do my hon. friends think of that? The fact of the matter is that in Great Britain organized labour, and in fact unorganized labour as well, have reached the stage where they say that if the employer can stop off for tea in the afternoon —and all British employers do—we have the right to stop off for tea also. I have for many years been connected with a trade union, and I remember occasions when the union of which I was an executive was negotiating an agreement with our employer, who was an Englishman. About four o'clock in the afternoon, in the midst of our discusssions, when very likely we were lambasting each other, he would say, "Gentlemen, would you like to have a cup of tea?"

I wish to say that the situation that exists in Great Britain has come about because organized labour is recognized; and, indeed, Mr. McCauley points that out in these words:

> But the most important difference between the labour movements of the two countries—

That is, between America and Great Britain.

> —is that collective bargaining has been universally accepted in England as an essential condition of healthy industrial relations. Organized associations of trade unions are recognized and dealt with by organized associations of employers. British industrialists are not more tolerant than Americans, but they are more mature.

In other words they are more civilized.

> Britain years ago passed through her disruptive period of labour organization. The fear of labour as a subversive class has given way to the practical necessity of admitting labour's right to organize and to be treated as a respected element in the industrial community.

Until employers in Canada, and the government of Canada, come to the same conclusion, that labour must be accepted as a respected element in the industrial community; until they are willing to make agreements with labour on the understanding that labour is just as much interested in the welfare of the country as they are, and perhaps more so—until that time arrives, whether in war or in so-called peace, we can have nothing but industrial unrest.

I do not know if it is necessary for me to say any more on this matter, but I plead with the Prime Minister, because after all he is responsible. Some people tell me that I am foolish in appealing to him; they say he was the originator of company unionism on the American continent. But I leave that aside and plead with the Prime Minister to take stock of his Department of Labour, to try so to organize that department that it can obtain the cooperation and the respect of the organized labour movement in the Dominion of Canada.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I feel that I should take a few moments to support much of what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacInnis). It seems to me there is no question in Canada at this time which is of greater importance to the ordinary people than that of the relationship betwen industry and labour, and the amount of work that can be accomplished during the difficult days that lie ahead. It is all very well to put our trust in armed force; but to-day, in the type of battle that we are waging, no armed force is going to win a victory unless it has the necessary supplies, which the industrial army alone can provide. We have these two great forces, the workers and private industry, or the employers; and it is of the greatest importance to the nation at large that harmony should prevail between these forces if the greatest possible amount of work is to be accomplished.

As has been stated already by other hon. members, there is widespread dissatisfaction among the working people of this country. Labour has pledged its support unequivocally; time and again it has said there should be only one consideration in mind, that everything possible should be done. Not only has labour made statements; I am told by some men employed in war industries that the workers have taken it upon themselves to form in the various industries committees which discuss ways and means of increasing production in the various plants. They also consider methods by which they may eliminate waste, so that everything possible may be done to assist the war effort. Certainly it is something that should be appreciated, when we see the workers themselves taking the initiative in this drive for greater production.

I have listened to the reports presented in the house by the various ministers, particularly the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of Labour. These reports have been interesting; numbers of figures have been given with regard to production, with regard to labour and so on. But I must say that there is a great difference between listening to the ministers report to the house and going around the country talking to people who themselves work in factories. During the past summer I travelled over a considerable part of this country. I talked to a number of trade union leaders; I was a visitor at the two trade union congresses, and I listened to and talked with those who, with their strength, their power, their initiative and ability and skill, do the actual physical labour that has to be done. And I know that from one end of Canada to the other there is a growing unrest, a growing feeling that the labouring people are not getting a square deal, are not receiving the consideration from this government which is theirs by right.

This has been stated before; it is not a new thought, but I consider that in a time like this it is a crime and a disgrace that after two years of war the government have not enlisted the services of more working people upon the boards which help in the direction and promotion of the war effort. There is a labour supply council acting as an advisory body. Beyond that, where do we find the workers from the factories, the mines and the shops? Where do we have them actually advising the government, giving their opinions, giving their points of view, giving some of the help I know they could give? Where do we find them helping to cut down the waste and speed up production?

There is no use trying to get away from it: among the working people of Canada there is a vast reservoir of potential energy, initiative, intelligence, and skill, and I would say most decidedly that the government is not taking the fullest opportunity to make the greatest use of that vast reservoir of competence and desire. Thinking over the situation as it exists to-day in Canada I would say that the greatest dam holding back the democratic will to action on the part of the working people is the control of private industry and its practical direction—I might say its sole direction—of the war effort.

I noticed a short time ago something Mr. Priestley is reported to have said in criticism of the British government. Mr. Priestley is well known to Canadians, because he has spoken over the radio to the Canadian and British peoples. He has a criticism of the British government which I suggest could be applied with equal force to this one. In a brief paragraph he says:

Let me give you two examples that affect production. Firms doing essential war work are often allowed to think too much about what is going to happen to them after the war. They should be told brutally that such long-term planning now is disastrous, and that unless they concentrate entirely on the work in hand there may be no post-war for them.

To-day, in speaking to some of the trade union leaders across the country, and to some who come from the shipbuilding yards at Halifax and at the Pacific coast, I hear tales and stories of the men who check in in the morning and then idle their time away throughout the day because there is not sufficient for them to do. There has been a lack of planning, a lack of consideration by the government of the possibility of a full utilization of the workers' time. These are skilled men who want to work. There is nothing more demoralizing for a man than to stand around idly and not be able to get on with the task in which he has his whole heart and interest.

At the meeting of the trades and labour congress held this summer the representatives of the plumbers' and steamfitters' union were actually asking for a royal commission to inquire into waste and inefficiency at one of the Pacific coast shipbuilding yards. There was nothing but a desire on the part of the workers to eliminate some of the waste and to get on with the job which has to be done. While at the meeting of the congress I was given a brief which was submitted to the congress by the representatives of the Montreal aircraft workers, lodge No. 712. I should like to quote one or two paragraphs from that brief, because I believe it demonstrates first of all that the French-Canadian working people are just as solid as any other Canadians in their desire to give more than they are giving at the present time to the industry in which they are interested. I quote from the brief:

It has become evident to us that those in high places to-day have no formula for the winning of the war against Hitler. We present our views on the matter in the following statement, together with some of our proposals for the carrying out of a real campaign for victory. . . .

This war, especially as it affects us as workers and trade unionists, is a war of production—the difference between going forward to a better life, or of going backward to barbarism under the nazi heel.

This being the case, we in Canada can best serve our country and humanity by producing —for the brave British people and their allies—the greatest possible amount, in the shortest period of time, of all the armaments and munitions which we are capable of doing.

To this end every other consideration becomes subordinated—

Showing their desire at all costs to go ahead and give the maximum amount that they can do. It continues:

—even our very natural and healthy desire for improved social services, and a higher standard of living.

Anything or anybody who stands in the way of the production of war materials must be overcome or removed.

We in the aircraft industry in Montreal know that the production of planes is not a fraction of what it could be. We speak from our own experiences. . . .

There is the attitude of the employers toward the war effort. We have received the impression that certain of the employers in our industry are no longer interested in producing planes as fast as possible. Instead, they seem to be concentrating only on the possibilities of amassing huge profits.

Due to poor planning in production, mass loafing is enforced in certain spots. Often workers who are honestly anxious to get on with the job are forced, because they have no job to do, to read magazines or make trinkets for themselves.

Who is responsible for this state of affairs? . . .

Certainly it is not the employees.

The blame lies squarely on the shoulders of the manufacturers who, though they are themselves only learning how to produce planes in quantity, look with contempt on the workers who could supply the solution for 90 per cent of the trouble.

These people in the aircraft industry certainly want to give assistance, but they are being blocked by the owners, the industrialists who have sole control of the effort being made.

Certainly the workers in the steel industry are not working to the fullest capacity. There are times when the men in the steel and automobile industries are working only a few days in the week, and certainly are not working full time. In connection with the government's policy respecting labour it would seem that the industrialists of Canada who have control of the war effort, and of industry itself, are allowed to have such complete control. In many instances it becomes apparent to the workers that private industry in Canada is becoming more interested in the battle against labour forces than in the real battle against fascism.

The question of collective bargaining, which has already been discussed, is one which looms up as something of the greatest importance. At Kirkland Lake we have an instance of private industry in the shape of gold mining corporations versus the miners themselves. There has never been any question in my mind, or, I believe, in the mind of any thoughtful person, that the miners themselves are in any way disloyal. They have given their sons, and they have done everything they could. It is simply that they feel that the democratic right which belongs to them is not receiving the attention and the protection this government should be prepared to give it. After all is said and done, no one can say to-day that the mining companies in northern Ontario are not receiving a fair share of war profits. I notice in an article appearing in the Northern Miner of June 14, 1941, that the dividend payments by Canadian mining companies for the first six months of this year, after deducting excess profits tax, reached the sum of $53,775,773, an increase of over a million dollars over the same period last year.

In his speech the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) said that we are asking sacrifices of the workers. The workers are justified in asking this question: what sacrifices will the Minister of Labour ask private industry to make? If there is to be equality of sacrifice there is no reason why private industry should not be called upon to bear its share of the sacrifice. This thought has been expressed in certain editorials. I notice in the Fort Erie Times-Review some pertinent remarks with regard to the Kirkland Lake situation. This editorial, which is quite brief, reads:

> A great many self-appointed leaders of public opinion have been preaching on the subject of labour's duty to the country; have been insisting that, while this nation is at war, wage-earners have no right to strike; that any disagreement with employers must be composed by peaceful means which will not cause any interruption in production. In short, labour is told that its part in this war is to labour—under whatever conditions an employer chooses. To strike against such conditions is held to be a betrayal of the nation. But what is to be said of employers who have so little regard for the country's welfare or its war programme that they announce their unalterable opposition to the recognition of a union, and refuse to have anything to do with any conciliation proceedings unless they are first assured of having their own way—at least on that particular point at issue? Are men in the fighting forces and those in the ranks of labour the only ones who must make sacrifices in order that the war may be won? Must the worker make all the concessions—or be exposed to charges of disloyalty and sabotage—while the employer is free to sustain an intolerant, dictatorial manner with impunity, and without regard for the consequences of his arrogance?

This right of collective bargaining is something to which I am sure the Minister of Labour must give the most earnest consideration. The principle has been established already; I believe it was established back in 1919 by a royal commission. It was agreed to by the League of Nations and was covered by the treaties to which this government was a signatory. But it is not enough to have a principle enunciated. A short while ago I read a booklet on collective bargaining written by a very eminent Canadian lawyer, Mr. J. L. Cohen. He gave as a typical illustration the pedestrian versus the motorist. He said it was all very well to establish the principle that the pedestrian should have the right to cross the road and that the drivers of vehicles should not be allowed to speed and to take the life of pedestrians, but no government would be foolish enough to stop with just the declaration of that principle; it would be necessary to pass laws providing that vehicles must drive only a certain number of miles per hour, that pedestrians must be protected and so on.

In this struggle of the workers versus the employers, it is not enough to establish the principle, as P.C. 2685 does, that collective bargaining is agreed by the government to be correct; it is necessary that we should have laws to enforce the principle and to see to it that private industry does not ride roughshod over the democratic rights of the workers. If the labour policy of this government is not enforced by law, if the rights of the workers are not protected, then this government will go in the same direction that the government of Vichy went before the betrayal of the French people into the hands of nazism. Let us not travel in that direction. Let us not travel in the direction which limits and curtails the rights of our workers and leaves them unprotected. Let us travel in the other direction, the direction which Great Britain and the United States have taken, toward the protection of labour.

I plead with the Minister of Labour at this time. Before the house opened I went up to Kirkland Lake and spoke to hundreds of the women of that town, the wives of the miners and the business men. Those women are solidly behind the men in their desire to maintain peace in the town. They have no desire that their husbands should go out on strike. Nobody wants to go out on strike. The miners of Kirkland Lake have never wanted it. But if the gold mine owners are not curbed by governmental action, by governmental intervention, there will be nothing left for the workers but to retire to the last trench of democratic defence, which is the strike, and try to force democracy to function in this country. These women are afraid of the bloodshed and distress which may occur in Kirkland Lake, and yet I am happy to see that they stand solidly with their men in upholding the democratic rights of the workers.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East has indicated, much has been said in this country about the intervention of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. The international president of the mine, mill and smelter workers' union, Mr. Reid Robinson, was held up for several hours when he attempted to enter Canada. He had intended to go to Kirkland Lake to speak to the miners there, but he was questioned for such a long period of time that he could not keep his engagement. This received some comment in the United States. In the News magazine of Toronto of November 1, 1941, their Washington correspondent remarks:

There may be blushes up there in that big dominion of yours soon over the deportation of Reid Robinson. The head of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers is working on a programme which may make him a major contributor to the supply of vital armament to Britain.

Mr. Robinson is studying the copper situation. The article continues:

If the programme is as good as promised, Canada may find that in deporting Reid Robinson it deported a good friend of Britain and of its defence against naziism.

This talk against the C.I.O. unions and the work which they are doing had better be stopped. We are finding out that these unions are actually helping the defence projects in the United States. We should welcome anything of the kind that they can do instead of acting as we have done and trying to make out that they are disruptive and spoiling the war effort of this country.

There is no doubt that the working people can be forced to fight. The working people of Germany have been driven to fight. The working people of a democracy want to fight as free men and women. They should be given a chance to have some of the beauty and fineness of life which working people appreciate as much as others. The labour policy of this country is being criticized. To some extent we are being held up to ridicule in the United States of America. I do not know whether hon. members noticed the article which appeared this week in PM a magazine which has a large circulation in the United States. Under date of November 10 there is an article headed, "Canada Suppresses Labour to Fight People's War." I should like to read one paragraph to show what the people of the United States are reading about our government's labour policy. It is as follows:

Labour has been given no real representation in the determination of war policy, shaped by Liberal party functionaries and dollar a year industrialists.

While it has frozen wages and imposed other curbs on labour, the Canadian government has failed to enforce the declared right of workers to bargain collectively through unions of their own choice. After enunciating this right on June 20, 1940, the government has continued to disregard it, not only in private industry, but in its own war contracts and even in its own plants.

The article then goes on to say:

Canada has carried its war time restrictions to the point where they not only rip at the basic fabric of democracy, but threaten successful prosecution of the war against Hitler.

I would ask the Minister of Labour if at this time it is not all-important that our own Prime Minister and our own government should do everything to instil into the minds of the American people that Canada is leading the way in the western hemisphere. Articles such as this are followed with the report in Tuesday's paper that "Canada interns union leaders without trial"; and in Wednesday's paper that Franceschini, who had been interned, was freed; and in Thursday's paper that the Canadian mounties and the Minister of Justice teamed up on interning twelve union leaders. Of course the question of the internment of labour leaders does not come specifically under the Department of Labour but on the other hand you will find that the American people, especially their trade unions, are very much concerned about the policy of the Minister of Justice which has resulted in the internment of some of our labour leaders. In fact the concern over this in the United States is so great that a state representative of that country is going to intercede on behalf of one of the international unions leaders; that is in the case of Mr. Jackson.

It seems to me that all these things need to be considered so very much more by this government and that the expression of democracy with regard to our whole labour policy should be given with the fullest freedom. It is even said that certain conditions with regard to our labour movement are being used by the isolationist element in the United States with a view to preventing and impeding the fullest participation of the United States working people. This is something which I bring to the attention of the house. These articles have only recently been written, just this week, and I would advise hon. members to read them for themselves and judge whether the policy of our government with regard to labour is not going to have an adverse effect on the worker in the United States.

I would remind the minister that Mr. Bevin in England said:

Let bitterness and discontent get into the hearts of my army of workers and then, by God, we have lost the war.

The Minister of Labour, if he is close enough to the working people of this country, must realize that the government's policy with regard to labour and wage-freezing, which the majority of workers regard as the actual freezing of democracy, is beginning to have the effect of bitterness and discontent. I know the workers will go on. They know that if fascism should ever win, they will be the ones who will suffer and bear the brunt of repression. On the other hand I would beg and plead with the Minister of Labour to see that government policies allow the Canadian workers to fight in this war as free men and not as slaves.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): It is rather difficult at this time to say anything on the question of labour that has not already been said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) or the hon. member who has just taken her seat (Mrs. Nielsen). But there are a few observations I wish to make.

On another occasion in this house I made the statement that I considered the Department of Labour the most important war department in government. While the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply have their own functions to perform with respect to organizing the defence machinery necessary to the prosecution of the war, the Minister of Labour has definitely under his department the job of organizing and mobilizing the workers of this country, who in the final analysis will produce the sinews of war without which the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of National Defence are helpless. I am disappointed that there are not more members in the house to take part in this discussion, because upon a clarification of the problems of the workers rests, in my opinion, the most necessary thing at this time with respect to this war prosecution about which so many talk.

I should like to make it clear that I do not look upon the Minister of Labour personally as an individual responsible for the present labour policy of the government. I realize that he is merely one of the instruments which are used by the government. The real government, I believe, does not sit in this house. They are on the outside of this house, those who direct the economy of this country, and the Minister of Labour is in the position of having to bring into this house legislation that was manufactured outside of the house.

I would like to introduce a new angle into this discussion of the government's labour policy. I have heard it stated many times, both outside and inside of the house, that the government has no labour policy, that it is merely following a haphazard course and endeavouring to meet problems as they arise. Personally I do not see it in that way. I believe that the government has a well-defined labour policy, one which has been carefully mapped out and which did not have its origin either this year or last year. As a basis for that statement, and in order to build my case around the legislation that has been passed up to the present time, I would draw the attention of the committee to an article in the last issue, September, 1941, of the Canadian Forum, written by a man who I think is fairly well informed on the problem he discusses. He is an economist, and has always taken an active interest in public affairs in this country. I am going to read only two short paragraphs, and from them I shall endeavour to prove that this government has a well-defined labour policy and is travelling on a road which it has clearly mapped out. The article is written by Mr. Eugene Forsey. He says in one paragraph:

> Mr. Tom Moore, in 1919, summed up Mr. King's plan in these words: "There are many ways of destroying trade unions, and they have nearly all been tried except the one of agreeing to them but seeing that they do not operate and function" (a reference to the "no discrimination" clause in the plan); "and this is the design of the plans which are based on the Rockefeller plan."

Further on he says:

> Mr. King has professed to regard his plan as introducing a "constitution" into industry. But the proviso, which he himself declared "essential", that the employees cannot choose "outsiders" to represent them, violates one of the basic principles of the British constitution: that the elector may choose his representative from anywhere he pleases, inside the constituency or outside it. That principle Mr. King should be the last to deny.

What do I see in this company unionism plan or shop committee plan which has been tried over a period of years both in this country and in the United States? Let me say in passing that it is stated that the Prime Minister of this country was the originator of this plan while he was employed by the Rockefeller people in the United States. Proceeding on the assumption that the article which I have quoted is correct, and I do so because the legislation which the Minister of Labour unfortunately has to defend in this house is travelling on exactly that road, P.C. 2685 in regard to this shop committee plan definitely sets out recognition of the principle of the right of the workers to organize. It is couched in very fine language. But it is the only order in council which has been passed by the government that has no legal status. It is not obligatory under any conditions on the part of the operator to recognize a union of any kind. In that connection, they have recognized there in principle the right of the workers to organize; and, as Mr. Moore sets out, the only scheme which has not been tried is to render the movement impotent and not allow it to function. That is well exemplified in P.C. 7440, which follows the plan through by rendering the movement impotent—recognizing it in principle, but not allowing it to function. That order in council has definitely relegated to the background the recognized unions which have been doing collective bargaining over a long period, some of them as long as thirty years, signing agreements, working out their own conditions through committees conferring as between the union and the employer. The order in council has absolutely usurped the bargaining powers of these legitimate trade unions, to say nothing of the difficulties it has put in the way of those who are endeavouring to organize unions.

The main function of a union once it is set up is to bargain collectively with the employers on the basis of the ability of industry to pay. It has therefore a definite function to perform. But under P.C. 7440 the unions may no longer bargain with the employers. They consult the conciliation boards set up by the government. The order in council freezes wages, so taking away the normal function of the unions to bargain with the employer. This is why I say the legitimate trade union movement is rendered impotent. No longer do the unions negotiate; no longer do they sign agreements; no longer do their membership get a referendum vote as to whether or not an agreement is acceptable. All these were functions of unions in the past. But the trade union movement to-day is nothing more nor less than a dues-collecting agency.

In addition to taking away all the democratic functions which the unions exercised in the past, the government have taken away completely their right to settle grievances; they have usurped the powers of their grievance committees, by setting up, at least in Nova Scotia—and I assume the same thing has occurred in other parts of the country—a board which deals with grievances. Upon that board in Nova Scotia sit two representatives of the coal companies who have the final say in any matter which may be under dispute.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not follow the hon. member for Cape Breton South. To which board does he refer?

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know whether you call it the mediation board—I mean the board which was set up by a provincial conference in Halifax, under the Minister of Labour. There sit on that board, J. W. McLeod, district superintendent of the company, and A. W. Mathieson, another district superintendent.

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member is not referring to any board appointed under the new order in council?

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, no. I mean that in accordance with principles laid down in order in council 7440, this mediation board is set up for the settlement of disputes, is given the final say in connection with these disputes, and there is no appeal from its decision, which rests with two superintendents of the company and one member of the union. They have the disposal of any grievance which may arise under the contract—

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but is this a board of conciliation, or is it a board appointed by the government of Nova Scotia?

Mr. GILLIS: It is a board appointed by the government of Nova Scotia for the purpose of settling grievances, but it is in line with this order in council 7440. The fact of the matter is that that conference was held for the purpose of trying to work out some medium of settling grievances, and was based on this order in council 7440. The trade union movement, by the establishment of these company unions, has been rendered impotent; and as I see it, the policy which the Minister of Labour is here to defend is not his policy or the policy of parliament; it is a policy which was laid down some time between 1916 and 1918 in the United States with respect to the establishment of company unionism. We might as well understand that this policy is well defined, that this is the road which it is travelling, and that it has as its final objective the complete elimination of trade unionism as we have known and understood it in Canada during the past thirty years.

Following the plan through, the effect of order in council 7307 is to take the franchise completely away from the established unions. That was well exemplified in Kirkland Lake. They do not deliberately take away the ballot, but the order places upon the Minister of Labour or his department the responsibility of decision, and there are no regulations with respect to the taking of the ballot. He can do it in one way in this section, he can do it in another way in that section, as illustrated by the vote taken down in Windsor at the Ford plant, and that taken at Kirkland Lake. The vote at Kirkland Lake was in my opinion a deliberate attempt on somebody's part to befuddle the men there into voting for a company union. I read that ballot the other day; and it would show a very high standard of intelligence for a group of men to go in there at a moment's notice, without having seen that ballot before, and cast a vote on that question. The vote at the Ford plant was absolutely fair. Yet it all goes to show that the Minister of Labour has in his hands, provided he wishes to exercise it, a complete dictatorship with respect to the question of the establishment of a union.

This trend of interference with the franchise is, to my mind, a very dangerous one at this time, and legislation on these lines is not in accordance with the laws of democracy. Many people out in the country are beginning to wonder whether we are not moving in the wrong direction by interfering with the vote for the establishment of democracy in industry.

In addition to that we have had the experience of the deliberate disfranchising of men in uniform in the last election in Nova Scotia. In that election not one man in uniform who was outside the province was enabled to vote. Many of our boys were training in Ontario, many others in New Brunswick, and many more were overseas in England, prepared to lay down their lives for democracy. Yet the government of Nova Scotia disfranchised these men and so deprived them of the very essence and basis of the democratic life. They were given no opportunity of saying who should represent them during the war or the aftermath of the war. This trend to belittle the franchise, to cast it on one side, either in the provincial election or under the provisions of this order in council, is in my opinion a dangerous tendency and one which should be checked immediately—that is if we expect the people to make the effort which we want them to make during the process of fighting this war.

Another matter to which I should like to call the minister's attention is the cost of living bonus, which comes within the province of his department. In fact it is not a cost of living bonus; if it were, a man would receive it whether he was working or not, because you are living seven days a week whether you are working or not, and the cost of living is exactly the same. The proper definition of this so-called cost of living bonus is that it is a steady work bonus, because you get it only for the days you work; it is based on the actual number of days you work. So that instead of being a cost of living bonus to offset increased living costs, it is a bonus based on your earnings and the number of days you work. That is how it operated in Nova Scotia. We had considerable difficulty there this summer. It is a long story which I do not want to resurrect here. It serves no purpose to rake old straw or open old sores.

I wish now to refer for a moment or two to the cost of living bonus. After a good deal of difficulty it was decided that a certain bonus would be paid. A delegation came here and waited on the government, and the war-time prices and trade board decreed that a certain bonus should be paid to the miners of Nova Scotia. What I am concerned about is that those who should have paid the bonus, the operators, did not pay a cent. The entire cost of paying that bonus to the miners was passed back to the already overtaxed consumer. The company was permitted by the war-time prices and trade board to increase the selling price of coal twenty-two cents a ton—that is, coal mined and sold in Nova Scotia—and therefore the burden of the bonus was placed upon the coal consumers in that province exclusively. The strange thing is that the only people that did get a bonus were the company. While the government decreed that there should be twenty-two cents a ton additional in the selling price of coal, the company increased the price twenty-five cents, so that the miners are paying back a portion of the bonus to themselves, the actual consuming public paying the rest of it. It would cost twenty-two cents a ton to offset the total cost, and the company charge twenty-five cents, so that they are receiving three cents a ton bonus on that coal mined and sold in Nova Scotia.

I understand that the government at that time was supposed to make an investigation into the ability of the company to pay, and to ascertain whether the set-up there at the present time, that is to say the link-up of the different companies, retarded in any way the negotiations of the miners' unions with the coal companies. I do not think these recommendations have ever been put into operation. In that particular instance the application of the cost of living bonus, or the steady-work bonus, which it really is, was passed back to the consumers, and the people who really got the bonus were the company.

There are many things which one might talk about this afternoon. I have no desire to keep the house in session; I have no desire to repeat anything that has already been said. There is, however, another question which I would bring to the attention of the minister. It may not come exclusively within his department; nevertheless it affects people that do come within the jurisdiction of the department.

Let me mention briefly order No. 68, consumers' credit regulations. This order sets out a long list of articles which, I take it, are to be regarded as luxuries.

Mr. McLARTY: Is the hon. member referring to an order in council?

Mr. GILLIS: No; I am referring to the regulations. The matter comes within the province of the war-time prices and trade board, but it has a definite relationship to the section of the country I come from, and I mention it because it restricts the lending companies in making loans for the purpose of enabling miners to purchase certain articles which are listed under the regulations. Loans are prohibited for the purpose of purchasing such necessities as bedding, springs and all that sort of thing, which are absolute household necessities. Throughout the whole of Nova Scotia, but very definitely in the section of the country I come from, there are credit union movements which are exclusively miner. In the past many of the people in that section have been aided by these credit unions. These people are on a weekly wage; their earnings are not large, and whenever they wanted to purchase furniture, bedding or other necessities of that sort, they were obliged, before the establishment of the unions, to go to some merchant and pay 25, 30 or 35 per cent more than they would if they were buying for cash. In that way they wasted a lot of money. By means of this credit union movement we have practically cured that situation and saved a considerable amount of money for our membership.

These credit unions are not lending institutions; they are formed for the purpose of establishing the credit of the small income groups who reside in the community, and they perform this definite function, that when a person wishes to purchase articles—many of them listed here—for $100 or $150, he goes to the credit union and gets a loan. He makes the purchase for cash, thus saving 25 or 30 per cent which he would pay if he were buying on the instalment plan. The loan is paid back to the credit union in small instalments at a low rate of interest, and that interest at the end of the year comes back to the miners themselves in the way of dividends. The whole turnover is in their own interests, and they really save a large amount of money in the purchasing of ordinary necessities for their homes, many of which necessities are listed in this order, No. 68, that has to do with consumers' credits.

I am wondering whether the Minister of Labour or the minister under whose department it comes exclusively will take this matter into consideration. I am reasonably sure, in fact I have been told, that this order applies to these credit unions, and the people who deal with the unions are therefore placed in an unenviable position. All that will be accomplished will be to drive them back to the condition from which they were rescued by this very movement, and the result will be that a good deal of money will be wasted through purchases on the instalment plan instead of through the medium of the credit union set-up.

May I now say a few words with regard to the situation in Kirkland Lake. I have been there; I have seen the place, and I know that the Minister of Labour is familiar with it. I know he is doing what he can with a view to arriving at a settlement. But the propaganda that appears in the press is not fair to the men in that section. I know that everyone in Kirkland Lake desires to see a settlement which will not disrupt the community. There are 26,000 or 27,000 people in the town of Kirkland Lake, surrounded by mines which will be affected in the event of a strike, and the entire life of the community will be disorganized, much damage done, and many sores opened up that will take a good deal of time to heal, if a satisfactory settlement is not reached. We find in the press from time to time the statement that something foreign is being injected into the situation there, that it is led by foreigners, outside organizations, and all that sort of thing. That is absolutely untrue. Every official of the union in Kirkland Lake is employed in or around the mines and is a resident of that town. The only man who has any relations outside, assisting the organization, is an administrator, working through the international union. I know him very well, and I can say that he is one of the most sensible, one of the sanest labour leaders in the dominion to-day. He has his feet on the ground; he knows where he is going, and if there is any difficulty or a strike in that section it will not be Tom McGuire's fault. It will not be the fault of the man who is endeavouring to assist the men there with their organization.

This propaganda about outsiders is most unfair, coming from such an industry. Many of the owners of that gold-mining industry, the people who draw the dividends, do not live in Canada. Some of them left the country and went to the Bahamas in order to avoid paying income tax. They have shirked their responsibility to this country. The local management who deal with the men have not, in my opinion, much more to say with regard to the management of the industry than I have. Absentee ownership directing the industries of this country is, I think, largely responsible for the difficulties which the Minister of Labour and the government are having in connection with this question of union recognition.

As I see it, after thinking the matter over and reading this article by Forsey, the trend at this time is toward the usurpation of the legitimate trade union movement and the setting up of an organization in Canada based on the company union or employees' plan. I know personally that this does not work. In the city of Sydney they had in operation for a good many years a plant council, and there was nothing but trouble, turmoil, low wages, misery and degradation. About three years ago, under an act passed by the provincial government, the steel workers of Sydney were enabled to set up for themselves a legitimate bargaining agency. Since the establishment of that union they have increased their wages by 25 or 30 per cent. They have had harmonious relations with the employers, and have improved the whole life of the community. They are taking part in various activities throughout the section of the country in which they are organized, activities in which they never took part before, and I have not seen any strikes or heard of any difficulties. They have eliminated much of the prejudice and misunderstanding that existed previously.

This company union plan does not work. You find perhaps one per cent of the men acting on committees, going round with the foremen and becoming friendly with the superintendent. You have the other ninety-nine per cent sitting back disgruntled, knowing they are denied their legitimate rights to join a union, knowing that their grievances are not properly presented. They are fertile soil for anyone who wishes to come at any time and stir them up. In my opinion the proper way, and the only way, to establish harmonious relations between the employer and the employee is to get them together in a signed agreement, which gives recognition to the basic rights of the men themselves, which permits a committee of the men to meet with the operator and understand his problem, then go back to the men and explain the exact situation. That is the only way that can ever be done; and as long as we sit back, accept no responsibility, let the operator have his way—though he may be influenced and forced to adopt a certain attitude by people whose only connection with the industry is to check their dividend slips occasionally—we are going to have the situation that now exists.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I should like to see the Minister of Labour get tough, in any way he may consider necessary. We have a definite job to do in Canada. As has been stated many times in this house, civilization is on the brink of destruction. Hitler is not stopped yet, by a long shot. It is going to take everything we have in this country to stop him, so we must get together. We have passed laws giving certain rights to industrial workers. The minister has declared that industrial democracy should be more closely woven into the fabric of our industrial set-up in Canada. If he means that, then I think he should get tough when that becomes necessary. When the workers have followed the legal procedure provided by the government, bad as that procedure is, and hard as it is to follow, the government should step in. That procedure was followed in Kirkland Lake where the workers, after a vote, said, "We want collective bargaining." In this case I think the minister should do what Bevin would do in the old country; he should tell the operators, "This is democracy. They have voted; they have indicated what they want. They are legitimately entitled to it, so you sit down around a conference table and iron out this matter with your employees, or else." The minister has the machinery to enforce any such order. Wages have been frozen, and the workers must accept that situation. This was done by order in council and must be accepted by the workers, whether they like it or not. In Kirkland Lake, as in every other section of the country where labour is unorganized, the operators are defying the laws of the country; and if the government is not prepared to enforce its own laws, then I think we are headed for destruction.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): I would like to pay a tribute to the labouring population of this dominion for the way it is carrying on at the present time with reference to our war effort. Last night one hon. member said that he had attended the sittings of this house but so far had learned little. Of course that was his affair; it is sometimes hard to get a bright idea through a dull head. Surely no one could have sat in this house during the last few days, listening to the statements of the ministers, without learning something about what is going on in Canada.

My purpose at the moment is to pay tribute to the men and women who are doing perhaps more than any other class to bring success to British arms. We have enlisted a large army, navy and air force. The growth of our forces in the field is one of the most remarkable things in modern times. But perhaps even greater than our work in the field has been what we have accomplished through the cooperation of management and labour in our factories. The statements that have been made indicate that the factories of Canada are now producing as much as fifty million rounds of small arms ammunition per month, and that in the course of the next few months that output will be trebled. When one considers that the armies of Hitler number only four or five million men, the importance of fifty million rounds per month, as part of Canada's contribution to the munitions of the allies, appears as of very great importance. We are producing more than a million artillery shells per month; we are building heavy artillery; we have launched as many as seventy-seven corvettes, of which we have actually delivered some fifty. We are turning out something like seventy million pounds of explosive per month. The clothing, the food and the supplies that we are sending across to our allies in England and Russia are playing a real part in the world war. I was impressed by the statement that since the commencement of this war Canada has shipped across the ocean and safely landed on the quays of Great Britain as many as 7,000 cargoes to warm the hearts and maintain the courage of our allies in Britain; that as much as 42,500,000 tons of freight has been transported across the sea from the factories and farms of Canada, carried by the shipping of the world, and convoyed in no small part by the Canadian navy.

I emphasize this because people are apt to lay too great stress—though not too great credit—on armed forces alone. My suggestion is that the effort which Canada is putting forth in her factories is even more important than the effort she is putting forth in the field.

In that connection, I wish to pay tribute to the workers of Canada. There is not very much difference between the man who fires off the shell and the man who manufactures it, or the man who turns it in a lathe. Both are necessary to the final result. Perhaps the man who makes the shell is the more important of the two, because it certainly cannot be fired off if it is not made. Anything which interrupts our war effort in the factories is a matter of supreme importance to the Canadian people.

I want to say something about the attitude which should be adopted toward labour and the working people. It has been my fortune in the past, as attorney general of Ontario, to control the police forces of that province. I have been minister of labour of Ontario, and I know something about the difficulties which face a minister of labour. I know the forces which are ever driving him to drastic action.

I have forgotten which one of the previous speakers referred to compulsion. He said that in his judgment all the compulsion was against the workers. That was an exaggeration; it has not been quite in line with my experience. It is true that the fixing of wage levels is a very serious action on the part of the government. I shall watch with a great deal of care and interest how it works out. The new rules made by the order in council are to be judged, not in advance by one's imagination but rather in retrospect, after they have been in force for perhaps six months. I say that because their success or failure, their advantage or disadvantage to the worker, will depend in large part upon their administration.

When the freezing of wages was announced I was concerned. I called upon one of the men in the Department of Labour, a very well-informed official of the government, and expressed to him my concern. I said to him, "The government is taking the place of the unions; the government will cripple the organization of the unions, if it proceeds to freeze wages." I got some comfort from this man. He pointed out to me that there are in Canada what he called depressed areas, places where wages are abnormally low. He might have gone farther and said that there are spots all over Canada where wages are altogether too low. He mentioned certain depressed areas in Canada where wages are outrageously low, and recalled the fact that wages generally are based on the lowest wages paid, and that if you can raise the mud sills, you raise the entire structure. He pointed out to me that the new order in council provided for regional boards, with powers of investigation, and fairly wide powers of compulsion in the matter of payment. He expressed the hope that in the comparatively short time in which the legislation would be in effect, it would bring to light conditions which to-day are under cover, and might, he hoped—and I hope, too,—bring about their rectification.

Labour will overlook an opportunity if it does not require the regional boards to make the inquiries permitted by the order in council, and so create a condition whereby wages in the depressed areas will be forced up. It will then become less difficult to raise the wages throughout the country generally when the legislation disappears.

Speaking to some of my unionist friends at a great union meeting in Toronto recently, I said that this was their opportunity, and that if they allowed their organizations to go to pieces on account of paternal legislation at present temporarily in effect, they would do a great disservice to the Canadian people. They must hold their organizations now, if ever, and thus prepare for the time when the soldiers will be marching home, and the munitions factories will be emptying their staffs upon the streets.

That will be the testing time of Canadian labour. Labour should be preparing for that day. But we cannot prepare by making extravagant statements. I deplore at this above all times any show of anger. Compulsion has been placed upon labour, it is true, in connection with the increase of wages. But to my knowledge there has also been compulsion with respect to employers.

I had the honour of being nominated by the running trades of the railroads of Canada, comprising some 125,000 men, to sit on a conciliation board whose duty it was to interpret order in council P.C. 7440. I may confess now that the majority of the board decided against labour, and in favour of the contention offered by the railroads. Naturally I took the side of labour; and I look back with pleasure upon the fact that though the majority of the board had disagreed with me, the government of Canada agreed with me, and settled the matter by order in council. Compulsion was brought upon the railroads, and to-day the railroads are paying the bonus to something like 125,000 railway working men.

Therefore do not let us be too extravagant in our condemnations. May I point out to the committee that probably the toughest job any man in the parliament of Canada has held in the last two years has been that of the Minister of Labour. I believe I may say that sweepingly, because he is dealing with men, not with machines. He is dealing with human beings who react to treatment, and he must be wise in his actions.

We talk about compulsion; I know something about it. I remember when the government of Ontario was pushed into action because people were striking, and sent tanks, barbed wire and machine guns to Stratford, in the quiet province of Ontario. Oh, yes, they suppressed the strike to some extent; but they left a wound in that city and neighbourhood which has not yet healed. The people who were responsible for that despotic action are still looked upon with anger and dislike by the labouring people of this country.

There are those who would like the Minister of Labour for Canada to call upon the police or the soldiery. It was suggested to me that the strike at St. Catharines could have been settled by simply putting in the volunteers. I objected and said, "You do not suggest that in this industrial province of Ontario we should coerce the working people at the point of the bayonet." The answer was, "Why do you not back up a few buses and carry off the leaders?" These are thoughts that are actually abroad. They are pressed upon the authorities. It is urged that action of that kind be taken.

While there may be criticism here and there, and discussion is good, the fact remains that the Department of Labour of Canada has resisted that policy. So far it has been able to get along, perhaps not one hundred per cent, and our factories in consequence are running, men are working, and products are developed and shipped across the sea. A little conciliation, kindness and understanding, even though that method may be slow, will win in the end as against more drastic methods.

We hear that there are no strikes in England. I noticed in a recent issue of the British Labour Gazette that some 285,000 man-days had been lost in Great Britain in a single month. No such losses have been occasioned here, but of course our population is not so large. Mr. Bevin has said that they have "practically no strikes." By that he means that the situation could be so much worse that a loss of 285,000 man-days is practically nothing. If Mr. Bevin can say that with respect to the labouring classes of Great Britain, our Minister of Labour can say it with much greater force with regard to the working people of the Dominion of Canada. I pay tribute to the patriotic way in which workmen are refusing to discuss minor matters in order that they may not overlook the important ones.

We hear references to compulsion, and I have just one more remark to make. A man is to be judged, not entirely by the things he does, but also by the mistakes he avoids, the things he does not do although tempted to do, the things which he might be forced into doing but resists. In the last few months we had the spectacle of the premier of Ontario bringing the wives and daughters of farmers to act as strike-breakers in Toronto, in order to beat some tomato factory workers in the east end of the city. The plea was made that the tomato crop was being saved, but as a matter of fact what was being saved was an increase of 2½ cents an hour to the workers in that factory, and recognition by the employers of the union chosen by those poor people.

Sometimes it is good to make comparisons. In all the stress of this war there has been nothing of that kind to be charged against the Department of Labour of the Dominion of Canada. It has been said that sometimes they are slow, but there is virtue in deliberation.

Steadily, quietly and sympathetically we have carried on the industry of Canada. We have raised the Canadian contribution to a point that is even greater than that of the United States, if we count out the production of aeroplanes. We are not in position to make many aeroplanes, and, excluding aeroplanes, the munitions of war which we have produced in Canada have been greater than the production of the United States. That is a startling statement, but it is true. It is due to the wisdom with which we are treating labour, to the hope which labour has of better things in the future and to the patriotism of working people.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before the minister makes his statement, I should like to draw his attention to a rather disconcerting statement which appeared in the press. I do this because as Minister of Labour he is responsible for the protection of the working classes of this country and because he represents the constituency in this house in which Windsor is located. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of November 11, as follows:

> Windsor, Ontario, November 10—Job seekers cannot get work in Windsor factories unless they have obligated themselves to subscribe "for a fair proportion" of war savings certificates, according to Donald W. McGregor, chairman of the local war weapons committee.
> He said that Windsor is confident it will go over the top in the present drive to gain subscribers for war savings certificates and termed "an ace in the hole" the fact that unless job seekers can show badges showing them to be subscribers they cannot get work.

The minister said something about being opposed to compulsion, but this certainly is the most discriminatory form of compulsion. For the last two years when the budget was brought down this group asked the government to institute a compulsory non-interest bearing loan. The government refused to do this upon the ground that it did not desire to use compulsion and levy upon the basis of ability to pay, but preferred to finance the war by means of voluntary contributions, not upon the basis of an ability to pay but upon the basis of a person's sense of patriotism and responsibility. According to this article there has been a conscription of wealth, but conscription from those earning the least.

I have no reason to believe that the action mentioned in this article is not being carried out. Mr. McGregor, the gentleman in charge of the war weapons committee, must be a fairly reputable citizen, and he would hardly give this statement to the press unless it were correct. If we are to use this bludgeon upon the workers and say that they cannot get jobs unless they are prepared to pledge what he calls a fair proportion of their wages to purchase war savings certificates, then the working groups in the city of Windsor are not being adequately protected. I wish the minister would give some attention to this. He may care to say something about it when he is making his general remarks.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): When the minister is making his statement I wish he would endeavour to give us a review of the youth training scheme and how it has worked out. A ceiling has been placed upon salaries and wages and upon what is paid to men in executive positions, and I should like to know why professional fees have not been included.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to have some information from the minister as to the division of authority as between the provincial government and the federal government in connection with the enforcement of conditions of employment, hours of labour, rates of pay and so on as they affect contractors carrying on federal government work in the provinces.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, I think the last two statements, while they were most brief, involve a wider discussion than almost anything else that has been said in this debate. It was my thought, and I think it was that of the committee generally, that after I had made my statement questions might quite properly be asked. I suppose it is an entirely unusual and improper attitude for a minister to take to say that he has been rather disappointed that more questions have not been asked.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have not finished yet.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be very glad if they are asked later. Perhaps I should make a statement, not too detailed, in connection with some of the observations that have been made. My statement will require to be less detailed on account of the address of the hon. member for Trinity, who dealt with some of the observations that I propose to make.

I would say this, that speaking generally, I cannot help paying definite tribute to labour in this country for the splendid manner in which they are carrying on their war effort. That is illustrated by the figures we have, strike figures for the month of October. These figures show that in that month we had fewer strikes than we have had in any month for some years. I think perhaps they may rival any in the history of this country. I should like to place them on record because they are, I believe, impressive. There were—and I am speaking from recollection—in the month of October, 750 men on strike, and the number of man-days lost was fewer than 1,500. This means less than two days per man for each man who was involved in a labour dispute. If that is resolved into terms of percentages, the percentage would be so small in relation to the total working population that it would be almost ridiculous to discuss it. I mention that figure again for this reason. It is a tribute not only to the working people of Canada but to those who are the responsible labour leaders in this country.

It has been suggested that in orders in council which this government has passed where penalties have been involved, we have put the penalties against labour but not against industry. In order that that question might receive consideration from this committee I have had a statement prepared. In the nine orders in council which we have passed since the war started, two provide penalties for both employers and employees, six for employers only, and only one for employees only.

Mr. MacINNIS: Which are these orders?

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member like me to read them?

Mr. MacINNIS: I should at least like to get the numbers or the titles of the orders in council.

Mr. McLARTY: P.C. 3495 of November 7, 1939, which extends the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act to cover all industries; P.C. 6286, of November 7, 1940; P.C. 4642, of June 25, 1941, which is the labour enticement order; P.C. 3884 was repealed and replaced—the fair wages order; P.C. 4758, of June 27, 1941, dealing with the reinstatement of returned soldiers in employment, providing penalties on the employer; P.C. 4844, of July 2, 1941, setting up the industrial disputes inquiry commission and containing provisions against discrimination on account of union membership; P.C. 7307; P.C. 7679, of October 4, 1941, which is the new order with regard to minimum wages in war industries; and the wage stabilization order in council of October 24, 1940.

The point I wish to make is that the suggestion that penalties have been put on labour but have not been put on industry are absolutely refuted by these very facts themselves.

The suggestion has been made that in the recent order in council we are what is called "freezing" wages. The word "freezing" is an unfortunate term. It suggests a static condition that is incapable of change. That condition does not exist in that order in council. If wages are low, they may be increased. If they are not fair and reasonable, they are not frozen.

We are setting up a national organization, a national war labour board, to which any man or any organization may apply, in order to ensure that there is no freezing, and that the condition that fair wages shall prevail shall be the order of the day. We are not doing this with the idea of putting a ceiling on wages. We are doing it with this idea in view, that we want to make real and nominal wages one and the same thing. In the statement I gave to this house a short time ago I pointed out the condition that arose in the last war. I pointed out that the cost of living inevitably rose higher and faster than wages, and that it was in the interests of the wage-earners of this country—not to hurt them, not to hold them down—but to assist in their actual real purchasing power that that order in council was passed.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River mentioned the war emergency training programme. We are substantially ahead of our programme in the training for war industries. Speaking from recollection, I believe the estimate for this year, made about a year ago, of those who would be trained in the vocational schools, for example, was 50,000. It will run over 60,000 for the current year. Further, based on 803 plants canvassed, industry is training, under the direction of the Department of Labour, an additional 70,000. In addition to that, the bureau of technical training, under the capable chairmanship of Mr. Little, is training through the newsprint industry, the utilities industry and the mines industry, other workers who either will take their place in war industry or will allow present employees in these industries to take their place in war industry, to be replaced by those now in training. In other words, the training programme is moving along in a splendid manner.

May I refer for a moment to unemployment insurance. That, as hon. members know, came into force on the 1st of July last. The number of books taken out by 143,000 employers is in the neighbourhood of 2,700,000. Up to date there has been collected in excess of $14,000,000 for that fund. In fact, the interest in that fund, invested in government securities, which assists our war-time effort, is in excess of $16,000. I mention that because I think it will be of interest to the members of this house.

Might I say one or two things in connection with remarks which have been made. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked which union we recognized in the National Steel Car corporation. At the present time the situation is this. There are two unions there. One is the steel workers' organization of Canada and the other is the employees' association. But I would not wish the hon. member to get the belief that that employees' association is a company union. There is no preference shown to either union. Neither one has premises in the plant. They are both organized on their own, on a self-sustaining basis, and in the matter of actual contact there is no discrimination shown as between them. I am advised that the employees' association has more members than the steel workers' organizing committee, but as to whether or not that is correct I am not definitely prepared to say.

May I refer to the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton South relative to Kirkland Lake? I think it would be inopportune for me to deal with that under present circumstances, because I have requested both employers and employees—the operators and the members of the union—to come here on Monday next. I believe that any statement which I made in connection with the hon. member's remarks might not assist but perhaps retard any effort, which I trust will be successful, to come to a conclusion that will avoid a strike.

I do not know that there is a great deal more which I need to say. As the hon. member for Vancouver East said, there may be some other questions, and I shall be glad to deal with them, but I do not wish to open a wide range of subjects which have not hitherto been referred to.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the minister again with reference to the statement which I brought to his attention. Are employers to be allowed to carry on that programme?

Mr. McLARTY: I intended to reply to the question of the hon. member for Weyburn, and I apologize for not having done so. I have not seen the article. I have not heard that Mr. McGregor, who is an estimable citizen, as my hon. friend has suggested, and is carrying on the war savings campaign for the Department of Finance in Windsor, has made the statement. It does not exactly horrify me if he had. On the other hand—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It should.

Mr. McLARTY: I should like to make sure that he has. I do not suggest that no man should obtain a position unless he buys war savings certificates. I have, however, a little sympathy with those who are trying to promote the sale of these certificates. I do not think the purchase of these should be made a condition of employment; it should not; let us admit that quite freely and frankly. On the other hand, I suppose it is one of those methods of promotion which is adopted by those who perhaps are a little more zealous for the sale of war savings certificates, which are to the advantage of this country.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is a very poor method.

Mr. SHAW: Would the minister care to deal with the matter which I brought up a few moments ago, having to do with a division of authority as between the provincial governments and the federal government with regard to certain matters such as rates of pay to men, such as truckers and others, engaged on federal government projects in the provinces?

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think there is any division of opinion as to the appropriate authority of the dominion and of the provinces in this matter. In so far as they are dominion government projects, the dominion government has the sole jurisdiction as to rates of wages paid and working conditions in connection with those contracts. In other words, wages generally speaking, are a provincial responsibility. But in the case of dominion government projects the dominion government has the authority.

Mr. SHAW: Has the authority to enforce provincial rates been delegated to any provincial government up to the present time?

Mr. McLARTY: If they are provincial rates, there would be no need of delegation. Do I understand the hon. member to suggest that the dominion government has delegated to the provinces the right to fix rates in connection with dominion government projects?

Mr. SHAW: No. But in some provinces they have minimum rates of pay for certain types of work. If a contractor takes a dominion government contract in a province where those legal rates prevail, must the contractor pay those rates? That is really what I want to know.

Mr. McLARTY: The answer is, very definitely, yes, the dominion rates. Primarily, of course, the matter of wages is a provincial responsibility, it being a matter of property and civil rights. But in connection with dominion projects the dominion is responsible in fixing those rates, and as far as I am aware there has been no delegation of any authority to any province to fix these rates in connection with dominion government contracts in any province.

Mr. MacINNIS: In my opinion the minister looks altogether too leniently upon the action referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn. This is blackmail—quite definitely so. When a promoter or a salesman of anything—I do not care what it is, whether it is war savings certificates, or blankets, or something else—says to a person, "You have to buy so much or you are not going to get a job", it is blackmail. Remember that when it is applied to workers it is particularly serious, because the job is the worker's life; it is his livelihood; if he does not get a job, he starves. Yet, regardless of his circumstances, he is compelled to subscribe to so many war savings certificates before he can go to work. After all, this is a free country, or it was until quite recently. This man is paying the taxes which have been deemed right and sufficient by the government of Canada. After he has paid those taxes it is no one's business what he is going to subscribe to, and it should not be made a condition of his getting a job. What would happen if the government of Canada were to say through someone—and if the government allows it the government is saying it—that before a contractor shall get a contract he must undertake to buy so many war bonds or war savings certificates? The Minister of Labour should make a statement here that such a thing will not be allowed, and that if it has been made a condition of employment at Windsor or at any other city it must be discontinued forthwith. The minister owes a statement of that kind to the committee.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, I think that when an hon. member uses the word "blackmail" he is probably going entirely outside the intention which would be behind this action. "Blackmail" suggests very definitely some personal advantage which is accruing to the blackmailer. In this case the chairman of the war savings certificates committee is trying to sell war savings certificates for the benefit of the government and the people of Canada. To call it "blackmail" is hardly fair to him. There may be a difference of opinion as to the desirability of having it done, but to suggest that the chairman of the war savings certificates committee, because he is endeavouring—perhaps unduly—to promote the sale of war savings certificates, is guilty of blackmail, is something which I do not believe will appeal to this committee.

Mr. CASSELMAN: "Coercion"!

Mr. McLARTY: I have dealt with the matter of coercion, and I do not think I need go into that at length. Before making a statement to the committee on this matter I should like to get some actual facts. I have seen in newspapers accounts which may be a little highly coloured, and probably this is highly coloured. I would say now that I seriously question if it is a condition precedent to any man obtaining a position in Windsor that he has to buy war savings certificates, and although I have read the statement in the press I would want more confirmation of it than the article now read. I quite agree that no such condition should be attached to a man's getting employment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If it is true, the minister would not permit it?

Mr. McLARTY: As to the matter of permission, I do not know that that would come within my authority. I would say it should not be made a condition precedent to obtaining employment; that is all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A project was begun in my constituency this summer by the Department of Agriculture under the prairie farm rehabilitation branch. Representations were made to me that while a rate of thirty cents an hour was paid to unskilled workers, certain groups of workers who came from Regina were paid forty cents an hour for the same kind of work. I brought the matter to the attention of both the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture, and I have been advised by the Department of Labour that some clauses will be put into force in connection with rates of pay. The attitude of the Department of Agriculture was that they did not want to pay wages which would interfere with wages paid to farm help. That is a policy which is open to some criticism. Agriculture is in a depressed condition throughout Canada and particularly in the west, but that is not a good argument for paying men who are unemployed in towns a large part of the year a very low wage because farmers roundabout always pay very low wages when farm prices are at low levels. Can the minister make a statement as to the policy that will be carried out in connection with projects that are being carried on by departments of the government?

Mr. McLARTY: This is the first time that the matter has been brought to my attention. When the hon. member speaks of a policy, I believe his question is more or less confined to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. If I remember correctly, I do not think the Department of Labour has any specific policy with reference to that. The only general policy, so far as wages are concerned, which we have that would be applicable is the minimum wage law, which applies to all dominion projects.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What are the rates?

Mr. McLARTY: For men we increased the rate from thirty to thirty-five cents and for women the rate was increased from twenty to twenty-five cents.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will this minimum wage law apply to a company supplying goods to the government? Take a lumber company selling 25 per cent of their output to the dominion. Would the minimum wage law apply to that?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes; if they were selling that amount, the minimum wage law would apply.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has made certain statements which I think are creditable. He said that it is fair to say that the Department of Labour has in every way sought, first, to protect every worker by establishing fair wage standards and to prevent industrial strikes, and second, to protect the lower paid workers against the attempts of unscrupulous employers to deny them the minimum compensation to which they are entitled. We have in operation in northeastern Saskatchewan a lumber company which I believe is the largest company of the kind in the province, the B. F. Harris company. They not only operate their own limits but buy a considerable amount from other operators in the district. They have a minimum wage rate of 22½ cents an hour plus the cost of living bonus. They work their employees on double shift, twelve hours in each shift. Seventy per cent of their employees are receiving less than thirty cents an hour and 70 per cent of the employees are working a twelve-hour shift. This company are not only selling their own products, but buying from the smaller operators in the district on the basis of the present fixed prices for lumber in this country. At the same time, according to the information I have, they are exporting approximately 50 per cent of their products and receiving for that, according to the Minister of Munitions and Supply yesterday, 20 to 40 per cent more than the domestic price. If my information is correct, they are also selling to the government 20 to 25 per cent of their output. What action does the minister propose to take in such a case?

Mr. McLARTY: I know that the hon. member will not expect me to pass judgment on the particular circumstances of an individual case such as that. All I can say is that I shall be glad to have the matter investigated and checked up in order to see what can be done to bring it into line, assuming, as he suggests, that it is out of line.

Mr. ESLING: May I ask the Prime Minister if there is a prospective remedy for a situation recited by one of my local legions with respect to citizenship? In the government's recruiting campaign a warm welcome was extended to those from other countries who wanted to enlist in the Canadian forces. I believe it was prior to July, 1940, that they were required to take the oath of allegiance, but subsequently to that date they merely give an undertaking that they desire to serve with the Canadian forces. The case in point is that of a soldier from the United States who apparently enlisted prior to July, 1940, and was recently discharged as medically unfit. He returned to my district and then attempted to cross the line to the state from which he came, but the immigration officials there refused him admittance and apparently, from inquiries I have made, the only possible way in which he can cross the line is to proceed to the coast and secure from the United States consul an immigration visa. This is quite an expense to him, perhaps $50 or $75, and it does not seem like a very generous recognition of one who offered his services to this country. The point is that to-day he is without any citizenship, a man without a country; he is neither a United States citizien nor a citizen of Canada. While such matters rest entirely with the United States government, I was wondering whether the Prime Minister would take the case up with the United States immigration authorities with a view to securing retroactive action with respect to those who enlisted in the Canadian forces prior to July, 1940.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to meet the hon. member's request to see whether the matter is one which can be dealt with by the United States authorities in conjunction with our own. It is an individual case that requires looking into, and I should hope that it would be dealt with sympathetically.

While I am on my feet, may I say that immediately after eight o'clock the Minister of Finance will make his statement on the question of the cost of living bonus in relation to dependents' allowances, veterans' allowances and allied matters. I think we might have it understood that after the minister's statement has been made the time will have arrived when hon. members may regard themselves as free to talk in committee on anything.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE IN RESPECT OF VARIOUS WAR ALLOWANCES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, during the late summer and early fall months the government has received numerous representations from individuals and organizations in various parts of the country suggesting that in view of the rising cost of living steps should be taken to provide cost of living bonuses for persons receiving pensions or allowances of various kinds, representing in some cases payments for services being rendered or something in the nature of awards for services rendered in the past, or, in other cases, awards or payments made on the basis of need. In most cases I believe that these representations were made not so much because of existing conditions but rather in anticipation of a continuing rise in prices and the cost of living. I am glad to say that since the policy of establishing a general ceiling over the prices of commodities, rents and services, and of stabilizing wages, was announced, there has been a noticeable falling off in the number of these representations. This is another of the strong arguments for the price and wage stabilization policy adopted by the government, because I think it was primarily the fear that the cost of living would be allowed to go spiralling upward that caused so much anxiety, so much sense of insecurity and of impending hardship on the part of recipients of small fixed incomes. However, I want to assure the committee that all these representations have been the subject of very careful study over a period of several months; and it is the results of these studies and our conclusions therefrom that I wish to announce to-night.

First I will take up dependents' allowances. In the field of allowances paid to soldiers' dependents, the government believes a real case has been made for some remedial action.

When the present scale of allowances was adopted at the outbreak of war, the allowances were deliberately made high in order to take account of the fact that during the course of the war there would undoubtedly be a rise in prices and in the cost of living. Experience, however, has shown that while they are adequate for most dependents, there are certain cases where undue hardship results, particularly in the case of families which have more than two children.

The government therefore proposes, in the case of personnel below the rank of warrant officer class 1, to provide an additional allowance of $9 for the third child, and an additional allowance of $6 for the fourth child. This would mean that the total allowance for a wife with three children would be increased to $68, which with $20 assigned pay, makes a total of $88 per month; and the total allowance for a wife with four or more children would be increased to $74, which with $20 assigned pay, would make a total of $94 per month.

We do not propose to make any additional allowance in respect to children beyond the fourth child, because we believe that definite steps should be taken to discourage the recruiting of men with large families.

What I have said applies to dependents of men in the army and air force, whose allowances are paid by the dependents' allowance board. The allowances to dependents of men in the naval services are paid directly by the Department of National Defence for Naval Services and on a different scale and principle. The question of making adjustments applicable to the naval services will be gone into promptly, and such changes as may be found to be appropriate will be made.

We have also thought it desirable to provide that in certain cases, and in accordance with methods which I will later explain, dependent mothers should receive an increase in the allowance paid them up to 25 per cent of the present allowance. It will be recalled that while the allowance paid to a wife is $35, that to a mother is now only $20, and it appears to be true, in some cases at least, that this differential is too great. Provision will also be made under certain conditions to prevent the mother from being penalized if she is willing to work and make some modest earnings.

It is estimated that these changes will provide benefits for approximately one-third of the present recipients, at an estimated cost of from $8,000,000 to $9,000,000 per annum.

It is very difficult at the present time to make detailed comparisons of the total pay and allowances under these new scales with the rates in effect in Britain and Australia, because complicated changes have recently been made in the systems in both those countries, and I have not sufficient information to make a proper comparison. However, at least until recently the rates of pay plus allowances in south Africa were the highest of any of the English-speaking countries, and the following table shows how the Canadian rates of pay and allowances with the present changes compare with the south African rates:

	Canada	South Africa
Private and mother.....	$ 64	$46.20
Private and wife.....	74	52.80
Private, wife and 1 child.....	86	59.40
Private, wife and 2 children..	98	66.00
Private, wife and 3 children..	107	72.60
Private, wife and 4 children..	113	85.80

A private in the United States army receives pay of $40 a month after one year's service, which compares with $39 a month pay in the Canadian Army, but the United States as yet makes no provision for the soldier's dependents. In the last war, a private in the Canadian Army received pay of $1.10 a day, or $33 a month; his wife received a separation allowance at the rate of $30 per month at the end of that war, and I may add that this was at a time when the cost of living price level was very much higher than it is to-day. There were no allowances for children, but the Patriotic fund provided assistance on the basis of family needs.

Even with these changes there will be special cases of difficulty which will require special treatment. The government is determined to afford the most adequate protection to all soldiers' dependents, and, after going most fully into the matter, they have found that the problem is not just a matter of financial assistance, which is susceptible of treatment by any uniform rule. There are special cases involving special or emergency consideration and special forms of assistance, as, for instance, when the family has had the misfortune of serious illness with heavy medical expenses, or when there are older children deserving special training or education, or when the family is large, or the difficult case of the change in status of a dependent mother when the son marries. Such special conditions create special needs which cannot be covered by any reasonable change in the standard rates and require assistance which will vary with the size of the family, conditions in the particular locality, and other special circumstances. The government therefore has tried to find some way to bring into play all the administrative resources available in the country so that the dependents of our men overseas should be given protection and service suited to the circumstances of the particular case.

We have therefore concluded that we should make provision for what might be called a war allowances adjustment fund, the moneys to be provided by a grant from the treasury under the War Appropriation Act, and that this fund should be administered by a national board of trustees appointed by the government, which would be given powers adequate to deal with special situations with a considerable measure of flexibility. This board of trustees would consist of

(a) A representative of the dependents' allowance board;

(b) A representative of the veterans' welfare division of the Department of Pensions and National Health;

(c) A representative of the Canadian Legion;

(d) A representative of the Canadian Welfare Council;

(e) A representative of women's institutes, or other person familiar with the problems as they present themselves in rural areas;

(f) A representative of labour;

(g) A representative of the comptroller of the treasury or the auditor general; and

(h) An independent chairman who has had experience in dealing with similar problems.

The national board would have under it a number of local or regional committees which would in so far as their composition is concerned be essentially replicas of the national board. There would, however, be certain differences; for instance, on the local or regional boards, instead of a representative of the dependents' allowance board, there would be local representatives of the Department of Pensions and National Health, or of the soldier settlement board, (varying with the particular community). Also, instead of the Canadian welfare council, there would be a representative of the most appropriate local social agency, or in large communities of mixed population representatives of several local social agencies.

These local or regional set-ups should be worked out by the national board of trustees in cooperation with local authorities, and the national board should appoint the chairman of the local or regional committee.

There would have to be a considerable number of these local committees, at least sixty or seventy, and perhaps as many as one hundred and fifty, if it were desired to expedite the work as rapidly as possible. In the division of the country into local regional districts, it would be intended to take the fullest possible advantage of existing divisions for the purpose of social service administration.

The local or regional committee would deal with applications and make recommendations to the national board of trustees on the basis of principles laid down by the national board. While limited powers would probably have to be given to the local committees to make emergency payments in certain cases, the general procedure would be that application and recommendation would be sent in by the local or regional committee to the national board, which would make the decision and issue supplementary allowance by means of a cheque direct to the particular recipient. In other words, the local or regional committee would not be administrative in character; they would advise in regard to scales of assistance in the particular community, make investigations and verify the special circumstances involved and provide direct personal assistance or advise. They would, of course, use so far as possible the services of experienced social service workers already working in the locality, and perhaps as well, in certain cases at least, the skilled staff of a provincial government. The government hopes that by making use of the special knowledge and skill of such qualified persons, it will be able to get the plan into full operation with the minimum of delay, and also with the maximum of efficiency and equity.

It will be noted that no large administrative organization would be set up, but rather arrangements made for a pooling of existing administrative resources, and the only cost should be the payment of perhaps a per capita fee to the local social agency for investigations and recommendations.

In addition to other special cases, the new organization should deal with cases where supplementary allowance not in excess of 25 per cent of the present allowance would be made to mothers of soldiers, and also with cases where it would be desirable to allow children, by continuance of allowances, to attend high school until they have reached the end of their eighteenth year, if such children have good prospects of matriculating.

The major arguments for the scheme just outlined may be summarized as follows:

(a) It is far more equitable than any alternative arrangement, providing for the meeting of need or protection against hardship, no matter what the need or the hardship may be, and eliminating a needless waste of taxpayers' funds such as would be involved in any uniform regulation which sought to meet the difficulties of certain special cases by a uniform increase in the standard scale of allowances.

(b) It is wholly flexible, allowing need to be met in accordance with the merits of the particular case and the conditions of the particular region. It will allow the greatest measure of assistance possible to those who need it most. Emergency and unusual requirements can be met as well as common and recurrent ones.

(c) It provides for meeting the special needs of special cases by bringing into play the judgments of a considerable number of people who know the local and individual situation.

(d) It avoids the necessity of building up a large new administrative organization which would involve a lot of unnecessary administrative cost. It will make possible the use of the existing social service machinery of the nation in reporting upon and examining individual cases and, where desirable, in providing more than mere financial assistance.

(e) It is hoped that this far-reaching and flexible system of supplementary allowances will not only ensure that all dependents are safeguarded against economic dangers, but also that it will give the men overseas the confidence and assurance that all the administrative resources of the community are standing by the home in their absence, and that even in the case of unforeseen emergency at home, their families will be looked after and will not suffer hardship.

In summary we believe that the changes we are suggesting will provide a measure of very real social security, democratic and fair in its underlying principles, and efficient and adequate in its administration. Naturally in view of its character, I cannot give any estimate in advance of the funds that will be required to finance it, other than the estimate I have already made of the probable cost of the changes made in regard to the third and fourth child and the mother.

I come now to war veterans' allowances: The War Veterans' Allowance Act was enacted in 1930 to assist in the maintenance of the aged or totally incapacitated veteran in necessity and incapable of maintaining himself. Allowances under the act were made payable to veterans upon attaining the age of sixty years and to those of any age who were permanently unemployable.

These allowances are limited in the case of a veteran with dependents to $480 per annum, and income from all sources, including veterans' allowance, must not exceed $730 per annum. In the case of a veteran without dependents the maximum allowance is $240, and income from all sources, including veterans' allowance, must not exceed $365. The act provides that no deductions shall be made in the allowance because of receipt by the veteran of helplessness allowance, clothing allowance, additional pension allowance payable on account of children, grants received by the veteran by reason of having been awarded the V.C., M.C., or D.C.M., and casual earnings not exceeding $125 per annum. In all cases the amount actually paid is based on an investigation of the need of the recipient and there are many cases where the maximum allowance is not paid.

A great many recipients of the war veterans' allowance are also in receipt of pensions under the Pension Act. Quite a number have other sources of income such as mothers' allowances under provincial legislation, rentals from property owned but not occupied, insurance disability benefits, casual earnings, et cetera. There are, however, quite a number who have none of these special types of income and who by reason of age or infirmity are unable to supplement their veterans' allowance by casual earnings. Within this latter group there appear to be certain cases involving actual hardship, and it seems desirable to make provision for additional allowances in special cases after investigation has established actual need. In this connection it is proposed that the additional allowances be limited to a maximum of $5 per month for single men and $10 per month for married men. These additional allowances would only be given after investigation to veterans who are now in receipt of the maximum allowances permitted under the act and who have no other earnings or income of any kind.

It may be observed that when the War Veterans' Allowance Act was passed in 1930, the cost of living index stood at 120·8 per cent. In other words, in spite of the increase in cost of living which has taken place since the outbreak of war, the latest index available is still more than five points below the point at which the index stood when the legislation was enacted and the amount of the allowances originally determined.

I come now to pensions under the Pension Act. These pensions are part of the compensation which is paid to a member of the armed forces or his dependents because of his disablement or death. The basic rates of pensions now paid are governed by schedules to the statute enacted in 1925 and are based upon the rates of pension and bonuses established in 1920 when the cost of living index stood at 150·5. The parliamentary committee which reviewed the problem in 1920 had been of the opinion that in view of the possibility of declining prices in future years increases in pension should in the main be effected by way of a bonus to be continued until such time as the cost of living warranted its modification. As the bonus was included in the basic rate of pension in the schedule to the act of 1925, it has remained in effect notwithstanding subsequent reductions in the cost of living.

In addition to the cash pensions paid on this basis, disability pensioners are free to accept employment, and their earnings do not in any way affect their pension entitlement. Such pensioners of the first great war also benefit by conditions which offer a wider scope of employment for those who are able to work, by reason of a primary preference under the Civil Service Act and preference in all government contracts and war work. In addition, they are given free hospitalization with pay and allowances for disabilities related to service. If over sixty years of age or permanently unemployable or if, despite the preferences granted, they are incapable of maintenance, such pensioners are eligible for assistance under the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

In view of all these circumstances and particularly because the cost of living index is only 115·5 as compared with 150·5 when the basic rates of pension were established, the government believes that no additions to these pensions could be justified at the present time.

I come now to old age pensions and pensions for the blind. Representations have been received by this government asking that a cost of living bonus be added to old age pensions, thereby raising the maximum amount of such pensions above the figure of $20 a month provided in the act. The question is one of extraordinary difficulty for reasons which I am about to mention.

I might remind the committee that these pensions are paid by the provinces, under agreements made by the governor in council with the lieutenant-governors in council of the provinces, in accordance with the Old Age Pensions Act of 1927. The act provides that every agreement shall continue in force as long as the original statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to terminate the agreement is given by the governor in council to the lieutenant-governor of the province with which the agreement was made.

The dominion's contribution of 75 per cent of the total pension paid is contingent upon the amount of the province's contribution, which is 25 per cent of the total, and therefore varies from province to province. The average monthly pension paid in each province as of June 30, 1941, was as follows:

British Columbia	$19.12
Alberta	18.56
Saskatchewan	16.97
Manitoba	18.72
Ontario	18.55
Quebec	15.72
New Brunswick	14.71
Nova Scotia	14.97
Prince Edward Island	11.26

It will be noted that in several provinces there is considerable leeway for increasing the average amount of pension paid if the province so desires. As advantage is not taken by certain provinces of the leeway which already exists, it is apparent that any provision for an increase in the minimum amount of pension payable would be used very much more by some provinces than by others, which would mean that the additional funds would be distributed very unequally between provinces.

Under the present scheme any increase in the amount of the maximum pension payable would require not only an amendment to the dominion act but new agreements with all the provinces. Several provinces would almost certainly be neither willing nor able to pay their proportionate share of a larger pension. If on the assumption that all provinces would not agree to increase the pension on the present cooperative basis the dominion undertook to pay the whole cost of a supplementary pension, we would be following the unsound and dangerous principle of one government bearing the total cost of a service for the administration of which another government was solely responsible. This unsound principle would be coupled with the further objection, already mentioned, that the benefit of the dominion payment would in the main accrue to only a few provinces which are already paying a higher average rate of pension than other provinces which, except in a limited number of cases, would not benefit from the scheme although obviously the taxpayers of the latter provinces would have to bear some share of the higher payments made to pensioners in the former group of provinces.

There is the further fact that the cost of living index to-day, 115·5, is five or six points lower than the level at which the cost of living index stood at the time the Old Age Pensions Act was passed and during the early years of its operation. Thus in 1927 when the legislation was passed, the cost of living index stood at 119·9. In 1928 the index had risen to 120·5; in 1929 it was 121·7; and in 1930, 120·8. It would therefore seem very difficult for the dominion government, in the present war emergency when it is taking nearly 40 per cent of the national income for war purposes, to justify the addition of a general cost of living bonus to a rate of pension which was determined and established at the time when the country was enjoying a peace-time boom and when the cost of living index was five or six points higher than it is to-day.

In this connection it must be remembered that there is a real distinction between the granting of a cost of living bonus, on the one hand, to workers employed by private industries or by governments, and, on the other hand, to persons who are being given an award at the public expense because they may not be in a financial position to provide for themselves. In the former case it must be remembered that wage-earners are forgoing increases in their basic rates of pay and the cost of living bonus is really an arrangement to effect a stabilization of wages in order to make possible the maintenance of a price ceiling and safeguard against an inflationary spiral which would have, it is believed, a disastrous effect on the economy as a whole and would create real hardships for wage-earners as a class and, particularly wage-earners in the lower income groups, and pensioners and others in receipt of small fixed incomes.

No decreases in the amount of the old age pensions were made in 1931 or following years when the cost of living declined to levels far below what it was when the act was passed. It was taken for granted then that the pension was independent of changes in the cost of living. Because of this, and the fact that the cost of living has not yet even reached the level at which it was when the amount was determined by parliament, a cost of living bonus to supplement it would be wholly inappropriate. It would only be a disguise for a permanent increase such as took place under similar circumstances in respect of war disability pensions in 1920.

The question then arises as to whether there should be a permanent general increase in old age pensions in all the provinces at this time, and if so whether the dominion or the provinces should bear it.

The government believes that this problem of making adequate provision for the aged can never be satisfactorily solved until we are in a position to set up a contributory old age pension scheme which would make it possible to commence the payment of pensions at a lower age than seventy years and probably to make the pension payments more generous. However, for reasons which are wholly familiar to the house, such a dominion contributory old age pension programme would be impossible without a constitutional amendment.

The dominion must, I am convinced, take the position that old age pensions of the non-contributory type now in effect are primarily a provincial responsibility, the role of the dominion being that of a contributor financially assisting the provinces to discharge this responsibility. This has been the rule consistently applied since 1927 by all governments. There are excellent reasons for the rule. Apart altogether from the constitutional reason there are the differences in living conditions, cost of living, living standards and social outlook in different provinces. A scale appropriate to one province is not appropriate to others. The figures I have given of average pensions show the differing views which the provinces have as to amounts which should be paid.

The dominion, overburdened as it is with its own responsibilities and obligations, nevertheless does not shrink from assuming further responsibilities in its own fields. As examples I cite the increase in dependents' allowances and war veterans' allowances which I have just announced. But in a provincial field the dominion should not operate in such a way as to throw further burdens exclusively upon dominion taxpayers. Furthermore we should be exceedingly careful not to act in such a way as to place virtual compulsion upon provincial governments and thereby on provincial taxpayers.

On the other hand, our laws should be such that if any province, due to public sentiment or local conditions existing in that province, wishes to supplement the old age pensions paid in that province under our act, there should be no automatic reduction in the pension jointly payable by the dominion and the province on the 75 per cent-25 per cent basis. If any of the provinces desire to do so, the government is prepared to amend the regulations and, if necessary, the act, to ensure that such supplementary payments by a province do not entail a reduction in the pension payable under the act.

Indeed the government is prepared to consider going further than this. It believes that, for the reasons already outlined, it would be impossible to justify an increase in the maximum rate of pension payable if the whole cost were to be assumed by the dominion, and that such cases as appear to present immediate difficulties can be met by the provinces on the basis of established individual need. If, nevertheless, all, or substantially all the provinces should make representations to the dominion government in favour of some increase in the maximum amount of pension payable, the additional cost to be shared between the dominion and the provinces on the same basis as the present cost, I can assure the committee that the government will be prepared to give consideration to such representations.

There is one other matter connected with the administration of old age pensions which may be of some interest to the committee.

Under the act, the pension is not permitted to bring the total income of the pensioner above $365 a year.

By section 17 of the regulations, income includes contributions by children. This expression has been interpreted as including assigned pay. Representations have been made that in many cases assigned pay is not a true contribution within the meaning of the regulation, as it is sent to the parent to be kept for the member of the forces assigning the pay, or for some other purpose not connected with the support of the parent. Distinctions between cases where this is true and where it is not true are impossible to draw as a matter of practical administration, and I am given to understand that all the provinces would be likely to accept an amendment to the regulations providing that pay assigned by a member of the forces to his mother or father in receipt of old age pension should not be regarded as income for the purposes of this act, providing the parent is not in receipt of a dependent's allowance as well.

I am therefore proposing that the regulation in question be amended by adding the provision that in all cases where no dependents' allowance in respect of the parent or the parent's spouse has been awarded, any pay allotted or assigned, as the case may be, by a son or daughter, grandson or granddaughter who is a member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada, serving on active service, may be disregarded in calculating the income of the pensioner. This will have the effect in many cases of increasing the amount of pension payable to old age pensioners in receipt of assigned pay.

PRIVILEGE—PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF MR. POULIOT ON NOVEMBER 11

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I take advantage of this my earliest opportunity to rise to a question of privilege. It is I think the proper moment to bring the matter referred to to the attention of the house. I saw for the first time a few moments ago in the Ottawa Evening Journal of to-day an article headed "Pouliot provides sensation—says Mr. King saved troops at Dunkirk." The article is credited to the Canadian Press and is as follows:

Considerable discussion has developed among members of the House of Commons over a statement made by Jean-François Pouliot (Lib., Témiscouata) in his speech to the house last Tuesday.

Mr. Pouliot said he felt it his duty to answer "some charges, some insinuations" made about Prime Minister Mackenzie King. He did not identify the charges and insinuations specifically.

Then the article goes on to quote the hon. member for Temiscouata as follows:

"There is something . . . that has not been said either over the radio or elsewhere about the recommendation made by my chief (Mr. King) to the commander of the Canadian army in England (Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton)". He said.

Then there is a subhead "Takes up hecklers," and the next paragraph is a quotation purporting to be what the hon. member for Temiscouata went on to say. I think the hon. member is reported correctly, as follows:

"It was this, that he should do his best to spare the lives of his soldiers; and the young fools that made some noise when the Prime Minister visited them ignored the fact that if they were still alive, if they had not been killed in the Dunkirk retreat, it was because of the very wise and patriotic recommendation of my leader, the chief of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister of Canada. It is time to say that."

I may say first of all, Mr. Chairman, that when the hon. member for Témiscouata was speaking the other evening I was in conversation with my immediate neighbour, the Liberal whip, and I did not catch this remark myself, but my colleague mentioned to me:

"The member for Témiscouata is talking about you." I immediately turned to listen. I had missed what he was saying about myself and at the time I turned toward him he was beginning to speak of the new leader of the Conservative party. I thought it was time for me to get up and say that I felt we had better get on with the business before us, that I understood the hon. member for Témiscouata was trying in some way chivalrously to defend me on some matter. I had not been paying attention to what he was saying, otherwise I should immediately have taken care to correct my hon. friend in the statement he made.

May I say that at no time have I made any recommendation whatever to General McNaughton on any matter. I think, however, I understand what was in the mind of the hon. member for Témiscouata when he spoke. I have at different times mentioned to members of my own party and to others the many reasons I have for having profound faith in the judgment, wisdom and caution of General McNaughton as the commander of the Canadian forces overseas, and I have instanced, and am pleased to instance here in the House of Commons to-night, what he said to me in the last conversation we had together before he left to go overseas. He came to call on me at my office, and I took advantage of the opportunity to repeat what I had said before and to give the thanks of the Canadian government to him for undertaking that great responsibility and to express our deep appreciation, and gave him the assurance of my entire confidence in him and of his being able to count on my support on all occasions. The general's last words to me were that I could depend upon it that he would take care to see that lives were not needlessly sacrificed. I remember those words very distinctly, that he as commander of the Canadian forces would take great care to see that lives were not needlessly sacrificed.

As to Dunkirk, it is now a matter of public record that General McNaughton before he undertook to take his men across to Dunkirk made a survey of the situation himself and made his own report upon it which was, I believe, to the effect that he did not think Canadian troops should be asked to participate in that venture at the time at which he was being asked to consider the matter, that to take that step at the time would be to incur the sacrifice of life to no purpose. I have mentioned that repeatedly to others, and that, I assume, is what the hon. member for Témiscouata had in mind. I was giving it as an illustration, just as I give it now, of why I and the citizens of Canada generally, particularly those who are in the forces and the parents and relatives of those in the forces, have every reason to have confidence in the present commander in chief of the Canadian forces overseas and be prepared to trust his judgment, that he himself would be cautious in the matter of any directions that he might advise or give.

The hon. member for Témiscouata is quoted in that same article in the Evening Journal as having referred to another matter, an incident that took place at Aldershot, a demonstration by a section of the troops when I appeared on the field to address them. It was a small demonstration. I do not think I need to go into the reasons that occasioned it, but I wish that all present here might have been there to have heard for themselves the alleged demonstration and also the demonstration that followed after I had spoken to the troops. I think I can explain to hon. members the occasion of such preliminary demonstration as was made at that time, because it has come to me from many sources. It was this, and this article helps to illustrate it.

I found on reaching England; indeed, I had heard rumours of it before, that among our troops there was being spread a rumour that the reason why they were being kept in Britain and were not allowed to go to Africa or other parts was because of some direction that I had given or was responsible for with respect to the movement of the Canadian troops, that I had sought to confine the field of their activities with a view to—I suppose it might as well be expressed here—saving the sacrifice of the lives of some of our men. Mr. Churchill has answered that rumour I think quite effectively. He has taken care to express to the troops themselves and to the public generally that the reason why the Canadian troops have remained in Britain and have not been sent outside has been that those in command feel that the greatest service that it is possible for the Canadian troops to render is that of guarding the citadel of freedom right at the heart of the empire, where the first great attack which would stab the empire's heart would likely occur. I think that some of the young men in our forces had the feeling that I had taken a position of the kind, and when I made a reference to their enforced inactivity they did make it quite clear that it was something which they did not appreciate. But when I also made it clear that as far as the government of Canada were concerned we were placing no restriction whatever upon the movement of the troops from Britain elsewhere, and had given authority to the commander in chief with due regard to ministerial responsibility to do as he might deem best with regard to movements based on Britain, and to take such immediate steps as he thought it advisable in certain circumstances to take, that impression, I believe, was effectively removed.

There is only one other thing that I should like to say. I was rather surprised that so much importance was given to a matter, which really could only be a misrepresentation of the facts in their true light, by a communication which went out through the Canadian Press from Aldershot on that day. I believe that, if hon. members will look in the British newspapers, they will find that there was not a single mention of any incident which was unpleasant in connection with my visit to the troops, and I believe that the representatives of the United Press and other press representatives who were there did not feel it necessary to send out any statement of the kind. But, for reasons best known to the representative of the Canadian Press, that particular report was circulated to all parts of the world, as a means, no doubt, of helping Canada's war effort.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION SINCE JUNE 14, 1941—CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the government has paid considerable attention to the many representations which have been made to it on behalf of pensioners of various descriptions because of the increased cost of living. The minister is to be commended for making this statement—this rather elaborate statement—before the house adjourns. It would hardly be possible to discuss it in any detail this evening. The first portion of it—that which deals with dependents' allowances—is quite easy to follow, but when one gets into the other categories they are not so easy to follow, and certainly I anticipate that the response of the government to the appeal of the old age pensioners will not be very warmly received. It will be of very little interest to the old age pensioner who began to receive such pension within the last few years that the index figure was at such a height and is lower to-day than when the pension legislation was started. The government, however, has given its consideration to what is obviously a particularly difficult matter, entering as it does into a constitutional realm; and it leaves one with the idea that possibly, had the events of January gone a different way, the government might not be faced to-day with so difficult a problem in that regard.

The third category entailed the setting up of a national board, not at any expense, because the individuals who will compose it will be drawn from departmental bodies and boards which are already dealing with these matters. It will be supplemented by the work of regional boards. I anticipate that these regional boards must of necessity be located in one spot in each of the various districts over which they will hold sway, and I wonder what the minister contemplates with regard to getting information of the affairs of an applicant who desires assistance. Let me put it this way. A person who considers that he needs assistance along these lines, and who perhaps is resident two or three hundred miles away from the place where that regional board will carry out its work, must of necessity, I assume, make application by form or by letter. Then investigation on behalf of that regional board will be necessary before they can advise the national board. Would the minister give us some indication of how the regional board will go to work to get information in detail with regard to the applicant's case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give it in any more detail than I did. I said that there would certainly be sixty or seventy, and perhaps as many as a hundred and fifty regional committees throughout the country, and they would consist of or be assisted by trained investigators in so far as those are available. They are available in a good many parts of the country. I do not remember just how the trustees of the Patriotic fund operated in the last war, but I am told that that was a very efficient organization and that it did just this kind of thing.

Mr. STIRLING: It will do some travelling, I take it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. GREEN: Have any of the provincial governments made representations to the dominion government that they would be willing to pay their share of a bonus to the old age pensioners? I understood the minister to say that if any province should make such representations, the dominion would give them favourable consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not say that. I said that in the event of an increase in old age pensions being considered desirable in any province, or in respect of particular cases of hardship in any province, the dominion did not feel that it should bear the cost of that itself, because it regarded that as primarily a provincial responsibility. Second, the dominion has no objection to the province bearing that cost. At the present time it may be that, if a province did increase old age pensions, in that particular province the pensions payable under the dominion act would be decreased, because they might be regarded as income and therefore the result might be some decrease in the pension payable. It is the view of the dominion government that that is not as it should be, and we are prepared to make an adjustment there, so that if a province wishes to bear in any case the full additional cost, it will be free to do so, without that entailing a reduction in the pensions payable under the dominion Old Age Pensions Act.

With regard to the third position, it is this: not, if one province says, "We would like to have the maximum in the old pensions act raised", but if all or substantially all the provinces make representations to the effect that they would like to have that maximum raised, the dominion government is prepared to given consideration to those representations. But I do not believe that, if one province alone, or merely one or two provinces, wanted to have the pensions raised, it would be the duty of the dominion government to get in touch with all the rest of the provinces to see whether they also wanted the increase, because there is a big conflict of opinion in the country. From the province in which the hon. gentleman resides a great many representations have come in favour of an increase in the old age pension, but from some provinces we have had no representations at all; in fact the reverse opinion is expressed a great deal.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, if British Columbia should increase the pensions or should be willing to pay a cost of living bonus added to the old age pensions, the dominion would not help out?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. NEILL: Speaking of a question which the minister raised, I understood him to say that he, as representing the dominion government, would contemplate a general increase pro rata only provided all, or practically all the provinces were acquiescent. I would point out that when the act was originally made, in 1927, the agreement was offered by the dominion to each province individually, and all were open to accept or reject.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I believe British Columbia was the first one to act. I believe there was no obligation that there should be even a majority of the provinces. Could the minister not give way to that extent at least? It would hearten some of us who are interested in the matter. If one province were willing to pay the extra amount, could he not make an agreement with them the same as he did before? It would be almost hopeless to expect unanimous action from the nine provinces, and the government realized that in 1927 and made their offer to any individual province. Any province that was willing to do it could come in and accept the agreement offered by the dominion government. There was no compulsion then to go and get the assurances of nine other people. Could he not allow the same condition to exist now?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the government at this time should embark on that course. I remember exactly what happened after 1927. It became an acute political issue in province after province and elections were run on it. The standing offer of the dominion resulted almost in compulsion on the provinces. That may be all right in time of peace, but I do not think the dominion government could embark on that course now. This is primarily a provincial responsibility, and I think the extent to which I have indicated we are prepared to go is as far as we should go under present circumstances.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the government are to be commended for having taken cognizance of the requests that have come from all over the country for further assistance to the people in receipt of dependents' allowances and war veterans' pensions. One cannot say of course, without closer study of the matter, just how much this will help, but certainly it will help a great deal, and every member of the house will be glad that this course has been taken. The people across the country will be exceedingly pleased that the minister has made this clear statement and taken the forward step he has.

With reference to old age pensions, I am afraid there will be a great deal of disappointment. It is difficult for me to follow the minister's logic. I am unable to understand why, in view of the fact that the dominion Old Age Pensions Act is an enabling act, it would not have been possible for the dominion government to raise the maximum. No provincial government is compelled to pay up to the full maximum, but by the dominion government raising the maximum to, say $30, each provincial government would then have it in its power, if it chose, to raise that maximum within the province, and the federal government would still be under the obligation of paying only its share, which is 75 per cent. I am inclined to think that the argument that the index commodity figure for 1927 was higher than the figure to-day will not bear much weight with the old age pensioners across Canada, because if there is any group of people who have suffered in Canada as a result of the increased cost of living, it is those people within our economy who have no means of increasing their incomes, people in receipt of pensions, dependents' allowances and so on. For them there has been no cost of living bonus; for them every increase in the cost of living has meant simply a decrease in their standard of living. I hope that this matter is not closed and that the Minister of Finance and the government will give further consideration to the possibility of raising the maximum under the dominion act, leaving it to the provinces to decide whether or not they are in a financial position to raise the maximum in their respective jurisdictions.

Before the committee rose at six o'clock the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that after the Minister of Finance had made his statement it would be in order for members to discuss anything. I am not sure that this is a departure from the procedure followed during the rest of the week; it is pretty much what we have been doing. I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words about the plight of western agriculture in the light of the government's agricultural policy.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the hon. member give way and let us have some explanation of old age pensions? I wish to inquire with respect to Nova Scotia and I shall be only a minute.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I intend to take only a short time, and it is possible that we may adjourn to-night.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The hon. member is going into a different subject; that is all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Agriculture has been pretty well left to the tail-end, which seems to be indicative of many things these days. Here in the last few hours of the last night we are likely to be in session we are to have only a few moments to discuss agriculture. It is commonly acknowledged that agriculture has become the forgotten industry in our economy; I should not like to see it become the forgotten subject in this parliament. While I should be glad to give way to the hon. member, I do not want to see the time slip by without an opportunity for the discussion of agriculture.

I am exceedingly disappointed that no statement has been made either by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I have waited each day thinking a statement would be made; for to my mind there is no more important war industry to-day than agriculture. The production of foodstuffs for embattled Britain has now become as important a question as the production of the actual implements of war, and so far we have relegated the discussion of this subject to the background. I must therefore ask for the privilege of saying these few words and requesting the government to make a statement to the house and the country before we adjourn, to indicate its plans with regard to agriculture, and to western agriculture in particular.

I wish to say something about agriculture, not only in the light of the government's policy but having regard to the recent price fixing regulations under order in council P.C. 8527. As has been said by several of my colleagues, we in this group have never objected to control. In fact, early in this war we suggested that ultimately we should be forced to rationing, and I am still convinced that that is the point at which the government will arrive in the end. We realize that no group of people will suffer more from inflation than the workers and the farmers, and therefore we have never had, and have not now, any objection to price and wage fixing, provided always that prices and wages are fixed on equitable levels so as to give to the workers and farmers a reasonable return for their labour.

The thing that has distressed me most about these regulations is the fact that neither organized agriculture nor organized labour seem to have been consulted. I listened to the Prime Minister making his historic announcement on October 18. I realized that the policy was wide-sweeping; a policy which would affect the economic life of Canada for the duration of the war; a policy that would affect the standard of living of millions of people; and I took it for granted that such a policy would have been considered by the representatives of all the factors concerned in our economy who would be consulted. I was therefore surprised on Monday, the 20th, to find the Canadian Press carrying statements from Mr. Tom Moore, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Mr. Mosher, President of the Canadian Congress of Labour, Mr. Hannham, President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and others to the effect that they had not been consulted and were astounded at the drastic nature of these controls. It seems strange that in the bringing down of such a far-reaching measure, representatives of the trade unions, of organized agriculture, of the pools of western Canada—they represent the greatest group of organized farmers in the dominion—representatives of the cooperatives and of the retail merchants, as well as of those other groups that were affected, had not been called in for consultation in an endeavour to arrive at some basis on which prices and wages would be fixed.

We in this group have always maintained that democracy ought to mean something more than merely counting noses. Democracy ought to mean giving to organized agriculture, to organized labour and to the business men a voice in the councils of the nation and an opportunity to exert their influence in shaping their own destiny. That certainly has been denied in the bringing down of these regulations.

As I have said, our quarrel is not with the principle of control. Our quarrel is as to whether or not the basis upon which this control is exercised is fair and equitable. The dominion bureau of statistics says that the cost of living has risen some 15 per cent. Of course that is based on a great, wide, varied assortment of commodities. But if we take the thirty-eight commodities most commonly bought—for there are hundreds of commodities that the common people never buy—we find that actually the cost of living has gone up more than 25 per cent. It is a well-known fact that in the early period of any inflationary spiral the cost of living always outdistances both wages and farm prices. To select an arbitrary period of twenty-seven days, from September 15 to October 11, and fasten prices at the levels prevalent during that period, is to fasten peasantry on the farming population. It will do the same, of course, for the people I mentioned earlier, people with fixed incomes, people in receipt of pensions and dependents' allowances.

Let us look at what the effect will be on the farming population. According to the Economic Annalist, issued by the Department of Agriculture, using 1926 as the basis of 100, we find that in August, 1941, animal products had reached the index figure of 97·9, and field products, 56·7, making an average figure of 72·1 for farm products. That figure, low though it is, is not a fair criterion by which to measure farm income, particularly in western Canada, because in Saskatchewan more than 75 per cent of the farmer's income comes from field products and only 25 per cent or less from animal products. Therefore even the figure of 72·1 is high. Compare with that the fact that wholesale prices—and we do buy not at wholesale but at retail prices—in August, 1941, were 91·8, and that the cost of living on the farm, on the basis of 120 in 1926, has reached the figure of 112·3. When we look at that we begin to realize how inadequate is the farm price level compared with the cost of living and in relation to the retail prices which the farmer must pay.

Last evening the Minister of Finance asked the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) just what he meant by a parity price. Of course there are many definitions. When some people speak about a parity price they mean a price commensurate with the cost of production. That, of course, can start so much argument that there is not much use talking about it. But certainly in talking about a parity price one would have in mind some year which might be used as a basis, for both farm products and retail products, and then fixing the present price at a level which would bear some relation to the cost of living. On November 6, at page 4155 of Hansard, the minister is reported to have said he was going to give some percentages. He proceeded to take August, 1939, as the basis, and said that oats had gone up 80 per cent, barley 66 per cent, butter 57 per cent, eggs 33 per cent and so on. Of course the minister was careful to say that he was not condoning the price level of 1939. Well he might, because in selecting the period from 1935 to 1939 he was selecting a period during which farm prices reached a very low ebb. As a matter of fact the Sirois commission pointed out that in Saskatchewan during that period the average cash income was $102 per farm per year, or the cash and kind income, $291 per farm per year. Therefore, to choose two distinctly different levels—a farm price level still comparatively low on the index of commodities basis, and twenty points below the cost of living on the farm—and to fasten prices at those respective levels, is to fasten the standard of living of the farming population, particularly of western Canada, far below what is adequate. In the same statement, at the same page, the minister is reported to have said:

> . . . retail food prices now bear about their normal relation to other retail prices.

In the first place, of course, the farmer does not receive retail prices for his products; he is paid wholesale prices. The second point is that the disparity, according to the Economic Annalist, is between 91·8 for all commodities and an average of only 72·1 for farm products, a difference of some twenty points between the level of the products the farmer has to sell and the wholesale level of the things he must buy. When there is added to that the fact that he must pay the retail price, it is evident that the disparity between farm prices and retail prices is even greater than these figures would indicate. Therefore we suggest that there ought to be some fairer basis. To accept 1939 as a basis is, of course, not satisfactory. The 1926 basis might have been fairer. It is true that if the 1926 basis is accepted, one or two commodities might have to come down in price, but the general average of farm prices would have to rise. Last evening I think my colleague the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) placed on record some of the index commodity figures for 1926 and 1941; I do not know that he placed them all on record, but in any event I should like to mention these figures:

	1926-29	1941
Wheat	$1.417	$ .726
Oats	.603	.493
Barley	.716	.526
Rye	.971	.547
Flax	.209	1.55
Butcher steers	9.04	8.79
Bacon	11.61	10.99
Cheese	.189	.160
Cream	.382	.344
Eggs	.482	.394

I realize that figures are always a little tiresome, but I draw them to the attention of the Minister of Finance because I should like to point out that while in the case of cheese the figure is now above the 1926-29 figure, over the average, if we take all the farm commodities usually sold by the farmer we find that the average is much below the 1926-29 figure. On the other hand, the cost of living is now getting quite close to the 1926-29 level.

Let me ask the minister to give some thought to how these regulations will affect those engaged in the growing and marketing of wheat. While some hon. members become very tired of listening to discussions in the house about wheat, may I remind them that wheat is the basic commodity produced in western Canada, and that the great masses of the people in that part of Canada find their standard of living affected either adversely or otherwise, depending upon the price they receive from the sale of their wheat.

What do we find? We find that according to the Searle index, taking the 1913-14 price as the base figure of 100, to-day the farmer is receiving 25 per cent less for his wheat and paying 50 per cent more for the commodities he has to buy. That is far from a happy state of affairs—that he should be getting 25 per cent less for the chief product he has to sell, and pay 50 per cent more for the commodities he must buy in order to live.

If we use the 1913-14 as the basic parity price, using that term as I have already defined it, the parity price for the United States farmer would be about $1.22 a bushel in store, Chicago. Under the AAA programme, the United States is paying to its farmers about $1.16 in store, Chicago, and the open market is paying about $1.19, basis Chicago. On the same basis of the 1913-14 level a parity price for wheat in western Canada would be about $1.20 a bushel, basis Fort William.

There has been considerable discussion as to how much the farmer is actually receiving for his wheat. There has been a long-range debate between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the president of the Saskatchewan pools as to what the farmer is actually receiving. I do not purpose taking part in that debate just now. But I do wish to point out that when the Minister of Agriculture suggests that the farmer is receiving 90 cents to $1 a bushel for his wheat, the minister arrives at that figure by some very strange methods.

To begin with, he adds to what the farmer gets from the wheat board the amount of money he gets for his wheat acreage reduction bonus. That bonus is paid to him in lieu of not growing wheat. It is paid to him for a piece of land on which he did not grow wheat, a piece of land which he either summer-fallowed or on which he grew coarse grains. You cannot take income from that piece of land and add it to the income from the wheat grown on another piece of land, any more than you can add what the farmer gets from the sale of his live stock.

Again, the minister arrived at his figure by adding in the bonus paid under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I believe the minister estimated over the radio, as I remember it, that the amount was about $30,000,000. Of course I never have been able to understand where he got that figure.

Mr. GARDINER: The figure is $10,000,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, yes; the acreage reduction bonus was $30,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I never have been able to understand where the minister got the $30,000,000 for the acreage reduction bonus.

Mr. GARDINER: It is over $20,000,000 now.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Six million acres have been taken out of wheat production. How the minister can get 6,000,000 acres up to $30,000,000, I do not know. But the minister will probably explain that. The point at issue is that whatever the farmer got for acreage reduction bonus cannot be added to what he got for his wheat on totally different land. Also the bonus he gets under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is the bonus which was paid with respect to land on which little or no wheat was grown. It is not paid to the man who had over twelve bushels to the acre. It cannot be added to the price of his wheat, because he does not get any.

The minister has confused a depressed area with a distressed industry. The man who grew fifteen or twenty-five bushels to the acre does not get this bonus. How can the bonus be added to the price he is receiving for his wheat? There is a bonus which may properly be added to the wheat income, and that is the so-called supplementary bonus of 75 cents an acre for half a man's cultivated acreage up to two hundred acres. That can properly be added to the farmers' wheat income because, as I understand it, it is a subsidy paid by the government in lieu of the fact that the government is going to peg the maximum price of wheat on the open market at 77·3 cents.

The estimate this year is that the average return per acre will be 13·1 bushels. For the average farmer, half of whose acreage is in wheat, that works out a little better than five cents per bushel. That means that a little better than five cents per bushel is being added to the price he is receiving for his wheat. That certainly leaves the farmer a long way from 90 cents to $1 a bushel.

I will say this much for the Minister of Agriculture: There is the possibility that if the government applied all sales of wheat to this year's crop the proceeds of the participation certificates might bring that figure up. But so far no action has been taken along that line. The only thing we can be sure of is an advance of 70 cents plus five cents and a fraction, which the farmer will receive under the present bonus plan.

The Minister of Agriculture has repeatedly stated over the air and in the house that the government's agriculture policy envisages a minimum agricultural income for western Canada of some $325,000,000. I never have been able to find out just how the minister arrived at that particular figure, or where he got it. The latest available figures issued by the government show that the agricultural income for the prairie provinces last year was $410,222,000. If the agricultural income for the prairie provinces is to be set in the neighbourhood of $325,000,000 this year, and having in mind the fact that $325,000,000 this year will buy much less than $325,000,000 would have bought last year, then it is quite apparent that the income of the prairie farmer will decline almost $100,000,000 this year.

This situation is serious because, as I said when I began the discussion on this matter, the whole economy of the prairie provinces has been tied up with wheat. After all, that has been the main commodity we have produced, or are capable of producing. When we reduce the income of the prairie farmer we reduce his purchasing power, and the effect of reducing his purchasing power is being felt to-day in every town, village and hamlet between the Rocky mountains and the great lakes.

The campaign carried on by the pools in western Canada asked the government for four things. The government was asked, first, to fix the price at $1 per bushel basis Fort William; second, to freeze the surplus as a war emergency; third, to apply all sales of wheat to this year's crop and, fourth, to declare 1941 to be an emergency year under section 3 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I think western members who support the government and western members on this side will agree with me when I say that great sections of people on the prairies were unanimous in support of this policy. I know that at some meetings I attended in my constituency I found business men, professional men, labouring men as well as farmers supporting this policy. They realized that the decline in the purchasing power of the wheat farmer was having an adverse effect upon the whole economy of western Canada. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will not think that that campaign which was carried on in western Canada during the last few months was a partisan campaign.

An hon. MEMBER: Pretty much.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That was not my experience although it may have been my hon. friend's. In the meeting held in the city where I live both the chairman and the secretary were, to the best of my knowledge, supporters of the present government. Large numbers of those who were active in the campaign were supporters of the present government. A great many of the Liberal members of the Saskatchewan legislature indicated their support of that policy. That did not mean that they were breaking with the Liberal party; it simply showed that they realized that the feeling in western Canada was that, irrespective of a man's party politics, something had to be done to give the wheat producer a more reasonable return for his product and enable him to keep his purchasing power up to a level that would prevent western Canada from going into bankruptcy.

In the last three months I have been over practically all the province of Saskatchewan, and I have never seen as many auction sale bills hung up in the general stores and post offices as I have seen in the last few months. We are faced with a possible wholesale exodus. People are going to the coast or coming to eastern Canada. According to the press, the mayor of Windsor has circulated the towns and municipalities of western Canada urging the people not to come east in such numbers looking for employment.

Mr. WOOD: Could the hon. member give us any idea as to what the stock put up for sale brought? Was it a reasonable price?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think in some instances fairly good values were obtained. In the part of the country in which I live that was the situation.

Mr. WOOD: When people are prepared to offer for sale the product of their effort in the form of accumulated stock it is an indication that the country is in a healthy condition.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): My hon. friend likes to ask a question and then answer it. He asks: Is not the fact that they are getting fairly good prices an indication that things are not too bad? Here is what happened. In 1937 we had a complete crop failure. In order to get relief a man was compelled to reduce his stock to a minimum. I think it was one milch cow for four members of a family, three hogs, twenty-five chickens, four horses and so on. Some of the finest live stock herds in Saskatchewan were lost to the province. I have seen pure bred stock being sold for $15 a head, and they could not be bought to-day for $125. A large section of our people were pushed out of live stock, and they are now trying to get back in. The result is that any man who has some good breeding stock to sell can get fairly good prices. Men who used to raise hogs and cattle are being forced out of business. Many of them are renting their land to people who intend to farm on a large scale and raise wheat, a product which is not now required.

Mr. WOOD: The live stock records show that there has been a considerable increase in the production of live stock in western Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am quite aware of that fact.

Mr. WOOD: That does not agree with the hon. member's statement; I do not understand his logic.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): My hon. friend's powers of comprehension can hardly be blamed on me. This exodus which is going on will have an effect upon our agricultural economy, an effect opposite to that which the minister wants. As I say, men with small farms, men who raised live stock and dairy products are now leaving their farms which are being taken over by others who are going to work them by machinery and produce wheat on a mass production basis. If we are not careful, in one or two years there will be a serious decline in the production of live stock and dairy products which are so much required for the winning of the war.

I suggest to the government that this matter should not be considered a closed matter. I notice by the press that the pools are sending a delegation to Ottawa. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will not feel that because he has taken a particular stand on this matter, he must now abide by it. I hope the government will keep an open mind. I hope also it is not too late to change the government policy with respect to the marketing of the 1941 crop. I trust the government will give some consideration to the policy of fixing the price of wheat on the open market at $1, and fixing the advance to be paid at $1 a bushel, basis Fort William. There should not be any difficulty in connection with the farmer who has sold his wheat, because by means of the permit book system the government has a perfect record of the amounts delivered and by whom delivered. It would be quite possible to make this retroactive.

Asking for an advance of $1 a bushel does not mean that we are asking the government to take a tremendous loss. We do not know what this wheat may be sold for upon the markets of the world. I remember in 1935 and 1936 when there was a great deal of complaint about the McFarland stabilization operations and it was said that the advance of 87½ cents a bushel, basis Fort William, was too high. That wheat was ultimately sold and at a figure much higher than what had been paid for it. The Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister have said over the radio that our wheat may be of inestimable value before this war is over, that it may turn the tide in winning the war. We are asking the government to show their confidence in the future of western agriculture by paying a price which is not unreasonable when considered in relation to the cost of living.

We also ask the government to freeze the surplus wheat as a national war emergency and to apply all sales of wheat to this year's crop. If we export as much wheat this year as we did last year, and our domestic consumption is the same, we shall need all of this year's wheat crop and shall have to use some out of the surplus. That would mean that for the first time we would be able to comply with the requirements of the Canadian Wheat Board Act and pay to the farmer whatever amount might have accrued to him on his participation certificates. The Minister of Agriculture has made frequent appeals over the radio to the farmers asking them to deliver their wheat to the wheat board. Many farmers are selling their wheat on the open market in order to get a spread of from three to six cents. They were desperate, and a spread of three to six cents a bushel meant quite a bit to them with the threshing bills, store bills and doctors' bills that were facing them. All these appeals to sell to the wheat board could have been obviated if at the beginning of the crop year on August 1 the minister had announced to the western farmer that sales of wheat would be applied to this year's crop and that in all probability payments would be made on participation certificates.

Mr. GARDINER: Why does the hon. member keep referring to the Minister of Agriculture? That matter is under the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Because it was the Minister of Agriculture who, according to this clipping, announced over the radio—

Mr. GARDINER: It is not because he lives in Saskatchewan?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No; it was the Minister of Agriculture who, according to this clipping, made the appeal to the farmers. The heading says "Gardiner urges farmers to deliver to the wheat board". That is why I referred to the Minister of Agriculture. I did not mean to single him out particularly, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has also a responsibility in this matter, as have all the members of the wheat committee of the cabinet. My point is that if we can sell wheat to Great Britain at the figure at which it has been sold for the last year or two, with the possibility there is to-day of selling it to Russia at a similar or higher figure, there is no reason why a substantial payment should not be paid this year on participation certificates if all sales are applied to this year's crop. When I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday whether the government still had this matter under consideration or what their decision was, I was disappointed when he replied that the government had not yet decided. I do hope that they will decide at once and make some announcement soon to the farmers of western Canada.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a moment or two.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what the last fellow said.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Mr. HANSELL: If the speech of the hon. member for Weyburn was only a short one, I do not know what he would consider a long one.

The Minister of Finance has announced the government's policy with regard to the payment of a cost of living bonus to soldiers' dependents, and I am certain that the entire country will receive that part of his announcement with a good deal of satisfaction. But the other part of his announcement which dealt with old age pensions will be received by the country with a good deal of disappointment. I deplore it. I look upon it with disdain. I think it is a shame in the light of all the circumstances that nothing is to be done for the old age pensioners. The minister has referred to the constitution, legal difficulties over agreements, and so forth, which, he says, stand in the way. It is all very well for governments to hide behind the law and the constitution and so forth and so on as an excuse for not changing their policy, but what is parliament here for if not to legislate and amend and change things in the light of to-day? We are a legislative body, and that is just what we are here to do. If the government want to do anything to-day that suits their purposes, they do not consider for a moment the constitution and existing statutes; they go right ahead and by order in council contravene any statute that stands in the way. Therefore the minister's argument falls down there by reason of the government's own practice.

The minister seems to place the responsibility for old age pensions upon the provinces. But the rise in the cost of living which has taken place is not a provincial responsibility. It comes about by reason of the expansion of credit, because there is a war on and people are at work and spending money. The emergency is not a provincial emergency; it is a national emergency, and the old age pensioner is a national problem. I think the minister may be a little afraid that an increase in the old age pension will work toward that thing we call inflation. But suppose the provinces provide the money; the money would be spent anyhow, and it makes no difference as far as inflation is concerned whether the provinces or the dominion provide the money. The provinces, as a matter of fact, cannot provide the money. It is the dominion government which has had an increase in revenues. Perhaps I do not know the facts and figures of provincial revenues as well as I should, but I doubt whether provincial revenues have risen very much. They may even have decreased.

The minister said that 40 per cent of the government's spending was for the war. I do not know what percentage of Great Britain's expenditure is for the war, but I think I could make a pretty good guess, and I know that in spite of all their war expenditure, their rationing and the huge taxation that is imposed upon their people, the British government has still found itself able to raise the old age pension in that country. It is a great shame in these days, with the cost of living rising as it has done and may continue to do in spite of the ceiling on prices, for us to say that we will see that the wage-earner and this class and that get a cost of living bonus, but that for our aged mothers and fathers we cannot afford to spend a dollar more. These aged mothers and fathers are the people who for the most part pioneered in this country and provided an opportunity for coming generations to live here.

There is this also to be noted. The earning power of our aged people has gone. They have no more opportunity in life to earn another dollar, and goodness knows the pension was low enough even when prices were low. How pitiful it must be now! The rising cost of living is working a tremendous hardship on these aged people, and yet we cannot provide an extra dollar or two for them. All we need to use is just the ordinary amount of common sense to see that these aged people who could barely live in days gone by on the meagre pensions they were receiving, certainly cannot live any better now, if as well, with the rising cost of living. The minister should go into this question more thoroughly with the provinces, and instead of putting the responsibility on the provinces to initiate action, let us look upon this as a national question, and let this government take the initiative and provide in this emergency the necessary funds. If the minister does not know where to get the money, we can tell him.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, since, this evening, we members have the opportunity, I believe, of speaking more or less along general lines, I feel that there are certain things which I should say before the adjournment.

It has been interesting, sitting here during these last two weeks, to listen to the questions which have been put and the answers which have been given. Somehow or another, sitting in this chamber, it has seemed difficult sometimes for me to realize that a war is actually in progress. I do not believe that I have ever seen quite so much apathy as I have noticed during the last few weeks among the members of this house. There seems to be an air of frustration and of futility such as has seldom been equalled during the time I have been here. There has seemed to be, somehow or another, such a lack of dynamic purpose; yet all of us will agree to-day that the necessity for the driving force of our whole activity is greater than it has ever been.

Of course, it is not so very long since the last adjournment; yet, living as we do in a world of such swiftly-moving events, great changes have taken place in the whole alignment of world forces since we left this chamber in the summer.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to the foreign policy of this government. That policy as a rule has been outlined by the Prime Minister. Looking over his speeches during the past eight years on this question, one does not find them always as clear-cut and as well-defined as one might hope to have them; they are more or less veiled in words and phrases. But I will concede that the speech which the Prime Minister made in this chamber a couple of weeks ago was about the clearest indication the Canadian people have had since he returned from England of a change in the foreign policy of this government. At the same time I doubt whether what he has said has been clearly understood by certain sections of our people, and I think they should understand these things.

In order to make a definite statement with regard to the change in policy it seems necessary to go back a while. The rise of aggression in Europe is an old story, and one which is now written indelibly on the pages of history. Neither wishes nor time can erase it. At the beginning, aggression reared its ugly head in Asia—in Manchukuo—then in Abyssinia, in Spain, in Austria, and so on. That is a story which everyone knows. The story of how the democracies rose to fight aggression is also known and is a matter of written record.

We all know and realize to-day that the policy which dominated Europe at the time of the rise of Hitler and aggression was the policy of Chamberlain, the policy of appeasement and isolation, the policy which Chamberlain, the Cliveden set, and some of the pro-fascist members of the British government helped to put into effect. It dominated the European scene during the rise of aggression.

It is, I believe, quite safe to say, in view of the speeches made by our Prime Minister during those years, that we in this country followed the appeasement policy of Mr. Chamberlain and supported isolation. It can safely be said to-day that the influences behind that policy more or less built up the forces of Hitler, seeking to direct them into certain channels. This policy aided in the building up of fascist Germany in the hope that it could be kept like a dog on a leash and directed wherever the British government wished.

On March 30, 1939, our own Prime Minister made a speech which, although clothed, as most of his speeches are, in many words, definitely takes the stand for isolation. I quote briefly from that speech:

> In many, but certainly not in all cases, this growth of national feeling has strengthened the desire for a policy which its defenders call minding one's own business and which its critics call isolationism. . . . The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that cannot run itself, and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptcy and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

That, I think, indicates, as well as any of the speeches the Prime Minister has made, his support of the appeasement policy. But we know now that appeasement was a fatal policy, which left the small nations of Europe one by one to stand alone in the pathway of the aggressor. If we look over the records of the dominion bureau of statistics we shall see that during the years of the rise of aggression we in this country actually supplied Germany with the munitions of war which she wanted. Any hon. member can look up those records for himself. Unfortunately, England did the same thing. One has only to look at the British Financial Post for the year 1939 to see the figures of the amounts of war material which were shipped from Britain to Germany direct, even without any payment of money, but by loans arranged through the Bank of England; and this was done until within one week of the declaration of war by Great Britain on Germany. Of course the purpose was that if Germany were so built up and strengthened, she should turn eastward and that there should be war between Germany and Russia, that the two should—possibly—destroy each other and leave England free to establish a hegemony over Europe. Hon. members will remember that materials were sent to Finland from Britain. They will remember the first Finnish war. England was so anxious to start war on Russia that she even aided the Finnish government in its first war on Russia. Materials were shipped and money was sent to build up the Mannerheim line, and at that time we were told that the poor little democratic government of Finland was set upon by the greedy Russian bear. It is wonderful, of course, the way time has of refuting lies, because to-day all the world recognizes the fascist nature of the Finnish government; it stands revealed on the stage of history where the drama of civilization is being enacted.

Then we came to a point where Russian diplomacy made a trade agreement with Germany, and England, being no longer in a position where she could dominate the scene, where she could lead or force Germany in any particular way, was forced to declare war.

Britain herself was then left, as a result of her own policy of appeasement and isolation, to stand practically alone except for her colonies, who were very ill prepared to help her, in the pathway of the dragon of fascism—the dragon which she herself had helped to grow to maturity and which now stood snarling upon her own doorstep.

The British people turned to Mr. Churchill. Mr. Churchill had always opposed the policy of Mr. Chamberlain, and had urged that Britain be prepared to fight. To me it is a remarkable thing how during the first years of the war the democracies seemed not to give a real expression of their effort to destroy fascism. The early stages of the war were characterized largely by a kind of stalemate; there was more of a sitzkrieg than of a blitzkrieg on the part of the democracies. The worst part of it was that at that time there was undoubtedly a concerted effort within the democracies themselves more or less to restrict and restrain the actual expression of democracy within their own peoples.

The classic example of this was France. Within France the ruling group, the men of Munich, did whatever was possible, and they certainly did a great deal, to destroy the trade union movement, the people's organizations, when they imprisoned and interned thousands of trade union leaders, and many of the communists, who would to the last drop of their blood have defended France against Germany. The French government was afraid to intervene on behalf of the democratic forces of the French people, and allowed the minority group finally to betray France into the hands of Germany.

We in this country had a taste of that repression. After war was declared, we had the defence of Canada regulations put into effect. We had the chief apologist for the Vichy government, our Minister of Justice, give us a little taste of, shall I say, Vichy justice or Vichy repression. The Canadian people were subjected to methods of coercion and repression, the loss of minority rights, the curtailment of free speech and free press. Right now it should be clearly said that if during the first part of this war the government of Canada had worked as assiduously to destroy Hitler and everything having to do with Hitler as it did to destroy the free and democratic institutions of Canada, the Canadian people would have been more united in their first efforts.

There was a certain amount of apathy at the beginning of the war. Anyone who was close to the people of the country felt it and knew it, although of course government spokesmen would deny the fact, and have done so. But anyone who was close to the working people, through the first year or two of the war, will know that in the mouths of hundreds of thousands of Canadians, even mothers and fathers whose sons were in the fighting forces, there was often this phrase, "What are we fighting for?" Early this summer the battle of Britain was raging and democracy such as Britain has upheld was hanging by a slender thread. Soon after this house adjourned, when perhaps the peril of the British people was greater than it had ever been in the whole history of their existence, events took a dramatic turn, and Hitler, hoping to have the support in Britain of a government which he thought was the same as the Chamberlain government, turned his arms against Russia.

I do not know, although I believe, that most members of this house are aware that I was not born a Canadian. I am a Canadian by adoption, but the whole of my future life and the lives of my Canadian-born children are bound up in the future of Canada. At the same time, however, like everyone else, I have a deep and all-abiding love for the land of my birth and, during the months of spring and early summer, it was to me a terrible thing to think of the people of Britain suffering as they did through the battle of Britain. As soon as the armies of Germany turned upon Russia, the people of Britain, having suffered through that period, and feeling the results of that isolation policy, forced their Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, once and for all, to sever himself from the idea of isolation and appeasement, with the result, which everyone now knows, that a collective security pact was made with the great powers of the world.

I think I can say most sincerely that when this pact of collective security was made it was the first real opportunity which the peoples of the democracies ever had for the utter crushing of Hitler. Before that, they had merely played at it; they had never been able with any degree of certainty to go forward in the knowledge that they could do it. It is a good thing to face facts and to acknowledge these things. The British people, because they have suffered, are not afraid to face facts. I have seen, in some British newspapers, astounding statements. For example, the Evening Standard a few months ago, writing immediately after the blowing up of the Dnieper dam, said:

> Certainly it will be criminal if our aid to the greatest ally we ever had is not Herculean. We must create a second front and not only in the air. We must haul off the tiger from the body of our friend, not by biting its tail, but by dealing violent and vicious blows against its body. As each new report reaches this country of Soviet valour and heroism, one question alone is raised in the minds of the British people. What are we doing to help our allies and to join in the battle? It is not sentiment which prompts this question; the plain facts of our own situation are known and can be stated.

I should like the members of the committee to listen to this; they will realize how the English people have faced the truth.

> Before Russia's entry into the battle the possibilities of a purely military victory over Germany did not exist. She possessed far greater resources in manpower and a continental industrial power which it would have taken us years to overhaul. Suddenly in a day the Russian resistance transformed the whole scene. But it will only remain transformed so long as the Russian armies are kept in existence and retain their power of counter-attack. If it had been the Russian armies, not the Russian Dnieper Dam, which had been broken in this past week, the possibilities of military victory would have receded once more beyond the horizon.

The News Chronicle of September 18 had this to say:

> Are we, too, going to play Hitler's game and let him dispose of his enemies one by one? . . . Will invasion of the continent be any easier in six months, twelve months or two years if Russia is broken through lack of timely diversion? The answer is no. It will probably be impossible and a large proportion of our great army will rot in idleness on our coasts.

Our own colonel in chief of the Canadian armies has spoken about the need for opening up a western front. He has said that to defeat the Germans we must defeat them on the land. Will it be any easier if it is left until later? This government should realize at the present time how many thousands of Canadians are joining with the British people in demanding that the allies do whatever is possible for opening up another western front. There must have been many Canadians who, when the pact of collective security was made, wondered as I wondered what stand this country would take. The policy of this country had been to follow the policy of appeasement and isolation; and here was Mr. Churchill taking a direct stand in opposition to that, and advancing, instead, the policy of collective security.

When our Prime Minister spoke in England at the Lord Mayor's banquet, although the greatest battle in all history was raging from Leningrad to the Black sea, he did not mention it, an omission for which he was severely criticized in the British papers. When he came back to Canada he certainly did make a speech over the air in which he said in so many words that free men must now get together to defeat the common enemy. But it was not until I came to the house two weeks ago and listened to the Prime Minister that I really had any confidence that this government had changed its foreign policy and was now in agreement with the idea of collective security, and that it was then really and truly willing to put the forces of Canada beside those of Britain, Russia and the United States for the defeat of Hitler. Considering that our Prime Minister did make a speech in which he praised Russian arms, in which he acknowledged that to-day they were stemming the tide of fascism and holding the dike for the rest of the democracies, I think it was a pity that he did not go just a little further.

As hon. members know, a few days ago the Russian people celebrated one of their anniversaries. The British people, I believe through Mr. Anthony Eden, sent them a message. The people of the United States sent them a message. In Australia the government demanded that on public buildings the Russian flag be flown beside the Australian flag. But in Canada the day passed, as far as I was aware, without a single statement being made by our Prime Minister, or any message being sent to the Russian people. At the time I did not quite know what should be done. It seemed a very poor thing, I thought, that we in Canada should not stand with the other democraries in sending a word of encouragement to the Russian people. On November 4 I received a telegram from the Tass agency of New York city, asking if I would send a few words in a telegram to the people of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. At that time I did not know whether our Prime Minister or any member of the government was going to send a message. Therefore my own message was very brief. Since to my knowledge nothing was sent on behalf of the government, I believe there are thousands of Canadian people who will be glad to know that at least one member of this house sent a message to the Russian people on behalf of the people of Canada who to-day are satisfied that Russia is defending democracy along with the rest of us. I should like to read the few words that I sent, so that the people of this country may know what I said:

On behalf of the workers and farmers of Canada, I send greetings to the peoples of the soviet union. The great heart of democracy which throbs with the vitality of the people will live on bringing final destruction to the fascists. Your courage and bravery is like a lamp which shines out across the world lighting in us the same flame of resolve. We will not fail you. We will see that the wheels of industry do not cease. The strength of our right arm and the power of our back shall continuously labour to send the supplies you need. Fight on, brave people. We stand beside you to the end, till victory is won for us all.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

I sent that telegram hoping that one message like that coming from Canada would reassure the Russian people that we were not forgetting them.

At this time, more than ever before, there is need for national unity, unity which takes no heed of class or creed or race or politics; because if now the great powers of democracy are united for the final destruction of Hitler, there are no people anywhere within those democracies who are not ready and willing to give the greatest possible support. I only wish the Prime Minister had made a more stirring appeal to the people of Canada at this time, in order to rally them. Here we are about to adjourn this sitting. Weeks will pass before we meet again. Many things may happen in the interval, and I feel that the Prime Minister has not really said enough in this house to rally and urge the Canadian people to a further spurt of effort. I should like to add my voice to anything the Prime Minister has said in calling upon the working people, to enlist not only their sympathy but also their greater support. I feel sure that if the Prime Minister would implement some of the fine words he has uttered by some action, the awakening of the Canadian people to the realization that further effort is required would come more quickly.

It has been a cause of great wonder to some of the people of Canada why the Prime Minister, who has acknowledged his willingness to join the pact for collective security, has not extended to Britain's new ally full diplomatic relationship, as he could. Why have not trade and diplomatic relations been opened up between this country and Russia? I take this opportunity to ask the government, on behalf of thousands of our Canadian people, to consider opening up these relations just as soon as that may be done. Then the people of this country will be in a better position to know just what aid is given Russia.

I think I can also say that it would do much to reassure the Canadian people if at this time our government would get rid of the Vichy representative. I do not know anything about that gentleman personally, but I do know, as thousands of Canadian people know, that Vichy is not our friend. Beyond any shadow of doubt Vichy has placed itself on the side of German aggression. Why in the world should we have to tolerate an enemy within our gate? As far as I can see, there is no reason for it. If Britain wants a Vichy representative somewhere, let Britain have the Vichy representative in her own country. We in Canada do not want him. I would say that the sooner we get rid of that gentleman, the greater will be the encouragement to our people to go ahead with a job that has to be done. It is a very bad thing to have the Vichy representative here any longer; we do not want him to teach our Minister of Justice any more Vichy tricks of repression.

I would ask also that before the next session the government, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Weyburn, should give further consideration to the plight of our western farmers. Hon. members know already that the wheat pools of the west have formulated a four-point programme which has been supported by all groups in the west, irrespective of party affiliations. After the wheat pools formulated those four moderate demands they were placed politely before the government for consideration. But when the Minister of Agriculture spoke over the air in reply to the wheat pools, the things he said were like a slap in the face to a hungry man. I would say also that the deep, icy silence of prairie winter will not be worse than the brooding resentment and despair which are felt among our people. The freezing winds which sweep over the prairies this winter will not be so chill as the sense of injustice which will be felt by the people on the prairies.

The other night the hon. member for Melfort outlined conditions in his constituency. Conditions are even worse in my part of Saskatchewan, for we suffered from drought this summer. I noticed some lists in one of the newspapers in the city of North Battleford. I had one or two people check over those lists with me, and I found that in three municipalities in the vicinity of North Battleford there are no less than 660 farms on which tax liens will have to be placed on or about December 1 if arrears of taxes are not paid. Surely that is a damning indictment of our agricultural policies. I cannot stress too strongly the need for the government to try to find some way to equalize the sacrifice as between the east and the west, to give our western people an opportunity better to maintain themselves on the land.

There is one other point I should like to mention in connection with arousing and stimulating our Canadian people in response to our war effort. I mentioned it briefly this afternoon, when I referred to those of our labour leaders and anti-fascists who are interned in this country. You may have your own ideas about these men, and so may I. In a democracy, that is one of the advantages—that you may have your ideas and I may have mine. But I think we may all agree that without any shadow of doubt there are certain of those men in the internment camps to-day who could do more to stir up certain sections of our working people in support of the war effort than could any other people. As long as they are kept in the internment camps we are going to have certain sections of the working people who are disunited and not as strong in their efforts to support this war as we might wish them to be.

There is one further point which will be of interest to the women of this country. I believe that when many of the women read their papers to-morrow they will feel very happy indeed to know that at last the government have done something with regard to their pensions, and dependents' allowances. I was going to ask the government to-night to do something in that regard, and as a woman I cannot help thanking them for relieving the anxiety and the burden of fear from the minds of so many Canadian women.

During these last few years, undoubtedly numbers of our women who could not do anything but stay at home and mind their families have had to carry undue burdens of fear, owing to the fact that their husbands were in the armed forces, and they were left to get along on allowances, and were not able to maintain their families as they would like to have done.

I know that in the past the people of Canada have felt, and I believe they still feel, that if this government would intervene a little more on behalf of our labour forces a greater amount of energy would be liberated in this war effort. In other words I would ask the government before the next session begins to intercede on behalf of democracy, and to try to see that the small minority group of industrialists within this country do not take from the rights of the workers, as they have done and appear to be doing at the present time. I say that because I really believe that to-day there are certain groups of industrialists in Canada to whom the making of profit is the paramount consideration, over and above the consideration of whether or not we win the war.

That is a charge. I know it is a charge. But I do not know whether there are any government spokesmen to-day who would dare to deny it. If we remember the history of France we will know that it was a small group within France who led to her final downfall, because they withheld the power of democracy from the people. Do not let that happen here. We do not want a small group in this country to attempt to hold back the forces of the people. I would say that if the government will allow democracy to function, they will find a great heart among the working people which will beat in steady, pulsing rhythm, and they will feel from it an increased momentum in the war effort.

The government should let us breathe once more in this country the free air of democracy by removing the restrictions of the defence of Canada regulations. Give us the chance to breathe once more into our nostrils the air of freedom, so that we can stimulate the activity of the people. I would ask the government to unleash the power of democracy, because if the people of Canada have its full power they will go forward, like a flood after drought, a flood which will wash away the blight and disease of fascism and aggression. If the government will accept the full power of the workers, as those workers would like to give it, I feel sure we shall have a new strength and a new vigour in this whole movement.

I can remember that on the first ocasion I spoke in this chamber I asked what women have to do with war. When it was a question of war, to direct or to manipulate the forces of aggression and facism, I can honestly say that I, as a woman in this country, took very little heed of it. I did not see where it would be of any benefit to the people. But to-day, when we have the united power of all the democracies ready and willing finally to crush Hitler I would say as a woman of Canada that I want to stand beside the men, and do everything possible for the winning of the war.

The women of Russia, the women of Great Britain, the women of the United States, and the women of Canada will, I feel sure, from now on give everything possible. I have gone even so far as to go to the Minister of National Defence and ask him if a place might be found for me in the women's army. I did that because I thought that in that way I might be further able to stimulate the working women of this country, and to make them realize the necessity for a national effort, irrespective of party, creed, race or colour, if fascism is going to be destroyed.

If we can liberate democracy in this country and give it a chance to fight, then I believe we can say to the tortured peoples of the conquered countries of Europe, in the words of the late Norman Rogers: "In faith we will fight on. We will resist; we will endure. We will take the offensive, and we will win."

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Chairman, during the past two weeks a variety of subjects has been discussed, and while I am sorry no legislation has been brought before the house, or no opportunity given to us to do anything constructive, other than to express our opinion, I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) make the statement he did make after the dinner recess. I refer to his statement respecting allowances for dependent mothers of soldiers.

I would ask the minister whether he would also include in that group the dependent fathers of soldiers. I understand no provision is made in the regulations whereby dependent fathers may receive any allowance. At the same time I have in mind certain cases where I believe allowances would be proper. I believe the allowances for dependent fathers demand the same consideration as do those for dependent mothers of soldiers.

The case I have in mind is that of a crippled father, a man who must get round in a wheel-chair, and who cannot leave the wheel-chair unless he is lifted by someone who must be hired part of the time to perform that service. Early in September, 1939, this man's only son enlisted and has been in England for eighteen months. The father had considerable difficulty in getting any allowance for himself or his fifteen-year old daughter. I would ask the Minister of Finance to consider such cases as this, and have the regulations amended accordingly.

I should like also to say a word on behalf of the old age pensioners. For a number of months past I believe most hon. members have been receiving letters from old age pensioners and potential old age pensioners. With those letters we sometimes received suggestions, and I am going to read one which came to me just a few days ago. It is headed "The Pensioner's Psalm", and is as follows:

> The Politician is my Shepherd;
> I am in Want.
> He maketh me to lie down in misery; he leadeth me beside still factories.
> He disturbeth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of destruction for his party's sake.
> His policies frighten me; he taxeth my food in the presence of mine enemies.
> He anointeth my pension with "Means Tests": My expense runneth over.
> Surely poverty shall follow me all the days of my life: I shall dwell in a mortgaged state for ever.

I believe that gives an accurate account of the stand some of the politicians take in connection with our old people. I do not wish to be classed among the politicians, because what I have to say to-night is for the earnest consideration of the committee and the government. I speak on behalf of the old age pensioners, and the potential old age pensioners. I have lived in Canada for a number of years.

On another occasion I pointed out to the house that if the people across Canada were given the right price for the fruits of their labour, if they were not legally robbed, there would not be the need for the paying out of so much money in the form of old age pensions. The conditions which have existed and do exist could be easily corrected by the government. The people should be given a chance to get something for what they produce and for the labour they give to industry. I believe the minimum for old age pensions should be reduced from seventy to sixty-five years, and the pension itself should be raised from $20 to $30 a month.

Some will ask: Where is the money to come from? That question was asked in 1938 and 1939 when people were trying to get relief from this and the previous governments. But since 1939 we have not heard that question asked. What we have heard is several ministers saying that whatever is needed physically will be made possible financially. Only this morning I saw in the morning Citizen where the president of the bankers' association stated that there would be no trouble about financing this war. If we can provide finances for war and destruction, then why in the name of common sense cannot we provide them for peacetime constructive purposes? I am one of these old men of thirty-seven years or more. I plead with the government once more to take into consideration the plight of these old age pensioners and do something for them that is really worth while. It can be done and it should be done.

Being one of those who has been robbed in the past, legally it is true, I think it is my job to-night to direct the attention of the government to the plight of agriculture all across Canada and particularly in western Canada. Going back to 1935 when the wheat board was first set up, we find there was an initial payment of 87½ cents a bushel. In 1936 the same price was paid and in 1937 it was continued, but with certain restrictions upon the operations of the wheat board, into which I shall not go at this time. In 1938 the price was cut down to 80 cents a bushel. I do not know why that was done. In 1939 there was a further cut to 70 cents a bushel, but a system of bonuses was instituted. There were other limitations which tended to cut down the income of the western farmer. That continued in 1940. In 1941, in order to help win the war, we were asked to cut the production of wheat, and a wheat acreage bonus was introduced by regulation. This provided for a payment to a farmer who summer-fallowed his land and took it out of production.

Because the government realized the wrongs that had been done to agriculture and wanted to make some amendment, they came out recently with the announcement of another wholesale relief bonus. In western Canada a bonus of 75 cents an acre is to be paid on a maximum of 200 acres; those who have less than 400 acres will receive 75 cents an acre on half the cultivated acreage. If the farmers of eastern Canada or British Columbia feel that they do not come within this class I would remind them that this bonus is being extended to them in the form of free freight on feed grains.

I should like to refer for a moment to the soldier settlers who went on the land after the last great war. On several occasions we have pleaded for better treatment for these settlers. This is something that should be taken note of at this time because we are looking for men to go overseas. No doubt the men who come back from this war will expect to receive the same treatment as those who came back from the first great war. The soldier settlement scheme was set up after the first great war and 10,710 men took advantage of it. Up to this past summer 2,592 or approximately, about 24 per cent, had paid for their farms in full. A total of 3,004, or about 28 per cent, had an equity of 40 per cent or more in their farms; 1,645, or about 15 per cent, had an equity of 10 to 40 per cent in their farms and 3,469, or about 33 per cent, had little or no equity.

To break these figures up still more we find that 2,300 have a fighting chance. These men have been fighting ever since they went on the land and they will have to continue to fight. Approximately 1,100 have little prospect of making good. It might be of interest to hon. members to know that where a man has enlisted and has not been able to keep up his payments, the department concerned confiscates part of the allowances paid. Is this fair and decent treatment for our soldier settlers? In twenty years the land they are on has not been able to earn enough to pay the payments, and yet the government comes along and confiscates part of the dependents' allowances which rightfully belong to the families of the men who own the farms. I shall not go into this any further at the present time, but I intend to go into it more fully at a later date.

Recently we had the announcement of price-fixing regulations. I am glad to see that these have come at last, but I would have preferred to have them at an earlier date. I would prefer also to have had the prices regulated on a parity basis. If we compare the position of agriculture with that of industry, we find that just before the war broke out, industry went on a sit-down strike and refused to work until the profit restrictions which had been imposed by this parliament were removed by order in council late in August, 1939. Taking the case of organized labour, we find that these men are guaranteed the highest level of wages that existed between 1926 and 1929, and in addition they are given a cost of living bonus. I am not opposed to that, but when we come to consider agriculture, the poor relation of this Canada of ours, we find that if we were to get the same price level for our wheat that we got in 1929 we would receive $1.35 a bushel for No. 1 northern, Fort William, instead of the seventy cents we receive at the present time. We were told that the farmer would have to take the rap during the first two years of the war, but I was in hopes that something would be done after we had taken the rap for those two years. I went back to see what prices had been in the third year of the last war, and I found that the average price of wheat during the third year of the last war was $2.05 cents a bushel; oats, 63.2 cents; barley, $1.09; and flax, $2.68. I mention the price of wheat particularly because it is the basic industry of western Canada and, as I say, in the third year of the last war we were receiving $2.05 a bushel, while in the third year of the present war we are receiving seventy cents a bushel for No. 1 northern, Fort William. That is the guaranteed minimum price.

If other conditions were equal, it would not be quite so bad, but I draw the attention of the government and of this committee to the fact that at that time we could buy an eight-foot binder for $167 and to-day we pay for that same binder no less than $342. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Finance who holds the purse strings, how farmers can make a living and pay their debts under those conditions? It simply cannot be done. Although the Minister of Agriculture has tried to tell western Canada and all of Canada that we are actually receiving ninety cents a bushel or better for our wheat I, as a practical farmer, know that that is not the situation. I am selling wheat, and I have sold it this year, for 48½ cents a bushel delivered to the local elevator. That is for grade 2. If I got seventy-five cents an acre bonus, it would net me three cents a bushel more, or fifty-one cents a bushel at the local elevator.

I know that the farmers of Canada from one end to the other are not asking for and do not want charity. I maintain here to-night, as I have on other occasions, that we are being robbed; and we are demanding at least a portion of that which is being stolen from us. During the early part of this session the Minister of Agriculture told one of the members of the loyal opposition that if the farmers were getting what they were entitled to, Canada would have at least $100,000,000 less for the war effort. That figure is not high enough. If the minister had made it $250,000,000 for wheat alone, I would have agreed with him on that particular occasion. But that is the kind of treatment we are getting, and I say that we are entitled to something better.

We have on a number of occasions advocated a price of one dollar a bushel for No. 1 northern, delivered at the local elevator. I do not think that is too much, and if that price applied for the first two thousand bushels the farmer delivered, it would not be necessary to go into a lot of these other schemes, such as acreage bonus, and so forth. The trouble is that the Minister of Agriculture and the government are trying to treat agriculture all round as only certain sections of it should be treated. Agriculture as a whole is passing through a period of depression. The prices that we get for our wheat would not be sufficient even if we had abundant crops, and special provision should be made by way of bonus or other assistance for that part of the industry which is suffering from crop failures.

We have heard in this country a great deal of talk about Canadian unity. We hear politicians on the platform, speakers on the radio, and certain sections of the press continually urging Canadian unity, but I ask this committee and the government, how can we have Canadian unity when one section of the country is making profits that are entirely out of line in war-time, while another section is selling at half the cost of production? It simply cannot be done, and on behalf of the people I represent, as well as the people of Canada as a whole, I ask that simple justice be meted out to agriculture so that we may be given an opportunity to do our share in getting justice for Canada and in ridding the world of Hitlerism.

Mr. PERLEY: The Chairman has sent me a note threatening to throw me out if I take longer than five minutes. There was one occasion in this house when I came pretty near being thrown out, so I am not going to take any chances now. We have been here for two weeks, and only now in the dying minutes of the session have we an opportunity to say something about agriculture, marketing and kindred subjects. I want to protest against this procedure. I can recall three occasions during the last four sessions when a similar thing occurred, and this all-important question was brought up only in the dying hours of the session.

The hon. member for Weyburn to-night has covered the whole situation and reviewed conditions in western Canada so well that if I had had the floor before him I would have said pretty much all that he has said. I recall a similar situation at a pool mass meeting in the west. The Hon. Mr. Motherwell was there, and we were charged not to be critical in our addresses. Therefore when I followed him I said that it would be easy for me to live up to those instructions because, if I wanted to be critical, I could not make half as good a job of it as the Hon. Mr. Motherwell had done. Accordingly to-night I feel I cannot make any better job of it than the hon. member for Weyburn has done, and I think I will leave it there.

It seems to me that the government have decided that they will not be jarred from their position. We cannot jar the Minister of Trade and Commerce from his seat to tell us something about the wheat marketing policy of the government, and on looking at the Minister of Agriculture as I have faced him during a number of sessions, I feel that he, too, does not intend to be jarred out of his seat to-night.

The pool may be down here in a little while with their recommendations. I think that the four recommendations they have made to the government are just and fair. I believe the Minister of Agriculture has already accepted one or two of them, and I would implore the government to give those recommendations serious consideration and to adopt them all. I have not time to go into them, but my position is quite clear. I may say that everything that organization in western Canada has advocated in the last three or four months I have been advocating in this house for the last three or four years. I implore the government and the minister to save agriculture, which to-day is facing a crisis—save agriculture in this emergency as you are saving other industries in Canada. That is all the people of western Canada want —a square deal for agriculture. I see my five minutes are up, and I will sit down as I promised the Chairman.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in his seat. I wish to refer to a question which I asked him the other day. His answer to my questioin with regard to the continued arrest and internment of certain persons in Canada was not satisfactory.

I know that the Prime Minister and other hon. members will realize that this is not a conversion on my part which has taken place since June 22 last. But if there was anything necessary to convince members of the government, and particularly the Department of Justice, of the folly, from both an economic and a psychological point of view, of continuing to keep in internment camps a certain class of internees, I believe the speech which was made here this evening should carry conviction to them. There has been a change. These people were interned because they might commit or had committed subversive acts. As there is now no possibility that they will commit subversive acts, at any rate until the "line" changes again, I see no reason why the whole question should not be reconsidered and these people released. I notice that, in a great many letters which I have received during the last few weeks, they are now making their plea for release on the basis that they are anti-fascists. That is a new departure since June 22, 1941. Prior to that date they were asking for release on the ground that they were arrested on account of their labour activities. Whether that is so or not, I think we can agree that to-day they are definitely anti-fascist. I see no reason in the world why this country should maintain them in internment camps when we can now get their assistance in carrying on the war effort and anything else which may be for the benefit of the country. I suggest that some members of the government bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister and of the Department of Justice and let them give it consideration before we meet again. I hope that something will be done in the matter, because I do not believe it is a good thing for the country that it be left as it is now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to see that it is brought to the attention of the acting Minister of Justice.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Munitions and Supply promised the other day to make a statement with regard to the training of merchant seamen. Is he in a position to make that statement now?

Mr. HOWE: I have obtained some information from the officers of the Department of Transport. The two projects go side by side —the seamen's manning pools and the seamen's training classes.

The manning pools are already in existence. There is a manning pool in operation in Montreal, with accommodation for about 850 seamen; there is a small manning pool in operation at Halifax, where a building is being completed for a much larger pool which is needed at that point; and plans are under way to build a manning pool in Vancouver. In the manning pool the seaman who for any reason leaves his ship, or, rather—as many are—is sent out from the old country to fill vacancies in British ships, will go into the pool, where he will be furnished with board and lodging and will receive the pay of his rank in actual service. In other words, he will be in service and ready for assignment to a ship when a vacancy occurs.

The training project is just being put under way. As my hon. friend knows, for a number of years there have been under the Department of Transport training schools for officers. These are located at a number of points across Canada, and they will continue to serve to train officers for the merchant marine. The schools will be expanded and brought up to requirements for that service.

Schools for seamen are being established, one near Halifax and one near Kingston. The one at Halifax is to train able-bodied seamen, and the one at Kingston is for the training of stokers, firemen and engine-room workers.

Arrangements have been made so that seamen in training can also be trained in actual service on ships. After a seaman has had—I believe it is—eight weeks' training, a place will be found for him on a merchant ship with more experienced seamen so that he can qualify for an able-bodied seaman's ticket.

The plan for training of seamen will be extended to the Pacific coast as soon as the schools in the east are well under way.

It will be necessary for Canada to man many of the new ships as they come into service. The first ships, those which have already been launched, have been built for British government account, but even of those ships, some have been assigned for operation to the Cunard-White Star company, and one or two have been assigned for operation to the Canadian government merchant marine. Canadian crews will be required for at least some of the ships built for Britain and, of course, for all ships built for or operated by Canadian companies on Canadian account.

My hon. friend asked what is the crew of a merchant ship of that type. The crew amounts to a total of forty-five men. It is the purpose of the schools for merchant seamen, the schools for engine-room seamen, and the schools for officers, to train men rapidly enough to man these boats as they are required.

At the same time we are performing a service for the British government and for non-allied governments in maintaining pools for seamen and in looking after the welfare of seamen while they are in port and not assigned to ships.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. GREEN: Thank you.

Mr. QUELCH: There are several questions which I wanted to ask the Minister of Agriculture, but, as the time is getting late and I do not know whether the house is going to sit to-morrow, I shall content myself with asking one question.

The Minister of Agriculture is well aware that in certain parts of the west there is a good deal of discontent at the present time at the way in which the summer-fallow bonus is being administered. I have had several complaints that the amount claimed by farmers is being cut down considerably. The other complaint is of the delay in making the payment. The reason which has been advanced by the department for the cutting down of the claims is twofold: first of all, owing to the fact that the statements filed by the farmers under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in 1939 and 1940 did not coincide with the statements filed in 1941, and second, owing to the definition of the term "summer-fallow." I cannot understand why the department should take the stand that statements filed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in 1939 and 1940 are 100 per cent correct and the statements filed in 1941 are incorrect. That is apparently their stand on the question of summer-fallow. I realized when the measure was first introduced that there was bound to be a good deal of trouble with regard to the definition of "summer-fallow," and I asked the minister then whether or not in the drought area it would be recognized that land which was allowed to go to weeds, burned in the spring and seeded to wheat was summer-fallow. He replied that whatever the practice was in any locality, that practice would be recognized as summer-fallow. The farmers in the drought area were uncertain about this. I held many meetings and told them that in my opinion, if it was the usual practice the government would allow it to be regarded as summer-fallow; but to make sure a letter was sent to Mr. Barrie from whose reply I quote as follows:

> If it is the custom to allow the land in your district to lie fallow, grow to weeds, burn in the spring and sow to grain, this plan of summer-fallow will be accepted.

I understand that there has been a great deal of trouble in that district with regard to that very thing. The amount of the payment is being cut owing to the fact that farmers have not cultivated the land but have allowed it to go to weeds. I do not say whether that is the right procedure, but that is recognized in the district. I was taken by a number of farmers to different fields where side by side they showed me one field that had been summer-fallowed by cultivation and the other field allowed to lie fallow and burned in the spring, and one could see no difference between the two groups. Possibly the grain grown on cultivated land was a little greener than the crop on the land that had been burned off. In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture and the department at Edmonton told these farmers—and they have letters on file to prove it—that whatever had been the procedure in the district would be recognized, I cannot understand the government now cutting down their claims because they have not cultivated the land. Can the minister deal with that?

Mr. GARDINER: Answering the first question as to delays on checking 1939 and 1940, I think the hon. member for Acadia will agree when I say that when the regulations were brought down first in the early part of the session no provision was made to take 1939 into consideration. I believe I am right in saying that the hon. member for Acadia was the first one to ask to have that done. I am not trying to place the responsibility upon him for its having been done. After I had listened to his representations and the representations of others, and giving the matter some consideration, I as Minister of Agriculture advised the government by myself to have the check made on 1939 and 1940. I must say that after having had the experience we have had with it this summer, if it were being done again I do not think I would give the same advice to the government. I think the delays in connection with the administration as a result of having taken 1939 into consideration at all have caused far more hardship, and expense to the government, than any benefits that are going to be derived from having denied a comparatively few people the payment on a greatly increased crop during 1940. Nevertheless that principle was adopted, and there has been some delay as a result of it, because we have had to take two years under consideration.

This, however, should be stated. According to the information which I was given early in the session, at least 60 per cent of all farmers who turned in applications or who filled out questionnaires during 1939 and 1940, when they put in their returns in 1941 showed a sufficient correspondence in those returns for the three years to make it possible to pass their applications for the amount they asked for. As regards the other 40 per cent, there were such differences as between the figures they put in one year for a particular year and the figures they put in another year for the same year that further checks had to be made, and there was a great deal of delay on that account. The matter of checking was, as a result of that, somewhat more expensive during this year than during previous years.

While I am dealing with the subject I might answer a question raised by the hon. member for Melfort last evening. He asked as to the numbers engaged in inspection this year compared with other years. The figure which gives the fairest comparison is the figure of man-days involved in the inspections in the three years during which we have had prairie farm assistance, and this year, as we have stated, we have had some staffs added to take care of additional work. That is the work of dealing with wheat acreage reduction. The man-days for 1939 numbered 14,676, and for 1940 the number was 17,693. The man-days up to the present for this year, which is not the complete year, number 19,503. The number of inspectors that are on is not a proper check upon the expense or even the amount of time that will be involved.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the committee will pardon me for a moment, it is nearly eleven o'clock. Might I suggest that the house give its consent to continue in commitee until we conclude.

Mr. GARDINER: As to why we have an inspector in each municipality, I may say that while I am not personally in entire agreement that all the inspections made were necessary, all departments of government are subject to the checks made by the auditors and by the comptroller of the treasury, and it was insisted that many more inspections might be made than probably we as a department would have made as a matter of administration. After all, however, those actually paying the funds have something to say about when they should be paid, and the inspections were made on the basis that we were required to make them.

With regard to summer-fallow, I might say that the statement which was made by the member for Acadia is practically the statement which I made to the house last year. The statement made by Mr. Barrie in general terms is the proper way of dealing with the matter of summer-fallow. I would, however, point out that after considering the question with the inspectors and others, it has been thought unwise to make a final settlement with regard to summer-fallow that is done on that basis, or according to that plan, until next spring, the reason being that if one wishes to abandon the land, he can take his payments in the fall of the year and disappear, and the land will probably not be put into crop in the succeeding year. That might not happen in many cases, but it is a possibility, and the decision has been made to withhold payments on summer-fallow that are claimed to be done when they are left to grow Russian thistle, to gather snow in the winter and to be cleared in the spring and seeded.

Mr. QUELCH: Withhold the complete payment, or part of it?

Mr. GARDINER: I would presume that if the payment is going to be made at all, the complete payment will be made, but the decision will be reached as to whether it is the proper method of summer-fallowing in that particular district. If it is decided that it is the usual method there, and that the individual will go right through with his programme for the year on that basis, then it will be possible to reach a decision in his favour.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister is quite aware, is he not, that this is a very general practice in part of the drought area, where the farmers are probably harder up than in any other part? If payment is withheld until next spring, a critical situation will be created. Surely the government could make a partial payment to tide these people over the winter. They have to buy coal, and everything else. Could at least a 50 per cent payment not be made now?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not aware from personal knowledge that summer-fallowing is done in that way. I have never known anyone who has done it in that way; but I have had reports from those who should know —and I presume, in view of the fact that the area where this is claimed to be done is largely in the constituency of Acadia, that I can take the word of the hon. member— that it is done in this way by some of the people there from year to year. I would, however, point out that in making the last $20,000,000 payment we shall be paying to all of those farmers certain amounts in December and March, when the money under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act ordinarily would be paid, so they will not be entirely without any payment. I would think that probably some check might be made in connection with individual cases, and where inspection renders it possible to make payment, part of the payment might be made.

The plan we are following at the moment is the one I explained the other day. All the claims recognized up to the present time are being paid immediately to the extent of 75 per cent of the amounts claimed; then we are making the adjustments from the other 25 per cent, if there is any difference of opinion as between the department and the individual.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. HANSELL: There is an impression abroad in certain parts of western Canada that the 75 cents bonus on the acreage is not applicable to irrigation districts. Are we to understand that to be the situation?

Mr. GARDINER: As the regulations read at the moment, the payments are not applicable to irrigated districts; but the question of whether they can be made applicable and how that might be done is still under consideration. A check is being made on the irrigated districts and regulations are being considered in that connection. This is intended to be a payment to increase the income of grain-growing farmers, particularly wheat growers, in western Canada. Where a farmer merely grows a field of wheat as part of his plan of rotation, in order that he may grow beets or something of that kind, it is not thought that payment should be made. But where the type of farming carried on in an irrigation district is such as to require the greater part of the crop to be grain, then it is the intention to try to work out some plan of making the payments.

Mr. HANSELL: I am very glad to hear the minister say that this matter is still under consideration. I am sure he is quite familiar with the problem. The fact of the matter is that in some irrigation districts the farmer will use water for only part of his farm, and not necessarily for that portion devoted to wheat. If the whole district is to be taken in, and the acreage bonus not paid, some of those individual farmers are going to suffer. There is the further point that these farmers are under a greater expense by reason of the fact that they have to pay for their water. I think it is correct to say also that the regulations are based on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, under which, of course, these farmers have to make their contribution of one per cent of the wheat they grow. I shall, however, be quite satisfied if the department will consider this whole matter in the most favourable light, and decide to give those districts the 75 cents additional bonus.

Mr. GILLIS: Just before the close of last session there was tabled in the house the report of a special parliamentary committee containing certain recommendations, two of which I have in mind at the moment. One was the extension of the War Veterans' Allowance Act to take in certain classifications of widows. I have heard no mention of that. The other was the extension of an order in council applying to men serving in the merchant marine, to include men who served in the convoy service. Nothing has been done about that. I believe that is a question which the minister for the navy should take under consideration. I have come in contact with many families who have suffered a great deal of hardship by reason of this situation. Men join the convoy ships. If the ships are of British or foreign registry, their families are left for months at a time practically as the recipients of relief, while the husband or breadwinner is performing a very useful service. If the provisions of the order in council which brings the merchant marine service within the pension legislation of the government is not made applicable to this class of service, then I think the shipping offices who sign on these men for convoy service should ascertain whether or not such men are leaving families in Canada. If they are, they should be compelled to make at least an assignment of pay. That is not being done at the present time, and I know that in eastern Canada, in both Halifax and Sydney, a great deal of hardship has resulted.

While I am on my feet I should like to bring one matter to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. On many occasions in this house I have endeavoured to impress upon the responsible ministers that coal-mining in Nova Scotia is on the wane and that a great deal of unemployment, both actual and potential, exists there. To-day I picked up a clipping from one of the newspapers of that district, in which it was stated that in the town of Reserve a mine which has been employing some 350 men is about to close down, because it is worked out. This means that 350 men are to be displaced. Some arrangements were in contemplation with regard to the opening of another colliery, but that has not been done.

This is what I have in mind. I corresponded with the minister with respect to a machine shop in the town of Glace Bay, which is about two and a half miles from the town in which this mine is located. If this machine shop could be used for war purposes, it would increase employment; and of these 350 men who will be displaced from that mine I am sure there are many who can be utilized in other industries. I just leave this thought with the minister. I hope he will give consideration to the possibility of utilizing these men somewhere else, because that mine is definitely closing. Within a week or so 350 men will be out of work, and this means the life of the entire community.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With reference to the question the hon. gentleman directed to me I would tell him that I made a statement the other day concerning the recommendations with regard to the War Veterans' Allowance Act, in which I said that the government had decided that the act would not be amended at this or the next session. I have prepared a complete report as to the action taken on every single recommendation of that committee, which I intend to table as soon as the new session opens. In the meantime I shall be glad to send a copy of the report to my hon. friend.

Mr. HOWE: With regard to the suggestion about labour, I may say to my hon. friend that I read the dispatch in the paper and I understood that a new seam was being opened up. I can say, however, that those men will be very welcome either at Sydney or at Halifax where a new machine shop with very considerable capacity has been opened for the repair of ships. Where there was a shortage last year of longshoremen there probably will be a greater shortage this year.

Mr. HANSELL: I asked a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health at the beginning of this part of the session as to whether he might have something to say respecting plans for the post-war period. I am not asking that he take the time of the committee to-night to say anything about that matter, because the hour is getting late. The war may not be over yet for a couple of months, and no doubt there will be time for him to make a statement. But are we to understand that he will make a statement to the house with regard to what his committee is doing in respect of plans for the post-war period?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A statement was prepared for this part of the session. But from a becoming sense of modesty I did not inflict it upon the house. I shall be glad most thoroughly to discuss the whole question of rehabilitation and reconstruction, as far as the government is concerned, at the new session of parliament.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are the regulations respecting the 75 cents an acre supplementary bonus available? I have not seen them, and I do not know anyone else who has seen them. Can we obtain copies of them?

Second, as I understand it, this bonus will be payable to all bona fide wheat producers. Is that without any qualification? For instance, will the $3,000 limitation clause in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act apply to this bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the matter of yield does not apply at all. Neither the yield nor the number of bushels applies—except to this extent, that there is a limitation of 200 acres upon the amount of land upon which an individual can collect. That means that $150 is the limitation. So that anyone with higher quantities would not come in for more than $150. The regulations are available.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if we may have an appendix setting out the advance for capital improvement for Canadian and British manufacturing accounts, similar to the appendix submitted on February 25 last? The total at that time was $268,000,000 and is now up to $550,000,000. I suggest that we should have that information in detail before the house adjourns. The minister gave us some assurance that he would endeavour to secure that information and make it available to the house before the adjournment. I am simply asking him now whether he has been able to do that.

Mr. HOWE: I made an inquiry at the time and I found it would take some time to prepare the list. While the information is available, it had not been prepared in the form of a list. I shall, however, endeavour to have the list compiled, printed and distributed to hon. members during the adjournment.

The committee rose without reporting.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.15 p.m. until Wednesday, January 21, 1942.

Wednesday, January 21, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, January 6, 1942.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman Poore Duff, G.C.M.G., acting as the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, January 21, 1942, at 8.10 p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from several members, notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, member for the electoral district of Quebec East, by decease;

Of Arthur B. Damude, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Welland, by decease;

Of Hermas Deslauriers, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Mary, by decease;

Of Alan Cockeram, Esquire, member for the electoral district of York South, by resignation.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT

JUDGMENTS RELATING TO ELECTION FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF STANSTEAD

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the Honourable Mr. Justice E. Fabre-Surveyer and the Honourable Mr. Justice Errol M. McDougall, two of the judges of the Superior Court of Quebec selected for the trial of election petitions pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, notes of judgment rendered by the said judges relating to the election for the electoral district of Stanstead.

RIGHT HON. ERNEST LAPOINTE

TRIBUTES TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since we last assembled here the membership of this House of Commons, of parliament itself, and indeed the public life of Canada, has sustained a loss than which, over many years, none has been so great. It is a loss which comes particularly close to every member of the chamber; but by no one other than by the hon. member for Lotbiniére (Mr. Hugues Lapointe) could it be felt more deeply than by myself. Of the loss to this house, the vacant seat at my side is more eloquent than words could be.

The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe whose death we so greatly mourn to-day was the senior member of the House of Commons. Mr. Lapointe entered the house as member for Kamouraska in 1904, and had been a member ever since. Upon the death of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1919 Mr. Lapointe succeeded Sir Wilfrid as member for Quebec East. At the time of his death

Mr. Lapointe had been a member of this House of Commons continuously for nearly thirty-eight years. During recent years he had no superior, and few if any equals, in parliament. He enjoyed the respect, the admiration and in no small degree the affection of members of all parties. He was regarded by Canadians everywhere as a great Canadian.

Mr. Winston Churchill is fond of describing himself as a child of the House of Commons. That apt description of himself might, in equal justice, have been applied to Ernest Lapointe. He was a child of the Canadian House of Commons, learned in its principles, its procedure, and fully seized of its meaning to the nation.

When he came here first as member for Kamouraska, Quebec, he set himself the hard and honourable task of mastering the ways of the house, and of perfecting himself in the use of the English language. So well did he succeed in both particulars that no one possessed wider understanding and knowledge of parliament, and its authority, or greater capacity for debate in both official languages, than the late Minister of Justice.

In his public life, Mr. Lapointe maintained throughout the highest standards of personal and political integrity. In politics, as in all else, he was incapable of underhand methods or of any form of meanness. He despised cunning and subterfuge, self-advertisement, and, above all, anything that savoured of arrogance, intolerance and coercion. He loved liberty, and fought valiantly to defend its principles and to broaden its bounds. Every worthy cause had in him a fearless champion. His sympathies were with the people in their struggle for constitutional and economic freedom. He was ever solicitous of the rights of minorities and of the welfare of those in humble circumstances.

Mr. Lapointe was the most unselfish of men, as he was also the most chivalrous and patriotic. His natural talent, his gift of eloquence, and the charm of his personality, would have won for him the highest place in any profession he had chosen to follow. He preferred to forgo entirely the security which the practice of the legal profession might have brought to his family and himself, and to devote practically the whole of his life to the service of his country. For himself, he sought no personal preferment or recognition, but was ever ready with praise and encouragement for others. What perhaps is greater than all else, and what more than all else served to reveal the noble patriotism which inspired his life throughout, is the personal sacrifice at which his great services were given to his country.

With his great abilities and endowments, Lapointe, had he been so minded, might have accumulated, if not a personal fortune, at least sufficient of this world's goods to have enabled him to look forward to years of comparative leisure, freed from the strain of public life and the anxiety it brings with it with respect to health and fortune. To the end of his days he chose, instead, to devote his great talents entirely to his country's services.

Time and time again, although his health was not without some impairment by the years of strain he had already endured, he put out of his mind all thought of respite, retirement, or reward, and chose to continue his membership in this House of Commons, in order that, if spared by Providence, he might continue to take to the end his place in the forefront of battle. Here, to my mind, is evidence of true greatness and of the noblest type of character.

Law, as we all know, was his chosen profession. Such practice of his profession as he enjoyed was with him merely a stepping stone to the wider field of service to the state in the parliament of his country. Had he given to the practice of law the time and energy which he devoted to politics and public affairs, his name would, I believe, have found its place in the list of distinguished jurists who have occupied the highest judicial positions in our country.

Had circumstances been but very little different, he would, I believe, most certainly have achieved the highest position in political life. When the Liberal convention of 1919 was held, Lapointe had been for fifteen years a member of parliament, having sat continuously as a member since 1904. He had had much parliamentary experience, and spoke fluently in both languages, and was recognized as an outstanding leader in parliament. I myself had had but a very few years of parliamentary experience. Though elected in 1908, and in the house until 1911, I was without a seat in the house between 1911 and 1919. I had not a seat in parliament at the time the convention was held. Despite his longer parliamentary experience and his stronger claims, Lapointe resolutely refused to allow his friends to put his name forward at the convention, and, instead, supported my candidature. From that time on, he gallantly accepted the role of lieutenant and associate, which, to the end, he filled with unswerving loyalty and magnificent devotion.

I like to feel that we shared together the succession of Laurier. While to me came the high honour of succeeding Laurier in the leadership of the party, his was the privilege of succeeding Laurier in the representation of the historic constituency of Quebec East, and with it the privilege of serving as the spokesman of his race to the people of the rest of Canada. Our long and happy cooperation was born of our common loyalty to a great Liberal and a great Canadian, and to the imperishable ideals which he cherished. I doubt if, within Canada's political history, there will be found the record of a more loyal friendship, a more constant friendship, a more unbroken friendship, than that which we enjoyed in the more than twenty years we shared so intimately together the responsibilities of leadership. We worked together side by side with a common aim: the unity of our country, and the maintenance of its proud place as a nation in that community of free nations which comprises the British commonwealth.

In world affairs the late Minister of Justice took a foremost part. On many occasions he represented Canada abroad, and always with ability and distinction. On more than one occasion he represented our country at empire conferences in London, repeatedly at the League of Nations in Geneva, in negotiations with the French government in Paris, in intra-empire affairs with the government of Australia at Sydney, in negotiation of treaties with the United States at Washington, and at international conferences in these and other countries. In his representation, in international affairs, of the Canadian point of view, one cannot but be impressed with how important was the contribution he made in shaping the evolution of the British commonwealth of nations and the troubled course of international relations toward a new world order.

The personal and political friendship between Ernest Lapointe and myself was so close, over so many years, that I cannot express what it means to me not to have him at my side to-day. I prefer to think of what I have gained from the years of our long, intimate association in the public life of Canada to what of loss I shall continue to experience.

In these critical times, more critical than any through which the world has ever passed, if there is one thing more than another for which I shall always be profoundly grateful, it is that as leader of the government I have had at my side, over so many years, the man of high integrity and noble character, the man of moderation and tolerance of view and outlook, the man of wide experience and mature judgment, Ernest Lapointe.

We are still too close to the events themselves, and the confusion of our times is too great, for us to see in its true perspective his outstanding service to his fellow men. More and more will the extent of this service become known as the years go by, when all our own people will be able to appreciate the influences and forces which have kept our country together. I pray that Canada may never forget Lapointe's many eloquent appeals to all parts of the country at the commencement of the present war, or, in the election which followed shortly after in his native province, his courageous crusade for full cooperation by Canada with Britain in resisting aggression. With nothing was he so profoundly concerned as with the preservation of national unity, and the harmonizing of differences of race and creed and class. For this unity he passionately strove through the whole of his political life. The unity of Canada was, to him, the guiding star of our national destiny.

In the last talks I had with him, he repeatedly said to me that what he most regretted about his illness was that it meant he would not be here to continue to take his part in meeting the difficult situation with which the country was faced. That regret will be shared by all Canada, and, indeed, by all parts of the British commonwealth of nations, and by all the nations that to-day are united in a combined effort to preserve freedom.

He has passed from us at the most critical moment in the history of our country, as, indeed, it is in the history of the world. Just as the spirit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier continues to inspire and guide those who cherish his aims and ideals, so I pray that the spirit of Ernest Lapointe, most faithful of all the followers of Sir Wilfrid, will continue to be a guide and an inspiration to all Canadians.

Canada and its people were uppermost in his mind until the very end. To the Reverend Father Gaudrault, who was at his bedside during his last hours, he said:

> Tell my young compatriots to work, to get ready to serve their country, to accept the responsibilities which they will have to bear, and to bear them with honour for the good of their compatriots and of Canada. Tell them that I have faith in them, that it is for them, and for my country, that I give back my life to God.

The sympathy of hon. members of this House of Commons, and indeed, the sympathy of all of Canada, goes out in their sorrow and bereavement to Madame Lapointe, to his daughter, Mrs. Roger Ouimet, and to his son, our fellow member, Lieutenant Hugues Lapointe. It was not among the least of his services to our country that the late Minister of Justice should, not only have left a name that will be honoured for all time in the country's history, but that, with it, should be associated a family tradition of service to the state.

I should fail in my duty to my late friend if I did not remind hon. members that throughout the entire period of Mr. Lapointe's membership of the House of Commons, Madame Lapointe shared, year in and year out, day in and day out, the obligations, the anxieties, the privations, as well as the joys, and other compensations, which come to those whose lives are dedicated to the service of their country. It is a fine commentary upon the noble purpose which underlay the lives of the late Minister of Justice and Madame Lapointe that the tradition of public service thus exemplified by their parents is being so fittingly carried on by those who suffer the loss of their father to-day, and who are so splendidly upholding, as an example to their own and future generations, the fine traditions of their early home.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have all listened with great respect and emotion to the eloquent tribute which my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) has paid to the memory of his friend and our colleague. May I be permitted in my own humble way to add a brief word by way of tribute to a man whom I always respected but with whom I was not so intimately associated.

In endeavour and achievement, the brilliant career of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe is, in many respects, unique in the political and parliamentary history of Canada.

Born in a country district, in the rural country of Kamouraska in the province of Quebec, some sixty-five years ago, without any inherited advantages beyond those common to many another country boy, by industry and native ability he successively attained the status of leading advocate in the city of Rivière du Loup, King's Counsel at the age of thirty-two, member of parliament for his native county and for Quebec East for thirty-seven years, minister of the crown for fifteen years, holding the high and important Justice portfolio for a longer period than any of his predecessors, and dean of the House of Commons—a record of achievement attained in Canada by but few, if any. And, finally, in 1937 he was sworn of His Majesty's Imperial Privy Council, probably the highest honour at present open to any Canadian subject of His Majesty.

On the death of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the mantle of that great Canadian as leader of our French-Canadian compatriots fell, by common consent, upon the shoulders of Mr. Lapointe; and throughout his career he carried that mantle with distinction and with credit both to himself and to his own people.

During the years of his service in the ministry of this dominion he had the privilege of participating in many international, imperial and dominion conferences; and he won for himself international recognition.

Although I did not have the honour of meeting him until after I had entered parliament in 1921, I recall that on the occasion of the Liberal convention in 1919, to which my right hon. friend has alluded, when my right hon. friend was elected to the leadership of the Liberal party, Mr. Lapointe made a speech which in my mind at least marked him as an outstanding figure in the ranks of his party; and his inclusion in any ministry formed under Liberal auspices was accepted by the country as a matter of course.

During my tenure of office in this house, he was unfailingly courteous in debate to me personally and I believe to all of the members of this house. At times his utterances rose to heights of eloquence all too rarely heard nowadays in this chamber.

In our views on political questions we were probably as far apart as it was possible to be. This was quite natural, since we were reared and educated in quite different schools of political thought. But I cherish the belief that while he held firmly to his own views on great political questions and problems, he accorded to the views of others, no matter how strongly and sincerely he disagreed with them, the same respect which he expected should be accorded to his own convictions.

I regarded as one of his most outstanding speeches the one which he delivered in this parliament on March 31, 1939, on the question of Canada's neutrality in war time. At that time I did not have the honour of a seat in this house, but I recall having read that speech with more than ordinary interest, profit and appreciation. On many occasions I quite frankly disagreed with his concept and interpretation of Canada's constitutional position. But I say in all truth and sincerity that because of that speech, I was prepared to and did forgive him much of what I considered to be heterodox. I warmly commend portions of that speech to all thoughtful students of the Canadian constitution and of our relations in the British commonwealth.

His life and his life's work are too near to enable us, his contemporaries, properly to appraise his place in Canadian history. But one feature stands out prominently throughout his life and career, one that now redounds and will forever stand to his honour and credit—his intense love for his native land.

To my right hon. friend and to those associated with him I extend our sincere sympathy in the great loss which he personally and his party in this house and the country have sustained. One by one the oaks fall. Their passing is a challenge to all of us to hold high the standards which our predecessors have raised in this country.

To Madame Lapointe and to the immediate members of his family I extend also our sincere sympathy. I recall the pride with which he witnessed his son take his seat as a member of this house in 1940 and, at the first session of this parliament, rise in his place to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At that time I offered to Mr. Lapointe my personal congratulations in the words of a great imperial statesman on a similar occasion in the imperial parliament: "It was a speech which must have been dear and refreshing to a father's heart." And I recall with pleasure the note of thanks which he subsequently sent to me.

To these, his loved ones, we offer sincerely and respectfully these expressions of solace and sympathy.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the group with which I am associated I join in the expressions of sympathy for the family of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and of regret that he has been taken from us in the midst of this period of crisis and of tragedy. We may not always have agreed with him, but every member of the house, as has been already said, recognized his sincerity, his integrity, and his love for the Dominion of Canada.

We realize that in his passing Canada has lost one of her most outstanding sons, and we join with other members of the house in an expression of regret at his passing and of appreciation of the good work that he has done for all the people of this dominion. We express, too, our sympathy with the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); for he has suffered, we know, a personal loss which is greater perhaps than we realize.

On behalf of our group, therefore, I join in the expressions of sympathy to his bereaved family and friends. We trust that Madame Lapointe especially may be sustained in the great loss which she has suffered.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, perhaps very few statesmen of the British commonwealth of nations have had, on their passing, such beautiful things said about them as have been said to-day by the various speakers concerning the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. It is greatly to his credit that there is in all of these expressions no statement which appears to be an exaggeration.

Members of my group desire to join with those of other groups and parties in the house in sincere sympathy with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the loss he has sustained, in heartfelt condolence with the members of the late Mr. Lapointe's family in their bereavement, and in high appreciation of the great life of a very good man.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words in French to the tributes which have just been registered in the political history of this country by the leaders of our various political parties. The unanimity of sentiment and of sorrow expressed by these political leaders clearly indicates the extent of the respect the late minister enjoyed in this house and of the prestige he exercised throughout Canada. The tributes justly paid to the great memory of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe will, I am sure, bring some consolation to the members of his family and some alleviation of their grief.

On this side of the house we have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) express praise and regret on behalf of those who are saddened by the loss of a leader whom they loved, respected and supported. On the other side of the chamber political opponents have in all sincerity paid tribute to the memory of the great man who is no more and have, across all political barriers, acknowledged the merit and the worth of the man who had long been the recognized and respected leader of French Canada. From all sides the worth of the great man whom we mourn is admitted. Everywhere all hearts were saddened by the premature death of so important and respected a man as Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. Today all of us, Liberals, Conservatives and members of the other political groups, are, so to speak, united around the grave of this great man, exchanging fraternal handshakes and consoling one another on the loss of a big brother.

Mr. Lapointe's career and his success in public life show what can be accomplished in a country governed and directed by the spirit of our democratic institutions for which we are now fighting.

Born of humble parents, educated in a college of his native province, Mr. Lapointe climbed all the rungs of the social and political ladder to become one of the most eminent men, not only of Canada, but of the world. It is the democratic system that has made possible the development of this great mind, that has permitted this man of lowly origin to attain so high a place in the political sphere and do so much good to his fellow-citizens. Today, I repeat, in a deep feeling of brotherliness we console one another. Let us all hope that this brotherly spirit which animates us at present will continue throughout the difficult times which lie ahead, so that we may preserve the great spirit of national unity which is so necessary to Canada and which was so dear to the man whom we now mourn.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily subscribe to the sentiments expressed by those who have spoken before me. With deep emotion I bend in thought over this great tomb and mingle my sorrow with the chill rays of our winter sun, which, at this moment illumines with a sad smile the humble corner of Canadian soil where rest in peace most sure the ashes of a great Canadian.

Mr. L.-PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I may, at this moment, use the words of the French writer: "The man whose irretrievable absence leaves in the hearts of those dear to him a void which can never be filled again, was one of the dearest friends fate had bestowed on me," and, shall I add, an incomparable teacher whose acts have been my inspiration as well as an example of civic devotion.

I shall not be alone, Mr. Speaker, to miss this great figure who is no more. All the members of this house, irrespective of political convictions, will feel his absence; this fact is amply proved by the speeches we have just heard. This brave, frank and open face, reflecting all that our race, attached to its soil, has given us of goodness and fortitude, tempered and refined by culture, taste and economic independence, will remain graven in our minds and his memory will hover over this house long after we, who have been fortunate enough to know Mr. Lapointe, have disappeared.

I have, Mr. Speaker, neither the gifts nor the ability to relate his life and draw the useful lessons it could teach us, or to paint a portrait of a man with whom you were so well acquainted that it is useless to endeavour to eulogize him, but I should feel that I had not shown all the friendliness, affection and admiration that I feel towards him, if I restrained from doing homage to his memory even in a very inadequate manner.

It has often been said that at each period of a nation's life some men appear who, whether called or made by circumstances, exemplify national thoughts and aspirations and become the interpreters of their fellow-citizens and, often, determine their evolution. Destiny sets these men up and the people recognize them when their time to serve has come. Such has been the case all through the history of the French-Canadian people. There has always been someone, at the opportune moment, to attract the attention of the masses and acquire the desired degree of ascendancy over them. One such man is now mourned by French Canada. This providential man has gone at the height of his career and at a time when his countrymen were in the greatest need of his stabilizing influence, his support, his advice.

Ever since the advent of our constitutional liberty, very few men have played so great a part as Ernest Lapointe in the development of our national destiny. The first among them, and perhaps the only one to assert himself through combativity and almost through violence, was the patriot Papineau. The others, Lafontaine, Cartier, Laurier and Lapointe were brought upon the scene through the course of events and they were selected by their fellow-citizens. They were trained political men. They all passed through a more or less lengthy period of gestation. They prepared themselves while remaining constantly in contact with the people, and when their moment came, they brought to the councils of the nation, besides a cultured mind, a deep knowledge of popular reactions, which is an essential equipment for the leaders of a free nation, of an enlightened body of electors.

For Lapointe, that preparatory period was comparatively long, but as it had begun early, he was still young when, in 1916, he brought himself to the attention of the whole country. Three years later, when he became the member for Laurier's constituency in Quebec, he was only forty-three years old, but he already had fifteen years of experience in dominion politics, and the young small-town lawyer, devoted to the interests of his rural electors had become an experienced parliamentarian, quite familiar with matters of national importance.

Lapointe was selected by his fellow-citizens as being the one who best embodied their opinions, their wishes and their mentality, and he preserved to the end those traits that had brought him to their attention; to the end of his life also he never ceased to understand his electors and to interpret their thoughts in matters of public administration.

The knowledge that he was interpreting the opinion of the great majority of his compatriots imparted to him a perfect equanimity and an absolute confidence, even in spite of the petty attacks to which public men are exposed. The great concourse of people we saw at his funeral was a most eloquent reply to his bitter though not numerous critics.

Through their deep sorrow, commensurate with the position that Lapointe occupied in our national life, the people recognize the ties that united them to him, and the tragic loss caused by his demise.

As Reverend Father Gaudreault has so aptly said: "When the tragic event became known, it was as if a bolt from the blue had uprooted an oak. And the gap still remains. An oak-tree cannot be replaced in a few days!"

After the eloquent words we have heard, the stirring tributes from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works, there is little more about Lapointe's career to be said that has not yet been stressed or remains unknown.

Everyone will admit that Lapointe, of all the parliamentarians, was the most conversant with the rules and customs of the house, the most able to authoritatively point out a precedent to justify an interpretation of the complex procedure. The political life of our country since 1904, was his own life; he knew all the details and this familiarity with the present, was supplemented by a thorough knowledge of Canadian history from the union until the present days.

In the house, he was a redoubtable adversary, first for his ready intelligence and wit, but above all for his historical erudition, his reliable memory and his assiduousness to the meetings of the house during his entire parliamentary career. However, everyone has noticed that, in spite of his eagerness in the fight, in the course of the debate, he had a method of attack all his own which, although very effective, did not leave room for any rancour, but kept the adversary his friend outside of this house.

As for his accomplishments, it would be too much of a task even to outline them, but I would like the members to make it their personal duty to "honour his memory in following the ideals to which he had dedicated his best endeavours."

The utterances, writings, acts, undertakings of Mr. Lapointe, everything that goes to make up his works, must stand as a beacon to guide those who attempt to speak in the name of the French-Canadian race.

(Text) My only excuse for taking a few more minutes of the time of this house is that, over a period of thirty-five years, in fact since my early childhood, I have known the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe intimately, and that I have been privileged to serve him in the capacity of private secretary during two periods of five years each, from 1925 to 1930 and from 1935 to 1940. Over that time there grew on my part for him not only admiration but devotion and affection, and I would have considered it amiss of these sentiments not to rise to-day, no matter how sad a task it is for me to speak in the past tense of a man who two months ago was yet in this house and who seemed destined to carry on in the line of duty for many years to come.

Upon Ernest Lapointe's first election in Quebec East, in 1919, Toronto Saturday Night stated:

> The province of Quebec has never had a stronger champion—save Sir Wilfrid himself—on the floor of parliament than Mr. Lapointe. He possesses the passionate love of his native race which marks so many of his compatriots. He is, however, essentially a Canadian, and not merely a French-Canadian. For that reason, he has the confidence and esteem of his fellow countrymen as a whole.

This was true, Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Lapointe's nationalism was broader than that of the pseudo-nationalist element of his province, one which saw beyond the borders of Quebec and embraced Canadian citizenship with full equal rights and full equal opportunities for all. It was the nationalism of Laurier blossoming forth in harmony with the evolution of the country from colonial-dominion status to that of equal partner with the mother country.

Ernest Lapointe remained true to his racial group, but, as in the case of Laurier, endeavoured to promote their interests by bringing them to the full benefits of a closer association with the rest of Canada on a footing of complete equality. He went far to reach his aim in that he obtained better understanding within his party, and, I may say, even in this house, between the two races, better cooperation amongst the duly elected representatives of the people. Unfortunately, his life's work, like that of most great men, was not yet completed; it was even in certain parts menaced, when he had to lay down the sword, and much remains to be done to ensure the realization of Laurier's and Lapointe's dreams of a country united by the fraternal spirit of cordial understanding and friendly sharing of our natural inheritance.

I have said before in this house, and I wish to repeat it to-day: There can be no true Canadian sentiment when English-Canadian citizens think in terms of empire and Britain and when French-Canadians consider their province and not Canada as their country. I might also add: There can be no real and effective cooperation as long as the majority keep all the benefits for themselves and give their minority partners the crumbs from the table, the dribbling drops from an overfull bucket, and also when the minority does not equip itself better to force the others to recognize its competence. This is part of the problem that was ever present in Lapointe's mind in these last few years, that still remains to be solved and that still demands the energies and good will of those who believe that in its solution lies the ultimate greatness of the country.

Ernest Lapointe's own parliamentary career is a splendid example of the value of preparedness achieved over quite a number of years of obscure work and patient assimilation. It can be said that from his arrival here, in 1904, he "made his way silently and single-handed to the front", and that after the long early years of training, "he rose by the upward gravitation of natural fitness." His career is also a model of tolerance and understanding because his outlook on all questions was broad and liberal. A champion of fair play, of liberty and of social justice, he was deeply convinced that the democratic institutions, so dearly conquered over intolerance and absolutism, were our most precious heritage, and although he always granted others the right to their opinion, he could never understand as sane the gesture of a free man who decried democracy and advocated totalitarianism.

A good lawyer, a brilliant platform speaker, an outstanding statesman, Lapointe was above all a great parliamentarian, and it is in the House of Commons that he lived most of the great moments of his public life.

Two paragraphs from Sir William Harcourt's speech in the British House of Commons on the occasion of Mr. Gladstone's death, at this moment come naturally to one's mind:

> What inspires confidence and sympathy in the midst of conflicting opinion is the belief that a man is acting from sincere conviction, that what he is doing is that which he honestly believes to be for the advantage of his country.

On this count I think all members of this house will agree with me that Ernest Lapointe was most deeply imbued with a sense of civic duty and most deeply conscious of his responsibilities, and that for him the first criterion to be applied to all ideas, to all measures, was their advisability or their timeliness for the good of the country at large, and I may state that all his decisions were motivated by his desire to make Canada a great, prosperous and united country.

There is one more quotation from Sir William Harcourt which I should like to read, because it applies so well to Mr. Lapointe:

> He greatly reverenced the House of Commons. He desired to maintain its reputation as the great organ of the will of a free people. . . . His conduct in the House of Commons, whether in government or in opposition, bore all the marks of a lofty spirit. He respected others as he respected himself and he controlled both by his magnanimity. He was strong but he was also gentle; he was to us not only a great statesman, but a great gentleman. . . . The House of Commons was greater by his presence, as it is greater by his memory.

I need not say here how heartily I join with those who have spoken this afternoon in offering to Madame Lapointe; their daughter, Madame Ouimet, and their son, my friend and our colleague, Lieutenant Hugues Lapointe, the assurance of my deep sympathy.

In closing, I wish to make mine these words of a great English Liberal leader, Mr. Asquith, on the demise of another great Liberal, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman:

> He has gone to his rest, and to-day in this house, of which he was the senior and most honoured member, we may call a truce in the strife of parties, while we together remember our common loss, and pay our united homage to a gracious and cherished memory.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): In 1933 a large group of citizens of my city of Cap de la Madeleine formed a social and political organization which they called the Club Lapointe. I have the honour of being the president of that club, and, aware as I am of the inspiration which the members derived from their patron, I feel that I might be looked upon as negligent in my duty were I not to say a word of tribute to the memory of the late Minister of Justice, and to express my profound sympathy to his wife and family.

At home a special confidence was placed in the late Minister of Justice, and on this occasion I must crave the privilege of expressing in a humble manner the heartfelt sentiments of my friends. After the eloquent addresses which have been made in this chamber this afternoon, and particularly the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who so kindly and feelingly spoke of his late friend and colleague, the only merit my words can have is that of sincerity.

The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe died on November 26 last; but the period of time which has elapsed since his passing away has not even begun to make us forget him, and that empty seat before us, where the least imagination makes one still see his genial face and strong, imposing body, is a sight that is both painful and depressing. His personality, his broad-mindedness no doubt made a lasting impression upon those who knew him. As one of the members from the province of Quebec, during the six years I have been in this house I have always been glad and proud that he occupied such a high position in the government of this nation and such a place of honour in the mind of the Prime Minister of Canada. In the political field as in other fields he practically always met with personal success, and while other statesmen have had at one time or another in their lives to face defeat, he was spared that trial to a great extent. But success and glory never made him look or feel otherwise than modest in his nobility and valour. Successive personal victories did not alter his kind and sensitive heart. During his public career there came from the press of this land, from the press of other countries, from his political foes as well as from his political friends, such praises concerning him as might have made others think that the summit was attained. But such infatuation was unknown to Ernest Lapointe; he simply went his way looking up and looking ahead as though guided simply by the word "Excelsior."

It is my belief that the remembrance of his humble beginnings in life caused him always to prefer simple testimonies of confidence to admiration expressed with a flourish. In reality have not all great men such kind dispositions? In support of this belief may I tell this house of an incident which took place in 1935 when the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe came to my city of Cap de la Madeleine to address a meeting on my behalf during the election that was then taking place. It was his first appearance in my city. He addressed an immense meeting. In fact, whenever and wherever he was to speak, the crowd always had the aspect, in numbers and enthusiasm, not of a local, but I might rather say, of a regional or provincial gathering. Before the meeting, while I was accompanying him to the platform through the dense crowd, an elderly and dignified lady managed to get near us and said to me, "I wish I could say a word to, or even touch the minister"; whereupon I told Mr. Lapointe what she had said and he stopped, shook hands with her and spoke to her, ending with these words, which were said with emotion as I saw his lips quiver: "Madame, vous me faites penser à ma mère. Merci." "Madam, you make me think of my mother. Thank you."

A noble heart, a noble thought! And when the greatest of all the great men of the day, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, lately having set foot in the United States, saw with his own eyes and felt in his own heart that the whole American continent was thrilled by his presence, when he became aware of the majesty of the reception tendered him he also thought of the one who had given him life, and said, "I wish my mother could have seen this." There was another nobleman, but one who had the same noble thought.

The testimony of confidence by the old lady, to which I have just referred, made a deep impression on the mind of the late Minister of Justice. He did not forget it, although he must have forgotten many other expressions of veneration. He told it to his friends and to some of his colleagues. He told it in my presence. On several occasions afterward, when during sessions I happened to meet him he would ask me in his pleasant way if my people were always of the same faith. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, they were.

May I say in conclusion that the people in my constituency, the people in the province from which I come—yes, the people throughout the whole of Canada, had faith in Ernest Lapointe. On November 26 last, when his death-knell was ringing in the air, making the fatal announcement that that most sympathetic of public figures would no more be seen alive, a cruel chill ran down the backs of thousands and thousands of Canadians who realized that a noble but humble soul had departed. They realized that an honest and ardent apostle of good-will and tolerance had just closed his eyes to the land he served so well, to the people he liked—people who so much needed men such as the late minister and his worthy friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), two real Canadians, loyal and true to each other who, like Baldwin and Lafontaine, gave us a most admirable example of a united Canada.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with deep emotion to the speeches delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and others of our colleagues in commemoration of the great man recently deceased, the late Minister of Justice. All these eulogies were eloquently uttered, but they would be but idle words if we failed to piously observe his memory.

Mr. Lapointe was first my friend, then my chief, but he remained my friend after becoming my chief. He did me the honour of often thinking as I did. I could not always think as he did, because the opinions he expressed were not always only his own, but also those of his colleagues.

I tender my heartfelt sympathy to my chief, the Prime Minister of Canada, in the heavy loss he has just sustained. It is sufficient to glance at the newspapers of August, 1919, to see how important a role the regretted Mr. Lapointe played at the Liberal convention held in the city of Ottawa to select a successor to our deceased leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Certain candidates put forward by the financiers received a large measure of publicity in the newspapers, but in the room where the delegates assembled, the memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was still lingering on. Mr. Lapointe's great success among the delegates from all the provinces in his appeal on behalf of the present leader of the Liberal party was due to his insistence on having them select as leader of their party a man who had been faithful to Laurier, who had never betrayed him, who had followed him in defeat and who was ready to revive this tradition for the good of the party. In thus appealing to the memory of Laurier, Mr. Lapointe contributed more than anyone else to the election of the man who is to-day and, I hope, will long continue to be the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it was touching indeed to hear at St. Lin the Minister of Justice's last message to the people of Canada. It was a eulogy of the man who had been his chief, of the man he so greatly admired, of the man under whose orders he had served for fifteen years—seven years while the great leader was in power and eight years while the great leader was in opposition. It was his last message to the Canadian people. We must never, Sir, forget the memory of the man whose death has left such a void in this House of Commons. The reason why I sometimes followed Mr. Lapointe blindly is that I had confidence in his uprightness, in his integrity, in his abolute honesty.

During the touching ceremonies that took place on the occasion of the funeral, both in Quebec and Rivière-du-Loup, many things have been said; however, at Rivière-du-Loup, the old parish priest of St. Patrick, a venerable old man, gave expression to thoughts which I shall be allowed, I hope, to repeat at this moment. They were uttered while the remains of our lamented Minister of Justice lay in state in the mortuary chapel at the Rivière-du-Loup City Hall. During his Sunday sermon, Reverend Roy, parish priest of St. Patrick, Rivière-du-Loup, while inviting his parishioners to pray on the remains of the dear departed, added the following words: "He was an outstanding Canadian whose memory we should cherish and bequeath to our descendants. Go, my dear brethren, see him, show him to your children. For them, as for us, he will become a model of faith and enlightened patriotism."

Mr. Lapointe did not use dual arguments, one set for Quebec and a different one for the other provinces. What he told our English-speaking fellow-citizens was identical to what he said to his French-speaking compatriots. Everywhere he used the same language and, my leader said so only a few moments ago, during the last general election, he visited the whole country, as far as Vancouver, where he supported one of my friends seated on the government side of the house, and the arguments he used in Vancouver were exactly the same as those he used in Quebec, Montreal or any other Canadian city.

Neither did he care for appeals to prejudice. He was far above all prejudice. While making himself respected, Ernest Lapointe was gaining respect for his compatriots, and that is the reason why his disappearance from the political scene is so keen a loss for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I frequently had occasion to discuss informally with Mr. Lapointe matters of public interest in which we were mutually concerned and I never feared to open my mind fully to him. I had no secrets from him. I spoke to him as if he had been an elder brother, and I was never rebuked by him. There have been, of course, periods that were very sad for him. He did not always succeed in bringing others to accept his views. But he always succeeded in commanding the respect of all his fellow-citizens, which is the finest tribute that can be paid to him.

Mr. Speaker, once again I tender my deepest sympathy to the Prime Minister of Canada, and to Mr. Lapointe's family, to Madame Lapointe, his distinguished wife, to our excellent and popular colleague the hon member for Lotbinière (Mr. Hugues Lapointe) and to Madame Ouimet.

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume the house will wish me to convey to Madame Lapointe and her family some expression of the tributes paid to-day to the memory of Mr. Lapointe, and I shall be very glad to do so.

THE WAR

PROCLAMATIONS DECLARING THE EXISTENCE OF A STATE OF WAR WITH ROUMANIA, HUNGARY, FINLAND AND JAPAN

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table of the house copies in English and French of proclamation dated Ottawa, December 7, 1941, declaring that a state of war with Roumania, Hungary and Finland exists and has existed in Canada as from December 7, 1941.

Also copies in English and French of a proclamation issued on Monday, December 8, 1941, declaring that a state of war with Japan exists and has existed in Canada as and from December 7, 1941.

TAXATION

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING INCOME AND CORPORATION TAXES

On the order for motions:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Before we leave this order of business may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) if he will be good enough to lay upon the table of the house copies of the proposed agreements with the various provinces respecting their vacation of the fields of income tax and corporation tax. I understand that these have not been settled finally in form but have been transmitted to the various provinces for ratification by way of legislation. It seems to me desirable, however, that we should have these, if not now, in the immediate future. I assume they will become public through the press as soon as they have been transmitted to the provinces, which will in turn transmit them to the legislatures. If the minister can give these to the house now, I shall appreciate it.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to give a little consideration to that request.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be alterations, I think minor only, in the agreements before they are signed. I am not just sure how far the government should go in submitting draft documents to the house before signature. However, they have been given to the press and I shall give consideration to—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If they have been given to the press, as a matter of right I claim that they should be laid on the table now. It is unheard of that they should be given to the press before being given to the House of Commons.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COLDWELL

CENSORSHIP OF MAIL ADDRESSED TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a matter of privilege concerning the members of the House of Commons as members of the House of Commons. I have in my hand an envelope and a letter, the envelope having been posted within Canada and sent to a member of parliament as a member of parliament, addressed to the post office of the House of Commons. This letter has been opened and examined by the censor; C-451 is the number upon it. From time immemorial it has been the right of constituents of members of parliament to approach their members without obstruction or interference of any kind.

I draw this to the attention of you, Mr. Speaker, as the guardian of the rights and privileges of this house, in order that this matter may be investigated and this interference with the right of a constituent to approach his member stopped. I may say that during my recent visit to Britain I had letters from persons who were relatives of mine living in the prohibited defence areas in Britain, and none of those letters was censored although they had all been posted to me as a private citizen. I cannot for the life of me see why a letter of any description mailed in the Dominion of Canada to another point within Canada should be subjected to censorship. But I do say that it is an interference with the privileges and rights of members of this parliament to have mail opened addressed to members of parliament as members of parliament on what may be matters pertaining to their activities as members of this house, and so Mr. Speaker, I draw this matter to your attention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does this letter purport to have been mailed from a defence area in Canada, if that is the proper technical term? I think we ought to know the exact facts before the house is asked to pass judgment.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not asked the house to pass judgment, or I would have moved a motion. This letter was mailed from Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, on January 19 of this year.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

BARACHOIS RIVER, QUE., WHARF

Mr. ROY:

1. Did the government construct a wharf or breakwater at the mouth of the Barachois river, Gaspe county, during the fiscal year 1939?

2. If so, was this work done by contract and (a) for what amount and by whom; (b) what quantity of timber was used; (c) from whom was it purchased and at what price on each contract?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. A breastwork was constructed at Bridgeville, Que., on the Barachois River, during the fiscal year 1938-39.

2. (a) Work was done by day labour at a cost of $4,266.30. (b) and (c) Timber purchased for this work from Alfred G. Maloney as follows:—

5,400 lineal feet of 6-inch round poles at 5 cents per lineal foot.	$ 270 00
19,420 feet B.M.—3-inch deals at $26	504 92
50,784 feet B.M.—8- by 8-inch spruce timber at $29	1,472 73

POSTAL CENSORSHIP

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Are letters from citizens of Canada to England censored in Canada before being despatched?

2. If not, are they censored by Canadians in England upon arrival there?

3. Are letters from one part of Canada to another subject to censorship?

4. If so, is this censorship done solely for the purpose of removing information which might be useful to the enemy?

5. If any criticism of a department of government has been found, has such criticism been extracted from letters and sent with the name of the writer to the department involved?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Examination is made of some letters in connection with the enforcement of the foreign exchange control board regulations. The percentage of mail so examined is less than 2 per cent.

2. No.

3. Yes, under certain circumstances in the interests of security.

4. In the course of any examination of mails, attention is paid to the enforcement of wartime laws and regulations from the point of view of security, trade, economic warfare, illegal intermediaries, enemy propaganda, subversive activities, etc.

5. Such extracts are referred in confidence to the head of the department concerned, when it is considered in the public interest to do so.

THIRD VICTORY LOAN

Mr. FAIR:

1. How many, (a) individuals, (b) corporations, subscribed to the third Victory loan?

2. What amount was subscribed by (a) individuals, (b) insurance companies, (c) banks, (d) other companies?

3. What amount was borrowed by individuals from banks for the purchase of Victory bonds?

4. What is the value of the bonds purchased by individuals on the instalment plan, now surrendered?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Data available to the Department of Finance do not enable a complete segregation to be made of subscriptions by individuals and corporations respectively. However, 9,229 subscriptions totalling $527,500,200 were received from subscribers (individuals, corporations and other bodies) on the special names list, and 959,030 subscriptions totalling $309,320,050 were received from subscribers (individuals, corporations and other bodies) in the general canvass.

2. (a) See answer to No. 1.

(b) $117,704,850 of which $22,174,500 represented conversion subscriptions of national service loan bonds due November 15, 1941.

(c) $49,450,000 of which $42,450,000 represented conversion subscriptions of national service loan bonds due November 15, 1941.

(d) See answer to No. 1.

3. Victory loan bonds purchased under the instalment plan described in the official prospectus, by individuals, corporations and other bodies, totalled $37,439,900. In addition, it is understood that loans made by the chartered banks of Canada to finance the purchase of Victory loan bonds by individuals, corporations and other bodies, totalled $135,978,539 on June 30, 1941.

4. None. No provision was made for the redemption by the government of 1941 Victory loan bonds prior to the call date. No information is available as to the amount of bonds which may have been sold by subscribers after their original purchase of the bonds.

NOTE.—It is assumed that while the question relates to what is called the "third Victory Loan", what is meant is the third public war loan which is officially described as "The Victory Loan, 1941".

ST. CATHARINES STEEL PRODUCTS LIMITED

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What amount of money, if any, has been loaned by the government to the St. Catharines Steel Products Limited?

2. Has the British government any money invested in this company?

3. How much private capital has been subscribed?

4. Who are the directors of this company?

5. Are they manufacturing any specific war weapon that cannot be produced in some of the already existing steel plants in Canada?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No loan has been made by the government to St. Catharines Steel Products Limited, Capital assistance to the amount of $844,300 has been granted for alterations to buildings, and for machinery and equipment, title to which will vest in His Majesty the King in right of Canada.

2. The British government has also provided capital assistance.

3. All working capital is being provided by the St. Catharines Steel Products Limited.

4. A. F. Field, A. W. Taylor, W. A. Wecker, E. J. H. Vanston, J. J. Bench, Edward Kennard.

WATER DIVERSION, ONTARIO

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What engineering projects have been undertaken in Ontario in connection with the divergence of waters into the great lakes during 1939, 1940 and 1941?

Mr. CARDIN: No engineering projects have been undertaken by the dominion government in connection with the divergence of waters into the great lakes during 1939, 1940 and 1941.

The thirty-third annual report of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, for the year ended October 31, 1940, states that towards the end of that year work was started on the Ogoki (Ontario) diversion which, when completed, would permit a diversion of 4,000 cubic feet of water per second from the Ogoki-Albany river watershed into lake Nipigon and the great lakes-St. Lawrence watershed at lake Superior.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What was the cost to the federal government of the maintenance of the branches of the soldier settlement board in each province for each fiscal year from 1930-31 to date?

2. How many persons were employed in each of these branches during each of the above years?

Mr. CRERAR: Statements herewith.

PURCHASE OF PLYWOOD IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

With respect to the 1,220,720 square feet of plywoods purchased for military purposes in the province of British Columbia, what quantity was supplied by each of the three firms and what amount of money was paid each company?

Mr. HOWE:

The Canadian Western Lumber Company, Fraser Mills, B.C., 154,600 square feet, $5,883.53.

B.C. Plywoods Limited, Vancouver, B.C., 1,076,120 square feet, $32,120.39.

The department has purchased plywood from the above two companies only.

The Pacific Veneer Co., Limited, New Westminster, B.C., may have supplied birch plywood to private contractors for the construction of aeroplane propellers.

The award of plywood requirements by the department was made by the timber controller on the basis of relative production capacity of the two manufacturers.

4. Chilliwack Lumber Yards.

5 and 6. As far as is known, Chilliwack Lumber Yards is not a licensed coal dealer but company advises that all their coal business is handled by a subsidiary—Robertson Brothers, Chilliwack, Limited—who hold dominion and provincial licences. The license issued by the war-time prices and trade board is numbered 2996.

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. What was the cost of establishing the Indian hospital at Sardis, British Columbia?
2. What staff is employed at present?
3. Who is the secretary or secretary-manager?
4. Was the appointment of such person made by the civil service commission?
5. If so, was competition invited?
6. What is the salary of the secretary or secretary-manager?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Cost of alterations to building	$69,161.84
Cost of equipment and supplies	54,888.10
	$124,049.94

2. 1 Medical superintendent; 1 Medical officer; 1 Matron; 13 Graduate nurses; 7 Hospital attendants; 1 Sr. laboratory assistant; 1 Engineer; 1 Clerk, grade 3; 1 Dietitian; 1 Cook; 15 Housemaids.

3. There is no such position in the establishment but the duties of such a position will be performed by the medical superintendent and clerk.

4. The appointments of medical superintendent and clerk were made by the civil service commission.

5. Yes.

6. Medical superintendent—$3,120 plus $660 in lieu of house, fuel and light.
   Clerk, grade 3—$1,380.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next order may I call the attention of the Prime Minister to questions 16 and 17, which have been standing on the order paper since November 13. Question 17, surely, would take only a few minutes to answer, and I submit that nine weeks is too long to take to answer a question of that kind. We ought to have an answer to both these questions immediately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that, unfortunately, I came into the house without the replies as they have been prepared by the department, but I shall endeavour to answer the questions orally now.

*REPRESENTATION OF VICHY GOVERNMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Church:

1. Has the Vichy government of France an ambassador or envoy in Canada?
2. If so, where is he located, who are the members of his staff; is there any inspection of the same, or regulation of the embassy?
3. Is it intended to close this legation?
4. Has the government received any request from his majesty's government of Great Britain to keep it open? If so, from whom?
5. Does this Vichy office in Ottawa conduct any dominion or empire business with Vichy?
6. If so, what is the amount of such business and of what nature is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. There is a representative of the government of France in Canada.

2. The legation is located on Sussex street, and the same precautions are taken with respect to the French legation as are taken with respect to other legations in the city.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not answer, "who are the members of his staff".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any inspection or regulation of the embassy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just the same, I would say to my hon. friend, as is the case with all the other legations. As long as there are legations here they are all treated alike. Answering now questions 3 and 4:

3. It is not the intention of the government at the present time to ask that the legation be closed.

4. My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury) is I think aware that when the right hon. the Prime Minister of Great Britain was here, speaking to members of the press, he made the intimation publicly that he would like to have our relations maintained with the Vichy government. Mr. Churchill has authorized me to make it quite clear that such a desire does exist on his part. This government is most anxious to cooperate with the British government in all particulars, and we feel that in this matter we are cooperating in a way that will be helpful generally.

Answering now question 5:

5. The legation, I assume, conducts the regular business that comes before it in the regular way.

I cannot answer the last question, "What is the amount of such business and of what nature is it?"

*REPRESENTATION OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT IN EIRE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Does the government maintain an envoy or minister in Eire?
2. If so, who is he, who are the members of his staff and what are their respective salaries and other allowances?
3. What is the annual cost to Canada?
4. Do Australia and New Zealand maintain similar offices in Eire, and where are they located?
5. Has Canada trade commissioners in Dublin?
6. If so, are these envoys not duplications of services rendered by trade agents?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government has a representative, a high commissioner in Eire.

2. Mr. John Kearney, K.C., of Montreal, for some time past has been high commissioner in Eire. I have not the names of other members of the office and staff. Mr. E. J. Garland, a former member of this house, is next to the high commissioner, and Miss O'Malley, a private secretary, is also a member of the staff.

3. I shall have to give this answer at another time, also the answer to question 4.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister cannot answer from memory, does he mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Answering questions 5 and 6:

5. Canada has trade commissioners in Dublin.

6. No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do suggest that this is a very slipshod way of answering formal questions on the order paper. Will the Prime Minister say that formal answers will be brought down in view of his intimation that they had been prepared?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said that he wished to have the questions answered immediately.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think they ought to be, having regard to the length of time they have been on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was simply trying to oblige my hon. friend, and in the circumstances I think he might have accepted the explanation which I gave.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not know what the explanation was until the Prime Minister spoke.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions 16 and 17 answered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—LEGAL SERVICES, RED DEER CONSTITUENCY

Mr. SHAW:

1. Have members of the legal profession resident in the Red Deer federal constituency been engaged by the Department of Munitions and Supply or any other department of the federal government in connection with property purchased in said constituency since September, 1939?
2. If so, what are their names and addresses?
3. What amount or amounts have been paid for legal services in each case?
4. Upon what dates were payments made for services thus rendered?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

ADJUTOR SAVARD

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Is Adjutor Savard in the employment of the Department of National Defence for Air Services, or any other department of government?
2. If so, in what capacity?
3. Was the position, to which he was appointed, newly created?
4. How was it created and in what department?
5. Where is he stationed?
6. What are his duties?
7. What is his salary?
8. What are other allowances and expenses, stating the rates and total amounts paid under different headings?
9. What was the total amount paid to him in connection with the Rowell-Sirois commission?
10. Was he formerly on the staff of the National Liberal Federation?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

RADIO BROADCASTING—DOCUMENT USED BY ERNEST BERTRAND

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Who authorized one, Ernest Bertrand, to gain access to a document, purported to be instructions from an axis power to its agent in Canada?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

2. Who authorized this gentleman to read this document over the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on or about August 20, 1941?
3. Was this document read as evidence, and behind closed doors, to the special parliamentary committee on the defence of Canada regulations?
4. Will other members of the defence of Canada regulations committee and members of parliament be given the same privilege of securing the same or similar documents and evidence for the purpose of enlightening the public as to the dangers of subversive forces?
5. Under whose auspices was the broadcast given, how many stations were used in the hook-up and what was the total price charged?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

TOTAL ENLISTMENTS BY PROVINCES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What are the total enlistments in Canada, by provinces, since the war began, to the end of October last, in the (a) army, (b) navy, (c) air force?
2. How many in each class are now serving overseas, and how many are engaged in home defence or in training in Canada?
3. Will the records, in future, record enlistments by municipalities, in the same manner as the victory loans are recorded?
4. Will consideration be given to a monthly statement of enlistments in future?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH BRIGADIER GENERAL CLARK

Mr. REID:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other correspondence exchanged between Brig.-Gen. J. A. Clark and the government or any official or department thereof, since September, 1939, to the end of September, 1941, with reference to military matters or appointments.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member really put this same matter in the form of a question before the house adjourned, and at that time I said that upon consideration my view was that to disclose information with regard to offers of military appointments would be establishing a precedent which would not be in the public interest. On that same ground I would ask my hon. friend to drop his motion.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I quite realize the viewpoint of the minister, but would he at least tell us if Brigadier General Clark was offered a position of any kind. Surely that question can be answered, and if the minister is prepared to give us that information, the motion might be dropped.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend that Brigadier General Clark was offered an appointment.

Motion dropped.

HOG AND BACON STATISTICS

Mr. BOUCHER:

For a copy of a document containing hog and bacon statistics compiled by the dominion Department of Agriculture and submitted to the bacon board on or about September 1, 1941.

YORKTON SERVICE FLYING TRAINING SCHOOL

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of all contracts and agreements between the government and the Waterman-Waterbury Company, in connection with construction in the relief No. 1 landing field of the Yorkton service flying training school, situated at Surdee, Saskatchewan.

THE MINISTRY

CHANGES IN THE PORTFOLIOS OF JUSTICE, SECRETARY OF STATE AND LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house of certain changes which have been made in the ministry since the adjournment on November 14 last. These changes have been occasioned, one, by the death of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the Minister of Justice, and the other, by the appointment to the Superior court of the province of Quebec of the Hon. P. F. Casgrain, the Secretary of State.

On December 10, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, K.C., of Quebec city, was sworn in as Minister of Justice. As hon. members are aware, Mr. St. Laurent is a former president of the Canadian Bar Association and a foremost member of his profession. He resides in Quebec city. Mr. St. Laurent has not a seat in the house at the present time, but is seeking election to the house in the by-election pending in Quebec East.

On December 15, Mr. Casgrain was appointed a judge of the Superior court of the province of Quebec. On that day the Hon. Norman McLarty, who at the time was Minister of Labour, was appointed Secretary of State to fill the vacancy created by the appointment of Mr. Casgrain; and on the same day Mr. Humphrey Mitchell was sworn in as Minister of Labour. As hon. members, I think, are well aware, Mr. Humphrey Mitchell for some years was a member of this house. Between 1931 and 1935 he represented Hamilton. More recently, and prior to his appointment, he was chairman of the national war labour board and secretary of the national labour supply council. Mr. Mitchell is a member of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and has held important executive offices in that body. At the present time he is seeking election to the House of Commons in the constituency of Welland.

RIGHT HON. WINSTON CHURCHILL

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO BE INCLUDED IN OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that all hon. members have much in mind the recent visit to Canada of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and the address which was delivered by Mr. Churchill in this chamber before hon. members of the Senate and of the House of Commons. I was very sorry that when Mr. Churchill found it possible to make his decision as to visiting Canada and to address the members of the two houses, it was not possible to give more than a very short notice of the visit and of the intention of the Prime Minister to deliver an address. I am sure hon. members will fully appreciate what the reasons were which prevented a longer notice being given than was given to them. I assume that those who were unable to be present heard the Prime Minister's address over the radio. I am sure that it will be the wish of all hon. members that the address should be recorded in the proceedings of this house. I have spoken about this matter to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and he has kindly agreed to second the following motion:

That the address which the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in the Chamber of the House of Commons on December 30, 1941, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the permanent records of this Parliament.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have very much pleasure in seconding the motion. I think it most appropriate that this motion should be carried and that this speech should form part of the records of the House of Commons. It was a great privilege to hear Mr. Churchill's speech in this chamber, and I know that most of us who were present were thrilled with the sentiments which he expressed and the opinions which he had formed and which he gave to us. If there is no precedent for what we are about to do, we now establish the precedent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It just occurs to me that Your Honour took a small part in the proceedings, and that I also had the privilege, on behalf of hon. members, of addressing a few words to Mr. Churchill by way of welcome. I did not include in the motion reference to either Your Honour's role or my own remarks. It might be understood that both might find a place on the record.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, you can never leave the Prime Minister out!

Motion agreed to.

(For Mr. Churchill's address, with introduction by Mr. Mackenzie King, see page 4478)

THE WAR

CANADIAN REGIMENTS AT HONG KONG—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since the house adjourned the name of Hong Kong has been added to the battle honours of two fine Canadian regiments, and these regiments, by the heroism of the brave men who comprised them, have added to our history an unforgettable page of gallantry and devotion.

I feel that this house should not and would not wish to prorogue without recording a tribute to these regiments and these men and without receiving a statement regarding the expedition.

I share deeply the anxiety which is felt not only in the homes directly affected, but in all Canada, in these days of waiting for news. I want to assure the house that no effort which we could or can make to get information has been or will be spared. We have sought to take advantage of every possible avenue of communication and will continue to do so.

We have recently received word that the Japanese have established a prisoners of war bureau and that they are ready to exchange information through the International Red Cross. Immediately on receipt of this word, it was suggested to the Red Cross people in London that their representative in Tokyo be requested to communicate direct with the International Red Cross representative in Canada. It is earnestly hoped that this suggestion will be accepted. If it is, it may hasten considerably the receipt of this information.

I shall now deal, first, with the manner in which a Canadian expeditionary force to Hong Kong was decided upon; second, the selection of the two regiments which were sent; third, the preparation of this force; fourth, its equipment and transportation; and fifth, its heroic operations at Hong Kong as far as we have received reports.

1. Decision to send Canadian force. On September 19, 1941, the government received a message from the government of the United Kingdom, asking us to furnish, as they said, one or two battalions to strengthen the garrison of Hong Kong.

Before arriving at a decision to agree to this request, the various strategical factors involved were fully considered. The British government, as a precautionary measure, had determined to strengthen its forces at Hong Kong and Singapore. Australia provided a portion of the additional troops required at Singapore, and Canada was being asked to supply a part of those required for Hong Kong. The British government indicated at the time that reinforcement by one or two battalions from Canada would mean an increase in the strength of the garrison much greater in proportion than the number of men that would be involved.

It was felt that such reinforcements would have a good moral effect in the whole of the far east, would give fresh evidence of commonwealth solidarity, and would reassure the Chinese as to the British intention to hold the island. In addition, the Canadian troops would materially increase the defensive strength of the garrison.

It was considered to be incumbent upon Canada, if at all possible, to accept this share of the responsibility for strengthening the garrisons in the Pacific area. After due consideration of all the factors, and on the recommendation of our military authorities who had studied the subject, the government authorized for dispatch to Hong Kong a Canadian force composed substantially of two infantry battalions.

This decision was reached on 29th September and was telegraphed to London on the same date. On 1st October we received a reply from London expressing appreciation and stating that a further message, dealing with military arrangements, would follow. This further message was received here on 9th October. On the 11th October the war office inquired as to whether, in addition to the two battalions, a modified brigade headquarters could be supplied. These proposals were agreed to.

2. Composition of the Canadian force. The force as finally determined thus consisted of a headquarters, containing various signal and administrative personnel, and two infantry battalions. Brigadier J. K. Lawson, an experienced officer who had been Director of Military Training at National Defence headquarters, and who had seen extensive service in the last war, was selected to command the force. Colonel Patrick Hennessy, D.S.O., M.C., another experienced officer who had been Director of Organization at National Defence headquarters and who also had served throughout the last war, was appointed as Senior Administrative Officer.

The selection of the two battalions to compose the force was a matter carefully studied by the Department of National Defence. In Canada we had available for selection, having in mind the necessary training and experience, the 4th division, the units comprising the brigade groups of the 6th division, which was then mobilizing, and a number of unattached battalions. The 4th division had already been assigned to an operational duty in defence of our eastern coast and it seemed therefore that the selection should come from the other forces I have mentioned.

Included in these available forces were three infantry battalions which had seen garrison duty service in Newfoundland and in the West Indies, where they had trained in defensive measures against invasion, a type of operation which might be anticipated at Hong Kong. These three battalions, because of the experience which they had had, seemed the most suitable for the Hong Kong duty, and, of the three, the Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers were finally selected.

The Royal Rifles of Canada was mobilized on the 28th June, 1940, and moved to Newfoundland on the 21st November, 1940, where it formed a part of the garrison of that island. The regiment returned to Canada in two parties on the 18th and 28th August, 1941, respectively. The commanding officer of the Royal Rifles was Lieutenant-Colonel W. J. Home, M.C., an experienced officer who had seen extensive service in France and Belgium during the last war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I interrupt to ask whether the Royal Rifles were at one time stationed at Sussex and, if so, when?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot give the date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was it 1941 or 1940?

Mr. RALSTON: It was 1940, I think.

Mr. POWER: From September or August of 1940 to December.

Mr. RALSTON: The Winnipeg Grenadiers was mobilized on the 2nd September, 1939. On the 25th May, 1940, it proceeded to the West Indies where it formed part of the Jamaica garrison until the 9th September, 1941, at which date the advance party of the unit returned to Canada followed by the main body of the regiment in two groups on the 21st September and the 8th October, 1941, respectively. This regiment was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel J. L. R. Sutcliffe, who served with the Canadian Expeditionary Force in France and Belgium in 1915, and later in India, Mesopotamia, Persia, Russia and Turkey.

When selected for the Hong Kong duty these two battalions had thus been mobilized for fifteen months and twenty-five months respectively. Both of them had trained in Canada prior to embarkation in 1940 for their garrison duties in Newfoundland and Jamaica. Their training was continued throughout these periods of service abroad. Each battalion had the advantage of having had the same men training for a long period under the same officers and non-commissioned officers. As battalions they were, I believe, properly regarded as among the most seasoned and experienced Canadian units available for this duty.

3. Preparation of the Canadian forces. When these two battalions were selected for the duty at Hong Kong, the Royal Rifles was up to full strength (with two men surplus) and the Winnipeg Grenadiers was 129 men under strength. The lower strength of the Winnipeg Grenadiers was due to its operating in Jamaica at reduced strength in accordance with British garrison establishment. In addition to bringing the Grenadiers up to strength, it was decided to provide each battalion with a surplus or reserve of 156 men, known as "first reinforcements." These "first reinforcements" are usually kept at the base when a unit goes into a theatre of war.

The total number of additional men required to prepare these two battalions for the Hong Kong duty was thus 127 men to complete the ordinary strength and 312 men as surplus or first reinforcements, making 439 in all. These additional men had to be obtained without delay from other units and training centres.

The total force which finally embarked for Hong Kong, as reported by Brigadier Lawson on board the transport, amounted to 100 officers and 1,885 men—a total of 1,985 all ranks.

Regarded as a whole, this was a well-trained force consisting mainly of two experienced and well integrated battalions. It included, however, the 439 additional men and reinforcements whom I have already mentioned, who were new to these particular battalions. Of the 439 men, there were 172, or more than sufficient to bring the force up to full strength, who had service of a year or more. Including these, there were 291 men who were fully up to the established standard of training required for overseas duty as reinforcements and 138 who were below this standard. This leaves ten men whose training record has not yet been completely reported to me.

Departmental orders require that infantry with less than 16 weeks' training shall not proceed overseas unless authorized by headquarters at Ottawa. In this case it is clear that although training requirements were observed in providing sufficient additional men to bring the force up to full strength, there would be available for the "first reinforcements" group a total of 138 to 148 men out of the force of 1,885 who had received less than sixteen weeks' training. An inquiry is being made fully into the circumstances under which these men were accepted and action will be taken in accordance with the facts found.

4. Equipment and transportation of the Canadian force. As I have stated, the war office's request for a Canadian force to reinforce the Hong Kong garrison was received here on September 19, and the Canadian government's concurrence was telegraphed to London on September 29. An acknowledgment from London was received on October 1 and this was followed on October 9 by a message dealing with the actual military arrangements and requirements.

Our military authorities were thus authorized to proceed with their arrangements on October 9. A troopship provided by the Admiralty and naval escort were to be available to us at Vancouver between October 20 and 31. The sailing date finally decided upon was October 27, which meant that the movement of troops from eastern Canada had to be under way not later than October 23. There was thus a period of about fourteen days—from October 9 to 23—in which to complete all necessary preparations, and action had to be taken accordingly with the greatest urgency and secrecy.

Provision of equipment and stores for the force was a question which received careful study, in consultation with the war office, as to the scale of provision required for the Hong Kong duties. There was some temporary doubt as to whether complete mechanical transport should be taken. As a result of a war office message received on October 11 it was decided that this would be done.

The mechanized transport for the whole force amounted to 212 vehicles, including universal carriers, and these could not be accommodated on the troopship provided by the admiralty. It was therefore necessary to secure a freighter, which was obtained through the British ministry of war transport.

The freighter reached Vancouver on October 28 and sailed, with the mechanical transport aboard, on November 4. She was a slow ship, capable of 8½ knots. When the sudden Japanese attack came on December 7 she was nearing the Philippine islands, and on December 12 reached Manila, where she remained under direction of United States naval authorities. I am not at liberty to give further information regarding this ship beyond saying that she could not, and did not, reach Hong Kong.

As far as we have been able to ascertain up to the present, the freighter which we secured for arrival at Vancouver on October 28 was the earliest ship we could obtain, and with this ship it was physically impossible to have had the 212 vehicles of our forces' mechanical transport reach Hong Kong before hostilities began on December 7.

The possibility of accommodating any of these vehicles on the troopship which carried the force itself was considered. After completing calculations of space requirements for troops and equipment it was thought that there might be space on the troopship for perhaps 20 vehicles out of a total of 212. These were sent forward by rail, but did not reach Vancouver before the troopship sailed. Brigadier Lawson, en route to Hong Kong, expressed disappointment that some of the mechanical transport was not aboard. My information is that it might have been possible, if they had arrived in time, to have put fourteen vehicles on the troopship. Whether these fourteen vehicles would have been any real help is a point of speculation to which none of us can know the answer.

The troopship sailed from Vancouver, as planned, on October 27. This ship carried the force of 1,985 officers and men and full equipment of weapons and supplies on the scale decided upon in consultation with the war office. The weapons included rifles, Bren guns, Thompson submachine guns and 2" and 3" mortars. The reserve equipment carried was calculated to make the force self-sufficient for a period of 12 months.

Arrangements were completed with the war office in regard to the provision of the balance of anti-tank rifles, which at that time could not be supplied from Canada. Anti-tank ammunition and mortar ammunition was also to be made available by the British authorities after arrival at Hong Kong.

The troopship reached Hong Kong on November 16, after a voyage of about 20 days. Three weeks later, on Sunday, December 7, Japan suddenly and without warning struck in the Pacific.

The events of December 7 at Pearl Harbour and the loss of the Prince of Wales and the Repulse a few days later completely changed the strategic position not only in the China sea but in the whole far eastern region. Japan in a few hours attained a command of the far eastern waters that was, and may be for some time, difficult to challenge. The dispatch of assistance to Hong Kong was no longer a feasible operation of war. Much less was there even a fleeting opportunity to repeat the miracle of Dunkirk.

The Japanese by these events became free to attack by land, sea and air, and the only support could come by the Chinese operating in the rear of the Japanese landward attack. The Chinese, despite all their efforts, were not able to influence the outcome of the battle. It remained for the British, Canadian and Indian troops making up the garrison of Hong Kong to face heavy odds and to fight it out, as they did.

5. Operations of the Canadian force. Our information regarding operations at Hong Kong, as the house knows, is meagre.

The first indication of action was contained in a telegram of December 8, naming two signalmen slightly wounded in action. On the following day, December 9, a telegram referred to one company of Winnipeg Grenadiers dispatched as reinforcements to Kowloon brigade. On December 10 information was received that this company was still in reserve and not yet employed. On December 12 a telegram reported that pressure had developed on left flank at Kowloon, but the situation was stabilized by all available reserves including one company of Winnipeg Grenadiers. On the 14th, however, a message reported Canadian troops not yet seriously engaged. On December 15 one rifleman was reported missing.

On December 19 it was reported that a battalion of Canadians, with other troops, was holding a line from Stanley peninsula and hill to the northwards. On December 22 we received through the Admiralty news that a counter-attack from Stanley had failed and that casualties included about one hundred Canadians. A second counter-attack by a company of the Winnipeg Grenadiers had also failed. The same telegram described the troops—presumably all troops, not only Canadians—as very tired, and noted that casualties were heavy and included Brigadier Lawson, believed killed, and Colonel Hennessy, killed by shell-fire.

On December 25 we learned of the intention of the governor of Hong Kong to surrender. An Admiralty message on the 27th added the name of Major Lyndon as missing. On the 28th seven Canadian other ranks were reported as wounded and one missing. This telegram was delayed from December 20. Later a delayed unofficial message mentioned Staff-Captain Bush as wounded in action.

I know that in this house, as throughout Canada, there is deep and heartfelt sympathy for the families and friends of the brave men who have been reported as casualties at Hong Kong, as well as for all of those who are enduring this long period of anxious suspense through lack of news.

On December 29 we received another Admiralty telegram reporting a delayed message of December 22 sent by Lieut.-Colonel J. L. R. Sutcliffe of Winnipeg, who by that time had assumed operational command of our force. His message stated "Canadian troops part prisoners, residue engaged, casualties heavy . . . troops have done magnificent work, spirit excellent."

That is a message for us to remember.

The defence of Hong Kong is in accordance with the finest traditions of Canadian armies. All ranks fought it out to the last, and more cannot be asked of any man. May I conclude in the words of the London Times. Referring to the fortitude and heroism of these men of Britain, of India and of Canada, and what they achieved at Hong Kong to help save freedom for us all, the words express far better than I can do what is in our hearts:

> The heroic defence of Hong Kong was not only beyond price as an inspiring example of valour and devotion; it also gained a footing in precious time, and, whether or not it may prove to have rivalled in that respect the decisive achievement of our forces in Crete, the invader would have gained vital days, if it had been decided to yield the colony without a struggle.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to say at the very outset of the few remarks which I wish to make on this subject that I think the country owes the minister (Mr. Ralston) its thanks for having made an objective and explicit statement about the situation at Hong Kong. In addition to other reasons, I am interested in the fate of those who may be survivors of Hong Kong, because I recall that the Royal Rifles of Canada trained in my province during part of the year 1940, and that a very substantial number of the men were enlisted from New Brunswick. I can say that four sons of one family enlisted from the little town of Upsalquitch—their name is Macdonald—and last Thursday or Friday I had a call from a young woman whose brother, a young man twenty-two years of age, I think, trained at Camp Borden as a rifleman, was among those mentioned by the minister as having been selected for the reinforcement of the battalion which went overseas. I communicated with the minister and he was good enough to reply, with as much promptitude as I could have expected, as to the fate of these gallant young Canadians.

I offer no criticism at all of the government for having sent these two battalions to Hong Kong. If we are to be in a total war, and to undertake a total war effort, aside altogether from questions of prospective manpower, and methods by which that may be attained, we must expect to share, in common with the other gallant soldiers of the British empire, and of our democratic allies, the fortunes of war.

Whether or not Hong Kong was a mistake I shall not say. Who am I, that I should criticize anyone—the British government, or the Canadian government—with the minimum of information I have? I do not propose to put myself in any such impossible position, and I offer no criticism. As soon as opportunity offers I hope the government or the department will—and I believe it will—ascertain the fate of those who may have survived and, if it is found that they are prisoners of war, do what is possible to render their position secure for the future. I know my hon. friend the minister will undertake to do that. I believe he will give information to those who are so earnestly desirous of obtaining information as to the fate of their relatives and dear ones who may have been enlisted in those regiments.

I believe there has been a somewhat strange misconception with relation to this matter. No one has criticized the Royal Rifles. It is one of the best and most ancient of our militia establishments in Canada, and it was manned by some of the finest officers who ever left our shores. There is no question about that. The personnel of that battalion was, I believe, equal to that of any battalion we have sent overseas. In some quarters there appears to be a misinterpretation of references respecting the Royal regiment. There has been no criticism of the training of the battalion proper. So far as I am aware there has been no criticism of the equipment which went with that battalion. The minister in his statement to-day has made clear the position with respect to equipment, and I accept every word he has said.

But in a measure the question of providing man-power for reinforcements is raised by the very statement the minister has made. Until the exact facts are established—and he has undertaken to establish them—there is some question in my mind whether the 152 men who went from Camp Borden, among whom was Rifleman MacBeth from a county in New Brunswick, should have been sent. That responsibility is for the permanent officials of the army. If they have not discharged that responsibility it is up to the minister to take action to see that the blame is allocated where it belongs.

Following the minister's statement I was startled to learn that before they were sent overseas a portion of these men had not been trained for the length of time the officials of the department thought necessary. But that of course raises another difficult question, namely the whole question of reserve man-power, one which I do not propose to discuss in the house to-day. But I would remind the minister and the government that it is a very live issue throughout the country, and an issue which sooner or later parliament, the government and the individual membership of the house must face. The Royal Rifles of Canada at Hong Kong are only incidental to that position. I accept without reserve the factual statement the minister has made respecting these men. Until it is shown to me that there is error in his statement, I accept wholly the statement he has made.

Hong Kong?—before this war is over perhaps there will be more Hong Kongs. We have to make up our minds, the Canadian people have to make up their minds, and the people of the democracies who to-day are faced with a situation more serious than that which has ever confronted the peoples of the world have got to make up their minds that there may be more Hong Kongs. Let us as Canadians—not as partisans—get together and face the facts realistically. Let us do our duty by those we are about to send overseas to fight for us and all that we believe.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I add a word at this point? I believe it may be said that we are united in our admiration of the defence made by the men at Hong Kong. I do not agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he states that necessarily there should be other Hong Kongs. The criticism has been made that there were some men who were not sufficiently trained and that the equipment was not all that it might have been. I believe the minister's statement provides ground for these criticisms.

I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it is indeed difficult to discuss openly the matter of equipment of men, matters of policy and the training of men either in Newfoundland or in the West Indies. May I add that we saw a Canadian battalion in Newfoundland. We saw the kind of defences they have, and the equipment they have been supplied. I say to the Prime Minister that opportunity should be given the house to discuss these matters in private session, so that no one may be accused at any time of saying anything in the house which might interfere with the war effort.

Some things ought to be said. Some questions ought to be asked. I hesitate to say those things or to ask those questions in open session. I know everything I say may go across the country, and perhaps into the outside world. In Great Britain secret sessions are held frequently. In November while some of us were in the gallery of the British House of Commons, we heard the Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, state that later that day the house would go into secret session to discuss the war effort. Many hon. members in this house hesitate at times to ask questions which come to their minds, but which may be based on improper information. But we would like to have the opportunity of discussing these matters thoroughly. There are matters which have been causing some concern to the people of Canada. There was the question respecting the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. There is the question of Vichy representation, and the further question of our relationship with Russia. All these matters have been discussed across Canada, and each offers aspects which do not lend themselves to public discussion. They involve other governments and peoples.

I am asking the Prime Minister, as I had intended to do privately before the house opened, had I had the opportunity, to make it possible at an early day for hon. members to ask questions about such matters and get proper information in a closed session.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I was unable to hear just what the minister (Mr. Ralston) said when he was speaking about the number of troops for which the British had asked. Did they ask for only two battalions?

Mr. RALSTON: One or two battalions, and then later they asked for a modified brigade headquarters.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It seems to me, on the face of it, that that is a very small number of men to send into such a precarious position. I really find it difficult to make that out. However, there is no use crying over spilt milk, as we say. But surely in times like these it would seem to be a serious matter to send so few men.

I could not quite get the combination of circumstances which delayed the vessel carrying the equipment for these men. I did get the statement about the supply ship getting to Manila and all the rest of it, but I did not get the reason why the ship was unable to leave until so late. I am wondering why the men were not held back until the equipment was ready to go forward. If there is one thing which has been apparent since the beginning of this war, it is that men simply cannot fight without machines. To send men forward without adequate equipment of all kinds is virtually to offer them for sacrifice. That seems to have been done in this case; at least their lives were needlessly risked.

I believe in the last analysis everyone in the house and in the country will agree that the lives of these men were far more important than the amount of good they were able to do by resisting the enemy for that length of time. It seems to me that if serious criticism is to be offered, it must be offered on this point: these men should never have been sent forward until the equipment was ready to go with them, or until there was reasonable assurance that the equipment would get there in time to protect their lives.

Having heard the story to-day for the first time, it seems strange to me that the ship with those men on board should have left port before the train arrived with the fourteen machines or the fourteen pieces of equipment. Surely the Canadian government or some other government had sufficient power over such ships to delay a sailing long enough for machines to join a ship. If not, I think it is time this house knew about it.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word by way of compliment to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) upon the explicit statement he has made.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is nothing before the house, only a statement by the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With unanimous consent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A lot has been said about the eastern regiment, but I come from Manitoba and I know many of the personnel of the Winnipeg Grenadiers. I have asked many questions in the past of the Minister of National Defence concerning our reserves in case we had difficulty, and from the figures he has given to-day I take it that we were short of trained men to complete these two regiments. I do not know whether that is really so, but I do know that a young friend of mine enlisted from my own community and within three months of being attested he was on his way to Hong Kong. I think that is wrong. Probably we were short of properly trained men. I understood the minister to say that when this investigation is completed the members of the house will be given an explanation as to why these regiments were reinforced in that manner.

As a member coming from Manitoba I wish to express our great admiration for those chaps who went to Hong Kong. As members of this unit they have done a fine job for Canada. I want also to express our deepest sympathies with the relatives of these men and also with the minister who is responsible at this particular time.

Mr. RALSTON: May I say just a word in reply to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore)? I did not intend to start a discussion on this occasion, but I thought that a statement should be made now. I assumed that hon. members might want to discuss it in connection with estimates or at any other appropriate time. However, I do not want to let what my hon. friend said with regard to the troopship and the ship bearing munitions pass without comment.

The ship bearing munitions was an eight and a half knot ship, whereas the troopship was a seventeen knot ship. For reasons which I cannot give now to the house and which I indicated in the statement, the original arrangement by the Admiralty was that the troopship had to sail between the twentieth and the thirtieth. That was absolutely necessary; had it not been done then, there would have been no opportunity for sailing for some very considerable time after that. The result was that the troopship had to go. You could not have a convoy, that is, two ships, one a seventeen knot ship and the other an eight and a half knot ship, unless you slowed up the seventeen knot ship. Had that been done the convoy would have been somewhere out in the China sea at the time war with Japan broke. As it was, the troopship and its naval escort got there in twenty days, whereas the cargo ship took over a month. It was not feasible, having regard to the conditions, to hold the troopship back for the munitions ship.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister should resign on account of the Hong Kong affair.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) that some of the reasons which the government had in mind earlier in this session and in previous sessions for not holding a secret session do not have the same force at the present time. I think I can assure him and other hon. members of the house that if it is desired to have a secret session, it will be arranged.

[Mr. Ralston.]

There is one point, however, that should be kept in mind with respect to a secret session. The government would wish to have here the officials who would be in a position to give information, and before the session itself was arranged it would be desirable that the government should be made aware of at least some of the matters hon. members might wish to bring up for discussion at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask the Prime Minister to keep this in mind. If there is to be a secret session at which criticism is to be levelled at, we will say, the heads of the permanent staff of the Department of National Defence, I do not think those men should be here. The minister is their spokesman, and the members of this house should be free and untrammeled to say exactly what they want to say. I have nothing in mind about this matter. So far as I am concerned, this afternoon I have shown a disposition to support the department, and I have tried to support it in days gone by. I supported the department in 1922 when the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) was attacking it. I do not say that to stir up any controversy at the moment, but I do say that if there is to be a secret session, hon. members should be free and untrammeled and not confined by the presence of members of the general staff of the Canadian army. I should like the Prime Minister to take that into consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was precisely that sort of thing that I had in mind when I suggested that it would be helpful to the ministry to know in advance what matters it was desired to discuss at a secret session. My hon. friend will realize that questions related to supplies and the like are matters of detail which no minister could possibly hope to answer unless he had his officials present. If it were desired for example to discuss the personnel and qualifications of members of the headquarters' staff, there would be no desire on the part of the government to have them present at the time.

I move that the sitting of the house be suspended until eight o'clock this day.

Motion agreed to.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 5.20 p.m. the sitting was suspended until 8.00 p.m. this day.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the second session of the nineteenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Since the present session opened, we have witnessed the extension of war until, to-day, it encompasses the globe. As aggression has succeeded aggression, the active resistance of free peoples everywhere has risen to meet it. The myth of national isolation has vanished from the earth. It is now recognized that the freedom of each nation is bound up in the freedom of all.

A little more than a year ago, the countries of the British commonwealth stood virtually alone, except for China, in armed resistance to the forces seeking domination of the world. In the front line of freedom were the brave people of Britain. Most of the countries of Europe lay at the feet of the conqueror. The heroic resistance of the peoples of Yugoslavia and Greece, the entry as an ally into the war of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the determination and military might of the armed forces of the soviet union, and the achievements of the British and allied forces in Africa have materially changed the outlook in Europe.

A new and very critical situation has been created by Japanese aggression in the far east and by the declaration of war by Japan against the United States, the British commonwealth and the Netherlands. Germany and Italy have joined Japan in declaring war against the United States. In assessing the possible consequences of Japan's action, full account should be taken of the significance of the entry of the United States into war against the combined axis powers.

In Canada, within recent weeks, the world aspect of the conflict has been reflected by formal declarations of the existence of a state of war between Canada and Japan, and shortly before, by similar declarations against Hungary, Roumania, and Finland, whose governments had passed completely under nazi domination. Canada's action in this respect was a part of the solidarity which now embraces the war effort of all the allies.

In Britain, in the far east, in the skies over Europe and over Africa, and on all the seven seas, Canada's fighting men are upholding freedom. Hostilities in the Pacific have added to our problems and responsibilities. Already by their heroic participation in the defence of the island fortress of Hong Kong, Canadian troops have written an immortal chapter of Canadian valour.

The whole economy of Canada has been increasingly directed to meet the needs of war. There has been a steady and orderly mobilization of material resources and of men and women for the widely varied tasks of modern total war.

Additional precautions have been taken for civil defence.

Further provision has been made for the dependents of members of the armed forces.

Reciprocity in the war production of Canada and the United States was established as a result of the agreement reached at Hyde Park in April last. The war production of the two countries has been further increased by subsequent joint agreements.

Comprehensive and drastic measures have been taken to control the cost of living and to prevent inflation.

My government has maintained close association with His Majesty's governments in Britain, and other parts of the British commonwealth, and with those of the allied powers. My Prime Minister and several of my ministers have visited the United Kingdom for consultation and conference. The Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand, other ministers from different parts of the commonwealth, and distinguished representatives of the allied governments have also visited Canada. These personal exchanges have heartened and strengthened our common effort.

Of particular significance have been the meeting at sea and the conferences held at Washington between the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States, and the visit to Canada of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. In these conferences, my Prime Minister and other of my ministers have been both directly and indirectly associated. The Atlantic Charter agreed upon between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain has been approved by all the allied nations. It sets forth underlying principles of a new world order upon which all are agreed. An outcome of the conferences at Washington was the important declaration, signed at Washington, at the beginning of the present year by the representatives of twenty-six nations. It binds each of the several countries to employ all of its resources against the axis powers, and not to conclude a separate armistice or peace.

In the course of the present session, the people of Canada learned with regret of the death of two former governors general. The names of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught and the Marquess of Willingdon will remain outstanding among those of the distinguished representatives, in Canada, of His Majesty the King.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the financial appropriations you have made. Their unprecedented magnitude is but one of many evidences of the determination of the Canadian people to put forth their utmost effort in the winning of the war.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I devoutly join with you in invoking the aid of Divine Providence in the preservation of our Christian civilization.

This concluded the second session of the nineteenth parliament.

ADDRESS

OF

Prime Minister of Great Britain

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

Tuesday, December 30, 1941, at 3 p.m.

Mr. Churchill was introduced by Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. James Allison Glen, Speaker of the House of Commons, presided.

Mr. SPEAKER: Your Royal Highness, Mr. Churchill, honourable members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen: I would ask the Right Honourable Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister of Canada, to introduce the Right Honourable Winston Churchill, the Prime Minister of Britain.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, on behalf of the Government and people of Canada I have the honour this afternoon to renew the welcome already extended from all parts of our country to the Prime Minister of Britain, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill.

I desire to express to Mr. Churchill the thanks of the entire country for his visit to Canada at this time. I thank him also for having so kindly consented, while in our capital city, to address the members of the two Houses of Parliament, and to speak, from this House of Commons chamber, to all the people of Canada.

I need not say to Mr. Churchill how unbounded is our admiration of the brave people of Britain. Nor need I tell him how completely he is, to us, the personification of Britain's greatness. That greatness was never more apparent than in this time of gravest crisis in the history of the world.

I speak, Mr. Churchill, for all the members of both Houses when I say that the Parliament of Canada was never more sure of its ground than when, at the very beginning of the war, it took its stand at the side of Britain in her determination to thwart aggression and to preserve freedom. Canada was never prouder of that stand than today, when, after sharing in arms for more than two and a quarter years, with Britain and other of the nations of the British Commonwealth in the defence of freedom, she is honoured, as we especially are this afternoon, by the presence in her halls of parliament of the man who, by his clear vision, undaunted courage, inspired utterance and heroic spirit, has given such incomparable leadership to the hosts of freedom.

Again I speak for all members of parliament and for the Canadian people as a whole when I say that we are unreservedly determined to maintain our stand at Britain's side and at the side of the other nations that fight for freedom. In that determination we are also resolved to put forth our utmost effort until the day of ultimate triumph over the evil forces that now seek to dominate the world.

Mr. Churchill, it is the prayer of the people of Canada that the Divine Power by which your life has been guided and guarded amid the perils and vicissitudes of war may continue to give you the vision, the wisdom and the endurance required for your mighty task. May you be spared to share in the hour of victory the reward of your life's endeavours.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honourable Winston Churchill.

Right Hon. WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL (Prime Minister of Great Britain): Mr. Speaker, members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons, it is with feelings of pride and encouragement that I find myself here in the House of Commons of Canada invited to address the Parliament of the senior Dominion of the Crown. I am very glad to see again my old friend Mr. Mackenzie King, for fifteen out of twenty years your Prime Minister, and I thank him for the all too complimentary terms in which he has referred to myself.

I bring you, Mr. Speaker, the assurance of good will and affection from everyone in the motherland. We are most grateful for all you have done in the common cause, and we know that you are resolved to do whatever more is possible as the need arises and as opportunity serves.

Canada, Sir, occupies a unique position in the British Empire because of its unbreakable ties with Britain and its ever-growing friendship and intimate association with the United States. Canada is a potent magnet, drawing together those in the new world and in the old whose fortunes are now united in a deadly struggle for life and honour against the common foe.

The contribution of Canada to the imperial war effort, in troops, in ships, in aircraft, in food and in finance has been magnificent. The Canadian army now stationed in England has chafed not to find itself in contact with the enemy, but I am here to tell you that it has stood and still stands in the key position to strike at the invader should he land upon our shores. In a few months, when the invasion season returns, the Canadian army may be engaged in one of the most frightful battles the world has ever seen. Upon the other hand their presence may help to deter the enemy from attempting to fight such a battle on British soil. Although, Sir, the long routine of training and preparation is undoubtedly trying to men who left prosperous farms and businesses or other responsible civil work, inspired by an eager and ardent desire to fight the enemy, although this is trying to high-mettled temperaments, the value of the service rendered is unquestionable, and the peculiar kind of self-sacrifice involved, will, I am sure, be cheerfully or at least patiently endured.

Sir, the Canadian government has imposed no limitation upon the use of the Canadian army whether upon the continent of Europe or elsewhere, and I think it extremely unlikely that this war will end without the Canadian army coming to close quarters with the Germans as their fathers did at Ypres, on the Somme, or on the Vimy Ridge.

Already, at Hong Kong, that beautiful colony which the industry and mercantile enterprise of Britain has raised from a desert isle and made the greatest port of shipping in the whole world, at Hong Kong, that colony wrested from us for a time, until we reach the peace table, by the overwhelming power of the home forces of Japan to which it lay in proximity—at Hong Kong soldiers of the Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers, under a brave officer whose loss we mourn, have played a valuable part in gaining precious days and have crowned with military honour the reputation of their native land.

Another major contribution made by Canada to the imperial war effort is the wonderful and gigantic empire training scheme for pilots for the royal and imperial air forces. This has now been, as you know well, in full career for nearly two years under conditions free from all interference by the enemy.

The daring youth of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, together with many thousands from the homeland, are perfecting their training under the best conditions, and we have been assisted on a large scale by the United States, many of whose training facilities have been placed at our disposal. This scheme will provide us in 1942 and 1943 with the highest class of trained pilots, observers and air gunners, in the numbers necessary to man the enormous flow of aircraft which the factories of Britain, of the empire and of the United States are and will be producing.

I could, Sir, speak also on the naval production of corvettes, and above all of merchant ships, which is proceeding on a scale almost equal to the building of the United Kingdom, all of which Canada has set on foot.

I could speak of many other activities—of tanks, of the special forms of modern high-velocity cannon, of the great supplies of raw materials and many other elements essential to our war effort, on which your labours are ceaselessly and tirelessly engaged. But I must not let my address to you become a catalogue. I turn to less technical fields of thought.

Sir, we did not make this war. We did not seek it. We did all we could to avoid it. We did too much to avoid it. We went so far in trying to avoid it as to be almost destroyed by it when it broke upon us. But that dangerous corner has been turned, and with every month and every year that passes we shall confront the evil-doers with weapons as plentiful, as sharp and as destructive as those with which they have sought to establish their hateful domination.

I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have not at any time asked for any mitigation in the fury or malice of the enemy. The peoples of the British Empire may love peace. They do not seek the lands or wealth of any country. But they are a tough and hardy lot. We have not journeyed all this way across the centuries, across the oceans, across the mountains, across the prairies, because we are made of sugar candy.

Look at the Londoners, the cockneys. Look at what they stood up to, grim and gay, with their cry, "We can take it," and their wartime mood—"What is good enough for anybody is good enough for us."

We have not asked that the rules of the game should be modified. We shall never descend to the German and Japanese level; but if anybody likes to play rough we can play rough too. Hitler and his Nazi gang have sown the wind; let them reap the whirlwind. Neither the length of the struggle nor any form of severity which it may assume shall make us weary or shall make us quit. I have been all this week with the President of the United States, that great man whom destiny has marked for this climax of human fortune. We have been concerting the united pacts and resolves of more than thirty states and nations to fight on in unity together and in fidelity one to another, without any thought except the total and final extirpation of the Hitler tyranny, the Japanese frenzy and the Mussolini flop.

There shall be no halting or half measures, there shall be no compromise or parley. These gangs of bandits have sought to darken the light of the world, have sought to stand between the common people of all the lands and their march forward into their inheritance; they shall themselves be cast into the pit of death and shame. And only when the earth has been cleansed and purged of their crimes and their villainy will we turn from the task which they have forced upon us, a task which we were reluctant to undertake, but which we will now most faithfully and punctiliously discharge.

Mr. Speaker, according to my sense of proportion this is no time to speak of hopes of the future or of the broader world which lies beyond our struggles and our victory. We have to win that world for our children. We have to win it by our sacrifices. We have not won it yet. The crisis is upon us. The power of the enemy is immense. If we were in any way to underrate the strength, the resources or the ruthless savagery of that enemy we should jeopardize not only our lives—for they will be offered freely—but the cause of human freedom and progress to which we have vowed ourselves and all we have. We cannot for a moment, Sir, afford to relax. On the contrary, we must drive ourselves forward with unrelenting zeal. In this strange, terrible world war there is a place for everyone, man and woman, old and young, hale and halt. Service in a thousand forms is open. There is no room now for the dilettante, for the weakling, for the shirker or the sluggard. The mine, the factory, the dockyard, the salt sea waves, the fields to till, the home, the hospital, the chair of the scientist, the pulpit of the preacher—from the highest to the humblest, the tasks all are of equal honour. All have their part to play. The enemies ranged against us, coalesced and combined against us, have asked for total war. Let us make sure they get it.

That grand old minstrel, Harry Lauder—Sir Harry Lauder, I should say, and no honour was better deserved—had a song in the last war which began:

> If we all look back o'er the history of the past,
> We can just see where we are.

Let us then look back. Sir, we plunged into this war all unprepared because we had pledged our word to stand by the side of Poland, which Hitler had feloniously invaded and, in spite of a gallant resistance, had soon struck down. There followed that astonishing seven months which were called on this side of the Atlantic the "phoney" war. Suddenly the explosion of pent-up German strength and preparation burst upon Norway, Denmark, Holland and Belgium. All these absolutely blameless neutrals, to most of whom Germany up to the last moment was giving every kind of guarantee and assurance, were overrun and trampled down. The hideous massacre of Rotterdam, where thirty thousand people perished, showed the ferocious barbarism in which the German air force revels when, as in Warsaw and later Belgrade, it was able to bomb practically undefended cities.

On top of all this came the great French catastrophe. The French army collapsed and the French nation was dashed into utter and, as it has proved so far, irretrievable confusion. The French government had, at their own suggestion, solemnly bound themselves with us not to make a separate peace. It was their duty, and it was also their interest, to go to North Africa, where they would have been at the head of the French empire. In Africa with our aid they would have had overwhelming sea power; they would have had the recognition of the United States, and the use of all the gold they have lodged beyond the seas. If they had done this, Italy might have been driven out of the war before the end of 1940, and France would have held her place as a nation in the councils of the allies, and at the conference table of the victors.

But their generals misled them. When I warned them that Britain would fight on alone, whatever they did, their generals told their Prime Minister and his divided cabinet, "In three weeks England will have her neck wrung like a chicken." Some chicken! Some neck!

What a contrast, Sir, has been the behaviour of the valiant, stout-hearted Dutch, who still stand forth as a strong-living partner in the struggle. Their venerated Queen and their government are in England. Their princess and her children have found asylum and protection here in your midst. But the Dutch nation are defending their empire with dogged courage and tenacity by land, sea and in the air. Their submarines are inflicting a heavy daily toll upon the Japanese robbers who have come across the seas to steal the wealth of the East Indies, and to ravage and exploit its fertility and its civilization.

The British Empire and the United States are going to the aid of the Dutch. We are going to fight out this new war against Japan together. We have suffered together and we shall conquer together. But the men of Bordeaux, the men of Vichy—they would do nothing like this. They lie prostrate at the foot of the conqueror. They fawned upon him. And what have they got out of it? The fragment of France which was left to them is just as powerless, just as hungry as, and even more miserable because more divided than the occupied regions themselves. Hitler plays from day to day a cat and mouse game with these tormented men. One day he will charge them a little less for holding their countrymen down. Another day he will let out a few thousand broken prisoners of war from the million and a half or million and three quarters he has collected. Or, again, he will shoot a hundred French hostages to give them a taste of the lash. On these blows and favours the Vichy government have been content to live from day to day. But even this will not go on indefinitely. At any moment it may suit Hitler's plans to brush them away. Their only guarantee is Hitler's good faith which, as everyone knows, biteth like the adder and stingeth like the asp. Some Frenchmen there were who would not bow their knees and who under General de Gaulle have continued to fight at the side of the allies. They have been condemned to death by the men of Vichy, but their names will be held, and are being held, in increasing respect by nine Frenchmen out of every ten throughout the once happy, smiling land of France.

But now, Sir, strong forces are at hand. The tide has turned against the hun. Britain, which the men of Bordeaux thought and then hoped would soon be finished, Britain with her empire around her carried the weight of the war alone for a whole long year through the darkest part of the valley. She is growing stronger every day. You can see it here in Canada. Anyone who has the slightest knowledge of our affairs is aware that very soon we shall be superior in every form of equipment to those who have taken us at the disadvantage of being but half armed.

The Russian armies under their warrior leader Joseph Stalin are waging furious war with increasing success along a thousand-mile front of their invaded country. General Auchinleck at the head of a British, South African, New Zealand and Indian army is striking down and mopping up the German and Italian forces who had attempted the invasion of Egypt. Not only, Sir, are they being mopped up in the desert but great numbers of them have been drowned on the way there by the British submarines and the Royal Air Force, in which Australian squadrons play their part. As I speak this afternoon an important battle is being fought around Agedabia. We must not attempt to prophesy its result, but I have good confidence. Sir, all this fighting in Libya proves that when our men have equal weapons in their hands and proper support from the air they are more than a match for the Nazi hordes.

In Libya as in Russia events of great importance and of most hopeful import have taken place. But, greatest of all, the mighty republic of the United States has entered the conflict and entered it in a manner which shows that for her there can be no withdrawal except by death or victory.

Et partout dans la France occupée et inoccupée, car leur sort est égal, les honnêtes gens, le grand peuple, la nation française, se redressent. L'espoir se rallume dans les cœurs d'une race guerrière, même désarmée, berceau des libertés révolutionnaires, et terrible aux vainqueurs. Partout on voit le point du jour et la lumière grandit, rougeâtre mais claire.

Nous ne perdrons jamais confiance que la France jouera le rôle des hommes libres et qu'elle reprendra, par des voies dures, sa place dans la grande compagnie des nations libératrices et victorieuses.

Ici, au Canada, où la langue française est honorée et parlée, nous nous tenons prêts et armés pour aider et saluer cette résurrection nationale.

(Translation): And everywhere in occupied or unoccupied France, their lot being the same, the decent portion of that great people, the French nation, are raising their heads again. Hope is revived in the hearts of a warlike though disarmed race, cradle of revolutionary liberties and scourge of conquerors. Everywhere breaks the dawn and the light spreads, reddish but bright.

We shall ever be confident that France will play the part of free men and that she will regain, after many tribulations, a place among the great victorious and liberating nations.

Here in Canada, where the French language is cherished and spoken, we stand ready and armed to help and welcome this national resurrection.

(Text): Now that the whole of the North American continent is becoming one gigantic armed camp; now that the immense reserve power of Russia is gradually becoming apparent; now that long-suffering, unconquerable China sees help approaching; now that the outraged and subjugated nations can see daylight ahead, it is permissible to take a broad forward view of the war.

Sir, we may observe three main periods or phases in the struggle that lies before us. First, there is the period of consolidation, of combination, and of final preparation. In this period, which will certainly be marked by much heavy fighting, we shall still be gathering our strength, resisting the assaults of the enemy, and acquiring the necessary overwhelming air superiority and shipping tonnage to give our armies the power to traverse, in whatever numbers may be necessary, the seas and oceans which, except in the case of Russia, separate us all from our foe. It is only when the vast shipbuilding programme, on which the United States has already made so much progress, and which you are powerfully aiding, comes into full flood, that we shall be able to bring the whole force of our manhood and of our modern scientific equipment to bear upon the enemy. How long this period will take depends upon the vehemence of the effort put into production in all our war industries and shipyards.

The second phase, Sir, which will then be open may be called the phase of liberation. During this phase we must look to the recovery of the territories which have been lost or which may yet be lost, and also we must look to the revolt of the conquered peoples from the moment that the rescuing and liberating armies and air forces appear in strength within their bounds. For this purpose it is imperative that no nation or region overrun, that no government or state which has been conquered, should relax its moral and physical efforts and preparations for the day of deliverance. The invaders, be they Germans or Japanese, must everywhere be regarded as infected persons, to be shunned and isolated as far as possible. Where active resistance is impossible, passive resistance must be maintained. The invaders and tyrants must be made to feel that their fleeting triumphs will have a terrible reckoning, and that they are hunted men and that their cause is doomed. Particular punishment will be reserved for the Quislings and traitors who make themselves the tools of the enemy. They will be handed over to the judgment of their fellow countrymen.

Sir, there is a third phase which must also be contemplated, namely, the assault upon the citadels and homelands of the guilty powers both in Europe and in Asia.

Thus I endeavour in a few words to cast some forward light upon the dark inscrutable mysteries of the future. But in thus forecasting the course along which we should seek to advance we must never forget that the power of the enemy and the action of the enemy may at every stage affect our fortunes. Moreover, Sir, you will notice that I have not attempted to assign any time limits to the various phases. These time limits depend upon our exertions, upon our achievements, and upon the hazardous and uncertain course of the war.

Nevertheless, I feel it is right at this moment to make it clear that, while an ever-increasing bombing offensive against Germany will remain one of the principal methods by which we hope to bring the war to an end, it is by no means the only method which our growing strength now enables us to take into account. Evidently the most strenuous exertions must be made by all. As to the form which those exertions take, that is for each partner in the Grand Alliance to judge for himself in consultation with others and in harmony with the general scheme.

Let us then, Sir, address ourselves to our task, not in any way underrating its tremendous difficulties and perils, but in good heart and sober confidence, resolved that, whatever the cost, whatever the suffering, we shall stand by one another, true and faithful comrades, and do our duty, God helping us, to the end.

Mr. SPEAKER: We will close this historic meeting with the singing of the National Anthem.

The National Anthem having been sung, the gathering dispersed with three cheers for Mr. Churchill.
